NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY

CANADA'S CONTRIBUTION TO EUROPEAN DEFENCE —REFERENCE TO STATEMENT OF MINISTER OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): With your permission, Mr. Speaker, I should like to refer to the question of privilege raised by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) on Wednesday with respect to certain statements reported to have been made by the Minister of National Defence at Rotterdam the previous day. The information I have received from the Minister of National Defence is to the following effect:

It was of course known to the press that Canada would be having a brigade group and eleven squadrons in Europe, and that that would require accommodation and airfields. It was indicated in the house on October 22 by the Minister of National Defence that airfields and accommodation were not available on the continent, and that the first of our squadrons would have to be sent to England pending the construction of airfields. The minister's declaration is to be found at page 280 of Hansard for October 22.

It was also known that the cost of construction would have to be met, and that we in Canada have always said that we expected to contribute our share. It was also known that our effort had been to ensure that this would be done in a way to avoid our becoming direct owners of property in Europe. The minister states that at the press conference in Rotterdam he did not give any figure of $100 million or any figure at all; that in fact no new information was given except as to the number of airfields required for eleven squadrons; that that was a figure which is arrived at by dividing the number of squadrons by the capacity of an airfield; and that no other new information whatsoever was supplied.

There were two news stories published in the Ottawa papers but our information is that one of those stories, at least in part, had been prepared before the press conference at Rotterdam. This matter is one that was covered by the communiqué of the NATO council meeting in Ottawa on September 20, 1951, and is referred to in paragraph 8 of that communiqué which reads as follows:

> The council noted that agreement had been reached on the financing of an "infrastructure"—

That is a new word which is put between quotation marks.

> —program of airfields, communications and certain installations for the support of forces. These projects will continue without delay.

I am satisfied that no new policy was announced, and that the minister would have been very careful not to announce any policy in that respect which had not been communicated to this house. It has been our firm intention, although this is something for which responsibility has to be taken by the government, to give full information to the house before attempting to carry out any decisions that are arrived at, in order that the house may have an opportunity of expressing its views upon the decisions and saying whether or not it is in agreement with those decisions.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): I submit, Mr. Speaker, that what has been put before the house by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) does not adequately deal with the question of privilege which has been raised. The point of concern to the members of this house and to the people of Canada is the very ancient principle that the first responsibility of parliament is the control of money. It is not a question of whether members feel that they were slighted in not hearing about declarations of this kind first. The important thing is that neither the question of policy involving very heavy financial commitments, nor the undertaking to other nations through the press that we were going to make such commitments, should be made at any time without the elected representatives of the people in parliament deciding on such a point.

The Prime Minister has stated that he has been informed by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) that he did not use the figures in the press conference to which reference has been made. Naturally, the Prime Minister is in the position where he has presented to the Minister of National Defence the reports that have appeared, and to which reference has been made. In relation to the words that were used, may I say that they were not statements of mine but were reports appearing in the press which were referred to in this house in the remarks that I made. The Prime Minister has given the interpretation placed on the interview by the Minister of National Defence. I must say it is difficult to grasp the explanation made by the Minister of National Defence that the Canadian Press report went beyond what he said. In the first place, the Canadian Press dispatch was one which carried the name of one of the most famous Canadian war reporters, who since the war has been dealing particularly with military matters. I believe that every hon. member of this house will approve of my statement that Mr. Douglas How is one of the most highly regarded members of the press gallery. He gave us a detailed account starting with the words:

> Defence Minister Claxton said this morning in Rotterdam that Canada will foot the bill for the construction of four or five aerodromes in Europe.

Then, after explaining the fact that this statement was made at the time the Canadian 27th infantry brigade was being turned over to General Eisenhower, the report goes on:

> The aerodromes, he said, will cost $100 million.

I would be very reluctant to believe that Mr. Douglas How would make a statement of that kind unless it had been made, but the thing that makes it difficult to accept the explanation of the minister in this respect is that a similar statement was carried by the British United Press. It is a strange coincidence that they believed also the statement had been made in regard to Canada paying the building costs. Furthermore, a similar dispatch was carried by the United Press in the United States, and by Associated Press in the United States and throughout the world.

I believe it may indicate how difficult it is to understand any suggestion that there was an extension of the minister's remarks when I read this paragraph from an Associated Press dispatch from Rotterdam, dated November 21, which appeared in the New York Herald Tribune on November 22:

> Canadian defence minister Brooke Claxton said here today that Canada will build four or five new airstrips in western Europe to field an eleven squadron jet air division. He estimated the cost at $100 million.

It would indeed be a remarkable thing if at that press conference the representatives of several of the best known press agencies, for some reason, all introduced statements which had not actually been made by the minister. I would point out that in his remarks the Prime Minister has not referred to another statement, which was not made at Rotterdam but was made the day before, and which goes to this whole question as to whether or not statements of policy and commitments are being made outside of this parliament without parliament previously knowing about them. An earlier dispatch from The Hague dated November 20, and also signed by Mr. Douglas How of Canadian Press, contains a brief statement in regard to the arrival there of the Canadian contingent. Then it refers to the construction of barracks in Germany, and it deals very definitely with where they are to be and what is to be done. It reads in part as follows:

> Defence Minister Claxton announced last night that Canada is planning to erect permanent quarters for her 27th brigade in the Soest area of western Germany—a move which would put a garrison in that key area for any allied defence stand east of the Rhine.

Then further in that same dispatch I quote these words:

> . . . the minister said the barracks will be built by Germans, the work to start in the next few months and be completed late next year.

Further on in the same dispatch I quote these words:

> It is expected to cost between $5 million and $10 million.

That was a very definite statement of policy and commitment which has not been covered by the remarks of the Prime Minister, and which cannot be covered by any reference to the general statement of the Minister of National Defence of October 22, when he simply made a broad statement that aerodromes were not now available in Europe and in the meantime the squadrons were to be based in Britain, or any general reference to the fact that Canadian troops would be sent to Europe and trained there. Those are definite and positive statements which have appeared not only in Canada but in Europe and the United States.

I believe that this is a matter of considerable importance to all of us, having regard to the position in which we find ourselves in these difficult days. We should certainly be giving every assurance we can to our associates as to what we are doing. We certainly should be giving every assurance that we can as to our full participation in the joint effort for the preservation of peace and the defence of our western civilization. No word that I have used in reference to these dispatches can in any way be taken as a suggestion that I am objecting to Canada's accepting such responsibility as has been approved by this house and by the parliament of Canada. What I am pointing out is that statements of the Minister of National Defence at this particular time have more weight and are of greater importance than those of any other minister, when they are taken in relationship to the place where they were made and to the circumstances under which they were made.

Naturally the people of Canada look to the Minister of National Defence to tell them the facts and to inform them with regard to the defence situation and the things that we are doing. The statement in regard to the construction of barracks and the statement in regard to the construction of airfields, and the cost of those barracks and of those airfields, are things about which every Canadian is naturally greatly interested. Most of all the elected representatives of the people sitting here in this house have an interest and a duty in connection with such statements. But his statements over there have gone further than that. In explaining what Canada was doing in connection with the air, I find that in another Canadian Press dispatch from Rotterdam there is a reference to the eleven squadrons and to the part they are going to play. I quote from a Canadian Press dispatch from Rotterdam, of November 21, referring to the statement of the Minister of National Defence:

> Claxton told reporters that the production of Sabre jets at Montreal is the biggest phase of Canada's arms production. He said the Sabre can and does lick the Russian-built MIG-15 daily in Korea.

I think that those who have seen the Sabre jet in operation know that it is an immensely powerful aircraft with great speed. But I think that it is important to keep a sense of proportion in regard to these matters. I think the Canadian people should keep all our participation in a true perspective, and that the perspective should be properly delineated by the Minister of National Defence above all others. On the very same day that the minister was making in Rotterdam that statement which conveyed the impression of the superiority of the Sabre jet, the commander of the United States air force was making a statement in Washington which is something that should be in the minds of everyone if there is any thought of complacency. I quote from an Associated Press dispatch from Washington dated November 21:

> The Chinese communist air force has deployed in North China and Manchuria about 1,500 planes, approximately one-half of which are MIG-15 jet fighters. The MIG "in many respects can outperform our own F-86"; it has outclimbed the best airplanes that have been tested against it and performed in combat at altitudes approaching 50,000 feet.

That is a quotation from an Associated Press dispatch from Washington on the same day as the other statement was made in Rotterdam. The reliability of these statements of the Minister of National Defence with regard to matters of defence assumes increasing importance; and I submit that the points of privilege which were raised in this house in respect of the statements as to policy and to commitments have not been answered by the Prime Minister, although I am sure the Prime Minister has fully interpreted the statement made to him by the Minister of National Defence. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that there is still much to be explained to this house as to why the Minister of National Defence was making statements of that kind in Europe, when the elected representatives of the people have not had an opportunity to pass on those extremely important decisions.

Mr. St. Laurent: I am not going to attempt any controversy on the accuracy or otherwise of the statements I received from the Minister of National Defence as contrasted with statements which have appeared in dispatches in the press. I obtained this information from the Minister of National Defence. I take it to be accurate, and I am putting it before the house as such.

With respect to the construction of barracks, I am afraid that the leader of the opposition did not read the whole of this clipping or dispatch from The Hague of November 20. In it there is this statement:

> In a talk with reporters aboard an RCAF plane which flew him swiftly on a three-stop flight around western Europe, the minister said the barracks will be built by Germans, the work to start in the next few months and be completed late next year.
> It is Canada's hope that a way can be found to prevent the Canadian government from becoming a land owner in Germany, that is, that this would become part of her contribution to the North Atlantic Treaty Organization without remaining Canadian property.

It seems to me that that is quite in line with our expectation that we are going to have to provide our share of the cost of construction but that it is no part of our policy to become owners of military establishments in continental Europe.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I do not want to extend this discussion because there is, of course, a much more extensive report than has been referred to by either of us. But I would point out with reference to that particular point that the minister has made a definite statement there, if the report is correct, that Canada is going ahead to build within the next few months barracks in the Soest area of western Germany and as far as the minister's statement goes it is the expressed hope that through some arrangement still to be made Canada may be able to claim that as part of our contribution under NATO.

That is a very different thing from making a contribution under NATO and having the installation built by NATO and under NATO direction. There has as yet been neither an announcement of policy in this house nor an opportunity for the members of this house to express any opinion in regard to Canada undertaking to construct barracks in Germany or any place else under such arrangements as these. It is not likely that Germany will be the only place that may be under consideration. Before any positive declaration is made that we are going to do certain things within a certain time limit in a certain area, I submit that the statement of policy should be enunciated here and that the members of the house should have an opportunity of passing upon it.

Mr. St. Laurent: The statement of policy will be enunciated here and will not be in the form of newspaper reports of interviews with any individual.

Mr. Drew: I am glad that the Prime Minister made the statement he has just made, because the whole point that was raised as a matter of privilege was that the members of this house do not want policy to be announced by ministers through the press; they want it to be announced here in this house.

PUBLIC WORKS ACT

TENDERS BY PUBLIC ADVERTISEMENT FOR EXECUTION OF WORK

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (Minister of Public Works) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 26, to amend the Public Works Act.

Mr. Green: Explain.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): This proposed bill will be consequential on the passing of Bill No. 25, which received first reading yesterday, to provide for the financial administration of the government of Canada, audit of the public accounts and the financial control of crown corporations. Paragraph (c) of section 1 will be amended and subsection 2 of the old act will be deleted to conform with the provisions of the bill I have just mentioned.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

RAILWAY ACT

AMENDMENT TO INCREASE SALARIES OF CHIEF COMMISSIONER AND OTHER COMMISSIONERS OF TRANSPORT BOARD, ETC.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to provide in the proposed measure to amend the Railway Act, Bill 12, now before the house, that the salaries of the chief commissioner of the transport board and of the other commissioners be increased and that the present chief commissioner be now, and that any subsequent appointee to that office become, on retirement therefrom, an additional puisne judge of the exchequer court.

[Mr. Drew.]

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

MOTOR VEHICLES

REQUEST FOR AMOUNT OF SALES IN CANADA IN 1950 AND 1951

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. T. Fulford (Leeds): In view of the expensive and scurrilous propaganda sheets being sent out by the Vancouver Motor Vehicle Association, copies of which I hold in my hand, I should like to direct a question to the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance. Can the hon. member give the figures on the sales of motor vehicles in Canada in 1950 and 1951?

Mr. James Sinclair (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Finance): The hon. member was good enough to give me notice of the question, and more than that, when I myself received this scurrilous advertisement I realized that questions would be asked. I must confess that it is in the same class as the Labour-Progressive party publication referred to by the leader of the opposition. The figures I submit illustrate most clearly the weak premise of the advertisement. In the first nine months of 1950, the biggest year of car sales in Canada's history, 331,244 new motor vehicles were sold. In the first nine months of this year, after added taxes and credit restrictions, 320,322 new motor vehicles were sold. As far as value is concerned the total sales by motor vehicle dealers, including sales of cars, parts and services, in 1950 were $1,053 million. In 1951 the figures were $1,294 million.

Mr. Drew: It might be very helpful if the parliamentary assistant would bring down the 1951 figures up to the date when the new taxes came into effect and afterwards, because that would be more informative.

Mr. Sinclair: I will obtain that. The hon. member did not give notice of that, but I will obtain it for him. The fact of the matter is, as far as dealers are concerned, it is not the effect on their business for one month that they are interested in, but the effect on their business year in and year out. Here is the nine months' business of 1951 as contrasted with nine months' business of 1950.

Mr. Drew: I think the hon. member is well aware that the advertisement to which he refers is dealing with the effect of the taxes and restrictions which came in well on in this year.

Mr. Fulton: When the hon. gentleman is giving the figures—I have no idea what they will show—will he also bring down figures to show the sales in British Columbia, because I understand the advertisement came from the British Columbia Motor Vehicle Association.

Mr. Sinclair: In fairness to the dealers of my own riding and other B.C. ridings, this scurrilous advertisement did not come from the British Columbia dealers but from the Vancouver motor dealers.

Mr. Fulton: Will you bring that down?

Mr. Sinclair: I will be glad to obtain those figures.

Mr. Harkness: When the parliamentary assistant is bringing down the information to which he refers, will he also bring down information as to whether the figures given in this advertisement in respect to the amount of federal tax here and in the United States, namely, $450 in Canada and $100 in the United States are correct. If not, what are the correct figures?

Mr. Sinclair: The hon. member had every opportunity to ask that question when the excise tax bill was before the house last spring. My recollection is that he did ask that question.

WHEAT

STORAGE FACILITIES AT CHURCHILL—REQUEST FOR ENLARGEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. R. Knight (Saskatoon): I should like to repeat to the Minister of Transport the question that I asked the other day, which he did not answer owing to the fact, as he said, he had no representations at the time. Has the government any plans for the enlargement of the facilities for grain handling at the port of Churchill, in view of the representations now in the hands of the government from the interprovincial farmers' union council?

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): If my recollection serves me rightly, I have received a letter from some union in Saskatchewan. Before I reply to the question I should like to read the letter more carefully than I have because I received it only this morning. When I have read it perhaps I shall be in a better position to reply to the question.

Inquiries of the Ministry

TOBACCO

INQUIRY AS TO PRESENTATION OF INTERIM BUDGET

On the orders of the day:

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. I recognize that he cannot go into too much explanation, since I have not given him notice of it. In view of the rumours started by certain circulars affecting the tobacco industry of this country, is there any intention of introducing what might be called an interim or "baby" budget during this session?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): No, there is no such intention.

CANADA LANDS SURVEYS ACT

REVISION AND CONSOLIDATION OF FORMER STATUTE

Hon. George Prudham (Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys) moved the third reading of Bill No. 14, respecting the surveys of public lands of Canada.

Motion agreed to, bill read the third time and passed.

PENSION ACT

PROVISION FOR INCREASES IN RATES OF PENSION FOR DISABILITY AND FOR DEATH

Hon. Hugues Lapointe (Minister of Veterans Affairs) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to amend the Pension Act to provide for increases in the rates of pension for disability and for death under the act.

Mr. Brooks: Is the minister going to make any further statement now?

Mr. Lapointe: It is not my intention to make a statement at this stage. I feel, Mr. Speaker, that any statement I would make at this stage would be nothing else but a repetition of the announcement which I made on November 16, on which occasion I gave a broad outline of the increases which were proposed in the legislation which would follow this resolution. It is my understanding that this announcement, generally speaking, did meet with the approval of all hon. members in this house, of the veterans of Canada, and of their national organizations, and I would hope we would go through the stages of this resolution without any further debate.

Mr. A. J. Brooks (Royal): I thank the minister for his statement I have just a few words to say with reference to the resolution.

I think the minister is correct in saying that there was general approval of his statement not only in the house, but throughout the country. As a matter of fact I have heard few statements in this house which received so much approval as the statement which the minister made. We all welcomed his announcement to the effect that there would be an increase in the basic rate of pension. As I pointed out after the statement was made the other day, we have waited long for this increase in the basic rate—waited nearly a year. I think the general approval indicated throughout the house and country was of the fact that, after a year of waiting, the government has realized that this has to be done, and that the matter is being attended to.

I should like to read an editorial in the Ottawa Journal of November 20 which, I think, expresses well the general reaction throughout the country. It says:

> Seldom has the government taken a step that met with such general approval. All the opposition parties in the Commons have been urging that disabled veterans should have higher pensions, and the veterans organizations have pointed out that the old pension rates were totally inadequate in this period of inflated prices. Nobody disputes the proposition that the state has a special responsibility to those who are maimed, or lost their health, in its defence.

I think that states fairly and correctly the general attitude regarding this increase in the basic rate of pension.

I would also congratulate at this time the different veterans organizations throughout the country. I noticed that in his remarks the other day the minister said that it was after reviewing the situation and considering recent representations of the veterans organizations that the government had come to this conclusion. I know from my own personal experience that the veterans throughout Canada have worked long and diligently to have this change brought about.

I suggest, too, as is mentioned in the editorial I read, that the different opposition parties in the house deserve congratulations on the splendid effort they have made to bring about this increase in the basic rate of pension. Anyone who will take the trouble to read again the report of the activities of the last veterans committee will see that, from the very outset, from the very first meeting, day after day and meeting after meeting, opposition members on that veterans affairs committee pleaded with government members and with the government to have this matter of basic pensions reconsidered with a view to having an increase in the amount.

As I have said on former occasions, we were greatly disappointed when the matter was not attended to at the last session of parliament. The government's action is now obvious. It has done the only thing it could do. I am sure there is no fair-minded man either in the house or outside it who could have contemplated doing less than has been done. The present suggestion by the minister that there should be an increase is certainly the correct one. And when we take into consideration the greatly increased cost of living in Canada, and the fact that this is the basis upon which the increase in pension is being granted, we realize at once that the matter should have been attended to long before this.

I should like to say a word concerning the unemployability supplement, known as item 650 in last session's estimates. In his statement the other day the minister said that the unemployability supplement had served a most useful purpose, and afforded an opportunity for getting valuable information. Yes, it has served a most useful purpose. It has served the purpose of indicating to the government that the veterans, the returned soldiers of this country, will not stand for any change in the fundamental principles of the Pension Act.

The unemployability supplement was a new departure, in that it introduced the principle of need in place of right. I hope that never again will such a principle be introduced in the pension legislation of this country. The minister is quite correct when he says that its introduction has served a useful purpose, because it has indicated to the people of Canada a most unfair way of treating veterans. He has also said that its introduction afforded very valuable information. Well, it afforded information to his department, just as it did to the house, that the veterans across Canada were one hundred per cent opposed to the principle of the introduction of the unemployability supplement, as set out in item 650.

In meetings of the committee last session it was pointed out time and again that the unemployability supplement was a most unfair and unjust principle. We considered it the most unfair and unjust principle that had ever been introduced into Canadian legislation.

One would have a short memory indeed if he did not remember the proceedings in the last special committee. I shall not review them to any extent this afternoon, except to point out again that when the motion to approve item 650 was brought before the special committee on May 31 of this year it was moved by the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Croll) that item 650 in the supplementary estimates carry and be reported. As an amendment I moved:

That item 650 do not now carry but that this committee request the house that it be given instructions to consider the basic rates of pensions and the War Veterans Allowance Act and make recommendations in reference thereto.

If that amendment had been accepted in the veterans committee last May there would have been ample time to have brought forward the legislation now being presented to the house, and the pensioners would not have had to wait this length of time to receive their just dues.

I might explain that when the amendment was put, twelve voted in favour of it and eighteen against. Every member of the opposition parties on the committee, together with the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank), supported the amendment, and every government member, with one exception, voted against it. It does seem a bit inconsistent when we see those very men, who had the opportunity at that time to correct what I say was a great wrong, applauding the legislation placed before the house a few days ago. Last May they could have given the veterans what they asked for and what they were entitled to.

When the bill is before the house, and we have an opportunity to discuss it, I shall have something further to say. There is however one further point I should like to make, which flows from the fact that, as I said a moment ago, we have waited too long for this legislation. In a statement the other day the minister said that the increase in pensions would become effective on January 1. As we have pointed out, January 1 will be just about the middle of our winter. Veterans already have had to provide themselves with fuel, clothing and other necessities in preparation for winter. I hope that when this legislation is brought down the increase will be made retroactive so that these men may be better able to pay their bills and meet the rigours of the winter.

Another situation concerns the small pensioner. As has been mentioned in this house on different occasions, the small pensioner who because of ill health or other reasons is not able to supplement his income is awarded a war veterans allowance. We all know that there is a ceiling on the war veterans allowance of $610 for the single pensioner.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Does this bill refer to war veterans allowances?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Brooks: No, Mr. Speaker, it refers to pensions; but my point is that the pensioner who is in receipt of a war veterans allowance will be handicapped. I do not know how we can discuss it at this time but I do submit that the increase given to a man in receipt of a war veterans allowance should not reduce the amount of that allowance because of the ceiling at present on the earnings of a recipient of war veterans allowance.

Mr. Lapointe: On a point of order, I have no objection to the hon. member expressing his views, but I submit he should keep within the rules of the house. Any reference to war veterans allowances on a resolution having to do with the Pension Act is completely out of order. The matter the hon. member is trying to discuss comes under the War Veterans Allowance Act and has nothing to do with this legislation.

Mr. Green: On the point of order which has been raised by the minister, I would point out that we are discussing a resolution in these terms:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to amend the Pension Act to provide for increases in the rates of pension for disability and for death under the act.

Surely we are in order in suggesting that the bill should contain a provision that any increase in pension shall not have the result of cutting down the war veterans allowance. I submit that we are perfectly in order in asking that there should be a section in the bill to that effect. If we are to be prevented from making any suggestions of that kind we will not be able to deal fully with the pension question. As a matter of fact, it is almost impossible to bring in an amendment to a resolution, as Your Honour has ruled earlier in the session, but I submit that we certainly are in order when we suggest that there should be a section in this amendment to the Pension Act providing that any increase in a veteran's pension shall not have the result of reducing his war veterans allowance.

Mr. Knowles: May I say a word on the point of order. I feel that the position taken by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) is the correct position. I realize that it is a difficult point on which Your Honour will have to rule because on the face of it the point raised by the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Lapointe) looks like one that will have to be considered. The minister suggests that when debating the Pension Act we should not discuss the War Veterans Allowance Act. Even though I might want to do so, I agree that that would be out of order at this time.

However, we now have before the house legislation that proposes to increase the amount of the disability pension that certain veterans will receive and I submit that we have the right to discuss other things that will determine whether or not he will get that increase. As I understand it, the point which the hon. member for Royal (Mr. Brooks) is seeking to make is that some veterans will not get any benefit from the increase in the disability pension because of the ceiling under the War Veterans Allowance Act.

Mr. Lapointe: That is in the War Veterans Allowance Act, not this act.

Mr. Knowles: That ceiling provision is in that act, but its effect will be felt by veterans drawing disability pensions as provided by this act. I submit that Your Honour would be in order in telling us that we cannot now discuss the War Veterans Allowance Act generally; I submit also that Your Honour would be in order in telling us that we cannot during this debate propose any increase in the war veterans allowance; we shall have to do that on another occasion. But I submit that you should permit us to discuss the effect of the ceiling imposed by the other act on veterans who are supposedly going to get an increase under the measure now before us.

Mr. Speaker: I may be able to settle this matter. I do not think there is a great deal of difference among hon. members at this time. We all agree that the legislation before us has to do with pensions, that it has nothing whatever to do directly with the War Veterans Allowance Act. May I point out also to hon. members that there is an amendment to the address in reply to the speech from the throne dealing directly with the War Veterans Allowance Act.

I did not take from what the hon. member for Royal (Mr. Brooks) said that he was going to discuss the War Veterans Allowance Act at this time. The point has been raised that if a pensioner receives an increase in his pension there will be a reduction in the amount he receives under the War Veterans Allowance Act. The suggestion is that the amount received under the War Veterans Allowance Act should not be reduced. Is that not a matter which should come up when the War Veterans Allowance Act is being amended?

Mr. Green: It could be put in the Pension Act.

Mr. Speaker: I doubt if it could be put in the Pension Act; it seems to me that that is an amendment which would have to be made to the War Veterans Allowance Act. I think that all members will agree that a passing reference to the War Veterans Allowance Act should be permitted as long as there is no debate or discussion on that particular legislation. I do not think that a definite ruling is necessary at the present moment, but I would ask hon. members not to debate the War Veterans Allowance Act at this time and to make any reference to that act as brief as possible.

Mr. Brooks: I thoroughly understand your ruling and suggestion, Mr. Speaker. I might say that in the discussion we have had on the point of order the point I was trying to make has been brought out and I do not see any necessity of saying anything more. The men who need an increase in pension most are those in receipt of war veterans allowances, and they are the men who will not get consideration. I had hoped that there would be an amendment to the act which would cover those particular cases. However, we can deal with that when the bill is before the committee.

There is another point I wish to make in connection with dependent parents. The hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) asked a question about this the other day and the minister stated that a dependent parent did not receive a pension under the act as of right but under an award by the commission after a means test. That is correct. There is a ceiling on the pension granted dependent parents and I think that might very well be dealt with in the bill to be presented. As a matter of fact the minister suggested that we should wait until we had the bill when we would know what was the attitude of the government I took it from that that there probably would be an amendment in the bill covering dependent parents. I do not think there is anything further I wish to say at this time. I repeat that opposition members are very pleased indeed that this legislation is being brought down, as are the people of the country. However, I should like to say to the minister and to the government that I think it would have come with much better grace if it had been granted a year ago. Whether or not they believe it, there is a feeling throughout this country—and I think it is just—that the government has been dragooned into this action particularly by Legion organizations throughout the country, by public opinion and also by opposition members of the House of Commons.

Mr. G. A. Cruickshank (Fraser Valley): I should like to say a word or two with respect to this legislation. I have the greatest admiration for the hon. member for Royal (Mr. Brooks) who served not only in the first war but in the second war with the greatest of distinction. I know that at heart he wants to do the best he can on behalf of the veterans, but I regret that possibly partisan politics are being brought into the matter. So far as the veterans of my province are concerned, we want to see justice done to them without worrying about who gets the credit, which party, which individual or which province. I am sorry that partisan politics have been introduced into the discussion by a member for whom I have the greatest respect, knowing how he has served his country in two great wars.

Mr. Brooks: I was merely stating the facts; that is all.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Sometimes they do not like them.

Mr. Cruickshank: I think my record in the veterans affairs committee will show where I stand so far as my fellow veterans are concerned. I have not always agreed with members of my own party or with those in the opposition, but in so far as my stand is concerned I am perfectly willing to rely on my record. I think we should forget political advantage. Some people should be satisfied. I have forgotten the exact phrase but I think it is "sufficient unto the day". "Sufficient unto yesterday" should satisfy them enough for one day.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): That is just a beginning.

Mr. Cruickshank: Let us not worry about politics with respect to this matter.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): May I correct the quotation? "Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof".

Mr. Cruickshank: I was not referring to the hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. Murray).

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): He is improving it.

Mr. Cruickshank: We have accomplished a great deal through the efforts of the veterans affairs committee on which I had the privilege of serving. As I have stated before that committee and in the house, I believe that is mainly due to the great efforts and influence of the Canadian Legion throughout the Dominion of Canada. Let us try to build it up and not tear it down. I agree with one thing the hon. member for Royal said. I am not allowed to refer to a certain type of pension, and I do not want to be called to order. I have been here since 1940, I have never yet been out of order, and I do not want to be now. You can imagine what I might like to say about certain other legislation. I should like to say to the minister that it is not clear in my mind—and I think I am in order—what the situation is with respect to dependent parents, and I would also link with that compassionate awards to mothers and wives. I think these two classes should be taken into consideration, because of the increase in the cost of living, in exactly the same way as other pensioners.

I believe the pension should be made retroactive. Whatever the advantage may be, it definitely should be made retroactive. As the hon. member from Labrador—for Royal, an outpost of Canada where there is cold weather, and I admit it is far colder there than in other parts—said, this is the time of year when those on small pensions need assistance if they need it at all. As I understood the announcement of the minister—and I want to be corrected if I am wrong—I believe the awards are to be made retroactive, and I should like to know to what date. That may have been stated before and if it was I am sorry I did not hear it.

One thing with which I cannot agree is the unemployability supplement. However, as I understood the minister—and surely this is in order because it was announced by the minister himself—it is to be discontinued as from the first of the year. I believe that is correct. As I stated before the veterans affairs committee, it has not worked out satisfactorily in my own province. The officials in charge there have been most fair about the matter. If I remember correctly, we estimated we would have 780 recipients, and the last I heard we had approximately 1,400 applicants. It did not work out in the rural districts although it may in urban centres. I understand it is to be discontinued as from the first of January. There is one thing I want to know for purposes of information only. Is it correct that those who have been in receipt of it temporarily will continue to receive it up to the first of January? Accepting the correction of the hon. member for Cariboo, let us not drag politics into the matter. We have had an assurance from the minister on behalf of the government and I thought his statement was very fair. The Legion asked for 33⅓ per cent but they are getting more than that. I am not allowed to mention that other matter but I will take it up at the next session of parliament inasmuch as I have been assured—and the minister nods his head in agreement—that legislation will be introduced to correct the abuse so far as that other group of pensioners is concerned. The minister agrees that legislation will be brought down to provide for them properly and it will be made retroactive to the first of January.

Mr. Fulton: Is this an announcement of government policy?

Mr. Cruickshank: After what happened yesterday anybody can announce anything, but I believe that is what is going to happen.

Mr. Green: Don't lose heart.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Don't take it to heart so much.

Mr. Cruickshank: I will announce the policy with respect to what is going to take place in Toronto tomorrow. The west will show the east where the sun rises and sets. I am very proud of my association with the veterans affairs committee. As I said, I have the greatest admiration for the hon. member for Royal—

Mr. Brooks: Mutual.

Mr. Cruickshank: —but on reflection I think he will agree there is one thing we should not do. If there is one committee that certainly should not be brought into the field of partisan politics it is the veterans affairs committee.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): I should like to say a few words on this measure. The resolution reads:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to amend the Pension Act to provide for increases in the rates of pension for disability and for death under the act.

I am sure, Mr. Speaker, that all hon. members of this house were delighted with the minister's statement to the house on Friday, November 16. They were happy to know that at last the government recognized the need of the disability pensioners in this country. I am sure that all hon. members, regardless of the party to which they belong, were relieved to know that the government had finally decided to abandon the supplementary allowance with its employment test, medical test, and in some cases financial means test. I remember when we were sitting in the veterans affairs committee last session there was strenuous opposition on the part of a number of members of that committee to this departure from former Canadian pension principles. I am sure all hon. members are glad to know that the government has returned to the long established principle of the payment of pensions according to disability incurred. By introducing this measure, the government has decided to erase that unfortunate blot on Canadian pension history.

I am sure that all veterans organizations in this country, as represented principally by the Canadian Legion and the National Council of Veterans, must find great satisfaction in knowing that their efforts have borne fruit in this satisfactory government action. In fairness to these representative bodies, we must say that the government's decision is a tribute to the Canadian Legion and to the National Council of Veterans. It is a tribute to their understanding of the needs of disability pensioners throughout Canada, and to their presentation of the facts. It is a tribute to their arguments supporting the facts, and to their eternal vigilance on behalf of disabled veterans and their dependents in this country throughout the years.

Mr. Cruickshank: Hear, hear.

Mr. Herridge: I am pleased to know I have the endorsement of the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank). I know that we on this side always realize that we have the sympathy and support of the hon. member in these veterans matters.

In my opinion the commendable position the Legion has taken is well stated in a recent editorial which I read in a good weekly paper published in British Columbia, the Revelstoke Review. I am going to read a paragraph—

Mr. Cruickshank: In what riding is that?

Mr. Herridge: Revelstoke is situated in the Kamloops riding. I know the editor quite well, and I believe he is a firm supporter of liberal principles. He is a man of considerable balance and good judgment. Unfortunately at the present time he is a member of the coalition—

Mr. Fulton: Are you speaking of the editor of the Revelstoke Review?

Mr. Herridge: Yes.

Mr. Fulton: Don't calumniate the man, because he does not support that party.

Mr. Herridge: If I am in error in that, it is because my judgment has been based on the reasonable and progressive nature of his editorials. I am quoting from the Revelstoke Review of Thursday, November 15, 1951. The editorial is entitled "Practical Remembrance". It reads:

Rev. H. S. McDonald, in his remembrance day address in the United Church last Sunday, told his comrades they need to remember the dead; living veterans in need of assistance; and thirdly, their heritage as Canadians. Remembrance day ceremonies in themselves call attention to the many who made the supreme sacrifice, while appreciation of our heritage ought to be inspired by individual common sense. Remembering the needy veterans, on the other hand, calls for positive action and eternal vigilance. . .

In all these matters which are so essential to the welfare of the war veteran, the Canadian Legion has played an outstanding role down through the years. There has been progressive improvement in the treatment of veterans since 1918, although the ultimate has not yet been reached. Had there been no strong body to champion the cause of the needy veteran, it is doubtful if even the most benevolent intentions of our governments would have reached the stage of today's programs.

The Legion makes no unreasonable demands. It is continually on the alert to the legitimate needs of its membership. It remembers the dead by calling attention each November 11th to their sacrifices. It promotes an appreciation of the ideals and traditions inherent in our way of life and for which the dead laid down their lives. It strives daily to ensure better treatment and sympathetic understanding for veterans and dependents in need. In the Legion's activities the general public has a constant reminder of the just debt this country owes those of its ex-servicemen who are unable to fend for themselves. And that understanding on the part of all Canadians is essential to ensure that no ex-serviceman will in the future shuffle off the end of a pier in despair, while his fellow-citizens pay grateful homage on November 11th.

I am sure, Mr. Speaker, that all of us agree with the sentiments expressed in that editorial. In my opinion the writer has stated well the attitude of a great majority of Canadians towards the needs of the veterans of this country, and the necessity for sympathetic consideration from the government. While these organizations now find great satisfaction in the minister's announcement of the government's intention, I am sure there has been great rejoicing amongst the ladies' auxiliaries because they have taken a direct interest in the Legion's proposals concerning an increase in the basic rate of disability pensions and an increase in war veterans allowance. These thousands of splendid unsung women have worked loyally to support their men's proposals. I am sure that they will find great comfort in the knowledge that this legislation is coming before the house.

It interested me to know that the ladies' auxiliaries are particularly appreciative of the work of the opposition in this parliament in supporting the Legion's proposals and those of the National Council of Veterans. I have had indications of that on a good many occasions. It may interest you to know, Mr. Speaker, that the members of one branch of the ladies' auxiliary in my constituency were so pleased with the efforts of the opposition in this matter that all of them wrote me a personal letter addressed to the Right Hon. Herbert Wilfred Herridge. Possibly that is a trifle premature, but at least it was a kind gesture on their part. I recall receiving a letter from the wife of a pensioner who had apparently just completed listening to one of my broadcasts in the parliament hill series. They are of course always completely objective. She wrote me to this effect: Dear Mr. Herridge: I have just finished listening to your broadcast from parliament hill, and I hasten to put pen to paper. I want to tell you, sir, that whenever I hear your voice on the air I turn down the lights, sit in my easy chair and dream of an increase in the basic rate of disability pensions. Then, she spoke of the day when the opposition would finally persuade the government to increase the basic rate of the disability pension, and she said: I am sure, sir, after listening to you, that the government will without doubt respond to your pleading.

I am exceedingly glad, Mr. Speaker, that the government has responded to the pleading of the veterans organizations and of Canadians who are interested in this question. This increase in the basic rate of pensions will give great relief to thousands of veterans who have been suffering severely from the increased cost of living. It will be a great thing for many on low pensions, with small incomes, who have been trying to earn a bit on the side in order to keep going, through doing odd jobs and various kinds of work. At this point I think I may be permitted to say that, in order to protect the small pensioner, so that the legislation will mean something to the small pensioner who at the present time is receiving a small pension and a portion of the war veterans allowance, the government should agree to having included in the bill when it comes before the house something to this effect: that no increase in disability pension be considered an increase of income for the purposes of the War Veterans Allowance Act. We in this group suggest that the government give serious consideration to that proposal.

As I have said before, when I am speaking in this house I see not only the resolution, the handsome Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Lapointe) and his intelligent and industrious parliamentary assistant, but I also see the people in the constituency this legislation benefits. I visualize a good number of people whom I know personally who will be affected by this legislation, including many older veterans, and widows. In addition to that, I have already had a good many personal letters which indicate what this resolution means to a large number of people whom I have the honour to represent. We in this group follow our usual policy of commending the government when it deserves commendation; we do not hesitate to do that, regardless at times of our sharp but constructive criticism of government policies. Having said that, however, I must say that while we in this group were pleased with the announcement which has been made, we do not think the government has given complete consideration to all those included under the terms of the Canadian Pension Act. I refer principally to three groups: first, the children of pensioners; second, the dependent parents; and third, the pensioners receiving a compassionate pension.

According to the minister's announcement, as to the children of pensioners the increase is to be from $19 to $20 for the first child, and for the other child there is no extra provision. That means only an increase of $1 for the first child of the Canadian pensioner. We think that the government should have had the 33⅓ per cent increase include all the children of pensioners. These are the children of veterans raising families. I know that Canadians generally want to do everything possible to see that the families of veterans have as good an opportunity as this government and the people of Canada can provide. Therefore we in this group feel that the government should have carried the increase of 33⅓ per cent along so as to increase the amount of pension awarded for the children on that basis. We urge the minister and the government to give further consideration to this matter before the legislation comes before the house.

I now come to the question of dependent parents. The hon. member for Royal (Mr. Brooks) and the hon. member for Fraser Valley had something to say on this matter. We believe that this particular group is entitled to special consideration. I have seen some pathetic cases in this group. It includes many a mother who has lost an only son and many a father who has lost an only son. These people have sacrificed not only the earning power of the son or the possibility of support by the son but have sacrificed a great deal of happiness for the sake of this country. Many of these people are living under difficult financial circumstances but, worse than that, they are living without the comfort which would have been brought to them by the children who they naturally expected would be a solace to them in their old age. We believe that some provision should be made for the dependent parents. We should like to hear the minister rise in his place in the house, when the bill comes before us, and say something to this effect: we intend to amend the bill so as to make some extra provision for this worthy group of Canadians who have sacrificed more than dollars can repay.

I now want to refer to those who are in receipt of compassionate pensions. We all know that a compassionate pension is paid not as of right but rather on purely compassionate grounds. The very fact that it is paid on compassionate grounds indicates there was need that demanded compassion. According to the statement of the minister there is not any stated increase for those persons receiving compassionate pensions. We hope that the minister and the government will give consideration to this needy group.

Mr. Mutch: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Herridge: Yes.

Mr. Mutch: When the hon. member speaks of compassionate pensions, is he referring to pensions awarded under section 21 for meritorious service?

Mr. Herridge: Yes. This is a particular group that, as I said before, have received these pensions on the basis of compassion, and for them we urge further compassion. When the government is doing an excellent piece of work in introducing this 33⅓ per cent increase generally, with the exception of those classes which I have mentioned, we in this group urge that they complete this legislation and make a good job of it by providing 33⅓ per cent increase for the children of pensioners, by making some extra provision for dependent parents, and by making extra provision for those receiving compassionate pensions.

Previous speakers have suggested making this legislation retroactive. In fairness I think we must admit that there are certain administrative difficulties in connection with giving immediate effect to legislation of this type. As I understood the minister's statement, the first cheques at the new rate would be in the pensioners' hands in early February, 1952.

Mr. Lapointe: During the course of January; the January cheque.

Mr. Herridge: It will be paid in January. In British Columbia they usually arrive in February. I suggest that the minister and the government give consideration to making the pension payable so that the pensioner receives his first cheque in the first week of the new year. I think that would be a nice send-off for the new year, and will provide some time for the giving by the commission of effect to legislation passed by this house.

Before concluding my remarks, I must once again emphasize the fact that we in this group believe that the Canadian pension commission is doing an excellent job in administrating the Canadian Pension Act. We all think they have done splendid work throughout the years. We hope that the government and the minister will make their task easier and will make this legislation completely satisfactory by including the groups to which I have made reference. I trust that, before this legislation is finally adopted by this house, the government will add these little extras so that the legislation will then be satisfactory to all veterans on disability pensions and their dependents and to all who have worked for and recognize their need.

Mr. Victor Quelch (Acadia): I am going to be very brief in my comments. The Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Lapointe) and his parliamentary assistant (Mr. Mutch) are in the very happy position of knowing that whenever they bring down any legislation in this house that will improve the position of the veterans they will receive the wholehearted support of the opposition. We in this group are very glad that at this time the government have seen fit to bring down legislation to increase the basic rate of pension without attaching to it any form of means test. Apparently the government now recognize that they made a mistake last session when they tied an increase in the rate of pension to an unemployability test. That was a form of means test, and a very undesirable form. I feel that by bringing down this legislation the government has fully vindicated the stand taken by the opposition members of the veterans committee last session when they opposed the payment of an unemployability supplement as an alternative to an increase in the basic rate of pension.

However, whilst we are strongly in support of this proposed legislation, I would like to point out that there are certain weaknesses in it. There are certain classes of pensioners who will receive no benefits under this legislation. For instance the married pensioner, receiving a pension award of from 20 to 40 per cent, will receive no benefit if he is already receiving a war veterans allowance. In regard to the single veteran, he will receive no benefit if he is receiving an award of from 15 to 30 per cent, if he is receiving the allowance. I have in my hand—

Mr. Mutch: Will the hon. member permit an interruption?

Mr. Quelch: Yes.

Mr. Mutch: I get a little weary of hearing it suggested that when a piece of legislation grants a man entitlement he does not get it under that particular legislation because under other existing legislation it may be taken away again. That is tantamount to saying that some of us do not get any salary because income tax takes it away. So far as this legislation is concerned, what my hon. friend has just said is untrue. The benefits do accrue. What happens to the money afterwards is subject to other legislation, and further discussion, and in complete honesty I think we should stop saying that.

Mr. Quelch: The point is I think the hon. member is the last one who should use those words "complete honesty". The test of any legislation is, will the person benefit as a result of that legislation?

Mr. Mutch: And the answer is yes.

Mr. Quelch: That is the only criterion. Can you show an income tax assessment which, as a result of its application, will mean that the taxpayer does not get any benefit from an increase in income? He will always get a slight benefit from an increase in income. As a result of this some pensioners will not receive one cent in additional income. Let me quote from the unemployability supplement chart given to the veteran members the last time the committee sat. We find that a pensioner receiving a 40 per cent award, and who is married, receives a pension of $50 a month. In addition he receives a war veterans allowance of $41.66 a month, making a total monthly income of $91.66, or a yearly income of $1,100. That man will not receive any benefit whatsoever under this legislation, because to the extent that his pension is increased the amount of the war veterans allowance will be decreased.

Mr. Cruickshank: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker; I do not think anyone—I know the hon. member will not—will question that I am as sympathetic as he is to those recipients of the war veterans allowance, and I have demonstrated it in the past. But I submit it is not fair for one member to discuss that legislation and some of the rest of us who would like to discuss it be ruled out of order.

Mr. Quelch: I am not going to discuss war veterans allowance in any way, shape or form. When Mr. Speaker was in the chair he gave us the understanding that so long as we referred only to the effect that one may have on the other he would not rule it out of order. I am not going to discuss the merits or the demerits of the War Veterans Allowance Act. I will even leave out the words "war veterans allowance" in the future.

Mr. Cruickshank: On a point of order, I want to keep the record clear. The hon. member for Acadia is always fair.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Where is Mr. Speaker, anyway?

Mr. Cruickshank: I beg your pardon. The hon. member who has just spoken has said that he is always humble, and as I said on previous occasions he should be. I was ruled out of order in that connection, and so were several other speakers. I would like to speak on it.

Mr. Quelch: No.

Mr. Cruickshank: I am speaking on the point of order. I was ruled out of order, and I believe the hon. member for Royal (Mr. Brooks) was also ruled out of order in the same connection. I would like to speak on the same matter, but it must work both ways. I am not speaking against the hon. member's argument, but I do claim the right to say something along the same line as any other member in the opposition or otherwise.

Mr. Quelch: I would again point out that this is exactly the type of reference that the Speaker ruled would be in order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Beaudoin): I was in the house when the Speaker made his remarks. He did say that the War Veterans Allowance Act was not now before the house, and that any reference in passing to the War Veterans Allowance Act should be as brief as possible.

Mr. Quelch: I would point out, Mr. Speaker, that the pensioners receiving an award of from 20 to 40 per cent will not receive any benefits as a result of this legislation. When you get down below the pension award of 20 per cent, that is at the 15 per cent level, there will be a partial benefit of $25 per annum. When you get below 15 per cent, from 5 per cent to 10 per cent, the pensioner will then be eligible to receive the full benefits of the pension award; but from 20 per cent to 40 per cent the pensioner will not receive any benefit at all.

In regard to the single veteran, a pensioner receiving an award of from 15 to 30 per cent will not be able to get any benefit whatsoever. Below 15 per cent—

Mr. Lapointe: No benefit under what?

Mr. Quelch: Below the 15 per cent they will get the full benefit of the award. In view of the fact that these are men who have very limited incomes, it does seem to me that we should have a section included in the legislation stating that any increase of any pension under this legislation shall not be considered income for the purpose of the War Veterans Allowance Act. That is all I am going to say—

Mr. Mutch: Order. We are back where we started.

Mr. Knowles: It is perfectly in order. The only trouble is the government has not put it in the bill.

Mr. Quelch: There is one other matter that I should like to refer to, namely dependent mothers. I was sorry to hear the minister say that dependent mothers would not be eligible for any increase, because it does seem to me that where the mother is solely dependent upon her son, when that son is taken away she should receive the same consideration as the wife receives; I mean where the son is her sole support.

In closing I would say, as I have said in the past, that I believe that in this country generally speaking we have veterans legislation second to none. I think we are also fortunate in having officials who are very sympathetic towards the veterans, and who do not hesitate to bend over backwards in trying to give the full benefit of the doubt in dealing with all matters. I would like to see us at all times endeavour to amend legislation so these officials can give to veterans the greatest possible benefits without having to take a chance on having to bend backward.

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I just want to add a word. I think, as the previous speaker said, there is the unanimous feeling on this side of the house that in these days when our social conscience is rightly as aroused as it is, and when we are doing so much for other people in the community, these men who have a special claim must not in any degree be left behind. Therefore we welcome what is being done. I should like to endorse what has been said concerning the sympathy of the men in the department. All members of parliament have a good many cases coming to their attention. I have always found the greatest readiness to help on the part of veterans advocates and all others doing similar work.

I think we are most fortunate also in the officers of the Legion because, along with their desire to have everything done for the returned men, they do realize that there are limits, and I believe they try to take a common-sense view and have regard for what is possible as well as what is desirable.

Motion agreed to, and the house went into committee, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in.

Mr. Lapointe thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 27, to amend the Pension Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Beaudoin): When shall the bill be read the second time?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Next sitting.

NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY ORGANIZATION

MEASURE TO APPROVE AGREEMENT ON STATUS OF ORGANIZATION, NATIONAL REPRESENTATIVES AND INTERNATIONAL STAFF

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (for the Secretary of State for External Affairs) moved the second reading of Bill No. 15, to provide for privileges and immunities in respect of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Would the parliamentary assistant make a statement?

Mr. Jean Lesage (Parliamentary Assistant to the Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, on November 8, while at the resolution stage, I made a complete statement. I do not believe I could add anything at this time. It is my understanding that the bill will be referred to the committee on external affairs, so there may be detailed study of all sections.

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make only one or two comments. Unfortunately I was not here on November 8 and did not hear the statement made at that time. I have looked at the debate which took place on a somewhat similar motion in 1947. Incidentally, due to the industry of the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker), there appears on record a point of historical interest which I should like to place on record. He pointed out that—> —the first general law on immunity, as far as Great Britain is concerned, goes back to the reign of Queen Anne. The Russian Ambassador in England having been arrested, strong objection was taken by the Russian government, which resulted in the passing of the diplomatic privileges act of 1708, providing for diplomatic immunities, which has been continued since this time.

I do not imagine there is any question to be raised by any of us in this connection, other than the question as to whether, as time goes on, the number of people covered by these immunities grows and grows. There are one or two points I should like to raise for the attention of the parliamentary assistant. We have a bill containing only two sections and an agreement of some length signed on behalf of Canada, which we are asked to approve. We know of course that in a sense, due to the non-coöperation of Russia, part of the agreement made in 1947 has become nugatory, so far as certain aspects were concerned. Part II of the agreement says, among other things:

> The organization may hold currency of any kind and operate accounts in any currency.

Then if we read further we find that not only representatives, that is to say senior representatives, but "any representative of a member state"—and I take it that "any" means "any"—shall enjoy the following privileges and immunities, as set out in the following paragraph (f):

> (f) the same facilities in respect of currency or exchange restrictions as are accorded to diplomatic personnel of comparable rank.

I mention this only because I think we have known of cases where military and other personnel, who were on their lawful missions in other countries, have indulged in currency operations which were not exactly what was intended by the scope of the agreements.

Without taking more time, because I understand this will be further considered, I would suggest that the agreement be looked at closely; because I suppose as time goes on we may have scores—and, for all I know, even more than that—of people in this country enjoying extraordinary immunities. I suppose it is extremely difficult for any country to be sure of all the attitudes, views and practices of all the people who are going to work for it. One of the points that strikes me is that it is contemplated that the home country, so to speak, may provide a certain number of staff for the organization of a visiting country. In their cases, of course, immunities are less.

I am suggesting only this, that the whole atmosphere of bringing here a considerable number of people—if there are to be a considerable number—is such that very close scrutiny and a very considerable amount of vigilance ought to be exercised.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on external affairs.

PUBLIC PRINTING AND STATIONERY ACT

AMENDMENT PROVIDING FOR ADVANCES TO KING'S PRINTER FOR PURCHASE OF MATERIALS, ETC.

Hon. F. G. Bradley (Secretary of State) moved the second reading of Bill No. 24, to amend the Public Printing and Stationery Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

On section 1—Requisitions.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Chairman, I have to confess some ignorance of what has taken place, due to my absence from the house for some days. However, when the matter was last before us, and I was present, I understood we were to receive a statement from the minister. Has that statement been received and discussed? The statement from the minister was to explain why this large amount is in the bill. I am informed the statement has not yet been made, although when the bill was first considered the leader of the opposition as well as representatives of other opposition groups asked for it.

Mr. Bradley: The additional credit being requested under this bill is not in the nature of a grant. It is merely a credit which is authorized by the finance department out of the consolidated revenue fund. As hon. members will realize, the operation of the department is in the nature of a commercial enterprise within the limits of governmental and parliamentary activities. Practically all our work is done either for parliament or some department of government. As I have already said, this credit is not a grant. It has been increased down through the years in accordance with the increases in the prices of materials and labour and the expanding activities following the continuous growth of the nation. Some years ago $700,000 was the limit of the credit; later on it was increased I think to $1,300,000, and later on to $2 million. The increase to $2 million took place in 1946. Since that time Canada has continued to grow more rapidly than ever and as a result the activities of the king's printer have been increasing continually while prices have been advancing enormously, not only for supplies and materials but also for labour.

We find that today the credit of $2 million is short of our requirements by another $2 million. For example, as of yesterday, November 22, we owed our suppliers for materials, paper, et cetera, $2,265,643. To meet our payrolls for salaries, wages and the like we require $160,000. Therefore we are in debt a total of $2,425,643. Our overdraft as at that date in the receiver general's account was $5,590,137. We were owed by various government departments, which we are entitled to deduct, the sum of $3,786,943. If we had been paid those amounts by the various departments—we were not—we would have had an overdraft of only $1,803,194. We are authorized by the act to have an overdraft of $2 million. Therefore, as of yesterday, we had cash available of $196,806 to meet liabilities, which I have set out above, amounting to $2,425,643. Therefore, as of yesterday, we were short $2,229,837. That amount is owing to outside firms for supplies and materials of various kinds, which we cannot pay. For that reason we require a further credit. As I have said before, this is only a credit, not a grant or anything of that kind, or roughly $2 million in order to keep our accounts down to a satisfactory maximum.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): We recognize that it is not a grant, that it is something in the order of working capital and for that reason it may be necessary. I should like to ask one or two questions. The minister has told us that the accounts payable are something over $2,229,000. I should like to know how long those accounts have been owing. On the other hand he tells us that there is $3,786,000 owing to his department, and I should like to know why that cannot be paid.

I should like to know also whether any real inconvenience is being suffered in carrying on the business as is. If the minister can demonstrate that any loss is being suffered I think we ought to be quick to come to his assistance. On the other hand I think the feeling of this house, which is a salutary feeling in my opinion, is that we should not accept suggestions of this kind too readily. We had a similar suggestion from the board of transport commissioners a year or two ago. They came along and asked for an amount which I recall was cut down considerably with their eventual consent. It is not necessary to go into the details, and indeed I do not remember them all, but they made a case which we went into with them along with the treasury board, and we decided that it was extremely difficult for them to get along with the amount which they had as working capital.

I repeat my questions. I should like to know whether any real inconvenience is being suffered and the reason this large amount of $3,786,000 should be outstanding for any considerable time. From time to time we get little glimpses of what is going on, and we understand there are hundreds of millions of dollars floating around in the air as surplus to what is needed, and just at the moment it does not seem clear why these several departments cannot pay their debts.

Mr. Bradley: It is not always easy to get accounts paid by departments as promptly as one would wish. There is frequently a hiatus between the date of the delivery of the goods and the date of payment. It must also be borne in mind that we carry a considerable quantity of what we call work in progress for which no bill has been rendered. We are continuously in debt to the tune of something in the neighbourhood of $2 million. That does not cause any inconvenience to the government, but it does cause inconvenience to the commercial firms supplying us with materials. We feel that we ought to be in position to keep these accounts down to a reasonable amount. The $2,229,000 is much too large.

It must also be borne in mind that this money is not going out of the control of the government. The money is in the various departments which have received grants of the sums they require to pay us for supplies. They simply pass it to us and we pass it into consolidated revenue. That movement is not fast enough to permit us to pay the outside bills we owe, which I think we should pay at the earliest possible date.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): So do I, but I still want to know why this $3,786,000 cannot be paid. Can the minister give us a list of the departments that owe money so that we may see why these accounts cannot be settled. Is there any earthly reason why these bills cannot be paid? I presume these government departments are solvent and able to pay their debts, and this amount of $3,786,000 should be paid. If this were private business they would certainly stir things up and get paid because they would not be able to go and ask somebody else for $2 million.

Mr. Bradley: I am not in position to answer my hon. friend's question because I am not familiar with the affairs of other government departments. The only thing I can say is that we have not received the money from them and are continuously in debt to outside suppliers because of that fact. As I have pointed out, this is nothing new. It is not a question of cash getting out of control of the government in any way, shape or form. It is merely a matter of internal arrangement. It seems to have worked out satisfactorily. I cannot give you the details at all because I do not know them.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Well, we want them.

Mr. Bradley: I am not able to give them to you.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I agree with the minister it is nothing new, but it is something new that we want. Unless there is some reason against it we want a sensible arrangement whereby this money will be collected. The minister says he does not know why. He has not the details. He cannot give us particulars. I think we should get particulars. For instance, if the Minister of Public Works owes him a lot of money let him pay it. I should like to know who these ministers are who will not pay their debts. Is that not a reasonable suggestion, Mr. Chairman?

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the clause carry?

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): No, it is not carried. I am waiting for information, Mr. Chairman. It is not carried; as long as I can stand up it is not carried.

An hon. Member: That will not be long.

Mr. Knowles: For example, can the Secretary of State tell us whether his own department owes any money to the printing bureau?

Mr. Bradley: At the moment I cannot tell you.

Mr. Lennard: Surely he should know that.

Mr. Knowles: Can the Minister of Public Works tell us whether his department owes the king's printer any money?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Perhaps we do not owe money right now. We are having reports printed, but when the bills come in we generally pay.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): How about the other ministers? What about resources and development, and labour? Could we have a statement from them? We might get the other ministers in here and find out why this money cannot be paid. I am quite serious about this. I am sure the Minister of Public Works, who is very co-operative will really agree with me in this matter.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I cannot answer for the different departments, but if the bills were not paid on time there would be some reason for it. From the public accounts it appears that we do pay all the debts we owe. If you will look at the public accounts which were tabled some time ago I think you will get all the details and information.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Oh, no.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Oh, yes.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Let me ask the Minister of Public Works this question. If he finds he owes money to the king's printer will his department be able to pay it right away?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Oh yes, certainly. The moment the comptroller of the treasury authorized payment of a bill a cheque would be issued.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Would the minister communicate that to the Secretary of State and suggest that is the way to get the money?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): The Secretary of State knows how they get the money because the business of that department has grown to such an extent that the revolving fund does not seem sufficient. In his statement he mentioned that they owed over $2,200,000. That means we have to come back to parliament and ask that the revolving fund be increased. As the hon. member knows, this is working capital. I do not know if all these details of every bill outstanding should be laid before the house, because they probably appear in the public accounts. I am not too sure, but I would believe that in the public accounts these bills appear as paid or unpaid.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): As the minister knows, I am always a man who wants to facilitate business as much as I can, but it seems to me at the moment we are in this position. We have asked questions which I hope are more or less reasonable, and they have not been answered. So far as I have been able to grasp, no reason has been given as to why that $3,700,000 cannot be collected, and it might be good for all concerned if it were collected. I do not know why these things should be allowed to ride along. If the departments got into the habit of paying each other promptly maybe they would get into the habit of paying individuals likewise, and that would be good for all concerned. I think we should have evidence as to whether the king's printer or the department, whoever looks after it, have made a real effort to collect the $3,700,000. It should not be allowed to pass until we have the information.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): As we have the king's printer in the house I suggest that he can probably supply the details and information.

Mr. Bradley: I should like to point out that work for the various departments is continually going on. It is not a question of doing a particular job for a department and then immediately getting paid for it. Before that one is paid there is another, and then another and another. It is going on all the time. That is the difficulty.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): That ought to be a great help. That just shows what good customers they are. They ought to be able to have the money coming in every day. There is no difficulty about it that I can see.

Mr. Lennard: You cannot get a bill paid if you do not render it.

Mr. McCann: You do not pay until you get your goods.

Mr. Lennard: You do not have to. There is no expense to the department until they deliver the goods.

Mr. Bradley: It should also be remembered that, according to the statement I have already made, we have given credit for the amount the departments owe us, and we still find ourselves short two million and a quarter.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): No, he is owed $3,700,000, and he only owes about $2,400,000. If he got his money in he would have $1,300,000 in the bank.

Mr. Knowles: It seems to me the Secretary of State and the Minister of Public Works have not yet understood the question we are putting to them. We want some information about the $3,700,000 the departments owe to the king's printer. The goods have surely been delivered and the bills rendered. It would seem a perfectly fair and proper question that we be given some examples of some of the departments that owe money, how long it has been owed and why it has not been paid.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Here is a man who knows all about printing saying that too.

Mr. Fair: I would suggest, Mr. Chairman, that you dispense with the services of some of the lawyers, get an accountant and you will probably get somewhere.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Which class are you putting me in?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I have in my hands a statement of the king's printer, where it is mentioned that as of a certain date there was owed to suppliers for paper, materials and so forth, $2,265,643. To meet the payroll for salaries and wages, $160,000 is needed. Therefore a total of $2,425,643 is owed. To meet the above debts there is an overdraft in the receiver general's account of $5,590,137. I do not know if that figure was given before, but it is in this report. The king's printer is owed by other government departments the sum of $3,786,943 comprising current accounts and work in process. If the king's printer were paid by these departments there would then be an overdraft of $1,803,193. What we are asking for at this stage of the proceedings is an increase of $2 million in the revolving fund. If we were authorized under this measure to have that $2 million we would then have cash available of $196,807. If you want a list of every department that owes money to the king's printer on current accounts, work in process and invoices not yet addressed to the departments, it would be quite a job to procure that.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): That raises another question. I am sorry to be so hard to convince. We are told now that there is an overdraft of $5,590,000. We are told that the amount owing is $2,265,000, plus something for wages. Let us hear how that overdraft is built up. What does that represent? Is that a loss or how is it built up, and over what period has it been built up?

Mr. Bradley: Possibly this may throw a little light on the subject. First, as I have already pointed out, the costs of both material and labour have gone up substantially in the last four or five years. In addition to that we have to keep larger stocks on hand all the time by reason of the increased activities of the government. With the increased stocks that we have and the increased price of those stocks, plus the fact that we have to buy substantially in advance—in some cases suppliers require six months in order to make deliveries—our inventories are built up.

I should like to draw to the attention of the committee one or two facts in connection with these increased costs. The increase in the cost of stationery amounts to about 50 per cent. The volume of our stationery stocks has increased from roughly $190,000 in 1946 to about $880,000 today, an increase of nearly 30 per cent. The increase in paper printing stores was from $482,000 to $760,000, an increase of 60 per cent. Our wages have gone up from $1 per hour to $1.65 per hour, an increase of 65 per cent. Members of the committee will recall that our inventories have gone up by 50 per cent during that period. In 1946 the inventory amounted to $1,041,631, and in 1951 to $2,219,000, an increase of over 100 per cent.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): That goes some distance towards explaining it. I admit that we are gradually getting more light on it. I still feel we have only got the story in bits and pieces. So far as I am concerned I think we should have a clear picture of the whole business. Nothing has been said yet which satisfies me as to this $3,700,000; nothing has been said to satisfy me why that amount needs to be outstanding. I shall admit quite frankly that if this passes now I shall not fully understand the position. I believe I am entitled to understand it. As I say, the story has been dug out in bits and pieces this afternoon. I suggest that this section stand until we get a clearer view of the whole position. The minister has explained part of the overdraft by saying his stock in trade is much higher than it was, but so far as I can see there is nothing to tie those figures up as yet.

Mr. Bradley: May I also point out that work in process, for which we cannot collect until it is completed, amounts to $2,394,000.

Mr. Knowles: Is any of that included in the $3,700,000?

Mr. Bradley: No.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I feel it is not proper to let this pass without the house having before it more information concerning what it is asked to act upon. I submit that if one looks at the record, unless he has a genius which I do not have, he will not know what the story is.

Mr. Knowles: I want to support the position taken by the hon. member for Greenwood, that this matter should stand over until we have a more complete explanation. I believe there is another point that has come out which has not yet been made clear. As I listened to the figures given by the two ministers it seemed to me that the position as of yesterday showed a shortage of less than $2 million. When those figures were all added up, the overdraft—

Mr. Bradley: It is slightly more.

Mr. Knowles: The minister gave the overdraft with the receiver general, and set against that the accounts receivable and the cash on hand and came up with a figure of $1,700,000 or something like that.

Mr. Bradley: It is $1,803,000.

Mr. Knowles: Yes; and as it now stands the terms of the statute allow an overdraft of $2 million. As of the moment that seems to be sufficient. The net position as of yesterday is an overdraft of $1,803,000, and by the act as it now stands you are permitted to have a $2 million overdraft, while the bill before us asks that we allow a shortage of up to $4 million.

Mr. Bradley: No, Mr. Chairman; the shortage, if I may put it that way, was $1,803,000, against which we have a revolving fund of $2 million. That leaves us with a balance in cash on hand of $196,000. As against that we owe to outside firms $2,425,000, so we are short on our accounts to our suppliers to the extent of $2,229,000.

As I have already pointed out, it must be borne in mind that this is not a case of isolated items for various departments, one now and one some other time. This is something that is going on all the time, month in and month out. Presumably the departments are paying monthly—I do not know that—but moneys are coming in every day. However, there is always a new account sent in immediately, perhaps before the one which went in a few days ago has been paid; so that in point of fact there is always work being delivered and work being completed. As fast as one account is paid, perhaps faster, another one is incurred. It is for that reason that this amount of $3 million odd is always outstanding.

I should like to point out that this amount of $2 million was authorized in 1946 to be used by the king's printer as a revolving fund. It is to enable him to purchase stationery and printing material, and to operate an establishment for the processing of printing and stationery when requisitioned to do so by parliament and various departments. The department must encumber in advance in favour of the king's printer sufficient funds to cover each purchase requested. The department of public printing and stationery operates practically at cost, and the cost of the printing and stationery requirements which the king's printer is authorized to deliver each year to parliament and the departments must not exceed the total amount of money voted each year by parliament for its own services and for all the departments, not including the advance account of $2 million authorized for use by the king's printer as a revolving fund only. As I say, that is capital, and after all it only amounts to 25 per cent of the annual turnover.

Moneys paid to him by parliament and the departments for stationery and printing which he delivers to them are used by the king's printer to pay for stationery and printing he purchases from outside firms—because he does not do all the printing himself—or which he processes in the printing establishment of the department, and to replenish that portion of his revolving fund which he uses from day to day for his purchases or the processing of stationery and printing so that at the end of the fiscal year the revolving fund is still intact, whether it is in the hands of the king's printer or in the inventories of the department.

The amount of $2 million authorized by the amendment to the act in 1946 has proved to be insufficient, and these are the detailed reasons:

1. The increase in cost of stationery articles.

2. The necessity of increasing stocks of stationery articles due to delayed deliveries.

3. The increase in the volume of stationery required by departments.

4. The necessity of keeping larger stocks of paper due to the difficulty of getting ready deliveries from the mills.

5. The increase in wage rates for printers and administrative officers in the department.

6. The increase in the volume and the cost of printing.

I have already given the percentage increases of the various items. In short, the inventories of the department amounted to $1,041,631 in 1946. The same item in 1951 has advanced to $2,219,021, an increase of over 100 per cent. On account of these radical increases the amount of $2 million in the advance account of the king's printer has proved to be totally inadequate.

The $2 million advance account is used, as already indicated, for the processing of printing, the purchase of printing and stationery material and the maintenance of printing and stationery stocks. The actual amounts invested at this date under these three items are as follows. Work in process—that is, work actually being done and in various stages of completion—amounts to $2,394,000; stationery stocks amount to $900,000; and printing material in stock amounts to $600,000. That makes a total of $3,894,000.

As the king's printer has only $2 million at his disposal to cover this liability of $3,894,000, he is at this date short $1,894,000—this report was made out a month or so ago—which he now owes to his suppliers of printing and stationery across the country.

The statement generally reflects the position in which the king's printer has found himself in the last fiscal year. The king's printer operates at cost, and his only source of revenue is the eventual repayment by parliament and departments of the amount of $2,394,000 he has spent to this date on work in process for them. This amount will be paid to him only when this work in process is completed and delivered. In the meantime, as his working capital is insufficient, the only recourse, in order to carry on and supply parliament and the departments is, as I have said before, to withhold payment for these supplies.

I have here a list as at various dates in October showing amounts which he owed to firms across the country. Those amounts vary between October 17 and October 29 from $2,218,301 down to $1,840,934. That amount is continuously outstanding and owing by us to firms across the country.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): It has taken a long time to get this interesting document, and even now it does not answer the chief question that I am still interested in. The minister now says—and I think these were his words—that probably or perhaps the various departments pay their bills monthly. I should like to ask him this question. How much work does he do each month for government departments? Is it $1 million, $5 million, $3,700,000, or what is it?

Mr. Bradley: It would run from $1 million to $1,250,000.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Then we have about three months' accounts outstanding and unpaid. Obviously payment is not being paid on a monthly basis or anything like that. I do not like to be the cause of delay; it pains me greatly, but I put it to you, Mr. Chairman, and to the committee that we still have not been told the whole story. The mere fact that at one time the king's printer obtained $2 million and that costs have gone up does not impress me greatly. Maybe they were following the same easy practice years ago. Maybe they were not making the ministers pay. In those days probably they did not have as good a Minister of Public Works as we have now. But there is no reason in the world why we should not press this matter. This raises an interesting question as to the relations between departments. I am not disposed to let this matter go. I suggest again that we get a clear statement with regard to this matter and that in the meantime this section stand.

Mr. Bradley: Mr. Chairman, I have no doubt that the information required by the hon. member can be supplied, but it is going to take some considerable time to do it. I should again like to point out that the matter is not so simple as that of monthly statements and monthly payments. For example, we are now printing the revised statutes of Canada. I am advised that we have been at that job for one and a half years. For that work we have as yet received no payment at all, and we presumably shall receive no payment until the job is completed and delivered. There is one case in which it is not a question of payment monthly at all. But we have to carry it month after month. As I have already said, we have carried it for one and a half years already.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Why?

The Deputy Chairman: Hon. members will have noticed that all the discussion is revolving around subsection 4 of the new section 38, which is section 2 of the bill. The actual clause under consideration is section 1, which has to do with requisitions. I know some latitude is always given to hon. members on the first section. Perhaps hon. members would consent to carrying section 1, which has to do with requisitions.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—How expenses shall be met.

The Deputy Chairman: This section creates a new section 38. Perhaps we could take this new section by paragraphs. Is that procedure agreeable to the committee?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Deputy Chairman: Subsection 1 of the new section 38 deals with the manner in which expenses are to be met. Are hon. members ready to adopt this subsection?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Subsection agreed to.

The Deputy Chairman: Subsection 2 of the new section 38 deals with accounting. Is it the pleasure of hon. members to agree to this subsection?

Mr. Knowles: In agreeing, may I point out that as to the three subsections which you are now referring to, Mr. Chairman, there is no change from those subsections as they stand in the act at the present time.

The Deputy Chairman: Then is subsection 2 agreed to?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Subsections 2 and 3 agreed to.

The Deputy Chairman: We now come to subsection 4. This is the subsection which the hon. member for Greenwood has asked to be allowed to stand. Perhaps I should refer the hon. member to citation 691 of Beauchesne's third edition. Unless this subsection is to be allowed to stand by unanimous consent, the hon. member will have to move that consideration of the subsection be postponed. If he makes that motion, and as the subsection is before the committee, if there is no agreement on it I will have to put it to a vote.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I understand that, Mr. Chairman. I just want to reiterate what I have already said. I have asked for information, and it seemed to me a reasonable request. If we may not have that information, then we cannot get it; that is all. I will move that consideration of the subsection be deferred until this information which I have asked for—and I think it was a reasonable request—is available.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Before we vote on this may I say that as I understand the discussion up to now, there is a sum due by the departments to the king's printer amounting to some $3 million odd as of November 22. The amount varies every day. The detail the hon. member wants is the amount due by the departments to the king's printer showing the change that occurs daily. The accounts are paid regularly. It would be quite difficult and would take a long time to prepare all these accounts, because every time we make a requisition to the king's printer for work to be done it is verified by the comptroller of the treasury, who looks into the account to see if we have that amount of money. Then the amount is encumbered, and cannot be spent otherwise than to pay for the requisition made. That amount is set aside by the comptroller of the treasury, and when we receive delivery of the goods, or the work is performed, an invoice comes in and the comptroller of the treasury pays that over to the king's printer, if I understand well the rouage of the procedure.

To answer the question asked by the hon. gentleman would be quite difficult because of the constant change in the amount of those accounts collectible by the king's printer. If the hon. gentleman would let this section pass I am sure the king's printer would open the books to him. He could see all the details. I do not think there is any objection to a member of parliament going into the details, but it would be quite cumbersome to come down here with all the books of the king's printer, with the outstanding accounts and so forth. Perhaps I am not reasonable in this, but that is the way it appears to me; and if it had the same effect on the hon. gentleman we would get this bill through.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I think you are very reasonable. I am only sorry that you thought I was unreasonable. I thought I made my motion in very general terms. I certainly did not want to cause a lot of irksome delay, but at the present time we have no picture, I submit, of what is really happening. We know that this department is owed $3,750,000 by other departments. We do not know how the payments are made except they seem to be a bit late. We also know that a little over $1 million in work is done month by month by this department for all other departments. I am frank to say to the Minister of Public Works that as far as I am concerned I would be perfectly satisfied with figures which would indicate in a general way what is happening between this department and the other departments. Anything which would satisfy a reasonable man—I will assume for a moment that I am one—and which would not cause great inconvenience to prepare would satisfy me. It would be in the public interest to have these payments made promptly. It is perfectly obvious at the moment that they are lagging months behind. There may be good reason for that, but up to the moment I have not got it and therefore I am going to let my motion stand.

Mr. Knowles: May I make this suggestion. I wonder whether or not we could pass this clause and have third reading stand over to a future sitting of the house. In the meantime the Secretary of State might lay on the table of the house a break-down of that $3,700,000 figure as of yesterday, and any other statements in that return which might help to answer the questions that have been asked today.

Mr. Bradley: I do not think there would be any objection to that.

[Mr. Fournier (Hull).]

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): That fails to cover one thing I have had in the back of my mind. There might be some amount less than $2 million, perhaps $1 million additional, that might be adequate. Nothing has been said yet to indicate that this cannot be done. I certainly do not want to be obstructive. If the Minister of Public Works feels that my request is unreasonable, all right; I will let it stand on the suggestion made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I thank the hon. member for Greenwood for being co-operative. I think it is reasonable that third reading be delayed for some time. The Secretary of State would have the details as to specified dates and as to the outstanding accounts for work in process which cannot be collected immediately by the king's printer. This return could be made to the house before third reading of the bill.

Mr. Bradley: There is no objection whatever to that. The only thing I would point out is that if this $3,700,000 were paid now we would still need $2 million in order to pay our bills.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): That is not a bit clear.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): I have been listening to the discussion, and if anything the hon. member for Greenwood is too reasonable. The minister wants authority to increase the advances by $2 million. In order to have sufficient knowledge to justify giving our approval we should have the information that is asked for. Now is the time for us to have the information with respect to what the departments owe the king's printer. If the different departments owe $3,700,000, that must be up to a certain date or the minister would not have come to us with that amount. We understand that it fluctuates from time to time. Now is the time to have the information, not after the bill is passed, to justify us in approving this legislation. We should also have a statement from the minister as to why the king's printer owes $2 million for supplies. So far as we know they may be owing $1 million too much. Someone in the department may have ordered much larger stocks than are justified. If that is so, there is no warrant for hon. members to increase the credit of the department to the extent of $2 million. That is particularly so if the supplies are very much larger than needed. There may be a lot of dead stock in the department. We should have a statement from the minister as to the standing of the purchases, whether they are justified in having on hand $2 million worth of goods more than are needed. We should have a statement from the minister clearing up that situation.

Mr. Bradley: I take it, Mr. Chairman, that the king's printer has some knowledge of his department. I do not think it likely that he is going to carry more stock than he actually needs for the purpose of his department.

Mr. Knowles: May I ask one question? Are there any wages unpaid because of this so-called shortage of money?

Mr. Bradley: No wages unpaid, Mr. Chairman.

The Deputy Chairman: Subject to the observations that have been made by the minister and accepted by the hon. member for Greenwood, I understand that clause 2 is carried.

Section 2 agreed to.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Mr. Speaker, I move the adjournment of the house. On Monday we will resume the debate on the address.

Motion agreed to, and the house adjourned at 4.40 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, November 26, 1951

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY

CANADA'S CONTRIBUTION TO EUROPEAN DEFENCE —REFERENCE TO STATEMENT OF MINISTER OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, with your permission I must refer once again to the matter of privilege raised by the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) on Wednesday last with respect to the report of a statement attributed in press dispatches to the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) at Rotterdam. Today the Montreal Gazette publishes on its first page the following explanation:

No cost figure set by Claxton. $100 million for Europe 'dromes based on estimates.

Toronto, November 25, C.P.: The $100 million attributed to Defence Minister Claxton in a Canadian Press story from Rotterdam November 21, as the cost of airfields in western Europe, was an estimate made by Douglas How, C.P. staff correspondent. It was based, How says, on statements by Mr. Claxton in the past that a modern airfield cost $20 million or more. No specific figure was mentioned by Mr. Claxton at Rotterdam. How's original cable from Rotterdam read:

"Claxton announced Canada foot bill for four or five new airdromes—likely to cost in vicinity of $100 million—in western Europe to field eleven squadron jet air division which capable providing tactical support for full-fledged army."

Then there are parentheses, and it reads:

(It then went into Mr. Claxton's references to Canada sending arms for more European divisions, and other matters.)

As extended and backgrounded by the Canadian Press cable desk for publication the dispatch ascribed the figures between dashes to the minister as follows:

"Rotterdam, The Netherlands, November 21, C.P. —Brooke Claxton announced today that Canada will foot the bill for four or five new airdromes in western Europe to field an eleven squadron jet air division capable of providing tactical support for a full-fledged army . . .

There are three or four points of suspension, then it goes on:

"The airdromes, he said, will cost in the vicinity of $100 million."

When this story, among others, became a focal point of controversy in the House of Commons, How was messaged by his head office for confirmation of the announcement that Canada would foot the bill for the airdromes, and for clarification as to whether the estimate of cost was his own or the minister's.

He replied that according to his recollection the defence minister, in answer to a direct question, left no doubt that in the long run in one way or another, Canada would pay for the airfields in question. But that the $100 million figure was his own estimate, based on previous statements by the minister as to the cost of airfields.

Perhaps the lesson from this might be that at times statements, even by ministers of the crown as to what they have said or have not said, might be regarded as apt to be as reliable as the expanded or backgrounded reports published by news agencies.

In that connection the same issue of the Montreal Gazette has as its lead editorial one entitled, "Parliament's servant, even in Holland". The first paragraph reads:

The Claxton incident ought not to be exaggerated. Everybody makes mistakes—sometimes bad ones. But the whole matter could have been much better settled if the errors were admitted, with a reasonable expression of regret.

Well, I suppose we can take it that the Gazette's error is sufficiently admitted by the publication in the same issue of the article which I have just read. As to whether or not the writer of that article will see fit to make any expression of regret is a matter for himself to decide.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): We are, Mr. Speaker, dealing with the reports of very reliable press agencies, and I would point out that the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) has completely failed to deal with the fundamental issue raised both by the editorial in the Gazette to which he has referred and the report which has been issued by the Canadian Press after checking with their reporter, Mr. How. The fact is, in so far as the question of policy is concerned, it does not make any difference whether the amount involved is $1 million, $100 million, or $500 million. From a careful reading of the Canadian Press dispatch to which the Prime Minister has referred, it is quite clear that the report stands except for the figure. This is a financial detail, and a very important one, but the question of policy is whether or not a decision that Canada is to foot the bill for airfields—and may I add for barracks which were not mentioned by the Prime Minister—is to be presented to this house for consideration, or whether the hon. members of this house and the people of Canada are to learn about it for the first time through a statement made in Rotterdam or anywhere else outside of Canada.

When this statement was brought to the attention of the Prime Minister last Wednesday, he did not leave any doubt about his own position and the position of the government. These are his words as reported in Hansard at page 1223:

> . . . no such policy has been decided upon by the Canadian government.

The money, vitally important though that is, is not the question of policy. The Prime Minister told us last Wednesday that no such policy had been decided upon by the government. The statement as checked, revised and printed today as coming from the Canadian Press headquarters in Toronto leaves the statement of policy precisely where it was last Wednesday. I return also to the question of the barracks, because the Prime Minister either has overlooked that subject or has avoided it. The members of this house will recall that from The Hague, the night before the announcement in Rotterdam, the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) had announced that Canada was going to build barracks near Soest in Germany at a cost of between $5 million and $10 million, and that those barracks would be built by Germans, with the construction starting within a few months.

A new and interesting angle in connection with this matter arose as a result of another Canadian Press dispatch on Saturday—a dispatch published since this house last met—in which it was stated that Canadians have luxury barracks which were built during the Hitler regime. Mr. Speaker, if Canadians now have luxury barracks which were built by Hitler, I should think it would be a good thing if we continued to use those barracks. I cannot imagine a better purpose to which those barracks, originally built for the nazis, could be put than that of housing Canadians. In any event, we have as yet had no suggestion that the Minister of National Defence's statement at The Hague was not correctly reported. We are therefore still left with the statement that Canada is going to build barracks in Germany at a cost of between $5 million and $10 million.

May I repeat what was said before. I do not think anyone in this house is raising any question about our fulfilment of any obligations which we properly share as a member of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. But surely there are questions to discuss as to whether it is not appropriate that the contribution of some of these European nations might well be the construction of barracks or the building of airfields while we are supplying arms on a divisional scale; according to another announcement made by the Minister of National Defence, our undertaking was to complete the delivery of arms for four divisions. Surely those are questions of policy which are not affected in principle by the amount involved.

I think the explanation given by the Canadian Press as to the way in which Mr. Douglas How arrived at the figure of $100 million is one that to most members of this house would seem to be perfectly reasonable, they being well aware of the manner in which press reports are prepared and, may I also say, well aware of the manner in which the government at times gives information to the press outside of the regular conferences. In any event, the statement as originally raised stands, and I suggest that what has been stated by the Prime Minister and what was left unsaid about the barracks leaves this house still with no satisfactory explanation of why these policies were not announced here and why we should be left to learn of them through the press.

Mr. St. Laurent: Mr. Speaker, I suppose the leader of the opposition is entitled to get as much consolation as he can about what he has referred to in his last remarks. But I am willing now to leave the matter on the record as it stands in Hansard. It will be remembered that the statement which was referred to about the barracks was this:

> . . . the minister said the barracks will be built by Germans, the work to start in the next few months and be completed late next year.

That is no announcement of government policy, because it is not the policy of this government to announce what is going to be done by Germans.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Fraser: That is a poor one.

Mr. St. Laurent: It is sufficient for us to announce to parliament what the plans of the government are. That has been done and it will continue to be done.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, am I to take it from the Prime Minister's remarks that the Minister of National Defence was speaking on behalf of the Germans when he made that statement?

Mr. St. Laurent: The hon. member can "expand and background" the statements as he sees fit; and I hope that he will not be any less successful than the Canadian Press.

KURT MEYER

COMMITMENT TO WERL PRISON, GERMANY —REFERENCE TO PRESS REPORT OF RELEASE TO VISIT HIS HOME

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, you will be glad to learn that this is another question of privilege that I propose to raise. On October 19 last the Minister of National Defence was asked to make a statement with regard to the status of Kurt Meyer, and he did so on October 22, as reported at page 245 of Hansard. After explaining that Kurt Meyer was being committed to Werl prison in Germany, a prison which he designated as a Canadian service prison, he went on to say:

> The answer is that Meyer is still under the control and jurisdiction of Canada.

Today we read in a Canadian Press dispatch that when a representative of the Canadian Press called at Kurt Meyer's house on Saturday, with the expectation of seeing Mrs. Meyer—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Drew: I might say, Mr. Speaker, that the representative of the Canadian Press assumed that the report would be taken with sufficient seriousness that he did not find it necessary to give any other explanation of the fact that he was calling at Kurt Meyer's house, expecting to see Mrs. Kurt Meyer and to obtain from her information about her husband. He found Kurt Meyer playing with his children, explaining that he had been released from prison under an arrangement whereby the prisoners at that particular prison camp are permitted to visit their homes. Remembering that this prisoner is under Canadian jurisdiction, the question arises as to whether the Canadian government has given authority to Kurt Meyer to visit his home at regular intervals in this way.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I understood that the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of National Defence had inquired into this matter and had an answer prepared.

Mr. R. O. Campney (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the fact is that Kurt Meyer was transferred to a British prison at Werl in Germany—a prison which is operated for the punishment of war criminals convicted by Great Britain. While he was so transferred for purposes of incarceration, as the Minister of National Defence said at page 245 of Hansard, he remains under the control of the government of this country so far as sentence is concerned, and any release—that is, permanent release—would be within the jurisdiction of this government.

It is provided by section 178 of the National Defence Act that the minister may designate any prison as a service prison. As announced by the minister in the house on October 22, he so designated Werl prison as a service prison. Order in council P.C. 5596, dated October 18, 1951, was also tabled on October 22, setting out the regulations that govern prisoners in service prisons. Section 2 of those regulations specifically provides that a prisoner who is undergoing punishment in a place designated as a service prison under the National Defence Act shall be dealt with in the same manner as other prisoners in that place, and all the rules applicable to such other prisoners shall, in so far as circumstances permit, apply to him.

The regulations governing the operation of the prison at Werl are within the jurisdiction of the British authorities, and it is presumed that all prisoners there are subject to the same regulations as provided in the order in council to which I have referred.

We have made inquiries as to the specific rules dealing with the point raised by the leader of the opposition and have not yet received information as to what the rules in the British prison are. As soon as we have that information we will give it.

Mr. Drew: I would point out that the circumstances under which General Kurt Meyer came under the control of the Canadian government are very harrowing indeed to a number of Canadian families, and they affect the sentiments of a great number of Canadians in regard to the conduct of those responsible for military action. Kurt Meyer was found guilty of the responsibility for the death of certain Canadians. Either he was guilty or he was not. If he was guilty there was a form of punishment provided. If he was not guilty he should be freed. I submit further, Mr. Speaker, that there should be no intermediate stage. I do submit that it is a very surprising thing to be informed now that although the government has full responsibility for Kurt Meyer, whom they arranged to send to Germany, they have sent him to a prison whose rules they do not know. Judging from the answer that has been given, if these rules should provide that a prisoner be absent from the prison for six months, there would be no reason why it would not apply in this case. I would assume also that if the British authorities decided to extend that privilege to General Manstein and other prisoners, including General Kesselring—General Manstein and General Kesselring occupy cells on both sides of General Kurt Meyer—under the explanation that has been given, it would apply to General Kurt Meyer as well.

This is not something that is being raised by way of simply seeking to provoke a discussion. It is a matter of very deep and grave concern to all Canadians. This goes to the conduct of the military forces with which we were engaged in the war. Most certainly, if there was one man above all others who should be under appropriate restraint for life—if that is the penalty—it is the man who was responsible for the death of young Canadians, and most certainly there should be no easy treatment for a man who is guilty of that offence, and guilty under the circumstances that were accepted as evidence at the trial. I can only repeat that what has happened now suggests that the house should have been informed before Kurt Meyer left Canada; but in any event, the government should have been informed as to the regulations at Werl prison before Kurt Meyer was sent there. I suggest now that this whole case be reviewed. Either Kurt Meyer is guilty or he is not. If he is guilty he should receive the punishment that goes with guilt of this kind. If he is not guilty, he should be freed.

Mr. G. A. Cruickshank (Fraser Valley): May I ask a supplementary question of the parliamentary assistant? As an old veteran I do not need any assistance from Winnipeg. I feel keenly about this. If, as the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) said, this man as a soldier was found guilty by the courts of the land, as we presume he was, of murdering Canadians, then by no stretch of the imagination, so far as I am concerned, should he be permitted to spend a week end visiting his wife, anybody else's wife, or anyone else. I should like to ask a question through you, Mr. Speaker. We have never yet been definitely assured of what has happened to the man who wrote "Mein Kampf", who caused ruin to this whole world. If he should turn up now, is he to be permitted to visit the little lady friend he had, for a week end or two? I want to know definitely. I feel very keenly about this. Either this man is guilty or he is not.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Cruickshank: If he is guilty, as I understand he was so found by courts set up under international law, then I should like any veteran member of this House of Commons or any member of the Legion to rise in his place and apologize or approve of some reason why this man should have a week end of leisure at home or anywhere else. The courts of the land have convicted this man of murdering young Canadian soldiers. I do not approve of it. I do not know just how strongly to put it, Mr. Speaker, but as a veteran I think it is a blot on the law of Canada and on international law that this should be permitted, that this rat should be permitted to go home for a week end, when at least 19 Canadian mothers are mourning the death of their sons who were murdered.

Mr. Pouliot: All that has been said—

Mr. Ferguson: This German general was—

[Mr. Drew.]

Mr. Pouliot: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I do not know whether the house desires to debate this subject.

Mr. Pouliot: No, Mr. Speaker, I am speak- about a different matter.

Mr. Ferguson: I intend to speak about it, definitely.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Pouliot: Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak on a question of privilege.

Mr. Speaker: I am in the hands of the house. It is not customary to debate a question of privilege. I realize this is an unusual session. We do not have a committee of ways and means and a committee of supply, and it is for that reason that I have allowed a certain amount of latitude. There have been several speeches on the question raised by the leader of the opposition. I do not know whether the house wants to continue that subject.

[Later:]

Mr. J. H. Ferguson (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, I will not mention names, but I say that every member in the House of Commons does have a right to voice his opinion about a gentleman from an enemy country who is found guilty of committing acts—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Ferguson: Instead of being shot he was sentenced to life imprisonment, and the people of this country, the people of Canada, thought that this man was going to serve the sentence given to him by a just court composed of those who know what war is, and who know that these Canadians were young boys who were probably taken because of lack of ammunition. Then they were taken prisoner and were murdered by a man—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Ferguson: —who was given a sentence that the people of Canada did not believe was quite good enough. But when they were told he was going to be given life imprisonment they did not believe that that life imprisonment meant freedom. They will judge this government by their actions in this case. It is a crime and it is a slur on the people of Canada who fought in the last war—to think that our government would permit this to happen.

PRIVILEGE, MR. POULIOT—TRANSLATION OF SPEECHES

Mr. Jean François Pouliot (Temiscouata): I agree with you, Mr. Speaker. All that has been said about Kurt Meyer was out of order. I am not to speak about it; I rise on a question of privilege. I rise on a question of privilege which concerns me and also other members of the house who look at the translations of their speeches.

There are two official languages in this country; but I have discovered that for a long time there has been a third one, the language of bureaucracy. Twenty-five or twenty-six years ago I put a question on the order paper to find out who was the man who had translated such-and-such a speech in Hansard. It created a commotion in bureaucratic circles. When I got the answer, the name of one of them was a translator who, instead of doing his work, was canvassing members for General de Gaulle at the time. He was a very busy gentleman.

What I complain about is that the language of bureaucracy is not understood by the people. When we have a translation from English into the language of bureaucracy, nobody understands it; and it is so bad that I cannot send speeches to the local weeklies to be reprinted, because nobody would understand them.

I will give the example I gave twenty-five years ago. There has been no progress since, because the strength of bureaucracy is the force of inertia. When I say the constituents of my county, or my constituency, I mean in French "Les électeurs de mon comté". Everybody uses that language from coast to coast, when one speaks in French. Instead of that, they have persisted in publishing, time and time again, instead of "les électeurs de mon comté" the words "les commettants de ma circonscription".

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pouliot: You laugh, Mr. Speaker; it is ridiculous. But, for their punishment, I shall ask again: Who first translated two or three little speeches which I made in English since the beginning of this session? I did not take much time. I wish my speeches to be translated in the French language, in the French that is spoken—good Canadian French, and Canadian language, which is used from coast to coast.

And I will tell you, some time, a little more about the translators who are busy distorting our language in the French edition of Hansard.

RAILWAY LEGISLATION

Second report of the special committee on railway legislation.—Mr. McCulloch (for Mr. Cleaver).

QUESTIONS

GUT DAM—EFFECT ON WATER LEVELS OF LAKE ONTARIO

Mr. Lennard:

What effect has the Gut dam at the easterly end of lake Ontario on the water levels of that lake?

He said: Mr. Speaker, I request that this question be dropped.

Mr. Speaker: Dropped.

STRATEGIC MATERIALS—PRICE FIXING AND SUPPLY FOR DOMESTIC USE

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood):

Has the Minister of Trade and Commerce, in cases where for war purposes we shorten the supply of materials and the remainder is insufficient for domestic supplies, taken steps to fix prices on materials for domestic use and arrange distribution?

Mr. McIlraith: For such materials as are in short supply, by reason of excessive demands to meet defence requirements, the government has appointed controllers to take charge of the distribution and no price increase for these materials can be made without prior approval being obtained from the controller. This applies particularly to steel, non-ferrous metals, sulphur and certain chemicals, at the present time.

CANADIAN WAR CLAIMS COMMISSION—CANADIANS RETURNED FROM JAPANESE PRISONS

Mr. Fulton:

1. Who are the personnel of the Canadian war claims commission, and what are their respective salaries?
2. What clerical and other staff does the commission have, and what are the total salaries for this staff?
3. What is the total number of claims from Canadians which the commission has under consideration?
4. Of these, how many are claims from Canadians who were imprisoned or interned by the Japanese?
5. Of the claims covered in part 4, when was the first one received?
6. Have any of these claims yet been paid?
7. What is the total of such claims?
8. What is the total of Japanese assets in the hands of the commission or of the custodian for distribution?
9. Have any interim payments been made on any of the claims?
10. If not, for what reason?
11. Have any Canadians been paid any money for the period during which they were interned or imprisoned?
12. Has the Canadian government done anything for returned Canadian civilian prisoners of the Japanese beyond arranging for their return to Canada?

Mr. Bradley:

1. Commissioner: Right Hon. J. L. Ilsley, Chief Justice of Nova Scotia, appointed by order in council of July 31, 1951, as an advisory commissioner on the method of dealing with war claims. No compensation.

2. Technical adviser: H. Carl Goldenberg, barrister, as and when services are required. Compensation $150 for each day during which he is so occupied. 1 secretary: Mrs. N. M. Haynes; salary: $200 per month.

3. The commissioner is acting in an advisory capacity only and will not make recommendations or awards on individual claims. The commissioner will recommend to the government which classes of claims should be paid in full, which in part only and which, if any, should be disallowed. Claims from approximately 4,000 Canadians have been received by the war claims branch of the custodian's office.

4. Claims have been submitted to the war claims branch on behalf of approximately 1,750 former prisoners of war of the Japanese and on behalf of approximately 125 former civilian internees or detainees of the Japanese.

5. December, 1943.

6. No.

7. Claims submitted on behalf of former prisoners of war of the Japanese total approximately $2 million, computed at the rate of $1 a day for every day of imprisonment; claims submitted on behalf of former civilian internees or detainees of the Japanese total approximately $625,000.

8. There are no Japanese assets in the hands of the commissioner. The custodian has under control approximately $3,425,000 of assets which formerly were owned by Japanese enemies. When the treaty of peace is ratified such assets will be at the disposal of the Canadian government.

9. None other than the following: (a) a few officers or employees of the government of Canada received compensation from the government in respect of loss of belongings incurred upon leaving their posts; and (b) a few Canadians were compensated by the governments of two or three Far Eastern countries under local schemes in respect of property losses.

10. There is no authority to make interim payments but this matter is under active consideration.

11. Former civilian internees or detainees have received nothing. Former prisoners of war were credited with their pay while imprisoned and in appropriate cases have received pensions if disabled as a result of imprisonment.

13. No, except that in some of the cases mentioned in (a) and (b) of No. 9 above the claimants so compensated may have been interned by the Japanese.

DEFENCE CONSTRUCTION—MATERIAL SHORTAGES

Mr. Hellyer:

1. What defence construction projects are held up by material shortages?

2. In each case, what are the specific materials and quantities that are not available?

Mr. McIlraith:

1. In carrying out the defence construction program, there have been a number of difficulties due to material shortages, resulting in delays in getting materials to the different sites as rapidly as might have been desired. However, as a result of government action and the co-operation of industry, there are only three cases where work is not proceeding because of material shortages.

2. The following defence construction projects are not proceeding because of material shortages: (i) Construction of RCEME workshop for the army at Long Branch, Ontario. This project requires 224 tons of structural steel ordered on American mills. Delivery to the Canadian fabricator was set back from September to November due to changes in the American controlled material plan regulations. Fifty per cent of the requirement has now arrived at the fabricator's shop and is being fabricated. Present plans call for erection at the site to commence December 10. (ii) Chemical laboratory for the defence research board at Shirley's Bay, Ontario. This project requires 160 tons of structural steel. Originally an effort was made to place this order on an American mill but due to delays arising out of the controlled material plan regulations, the order was subsequently placed on a Canadian mill. Twenty-five tons have been delivered to the fabricator and the balance is to be delivered before December 31. Present undertaking of the fabricator is that erection will start not later than February 1, 1952. (iii) Construction of 250-man barrack block for the R.C.A.F. at Centralia, Ontario. This project requires 137 tons of structural steel ordered on American mills. Delivery to the Canadian fabricator was scheduled for October but was received in October and November. The delay arose due to changes in the American controlled material plan regulations. Fabrication is now being completed and erection at the site is to commence during the week of November 26.

NATIONAL REVENUE—OFFICES IN SYDNEY, N.S.

Mr. Gillis:

1. How many offices does the Department of National Revenue occupy in the city of Sydney, Nova Scotia?

2. Are these offices owned by the government, rented or leased?
3. If rented or leased, from whom?
4. What rental is paid per year?
5. Does the rental paid include heating, lighting and janitor service?
6. If so, what amount of the rental is allocated for such services?

Mr. Fournier (Hull):

1. Two.

2. One office, which is occupied by the customs division, is located in the public building, and the other, which is occupied by the income tax division, is in a rented building.

3. Joseph G. Azar.

4. $20,448.77.

5. The rental includes heating and janitor service, but not lighting.

6. No information.

NATURAL GAS AND OIL PIPE LINES—INVESTIGATION BY GOVERNMENT

Mr. Knowles:

1. Has there been made by any branch or department of the federal government an investigation or study of the whole question of natural gas and/or oil pipe lines, including any or all aspects of the question?
2. If so, has such investigation or study resulted in the preparation of a report thereon?
3. If there is such a report, is it available to members of parliament and to the public?

Mr. McIlraith:

1. Yes.

2. A confidential report on the crude petroleum industry, dated July, 1950 and one on the natural gas industry, dated May, 1951, were prepared for use by the government.

3. These reports are confidential, prepared by government employees for government use and therefore not available for general distribution.

IMMIGRATION—HOSTELS AND COSTS OF MAINTAINING IMMIGRANTS

Mr. Churchill:

1. How many hostels are there to deal with arriving immigrants, and where are they located?
2. What is the cost per person per day of maintaining immigrants in these hostels (a) when maintained by the Department of Labour; (b) when maintained by the Department of Citizenship and Immigration?

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce):

1. (a) The Department of Labour operates two hostels for the reception of immigrant workers, one located at St. Paul l'Ermite, Quebec, and one at Ajax, Ontario. (b) The Department of Citizenship and Immigration maintains eight buildings in which immigrants may be housed and fed. These buildings are located in Halifax, Saint John, N.B., Quebec, Montreal, Winnipeg, Edmonton, Vancouver, and Victoria.

2. (a) The average cost per person per day of maintaining immigrants at Department of Labour hostels is $2.88, which includes rent, salaries, services, food, and other supplies and depreciation. (b) The cost of maintaining immigrants in buildings operated by the Department of Citizenship and Immigration is approximately $2.50 per person per day. This includes food, salaries of catering staff, light, heat, laundry, and small items of kitchenware.

IMMIGRATION—SHORTAGE OF SHIPPING—PRIORITY

Mr. Churchill:

1. Is there a shortage of shipping for (a) British immigrants; (b) other immigrants, by countries?
2. Is British immigration being held back by shortage of shipping?
3. If so, what is the order of priority, if any, allowing British immigrants to come forward as among different categories?

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce):

1. (a) Yes. (b) Yes. All European countries, in varying degrees, with the exception of Mediterranean countries.

2. See answer to No. 1.

3. The Canadian government does not control the booking of passage by private companies. The booking of passage is handled by the transportation companies.

NORTH RUSTICO BAY, P.E.I.—CONSTRUCTION OF BOAT HARBOUR

Mr. McLure:

1. Were tenders called for the building of the boat harbour at North Rustico bay?
2. If not, will this work be completed by day's labour?
3. Will this boat harbour or boat protection be built in one place, or will it accommodate fishermen at the north end of bay as well as south?
4. What is the estimated amount for this work?

Mr. Fournier (Hull):

1. Yes, a contract was awarded for repairs to the breakwater at an estimated cost of $19,483.50.

2. Further repairs to the breakwater, estimated to cost $4,900 are being performed by day labour. Repairs to the North Rustico wharf, estimated to cost $2,500, have also been authorized.

3. The breakwater is maintained for protection of the harbour entrance as well as for protection of fishing establishments in its vicinity. The wharf is maintained for the accommodation of boats in the vicinity of North Rustico village.

4. Answered by Nos. 1 and 2.

IMMIGRATION—TEMPORARY LOANS TO EUROPEAN IMMIGRANTS

Mr. Dinsdale:

1. Has the practice of providing temporary loans to European immigrants, in order that they might get passage to Canada, been discontinued?

2. If so, when was this done, and for what reason?

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce):

1 and 2. The issue of travel warrants under the assisted passage loan scheme was suspended on October 11, 1951, because the total revolving fund had been committed at that time.

FLOOD PREVENTION—STUDIES OF PROTECTIVE MEASURES

Mr. Knowles:

1. Has the government received, since January 1, 1951, representations urging prompt completion of protective studies with reference to long-range protective measures against future floods in the watershed which includes the Red, Assiniboine and Pembina rivers, so that any comprehensive plan based thereon may be established at an early date?

2. If so, from whom?

3. What progress is being made in connection with the completion of these studies?

4. Have these studies been advanced to the point where the type of plans to be based thereon can be indicated?

5. Can the government give any other information concerning progress in connection with these long-range protective measures against future floods in the Red river area?

Mr. Winters:

1. Yes.

2. The council of the Winnipeg chamber of commerce.

3. Field investigations and office studies are going forward with the objective of completing a report at as early a date as possible.

4. No.

5. Good progress is being made in the accumulation and analysis of pertinent data from topographic, hydrographic and bathymetric surveys, soil examination, diamond drilling and so forth.

VETERANS—MEDICAL TREATMENT—DEDUCTION OF PENSION PAYMENTS

Mr. Diefenbaker:

1. How many veterans, suffering from tuberculosis and accepted as the responsibility of the Department of Veterans Affairs, are receiving medical treatment in sanatoria or other hospitals in Canada?

[Mr. Fournier (Hull).]

2. In provinces in which free treatment is given, does the Department of Veterans Affairs deduct any portion of the payment of pension to cover payment for treatment?

3. If so, has consideration been given to discontinuing doing so?

Mr. Mutch:

Return at November 13, 1951:

1. 1,070.

2. No. A pensioner, however, under treatment as a responsibility of the department in a sanatorium or other hospital for his pensioned condition "tuberculosis", receives while in hospital, in the form of pension or treatment allowances, the equivalent of a 100 per cent pension less $15 a month. The $15 a month is deducted because he is not under expense for food and lodging.

3. Answered by No. 2. The matter has been under consideration.

UNITED STATES TARIFF ON FROZEN FISH FILLETS FROM CANADA

Mr. Balcom:

1. Is the government aware of any investigation being made by the United States tariff commission into the tariff on frozen fillets of cod and haddock entering the United States?

2. Under our trade agreements with the United States are Canadian producers protected against increases in the United States tariff on these items?

Mr. McIlraith:

1. Yes. According to available information, a request has been made to the United States tariff commission to investigate the need for increased tariff protection for groundfish fillets produced in the United States. As a result of such an investigation, the tariff commission may, in certain circumstances, recommend to the President of the United States an increase in the tariff rate which is involved. Under United States law, it is understood that such a recommendation cannot be made unless it is found that increased imports are the cause or the threat of serious injury to a domestic industry, nor unless it is found, further, that these increased imports are the result of a tariff concession negotiated by the United States under a trade agreement. The tariff rate on frozen fillets of cod and haddock entering the United States is contractually bound against increase in the general agreement on tariffs and trade, which is the operative trade agreement between Canada and the United States.

2. Under this agreement, it would not be permissible for the United States government to increase the tariff in question unless it could be shown that groundfish fillets are being imported into the United States in such increased quantities as to cause or threaten serious injury to domestic producers of like products and, further, unless it could be shown that the increased imports are the result of unforeseen developments and the result, also, of the tariff concession under the agreement. Even if the United States government should decide, as a result of a recommendation by the United States tariff commission, to increase the tariff rate in question, the Canadian government would have the right, under the general agreement on tariffs and trade, to be consulted on all aspects of such proposed action.

CATTLE, ETC.—NUMBER IN CANADA—EXPORTS TO U.S.A.

Mr. Diefenbaker:

1. What was the number of (a) milk cows; (b) cattle; (c) pigs; (d) sheep, by provinces, in each of the years 1941 and 1951?

2. How many (a) milk cows; (b) cattle, were exported to the United States in the year 1950, and to date, during each month in 1951?

NEWFOUNDLAND

R.C.A.F. TRANSPORT ON SPECIAL FLIGHT FROM ST. JOHN'S TO GANDER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister, of which I have given notice. I should like to know what representations were made by the premier of Newfoundland as a result of which instructions were given for an R.C.A.F. plane to make a special flight from St. John's to Gander last Thursday night with a German national on board and to pick up another German national at Gander who was arriving by a Sabena plane from Germany that night. I raise this question because according to press reports this was part of the general political activity which has been taking place down there recently. I am asking what representations were made which resulted in this plane being made available.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I thank the leader of the opposition for sending notice of his question to my office so that I could have the matter looked into and get whatever information was available. On Thursday evening the premier of Newfoundland telephoned my office and asked if an R.C.A.F. plane could fly a government official—not a politician; that was his statement—from St. John's to Gander that evening. He said that the matter was urgent and that no other means of transport were available.

The matter was brought to my attention and I said that I could not give any order for any such flight but that it was the general policy of the government to meet reasonable requests from provincial governments when it was possible for us to do so. I suggested that they try to get in touch with St. John's to find out more about it and I especially warned them to make sure that it had nothing to do with the election that was in progress down there.

I understand that the deputy minister of national defence tried to get through to St. John's by telephone, but after several attempts he found that it would be several hours before he could do that. He communicated this information to my office and it was brought to my attention. I said, "Mr. Smallwood told us in his first message that he had been in touch with the officer commanding the air force down there and perhaps that officer knows what this is about; perhaps you could let him know that we do not want to refuse to do something which may be important—I do not know—but perhaps you might tell him what is the policy of the government in such circumstances. If you cannot get an answer from him, let him take the responsibility of deciding what would be proper in line with government policy". I said that I did not want to do that as Prime Minister, that there was an Acting Minister of National Defence. I said, "You can tell the acting minister what my views are without their being instructions from me, and determine with him what you had better do about it". I understand that, after discussing it with the deputy minister, the acting minister saw that that kind of message went to the officer commanding the R.C.A.F.

Mr. Coldwell: Who is the Acting Minister of National Defence?

Mr. St. Laurent: The Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Lapointe). I understand the flight was made. I do not know whether there was a German national on the inward or on the outward flight. We will inquire as to how the officer commanding the air force down there attempted to carry out this general policy to be of service to provincial governments but to be careful not to take part in any political controversies.

Mr. Drew: Since the Prime Minister has indicated that he will be getting further information I would point out that the definite, undisputed facts, as set out in the press reports which have appeared, are that this plane went to meet a Sabena aircraft arriving from Germany that night and that on that plane was a Dr. Sennewald, who has become a figure in the political campaign under way in Newfoundland; that on the plane going to meet him was a German by the name of Brown Wogan; and that he went to meet this man for purposes which were quite apparent. I should like to know why a special plane should have been made available.

Mr. St. Laurent: All I know is that the policy of the government of Newfoundland, whether it be proper or improper, has been to try to bring industries from overseas to be established in Newfoundland. Mr. Smallwood did tell me about some of his projects and I hope they will be successful. I shall make further inquiries and endeavour to see, on the one hand, that we do not refuse to do reasonable things for provincial governments, but also that we do not comply with requests that might be regarded as unreasonable.

Inquiries of the Ministry

KOREA

REPORTED ARRANGEMENTS FOR A CEASE-FIRE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Can the Prime Minister give the house any information regarding the cease-fire agreement which, according to the latest British United Press dispatches, has been reached in Korea? Will this welcome news mean that as far as the United Nations—Canada being a member—are concerned, the fighting will cease? The dispatch is a little obscure. I would quote it as follows:

> In the meantime it is believed that while officially the war will continue during the thirty-day period, it actually will die down.

In view of the interest of many Canadians, some with sons overseas, can the Prime Minister tell us what Canada's position is regarding this cease-fire?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I am sorry that I cannot give the hon. member any better information than I gave my wife when I went home for lunch. I did not hear the newscast over the radio as she did. She was quite firm in her belief that the fighting had ceased. As I had no official information I had to tell her that my understanding was that they were to agree upon where the line would be drawn, and if they could within thirty days settle the other matters in dispute; all that before the cease-fire order took place. I assume, if they are well on the way to agreement, the fighting might be less active in the meantime, and I would hope that that would be the case. I shall give the house the information just as soon as we can get it from the headquarters of the United Nations.

Mr. Coldwell: After hearing the broadcast I thought that perhaps the Prime Minister might know more about the matter.

Mr. St. Laurent: We are endeavouring to get accurate information from the United Nations headquarters as to what it really means and I shall communicate that information to the house just as soon as it is obtained.

GRAIN

RESULTS OF PLEBISCITE ON MARKETING OF OATS AND BARLEY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. S. Sinnott (Springfield): I should like to ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce a question, of which I have given notice. Can he give the house information as to how many voted for and against the marketing of oats and barley through the Canadian wheat board in the plebiscite held in Manitoba, on Saturday, November 24?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): The department has no official information regarding the results. After receiving the notice I asked for such information as could be obtained at that time. I understand the question asked was: Are you in favour of the present system of marketing oats and barley through the Canadian wheat board? The unofficial figures are as follows: 30,622 voted yes and 3,797 voted no.

Mr. Bryce: Will the government, following the result of Saturday's coarse grain plebiscite in Manitoba, and having in mind the recommendation of the pools, give consideration to discontinuing the use of the Winnipeg grain exchange in making sales, and to placing flax and rye under the wheat board?

Mr. Howe: The methods used in marketing oats and barley are methods that commend themselves to the wheat board which is responsible for that operation. No consideration has been given to placing the marketing of flax and rye under the wheat board.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

ITALY—PO RIVER FLOOD—QUESTION AS TO ASSISTANCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. Earl Catherwood (Haldimand): I have a question which I should like to direct to the Secretary of State for External Affairs, but as he is not here I will direct it to the Prime Minister. Has the government received an appeal from any Italian sources or agencies asking for assistance for the people in the stricken areas of the Po river where disastrous floods have rendered almost 200,000 people homeless and caused property damage of hundreds of millions of dollars? If the government has received an appeal, will the Prime Minister state whether any help is being extended to these people?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): The short answer to both questions is no, but I do not think I should leave it at that. I think I should inform the house that the Secretary of State for External Affairs as chairman of the North Atlantic council has sent the following message to the prime minister of Italy, Signor de Gasperi:

> I am sure that I speak for all NATO governments in expressing to you our warm sympathy and deep concern for the trials and hardships which the people in northern Italy are suffering from the disastrous floods. Italy's partners in NATO will, I know, wish to co-operate by whatever means may be possible in giving help and assistance to meet this tragic emergency.

I know that the means by which some assistance, either direct or indirect, could be made available to supplement the rescue operations which are being assisted by the United States and United Kingdom forces are being actively explored. The United States and the United Kingdom had armed forces stationed quite close by and they were able to be of very substantial assistance in this disaster. As soon as more details are available as to what is urgently needed—I have heard something to the effect that it is blankets and medical supplies—we will all be in a better position to determine what could or should be done.

NATIONAL CAPITAL PLAN

INQUIRY AS TO ERECTION OF STADIUM IN OTTAWA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. T. Richard (Ottawa East): In taking this opportunity to congratulate the Ottawa Rough Riders—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Richard (Ottawa East): —I should like to ask a question.

Mr. Speaker: Order. With respect to the question of the recent football championship game, I should say that the hon. member for Ottawa West telephoned my office and asked me if it would be in order for him to raise the question today. I told him that it was unanimously decided by the house at the last session not to bring up these matters.

Mr. Richard (Ottawa East): That is why I did not get up exclusively for that purpose, but to ask a question of the Minister of Public Works. I should like to ask him if it is the intention of the government to follow the recommendations of the Greber plan at an early date to co-operate in the erection of a stadium in Ottawa so that future Grey cup games between Ottawa and the west can be played in the capital city?

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (Minister of Public Works): Really I have not given much thought to this question. I was elated when I learned that the Ottawa Rough Riders had won. I will submit the hon. member's question to my colleagues of the cabinet and when they agree on some project I will let the house know.

Inquiries of the Ministry

FINANCE

INQUIRY AS TO WITHDRAWAL OF BANK OF CANADA SUPPORT FROM GOVERNMENT BOND PRICES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I wish to direct a question to the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance, having already given him notice of it. Will he confirm or deny the following statement:

> Big news of the week was the Bank of Canada temporarily withdrawing its support from government bond prices.

This statement appeared in the Financial Post of November 24.

Mr. James Sinclair (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Finance): I thank the hon. member for giving me notice. I got the Financial Post and searched through it. On page 4 I found a little story headed, "Government Bond Prices Hold After Sharp Drop". The main part of the story is a repetition of the statement I made last week in answer to the hon. member for Kamloops. I cannot see where that is the big news of the week, even by the Financial Post's standards. The second point is that I have nothing to add to the statement I made on government policy last week. I would point out, however, that this very story in the Financial Post does say that bonds of comparable issues of both the United Kingdom and the United States have fallen more over the same period. Neither of these two governments follows a policy of bond support either.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): If I might make a comment it would be in the words of a former distinguished member of my party, that we were given a lot of words but no answer.

WHEAT

STORAGE FACILITIES AT CHURCHILL—REQUEST FOR ENLARGEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): I should like to reply to a question asked on Friday by the hon. member for Saskatoon. He inquired as to whether representations had been made concerning the expanding of storage facilities for grain at Churchill. I received a letter from the interprovincial farmers union council asking that the grain storage facilities at Churchill be doubled. While consideration will still be given to other parts of the letter, I should tell the hon. member that because of the shortness of the season at Churchill, and also on account of the very limited amount of incoming cargo, I do not think it would be advisable to expand the facilities at that point.

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS

PRINTING OF AUDITOR GENERAL'S REPORT AND PUBLIC ACCOUNTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. James Sinclair (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Finance): Last week the leader of the opposition raised a point concerning the printing of the public accounts. At that time I gave some reasons why the printing was delayed and said that I thought it unlikely they would be published for another two weeks. Since that time the comptroller general of the treasury has prepared a statement outlining the difficulties which arise in the publication of this very large book. I do not think there is any point in my giving the further reasons but he does say that it has been found possible now to turn out a special printing of the appendix, the report of the Auditor General, and that will be in the hands of all hon. members on Wednesday before the public accounts committee sits.

INQUIRY FOR RETURN

BUTTER AND MARGARINE—REGULATIONS REGARDING MANUFACTURE—INGREDIENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. Chester S. McLure (Queens): I do not want to ask a new question, but on November 7 I placed a question on the order paper which was passed as an order for return on November 12. It is a very important question, and reads as follows:

1. What are the regulations regarding the manuture of (a) butter; (b) margarine, for human consumption?

2. What amount of each kind of oil or other ingredient is used in the manufacture of a pound of margarine?

No return has as yet been tabled, and I should like to bring this matter to the attention of the government so that the return will be made soon.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed, from Wednesday, November 21, consideration of the motion of Mr. Robert Cauchon for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Drew, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Quelch.

Mr. E. G. Hansell (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, it is not very usual for the good brethren to walk out before I announce my text, but under the circumstances, so much time having been spent today in the asking and answering of questions on the orders of the day, perhaps it is excusable. In this debate on the speech from the throne I wish to emphasize one or two points that have been mentioned during the course of the debate, but which so far have not received any satisfactory reply from the government side of the house.

The first matter is that, in spite of the government's action announced during the last session to curb the rising cost of living and put a brake on inflation, the cost of living still continues to rise. I was interested in listening to the speech by the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Sinclair) some weeks ago. The hon. member is, in my opinion, a rather capable individual and carries his burden quite well. During the course of his speech I could not help thinking that he was extremely apologetic when attempting to explain to the house how inflation was brought about, why the cost of living continues to rise, and the fact that there was not a great deal that the government could do about it. I fancy he spoke officially for the government, and I took his speech as a series of excuses.

In such a predicament as we find ourselves in today, with the average or lower income people finding it so difficult to meet the cost of living, we want something more than apologies and excuses. It is not good enough for members on the government side of the house to argue that the situation cannot be helped, that it is a world-wide situation, or attempting to compare Canada with some other countries and pleading that our situation here is not perhaps as bad as it is in some countries. It is not good enough for them to excuse the situation by saying it is a result of the war which left us with few consumer goods.

The attitude that things just happen is not the right attitude to take. Might I suggest to the government that nothing just happens. Surely, they have heard of that great law of cause and effect. This law is just as true in respect of the actions of the government, whose actions must be based on their policy, as it is in other fields. Nothing just happens. There is a reason for anything happening, and the reason that we have inflation today, the reason that there is a steady incline in the cost of living, is to be found in the monetary policy that has been pursued by the government and their predecessors. Excuses are not enough. We must ask them to determine what financial policy they are desirous of pursuing in order to check inflation and the rise in the cost of living.

During the course of the debate one or two speakers on this side of the house mentioned the fact that people who cash bonds today do not receive the full value of those bonds. I believe it was the leader of the C.C.F., the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), who gave an illustration of a young woman who found it necessary to cash some of her bonds, and who did not receive full value for them. I believe the excuse was that perhaps she cashed them before they came due, and therefore had to take a discount. This illustration was used on more than one occasion. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) immediately replied that during the war years when we were floating those bond issues he promised that they would always be worth one hundred cents on the dollar. Well, that is a fine statement to make, and I suppose the minister is technically correct when he says that when those bonds mature the holder will be paid one hundred cents on the dollar. The more important point has been overlooked, and that is the fact that when the bonds are cashed, even though one might receive one hundred cents on the dollar, the one hundred cents only goes half as far in purchasing power as it did when the bonds were bought. We cannot lose sight of that point. The reason our dollar is only valued at half what it was several years ago is the result of government policy, and the government cannot pass the buck by saying these things just happen.

As a further point may I say, and this is another point which no one mentioned, perhaps owing to the fact hon. members are not too well informed on the matter, that when people cash their bonds today with the chartered banks, the chartered banks make a new issue of money in payment for those bonds. The result is that there is that much more money going out into circulation. This point would be well worth considering. As I mentioned in previous sessions, even when the government put on their sale of these bonds they encouraged the white-collar worker and others to take these bonds out on the instalment plan or even to borrow money from the banks to buy them. That in itself aggravated the inflationary trend; because every time anyone borrowed money from the banks in order to buy these bonds, the banks expanded the financial credit of this country. More money came into existence, with perhaps less consumer goods. That is something which perhaps has not been any too prominently mentioned here, but it is something that is extremely important in the general effect it has on purchasing power today.

Then again there are people who put their savings in the bank, put money away for a rainy day, or contributed some of their income to pay for industrial pensions. What has happened? Years have gone by. They now find it necessary to withdraw some of their savings or they are in receipt of industrial pensions for which they have already paid. What do we find? The money they receive today is worth only half as much as it was worth when they saved it or when they put it into their pension schemes. The result is that they can buy only half as much consumer goods. That is the problem we have to face today, and it is one that has resulted from the government's attitude. They have persisted in following a policy for whose framework they are also responsible.

I am now going to give an illustration. Perhaps hon. members did not read this in the papers the other day because it was not headlined. A certain aged lady went down to the bank here on Sparks street and withdrew $1,000 of her savings which she had put in the bank many years ago. As she was going out of the bank, by way of the front door, near the sidewalk a burly sort of a chap brushed against her. She felt something in her side and the man said: Come through; this is a stick-up. The lady fumbled around with her handbag and the thug—I will call him that—began to get a bit nervous; he poked his hand in the lady's bag and pulled out $500 and began to escape. The lady of course put up a little nervous cry, and it was not long until the news was spread abroad that there had been a stick-up. Of course the mayor of this city—or shall I say the mayoress—heard about it. She immediately contacted the chief of police and demanded that they get that man. She was surely going to have her man. No man is going to stick up defenceless women as long as I am mayor of this city, she said. So the police put a cordon around a few blocks, and the man was caught.

As I say, hon. members did not see this incident headlined in the paper. When the mask was torn from this man's face, to their surprise the police found that the face underneath the mask was none other than that of Douglas Charles Abbott, the finance minister of Canada. Of course the police were greatly surprised. How could they arrest such a distinguished gentleman? When they asked him to produce his gun he said: You surely do not think I did that with a gun. The police asked: What did you do it with? I do not know what he produced, but what he actually did it with was the government's financial policy. That is exactly what happened.

That is an allegory. I am quite certain that if the incident I have described actually happened, the people would be up in arms. Yet in effect that is what has happened. That is what happens to any person who goes to the bank today and takes out $1,000 of the hard-earned savings he has put in there over the years. When he comes to spend it on the production of this country with all its wealth, he finds that he has only $500. I could pursue that little allegory a bit further. Perhaps I shall.

Mr. Byrne: It might be worth while if it had some sense to it.

Mr. Hansell: I will give you some sense if you do not think that is sense. Somebody asked the old lady how it felt to be held up. She said: I did not feel it a bit. He was such a nice man, and he had such a nice, shiny gun. In fact, I told him, she said, that I would be back in a week or two for another thousand, and if he was around I would not mind much if he did the same thing again. The hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Byrne) suggested that I might illustrate the point with some sense. He might say: The last part of your illustration surely is nonsense. But let me tell him that it is no more nonsense than it will be for a bunch of chumps to turn around in the next election and vote Liberal. It will take a little while for that statement's meaning to dawn on the mind of my hon. friend; but eventually he will get it.

An hon. Member: It is very deep.

Mr. Hansell: The fact of the matter is this. I say again that the result of the financial policy that has been pursued by the present government is the situation we have today, and they cannot escape responsibility.

We need to speed up the wheels of our vast productive system. We need to put on the market more consumer goods. I know, of course, what the government will say to that suggestion. They will say: But you must recognize the fact that a great deal of our productive machinery today is being put into the production of non-consumer goods; the world is on the edge of a volcano; we have joined the North Atlantic Treaty Organization and we are spending money on our defences. I realize that fact. We all realize it. We all like to be as sensible as we can be. But let me ask one question. Suppose, for instance, we should be greatly surprised one of these days to find that we had come into an era of peace, when the confidence and trust between nations should suddenly be restored and there were no danger of an international armed conflict. I should like to know how the government would handle the situation if the wheels of our productive system should suddenly be changed over to the production of consumer goods. Would they shy away from a possible problem of unemployment? In what way would they change the framework of their monetary system in order to cope with a situation of that kind? That is something they have never answered, and something that men in public life should know. It is something that the people of Canada should know. It is something I will dare them to answer. Their financial policy would not be able to take care of a situation of that kind. I declare on that score that the government has absolutely no answer.

The other matter that I should like to refer to is the subamendment, which in reality is now under discussion. It was moved by the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch)—I think it was well moved and well timed. I will read it for the record:

> That the amendment be amended by adding thereto the following words:
> Furthermore, we regret that Your Excellency's advisers have failed to compensate the recipients of war veterans allowance for the increase in the cost of living by an appropriate increase in the amount of the allowance.

Previous to this I had intended to speak on the Legion's brief respecting an increase in their pensions. The other day we were delighted to hear the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Lapointe) announce that there would be an increase in war veterans' pensions. This has been mentioned before; it will bear mentioning again. Why did the government decide to increase the veterans' pensions, when no mention was made of it in the speech from the throne a few weeks ago? Could it be that pressure was brought to bear upon them to do it at this particular time, or could it be that an election was in the offing and they wanted to tell the people how much they thought of them? If the latter statement is correct, it may conceivably be found that they desired to assist Liberal Walter Thomson in his election. At least they got their answer, if they were willing to gamble millions of dollars for political purposes.

Mr. Cardiff: They assisted him out.

Mr. Hansell: However, I am saying this—and I want to be fair. We have reason to be pleased with the announcement. Our only regret is—and this has been mentioned before—that the government were not able, or did not see themselves able, to give similar increases in war veterans allowances. We all know that today there are veterans who, as far as their financial status is concerned, are perhaps in a worse plight than many war veterans on pensions. There are older veterans, widows and perhaps mothers and dependents who have no way in the world of making a living, and yet no thought was given to them. It is all very well for the government to say that a special committee is to be set up next session to look into this matter, to discover whether or not rates under the war veterans allowance are to remain the same or how much they should be increased. To me that is a very lame excuse, because all the government needs to do is to apply the same logic, the same reasoning and the same actuarial studies to the war veterans allowance as they did to the increase in pensions. Unquestionably they increased the war veterans pensions because of the higher cost of living. Well, the higher cost of living applies equally to those who are in receipt of war veterans allowances as to pensioners. What I am saying is that we are very sadly disappointed that these increases have not been announced, and that there will be no increase in the war veterans allowances until some time next year and perhaps late in the year. I say that because we all know that committee work takes time. Perhaps the next session will not be called until next February and the committee will not be set up until the end of that month and it may take a couple of months after that to report. That is the situation. However, I am very pleased that the hon. member for Acadia put the motion as he did, because it will give no hon. member in the house any excuse, when the vote comes, for not laying right on the line what his attitude is in respect to this matter.

I was very interested the other day in the line of debate pursued by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker). The hon. member was talking on this particular amendment and showing how each and every hon. member would now be in a position to register his vote, one way or the other. The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) objected as follows, as appears at page 1244 of Hansard:

> Does my hon. friend suggest that when any member of this house comes to register his vote, he does not use that privilege in accordance with his best judgment in the circumstances?

Of course that is a trick question. We all know that, from experience of the past in this house. Some of us have been sitting here a long time. We all know from past experience in the house that it is one thing to say something out on the hustings, but it is another thing to do something about it in this house when it comes to registering your vote. We all know what happens. I shall now finish the quotation from Hansard. When the Minister of National Health and Welfare interjected that question the hon. member for Lake Centre went on:

> Mr. Speaker, I am not going to become involved in any argument such as that. I am asking the question of the minister again, and giving him the opportunity to answer. Will he, speaking for the government, say that a free vote will be given on this amendment? That is the question.

The Minister of National Health and Welfare has never answered that question from that day to this. Let me pursue the matter a little further. We all know that just preceding the present session a circular letter was sent out from the Legion headquarters to all their organizations throughout the country, asking them to get in touch with their members and put before them the case for increased pensions and increased war veterans allowances. They came to me. I spoke before the local organizations of the Legion, and I suppose other hon. members did. What did members of this house tell these local bodies comprising the Legions throughout this country? What did the members tell them? Well, I know what they told them; but it does not take half an eye or half a brain to discern what they were told—"Well, of course, we will do all we can for the pensioners; of course we will do all we can for those who are on war veterans allowances; of course we will." Yet, it is one thing to tell them something in your own home town or in your own constituency, when they come to you. But, Mr. Speaker, we are here and now given an opportunity that will take us much further than vain words, vain speeches—vain words, words, words!

Now comes the opportunity for each and every member in the house to say whether they stand behind our veterans in respect of war veterans allowances, or whether their loyalty is to their political party, first. That is the issue, and it will be the issue in this vote. There is no getting away from that.

There is one other point I should like to discuss. When anyone raises a fuss along these lines, when one suggests that some hon. members are more concerned about keeping the government in office than in expressing and pursuing vigorously the wishes of their people, some government member rises in his place and says, "Well, under our parliamentary system we have a system of responsible government."

I remember that happened a year or two ago when, speaking about our parliamentary system, I compared it with the American system, as well as one or two others. When I was urging that some changes be made so as to bring into existence a more effective democracy, wherein members at all times, in their speeches and in their votes, would reflect the desires of their constituents, the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) rose and answered on behalf of the government. While he is Minister of National Defence, he is also an expert on constitutional law. At that time he said, in effect, "Under our system we have responsible government." Well, that is a nice expression; it sounds good. But, I ask: Responsible to whom? That is the question.

The only answer that can be given in a democracy is that they are responsible to the people of the nation. The only place where the people can make their wants and wishes known is on the floor of the House of Commons. That is why each and every member has been elected. We are the people's mouths, whether in criticism or in praise. And when it comes to voicing our opinion and registering our votes, then I declare that this subamendment gives each and every member an opportunity to say unreservedly where they stand in respect of war veterans allowances. Are they in favour of them or are they not?

I know the government will say that in this amendment there is an element of want of confidence, and that members supporting the government cannot be expected to vote for such an amendment. All right; the challenge goes out once again, when I say that the acceptance or rejection of this vote does not mean necessarily support or rejection of a vote of want of confidence. Let some minister rise in his place and say, "On this issue we will permit all members supporting the government to have a free vote, so that we may be able to determine exactly what the people of Canada want. Then, as their servants, we will pursue the policy of giving effect to their wishes".

That is the point I wanted to make. My leader the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low) whispers to me now that if the government will bring down an announcement to the effect that at this session, right now, war veterans allowances will be increased as pensions have been—and if that is done before we leave here, in two or three weeks—we shall be happy to withdraw the amendment.

I have one further point to make—and I fear my speech is reaching a sort of anti-climax. However, I cannot take my seat without referring to the apparent plight of the farmers in the west, brought about by the late harvest and the freak seasons we have had throughout the year. We have had rain and snow, and abundant crops, but much of it lies under the snow or is too wet to thresh. Let me add my voice to what has been said by many representatives from western Canada, who have said that the government should do something to alleviate this condition. I have taken a trip to the west since the beginning of the session, and while there I had the opportunity to talk with a number of people. I travelled through a considerable portion of Alberta and had an opportunity to discover what the situation was. The condition may have improved somewhat since that time, because I understand the weather has been more favourable. Nevertheless a tremendous amount of crop is still under the snow.

I was pleased to hear the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) announce a few days ago that the final wheat payment would be made. Perhaps that will help the farmers to some degree, so that they will have a little bit of that jingling stuff in their pockets. Nevertheless they will continue to find themselves in financial difficulties.

I do not wish to repeat suggestions which have been made before. I understand they have been made by the government of Alberta as well as by that of Saskatchewan. They have been made in the house by a number of speakers, when they have asked for the granting of loans on wheat in the bins, or even some sort of assistance in respect of crops that may eventually be harvested, but are not harvested at this time.

I suggest the government should do something about this serious matter.

Let me point out once again, as this group has done year after year, that the government's financial policy is bound within the confines of a framework it has vigorously supported and defended through the years. Almost everything the government has done, almost all financial legislation it has brought down, almost all international agreements touching upon the matter of finance and money, has been designed by the government so as to solidify and make permanent the financial framework from which it refuses to budge, and refuses to change. I am saying once again that just as long as they refuse to change, but pursue the same policies, there can be no improvement. Let it be understood that the same policies that get you into difficulty will never get you out. Once again I say that there will be no permanent solution of the many problems that confront us in the matter of finance, currency, cost of living and what have you until they change some of their basic and fundamental principles which today are false.

(Translation):

Mr. L. D. Crestohl (Cartier): Mr. Speaker, this afternoon I am merely following the policy I have adopted of opening all my speeches in this house with a few words in French.

Mr. Speaker, I do this in order to stress the bilingual character of our country. I feel very gratified in fulfilling this duty and I propose to continue doing so whenever the opportunity presents itself.

(Text):

Mr. Speaker, it is six weeks since His Excellency the Governor General delivered the speech from the throne. Following this we heard excellent speeches from the mover (Mr. Cauchon) and the seconder (Mr. Simmons) of the motion to adopt the address and lest their content and form of delivery be obscured by the intervening proceedings, I desire, Mr. Speaker, even at this late stage, to join my colleagues in congratulating the hon. member for Beauharnois and the hon. member for Yukon-Mackenzie River upon the high standard they have set in the splendid addresses which they delivered.

I should like to address myself, Mr. Speaker, principally to one matter referred to in the speech from the throne. I realize that referring to the Old Age Security Act at this stage may at first glance appear somewhat post facto, but I want to assure you, Mr. Speaker, that even though the legislation has been adopted by the house, I think my comments will nevertheless be timely, because I desire to deal with the spirit of the legislation and relate it to its administrative prospects when it comes into force on January 1 next.

I was impressed, as was no doubt every hon. member in this house and every person in Canada, by the gentle description which the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) gave to the men and women of Canada who are affected by the act when he referred to them as our senior citizens. That is a much kindlier reference and a much more thoughtful one than the term "old age pensioner" which is commonly used. For, in truth, Mr. Speaker, they are our elder citizens and should justly be known and treated as such.

Advanced years is one status which we all seek to attain and desire despite the apprehension as to what the fates may have in store for us. It is a strange phenomenon that, despite the fears which human beings hold with respect to old age, we all strive to grow older. We often shrink from the thought that we are actually growing older and yet we constantly exploit all the sciences to preserve ourselves to be able to do so. In speaking of this apprehension which we have about old age I am moved to quote from the liturgy of my faith very briefly. There is a supplicating prayer which reads:

"Cast us not off in our old age, and when our strength has ebbed do not forsake us."

That is a solemn prayer which people of all faiths utter in silence and in hope as the years move on. It is my conviction—in fact it is self-evident—that the adoption of this bill is an answer to that prayer. No one knows where he will be and under what circumstances any one of us may find himself at the age of seventy. Canada can now say with pride that it has not cast off its aged and has not forsaken them when their strength has ebbed.

With respect to the natural desire we all have to grow older, I am reminded of a little anecdote which is told about an ageing mother who at eighty years of age, because of her advanced years, was indisposed. Her considerate son sent for a physician to see her. The doctor with his charming bedside manner, and realizing her age, gently said to her, "You know, of course, madam, that time marches on and you, like all the rest of us, are not getting any younger". To which the little lady snapped back, "Young man, I don't expect you to help me get younger; you have been summoned here to help me get older, so get on with your job".

That, of course, typifies the desire of each one of us to attain that magnificent status to which years have no limit, but in which the years alone make us more dependent upon others. The problem of treating elder citizens has since time immemorial been a matter of grave concern to heads of governments and its solution has assumed various forms throughout the ages. I do not want to present a historic survey of how different peoples have treated their aged. I do not have to cite the Spartan approach or the Hitler system of doing away with human beings who could not bear arms because of old age or physical infirmity, but I do want to refer to one authority, no doubt the oldest authority, an authority which is indisputable and which sets into proper focus the lofty level of regard and the consideration which should be shown to our elder citizens, all of which is in consonance with the Canadian way of life.

Like one of my illustrious predecessors from the constituency of Cartier, the late Mr. S. W. Jacobs, who frequently quoted from the scriptures on the floor of this house, I too would like to quote from the ten commandments to which the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) referred the other night and which are universally acknowledged to be the first code of ethics given to man. The fifth commandment teaches us a very subtle lesson on how we should treat our elders. It reads:

"Honour thy father and thy mother; that thy days may be long upon the land which the Lord thy God giveth thee."

That is the enjoinder of this commandment. I am not a clergyman, but I am the son of a clergyman and therefore take a little poetic liberty which, together with the immunity provided by this house, may enable me to encroach upon what may be interpreted as a sermonette.

The commandment which I have just quoted is the only one that carries with it a promise of reward to those who will observe it. "Honour thy father and thy mother: that thy days may be long upon the land which the Lord thy God giveth thee". My neighbour to my left, the hon. member for Grand Falls-White Bay (Mr. Ashbourne), reminds me that in Sunday school class this commandment was called the first commandment with a promise. Biblical scholars have many interpretations for this commandment. The one I should like to emphasize is a version given to me by a friend of mine, Mr. Barney Aaron, a recognized scholar of biblical lore and literature in Montreal, who points out that this commandment means that you should honour not only your own father and mother, but also everyone else's father and mother. These in reality are the fathers and the mothers of the nation and if you honour them, then the reward is promised. Your own days will be long, you too will grow old to be a father or a mother. You too will be honoured in your own old age and in your own country where you will have honoured your own elders.

I should like to add another interpretation. This commandment speaks not only to the individual, but also to the nation as a whole. The words, "that thy days may be long upon the land", teach us the following lesson: That nation which lives in a land that honours its elders, builds a strong moral fibre, will continue to live in happiness upon its soil, will be free from the conquest that results from moral disintegration from within, and will be strong to repel assault from without.

By the adoption of this act, Mr. Speaker, the parliament of Canada, the people of Canada, give public and universal expression of their observance of the fifth commandment. This epoch-making law elevates every Canadian, and is in stride with the social justice program of this government and as the minister rightly declared, it places our country in the forefront of the nations of the entire world in the field of progressive legislation for the welfare of its people, and bespeaks for our country a lofty moral future.

It is so typical and characteristic of the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) to have treated this subject with the tenderness with which he did. He is eminently suited by temperament, by upbringing and by character to sense fully the consideration with which such a delicate matter should be handled. This was beautifully illustrated by a photograph which appeared in the press two weeks ago showing the minister with all his attention riveted on his mother in the midst of a happy family group. I have the photograph from the Ottawa Citizen of Wednesday, November 7, 1951. It bears the title, "Happy Family Reunion", and the reference under the picture reads:

"Paying one of his rare visits to his home town, Pembroke, Health Minister Paul Martin took time off to attend the Pembroke Rotary club dinner in company with his elderly mother."

I hope the minister will forgive me the personal reference, but I am moved to mention it by the symbolic coincidence that he should appear in the genuine role of a doting son to a greying mother on the same day that he was piloting through parliament a piece of legislation spelling out the love and affection of all Canadian children for all Canadian fathers and mothers. This sentimental touch epitomizes the profound and genuine understanding of the duties which the younger generation should constantly have for all fathers and mothers who, as I previously stated, constitute the fathers and the mothers of the nation.

I should like now to make one or two observations with respect to the application of the act in practice. The theory of paying a pension universally to rich and poor alike carries with it a dignity commensurate with our desire to preserve for our senior citizens the self-respect to which they are entitled by age alone, if by nothing else. It eliminates the stigma, in my judgment, of relief or charity and clothes it with the stature of a reward well deserved and well earned for many years of service. I am anxious that this sense of dignity be preserved on the administrative level where, if we are not careful, there is a danger that the entire philosophy of the act may slip from its elevation. I should like the administration of this act to be as generous and as considerate as it deserves to be. I am not unmindful of the great caution that must be exercised in the spending of public funds, but this is one expenditure that I should like to see made with a greater emphasis on the payment than on the caution.

The officials in charge should be men with charity in their hearts and a kindness in their souls. These humane qualifications will be required particularly to interpret sympathetically the documents and evidence submitted in support of applications which they will be called upon to consider. I am, for example, concerned with the fact that many of the applicants may not be in possession of birth certificates, particularly those applicants who were born in countries whose records were destroyed in the European holocaust, or records which are in the possession of countries where they are not accessible. I was happy to hear the minister constantly repeat on the floor of the house that every reasonable form of evidence as to age will be accepted. This is the humane approach, and I have every confidence that he will cause to penetrate to his administrative staff the same qualities in dealing with the applicants.

In speaking of administrative staff, I should like to say that we have indeed a most efficient and devoted civil service who hold and well merit the confidence of the people of Canada. They seem, however, to have classified themselves in two categories, the civil servant with an affirmative approach and the civil servant with a negative approach. I should like to illustrate something which is perhaps well known to almost every member of the house. John Citizen walks into the office of an official who promptly fixes in his mind that this man is looking for something and the official says to himself, "Now, what does he want?" He listens carefully and promptly turns up the regulation to indicate why the request cannot be granted. That is the negative minded civil servant.

Then there is the affirmative minded civil servant who, as he sees John Citizen walking into his office, allows himself the charitable thought, "There goes John Citizen, he must have a problem, he requires some assistance; I am his obedient servant, let me see what I can do to help him." He listens to the problem as did the other gentleman and he too reaches out for the book of regulations, but he finds something in the act to offer some measure of relief, if not totally at least partially. He speaks to John Citizen with a smile on his face and offers to help him as much as he is able to. That is the affirmative minded civil servant. It is my prayerful hope, therefore, that only civil servants who are affirmative minded will be charged with the administration of this act.

In all humility I should like to say that, because it was my privilege for many years to serve as the honorary secretary of the Montreal Hebrew old people's sheltering home, I acquired some little knowledge of the problems which people of advanced years present, and I therefore appeal to those who will administrate the act to regard the documents which they see before them not as cold type, not just as another file or another file number, but to understand the messages which these documents are intended to convey, and above all to remember that behind each document is at least 70 years of human life, loyalty, devotion and no doubt much suffering, which now pleads for gentle treatment at the hands of civil servants and pleads for a peaceful old age. If a country has the government it deserves, a minister too has the staff he deserves. This humane minister cannot, therefore, be surrounded by other than a most sympathetic administrative staff, and we can have every confidence that this act will be dealt with in the spirit of the minister himself. The people of Canada can ask for nothing better or more reassuring.

I should like nevertheless, Mr. Speaker, to say a word about the means test which has been eliminated at age 70 but retained between the ages of 65 and 69. I, for one, do not approve the dual classification allowing a pension at age 65 with a means test and at age 70 without a means test. There is a discomforting paradox in the situation. If a person requires a pension at age 65 and files his application, he should not be humbled by a means test any more than a person who files his application at age 70. There will be thousands of affluent Canadians of age 70 and over who will not file applications. On the other hand, there are thousands who at age 65 will not file applications, notwithstanding their need for assistance, because they want to avoid being humbled and embarrassed by the means test. These two classes would well balance each other. I am certain, Mr. Speaker, that Canadians who are called upon to meet the cost of this new legislation will have no objection to extending themselves a little further if need be to eliminate this discomforting procedure known as the means test and enable the government to pay this universal pension without a means test to everyone who applies for it at age 65 and over. The present legislation is a good beginning in that direction, and I am hopeful that in the not too distant future the government in its wisdom will be able to eliminate the means test altogether.

The Minister of National Health and Welfare has frankly stated during the debate that time and experience may suggest improvements. At the risk of being redundant I want to ask the minister again to review section 5 of the act which deals with the suspension of the pension to anyone who leaves Canada for a certain period. At age 70 and over people become quite frail, and frequently they are alone. They may have to leave Canada for short or long periods to preserve their health or in order to reside with a child outside of Canada rather than live with strangers or alone. If the denial of the monthly pension is to produce real hardship, the minister, I know, will have another look at this section of the act with a view to eliminating such a possibility.

I should like to draw to his attention also that a satisfactory explanation to justify the suspension of these payments has not been made. If I recall correctly, the only explanation given was that those who leave Canada will not be here to spend their money, while those who remain in Canada continue to make their contribution by paying sales tax on the purchases which they make in Canada. The mathematics of this explanation, in my opinion, does not justify the conclusion reached. Let us have a look at it in dollars and cents. The $40 per month which is not spent in Canada by the person who leaves the country deprives Canada of the 2 per cent sales tax on that amount which he would spend if he resided in Canada, so the country is deprived of 80 cents per month. To preserve this 80 cents we deprive a needy person of the $40 per month if he is obliged by circumstances to leave the country. I do not think this feature is in line with the lofty purpose of the act, and I have every confidence that the minister will review this section in the light of the generous spirit of the entire legislation.

May I also, Mr. Speaker, say a word about the title of the bill, despite the fact that I raised that question at the time the bill was considered. I raise it once more in the hope that upon reflection the minister may see no harm but much good in recommending a change in the title. It is true that a rose by any other name smells just as sweet, but in considering legislation of a special and delicate character due regard should be had for each clause, for each phrase, including the title. The minister has given this legislation an atmosphere of some reverence. In order to maintain this appreciation I feel that the language "Old Age Security"—which suggests a pension—in the title of the bill itself is an undesirable feature. There is nothing disagreeable in the word "pension" because one can refer with pride to the title veterans pension, which is an award made to the heroes of our country for services rendered. On the other hand the words "old age security" or old age pension seem to carry a subtle connotation associated with philanthropy or relief. It is precisely this reflection that I should like to see modified. I am, therefore, hopeful that, in a general review of the bill as it advances in practice, the minister will conclude that some such title as "An act for the benefit of senior Canadians" would better suit this particular legislation and that he will, in consequence, recommend a change in the title.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a word on another matter which is causing some concern in many quarters. About two weeks ago the newspapers reported that the first German ambassador since the war has been duly accredited to Canada, and that complete embassy and consular services are to be established here. As I said a moment ago there is considerable apprehension surrounding this fact, because many of the German consular officials recently accredited to the various countries are suspected of being men indoctrinated with the nazi and totalitarian philosophy, who were formerly connected with the nazi party in Germany. I quote from a report datelined Washington, D.C., November 9, 1951, which appeared in the Canadian Jewish Chronicle, published at Montreal:

> The "new" German diplomatic corps is preparing to expand its operations by opening a considerable number of consulates in the United States and throughout the world. Some of the men it will send out formerly worked with American anti-Semites to promote nazi propaganda in this country. In January, 1951, the 252 members of the German diplomatic service included a total of 151 who served under von Ribbentrop, 130 of them members of the nazi party.

I therefore urge upon the government that these gentlemen, and all other immigrants to Canada from Germany, should be most carefully screened and examined. The greatest caution should be taken to safeguard this country from the influences which may penetrate from the fascist right as well as from the communistic left. We want neither of these evil influences to impede or interfere with the development of our country on the democratic foundations upon which it stands, and on which it has flourished and will continue to flourish, making it one of the greatest democracies in the world.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, the subject now before the house is the subamendment which was moved on November 7 by the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch), asking for an increase in the amount of the war veterans allowance to compensate for the increase in the cost of living. I intend to devote my remarks to that subject and to speak as strongly as I can in support of that proposition. Before I do so, however, I may say that it seems a bit of a coincidence that I should get the floor immediately after the speech that has just been made by the hon. member for Cartier (Mr. Crestohl). If I had thought that it would be in order on any subsequent occasion this session to speak on the subject of old age pensions, I certainly would not have passed up the opportunity to do so. However, I want to say that I agree with a number of statements the hon. member has made. In particular I was glad to hear him support the proposition that the means test should be removed at age 65. I earnestly hope that it will not be long until this parliament takes that step. I agree with him also in his contention that once a person goes on the old age pension, particularly under our new legislation, he should be entitled to draw that pension even if he finds it necessary to move to some warmer climate than that which we experience in this country, which is a bit severe for some of our older people.

While I agree with statements of that nature which were made by the hon. member for Cartier, I must say that I cannot go along with him in his complete acceptance of our old age pension legislation as evidence that this parliament has wholly implemented the fifth commandment or in his suggestion that by passing the Old Age Security Act Canada has made it clear that she has not forsaken her aged citizens. When we ask our older people, particularly those who have nothing else, to get along on $40 a month—even when we have removed the means test and even when we call it old age security instead of an old age pension—I want to say that we really are forsaking a great many of our older people. As I pointed out in the other debates which are now closed, more than 200,000 Canadians 70 years of age and over are already drawing the full $40 a month; and for them there will be no increase whatsoever as a result of the legislation which we passed at this session. Though we welcome most enthusiastically the steps that have been taken by this parliament, for they are signs of progress, may I point out that there are further steps still to be taken; and they should be taken now, not after many of the older people, whom we are called upon by the fifth commandment to honour, have passed on because we have not given them enough to live on.

I agree with the hon. member for Cartier, and I welcome his support of the proposal that the means test should be removed at age 65. I hope that he will support some of the rest of us in our contention that the amount of the pension should be increased to a figure of at least $60 a month, which is a minimum under today's conditions.

As I indicated when I rose to my feet, the subject now before the house is the sub-amendment that was moved on November 7 by the hon. member for Acadia, asking that something be done about the war veterans allowance, and in particular asking that something be done at this session of parliament. This is indeed a session which has had to deal with many important issues. The previous speaker and I have just had something to say about one of those important issues, namely old age security. The question of inflation and the high cost of living has been much before parliament at this session. Similarly there are other matters of great importance before hon. members, but I suggest that one of the hottest subjects is this question of the war veterans allowance. As hon. members know, before we came to Ottawa for the session which began on October 9, the Legion and other veterans organizations were in touch with practically all members of parliament, asking us to make sure that their representations to the government were given consideration at this session. I felt, as I am sure most hon. members did, that their requests were most reasonable. There was nothing exaggerated in what they requested. They asked for an increase in the amount of the disability pension commensurate with the increase in the cost of living since those rates were last determined. They also asked for an increase in the amount of the war veterans allowance. Their proposal in that connection was that the maximum for a single veteran, which is now $40.41 a month, should be increased to $50 a month; and that the allowance for a married veteran, which is now $70.83 a month, should be increased to $100 a month.

I repeat what I said a moment ago. There is certainly nothing exaggerated about a request of that kind, namely that our so-called burnt-out pensioners should be given an allowance of $50 a month if single, or $100 a month if married. In my view the Legion and other veterans organizations would have been quite justified in asking for larger amounts than those which were included in their representations.

As hon. members know, in the speech from the throne there was nothing to indicate that anything was going to be done about either of those requests. The result was that from all sides of the house a great deal was said about these matters right from the very day that parliament opened. In due course that discussion brought from the government, on October 19, an announcement by the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Lapointe). That announcement is to be found at page 197 of Hansard, to the effect that the government had decided to do something at this session about the disability pension. As hon. members know, we have since had a further announcement as to the amounts of the increases to be provided, and we have also had the introduction of the bill. I think it is only fair to say that members in all parts of the house are indeed pleased with that announcement as to the disability pension, and with the terms and provisions of the bill as far as it goes. But in that same announcement the minister stated that, as to the War Veterans Allowance Act, the government's decision was to deal with that at the next session of parliament. By way of spelling out its plan, the government said through the Minister of Veterans Affairs that at the next session of parliament a special committee would be set up to go into that act, with particular reference to the relationship between it and the old age legislation which has since been passed by this house.

I am sure the government is not at all surprised that members of the house generally —particularly those on the opposition side, although I know there are many on the government side who feel the same way about it —having had the experience of pressure for those two changes being met by something being done about the disability pension, are keeping up the demand that the Legion's request for increases in the war veterans allowance be met at this session. It simply is not good enough to propose that the matter be considered by a committee at the next session of parliament. Even the suggestion that any changes proposed as a result of that committee's work could be made retroactive to January 1 does not solve the problem which our veterans on the burnt-out pension now face; and, so far as the government announcement is concerned, it is a problem that will continue for many cold months. Since that announcement on October 19 there have been several occasions when hon. members have put questions to the Minister of Veterans Affairs in the hope that the pressure being put on by hon. members generally might have resulted in the government changing its position. I need not read them, but I have notes on my desk here with reference to questions of mine on Monday, November 12, as recorded at page 905 of Hansard, and also on Friday, November 16, as recorded at page 1088 of Hansard. On both those occasions, and on any other occasions when the direct question has been put to the minister as to whether or not anything is going to be done at this session with reference to veterans allowances, the reply has been that government policy had been announced. That simply referred to the statement on October 19 to the effect that a committee would be set up at the next session of parliament. Mr. Speaker, the reason I devote my remarks at this time to this question, as I am sure has been the reason other hon. members in this debate have risen to speak in support of the sub-amendment before the house, is that I feel the position taken by the government is not satisfactory, and we still hope that by continuing to bring this matter to the attention of the government, by continuing to impress upon them how the veterans of this country and the veterans organizations feel, we may yet persuade them to take action at this session.

The minister's announcement on October 19 implied that one of the main problems to be dealt with was that of working out a proper relationship between the war veterans allowance and the Old Age Security Act and the Old Age Assistance Act. I agree that is a problem. As a matter of fact I drew it to the attention of the minister last spring, and in June I urged that he study it during the summer and be ready to bring in the necessary amendments at this fall session. The government has found it possible to bring in many other items for us to deal with at this session, but this important matter has been laid over. Entirely apart from the problem of relating the War Veterans Allowance Act to the old age legislation is the plain fact which the government cannot get around that the amount of allowance is not enough for a Canadian veteran to live on. The sums of $40.41 a month for a single veteran and $70.83 a month for a married veteran are a disgrace to this country, and whatever may be done in the future about relating this legislation to the other I submit that provision should be made at this session of parliament for an increase in those two figures I have just quoted.

I remind the government that that was just as much a part of the request of the Canadian Legion as was the request for a 33-1/3 per cent increase in the disability pension. As to the attitude of the Legion on this whole question, may I suggest to the government that I have on my desk copies of several letters which have been sent to the Minister of Veterans Affairs. Perhaps I should not take time to read them all, but I do want to refer to some of them. The first one I pick up was addressed to the Minister of Veterans Affairs on November 7, 1951, and is signed by Ed S. Pratt, secretary, Winnipeg (Manitoba No. 1) Branch, Canadian Legion, B.E.S.L. The letter reads in part as follows:

Dear Mr. Lapointe:

The members of Winnipeg (Manitoba No. 1) branch of the Canadian Legion were very pleased to learn from the daily press that you announced in the House of Commons that something would be done by the government during the present session of parliament to increase the basic rate of the veterans disability pension. We hope that the government will eventually see fit to implement the suggestion advocated by the Canadian Legion in their latest brief presented before your parliamentary committee.

We regret that no mention has been made by the government of any action to be taken to raise the allowance paid to the recipients of war veterans allowance.

Mr. Pratt goes on to say that there are 900 members of this particular branch, and he indicates that many of those members are seriously affected by the rising cost of living and face difficulty in getting along on the small amount of the war veterans allowance. In the last sentence he says:

In our opinion a single recipient of war veterans allowance should not receive less than $50 a month and a married recipient not less than $100 a month.

The next one I pick up is from Mr. J. H. Larkin, secretary of the St. James Branch No. 4 of the Canadian Legion at Winnipeg. It is dated November 6, 1951, and is addressed to the Minister of Veterans Affairs. It reads:

Dear Sir:

The St. James branch No. 4 of the Canadian Legion B.E.S.L. has heard with pleasure that the government has decided to increase immediately the basic rates of the veterans disability pension. We trust that the increase will be not less than the 33⅓ per cent minimum advocated by our dominion executive.

While dealing with the disability pension is a step in the right direction, this branch would stress most strongly that the same conditions which make this increase so necessary and so urgent, apply equally to the provisions of the War Veterans Allowance Act. A delay in adjustment of allowances until next year will produce great additional suffering.

Mr. Larkin goes on to conclude his letter by expressing the hope that the government will act on this matter at this session. I emphasize the tone of both these letters—and I have others—to the effect that the local Legions, the men back home, really appreciate the action that has been taken with respect to disability pensions, but they are amazed that parallel action has not been announced at this session with respect to the war veterans allowance.

Another letter I have is dated Winnipeg, October 31, 1951 and signed by J. McNeil, president of the Weston and Brooklands branch of the Canadian Legion. It is addressed to the Minister of Veterans Affairs and reads in part as follows:

Dear Sir:

We are very pleased to note that the present session of parliament intends to bring down legislation increasing the basic rate of ex-service men's disability pension, and we are anticipating this increase will conform to the request of the Canadian Legion.

It is with regret, though, that we also note there is no intention to increase the war veterans allowance at this same session, but rather to wait until the 1952 session, at which a veterans committee would be set up to consider its relation to the old age legislation.

This branch of the Canadian Legion are seriously concerned about the financial status of the so-called "burnt-out" pensioners and request that your department do something at the present session to alleviate their condition.

I have other letters, which I will not take time to read now, from the Winnipeg tuberculosis veterans section, from Mr. Cairns, secretary-treasurer of the Manitoba and northwestern Ontario command, from Mr. P. Johnson, chairman, pensions and rehabilitation committee of the imperial division at Winnipeg. I have others, one from the Fort Rouge branch and so on. All through these letters runs the same thought, namely that the local branches of the Legion, the men back home, who are close to the people affected, are grateful for the decision taken by the government to increase the disability pension at this session, but they cannot understand why the same action is not being taken with respect to war veterans allowance. After all, the men on war veterans allowance are just as seriously affected, if not more so, by the increase in the cost of living. In most cases the amount they have to live on is less. Surely, if the government responds to the case for the one pension to be increased, the case is equally strong that the war veterans allowance should be increased, and that the increase should be made at this session of parliament.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I would like to take a few minutes of the time at my disposal to indicate how matters work out with respect to some specific cases, particularly at this time when certain pensions are being increased. For example, the previous speaker had a good deal to say—in fact he devoted the whole of his speech to the subject—with respect to old age pensions and the removal of the means test. It is also the case that the disability pension rates are being increased. There are rumours around that there might be some change in the pension plan of the Canadian National Railways. So it is that I know quite a number of veterans who, hearing of these various changes, have dared to hope that their position might be improved. Yet I will show, by reference to cases about which I shall speak in a moment, that there are men who served this country, particularly in world war I, for whom as matters now stand there is no possibility of any improvement in their position, despite the fact that all these pension arrangements are being revised at the present time.

The first case I pick up is that of a veteran living in Brooklands, Manitoba, which is a village just on the outskirts of Winnipeg. I would ask hon. members to follow the facts in this case, so far as the dollars and cents are concerned. This is a world war I veteran who at the present time has a disability pension of 30 per cent which, of course, brings in $37.50 a month. He is a married man. He has no other source of income, so he is on war veterans allowance. Because of the ceiling he receives the maximum permitted, $54.16 a month. Those two items taken together, namely his $37.50 disability pension and his veterans allowance of $54.16, come to $91.66 a month. That is the ceiling for a burnt-out pensioner. Both this man and his wife are over 70 years of age. There is now a new old age pension payable without a means test. What can they expect, because of that? Can they expect that their position will be improved to the extent of $80 a month? After all, many other people in this country, where both the man and wife are over 70 years of age, will have their positions actually improved to that extent. Persons on superannuation from private corporations or from the government service, including retired judges, senators and many other people who are 70 years and over, will have their actual cash positions improved by $80 a month.

This veteran and his wife can qualify for the old age pension. But when they get that $80 as a pension, and it is ascertained by the war veterans allowance board that they are also getting $37.50, as a veteran's disability pension—and this of course would add up to $117.50, which is in excess of the ceiling allowed by the War Veterans Allowance Act—the whole of the $54.16 war veterans allowance will be cancelled. It is true that this veteran's position will be slightly better than it is today. But it will not be better to the extent of the $80 a month that will be received by the average Canadian man and wife over 70 years of age. I submit it is grossly unfair to the veterans of this country to discriminate against them in that way.

It so happens that there is to be an increase in disability pensions. This means that under the new rates the $37.50 will become $51 a month. If he were not 70 years of age—and at this point I am speaking hypothetically, because there will be other cases like it—the fact that the $37.50 becomes $51 a month would result in a reduction of his war veterans allowance to $40.66, so that he would stay at the ceiling of $91.66 a month.

So I say that in view of the fact that, whatever their positions, most Canadians 70 years of age and over will receive the pension and have an actual increase in income to that extent, it is not fair that the one group that finds it gets an increase, but not the full value of the increase, should be the group we know as our burnt-out pensioners.

The next case with which I wish to deal is that of a veteran living in Transcona, Manitoba. This veteran is the recipient of a Canadian National Railways pension amounting to $63.91 a month. He has nothing else, so he is drawing a war veterans allowance of $27.75. In other words his Canadian National pension and his war veterans allowance bring him, as a married man, to the ceiling of $91.66 a month. He is over 70 years of age, and his wife is 64. He can qualify for the $40 old age pension, without the means test, but his wife cannot qualify for anything. But when he gets the $40 old age pension without the means test, and the war veterans allowance board discovers that between that and his Canadian National pension he is getting a total of $103.91 a month, hon. members know what will happen to his war veterans allowance of $27.75. It will be taken away from him entirely. So on the one hand he gets $40 a month from the old age pension legislation passed at this session and, on the other, he loses $27.75 from the war veterans allowance, not only because the means test is still in the War Veterans Allowance Act but because nothing has been done at this session to moderate or to change it in any way.

I submit that when these things come into effect, and Canadians are actually up against the fact that, unlike any others, this group will have the experience of being deprived of the war veterans allowance either in whole or in part, if it is to receive the old age pension, the people of Canada will be deeply annoyed, and rightly so.

These are cases which demonstrate not only that there should be an increase in the amount of the war veterans allowance, but something should be done at this session to make sure that these veterans do not have what they are given on the one hand taken away on the other.

The next case I should like to place on record is particularly tragic, when one realizes how it works out. I now refer to a married veteran living in Vancouver. He, too, is a Canadian National Railways pensioner; in fact, he comes under all three of these provisions at the present time. He is drawing the railway pension of $34.25 a month, he has an army disability pension at the rate of 5 per cent which, because he is married, works out at $6.25 a month, and he has a war veterans allowance of $51.16 a month. He gets only $51.16 because of the ceiling. Those three amounts added together mean that he is getting $91.66 a month.

This veteran has written to me expressing the thought that he had dared to hope that he had a pretty good chance of having his position improved. In fact he believed he had several chances. He is drawing the Canadian National pension, and there have been rumours that there would be an increase or a change in that pension plan. He might benefit as a result of that change, or at least he had hoped he would. There has been the report that there was going to be an increase in the disability pension, and those reports proved to be correct, thanks to the pressure put on the government. So he dared to hope that as a result his total income of $91.66 might be increased. Then, of course, there is the old age pension of $40 a month, without the means test. This man is over 70 years of age. All told, he felt he could not lose. Perhaps he would not get them all, but he believed he had three possibilities for increases, and dared to hope that he would therefore have something more than the $91.66 a month on which to live.

What is the story? We have been trying to find out what will happen to the Canadian National Railways pensions, but have not yet been able to get any information. It does not seem, however, that anything will be done for those who are already retired. I regard that as most unfortunate. I think the government should see to it that the Canadian National Railways deals with the problem and the plight of that group of men. At the moment, at any rate, there is nothing for this veteran on that account.

What about the disability pension? There is going to be an increase in that. This man's pension is only 5 per cent, or $6.25, and under the new rates that will go up to $8.50 per month. His increase will be only $2.25. This veteran studied it out and discovered that while he will get an increase of $2.25 in his disability pension, that will immediately come off his war veterans allowance because he must stay under the ceiling of $91.66 per month. So there was nothing for him there. He gets $2.25 a month extra as of right, but he gets $2.25 less in the other cheque and his position remains exactly the same as it was, $91.66 per month.

He had not yet exhausted all the possibilities. What about the old age pension? While his wife is under 70 years of age, he is over 70 and can qualify for the $40 per month. Look at what happens when he gets $40 per month old age security. The war veterans allowance people immediately say, "There is still the $91.66 ceiling so far as war veterans allowance is concerned." So it adds up this way: His C.N.R. pension will be $34.25 a month; his disability pension under the new rate will be $8.50 per month; his old age security will be $40 per month. That makes a total of $82.75. The result will be that his war veterans allowance will be decreased from $51.16 to $8.91, because he must still remain under the ceiling of $91.66. It reminds me of the comic entitled "Sad Sack". Here is a man full of hope that there might be an increase in the amount he receives and yet he finds that he loses out on all counts, on the C.N.R. change, on the disability pension increase and on the old age security. Why? All because of the ceiling under the War Veterans Allowance Act which says that he cannot have more than $91.66 a month.

For the government to leave cases like that over for a committee to deal with at the next session of parliament is not a responsible way to deal with such matters. I would like to read the letter, but I am not sure that all the thoughts therein are strictly parliamentary. But he tells me of his memory of the days in July, 1918, when he and others had their backs to the wall in France and were visited by the then Prime Minister of this country, who assured them on behalf of the people of Canada that all Canada was behind them to the last dollar and that nothing would be too good for them when they got back to this land. Now at his advanced age he is confronted with this situation.

I gave considerable thought to this case, as I do to all these cases. I racked my brain to see if I could think of any way under existing legislation by which this man might have another opportunity. After giving it some thought I realized that there was a possible solution. This man's wife is between 65 and 70 years of age. That means that with the old age pension given to him as of right, he being over 70 years of age, if he stays on the war veterans allowance he is limited to $91.66 a month. But if he forgoes the war veterans allowance his wife can apply for old age assistance, for the ceiling under the act passed last June is $100 a month for two people, where one is on old age assistance. In other words it is possible for this man to forgo his war veterans allowance, which would be only $8.91 per month, and thus permit his wife to collect $17.25 in the way of old age assistance, improving their position by the difference between $91.66 per month and $100 per month.

I ask hon. members to recall the many conversations they have had with these older veterans of world war I. Hon. members generally know that veterans prefer being on war veterans allowance because even though it has a means test they feel that it is something they have earned because of their service. They would rather be on war veterans allowance than on a means test old age pension. Here is a case where a veteran loses out on all these counts. The only opportunity he has to improve his position is to forgo the war veterans allowance so his wife may apply for as much of the means test old age pension as she can get. It must be remembered that one-half of the $17.25 she would get would be paid by the provincial government. In other words we are asking veterans like this to look to the province rather than to the federal government which has responsibility for them.

I have just picked out a few of these cases which are being sent in to me all the time, but they certainly demonstrate that this is a problem which should not be left over until next session. If it has to be dealt with in committee I submit that it is more important that it should be dealt with at this session than some of the committee work now being carried out. Some of the matters being dealt with at this session, even some of those which I favour, could wait. I am thinking of the changes being made to the Annuities Act, which I support. The need to have those changes dovetail with the old age security legislation is not as great as the need to deal at this session with the whole problem of war veterans allowances.

I have submitted thus far individual cases of veterans, both single and married. May I put in a word as well for the widows who qualify under the War Veterans Allowance Act. I just do not see how we can regard ourselves as doing our job at this session if we leave them in the position where the most they can get is $40.41 per month. I welcome the change being made in the Pension Act whereby the widow of a veteran who had 50 per cent disability or more will get $100 per month instead of $75. However, it seems to me that the spread between $100 and $40.41 per month is too great. On the one hand we have a veteran with a disability of 50 per cent or more who dies and whose widow goes on a pension of $100 per month as of right—I think she is entitled to it—and then we have the other veteran, a comrade, with a disability of only 45 per cent who dies and whose widow gets nothing as of right. If she can meet the means test and other conditions under the War Veterans Allowance Act the most she can get is $40.41 per month.

I realize the principle that is involved, but surely something should be done at this session to narrow that spread between $100 in the one case and $40.41 in the other. I welcome the announcement that widows who qualify for a full pension under the Pension Act will have it increased from $75 to $100 per month, but I urge the government to do something at this session to raise that other figure. I have here a case of a widow in Winnipeg who was married in 1906 and whose husband served in both wars. Most of his active service was in world war I, but he served in both wars. She was married to him through both of those periods, but because he had a disability of considerably less than 50 per cent the best she can get is the burnt-out pension under the War Veterans Allowance Act, which is only $40.41 a month.

I am simply pointing out that there is too big a spread between the $100 paid under the Pension Act—I approve of it—and the $40.41 which is the most a widow in these circumstances is able to get. Furthermore, a widow can receive that only if she is 55 years of age or over and is able to satisfy the terms of the means test set out in the War Veterans Allowance Act.

I feel that this whole question is just as important as was the old age pension question, just as important as is the question of amending the disability pension provisions. I think it is a lot more important than the question of overhauling the Annuities Act. I think it is more important than some other matters that are being considered by various committees sitting at the present time. I urge most strongly that this matter be dealt with by the government at this session of parliament. I am satisfied that others, as this debate goes on, will continue to make the same plea I am making today, and we are still hoping that it is not falling on deaf ears. I know that so far the government seem satisfied with what they have done. They think it is enough to deal with the Pension Act at this session, but so far as the veterans affected and the local branches of the Canadian Legion are concerned, they want action on this matter at this session of parliament.

I was quite interested in the interjections the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) made the other day when the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) was speaking on the question of making changes at this session in the War Veterans Allowance Act. At page 1243 of Hansard for November 21 the minister made an interjection when the hon. member was asking that the Liberal members be given freedom to vote on the subamendment as they might wish. The interjection was as follows:

> Mr. Martin: There is nothing but freedom in the ranks of the government members.

A little later, at page 1244, when the hon. member for Lake Centre was pursuing this matter, the Minister of National Health and Welfare made a few more interjections and one of them was a question already mentioned today by the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell). It reads as follows:

> Mr. Martin: Does my hon. friend suggest that when any member of this house comes to register his vote, he does not use that privilege in accordance with his best judgment in the circumstances?

If the Minister of National Health and Welfare, speaking for himself or the government, meant what he said in those interjections it means that government supporters in this house are free to vote on this question according to their best judgment. I suggest that the minister has, if I may use language that we all well understand, put Liberal members on the spot. He says they are free to vote according to their best judgment. The proposition before them, when the vote is eventually taken, is that something should be done to increase the amount of the war veterans allowance, and I hope they will exercise their best judgment, which surely calls for a vote for the subamendment. May I remind them and also the Minister of National Health and Welfare that the last time a similar suggestion was made was on August 27, 1946, as may be found at page 5431 of Hansard for that year. On that occasion an amendment was before the house having to do with a subsidy with respect to milk, and the debate had waxed quite warm. The result was that the then minister of reconstruction and supply, now the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), rose and said to the house:

I suggest that the vote should be a free expression regardless of party.

Then there were two or three other exchanges and questions back and forth until it was finally made clear just before the vote was taken that it was to be a free vote, and that members on the government side were permitted to vote as they wished. The result was that the amendment, which was moved from this corner of the house, was carried. Members expressed their best judgment on the issue then before the house. Either the Minister of National Health and Welfare means the same thing the Minister of Trade and Commerce meant on August 27, 1946 or he does not. If he does not mean the same thing, of course it does not mean anything; but if he meant the same thing, if he meant that members are free to exercise their best judgment, I suggest there is only one way that best judgment can be exercised, and that is by voting for the subamendment for an increase in the amount of the war veterans allowance. I hope all members will vote that way and that we shall get action on this matter at this session.

Mr. D. S. Harkness (Calgary East): Mr. Speaker, as is usual and I think proper in this debate there has been discussion of a wide variety of subjects, but the primary question before the house is the one dealt with by the last speaker, the subamendment moved by the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch). It reads as follows:

Furthermore we regret that Your Excellency's advisers have failed to compensate the recipients of war veterans allowance for the increase in the cost of living by an appropriate increase in the amount of the allowance.

I support the subamendment wholeheartedly, and I think a wide variety of reasons can be put forward for everyone in the house to support it. As the last speaker has indicated, I hope that a large number of those who support the government will find themselves able to vote for the amendment to the amendment. I think it is a cause for shame to the government and to Canada that the scale of war veterans allowance payments was not raised long ago. War veterans allowance recipients are amongst those who have been hurt most by the rising cost of living during the last year or so. In my own province I know they are worse off than the recipients of the present old age pension. Old age pensioners in the province of Alberta receive $50 a month, while recipients of war veterans allowance receive $40 and a few odd cents a month. They are nearly $10 worse off than the old age pensioners. The same thing is true in a number of other provinces.

It seems to me that the dominion government has been shirking its responsibility in that it has allowed these veterans, who have no other source of income, to remain in a worse position than the old age pensioners under the combined pensions paid to them by the dominion and the provinces. Like the last member who spoke, I have had a large number of letters on this subject. I am not going to take the time of the house to read any of them. Many are extremely pitiful. They presented cases which made one really wonder what one could write in reply to people with the stories of privation and hardship indicated in their letters. In many cases war veterans allowance recipients are in greater need of an increase in the scale of payment than disability pensioners. On the whole I think the disability pensioners have not been as badly off as the war veterans allowance recipients.

However, as a result of pressure on the part of veterans organizations and the pressure of public opinion, crystallized to quite an extent by representations made in the house by a large number of members, the government have seen fit to introduce legislation at this session to increase the basic rate of disability pension. I fail to understand why they did not introduce legislation at the same time to increase the rate of war veterans allowance. It could have been done very readily, and it should have been done. What they have announced is that a committee will be set up at the next session to study the matter. One thing I think the committee and the government should have very much in mind is that whatever increase is granted to war veterans allowance recipients should be made retroactive at least to the present time, and in any event to the same time the increase in disability pensions becomes effective.

One of the difficult matters with regard to war veterans allowance is that the amount of income permitted to be earned or secured in any other way is not nearly sufficient. The total amount of income allowed a recipient of the war veterans allowance should, without doubt, be raised. Many of these men who find a small job earn more than the allowable amount of extra income. In many cases they do not realize that is so until it is too late; and when the officials of the war veterans allowance board discover this situation they cut off a portion of the war veterans allowance until this extra amount is paid back. When that happens these people get into truly difficult circumstances and find it almost impossible to live. This could be overcome by increasing the total amount of allowable income for the recipients of war veterans allowance. At the moment the ceiling on total income for a single man on war veterans allowance is $610 a year, and for a married man $1,100 a year. In the case of a single man this means that the amount he can earn above the allowance is $125, and in the case of a married man it is $250.

So far as disability pensions are concerned this matter is going to assume even greater importance with the increase in the basic rate of pension. Many drawing small disability pensions are drawing war veterans allowance also. What is going to happen in their case? Unless this allowable limit is raised the increase they receive under their disability pension is going to be deducted from their war veterans allowance cheque, and they are not going to be one cent further ahead. I believe that is something which should be corrected immediately. We still have plenty of time for the government to bring in some provision at this session to make certain that situation will not come to pass.

For several years I have advocated that the total allowable income for the recipients of war veterans allowance should be increased. I feel it should be increased to the level of the income tax exemption. In other words, before the allowance is cut down the single man should have a total income of $1,000, and the married man a total income of $2,000. If he is able, in spite of his disability, to do odd jobs and pick up a few hundred dollars I believe he should be allowed to retain it, particularly in view of the cost of living today. A move such as I have suggested, to raise the total allowable income, would help a great deal to do away with the many complaints every one of us receives from the war veterans allowance recipients. This matter has been dealt with by a large number of speakers, so I do not propose to spend any more time upon it.

There is one other subject I should like to mention, and that is the feed grain and forage situation in western Canada, and in particular in my own province of Alberta where I am familiar with conditions. In Alberta this year more areas were wiped out by hail than in any other year in history. Following that the early onset of winter prevented the grain in many areas from being harvested. The result is that in Alberta there are a considerable number of areas in which either hail or the early onset of winter or a combination of both have prevented any harvesting at all, or perhaps only 5 or 10 per cent. This means that feed grain is now in exceptionally short supply in many portions of southern Alberta. I was in Alberta last week and found that all the elevators in my immediate area south of Calgary had been cleaned out some time ago. There was no feed grain, oats, wheat or barley. People were sending trucks as far north as Edmonton, two hundred miles away, to try to pick up a load of oats or barley so that they could feed their cattle.

The result of this shortage of feed grain in these areas is that a considerable number of people have had to dispose of their stock. I cite my own case as an example because I know it best. I had to reduce my herd of breeding sows by one-half only last week, although in the course of two or three months most of them would have produced young pigs. They had to be taken to market because I could not get sufficient feed to keep them going. This shortage of feed grain is going to result in a serious loss in future production. So far as I can determine the government, through the wheat board, have taken no steps to meet this situation. I believe they should have done so some time ago, but certainly they could arrange now that carloads of feed grain be taken from the areas where those grains exist and shipped into areas where no grain is available. Unless that is done as soon as possible, the sale of breeding stock which is necessary for future production is going to have to continue, and some people are going to have to go out of the livestock business altogether.

There is a somewhat similar situation prevailing so far as forage is concerned, hay and straw. It is very short in some areas. In this case some co-operative measures need to be adopted by the provincial and dominion departments of agriculture in order to avoid a drop in livestock production during the remaining months. I should like to impress upon the government as strongly as possible the necessity of getting something done in these very urgent matters.

Mr. L. Philippe Picard (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I should like to start my remarks with the customary gesture of congratulating the mover (Mr. Cauchon) and the seconder (Mr. Simmons) of the address. My remarks are all the more sincere in the case of the first, my friend the hon. member for Beauharnois, because I have come to know him, and since his arrival in this house he has contributed handsomely to our debates and the work of the different committees to which he belongs. I read his speech while I was abroad, because I had Hansard sent by air mail daily. This might be the reason which will lead me to conclude in a moment that I think this house ought to assume that we all appreciate the speeches of the movers and seconders of the addresses. We should all assume that the governments, whatever party is in power, will choose good men to introduce and second the motion. Once and for all, we should assume that they are good and we should stop spending fifteen minutes or so complimenting them, although they are deserving of it.

I have calculated that the speakers who have taken part in this debate have spent about three hundred minutes, about five hours, in complimenting the mover and the seconder. I believe we should assume that these gentlemen acquit themselves well of the task which has been entrusted to them, and we might discontinue this practice. As I said a moment ago, it may be that I am influenced by the fact that I had to pay to read these speeches. I asked my office in Quebec to send me Hansard every day by air mail. The first and second times I received it, I was a bit discouraged to find that there was about $1.25 worth of stamps on the envelope. I do not mean that all of us do not make good speeches or do not contribute to the debates in an eloquent way, but frankly I wondered whether I had received my money's worth. In the meantime I must say, before anybody else attempts to do it, that I do not believe today's Hansard will be any better because I took part in the debate or that it will be any more worth the $1.25 in stamps that was on the ones I received while abroad. But I say frankly that I think we would save probably five or six hours or more in our debates if we did away with the practice of congratulating the mover and the seconder of the address. In this case I must state that I was really pleased to see the way the new hon. member for Beauharnois (Mr. Cauchon) behaved. I followed his activities in this house, and I thought his speech was good and up to expectations. The same remark applies to the hon. member for Yukon-Mackenzie River (Mr. Simmons), whom I have not the pleasure of knowing so well, but whose speech also was good.

I do not intend to follow the example of the two previous speakers who dealt mainly with the subamendment. I propose to touch on a few of the items that are mentioned in the speech from the throne, particularly on those referred to by most hon. members since this debate started. One of the most important is of course the high cost of living. That is one of the most serious problems of the day, and it is a world problem. World economists have been at a loss to find a remedy not only in Canada but throughout the world. During the course of my visit abroad, particularly in England, in France and in Germany, I met some gentlemen who were supposed to be acquainted with the problem. Some of them were professors of political economy and of social economy. They see with great anxiety the trend of rising prices throughout the world, especially on the continent. As one of them was pointing out to me, before the war there used to be set rules governing the rising cost of living. We all used to attribute it to inflation. Inflation was described as being caused by a great supply of currency or buying power in the hands of the people and a scarcity of goods, mostly consumer goods. Often it was attributed to laxity in the rules or regulations concerning credit, speculation on a large scale, and so on.

At this time throughout most countries of the world, except possibly in Greece where there was real inflation in the way of too much currency being put on the market, generally it cannot be said—and this is true especially as to Canada—that the government has issued too much currency or has financed its works program through the issuance of new currency. In fact during the war many of us complained that the income taxes were stiff and high because the government had acted wisely in arranging to have at least 50 per cent of the cost of war paid on a day to day basis and the other 50 per cent financed by loans or as an accumulation of debt. While not contesting the wisdom of this policy, some of us complained bitterly when we had to face the period of the year in which we had to pay those taxes. Yet these taxes were paid cheerfully by the Canadian people in time of war. It cannot be said that too much currency has been put on the market for this purpose or that too much of our war effort was financed by the issuance of new money.

Another cause of inflation that did not exist during the last war was the issuance of currency without relation to productivity. In the present set-up in Canada I do not see that the amount of currency issued is out of proportion to the productivity of the country. Some people have stated that there is much more money available than the proportion of increase in the productivity of the country warranted. Yet there is no lack of consumer goods. Some hon. members even applauded when the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance stated that we had plenty of goods available. That is true. There is a large amount of money in circulation. The people have a lot of money to spend. But there is also a large amount of goods available; so much so that inventories are extremely large. In fact they are probably larger than they have been in a long time; and this situation has gone to the point that some industries have even curtailed their production. That is another cause of inflation—the lack of consumer goods, which is regularly or commonly considered as being a cause of inflation or of rising prices—that we do not find in these present circumstances.

The rise in the cost of living can therefore hardly be attributed to inflation, because we do not see what economists have described as the main signs of coming or actual inflation. Yet prices are rising. But they are not only rising in Canada, as I said a moment ago. It is no consolation to say that prices are rising elsewhere, but I do so to point out that this is a world problem and not just a Canadian problem.

By referring to the speeches that have been made, I have tried to find helpful suggestions. Some people have talked of controls. I myself was at one time inclined to think that controls would be good. It seemed to be a logical conclusion that controls would do good. In these circumstances, when we can determine that the rise in the cost of living is world-wide, I wonder if any controls applied today would bring about a remedy. Some other speakers have pointed out what has happened in countries where controls have been tried. In England and elsewhere controls have been tried, and the cost of living is still rising, going higher and higher.

During wartime controls were accepted; and Canadians behaved better than did the people in most other countries of the world in this regard. But to be effective the controls must be approved and accepted, and the people must co-operate in their application. Could we get that co-operation in time of peace? Controls have been tried in other countries, but they were not effective. During the war controls were tried in the United States, and they did not prove to be easy of application. There is no use trying to apply controls exclusively by force. Our neighbours to the south tried to apply a particular law that was passed with noble intention, but it could not be applied. I refer to the Volstead Act, providing for prohibition. A huge amount of money was spent but it could not be enforced, and it led to gangsterism and many other evils. Can we apply controls in times of peace when we and the people in other countries seem not to be prepared to accept them as gladly as in time of war? I think we must contend that at the moment controls would not meet with popular approval. But people may, at times, be inclined to think, as I was myself, that they might be a remedy. I think they might be a remedy if the causes were local. But if we consider the situation throughout the world, even if we applied controls here I do not think it would remedy the situation at all.

In this regard I was interested to see what was the attitude of the official opposition. Last year I think they approved the idea of controls; this year they limited their approval to a certain category of goods or projects. I have here an extract from the Winnipeg Free Press which states:

> In the last session of parliament Mr. Drew voted with the C.C.F. in proposing an open-ended system of controls. In the present session Mr. Drew's first concern was to denounce the same C.C.F. policy and to deny, over and over again, that he favoured anything like a complete system of controls. Where does this strategic retreat leave Mr. Drew today? It leaves him advocating controls only on materials entering the defence program. But this cannot be construed, by the widest latitude, to mean an attack on the cost of living since defence materials do not in general enter into the cost of living.

It can be said the fact that we are going in for war expenditures put more money into the financial stream of the country, and that it might help to prevent inflation by putting controls on war materials rather than general controls. I do not agree with that. When I started to study the question I thought that controls might be a good policy. I have now come to the conclusion, especially after travelling abroad, that under the present general conditions controls would not improve the situation. They may be tried on certain things. It may be true there. They may be tried on food; they may be tried on consumer goods, but will they affect the whole situation? We are governed by the cost of our imports and by the price offered to us for our exports. These are the two things that regulate the high cost of living and the prices of many commodities.

Some people talk about the farmer getting too high a profit. They try to attribute the rise in the cost of food to the agricultural class. I think that is entirely erroneous. There is one sure thing: these prices cannot be attributed to the excessive net profits of the farmers. Their net incomes are lower today than they were during the war years when most of these products were lower in price. On the other hand that cannot be said of industrial corporations or of financial corporations, where you do not see the same decline in net incomes as you see with respect to the farmers. The same applies to the intermediary, or shall I call him the middleman, the packing industry, those who are slaughtering, packaging and distributing meat and agricultural products, and also the large milling companies. When you see the balance sheets and reports of some of these companies you do not see that their net profit is down in comparison with the net income of the farmers. Yet it can be said that the farmer is not in such a poor condition now. His net income is not quite as high as during the war, but it is still much higher than it was in prewar years. The least that can be said is that he has a more decent kind of living. I am sure nobody here would want him to revert to the net income that he had before the war.

If the condition is looked into fairly no one can suggest sincerely that the high cost of food can be attributed to excessive net profits made by the farmers. Even if they get more they have to pay more for commodities and services, and though they may have a better profit than they had before the war, they do not get as high a profit now as they got during the war. As I said before, the large corporations are maintaining their scale of profits in a better way.

To curb the inflationary effects of too large a supply of money in the hands of the people the government has already tried to apply some remedies. They have limited credit, and now we are flooded every day with representations from automobile distributors and vendors of this and that to the effect that because half the cost has to be paid immediately on purchase and the balance distributed over 12 months, it ruins their business. Yet the function of this provision is to limit the amount of money the people can spend on consumer goods, or to prevent excess purchases by people who cannot pay immediately. The idea is to put our economy in a better position and allow our people to spend only what they earn. There is also a limit put on the write-offs by the big corporations, an increase in the interest rates and an increase in the corporate taxes. All these are measures complying with the traditional advice on what should be done when we are threatened with inflation. These are measures that have been devised long ago by economists. They have not fully succeeded in curbing the inflationary high cost of living, but they are steps in the right direction. In this regard it may be interesting in a short while to see the results of the new policies announced by Finland, which are exactly the opposite of what every economist up to now has advised. They lowered the rate on borrowed money; they facilitated spending. They have increased salaries. In an effort to curb inflation or the high cost of living they have taken exactly the steps which up to now were considered conducive to inflation. It will be interesting to see in a short while whether or not that leads them in the right direction, but it is an entirely new and revolutionary step in so far as conducting financial matters in a conservative way has been considered to be advisable. I saw these people at work during the past summer. They are energetic; they are hard, tough people. They work well. They are keen in what they do. They are not going in for any kind of entertainment as you see it in other countries. They are all working seriously and facing up to their problems. They are building apartments for the working people, something of which my hon. friends say we do not have enough. They have paid off nearly all their war debt to Russia. They are the only country who have paid off their debts of the first war. They are now trying this new step, the result of which should be most interesting to see in a short while.

The problem, Mr. Speaker, is world-wide, and can be coped with only on a world-wide basis and an international plane since, as I said a moment ago, the cost of our imports and what we get for our exports regulate the cost of the different commodities in our country. Only when the nations of the world get together and devise new means can we hope to have an effective tackling of the problem. I do not want to bring any depressing ideas into the debate, but after talking to many people in different countries who are supposed to know about it, nobody seems to be doing much different than we are doing. Everybody is experimenting with this or that system, and the prices go up. The only thing we can envisage in this house is that this government has done its best, and that no constructive, effective criticism has come from the opposition side. They have rightly criticized the increase in the cost of living but no effective, constructive criticism has come from the other side as to how to remedy it. What has been advocated by them has not been considered by most economists up to now to be the wise thing at this time. It is easy to criticize; it is not so easy to suggest a remedy.

I now want to go on to another item, Mr. Speaker, namely the old age security program and the old age security bill that was passed in this house a short while ago. It extended, shall I say, the scope of our social security program to the point that those from 65 on will be provided for. Those from 65 to 70 will be provided for if they can prove their need. The others will all get it as a matter of right. This point has been criticized by some people even here. It has been said that it would be much better to increase the pension of those who are in need than to give it to everybody. Well, I do not think the people understand the matter thoroughly, because when you give $40 to everybody you must realize that you bring help to a vast number of people who, while they are not entirely destitute, are bordering on destitution and are in need of help. There are a large number of people throughout Canada for whom this $40, when added to the little they have, will mean security. It is also an encouragement, shall I say, to save. We have heard the argument from hon. members in the C.C.F.—and it is a proper argument, which would apply even to those from 65 to 69 years —that the means test discourages savings.

Under the old system, if a man reached the age of 70 and had nothing, he received a pension. If he had looked to the future and had saved a little money—not much, perhaps, but a little—he was prevented from getting this $40. The new system will cover quite a considerable number of cases throughout the country—where people may not be entirely destitute, but do not have sufficient to live a decent life. Therefore I suggest that those who criticize this move as being unwise do not fully understand the situation. In an article appearing in the Gazette of November 16 they quote from a speech made over the radio by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) in which he said:

> The government's program is intended to ensure that Canadians, when they grow old, have the prospect—not of charity—but of independence and a decent livelihood.

They go on to say that the program would cost too much. It is always the same thing. Then they go on to criticize the fact that the minister said—

> We can all take pride in the fact that Canada is the first nation to pay a full-scale universal pension without a means test.

They criticize the observation by the minister. These people really do not understand the situation at all. These are the same people who every day talk about the necessity of curtailing communism and doing the things which will prevent the spread of communism. During the last month I visited a country which is under a communist regime. I did not go there to see whether they were right or wrong in having done what they did; nor did I go there to see if, at the time they did it, they acted wisely. I was just trying to find out what conditions are in that country. I am referring to Yugoslavia.

In that country I saw things of which I approved. I approved of the way some things were done—but I would not want to say too much along that line for fear some of my friends might say that I have communist leanings. However, one day I did say to a government official, "You are doing a job that some people do not understand. Much of it is commendable. The way you gained power is another thing; the way you curtail political liberty according to our western standards is another thing. But as to the ways you have taken to better the fate of the masses, I think many of the things you are trying to do are in the right direction. However, when I go back to my country I will be more than ever convinced that we should bring about reforms, all kinds of reforms we need, so that our population will never be tempted to have recourse to the communist form of government." I say that because, while it leaves to human beings personal liberties, it takes away from them their political liberties and their right to choose one form or another of government. It reduces them to a state of inferiority so far as their choice of rulers is concerned and so far as approval or disapproval of their policies is concerned.

This is why I suggest it would be unwise to criticize any reform or any government that brings about social security in our country, because if there is one way of preventing the communist form of government, it will not be by the institution of rules and regulations saying that the communist party is outlawed, or that it should be driven underground, but rather by bringing to the masses in this country the means that will give them a decent standard of living. In this way they will not be tempted to have recourse to communism. While it must be admitted that in some countries it might have brought about better conditions than those that prevailed under their former system of government, in Canada we have improved the condition of the masses gradually and are going to continue to improve it; and it will serve as a safeguard against any loss of our political liberties.

I would not have time this evening to discuss all the reforms that may be needed in our country, but I strongly approve those that bring about social security and old age security. That is one of the most important fields in which good can be done for the masses. The time has gone when the masses of the world could be held in ignorance, or could be abused. There is temptation everywhere in the world to listen to the advice of those who would offer panaceas and remedies, but those remedies are the ones we do not want in Canada. We know that the way to keep the people of Canada more satisfied is to give them a better life, to give them security in life, while maintaining our democratic form of government.

If the people feel that governments understand their needs, and if a larger and larger number of people can have a decent standard of living, we will be further away from the methods of communism.

It is all very well to say that all people are born free and that all have the same opportunity. Less than two hundred years ago the French revolution attacked many of the evils which existed at that time, and much is owed by humanity to the Encyclopedists and those who helped to overthrow the old regime. Man from then on was recognized as being equal to man, in principle. But from the moment of his birth one man is not equal to another man. He may be born of a father who is sick. He may be born of people who are intelligent, or of people who are not. He may be born of people who have money, and who have succeeded in life, or of people without means. Although in principle man is equal to man, life immediately sets in motion factors which make sure that there is no real equality.

Then life goes on, and one man with the same work and application may succeed while another may fail. Some religious people will say that those who succeeded had the help of Providence. Others will say they succeeded through chance. Others will give some other reason. But there is one imponderable element, which can be hardly known in the life of every human being, and which brings about inequality. For such cases a program of social security is needed. For such cases we are taking a step in the right direction when we do what the minister has done in connection with old age pensions.

In this regard I would not be consistent if I did not tell the minister that I am quite disappointed to see that invalids and the infirm are not looked after properly in the new legislation. Good reasons will no doubt be given for this. In his speech the minister brought forth the argument, which I did not think was as strong as the rest of his speech, that most of these people are covered by the new regulations because they are 65 years of age or over. I see people in my own constituency, and I know they exist in others, for whom something more than the present regulations is required. I think the time has come when they should be given some allowance. The minister said there were very few of these who do not come within the law. Well, if there are so few, why not bring about a remedy? It would not cost very much. I gave the figures to the house on an earlier occasion, in another debate, as to the cost in other countries, so I shall not repeat them at this time. I do repeat that in my opinion it is high time something more was done in this regard.

As I should like now to turn to another subject, perhaps I might be permitted to continue at eight o'clock.

At 6.15 p.m. the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Picard: Mr. Speaker, as I was leaving the chamber this afternoon after the house took recess someone asked me what I meant when I said that I approved of some of the things I had seen in Yugoslavia. I do not of course approve of the form of government they have there; but I found that since 1948, when they broke with Russia, there has been considerably more personal liberty, although this may not apply to political liberty as we understand it in our democracies. Considerable effort has been made to bring about a betterment in the position of the masses of the people. I do not agree with many of the things that have been done, but I have been favourably impressed by others. While it may not be from sympathy, the fact is that today they are friends of the west and as such deserve whatever help the United Nations or the United States may give them. This help would be used against our eventual common enemy should ever there be a clash, because the leaders there, and I talked with many, while not pro-west are decidedly anti-soviet union. While they will certainly never revert to our form of government, they are far away from the Russian form.

I consider that the experiment going on there constitutes the third application of the ideas or principles of Marx. We had as the first application the mild British version which originated with the Fabians and which was translated afterward into the policies of the Labour party. Then we had the extreme Russian application of Marxist principles that evolved into state capitalism and Stalinist dictatorship. It is possible that the experiment going on in Yugoslavia may prove to be the go-between and a third form of Marxism because these people are sincerely Marxist in their beliefs, but seem to me to be getting away more and more from the Stalinist form of communism. Of course I do not accept those principles because I am a Liberal and a democrat, but the fact is that the national front government there is finding approval to a certain extent and there is no general movement against it. At any rate I will expand more on my views on this subject outside of this house, or on another occasion.

I had about reached my next point, our share in the United Nations. I think Canada should go on giving the greatest possible co-operation to the United Nations, and that we should carry on those policies. We should try to avoid being ruled by one nation and make sure that the smaller nations have a say in the United Nations and are not dominated by any one country. I contend that simply because they may be the strongest member of the United Nations, that organization should not reflect the vacillating foreign policies of the United States, if I may call them that. In that respect I should like to quote briefly from an article in the Citizen which was brought to my attention the other night entitled "Negotiation, a Two-Edged Sword." If a truce has been reached in Korea so much the better, because it shows it is possible that we may finally come to an agreement there. This article reads:

> As western strength grows, it does not mean that a peaceful world will come automatically. On the contrary, the danger of war may increase because of this growing strength, unless the west's expanding power is used to negotiate a settlement.

Then the article quotes a speech which Mr. Eden had made in Paris before the United Nations:

> I do not believe that in any dispute one party is 100 per cent a black villain, and the other 100 per cent snow white . . . All men are fallible, and peace can only rest on mutual forbearance and restraint.

I believe that Canada's policies should be directed toward establishing better understanding between the east and the west. We should not give wholehearted support to everything contained in United States propaganda, but on the other hand we should watch carefully whatever comes from the east. I think under the guidance of the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) our representatives have done well, and I trust that the Canadian government will continue to be careful and not follow the trend that was shown in the past of accepting everything that came from Great Britain by switching across the border and swallowing everything that comes from the United States, no matter how much we may admire what that country is trying to do to retain democratic institutions for the west and to help the nations of Europe to remain free.

Our participation in the United Nations and the North Atlantic Treaty Organization implies certain obligations of a military nature. I contend that our policies should be directed first of all to the defence of Canada. When the first incident occurred in Korea there were some in this house who contended that we should send to Korea all the help we had available. The government acted more wisely and decided that we should train a special contingent and not take away from Canada what small protection we may have had. There are some people today who advocate that we should send whatever men we have available, or even enlist more, to the European theatre of war. In this respect the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) seems to have adopted a different attitude from that taken by his party last year. I agree when he says that our policy should be directed toward the formation of strong mobile units that could be moved easily and quickly from one point to another rather than to send all our strength to Europe. That is somewhat in contradiction to what other members of his party advocated last year, when they complained that we were not sending enough to Korea.

Above all Canadians should think first of their own country. While we are committed to assisting in the defence of Europe along with other members of NATO, we should consider that the first line of defence may lie in our own country and our first duty is to provide for our own defence. This is the best way in which we may help in the defence of human rights and democracy. We should not forget that any nation should think of itself first of all.

We are committed in conjunction with the other United Nations in Korea and with the north Atlantic powers in Europe, and up to now we have done our share and we are willing to continue although whatever a country does for a general cause may not necessarily be given recognition. I can remember not long ago after the second war, in which we had done more than our share, when the United Nations were organized our neighbours below the Rio Grande were given a seat in the security council, which we were refused; and it is a sure thing their war effort was not comparable to ours. But these are things that have happened, and gratitude is no more to be expected in international than in national politics. At this moment more than ever I think Canadians should consider what are the interests of their own country. We have our Atlantic and Pacific shores to defend. If war ever breaks out we may be subjected to a submarine menace that will be much worse than it was when the Germans controlled the Atlantic with a few submarines. The Russians evidently have more. We have none, and it is no secret that the allies cannot cope with that menace at the present time. Everybody knows it.

This is a field which should be investigated by the government before we commit all our strength overseas. It is necessary for us to build up our air defences for use in Canada and not send everything abroad, because nobody can tell now where the front line will be. It may well be here in Canada. With the development of air power an attack may come from the north and we may be among the first to be hit. I heard a most distressing and discouraging opinion from one European, which shows some of the ideas they have over there. He said: "You are quite lucky. In the first attack you will probably get about nine atomic bombs and some of your cities at any rate will be through with them. In our case we will not be considered that important. We will just get 500-tonners. As in the last war we will have our wounded, and our buildings will be down; but we will have to live through it because the Russians will want to keep us while on the other hand in trying to invade the United States they will fly over your country and in passing by they will drop a few on you."

One way or the other I think we might very well be in the front line. Nobody can predict where the front line will be. The first incident took place in Korea. The next one may well be in the Middle East, and nobody knows where the third attack will come, in Europe or on us if they ever decide to do so. I doubt that they will, but that is another matter that will take too long to go into. However, if the blow ever should come it might very well fall directly on us; then we would be the first line of defence. Therefore I think the government, so far as their defence policy is concerned, should consider Canadian interests first and train and keep at home as far as possible all the air squadrons necessary to defend our country. Like everyone else I know what we hear here and there about what is being done by way of constructing radar chains throughout the country. That is one thing, but once you know the enemy is coming you must have somebody prepared to meet them.

I think it is time we knew exactly, in definite terms, what is the government's policy for the defence of the country; not only our commitments abroad but how we intend to defend our country, because we do not know where these people will strike if they ever decide to do so.

That brings us to the much greater consideration of whether they will. I am one who said a few years ago that I thought Russia wanted twenty years of peace; perhaps of cold war, but not of shooting war, in order that they may bring to a higher level the standard of living of her population. I stated then that I thought she would not provoke a definite incident which might ignite the powder. I may be wrong. A lot of people think I am. A lot of people think Russia will strike any day, within a year, two years or three years. Personally I still do not believe that such an element in Russia will be the one to dominate the policies of the Politburo. I still think they will want to continue the cold war, try to raise the standard of living of their population and bring about a higher degree of productivity.

Then with the manpower they possess, and with which we can hardly cope, they will be able to attack provided they wait long enough and do not act on the spur of the moment as did Hitler, or consult astrologers and so on. I believe that guided by hard tactics alone they will wait until the moment they believe they will have a chance to win a victory. There are those who fear that the people on the other side may provoke an incident. I hope the reason and strength of mind of the people of the democracies will not bring about that situation.

I think that sooner or later, and the sooner the better, we should have a statement from the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) on the general defence policies of the country, not something piecemeal or a statement made outside of the country.

No matter what has been said, I am one of those who think such statements should be made in the house. I believe there should be enough liberty of speech in the house—and I think there is—that when a member feels the way I do on this question he ought to say so. No matter how much one may think the government may be better than its opponents, I think it is not to the advantage of parliament or of democratic institutions when such things are done as the minister, whom I respect and like personally, did by a slip of the tongue, if we may call it that, in announcing policies abroad rather than in the house.

This house has gone through many attacks. Parliament in general and our democratic institutions have been attacked as being inefficient. How can they be efficient if important matters of policy are declared outside of parliament rather than in parliament and before they have been discussed in parliament? I think it is high time that the general scheme of our defence policy should be voiced in the house, not in vaguely worded statements or uncompromising generalities but the complete details of our defence policies as they concern not the interests of the world at large but above all the interests of Canada. Our first duty is to Canada. Our first duty to the world is to keep Canada free and democratic.

It has been my privilege to come back from abroad after visiting other countries. I visited the Scandinavian countries and Germany, and spent some time in Yugoslavia. There is nothing better than to come back home and realize the value of our institutions. If we want to keep our institutions we have to keep them alive. We have to have respect for our institutions if we want them to live, if we want people to have confidence in them. Members of parliament should not be elected only as official applauders of the leader of the opposition or the prime minister, but as men who can voice their own opinions, who are consulted and who can give their opinions, having in mind of course those they wish to keep in power, in whom they have more confidence. Once this is established, then when important matters arise members who believe in the political theories of a party support the action of the government when it is a matter of government policy.

They do not always like all these policies, but because they would rather have this government than any other group in which they have less confidence they support them. Once this has been done every member is free and has the duty to express his views. I said somewhere else that I thought it was a pity that in our debate on external affairs more people did not take part. The hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) challenged people on this side to speak. The hon. member for Trinity-Conception (Mr. Stick), a respected gentleman with a knowledge of international affairs, rose to the occasion and made a valuable contribution to the debate. On this side of the house he was the only other member besides the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) who took part in the debate. I do not want to bring about a competition between parties as to which can take the longer period of time speaking, but I think it is the duty of every member of the house to voice his opinions. I do not think we are in good standing when we criticize people because they prolong a debate. Some of our friends seem to believe that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) gets up too often. I approve of that. He gets up because he has something to say, and I think no time is lost when somebody expresses an opinion in the house.

Of course I would be the last to say that we should adopt the United States system where they have a Democratic party half of which votes for the government and half against, and a Republican party that does not know whether or not it approves its leadership. I do not want that; but I claim that every member in the house should have the respect of the house, and policies should be announced in the house. I believe there should be greater and greater respect amongst parliamentarians, because if parliamentarians do not respect one another and if the government does not show all respect due to parliamentarians, the people will not respect them.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I am a partisan. I shall continue to be a partisan of the government, because I believe more in this government than in any other group now before me.

An hon. Member: Why?

Mr. Picard: To answer that would open a long discussion for which I have no time left now. I should like to answer the hon. member by referring him to my previous speeches explaining my votes and give him a further explanation when the opportunity presents itself in other debates.

There are times in one's life, however, when one has to decide between the ideas that one entertains and those of his party. The party or the government arrives at certain decisions and gives reasons for them. There may be times when you have to stop maintaining your own views and vote in a certain way on a given issue because you believe in the general program and policies of a party. If you vote against the government you may bring into power other people in whom you have no confidence at all. I will admit that at times I will vote for governmental decisions not so much because I like them but because I believe that if I vote against the government I shall vote in favour of another group in whose ideas or in whose men I have less confidence than in those with whom I am associated. That is a rule for all members of parliament.

To revert to our defence policy I think it is of the greatest importance to man the defences of Canada, and to look into our program for NATO and other international organizations in the light of our own strategic position. As I said, our first duty is to Canada, then to NATO and the other organizations that may contribute to the preservation of democracy. As to our democratic parliamentary institutions, the best way to preserve them is to ensure the respect of parliament by the government in order that the people at large may respect it.

(Translation):

Mr. Hector Dupuis (St. Mary): Mr. Speaker, I wish to extend my most sincere congratulations to the member for Bellechasse (Mr. Picard) for the splendid speech he has just made in this house. I must admit he is truly an authority on the matters he has brought to the knowledge of his colleagues, and I congratulate him especially for his frankness and his adherence to the party to which he remains loyal in spite of the fact that sometimes he does not share the views of his party.

I can hardly omit mentioning the efforts made by the Speaker of this house to increase his knowledge of the French language.

In my maiden speech in the house I paid tribute to him for making it a duty, in all circumstances, to give the French language its rightful place in debates on the various matters brought to the attention of members of parliament.

Since, although it may be said that he is no longer of school age, the Speaker has taken lessons in the French language. I was both astonished and happy to find that, although he had but little time to learn it, he could speak fluently in my mother tongue.

This gesture should set an example to all our fellow citizens who, I am sure, must feel more and more convinced of the necessity of learning and using both official languages of the country.

I wish to congratulate the mover (Mr. Cauchon) and the seconder (Mr. Simmons) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. Both have acquitted themselves admirably of this task.

I want to stress certain remarks made by the hon. member for Beauharnois about the gentleman who, with the assistance of his ministers, directs the destinies of Canada.

The eloquent member for Beauharnois has laid special emphasis, and rightly so, upon the firm determination of the Right Hon. Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) to ensure national unity, a determination against which will beat in vain the efforts of certain narrow-minded fanatics who wish to appropriate for themselves alone the rights and privileges granted by the British North America Act and which they hold in contempt.

The Right Hon. Prime Minister, as I have already mentioned, will go down in history as a champion of legitimate collective and individual liberties and of national understanding, from sea to sea, within the confines of this great and now autonomous nation of ours.

At the risk of offending certain so-called ultra-loyalists who, fortunately, are becoming fewer and fewer and who have failed to understand what this autonomy means to the descendants of those who cleared the land in Canada, whether they be of English or French origin, I am not afraid to state that our country has reached its maturity and that, as such, it can now stride forward alone towards the bountiful future it has in store.

The prophecy of another compatriot, a most illustrious one, to the effect that the twentieth century would be Canada's, is already beginning to materialize.

Thanks to God, we have and we are developing natural resources and basic products that place us among the very first producing countries in the world.

But of what use would all this wealth be if we failed to take the necessary means to apply these resources methodically, if conditions were to become such as to paralyse all individual effort and initiative?

When we consider world conditions today, we can safely say that living conditions in Canada compare favourably with those in other countries.

The political party that now manages the affairs of this country, and has managed them longer than any other party, has always striven to establish social and economic conditions that are the envy of many other nations. Thanks to the progressive spirit which characterizes this party, the house has been able to enact social legislation to protect the workers and the underprivileged.

In fact, who will deny the huge benefits accruing to the majority of our fellow countrymen by the enactment of such laws as those on family allowances, unemployment insurance, pensions for the blind, not to mention the pending legislation on behalf of the disabled and others whose permanent disability prevents them from earning a living.

I recall that for many years the leaders and supporters of the official opposition party fought endlessly against these social reforms. They came round to them after having realized their beneficial effects, unless it was through wisdom, in the hope of being able to win the confidence of the electors.

No matter which of those reasons prevailed, the fact remains that some of those beneficent measures to ensure security to the groups concerned were necessary in this country, first as a duty and then to offset communistic propaganda, as well as the effect its wonderful promises might have had on the masses.

Workers do not have the advantage of putting aside the money which might help them go through with the least difficulty, those periods of trial and want which, unfortunately, are much too often experienced by the mass of wage-earners. All those social laws will help them and the old age pension will make them secure from destitution when they are old.

I associate myself with the remarks uttered by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) in his talk of November 13 last. I quote:

> No fear is more tyrannical than that of want in one's old age. The government's policy is intended to guarantee that Canadians, when they advance in age, may count upon independence and a decent standard of living and not upon charity and the old people's home.

During the last session, the government decided to lower to sixty-five years the age at which a person may be eligible for the old age pension. It has also increased the amount of the monthly pension paid old age pensioners, thus increasing the measure of security which this legislation provides. It is an annuity which will guarantee them comfort and independence when they reach the twilight of life.

Unavoidably, it was necessary to increase taxes, but I believe that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) deserves congratulations for having distributed so equitably the taxes required to grant those additional benefits to our senior citizens.

Since I am dealing with the Department of Finance, I deem it my duty to present a few suggestions which I believe should be adopted.

It has seemed advisable to impose an excise tax on various articles, the so-called luxury goods, like radios, washing machines, refrigerators, etc. A very burdensome tax has been added also to the price of tobacco.

I understand that very heavy sacrifices are made necessary by the extraordinarily high cost of rearmament. All the parties recognize how imperative it is to establish our defence on a sound basis. However, some members of the opposition seem to think that we are not doing enough in that connection.

If we decided to follow their suggestions, I wonder how many millions we would have to add to our national revenue, millions which would have to be levied by taxation!

Those who blame the government for not doing more in connection with our defence situation and recruiting for the various armed services take great care not to suggest some beautiful source where we might obtain such huge additional amounts as would be involved.

While I approve the government's policy as far as the amounts allotted to our defence production are concerned I think that there should be a better distribution of the taxes necessary to meet the emergency.

Reverting to the increased excise tax on the articles I have already mentioned, I wonder who, after due consideration, could seriously claim that an electric washing machine or refrigerator, or even a radio, are luxuries.

Are there some who would like us to go backward by raising the price of washing machines through taxation to such a prohibitive level that only well-to-do people could buy them while those who are not as fortunate would have to do without them?

Certainly, no one would like to go back to the times when the housewife was practically a slave and forced to labour hard without the help of those household machines and appliances which progress has placed at her disposal in the last fifty years.

It is imperative that we should contribute to the comfort and the well-being of the housewife; one of the best means to help her is to facilitate the purchase of all the appliances necessary for this purpose. It is not by increasing taxes and curtailing instalment buying facilities that we will reach this end.

Thus, electrical refrigerators contribute to the well-being to which everyone has the right to look forward to.

Some may claim that people can always use an ordinary ice-box, the cost of which is within everyone's reach. Even if this is true, one may wonder whether it is very much more economical to use natural ice than an electric refrigerator. Have we figured out the enormous quantities of food that are saved through the modern methods of electric refrigeration? I should add that this invention and the health conditions it creates help to raise the health standards of the nation. No, gentlemen, an electric refrigerator at a reasonable price is not a luxury; it has become a necessity.

And what about a radio? Who could do without one today?

Of course, it is not necessary that we should have the most expensive models.

I could readily understand a luxury tax on appliances or machines which would truly be luxury items selling at a very high price. But I cannot see that it is proper to tax all these appliances at the same rate, regardless of cost.

I speak, I am sure, for those I represent when I ask the government to reconsider its decision and to secure elsewhere the revenue it requires.

As I suggested in a previous speech in the house, could we not, for instance, tax profits derived from the sale of businesses, properties or from financial operations on the stock market or elsewhere?

Wage-earners' incomes are taxed at the source, via salary deductions, while hundreds, indeed thousands, of people do not pay anything on enormous profits made in financial operations and which, for all intents and purposes, are truly income acquired during the year.

I also humbly submit that the tax on cigarettes and tobacco should be greatly reduced.

All members of the house know that, more than ever before, tobacco is being smuggled into this country.

This is largely due to the excessively high price of cigarettes, because of the heavy taxation on that commodity.

There was a time when a man could save by rolling his own, but nowadays, if you take into account the tax on processed tobacco, the so-called home-made cigarette becomes a near luxury, compared to what it cost before the tax increase.

And what about pipe tobacco, cut or leaf? Undoubtedly this was the cheapest method open to the smoker who wished to indulge his taste. Nevertheless a way was found to increase its price to what I consider to be an exaggerated extent.

Smuggling, which has resulted from such overcharging, has created ruinous competition for local producers, so much so that they are about to lay off hundreds of employees.

Let there be no mistake about it. There has been no drop in the amount of tobacco consumed, but thousands of people have taken means to buy cigarettes at a price which is just half the price paid in Canada.

It is my hope that in view of the requests coming in from all sides and to prevent our fellow countrymen from turning more and more into lawbreakers, the government will reconsider their position and that not only will they remove the tax increase levied in the last budget but that they will even reduce the rate levied previously.

My remarks are not inspired by the desire to oppose the government nor even to embarrass them. My sole purpose is to draw the attention of our leaders to a deplorable state of affairs, which should be corrected at once.

However, the necessary steps should be taken to prevent manufacturers from benefiting from this action on the part of the government, by increasing the price of their products.

I remember, and I have already said so here, that the manufacturers of soft drinks asked for repeal of the tax on their products, and that this request was granted.

Their main argument was that the five cent price was the popular price and that the extra cent to be paid by the consumer was, in short, but a nuisance tax, as they called this impost.

A little later, the tax was removed, the price of soft drinks was raised to six cents and, a short time afterwards, to seven cents.

Perhaps manufacturing costs, wage increases or higher sales commissions are the cause of such an increase but nothing has proven that such price increase has not entirely benefited soft drink manufacturers.

It was the same with chocolate bars. The tax on this confection was also abolished and immediately after the price was brought up to seven cents, although by this time bars were smaller.

Even if such increase is justifiable for the reasons just given, the fact remains that we might fear that the cigarette manufacturers would raise their prices also, solely to their own benefit.

I therefore suggest that a parliamentary committee be set up to authorize, if need be, the increase of the sales price in general.

Now I wish to discuss a matter which I have already mentioned in the house, namely, civil service salaries and the increase made necessary by the steady rise in the cost of living.

I understand that those good public servants will shortly receive a substantial increase. Far be it from me to claim credit for it, but I am happy to find that the government has willingly granted the numerous requests similar to mine which they have received from various quarters.

Now this commendable step should, however, be completed by a reclassification of the various positions, in order to place on the same footing, in regard to salaries, all those who perform work similar to that of other employees and who receive less than their colleagues whose duties do not require any more knowledge or effort.

The wages paid to the unskilled workers, those we call the day-labourers, should be checked in all departments in order to find out if they are in keeping with the work required from the men and with the cost of living.

Of course the wages paid to this class of workers must correspond to those paid for similar work in industry and trade. Still I maintain it would not be superfluous to make a survey in this regard in order to correct any shortcomings if not injustices, quite unintentional, I dare say, affecting certain workers.

I am pleased to congratulate the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier) and the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg) for the increase of thirteen cents an hour granted to the women looking after the cleaning and the maintenance of government offices. This action does them honour and I have been asked to extend to these two distinguished members of the government the most sincere thanks of the people concerned.

I also express the wish that the pension paid to veterans of both wars will be increased, because like everyone else they are suffering from constantly rising prices.

We all deplore the high cost of living, which is the great problem of all those who look after a family budget. In that connection, I wish to repeat what I said previously.

In my opinion, we cannot freeze prices at their present high level and salaries at the low level now paid to a very large number of people.

Before thinking of price and wage controls, we should provide a decent salary to the small wage-earners, unskilled workers, and office workers who today are not earning enough to cope with the present high cost of living and must resort to work outside their regular employment in order to make both ends meet. Due to inadequate incomes, several families have to go without some essential commodities. We should first find a solution to that problem before speaking of controlling prices and freezing wages.

Recently, representatives from all labour unions have asked that the Unemployment Insurance Act be amended in order to reduce the number of days that must elapse between the time the worker loses his job and the time he begins to receive his unemployment benefits.

It seems to me that the reserves accumulated by the commission are sufficiently large to allow such liberalities. In any event, I do hope that the government will see its way clear to afford this timely suggestion the attention it deserves.

Before concluding these remarks I once again call the attention of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) to the appropriateness of doing away with toll charges on the Jacques Cartier and Victoria bridges. The construction costs of the latter structure have been written off long ago. As for the former, it is true $19,000,000 still remains to be paid on it, but that is no reason to impose an additional indirect tax on the residents of Montreal and the adjoining district who use this route every day.

Why not discuss it with provincial and municipal authorities with a view to reaching a sensible arrangement in so far as the writing off of this debt and maintenance costs are concerned?

Such an arrangement would be likely to do justice to all the people of our province, since they all have to use this bridge. It should be noted that this means of communication serves tourists from all parts of the country and that they too must pay this indirect tax. But there are not many of them and the greater part of the burden must be borne by the people of Montreal and vicinity.

I intend to move a motion, at the next session, to request the abolition of toll charges on those bridges. If the government cannot grant my request, they might at least be able to abolish the price charged passengers in cars.

I hope the government will grant the many requests they have received concerning this discriminatory charge, since I believe these are the only two toll bridges in the country.

In closing I wish to assure the government that any remarks I made were made in good faith, because I thought it was my duty to make them and because I thought I was faithfully carrying out my mandate by expressing those views as frankly as I could. Despite my remarks and those few suggestions which I would like to see carried out, I wish to assure the government of my full support.

To be sure, conditions could be better than they are now; however, I do not think this country can be led by better men than we have now, or men more anxious to give their best to ensure the greatest measure of welfare to our fellow countrymen under the difficult conditions that now exist throughout the world.

I shall therefore vote for the address in reply to the speech from the throne, against the amendment and against the amendment to the amendment, because they offer no solution to present-day problems and merely amount to a motion of non-confidence in the best government our country ever had. Such a motion I could never support with my vote.

(Text):

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, before turning to the subject on which I wish to detain the house for only a few moments I should like to make one or two comments on the speech of the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Picard), to which I listened with keen interest. I refer particularly to what he said about the desirability of debates in the house on foreign affairs being more actively participated in, and I agree fully with him. He of course has had the advantage of being abroad this summer, and was therefore able to speak about these matters with a certainty of touch which the rest of us could hardly have. Nevertheless we are an international power now, and it seems to me the time has long since passed when we should get rid of what seems to have been almost a taboo on the subject of foreign affairs. I do hope that what has been said tonight by the hon. member for Bellechasse will bear fruit.

I was of course also delighted with another statement he made in answer to a question from one of my colleagues as to why he supported the government. He said, and I hoped he said it sadly, "Oh, that would take a long time to explain". I took great comfort from that, and I hope not without justification.

My only excuse for rising a second time in the debate, even to speak for only a few moments, is a statement made in the house the other day which it seems to me was entirely wide of the mark and completely removed from reality. I should like to take a few moments of the time of the house to bring it back to what I, at any rate, consider to be a realistic view of the situation. I refer to the remark made the other day by the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Sinclair), in answer to a question as to whether the Bank of Canada supported Dominion of Canada bonds. He sought to suggest that, really, the Bank of Canada had no responsibility. I sympathized with him, because I thought he was given the rather ungrateful task of trying to explain something which I think cannot be explained, because I do not think it is a fact. He practised hair-splitting and, indeed, evasiveness, which I do not think is characteristic of him but which, nevertheless, I suggest was characteristic of the statement he made the other day.

I should like to point out in passing that this attitude of running away from responsibility, trying to pretend that the bank had nothing to do with this, is a change—oh, such a change—from the attitude of some years ago, when we were treated to any number of boasts as to what the bank was doing, how it controlled this and that, how it knew all the answers, and so on, and so on. Indeed, I propose to read a little later a statement by no less a person than Mr. Ilsley, to show that even the careful Mr. Ilsley was led a pretty long way toward saying that they had the answers, and that it was now really possible to control all kinds of things, which they have since learned cannot be controlled.

I should like to point out that I am not questioning the importance of these powers; far from it. What I am questioning is this apparent desire to run away from the fact and to treat the house to statements which I think do very little credit to its intelligence, and which we should not be asked to accept.

I should like first of all to read a short statement from the Financial Post of November 24, which sets out what is I am sure the unquestioned belief of the ordinary man of business, in the financial world, as to what is the practice at the present time. I propose to read this; and then I propose to read briefly from what the parliamentary assistant said. I then propose to look back very briefly, also, to show that the whole purpose of the Bank of Canada, at least one of the chief purposes, as set out in the preamble and in the statement made by those responsible for its organization, was to do the very thing which we are at the present time being asked to believe it does not do.

> Although prices of Canadian bonds dropped sharply on Thursday last week with the long terms being off from 1 to 1½ points, prices have held steady since. Longer term government bonds are said "resting" on Bank of Canada bids again but shorter term governments are quite buoyant and in good demand . . .
> The reason for the drop was a lowering of the prices which the Bank of Canada was willing to bid for government bonds. For some time now, dealers say, the bank has been the main buyer of government of Canada bonds and so, in effect, was supporting the market. (In January, 1948, the bank stopped its wartime practice of issuing a daily list of prices at which it would buy and sell government of Canada bonds and reverted to its pre-war practice of dealing in general only in response to offerings and bids of dealers.)
> As soon as dealers found no buyers for their offerings, dealers dropped their prices until they found the level at which the bonds would be bought, either by the Bank of Canada or others.

And another short quotation from the same issue:

> Big news of the week was the Bank of Canada temporarily withdrawing its support from government bond prices. When prices dropped $1 to $1.50, Ottawa again temporarily at least lent its support. The move has signalled higher interest rates generally, tighter money, and, of course, new brakes on capital expansion programs.

Having said that, I wish to read what the parliamentary assistant said the other day, when he referred to the statement of the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton):

> —that the Bank of Canada formerly supported the market for Dominion of Canada bonds by issuing quotations of the prices at which it would purchase bonds . . .

The parliamentary assistant went on to say this:

> This apparently refers, although somewhat incorrectly, to a wartime practice which terminated nearly four years ago. It was not a practice of supporting the market, but a question of trading methods. During the war the practice was for the Bank of Canada to notify dealers each day the prices at which, subject to change at any time, it was prepared to buy bonds, and similarly the prices at which it was prepared to sell.

If anyone can tell me what better words could be used to describe the operation of supporting the market, I would like to know them. The parliamentary assistant continued:

> In January, 1948, the bank announced that it was reverting to its pre-war practice of dealing, in general, only in response to bids and offers initiated by other buyers and sellers in the market, and there has been no change in its usual practice since that time.

That is a change of small significance so far as I can see. All that it means is that instead of the bank notifying them in advance what they would pay, what the bank did and still does is to stand by and watch the course of prices before making up its mind at what rate they will start to act, and to act accordingly. In my opinion to say that that is not supporting the market is just playing with words.

Let me just take a moment or two to remind the house what the Bank of Canada was formed for, because it seems to me that if this statement which has been made were true the bank is actually running away from doing the thing it was supposed to do. One phrase in the preamble of the Bank of Canada Act reads:

> Whereas it is desirable to establish a central bank to regulate credit and currency—

I should like to go on and quote briefly from what Mr. Rhodes, the then Minister of Finance, said when introducing the bill in 1934:

> It is intended that the bank shall have a definite measure of control over the total volume of credit and thus be in a position indirectly to exert an influence over the general price level.

Four years later Hon. C. A. Dunning, then Minister of Finance, said this when speaking of the machinery:

> Canada's financial machinery is now adequate to enable the government to cause effective action to be taken in the field of monetary policy to the extent that monetary methods may be appropriate to solve our problems.

I should like to quote briefly from what Mr. Graham Towers, the governor of the bank, said when speaking before the banking and commerce committee in 1939. After four or five years of experience in the operation of the bank he said:

> I believe that in no country and at no time have there been bank and market responses to central bank action and central bank policies more complete, more full and more in line with anything that a theorist might have anticipated than have taken place in Canada.

That is a strong statement. How does the bank exercise this influence? I suppose two of the strongest and most obvious ways would be by buying and selling securities on the market and by the regulation of interest rates.

If you look at the Bank of Canada Act you will find the widest powers given there for the buying and selling of securities.

Why this change? I should like to read something that was said by Mr. Ilsley. Hon. members will note that this is cautiously worded; nevertheless the indication is that they know the answers, that they know how to fix the prices of securities. I have before me a circular which was issued in October, 1945 as an aid in selling victory bonds. It is entitled "Victory Bond Prices" and contains a statement by Mr. Ilsley as follows:

> It will be of the greatest importance that we maintain, indeed assure, a ready and stable market for all these millions of bonds that we have sold. We have now the monetary and financial machinery and we have developed the methods for accomplishing this, and we will therefore be able to deal with any situation which may develop in a way which will keep faith with the millions of investors who are supporting the savings program in this national emergency.

There is caution as well as emphasis in that statement. Of course Mr. Ilsley does not say that the bonds will never go below par; nevertheless the people selling those bonds did their best to make the investors believe that. When Mr. Ilsley mentioned keeping faith with the millions of investors, the faith which the ordinary man thought was implied was to keep the bonds at par. I am not saying Mr. Ilsley ever said that, because he did not. On several occasions he refused to say it. Nevertheless at that time the government in effect indicated that they knew all the answers.

What has happened since? We all know. The situation is not quite so good now. The Canadian dollar does not look as good now as it did then. We have had a lot of what can be described as debasing of the currency since then. Our fine Canadian dollar which people were asked to purchase ten years ago in the form of bonds and which they were told was the best investment they could ever have has been affected by this debasing of the currency, and today that dollar is not as good as it was.

Therefore I say that we now have an attempt to get away from responsibility. Now that the powers given four or five years ago have not produced exactly the results which were hoped for, now that a reverse situation has come about, it does not seem to be so popular to assume responsibility. Therefore I bring this to the attention of the house. I say again that I think the statement we had the other day was a masterpiece of hair-splitting. It is complimentary to call it hair-splitting. Though there is not a single sentence in that which is actually a misstatement, to me the whole effect was a complete—what shall I say—failure to state the reality of the situation. That is putting it most mildly, but I do not like strong words which may cause pain in certain quarters and which one may want eventually to soften. I say that is a very soft expression to use. All I can add is that I hope this house will not be treated again to a sample of this kind of thing which is far from being a compliment to our intelligence.

Mr. R. R. Knight (Saskatoon): Mr. Speaker, I should like tonight to take up a number of things which are of interest to the people of my constituency. The world has grown so small that world affairs come home to us very closely. I suppose that if my constituents had the choice of anything kind Providence might bestow upon them they would ask for the establishment of world peace under the rule of law. That granted we could then proceed toward the solution of other problems.

The next great problem facing the world today is the feeding of its population, which is increasing at an amazing rate. In spite of our vaunted agricultural technique our food production is not nearly keeping up with world demands for food. The distribution of wealth in the form of consumer goods is on an uncertain and haphazard basis. We on this continent are fortunate in being possessed of almost limitless resources, but we cannot expect to sit tight forever on an island of plenty, an island of great natural resources, when surrounded by the envious and hungry eyes of nations which are less fortunate than ourselves. Even in this country we have our distribution problem. The people of Canada are being mulcted by inflation and high prices going still higher. Throughout the years the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) has tried to soothe us with the comforting thought that when consumer goods became more plentiful prices would level off. But is there anyone within the sound of my voice who is now so naive as to think that the system of supply and demand operates freely? It is true that there is an abundance of goods upon our shelves. Our consumer supplies are, I think, almost greater than we can use. There is an abundance of goods which one of these days is likely to prove an embarrassment to us as it has before to our topsy-turvy and haphazard economic system. Under a system in which the law of supply and demand was in free operation, prices would have fallen long ago.

The much vaunted free competition is conspicuous by its absence, and when goods become plentiful they do not necessarily go down in price. The manufacturer simply shuts down his factory and throws his employees upon the tender mercies of unemployment insurance until once more the need for supplies makes people willing to pay the same if not a higher price for the same goods. Once again we have proven our ability to produce far more than the needs of our own population. Consumer goods are plentiful, but they are not getting into the hands of the consumers. This tremendous production of consumer goods goes on in spite of the demand created by defence production and the transfer of men and machinery formerly used in the production of consumer goods to the production of defence goods. Is it any wonder that certain groups of businessmen are concerned as to what is going to happen if peace is declared? Is it any wonder that the New York stock exchange slumps to the degree that Korean settlement becomes likely? I ask hon. members if that is not a tacit admission that our economy only works smoothly during a war period or when war is threatening. Whether or not it is a sign that business interests believe there is now a better chance of peace than formerly, our economy is certainly not functioning too well in some quarters.

We hope that the optimism expressed today about a cease-fire in Korea is justified. If a cease-fire has been agreed upon; if a geographical line has been decided upon; if the date for such a cease-fire has been set, then I hope Canada will bring her influence to bear upon her allies to bring their influence to bear upon their foes to the end that in the meantime there may be no more killing and unnecessary slaughter before the armistice. A soldier may think the world well lost if he is fighting in a just and necessary cause, and the parents of our troops may even agree, but it seems to me a pity that a soldier should lose his life under circumstances such as I have described, in what must be for that time at least a pseudo battle which can decide nothing. I speak with some feeling on this matter because I was intimately connected with a family who suffered an unfortunate occurrence about the end of world war I. When the date of the armistice was announced as November 11 the family met together to celebrate in a quiet way the fact, as they thought, that their son would now be coming home unscathed; but the boy was instantly killed one night in a wheat field near Cambrai just a day or two before November 11, the date upon which the armistice actually went into effect. The yellow telegram arrived a day or two later. A life was unnecessarily lost which could have been spared for Canada, a life which Canada and the parents of the boy could ill afford to lose.

I was saying that our economy is not functioning too well in some quarters. The hon. member for York South (Mr. Noseworthy) pointed out to the house the other day the seriousness of the unemployment situation in Toronto. Vancouver too is having its unemployment problem and is concerned lest its mild climate may attract more jobless people to that part of the country. I have here the Saskatoon Star-Phoenix of November 21, 1951, in which there is a Canadian Press dispatch to which I wish to refer. It contains a statement by Mayor Fred Hume of Vancouver to his council. The article reads in part:

> "Things are getting tough in Vancouver, no fooling," Mayor Fred Hume told council. "I have as many as ten people in every day looking for work and I don't know where to send them." On October 25 there were 12,604 persons registered with the national employment service in Vancouver and only 1,025 unfilled jobs.

Vancouver is warning unemployed people to stay away, and with some reason. I have here an article from the Montreal Gazette of November 21 which refers to social service workers as saying:

> We've been urging all the younger men to start hitch-hiking towards the coast ports before the weather gets any worse.

The same dispatch says that in Montreal 20,000 men and women are unemployed and that the number may climb to 30,000 by the end of this week. Soup kitchens have been opened, and in the words of the article, "transient shelters are filled to capacity each night". The article is accompanied by a picture of a line of men waiting for a free lunch, and winter is not with us yet. The article mentions the scarcity of cash as one of the reasons for unemployment. I am reminded of the Minister of Finance's definition of inflation: "Too much cash," he has said on numerous occasions in my hearing, "chasing too few goods." It is a definition which will interest but will not encourage able-bodied men who are out of work. They have no cash. Goods are plentiful, it is true, but so far as they are concerned they are plentiful only in the shop windows.

Let us look for a moment at the other side of the coin. Profits and dividends are at an all-time high. The minister is trying to see to it that we have not too much cash. Taxation has now reached the point in this country where it may in fact become inflationary. I should like to refer to the Montreal Gazette of November 24 which says that the revenue surplus soared to $604,700,000 for the first seven months of the fiscal year, with October showing an increase of $91,500,000 and revenues going up to $354,600,000. Here, if you like, is too much cash, but it is in the hands of the government and its minister. It is an embarrassment of cash, but this government forsooth has not enough money at this session to increase the pensions paid to burnt-out pensioners under the War Veterans Allowance Act. Under that act a single man only receives $40.41 per month, and that under a means test. He can only have $10.42 additional monthly income if he is not to be prejudiced in the receipt of even that pittance. The married man is perhaps in a worse position. He receives $70.83, and the ceiling on his total income is $91.66. Items counted as additional income under the means test are such things as disability pensions and the old age pension, if the recipient is eligible for either of them. Inflation is described as too much cash chasing too few goods. Here is a class that has not too much cash; the government has seen to that. In view of the cost of living the goods that can be purchased by this class are indeed few.

We have not heard so much in this House of Commons about the plight of the veteran's widow under the War Veterans Allowance Act, perhaps because the widows are fewer in number. They, too, should receive immediate consideration. The government has said that at the next session it will set up a veterans committee to consider these things. I appeal to the government to consider these matters at this present session. Just a small fraction of these accumulated and embarrassing millions to which I have referred would set right the great wrong which has been done to these underprivileged classes of society. The request made by the Canadian Legion on their behalf is not unreasonable, and should be granted now. The executive committee of Saskatoon branch No. 63 of the Canadian Legion has written to me about the matter. They have sent me a copy of a resolution which I shall put on the record. It reads:

> Whereas those veterans whose sole or main income is an allowance under the War Veterans Allowance Act are suffering hardship due to the increasing high cost of living and,
> Whereas the government of Canada has announced the situation will be referred to a veterans committee of the House of Commons in 1952 for consideration and recommendation;
> And whereas the plight of many of these recipients of war veterans allowance is desperate now—
> The word "now" is underlined.
> Be it resolved that the government of Canada be urged to bring in a bill at the present session of the House of Commons, increasing basic rates of allowances under the War Veterans Allowance Act so that such allowances will at least provide food, clothing and shelter for the recipient.

A few minutes ago, Mr. Speaker, I was talking about the food production of the world. We, and particularly those of us on this continent, have wasted our heritage. We have slashed our timber lands; we have lowered the water table; we have impoverished our soil; we have caused soil erosion, and all for the sake of immediate gains. We shall have to call a halt. If these acts of commission are reprehensible, no less reprehensible has been our neglect to supply available water to our parched lands that they may become more fruitful. This brings me, as one would suspect since I am a Saskatchewan man, to the question of the Saskatchewan river development project. A successful irrigation scheme would be of inestimable value to that part of the country. Possibly the greatest problem facing Saskatchewan is caused by the slow growth of her population. The mechanization of wheat farming, the increased acreage of the average farm, mean that less and less people are needed for the process of growing the great quantities of grain which we produce. Climatic conditions work against the establishment of mixed farming.

Oh, it is easy for the arm-chair farmers to say that the farmers could keep more cattle. Most of these arm-chair farmers do not realize the climatic conditions under which farmers work, particularly in the southwest corner of Saskatchewan. More and more farmers are living in the towns, and under today's conditions one cannot blame them. We need more mixed farming; we need more stock raising, more industry and, above all, we need more people. A partial solution at least would be to bring water to the lands which are often parched for the lack of it. Thus it is that, as I have often done before, I urge the government to proceed forthwith with the great irrigation project that is planned. Government speakers, and in particular the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), have spoken generally in favour of this scheme. They have helped to create a public demand for it, but as yet they have done little in a practical sense to bring the plan to fruition.

This is not a political thing. It should not be looked upon from a partisan viewpoint, although political capital has been made of it. Last summer I attended a great meeting of farmers held at Outlook, Saskatchewan. These people were in earnest. They want action, and they want it soon. I had hoped that something would have been done before now. The minister's speeches before the last two federal elections seemed to give us some assurance of that. In February of 1949 I made a speech on this subject. I admit that on that date I was convinced something was going to be done soon, because on that occasion I said:

> Irrespective of what party is in power—

That is after the 1949 election.

> —I think something will be done. If the project is sound from an engineering point of view, this government is to be censured for not carrying out its promises.

That was three long years ago. After the 1949 election we again had high hopes, but the minister hedged a bit. He said the province of Saskatchewan would have to put up its share of the money. The province gave its assurance as to that, and we were then told that nothing could be done without agreement between the three provinces concerned as to the water distribution. Then there was to be a delay for the final inspection by a prominent engineer. Although the minister was questioned at that time as to the name of the prominent engineer, we were never able to find out. The matter was then handed over to a commission of three experts who are now studying it, and we believe their decision will be favourable. I do not believe it could be anything but favourable. If that is so, then I urge the government to proceed forthwith, even before the next election. I am concerned with the benefit this project will bring to the country more than I am concerned with who gets credit for bringing it about. The completion of this scheme would benefit not only our province; it would bring work to a great many people. It would increase the population of Saskatchewan; it would put a greater number of people on smaller farms, and it would mean a new type of farmer. It would encourage diversification in farming and the breeding of livestock, and would conceivably promote other industries such as the finishing of beef cattle and the production of beet sugar. It would mean more business for the towns, and would stabilize the farm economy of the province. It would affect the nation as a whole. Let us proceed with it.

Much has been said at this session of the current difficulties of the prairie wheat farmers. We hope something will be done to help them in their temporary trouble due to the lack of storage space and the lack of transportation. We hope they will be assisted financially until their crops can be delivered in the ordinary way. The demands for better transportation have perhaps embarrassed the government and the railways. It occurs to me that embarrassment might have been very much greater if the crop had been taken off, as it usually is, in two or three weeks of fine sunny weather. In view of the apparent lack of preparation for the movement of this year's crop, the fact that most of it was not ready as quickly as usual has been something of a face saver, in my opinion, for this government and for the transportation companies. The storage of grain, of course, is one of the difficulties this year, and I am going to suggest to the government that the storage space at the port of Churchill might well be enlarged. The present capacity of the elevator up there is 2,500,000 bushels. If there were greater storage facilities, greater use of the Hudson bay route would be encouraged. That in turn would be an advantage to the growers in that shipping area; it would also be an advantage to my own city and to other northern towns.

There is another consideration. I was reading tonight in my home paper that the grain people are estimating that in the northern part of Saskatchewan only about 20 per cent of the wheat that is being shipped is classified as dry; it is damp or tough. The Churchill elevator is equipped with splendid drying facilities which in any wet harvest year, such as this one, could be used to tremendous advantage. If more storage space were available, more wheat could be prepared there for export through the use of even the present drying facilities which throughout the years have been comparatively idle. I think last year was the first in which any substantial use was made of those facilities. It was amazing to me to learn the amount of grain that could be dried there in twenty-four hours' time. The Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) has received in this regard at least one representation that I know about. That was from the council of farm unions of the prairie provinces. I have twice questioned him about it, and in spite of his rather discouraging reply today we hope that the government will give it earnest consideration.

I have one more subject to bring before this house at this time. For some time we who live in Saskatchewan have felt that a production unit of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation should be established in that province. There are three provinces in Canada where the C.B.C. has not set up such a unit. Before deciding to bring this matter before the house I canvassed the opinions of the premier of Saskatchewan, the president of the farmers' union in Saskatchewan and the president of the Saskatoon federated co-operative, and I have received unanimous endorsation of the idea. I have in my hand letters from those gentlemen in regard to the matter.

As things are now it is difficult to arrange to have people from our province take part in such programs as "Citizens' Forum",

"Critically Speaking" and other programs which ought to reflect the thinking and actions of people all over Canada, not just people from a group of provinces. Were there administrative offices in Saskatchewan, or were there a production unit there, C.B.C. personnel would have a better opportunity to become acquainted personally with the leaders in the various organizations in that province, with speakers, musicians, actors and artists of all kinds. There would be a tremendous stimulus to local talent which might be used on the air; and there is a great deal of talent in that province. I noticed tonight that in Edmonton at a national contest in poetry put on some time ago by the Canadian authors' association, several of the prize winners were young Saskatchewan people.

In this interchange of correspondence between Premier Douglas and the chairman of the board of governors of the C.B.C. there is a letter from Mr. Dunton to the premier in which he says:

> We have been aware for a long time of the desirability of having a C.B.C. production unit in Saskatchewan. I hope the new financial arrangements for the corporation will make it possible in the not too distant future.

Then I skip a line or two and quote again:

> I can assure you, however, that a production centre for Saskatchewan is very much in mind.

That is indeed good news; and I express the hope that, when the necessary funds are available, this project will be one of the first to be carried out. I urge, of course—and it is natural perhaps that I should do so, for I am prejudiced—that the natural place for such a unit is the city of Saskatoon. I shall not weary the house by cataloguing its natural beauty and its many advantages, except to say this, and it is revelant to the subject under consideration. As the site of the provincial university it is the educational centre of the province; it has become recognized as the city in which most Saskatchewan organizations hold their conventions; and geographically it is at the centre of the large populated area of Saskatchewan. It will be of tremendous advantage to the city, to the province and to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation itself if there is established at that point a production centre such as we visualize.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, may I recapitulate the earlier part of my speech by again drawing to the attention of the government the desire of our people for the early construction of the Saskatchewan dam, the need for greater storage facilities for grain at the port of Churchill, the desperate need of the burnt-out veterans and veterans' widows for increases in their pensions, and the reponsibility of this government to alleviate somehow the uneasiness caused in Canada by inflation, over-taxation and the high cost of living.

(Translation):

Mr. Andre Gauthier (Lake St. John): Mr. Speaker, in view of the importance of the legislation introduced during this session and of the urgency of the problems which I have to submit to the government, I would be shirking my responsibilities if I did not take part in this debate.

I wish to associate myself with those who have preceded me in order to congratulate the mover of the address in reply to the speech from the throne (Mr. Cauchon) and the seconder (Mr. Simmons). Their electors should be proud of them. I have listened with particular interest to the speech of the member for Beauharnois and I have admired the manner in which he dealt with national unity. Before concluding my remarks, I shall come back to a particular aspect of national unity.

Our country is developing rapidly and the constituency which I have the honour to represent, Lake St. John, is in the forefront of the industrial development.

For the past few months the Aluminum Company of Canada has been engaged in the development of two power stations on the Peribonka river and the extension of its aluminum plants at Isle Maligne. These works, which will cost in the neighbourhood of $100 million, create for the people of my constituency certain problems that appear difficult to solve. I am referring in particular to the housing problem. Some time ago, the Minister of Resources and Development (Mr. Winters) announced improvements to the federal law on housing for the benefit of the workers employed in defence industries.

Because aluminum is a metal used in the production of munitions of war, the Lake St. John district should be considered as an emergency district within the meaning of the act recently amended. I bring this point to the attention of the government. For my part, I am convinced this is the only way to face the situation and to solve, partially at least, this difficult and yet alarming problem, the housing problem. The need is particularly great at Saint-Joseph d'Alma, Naudville and l'Isle Maligne.

The Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Lapointe) announced, a few days ago, an increase in the basic rate of veterans' pensions. The steady increase in the cost of living had reduced the value of their original pension. They were fully justified in asking for an increase in their pension.

By granting the requests of the Canadian Legion and by carrying out our recommendations, the government did justice to the veterans of the two world wars and carried forward the social security program it is trying to extend even further to all classes of Canadians. This brings me to the most important social security legislation ever passed by a Canadian parliament since confederation—I mean the act providing for old age security.

Personally, I am delighted to be a member of the parliament that passed that legislation and I take pride in supporting the government that brought it forward.

In this way, the federal government will be contributing half the cost of pensions for those aged 65 to 70 and will assume the entire cost of paying a universal pension of $40 per month to people aged 70 and over. As stated by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin), we can all be proud of the fact that Canada is the first country to pay a universal pension without a means test.

In two previous speeches in this house I had the honour to ask that this social security be afforded the old people of my constituency. I am glad that this is at last an accomplished fact.

The mover of the address in reply spoke of national unity. This national unity, to my mind, would be far better served if the Department of National Defence were to erect a military college in the province of Quebec. This would make it easier for our young men to make a career of army life.

The Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) seems to be very favourably disposed with regard to the requests of French-speaking Canadians. I am confident therefore he will give our recruits the same advantages given those of other provinces. The establishment of a military college in my province would remove an injustice and the source of many grievances. National unity would be strengthened and we would be better prepared to play our part in the international field.

It is comforting to see the growing importance Canada is assuming among the nations of the world. As stated a few days ago by a Quebec newspaper, L'Action Catholique, one feels something has changed. Yes, many things have changed. Canadianism has become a more and more compelling force, and our country, united within by a common patriotism and by common feelings, is beginning to assert its sovereignty abroad.

This is due to the wisdom of its government and, in particular, to the broad-mindedness and the ability of the great statesman who presides over its destinies.

[Mr. Gauthier (Lake St. John).]

In closing, Mr. Speaker, may I add that in my opinion national unity would be greatly strengthened if every Canadian from coast to coast could fly the same typically Canadian flag.

(Text):

Mr. H. O. White (Middlesex East): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to take very much of the time of the house tonight, but there are two or three matters I should like to mention. First, I want to support the amendment introduced by the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch). One of the matters I want to deal with is that of the reserve army and our railways. The reserve army enjoys a high priority as far as military goods and supplies are concerned. It is on the reserve army that we can draw to maintain our forces in other parts of the world. On good authority I understand that while many small firms, private industries and companies aid this effort by allowing their employees to take time off to assist in the development of the reserve army, the railways in some instances are discouraging their men from participating in those activities. Therefore I would suggest that the Minister of Transport and the Minister of National Defence get together on this so they will not be pulling one against the other at a time when we need all the men we can possibly get to participate in our defence activities.

When I took part in the throne speech some three weeks ago I mentioned the amounts of money that were available for stemming the tide of communism and for the rehabilitation of Europe and other lands. After the debacle of Iran and the oil negotiations there we find that the premier comes to America and we pat him on the back and say: "You are a good boy." He is lent $9 million from the international monetary fund and told; "You have been a bad boy; go home and sin no more." That seems to me to be a very nice way of rewarding a certain amount of international brigandage.

Then we were more or less shocked, then reassured, and today again alarmed about the developments in Europe and the alleged commitment of Canadian funds for the building of airports and barracks in Europe. Whether it is right or wrong I am not going to say, but I want to point out first that we have all these hundreds of millions of dollars to do these things, yet our young people in Canada are not able to establish themselves on the land or in business. We have money to pour out all over Europe and Asia for these questionable purposes, and the defence of Europe. With all the people they have available there I should think they could do some of the work themselves. If we are to supply the men, the planes and the guns to help defend Europe, surely one of the contributions they could make would be to build the airports, the airfields and the barracks in which they are to live.

I noticed in a newspaper article on the recent visit of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) to Rome, his participation in the deliberations of the food and agriculture organization there, and his announcement that he was afraid the agricultural production of the world, and of Canada in particular, was likely to decrease. Part of the reason for that is inflation, and part of it can be laid on the doorstep of the government. We have long since reached the point where we are pricing ourselves out of European markets. They can no longer buy our goods.

Then there was an announcement in the paper a day or two ago that food supplies in the United Kingdom are lower than they were at the height of the submarine menace during the war. We find ourselves short of markets for some fruits and fruit products, yet in Great Britain and elsewhere they are not able to buy them.

I wanted to say that I concur heartily in the views expressed by the hon. member for Calgary East (Mr. Harkness) that the war veterans allowance should have been taken care of at this session. I agree, too, with the suggestion he made that if the measure is introduced at the next session it should be made retroactive. I must say that I receive great numbers of letters from men who are receiving war veterans allowances, telling me of their plight in trying to make ends meet on this inadequate allowance.

In the news broadcast at eight o'clock in the morning, November 14, it was reported that the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), in reply to an inquiry regarding Great Britain's worsening monetary and trade situation, had said that there was a good market in Great Britain for Canadian goods. In view of the serious situation in that country, I must say he certainly was optimistic.

There are two further items I wish to bring to the attention of the house. One is a paragraph in a letter over the signature of the clerk of the city of London with regard to proof of age for old age pensioners. He points out that the council of London passed a resolution stating in part:

> Therefore be it resolved that the dominion and provincial governments be respectfully urged to establish, in county seats and in all cities, bureaux to enable applicants for old age pensions to present evidence for the purpose of establishing date of birth, and that consideration be given to the advisability of appointing a local authority, such as a city or county clerk or city or county welfare administrator, with the powers of a commissioner for the issuance and certification of proof of age documents, and further, that a copy of this resolution be forwarded to the local members, and to the Ontario municipal association, with the request for their support.

I believe there is considerable merit in that resolution, and I hope the government will give it serious consideration.

Then I have in my hand a chart issued by the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys, showing the set-up of that department. If all departments of government would issue these in loose-leaf form so they could be brought up to date from time to time, they would be most helpful to members of the house when they wish to get in touch with various individuals in departments, as they must do from time to time.

On motion of Mr. Poulin the debate was adjourned.

KOREA

REPORTED ARRANGEMENTS FOR A CEASE-FIRE

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, if I might have the unanimous consent of the house, I should like to revert to motions so that I may discharge a promise I made to the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) to communicate to the house, as soon as I got it, any information obtained from the unified command of the United Nations with respect to cease-fire negotiations in Korea.

The information I have received is that the sub-delegations of the United Nations and enemy delegations meeting at Panmunjom have agreed on the line of contact between the United Nations and enemy forces for the 145 miles across the peninsula of Korea, and have thereby established the description of a neutral buffer zone which would extend two kilometers in depth from this contact line on either side, and from which both sides will withdraw if an armistice is signed within thirty days. It was expected when this dispatch was sent to us that at a meeting which was to take place at Panmunjom at eleven o'clock Tuesday, their time, which corresponds with nine o'clock p.m. eastern standard time today, the full delegations would approve the findings of the sub-delegations.

However, before a cease-fire can take effect it will be necessary for the full delegations to concur on arrangements for inspection to ensure that the truce is being observed, and to care for the exchange of prisoners of war. There is a third remaining outstanding item on "recommendations to the governments concerned on both sides", which has not yet been explored. And it is only when agreement on all three of these outstanding points has been reached that it will be possible for a cease-fire to take official effect.

The sub-delegations were to meet at eight o'clock eastern standard time to complete their report for the full delegations of the two sides. The full delegations are probably in session at the present time. They were called to meet at what would correspond to nine o'clock eastern standard time today; and it is assumed that they are now in conference dealing with this line of demarcation which has been set out on the plans, and with the explanatory notes.

It was expected that they would ratify this line of demarcation. The arrangement with respect to it signed on November 23 provided that when the cease-fire became operative, each side would withdraw two kilometers in depth from this line of demarcation, and that that would be the line of demarcation if the other items were agreed upon within thirty days from the ratification of the line of demarcation.

If they did not agree within thirty days they would nevertheless continue their negotiation of these other points; and when they had arrived at agreement upon them, the sub-delegations would revise the line of demarcation in conformity with what might then be the point of contact between the opposing forces.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): May I ask the Prime Minister if he has any comment to make on another point made this afternoon by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, namely as to the possibility of there being a minimum of actual warfare during the period between now and the effective date of the proposed truce?

Mr. St. Laurent: There is nothing in the dispatches bearing upon that. That would evidently be something that would be determined in the field by the local commanders of the opposing forces.

Mr. Knowles: And may I ask one further question. The Prime Minister referred to a third subject, namely outstanding matters of concern to the various governments. Is Canada one of the governments concerned, in view of our participation? If so, does the Prime Minister know what the matters are?

Mr. St. Laurent: There is a third remaining outstanding item on "recommendations to the governments concerned on both sides." I assume that the recommendations would be made through the unified command to all the governments having forces participating in the actions of the United Nations.

Mr. Knowles: So we are one of those governments concerned?

Mr. St. Laurent: It is my understanding that we are one of those governments concerned to whom this cease-fire committee would be making recommendations.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Tomorrow we will move second reading of Bill No. 25, to provide for the financial administration of the government of Canada, the audit of the public accounts and the financial control of crown corporations. This bill is being referred to the committee on public accounts. Next we will consider railway legislation, and as the first item the resolution in the name of the Minister of Transport, No. 8 on today's order paper; and three bills reported from the committee: Bill No. 12, to amend the Railway Act; Bill No. 6, to amend the Canadian National-Canadian Pacific Act, 1933 and Bill No. 7, to amend the Maritime Freight Rates Act. If we have time we would proceed with Bill No. 8, to amend the North Fraser Harbour Commissioners Act.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to the order of the house passed on November 2, 1951.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, November 27, 1951

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

ITALY—PO RIVER FLOOD—ASSISTANCE FROM CANADA

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I now have some further information to give to the house on the question of relief to the stricken people of the Po valley in Italy. This will supplement what I said to the house yesterday afternoon.

Perhaps hon. members will have noticed in the news this morning that the Canadian Red Cross Society in addition to supplies from a stockpile in Geneva is contributing $15,000 worth of supplies from Canada. These supplies are taking the form of blankets, woollen underwear, shoes, powdered milk and medicines. The society has approached the government with the request that we facilitate the transport of this material to Europe.

I am glad to inform the house that the government has today placed at the disposal of the Canadian Red Cross Society two North Star aircraft. These aircraft will deliver the material to some airport in Europe which has not yet been designated. Through arrangements made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) and the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton), both of whom are in Rome attending the meeting of the North Atlantic council, the supreme headquarters allied powers in Europe have undertaken to deliver the material from whatever airport is selected to the actual scene of the disaster.

I know that the house will be unanimous in its appreciation of the expeditious manner in which the Canadian Red Cross is contributing to the relief of the very considerable suffering which, from all reports, is being endured by the people who have been made homeless in the Po valley area. I am sure also that the house will fully approve the decision to help the Red Cross in getting these supplies to the scene of the tragedy by the quickest possible means.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I feel sure that the Prime Minister has correctly interpreted the sentiments of the house, and that all hon. members will welcome the steps that are being taken. We ourselves had occasion to have some understanding of what it means to see positive evidence of sympathy and support at the time of the floods in this country last year. Above and beyond the importance of the articles themselves—and they are extremely important, particularly in a country like Italy where they have not the supplies available that we have—I feel sure that this gesture will give these people heart at a time when they must be suffering in spirit as well as physically.

CAPITAL COST ALLOWANCES

TABLING OF ORDER IN COUNCIL AMENDING REGULATIONS WITH RESPECT TO DEFERMENT

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I desire to place on the table two copies of order in council P.C. 6384, dated November 27, 1951, amending the regulations with respect to deferred capital cost allowances.

The change in the regulations is designed to provide further relief in cases where a genuine commitment has been made before April 11, 1951. Hon. members will recall that on June 28, 1951, I advised this house that partial relief was being granted with respect to properties in existence on April 10, 1951, and acquired by bequest or inheritance, properties transferred between taxpayers who were not dealing at arm's length, and properties taken over when the whole of a business was acquired in a deal at arm's length.

Order in council P.C. 6384 goes further and grants relief in respect of properties in existence, under construction, or under contract, as of April 10, 1951, provided the taxpayer can establish that he had entered into a genuine commitment which he was obligated to abide by.

Briefly, the amendment in order in council P.C. 6384 authorizes the Minister of Trade and Commerce to grant a certificate of eligibility in three types of cases for property acquired after April 10, 1951, for which a commitment had been made before that date.

First, in the case of new structures, properties are eligible provided the taxpayer can prove that he had entered into a contract with a contractor for the construction of a structure before April 11, 1951, according to plans and specifications adopted before that date, and provided that the structure is completed before April 1, 1953. This covers, therefore, the case of a project already under construction on April 10, 1951, and the case where no construction has commenced but a legally binding contract exists between a taxpayer and a contractor, and provided there is available a set of plans and specifications adopted before April 11, 1951, by the taxpayer and forming a part or the full basis of the construction contract entered into between the taxpayer and the contractor.

The certificate will be granted after the property is acquired. One of the tests of a genuine contract in existence on April 10, 1951, will be the fact that the work on the structure will be undertaken and completed within a reasonable time. A period of two years has been considered as a reasonable time in the light of present and foreseeable supply conditions. This explains the provision requiring completion of construction before April 1, 1953. Therefore a taxpayer who has a valid contract as of April 10, 1951, but who has decided to postpone construction for say two years, would not be eligible for a certificate, since the purpose of the amendment is to provide relief to those who not only have a contract but who have also either commenced construction before April 11, 1951, or were obliged to do so, within a short time after that date.

Some new structures are erected by owner builders, that is, without employing a contractor, and in such cases there would be no contract in existence as of April 10, 1951. The amendment to the regulations also grants relief in such cases, provided the taxpayer can prove that construction was commenced prior to April 11, 1951, and completed before April 1, 1953, according to plans and specifications adopted by the applicant prior to April 11, 1951.

The second group of properties covers structures completed before April 11, 1951. In such cases a certificate of eligibility will be granted if the taxpayer can prove that he was obligated to acquire a property under the terms of a contract entered into prior to April 11, 1951. The emphasis is on "obligated to acquire". Therefore an option which gave a potential purchaser a right to acquire property without obligating him to acquire it would not be accepted as a binding contract under the regulations.

The third group covers mainly machinery and equipment, both new and old. In such cases certificates of eligibility will be granted if the applicant can prove that he was obligated to acquire the items involved under the terms of a contract entered into prior to April 11, 1951. There is no date set as to time delivery has to take place, because it has been presented to us that in some cases of complicated pieces of equipment which are made to order and according to specifications set out by the purchaser, the period required to complete the equipment might involve several years. As with regard to structures, a certificate will be issued only after the property has been acquired by the taxpayer.

These amendments will take care of the bulk of genuine commitments made as of April 10, 1951. Thus in the case of a new project where a construction contract had been let and some of the machinery and equipment had been ordered, this part of the project would be eligible for a certificate provided the various conditions as set out in order in council P.C. 6384 were fulfilled. Not eligible would be the machinery and equipment ordered after April 10, 1951, or any substantial changes in or additions to the structure beyond what had been provided in the plans and specifications drawn up and adopted by the taxpayer before April 11, 1951. As I remarked to this house on June 28, we may not be able to take care of everything for which a taxpayer could make a case for relief, but we have gone a long way to grant relief where the taxpayer had no option but to carry out commitments made before April 11, 1951.

I should like to emphasize that the relief granted under the order in council tabled today applies to industries not otherwise qualified for a certificate of eligibility.

Just before closing, hon. members may be interested in a brief statement about the progress of administering deferred capital cost allowance provisions.

Between April 11, 1951, and November 16, 1951, 928 applications for certificates of eligibility have been received. Of these, 342 have been approved, involving capital expenditures of $269·9 million. Projects approved include properties acquired by defence and defence-supporting industries, under subsection 5 of section 1107 of the income tax regulations, properties acquired by basic industries required for the carrying out of their business as provided for under subsection 6, and properties acquired by bequest or inheritance, properties transferred between taxpayers who were not dealing at arm's length, and properties taken over when the whole of a business was acquired in a deal at arm's length, as provided for under subsection 8.

Certificates have been denied for 175 applications, involving $27·7 million. The remaining 411 applications are pending, and these include many applications which will probably qualify for the issuance of a certificate under the amended regulations announced today.

Of course the impact of the provisions is not fully reflected in the figures I have given, for two reasons. First, there will be many cases where the taxpayer has not applied for a certificate of eligibility because his project clearly does not comply with the exceptions that can be granted under the regulations. Secondly, there are many cases where businessmen have decided to postpone capital projects and they would therefore have no cause to apply for a certificate.

A list of the cases for which certificates of eligibility have been issued has been published in the Canada Gazette of July 21, 1951, and September 22, 1951, covering all applications approved from April 11, 1951, up to and including September 15, 1951. The names of applicants to whom certificates have been issued since September 15 up to the present will be published shortly in the Canada Gazette.

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): May I ask the minister a question? Notwithstanding the statement the minister has made showing a large percentage of permits that have been granted, does the minister think that the deterrent which was continued in the act of last April has been a very effective one and is effective still?

Mr. Howe: My own opinion is that it has been a very effective deterrent. The amount of new private construction has been materially reduced since this provision came into effect.

Mr. H. A. Hosking (Wellington South): Will the minister tell us whether he has given any consideration to having this four-year period start from the date of April 11, 1951, rather than running for a four-year period from the start of the contract? Many of the larger concerns are speculating whether this will be dropped if conditions change. I wonder whether the minister would be prepared to make a statement regarding the advisability of setting a closing date five years from April 11, 1951, rather than a four-year period from the starting date of the contract?

Mr. Howe: I would be glad to have the statement of my hon. friend examined as it is reported in Hansard, and, after consulting with my officials, I will make a statement.

Inquiries of the Ministry

INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS

CHANGE IN PERSONNEL OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. W. G. Weir (Portage-Neepawa) moved:

That the name of Mr. Bryce be substituted for that of Mr. MacInnis on the select standing committee on industrial relations.

Motion agreed to.

JUDGES ACT

INCREASE IN NUMBER OF COUNTY COURT JUDGES IN BRITISH COLUMBIA

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to present a measure to amend the Judges Act, 1946, to increase the number of county court judges in British Columbia from fourteen to fifteen.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

OLD AGE SECURITY

PROOF OF AGE—QUESTION AS TO USE OF CENSUS RECORDS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. L. O. Breithaupt (Waterloo North): Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day are called I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. My question has to do with proof of age for old age pension applicants, some of whom are having great difficulty in establishing proof of age.

Is the bureau of statistics in a position to assist old age pension applicants to establish their age for the purpose of the act, when other forms of proof of age, such as birth certificates, baptismal certificates and the like, are unavailable? If the bureau is in a position to assist in this connection, would the minister please state the procedure to be adopted by the applicant.

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I believe my parliamentary assistant has been looking into the matter, and I would ask him to give the answer.

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, in answer to the question of the hon. member for Waterloo North I would say that under section 15 of the Statistics Act no individual return and no part of an individual return made for the purpose of the Statistics Act can, without the previous consent in writing of the person making the return, be given or published. However, in cases where the person making a census return completes a form authorizing the dominion statistician to furnish information from the census records as to age in the event that other proof of age is not available, the practice is for the bureau of statistics to supply the information in the census records for purposes of verifying the age as submitted to the old age security and old age assistance administrations.

Applicants for old age security, that is to say those over seventy years of age, who come under the terms of the federal Old Age Security Act, should apply in the usual manner directly to the regional director of old age security in the capital of the province of residence. Those 65 to 69 years of age should apply to the appropriate office in the province of residence charged with the administration of old age assistance.

Hon. members will notice that in no case can information be given except on the request in writing of the applicant. However, forms of request for search for this information as to age are available in the old age security regional offices.

Mr. Gordon Graydon (Peel): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare whether, when the original forms for universal pensions were being formulated, consideration was given to including an authorization by the applicant to search census records.

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, if I understand my hon. friend's question correctly he is asking whether, when we prepared the forms of application, we gave consideration to the further use of census records. My hon. friend will realize I am sure that that could not be done, because the law at that time did not permit our doing so. We have secured legislative authority under the Old Age Security Act.

My hon. friend may be interested to know that the progress of applications, to date, is such that I may say to the house that, from present indications, we expect to arrive by December 31 at a total of some 685,000, which is not very far from the theoretical total of from 695,000 to 700,000, as we estimated. We have since learned that the population of Canada is 13,900,000 instead of 14,200,000; so that it appears that our original estimate was slightly in excess, and likewise the estimate made by the parliamentary committee. As I said a few days ago, there has been no undue difficulty. Rather, very efficient operation is being experienced in connection with the applications received and the processing in connection therewith.

[Mr. McIlraith.]

[Later:]

On the orders of the day:

Mrs. Ellen L. Fairclough (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mrs. Fairclough: I take it that that is for my persistence. I should like to address a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare following the answer made by the parliamentary assistant with reference to dominion bureau of statistics records. Which census records, the 1921 or the 1931, will be accepted by the Department of National Health and Welfare? As the residence requirement is twenty years, will the department accept the 1931 records?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): May I say to the hon. gentleman at once—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Martin: May I say to the hon. gentlemen at once that the reason for the applause when she rose was not her persistence but because of her quite apparent charm. The figure will be 1921 or earlier.

IRRIGATION

SOUTH SASKATCHEWAN RIVER PROJECT—REQUEST FOR REPORT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, has a report been received from the commission looking into the South Saskatchewan river scheme? If so, will it be tabled?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): No report has yet been received, but I can assure the hon. member that just as soon as it is received or available it will be made public.

EDUCATION

GRANTS TO UNIVERSITIES—METHOD OF DISTRIBUTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. R. Knight (Saskatoon): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister a question, arising from an answer tabled yesterday. Will he state the reasons for delay in the arrangements to pay authorized grants to universities; and may we hope that those grants may come soon?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I hope, as does the hon. member, that they can be made soon. The reason it has not yet been done is that we are still in correspondence with the premiers of the Canadian provinces to carry out the recommendation of the royal commission that this grant be apportioned after consultation with the provincial governments, in view of their jurisdiction over educational matters. That correspondence has been in process for several weeks, and I hope we are nearing the point where a preliminary distribution may be made.

I may say we have been considering making a grant that would be perhaps approximately 40 per cent or 50 per cent of what might be expected to be paid, even before we get a final determination as to the exact figures with respect to each province and each institution. We do appreciate that they are anxious to receive this aid, and to make good use of it, as we know they will.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to ask a supplementary question. As I understand it, those payments are to be made direct to the provincial governments, and not direct to the universities.

Mr. St. Laurent: No; if the hon. member will look at the item in the estimates he will see that the grant was one of $7,100,000 to authorize grants to the universities and institutions providing university education. I am afraid we would have some pretty scorching comment in the report of the Auditor General if we did anything different from what is provided in the terms of the vote authorized by parliament.

Mr. Drew: Then do I understand that the payment will be made as a result of direct applications by the universities to the dominion government, or will this be handled through provincial governments?

Mr. St. Laurent: What has been done up to the present time has been to get, as provided by the vote, advice from the Canadian university council, and on that advice a tabulation has been made and has been communicated to each of the provincial governments, with information as to the advice we have received, and with the request to them for their comments as to whether or not it appears to them to be in order.

[Later]:

INQUIRY AS TO REQUEST FOR FEDERAL AID TO GENERAL EDUCATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): May I direct a supplementary question to the Prime Minister? Has the government received from the Winnipeg school board, and perhaps from others, a request that consideration be given to extending federal aid to education generally? Is consideration being given to this question?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I do not know that any such representations have been received. While I have the responsibility as the head of the government I would have to ask my colleagues to join with me in refusing to consider such a request.

ROYAL CANADIAN NAVY

"JOSEPH C. CYR"—DEPORTATION TO THE UNITED STATES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask one of the parliamentary assistants to the Minister of National Defence for a statement concerning the so-called Surgeon Lieutenant Joseph C. Cyr, who served as surgeon with the Royal Canadian Navy in Korean waters, and has now been discharged and deported to the United States under the name Ferdinand Waldo Demara. I should like to know particularly whether he is really someone else again, and what qualifications he has as a surgeon.

Mr. R. O. Campney (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of National Defence): The hon. member was good enough to give me notice of his question a short time ago, but in the intervening time I have not had an opportunity to prepare a statement which might clear up the matter. I shall be glad to take his question as notice.

Mr. Graydon: Consult Dr. McCann.

KOREA

INQUIRY AS TO TREATMENT OF RETURNING VETERANS ON TROOPSHIP "J. P. MARTINEZ"

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. K. Fraser (Peterborough West): May I address a question to the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of National Defence. Has the Department of National Defence investigated the charge appearing in the press of yesterday that Canadian veterans of the Korean war returning to Canada on the troopship J. P. Martinez were allowed only two meals a day—very small ones at that—and were also made to paint the ship?

Mr. R. O. Campney (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of National Defence): I will take the hon. member's question as notice.

Inquiries of the Ministry

WHEAT

MARKETING SITUATION AND AVAILABILITY OF CARS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Lake Centre): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce regarding the wheat marketing situation on the prairies and whether consideration will be given to making available to those farmers who have not as yet marketed the six bushel quota that was fixed originally sufficient cars for the transportation of their wheat. Is the minister in a position to give a general statement regarding the marketing situation and the availability of cars?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): About a week ago a circular went out from the wheat board to the effect that pressure for deliveries at Fort William had ceased and that henceforth priority would be given to congested points that have not been able to deliver their full quota and particularly to the shipment of damp grain. In other words, damp grain would be given priority over dry grain from such points. At the same time the transport controller ordered the railroads to give special priority to points in the province of Saskatchewan where congestion was apparent. From this time on an attempt will be made to correct all situations of the kind referred to by my hon. friend.

Next Monday and Tuesday I am meeting with the wheat board, the transport controller and the board of grain commissioners in Winnipeg for a two-day session to assess the transportation problem for the rest of the year and to lay plans for improving the situation in the best possible way. I hope that after that a more definite program can be announced.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I thank the minister for that statement.

POST OFFICE

INQUIRY AS TO DISPOSITION OF POINTS RAISED BY POSTAL EMPLOYEES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. W. Noseworthy (York South): Will the Postmaster General tell the house what disposition he has made of the eight points raised by the postal employees at their meeting on June 24, 1951, and which he told the house would have to be taken up by the government before an announcement could be made.

Hon. Edouard Rinfret (Postmaster General): I gave the employees' association an answer in writing some time ago, which no doubt the hon. member has seen.

[Mr. Campney.]

NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY

INFRASTRUCTURE AGREEMENT—DIVISION OF ESTIMATED COSTS AND EXPENDITURES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister in the absence of the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson), which he may prefer to treat as a notice. Is the government prepared to table what has been described as the infrastructure agreement which was entered into by the members of the North Atlantic Treaty council in Ottawa in September, or, in the alternative, to furnish details of the total figures of the estimated costs of their joint requirements and the division of that cost among the twelve countries along with the proportion of the expenditures to be borne by each of the twelve nations?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I shall have to take that question as a notice. The hon. member will appreciate that I shall have to communicate with the NATO council because it is understood that any information about their decisions has to be authorized by the council. I shall be glad to make available to the house all the information that can be published.

HOUSING

FINANCING OF HOUSES FOR DEFENCE WORKERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. W. Noseworthy (York South): Will the Minister of Resources and Development tell the house whether the lending institutions have accepted the government policy for financing houses for defence workers which he indicated to the house on November 5 was then under discussion with the lending institutions?

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Resources and Development): Mr. Speaker, the lending institutions are not joining with the government in arrangements for the building of houses for defence workers, but they have agreed to participate in joint loans which are available on the 80 per cent basis announced to the house some time ago.

FINANCIAL ADMINISTRATION

PROVISION FOR CONSOLIDATION AND REVISION OF CERTAIN ACTS, AUDIT OF PUBLIC ACCOUNTS, FINANCIAL CONTROL OF CROWN CORPORATIONS, ETC.

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (for the Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 25, to provide for the financial administration of the government of Canada, the audit of the public accounts and the financial control of crown corporations.

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I think we will all agree that this measure is of great importance. People are inclined to say that finance is dull, but unless we manage our financial affairs pretty well they may become rather exciting before we go very far. People are becoming more tax conscious and one hears quite fervent statements made from time to time in private, even about so genial a person as the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) who is associated with these high taxes.

Broadly speaking, I think this is a measure which we should consider with the greatest care. It is very hard of course to be as realistic in managing the affairs of the public as in managing the affairs of a private business. In the case of the private business there is an acid test facing you every day. You have to be on the right side in respect of your business operations or you will come to an end. You will become bankrupt. That is not true, of course, in the case of the government. I am fond of a remark attributed to the late Sir Wilfrid Laurier when he was in the opposition. The minister of finance of that day was a man who had been the head of a business, and he and Sir Wilfrid were great personal friends. Sir Wilfrid said to the minister of finance: Mr. So and So, I observe that you are very worried about your position. You are worried about matters which are under your charge. You are worried about the position of the public finances. Of course it is right that you should take your work seriously but do not worry too much. Of course when you were in business you had to worry because if you did not show a profit your business would be liquidated, but a government can stand an awful lot of ruin, and I would not worry too much. If you do too badly we will defeat you and come back into power and take over things again ourselves.

No doubt that was a comforting reflection and it reminds us of the different test which exists. After all, no government is bankrupt, no government can fail to pay its way, as long as there is a taxpayer from whom it can take a single dollar more. As long as the taxpayer has money in his pocket the government can take it away from him. Therefore there is that great difference, and it is hard for us to bring the same measure of scrutiny. It is an odd thing to say—perhaps it is because of the huge amounts with which we now deal—but if one reads the debates of thirty, forty, fifty or more years ago, one finds that they took money matters very seriously. I suppose their own affairs were carried on in a small way. I remember reading a budget debate—I have forgotten whether it was Mr. Fielding's budget being criticized by Sir George Foster or vice versa, but at any rate the minister of finance, whoever he was, had produced a very small surplus. It was a matter of a few thousand dollars and the financial critic of that day, using language which we really would not dream of using now, denied that there was any surplus. He said if there was it had been produced by fraud and misrepresentation.

I do not know where the libel laws were. Of course they could not affect him in the House of Commons, but they did let themselves go in those days, and perhaps we are becoming too soft. I do not know how that may be, but at any rate they debated for a whole summer afternoon about these few thousand dollars, and as I say they used words to each other which have now passed out of usage in the house altogether except among some of our brighter spirits who are not really encouraged to let themselves go, as I think perhaps they might. However, as I say, today it is hard for us to concern ourselves about small amounts or even about large amounts. We have come to talk in billions. There is a phrase which has been so often quoted that I quote it now with apology. It has now passed into the language and I quote it without even trying to remember who it was who said it. This phrase—"What's a million?"—has of course passed into the language of this house and we must not suggest that it is the peculiar property of anybody. It is in the air, Mr. Speaker, and we must all perhaps plead a bit guilty to it.

At any rate I come now to consider for a moment one aspect which has become so familiar to us, the matter of surpluses. The gentlemen to whom I have referred argued for a whole summer afternoon about a few thousand dollars. Now we have passed into the hundreds of millions, and indeed I suppose we have passed into an age when I can quite imagine that some of the younger people in the finance department can hardly conceive of a world where there would be deficits instead of surpluses. I was told the other day by a man in the retail trade in a large way that the same thing has happened in business too. He said: You know, in our business some of the younger buyers have had quite a lesson lately. They have found out that it does not always happen that you buy things, mark them up and sell them at a nice profit. They have found out that sometimes you buy things, mark them down and sell them at a loss. He said that it had been very good for them to find that out and that they are setting out now to do better buying and to carry on their business in a better way.

Unless the present boom is going to be different from all other booms, which no sensible man hopes or believes, and is going to go on forever—and of course we should remind ourselves it has always been a characteristic of booms that while they were on people thought they were going to last forever—one day we may find that such a thing as a deficit does exist. Therefore we should welcome this measure, the purpose of which is to try to enable us to carry on our own business better.

I do not propose to take the time of the house to go into a lot of details. I understand this measure will be referred to a committee and I merely wish to raise a few points of principle which I think are important and which I hope will be seriously considered by the committee if and when this measure reaches it.

First of all I should like to say a word about the powers being given to the treasury board. I observe that a good deal of detailed powers are being given to the treasury board, and by and large it would seem to me that is very wise. So far as my research, which has been limited, has gone, I would say that a good many of the powers that are being given to the treasury board are going to relieve the governor in council of details and that it is a wise delegation. However, I think there is one thing which should be borne in mind. In handing powers to the treasury board caution should be exercised in superseding the jurisdiction of other public bodies. That no doubt is a difficult problem, and I shall give one illustration of the kind of thing I have in mind. I observe that section 7, subsection (d), paragraph (i), reads as follows:

> The treasury board may make regulations
> (d) notwithstanding the Civil Service Act,
> (i) authorizing the payment to persons in the public service of compensation or other rewards for inventions or practical suggestions for improvements.

Then there is a further paragraph which speaks about reimbursement for travelling or other expenses. I am not going to pause on that. There are details there which I think could be gone into, but I am just raising this question. Here is what looks like a somewhat important invasion of the powers of the civil service. It may be wise or unwise, but I venture to sound a note of caution there.

I go on now to comment with respect to section 22, again raising the question of powers, although this is a somewhat different power. This is the power of the governor in council. The section reads:

> The governor in council, on the recommendation of the treasury board, whenever he considers it in the public interest, may remit any tax, fee or penalty.

Further on it is provided in the same section that when that is done a statement of each remission of $1,000 or more granted under this section shall be reported to the House of Commons in the public accounts. We all know that things reported in the public accounts come many months afterwards and that it is not as effective a means of reporting as we would like. I take this occasion to raise that as something which I think the committee might very well consider.

I come back again to the treasury board and I refer to section 5 under which the treasury board is to assist in budgeting and other things, and I pause to say just a word about budgeting.

I was interested in reading a book entitled "Financing Canadian Government" by A. E. Buck. He has many interesting things to say, and incidentally I ran across a figure he gave as to the extent of the accuracy of budgeting in Great Britain where, according to him, they arrive at an accuracy of something like 2·5 per cent. I am not going to make a comparison with our own, because the circumstances are somewhat different. But frankly when we consider what has been going on it is hard to believe that our budgeting is dealt with as it should be. Sometimes one finds it hard to understand how serious men can go so far wrong. Sometimes one wonders, after several years of being so wrong, that they would have been able to know how great an error to make in order to be right. It reminds me of the old quip in Punch—one of the many criticisms of the London telephone service. A customer calls up central and says, "What wrong number must I call in order to get London Wall 6677?" It ought to be possible for this government, with these gigantic mistakes which are made year after year, to say we are going to be $500 million wrong or $700 million wrong and correct their estimate accordingly.

At any rate, I would have thought it would have been possible, by guess and by God—no, no, by calculation of past errors—to know how great an error to make. I do not want to press that farther, and I do want to recognize that part of the bad budgeting has been due to increased inflation. What has been often said here before, of course, is that increased inflation is partly due to bad budgeting. We know the argument. If you take much more than you need it sends up prices, which sends up receipts, and you have this spiral going on and on. I repeat what I have said before, that we could stand this better if there was any sign of repentance; but all we have is a continuing sense of self-satisfaction. Perhaps the greatest irritation of all is that we are expected to accept as a complete answer, "Well, we used the money to pay off the debt." I do not suppose anyone thinks they stole the money. You could not do so even if you tried. It is not that we do not want to pay off the debt. Of course, we want to do that; but we do not want to blunder into it, we want to plan it.

I go on to the next section, which is under public stores. On a cursory reading, which was all I had time to do, it would appear as if we were going to have a kind of super-revolving fund. The other day we had a little experience with revolving funds, and the relations between the various government departments seemed rather casual and loose. It was almost a case of the right hand not knowing what the left hand doeth. In this connection I suggest it would be well for the committee to have a close look at these revolving funds.

I should like to say a word about crown corporations. Here we have a real problem because on the one hand we must give adequate power and adequate discretion to those who are carrying on business like any other corporation—Polymer is an example. On the other hand, we must somehow or other retain adequate control in this parliament. It is a curious irony that most of the crown corporations come under the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe). He is a man of many devices. So far as I can see he apparently manages to be both a private ownership man and a convinced public ownership man at the same time, and without any split personality. But after all, there is perhaps quite a simple explanation of that. The contradiction is only superficial, because when he was describing the operations of Polymer in this house on a certain day, the member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), after listening to his very satisfactory report, said to the minister "a pretty good recommendation for public enterprise". The Minister of Trade and Commerce gave an answer which I really think should, in some way or other, be immortalized. He said "This is different. This is my enterprise."

Of course it is natural that under the present Minister of Trade and Commerce these corporations should go on pretty strongly under their own steam. This may raise a question for the future. I often wonder in my own heart whether the Minister of Trade and Commerce could honestly in his heart advocate that such wide powers as he has had should be given to anyone else. I would think he would have grave doubts about that. However that may be, there they are. They have been very unusual, and I think this may well raise a question in the future.

One other question which arises in connection with crown corporations is the question of the relationship of the Auditor General to their operations. Section 77 says that the Auditor General is "eligible" to be appointed the auditor or a joint auditor of a crown corporation. Actually, he may be eligible; he may have passed the qualifying round, but he has not very often won a prize because he has not been very popular as auditor to crown corporations. I have the names of some, which I am going to mention, for whom he is not the auditor. I am not willing to press this point unduly because there may be certain cases where, by reason of the size of the corporation and the ramifications of its operations, the Auditor General might have to enlarge his staff to do one particular job, and that would throw him out of balance. I am not dogmatizing on this, I am just raising the point. When I find companies like the Industrial Development Bank and the board recently set up under the Agricultural Products Marketing Act are not put under the Auditor General's supervision, I think it is a matter the committee should investigate. I believe the committee should be thoroughly satisfied as to what the policy is, and the reasons for it.

I want to say a word, and I think this will be my last point, about part VI of the act which deals with the whole manner of setting up the public accounts. Looking back, it is not possible to reach any other conclusion than that our method of dealing with our public accounts was like Topsy and just "grow'd". It was not according to a plan but was compromise piled on compromise. I know I am correct in saying that more than once in this house the Minister of Trade and Commerce has remarked about our method of public accounting. I am not quoting now, but I think it is a fair interpretation to say that he expressed the opinion that our method of public accounting is not like that of any private corporation, that we just take nearly everything that comes in and call that income, and we call everything that goes out expenditures. We do not take the trouble to distinguish between what is truly capital and what is truly income.

An ex-minister of finance used a somewhat different phrase when he called it the bridge score method of accounting with so much below and so much above the line. I do not want anyone to cross-examine me on what that means, because when I play bridge it causes a panic and therefore I do not play. I am merely quoting from an ex-minister of finance.

I just want to say a word about this capital and revenue being tossed in together. In the early days of confederation there was a plausible phrase, "capital expenditure" which got them out of a whole lot of trouble. When there was a depression the finance ministers were inclined to make really quite unwarrantable charges to capital expenditure. Indeed one finance minister is reported to have swollen his revenues and reduced his outlays by judicious use of this phrase "capital expenditure". For example, railway subsidies were for a long time regularly charged to capital account.

We have made improvements since that time, but I am going to add a query in a moment or two because, as I understand it, there is nothing that I can discover in this legislation which really suggests any change in principle as to our method of keeping our accounts. I am somewhat surprised and disappointed that that is so. I am not overlooking the fact that there have been certain changes of technique which I think indicate more clearly what is capital and what is revenue. But nevertheless my understanding and information is that when we say that Canada has a surplus or deficit of so much, that is arrived at by pouring into one pot indiscriminately capital and revenue items of income; and the same is true with respect to the outgo. To me that seems to be an extremely unfortunate situation. It may be that the difficulties of making a change are almost overwhelming but it seems to me, to put it mildly, to be extremely unfortunate.

I also want to indicate that the Auditor General has certain questions to raise about that matter. I wish to read briefly from what he said in 1949 and again in 1950. From 1949 I will read first of all paragraph 1 and next paragraph 3 of his report. Paragraph 1:

> In 1947 the public accounts committee recommended that the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act, 1931, be revised to the end that present day operations are suitably regulated. A needed improvement, for example, is that a statement of assets and liabilities incorporate those of corporate bodies as well as those of the government. The present balance sheet may not be regarded as presenting complete disclosure of the situation.

I read further from section 3 in which he gave more details. After referring to certain improvements he said:

> Desirable as are the improvements made, they may not be regarded as more than steps towards recasting the balance sheet to the end that it portrays, in summarized form, the year-end financial position. To illustrate, the statement does not take notice of assets and liabilities of the custodian of enemy property; nor does it reflect all cash and securities holdings of corporate instrumentalities. For example, the national harbours board held $25,600,000 of securities at the year-end and the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation had over $1,500,000; neither of these totals is included in the schedule of current assets.

I could read further in this section but it is not necessary. That will show the point which the Auditor General makes. I wish to read one short section from his report of 1950. It is paragraph 79:

> There is need for statutory definitions of "liabilities" and "assets" for the purpose of (c).

And (c) is as follows:

> Such other accounts and matters as are required to show what the liabilities and assets of Canada are at the date of such statement.

To continue:

> From the accounting viewpoint, it is inconsistent to ignore, for example, inventories of consumable stores, accounts receivable and moneys held in various corporate and other special accounts, while various non-current loans are treated as assets up to their face value. So far as the liabilities of the government are concerned, the correctness of balances in various liability accounts is not established.

If a statement of that kind were made about the accounts of a private corporation, probably somebody would go to jail for it. But we must not allow ourselves to get excited about that, because we must recognize the different background. Nevertheless, these are important matters brought to our attention by our own special financial guide, philosopher and friend, you might say. I refer to the Auditor General, who represents this house, who is independent of the government and who brings these serious matters to our attention. I hope that these matters will be given by the committee the serious consideration which they deserve.

As I said at the outset, we should not assume that we are going on forever to have surpluses which are easy to come by. We should assume that our affairs need to be managed in the best possible manner at all times. Indeed, we need not look to the future. We can see it this very week. It has often been said—I heard it said in this house yesterday; and when the parliamentary assistant says it, from the point of view that he is making the statement, it is perfectly correct to say it—that our troubles are caused by an excess of money. That statement sounds terribly ironical to all people who do not find that they have any excess of money. Of course the difficulty of it all is that when you have the stream of money growing, it does not fertilize every family to the same extent. Therefore the inequalities become greater and greater; and therefore the irony of being told that there is too much money is, to the large percentage of the population, a bitter one.

Without enlarging further on that at the moment, I just come back and say that this matter is of great importance. I hope the committee will treat it so; and in particular I hope the committee, the public—so far as one's words can reach them—and those particularly who concern themselves in these matters, will searchingly ask whether the time has not now come when we are going to approach as nearly as possible to the situation which the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) has often told us we are not in, namely that of having a business-like balance sheet. We may as well face the fact.

It has been pointed out to us that this act has been on the statute books for a long time. The one that we pass today is likely to stay on the statute books for a long time. For that reason among others I hope that the committee will do a serious job. Incidentally I hope that there will not be any rush. I hope that the committee will not be cut off with sort of short notice before its work can be done. Even if this work had to go over to the next session, it seems to me that it is a matter of sufficient importance to warrant it.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, the debate on this measure is not likely to be put into book form and be published as a thrilling best seller. But as the previous speaker has indicated, the measure deals with an important subject. As has been pointed out on previous occasions, it deals with the whole question of the control of governmental finances, and it deals with the question of parliamentary control over the government so far as its financial operations are concerned. When one realizes the scope of the bill, going into that field as it does, he cannot but recognize that it is an exceedingly important measure.

I submit that it has always been a matter of great importance to any democratic country that the finances of the government should be on a proper basis and under strict parliamentary control. I submit further that the need for complete parliamentary control and the need for confidence on the part of the people that financial matters are being handled properly will increase as time goes on. One of the reasons that I believe that need will increase is that, as I see it, the part that governments will play in the financial and economic affairs of our country will continue to increase with the passing of the years.

There are those in this house who want that to come. Some of us feel that it is a part of the democratic process; that the whole of our financial and economic life is something over which the people should have more and more control in the name of democracy. There are others in this house who do not particularly desire that we move in that direction, but even they admit that we are doing so and the likelihood is that federal budgets will be larger in the years that lie ahead than they are now, and as we contemplate that fact it does make it imperative that we plan our financial administration on the best possible basis.

As a government we are getting more and more into economic fields. We are getting into various branches of production; we are extending our part in the field of social security and we are being called upon as a federal government to concern ourselves with the economic and financial needs of our people in many ways. In fact, if I may say so in passing, despite the off-the-cuff answer that the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) gave me on the orders of the day this afternoon, I submit that the day will come when the federal government will have to pay more attention to the needs of education generally throughout the country. There is no question but that that could be done without infringing upon the provincial jurisdiction over education, and I submit that the day of federal financial aid to education will come, for come it must.

With such thoughts in mind I emphasize the need for the best possible control over governmental finances. That means that there must be ways and means of achieving economy in a huge set-up such as this. It also means that our statutory provisions for appropriating and expending money, as well as accounting for it, must be very complete. The government of Canada has had many years of experience in this field, and it has had the advice of able men in the Department of Finance and the Auditor General. Thus it is no surprise that there has been placed before parliament at this time a bill that does seem to be an improvement on the legislation that we have had in the past. I welcome the bill, and I am glad too that it is going to be presented to a committee, the committee on public accounts, to deal with. I support the suggestion just made by the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) that that committee should not be rushed. Frankly, I do not know when it is going to get time and where it is going to get the necessary staff to do any of this work at this session, in view of the large number of committees now meeting almost every morning and every afternoon. At any rate, I hope that it will be given sufficient time, whether at this session or at the session that begins in 1952, to do a complete and proper job on this very important measure.

I have already had the opportunity, Mr. Speaker, to say things in connection with this bill on two or three different occasions, and it is not my purpose today to repeat any of the things that I said on those previous occasions, or to go into the matters that I have already discussed. Indeed, the more I look at this bill the more I realize the wide number of subjects that come under its provisions. In passing, however, I would like to say that I certainly pricked up my ears when the hon. member for Greenwood began to refer to section 7 of the bill. The reason I did prick up my ears was that on a previous occasion I had expressed approval of this new section 7, because it makes possible the introduction of a suggestion system into our civil service such as the one that is in operation in the United States. When we were at an earlier stage of this debate I placed upon the record statements and certain tables showing the tremendous monetary savings that have been effected in the United States because of the use of the suggestion system, which has been in effect down there for the last four or five years. I earnestly hope that that system, or one like it, will be put into operation in this country. However, I must say to the hon. member for Greenwood that as he dealt with section 7 I realized that he was not speaking unfavourably of that part of section 7; rather, he was concerned with the latter part which has to do with payment of travelling expenses to civil servants notwithstanding the provisions of the Civil Service Act. The point is that he glossed over section 7, (d), (i), and I hope it is significant that he glossed over it. I hope it means that he supports the type of suggestion that I have been making which, in the United States, has resulted in the saving of many millions of dollars during the past few years.

However, Mr. Speaker, as I said a moment ago, it was not my intention on this occasion to say anything more about aspects of this whole question on which I have spoken at earlier stages. Rather, there is yet another phase of our financial administration about which I should like to say something at this time. It arises, as did some of the other comments that I have made earlier, out of the fact that the Auditor General across the years has made a number of suggestions. I am quite ready to say that the government has accepted some of these suggestions and has incorporated some of them in the bill now before us.

I would point out, indeed, that one of the suggestions made by the Auditor General, to which I called attention only last week, is implemented in part by a notice of motion in the name of the Secretary of State (Mr. Bradley), which is in Votes and Proceedings for yesterday. It is a notice to the effect that a bill is to be brought in amending the Civil Service Act with respect to the salaries of the civil service commissioners. For many years the salaries of the civil service commissioners have been made up in two parts: part (a) the amount set out in the statute and part (b) an item voted in the estimates year after year. The Auditor General has commented on that several times, and has suggested that vote texts that legislate are not desirable on a long-term basis. I have suggested on several occasions that that proposal of the Auditor General should be implemented by the government. The case of the civil service commissioners is but one example of that type of thing. I am glad to see that that change is being made, and I hope the government will go on implementing that suggestion of the Auditor General; that it will go through the estimates page by page and pick out all the items that are vote texts that legislate and which have been in there year after year and put them on a proper statutory basis, as the Auditor General has suggested.

The particular question that I want to speak about today is one that is a little awkward to deal with because it does concern some of the members of this house, namely, cabinet ministers; but it too has been the subject of comment by the Auditor General in some of his reports, and also in a letter which I have on my desk, which I received from him some time ago in answer to a letter that I wrote him. To describe it in technical language, the Auditor General frowns upon items that have a continuing effect, items in the Appropriation Act of any one year, on the basis of which payments are made in succeeding years as though they were statutory.

I must say that from my study of the matter it seems it cannot be said that such payments are illegal. That seems to be quite clear, but it is also clear—and so the Auditor General says—that it is hardly a desirable practice, and he makes a suggestion as to another way in which this matter could be handled.

The best way to deal with this is to tell the story, and to show how it works out in the case of the allowances paid to cabinet ministers for their cars. It so happens that back prior to 1931 instead of cabinet ministers getting the allowances they now get, they were provided with cars and chauffeurs. It appears that in 1931 Mr. Bennett, the then prime minister, as one of the economy measures he was putting into effect, decided that the providing of individual cars and chauffeurs to cabinet ministers should be done away with, and that in its place there should be provision of an annual allowance of $2,000. That was done by an item in the estimates for the year 1931, as set out in item 352 in the Appropriation Act, No. 5, 1931, which is chapter 61 of the statutes of that year.

Perhaps I should put this item on record so that the story will be complete. Item 352 of that year reads as follows:

> To provide for payment annually from the consolidated revenue fund of a sum of $2,000 to each minister of the crown charged with the administration of a department, the solicitor general, and the leader of the opposition, and the sum of $1,000 each to the Speaker of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Commons, in lieu of motor cars and their maintenance, including chauffeurs, the acceptance of such sums not to vacate their respective seats in parliament; and to authorize the governor in council to appoint any person now employed in the public service as a chauffeur of a passenger automobile at Ottawa, whose position is abolished, to a vacant position in the public service, provided such chauffeur has been continuously employed as such for at least two years and that the appointment will be made at no higher remuneration than he is now receiving, $42,000.

What puzzled me, when I first learned about this, was that there has been in the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act all along, and there has been carried forward into the financial administration act now before us, provisions which seem to me to make it impossible for continuing payments like that to be made.

There is in section 32 of the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act the following provision:

> Balances of appropriations which remain unexpended at the end of a fiscal year shall lapse and be written off . . .

That same provision is being carried forward, although in somewhat expanded wording, as section 35 in the bill now before us.

Then, as section 23 of the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act, we find this provision:

> All estimates of expenditures submitted to parliament shall be for the services coming in course of payment during the fiscal year.

And that same section is being carried forward as section 25 of the present bill. My feeling, as I studied this matter, was that it looks to me as though the estimates for any year must, by virtue of the section I have just read, be for moneys to be spent in that fiscal year, and that fiscal year only. It looks also from the section I read a moment ago as though any money remaining unexpended by the end of the year must lapse.

On the basis of this I have found it difficult to understand how that appropriation of $42,000 in 1931 could be the basis of continuing payments of $38,000, $40,000 or $44,000 a year, across the years, as has been done. I still cannot understand it. In all fairness I must admit that the Auditor General sees nothing illegal about it, and I understand the Department of Justice has gone into the matter.

The important point is that, in the estimates as we get them each year, motor car allowances to cabinet ministers are included with their salaries. They are not set out separately as items of $10,000 for salary and $2,000 for car allowance, but rather they are included together as $12,000, with the letter "S" appearing in the margin indicating that these amounts are statutory. There is no question about the $10,000 salary being statutory, because provision for that salary is made in an act of parliament passed in the usual manner. But the so-called statutory basis for the $2,000 is not found in any act stating that every cabinet minister shall receive this $2,000 every year, but rather is found as an item in the estimates for one year, a year long since passed, namely 1931; and the money voted for that year was expended long ago.

That is the way I feel about it, namely that it should not be paid on the basis of an estimate at all, but rather that it should be put into a statute, perhaps the Senate and House of Commons Act, or into the various statutes making provision for departments of government and for the salaries of cabinet ministers.

My contention is that, just as the Secretary of State (Mr. Bradley) has now given notice of a bill to clean up the confusion with respect to the salaries of the civil service commissioners, and just as other matters along that line which the Auditor General has suggested from time to time, are in process of being cleaned up, so the government should come along and clean this up, too. It should not go on year after year putting the letter "S" opposite this sum of money, because it cannot be pointed out to us in any statute that there is such a permanent or statutory provision as that letter "S" is supposed to indicate.

I know this matter has presented itself to the Prime Minister as a problem, because the last time new departments were created—that was in the fall of 1949—the question came up. On that occasion I asked him some questions, and his reply was that the problem had presented itself to him and he had been informed that no provision for ministerial car allowances was necessary in the statutes setting up these new departments, because it was paid on the basis of this item in the estimates for 1931.

There was an exchange of views in the fall of 1949, and I made some further remarks on December 10 of that year, as they are set out at pages 3122 and 3123 of Hansard. Then after that I wrote to the Auditor General in the matter, because, as has been pointed out repeatedly, he is the servant of parliament, and each and every one of us has the right to take up with him any matter about which we may be concerned. In turn it is of course his obligation to answer any letters we submit to him.

I drew his attention to this whole question, and to the discussion we had had in the house. Mr. Sellar replied to me in a letter of December 14, 1949, of which I shall read a part:

Dear Mr. Knowles:

Replying to your letter of the 12th, may I say at the outset that perhaps I am not the best person to interpret vote 352 of 1931, because I drafted it.

That was the interesting comment with which Mr. Sellar began his letter. Then he proceeded to say:

I was then assistant deputy minister of finance, and as there was then no deputy minister in office, I was responsible for the routine in connection with the estimates book. The instructions were to prepare a "continuing" item and have the text approved by the then deputy minister of justice.

Apparently that was done, and the wording of that item was in the form I have already quoted from the Appropriation Act, No. 5, 1931. While what follows in this paragraph of the letter does not bear strictly on the point I raised, it indicates the way in which these items in the estimates can be used in a legislative way to provide something that was never intended. Please note that this is a letter from the man who drafted the item in question, and this is what he says:

Frankly I was surprised when, some years later, it was ruled that the latter part of the text provided authority to appoint one of the chauffeurs who, in the interval, had served as the private chauffeur of the then prime minister, Mr. Bennett. I was in sympathy with the appointment, but had assumed continuity of employment was an implied condition of the text.

The idea of the original item was that all the chauffeurs who were then driving ministers' cars, provided they had been employed for a certain length of time, were to be transferred to some other jobs in the government service. But it turned out that a man who was not so employed at the time, but who later became a chauffeur to Mr. Bennett, at a still later date was given another appointment on the basis of this item. The wording of the item seemed to be clear. The very man who drafted it expresses amazement at the use that was made of it. I mention this because it indicates the importance of careful drafting of items in the estimates and the obligation that rests upon the government not to take advantage of the wording that may be there or of the rulings which the Department of Justice may give. That is the plea I make with reference to this $2,000. I suggest that the government should not take advantage of the rulings that have been given that it is legal. The fact of the matter is that it has never been written into a permanent statute and I think it should be brought out into the open and dealt with. Let me go on and quote further from Mr. Sellar's letter where he says:

On several occasions I have expressed the opinion to the public accounts committee that legislating by the Appropriation Act has undesirable characteristics,—

That is the whole point of what I am talking about at this stage, that legislating by means of the appropriation acts has undesirable characteristics.

—and in the report of this office to the House of Commons a year ago I drew attention to the situation. See paras. 39-42 of the attached marked copy.

Mr. Sellar was referring to a copy of the Auditor General's report for 1947-48 which he sent to me with his letter. He goes on to say that more recently he had been informed that he might be called before the Senate and had prepared a memorandum. He sent me some portions of that memorandum which he expected to present to the Senate. Time has moved on since and he has appeared, not only before the Senate but before the public accounts committee of this house. All that was in that memorandum is now out in the open. Mr. Sellar goes on to say:

I assume from the discussion in the house that you are exploring the matter with the deputy minister of justice, therefore I will not discuss the question from the legal angle.

In other words, I have to say quite frankly, Mr. Sellar does not question the legality of this money being paid out, but he goes on to say, and this is important to us when we are discussing the whole financial set-up of the government and parliamentary control:

My official interest is that of preserving parliamentary control over the public purse.

I am sure that the parliamentary assistant will agree with me that that is the pith and substance of the bill now before us, the necessity of maintaining parliamentary control over the public purse. Mr. Sellar continues:

For that reason, I entertain the view that much may be said in favour of annual appropriation acts segregating such votes and including a section providing for the expiration of the act on the 30th April.

One must realize that the Auditor General was writing to a private member of the House of Commons which means that he would be guarded and careful in what he said. That makes what he said most significant. In our correspondence the Auditor General and I were discussing the way in which this $2,000 item appears in the estimates. He says that his official interest is that of preserving parliamentary control over the public purse and for that reason he entertains the view that much may be said in favour of annual appropriation acts segregating such votes and including a section providing for the expiration of the act at the end of the fiscal year. If that were done it would mean that this whole business of a continuing item, of legislating for all time by including an item in the estimates of one year, would be done away with. We were discussing the principle of the $2,000. I contend that it was wrong in the first place to arrange for that payment for all time by having an item in the estimates of one year and then thereafter trying to tell us that that is statutory and therefore we cannot discuss it.

The Auditor General dealt with it, not only in his letter to me in the way in which I have quoted, but in his report for 1947-48, a copy of which he sent to me with his letter. In fact paragraphs 39 to 42 of that report constitute a subsection under the heading "legislating by appropriation acts". Paragraph 39 reads:

Since this office was established seventy years ago attention has, from time to time, been drawn to problems associated with legislating by means of token items in annual appropriation acts. For example, the procedure by-passes normal parliamentary safeguards against hasty decision with respect to public expenditure.

That is the whole point I am making.

Further, the practice tends to disturb constitutional usages with respect to money bills—both within the House of Commons and in relationships between the Senate and the house. An ancillary characteristic is that the practice presents difficulties to searchers for the authority for payments.

Even the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) had difficulty in finding the authority for the $2,000 when bills were brought in two years ago setting up certain new departments. He was advised, but he did not know offhand where that authority was to be found.

Paragraph 40 is under the same heading but it deals with another subject; it relates to vote 586 in the estimates of that year which had to do with government annuities. The Auditor General pointed out that the effect of vote 586 seemed to be legislative in character rather than the appropriation of one dollar, which happened to be the amount of the item.

Paragraph 41 reads:

Moneys granted by an appropriation act lapse at the year-end—

I have quoted the section in the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act and I have referred to the section in the bill now before us which makes that provision.

—but the act itself does not expire.

That is the anomaly which underlies the whole problem; the money expires but the act, once having been passed by parliament, is on the statute books for all time.

Consequently, when an item is so worded as to make future expenditures a charge to unappropriated moneys in the consolidated revenue fund,—

That is apparently the way that item 352 in 1931 was worded; it was an item appropriating $42,000 for that year but it was so worded as to make future expenditures a charge to unappropriated moneys in the consolidated revenue fund.

—authority exists to make payments in subsequent years without further grant by parliament.

That may be legal, but I suggest that it is wrong in principle. It violates the precept that there should be parliamentary control over the expenditure of money. Mr. Sellar is really spelling this out most carefully despite the reserve and the guarded language of an Auditor General when he says that the procedure by-passes normal parliamentary safeguards, and when he says in his letter to me that his interest is that of preserving parliamentary control of the public purse. He goes on to say in paragraph 41:

An illustration is the motorcar allowances to ministers, the Speakers and the leader of the official opposition.

In other words, this is not just something the member for Winnipeg North Centre is bringing up; it is there in black and white in the 1947-48 report of the Auditor General.

These payments became statutory charges by the text of vote 352 of Appropriation Act No, 5, c. 61, statutes 1931. The 1947-48 main estimates included thirty items marked "(S)" because of texts in previous appropriation acts—

That is the notation which appears on the left-hand column of the estimate indicating that the item is statutory and we cannot discuss it.

—22 having an association with vote 352 of 1931.

That means that in that year's estimates there were twenty-two of these items related to that motorcar allowance but there must have been eight others which were marked "statutory" and which had never been dealt with by proper statutes but were simply being paid on the basis of continuing vote that was made in one particular fiscal year. The rest of the paragraph reads as follows:

> Among the "to be voted" items in the same estimates were twenty-seven authorizing payments notwithstanding provisions of various public acts.

I come now to the last paragraph of this section to which the Auditor General drew my attention. Paragraph 42 reads:

> The practice of legislating by appropriation acts has attractions when dealing with special cases or making temporary exceptions from general legislation; but the thought presents itself that it might be a safeguard and a convenience to members were such items listed together in a special schedule and the reasons therefor printed with each item—as is the practice with respect to bills.

I submit that a careful study of these comments made by the Auditor General in his 1947-48 report, a careful study of his letter to me, practically all of which I have now placed on the record, and a careful study of the whole case I have been making will make it clear that, in addition to the necessity of our having a good bill, which is to be called the Financial Administration Act, it is also important for the government to be most meticulous and careful in the way it words its estimates and in the interpretation that it places upon the estimates after they have been dealt with. As I said before, I pay tribute to the government for the way in which they have from time to time tried to clean up a number of these matters by way of implementing suggestions of the Auditor General. I would be the first to admit they could not do it all at once. I am glad to note the progress that has been made. But I suggest that here is one more case where the Auditor General has suggested something that is very important and is particularly germane to the whole question of maintaining parliamentary control over public expenditure, and I hope that something will be done about it at an early date.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): I wish to take a short time to deal with certain aspects of this measure. I appreciate that all sections of the bill will be brought before the public accounts committee. The importance of this legislation is demonstrated by the terms of the definition of the bill itself. It is described as an act to provide for the financial administration of the government of Canada, the audit of the public accounts and the financial control of crown corporations. It is in fact the protection offered to the public that in the handling of moneys taken from the public by taxes there will be appropriate safeguards and that businesslike methods will be employed in the handling of these funds. As was pointed out at the time the resolution preceding the bill was introduced, this is undoubtedly one of the most important pieces of legislation that can come before parliament. If there are not the safeguards which should exist, then they should be introduced as a result of the examination and discussion which takes place.

If there are any ways in which the public business can be improved through this bill then that should be done. It is for that reason that I wish to refer to something that has already been mentioned in the discussion this afternoon but which I should like to emphasize from another point of view. It is quite clear that, no matter how carefully the estimates may be prepared, certain events are always bound to happen which will produce a different result at the end of the year from that which was anticipated. There may be international disturbances. There may be internal events such as vagaries of the weather or other circumstances of that kind which would affect the total amount of revenue and also the total amount of expenditure. Nevertheless, subject to such reasonable explanations as may be made, the estimated surplus or the estimated deficit, as the case may be, should bear some reasonable relationship to the estimates which the minister himself has received from his departmental officials, and they should be a correct interpretation to parliament of what the minister himself expects the net result will be, subject to these unexpected events.

It is not open to the minister to put before parliament one estimate of expected surplus and have in his mind some other. If it could be demonstrated that the minister had in fact placed before parliament an estimate which was not the estimate he had in his own mind, then he would of course be guilty of a very grave abuse of his position as a minister of the crown. For that reason surpluses that go far beyond the estimates placed before the house demand some kind of explanation which has not yet been furnished to the house in this current year. When the committee is dealing with this measure I think it might well consider the introduction of some provisions which will clearly state the responsibility of the minister to present to the house a figure which does in fact interpret his own expectations upon the best possible analysis of the figures which have been placed before him.

It has been pointed out that the present surplus is far beyond anything indicated to this house. In fact if the surplus for the present year continues to accumulate at the rate it has accumulated for the first six months the minister will have guessed wrong by forty times. We are simply told that this after all is good business, that the government will be paying off the public debt. I think that on most occasions it would be agreed that it is a sound thing to pay off debts. What should be remembered by members of parliament, however, is that it is not for the minister to decide whether he will pay off public debts. It is for parliament to decide. If it is the intention of the minister to pay off public debts he should state that to parliament, and parliament, I would imagine, would support him as long as it could be demonstrated that the payment was on a reasonable basis.

If the taxation to be imposed upon the taxpayers of Canada is to include an amount for payment on account of the public debt over and above anything that is actually indicated in the estimates themselves, then the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) is taking it upon himself to do something that he thinks is good but which he has not disclosed to parliament. That is not responsible government. That does not accept the authority of parliament over money, and that is the highest responsibility parliament has. There may be a question as to how much of the public debt should be paid off at any time. There are those who contend, and apparently with some sound arguments to support their contention, that, if too large payments are made at a time like this on account of the public debt, instead of being deflationary it may be highly inflationary. Undoubtedly there would be some point at which that would be true. Surely it would be the responsibility of parliament to be in a position to express some opinion on that subject, if it is the intention of the Minister of Finance to go far beyond anything indicated in the budget he has presented. Here we have a situation where the Minister of Finance has been so grossly and outrageously in error—I say "outrageously" having regard to his responsibility to parliament. He estimated a total surplus of $30 million for the whole year and there is already a surplus in excess of $600 million for six months, more than forty times the amount that had been estimated on a proportionate basis for the whole year.

Let us see what that means. This is not like a surplus in an ordinary business, because every cent of it is overtaxation. It is an amount of money taken out of the taxpayers' pockets which the Minister of Finance was not authorized to take out of their pockets. It is extremely difficult for any individual taxpayer to measure what $600 million means in terms of his own daily experience. But let us see what it does mean. Accepting fourteen million as the population of Canada at this time, it means that for six months every taxpayer in Canada has been overtaxed to the extent of about $43. Over and above those taxes which the Minister of Finance said he was going to impose, the average taxpayer, every man, woman and child in Canada, is paying $43. I am hardly correct when I use the word "taxpayer", because a child is not a taxpayer, and there are a great many people who pay taxes to a limited extent. Nevertheless, everything which is eaten, everything which is worn, everything which is used includes taxes of some kind, and no Canadian should be under the impression that he is escaping these taxes simply because he does not see a tax marked on the things he buys, or because he may not be called upon to pay income or other direct taxes of that kind.

The way that this can best be appreciated is to take a family of five, which is still the normal family in this country. It means that for the first six months of this year, over and above the taxes disclosed in the budget, the head of a family of five has been overtaxed to the extent of $215. This is not just the amount that has been paid by those in the brackets who pay income tax; it is not just paid by those who pay the visible tax, but that is the average overtaxation for the head of a family of five in this country. I recognize that it may be extremely difficult to introduce into this act a section which will prevent a surplus exceeding in some substantial measure the estimated surplus. This is particularly true when there is a progressive inflation such as we have at this time. Nevertheless, even if the act only had a section declaring that the minister accurately interpret the figures which have been placed before him, there should be something declaring beyond any doubt that it is the duty of the Minister of Finance to present to this house the most accurate estimates possible. I believe if that were there we might not see such grossly inaccurate estimates as we have had this year.

There is one other point I wish to mention concerning the bill now before us, and that is the part which deals with crown corporations. This section, which is a new section of the act, defines crown corporations and also sets forth that it is possible for the Auditor General to be the auditor of crown corporations. Section 76 (c), which is one of the defining sections, gives this interesting definition:

> "Crown corporation" means a corporation that is ultimately accountable, through a minister, to parliament for the conduct of its affairs, and includes the corporations named in schedule B, schedule C and schedule D.

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that that is a slight overstatement. While crown corporations might be ultimately accountable to parliament, they have not been accountable to parliament in a way that has made it possible for parliament to carefully examine the details of the business of those corporations. I do not believe any crown corporation, unless it deals with some secret operation and the statute creating that corporation places it under some terms of secrecy, should be in a position to deny to parliament, through the minister, any and every detail of its operations which affect its business.

We know that on a number of occasions where questions have been asked concerning crown corporations it has been said that this information could not properly be given. There are cases where operations deal with atomic energy in certain of its aspects—I say "in certain of its aspects" advisedly because I do not believe all the activities in relation to atomic energy should be secret. When it becomes an operation which can be used for peaceful purposes, as it is being used now for certain medical activities and where the operation relates to civilian requirements, then I believe the terms of secrecy should be removed. Subject to cases of that kind, and subject to the reservation of secrecy in the act of incorporation of the crown company, I believe that any questions relating to the business, salaries or any other detail concerning the crown corporation, should be available to the members of this house at any time. Otherwise, we can set up a tremendous branch of public business in this country which is not accountable in the ordinary way to members of parliament. I would hope that this part of the act will be reviewed carefully, and that a clearly defined reservation concerning these terms of secrecy may be introduced, so that all the details of the business of a crown corporation set up by the parliament of Canada or under the authority of the parliament of Canada can be brought fully before the members of this house.

Now, I should like to refer back to the overtaxation which has already been seen this year. In explaining to the public accounts committee the way in which the public business of Canada, particularly the financial business of the country, can best be supervised, I suggest that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) give some explanation of where he and his officials went so wrong this year. That information would be helpful in trying to draft sections which might prevent a repetition of that tremendous mistake.

Mr. James Sinclair (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I must inform the house that if the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance speaks now he will close the debate.

Mr. Sinclair: —I intend to make only a few remarks. I think the house is indebted for the comments which have been made by the three speakers on this bill. As all three have pointed out, this is probably the key bill of government, and it is only right that the attention of the house should be drawn to it. I would suggest that not only the members of the public accounts committee who will study this bill item by item but other members of parliament can profitably follow the discussions in that committee and get as good a picture as it is possible to get in this parliament of the function of parliamentary control over expenditures.

I will not comment on the remarks on taxation policy made by the financial critic of the official opposition, the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell). After all, this bill is not concerned with the methods by which money is raised or with the purposes for which parliament votes that money. It is concerned with the methods by which that money, when raised, is received by the government, held in safekeeping and controlled by the government, and the circumstances under which it is paid out in accordance with either legislation or parliamentary appropriation. It is concerned, of course, with both the internal audit by the office of the comptroller of the treasury, and, perhaps most important of all, as the hon. member for Greenwood and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) have pointed out, the audit by our own servant, the Auditor General, to see that these moneys were spent in accordance with the instructions of parliament.

The first point made by the hon. member for Greenwood was on the transfer of certain powers from the governor in council—that is the cabinet in our ordinary phraseology—to the treasury board. This is certainly a step long overdue, as most hon. members will realize when they look through the record of orders in council. I know that it has been extremely popular for opposition members to call this an order in council government. We have passed tens of thousands of them. But when you actually examine the great bulk of those orders in council it will be found that they are concerned with trivial affairs which, back at the turn of the century when the business of the government of Canada was only a fraction of what it is today, may have seemed important but which certainly are not important when compared with other issues which have to be decided by the cabinet today. One which I came across just in the last week or two illustrates, as well as anything can, the type of thing which has now been referred to treasury board rather than to the governor in council for action. Under one of the earlier pension or superannuation schemes here the recipient had the right to either take his pension in instalments or to commute it into a sum. Under the original legislation his decision, if he chose to take it in a sum, had to be confirmed by an order in council. I do not think any of us here today think the cabinet of Canada has so little business that the giving of approval to a man's own decision as to how to take his pension is a matter which should engage their attention. The section referred to by the hon. member will, I think, do a great deal to remove a load of unnecessary trivia from the shoulders of the cabinet.

The hon. member mentioned section 7 (d). I was just thinking of the difference between the opinions expressed on this section by him and by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. But as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre stated, I rather think he was referring to section 7 (d) (i) rather than section 7 (d). It gives authority to encourage employees in the public service to advance constructive ideas on how to effect economies. In this regard I think those of us who are actually in the departments carrying out the daily duties of government are perhaps in a good position to see where savings—perhaps just small ones but nevertheless savings which in the aggregate will be substantial—can be effected. As the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre pointed out in his thoughtful speech on the resolution the other day, such a practice has been useful in the United States.

Mr. Knowles: It is good for morale as well.

Mr. Sinclair: And it is good for morale as well, as the hon. member points out.

Mr. Fraser: It is used in industry.

Mr. Sinclair: It is used in industry, which has found it to be a useful practice. The hon. member at the same time mentioned section 22. Under that section, of course, power to remit taxes or other revenues is not transferred to the treasury board. That is still a matter for decision by the governor in council.

I am sure that the clauses on revolving funds are going to get thorough discussion when they come before the committee. A year ago we had a protracted debate here on the bill of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) establishing the first such a revolving fund. With that discussion under our belts, I think we will be in a better position to understand what is aimed at. I think the principal aim of these provisions for revolving funds is to establish a uniform policy across all departments so that we will understand what is government policy in any department as far as revolving funds are concerned.

The crown corporation section is, I think, undoubtedly the most interesting one and it is also, I think, the section which gave the greatest problems to those who drafted the bill and those senior officials in the various branches of government who were consulted in the drafting. The crown corporations do not fall easily into any one category. This spread which we have between government departments at one end and the companies which are public from the fact that they are owned by the crown but are operated much as a private business corporation, such as Polymer, at the other end, spans the field in crown corporations. Obviously the form of parliamentary control which will be exercised over the crown corporation which is in essence merely an extension of a department of government is entirely different from the control which you would expect to be exercised over what is, in many respects, an independent business operation competing with other privately owned businesses in the same field. That has been the aim of this legislation; and I am sure it will receive careful attention. No doubt when we come before the committee the question of whether or not these various corporations are in their right categories will receive discussion.

The hon. member for Greenwood pointed out this interesting point which I was quite sure some hon. member would raise with respect to section 77, as to the Auditor General's responsibilities in auditing crown corporations. Some years ago as a private member I made a speech on the fact that I thought that the Auditor General should do the work on the C.N.R. I was quite sure that in this debate I would be reminded of that fact. The hon. member for Greenwood came close to it. The actual number of corporations which are not audited today by the Auditor General is small; I think there are four or five all told. The most outstanding of them, of course, are the C.N.R. and the Bank of Canada. The Auditor General entered into all the discussions on this phase, and when we are before the committee one of the points which will be dealt with is the reasons the C.N.R. and the Bank of Canada are not at the moment included in those corporations which shall be subject to the audit of the Auditor General. They are audited by outside auditors at the moment.

An interesting point was raised by the hon. member for Greenwood on the form of the public accounts in classifying what are current and capital revenues and what are current and capital expenditures, and then on the balance sheet, in classifying what are assets and what are liabilities, as compared with what in the ordinary business world would be regarded as revenues and disbursements and what would be regarded as liabilities and assets. That point was a subject of long discussion when we had the Auditor General before us in committee on the form of the public accounts. There is a great literature on the difference between the form of accounting which governments must of necessity follow and that which private business can follow. Perhaps it can be summed up best by the words used by the assistant deputy minister at that time, to the effect that a business in listing assets and liabilities can have in mind the thought: If we were to be wound up and sold tonight, what are the liabilities we must meet and what could we realize? What are our assets actually worth? That is not true, of course, with the government. First of all, to think of winding up the government of Canada, the Dominion of Canada, the country of Canada, overnight and putting on the block the assets which have been paid for since confederation —our canal system, for example, our transportation system, our road systems—and saying what a prospective buyer would pay for them is purely hypothetical, since there would be no buyer for such things. The very difficult question of sorting out what is a current expenditure and what is a capital expenditure is one which has engaged governments on all levels in this country for a long time, and it seems to be more or less a decision of the government of the time with respect to any particular borderline expenditure as to which category they put it in.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) went at some length into the matter of legislation by appropriation, items in the Appropriation Act which have no statute behind them and which might be regarded as money bills in the ordinary sense. As we know, in this house any money bill involving public expenditure has lots of warning. We get a notice of motion. We get a resolution, and we go into committee on the resolution. Only then do we start the first, second and third readings which are given to all other bills. And of course the fact, as was pointed out by the Auditor General, is that when we legislate through items in the Appropriation Act there are no such stages in the consideration given. It is before you once, and there it is. I think it has already been agreed in this house—certainly I recall the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott), when the same member raised this problem a year or two years ago—

Mr. Knowles: Two years ago.

Mr. Sinclair: Yes; and quite recently the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), at the time of the establishment of those two new departments, agreed that in most instances continuing legislation by appropriation was undesirable. There are fields in which this legislation by appropriation is very practicable. To give examples, there were the Fraser river floods, the Winnipeg floods, the Rimouski and Cabano fires. Obviously we are not going to have bills put through to authorize the payment of non-recurring expenditures—at least we hope they are non-recurring.

Mr. Knowles: They were emergencies.

Mr. Sinclair: Yes. There were other instances. I could mention the university grants which were referred to today. In an instance like that there is a need to give help even before a firm policy on legislation has been established; and where in the early stages—that has happened with other forms of legislation—it is necessary to give immediate assistance there is legislation by appropriation. But I think it would certainly be agreed that as these statutes come up for amendment where provision can be made for statutory legislation rather than legislation by appropriation these changes should be made. I am quite sure that the amendments being brought in by the Secretary of State (Mr. Bradley) are along that line.

The point made by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) on the estimates and the extent of the surplus is very interesting. Of course I am not in a position to answer fully. The Minister of Finance will be back early in the week and will be available if desired both for the passage of the bill through the public accounts committee and in the house when the bill is in committee of the whole. I might point out again, though, that in the study which the public accounts committee made of this matter two years ago, when we were studying the form of the estimates, the Auditor General, both from his experience in that post and his previous experience as assistant deputy minister of finance, gave us a great deal of information on the difficulties of forecasting both revenues and expenditures in some fields of government. I recall him saying that in a purely administrative department such as the Department of the Secretary of State he would expect accuracy in estimating expenditures to as close a margin as at least 5 per cent. He pointed out of course that in such a department if toward the end of the year you found that you were going to exceed your estimate you have control by cutting back. At the same time he pointed out how impossible it was to forecast with any similar degree of accuracy expenditures which entailed future events, future decisions, future emergencies which could not be envisaged at the time. Obviously that is certainly true as far as our defence department is concerned. He pointed out, too, the problem of estimating revenue in times of full employment and inflationary pressures, or in times—and this was the experience of course the other way round during the early thirties—of falling employment when there were deflationary pressures in the country, when estimates of revenue were out in the other way, falling far short of expectations.

It is very interesting to recall at this moment that the budgets of both the United States and the United Kingdom, and for that matter in one other country with which I am familiar, namely Belgium, show exactly the same difference, perhaps not quite to the same degree but to a substantial degree between the estimates of expenditures and what actually has been spent, and the estimates of revenue and what actually has been received. The United States forecast quite a large deficit in the budget for this year. Actually I think they are running up about a $7 billion surplus at the moment. The British had a similar experience.

Mr. MacInnis: About the only way you can strike a balance is by estimating for a deficit.

Mr. Sinclair: That is along the lines the hon. member for Greenwood suggested. The one point the leader of the opposition raised which I do question very much is this. He said the minister had no authority to raise such sums. The actual authority given the minister is not to raise any sum, because the expenditures to be met are only an estimate. The authority is given to impose tax rates. It is quite true that tax rates are based on the estimate of what expenditures of the country are to be; but there is no question of the authority given by this parliament to the minister to impose those taxes.

The hon. member's comments on crown corporations were very interesting. Perhaps I touched on them slightly when I was dealing with the remarks of the hon. member for Greenwood. It is quite true that as far as crown corporations are concerned, such as that which controls Chalk River, there is an element of secrecy. On the other hand there is also a measure of—perhaps that is not the word—confidence in the operations of a company like the Canadian National Railways which is in daily competition with the Canadian Pacific Railway. The officials of this company have always felt that to allow their competitors to have full knowledge of all their working conditions and costs when they at the same time cannot receive similar information from the management of the Canadian Pacific Railway would be putting them at a disadvantage. That is one reason, of course, all crown corporations are not given the same treatment. But what this bill does do for the first time is to make all crown corporations now responsible through the appropriate minister to parliament for the tabling of their annual reports and their budgets. As you know, in the past these propriety corporations did not need to report to parliament. Just as long as they were not running in the hole they could go on for years and years without ever coming under parliamentary scrutiny. Polymer again is an example, because it has been a successful corporation. It is only those corporations that do not pile up a surplus but must come back to parliament each year to get either grants or loans of money to make up their deficits that have been subject to annual parliamentary scrutiny. I think most hon. members would like to have a good look at operations of the successful corporations as well as at the unsuccessful corporations, and in that regard I think this bill represents a real step forward. It is perhaps in this feature that this bill is so different from the bill put through the house by Prime Minister Bennett in 1931, because at that time they did not have the problem of what we today refer to as crown corporations. It is true they had the Canadian National Railways, but at that time nobody referred to the Canadian National Railways as a crown corporation.

The last point that I should like to refer to is the reference to rushing. It has never been the intention to have this bill rushed through. We would like every hon. member to have all the answers he wishes to every clause of this bill. When the minister introduced this resolution for the first time last summer he said that the services of every officer of our department who could be of any help to any individual member of the committee to understand the background of any of these clauses were readily available.

I need not of course say to this house that the services of the Auditor General's department are at your command, because the Auditor General is not a branch of the Department of Finance but is a servant of the members of the House of Commons.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I should like to ask one further question. I was not clear as to the exact position regarding what we have described as legislation by estimates. I do recall that on one occasion the Prime Minister indicated that he was opposed to it, and I got the impression that he hoped it would be done away with. I am not clear as to whether there is anything in the bill to deal with that situation, and if not whether any other measure is in prospect.

Mr. Sinclair: Under the treasury board section of the bill there is one section which contains the power to frame estimates, and it is in the estimates themselves where some of these continuing votes are actually listed as statutory. There will be an opportunity to raise the matter in committee, and to check it. The other point raised by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) was that as other bills in which changes should be made come before parliament, for other reasons, it was hoped to make these changes at that time. That was my recollection of the understanding given at that time to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the committee on public accounts.

RAILWAY ACT

AMENDMENT TO INCREASE SALARIES OF CHIEF COMMISSIONER AND OTHER COMMISSIONERS OF TRANSPORT BOARD, ETC.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to provide in the proposed measure to amend the Railway Act, Bill 12 now before the house, that the salaries of the chief commissioner of the transport board and of the other commissioners be increased and that the present chief commissioner be now, and that any subsequent appointee to that office become, on retirement therefrom, an additional puisne judge of the exchequer court.

He said: The object of this resolution is twofold. It seeks, first of all, to increase the salary of the chief commissioner of the board of transport commissioners, and of the other commissioners; and, secondly, to make the chief commissioner a puisne judge of the Exchequer Court of Canada.

[Mr. Sinclair.]

The bill which will follow the resolution contains a provision for an increase in salary of the chief commissioner so that his salary will be equal to that of the president of the Exchequer Court of Canada. The committee on railway legislation did have before it a motion recommending an increase in the salaries of the other commissioners, but the chairman in his report to the house indicated that that motion could not pass because of a constitutional point, unless and until the government had given its approval. The government has done so, and the resolution now before the house is indicative of that fact. So the bill to be founded on the resolution will also have a section providing for increases in the salaries of the other members of the board of transport commissioners.

In so far as the second part of the resolution is concerned, namely that which also makes the chief commissioner a puisne judge of the exchequer court upon his retirement from the position of chief commissioner, I might point out that this is a provision which already existed, in effect, and that the former chief commissioner was also a member of the Exchequer Court of Canada.

With these observations I recommend the resolution to the house.

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): Mr. Speaker, this resolution has a somewhat unusual background. In view of that, and in view of what the resolution seeks, members of the official opposition intend to oppose it.

I must give Your Honour and the house something of the history of the measure. Some weeks ago Bill No. 12 was introduced, designed to amend the Railway Act. In one of the sections provision was made for increasing the salary of the chief commissioner of the board of transport commissioners to equal the salary paid to the president of the exchequer court. In due course Bill No. 12 was referred to the special committee on railway legislation; and when that committee came to consider the sections of the bill one of the private members on the government side rose in his place and proposed an amendment to the effect that, in addition to the increase for the chief commissioner, there would be increases for the assistant chief commissioner, for the deputy chief commissioner and for all the other commissioners.

The minister was a member of the committee and tried to look unconcerned and surprised. However, I do not think there is any question that it was very well known that this subject was to be taken up. In effect the minister said, "Well, I must consult my colleagues to see whether these increases are all right." After a day or so he came back and said that everything was fine with the cabinet, and that therefore the committee could recommend the increases. Members of the official opposition who were on the committee opposed the recommendation for these increases and, as I have said, we propose to oppose the resolution today.

The salaries now being paid to the members of the board of transport commissioners are $15,000 per year to the chief commissioner, $12,000 to the assistant chief commissioner and $10,000 to each of the other commissioners, including one who is known as the deputy chief commissioner. Those salaries were increased just four years ago from $12,500 for the chief commissioner, $9,000 for the assistant chief commissioner and $8,000 for the ordinary commissioners, including the deputy chief.

As I have said, Bill No. 12 does provide for an increase in the salary of the chief commissioner from $15,000 to $16,000, so that he would then be getting the same amount as the president of the exchequer court. It also goes further and provides that if at any time he should retire from the position of chief commissioner, then until he becomes 75 years of age he is automatically one of the puisne judges of the exchequer court and, as such, would receive a salary of $14,400. There is no provision that he must be needed on the exchequer court. He is just made a judge of that court and continues as such at this salary until he becomes 75 years of age.

The amendment proposed in committee, as set out in the report of the committee to be found in yesterday's Votes and Proceedings, provides for increasing the salary of the assistant chief commissioner from $12,000 to $14,000, for increasing the salary of the deputy chief commissioner from $10,000 to $13,000, and the salaries of the other commissioners from $10,000 to $12,000. I would point out that county court judges are paid only $8,000, but we are being asked to approve an increase of $2,000 for the ordinary members of the board of transport commissioners. No argument was presented to justify this increase. It has just been pulled out of the hat, so to speak.

As a matter of fact the Turgeon commission on transportation recommended that the board of transport commissioners should be strengthened. Obviously the royal commission was concerned about the capabilities of the board of transport commissioners and recommended that it should be strengthened. But the royal commission did not recommend that the present members of that board be given an increase of salary of $2,000 for the ordinary commissioners, of $3,000 for the deputy chief commissioner and $2,000 for the assistant chief commissioner.

Mr. Brooks: That is hardly strengthening the board.

Mr. Green: I submit that does not carry out the recommendation of the royal commission on transportation that the board of transport commissioners should be strengthened. This legislation might very well make it the more difficult to do anything about strengthening that board. It is not my intention to say anything further on the matter, but I repeat that the official opposition feel this is an unwise step to take under the conditions, and we propose to vote against the resolution.

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, it is much more pleasant to speak in favour of increasing salaries than it is to object; therefore I do not particularly relish the task before me. However, I am going to vote against this resolution and I think perhaps I had better give my reasons. The hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) has explained the rather unusual way in which this came about. I think it is fair to say that this does not come to us as the original considered judgment of the government. Presumably it is a matter which must have been much in the mind of the minister because it has been discussed a good deal; nevertheless the proposal did not come from the minister when the committee first met and the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra has explained why.

My approach to this matter is a simple one. I regard $10,000 as a large salary. The hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra compared this salary with that paid to county court judges. County court judges are men of some eminence in their profession. I know something about university salaries and I know a university would be delighted to be able to pay $10,000 to its professors. However, we cannot pay that salary. Many eminent men are getting very much less. I have some knowledge of business, and I know that $10,000 jobs do not grow on every bush. A man who gets $10,000 is generally a man of ability and service and experience.

Therefore I feel justified in voting against this resolution, but in doing so I do not mean it as a criticism in any way of the members of the board. I do it purely on the basis of believing that $10,000 is a good salary for men doing work of distinction and importance in the community.

Mr. Clarence Gillis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that my friends to my right propose to call a vote on this resolution, I think I should say a word or two. The two hon. members of the official opposition who have spoken have indicated that they intend to vote against this, and the only way you can vote against a resolution is to call a vote. If they are going to call a vote I feel it to be my duty as a member of the committee to say why I am going to vote for the resolution.

I heard the discussion that brought about the amendment which led up to this resolution. I disagree with my respected friend, the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green), when he says no argument was presented to the committee to justify the proposed increases. Perhaps I should be the last one to say this, but in my opinion this resolution is aimed at removing a discrimination. I feel strongly on that point. The official opposition voted against an amendment proposed by me in committee; and in that the personnel which will share in these increases are all members of the legal profession and—

An hon. Member: No.

Mr. Gillis: Just a minute. When the bill was under discussion we objected to the provision that the commissioner, the assistant commissioners and the members of the board must be members of the legal profession with at least ten years of practice.

Mr. Green: On a point of order, I am sure the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) would not want to make a mistake if he had the necessary knowledge. It is not provided that the ordinary members of the board must be barristers.

Mr. Gillis: Just a minute.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Beaudoin): The hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) must not interrupt the hon. member who has the floor without his consent. The hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra did not raise a point of order; he merely explained a point, and that should be done after the hon. member who has the floor has concluded his remarks.

Mr. Gillis: I am always pleased when those with whom I am arguing get excited enough to get up as that is a clear indication that my argument is having effect. The chief commissioner and the assistant chief commissioner must be members of the legal profession with outstanding qualifications.

Mr. Green: Now you are right.

Mr. Gillis: We said that should not be so. We wanted to know why men from the trade union movement possessing the necessary qualifications could not be appointed. Why should not some outstanding economists be appointed? Running a railroad is an economic proposition. However, we lost; and we bowed to the will of the majority in the committee. The hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra and other members of the opposition insisted that they must be members of the legal profession.

This brings up the question of remuneration for their services. In the past year or so we have increased substantially the pension rights and salaries of the members of the judiciary, and I submit that we should not have discrimination against the legal profession in this legislation. Why should we ask men with outstanding qualifications to give public service on this board for ten or fifteen years, and then when they are through find themselves on the beach? I think there is every justification for removing that discrimination by bringing the salaries of the members of the board of transport commissioners in line with the salaries and pension rights of members of the judiciary. Every reasonable argument with respect to removing the discrimination went through my mind, and I was quite prepared to see the salaries increased to the extent proposed in the committee and now contained in an amendment to the bill. It is removing a discrimination against the profession to which the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) belongs. I am always prepared to do that kind of thing. In the second place, I have heard arguments advanced on a good many occasions in the house against increasing the salaries and pensions of members of the judiciary, and the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) and other members have risen and waxed very eloquent about it. They said that if we were going to get responsible men with high qualifications we had to remunerate them sufficiently so they would be available for appointment to these very important positions.

I consider the board of transport commissioners just as important a body as any court in this country. They deal with more complicated problems than merely deciding whether or not someone should go to jail. In fact they have much to do with the whole economic future of the Dominion of Canada. So far as I am concerned they have had no increase in remuneration since 1947, and since that time there have been many changes in the structure of prices and so on. I am making my decision to support the resolution on the ground that we are removing a discrimination between equally qualified personnel on the board of transport commissioners and those who occupy high offices in the judiciary in this country.

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, the royal commission on transportation recommended the strengthening of the board of transport commissioners. We are in complete agreement with that recommendation because we feel there is no more important judicial body in the Dominion of Canada, nobody who has more to do with the welfare of most Canadians, than the board of transport commissioners. The minister has brought before the house a resolution proposing to remunerate the members of the board sufficiently to attract the very best men. I presume that if the best men are attracted by the salaries that are to be offered we can reasonably expect the board to be not only efficient but active. I think one of the things the royal commission suggested was that they be more active, that they should engage in more active investigation and keep themselves thoroughly informed at all times. Under these circumstances, because of the fact that we must have the very best men we can get and that once we get them and pay them well we can expect better service from them, we will support the resolution.

Mr. A. J. Brooks (Royal): I should like to ask the minister how many members there are on the board. I understand that they are appointed for ten years. I should also like to know what length of time each member still has to serve. We talk about improving the membership of the board, but if the members still have a number of years until the end of their terms how are we going to get new men on the board in the meantime?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Beaudoin): Perhaps these questions might be asked more properly when we are in committee.

Mr. Brooks: I thought I might as well ask them while we were discussing the matter.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Beaudoin): I understand that we are discussing it now, but we are considering a motion that Mr. Speaker leave the chair for the house to resolve itself into committee of the whole on the resolution, and I do not think questions are in order at this point. Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. Green: No.

Mr. Fulton: I was paired with the hon. member for Yorkton (Mr. Stewart), who is ill in hospital. Had I voted, I would have voted against the motion.

Mr. Ross (Souris): I was paired with the hon. member for Melville (Mr. Gardiner). Had I voted, I would have voted against the motion.

The house went into committee, Mr. Dion in the chair.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, one or two questions were asked during the discussion of the main resolution which I should like to answer at this juncture. The hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra indicated that this resolution was pulled out of a hat, as it were. I want to assure him that such is not the case, that the government approved of the increases for other members of the board of transport commissioners for several reasons. One of the reasons was that given by the hon. member for Cape Breton South, namely that there was a substantial discrepancy between the salary which the chief commissioner will be in receipt of when this bill goes through and the present salaries of the members of the board of transport commissioners. Then again, another reason is that over a period of many years the salaries of members of the board of transport commissioners have been higher, as a general rule, than those of all other boards. They also have been comparable to the salaries of the members of the judiciary for some time. The report of the Gordon commission, which was established in 1946, dealing with administrative classifications in the public service, to which is added an appendix D, sets out and recommends in effect that the members of the board of transport commissioners should receive at least $2,000 more than the amounts recommended for members of other boards. During the discussions in the committee I indicated what was said by the royal commission on transportation. At page 273 of their report they stated that, because of the tenure of office of the members of the board, they felt consideration should be given to their present status. Having regard to all that, the government consented to the motion which was made in committee.

As to the question which was asked by the hon. member for Royal, there are normally six members of the board of transport commissioners. At the present time there are five. There is one vacancy. They are appointed for a period of ten years.

Mr. Brooks: I asked the minister to tell us how long each of the individual commissioners—

Mr. Chevrier: I am sorry, but I cannot follow what the hon. member is saying.

Mr. Brooks: I beg the minister's pardon?

Mr. Chevrier: I did not understand the hon. member's question.

Mr. Brooks: I thought I made it quite clear.

Mr. Chevrier: I could not hear. Someone was talking to me while the hon. member was asking the question. Would he mind repeating it?

Mr. Brooks: I should like to know the length of time each commissioner on the board has to run.

Mr. Chevrier: I could not give that information from memory. I could get it during the course of the debate on the bill. As to the chairman, he has just been appointed. As to Commissioner MacPherson, his term was extended last year, I believe. As to Commissioner Chase, I think the same applies to him. As to Commissioner Sylvestre and Commissioner Wardrope, I could not say; I would have to inquire. But I will get the exact details and give them to my hon. friend.

Mr. Green: There is, of course, a complete answer to the minister's statement that the government has given such careful thought to the need for increasing these salaries, and the answer is this. On October 23 first reading was given to Bill 12 amending the Railway Act. In that bill the government did not see fit to provide for these increases at all; there was no suggestion whatever that the government thought the salaries should be increased until, in the committee last week, or it may have been the week before, a private member stood up and moved that these increases be brought into effect. Therefore the minister's argument that this had all been carefully considered and that there was a very good reason for the increases is just a lot of poppycock, in view of the manner in which the matter was handled.

Mr. McLure: We are all in pretty nearly the same boat in this, in that we do not know what we are dealing with. So far as I am concerned, I have this resolution before me, and I do not know whether it deals with the board of transport commissioners or all the other boards such as the maritime transport commission, the board of transport commissioners, the royal commissioners, the transport controller and so on. What is the jurisdiction of all these boards? I remember that in 1945 and 1946 I took objection to this board of transport commissioners on the ground that they had no jurisdiction to deal with certain problems of my province, at any rate. However, they were sent down there at that time, and they had a sitting. After a week or ten days and a great deal of expense they ended their sitting and decided they had no jurisdiction. Since that time I have often wondered whether any jurisdiction had been given to them.

A few days ago I noticed that they gave a ruling with reference to a railway bridge in my province. It was a most peculiar ruling. I think I have something here that explains it. One of the members, I think it was the chief commissioner, who has since resigned, filed a minority report. As hon. members know, this bridge was operated by the Canadian National Railways in conjunction with the Murray Harbour Railway. As I said a few days ago when speaking on a railway matter, the theory is they are going to pull up the railway track for 45 or 50 miles and ship it off to some other place. But listen to the report of the commissioners. Two of them found this—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. Perhaps I should remind the hon. member that this resolution deals with an increase in the salaries of the board of transport commissioners. It has nothing to do with the reports the board has made from time to time. The hon. member may find an opportunity to discuss this matter when the bill is before the house.

Mr. McLure: Mr. Chairman, I do not know, but it always seems to be my lot that when anything comes up and Your Honour has the privilege of being chairman of the committee you like to push me off.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I am always very sorry when it is my misfortune to call the hon. gentleman to order. But I think he would not want to leave on Hansard the words he just used, namely that the chairman likes "to push me off".

Mr. McLure: Mr. Chairman, we will bury the hatchet at that.

Mr. Knowles: It depends on where you bury it.

Mr. McLure: We are dealing with the board of transport commissioners and the increase in the salaries that they are to receive. I was just speaking about the jurisdiction of this board and how they are to operate in the future. These men are going to get great increases in salaries, and I was just trying to prove that they had no jurisdiction and when they do bring in a report it is what you might call an unreasonable one. I was just quoting from a recent report. I had just got this far and said that when they were dealing with this bridge that they have now condemned here is what two of them said after the chief commissioner had brought in his report but not in accord with theirs:

> Having regard to the fact that the railways have from time to time found it necessary to apply for increased freight rates, etc., which are generally opposed by the public—

That is true, all right. I continue:

> —it would appear only right that the board should approve of any applications which will result in economies of operation whenever and wherever such economies can be effected without causing undue inconvenience to the public.

Therefore they do away with this little railway down in Prince Edward Island.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I think the hon. member will be reasonable enough to realize that by this time he is definitely out of order.

Mr. Green: Surely it is in order for an hon. member to point out where there have been extremely unwise decisions made by the board. This is a resolution which is preliminary to a measure which will increase their salaries. Surely an hon. member can submit cases to show that the increases should not be granted. That is all the hon. member for Queens is doing.

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra has put his finger on the very point. This is a preliminary measure, and perhaps when the bill comes before the house the other points concerning the jurisdiction of this board and the reports they have made from time to time may be discussed. Right now all we have before us is a resolution dealing with the increases in their salaries; that is all.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, I suggest in all seriousness that what the hon. member is doing is supporting the contention that the board needs to be strengthened. After all he is showing why it should be strengthened, although he does not agree it can best be strengthened by increasing the salaries of the same people.

Mr. Chevrier: I do not think that because we have two hon. members taking the same attitude it strengthens the point of order. As I understand the point of order, the hon. member is trying to discuss a matter concerning the Hillsborough bridge on this resolution. Surely that is entirely out of order. He also wants to discuss the matter of freight rates. If he wants to deal with the increase in the salaries and the duties of the board, that is another thing. In fairness to the committee, since we did not allow a discussion on the freight rates on the bill when it was before the house and on the earlier resolution, surely we should not allow it at this stage.

Mr. McLure: During the discussion of these things I was endeavouring to show that in getting these extra men who are to be appointed at high salaries, we should get men who would not bring in unwise reports such as the one I referred to. I will go this much further and say this. The board of transport commissioners that I have had anything to do with for the last six or seven years never gave us any consideration because they did not know where they were in regard to it. What I should like to see brought in is another amendment washing out the board of transport commissioners entirely. We have far too many of these things. We have the maritime commission for the railways, we have a controller of boxcars and reefer cars and all these things. After all, anything that our province has to do with the railways cannot be done through the board of transport commissioners. They have no jurisdiction to set freight rates. We cannot deal with subcontractors. Our contract is with the Minister of Transport and the government, and that is the reason I want to express myself at this time to the effect that the board of transport commissioners, as applied to the problems of our province, are not worth a pinch of snuff.

Mr. Knowles: I should like to ask a question with regard to the wording of the resolution. It says that the present commissioner is to be now an additional puisne judge of the exchequer court. Then, later on it says "on retirement therefrom". Which is it? Does the present chief commissioner become now a judge of the exchequer court or does he become such upon his retirement from his present position?

Mr. Chevrier: Both.

Mr. Green: What procedure will be followed, once this resolution has been passed? Will it be an amendment to Bill 12, or is there to be a new bill entirely?

Mr. Chevrier: When we reach the end of this discussion I propose to move that this resolution be referred to the committee of the whole on Bill 12, and then when we get to the section dealing with the salary and position of the chief commissioner I propose to ask my colleague the leader of the house to move an amendment to that section.

Mr. Green: And will the minister clear up the situation with respect to the chief commissioner becoming a puisne judge of the exchequer court? As I read Bill 12, upon his retirement from the position of chief commissioner he will become what is called a supernumerary judge of the exchequer court, and will continue to be such supernumerary judge until he becomes 75 years of age. Presumably as such supernumerary judge he will draw a salary the same as other puisne judges of the exchequer court, namely $14,400. And he will do that regardless of whether he is functioning as a judge of the exchequer court. Am I wrong in that summing up?

Mr. Chevrier: I wonder if my hon. friend would allow me to explain that when we get into committee of the whole on Bill 12, because the amendment which I shall ask my colleague to move will deal with those very points. I undertake now to make that explanation, and I hope I shall do so to the satisfaction of my hon. friend.

Mr. Knowles: Perhaps the amendment will be clearer than the resolution.

Mr. Chevrier: It will be more detailed, I can assure you.

Mr. Herridge: What are the minimum educational requirements and administrative experience required by the government in making an appointment to the board of transport commissioners?

Mr. Chevrier: If my hon. friend would take the trouble to look at section 1 (2) of the Railway Act as it now stands he will find there the qualifications required to become chief commissioner and assistant chief commissioner.

Mr. Herridge: I have asked for the qualifications required for commissioners.

Mr. Chevrier: The qualifications required for the chief commissioner and the assistant chief commissioner are that they be judges of a superior court, or at least barristers of ten years' standing. There is no qualification set out in the act with respect to commissioners. I take it that men of standing in the community, such as have been appointed in the past, would be appointed in the future.

Mr. Knowles: What community?

Mr. Hodgson: I understand the commissioners get $10,000 a year now, and this increase brings them up to $12,000; is that right?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes.

Mr. Hodgson: I think $10,000 is a fair salary for any commissioner. A short time ago railwaymen had to go on strike to get increases of from $10 to $25 a month. Yet here with one stroke of the pen we give commissioners an increase in salary of $2,000. In my judgment it does not just add up.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the resolution carry?

Mr. Fraser: On division.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in.

Mr. Chevrier: I move that this resolution be referred to the committee of the whole on Bill 12.

Motion agreed to.

RAILWAY ACT

IMPLEMENTING CERTAIN RECOMMENDATIONS OF ROYAL COMMISSION ON TRANSPORTATION —MAINTENANCE OF TRACKAGE

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport) moved that the house go into committee on Bill No. 12, to amend the Railway Act.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

On section 1—Reappointment.

Mr. Green: Is the minister going to make any general statement on this section?

Mr. Chevrier: No. I think the statements I have already made are sufficiently indicative of the meaning of the bill. The proceedings which took place in committee, too, will indicate to those who want to read them the tenor of the discussion there.

However, before we proceed to the discussion of section 1, I would ask my colleague to move the new section 1. Before he does move it I should like to advise the committee that it is in practically the same language as the present sections 1 and 2, with the exception that section 2b is spelled out far more than in the present bill. Then there is an addition to section 2 dealing with the present incumbent, together with section 3 which indicates the time at which the whole section shall come into force. I would ask my colleague to move it.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I move:

That sections 1, 2 and 3 of Bill No. 12 be deleted, and the following be substituted therefor:

"1. (1) Subsection five of section nine of the Railway Act, chapter one hundred and seventy of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1927, is repealed and the following substituted therefor:

'(5) A commissioner on the expiration of his first or subsequent term of office shall, if not disqualified by age, be eligible for reappointment for a period not exceeding ten years.'

(2) Subsections two, two(a) and two(b) of section ten of the said act, as enacted by section one of chapter sixty-six of the statutes of 1947-48, are repealed and the following substituted therefor:

'(2) Any person may be appointed chief commissioner who is or has been a judge of a superior court of Canada or of any province of Canada, or who is a barrister or advocate of at least ten years' standing at the bar of any such province.

(2a) Sections twenty-two, twenty-three, twenty-six, twenty-seven and twenty-eight of the Judges Act, 1946, apply in respect of the chief commissioner as though his service in the office of chief commissioner were service in the office of a judge of the exchequer court, and notwithstanding anything in the Civil Service Superannuation Act the chief commissioner is not a civil servant for the purposes of that act.

(2b) Where the term of office of a chief commissioner expires before he has attained the age of seventy-five years and he has not, prior to the expiration of such term, been reappointed as chief commissioner for a further term, he becomes, at the time such term expires and without any appointment pursuant to the provisions of the Exchequer Court Act, a puisne judge of the exchequer court in addition to the number of judges of the exchequer court provided for in the Exchequer Court Act and the Judges Act, 1946, and with the same jurisdiction, tenure of office and salary as other puisne judges of the exchequer court; and for the purposes of sections twenty-two and twenty-three of the Judges Act, 1946, his period of service as chief commissioner shall be added to his period of service as judge of the exchequer court, and for the purposes of section thirty-two of the Judges Act, 1946, his salary as a puisne judge of the exchequer court shall be deemed to be payable under that act.

(2c) Where a chief commissioner who made an election under section twenty-six of the Judges Act, 1946, in respect of his office as chief commissioner becomes a puisne judge of the Exchequer Court pursuant to subsection two (b), no further election under that section is necessary and the election he made in respect of his office as chief commissioner shall be deemed to have been made in respect of his office as a puisne judge of the Exchequer Court at the time he became such a judge.

(3) Subsection one of section twenty-six of the said act, as enacted by section two of chapter sixty-six of the statutes of 1947-48, is repealed and the following substituted therefor:

26. (1) The chief commissioner shall be paid an annual salary equal to the salary of the president of the Exchequer Court; the assistant chief commissioner shall be paid an annual salary of fourteen thousand dollars, the deputy chief commissioner shall be paid an annual salary of thirteen thousand dollars, and each of the other commissioners shall be paid an annual salary of twelve thousand dollars.

Mr. Knowles: I think we have been given quite a mouthful. As a matter of fact, we have had read to us the revised form, not just of section 1 but of sections 1, 2 and 3. I do not blame the Minister of Public Works because he just had it handed to him a minute ago, but I think these sections should be dealt with one at a time. I tried to follow what was being read and to compare it with the sections of the bill before me, and I did not notice any change in section 1 nor in section 2 until we got down to 2 (b).

Mr. Chevrier: Would the hon. member allow the Minister of Public Works to complete reading the whole amendment and then I shall try to explain it to the committee. I think that would make for a more intelligent discussion.

Mr. Knowles: I thought he had completed reading it; he did sit down.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Sections 2 and 3 will read:

2. The person holding the offices of chief commissioner of the board of transport commissioners for Canada and puisne judge of the Exchequer Court of Canada at the coming into force of section one of this act shall continue to hold those offices as though subsections two and three of that section had not been enacted, except that

(a) the said office of puisne judge shall be deemed to be in addition to the number of puisne judges of the Exchequer Court of Canada provided for in the Exchequer Court Act and the Judges Act, 1946;

(b) the salary annexed to the said office of puisne judge shall be equal to the salary payable to other puisne judges of the said court and for the purposes of section thirty-two of the Judges Act, 1946, shall be deemed to be payable under that act; and

(c) the salary payable to the said chief commissioner under the Railway Act shall be equal to the salary of the president of the Exchequer Court of Canada, less the salary received by him as puisne judge of that court.

3. Sections one and two of this act shall come into force on the first day of January, nineteen hundred and fifty-two.

Mr. Chevrier: I think I should say at the outset that sections 1, 2 and 3 of the bill now before the committee are being amended by the amendment which the minister has moved. I presume the committee will want me to explain the effect of this amendment.

Mr. Knowles: It seems to me that we could listen to the minister's explanation more intelligently if we had these revisions before us. After all, we have had quite a bit read to us just now. I suggest that these sections stand and we go on with the other parts of the bill. As a matter of fact they might stand until tomorrow, when we would have this material before us in Hansard.

Mr. Green: Perhaps the minister could furnish us with typed copies of the proposed amendment and then make his statement at eight o'clock, after we have had an opportunity to read it.

Mr. Chevrier: I think that is possible.

Mr. Green: I presume the changes are not very extensive.

Mr. Chevrier: That is a fair suggestion. I shall have copies made and distributed so we can discuss this amendment more intelligently at eight o'clock.

At 6.15 p.m. the committee took recess.

[Mr. Knowles.]

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Chevrier: Perhaps I should explain the meaning of the amendment, copies of which I hope the committee has received since we adjourned for the dinner recess.

Mr. Knowles: Only a few minutes ago.

Mr. Chevrier: I admit that is so, but mind you it is a task to prepare one hundred copies in the short time we had. If it had not been for the assistance of the Hansard office it would have been impossible. Briefly the meaning of the amendment is as follows: Clause 1 (5), which corresponds with 1 (5) in the present bill 12, simply provides for the reappointment of a commissioner for a period not exceeding ten years. In other words it permits a commissioner to be reappointed for a term of less than ten years if that be found necessary. There is no change in that section. Neither is there any change in subsections 2 and 2a. Subsection 2 provides for the qualifications of a chief commissioner, namely, that a chief commissioner must be a judge of a superior court of Canada or of any province of Canada, or a barrister or advocate of at least ten years standing at the bar of his province. Subsection 2a provides that the sections of the Judges Act relating to annuities and pensions shall apply to the chief commissioner as if he were a judge of a superior court.

Subsection 2b is in essence the same, but certain language has been added which strengthens the clause as it stood before. It provides for the appointment of the chief commissioner as a puisne judge of the Exchequer Court of Canada before he has attained the age of 75. Subsection 2c is new. It provides that where the chief commissioner makes an election under the Judges Act no further election is necessary as a puisne judge of the exchequer court at the time he becomes such puisne judge.

Mr. Green: Has that to do with pension?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes, and it also has reference to the distribution of the pension to his widow. Everything I have discussed so far is purely academic and has to do with future chief commissioners, whereas section 2 provides for the present chief commissioner. Perhaps I should not have overlooked subsection 3. It is in exactly the same language as subsection 3 of the bill and is the one which provides for increases in salaries. There is no change there.

Mr. Green: It is not the same as 3 in the bill. It is somewhat the same as the committee's recommendation.

Mr. Chevrier: Yes. Thank you for bringing that to my attention. That is a fact. It is not the same as in the bill. It is the same as the motion made in the committee, which we have adopted. It provides for the salary of the chief commissioner to be the same as that of the president of the exchequer court. It provides for the salary of the assistant chief to be $14,000, that of the deputy chief $13,000 and that of each of the commissioners $12,000. Section 2, as contained in the amendment now before hon. members, deals with the office of the present chief commissioner, and I think that needs no explanation. It is clearly set out in subsections (a), (b) and (c) what the intention is. Section 3 provides that sections 1 and 2 of the act shall come into force on the first day of January, 1952.

Mr. Knowles: On the question of form, I understand then that the subject matter of what is comprised in sections 1, 2 and 3 of the printed bill is all being compressed, with some changes and additions, into the new section 1.

Mr. Chevrier: That is right.

Mr. Knowles: And that there are new sections 2 and 3.

Mr. Chevrier: That is right.

Mr. Green: We have not had very long to consider these changes in the first three sections of the bill, and I should like to take the opportunity of making a few general remarks with regard to it, as is the custom on the first section of a bill. Perhaps that will give other members a chance to review these amendments that are to be made. I am rather sorry the minister did not say something concerning the work of the committee, and with reference to the bill as it has come back from the committee.

Those members of the house who, like myself, were fortunate enough to be members of the special committee on railway legislation found the work extremely interesting, and I hope it will be beneficial to the country. I must admit that we are hardly qualified as experts by reason of the fact that we have been sitting as members of the committee for a couple of weeks, but at least we do know a little more than we knew before the committee started to sit. Not many witnesses appeared before the committee. There were two from the Canadian Pacific Railway and there was one spokesman for the Canadian National Railways, although of course other officials of that railway were present and also other officials of the Canadian Pacific. I think it was unfortunate that the Canadian National was not allowed to take a more active part in the work of the committee. The Canadian Pacific had to make all the submissions against the bill, and of course in the process got a certain amount of kicking around. I would have appreciated having similar comments from the spokesman for the Canadian National Railways, but perhaps he was handicapped by the minister.

Mr. Chevrier: Not in the slightest.

Mr. Green: One got the impression that he had the wraps on, and I thought perhaps the minister was responsible. However, there is no doubt that when it comes to the fixing of freight rates both the railways will be together. They have been in the habit of making applications in the name of the Railway Association of Canada, and I have no doubt they will continue to do so in applying for increases in rates.

Then we heard representatives from eight of the provinces; that is, all the provinces except Ontario and Quebec. These two provinces were not represented, I presume because they are not very interested in this bill. It is obvious that the shippers in those provinces are confident they are not going to pay very much higher freight rates than they are paying today. Ontario and Quebec were not represented, either, before the royal commission on transportation. The minister will correct me if I am wrong, but I believe those provinces did not make any representations to the Turgeon commission.

Mr. Blackmore: They always win.

Mr. Green: Well, in so far as freight rates are concerned they have been winning thus far and perhaps they will continue to do so.

There has been an impression abroad that this bill lays down some new national transportation policy. In the earlier debate I may have made a statement to that effect myself, but I believe we should make it absolutely clear that there is no such intention. The bill deals only with railway freight rates. There is no attempt at all to deal with rates by water, by air or by road, so that by no stretch of the imagination can it be considered a bill to bring in a national transportation policy.

Section 332A of the Railway Act does, however, proclaim what is called a national freight rates policy. Even that name gives a wrong impression, because if members will refer to the section, which is contained in section 7 of the bill, they will find that there are quite a few exceptions to this national freight rates policy. For example, all joint international rates between points in Canada and in the United States are excepted from this new policy; rates on export and import traffic through Canadian ports where in practice such rates bear a fixed and long-standing relationship with rates on similar traffic through ports in the United States are also exempted. A third group of exceptions are the competitive rates, which form a large group, and the agreed charges authorized by the board under part V of the Transport Act of 1938. The rates over the White pass and the Yukon route are excepted. There is also an exception for all the Crowsnest rates which are statutory rates applying principally to the hauling of grain. Another group of exceptions are all the rates subject to the Maritime Freight Rates Act.

The representatives from the maritimes were not satisfied that this exemption of the rates under the Maritime Freight Rates Act protected them; and at their request, and with the approval, may I say, of all the members of the committee and the representatives of the four western provinces, an additional exception was written into the bill to protect the maritimes. It will be found in a new paragraph (f) of section 332A of the Railway Act, which reads:

(f) rates applicable to movements of freight traffic upon or over all or any of the lines of railway collectively designated as the "Eastern Lines" in the Maritime Freight Rates Act as amended by the Statute Law Amendment (Newfoundland) Act.

This means, Mr. Chairman, that the national freight rates policy begins at Levis, Quebec. It does not apply east of that point, so the eastern part of Quebec and the four maritime provinces, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island and Newfoundland are excepted. In the general result too I do not believe Ontario and Quebec are going to be very much affected by this national freight rates policy. In those provinces much of the carriage of goods by rail is subject to competition from ships and from trucks. This means that there are competitive rates in Ontario and Quebec which are lower than the ordinary type of rates, and as such they are excepted from the provisions of section 332A which contains the national freight rates policy. The Canadian Pacific representative stated that over 41 per cent of the freight traffic being carried by that railway would come under these exceptions, and only about 59 per cent would be subject to the so-called national freight rates policy. We should not fool ourselves that the bill, good as it is in most of its provisions, constitutes a new national freight rates policy.

Another fact we should bear in mind is that these provisions will not be implemented for a period of several years. The class rates will not be finally dealt with by the board of transport commissioners for a year and a half or two years. After that the commodity rates have to be reviewed and brought under the terms of this section. It may, therefore, be four or five years before this policy really comes into effect. I am not criticizing that delay. I assume it cannot be avoided. But we should remember that there will be all this delay in implementation.

Another important feature of the bill has to do with these competitive rates. As I have said, they are excepted from the new freight rates policy; they do not come under it at all. They are especially low rates put in by the railways to enable them to meet competition. Most of such rates are in effect in Ontario and Quebec. The bill, in section 331, seeks to tighten up the competitive rates. I think there is an attempt to make it more difficult for the railways to bring in these competitive rates. If something cannot be done about them there is not going to be much chance of the eight provinces being relieved of any of the burden of railway freight rates. I suppose it is hoped that this section 331 will make Ontario and Quebec pay higher rates than they have been paying in the past. They obviously do not much fear that result because they did not bother to come before the committee.

I would point out that under section 331, in order for a railway to justify putting in a competitive rate, several things must be proved. In the first place the railway must show that the competition actually exists. Then it must show that the competitive rates are compensatory. In other words it cannot put in a rate that is below what costs will be. Then the railway must show that the rates are not lower than necessary to meet competition. All these conditions must be met in order to justify a competitive rate. But once the rate is put in the railways are free to abolish it or to raise it at will. The board of transport commissioners has no control over the abolition or the increase of these competitive rates.

As I have said, section 331 is the code dealing with competitive rates. But there is another section in the bill which also deals with them, namely section 332B. It deals with one type of competitive rates known as the transcontinental rates; they are the rates on goods carried across the country where there is competition between the ships and the railways, as for example at Vancouver. A special provision is made with regard to that one type of competitive rate. Section 332B writes in a ceiling on what can be charged to the intermediate areas—primarily the prairie area—and provides that the rates at the intermediate points cannot be over 1⅓ of the through transcontinental rate.

There will be an opportunity to debate that section when we come to it. I have no intention at this moment of going into that question any further. It is highly contentious. Here again Ontario and Quebec are not interested, and I do not think the maritimes are interested. But unfortunately the provision has lined up the provinces of British Columbia and Manitoba on one side, against the section, and the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan on the other in favour of it. The section has had that result. The governments of these provinces had representatives appear before the committee, the British Columbia and Manitoba representatives opposing the section and the Alberta and Saskatchewan representatives approving it. I greatly regret that this has taken place. I think it is unfortunate for western Canada. I believe the difficulty could have been dealt with in another way, in order to avoid this friction, but at the moment that is the position. Section 332B is a subject of great controversy among the four western provinces.

Another provision in the bill is that a subsidy of $7 million will be paid to help to defray the cost of maintaining the tracks of both railways across the rocky part of northern Ontario which in the past has been considered rather unproductive. The district is between Sudbury and Fort William on the Canadian Pacific Railway and between Capreol and Fort William and between Cochrane and Armstrong on the Canadian National Railways. The payment of this subsidy is to help keep down the freight rates on goods that have to go over that unproductive area.

I think that plan met with the general approval of members of the committee and also of all the representatives who appeared to give evidence. The details are not worked out in the bill. Hon. members will find all the provisions in section 18. The implementation of the policy has been left to the board of transport commissioners. It has been given wide discretion to say how much shall be paid to each railway and on what basis the amounts will be worked out. I think this policy of subsidizing that so-called bridge or gap is sound.

Then there is one other thing which has occurred to me as a result of the sittings of the committee. I think it is not accurate to describe the bill as an equalization bill. In the press and in our speeches the bill has been referred to in that way. I suppose that has been done because over the years the freight rates fights have been called fights to equalize the rates, and that word "equalization" has been used to describe all the attempts that have been made to improve our freight rate structure. There is really not a great deal of equalization under this bill.

We might have equalization if we removed all the exceptions to the new section 332A; for example, if we removed the Crowsnest rate—I can hear every hon. member from the prairie provinces starting to swear under his breath the minute that is even mentioned in a debate; and nobody is suggesting that it should be done—or the maritime freight rates. If we are to have equalization, real equalization, then I suppose the Maritime Freight Rates Act will have to go out the window. Now all the maritimers start to shake their heads, and I quite agree with them. But this shows you how far we are from having real equalization of rates in this bill or in the near future. I suppose the only true equalization in Canada would be to have a freight rate structure such that you paid the same to have a car brought from Oshawa to Vancouver as you paid to have it carried by rail from Oshawa to Montreal. That is the kind of equalization that would appeal to me. If we had that sort then we would have what could properly be called equalization. However, I guess that is a long way in the future, too. Or we might have equalization by a wider system of subsidies. It may prove to be a good policy for Canada, through her federal taxation, to subsidize freight rates in different parts of the country so that Canadians would pay the same rates no matter where they may live.

However, we will be inaccurate if we describe this as an equalization bill. I think the minister will agree with me when I say that it is perhaps a start on equalization, but it can be more truly described as a step towards improving the freight rates structure of Canada. I believe it is certainly that. All the members of the committee, and also I think all the witnesses who appeared before the committee, were equally glad to have a measure of this kind being made law, with the idea that it would be a step towards improving the Canadian freight rate structure.

These are just rambling remarks having to do with the whole bill, and the impressions I gained as a result of those very interesting days spent on the special committee on railway legislation. As I have said, there will be further debate of course on the different sections. I am reserving my right to debate section 332B, and no doubt other hon. members will also wish to speak on that same section.

Mr. Laing: For a few moments I should like to make some remarks concerning this bill. I will not be as pessimistic concerning its future as the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra.

Mr. Low: That would be refreshing.

Mr. Laing: In the main it is a very good bill.

Mr. Green: I agree with you.

Mr. Laing: It is a bill which as a start implements the report of the Turgeon commission on transportation. I want to say that I do not think a finer report has ever been presented to a government of Canada by any commission appointed. There is material in that report that will stand us in good stead, transportationwise, for many many years in Canada. As the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra said, this bill, as a beginning—perhaps just a beginning—of the implementation of that report, I think is a little bit of a monument in transportation affairs in the Dominion of Canada. We do not realize what the railways have meant to Canada. In our own case, in the province of British Columbia, it was by virtue of the guarantee that the railway would come west that we came into confederation. In the days when the railways first went through, transportation was simple and the railways' revenue was secure. That situation does not pertain today. The railways are being harassed on every side by every other competing mode of transportation. In our own city of Vancouver today we have 25 trucks coming in daily from San Francisco, with two drivers to a truck, 50 hours out of San Francisco. They do not back their freight load against a team-track downtown; they back it right up to the warehouse or put it inside the warehouse. The railways, with fixed rolling stock and fixed locations and so on, are sitting ducks for that type of competition. We have a railway problem in Canada because the nature of traffic in this country is such that we cannot move it, and will not be able to move it for many years to come, or at least in the foreseeable future, without railways. That is why we have a railway problem.

I know many Canadians in my part of the country who occasionally ride on United States railways as passengers. They come back and say: "Why can't we have these lovely trains in Canada that they have in the United States?" Well, last year Canada lost $20 million on passenger transportation, and I do not know that they would be justified in providing any better equipment than we have today. For the volume of traffic they have and the distance over which they run I think their passenger service is very very good indeed.

The railways have done a great work for Canada. One of the great things they did was to provide a group of men who came in as pioneers to build a railroad, and who have left first and second generations of people who are very important in all parts of the Dominion of Canada. By some means or other the Canadian Pacific Railway commanded a loyalty among its employees, which I think was reflected too in the case of the Canadian National Railways probably under the chairmanship of the late Sir Henry Thornton, when the national system was brought together in the twenties; and out of that loyalty to their firms there have been given to Canada a great many men who have made great contributions in business—yes, and in this House of Commons as well—because we have had in the past a great number of men in this house, including one or two at present, who have come from the railways, and they have been outstanding citizens.

Passenger traffic today is being lost to the bus lines, and the expensive rear-end traffic of the railways today, over long distances at least, is largely being carried by the aeroplane; and we can expect an increase in that. At the present time we are carrying some 1,400 passengers a day out of our great airport at Vancouver. That is about four trainloads of passengers. That traffic will increase in the future rather than decrease.

Some parts of this bill are of very great concern to Canada, and are outstandingly good. One of them is the $7 million provision. For generations we in Canada have regarded this country as an east and a west with a great gulf fixed between. If this provision to take care of that so-called desert, or non-productive area around the head of the lakes, does nothing more than make the Canadian people realize that we are one country and we are bridging that gap, it will be money extremely well spent.

In the bill there is a definition of eastern territory and western territory. The eastern territory is beyond a line drawn from Armstrong, Ontario to Port Arthur. That provides for shipment from the eastern territory into the intermediate territory by transcontinental roads to all the vast productive area of Ontario and Quebec and such productive areas as we have in the maritimes; and we in British Columbia draw steel products from the maritimes as well. In the case of the western territory, it is defined as a very narrow strip along the Pacific coast. As a matter of fact it is from Mission City to Vancouver, which is a twenty-eight mile strip. I thought that was hardly fair, and I do not see why we cannot expand the western area or, in other words, bring it in farther from our coast. If possible I would like to see it include the area in which the fruit industry of British Columbia is located. We have not an extensive agricultural industry in that province, but we have a very specialized one. The most important feature, and the most important product of our agriculture there, is the very magnificent grade of fruit produced by the fruit-growing industry of British Columbia, a product which finds a market in all the provinces of Canada. It is more of a tribute to our fruit than to the Canadian freight rate structure that last year several cars were shipped to Newfoundland at freight rates of $1,700 to $1,800 per car. We will go into that point as we proceed with the discussion.

I noticed in the Vancouver paper that the hon. member for Kootenay East and I had joined with the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra in a battle in committee, and that we had lost. The hon. member for Kootenay East and myself will have to be more careful of our allies in the future. I am going to say this, that I do join with him in my concern with respect to the transcontinental competitive rates. That is a matter in connection with which there is considerable history in our province. It did not start with the building of the Panama canal. As a matter of fact those transcontinental competitive water-compelled rates were in effect long before the Panama canal was thought of. And as a matter of fact there was movement by way of the Horn which really had an effect upon the very earliest freight rates established continent-wide. That competitive position, so far as transcontinental rates are concerned, is very important to us. It is a very low rate on many commodities, but it is a rate upon which provision is made for shipment to the intermediate territory in Canada.

In order to relieve the disabilities that have come upon the prairie provinces in the matter of freight rates, this bill establishes the provision that upon shipments from either the eastern or western territory into the intermediate territory, the rate to no point shall be greater than one and one-third times the transcontinental rate. That is a matter of very great concern to the central provinces and will bring them a tremendous measure of relief, for which I think the people in all other parts of Canada will be very happy indeed. But I do point this out, that to bring them that relief it simply has to operate and it can only operate on the basis of the maintenance of our transcontinental rates.

I wish to thank the committee for giving me so much time to discuss the matter at this stage. I enjoyed working on the committee. It is an engrossing subject, which one would have to study many years before he could say that he had any considerable knowledge with respect to it. It is a dynamic problem, and we are dealing with it in a dynamic country. The greatest mistake we could possibly make at this time would be to think that by writing a bill like this we are going to solve the disputes in respect of freight rates for all time. I think we should disabuse our minds of that right now, because we will find that within four or five years this country will be faced with a brand new set of conditions which will make many of the present conditions connected with freight rates entirely outmoded. We can expect that.

One of those factors, I will say, is going to be the industrialization of the west, something that is on our doorstep right now. It is affecting Alberta and British Columbia today, and there is no doubt that this industrialization wil move into Saskatchewan, too. Much of that movement will be westbound, toward the water.

Mr. Fraser: Not while they have a C.C.F. government there.

Mr. Coldwell: That is a silly remark.

Mr. Fraser: No, it is not.

Mr. Sinnott: Let them fight it out.

Mr. Laing: I believe we will have that industrialization, and I trust the people of Canada, when they have profitable industrialization, will also have a government of their choice. I think they will probably have the right government, when they have that industrialization.

We must keep the thought clearly in our minds that we are going to continue to make changes as we go along. There is one further point concerning which I disagree with the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra and his followers. I refer to the provision discussed this afternoon, to increase the salaries of the commissioners. I thought the hon. member and his followers took a very backward stand. What are the salaries of the high officers of the two railways today? I take it they are probably two or three times the amount the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra would want to pay these commissioners, who are charged with the responsibility of administering the conditions under which both railways operate. I do not think there is any direct relationship between what you pay a man in a particular category and what you get out of him in service. If there were a direct relationship, then I know many public servants of this government, men of outstanding merit, whom we would not have retained as long as we have.

At the same time there is some relationship and certainly there is some connection between the salaries we pay and the services we should expect to obtain from the men we hire. The salaries which will be adopted in this bill are remarkably low when we consider what we should expect from the men who are going to form the board of transport commissioners for Canada. The hon. member for Cape Breton South said this afternoon that they have an important task. I do not think there is a more important commission in Canada because, as he said—and said very well—not only are they administering the conditions under which the roads operate, but they have much to do with determining the economic growth and development of the country. We are going to have to depend more and more upon that commission. I would suggest to the minister that as we go along in developing this policy, he also always bear in mind that we want the strongest and best commission we can possibly have, at all times. We want the most energetic and the best informed. And —and this may be more important than even the commissioners themselves—they should have assistants in the engineering branch, and in the branch of accountancy, equal in all respects to those of the railways. We should be prepared to employ these men, and to pay whatever salaries are necessary to get men as competent as those of the public utilities appearing before them.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Chairman, I have only a few remarks I should like to make at this point. I have listened with a great deal of interest to hon. members preceding me. I listened to the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra. His interpretation of the value of this bill is not the same as mine. If I remember correctly he said that in this bill there is no broad, new, general freight rates policy for Canada. I believe there is a new freight rates policy for Canada spelled out in this bill, in section 332A. That feature of the bill is something for which the people of western Canada have been battling for many years. It is perfectly true that this bill does not provide for the equalization of freight rates by legislation, but it does make the equalization of freight rates, with certain exceptions, the declared national freight rates policy. I believe that declared national freight rates policy will strengthen the stand of the provinces when they appear before the board of transport commissioners from time to time in an effort to obtain a fairer freight rates structure.

The work of obtaining a better freight rates policy will begin with the passage of this bill. This measure does not in itself guarantee in any way the equalization of freight rates; it does not guarantee a better deal for western Canada, but it has in it all the possibilities of a better deal. It will now be up to the board of transport commissioners to see that the terms of this bill are put into effect and that the people in the various provinces get the new freight rates deal for which they have hoped.

When the matter of an increase in the salaries of the transport commissioners was brought up in committee I stated, on the basis of an answer which I had received from the minister that the total of the increases would amount to only $9,000, that I did not feel I could oppose such an increase if it would be effective in strengthening the board of transport commissioners. If there is one thing the report of the royal commission emphasizes repeatedly it is the many ways the present board of transport commissioners has fallen down in dealing with the freight rates question. If a total increase of $9,000 divided among the members of the board of transport commissioners will be successful in bringing about a fairer freight rates structure resulting in large savings to the people of western Canada, perhaps amounting to millions of dollars, I cannot but support those increases.

I hope the minister will obtain the best possible men as commissioners. I have discussed the personnel of the present board with some people who I believe have some idea of its competence, and was informed that one member of the board was in the habit of going to sleep through much of the freight rates hearings. I suppose if a member of parliament goes to sleep too often in the House of Commons his constituents will take care of him at a general election, but I do not think there is room for a member of the board of transport commissioners who goes to sleep. It is time the government obtained the best possible personnel.

We have agreed to the minister's request that increases in salaries be granted, but I tell the minister that as far as I am concerned I will object to those increases if the board does not come through with the goods in a short time. We want equalization of freight rates; we want fairer freight rates, and we are willing to pay good salaries to the members of the board in order that this be done. But once we have agreed that good salaries shall be paid we want to see action on this new legislation within a short period of time.

One other valuable feature of the bill in my opinion is contained in section 331, which gives the board the power of policing competitive rates. One of the most serious objections counsel for the prairie provinces have taken in the past has been that there was very little or no policing of competitive rates and that finally you had a system of competitive rates in central Canada which because they were so low resulted in excessively high freight rates on the prairies, in British Columbia and perhaps in the maritimes. We support section 331 which gives the board of transport commissioners the power to go into competitive rates, to require the railroads to name the competing carriers, to show the route over which the competing carriers operate, to show the rates charged and so on.

I was not at all impressed with the evidence given before the committee by counsel for the Canadian Pacific Railway. He told the committee the C.P.R. had no idea who were its competitors or what they were charging. He said the C.P.R. had no idea of the amount of traffic its competitors were carrying, and that it would be absolutely impossible to produce the kind of information asked for in section 331. It is true that the board may decide in its own discretion whether this information should be produced, but this section will enable the board to get from the C.P.R. information which the C.P.R. now says it cannot produce. I believe that if the board of transport commissioners does a good job, under the powers granted by section 331, the C.P.R. and the C.N.R. will be obliged to produce the necessary information about competitive rates. If we are to have equalized freight rates in western Canada without an excessively high freight rates structure the board of transport commissioners will have to do a great deal of policing of competitive rates. It is our hope that the board will carry out its duties under this section.

I should like to refer now to section 18, the subsidy section. Hon. members are well aware that provision is being made for the payment of up to $7 million from the federal treasury for the maintenance of the trackage in the bridge across northern Ontario between Fort William and Sudbury on the C.P.R. I believe that as the new section is drafted the western provinces will derive some real benefit if the board of transport commissioners carry out the purport of that section, which reads:

> (5) The amounts paid under subsection one shall be applied to a reduction in the relative level of rates applying on freight traffic moving in both directions between points in eastern Canada and points in western Canada over the trackage to which the payment relates, in such manner as the board may allow or direct.

As I understand it, this section provides that the $7 million shall be passed on to the shippers by lowering freight rates on traffic going over the bridge.

As I have already said, in my opinion the most important section in the bill is the one on equalization. I, like other hon. members, am no expert on freight rates, but it is my opinion that equalization could be brought about without the $7 million subsidy. Therefore I say that the $7 million subsidy should be used to reduce further the new freight rates for western Canada on long haul traffic. Representatives of the C.P.R. and C.N.R. were questioned, and they felt there was no difficulty confronting the railways in filing rates to bring about equalization. Equalization can be brought about, but when it is established the $7 million should be used to bring about a reduction in rates affecting traffic into and out of the prairie region.

I am glad the bill was amended in the committee to provide that the maritime arbitraries will still be maintained. I know the maritimes have been greatly concerned lest this legislation should affect them adversely. I feel there is ample protection in the bill now for legitimate maritime interests. The maritime provinces have the Maritime Freight Rates Act providing them with a definite reduction in freight rates. My hope is that the $7 million may be used to lower freight rates for people residing in the prairie provinces in the same way that the subsidy now paid under the Maritime Freight Rates Act reduces freight rates for the maritime provinces.

I believe this is a good bill, and I shall be glad to support it; but the main job will have to be done after the legislation is passed. It will be a job for the board of transport commissioners. The railway representatives have said that equalization can be brought about in five years. I would hope it could be brought about in a shorter time, but as far as I am concerned five years should be the maximum time parliament should give the board of transport commissioners to bring equalization into full effect. In a few weeks or less the board will have an opportunity of bringing in new freight rates that I hope will represent a step towards making this legislation effective.

Mr. Johnston: I am somewhat at a loss in starting to speak on this bill on this occasion because those of our Conservative friends who were members of the committee were so mild in their criticism today that I am beginning to be a little bit suspicious. I recall quite well the vehemence they displayed in the committee. Then I think of the chief representative of the Conservative party on that committee, the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra, and I remember that even in the house he is one of those silver tongued orators who could almost cut your throat—figuratively speaking, of course—while he is patting you on the back. I guess he has fallen into that practice because he is a lawyer but I would caution the committee not to put too much faith in the mild attitude he adopted in his first few words on the bill today.

I agree with some of the remarks of the hon. member for Vancouver South. He pointed out that the railways have a difficult problem. We all recognize that. There is not a member of this house or a province of Canada who does not agree that the railways will have to have sufficient revenue to maintain them in a solvent position, and that we need the railways for long hauls and probably will always need them. But the thing about which we in Alberta are concerned particularly—and Alberta is possibly more concerned than any other province over the passage of the bill—is that when the railways want increased revenue they should not get it all from Alberta. That is what we are concerned with, and that is the very point on which I want to caution the representatives of the Conservative party who were on that committee.

They say: "Oh yes, it is all right to have equalization as long as you do not affect us in British Columbia. If the railways need increased revenues let them get them from the province of Alberta. We do not care; that is what has been done all through the years." They say that despite all the handicaps and obstacles Alberta is progressing. Yes, it is; but it is not because of the co-operation of those who are opposing this measure. Certainly we recognize the difficulties confronting the railways, and we want to do our share in seeing that they are maintained in a proper condition. I was interested in the suggestion made by the hon. member for Vancouver South that the western area in British Columbia should be extended farther eastward than Mission. I do not object to that. I was glad he made that remark, but why stop at the British Columbia line? We would like to extend that area into Alberta. We would like to push it on into Saskatchewan.

Mr. Bryce: Don't forget Manitoba.

Mr. Johnston: Yes, Manitoba too. We would like it so well that we would go further and say that the one and one-third rule should not apply. It should be a parity rule. I wonder if the hon. member would agree with that. We do not want to have to pay one and one-third of the transcontinental rates. We think we should have parity. Why should the people of Alberta pay one-third more than the people of Vancouver, British Columbia? The reason is that we recognize the difficulty of the C.P.R. and the C.N.R., and we are willing to co-operate. We are willing to compromise and be soaked another one-third. The British Columbia Conservative members are not agreeable to that. They want us to take all the load. I refer to the Conservative members as a whole because I do not want to be personal about the thing and I do not intend to be, but the members of the Conservative party who were on that committee—

Mr. Ferguson: Speak for yourself. Don't try to be a mind reader.

Mr. Green: May I ask the hon. member a question? Were there any Conservative members from British Columbia on that committee other than myself?

Mr. Johnston: I do not know about other Conservative members from British Columbia, but there were other Conservative members on the committee.

Mr. Ferguson: If you could read my mind you would sit down.

Mr. Johnston: What did the hon. member say?

Mr. Ferguson: I said if you could read what is in my mind you would sit down.

Mr. Johnston: I sympathize with the hon. member for Simcoe North because he has to back up some of the remarks made by his associates before that committee. He really does have my sympathy.

Mr. Ferguson: I am against your remarks voluntarily. I do not have to be.

Mr. Johnston: As long as your remarks are all involuntary it will be all right.

Mr. Ferguson: Well, read my mind and sit down.

Mr. Johnston: I thought the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra went to some pains to point out to the house that there was no great principle involved in this bill. He said there was no great change, so why bother with it at all? In fact I do not think I will offend him if I say that was the attitude of the Conservative party before the committee. We in the province of Alberta think there is a great principle involved in this bill, and we want to see it passed. We know it is not equalization, but we have been suffering from an unjust, unfair and criminal discrimination for the last forty years. Now the Minister of Transport has introduced this bill, and I want to congratulate him. It was a big step to take, especially in view of the criticism he will receive from the official opposition. I believe he is to be commended for taking this step.

When this railway problem came to the fore in Canada, Mr. Chairman, the attack upon it was spearheaded by the province of Alberta, and later by Saskatchewan, Manitoba and even British Columbia. Finally they all agreed that it would be better to have our freight rates problems solved by a royal commission investigation than by submitting the difficulties to the board of transport commissioners. The government agreed with that view and set up a royal commission. When the royal commission was set up and it did not go according to the plans of some of those who had advocated the setting up of the commission, they raised their hands in horror and said, "We do not want this; we would rather trust the board of transport commissioners." Then when it came to improving the board of transport commissioners by increasing their salaries and creating a better board in accordance with the terms of the resolution passed a while ago, the opposition said, "No, leave it the way it was; we do not want it any better." Certainly they do not, because of the advantages they have obtained from the decisions of an overworked and inefficiently staffed board.

We do not take that view at all. We believe that the board should be strengthened and the members given decent wages, even though they be lawyers. This will put the board in a position to make an extensive inquiry into these difficulties, and arrive at a fairer decision. For a moment I should like to read from the royal commission report. All the contending parties agreed that there should be a royal commission. This commission went into the problem thoroughly and brought down a report, and the government have implemented the recommendations of that commission in the legislation which is before us now. Let us see what the report says about some of the problems confronting Alberta. Every province had an opportunity of setting forth their criticisms, and they did —except Ontario and Quebec. These two provinces believed they were in a preferred position because they had water and truck transportation. They did not care what was done, because those two modes of transportation would keep the freight rates down. British Columbia has water rates which it is said should be used to keep their freight rates down. We, therefore, are between the devil and the deep sea, British Columbia and Ontario. They say to us, you fellows in the prairie provinces should be satisfied. You are going to get your throat cut anyway, so which one do you want to cut it, British Columbia or Ontario? That is about the proposition they are putting to us. They believe we are going to sit down and take it. Thank God there is not a Conservative government in power or that is what we would get. As much as I dislike the Liberals, in this case at least they have gone a long way by introducing this legislation.

After a thorough investigation, these are some of the problems the royal commission found were facing the people of western Canada. At page 100 of the report we find this:

> As long as the competition exists the railways should be permitted to meet it. But when meeting the competition creates anomalies of the character indicated above and causes such long standing grievances, it is desirable that a solution be found which will enable the railways to meet the competition and at the same time eliminate, at least to a substantial degree, the anomalies created.

On the same page, under the heading "Recommendations", the report states:

> On the main issue, it seems reasonable to conclude that when the railways give the trader and consumer at the Pacific coast the benefit of fast railway service at rates that are very little more than ocean rates and thus provide them with two alternative services at almost the same price, the consumers in Alberta and other intermediate provinces are entitled to share in an equitable degree in the beneficial condition thus created by the railways.

Surely no intelligent person would contradict that statement. Then, the report continues:

> The influence of any transcontinental rate from the east to British Columbia coast should be carried back in the rates to the intermediate provinces (including points in British Columbia east of the coast) on a basis not more than one-third greater than the transcontinental rate to the seacoast. This is a logical and simple solution to the matter, one which is readily calculated and applied; it recognizes the influence on Alberta of intercoastal competition, but at the same time does not lead to the extreme conclusion that Alberta should have seacoast rates.

A little further on the report states:

> The provinces east of Alberta will likewise benefit from the proposal which is outlined above, since the maximum rate to all points between the point of origin and the Pacific coast area will be subjected to the ceiling of 133⅓ per cent of the transcontinental rate.

Then there is the final conclusion:

> This is all that can usefully be recommended in regard to this much debated question of transcontinental rates and their relation to rates at intermediate points.

The royal commission has gone to so much trouble to investigate this problem, and has come to the conclusion that settling these transcontinental rates at one and one-third should be the proper solution in view of the fact that it will assist all the provinces east of the Pacific coast. The maritimes have a problem. I quite appreciate the maritime position in this respect, and we go along with them in stating that their difficulties should be solved. We agree that they should maintain maritime freight rates, and in the committee the legislation was amended in order to ensure that there shall be no interference with their preferred position in the rate structure.

The big question facing western Canada is, are we going to continue to be a mere market for British Columbia, Ontario and Quebec or are we going to be allowed to industrialize our province in the manner in which it can and should be developed? Or are we to be allowed to industrialize our province in the manner in which we can and should develop it? Surely no one would say, when we speak from a national point of view—and that is the point of view we should have in this parliament—that any part of Canada should be retarded in its industrial progress. Certainly no province should stand up in this House of Commons and claim that any part of Canada, no matter where it be, should be retarded in its industrial growth just in order to give an unfair advantage to some other section of the country. No one can criticize us in Alberta for ever saying that we would not carry our full share of any costs which were involved in helping Canada as a whole. When we rise in this House of Commons and declare that we are entitled to justice, no one should criticize us. I would point out that this bill does not do away with the gross and unjust discrimination that has existed for the province of Alberta for the last forty years. No, it does not do that, and let no one get that idea into his head. Even under this bill we in the province of Alberta are paying one-third higher rates than any other part of Canada, at least any part on the transcontinental line. No, Mr. Chairman, we are not getting anything for nothing. Yet some hon. members have the audacity to stand up here and say: You should wipe out the one and one-third rule. Would they not make a great national party?

Mr. Brooks: Mr. Chairman, I feel that I should rise on a point of order. I was on this committee. The hon. member has stated a number of times that the Conservative party members on that committee voted with British Columbia as opposed to Alberta.

Mr. Johnston: I did not say anything about your vote.

Mr. Brooks: You said that we opposed Alberta. You said that time and time again.

Mr. Johnston: Yes, certainly.

Mr. Brooks: I want to say that I did not oppose Alberta. I opposed it neither by voice nor vote. I may say that my sympathies were more with Alberta than with British Columbia in this matter. My opinion is that my hon. friend is simply trying to run the Calgary by-election here in this chamber tonight.

Mr. Johnston: Now we are getting into elections, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Brooks: Yes. That is exactly what you have been doing.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): We have been there for some time.

Mr. Johnston: May I point out, Mr. Chairman, that I have not been out to Calgary; but the leader of the opposition was out there and took part in the election campaign, as well as some other members.

An hon. Member: You are taking part here.

Mr. Johnston: I recall what I would call some political speeches before the leader of the opposition went west. I can tell you quite candidly, Mr. Chairman, that I am not thinking of any by-election in Calgary.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Johnston: What is one member here or there, compared with the passage of this measure?

Mr. Brooks: Let the hon. member stick to the facts when he is making statements.

Mr. Johnston: Why did you not rise in the committee and give your approval to this section when your colleagues were lambasting it right and left?

Mr. Brooks: There was not much chance for me to do that, as you were talking most of the time.

Mr. Johnston: I am not going to argue about that. I think I had a right to talk, because it was Alberta's interests that were at stake.

Mr. Brooks: Exactly.

Mr. Johnston: I might point out that maritime interests were at stake as well, and Alberta voted to assist the maritime provinces in retaining their freight rate structure.

Mr. Brooks: We greatly appreciated that fact. So did British Columbia, Saskatchewan and every other province in Canada.

Mr. Fair: Kiss and make up.

Mr. Johnston: They went on to argue that we should not insert in this bill anything about the one and one-third rule. That was not what we were arguing at all. I wonder if you will vote—I hope you will and I think you should—when this bill comes up to support section 332B, which gives us the one and one-third rule.

Mr. Brooks: Wait and see before you condemn us.

Mr. Johnston: I hope you do not get kicked out of the party when you do that.

No, Mr. Chairman, this is no laughing matter to us. We have had to make a great fight in the province of Alberta to get any advance in our industrial progress. We have only been able to do it through mighty hard work in the last several years. Now we want to take advantage of this provision; and as far as we are concerned, we are not going to let anybody stand in our road. We intend to get at least a little bit of relief from this unjust discrimination that we have had to put up with so long. It makes me angry, Mr. Chairman, to have people get up in this chamber and say: "You do not want to take this thing too seriously, because it is only a few items that it affects anyway; this one and one-third rule affects only ten or fifteen items which concern you. You fellows in Alberta had better be careful or you will be worse off than you ever were before". When I hear that sort of thing coming from certain sources I take it with a grain of salt because we are still in the difficulty that we have been in for the last forty years. It is an amazing thing when you have people get up and tell you that in this chamber, when the royal commission found that this gross and unjust discrimination existed and brought in recommendations to relieve it to some extent. The government has brought down a bill which will to a degree relieve it. The Canadian National Railways say this bill in principle is good. There is no difficulty in applying the principles involved in the legislation. The only two who are objecting to it are British Columbia and the C.P.R. railway.

Mr. Green: And Manitoba.

Mr. Johnston: Manitoba to a degree. But I would point out that they are not so outspoken in this regard as my friend the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra.

Mr. Ferguson: I thought you said the Conservative party objected to it. Now you have changed your mind. You are forgiven.

Mr. Johnston: No. Do not make any mistake about it. I have not changed my mind about the Conservative party.

Mr. Ferguson: We forgive you. You have apologized.

Mr. Johnston: I have not changed my mind.

Mr. Ferguson: Do not apologize any more. You are forgiven. You made a mistake. We all make mistakes.

Mr. Johnston: We will be able to count the noses when the vote is taken.

An hon. Member: Keep on talking.

Mr. Johnston: The point is that this is no joke for us, Mr. Chairman. It is a matter of our existence, of our prosperity. We want to compliment the government again for taking this forward step. It is the only one that I can recall they have taken, but I think they deserve praise in this one instance. I can assure them that we agree with the principles of the bill. We are going to support it in its entirety, although we want it clearly understood that this does not remove the discrimination. It lessens it, however. It does not bring equality in freight rates throughout Canada.

It is an amazing thing, Mr. Chairman, to hear these people talk about removing this one and one-third rule because it is going to injure them a little bit. In the United States the intermediate points have the same rates as does their coast. Yet we in Alberta, even if this bill is passed, will have to pay one-third more. There is a reason why in the central United States you have industrial growth and expansion far beyond that which we have in Canada; and that is the reason. From a national point of view I think these Conservatives—should I call them that?—should have a broader and more national outlook on this bill and should support it so that it may pass this house unanimously.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, I must thank the hon. gentlemen immediately on my right; it is seldom that I have heard them applaud when I rise to speak. I had not intended to take any part in this debate at this time, but somehow I think the remarks just made by the hon. member for Bow River make it necessary that I should say a word or two. The hon. member has sought to convey the totally false impression that the Conservative party is opposed to equalization and has been opposed to Alberta getting a better deal in regard to these transcontinental rates and the additional amount which can be charged to Alberta. To illustrate that this impression sought to be conveyed is absolutely wrong all we need do is go back to the debate on the motion for second reading. I think I was the only one at that time who spent the entire time he spoke in connection with this matter of the transcontinental rate and the proposal in this bill to allow only one-third more than that as the rate to intermediate points. I would say further that during the last seven years the former member for Calgary West, Mr. A. L. Smith, and I spoke more frequently in this house in connection with doing away with the discrimination as far as Alberta is concerned in connection with freight rates than any other hon. member.

When the hon. member for Bow River was speaking on second reading did he put on the great blast that he has tonight in connection with this matter of equalization? No; practically his entire speech was given over to truck competition and matters of that kind. He barely mentioned this matter. He has suddenly come out as a great champion of it and, as I say, in doing so is attempting to convey the impression that members of the Conservative party are against this; whereas the actual truth, as I have indicated, is that we have more consistently spoken in favour of doing away with this inequity as far as Alberta is concerned than anybody else.

In order to demonstrate just the situation as far as second reading was concerned I will read what I said at that time in connection with this very matter. My remarks are found at page 513 of Hansard. I will not read all my speech, but just one section.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Harkness: I thought that hon. gentlemen to my right would be very much reassured if I made that statement first.

Mr. Stick: Hear, hear.

Mr. Harkness: This is what I said:

> We in Alberta, as I think everyone knows, are at the very apex of the freight rate structure. We pay more than anybody else in Canada. We have agitated for many years for the application in Canada of the decision in what is known in the United States as the Spokane freight rates case, namely, that a higher rate cannot be charged for a haul to an intermediate point than the rate charged for the whole distance. In Calgary, for example, we have to pay up to twice as much to bring a carload of goods from Toronto as it costs to carry the same carload of goods from Toronto to Vancouver. The commission recognized the injustice of this to a certain extent and recommended that the rate to an intermediate point should not be more than one-third greater than the through rate. The bill of course will bring this recommendation into effect through section 7. This is an improvement which I think everyone will recognize, but it still does not remove the basic inequity and the disabilities under which the economy of Alberta has had to operate in the past and under which it will have to operate in the future. I believe we should go the whole way in this matter and apply the so-called Spokane formula in Canada, particularly as far as the Canadian west is concerned.

That was my statement on the matter away back on October 30, and it was just a repetition of statements of the same sort which I have been making here for the past seven years. Any effort at the present time on the part of the hon. member for Bow River to try to convey the impression to this house and throughout the country that the Conservative party has been opposed to a fair deal in freight rates for Alberta is completely false and completely wrong.

Some hon. Members: He knows that.

Mr. Harkness: Why the hon. member should attempt to convey that impression I do not know. It was suggested by the hon. member for Royal that the by-election now pending in Calgary West may have something to do with it. That may be so, but personally I do not think the place to fight by-elections is in the House of Commons. I am sorry the hon. member has made the statements he has and has taken the line of argument he has because what I have said demonstrates quite well that there is no foundation for a contention of that kind.

Mr. Johnston: As I indicated in the committee a moment ago when I was speaking, I do not take this question lightly. It is a question that is of great importance to Alberta. I am going to suggest to the hon. member for Calgary East that if he is so concerned—and I am not saying that he is not—his proper place was on that committee. If you look up the records you will find that there were some Conservative members on that committee whose attendance was not very regular. There is no more important place for a member who is vitally interested in this question than on the committee that is dealing with it; because there are occasions when a section such as 332B could be wiped out in a vote and never come to this house at all. The committee is the place where the work is done, not speaking here a month ago, six weeks ago or two weeks ago, so that he goes on the record and out in the press as one who is a great supporter of a certain section which will help Alberta.

Mr. Ferguson: To hear you talk you would think it is all done there. If all the work is done in the committee why didn't you stay there?

Mr. Johnston: I accept the remarks made by the hon. member for Royal. I am going to say that if a vote is taken on this section I think the hon. member for Royal will support it. I may be wrong in that. I am not so sure about the others. We will have to wait and see.

Mr. Brooks: They do not all have to get up and say it now.

Mr. Johnston: Some of the hon. members who are voicing their opinions now were not on that committee. Hon. members should have seen the tenacity with which some of those who were opposed to this section hung on to every little thing to try to discourage the committee from passing it. I know it is the business of a lawyer to hang on to those points until he gets everyone so thoroughly disgusted that they say: "Oh, well, I guess we had better let it go." This is a serious problem for Alberta, and we do not intend to take it lightly.

Mr. Harkness: The hon. member for Bow River now seems to have changed his attack a little. He is now attacking me because I was not on the railway committee. In answer to that I should like to say that I believe I have been on as many committees as any hon. member of the House of Commons during the last five or six years. I am generally on about nine each year of one sort or another, standing and special. It happens also that this year I am on the combines committee. A man cannot serve on both committees satisfactorily, particularly when they meet at the same time. The hon. member's former attack was completely unwarranted. His present attack on the basis that I was not on this committee is even more unwarranted.

Mr. Ferguson: And ridiculous.

Mr. Pouliot: Can I act as as a peacemaker, Mr. Chairman?

Mr. Knowles: No man is better fitted for the job.

Mr. Pouliot: I will say to both hon. gentlemen who have just spoken that they are among the finest members of parliament, although each does not think the same about the other. But it is true nevertheless.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): What does all that mean?

Mr. Churchill: In view of the remarks that have been made in connection with Manitoba and the Conservatives, perhaps I might say a word or two—

Mr. Pouliot: If I may be permitted on a question of privilege to say just a word, I said that of two hon. members; I do not promise to say it of a third one.

Mr. Churchill: I would like to assure the hon. member that everything I am going to say now follows exactly along the line that he has suggested to us. The first is that we maintain a proper sense of proportion, and that we do not get into a violent argument as between western provinces. We have other enemies to fight. I think our position could be put quite clearly. However, I would like to say this before I come to the particular point raised by the hon. member for Bow River. I appreciate very much the importance of the railway committee. I think that has been my most valuable experience here this fall; and I agree with everything that has been said as to the importance of the freight rates structure, and the need for an understanding of it. I agree with hon. members who paid tribute to the royal commission. In my view it performed a most valuable function and has enlightened all Canada with regard to these important freight rates.

The effect of the bill is only that of partial equalization. We must recognize the fact that we had pointed out to us that 41·1 per cent of the railway freight traffic is concerned with matters not affected by this bill at all. Therefore equalization is not over the entire system. Nevertheless the measure of equalization contained within the bill is most agreeable to Manitoba, something that province has been after for years. It meets with the approval of Manitoba. I will say that my opposition in committee was directed only to section 332B, and was based upon representations made by the Manitoba government—and it is not a Conservative government.

I represented in the committee the views of the Manitoba government that were brought to our attention by the representatives who appeared before the committee. I believe their point was fairly well taken. We have heard the statement tonight that Alberta's interest is at stake. Well, Manitoba's interest is at stake; and it is only right that each representative should speak for his own province. Perhaps, as in some other instances, the solution would be by way of compromise. That is all that was suggested in the representations from Manitoba, namely some modification of this particular section. When it comes up for discussion we can deal with it in more detail.

That is all this great fight is about; and it seemed to me it was magnified tonight by the remarks of the hon. member for Bow River. Surely it is only right and proper for provincial representatives to emphasize the stand taken by their respective provinces. We may not win our point. Perhaps the solution offered in the bill is the one which will be adopted. All we are saying is that if that is adopted, then for a long period of time there will be complaints from other provinces. Complaints that are now being satisfied in respect of one province will be replaced by those of another province. I think a more moderate solution to this problem could have been devised. I have sympathy with the problem in Alberta. I am not blind at all to the difficulties under which they have been labouring.

Then, with regard to the salaries of the commissioners, the suggestion was thrown out that we opposed the increase because we are generally dissatisfied with the bill, and things of that nature. Well, it struck me as rather odd that in this House of Commons, where on some occasions it is so difficult to get support for people who are in actual need, we can quite easily and quickly hand out thousands of dollars to people who are not in any particular economic distress. I was not impressed by the argument that another two or three thousand dollars given to certain individuals would result in better work on the part of the board, or would necessarily result in obtaining more valuable people later on. Surely there are people in Canada who, as a public service, will accept positions on boards as important as this without necessarily worrying as to whether the salary is $10,000, $12,000 or $25,000.

Generally I approve of the bill. My opposition to it will be expressed chiefly with regard to section 332B, and I shall reserve my right to have something to say when that section is before us. I do, however, reject the suggestion that there is afoot a campaign to do harm to Alberta. On the contrary, I suggest that so far as Manitoba is concerned some better solution for this problem is desirable. It could very well be a compromise, and could be achieved in a peaceful manner.

Mr. Green: Will the minister explain the provision for the chief commissioner? I refer particularly to the terms of the bill which make him a supernumerary judge of the exchequer court upon his retirement. As I read the Railway Act, as it stood before the introduction of Bill No. 12, the provision with respect to the exchequer court was almost the opposite of the provision in the new bill. That is, it dealt with the case of a judge of the exchequer court becoming chief commissioner, and not losing his rights as an exchequer court judge by reason of the transfer.

I may be wrong in that, because there are only certain sections of the Railway Act appearing in Bill No. 12. It would appear to me, however, that the approach in the present instance is just the opposite, in that the chairman can be brought in from the outside and then, after he resigns or is retired, he automatically goes to the exchequer court whether that court requires judges or not. He continues to receive the salary of an exchequer court judge until he reaches the age of 75 years. Am I right in my contention that there is an entirely different approach under the bill?

Mr. Chevrier: No, there is not an entirely different approach, because the former chief commissioner also held the position of judge of the exchequer court. He was first appointed judge of the exchequer court, and thereafter became chief commissioner.

In this instance subsection 2 of the amendment clearly sets out that the salary of the chief commissioner will be paid, under the Judges Act, from the appropriation the Minister of Justice brings down. He will be paid as a puisne judge of the exchequer court, and for all purposes he will be a puisne judge of the exchequer court. But the difference between his salary as chief commissioner and his salary as a puisne judge will be paid through the appropriation of the Department of Transport. I would draw to the attention of the hon. member the fact that the former chief commissioner held both positions, just as the present chief commissioner holds both positions.

Mr. Green: The minister is referring to Mr. Justice Archibald?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes. All subsection 2 does is clarify the position. It is not a new approach. Both the former chief commissioner and the present chief commissioner were chief commissioner and puisne judges of the exchequer court at the same time.

Mr. Green: Is Mr. Justice Archibald now a judge of the exchequer court?

Mr. Chevrier: He has resigned as chief commissioner and is now a judge of the exchequer court.

Mr. Green: Could we be in the position of there being several former chief commissioners of the board of transport commissioners all of whom would be entitled under this legislation to be judges of the exchequer court?

Mr. Chevrier: No, there can be only one chief commissioner of the board of transport commissioners.

Mr. Green: If the present chief commissioner resigns in five years he will automatically become a judge of the exchequer court and remain as such until he reaches the age of 75 years. His successor could do the same. As I read the proposed amendment, when a chief commissioner retires he automatically becomes a puisne judge of the exchequer court.

Mr. Chevrier: That is right.

Mr. Green: And continues as such until he reaches the age of 75 years.

Mr. Chevrier: That is the position.

Mr. Green: Why is it necessary to have a provision of that kind? Why could they not be covered by a pension scheme? Why do they automatically go to the court?

Mr. Chevrier: This does not change the position that prevailed heretofore. It simply makes the present incumbent's position the same as that of his predecessor; he is chief commissioner at the same time he is a puisne judge.

Mr. Green: Could the minister give the salaries of other officials who come under his jurisdiction? I would like to know the salary of the deputy minister of transport; the salary of the members of the Canadian maritime commission; and of the members of the air transport board.

Mr. Chevrier: The salary of the deputy minister is $13,500; the salary of members of the maritime commission is $10,000; I think the chairman of the air transport board receives $12,000, while the members receive $8,000.

Mr. Green: The figures I have are $12,000 for the chairman of the air transport board and $9,000 for the members.

Mr. Chevrier: Perhaps there was an increase from $8,000 to $9,000.

Mr. Green: I have the chairman of the maritime commission receiving $12,000, with the ordinary members receiving $10,000. I have figures indicating that the chairman of the Canadian pension commission under the Department of Veterans Affairs receives $12,000 and his deputy $10,000, with the ordinary members of the commission receiving $9,000. In the case of the war veterans allowance board, the chairman receives only $9,000 while the ordinary members are paid $7,500. Vice-presidents of the research council get only $10,000. The chairman of the board of grain commissioners is paid $12,000, while the ordinary members of the board receive $10,000. The amendment brought in by the government today seems to make the salaries to be paid out of line with the salaries paid to other officials holding similar positions. How can we justify differences of that kind?

Mr. Chevrier: I gave some reasons earlier today why the government was disposed to accept the recommendations of the committee. The first was that the royal commission on administrative services had recommended that members of the board of transport commissioners should receive at least $2,000 more than members of other boards. That explains the discrepancy in the salaries the hon. member has referred to. I indicated also what was said by the royal commission itself. Otherwise there would be a great discrepancy between the salaries paid to members of the board and the salary of the chief commissioner.

Mr. Knowles: I believe I heard the minister state that the salary of the deputy minister of transport is $13,500. I have in my hands the estimates for the current year and they indicate that it is $12,000.

Mr. Chevrier: There has been an increase to $13,500.

Mr. Knowles: How does he get a raise without our hearing about it?

Mr. Brooks: Just before the recess at six o'clock I asked for the dates of the appointment of the commissioners and the dates of retirement. The minister gave a partial answer and I understood him to say that he would give a complete answer later on.

Mr. Chevrier: I could not get it during the recess, but I will give it to the committee when this bill comes up again.

Mr. Follwell: Provisions of sections 1 and 2 of the bill are to come into effect on the first day of January, 1952, and there would then be a vacancy for the position of puisne judge of the exchequer court.

Mr. Chevrier: No.

Mr. Nowlan: I think we should have the information asked for by the hon. member for Royal before this section carries, because it certainly goes to the question of whether the board is being strengthened. If members of the board who have been recently appointed or reappointed are going to continue to sit from six to ten years, without making any comment as to their qualifications as being strong or otherwise it is obvious that we will not be strengthening the board by increasing the salaries. I have not the recommendations of the royal commission before me, but as I remember they recommended or said that the best way to strengthen the board was to extend the tenure of office of the members and make the appointments for life on the basis of good behaviour.

I think the minister referred a moment ago to a vacancy on the board and said that an appointment is to be made. I assume that arises from the retirement of Mr. Justice Archibald. That would leave a vacancy in so far as maritime representation is concerned. I should like the minister to advise when an appointment will be made and if the regional basis of appointment is to be recognized?

Mr. Chevrier: When an appointment is made it will be announced by the government.

The Deputy Chairman: Do I understand that, with the exception of subsection 3, section 1 can be considered as carried?

Mr. Green: No, nothing is carried yet.

The Deputy Chairman: It is now understood that the general discussion under section 1 is completed?

Mr. Blackmore: No, there is no indication that we have finished discussing section 1.

The Deputy Chairman: It has been the practice that a general discussion is held on the first section, and for the last few minutes specific questions have been asked. Before we break up I should like to have an understanding that when we open up the discussion again it is understood that the general discussion is over.

Mr. Blackmore: We want it definitely understood that the general discussion is not completed. Certain members got the floor and started to ask questions, which prevented other members continuing the discussion.

Section stands.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Tomorrow we will resume the debate on the address, and we hope to have a vote on the amendment to the amendment moved by the hon. member for Acadia.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): What do we do if it is not finished by the end of the session?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Pardon?

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): What do we do if it is not finished by the end of the session?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): We had plenty of work today. Today is an indication of the work we have.

Mr. Chevrier: When is the end?

Mr. Knowles: How long is a string?

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to the order of the house passed on November 2, 1951.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Wednesday, November 28, 1951

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

PRIVILEGE

CONGRATULATIONS TO MR. MEEKER ON BIRTH OF DAUGHTER

Mr. P. T. Hellyer (Davenport): I rise on a matter of personal privilege. I would like to take this opportunity, on my own behalf and on behalf of hon. members on all sides of the house, to congratulate my successor as the youngest member of this house on the occasion of the birth of a daughter to Mrs. Meeker at Toronto yesterday.

COMMITTEES OF THE HOUSE

DEFENCE EXPENDITURES—COMBINES LEGISLATION —CHANGES IN PERSONNEL

Mr. W. G. Weir (Portage-Neepawa) moved:

That the name of Mr. Adamson be substituted for that of Mr. Pearkes on the special committee on defence expenditures; and

That the name of Mr. Blair be substituted for that of Mr. Churchill on the joint special committee on combines legislation; and that a message be sent to the Senate to acquaint Their Honours therewith.

Motion agreed to.

TAX AGREEMENTS

CANADA-UNITED STATES—ADDITION OF PROTOCOL DEALING WITH EXCHANGE OF RATIFICATIONS, ETC.

Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 28, to amend an act to amend the Canada-United States of America Tax Convention Act, 1943, and the Canada-United States of America Tax Convention Act, 1944.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. McCann: The purpose of this bill is to amend the act passed by parliament in 1950 amending the Canada-United States of America tax convention.

The amendment is to add the protocol dealing with the exchange of ratifications signed at Washington on November 21, 1951. The protocol is set out as a schedule to this bill and is self-explanatory.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

ST. JOHN AMBULANCE—ALLOCATION OF FUNDS IN CIVIL DEFENCE APPROPRIATIONS

Mr. Hees:

1. How much money has been allocated for St. John Ambulance training in Canadian civil defence appropriations?

2. What proportion of such will be allotted to the local defence of the Toronto and York district?

Mr. McCusker:

1. Authority has been given for an expenditure of not more than $99,000 for the training of civil defence workers in basic and advanced first aid through the facilities of the St. John Ambulance Association.

2. The amount to be allocated to individual target areas from the total amount allotted to each province is the responsibility of the province concerned.

NOVA SCOTIA—WAGES PAID BY MINE OPERATORS

Mr. Balcom:

Has the labour department appointed anyone to follow the inquiry set up by the province of Nova Scotia to study matters pertaining to wages as paid by independent mine operators?

Mr. Cote (Verdun-La Salle): The Department of Labour has not appointed an officer to "follow the inquiry" which is being conducted by the province of Nova Scotia into the wage rates and other matters affecting the operations of the independent coal mine operators in the province, but the department's officers in Nova Scotia, as a matter of routine, will be closely in touch with the inquiry.

GOLDEN SYRUP—IMPORTS FROM EIRE

Mr. Balcom:

1. Was any golden syrup imported since January 1, 1951, into Canada from the Irish Sugar Company, Mallow, county Cork, Eire?

2. If so (a) what quantity; (b) at what price; (c) what are the dates of customs entry?

3. Was entry made through the port of Halifax?

Mr. McIlraith:

1, 2 and 3. Golden syrup not classified for statistical purposes. No information available in the dominion bureau of statistics.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

FOOD AND AGRICULTURE ORGANIZATION—CANADIAN REPRESENTATION AT ROME MEETING

Mr. Balcom:

1. How many delegates will accompany the Minister of Agriculture when he attends the FAO meeting at Rome?

2. What are the names of delegates and the departments with which they are connected?

3. Will there be a representative from the fisheries department?

4. If not, for what reason?

DEFENCE PRODUCTION—CONTRACTS TO VARIOUS AUTOMOBILE FIRMS

Mr. Thatcher:

1. Since June, 1950, what was the dollar value of contracts placed with each of the following companies: (a) Ford Motor Company; (b) General Motors; (c) Chrysler Motor Corporation; (d) Studebaker of Canada?

2. What is the value of the equipment that has been actually turned over to the defence forces, from each company?

HEALTH GRANTS FOR RESEARCH PURPOSES

Mr. Knowles:

1. What were the terms of each application for a grant for research purposes, made by the provinces under the federal health grants program since January 1, 1950, in those cases where such applications were refused, as specified in sessional paper No. 86-A of November 22, 1951?

2. What was the reason for the refusal in each such case?

GOVERNMENT EMPLOYEES—WEEKLY WORK PERIODS

Mr. Knowles:

1. What groups of employees working for agencies of the federal government, but not civil servants, are on the five-day week?

2. How many employees are involved in connection with each such agency?

3. How many weeks per year, in 1949, 1950 and 1951, have civil servants been on a five-day week?

4. Have representations been received by the government, since January 1, 1950, for the five-day week for civil servants the year round? If so, from whom?

5. What consideration has been given to such representations?

6. What progress is being made by the government in getting ready for a five-day week for all civil servants and all government employees?

AIR TRANSPORT

PURCHASE OF AIRCRAFT FROM ENGLAND

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr.

Howe) or his parliamentary assistant. Is the report correct that the government has ordered two jet-powered Comet airliners from the de Havilland company of England? If so, why was this aircraft preferred over the Avro jetliner developed by A. V. Roe Canada Limited with substantial government assistance? Have any orders been received for this Avro jetliner?

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Defence Production): In the absence of the minister may I say that notice of the question has just come to my attention. I would prefer to let the question stand as notice, and give an answer later.

Mr. Coldwell: Very well.

WHEAT

ASSISTANCE TO FARMERS—MEETING IN REGINA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Prime Minister. Has he received a report from the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) of the meeting he held in Regina with provincial government representatives and farm leaders on methods of assistance to western farmers? Is the Prime Minister in a position to announce financial aid to farmers on unthreshed grain as forecast by the Minister of Trade and Commerce on November 15?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): The answer to both questions is no.

POSTAL SERVICE

PARCEL POST RATES TO FORCES IN KOREA AND EUROPE—SPECIAL FORCES LETTER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gordon Graydon (Peel): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Postmaster General, of which I have given notice. What are the rates for parcel post from Canada to our forces in Korea and in Europe, and what is the maximum weight of each parcel that can be sent? Is the government giving consideration to reducing these rates and increasing the weight of parcels which can be sent?

Hon. Edouard Rinfret (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the hon. member for having given me notice of his question. Whereas the civilian rates for parcel post from Canada to Korea range from 40 cents for one pound to $2.10 for ten pounds, the rate for the services is 15 cents a pound. This was introduced in October, 1950. About three weeks or a month ago we extended the same privilege at the same rate to our forces in Europe. The maximum weight of each parcel is ten pounds.

The answer to the second question is no.

Then, if I may be allowed, I am proud to be able to announce a special forces letter to be introduced on December 1, 1951, available for air communication to and from forces overseas, regardless of location. They are similar in form to our Canada air letter, but buff in colour. They are at present being distributed to all post offices, and will be supplied free to mailers upon request. The postal rate will be 5 cents as compared with 15 cents at the present time for one-quarter ounce to Europe, and 15 cents for the Canada air letter to Europe.

MING SUNG INDUSTRIAL COMPANY

USE OF CANADIAN FLAG

On the orders of the day:

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, in view of the answer given in sessional paper 167-A, which was a reply to certain questions of the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Pearkes) and a copy of which I have just received, I wish to ask a question of the Prime Minister, of which previous notice has not been given, but in regard to which he will have the facts available, without notice.

Has the government rescinded the order in council permitting certain ships operated by the Ming Sung Industrial Company Limited to fly the Canadian flag and have the privileges which this affords?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the answer at this time is no. The ships have not returned to Hong Kong, and it is not known by us just where they are at this time. Negotiation is going on with the representatives of the Ming Sung Company of Canada Limited. They have been informed that those ships cannot be allowed to carry on under Canadian registry, and as the banks have the mortgages registered against them the negotiations look to the transfer of register where there could also be transfer of registry of these mortgages. I have not within the last few days had any report as to the progress that has been made, but I know that these negotiations are on. Meantime representatives of the Ming Sung Company of Canada Limited have been informed that we cannot allow the ships to continue to operate under the Canadian flag.

Mr. Drew: I suggest to the Prime Minister that the information he has given and the fact that the Canadian government does not know where these ships are now is all the more reason why permission to fly the flag should be cancelled immediately, and this shameful question brought to an end.

CHINA

INQUIRY AS TO PROHIBITION OF EXPORT OF CANADIAN FUNDS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. K. Fraser (Peterborough West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Justice. On January 31 of this year and November 15 of this year I addressed questions to the Minister of Finance in regard to prohibiting the export of funds to communist China. The parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance on November 16 gave an answer which was not very satisfactory. I am asking the Minister of Justice now whether, owing to the fact that Chinese in Peterborough have had demands made on them to the extent of $5,000 and $2,500 within the last two or three weeks, from relatives in China, he will look into the matter and see what can be done.

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): I would say in reply to the hon. member that we have already some time since looked into the matter. Since the blackmail in question takes place entirely within communist China, with which at the present time we have no diplomatic connections, it is difficult in this country to do anything about preventing blackmail in China.

Mr. Fraser: Owing to the fact that wires have been sent direct to these Chinese in Canada something should be done about it, something to check on it.

Mr. Garson: The hon. member has indicated in his first question that these demands came direct to citizens in Canada from relatives in China, and not from people who are blackmailing them. Therefore it would be difficult, I suggest,—and I think the hon. member would agree, upon reflection—to take any action within Canada which would prevent the commission of a crime in China.

Mr. Fraser: I know where amounts up to $9,000 have been demanded. Is there not some way that this money can be stopped from going to communist China?

Mr. Garson: I would be prepared to accommodate the hon. member in that regard, but I think that is a question which should be directed to the Department of Finance.

Mr. Fraser: Then I direct it to the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance.

Mr. James Sinclair (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Finance): The answer that I would give today is exactly the same as the answer I gave at an earlier time. The only effective way to stop money going to China would be for the United States government and ourselves not only to stop all remittances to China but to have a complete postal censorship as well to stop bills being sent. Obviously that is impossible under present circumstances. There is another feature which has been raised by the Chinese in Vancouver who are suffering from these blackmail attempts. There are many families in China who are dependent upon the weekly or monthly remittances made by heads of families in Canada who have lived here for many years, and to cut off all remittances would cause great hardship to these families.

Mr. J. H. Ferguson (Simcoe North): I should like to address a question to the Minister of Justice. Does he not think that the attitude of the House of Commons in connection with this particular Chinese question reminds him of the attitude of the Liberal party when the Ming Sung situation was first brought up?

Mr. Garson: The answer is "no".

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed, from Monday, November 26, consideration of the motion of Mr. Robert Cauchon for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Drew, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Quelch.

(Translation):

Mr. Raoul Poulin (Beauce): Mr. Speaker, in rising for the second time to take part in the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne, I wish to say a few words in favour of the amendment to the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch) requesting an increase in the amount of war veterans allowances.

In the constituency of Beauce, which I represent, it is known that I am pacifist in the proper sense of the word, and that I am opposed to this war psychosis which sometimes seems to be artificially, even deliberately, brought about.

Nevertheless I have the greatest admiration and the deepest sympathy for those who generously offer their lives for their country which they believe to be threatened or attacked.

At Remembrance day ceremonies held November 11 in the constituency of Beauce, I had the opportunity of reaffirming in the presence of hundreds of local veterans the admiration I personally feel for them and the feelings of pride the people of the whole constituency have towards them.

Wreaths were then laid by county officers, and by each of the parishes, at the foot of a splendid monument erected to the glorious memory of the Beauce county men who laid down their lives in the two world wars.

The perfectly organized ceremony was most touching. Whoever has not heard of the Chaudiere regiment's exploits really knows very little about the heroic history of French-Canadian servicemen. However, colourful ceremonies such as these remind us that our departed heroes left behind widows and orphans who need our help.

They also remind us that among those who survived the great adventure are some who can no longer earn their livelihood under normal conditions. Well, it is the duty of the state to be generous towards them and to remember that glory is not sufficient to quell hunger and to protect from cold and hardship.

I am therefore very happy about the statement made in this house by the Minister of Veterans Affairs on November 16. According to his statement the basic rate of veterans pensions will now be increased from $94 to $125. This, in my humble opinion, is very acceptable.

In the case of the married pensioner, the allowance to his wife will be increased from $31 to $45, which again seems very good to me.

In the case of children, however, I must voice my disapproval because the increase is practically insignificant, being only $1. The amount is increased from $19 to $20 for the first child and the others seem to have been forgotten. It is about the same in the case of widows' children.

I am quite satisfied with the 33 odd per cent increase in the pension to widows of pensioners.

I feel it my duty, however, to tell the government they should have laid more emphasis on child welfare, through a more substantial allowance, one in keeping with the new pensions granted to the father or mother. This would have enabled veterans and their families to live a more normal family life.

The minister will allow me, I presume, to call his attention to a matter which I consider very important. On the very day the minister announced the amendment to the war veterans Pension Act, the member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) asked if adopted children would benefit to the same extent as the others. The minister replied that he would gladly consider the matter. I am glad the minister did not answer immediately. If this question had been answered in the negative in such a Christian and civilized country as Canada, it would have been most unfortunate. I now urge the minister to study all the aspects of the problem before giving a definite answer.

The minister, whom I know as a man of sound ideas and for whom I have great respect, will surely not deny that the question of adoption is of primary importance in Canada and particularly in the province of Quebec. There is to this problem a moral as well as a social and in some respects even an economic aspect which our statesmen are in duty bound to scrutinize before coming to a decision.

As far as I am concerned I humbly and honestly believe that by all means adoption should be generally encouraged and favoured. One feels pity, and rightly so, for stateless aliens. How then can one remain indifferent to the undeserved misfortune befalling young children in this country who are without parents, without a family, without a home. Their past history does not matter. They are human beings like ourselves; they have a soul and a mind like other people; they are the work of a single and universal Creator; they are Canadians and we are in duty bound to treat them as such. Fortunately, the acceptance of this duty provides, of itself, many consolations and deep happiness for those who are willing to fulfil it generously. There lies, for the government, an excellent opportunity of proving that they consider spiritual concepts as important as material concepts. I am therefore certain that the minister will meet no difficulty in convincing his colleagues in the cabinet that an allowance must be granted for adopted children, as it is for others.

Mr. Speaker, I wish to add a few words about a subject which, to my mind, is equally very important. I refer to the pressures now being exerted by Canadian milk producers in order to have the tariffs raised on imports of vegetable oils used in the manufacture of margarine.

It will readily be admitted that margarine constitutes a threat to the security of the butter market in Canada and consequently to the whole dairy industry, of which it is the main item.

Last April I quoted certain figures which I do not intend to repeat but which seemed, at the time, to be fairly conclusive. I have received more than 500 cards from the farmers of Beauce constituency, asking the government to protect the dairy industry against the admittance into Canada of vegetable oils. It seems to me that our leaders should study this request. Customs duties are raised all around to protect all kinds of manufactured goods. Why, then, should farmers not be allowed to claim for themselves tariff protection for a product essential to their survival? The farmers are a basic element in this country. Let us not jeopardize the economic security of our people by neglecting to take the necessary means to protect an essential part of our production.

The federal authorities are now considering the complaint made by Canadian textile manufacturers, to the effect that the dumping in Canada of 140,000 pairs of cotton gloves manufactured in Czechoslovakia is threatening the Canadian manufacturers. They are quite right. In my opinion, the Canadian textile worker must be protected and I am all the more interested in this because the constituency of Beauce has both large and small textile mills. I therefore hope the government will be in a position to settle the problem to the greater advantage of the Canadian manufacturer, of course, but especially for the protection of our workers who, otherwise, would suffer from unemployment and distress.

But why, then, should the same thing not be done to protect the product most essential to eastern Canada's agriculture? It seems to me that to consider seriously the problem is to have already solved it in part. I am convinced that milk producers generally will not have appealed in vain to the generosity of the government and of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) in particular.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I would like to discuss briefly a subject which is of great importance to the people of Quebec, I mean the report of the Massey commission on national development in the arts, letters and sciences.

At the time of confederation Quebec had refused legislative union in order to be in a better position to keep its characteristics intact and to keep on shaping its future in accordance with such characteristics. Of capital importance among these were education and teaching, so much so that the fathers of confederation took the trouble to write them out in section 93 of the British North America Act, thus making sure that that particular point of the mutual pact could never be modified in the future without the mutual consent of the contracting parties. Who will dare state that Quebec is ready to change that? Who will dare claim that the province of Quebec is ready to surrender to federal authorities part of its exclusive rights in the field of education at any level?

The report of the Massey commission can change nothing in this condition because the commission is not and has never been authorized to speak on behalf of Quebec. The scholarly lucubrations of a member of that commission, though he be from Quebec, will change nothing in it.

Mr. Cote (Matapedia-Matane): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Poulin: I would rather not be interrupted, if you please. Problems such as schooling or education, academic schooling or popular schooling are too important, too essential to a people's soul, to be solved by playing on words or quibbling. Academic culture reflects the intellectual life of a nation, and popular culture the abundance of this life. The one is inseparable from the other, they are complementary. One represents the trunk, the other the branches, and the branches cannot be severed from the trunk without killing both. What standards will be set in determining which should be at the provincial level and which at the national level?

The Massey commission recommends assistance to the universities after agreement with the provinces. Why did it go into that problem after stating at first it was beyond its purview? And since they decided to study the problem after all, why did they not go the whole way and show that our universities are in a bad way because the central government draws too great a share of the people's taxes, leaving the provincial treasury practically empty? In this regard, I cannot help quoting an article written by Andre Laurendeau in Le Devoir of November 20 last.

I quote:

> Having ascertained the financial difficulties of universities, the Massey commission did not wish to go further. On the contrary, it suggested that the central government do likewise, that is go beyond its jurisdiction and actually do away with the provinces and take over, with its billions, the field of strictly academic education.
> The Montreal chamber of commerce had suggested that the commissioners remind the central government of its duty of enabling the provinces to act, by the return of a substantial part of their tax fields.
> But the Massey commission carefully avoided this and thereby revealed its intentions.
> It speeds up the wheel of centralism, introducing centralism into a field where one never dreamt it would dare intrude: in the field of education. It seeks to introduce it into a position until then strongly guarded.

The commission proposed, it is true, an agreement with the provinces. But why seek agreement in a field of exclusive jurisdiction? If there is really no other way of proceeding, —and I cannot believe it is so—let the state give unconditionally and refund to the provinces what it has taken from them.

Mr. Lesage: The election fund!

Mr. Poulin: The remark of the hon. member for Montmagny-L'Islet (Mr. Lesage) is out of place. I am trying to stay above petty politics. In that connection, may I say that I have heard in this house speeches oozing with electoral anxiety. I am trying to rise above that and I shall not comment further on my hon. friend's remark.

Some may say that universities are willing to accept and even request federal aid which, sooner or later, in my humble opinion, will entail state supervision and control. My answer to that is that we forget the old saying: "It is no use preaching to a hungry man." I might add that a hungry man has no eyes to see. Besides the universities though, a large number of individuals and groups in Quebec are not so hungry that they have not kept their eyes and ears open and are unwilling to accept this logic in reverse. I might quote a few, for instance the Rev. Father Richard Arès, S.J., who said this:

> The Massey report is full of the generous intentions of its authors, but this generosity, after all, leads Canadians into temptation, by inviting them to admit into their own spheres of activity the state, and the federal state at that. There is a danger here that they will no longer be masters in their own house and will be like those people who let into their tent the proverbial camel.

I am also referring, without mentioning their names, to many journalists who contribute to the magazine Relations, to the Liberal Winnipeg Free Press, not to mention the University of Montreal Alumni Association, the Student Federation of the University of Montreal, the Montreal branch of the Societe Saint-Jean-Baptiste, the Federation of Junior Chambers of Commerce of the province of Quebec, the District of Montreal chamber of commerce, Mr. Rene Chaloult, independent M.L.A. for Quebec county, as well as others, and, finally, the Catholic Farmers' Union of Quebec, whose opinion—

An hon. Member: They haven't read the Massey report.

Mr. Poulin: —whose opinion, to my mind, is very important, since I have almost limitless faith in the common sense of our farmers.

We know what is going on today in the field of radio, which is controlled by a corporation of the federal government so dear to the heart of the members of the Massey commission. When the federal state has usurped the field of education, is it not to be feared that what is happening now in the C.B.C. will happen there and that we will be unable to make it stop?

I think that perhaps—and this will undoubtedly please the hon. member for Montmagny-L'Islet—we shall never have a central government better disposed about these matters than the one we have now. This statement, I hope, will also satisfy the hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Arsenault) who sees nothing but electoral concern in the views of those who express themselves freely on this admittedly debatable issue.

Mr. Lesage: That is unfair.

Mr. Arsenault: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Beauce should not ascribe such intentions to me. I do not ask him to withdraw his remarks but I wish to point out to him that it is not courteous to ascribe such intentions to one of his colleagues.

Mr. Poulin: Mr. Speaker, perhaps I have misunderstood the meaning of the remarks made by the hon. member for Bonaventure. He was evidently speaking with much more warmth than today. However, I have read his speech in Hansard and I gathered from certain portions of his speech that he accused those who opposed the conclusions of the Massey report of having an eye to the electorate. If this interpretation is not in accordance with what he said, with great pleasure and great generosity towards the member who has interrupted, I withdraw what is false in my statement.

Mr. Arsenault: Hear, hear.

Mr. Poulin: Only yesterday, in this house, the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) gave us proof of his good will on a matter of this kind. Strangely enough, I do not hear any protest from the members opposite when I praise the government.

Mr. Arsenault: Which government?

Mr. Poulin: The present government.

Mr. Arsenault: Where?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Poulin: I wish to quote yesterday's Hansard. In reply to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) who asked whether the government had given consideration to extending federal aid to education generally, the Prime Minister replied, and I quote from page 1355:

> I do not know that any such representations have been received. While I have the responsibility as the head of the government I would have to ask my colleagues to join with me in refusing to consider such a request.

In spite of the question asked by the hon. member—and there was nothing shameful in asking it—I believe the Prime Minister and leader of the present government was fully justified in taking the position he has just taken. That is why I have no apprehension whatever as far as the present government is concerned. But the Prime Minister and the present government are not eternal.

A Conservative government which might one day replace it, and which I would also believe to be well-disposed, under its present leader would not be any more eternal.

And then? And later? In 25, 50 years, what ideas, what principles or sense of opportunity will guide those statesmen who will then be at the helm in our country? I am not in the least concerned whether they be red or blue or even colourless, but how can we be sure that these men will be as full of good intentions as the present leaders of our great parties?

An hon. Member: Never!

Mr. Poulin: And should they not be well-disposed would they not be then provided with the most dangerous weapon ever? That is, to my mind, the very crux of the matter. We already know the past too well. Do we not have good reason to be worried about the future?

At the present time, even though the government is composed of well-disposed men, we see the officials of the C.B.C. allowing the airwaves to be used to warp altogether the education we wish to give to our children. What would it be if we had an ill-disposed government?

For instance, does Rev. Father Levesque, one of the commissioners, consider there is any appearance of common sense in letting a Chisholm, a Freud or a Cameron and others, with their materialistic and atheistic theories, use the facilities of the C.B.C. to indoctrinate the children of Canada and tell them the cause of our trouble lies in the fact that a distinction is made between the concept of good and the concept of evil? I speak subject to correction, but that is not what the good Father teaches. What means has he at his disposal to call a halt to such a scandal or to prevent its recurrence, if ever we succeed in bringing it to an end? What tactics does he suggest so that these nauseous outbursts will stop poisoning the air our children are breathing? Since he claims popular culture comes under the jurisdiction of the federal government, is he prepared, at least, to point out a few steps we could take to bring an end to such a state of affairs? Does he know where we should go in Ottawa, to meet a few bureaucrats or executives who might be in a position to understand the Quebec point of view?

Are we, in this respect, to be as successful as the member for Chicoutimi (Mr. Gagnon) and the member for Three Rivers (Mr. Balcer) were, when they asked for a wider use of French in our armed forces?

Is it not realized that in all these matters that deal with the very soul of a people there are always persons or circumstances that might seriously embarrass a government, even the most favourably disposed?

I am thinking of British Columbia, where the provincial government refuses to grant a charter to a Catholic university. Such is their conception of human rights and respect for minorities—

Mr. Arsenault: It is the provincial government which refuses that.

Mr. Poulin: —which certain public men talk about ad nauseam!

The time has come to remedy a situation already jeopardized. And those who, speaking authoritatively, would have us believe that the central government has something to do with education and culture may well be responsible for encouraging that same government to deform and even to vitiate that which the provincial authority—the rights of which it has usurped—had been entrusted with, to keep, consolidate and perfect.

Mr. Speaker, I wish to state publicly that if I have mentioned here the name of Rev. Father Levesque, it was in his capacity as a member of a commission appointed by the government to deal with a matter of public interest. As the representative of a county it is my right and even my duty, I believe, to concern myself with that matter because I represent here parents who after all have the first say in the matter of the education of their children. I wish to assure Rev. Father Levesque and everybody, including the hon. member for Bonaventure, that after having accomplished a duty which was painful to me, I still have for that distinguished member of the clergy and for all other members of the clergy the same profound respect and the very high consideration that I have always tried to show them much more by my deeds than by my words.

May I add a few more words in reply to an allegation which was made in this house on November 19 by the hon. member for Kamouraska (Mr. Masse) and which is found at page 1171 of Hansard:

> When I see that for political reasons—

Such words evidently struck me.

> —the words of that worthy representative are quoted and an attempt is made to contradict them and to make people believe that he no longer holds his former beliefs, I am dumbfounded.

Mr. Speaker, I shall answer that by declaring that no political reasons have prompted the few remarks I am making today.

I am fairly well acquainted with the member for Kamouraska. I esteem greatly that very fine gentleman. He is a university professor who honours his faculty.

I am sure that he did not mean to be unfair and that his words went beyond his thoughts. Otherwise I would be compelled to quote good old Boileau:

> Can so much venom enter into the soul of such a sanctimonious man?

Mr. Speaker, I realize that, in endeavouring to be brief on this matter of the Massey commission, I have not by far covered the whole ground. I trust, at least, I have not been unfair to anyone.

[Mr. Poulin.]

Mr. Balcer: Would the member for Beauce allow me a question? When he said, a few moments ago, that the members of the present government were favourably inclined towards the minorities, did he have in mind the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton)?

Mr. Poulin: I may have been misunderstood. When I said the present government was favourably inclined, it was mostly as regards education.

Mr. Edgar Leduc (Jacques Cartier): Mr. Speaker, it had not been my intention to take part in the debate on the speech from the throne. If I do so now, it is to give my views on two questions that have been discussed at some length in this house. I mean inflation and price controls.

May I first be permitted to associate myself with the congratulations previous speakers have tendered to the mover and seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne (Messrs. Cauchon and Simmons). They were well deserved congratulations and I am indeed proud and happy to repeat them personally.

We have heard members of the opposition talk about inflation and the high cost of living. They have even suggested resorting to controls, on the grounds that they were in force and proving beneficial in the United States.

According to many economists, price controls would prove neither useful nor commendable, in view of the widespread effects of the rise in prices in all countries. Only the people can put a stop to it.

What are the causes of inflation?

Who is adversely affected by it and to what extent? What can we do to put an end to it?

Inflation is not the cause of high prices. It is a result of price increases. Unless this fact is clearly understood by the millions of people concerned, their efforts to check inflation will be futile. Even economists cannot agree amongst themselves on a definition. Inflation is a result of the fact that people at the present time have enough money to buy many more goods than are available.

The amount of money available has tripled in ten years, while the production of goods has only doubled.

Thomas B. McCabe, chairman of the Federal Reserve Board, has said:

> Price and wage controls only serve to hide the source of inflation. There is a danger in that. By concealing the source, there is a tendency to weaken the people's will to get at the real cause of the evil. That is the danger today.

While admitting all this, there are some who say: I do not like high prices but I have never been as well off as I am now. That is no argument.

Thanks to the progress of science and to inventions, people now enjoy the benefits of increased production and better goods. If the workman produces more, more goods are available. Production would have been just as great without inflation.

The practical way to fight inflation would be to put in a day's work in proportion to the salary received. If everyone did that, we would have not only more goods but cheaper goods. We could thus produce better quality goods and offer them at better prices, while allowing a fair margin of profit to the manufacturer. They would not then be tempted to profiteer. Then we could avoid unnecessary expenses. Economy begins at home. This is no time to make non-essential expenditures. Certain expenditures could be postponed by the municipalities, the provinces and the federal government.

Above all we must save. Compulsory savings would be an effective weapon against inflation. It would be better to deprive ourselves now of a part of our income than for our widows to be barely able to live a few months on our insurance policies.

In closing, may I quote an article by William R. Biggs, the vice-president of the Bank of New York. This article is about controls in the United States and it compares the stand taken by the Canadian government to that taken by the government of the United States.

It deals with inflation and economy in the United States. I quote:

(Text):

Before we go to the direct methods of control, it is interesting to contrast our indirect controls with those of our neighbour, Canada. Canada has enacted additional personal and corporate income taxes and various sales and excise taxes, but has so imposed this additional taxation that almost 45 per cent of the increased tax revenue has been obtained from sales and excise taxes. Furthermore, Canada has not only had a surplus in every year since the war, but expects to have a surplus in the fiscal year ending March 31, 1952—and a substantial one in relation to the size of her budget. Her national debt has been reduced over 15 per cent since 1946.

Canada not only has increased her discount rate from 1½ per cent to 2 per cent, but she has been realistic in the matter of encouraging savings. Recognizing the importance of accelerated public saving, she has increased the rate paid on her savings bonds by about one-half of one per cent. In other words, Canada has acted upon the necessity of higher interest rates as part of a program to contain inflation. Again in Canada really tough instalment selling terms have been laid down. As just one example, the down payment for a new or used automobile is 50 per cent with only twelve months to pay.

Because of the concentration of banking into a few large banks in Canada, with branches throughout the country, the Canadian credit control system, which seeks to limit bank loans to last year's levels, has been particularly effective.

Canada has also adopted a very ingenious plan for discouraging unnecessary capital expenditures. No depreciation on new construction or new equipment will be allowed as a deduction for income tax purposes for a four-year period commencing April 1, 1951, except in certain categories considered essential to defence or basic to national development. This should prove to be, over the long run, an extremely effective way of reducing unnecessary capital expenditures and, hence, should relieve the strain on the supply of raw materials.

These indirect controls add up to an effective program which has some real teeth in it. They have also the great advantage over direct controls of not requiring a great build-up in bureaucracy to operate and enforce them. In connection with the effectiveness of the Canadian program, it should be realized that inflation in Canada, as in the rest of the world, is affected most importantly by rising prices in this country.

Our indirect controls in the United States have been so inadequate that we have turned to direct controls. Our direct control system is built around the allocation of raw materials, price and wage ceilings. Had we set ourselves the task of attempting to control the prices and distribution of a limited number of essential raw materials, there might have been some hope for the success of such a program. Our planners, instead of proceeding on a selective basis, have put most of the economy under their so-called price and wage controls. There is obviously little or no hope of enforcing such controls under less than all-out war conditions. From our experience after the last war we all know how difficult it was to control prices, particularly without rationing. But this should not have surprised us, as such has been the experience of controllers over hundreds of years.

(Translation):

According to a foreign economist who should know, Canada did well and is winning admiration abroad.

Why then these repeated criticisms whereby the opposition tries to have people believe nothing is going well in this country? If we consider our present situation and the present difficulties caused by the cold war and the defence preparations necessary to our protection and our survival, these criticisms should not be taken seriously.

In most cases I have found that the criticisms of the opposition were directed at the fact that the government was not spending more on many projects.

We find proof of this in their constant request for higher expenditures for national defence and for increased grants, while they regret the inadequacy of old age pensions.

In other words, the opposition would have the people believe that it is ready to give them more than the government is prepared to give. However, they also criticize the taxation set-up, which shows the inconsistency of their criticisms.

I am convinced that the Liberal government is doing its best under present circumstances and I am pleased to give it my humble support.

(Text):

Mr. Alistair Stewart (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, a few years ago, the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) when he was secretary of state for external affairs made a speech in Hamilton. He was speaking to the politics club of McMaster university. In the course of his address he dealt quite extensively with the matter of housing, and he gave us his opinion as to how the housing problem, which is greater now than it was then, should be tackled. But what was clear and explicit in his speech was the fact that he was opposed to subsidized housing. The right hon. gentleman said:

> I'm against subsidized housing because it would be available to a few privileged ones.

Of course there he showed a complete lack of knowledge of the whole philosophy behind the concept of subsidized housing; for it is not designed to help the privileged ones but rather the underprivileged. He went on to say:

> It would be risking temptation to put into the hands of politicians a few thousand houses which could be given to certain persons. It would be a temptation to buy votes.

That was rather an unhappy aspersion, I suppose, upon his own colleagues; but I did not believe it then and I do not believe it now because of course subsidized housing would be handled by the municipalities or else by the provincial governments concerned. I point that out to show that the right hon. gentleman was sincerely opposed to subsidized housing and yet the government of which he is the head today is prepared to support subsidized housing. In other words, the right hon. gentleman changes with the years, as does the party of which he is the head.

The interesting fact about the Liberal party is that it thrives on theft. The more ideas it can steal from the C.C.F. platform the happier it is and the more successful it seems to be. I have no objection to that whatsoever when those ideas lead to increases in the welfare of the Canadian people; but I think it only fair to say that the Liberal party does resemble somewhat a jackdaw in its acquisitive instincts. But yesterday the Prime Minister made another categorical statement. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) asked him in effect what was the government's approach to federal aid to education. The Prime Minister again spoke quite forthrightly and he said as reported at page 1355 of Hansard:

> While I have the responsibility as the head of the government I would have to ask my colleagues to join with me in refusing to consider such a request.

Or to put it in a more peremptory way, the answer would be no. Well, I have no doubt that within a few years' time—this is not a matter of prophecy; it is a matter of fact—whatever government is in power in Canada will be entering into negotiations with the various provinces to assist education, not in the sense that anyone will attempt to take away one iota of provincial jurisdiction in the matter of education; but the fact is that the provinces and the municipalities need help if we are going to have the same high standard of education that we desire across this country. And so I think once again we shall find the Prime Minister—if he is then Prime Minister—eating his words. We shall again find the Liberal party espousing causes which were first of all presented to the house by this group, the C.C.F. party.

With respect to the demand for federal grants for education, let me place on the record this letter to which the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre referred yesterday, and which the four Winnipeg members of parliament received from Mr. A. F. Allden, secretary-treasurer of the Winnipeg school board. It states:

> Dear Sir:
> Re: Federal government grants to education
> I beg to inform you that at the regular meeting of the school board held on the 20th instant, the following resolution was adopted:

The letter is dated November 23, 1951.

> "Whereas the burden of taxation is becoming a problem to the small home owner in the city of Winnipeg;
> "And whereas the aid received from the provincial government of Manitoba toward the educational costs of Winnipeg is almost negligible;
> "And whereas the educational costs are a large part of the Winnipeg city budget;
> "Now therefore be it resolved that the Winnipeg school board request the federal government to extend grants in aid to education and that a copy of this resolution be forwarded to all Winnipeg members of parliament asking them to support this request at this session of parliament."

Of course we do request that. I have already informed the Winnipeg school board that my colleague, the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Knight), who has led this fight for federal aid to education, will carry on that struggle again next year.

Another matter about which I wish to speak is the plight of recipients of war veterans allowances. I support wholeheartedly the amendment before the house. In this connection I should like to read again part of the brief presented by the Canadian Legion. One of the most interesting facts about briefs which have been presented by the Legion to various parliamentary committees has been their dignity and their air of reasonableness in the requests for those things they consider right and proper, which I am sure the rest of us consider in exactly the same way. The Legion recommended:

1. That the basic rate of our war veterans allowance be increased to $50 a month for single recipients and $100 a month for married recipients, and that the income from other sources be permitted up to $250 for a single person for a year, and $500 for a married one.
2. That where a recipient is permanently and completely unemployable and has no other income, the W.V.A. rate be $60 for a single person and $120 for a married veteran.
3. That consideration be given to the plight of children whose parents are on W.V.A.
4. That W.V.A. benefits be extended to Canadian veterans living outside Canada.

The reason for these grants or allowances is that those who receive them are suffering ill health today because of service in the forces. But their incapacity is such that they cannot obtain a pension. I am sure every hon. member has on his desk many piteous letters setting out the plight of these people.

Meantime the government continues to do nothing. The attitude of the government toward these people is nothing short of niggardly. Today a married veteran under this allowance receives $70, whereas before the war he received $40. But that $40 bought much more than the $70 he receives today. It is pointed out in the brief that the Legion is asking $50 for single returned men and $100 for married men.

Why do they do that? The answer is that they must receive that minimum because of the government's fiscal policy. It has decided not to introduce any controls or subsidies to curtail the cost of living. As a matter of deliberate policy the government is permitting prices to rise and those who are on pensions and allowances are suffering most severely. If the government is prepared to carry out this policy, then it ought to be prepared to fulfil its obligation toward those who are receiving these allowances that is to increase their purchasing power.

The only answer we get is that there will be a committee next year to study the matter. The need is going to be great next year, let there be no doubt about that. But it is just as great today. Many of these people cannot afford to wait until perhaps next June, when a committee may give its approval to some increase. If the government was prepared to increase the amount paid to war pensioners, then there is no reason why it could not have gone ahead and increased these allowances under the War Veterans Allowance Act.

As the hon. member for Melfort (Mr. Wright) pointed out the other evening, those who are in receipt of these allowances are individuals who contributed in no small way to the welfare of Canada. They have contributed through their years of service and through impaired health, and they have a moral right to ask for greater consideration than they are now receiving.

I do not know why the government is not prepared to yield to the request of the Legion and the request of many hon. members that this allowance be increased. It cannot be a lack of money. Obviously, we are going to finish up this year with a large surplus and there would be more than enough to pay an increase in war veterans allowances. Nor do I think the reason is expenditures on defence. We realize the money being spent on defence is an essential expenditure; but let us remember also that we have a responsibility to those who are in need today, the very men who defended us.

Mr. Rodney Adamson (York West): Mr. Speaker, I rise to discuss a problem of great importance, one with which I shall deal through the medium of a single case. I refer to the whole question and problem of security and loyalty. I shall refer in detail to the case of one Robert Jackson, to which I referred briefly on an earlier occasion in the house. In discussing this matter I shall require to use a certain amount of evidence now before me, and I trust hon. members who are present will bear with me while some of this material is placed on record.

I had considered moving the adjournment of the house to discuss this matter, because its importance far transcends the single individual with whose case I shall deal this afternoon. I would also suggest to the government through you, Mr. Speaker, that at this session, owing to the fact that there is no budget, private members do not have the opportunity to raise grievances. Without a budget there are no motions to go into supply and therefore no opportunities to express these grievances.

I speak therefore in this debate on the speech from the throne, despite the fact that at the present time speeches at this stage of the debate have about the same effect as spitting into the Pacific ocean would have in raising the level of that body of water. The fact that there are only twenty-four members in the chamber at this time, only four more than a quorum, emphasizes my point.

I shall recapitulate briefly the facts concerning Jackson. He was discharged from the A. V. Roe Company in Malton on the orders of the security officials of the department. He was given no reason whatsoever for his discharge, and all attempts he has made so far to find out the reason for his discharge have failed. I might add that all attempts I have made through the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) have also failed, because of the policy of the government.

I believe that policy is wrong, that it is basically unfair and unjust and, furthermore, that it does not improve either security or loyalty. In fact it is the very opposite. I left Malton this morning where I was interviewed by one or two people whose names unfortunately I cannot give. They told me that the case had caused considerable unrest among the workers in this defence plant.

After Jackson saw me I took the trouble to go into his background. He served for approximately four years overseas with the Royal Canadian Artillery. I took the trouble to find out from his officers of that time and his associates what they thought of him and with your permission there is certain information which I think would be useful that I should like to place on the record. The first letter I have is from his former commanding officer, Colonel C. D. Crowe, who at the present time is the director of development, department of travel and publicity, government of Ontario. I would not mind tabling this letter if any hon. member wishes me to do so, but I have it here and to save time I shall read the pertinent parts. Colonel Crowe says:

I believe you have taken interest in the case of Mr. G. R. Jackson, 699 Jane street, Toronto, who was recently dismissed from his employment at the Avro plant, Malton, for alleged security reasons, the nature of which he has been kept in ignorance.

I will not recount the details of the case as I believe you have them in full. The iniquity of the matter to me seems to lie in the brush-off this man got at the hands of the security official he succeeded in interviewing at Ottawa.

This official, Jackson states, displayed complete familiarity with his army file, and after talking around that for a while, came out with the statement that the grounds for dismissal had nothing to do with army service but with some alleged devious activity Jackson is supposed to have indulged in in England.

He would not elaborate. My own suspicion is that some ill-wisher has placed a statement on Jackson's record under a promise of anonymity.

At my suggestion, I see that Jackson has given his story to the local press some days ago. I am writing now at his request to express the hope that you will pursue this matter to finality and to tell you that in my belief you can do so with complete confidence as far as Jackson's character is concerned. I simply cannot picture him in the role of communist sympathizer, and I am sure his spare time in England was devoted to his own amusements, like most soldiers, and not to attending subversive meetings.

[Mr. Adamson.]

I commanded his unit for four months in Canada and then for two years in England (11th Canadian Army Field Regiment, Royal Canadian Army). When he came into my office I immediately remembered him very clearly. In my time he had the rank of lance-sergeant and was employed as a "gun-position officer's assistant" which called for a fair education (plane trigonometry) and general reliability and know-how.

I remember dealing summarily with two or three charges against him—overstaying leave, leaving the guard room when in command of a guard and things of that order. His main fault was probably being too mouthy but there was nothing sly about him—a plain extrovert.

I have questioned him at some length here and have formed the conclusion that in this case the present government's celebrated "screening" machinery has slipped badly and that injustice has been done. This injustice could only be corrected if officialdom would come clean and tell the man what they have against him and give him a chance to refute or explain the allegation.

I am certain that in taking up his case you are on sound ground.

Yours very truly,

C. D. Crowe
Lieutenant Colonel RCA (Ret.).

I have another letter from a personal friend of mine, W. E. Fleury, of Fleury and Arthur, well-known architects. Mr. Fleury writes to me personally as follows:

Dear Rodney:

I understand from Jackson that you are investigating the case of his dismissal from the A. V. Roe Canada Limited on grounds of alleged subversive activities in England during the last war.

He dropped into my office on Friday last, November 16, and mentioned that you would be pleased to receive any comments which I—as a former officer of his—would care to make to you.

Jackson was a member of the battery in which I enlisted in December, 1939, and had become a lance-sergeant (C.P.O.A.) before the time when I left the regiment in January, 1941.

During that time there certainly was no indication of any extra-regimental activities by Jackson to my knowledge, and I have since spoken to one or two officers who were in the regiment at that time, and they have indicated that they were unaware of it—if any such activities were taking place.

I may say that Jackson carried out his duties efficiently, and if any criticism were to be made, it would probably be that he had a tendency to be a bit of a barrack-room lawyer and a trifle oververbose at times.

I should be pleased to hear from you, if it is not too much trouble, whatever developments arise out of your enquiries. For while naturally one cannot know all the circumstances concerning a man's activities outside of the regiment, I should be very surprised to learn that Jackson was indulging in subversive work during the time when I knew him in the regiment.

With kindest regards

Yours very sincerely,
W. E. Fleury

I have another letter from Professor J. Fisher of Victoria University. He states that he is a professor of English and was visited by Jackson who had served under him. He then goes on to say in part:

What I have to say about him (Jackson) relates to the year 1940 only. On Dec. 14 of that year, I was posted to OCTU as an officer cadet, and I eventually served with the 1st Fd. Regt. But although I did not to my knowledge see him again while we were overseas, I was in close and continuous contact with him during most of 1940. The big events of that year, you will remember, were Dunkirk and the battle of Britain; throughout the critical months involved, Jackson and I were in the same regiment, the same battery, the same troop, and the same command post; and in view of the fact that all of us were being kept on the alert against fifth columnist activities as well as against invasion, it is hardly likely that Jackson could have done anything suspect without my knowing it.

He then goes on to give his opinion of Jackson, and continues:

I have made every effort to remember anything at all that might cast suspicion on Jackson's reliability in the insecure world of 1951. Having done so, I cannot recall any such thing. It is significant that when I read his letter to the press, I concluded that some other Jackson must be the man in trouble.

I remember, as his only fault, that he could be stubborn. But stubbornness is a good fault in a soldier, and Jackson was stubborn in a harmless way.

I have another letter from R. B. Dale-Harris of McDonald, Currie and Company, well-known chartered accountants in Toronto, who says:

Dear Mr. Adamson:

It has come to my notice that there has been a considerable amount of disturbance and discussion over the dismissal of a certain employee of the A. V. Roe Canada Limited, one Jackson by name.

I have no knowledge of Jackson's present standing in the community nor do I know whether or not he has any particular political leanings. He was, however, well known to me in the army in 1940 and 1941 when he was serving in the same unit as I in England. At that time he was a satisfactory and dependable soldier, and I should have expected him to become a responsible and loyal citizen on discharge.

In the hope the above may be of some use to you, I am

Yours sincerely,

R. B. Dale-Harris

There are several others, all from responsible persons. There is one from an N.C.O. who served with him. I think it is pertinent to quote the last paragraph. He says:

The state of affairs indicated by this case should be adequately corrected and in a hurry for the protection of the public. Since I doubt most decidedly that anyone can openly point to anything subversive in regard to Jackson, he should be immediately reinstated in his job with suitable public retraction and reimbursement to clear his name. Please note that time counts with the small man. He cannot wait for weeks and months for justice to function. Jackson is already heavily out of pocket. I and my friends will be following closely the steps taken to correct these inroads on our democratic ways and to get justice for Jackson in particular.

Yours very truly,

K. Cooper
ex L/Sgt. 9th Bty., 11th Cdn. A.F. Regt.

The addresses are all given in these letters. I think that shows that at least there is a very grave question as to the position taken by the government. His commanding officer, battery commander, troop commander and an N.C.O. who served with him, as well as others who know him more recently, have come to me because I was interested in the case and have said that they know nothing subversive whatsoever about Jackson. Apparently he is being accused of some sort of activity that took place during the war and no opportunity has been given this man to refute these allegations which have cost him his job and his livelihood.

The whole question of loyalty and security is a matter of enormous importance to this house and the people of Canada. In my capacity as a security officer during the war I had a lot to do with the matter of security and loyalty and I am perhaps in a position to discuss this matter with a certain background and knowledge of the problems at stake. I want for the sake of illustration to put on the record part of an article in the form of an interview appearing in the U.S. News and World Report of November 23. It is an interview with Hiram Bingham, chairman of the United States loyalty board and is entitled, "Catching the Disloyal". He gives certain very definite answers to questions which I think are of great importance to us in Canada.

I am not one who advocates that we should in any way follow what they are doing in the United States. In fact I have been, if anything, one who believes in our standing on our own feet more than we are. However, they have this problem and they have been trying to meet it. They have had it to a far more serious degree than we have in Canada, and I commend to the house the whole article and the answers given by the chairman of the board. It reads in part:

Q. As chairman of the loyalty review board, Mr. Bingham, your work is to review the work of the 100 or more loyalty boards—is that right?

A. Our first job is to lay down rules and regulations so as to make the whole procedure of the loyalty program uniform. The department and agency boards had been doing different things, so we were instructed by the president to lay down the rules and regulations for the entire program. Also we are the highest board of appeal for any persons adjudged ineligible by lower boards and by the heads of the different departments and agencies. Also we review under what's known as "post audit" cases that are cleared by the lower boards after full field investigation.

Q. Your board doesn't have any investigating machinery itself?

A. No. The F.B.I. is the sole investigating agency under the loyalty program. Loyalty boards don't investigate; they weigh the reports received from the F.B.I., hold hearings as necessary and decide loyalty cases.

Q. You have two main considerations, loyalty and security?

A. No, we have nothing to do with security.

Q. What is the difference between the two as you see it?

A. Security is much broader than loyalty.

I shall come to that in a minute. Then the interview continues, and I shall read only a few of the pertinent questions and answers.

Q. What about all this that you hear about some employee being accused and not having any information given to him as to where the charges arise from?

A. Those cases, so far as I have been able to discover, are mostly in the security field, where you don't have to give specific charges, where under the law the head of any one of the ten departments and agencies mentioned, and any others the president may put in, may be told by his security officer—they all have security officers—that he is a "security risk". The head of the agency may suspend him. I have known of cases where a man got a letter telling him that he had been suspended and the reason that he had been suspended was too confidential to tell him. There is something wrong about that, but that has nothing to do with loyalty.

There again you see that the question of dismissal on security grounds also exists in the United States, but when anybody is dismissed in the United States he has an opportunity to state his case, not through the loyalty board but through the officials of the security board of his own department. That is bad enough, but in Canada a man so discharged gets no opportunity at all to state his case to anyone. The article continues:

Q. Why isn't your board empowered to consider the security risk?

A. The president, in the last paragraph of executive order 9835, says, "You will have nothing to do with security cases".

Q. But why is that?

A. It may be because the acts of congress relating to security matters gave the authority to dismiss for security reasons to only a few departments and agencies, whereas the order establishing the loyalty review board is more comprehensive.

Q. Wouldn't it be better if just one board did it?

A. It would be much better, in my opinion. There are a number of times when our panel is in doubt about a person but cannot say that there is a reasonable doubt.

Then it goes on to discuss communist agents and the futility of administering an oath of loyalty to anybody who is a communist. I will not read that part but it is of great importance. I come now to the actions of the board, and it reads as follows:

Q. They have what they call "security officers"—

He is referring to the individual departments of the United States.

—in a department, for example. Do their reports go to a loyalty board?

A. No, that's security. But in most departments it is the same board. In the state department the board is called the loyalty and security board. The commerce department is the only one that separates them, and has a loyalty board and a security board.

Q. Such a double board, then, might know from security channels damaging facts that could be used in judgment on the loyalty question?

A. Yes.

[Mr. Adamson.]

Q. Does anybody keep any check on the disloyal former employees, what becomes of them afterwards, where they go to get jobs, whether they drift back into these communist-front organizations?

A. No.

Then it goes on, and I will read one more passage. It is as follows:

Q. How do they (the discharged employees) make a living?

A. Having chosen to act in a manner which led the loyalty review board to find a reasonable doubt as to their loyalty, they have put themselves in a very bad position to get a job requiring loyalty . . . and find it extremely hard to get subsequent employment.

Q. When they are dismissed from the government, they are dismissed because they are assumed to be dangerous, or disloyal, and then they go somewhere else to get a job where they might continue their disloyalty?

A. They have to try to get a job. We never publish the names. We give no publicity to any of our activities. If there's any publicity, it is all given by the man himself or his counsel.

Mr. McCulloch: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege may I ask if the hon. member is supposed to read from a magazine to such an extent that the quotation constitutes the whole speech?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member has been reading quotations from a magazine. I think he has given the quotations and is coming to the end.

Mr. Adamson: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I am coming to the end shortly. I am doing this in order to show the set-up of the loyalty boards and the security machinery in the United States. This is hardly an editorial. It is merely the statement of the head of the loyalty board in the United States. It goes on to say that a man, if discharged for security or disloyalty reasons, has great difficulty, and in fact finds it impossible to get a job after he has been so discharged. I continue the quotation:

Problem of unfairness

Q. But can't there be some way for all the problems to be dealt with centrally?

That is, loyalty and security.

A. The only criticism that I have to make of the program as it is at present is that the individual has no right of appeal from a decision on security outside the agency. If the security officer makes up his mind that this person is a bad risk, that person can be heard by the agency, but—perhaps you remember in the middle of July the president decided that this question needed investigation by the national security council. He is the chairman of it himself. About the middle of July he wrote a letter to the executive secretary of the national security council, asking the council to investigate the question of security and the charges of unfairness, and to make recommendations to see if anything should be done about it.

In the United States you have the question raised about unfairness but there, if a man is discharged as a bad security risk, he has an opportunity to appeal and to be heard by the security board of the department in which he is employed. Nothing like that procedure exists in Canada. He has no opportunity at all. He is discharged and he has no redress and no opportunity to answer, not charges that he knows of but charges that he does not know of. In my opinion that is an intolerable miscarriage of justice. As to the question of loyalty and security, there are basic differences between them but both can be treated by the same machinery. I want to say that nothing I propose to suggest will in any way give away the hand of the security officers or the subversive activity officers engaged in the various departments of government or in the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. The thing can be done without in any way disclosing the operations of any undercover individual who may be working at the present time in Canada.

There are today three basic freedoms: freedom of life; freedom of the person, generally known as habeas corpus; and the freedom to work. To take away any of them in this modern age results in a failure of essential justice. In fact, it is much worse; it is the act of a dictatorship. Today if a man is discharged for security or loyalty reasons he finds it virtually impossible to obtain further employment. When he goes to a prospective employer the first questions he is asked are: Where did you work before? Why did you leave? Then the immediate answer to the employee discharged for security reasons is: Oh, we want no communists here; and that is the natural answer. The result is that the man does not get a job. Unless that man has an opportunity to hear the charges raised against him, and answer them if he can, it is impossible for him to obtain a livelihood in Canada today. If he is a communist, I have no mercy on him. He is a declared enemy of mine, and nothing I can do or would advocate doing to keep him out of our society could be sufficiently drastic. But it is basic that you cannot accuse a man of anything, and thus deprive him of his right to make a living, without letting him know what he is accused of doing. That, Mr. Speaker, is a basic principle of justice. It is the third great freedom; and in this economic age of our civilization it is as basic as the other two.

I want to make a suggestion to the government, and it is this. I suggest that there be established panels of personnel available to sit on security and loyalty boards, and that no man be discharged for security or loyalty reasons without having an opportunity to state his case before one of those boards. I would suggest that the composition of those boards be something like this. I suggest that there be set up in the department in question a panel of personnel from which the boards may be chosen. In other words the Department of National Defence would have a panel of personnel who could be drawn on to form the membership of these boards; the Department of Defence Production would have a panel of personnel, as would the Department of External Affairs and the other departments necessarily doing secret or what has been called classified work, from which personnel can be drawn. Second, I suggest that the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) have a panel of personnel drawn from persons of probity known to him and possibly known either through the mounted police dealing with security or legal counsel or others of good repute and sound judgment. I suggest that the third panel be chosen by the Speaker of the House of Commons. It need not necessarily be chosen from members of the House of Commons, but I feel that it should contain a fair number of members of this honourable house; because if there is any function we have today in Canada, and if there is any function any freely elected parliament has, it is to protect the freedom of the individual. The freedom of an individual can be in jeopardy from his own government just as easily as it can be in jeopardy from the government of an outside power. I suggest that these three panels be set up. When there is a case for investigation, one member from each of the three panels could be chosen as a board to review the case. The evidence against the individual could be given to the board, and he could appear to reply. Under this system there need be no disclosure of the methods by which the evidence was obtained. The board would deal with the case of each individual who appealed against his dismissal.

Under this method, Mr. Speaker, you would have security through the departmental member of the board who would know the type of work being done by the individual; you would have loyalty through the board member appointed by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson). Furthermore, through the appointment by the Speaker of this house you would safeguard the liberty of the individual. My knowledge of security, loyalty and subversive activities during the war was reasonably extensive. As district intelligence officer for the largest military district in Canada my office worked with the mounted police, who were entirely responsible for loyalty, security and subversive activities. The fact that there was so little subversive activity in Canada during the war illustrates the effectiveness of the methods adopted by the mounted police, yet at no time do I remember a man being held without explanation. Essential justice for the individual was maintained during the war. Under this system justice for the individual is not being maintained. The government now can take away a man's livelihood; can make him a pariah amongst his fellows; can destroy his reputation and make him a social outcast; can take away his ability to earn, without ever letting him have an opportunity of answering the unknown charges which are made against him.

In all seriousness I say to this house it is an act of vicious dictatorship, perhaps thoughtless but nevertheless an act of dictatorship. If we are to carry on our fight against communism, we must continue our fight for freedom, justice, security and for the dignity of the individual. If we allow these things to be destroyed through the methods I have mentioned we are in very truth giving aid and comfort to the enemy.

Mr. R. E. Anderson (Norfolk): I must apologize, Mr. Speaker, for entering this debate at this late date, but there are a few matters I should like to bring to the attention of the house. I shall not take very long. This is my first attempt to bring my own county of Norfolk to the fore, and to speak for other tobacco growing counties within Canada.

First of all I should like to speak about tobacco growing in my area. The crop is grown on land that was submarginal or nonproductive for any other crop. This same submarginal land, and the tobacco growers, have contributed much to Canada's national economy. The hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McIvor), for whom I have great respect, had a resolution on the order paper earlier this year dealing with the evils of cigarette smoking for the very young. His points were well taken, but I am afraid tobacco is here to stay. This product does provide employment for a great number of people.

The business of growing tobacco started a good many years ago in Norfolk. For the first few years the venture was a failure, or nearly so. However, my people determined that they would not be beaten, and we have now one of the best flue-cured tobacco growing districts on the continent. Up to and including those first few years all flue-cured tobaccos were imported. At first sales for processing were carried on in large centres outside the province.

Several years ago this government started the dominion experimental substation at Delhi under Mr. Vickery. I believe this government should be complimented, because the station has done wonderful work by introducing new varieties that have stepped up the quality and production generally. In 1951 approximately 100 million pounds of tobacco were grown and sold within my own county.

Tobacco growers usually have to borrow money from the banks in order to cover the expense of growing their crops. The entire year's income is determined by one sale that lasts only a few minutes or at most an hour or so, usually with only a few buyers present. These farmers are in the same position as a labourer who works a full year without pay, borrows from the bank in order to live, and then takes whatever he can get at the end of the year, whether or not it is sufficient to repay the bank. Many of our growers find themselves in the position of not having enough to do that.

Today we have large tobacco processing factories in Simcoe and Delhi which employ hundreds of men and women. We have to contend with a short growing season and late spring frosts that sometimes ruin an entire planting. I recall that in 1949 the first planting froze; the second and third plantings dried out, and some farmers made a fourth planting before they got a stand of tobacco. These people would not be beaten. They worked all the daylight hours, not just an eight-hour day. Grandpa and everyone who could carry a plant or use a spade worked. Any touch of frost on tobacco ruins it and makes it unfit to cure. If it does go through the kiln once it has been frozen, it becomes so brittle it cannot be handled. The harvest cannot be hurried, and the crop must be taken as it ripens. A leaf that is too green is no good. Then there is hail and dry weather. All during the summer something was always happening to someone to spoil his crop. Wages are high, running as high as $13 a day in some instances, but generally $10 to $12. When a man employs ten to twenty workers you can see that it takes a lot of cash each day. This year the crop was sold at reasonable prices, even the part grown by the free-lance growers who are not in the Ontario tobacco growers' marketing board. I am thinking about the future.

That brings up the matter of cigarette prices. You can all remember that previous to the last war cigarettes retailed for 20 cents per package of twenty, and for a short time twenty-five for 20 cents. The price is now 42 cents in most of Canada, running as high as 46 to 47 cents in some provinces. The 42 cent price is arrived at by taxation, the manufacturers' part and the trade. There was a manufacturers' increase this year of 3 cents, which brings the price, other than taxes, to 17 cents in Ontario. This 17 cents is almost as high as the price at which United States cigarettes sell. Our own tax here is higher than the United States price per package. The two added together amount to twice the United States price.

This brings up the question of smuggling. I am afraid it is on the increase, despite all the good work carried out by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, who have so few men to cover the whole boundary line and check the smugglers from the United States who see an opportunity to make money by carrying to our side of the boundary millions and millions of United States cigarettes. Hundreds of thousands of these smuggled cigarettes are seized each year, as well as many cars and trucks, and sometimes teams of horses used in smuggling. We started out many years ago importing our entire needs, and grew from that to be an exporting nation. Great Britain takes large amounts each year. Now again we are importing tobacco in the form of United States cigarettes, illegally I admit, but just the same the fact remains that we are now again importing, and this should not be so.

I maintain, Mr. Speaker, that our own market should be kept as nearly as possible for our own growers and manufacturers, and our manufacturers should watch their own prices as well as the government tax. If you will permit me I should like to read an editorial from my own paper, the Simcoe Reformer, under date of November 26, which reads as follows:

> It is evident that tobacco growers are not the only ones to suffer by reason of slumping cigarettes sales, the result of excessive excise taxes. Press reports during the past week have announced that a sizeable group of employees were laid off by the Tuckett Tobacco Company in Hamilton, while in Montreal more than 200 employees of the Imperial Tobacco Company are joining the ranks of the unemployed and a similar lay-off in the company's Hamilton plant is anticipated. This serious situation is a direct consequence of exorbitant government taxation on Canadian-made cigarettes coupled with the wholesale smuggling of United States cigarettes into Canada. Withdrawals of cigarettes for consumption in Canada during September were down nearly 50 per cent, indicating the severe nature of the body-blow to the tobacco industry. Growers, manufacturers, employees, retail dealers and consumers are all being seriously affected by the excise tax of 62½ per cent levied by the federal government.

I do not know where this paper got that information, but they thought it was right.

One of the chief reasons our tax structure is so out of line with the United States is that when our own budget was brought down last April there was a bill before the United States congress proposing a sharp increase in cigarette taxation. This bill did not pass, at least in the original form. This brings up the question of our own taxation, and I would like to refer the house to Hansard of Friday, November 23, 1951 at page 1279, from which I quote. The leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) asked the following question:

> I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. I recognize that he cannot go into too much explanation, since I have not given him notice of it. In view of the rumours started by certain circulars affecting the tobacco industry of this country, is there any intention of introducing what might be called an interim or "baby" budget during this session?

The Prime Minister replied:

> No, there is no such intention.

This may or may not indicate that no taxation change will be made this session; but no doubt, as is common with government policy, this matter will be under consideration and watched carefully before the next budget is brought down.

I have another matter on which I should like to speak for a little while. It is the problem of the dairy farmer. A few days ago in this house the matter of bank hours was under consideration and farmers did not take it kindly. I would like to point out here that dairy cows are milked twice daily. This brings milking time twelve hours apart, and a five-day week or an eight-hour day would not go well with the dairy farmer or his cow. Fluid milk is now becoming very high in price, and I am afraid that consumers will buy less and deprive children of the most complete food on the market today. I would point out, Mr. Speaker, that the farmer does not get over half the money that milk retails at, and he must own, feed and otherwise care for his cows, pay trucking to the city, pay veterinary bills, have part of the milk designated surplus and often have milk returned.

It is interesting to learn from responsible sources that in the period from 1945 to 1951 our population increased by 2 million, and in the same period our dairy cow population decreased by 456,300 head. Our total production is down by 1,200 million pounds, and our per capita consumption has dropped by 292 pounds. Our butter production decreased by 40 million pounds in the same period, and our cheese by 97 million pounds. Our population is increasing; our milk supply is decreasing. Is Canada to become a country that will have to import all its butter, and use its milk for home consumption? What are we doing about it? Not enough, I am afraid.

I hold in my hand a pamphlet from which I should like to read a few extracts. In 1949 we produced 74 million pounds of margarine in Canada. In the year 1951 we produced 105 million pounds. That production was up 31 million pounds. Butter, cheese and cows are down, but margarine is up.

Mr. Hodgson: Let us change the government.

Mr. Anderson: I quote the following:

> The lack of confidence on the part of 450,000 dairy farmers as to the future of the industry as a result of the unfair competition created by inadequate controls on substitutes manufactured from cheap foreign produced oils. (An increasingly large portion of these oils, at prices of only 12 cents to 15 cents per pound, are imported without duty of any kind. The balance, from a country which has banned the import of Canadian dairy products, pay duty of about 1½ cents a pound only.)
> The production, manufacture, processing and distribution of dairy products in some 2,000 dairy plants provide a direct or indirect livelihood to 17 per cent of our population. In contrast, dairy substitutes are produced by about ten companies, the majority of which are packing houses and large international soap concerns.
> The decline in the dairy industry has become so acute that in 1951 Canada, an agricultural country, imported 21 million pounds of butter; 10 million pounds of cheese; 6 million pounds of non-fat dry milk powder and was unable to supply sufficient fluid market milk to meet the demands of many urban centres in western Canada.
> Just a few years ago dairy products were among Canada's biggest exports. Today, with a deteriorating international situation we are not able to meet our own domestic needs. This is a national problem.
> Unless these trends are halted immediately, prices for all milk products as well as beef and veal (about half of which come from dairy herds) will become scarcer and more costly.

From the Gazette, under date of November 7, 1951, we get the following:

> The dairy industry is too important and too vital a source of food supplies to be allowed to expire, or nearly so, by a process of default and indifference.

There is another small matter I should like to bring to the attention of the house. I do not know how serious hon. members may consider it, but I think it is serious. I refer to the lowering of the water table in some parts of Canada. I know districts where gas wells have been drilled and farmers have had great difficulty in obtaining sufficient water for their livestock. Every new block of housing and every new industry coming to our cities and smaller towns adds to this difficulty. We are in a period of expansion that cannot and must not stop. I believe we are overlooking one important and never-ending source of supply, namely that provided by rainwater held in cisterns. Furthermore, it is free. The needs of any household, apart from cooking, could be taken care of in this inexpensive way.

Mr. Ray Thomas (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a few words with respect to the amendment to the amendment moved by the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch); and my words will be few indeed. First of all I should like to thank the government for the pension legislation for veterans. At the same time I was amazed to see that the government failed to recognize the need of another group of veterans who are in equally distressing circumstances, and who are often worse off than the pensioners. Speaking on this subject the hon. member for Melfort (Mr. Wright) said he was sure all members of the House of Commons who are veterans would support the amendment to the amendment. I fear, however, that after seeing the attitude taken by some government members last spring in the veterans committee I fail to share his optimism.

At the present time the war veterans allowance is $40.41 for single and $70.83 for married veterans. To say the least, these amounts are inadequate. The last increase in the war veterans allowance was given in 1948, when the cost of living index stood at about 155. The first representations for a further increase came in April of 1949, when the index stood at 160·8. The present index stands at 190·4; and there is no doubt in my mind that when the new index figure is given at the first of the month it will be even higher.

I should like to read briefly from the brief presented last spring to the veterans committee by the Canadian Legion. They said, in part:

> If we were consistent with our figures in 1947 we would now be asking for more than $65 for the single man and about $113 for the married person. We are, however, repeating our request for $50 for the individual and are asking $100 for the married couple. This departure from our former brief in regard to the married couple is noteworthy but it is made necessary by the cold facts of existence. Actually, according to the latest figures supplied by the Toronto welfare council as of November 1950 (which are appended to this brief), what we ask for is far below minimal living requirements. On the basis of that organization's research, a single veteran requires a minimum of $93.34 per month and a married veteran without children $153.43. It will be noted that the present rates are less than half of these minimal requirements and the W.V.A. which originally recognized that the condition of these men was attributable to war service, now functions on something less than a minimal relief basis.

This brief was presented last spring when the cost of living index stood at 179. As has been pointed out by previous speakers, and most ably by the hon. member for Acadia, the war veterans allowance now is worth far less than it was even at the $40 limit many years ago.

I agree wholeheartedly with the Legion and the other service organizations that this war veterans allowance should be boosted considerably. Also I agree it should be boosted at least to the amount asked for by service organizations. However, for my own part I would far rather see the war veterans allowance tied to the cost of living index and put on an escalator scale. Even if the increases asked for by the various veterans organizations were brought into effect the veterans would still be getting less in purchasing power than they were in 1946, and prior to that.

Many of these people are living in abject poverty. I know personally of many cases where they just cannot get along. They are piling up debts; they cannot afford to buy fuel for the winter, and they are in very serious circumstances. In my opinion the means test should be abolished altogether in connection with the war veterans allowance. However, if the government is not willing to abolish it, then I suggest that at least it should increase the maximum of the war veterans allowance to the amount of the income tax exemption.

In many provinces today war veterans allowance recipients are getting far less than old age pensioners. For example, in my own province of Alberta they now receive $50 a month old age pension, plus medical, dental, optical and hospital care. Under the new old age pension legislation there will be no means test. I cannot see why the same should not apply to the recipients of war veterans allowances. These men were burnt out through rendering service to this country. They are being paid for a service that has been rendered and disabilities acquired as a result of that service. If so, they should be paid adequately.

I regret that the veterans committee was not set up at this session, but I would suggest that if the government insists that it should not be set up it could at least give an interim increase in the war veterans allowance, and then set up the committee at the next session to deal with the whole field of veterans legislation. I should like to repeat what was said by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low) and again by the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell), that if the government will indicate its willingness to bring down legislation at this session to increase the war veterans allowance, we will be only too glad to withdraw our amendment so the veterans at least will have a square break.

When setting up the committee next spring I would hope the terms of reference would be broad enough to take in and adequately deal with all veterans legislation. For example, we have knowledge as to the plight of many of the widows and dependents of recipients who under the act should be receiving medical treatment. We would like also to see widows of imperial veterans who have lived here twenty years or more but whose husbands died prior to the twenty year period given allowances such as would be given to their husbands had they remained alive. We should like to see England declared to be a theatre of war during world war I so that many veterans who are suffering disabilities as a result of the conditions which obtained in England at that time may obtain benefits under this act. We should like to see those veterans who took up land under the soldier settlement scheme given clear title. All these things should be dealt with adequately when the veterans committee is set up, I hope early in the next session.

I should like to say one brief word about the Kurt Meyer case. Kurt Meyer was convicted of murdering nineteen Canadian boys during the last war or immediately afterward. He was convicted of ruthlessly slaughtering some of the best men we could have had in Canada. If the government does not agree that Kurt Meyer should be allowed to visit his family they should bring him back to Canada where they can keep an eye on him and have him remain where he belongs. If the government agrees that Kurt Meyer should be allowed to visit his wife and family on compassionate grounds, then they should follow the same line of reasoning and allow every murderer or life termer in Canada to go home for Christmas to see their families. If Kurt Meyer, a German murderer of Canadian boys, is permitted to go home to see his wife and family because he has not seen them for some time, surely convicted Canadian murderers should have the same right to visit their families over Christmas. This would apply particularly to those who are under sentence of death, not because they have not seen their families for some time but because when they do hang it will be a long time before they see them again. It is absolutely ridiculous that because a man is a general and is put in a military prison he should be given privileges denied to Canadian criminals. Kurt Meyer should be brought back to Canada immediately and placed in a prison here where the Canadian government can keep an eye on him. After all he has been sentenced, and he should have to serve that sentence.

Mr. O. L. Jones (Yale): Mr. Speaker, I should like to add my support to the amendment now before the house, but before doing so I should like to congratulate the minister and through him the cabinet for the generous response they have made to the pleas on behalf of the veterans. They have accepted practically all that the Legion and other veteran organizations asked for. The veterans generally are pleased with this increase in the disability pension, but they are still unhappy about some of their comrades who have an equal claim on the government for pensions.

I refer to the burnt-out veterans. It has been well established for years that the majority of the men who served in any theatre of war underwent nervous strains because of the fear that most good soldiers felt at some time or another. The high explosive shells and other activities in the theatre of war had definite and lasting effects upon the fear-consciousness of individuals. Some soldiers were strong enough to withstand this impact and were able to come back with limb and mind sound; others came back with limb or mind damaged, while others gave their lives.

Those who have the marks of battle clearly visible or are able to establish physical disability in some form or other have received a fair and necessary adjustment of their claims for compensation. However, there are others whose disabilities cannot be so easily assessed. Some day medical science will be able to assess this type of mental and physical disability on an approved basis. In the meantime, it is known that these disabilities do exist and on the basis of this knowledge the government has granted allowances to burnt-out veterans.

The impairment to their body and mind is hard to assess, but it is known that this impairment exists and that their life expectancy has been shortened by several years. This fact is accepted by both the medical profession and the Department of Veterans Affairs. An examination of first war veterans who are still living today would furnish further proof of this contention if such were needed. You would find men of 50 and 55 years of age who are old men before their time. The rigours of war have left undeniable but unseen scars upon them. There are men who have suffered for years from these unassessed and uncompensated disabilities.

I claim that the government should remove these men from the classification they are now in, that is charity recipients or burnt-out pensioners. They should be placed in their proper category as disability pensioners. Many of these men have found from experience that their unseen disability has handicapped them on the labour market. They have already paid a heavy penalty through their inability to compete in the modern industrial world. We should look at this problem in its true light and realize that these are permanent disabilities just as much as a leg that has been amputated. We should regard these veterans who do not bear the visible scars of war as having equal rights with the disability pensioners.

In my opinion these men are definitely and distinctly war casualties, and are entitled to pensions as such. In their case the same consideration should be given to the fact that the cost of living has gone up and the value of the dollar today is roughly only 50 cents. That is why I support this amendment which calls for an immediate increase in war veterans allowances. I should like to go further and ask the government to consider these war casualties as being undistinguishable under the act from those veterans who bear the marks of battle more plainly.

I urge that the government meet the request of the Canadian Legion. I should like to ask for more, but at least the minimum should be $50 a month for single men and $100 a month for married men. The minister should make a clear-cut announcement; then the mover of this subamendment might be willing to withdraw it. In any case before the vote is taken today a clear statement should be made that something will definitely be done for these veterans so that they may have the happy Christmas they deserve and which they have earned the hard way, working and fighting for you and me.

Mr. Fulton: I was paired with the hon. member for Yorkton (Mr. Stewart), who is ill. Had I voted, I would have voted for the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. Ross (Souris): I was paired with the hon. member for Melville (Mr. Gardiner). Had I voted, I would have voted for the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. Graydon: I was paired with the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson). Had I voted, I would have voted for the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. Ferguson: Had it not been for the rubber stamp system of the Liberal party, the soldiers would have had a better break.

Mr. George H. Hees (Broadview): I believe, Mr. Speaker, that the contribution a member of parliament is able to make in this house depends to a large extent upon the contact he is able to maintain with his constituents during the session. This is an easy matter for those of us who live within three or four hundred miles of Ottawa, but I believe it is made unnecessarily difficult for those whose ridings are at greater distances.

I say "unnecessarily difficult" because if members who live more than three or four hundred miles away were given passes on Trans-Canada Air Lines they would be able to keep in close touch with their constituents, their families and their occupations, much as we who live close to Ottawa are able to do by rail. After all, it would affect less than half the members of this house. For instance, Mr. Speaker, I live in Toronto. I am able to leave Ottawa on Friday night at eleven o'clock and have breakfast in Toronto the next day. I leave Toronto early Sunday night, and I am here the next morning. This is very easy for those of us who live close to Ottawa. I believe there is no reason why air passes should not make it just as easy for those who live at greater distances.

As the business of parliament increases year by year and sessions become longer, even extending into two sessions a year as has been the case this year, it becomes increasingly important that members should be able to maintain close contact with their constituents, their families, and the occupations upon which they will have to rely to support themselves and their families should they be defeated at the polls. If members who live at great distances are not given air passes, I believe it will become increasingly difficult to get young men to stand for parliament, and it will become increasingly difficult for some sitting members to remain. If either is the case, I believe parliament will suffer. I urge upon the government, therefore, to give this matter serious consideration.

I should like to speak now on something which, although it does not come under the jurisdiction of this parliament, I believe does more to bring the east and west together than anything we say or do in this house. I am speaking about the annual Grey cup football final. No one is more interested than I am in having that game played in Toronto, because I live within two blocks of the stadium. I have a nine-year-old daughter who operates a very lucrative parking business on our driveway, and I would have to answer to her if any change were made. In all fairness, however, I believe this game should alternate between the east and west each year. I believe, also, that the year it is played in the west it should be played in the city whose team won the western championship. When it is played in the east, I believe it should be played in the city whose team has won the eastern championship.

Although other stadiums are not as large as Toronto, it seems to me to be extremely important that those who have supported a team during the regular season should be able to see that team play in the final. I believe this consideration outweighs the greater gate receipts which could be obtained in the larger stadium. I believe it is important also for the west to have the game played out there just as often as we have it in the east. It would do easterners a great deal of good to make that trip every second year and sample western hospitality. Speaking as a member who was fortunate enough to be in the west this year, I can say that western hospitality is certainly everything it is said to be, and then some. I believe the great number who would make that trip every year would ultimately bring the east and west closer together.

I appeal to the football clubs and the directors of the C.R.U. to realize that this game is not merely a game of football, but is now an important national event. I believe these people would be making a contribution to Canadian unity, as well as winning the approval of those who support the teams during the regular season, if they would follow the suggestion I have made.

Mr. R. R. Knight (Saskatoon): I was keenly disappointed, and indeed hurt, by the categorical and adamant reply given by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) when the latter drew to the Prime Minister's attention the request from some educational body in Winnipeg for the extension of federal aid in the realm of general education. I have not the Prime Minister's statement before me, but I hope to give the gist of it correctly. He said that as long as he was head of the government he would have to advise his associates not to extend such aid to general education. May I advise him that times change, opinions change, and even governments and prime ministers change. I was struck by the remark made this afternoon by the hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Poulin) when he said in effect: Ni le premier ministre, ni ce gouvernement n'est éternel.

The Prime Minister has appeared adamant on certain other occasions of which I have some recollection. I remember one occasion some years ago when he said that he saw no reason why he, on the attainment of 70 years, should receive an old age pension without a means test. Well, he will receive one on January 1, and I hope he will have many years in which to enjoy it. Tempora mutantur et in eis nos. I remember the time the Prime Minister said that he would never be the head of the government that would legislate for a system of subsidized housing.

The Prime Minister has issued a challenge and a taunt to the millions of people in this country who believe in federal aid to education. I deplore, and I blame him for the fact that he has, by his words, crystallized and hardened among his own political followers such opposition as there is to this cause. I said "opposition", but most of it is expedient rather than real. Apparently a Liberal member from Saskatchewan, for instance, is to have no choice in this matter. He is faced with what is virtually a threat. If I am to stay, says the Prime Minister, then there will be no federal aid to education.

Sir, I believe, and I believe sincerely, that a great many Liberal members from many parts of this country, and certainly from the Canadian west favour, just as 90 per cent of their constituents favour, this matter of federal aid. But their leader, the Prime Minister, holds over them the club which he used at yesterday's session. By so doing he denies to them the right of expression in this house, and what is more important, he denies to the children of Canada that equality of education which is their right. Mr. Speaker, I use this opportunity to express the opinion that not only in this matter but in other matters it is becoming apparent that this government is virtually a one-party dictatorship. One hundred Liberal members could leave this house at this present moment and it would not have any effect whatsoever upon the government of this country.

Mr. Noseworthy: They could all leave and it would not have any effect.

Mr. Knight: The Minister of Defence Production (Mr. Howe) asked once: "If we want to do anything, who is going to stop us?" Government, from the top down, is becoming more and more dictatorial. The cabinet has assumed more and more a dominant position in the government of this country, and now it seems that the Prime Minister himself has become a more and more dominant influence in that cabinet.

Is the Prime Minister to be allowed to go unchallenged, to muzzle—not only for today, because that is not so bad, but for the future—the free expression of the opinion of private members? That again, sir, and the tendency to autocracy in government which I see indicated, the tendency towards cabinet control, must be condemned and curbed.

In conclusion, sir, I wish to say to the Prime Minister that I shall make a prediction. As surely as time goes on, whether this government is still in power and whether my right hon. friend is still Prime Minister, the day will come when we shall have in this country not only the old age pension legislation and the aid to universities, which we now have, but also a system of subsidized housing, which he deplored, and federal aid to education, upon the opposition to which he stakes his political existence. I say that with certainty, not only for the reason that a tremendous opinion in favour of federal aid to education in this country has been built up among large and important organizations, organizations of farmers, labour, educational authorities, school trustees, and the like, together with the co-operatives who have expressed their favour; but what is more important, more and more the great masses of public opinion in this country are becoming more and more vocal and demanding.

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): I should like to take just a few minutes to say something along the line that has been taken by the hon. member for Saskatoon. I believe this topic is very timely. I think it ought to be brought to the attention of the Prime Minister that there is a growing feeling throughout the country that he is addicted to the habit of saying no for the purpose of seeing what happens, but that habit certainly is not conducive to national unity, particularly when the people of this country have, for a good many years, looked forward to the time when federal aid to education would be a reality, and on a much broader scale than at the present time.

Let me say at the outset, Mr. Speaker, that we are quite aware of the good things the federal government has already done in the educational field. We are quite aware of the fine things that are done and have been done for some time, particularly in the field of technical education. That sort of thing we deeply appreciate, but it only goes a very short way. It is not the sort of thing the people of Canada from one coast to the other have expected eventually would be brought about in this Dominion of Canada. We are aware also, Mr. Speaker, of the good things that the federal government has done by way of assistance to the universities of this country. We appreciate that. But that again is not enough, and it is confined to all too few of our boys and girls, all too few of our people. When one realizes that not more than 8 or 10 per cent of those who graduate from the high schools ever have a chance to graduate from a university, one can realize that the assistance which has been extended to universities can touch the lives of only a very, very few of the Canadian people. So we express keen disappointment that the Prime Minister acted the other day in such a peremptory manner in answering the question put to him with regard to the intention of the government in the future in helping the provinces in the general field of education.

What we would like to see is much more consideration given these things by more people on the other side before answers are given that tend to close the doors. I quite agree with the hon. member for Saskatoon that the Prime Minister was certainly peremptory and showed on that occasion an inclination to be pretty dictatorial. What has been done by the federal government to date in the field of aid to education in no way assists the provinces to equalize educational opportunity; and if there is one thing more than another that I think we, the members of this house, pretty generally stand for it is equality of opportunity in education for all our boys and girls throughout this whole country.

It is well known that certain provinces cannot advance the standard of education to these young people comparable with what other provinces can extend. There are certain provinces that just have not the wherewithal. How in the world are they going to equalize educational opportunities in those provinces that have smaller incomes, that have not the resources to draw upon? There is only one way, and that is for educational assistance to be granted by this federal government.

Mr. Pouliot: Will my hon. friend permit me a question?

Mr. Low: Yes.

Mr. Pouliot: What does he mean by the standard of education?

Mr. Low: I did not say "standard"; I said "opportunities".

Mr. Pouliot: No, you said "standard". Hansard must have taken it.

Mr. Low: I shall repeat what I did say. There are certain provinces in our country that have not wealth enough, have not resources sufficient to advance educational opportunities to their boys and girls such as you find in other provinces. That I think goes without saying. One does not need to argue on this floor, certainly, the merits of that contention. I believe everybody who is familiar with education understands that to be true. I do not need to mention names. All one has to do is take the reports from the various departments of education and discover the amount of money that is being provided, the quality of the equipment, the training of the teachers and that sort of thing to come to a full understanding of the problem as I have expressed it. I do not intend to enter into that argument today; it has already been established right here in this house on numerous occasions.

That being the case, Mr. Speaker, what I want to get at is this. How in the world can these less fortunate provinces ever look forward to equality of educational opportunity with the more fortunate provinces if this federal government is not prepared to do something about it, to make available assistance to general education and not just confine itself to the field of technical or university education? It must get down to lower levels than that. We have constantly advocated that the federal government be prepared to make available grants out of the broad, substantial taxation they take out of the people in the provinces, and that these grants shall be unconditional, at least so far as specifying the particular things on which they shall be spent. We would expect, of course, that grants to education from the federal government to the provinces would carry with them some regulation as to how they should be spent, but it should be broad. We have already expressed that on numerous occasions. But to close the door now to any hope of that sort of thing in the future, by a peremptory answer such as that given by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) the other day, it seems to me is unjust and will certainly dampen the hopes of a great many people across this country.

I think the Prime Minister will live to rue the day he took that stand. I think the Canadian people are going to remember and, so far as I am concerned, I will help them to keep their memories fresh in the matter. I do not think it was right, I do not think it was just, I do not think it was deserved; and I do not think it reflects, either, the feeling of the majority of people in this House of Commons. So I join with the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Knight) in deploring the closing of the door, as it were, to any further appeal by the Canadian people for federal aid to education. I would not like to enter upon any long argument today as to why there should be that federal aid, because the subject matter is not federal aid to education; the subject of the discussion is the Prime Minister's action in closing the door the other day.

There is only one thing; we may have misunderstood him. I hope we did. I hope the Prime Minister did not mean to close the door so abruptly, so completely, so tightly. I hope he will be able now to tell us that we took the wrong meaning. If we did, then I shall take back all I have said this afternoon. If we did not, then I am just saying now that I will have a lot further to say about it in the house and outside the house until such time as a better answer is given to the Canadian people.

Mr. Jean François Pouliot (Temiscouata): Mr. Speaker, I will not let any member of the C.C.F. party or the leader of the Social Credit group lecture the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. St. Laurent), who is my leader.

Mr. Noseworthy: Try to stop them, if they want to. It is a free country.

Mr. Pouliot: Yes, it is a free country; but if it is free for the hon. member who has spoken it must be free for me too. My hon. friends show so little respect for their leaders that it must be a surprise when I, as a member of the Liberal party, take the defence of my chief against such ridiculous attacks as those which have come from the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Knight) and the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low).

Mr. Low: There were some speeches of yours in 1947—

Mr. Pouliot: It was not the same leader. I was suffering from tyranny at the time.

Mr. Low: There was another one sitting in the Prime Minister's seat.

Mr. Pouliot: I will tell my hon. friend to keep quiet. I did not interrupt him, and I have something to tell him. I have still a few moments to speak, and I want him to listen to me. I regret having to put him to shame.

Mr. Low: That is fine.

Mr. Knowles: Where is the peacemaker?

Mr. Pouliot: I am not a peacemaker with my colleagues. But this time I want to bring those two hon. gentlemen to a sense of proportion. In the first place I will remind the leader of the Social Credit group that at one time he was a member of the provincial government of Alberta.

Mr. Low: Yes.

Mr. Pouliot: He agrees. Why was he a member of that government? It was in virtue of the constitution of this country.

Mr. Low: Right.

Mr. Pouliot: He still agrees with me. But let me go on with my argument. If there had been such a mix-up with regard to education, and with regard to jurisdiction and power, as the hon. members who have just spoken have described, there would have been no provinces and the leader of the Social Credit group would not now have the glory of having been a former supporter of Mr. Aberhart, in his cabinet. There would have been no provinces.

I have a few things to tell those gentlemen, through you, sir. I shall try to make it as brief as possible. In the first place my hon. friends are under the belief that it is easier to say yes than to say no, when requests are made.

Mr. Low: No, we are not.

Mr. Pouliot: It is true that it is easier to say yes than to say no.

Mr. Low: No, it becomes easier to say no, just like Vishinsky does.

Mr. Pouliot: No.

Mr. Low: Oh, yes. He says no to everything, now.

Mr. Pouliot: There are some members of parliament who say yes, yes, yes, every time they are asked for something. When it is no that comes afterward, they are greatly disappointed. It takes courage to refuse a request. And it is not because requests are declined or turned down that one must call the one who refuses them a tyrant, a dictator or the like. My hon friend knows that very well.

There are reasons for that. The main reason is that in virtue of the constitution under which we serve as members of parliament, education is a matter exclusively of provincial jurisdiction.

Mr. Low: We agree with that—"jurisdiction"—surely.

Mr. Pouliot: Inasmuch as the hon. member agrees with it, he must agree also with the Prime Minister who gave a constitutional answer to the provinces who try to tear down the constitution so as to have the provinces of Quebec and Ontario pay for all their expenses.

Now, my hon. friend should be prouder than that. We are always hearing about the revenues from oil in Alberta, that that province is rich and is about to clear its debts. We hear it said that that province has big revenue, when compared with the revenue of Quebec and Ontario. And I am sure that those who make the comparison will not take long to see that Quebec, and even Ontario, have done wonderfully well for their schools, without the assistance of the dominion government.

My hon. friend must remember that at the time of the Rowell commission Mr. Dafoe, who was a self-taught man and one of the big bugs of the university of Manitoba, induced the university to submit a memorandum to Judge Rowell asking that educational grants be given by Ottawa to the provinces. My hon. friend must remember that. Yes, he does. My memory is good enough to discuss these matters now. Dafoe was a journalist who acquired some fame in the newspaper world. He was a self-taught man, and my hon. friend knows that. And he knows something more: he knows that the pillars of universities are, most of the time, men who are well off, well to do, and who have no university background. My hon. friend knows that, too. They are the men who are under the impression that university education will improve the condition of future generations.

This is a matter for argument. It is a matter concerning which there could be considerable dissent. And, judging by the world today, we do not know if it is so good for the youth to follow a university course. I will remind the hon. gentlemen who have spoken of what was said by Dr. Sidney Smith, the president of no less a university than the university of Toronto. He said two or three years ago that there were too many boys, too many students following the courses of universities. The reason is quite obvious. There are many people who derive no benefit from the years they have spent at college or university. I know of people who would be much happier, and perhaps the world would be better off, if they had never learned to read or write.

Mr. Low: Even the Prime Minister laughs at that.

Mr. Coldwell: Did not President Smith point out that there were too many young people who were unable to benefit from university education because they had not the economic resources, that the wrong people were getting it in some instances?

Mr. Pouliot: Perhaps, but my hon. friend knows that no proportion of that kind has ever been established. Occasionally we meet people who are not educated and we are apt to say, "It is unfortunate that he did not have the benefit of education; he would do marvellous things if he had gone through university". The fact is that quite often those same people would have been failures if they had gone through university.

A proper aim in life is not to fill your memory with facts and figures or with so-called general knowledge contained in encyclopedias which are put out, often for young people. The proper aim in life is education in the proper sense.

Mr. Low: Living.

Mr. Pouliot: The formation of the mind and character, the will to do perhaps unpleasant jobs at the start in order to know what is right and then to ascend to the summit by degrees. Many young people go to college or university in order to become superior people. When they are finished with the social sciences, economics or the like they are ready for old age pensions in their twenties. They are fed up with school, they are fed up with everything, and yet they feel they are ready to rule the world.

What is lacking? It is the formation of character, the readiness to start humbly as their fathers started and not to expect to be in the position their fathers are when they leave school. I know boys whose fathers earn $4,000, $5,000, $6,000 or perhaps more, and when they come out of college they expect to earn the same amount. They have been through college or university and their heads have become swelled. They are filled with ambition. Ambition to serve their country? No, sir; ambition to get more money.

Mr. Low: Where would the hon. member for Temiscouata be if he had not gone to university?

Mr. Pouliot: I will surprise my hon. friend by telling him that I began to learn things as soon as I got out of it. Thirty odd years ago I refused an honorary degree of doctor of laws because I did not think I should have it. I was not even a bachelor of laws. I had passed my examination to enter the bar of my province, but the only university degree I have is bachelor of laws.

Mr. Noseworthy: The hon. member will not get any after this speech.

Mr. Pouliot: We have great seats of learning in this country and in many respects they do a useful job, but many students come out of our universities nothing less than failures in life. On the other hand, there are boys who took commercial courses who are now paying the taxes to support these schools. The leader of the Social Credit group has many farmers in his constituency and I think he will admit that very few of them have university degrees. Without knowing them I feel safe in saying that they are similar to the farmers in my constituency. They will be self-taught men who observe what is going on, who love nature, who live a healthy outdoors life.

Mr. Low: They have a good public and high school education.

Mr. Pouliot: But not a university education.

Mr. Low: That is not what I was talking about; I was talking about public and high school education, general education.

Mr. Coldwell: I think general education was the subject.

Mr. Pouliot: That is even worse. I do not think my hon. friend should complain about the decision reached by the government.

Mr. Low: By the government?

Mr. Pouliot: That is according to the press and I know nothing more about it. Grants are to be made to the universities through the provincial governments. If those grants are necessary, which is a matter of opinion, they will be made to the provinces which have exclusive jurisdiction over education. The Prime Minister's competence as a lawyer is recognized and he respects the constitution. He is doing the best he can to help education under the constitution.

Mr. Low: That is what I want.

Mr. Pouliot: Let me say to my hon. friend that if he held the responsible position of Prime Minister of Canada and the provinces asked for grants to the universities, he would make no different answer than that made by the Prime Minister; and if the Prime Minister had been in the position of the hon. gentleman he would not have criticized him.

Mr. Low: The hon. member is quite wrong there.

Mr. J. W. Noseworthy (York South): Mr. Speaker, I listened with a great deal of interest to the remarks of the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) on education, and particularly on the subject of federal aid for education. I think I am only fair in saying that the arguments he used were not arguments against federal aid for education. He questioned the value of education itself. It was not just a question of which government supports education. It became quite evident from the hon. member's remarks that he is questioning the value of education to society and to individuals. It is rather amazing to find one who has benefited from education, who has acquired all the culture that education and educational institutions offer, who portrays in his daily life all the virtues of an educated man—

Mr. Knowles: Stand up and bow.

Mr. Noseworthy: —frowning upon the value of education to his fellow citizens. He tells us, for instance, that a great many people would be happier if they had never learned to read or write. I do not know that happiness in itself is a measure of the value of education to society. Happiness must be relative. I would not be at all surprised if the imbecile, who has no power of observation and no sense of responsibility, may be happier than some of us. I do not think happiness is the measuring rod by which we should judge the value of education. I do not think the hon. member for Temiscouata would want to carry his argument so far as to say that society and the world itself would be better off if no one had ever learned to read or write. I am quite confident that the hon. member realizes the benefits which we in this generation receive by virtue of the fact that our ancestors were able to read and write and were able to leave us their thoughts on the written page. The hon. member would not be nearly so charming as an individual if he had not imbibed the culture of the past.

Mr. Low: Temiscouata would not have had such a colourful member.

Mr. Noseworthy: I am not going to enter into an argument with him about what is and what is not education. Certainly every educationist today will agree with him that education is something more than merely storing the memory with facts. That is not what we mean by education. To say that the federal government should not assist the provinces and the municipalities in supporting education is, I think, in this day and generation on a par with the belief held one hundred years ago that it was the responsibility of the parent to finance his children's education. We have moved forward since then. We no longer think it is the sole responsibility of the parent even if the hon. member for Temiscouata believes that the youth of today should begin where his parents began. Actually of course he does. Actually the child of today begins where his parents began. Children are born with no more knowledge than their mothers or fathers had at time of birth. They are still born unable to speak and walk. The babies of today start where their fathers and mothers began, so I have no quarrel with the hon. member on that point. But we have moved forward during the past century. We no longer think that the parent should assume the sole financial responsibility for the education of his offspring. We no longer think even that the municipality should assume full financial responsibility. We have reached the point where every province in this country shares with its municipalities part of that responsibility. We have gone further. We have reached the stage where the federal government shares to a considerable degree the responsibility for providing education in one form and another with the provinces and the municipalities.

During a previous speech I put before the house the amount of money the various departments of the federal government spend directly and indirectly on education. Whether or not the hon. member for Temiscouata likes it, the federal government is in the business of education, is paying large sums of money each year for education, and we are now about to embark upon a new venture, direct grants to the universities. I am sure we appreciate that. I was very disappointed and not a little surprised to hear the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) categorically deny any intention of giving federal support to education. I hope that the Prime Minister—

Mr. McIlraith: The Prime Minister was replying to a specific question asked by a member.

Mr. Noseworthy:—was referring solely to the particular question directed to him at that time. I think probably we have reason to believe the Prime Minister meant that in so far as that specific request was concerned it was not being considered, and he was advising his colleagues not to give consideration to it. I cannot believe that the Prime Minister, as cultured and as appreciative of culture and the values of education as he is, meant anything else. Notwithstanding all that the hon. member for Temiscouata said about education, I am sure both he and the Prime Minister appreciate and set a very high value on the merits of education.

I recall that in the first session of 1949 the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) gave us reason to believe that his government was interested in federal aid for education. I can see no reason why he should have changed his opinion with regard to the general subject of federal aid to education since that day. If he has changed his opinion, or if his statement yesterday applied to federal support for education in general and not to the specific question that was raised, then I think we are entitled to an explanation. We are entitled to know just why he has changed his attitude to this subject. Is it because he fears that the federal government will be assuming too much financial responsibility if it embarks further on the matter of federal aid to education? Or is he concerned chiefly with the constitutional question, or with the fact that the provinces, by our constitution, are responsible for education?

I cannot think that the latter is a sound reason for any great change in the Prime Minister's opinion. There is no reason in the world to think that, by granting aid to the secondary schools or the public schools of any province in this country, the federal government should seek to interfere with the curriculum or the methods of teaching, any more than the federal government will interfere with the curriculum and the methods of teaching in the universities to which the federal government is making a direct contribution. There is no reason why what is true in one case should not also be true in the other.

Mr. Pouliot: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Noseworthy: Yes.

Mr. Pouliot: Besides being a delightful man, I should like to know if his profession is that of teacher.

Mr. Noseworthy: I was for more than twenty years, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Pouliot: Thank you.

On motion of Mr. Noseworthy the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Mr. Speaker, tomorrow we will continue consideration of the railway legislation: Bill No. 12, to amend the Railway Act; Bill No. 6, to amend the Canadian National-Canadian Pacific Act, 1933; Bill No. 7, to amend the Maritime Freight Rates Act; then Bill No. 8, to amend the North Fraser Harbour Commissioners Act; the resolution in the name of the Minister of Justice concerning the increase in the number of county court judges in British Columbia; Bill No. 28, to amend the Canada-United States of America Tax Convention Act, 1943, and the Canada-United States of America Tax Convention Act, 1944.

At 6.15 p.m. the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to the order of the house passed on November 2, 1951.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, November 29, 1951

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

COMMITTEES OF THE HOUSE

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS—CONCURRENCE IN FIRST REPORT

Mr. J. A. Bradette (Cochrane) presented the first report of the standing committee on external affairs, and moved that the report be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

DEFENCE EXPENDITURES—CONCURRENCE IN FIRST REPORT

Mr. David A. Croll (Spadina) presented the first report of the special committee on defence expenditures, and moved that the report be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

DOMINION ELECTIONS ACT—THIRD REPORT

Third report of special committee on the Dominion Elections Act, 1938, and amendments thereto.—Mr. Fulford.

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS—INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS—CHANGES IN PERSONNEL

Mr. W. G. Weir (Portage-Neepawa) moved:

That the name of Mr. Low be substituted for that of Mr. Johnston on the select standing committee on public accounts.

That the name of Mr. Wylie be substituted for that of Mr. Johnston on the select standing committee on industrial relations.

Motion agreed to.

DOMINION ELECTIONS ACT

AMENDMENT RESPECTING ADVANCE POLLS AND PRISONERS OF WAR VOTING REGULATIONS

Hon. F. G. Bradley (Secretary of State) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to amend the Dominion Elections Act to implement the recommendations of the special committee appointed to study the Dominion Elections Act, 1938, embodied in the draft bill prepared by the said committee and inter alia to make provision for: (a) a greater number of advance polls: and (b) the Canadian prisoners of war voting regulations, 1951.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

CIVIL SERVICE ACT

AMENDMENT RESPECTING TENURE OF OFFICE AND SALARIES OF COMMISSIONERS

Hon. F. G. Bradley (Secretary of State) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to present a measure to amend the Civil Service Act in respect of the tenure of office and salaries of the commissioners.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

AMENDMENT TO INCREASE MAXIMUM SALARY OF REGISTRAR

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to present a measure to amend the Supreme Court Act to provide an increase in the maximum salary of the registrar from eight thousand to eight thousand five hundred dollars.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

EXCHEQUER COURT ACT

AMENDMENT TO INCREASE MAXIMUM SALARY OF REGISTRAR

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to present a measure to amend the Exchequer Court Act to provide an increase in the maximum salary of the registrar from six thousand five hundred to seven thousand five hundred dollars.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

Inquiries of the Ministry

METEOROLOGICAL SERVICES

REQUEST FOR INSTALLATION OF WEATHER STATION AT LONDON, ONT.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. H. Jeffery (London): Has the minister given consideration to the establishment of a weather station at or near the city of London and, if not, will he do so?

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): I thank the hon. member for having sent me notice of his question. The Department of Transport already has a fully-equipped weather observation station at the London airport which takes weather observations each hour. The department has no plans for the establishment of any additional weather observation facilities at London.

OLD AGE SECURITY

PROOF OF AGE—AVAILABILITY OF FORMS FOR SEARCH OF CENSUS RECORDS

On the orders of the day:

Mrs. Ellen L. Fairclough (Hamilton West): Will the Minister of National Health and Welfare make available through the post offices a supply of the forms necessary to institute a search of census records by applicants for old age pensions?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): My hon. friend will appreciate that the matter of census is not within the jurisdiction of the Minister of National Health and Welfare and consequently the question will be referred to the Department of Trade and Commerce and the Post Office Department. Possibly my hon. friend is under a slight misconception. The census is only one of the many ways of proving age. It is by no means an absolute method of proof, as we are finding out. However, the problem is not as considerable as the hon. member may possibly think because the number of applicants still to make application is remarkably low and the processing of applications is being done with remarkable speed.

EMERGENCY GOLD MINING ASSISTANCE ACT

INQUIRY AS TO ISSUANCE OF NEW REGULATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Rodney Adamson (York West): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys. I have not been able to give notice and therefore he may take it as notice. Are new regulations under the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act under consideration and will they likely be introduced this session?

[Mr. Garson.]

Hon. George Prudham (Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys): No new plans have yet been discussed but it is expected that by the end of the year there will be an announcement of government policy.

ROYAL CANADIAN NAVY

"JOSEPH C. CYR"—DEPORTATION TO THE UNITED STATES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): When will the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of National Defence make a statement concerning Surgeon Lieutenant Joseph C. Cyr which he promised to make two days ago.

Mr. J. A. Blanchette (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of National Defence): I feel quite certain that a statement will be made tomorrow.

AIR TRANSPORT

PURCHASE OF AIRCRAFT FROM ENGLAND

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Trade and Commerce): Yesterday the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar asked the following question:

> Is the report correct that the government has ordered two jet-powered Comet airliners from the de Havilland company of England? If so, why was this aircraft preferred over the Avro jetliner developed by A. V. Roe Canada Limited with substantial government assistance? Have any orders been received for this Avro jetliner?

The answer to the first part of the question is "yes". In reply to the second part may I say that the Comet is the only jet transport in production and service at this time anywhere in the world. The purchase of these airliners will bring to Canada the latest developments in jet transport aircraft, as the Comet has been under development and test in service for the past five years. The answer to the third part of the question is "no."

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): In view of the large expenditures that have been made by the Canadian company when is it expected that craft will be coming from that company?

Mr. McIlraith: There seems to be a little misunderstanding. The Canadian jetliner is a prototype and could not be put into service until it has been further developed. The two types of jetliners are not comparable. The one is a transport jetliner with a long range while the other is a short-range aircraft.

KOREA

INQUIRY AS TO TREATMENT OF RETURNING VETERANS ON TROOPSHIP "J. P. MARTINEZ"

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. O. Campney (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of National Defence): On Tuesday the hon. member for Peterborough West (Mr. Fraser) asked the following question:

Has the Department of National Defence investigated the charge appearing in the press of yesterday that Canadian veterans of the Korean war returning to Canada on the troopship J. P. Martinez were allowed only two meals a day—very small ones at that—and were also made to paint the ship?

I took that question as notice and upon making inquiry I find that a party of Canadian soldiers were returned from Korea on the United States army troopship J. P. Martinez along with a larger number of United States troops. There were approximately 1,700 troops on board which rather taxed the messing capacity. Upon a few occasions the midday meal was not served and upon other occasions it was only a light lunch. The ship was travelling under service conditions and at all times there was adequate food of first-class quality and everybody was well fed. None of the troops was made to paint the ship, but investigation indicates that a few of the men who wanted something to do volunteered to do some painting.

RAILWAY ACT

IMPLEMENTING CERTAIN RECOMMENDATIONS OF ROYAL COMMISSION ON TRANSPORTATION —MAINTENANCE OF TRACKAGE

The house resumed, from Tuesday, November 27, consideration in committee of Bill No. 12, to amend the Railway Act—Mr. Chevrier—Mr. Dion in the chair.

On section 1—Reappointment.

Mr. Chevrier: I should like to answer the questions asked the other evening by the hon. member for Royal concerning the appointment of the various members of the board of transport commissioners. The chief commissioner, Hon. Mr. Justice Kearney, was appointed on November 1, 1951. The assistant chief commissioner, Mr. Hugh Wardrope, was appointed on November 8, 1948. That was a reappointment. The deputy chief commissioner, Mr. Armand Sylvestre, was appointed on April 18, 1945. Mr. Commissioner MacPherson was reappointed on the 21st of September, 1949, and Mr. Howard B. Chase was appointed on July 28, 1948.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I want to say a word on clause 1. When the special committee on railway legislation met the other day, counsel for the two railways appeared before it but counsel for the Canadian National when called upon spoke in part as follows:

According to my instructions I am to say that in principle the Canadian National Railways have no objection to these bills, and have no representations to make with respect to them at this point.

I think it is correct to say that that attitude was persisted in throughout. The point I want to raise is that in the Canadian National we have a great public corporation. We are told, and I think we accept the statement, that it is allowed to run its own operations, and that it is an independent corporation in a very real sense of the term. We know that government ownership has certain implications but nevertheless the other situation is very real. Questions are asked in the house, the minister very properly says those are questions for the railway, and we accept that. It seems to me a very strange thing that in a matter of this kind, which surely is one of the most important things facing the management of that railway, when the railway comes before the special committee which is dealing with a question of great difficulty and complexity concerning which the committee certainly needs all the assistance it can get, then, as they call it in the army, we have a nil return from counsel for the railway.

I should like to point out that after all this railway is presided over by a man greatly esteemed in this country for his ability. He has held public positions before, and certainly no matter what other comments were made of him at that time it was never a point of criticism that he did not have his own views and could not express them. Now, however, the railway says nothing. I point out that what that really means is that the senior officials and management of over 100,000 men who are employees of this railway—I think that is the correct number—had nothing to say at all on this tremendously important question when it was before the special committee. That does not seem to me in accordance with my understanding of what should be the situation on the Canadian National Railways. I understand it is a practice that has been followed in the past and maybe it has been sanctioned to whatever extent sanction comes through practice. However, I raise the matter now very earnestly. I should like to quote one or two comments from a previous debate to show the views of two distinguished parliamentarians of that time. I refer to 1927 when I believe the Canadian National Railways Act was passed. Mr. Dunning was then minister of railways, and I should like to quote a short sentence from his remarks merely to show the relationship between him as minister and the then president of the railways, Sir Henry Thornton. I quote it merely to show the relationship of independence together with mutual co-operation. At page 193 of Hansard for February 10, 1927, he said, speaking of Sir Henry Thornton:

> As minister and president of the system, respectively, we often have very wide differences of opinion on matters which it is Sir Henry's business to place before me at times.

I only read that to show that at that time the president of the railway had a very independent position which was recognized by the minister in the frank manner of the passage I have just read. I should like to read from the same page a statement made by Mr. R. B. Bennett, as he was then, speaking about the directorate of the railway. He said:

> They should be businessmen of capacity, able and willing to assist the president of the system in the conduct of its operations.

I do not need to labour the point further. I think I have made the point I want to make. It seems to me that we can only draw one inference. What is the situation? We have a man well known to be a man of ability and energy at the head of this great enterprise. We have this enterprise concerned in a discussion regarding freight rates than which there can be nothing more important for them. Their whole life blood depends on it. Nevertheless the representative of the railway stands up and says: "According to my instructions I am to say that in principle the Canadian National Railways have no objection". The inference there is—and if I am wrong I shall of course be corrected—that, however free the railway may be in other matters to carry on their business, and I think they are largely free, in this matter of great importance they really are in the position expressed by the words of their counsel. He of course is speaking for the management of the railway but I suggest that the words he used are really words which we must assume the president himself would have had to use if he had been present. In other words, I think we must assume that the railway was not free in this matter. I submit that is a great disadvantage. It means, apart from anything else, that these tens of thousands of men who work for the railway are deprived of the expression of their views through their senior officials, and it means that the committee, when dealing with a matter of infinite complexity and importance, was deprived of the assistance of these able men.

Mr. Chevrier: I should like to be allowed to reply to the suggestion of the hon. member for Greenwood. The inference he draws from the statement made by counsel for the Canadian National Railways before the committee is that there may have been some dictation on the part of the minister or the government with reference to the conduct of the Canadian National Railways. I want to assure him at once that there was no interference or dictation either by the minister or by the government in so far as the attitude of the Canadian National Railways is concerned, and for more than one reason there need be no surprise at the attitude of that railway. The first is that under the practice which has arisen before the board of transport commissioners it is the Canadian Pacific that is the yardstick for the fixing of rates, and therefore it was only natural that they who bear the brunt of presenting evidence before the board of transport commissioners should also be responsible in large part for submitting evidence to the committee. I think that is clearly established by the practice before the board of transport commissioners itself.

Let me assure my hon. friend on another point. After the report of the royal commission had been handed down and the president of the Canadian National Railways had had an opportunity to give it some study, he came to see me and discussed it with me. He told me frankly then that he was in full agreement with the substance and the principles of the legislation as it was then envisaged. Therefore there should be no surprise when counsel for the Canadian National Railways declares that in principle he is in favour of this legislation.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I want to make only one comment, if I may. I am aware of what the minister said about the Canadian Pacific Railway being the yardstick, but that does not seem to answer the point. Even if the Canadian Pacific Railway is the yardstick, it is very unfortunate that no assistance whatever came from the Canadian National, but I am not going to pursue the matter further.

Mr. Gillis: Since I was a member of the committee I feel it is my duty to say a few words on this first section. I might say that on the question of freight rates I went into the committee in much the same state of mind as the average member of that committee, namely, pretty well confused and mixed up on the whole question. I wish to say that I had my mind clarified on many things that had been rather mysterious to me previously, particularly the language used when discussing the whole problem of freight rates. I wish to say also that it was one of the best committees I have sat on since I came to this house. It was an education to me at least. I say it was a good committee for three reasons. I think the people who serve on other committees should insist on the same kind of administration as far as their committees are concerned. In the first place, there was the patience of the chairman. I have never seen a chairman with more patience.

Mr. Chevrier: I wish that applied to the minister.

Mr. Gillis: I will say something in a minute about him. In the second place, there was the calibre of the witnesses who came before the committee. Every witness on behalf of the provinces and the Canadian Pacific Railway knew exactly what he wanted. They were clear and explicit about it. If you had any doubt in your mind that you were trying to resolve they certainly cleared it up for you. All the witnesses who appeared before the committee were very able people. They gave us a valuable education in the mysteries of rate-making as it exists across the country, and the importance of the board of transport commissioners. The patience of the chairman, the ability of the witnesses and the flexibility of the minister were outstanding.

Mr. Knowles: You asked for it.

Mr. Gillis: Any time a matter came up that was not strictly in accordance with the bill, if there was any suggestion that there was something wrong with it or that it created a hardship, the minister was very flexible. He took it under consideration. The fact that the bill was amended in about six different places shows that he was not stuck on a sentence. The committee was fortunate in the calibre of the people it had to handle the problem and present it to us.

The members of the committee were conscientious. I would like to pay tribute to the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra. While we may not agree with him in everything, nobody can doubt his sincerity, honesty and tenacity of purpose. He took a beating in the committee, and he is taking a beating in the house. But my sympathies are with him. I think that any person who is trying to do something honestly deserves the commendation of his fellow men.

Now, in regard to what was accomplished. It is not hard to rise in the house and criticize, and I am very good at that myself. This whole question of freight rates was handled by a royal commission. That royal commission dealt with the whole question for around eighteen months. A witness for the Canadian Pacific Railway said that he made 105 appearances before the commission. After hearing all the evidence and giving everybody across the country an opportunity to present their case, the royal commission sifted the mass of evidence, and this bill was the result. This bill is intended to implement the recommendations made by the different provinces and the railways and put it on the statute books. I myself think that a good job was done on it in many respects.

As far as the maritimes are concerned, they did not get under this bill, but they did get a guarantee that they were not going to lose anything. The historic position of the maritimes was guaranteed. While some of us had some doubts whether it was sufficiently guaranteed in the bill, the minister, again in his own flexible way, said: We will write something in that gives you a second guarantee. So far as the historic position is concerned, we are guaranteed we are not going to lose anything. The rebate of 20 per cent is guaranteed to the maritime provinces.

I want to say on behalf of the end of the country that I come from: Thanks to the other provinces. From British Columbia to Newfoundland they all agreed that that particular right guaranteed to the maritimes should be maintained. It was a very generous gesture on their part, in view of the very many complex problems they have in their own provinces in this matter of freight rates.

Another reason why the maritimes were treated fairly was the fact that the presentation on behalf of the maritimes was a united one. The whole four provinces were represented in the maritime commission, with capable people at the head of it. Their job is continuously to sift rates, groupings and what have you, and to represent the maritimes before the board of transport commissioners. In my opinion they did a good job, and it is a demonstration of united action. We are grateful that while we did not get anything, we did not lose anything. The bill does not prevent us from getting redress from any inequities that we think still exist.

So far as the maritimes are concerned, I want to say that as a member of the committee I was quite satisfied, and the maritime representatives had their own commission acquiesce in the amendments in the bill, and they felt they had sufficient guarantees.

On the question of equalization, I am convinced that equalization of freight rates in this country is a dream. What the bill intends to do, rather than equalize in the strict sense of the word, is to remove discriminations where they exist, and to bring about equality in so far as it is practicable in this country. The bill has laid a good base for that. There are sections of the country that still have a complaint, but I do not think there is anything in the bill that prevents a redress of any wrong that may exist now if it has not been taken care of completely in the bill.

There was one place where I was disappointed. A few moments ago the hon. member for Greenwood said he did not think the Canadian National Railways took the proper position. I think they did, in that the Canadian Pacific Railway has always been recognized as the rate-making section for the railways in Canada, as the minister stated, and whatever yardstick is laid down for them in so far as rates are concerned is applicable to the whole system. The Canadian Pacific Railway representative is a very able person. He was very vocal in the committee. There was never any doubt in anybody's mind as to what he thought on any particular section of the bill.

In this respect I think the railways took a position that any sensible organization would take, recognizing that the fellow with the big stick is in there, and if he can get a good job done it is applicable to me.

Therefore, why should I send a lot of representatives in there? The point I was disappointed in is this. The legislation does not recognize at all the representation of the Canadian National Railways to the commission on the proposition of a revision of the capital structure of that railway.

I am concerned about the employees of that road, just as the hon. member for Greenwood has indicated he is. I believe the largest single factor preventing the employees of the Canadian National from getting proper redress in the matter of wages and conditions is the capital structure of the railway itself. As the hon. member knows, that railway is carrying an interest debt of around $45 million a year on fixed capital which produces nothing. Many years ago this capital should have been put into bankruptcy. The president of the Canadian National recommended that that capital should be either written off or written into the balance sheets as equity capital and not interest bearing. There is $45 million a year which goes to maintain the national railway which should not be there. We should have done something at this session about this interest debt which is carried year by year.

I did not intend to make a lengthy speech. I happened to be a member of the committee representing a part of the country that I think got a fair deal, and I was there to protect the interests of that part of the country. I thought I should say these few words to express my appreciation.

Mr. Low: I was a member of the committee until the last few days of the sittings. At that time I had to be away, and my place was taken by another member. As a member of the committee, I believe I should say a few words in connection with this bill, and especially since I come from a province that for many years has been attempting to get just such an arrangement as has been presented in the bill. We want it understood, Mr. Chairman, that on the whole we think the members of the committee have been very fair. Like the hon. member who has just spoken, we appreciate the attitude of the chairman of the committee, and the minister. We feel they both did a very fine job in that they did not allow themselves or the committee to be swerved from the terms of reference. All the members of the committee settled down to their task with commendable studiousness and energy. While we disagreed in some measure with some of the members of the committee, we appreciated the view that they took.

I should like to say a word about the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra. No one appreciates his good qualities more than I do. I believe he is a very courageous man, and he has shown that on numerous occasions in this house and on other committees. We differ in our opinions, certainly, but I can quite understand why he took the position he did, especially on section 332B which I think was the subject of most of his attention during part of the sittings. I quite understand that if the west coast really were in danger of losing the transcontinental rates, the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra was quite justified in putting up a fight. I would not like to see that happen. In fact I would feel towards the possible loss of the transcontinental rates for the west coast as I felt when British Columbia made an application for the removal of the mountain differential. At that time we in Alberta recognized that the removal of the mountain differential might throw some additional burden upon the freight payers in the province of Alberta. We felt, however, that British Columbia was completely justified in requesting the removal, so we did not fight against it. However that may be, I just wanted it known that we appreciate the position of the British Columbia members too. I believe it was the hon. member for Vancouver South who spoke the other day, and took a sound position so far as his point of view was concerned. He took a well-balanced and very fair position, and I want to pay that tribute to him.

We in the province of Alberta did not get everything for which we asked, but under the circumstances I believe we are justified in saying that we are fortunate in what we did get. I want that known, because we feel quite thankful for what we believe the bill provides. Personally, I cannot feel very critical about it at all. I should like to see the bill given every chance to show what it can do for all the provinces. Certainly I believe the minister, if the experience over the next three or four years proved there are deficiencies in the bill, would be the first to recommend that changes be made in order to ensure fairness for all parts of this country. Certainly the equalization principle established in the bill is something for which we can all be thankful.

The provinces of Ontario and Quebec have not shown too much concern about the matter, which I interpret to mean they are prepared to take their chances with the rest of Canada. If they had fought section 331 in committee, perhaps I might not have the same opinion. They did not, however, and one has to interpret these things pretty much on the attitude of the members in committee. I would say that they took a fair stand in committee, and they are not fighting it in the house today. They are not fighting the equalization principle nor are they fighting section 332B, which sets out the one and one-third formula. This seems to be evidence that they are prepared to go along without making an issue of something that will probably be of benefit to the whole of Canada; that is the only way I can interpret it. I am quite prepared, Mr. Chairman, to attribute that attitude to them on the basis of what I have seen and heard.

As the days go by I believe the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra and perhaps some others from British Columbia will find their fears were not justified. A careful study of the evidence and statements presented in the committee, especially by Mr. Knowles who was the adviser to the committee, will indicate that the transcontinental rates are not maintained so much on the basis of water competition today as they are on the basis of United States railway competition. That being the case, I doubt very much whether the railways will, in your time or mine, consider taking off those transcontinental rates. I cannot bring myself to believe there is any danger of that at all. If there is, then of course Alberta stands to lose some of the benefits that are contained in section 332B, because if the basis of the one and one-third formula is raised then of course it will result in higher rates. My own feeling is that the evidence clearly shows there is little if any danger the railways will abolish those rates.

I do not want to make a lengthy speech. I merely want to express our appreciation of the very fair way the committee was conducted. To the railways I should like to say this. We thought, at times, the Canadian Pacific Railway spokesman was vigorous, but that is what he was there for. He submitted himself to cross-questioning quite amiably and tried to give, to the best of his ability, answers to the questions that were asked of him. On behalf of the people of the province of Alberta, Mr. Chairman, I want to say how much we appreciate the effort that is now being made to remove what we have thought have been historic injustices and to bring relief from the terribly heavy burden of freight costs under which those people have suffered for so many years.

Mr. Brooks: I have little to say, Mr. Chairman. As a matter of fact, I did not intend to say anything but I feel that I should, in a way, rather second the remarks which have been made by the hon. member for Cape Breton South. Like him, I appreciate greatly the situation as far as the maritimes are concerned. I also realize how little we know about freight rates. The hon. member said that he had learned a great deal. I feel that I learned much as well. I also feel that even yet I know little about freight rates across Canada, and I doubt whether anyone can say that he knows the whole story.

Mr. Low: To do that would take us many years.

Mr. Brooks: I think so, when it is remembered that freight rates are based on so many factors such as geography, competition with trucks, and competition with canals; we also speak about ocean competition; and there are statutes such as the Maritimes Freight Rates Act, the Crowsnest Pass agreement, the mountain differential, and United States freight rates. All of these things which have to be taken into consideration impressed us with the great difficulty of fixing freight rates on our transportation system in Canada.

We in the maritimes were greatly concerned as to what would happen to us when this bill was passed. I was not in the house when the resolution was before it, but my good friends the hon. member for Cumberland and the hon. member for Annapolis-Kings expressed doubts at that time as to whether our interests were safeguarded. I think their fears were justified because when the representatives from the maritimes, representing the maritime transport commission, appeared before the committee they emphasized the dangers there were in passing the bill as it was presented to the committee. I was pleased indeed that, while the minister did not entirely agree with them, he was nevertheless far enough convinced to allow an amendment to go through. I feel that that amendment has cleared the air. As I say, it has justified the fears which were expressed in this chamber by the hon. member for Cumberland and the hon. member for Annapolis-Kings. As my good friend the hon. member for Cape Breton South has said, we appreciate the support which was received from all parts of Canada. I might also say that we in the maritimes greatly appreciate the efforts of Mr. Rand Matheson and Mr. Frank Smith, the men who appeared before the committee for the maritime board of trade and commission. They presented our case in a splendid manner, so that when representatives of other parts of Canada came to express their views on the requests that we were making, it was found that they felt that our views were entirely justified, and that the stand that the maritime provinces were taking was entirely justified. Along with the hon. member who spoke a few moments ago, I wish to thank the other sections of Canada who realized so well the position of the maritime provinces. I think it is a great indication of the solidarity of this country in certain matters and also of a true Canadian spirit from one end of Canada to the other.

The other night the hon. member for Bow River—and I may say that I think perhaps he was not altogether serious—accused our party of taking sides in the committee between different provinces. That is absolutely incorrect, as I am sure was proven to him. I for one had an open mind. As I stated then, while I was in sympathy with my good friend the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra personally, nevertheless I was not entirely in sympathy with his arguments. My sympathies were more or less with the province of Alberta. The hon. member for Bow River thought that possibly I should have taken more part in the debate in defence of Alberta's attitude. But with the hon. member for Peace River and the hon. member for Bow River being on that committee, upholding the rights of the province of Alberta, I felt—as I am sure did every other member of the committee—that there was no necessity for anybody else to put in his oar.

Mr. Low: We liked your attitude.

Mr. Brooks: I am sure you did. I have nothing further to say at this time, Mr. Chairman. I hope that this bill will be a success. I hope that it will be fair to the railways and to every section of Canada.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): The bill has been carefully worked out and is worthy of all the praise which has been given it. At the same time, coming as I do from a certain part of Canada where railway service is not adequately given to the people, I am sure that my community would be unhappy if I did not say at this time that, now that this great national plan has been worked out, we hope that the Canadian National Railways and the Canadian Pacific Railway, which jointly own the Northern Alberta railways up in my part of the country, will at an early date be instructed to proceed with the extension of certain rail construction in that area.

When the royal commission on transportation met I was authorized by the boards of trade and chambers of commerce of the district, along with Senator Gray Turgeon, to appear before it and to present the claims for the Peace River block of British Columbia and that part of the hinterland of Vancouver north of Prince George, for adequate railway service. In the report of the royal commission, at page 20, it is noted that we duly appeared before the commission and that a brief of many pages was submitted.

The Chairman: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but its seems to me that he is not quite in order in discussing that matter at the present time.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): Mr. Chairman, I sought to approach the question of freight rates in that particular province in which, I think any expert will agree, they are higher than they are elsewhere in Canada, simply because 10,000 people in that area are removed from rail service. The hon. member for Peace River was quite right in the position that he took. But as my neighbour out there, he knows that there are at least 30,000 people out there whose natural outlet is the port of Vancouver but who are not enabled to ship their material to the port of Vancouver and who must ship it 500 miles to Edmonton, and around back from Calgary or elsewhere, in order to reach the port of Vancouver. If I am out of order in referring to that matter, I hope that at an early date I may be given the opportunity of referring to what is a national problem in our country, and particularly in the city of Vancouver which is today deprived of direct access to its natural farm hinterland.

Freight rates on grain have been fixed from Dawson Creek to the head of the lakes and to the port of Vancouver, and certain concessions have been made. Nevertheless the merchants and manufacturers of British Columbia are interested in a cheaper schedule of rates from the great industrial centres to that particular area. That is something which probably breaks the harmony of the occasion. But, as I say, a very extensive brief was placed before the royal commission. Pages 130 and 131 of that document are devoted to the proposed railway expansion, and matters incidental thereto, and to the economic position of the Peace river and Pacific regions.

I shall not read from the report at this time. It is a matter of record, and the material may at a later time be brought before the proper authorities. In urging these remedies for that area, I think it is only good business for all concerned, because in extending the rail services there it must be kept in mind that a very large tonnage already exists. It is urgent that the matter should be considered at this time, because that country is going to come into its own as a highly productive country. With coal, oil, lumber, agricultural products and the like, the matter of freight costs is of paramount importance and a public issue of first magnitude.

Mr. Blackmore: Mr. Chairman, as I have watched developments since the setting up of the royal commission in 1948, I have found much cause for happiness. It seemed to me like the realization of a dream.

In 1937, the second year in which I was in the House of Commons, I made a number of remarks bearing upon the inequities suffered at that time by the prairie provinces. Among others, I referred to the railway freight rates situation, and used the following words recorded on pages 52 and 53 of Hansard of that year:

> Now there is another injustice of which I believe a good many people are not aware. I am going to speak for a minute or two directly for my own province, not mentioning the others. There is in the Dominion of Canada a freight rate structure that makes Alberta pay both going and coming. She is being discriminated against as is no other province in this dominion.

And at a later point in the same speech:

> I wager that if the people of some of these eastern provinces were suffering as much as Alberta is they would not be as calm as Alberta has been. The thing we want to do is to find what is the cause of all this, and to remove that cause as far as is humanly possible. Surely there is something that can be done. I read this from an editorial in a western paper, and not a Social Credit paper:
> "This province (Alberta) as a matter of fact is at the apex of the general freight rate structure of Canada."
> I have not time to go into details, but they bear tremendously on the relief problem in those provinces. Someone is suffering for all that. And it does not matter how desirous they are of working or how careful they are in their living or how economical they are or how anxious to keep off relief, they are in the grip of circumstances which are an absolute disgrace to this dominion.
> There are some other things which I wish to consider. I will not now spend any more time on the discrimination; I may at another time say something further on that for the enlightenment of the house. I fancy the reason these things are tolerated is only that we do not know about them. I did not know about these things until I looked them up, and I cannot blame people who have never had them brought to their attention. It is our business to bring them to the attention of hon. members, and we do so in a spirit of good fellowship and straightforward honesty, asking that redress be given to us so that we may live. That is all. You see why I said a moment ago that the matter is exceedingly serious.

From that time forward, until the appointment of the commission, I missed no suitable opportunity to bring to the attention of other members of the house and of other provinces of the dominion the outrageously unjust position in which Alberta was placed by the freight rate situation.

I rejoice in the finding of the commission; I rejoice in the bill that has been brought down; I rejoice in hearing about the way the minister deported himself all through the sittings of the committee, and about the way the different committee members deported themselves.

I should like to make a few observations on the whole situation. One of the bright lights, in my judgment, is the provision of the $7 million subsidy to take care of the millstone about the neck of Canada in the form of that wilderness of rocks which separates Ontario from the prairie provinces. I do not know why it was that something like that $7 million was not provided many, many years ago. I do not see how it could be that men, around the year 1900, and from there on, failed to realize that calling upon the prairie provinces and upon British Columbia to bear the full burden of the futile daily haul across those thousands of miles was an outrage not to be contemplated with equanimity by members of parliament and by the provinces. Nevertheless that outrage has been contemplated and has been inflicted upon those four western provinces every year since the railways were built.

I believe other things are being overlooked, just as were those thousands of miles of rock. Until we give cognizance to those other things we shall never place Canada in a position where she can accomplish her maximum by way of well-being for Canadians.

I should like to commend the hon. member for Vancouver South for the views he expressed the other evening. In my opinion they were genuinely statesmanlike. His general attitude was that we should approach this whole matter with calmness and a realization of the facts, and that we should try to do something about it that would be an honour to us in our generation. I believe I have correctly summarized what the hon.

member said, but if he feels I have been unjust, then he may make the correction.

But, applying that general principle, let me draw to the attention of hon. members once again the fact mentioned by the hon. member for Vancouver South. Trucks and busses are now cutting into a great deal of the most profitable business of the railroads, and that is entirely as it should be. What is the use of living in an age in which we have wonderful machines, if the people cannot obtain benefit from those machines?

In addition to that, the top layer of business of the railways is being taken off by the aeroplanes. Our own Trans-Canada Air Lines, as well as other air transportation companies, are doing the job—and rightly so. Once again, why in an age of splendid machines should we not profit through the use of those machines? While we recognize that those particular machines at both ends of the business are taking off the cream of the transportation business, we expect the railroads to be able to make a success of their undertaking with what is left. We expect those people who must use the railroads to bear the whole brunt of their maintenance. How can men in this House of Commons be more neglectful of their duty than to disregard that important fact?

There are those in the dominion who believe that trucks and busses should be brought under central control and forced to discontinue competition with the railroads. Could there be a more fantastic attitude to take toward machines than to put them in a position where they cannot fulfil their purpose? If we had tried back in the horse and wagon days when busses and trucks began to come into use to bring them under control and make them unable to compete successfully with the wagons and horses, what a nonsensical situation that would have been! No one would fail to recognize the tragic absurdity of such a position. Yet the like of that is practically what we are meditating when we entertain the notion of limiting truck and bus competition with railroads.

Our whole idea seems to be that come what will these railroads must be able to raise enough money from the traffic they carry to discharge their responsibilities and commitments and make a go of their organizations. We simply must once more recognize, as we have now done in the case of the wilderness of rocks, that with this rapid development of impinging transport industries a factor is brought into being which must be provided for, not by the poor unfortunate people who still have to use the railroads but by the whole Dominion of Canada.

We must have the railroads and they must be in the best of condition when we need them sorely as in time of war or when our crops must be moved to the sea. But that does not mean that the people using the railroads should have to pay the whole shot. It is a national advantage and a national necessity that these railroads be in perfect running order, adequately equipped with personnel and rolling stock so that they will be able to serve us in time of need. Why should we as a nation not pay for that great facility just as we pay for the construction of airports or for military preparedness? It is just part of the cost of keeping ourselves able to meet the exigencies of the future.

I feel almost certain that before too long men will recognize that the only way of meeting this equalization problem and at the same time enabling the railroads to carry on is an adequate subsidy paid out of the consolidated revenue fund by all the people of Canada. I sympathize intensely with the people of British Columbia. I quite understand the attitude of the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra and I honour him for the courage that he has manifested. He feels that British Columbia is in danger of losing the few crumbs of advantage she already has. I know something about the disadvantages under which British Columbia is labouring. Life is not all meadows and sunshine there, not by any means. She is enduring a freight rates structure which is almost as unhappy for her as is the freight rates structure which the maritimes must still endure, even with the bit of patching done to their situation.

If we want Canada to make her fitting contribution to the well-being of the world we simply must not put parts of Canada in a position where they are burdened down and prevented from making their contribution. Everywhere we are having impressed upon us at the present time the tremendous need of increasing the production of food for the world. If I am correctly informed, only yesterday Dr. Barton gave a talk over the air from Rome in which he pointed out the tremendous need of increasing food production.

Let it be borne in mind that one of the greatest potential areas on the face of the earth for the production of food is Canada. Let it be borne in mind that if we inflict upon our people a burden of freight rates so great that they are unable to produce fully and profitably and market their products we shall be preventing Canada from doing the thing which perhaps is the most important for her to do in this critical time of world history. Each and every freight rates increase which has occurred in the last few years has made it more difficult to produce and market butter and all kinds of dairy products, all kinds of poultry and meat products, and practically every product produced in Canada. It has made it more difficult to have a farm which is near submarginal and make it pay.

If we are worthy of the position we occupy in this house we will take cognizance of that fact and adopt every measure to see to it that every possible producer in Canada is, as far as is practicable, put in the position where he can do the best he is capable of doing to build up the productive capacity of Canada to the optimum degree.

Let me say once more that a subsidy to be paid out of the consolidated revenue fund will have to be resorted to if we are going to have fair rates, or I would say tolerable rates, in this nation. I shall close by once more congratulating the minister upon the position he has taken in the committee and elsewhere in respect to this bill. I think that is an achievement which will redound to his credit all through future times and I do not think I am speaking extravagantly when I say that.

Before I resume my seat however let me say that we must not assume that the railroad fixture we have planned for today is our ultimate goal. We have merely won one or two trenches and everybody must start immediately to determine how we are going to win the next trench and consolidate those we have won already. I think it was the hon. member for Vancouver South who pointed out that in five years we shall probably have to have a new set-up. I think that is true. We cannot have that set-up by just letting the railroads and their employees struggle along until they get to the point where they feel that they simply must have additional freight rates, then to continue with the hit and miss, chaotic system of the past for the next ten or fifteen years until another royal commission will have to be appointed. We must go at this matter in a sensible way, appreciating the difficulties with which these people are confronted, and making provision for the remedying of the difficulties before they become acute.

Mr. Macdonald (Edmonton East): As one of the members who served on the special committee on railway legislation, I feel that at this stage I should make a few observations. Like other members who served on the committee I should like to state that I never served on a more interesting committee, or one before which more qualified witnesses appeared or where the chairman gave more consideration to everyone concerned in studying the legislation. I believe that the railways of Canada are perhaps more important than those of any other nation, for without railways this country could not exist. I have been an employee of one of the railways for over thirty years, and I appreciate that railways must have revenues to exist.

There is nothing in this legislation that is going to do away with railway earnings. As a matter of fact I believe that the procedure outlined in these amendments to the Railway Act will result in a more equal distribution throughout Canada of the collection of freight rates from those sources from which the railways obtain their revenue. I am not anxious to prolong the enactment of this legislation. For that reason I take the opportunity on this section to speak about two matters in the bill that are of particular interest. I refer first to the new section 332B found in section 7 of the bill. This section is of great importance to the people of Alberta, and is not only important for the beneficial change it makes in the rate structure. After forty years of discrimination in the Canadian freight rate structure this section removes what almost might be described as a festering sore in the economy of our whole province. Shortly stated, that discrimination permitted the railways to charge more, much more in some important instances, to Edmonton and Calgary for transportation of goods from eastern Canada than was charged to Vancouver, 771 miles farther.

It is a fundamental rule in transportation that you cannot charge more for a shorter than for a longer distance, other things of course being equal, and the rate comparison I have cited was a striking violation of that principle. The railways justified the violation by pointing out that there was water competition from eastern Canada to Vancouver which did not exist at Edmonton and Calgary. However, the people of Alberta were not long in finding out that on transcontinental traffic in the United States no such discrimination was permitted owing to the combined effect of the railway law of the United States and the rulings of the interstate commerce commission. Since 1922 it has been laid down that the rate to interior points in the United States must not exceed the rate to west coast destinations. For example, if the rate from Cleveland to San Francisco was $1.50 the rate from Cleveland to Salt Lake City was $1.50 and no more.

The Alberta people submitted this grievance to the general investigation of the board of railway commissioners in 1927 and no relief was given. The discrimination was left as it was. The matter was then placed before the Rowell-Sirois royal commission in 1938. I believe that the report of that commission, while lending a sympathetic ear, said that it was a matter for the board of transport commissioners and that it probably warranted investigation. Then came the royal commission on transportation set up by this government in December, 1948, with broad and unrestricted terms of reference. Again the people of Alberta were given an opportunity to seek redress of this old wrong. A case was submitted to the royal commission on the long and short haul principle and their complaint with respect thereto. The royal commission recommended a solution for this serious discrimination, and I am glad to compliment the government, and particularly the Minister of Transport, for having faithfully reproduced in the bill the recommendations made by the royal commission.

The recommendation of the royal commission does not give intermediate destinations the full and complete relief from long and short haul discrimination which is enjoyed by the people of Idaho, Washington and Utah, but what it does do, as expressed in the bill, is to provide that the people of Alberta will pay the rate to the west coast plus 33⅓ per cent. However, at this time, we are content with that seemingly unfair treatment. We recognize, as the royal commission did, that this has been a controversial matter and the good people of Alberta are satisfied to compromise and accept less than was sought with a view to maintaining harmony.

To illustrate the discrimination existing at the present time, and which the bill will remedy, I might give the house one example, the movement of canned goods, which is an important one. The story is told at page 101 of the royal commission's report. The rate shown there has since been increased, and I will give the existing rates. The present rate on canned goods from eastern Canada to Vancouver is $1.57. The rate to Edmonton is $3.23, but I must point out that by use of what is called the Vancouver combination the rate on very large carloads can become $2.97. By combining the rate of $1.57 to Vancouver with the back haul rate of $1.40 from Vancouver to Edmonton you can get a rate of $2.97. This so-called privilege is extended so as to obviate the necessity of actually hauling to Vancouver and back to Edmonton.

Applying the remedy recommended by the royal commission, namely, that the rate to the intermediate point must not be more than one and one-third times the coast rate, our rate to Edmonton will become $2.09. From what I have said hon. members will readily realize that I am giving my wholehearted support to the bill in the belief that in so far as Alberta is concerned it is one of the most beneficial pieces of legislation that have ever come before the attention of this house.

Mr. Decore: Although I was not a member of the special committee on railway legislation, inasmuch as I come from the province of Alberta I should like to make a few observations. I believe one of the greatest steps toward national unity in this great country of ours is the introduction of this measure by the minister, a measure based on some of the recommendations of the royal commission on transportation. Rarely, if over, have the western provinces since joining confederation been in a position to win so notable a victory. There is no question that there has been unjust and unfair discrimination concerning freight rates especially in the western provinces and particularly the province of Alberta. We of course realize the difficulties of railway transportation in a country like Canada. It is a country which has thousands of miles between the Atlantic and the Pacific, with mountains and barren territory in between. Let us also not forget that we have in Canada a population of only some 14 million people, a very small population, considering the intricate and vast system of rail transportation that we have here. The cost is obviously very high to the people.

Rail transportation is the life stream of the economy of any country. In Canada it is not only that life stream of our national economy, but it is also a very important factor in national unity. Therefore it is a matter of national concern, and it is important that the burden of rail transportation should be, and must be, on a more equitable basis.

The reason I rose was to make this observation and to bring out the fact that this great victory for the west, and particularly for the province of Alberta, as a result of the Turgeon report, would hardly have been possible had it not been for the silent acquiescence of the provinces of Ontario and Quebec. I understand that neither of these provinces that has the benefits of the freight rates as they have existed up until now appeared before the Turgeon commission. Probably the Turgeon commission report would have been different had they appeared. I assume that if representations had been made by the provinces of Ontario and Quebec they would have tried to continue the unjust discrimination in their favour. But this they did not do, and we in the west most certainly appreciate the attitude of these two provinces, and especially the attitude taken by the hon. members from these provinces. I think to a great extent this will eliminate the bitterness which sometimes existed in the west toward Ontario and Quebec. I believe this is a great step in strengthening national unity in this country.

Mr. Gillis: Before we proceed with the bill may I say that the royal commission devoted twenty-one pages of its report to the recapitalization of the Canadian National Railways, and it set out some formulae. I am not going to make a long argument on this, but I am in favour of what the royal commission said in their report. For example, there is the psychological factor as it applies to the Canadian National Railways in this accumulation of deficits. The commission definitely states that the Canadian National Railways did prove conclusively that their case was good in so far as an adjustment in their fixed charges was concerned. While the bill does not do anything specifically about it, is it the intention of the board of transport commissioners and the minister's department to study further the recommendations of the commission in regard to a revision of the capital structure of the Canadian National Railways?

Mr. Chevrier: The answer to that question is yes. I think I have indicated that a committee is studying it now. I am sure my hon. friend will realize that it is a matter of some importance, and one that takes time to consider, just as it has taken a considerable amount of time to consider this legislation. But it could not possibly be in this bill. It would have to be a separate amendment, or perhaps another bill along the lines of the Canadian National Railways capital revision act, which was brought before this house some time ago. I can assure my hon. friend that it is under active consideration at the moment.

Mr. Green: I want to bring one question to the attention of the minister. Before doing so I should like to thank the hon. member for Cape Breton South and the leader of the Social Credit party, the hon. member for Peace River, and also his colleague, the hon. member for Lethbridge, for the kind remarks about myself. These three members and I have been friends ever since we first met here in the House of Commons, and perhaps we see each other through rose-tinted spectacles. However, I should like to reciprocate their kind expressions.

The matter I wanted to raise with the minister is the question of policy with regard to future appointments to the board of transport commissioners. A vacancy has existed for some time now, and I presume a new commissioner will be appointed in due course. I think the minister should pay close attention to the recommendations made by the Turgeon commission, which advocated strengthening the commission. If he will turn to page 272 he will find there under the heading "Assessment of the Suggestions", which means suggestions made by the various provincial representatives before the royal commission, the following paragraph:

> It can be stated fairly that what everyone really wants is that the board's powers be kept as they are now, but with the hope and expectation that the recent contentious proceedings which have gone on will cause the board to exercise greater care in the future in arriving at its decisions.

Further on in the same chapter we find the recommendation of the commission for strengthening the board. It is couched in very tactful language, but I do not think anyone can doubt what is meant. I suggest to the minister that, in making new appointments, it is of vital importance that the main consideration be the qualifications of the appointees. There is not going to be much improvement in the board of transport commissioners if the first qualification is that of having been a Liberal member of parliament, a Liberal member of a legislature or a defeated candidate. I hope that I would express the same sentiments if a Conservative government were in office at the present time. No doubt when one was in office it committed similar indiscretions; but we have come to the stage now in this transportation question in Canada when it is absolutely vital that the selections be made on a new basis. I hesitate to make this comment, but in the interests of the country I think it should be made.

Mr. Chevrier: I thank the hon. member for the suggestion which he has made. In view of the discussion which has taken place here and in view of the various recommendations, I think it is timely. I think, too, that the government has had that very strongly before it in the last recommendations. Certainly it cannot be said that what the hon. member suggested was in the government's mind with regard to the appointment of Mr. Justice Archibald.

Mr. Green: That is true.

Mr. Chevrier: He was, and I am sure the committee will agree, an outstanding candidate for that position. Unfortunately his health broke down. I think that goes for the present incumbent. I have known him for some years but more intimately within the last few weeks, and I am very strongly impressed by the force of character and by the intellectual powers of Mr. Justice Kearney, the present chief commissioner. Because of his qualifications I have no doubt that he will be a success as chief commissioner. It is certainly the intention of the government to make sure that any appointments in the future will be along the same line. It is certainly my intention to so recommend to the government. But I would like my hon. friend to be reminded of this. There are some former Liberal candidates, elected and defeated, who are outstanding men. I would not want to have them ruled out just because they happen to be of that political persuasion. I do not mean to say they should be appointed because of that. Certainly those who have been appointed thus far were not regarded in that light.

Mr. Green: That is open to question.

Mr. Chevrier: I would not want my hon. friend to think that I am making this reservation because we intend to appoint a former Liberal member or a defeated Liberal candidate to the next vacancy. That has not even entered my mind nor the mind of the government, because we have not given it consideration yet. But again I want to assure the house and my hon. friend that it is certainly the intention of the government, and it has been in the last few years, to carry out the recommendations of the royal commission in so far as qualifications are concerned.

Mr. McLure: I do not want to make any extended remarks. When this matter was being considered the other evening I was anxious to ascertain what the powers of this board were, and the jurisdiction which it has. After I made a few remarks the other night I received a telephone message saying that I had been quite severe in what I said. So far as the railway problems in our province are concerned, I believe this board has always acted as a buffer between the Minister of Transport and the people who are looking for railway service.

In delivering judgment a few weeks ago on a railway problem in our province, the board disagreed amongst themselves and the chairman wrote a minority report which was based on certain reliable facts. As could be seen from the portion I quoted the other night, the remainder of the board put in a childish report. Whether or not we are getting the right class of man on this board, I do not know. Surely with this increase in salary we will get high-class men from the educational point of view. Still it is no use getting these high-class men if this board is, as it appears to me, just a buffer arrangement for the government when we make certain demands on the government. As I said before, according to the terms of confederation my province is compelled to deal directly with the government, and for that reason I would not favour these increases in salary until we see if we cannot get good men to serve. I should like to find out what the powers and jurisdiction of the board are.

[Mr. Chevrier.]

Mr. Chevrier: The powers of the board are set out in sections 32 and 33 of the Railway Act, principally section 33. The royal commission on transportation recommended that the powers be not broadened.

Section agreed to.

Section 2 to 6 inclusive agreed to.

On section 7.

Mr. Green: Section 7 is the section which contains the most important part of the bill. I would suggest that we consider this section clause by clause as those clauses will appear in the Railway Act itself. We could take section 328 of the Railway Act first, and so on through section 7 of the bill. It might be wise to consider one or two sections together during the discussion, but I think we would have a more orderly debate if we took it according to sections of the Railway Act.

The Deputy Chairman: Hon. members have heard the suggestion. Is that suggestion agreeable?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

On section 7—section 328—Division of freight tariffs.

Mr. Green: Section 328 of the act deals with the new division of freight tariffs, dividing them into class rates, commodity rates, competitive rates and special arrangement tariffs. I have today received from the city of Victoria and the Victoria chamber of commerce a brief which refers apparently to the class rates. It sets out that after the mountain differential was removed on July 1, 1949, the railways discontinued a practice which had been carried on for many decades, namely that the rates to Victoria were practically the same as the rates to Vancouver. In other words there was what we might call a grouping of Victoria and Vancouver for the purpose of these class rates.

The mountain differential, of course, was very unpopular in British Columbia, and was extremely unfair because it set a higher rate for that province than for any other part of Canada including the prairies. I do not understand why, when it had been the policy of the railways to put Victoria on this basis, that policy was changed. I would ask the minister if there is not some way in which the problem can be met. No doubt he has had the same letter and brief that I have received. I believe it was sent to each of the British Columbia members. There does seem to be a need for some action to remedy that situation. Victoria is handicapped in any event by reason of the water trip from the mainland to the island. I do not think she should be further handicapped by having to pay these higher rates.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, in answer to my hon. friend's statement, may I say that I do not think section 328 of the act deals with that point. There is nothing in it, in my opinion, which could come to the rescue of these aggrieved people. When the province of British Columbia made its application for the removal of the mountain differential some time ago, I presume that there were placed before the board the handicaps and difficulties under which the area suffered because of the differences in the rate in the mountains as compared with the prairies. I would think that the remedy would lie with the board, in that an application should be made to the board by the persons aggrieved to have their original position restored. Since the board was seized of the whole question of the mountain differential, if something arose out of that judgment then I think it is for the board to determine.

Mr. Green: Apparently it does not arise out of the mountain differential. The position was that while these mountain differential rates were in effect, the rate to Victoria was practically the same as that to Vancouver. When the mountain differential was wiped out, then the railways put on the additional rate to Victoria. As I read the brief and the letter, it is a class rate and I should think the difficulty could be overcome by putting Vancouver and Victoria in the same group. I suppose that would be under the new section 332A. It has nothing to do with the mountain differential other than that when the railways lost revenue from the mountain differential being wiped out, they apparently decided to get more from Victoria by charging them a higher class rate than they had been charging, in comparison with the rate charged to Vancouver.

Mr. Chevrier: Yes, but that arises out of the position in the mountain differential. What the railways did was this. They simply did what they were entitled to do. They put Victoria on its proper mileage vis-à-vis Vancouver. That perhaps put the chief complainants in the position in which they find themselves today. But I think my hon. friend will find that there is in the Railway Act at this time ample provision for redress. I do not know what the section is—I think it is either section 314 or 315—under which any party aggrieved can make application to the board for redress.

Mr. Green: Would that redress be in the nature of making a bigger group; of putting Vancouver and Victoria in the same group?

Mr. Chevrier: I think it could be of that nature, and I think it could be in the nature of a general complaint.

Section 7—section 328—agreed to.

On section 7—section 329—What class rate tariff to specify.

Mr. Green: Will the minister explain that amendment? Also, as we come to other sections which have been amended, I would ask him to explain the effect of the amendments which have been made in committee.

Mr. Chevrier: This is a rather difficult amendment to explain. My hon. friend will recall that the same question was asked of me in the committee, and that I stated that it was an amendment of a technical nature which our officers thought should be included in the section. What was proposed before was this:

> Class rate tariffs (b) may, in addition, specify class rates between specified points on the railway which rates may be higher or lower than the rates specified under paragraph (a).

Then it was thought advisable by our experts to amend that so that the section would read:

> Class rate tariffs
> (b) may, in addition, specify class rates between specified points on the railway and when such rates are established in groups the rates between the groups may be higher or lower than the rates specified under paragraph (a).

I understand that under these standard mileage freight tariffs—a copy of which was filed—articles move in groups. The intention here is that where such rates are established for groups the rate between the groups may be higher or lower than specified in (a). Beyond that, I am afraid I cannot help the committee. It is a highly technical matter. If my hon. friend insists too much, I am frank to admit that I may not be able to explain it because it is a technical matter.

Mr. Argue: May I ask this question. Is it a further exemption to the equalization section? If the railways may specify class rates between specified points on the railway and when such rates are established in groups the rates between the groups may be higher or lower than the rates specified under paragraph (a), it would seem to me that that is an exception.

Mr. Chevrier: No, it is not. The exceptions to equalization are set out in section 332A. Those are the only exceptions and there are no others.

Mr. Green: On that point, Mr. Chairman, I have also been puzzled. The minister will remember that Mr. Evans, vice-president of the Canadian Pacific Railway, told the committee that 41·1 per cent of the traffic carried on that railway came under the exceptions in section 332A. But then he went on to say that, of the balance, 18·5 per cent of the freight was under class rates, which of course would be covered by the new equalization provision; 15 per cent was on mileage commodity rates; but the remaining 25·4 per cent was on what he called point-to-point rates. In the committee he was questioned by the minister with regard to these point-to-point rates and gave this reply as reported at the top of page 59 of the minutes of proceedings and evidence of the committee:

Mr. Evans: Put it this way. I believe you can equalize class rates.

That, of course, would be 18·5 per cent of their freight traffic.

I believe you can equalize commodity rates, rates that I call commodity mileage rates, which are a general application of the tariff rate.

That would be the 15 per cent.

I do not believe you can equalize specific point-to-point commodity rates because they are put in to meet local conditions and local industry, and if you try to equalize them you are going to disturb a lot of industries whose rates are made for particular purposes, and I do not think you should attempt to equalize those rates; and I think that is why this bill specifically points to the equalization of the class rates and the commodity mileage rates and leaves the other rates in a general category for the jurisdiction of the board; because if you start equalizing all these specific point-to-point rates then you are in a hodge-podge that is going to overlook the reason why these rates were established.

From that explanation I took it, in reading over the evidence this morning, that in addition to the 41·1 per cent of the C.P.R. freight traffic which would not come under the national freight rates policy, there would also be this 25·4 per cent made up of point-to-point rates. I wonder if I am right in that assumption?

Mr. Chevrier: I think our expert witness indicated that equalization could not take place in so far as the exceptions in section 332A were concerned but that in so far as the rest were concerned, equalization was possible. While it is true that Mr. Evans made the statement which he made, in cross-examination of him I thought I had obtained from him an admission that so far as the remainder—59 per cent—of the traffic was concerned, it was possible to obtain equalization. Certainly I think that is the case. As to at least some of the exceptions that are enumerated in section 332A, it is possible to have equalization; equalization already exists. It is the view of our experts that equalization is possible in many, if not all, of the point-to-point rates. They disagree with the view of Mr. Evans in that respect.

Mr. Green: I do not think the minister obtained that statement or that evidence from the witness. I shall proceed to read the next question following that statement I read a few moments ago.

Hon. Mr. Chevrier: So with the exception of these point-to-point commodity rates you think it is possible to equalize commodity rates under this bill?

[Mr. Green.]

Mr. Evans: I do, sir, and we are in favour of it.

Mr. Browne: What percentage of these rates would be point-to-point rates?

Mr. Evans: I wish I could tell you. All the division that we have got is the division between the class rates, the commodity rates and the competitive. I do not think there is an analysis that goes deep enough to differentiate between the commodity rates and the point-to-point rates.

Then the minister will notice that as reported at the end of the page he asked the question again. But that did not bring out any answer to the effect that the point-to-point rates could be equalized. I would think, from Mr. Evans' explanation as to what these point-to-point rates are, that it would be doubtful whether they could be equalized to the same extent as class rates and commodity mileage rates.

Mr. Chevrier: It is the opinion of our advisers that many of the point-to-point commodity rates can be equalized.

Section 7—section 329—agreed to.

On section 7—section 330—Tariffs to be filed and published.

Mr. Green: Could we have an explanation of the amendment to section 330?

Mr. Macdonald (Edmonton East): Mr. Chairman, the Canadian Pacific Railway proposed an amendment to the subsection as originally drawn. This proposal was intended to protect the railway against claims by shippers, in courts, for reparations, that is to say, from damage claims against the railways that the rates charged were not just and reasonable. The amendment offered by the railway to give it that protection provided that as soon as the rates were filed with the board of transport commissioners they would be deemed conclusively to be just and reasonable. That proposal was objectionable, and I protested it. It might very well have proved to be an insurmountable barrier to a shipper seeking disallowance of a rate, as is frequently sought, on the ground of unjust and unreasonable. In any event the suggested amendment went far beyond protecting the railway against reparations claims. The amendment adopted by the special committee protects against such claims without interfering with the right of the shipper to go before the board seeking a disallowance of an unjust and unreasonable rate.

Mr. Chevrier: In answer to the question asked, might I point out that section 330 may be divided into several parts. Subsection 1 provides for the filing and publication of the tariffs, and the notice of cancellation of any tariff. Subsection 2, which was amended at the request of the committee, contains a clause which provides for the giving of at least three days notice where a tariff is reduced.

Subsection 3 makes provision for the giving of thirty days notice where a tariff is increased. Subsection 4 deals with competitive tariffs, and subsection 5 with the effective dates of the tariffs.

Section 7—section 330—agreed to.

On section 7—section 331—Filing of competitive tariffs.

Mr. Green: Would there be any objection to considering sections 331 and 332B together? Section 331 lays down the general rules with regard to competitive tariffs, while section 332B deals also with one type of competitive tariff. Would there be any objection?

Mr. Chevrier: I would like to accommodate the hon. member, but I am sorry I cannot because these are two different matters. One deals with conditions required of the railways when they file a competitive tariff; and while it is true that the transcontinental rate is a competitive rate, I feel the two should be taken separately. I hope my hon. friend will not insist.

I believe there would be no objection to his referring to section 331 when he is dealing with section 332B. Certainly I would not try to stop him. If he wishes to make his argument along that line, I think he should have the advantage of referring to the earlier section.

Mr. Green: That is what I had in mind. In discussing section 332B I hope to suggest that the difficulty which is sought to be overcome by that section might more properly be handled by an amendment to section 331. If I am free to refer back to the earlier section, I shall have no objection.

Mr. Chevrier: I can see no objection to referring back; but I hope my hon. friend will not insist upon having section 331 stand.

Section 7—section 331—agreed to.

On section 7—section 332—Burden of proof.

Mr. Green: Would the minister explain that?

Mr. Chevrier: The change in section 332 was inserted to meet the request of the Canadian Pacific Railway. I think it was the intention not only in the report of the royal commission but also in the whole statute dealing with the establishment of tariffs that competitive rates should remain as they were prior to the passage of this measure. The words "other than a competitive rate" had been omitted in the drafting of this section, and it was felt in fairness to the railways that there should be no interference with the competitive rate tariff. Those several words, "other than a competitive rate" were inserted in the section.

Mr. Green: Will the effect of the section, as amended in committee, be as follows: The section without the amendment provided that when anyone filed objection with the board against an advance in a freight rate tariff, the burden of proof justifying the increase rested with the company. In other words the company had to justify the increase. As the section was originally introduced, there was no mention of competitive tariffs. Now this amendment takes the competitive tariffs out of the provisions of the section, with the result that in the case of a competitive tariff a railway can raise that tariff and does not have the onus of proving that the increase was justifiable. Is that correct?

Mr. Chevrier: I do not think it takes the competitive rate out. The competitive rate wording simply was not there, and it leaves the section exactly the way it was before in that respect. A further definition is given.

Mr. Green: No; as the bill was introduced into the house, when any rate was advanced by a railway the railway had to justify that advance. In other words the onus of proof, or as it is called the burden of proof, was on the railway. That of course would include competitive rates, because originally they were not exempted in this section. The amendment introduced in committee takes the competitive rates away from that provision, and provides that there will be no onus on the railway to justify increasing competitive rates?

Mr. Chevrier: In effect that is so.

Mr. Argue: I wish to make a comment on that language in 329(b). The view of the counsel for Saskatchewan, and I believe counsel for other provinces, has been that competitive rates in the past have been lowered and for that reason there has been great disparity. I think the amendment is a good thing in that it will allow the railways greater facility in raising competitive rates. Certainly if competitive rates are raised, the difference between the freight rates in one section of the country as compared with those in another will be lessened. I believe this is a good section.

Section 7—section 332—agreed to.

On section 7—section 332A—National freight rates policy.

Mr. Green: Will the minister explain the amendment to this section?

Mr. Chevrier: The amendment is in subparagraph (f), which reads:

> Rates applicable to movements of freight traffic upon or over all or any of the lines of railway collectively designated as the "eastern lines" in the Maritime Freight Rates Act as amended by the Statute Law Amendment (Newfoundland) Act.

As the committee knows, the recommendation of the royal commission made it quite clear that there should be no interference with the principle of the Maritime Freight Rates Act. It was certainly my understanding that there was no such inference in the recommendations of the commission. Furthermore I expressed the same opinion in this house, that the maritime freight rates preference was not affected in any way.

However, both the representative of the maritime transportation commission and counsel for the maritime provinces took the view that for greater security these words should be inserted. The other provinces were of the opinion that as it then stood the bill was sufficient to protect the position of the maritimes, but they said they had no serious objection to the insertion of these words. The words were inserted and accepted by the committee, and are now in the bill. To my mind those words simply give greater protection to the preference, or to the position of the maritime provinces. I am sure the committee was delighted to consent to the introduction of this subsection if it eased the minds of hon. members from the maritime provinces. From the outset it was the intention that there should be no interference with the statutory rights of the maritimes, and I think this additional paragraph (f) makes it clear beyond doubt.

Mr. Brooks: Mr. Chairman, I should like to make a few remarks in connection with this. As I said when I was speaking on the first section, we from the maritime provinces appreciated the attitude of the committee and of all parts of Canada toward our great problem. However, I would not like this committee to get the impression that those who are representing the maritime provinces and the maritime transportation commission were asking for something they did not think was really necessary. They presented a long brief to the committee; and it will be remembered that while the minister was quite definite in his statement that the Maritime Freight Rates Act was protected, there was something beyond the Maritime Freight Rates Act that Mr. Matheson and Mr. Smith, representing the maritime transportation commission and the province, felt should be protected. I refer to what is known as the maritime freight rates structure.

The maritime freight rates structure consists of our rights under the Maritime Freight Rates Act, certain arbitrary groups of rates, and our rights under the old Intercolonial railway. That is what we wanted protected and that is what we feel is being protected under this amendment, but which was not being protected under the bill as it then stood. I think I could best indicate to the house the attitude taken in the committee by reading from the proceedings of the special committee, at page 110, where the chairman asked this question:

> Have you any reason to believe that the same board of transport commissioners will not follow the same practice in the future when there is no legislative authority directing them to change it?

Mr. Smith pointedly replied:

> Our fear, if I may put it so, Mr. Chairman, is that there is a declaration of policy. Now, either that policy means something or it means nothing, and if it means what we think it does—and I do submit as a lawyer of some experience that it is clearly susceptible of that interpretation—there is, in my opinion, as I think, to use an expression of the honourable the minister, a directive to the board to put into effect a policy. Now, what is that policy?
> The policy is, as I understand it, that there be uniform systems of freight rates in Canada.

Mr. Smith then goes on to quote the first subsection of section 332A which reads:

> It is hereby declared to be the national freight rates policy that, subject to the exceptions specified in subsection four, every railway company shall, so far as is reasonably possible, in respect of all freight traffic of the same description, and carried on or upon the like kind of cars or conveyances passing over all lines or routes of the company in Canada, charge tolls to all persons at the same rate, whether by weight, mileage or otherwise.

Mr. Smith then goes on:

> And now, Mr. Chairman, as I see it that is a general directive; and then, it is true, the next subsection is permissive, the word "may" being used; and it provides that "The board may with a view to implementing the national freight rates policy, require any railway company."
> And now, that is an over-riding obligation, as I see it, to bind the board to effect a national freight rates policy. And now, what are they to do? They are
> (a) to establish a uniform scale of mileage class rates applicable on its system in Canada, such rates to be expressed in blocks or groups, the blocks or groups to include relatively greater distances for the longer than for the shorter hauls.

Mr. Smith's contention was that there was this general directive under the act which would override the permissive clauses. I simply mention these matters to show that I feel there was justification in the argument of both Mr. Smith and Mr. Matheson, that their arguments were not unnecessary as I think the minister is now stating and as he stated in the committee. Mr. Smith continued at page 111 as follows:

> I do submit, Mr. Chairman, that the authority and jurisdiction of the board is so circumscribed and limited by this declaration of policy that we will have to have something in there for our protection.

I have tried to give the background of that need of protection. As I said previously, we in the maritimes appreciate the action of the committee and the minister, but we feel also that both Mr. Matheson and Mr. Smith and the maritime transportation commission were justified in presenting their brief to the committee. I do not think the minister wishes to belittle their action but I would not like it to be understood in this committee that the action taken by Mr. Matheson and Mr. Smith was not necessary as perhaps the minister might lead us to believe.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Chairman, as I have said already, I believe this equalization section is the most important in the bill, and I am most anxious that it be fully implemented as quickly as possible. I think the minister will agree that if there is any undue delay in bringing about equalization it will destroy much of the benefit provided by this bill. I am wondering if the minister is able to tell the committee what is the goal of the government, the period in which equalization may be brought about. When the minister and the government were drafting this section they must have had some time objective in view, because if no effort were made to bring about equalization in a reasonable time this bill would be of little value. I wonder if the minister could tell us approximately how long it will take to make this section operative.

Mr. Chevrier: I think it is rather difficult to answer my hon. friend's question with any degree of assurance. I am sure my hon. friend realizes that this section, as well as all other sections having to do with rates, is one for the guidance of the board of transport commissioners. They and not the government fix freight rates. They are the ones who grant either increases or decreases from time to time, and they are the ones who will put this equalization section into effect. Under P.C. 1487 they have been instructed to carry on an investigation of the freight rate structure, and the royal commission on transportation hoped that investigation together with this bill would be very helpful in bringing about a plan of equalization. I can only say what the experts have said in the committee, namely, that it is a matter of some time.

In the United States, for instance, it took the interstate commerce commission twelve years to equalize rates, and I am reminded that was only class rates and not commodity and other rates. It has been given in evidence that it will take anywhere from three to five years to do the job in Canada, and I am sure the board, in view of the discussions that have taken place in this committee, will want to get on with the job as quickly as possible.

Mr. Argue: I hope the board will want to get on with this matter as quickly as possible. I appreciate the fact that the minister cannot say with any degree of accuracy how long equalization may take, but I am wondering whether the minister would agree with the evidence given by Mr. Knowles that a period of five years might be the time required. All I should like is some target, whatever assurance the minister can give me as to the time it will take to bring about equalization. Will the minister agree that five years is a reasonable time, that we may have some reasonable expectation that at the end of five years all or almost all of the rates will be equalized?

Mr. Chevrier: If it will help my hon. friend I will be pleased to repeat here what our experts think—and I have to base my opinion on their advice, particularly in a matter of this kind—namely, that it would take about five years before a plan of equalization would be complete.

Section 7—section 332A—agreed to.

On section 7—section 332B—Definitions.

Mr. Laing: This is the one section of the bill that has been of considerable concern to members from the province of British Columbia. The calibre of debate has been sufficiently high on this subject that I am not going to say anything that will lower it. The people of British Columbia do not want any amendment made in the bill at the expense of any other part of Canada. We have not built up what we have in that province today by enforcing harsher conditions on any other part of Canada, and we do not intend to do so in the future. However, what we are particularly concerned about in this section is that the transcontinental rates are the ones upon which is to be founded the entire intention of the section and the most important part of it, namely that in the intermediate territory the rate that shall apply from the eastern territory to the western territory or from the western territory to the eastern territory shall not be greater to any point than one and one-third the competitive transcontinental rate.

Our excellent friends from Alberta are delighted with this legislation, and I can understand their delight when for many years they have been paying rates which were sometimes two and a half to three times the transcontinental rate. To have relief proffered in the form of an over-all rate to all intermediate points not greater than one and one-third the transcontinental rate is a most engaging prospect. However, I should like to draw their attention to this point, and I should like the minister to make some comment concerning it. Members from Alberta must remember that the one and one-third rate is dependent entirely upon the maintenance of the transcontinental competitive rate. We and the representatives employed by the province of British Columbia to appear before the committee were of the opinion at one time that we could include something in the section which would ensure that the transcontinental competitive rates would apply, but we are told that by the very nature of competitive rates such an amendment cannot be included.

Therefore we are concerned with this section which endeavours to spell out the meaning of the national policy to bring relief to a great part of the prairie provinces, because in order to bring that relief we must have maintenance of the transcontinental rates. If I may revert to section 332A, we were inclined to believe that there was adequate provision under subsection 3 of that section, which reads as follows:

> The board may disallow any tariff or any portion thereof that it considers to be contrary to the national freight rates policy, and may require the company, within a prescribed time, to substitute a tariff satisfactory to the board in lieu thereof, or may prescribe other tolls in lieu of the tolls so disallowed.

We thought that was ample provision. Many people who gave evidence—and this was also indicated in many briefs sent to us—indicated that they thought the freight rate structure could suffer if it were made too rigid, that after all the board of transport commissioners had to make decisions in these matters and that as much leeway as possible should be given to them. I suggest that subsection 3 of section 332A gives all the leeway in the world to the board of transport commissioners to provide a satisfactory rate in any direction for any commodity. But in order to pinpoint national policy as it may affect the prairie provinces it is proposed to include this one and one-third provision based upon the transcontinental rate. It comes to us repeatedly that relief for the prairie provinces is founded completely upon maintenance of the transcontinental rates.

We had some evidence on the part of the railways to this effect: Well, if you do not have the transcontinental rates we will put in a low commodity rate that will not hurt you too much. That evidence is to be found on page 211 of the proceedings of the committee. The witness, Mr. Knowles, suggested that such a low commodity rate would not be too high either. Our only point is that we are interested in the maintenance of the transcontinental rates. We want to point out that the relief for the prairie provinces which is proffered in the substance and the spirit of this bill is dependent upon the maintenance of the transcontinental rates, and we are further advised that we cannot include an amendment to maintain those rates. That is why we took the stand we did in the committee, and I would much prefer to see 332B dropped entirely.

Mr. Churchill: It must be evident by now that there is a weakness in section 332B, which deals with the transcontinental rates and the imposition thereon of what we have been calling the one and one-third rule. When you look back over the meetings of the special committee, and when you look at the debate in this committee so far in connection with this bill, it is a strange thing that most of the sections have gone through, both in the special committee and here, without any great delay; but when you come to section 332B you find a very sharp difference of opinion, and that difference of opinion is absolutely non-partisan. In view of the nature of our country it happens to be sectional.

What is wrong with section 332B that it has aroused this difference of opinion? I submit for the attention of the committee that section 332B, based as it is on a recommendation of the royal commission, has not back of it the same weight of opinion that we find with regard to other recommendations of the royal commission. We have been told of the number of meetings that the royal commission had, and of the opportunities afforded all interested parties to make representations. Over a period of a year and a half the royal commission investigated all these problems; and it is only reasonable to expect that when there has been complete investigation, when every party interested has made his statement, a finding of a royal commission should receive due consideration. I think that with respect to other parts of this particular bill due weight has been given to the recommendations of the royal commission. But here, in so far as I can discover, and based on the statements made by the official representatives of the province of Manitoba and of the city of Winnipeg who appeared before the special committee, this particular finding of the royal commission did not have back of it the complete evidence that is back of other findings. Just let me read what counsel for the province of Manitoba said when he appeared before the special committee:

> The recommendation of the Turgeon royal commission (p. 100 of the report) on which the section is presumably based, was not advocated by any person or organization appearing before the commission. The railways did not suggest it as sound from a rate-making point of view. The provinces and other interested groups did not suggest it as sound from either a rate-making or economic point of view. In short, the suggested 1⅓ rule is entirely arbitrary in character, unsupported by any representation before the Turgeon commission.

In other words, had Manitoba then been aware that this one and one-third rule was going to be a finding of the commission, that province would have made a detailed study of the matter and would have made an effective presentation. I presume that British Columbia would have done the same thing, and the other provinces entering into it. Then what would we have had? We would have had a deliberate study on the part of the royal commission of the effects of that particular rule, and then a finding; and based on that finding, legislation. Had that happened, we would not have been in the same position in the special committee nor here in the committee of the whole. We might have raised an objection, whatever the finding would have been, but naturally the objections would not carry as much weight as I suggest the objections that have been put forward so far do carry.

I have put before the committee of the whole for its consideration the point of view of the province of Manitoba, the city of Winnipeg and the Winnipeg chamber of commerce. This point of view is a serious and considered one. The people who presented the briefs to our special committee were men who have been concerned with and engaged for a long time in the study of freight rates. They had competent economic advisers and men who were able to give them adequate advice on the freight rates problem, and I think their point of view deserves very careful consideration. In fact I thought that at the meeting of our special committee the point of view against 332B in its present form was rather completely set forth, and I entertained the hope at the time that some modifications would be introduced, just as in other aspects of the bill we have had certain modifications brought in. However, that did not happen, so we have reached this stage where it is necessary to put the position of Manitoba before the committee of the whole so the committee will have a full understanding of our objection to this section.

As the brief for Manitoba represented, Manitoba states that a violation of the general principles of the bill has occurred. This bill is aimed generally at equalization, and this method of dealing with the transcontinental rate involves something that is not equalization. At the bottom of page 125 of the report the royal commission points out that equalization is not going to be obtained very quickly; that is, some study must be made of the problem, and the report says:

> Undoubtedly many serious problems are involved, for example the effect that the proposals may have on railway revenues, on established industries and on trade and market patterns. All of these things are matters of the utmost importance. Having regard to the large number of rate changes which will be involved, the problem is one peculiarly for the board to resolve finally after the general freight rate investigation and after all parties who may be affected by the proposals have had an opportunity of being heard.

Well, no one can find fault with that suggestion in the report. Surely it is a reasonable and sane way to put into effect any alteration in the freight rate structure. If that were done in connection with this particular proposal in 332B, the position of Manitoba and the city of Winnipeg would be that there could be no objection. If the board were empowered, before putting it into operation, to investigate its effect, if any, on established industries and on trade and market patterns, we could scarcely raise objection, but there seems to be no opportunity for doing that. It is going to be written into the statute and may be applied immediately, and in our opinion Manitoba will not benefit thereby; or at least, if there is some benefit thereby, Manitoba's competitive position will be endangered to some extent.

Just to summarize the point of view of the Manitoba government let me read just one paragraph from the brief presented before the special committee:

> We think that section 332B is wrong both in principle and in practice, because it would give to a restricted area a special low rate which is not justified by the competitive tests of section 331 or by the national freight rates policy of equalization as set out in section 332A.
> The effect would inevitably be to reduce railway revenue in that area below the level which is reasonable and proper under an equalized rate structure, with the result that other areas would be called upon to pay slightly higher rates to make up the necessary revenue.

Then on the next page there are two sentences I should like to quote:

> The disturbance of existing and long-established competitive positions of businesses in the various centres of western Canada.

This would result from the application of this rule.

> The distortion of a sound set of principles laid down in sections 329, 331 and 332A by the special concession to a particular area on a particular type of traffic as set out in 332B.

The city of Winnipeg presented a similar point of view. It all comes down to this. We are of the opinion that there will be an adverse effect on Manitoba's industrial development, particularly in respect of steel products. We in Manitoba sometimes feel that people are not aware of the extent of the industrialization of the province. My argument is based on the effect of section 332B of the Railway Act on our industrialization.

Without enlarging upon it to the fullest extent, I want to say a word about Manitoba's industrial development. It has been proceeding at a very satisfactory rate during the last few years. We take a considerable interest and pride in that fact. Anyone who is interested in getting a more complete picture may refer to the Toronto Saturday Night of November 24, 1951. On page 23 there is a useful article by Mr. Carlyle Allison concerning Manitoba's industrial development, and the introductory sentence is in rather forceful language. It reads:

> It is a sore point in Manitoba that eastern Canada—and particularly Ottawa—still regards the keystone province as primarily agricultural . . .

Manitoba has a thoroughly developed agricultural economy which has been the backbone of the province for a great many years. At the same time we are developing an industrial side, the extent of which can be seen in this article. The whole point of my argument is that when you have an industrial development the freight rate structure becomes just as important to that section of your economy as the freight rate structure is to the movement of your agricultural products.

I quote again from this article in Saturday Night:

> The total value of all farm production in Manitoba in 1950 was $298,952,000; the gross value of manufactured goods produced in Manitoba in 1950 was estimated at $525 million.

Just to complete the industrial picture, since the beginning of world war II the number of manufacturing firms grew from 1,000 to more than 1,600, and their employees from 24,000 to 43,000. In 1951 alone 25 per cent of the province's manufacturers extended their plant facilities. It is because of the development of Manitoba's industry that we are so concerned about any alteration in the freight rate structure which may adversely affect that industry. Our industry is not located solely in the city of Winnipeg and suburbs. Brandon, Portage and other places in Manitoba are gradually taking part in this industrial development and will similarly be affected.

As I said, steel seems to be the product which is most likely to be affected by this rule in section 332B. By checking through the Winnipeg telephone directory I found that there were twenty-four firms advertising themselves as producers or fabricators of iron or steel. In the Canada Year Book I discovered that 10,000 people are employed in industries that have to do with iron and steel. Many of these people are employed in the railway shops, but through correspondence with Winnipeg I have discovered that there are certainly 5,000 employees who are directly employed in these various industries I have mentioned. A new plant for the fabrication of steel has just been erected at a cost of half a million dollars. I have mentioned that steel fabrication is an important part of Manitoba's industrial production, and if her competitive position in that field is endangered, as is suggested by this brief, our hope is that some attention will be paid to the matter and our position restored, or else assurance given that the board of transport commissioners will go slowly in making any change which will adversely affect our industry.

It is an interesting investigation to consider the interrelation of the economy of the western provinces and the trade that flows between these provinces. It is not to our advantage if any of the western provinces are weakened in any way. It is not to the advantage of any of the other western provinces if Manitoba is weakened in any way. As I mentioned yesterday I am sympathetic towards the point of view of the province of Alberta, and I hope that province will be sympathetic towards the point of view of Manitoba. With the development of Manitoba and the subsequent increase of population, there will be a market for Alberta products. We have not the advantages of coal or oil, and consequently each year we import from Alberta 600,000 tons of coal and an estimated 6 million barrels of oil. It is a large and growing interprovincial commerce, and the maintenance of Manitoba's industries means the development of Manitoba's population and the consequent greater dependence upon the provinces of the west.

In conclusion I suggest that the proposal put forward in the brief of the city of Winnipeg is the one that should be considered. After all it is a reasonable suggestion, and does not ask for anything more than fair treatment. I read from the brief:

> We respectfully suggest that . . . if the mandatory language of section 332B be modified to permit the board some discretion which would enable it to relate the intermediate rate to the normal rate as circumstances may warrant, most of our apprehension would be alleviated.

I think that is a fair and reasonable presentation of the point of view of Manitoba, and that it should be given serious consideration here. What purpose will we have achieved if the board of transport commissioners is going to be faced, year after year, with a conflict over something which is now rather hastily written into the act? Surely the opposition that has been developed to section 332B is an indication of conflict in the future unless there is some modification of that particular section. Modification could surely be made with a view to recognizing the established positions of the provinces concerned.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman—

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Gibson): The hon. member for Kootenay West.

Mr. Herridge: I must first of all congratulate you on your new office, Mr. Chairman; I am sure you will occupy the chair with grace and dignity, and that you will exercise wisdom and great independence.

Mr. Knowles: As usual.

Mr. Herridge: I have risen to speak only briefly because I must say that this question of the mechanics of freight rates is to me a bit of an enigma, and I am not given to speaking on subjects about which I know little. I know the attitude of some of the people of British Columbia towards this section of this bill, and I rise particularly for the purpose of supporting the remarks made by the hon. member for Vancouver South. I am not going to repeat what he said, but I thought he aptly expressed the concern of a considerable number of people in British Columbia over section 332B of this bill. I may also say this. In view of the technical nature of the subject and the great concern of all hon. members for the sections of the country which they directly represent, I think the debate has been carried on at a high and tolerant level and I am pleased to note that fact. I think that has been possible because there is a general recognition that this bill is a particular and first attempt to develop a national freight rates policy.

Again I want to say that I think the hon. member for Vancouver South expressed in excellent language the concern felt by a number of people in British Columbia. I am not sure how this bill affects the people in the eastern portion of the province. I think possibly the people of British Columbia will be affected in various ways, according to the maintenance of the present transcontinental rates. When the minister replies I should like him to give to the committee some assurance that the people of British Columbia can expect the maintenance of the present transcontinental rates about which they are concerned.

Mr. Byrne: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member who has just taken his seat feels, perhaps as much as I do, that the eastern portion of British Columbia may either be adversely affected by this legislation or be benefited. As a British Columbian I rise to take exception to this clause because I feel that it adversely affects the province of British Columbia. Many of my views have already been expressed by the hon. member for Vancouver South. However, some evidence was submitted to the committee which I feel should at this time go into the record.

Section 332A deals exclusively with the question of transcontinental competitive rates. Our understanding of transcontinental competitive rates is that they may be continued only so long as the board of transport commissioners is assured that the railway companies are making a profit, or at least that they are compensatory, and that all commodities hauled at those rates will bring some measure of return to the railways.

Before going further I think it would be well to remind the committee that British Columbia, which contains a fairly large population, is certainly the province that is the greatest distance from the industrial central portion of Canada, and that with commodity and mileage rates we pay an amount greater than that paid by any other province, according to the distance from the central area. That is, if we are 700 miles farther west, we pay that much more on our commodity and mileage rates. We therefore are at a grave disadvantage in this respect. If the transcontinental rates are to be maintained they must be compensatory, as I have said previously. If the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan have been plundered—and some of the members from Alberta have seemed to try to give that impression—a large amount of money must be involved. When the one and one-third rule is applied, there will be a measure of loss to the railways on the transcontinental rates. If there is a loss due to the return under the one and one-third rule, there must be an increase in the transcontinental rates. It is on that basis that we from British Columbia feel there is a grave danger of the transcontinental rates either being abolished or increased. Despite the feeling that is at present abroad in Alberta and Saskatchewan, despite the fact that they feel they are going to receive great benefits from this one and one-third rule, we feel it is quite possible that they will stand to lose as well as British Columbia.

It has been said that many of the briefs we have received are from quarters which we may say have no actual remunerative interest in the question, at least as far as the political aspect is concerned. We have a brief from the Canadian industrial traffic league. This, of course, is in the records of the committee, but I should like to read from it at this time:

> Our concern is, primarily, with subsection 2 (b) of proposed section 332B which would establish a specific maximum to intermediate points over a transcontinental competitive rate. This subsection would, in effect, decree rates by statute, although such rates are not named specifically.

Then further down:

> We strongly recommend to the committee that further study be given to the method of dealing with this problem which has been evolved in the United States under what is commonly known as "fourth section relief." In brief, as applied to transcontinental rates this requires that the railways make such rates applicable to intermediate points unless the interstate commerce commission grants their application to do otherwise.

If that were written into this section it would provide relief, so that if any rate were found to be non-compensatory it could be appealed to the board, and some measure of assurance could be given that the transcontinental rate would not be lost.

Then the Montreal board of trade, referring to section 332B, says:

> As with other shippers, there is no opposition to any effort to provide lower rates to any intermediate points. It is felt, therefore, that the transcontinental competitive rates should have intermediate application but that should the carriers require relief from this intermediate application, then such relief should be effected by application of the carriers to the board of transport commissioners rather than by statute as this section would require.

And then the board of trade of the city of Toronto, with respect to the same section, states:

> In such a situation, it is possible that the railways may have to reconsider their position respecting these rates—

That is, competitive transcontinental rates.

> —and in that event it is conceivable that they may be forced to cancel the transcontinental rates and probably be compelled also to review the existing system of publishing competitive rates in the light of the possible general effects such legislation may have on these rates.

As I say, that is our fear. However, if the minister can assure us that we are not in immediate danger of losing our preferred position of being a coastal province, and if there is no danger of losing our transcontinental rates, then I am prepared to support this section of the bill.

Mr. Knowles: I feel it is quite significant that this debate is being conducted in the very moderate terms which characterize the speeches being made. This is especially true in view of the sectional interests that seem to be involved. I think that very moderation with which members from different parts of the country are speaking indicates our desire, no matter from what part of the country we may come, to take whatever stand is in the national interest. Furthermore I think it indicates that if from the point of view of any section of the country we feel there is a particular point we have to make, or a particular position we have to put forward, none of us wants to do that to the detriment of any other section.

[Mr. Byrne.]

I believe what I have just said characterizes the remarks of several of those who have spoken just now. Naturally I am particularly interested in the remarks of the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre, since both of us come from the same area. I agree with pretty well everything he said. I think there may be some slight differences of emphasis I would wish to make, in respect of what I think should be done; but we each appear to have the same approach to the matter. I am sure the committee listened with interest to the statistics the hon. member placed before us concerning the growing industrial activities of our city of Winnipeg and our province of Manitoba. I think hon. members generally will agree that once the life of a community becomes centred around and established upon certain industries, and certain things being done, one should not see those industries disturbed unduly unless there is good cause for such disturbance or appropriate compensation.

I too think the representations made to the special committee on railway legislation by the Manitoba government and those representing the Winnipeg chamber of commerce were likewise moderate. They did, of course, express opposition to the one and one-third rule. I am not so sure I can go that far and say that I would want the one and one-third rule deleted from the bill, because I cannot get over the fact that, to me, it is in the national interest that the advantage that the one and one-third rule will give, particularly to areas such as Saskatchewan and Alberta, should be enjoyed. That is one of the aspects of the approach toward equalization which has been a goal for many years. Nevertheless I do think it is perfectly proper for the people of Winnipeg, and for those of us who represent that area, to look at the effects of that one and one-third rule in so far as it applies to the Winnipeg area.

The hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre has already referred to the brief presented to the committee by the government of Manitoba. I have it before me; and I am thinking in particular of the example given in that brief respecting freight rates on iron and steel products from Hamilton to Winnipeg, and on to Battleford. It was pointed out that the present rate from Hamilton to Winnipeg on steel products is $1.64 and from Winnipeg to Battleford $1.10, or a total of $2.74 for the entire distance if the material is shipped from Hamilton to Winnipeg and then shipped again from Winnipeg to Battleford.

The rate from Hamilton to Edmonton at the present time is $2.91. By making further reference to the Manitoba brief I would point out that when the one and one-third rule becomes effective, since the transcontinental rate to Vancouver is only $1.48, the rate to Edmonton would be only one and one-third times that, or $1.97. That through rate from Hamilton to Edmonton would thus be less than the combined rate for iron and steel products from Hamilton to Winnipeg and from Winnipeg on to Battleford or Edmonton. As a matter of fact under this new arrangement it would be possible for iron and steel products to be shipped from Hamilton to Edmonton and back to Battleford, cheaper than they could be shipped from Hamilton to Winnipeg and then from Winnipeg to Battleford.

It is precisely that kind of anomaly, that kind of inequality, that equalization is supposed to get away from. I welcome the fact that in many instances this sort of difficulty is being ironed out. That is one of the main purposes of this legislation. But it does seem that Manitoba has made a case to the effect that some new anomalies of this kind may be created for Manitoba by the strict application of the one and one-third rule. I am not one who will ask that Winnipeg or any other part of the country be kept in a protected position. It is my view that when there is an attempt to follow that theory or philosophy the people of the country sooner or later have to pay for it in higher costs.

At the same time I think Winnipeg is perfectly justified in asking that it ought not to be placed in a disadvantageous position, and it does seem to me that something could be done to solve the kind of problem outlined in the Manitoba brief. The hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre in my opinion approached this question in a statesmanlike fashion. If I heard him correctly, it was not suggested that we should put up a fight against the one and one-third rule but that the board of transport commissioners should consider problems of this kind and try to find some way of solving them. The hon. member referred to the request from Winnipeg that the board endeavour to relate intermediate rates to the normal rates.

What interests me even more than that are what are sometimes referred to as in-transit rates. I know this matter was discussed in the special committee only briefly, and the reference to it will be found on pages 143 and 144 of the proceedings of the committee. At that time I believe the chairman suggested that a slight extension of the in-transit rule might solve the problem. The hon. member for Winnipeg South, who was a member of the committee, said that it would not. It came out in the short discussion that took place right then, as I read the evidence, that an extension of the in-transit rule might solve the problem but it would have to be not a slight extension but an extension of considerable degree. It seems to me that would offer a solution of the problem.

I understand that the in-transit rule is applied to the shipment of grain. Grain can start from one point as grain, stop somewhere along the way and be milled into flour, and then be shipped on as flour and the rate paid is the through rate for the total distance. It seems to me that would provide an answer to the problem connected with iron and steel products because that is the feature of most concern to Winnipeg. The board of transport commissioners should find some way to make sure that the total rate for two parts of a distance between two points should never be greater than the through rate between those two points. In other words, if the one and one-third rule is going to place a certain maximum on the rate from Hamilton to Battleford, with which I agree, I submit that the rate on iron and steel products from Hamilton to Battleford, even though they are fabricated along the way at Winnipeg, should not be greater than the through rate which would be possible under the one and one-third rule.

I was interested in the discussion that took place a while ago about the job to be done by the board of transport commissioners in implementing the principles and provisions of this bill. I followed with considerable interest the remarks of my colleague, the hon. member for Assiniboia, who pointed out that perhaps the major part of this job would be that to be done by the board of transport commissioners after the bill is passed. I hope I am not being unfair to the minister when I say that I think he agrees with the view expressed by the hon. member for Assiniboia. Although he did not want to answer the question as to how long the job would take, it is clear that this matter of implementing these provisions is of concern to the department.

I should like to ask the Minister of Transport if under the bill as it will now go through it is possible for the board of transport commissioners to extend the in-transit principle in such a manner as to solve the kind of problem I have presented to him, which I have taken directly from the Manitoba brief.

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, in speaking on section 332B I speak as a member representing British Columbia and not on behalf of my party. It is perfectly clear that in the case of the Liberal party, the Conservative party and the C.C.F. party there are members on both sides of this argument. The question involves Manitoba and British Columbia on the one side and Alberta and, to a lesser extent, Saskatchewan on the other. The Social Credit party may think they are in a preferred position in this debate in being all on the one side.

Mr Low: We usually are quite united.

Mr. Green: I would point out to them that in recent months they have been very busy wooing the people of British Columbia. There has been a great one-sided love-making affair going on in that province. If they are not careful about the way they go after British Columbia in this debate they may find the people of British Columbia deciding that in effect they are in the position of Little Red Riding Hood with the Social Credit party representing the wolf dressed up in grandmother's cap and spectacles. I must admit that I gained that impression from the hon. member for Bow River when he spoke two nights ago, but today both the leader and deputy leader of the Social Credit party have spoken in a most statesmanlike way and I appreciate the attitude they have taken. In our own party the hon. member for Calgary East has been one of the leaders, ever since he first came here, in placing the position of Alberta before the house.

It is just too bad that this position should have arisen and the four western provinces, of all parts of Canada, placed in two opposite camps. We have had the small end of the stick in so far as freight rates are concerned from the start and nearly all the time these provinces have combined to fight against the injustices in our freight rates structure. Mr. Chairman, there is something about western Canada which I am sure a man of your great intelligence will understand. We are a little different from other Canadians.

Mr. Brooks: Just a little?

Mr. Green: I do not like that laugh from my friend the hon. member for Royal. I know that when the train rolls on to the prairies I always feel that the air is fresher and perhaps a little purer than what we have had to endure in central Canada.

Mr. Brooks: Much hotter too.

Mr. Green: There is a clannishness among the people of the four western provinces which is very worth-while in our Canadian set-up, and I regret that in the argument on this particular section we find ourselves divided.

That division did not start with the members of the house. We all went into the committee believing there was no particular objection to this section, but when we heard the representations made by the official representatives of the four western provinces we realized that a very difficult question is raised by this particular section. It deals entirely with one group of rates known as transcontinental rates. They are rates which have been established, in effect both east and west, because of the ship competition on the west coast; not only competition from ships carrying goods from eastern Canada through the Panama canal to the Pacific coast, but also ships from abroad. For example there is ship competition from Great Britain with respect to cast iron pipe. Heavy commodities such as cast iron pipe and steel can be carried very easily by ship, and of course can be carried at a low rate.

There can be no doubt that the transcontinental rates are competitive rates. It is true that some of them are very low. For example, the rate on iron pipe is low so the railways can meet the competition of the ships. However, we were told in the committee that there are rates in Ontario and Quebec which are equally low in order to meet truck competition. The point I am trying to make is that these competitive rates to meet carriage by ship are not unduly low. They have been of great benefit to the province of British Columbia because we prefer to get these goods by rail. It is a great deal more advantageous to a businessman to get his supplies by rail because they come a great deal faster than by ship, and there are not the same delays. A ship may have to go to other ports en route, and it is an advantage to be able to get goods by rail.

The transcontinental rates have not only been of benefit to the area or the Pacific coast which includes the cities of Vancouver, Victoria, New Westminster and Prince Rupert, but also to quite a large territory inland from the coast for a distance of approximately one hundred miles. They have been of benefit to the interior of British Columbia because goods transported to the interior get the transcontinental rate plus the rate from Vancouver to the point in question. That is what is known as the back haul, and it is of great benefit to the whole of the interior of British Columbia. It is also of benefit to Alberta cities. Let us take Edmonton, for example. Edmonton gets the benefit of the back haul where there is a transcontinental rate. People there pay the transcontinental rate to Vancouver plus whatever the rate is to carry the goods back from Vancouver to Edmonton. That is cheaper than they would have to pay on a mileage basis coming across Canada from Ontario or Quebec. I do not believe any hon. member will question that such is the case.

British Columbia is entitled to these transcontinental rates under the laws of Canada as they exist at the present time. That too cannot be denied. On the vast majority of the goods shipped to the west coast we pay the ordinary rates, and we pay the highest rates in Canada. I repeat, we pay the highest rates in Canada on goods coming from eastern Canada with the exception of those few items that are under transcontinental rates. We pay the highest rates also on the great majority of the transcontinental rates. There are only a few of them on which the rate to the coast is lower than the rate to points in Alberta.

Section 331 of the Railway Act contains a code for competitive rates. It sets out what the railways must be able to show if they are to continue a competitive rate. I believe they can bring it into effect without securing the approval of the board but once it has been brought into effect then it can be attacked unless it meets with the requirements set out in section 331. I ask hon. members to look at that section in order to see what those requirements are. Mind you, the competitive rate is lower than the ordinary rates. In the first place it must be shown that competition actually exists. The rate cannot be maintained unless there is competition. Then it must be shown that the rates are compensatory, in other words that the railway is making some money on them. Naturally it will not make as much as it would on the regular rates, but under section 331 the railway cannot carry these goods at a loss under competitive rates. It must also be shown that the rates are not lower than is necessary to meet competition.

These three requirements must be met if the competitive rates are to be kept in effect. Furthermore, such rates are only permissible under our Canadian law where there is competition. They do not apply to intermediate points where there is no competition. Rightly or wrongly it has been the law of Canada that competitive rates would not apply to intermediate points where there was no competition to be met as there is in our case at the coast. There are examples of that right here in Ontario. For example, there is a cheaper rate from Ottawa to Windsor than to London, although the goods go through London on the way. The reason for that is water competition to Windsor and not to London. That evidence was given by the counsel for British Columbia, Mr. Brazier, and will be found at page 189 of the proceedings of the committee. He pointed out that the rate from Ottawa to Windsor, a distance of 472 miles by water, is 48 cents. The rate to London, a distance of 362 miles, which is not on the water, is 60 cents; that is 12 cents higher than the rate to Windsor. Another example is on the rate from Toronto to Sault Ste. Marie. Reference to that will be found at page 34 of the proceedings, in the evidence of Mr. Evans, vice-president of the Canadian Pacific Railway. He pointed out that the Canadian Pacific Railway line from Toronto to Sault Ste. Marie is only 439 miles in length. The Canadian National route from Toronto to Sault Ste. Marie is almost double that length, namely 780 miles; yet the rate over both railways is the same because there is the competition. But the points which are on the way to Sault Ste. Marie on the Canadian National Railways line do not get that reduction. They have to pay the regular mileage.

Another feature about the competitive rates which should be borne in mind is that the railways can increase them or abolish them at will. The board of transport commissioners has no power whatever to prevent the railways increasing a competitive rate, or wiping it out completely. Still another feature is that the areas which qualify for competitive rates are entitled to have the benefit of competition. In other words, on the Pacific coast we are entitled to have both the railway facilities and the ship facilities; just as in Ontario, cities where there is truck competition are entitled to have both the railway service and the truck service. Some hon. members suggested in the committee that because we have the ships therefore we do not need to worry about the rail rates, that it was quite right to take away from us any benefit of bringing freight by rail; but where this competitive situation is definitely established, then the area in question is entitled to have the benefit whatever the competition may be.

So much for the background; let us now come to what section 332B does. It adds to the code set out in section 331 for competitive rates, in the case of transcontinental rates only, a provision that the rates to all intermediate points in the prairie provinces cannot be more than one-third greater than the rate to the coast. There is a ceiling written in on competitive rates for the first time in Canada, and it applies to only one part of the competitive rates, namely those which are transcontinental. Furthermore, section 332B does not say that the one and one-third ceiling shall apply only on the railway line over which the freight goes—it would not be nearly so objectionable if that were the case—but it defines an area practically from Port Arthur, I think it is, right through to British Columbia. And it says that in that whole area, a thousand miles one way and nearly the same the other, the rate cannot be more than one and one-third the rate to Vancouver.

See what that does. Freight goes to Edmonton, and then it may go 300 or 400 miles north to Waterways or to Grande Prairie in the Peace river country or to Lethbridge down near the United States boundary, and at each of those points the rate must be only one and one-third. That is not the United States system at all. The United States system is that on the line itself the rate must be the same as it is to the coast. They do not take in a huge territory such as has been done in this case.

What is the effect on actual rates? Take canned goods, which are an extreme example because the rate on canned goods is extremely low. It is one of the lowest rates, because ships can put the canned goods in the hold and carry huge quantities of them. I think one ship brought in half a million pounds. I do not remember the figure exactly—we had it in evidence—but it was a huge quantity.

The transcontinental rate to Vancouver and to the coastal territory is $1.57 a hundred pounds. The present rate to Edmonton—if it were on a mileage basis from eastern Canada, it would be $3.23—is only $2.97 because Edmonton gets the benefit of the back haul rate from Vancouver. The rate to Brandon is $2.15. If the one and one-third rule is put in the maximum rate for the whole of the prairie territory will be $2.09, which means that Winnipeg will have to pay just as much to get those canned goods as Waterways will pay away up in northern Alberta. That gives a very clear picture why Manitoba is opposing this section. Incidentally we get a cheap rate on canned goods only in carload lots of 70,000 pounds; in other words a very big car full. On the smaller carload lots of canned goods we pay higher than the rate to Alberta, even on the transcontinental rates. For example, on a carload of 24,000 pounds we pay higher than the rate paid to Alberta.

I hold in my hand a brief submitted by the Vancouver board of trade. They say:

> The board is much concerned, as also appear to be the railways, that if the commission recommendation, as included in bill No. 12, is adopted, such losses in revenue would occur to the carriers on traffic to intermediate points that it might be found necessary by the railways to cancel these transcontinental rates which have been found so beneficial to Vancouver, Victoria, Prince Rupert and other coastal points affected.
> An illustration of this rate situation is shown herewith in the transcontinental rate on cast iron pipe from eastern Canada to named Pacific coast points: Group 1, including Vancouver, Victoria, Prince Rupert and New Westminster: $1.12 per 100 pounds.

The minimum car load is 70,000 pounds. There again you have the rate applying only for very large car loads. If you add the 33⅓ per cent to get the rate to intermediate points, it brings it to $1.49 per 100 pounds.

> The rate analysis from eastern Canada on this pipe and the estimated loss in revenue to the carriers is indicated to just three stations which are sufficient for the purpose:

They use the round figure of $1.50 instead of $1.49. The present rate to Dawson Creek is $2.61; to Edmonton it is $2.16, and to Saskatoon $1.79. The proposed rate in each case is $1.50. The revenue loss per car load to the carriers amounts to $777 per car load to Dawson Creek, $462 to Edmonton and $203 to Saskatoon. The mileage from Montreal to Dawson Creek is 2,655; to Edmonton, 2,160; to Saskatoon, 1,829. Then the brief goes on:

> Should the transcontinental rates be cancelled the commission plan would fail as the intermediate points would be assessed present rates and Vancouver and other coast points be penalized. Another important point—the same proposed rate would be authorized to stations with differences in mileage.

I cannot complete my remarks before the dinner recess, but I would point out that the loss in revenue to the railways is not going to come out of the pockets of the railways. It will come out of the shippers or the people in some part of Canada. Do not let any of us believe the railways are going to absorb any of this loss. They do not have to do that.

Mr. Low: Which loss?

Mr. Green: The loss that is shown in the figures I have just quoted concerning the iron pipe.

Mr. Low: They do not show any loss.

Mr. Green: I believe this brief does show a substantial loss amounting to $777 on one car load. These losses will have to be paid, and they are not going to be paid by the railway; make no mistake about that.

At 6.15 p.m. the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Green: When the committee rose at 6.15 I had been pointing out that section 332B provides that in the intermediate area the freight rates shall not be higher than one and one-third of the transcontinental rate, and I went on to explain that this provision applies not only to the line of railway over which the goods move but to the whole territory of the prairie provinces and indeed in Ontario as far east as Fort William and Port Arthur. That provision of course brings into the law a new restriction on competitive rates. A new principle is brought into these rates. It covers a large area running hundreds of miles in both directions.

The result is that on some of the goods the freight rate from eastern Canada will be the same to Winnipeg as it is to Saskatoon, Edmonton and as far away as Waterways. That means a new discrimination in our freight rates, because the people of Winnipeg or the people of Brandon will say, quite rightly: Why should we have to pay for this freight the same amount paid by a merchant hundreds of miles away in Edmonton or in Waterways? We are therefore not getting away from discrimination. I think a whole new series of complaints about discrimination in freight rates will be initiated if this section is left without some qualifying provision.

We should also remember that all hope of benefit to Alberta or to western Saskatchewan is based on the railways not increasing these transcontinental rates or wiping them out altogether. Any benefit that is going to come to this intermediate area disappears if the railways see fit to raise the transcontinental rates. The foundation for any relief given by section 332B rests on our transcontinental rates to the Pacific coast.

Mr. Blackmore: Will the hon. gentleman permit a question?

Mr. Green: Yes.

Mr. Blackmore: I realize that the hon. member is starting on a most valuable discourse. I should like to have him define for us what he means by discrimination. I ask that question as a matter of clarification, not in order to embarrass the hon. gentleman.

Mr. Green: I thought I had explained that point. Under this new plan the rate on canned goods, for example, or on cast iron, will be just as high to Winnipeg as it is to Saskatoon, Edmonton or Waterways, because the one and one-third ceiling clamps down on the rates all over the whole of the prairie area. I am afraid that will mean there will be complaints from Manitoba—as we have already heard today—on the ground that they should not have to pay for their freight the same as the people who live farther west. They will try to break down this rate, because they will not be able to understand why they should have to pay say $2 per hundred pounds when the man in Edmonton or Waterways is paying only the same amount. The effect goes further than that, because under these rates a wholesaler in Edmonton will be able to buy goods and ship them back half way to Winnipeg and put the Winnipeg merchant out of business.

Mr. Low: Not outside of his own area.

Mr. Green: Oh, yes. This changes the whole distribution area, because the rate to Edmonton will be exactly the same as the rate to Winnipeg. The Edmonton merchant could therefore ship goods half way to Winnipeg and beat out the Winnipeg man, although the goods have come through Winnipeg to get to Edmonton.

Mr. Low: Do we not have to look at the consumers' angle also? That is a highly important thing, it seems to me.

Mr. Green: The whole benefit is based on the transcontinental rates remaining untouched; and of course that is where British Columbia begins to worry. We should be delighted to see Alberta get all the benefits possible, but we are afraid that as a result of this plan the transcontinental rates will be wiped out on some goods, or will be increased. If that happens, Alberta will get no benefit and we will be penalized. That is the picture.

Then I come to what the railways are likely to do. It must be remembered that the railways are free to wipe out these transcontinental rates without the board of transport commissioners being able to prevent that action. The vice-president of the Canadian Pacific Railway gave us figures as to the amount of freight that is involved both in the prairie area and in British Columbia. It is estimated that in the course of the year 1949, under these rates, on goods shipped to British Columbia the C.P.R. earned a total of approximately $1,500,000. On the other hand goods were shipped to the prairie provinces earning in freight the amount of $15,500,000 which might be affected if this new plan is put into effect. That means that on the prairies the amount of freight revenue in danger is ten times that which would be earned in British Columbia by maintaining the transcontinental rates to the coast. As Mr. Evans said, the railways simply will not take that loss. They need not take it because they can increase our transcontinental rates, and it is only human nature to take that step in order to prevent the loss. On that point he is reported at page 43 of the proceedings of the committee as follows:

I submit if it is enacted—

Referring to this section 332B.

—it may result in a breakdown of the entire rate structure, may cause substantial losses in revenue to the railways and may lead to a defeat of its purpose because it will not any longer be possible to maintain the same low basis of transcontinental rates to meet this competition.

That is, to meet the competition by ships. Mr. O'Donnell, counsel for the Canadian National Railways, was examined and at page 202 will be found his answers to questions I asked about getting a guarantee that the transcontinental rate would not be increased. I said:

Would you give us any undertaking that the transcontinental rates would not go up?

I meant if this section becomes law. He replied:

We could give no undertaking in that regard with respect to any particular rate.

Mr. Cleaver: Would the hon. member mind reading the rest of the paragraph?

Mr. Green: He continued:

I think you have to take it for granted that the railways are out to get all the business they can, even business that they can get on a basis that will make a contribution to their overhead, not necessarily a profit, but a contribution to their overhead; they are going to take it, they will take anything that is going to make money for them.

Now, if the railways decide to make the transcontinental rate high enough so they will not have to lower their rates to intermediate points, and particularly to Edmonton, by reason of this section 332B, the result to British Columbia will be that we will have an increase on approximately 63 per cent of the items which are carried west under this present transcontinental rate. Those figures were furnished to me by the economic expert for the government of British Columbia.

An even more objectionable feature is that in the future the railways will be very reluctant to put in a new transcontinental rate. Here they are faced with a ceiling of one and one-third to apply over the whole area, to practically every station in the prairie provinces, and they will hesitate to put in any new transcontinental rates.

Other areas in Canada are not being treated in that way. They have no such restrictions. Ontario and Quebec receive great benefit from the competitive rates in these two provinces. They receive a great deal more benefit than British Columbia receives from the transcontinental rates. Yet there is no ceiling written on the competitive rates in Ontario and Quebec. If the law of this land is to be that the rates to intermediate points in competitive tariffs must not be more than one and one-third times the rate to the points of competition, then surely it would only be fair that the rule should apply across the nation and not only to the transcontinental rates.

Some mention was made this afternoon of the origin of this new plan. It came out in evidence before the committee that the provinces had no opportunity to argue it before the royal commission. Apparently the commission got that suggestion from someone—I think from one of their technical men—and it was brought down in the report without the provinces concerned having had the opportunity to point out what the result would be. I think the royal commission did excellent work, but on this one point they should certainly have given the provinces affected an opportunity to come in and be heard, rather than make a recommendation without its having been given full consideration.

I have great sympathy for Alberta. Frankly, I do not think Saskatchewan is so much concerned. My understanding is that the east half of Saskatchewan will be hurt by the new section, but the west half will be benefited. I repeat, I have great sympathy for Alberta. That province and my own province of British Columbia have more in common than any other two provinces in Canada. I would hope that in the years ahead they will be able to work together very closely. If we do that, then those two provinces will constitute almost an empire.

In my opinion, however, this problem can be met in another way. I believe section 331, dealing with competitive rates, could be amended by putting in that section a provision that where the rate to an intermediate point is over one and one-third the board of transport commissioners will have power to consider whether or not that rate is fair and reasonable. If it were not reasonable, then they would be able to prohibit it, they would be able to cut it down.

There are only a few items causing all this trouble. It is not as though hundreds of freight items were concerned. I believe those causing the serious trouble are the four or five listed in the report of the royal commission. There may be some additional ones, but Mr. O'Donnell said there would not be more than twenty. In order to bring about a fair rate situation with regard to those twenty items, surely the proper way would be to give the board jurisdiction to deal with them, rather than to write an entirely new principle into our law governing competitive rates and restrict that new principle entirely to the transcontinental rates which are beneficial to British Columbia.

Some of these twenty odd items are of great importance in British Columbia. Included, for example, are iron and steel items. If that were not the case I do not suppose there would be much objection to letting it go. But they do enter into our economy to a very large degree, and we have to ask that there be no restriction placed upon the transportation of those goods, such as we believe would follow from section 332B.

That section is out of place in this bill. Here we have a new national freight rates policy. This section does not fit in with that new policy, because it opens the door to new types of discrimination. It is also outside the policy for competitive rates as laid down in the Railway Act. I am afraid it is going to start a lot of fresh trouble out in western Canada, and that is something which certainly should be avoided.

I had intended to quote from some of the briefs filed, but I shall conclude by reading from only one or two of them. The first of these is the brief from the board of trade of Toronto. I would point out that the provincial governments of both Manitoba and British Columbia are opposing this section. Here we have the brief from the board of trade of Toronto, which says:

Section 332B (2a) Maximum tolls to or from intermediate territory.

This board questions the advisability of establishing in statutory form the conditions set forth in this proposed amendment. The railways, in our opinion, should be free to meet any competition actual or potential to Pacific coast points without being obligated to reduce their rates on such traffic to intermediate territory. It is only by their freedom of action to meet such competition that the railways can protect their revenues and at the same time assist Canadian suppliers to meet foreign competition to Pacific coast territory. In its conclusions on the subject of competitive rates generally, the royal commission says on page 86:

"The railways should neither be denied the right to meet competition, nor, when once they have decided to publish competitive tolls in one area, be forced by law to apply these same tolls to other regions where competition between transportation agencies is non-existent."

It is a matter of record that the transcontinental competitive rates have been established only because the railways were faced with competition actual or potential. It is therefore reasonable to conclude that if the railways are to be compelled to extend the benefits of these competitive rates to points where competition is not involved a principle will have been established which it is feared would have a marked influence on the future publication of such rates. Certainly it is difficult to imagine the railways being willing to publish or maintain rates on a competitive basis to the Pacific coast if they were compelled by statute to depress their rates on the same commodities to inland and prairie points where the competition did not exist. In such a situation, it is possible that the railways may have to reconsider their position respecting these rates and in that event it is conceivable that they may be forced to cancel the transcontinental rates and probably be compelled also to review the existing system of publishing competitive rates in the light of the possible general effects such legislation may have on these rates.

I think that sums up the situation very neatly. I would hope that the minister would give the section further consideration and possibly agree to an amendment which would give the board power to review any of these rates which are over one and one-third and cut them down to that figure if they are found to be unreasonable.

There are nearly two million people in British Columbia and Manitoba, and about the same number in Saskatchewan and Alberta, and I doubt the wisdom of adopting a policy on which there is such a wide difference of opinion. It cannot be good legislation when there are such large blocks of people who will be dissatisfied. For that reason alone I submit that the government is unwise to force through section 332B in the form in which it is now found in the bill.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, I want to refer immediately to the moderation with which this section of the bill has been discussed this afternoon and evening. I want also to thank and commend hon. members for the manner in which they have received this bill. There has been almost unanimous acceptance of it, perhaps with the exception of section 332B, to which the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra and those who have joined with him have objected. I want to tell the committee that it is a matter of deep satisfaction to me and I am sure to the government that the recommendations of the royal commission on transportation which they have attempted to implement by way of legislation have found such favour.

I hope the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra will accept the remarks I am about to make in the spirit in which they are made. I want to assure him that anything I have to say on section 332B is made in that same spirit. His moderation in debate has been such that I would not want him to think for a moment that anything I have to say is said in any other than the same way. But I think the hon. member and those who are associated with him have not only overstated the case, they have exaggerated it. I believe when the hon. member comes to place it in its proper perspective he will find that it does not mean anything like he thinks it means. I am sure that at one stage he must have thought exactly as I do at the moment.

My reason for saying that is that in the freight classification there are about 14,000 items and only 2,000 of those move under the transcontinental tariff. This means that immediately 12,000 items are eliminated from the provisions of this section. Of the remaining 2,000 items there are barely nineteen that could have any effect upon the position as placed on Hansard by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra. A moment ago he placed on the record some figures which would indicate, to use his words, that there would be an increase of 63 per cent in the rates on freight carried west under transcontinental rates.

I challenge that statement; I say that statement is not correct. I have in my hand a statement that has been prepared for me by the same expert and adviser who gave evidence before the royal commission and who was heard by the committee. I am sure that the manner in which he gave his evidence found favour with hon. members. This statement indicates that of a total of nineteen items moving under the transcontinental rate and which may be affected by section 332B, ten of them clear it and therefore will not be affected at all. For instance, the rate on automobiles to the coast is $8.98 per hundred pounds. If you apply the one and one-third rule the rate will be $11.94. The present rate to Calgary and to Edmonton is $7.37, so there is no application at all. The same goes for confectionery and furniture. In the case of furniture, the rate to the coast is $4.57; if you take the one and one-third rule it is $6.08. The present rate to Calgary is $3.79.

Mr. Green: I was referring to the items which will be affected, whereas the minister is referring to items which will not be affected.

Mr. Chevrier: I am coming to those. I am proceeding by process of elimination. I want to show that of these nineteen items there are at least ten which will not be affected because they are clear. If my hon. friend will allow me, I should like to give some further items. For instance, the rate on hardware to the coast is $3.07; under the rule of one and one-third the rate would be $4.08; the present rate to Calgary is $3.23. The rate on canned goods to the coast is $1.57; if you apply the one and one-third rule the rate is $2.09, whereas the present rate to Calgary, which is a combination of the Vancouver rate, is $2.99.

I come now to the items which might—not which will—be affected, as I shall attempt to explain later on, by the one and one-third rule. The first is chemicals and drugs, which I do not think is serious and which I shall leave for the moment. Then come the iron and steel items. On iron and steel for construction the rate is $1.48; plus the one and one-third rule it is $1.97; the rate to Calgary is $2.64. That may be affected. Iron and steel of a general nature comes under a rate to the coast of $1.98; plus the one and one-third rule the rate is $2.63; the rate to Calgary is $2.91. Paper and print will be affected, and so will soap, wire, syrup, starch, pipe fittings. There are nine articles.

Mr. Harkness: Has the minister the figures with respect to barbed wire?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes.

Mr. Harkness: Would you mind giving them?

Mr. Chevrier: The rate on wire to the coast is $1.48. If you apply the one and one-third rule it is $1.97. The present rate to Calgary is $3.23. Therefore there will be these nine items which might be affected by the one and one-third rule.

Mr. Green: I think there are other items which are not affected so much.

Mr. Chevrier: Yes, there are other items which are not affected so much, but the point I am coming to is this. Assume that those articles are serious, and I do not admit that. Assume further that the railways, because they are serious, withdraw them. Then is there not still competition by ship?

Mr. Green: But we should not be put in that position.

Mr. Chevrier: Wait a minute. Assume that there is no competition by ship. Is there not still competition by the United States railways? Is there not still competition into the back door of Vancouver by the Great Northern? Does anyone in this house think for a moment that the railways are going to allow this traffic to go to the United States railways? Of course they are not. What did counsel for the Canadian National Railways say? He said that in so far as the Canadian National Railways were concerned they had no intention of withdrawing the rate. I cannot speak for the Canadian Pacific Railway; neither can I speak for the Canadian National for that matter, but I will let counsel speak because he put on record what his views were. While I cannot speak for the Canadian Pacific Railway I will be a very surprised man if the Canadian Pacific withdraws any of the transcontinental rates—

Mr. Green: I certainly hope you are right.

Mr. Chevrier:—in so far as that section is concerned. Therefore the worst possible thing that could happen would be that there would be no steamship competition and no competition from the United States railways. That would be the worst possible event that could happen. I do not think it will, but suppose it did? Then what would take place? The railways would quote a special commodity rate which, as witnesses said before the committee, would be slightly higher than the rate existing at the moment. That is the worst that could happen so far as British Columbia is concerned.

Opposed to that there are advantages to British Columbia by virtue of the one and one-third rule because the transcontinental rate applies to port areas on the coast, and therefore I maintain that the whole eastern half and the whole northern part of British Columbia will benefit by virtue of the one and one-third rule. My hon. friend shakes his head, but that is the advice I have received.

Mr. Green: That is not what the British Columbia government say.

Mr. Chevrier: I will come to that too. That is certainly what the royal commission on transportation recommended. Opposed to that position which I have expressed as being perhaps the worst that could be envisaged by British Columbia, and which I do not think will ever happen, there is the other problem, which has affected Alberta and a large portion of Saskatchewan for many years, namely the problem of unfair discrimination. It is one that is covered by section 314 of the Railway Act and one which could be remedied by an amendment to that section or by the section that we have sought to introduce under this bill. Subsection 5 of section 314 of the Railway Act provides in effect that there shall not be a greater charge for a shorter haul than for a longer haul, and an exception is made by the board because of the fact that this is a competitive rate.

Alberta has been suffering from discrimination for a number of years. They have been complaining about that discrimination, and on this point let me meet the argument of my hon. friend when he says he regrets that the provinces are divided amongst themselves with reference to section 332B. Let me answer him in this way. How much more would the provinces be divided if this bill were not made law? That is why the bill is brought down; because the royal commission, after having gone into the complaints, came to the conclusion that there were geographic, economic and climatic disadvantages being suffered by the extremities of this country. They sought to remedy them by the recommendations they made and which have been carried forward into the bill. My hon. friend says the provinces will be divided. I do not think they will. As a matter of fact, in answer to the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre, when counsel for the province of Manitoba was asked by me whether or not he would prefer to have this bill or to have section 332 out and no bill at all he said: Of course we would much rather have this bill; and that goes for all the provinces.

Mr. Churchill: That is hardly a fair question.

Mr. Chevrier: Of course it is.

Mr. Churchill: Not "either/or" on the whole bill.

Mr. Chevrier: The point is this. Let me tell my hon. friend that if we did not have this bill all the things that Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta have been complaining about over the years would not be remedied. All the provinces would go back before the board of transport commissioners under the circumstances as they were before, and the board would have its hands tied by judicial judgments handed down over the years. There would be no remedy at all for the present position. For the last forty-seven years the board of transport commissioners has been trying to remedy this position and could not do so because it did not have the power. We in this parliament decided that we would have a royal commission to investigate their complaints. After all, we must be logical. Did we not say to the provinces in effect—and when I say "we" I mean the government—all right; you want a royal commission, but you will have to take the bitter with the sweet. I am not admitting there is anything bitter in this bill. I do not think there is. With all due respect to my hon. friend—

Mr. Green: Surely it was never the position that the provinces had to take whatever the royal commission chose to bring in without any opportunity to protest and ask for something else. That is making the royal commission almost godlike. Nobody thought they were that.

Mr. Chevrier: No. I agree with my hon. friend that nobody thought they were that, but I think it might be interesting if I were to read to the house something that is contained in the brief of the premiers of the provinces to the government, and this is an entirely different citation from the one I put on the record before. I place this one on the record because it has particular reference to the problem under discussion now. Here is what the brief said at one point:

> In our opinion the only satisfactory way in which this problem can be met is by the appointment of a royal commission under the public inquiries act. The differences between the views of the seven provinces and the view of the federal government in this matter are not fundamental differences in any matter of principle.
> The dominion government feels that there should be a further inquiry into this matter. The seven provinces are unanimously of the same mind. The only question between us is as to the body which should conduct the inquiry and we feel that a royal commission can perform this duty with greater satisfaction than can the board of railway commissioners. We give the following reasons in support of our view:
> (a) With wide powers of reference enabling it to inquire into all railway problems of the country as they exist in either a geographic or an economic sense with full power to recommend any amendment to existing legislation or as to the constitution, powers and duties of the regulatory body, it can do much to promote a greater sense of national and regional security in the dominion. We feel an opportunity should be given to the provinces to make recommendations with regard to the terms of reference of the royal commission.

(b) If the commission is composed of men of ability with an urge to inquiry constructively for solutions to problems now vexatious and pressing, such a commission could without spending too much time in hearing evidence arrive at conclusions calculated to advance the general welfare.

And we proceeded—

Mr. Green: Surely the minister is not suggesting that the provinces bound themselves by that request to accept whatever recommendations the commission saw fit to bring down.

Mr. Chevrier: No, I am not arguing that, but my hon. friend will see in a moment what I am coming to. This brief was read by one of the premiers, and at the end of the brief is to be found this addendum:

The submission which I make has the unanimous assent and approval of the premiers of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island, Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta, and British Columbia. The premier of British Columbia is unable to be here today because of the demands of his own legislative session; but he was with us all day Saturday, on which day the proposals that I have outlined were discussed and agreed to by the seven premiers. I am authorized by Premier Johnson of British Columbia to say that, joining with the other provinces in the proposals now submitted, the premier of the province of British Columbia thinks it proper that it be made known to the dominion cabinet that the province of British Columbia had, prior to the judgment of the board, taken appropriate steps toward the filing of applications with the board of transport commissioners for the approval of the mountain differential, and intends to proceed thereon with all due diligence.

The province of British Columbia did proceed with the application to the board for the removal of the mountain differential, and the board granted the application. My hon. friend says: "Surely you are not arguing that the provinces are bound by these recommendations." I am not arguing that, but what I am arguing is that the provinces wanted the royal commission and in effect said: "There is no difference of opinion between us in principle. The only difference of opinion is that you want an investigation under P.C. 1487; we want a royal commission. Give us a royal commission and also let us assist you on the terms of reference." We have done that. Could we go any further than we have gone? Having read the report, having studied the report, having examined the conclusions, we adopted them. The hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra was also of the view that these recommendations were good. He was not only of the view that they were good—and now I refer to section 332B

—but that they should be brought down and implemented at the earliest opportunity. The hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra made a lengthy speech when I dealt with the recommendations on the report of the royal commission in the house—and a very good speech it was—which indicated that he had studied the report of the royal commission very carefully. He dealt with many of the recommendations therein contained, and he dealt in an especial manner with section 332B. I am sure he will not object if I read to the committee what he said then. This was his statement on April 5, 1951. It can be found at page 1649 of Hansard:

Another subject which is also of great importance and which likewise calls for an amendment to the Railway Act is that of transcontinental rates. They are dealt with at page 96 of the report, and I refer particularly to page 101 where it is stated:

"The Railway Act should be amended to provide that when the competitive transcontinental tariffs are published by the railways, such tariffs shall contain a provision that the rates to or from intermediate territory shall not exceed the transcontinental rates by more than one-third."

As I understand it, the meaning of that recommendation is this. There are certain special transcontinental rates, for example, from Toronto and Montreal to Vancouver. They are only in effect because there is competition by sea and we benefit by those rates on the west coast. I presume there is also a similar benefit from transcontinental rates on the east coast. But the Canadians who live in the interior part of the country—for example, in interior British Columbia, in Alberta and, I suppose, in Saskatchewan as well—do not get any benefits from those transcontinental rates. They must pay a much higher rate. The commission has recommended that the higher rate that they pay in the interior portions of the country shall not be more than one-third higher than the transcontinental rates. I believe that that provision, if it became law, would be of great benefit to those Canadians who are not privileged to live at the seashore. I hope that the government will bring in an amendment to the Railway Act at this session to make that change possible as well.

Mr. Green: I am sure the minister would not want to be unfair. If he will remember, I said this afternoon that none of us had realized the defects in this measure until we heard the evidence in the committee. I quite admit that is what I said when we had the first review of the commission's report, but I made it perfectly clear this afternoon that when we got into the committee hearing evidence and realized just what the change did it altered the situation completely from my point of view.

Mr. Chevrier: I am not going to press the point, and I do not want to embarrass my hon. friend.

Mr. Green: Oh, I am not embarrassed.

Mr. Chevrier: But I do want to say that when he made the statement—

Mr. Green: I did not know as much then as I know now.

Mr. Chevrier: When he made the statement it was several months after the report had been tabled, and he had had an opportunity to study it. I think he has been fair in his—

Mr. Green: We had had the report only a few weeks.

Mr. Chevrier: No; I think the report was tabled in March. However, I may be mistaken. This statement was made on April 5. I will not pursue it any further because I do not want to be unfair to the hon. gentleman. There is no doubt about it, he has had a change of mind, whether or not it is because of the evidence in the committee. I suppose if he rises in his place and says it is because of that I as a member of parliament must accept his statement. Since he has said it, I do accept his statement, but I think nevertheless he has been influenced by that evidence in a manner other than which the evidence indicated, because my understanding of the evidence is not at all that of my hon. friend. And during the whole of this discussion, not only in the committee but in the house, it was said repeatedly by many hon. members that this is a very technical thing; it is a difficult thing to understand; we are not freight rate experts, and the like. Above all I certainly would subscribe to that position. I am not a freight rate expert. I have been dealing with this subject now for two or three years, and I do not profess to know a great deal about it, certainly not any more than the ordinary member of the house does. But the point I am trying to make now is that we picked out a group of experts. We picked out men whom we thought—

Mr. Green: The minister is not suggesting that the members of the royal commission were railway experts.

Mr. Chevrier: I am suggesting that the members of the royal commission were men qualified to deal with this problem. I am suggesting that the members of the royal commission were exactly what this parliament wanted, and they had assigned to them the best experts they could have in this country, either in traffic, accountancy or otherwise. If there was a body competent to deal with it, it was the royal commission on transportation. What did they do? They listened carefully to all the evidence, and they recommended this one and one-third rule.

Mr. Green: They did not listen to anything in connection with this section.

Mr. Chevrier: The hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre says this rule was never discussed. He asks about the origin of this new plan, because the provinces had no opportunity of discussing this recommendation. But did the provinces have any opportunity of discussing the other recommendations contained in this report? Certainly the provinces made no recommendations similar to those found in section 332A; they made no recommendations in so far as the uniform rate structure is concerned, which is found in this bill. Where did that come from? Did that come out of the sky? It came from the study given to the problem by the members of the royal commission, and the advice and assistance they got from the experts. The same thing can be said about the one and one-third rule.

I believe that if hon. members will read the chapter dealing with transcontinental rates they will find a clear explanation of the reason a great injustice would ensue if the province of Alberta and a portion of Saskatchewan were not given the benefit of this one and one-third rule. The report goes on to say that no great hardship, if any at all, will ensue to the province of British Columbia. I could quote that chapter at length, but I shall not do that. If hon. members will read the conclusions at the bottom of page 99 of the royal commission report, together with the five or six paragraphs to be found on page 100, they will find what the commission recommended in so far as the one and one-third rule is concerned.

Then my hon. friends suggest we should amend section 331 in order to give the board authority to deal with the one and one-third rule. But that would not meet the position in Alberta. Alberta is faced with section 314, subsection 5, of the Railway Act which, because of the competitive transcontinental rate to the coast, puts that province in an unfair discriminatory position. The way to remedy that is not by amending section 331, but by a new section in the bill. If I were to accept the suggestion made by the hon. member it would interfere with the right of the railways to establish competitive rates. After all, the competitive rate is one which the railways file with the board of transport commissioners. If an amendment were made to section 331 it would interfere with a right which they already have. All through their report the royal commission say there should be no interference with the competitive rate position of the railways.

I have been much longer than I intended to be. I hope I have not been unfair to my hon. friend. I have tried not to be.

Mr. Green: A great many more hon. members feel as I do.

Mr. Chevrier: That may be.

Mr. Green: Including some on that side of the house.

Mr. Chevrier: I directed my remarks to the hon. member principally because he carried on the debate in the committee. In so far as the hon. members on this side of the house are concerned, they have made their position quite clear. With reference to the hon. members for the Kootenays, it is my view—it is only a personal opinion—that they are not hurt but rather are helped by this one and one-third rule. However, I may be wrong in that. I conclude by saying that I believe the case for the province of British Columbia has been overstated. I do not believe the position will be nearly as serious as suggested by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra. In any event my feeling is, as the royal commission says in its report, that because of steamship competition which exists and the railway competition from the United States side of the border, the railways will not withdraw the transcontinental rate as some expect. I believe this bill is a good one. I believe this section is a good one, because in the national interest I am sure even my hon. friend would not want to deprive a large region of this country of an advantage gained under this bill, which would not come to that region were it not for the one and one-third rule. In effect I am saying that I cannot accept the suggestion of my hon. friend. I say it regretfully, and I say it respectfully. I believe it is a good bill, and I hope it will be possible for us to get on with it now.

Mr. Churchill: I should like to ask the minister if he would care to comment upon Manitoba's position with regard to industry, particularly steel. Is he leaving us with the assumption that Manitoba's argument is unanswerable?

Mr. Chevrier: On that point, Mr. Chairman, all I can say is what I have already indicated in my earlier remarks, and what I said in the committee. When I asked counsel for Manitoba whether or not he would be willing to accept this bill as it was or have no bill with section 332B and go before the board of transport commissioners in the same position he was in earlier, he replied he would much rather have this bill.

Mr. Green: That is like asking whether you have stopped beating your wife.

Mr. Chevrier: That is the best answer I can give.

Mr. Knowles: In connection with the situation in Manitoba, I should like to repeat a question that I put earlier today. Before I do so may I say again that I believe, in the national interest, this bill is a good bill and I support it. In fact I go further and say I support the one and one-third rule. One of the purposes of that one and one-third rule is to do what is suggested on page 100 of the royal commission report, namely, eliminate to a substantial degree some of the anomalies that have been created. But if the application of that rule creates a new anomaly of the kind I cited this afternoon in quoting from the Manitoba brief, are not we from Winnipeg justified in asking the minister if there is not some way in which that new anomaly can be solved? In particular, I should like to know whether it would be possible, under the provisions of this bill, for the board of transport commissioners to consider in-transit rates for steel and iron products moving through Winnipeg?

Mr. Chevrier: The answer to that, Mr. Chairman, is that the commission dealt with in-transit or stop-off rates in a special chapter, and came to the conclusion that it would not begin to answer the problems of Alberta and Saskatchewan. They recommended against it. If my hon. friend will look at page 113 of the commission's report, he will find a chapter or a section of a chapter dealing with stop-off privileges. The conclusion reached by the royal commission is as follows:

> The reasons for the establishment of stop-off (or in-transit) privileges are stated above, and it must be borne in mind that these privileges are concessions made by the railways.
> To carry out the proposal suggested by Alberta would lead to the introduction of claims for further stop-off privileges on the grounds of analogy to existing cases and in turn to reductions of revenue to the railways. It is presumed that the railways are competent to determine what stop-off privileges are in their interests and it would be dangerous to permit the board to compel them to act against their interests and to commit them to indefinite losses.

Mr. Knowles: I do not wish to prolong this discussion indefinitely, but after all those of us who were not on the committee are at a bit of a disadvantage in comparison with those who were. It seems to me, however, that what the royal commission was saying on that point was that an extension of the stop-off privilege or the in-transit rate would not be as happy a solution to the problem facing Alberta and Saskatchewan as would be something like the one and one-third rule; and I agree. My point is that the one and one-third rule—which has been brought in to solve the problem for Alberta and Saskatchewan, and which has been brought in in the national interest—good and all as it is, has created this new anomaly. I do not feel that the answer given to the Alberta case should be regarded as ruling out the possibility of considering it for Manitoba, particularly in respect of the steel industry.

Section 7—section 332B—agreed to.

Sections 8 to 17 inclusive agreed to.

On section 18—Payments to railway companies for cost of maintenance.

Mr. Green: Will the minister explain the amendment to section 18, and tell us just how this section will be applied?

Mr. Chevrier: Section 18 is the subsidy section having to do with the payment of $7 million to both railways. By virtue of subsection 1 (a) the Canadian Pacific Railway Company is to receive the full annual cost of maintaining 552 miles of trackage, subject to subsection 4, if the total cost for both railways exceeds $7 million. By virtue of subsection 1 (b) the Canadian National Railway is to receive the full annual cost of maintaining 552 miles of trackage out of the total trackage involved of 985 miles, subject also to the provisions of subsection 4. By virtue of subsection 2 the board of transport commissioners is to determine what actual trackage is to be used, which would mean that it would fix the actual trackage to be included, such as the main track, the passing track, the siding, the yards and the like. The board is also to determine, by virtue of this section the annual cost to each for the trackage so determined and for inclusion in the scope of the payment.

These payments should be for the purpose of reducing to that extent the freight rates applying between eastern and western Canada, and the amendment which has been added indicates how the board is to proceed. The total amount payable shall be applied to a reduction of the relative level of rates applying on freight traffic moving in both directions between points in eastern Canada and points in western Canada over the trackage to which the payment relates, in such manner as the board may allow or direct. In effect the board of transport commissioners, which is the body dealing with these rates, will determine the coverage as to tracks applying to both railways, and will also determine the manner in which this $7 million shall be apportioned.

Mr. Argue: The $7 million provision in this section should result in some benefits to the people of the prairies and to the long haul shippers. It has been stated over and over again that the provinces of Ontario and Quebec have certain natural advantages in the way of truck and water competition which result in low competitive rates for the people in this area: The long haul shipper, even though the rates may be equalized, needs something more; and that something more, as suggested by the royal commission, is this $7 million to pay the cost of maintenance of the trackage over the railway bridge between east and west.

We should bear in mind first of all the fact that this amount is only $7 million; and unless the $7 million is guarded carefully this provision may not result—if certain other things are done—in any benefit whatsoever to western Canada. Up until now freight rates have been set on the basis of using the financial position of the Canadian Pacific Railway as a yardstick. One of the important items in that C.P.R. yardstick was that freight rates should be of such an order as to provide the C.P.R. with a surplus of $15 million. I note that at the present time there is a move on foot by the C.P.R. to get the $15 million surplus in the C.P.R. formula increased to a figure of between $27 million and $29 million. If the C.P.R. can get the formula changed so that in future freight rates are set so as to give it a surplus of $29 million instead of a surplus of $15 million, there will have to be an increase in freight rates to the extent of $52 million; and on the basis of estimates made in the past the total cost of changing the C.P.R. surplus from $15 million to $29 million would amount to some $30 million for freight users in western Canada.

All I am saying is this. If, a few days after we are given the $7 million to maintain the trackage over that bridge, we are called upon to pay another $30 million in freight rates in order to provide more money to the C.P.R., it would have been better for the government to keep the $7 million and not spend it, and not to have made this provision in the bill, if at the same time the government would prevent this proposed change in the C.P.R. formula. I want the $7 million, but I want it to be effective in bringing down the rates for the freight users in western Canada. It will not be effective if, after the government provides the $7 million, a change is granted by the board of transport commissioners in the C.P.R. formula on which freight rates are based, in order to provide the C.P.R. with more money at a cost of $30 million to the freight users in western Canada.

We want equalized freight rates; but the advantages of equalized freight rates will be small indeed if they are increased by the suggested new formula. I do not know whether the minister is prepared to comment on the argument I have made. But I can say to him that I hope, I trust, the government will see to it that the Canadian Pacific formula is not changed, because that would result in taking away all the benefits of the $7 million, and impose an additional burden on western Canada.

Mr. Green: Next sitting.

CANADIAN NATIONAL-CANADIAN PACIFIC ACT

REPORT TO PARLIAMENT TO GIVE INFORMATION CONCERNING CO-OPERATIVE PROJECTS

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport) moved that the house go into committee to consider Bill No. 6, to amend the Canadian National-Canadian Pacific Act, 1933.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

On section 1—Contents of report to parliament.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Chairman, at the resolution stage, before the bill was sent to committee, it was pointed out that it was of a simple nature. The committee evidently regarded it as such, because they passed it without discussion. However, could the minister make some brief comments as to the subject matter of the bill which, when the legislation was originally introduced in 1932, was considered very important. Those were bleak days so far as railway traffic was concerned. Perhaps the minister would make some brief comments as to the extent to which co-operation does exist today. We all know there are such things as pool trains, but there may be some other trains with which we are not familiar.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, I would be glad to do that. One of the complaints made by the provinces when they presented their brief to the government was that the Canadian National-Canadian Pacific Act, which was passed to ensure greater co-operation between the railways, was not effective.

The complaint was that there were a number of instances where, in the minds of the provinces, there should have been co-operation but such co-operation had not followed. In the light of that complaint by the provinces the government decided to include a reference in the terms of the royal commission as to whether or not there had been the desired co-operation between the two railways. The royal commission deals with the subject matter in a rather comprehensive chapter, which is chapter 8 of the report.

In that part of the report, which I am sure my hon. friend has read, the commission recommends the changes now found in this bill. It came to the conclusion that perhaps it would be a good thing if there were placed in the anuual report of the Canadian National Railways certain requirements which the railways would have to give to the committee on railways and shipping, and which that committee would be in a position to study and to investigate. It could then be decided whether or not there was the desired degree of co-operation and, too, it could be ascertained whether in certain cases there could not be a greater degree of co-operation. I think the manner in which the royal commission has recommended the amendments to the act is good, because it gives parliament a chance to learn whether or not co-operation really exists.

That, I believe, is the effect of Bill No. 6.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): How extensive are these instances of co-operation? Do they occur in every province? Those of us who live in Ottawa know such a condition exists in the service between Toronto and Montreal, and Toronto and Ottawa. Is that co-operation widespread throughout the dominion?

Mr. Chevrier: I can pick out of the air one or two instances. For instance, both railways operate the Northern Alberta railway. There is co-operation there. Both railways operate the Vancouver hotel. There is co-operation there. There is some co-operation, too, in certain parts of the maritimes in respect of some of the lines running into those provinces. Then my hon. friend knows of the co-operation between the two railways in their service from Montreal to Toronto, which has been going on for many years. It may be that it is desirable to extend this condition. In order to come to a sound conclusion one would have to hear what both railways have to say.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Could the minister tell us of any case where co-operation has been discussed but no conclusion arrived at?

Mr. Chevrier: I do not know of any at the moment.

Mr. McLure: May I ask the minister if, when the railway committee meets, it will have the report before it. In other years the report of the Canadian National Railways has been presented two or three days before the meeting of the committee, with the result that there has been insufficient time to look into the affairs of the company. Then may I ask if we will have separate divisional reports? For instance I should like to know whether the Prince Edward Island division is operating at a profit or otherwise. It would seem that under section 14A some changes are to be made. Why not at the same time give us a break-down of what each division is actually earning?

Mr. Chevrier: The report of the Canadian National Railways will be in the same form in which it has always been. While the information my hon. friend wishes to have is not in the report, it is always obtainable from the railway officers.

Mr. McLure: It is difficult to get that information from any of the officers of the Canadian National Railways. I have tried for the last three or four years to get some idea along this line, but I have not been able to.

Mr. Chevrier: What I should have said is that the information, in so far as the Atlantic region is concerned, is obtainable. It may not be divided as between Prince Edward Island, Newfoundland, New Brunswick and Nova Scotia; but the information for the Atlantic region has been given from year to year.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): In section 14A(e), after referring to co-operative projects being studied by the National company and the Pacific company, and such other information as appears to the directors necessary, we find these words: "or as may be required from time to time by the governor in council." Are those words put in merely as a sort of protection or do they indicate some definite project of inquiry by the government?

Mr. Chevrier: They do not indicate any definite project of inquiry at this time but there may well be some instance in the future when it will be necessary to ask the co-operation of the railroads.

Mr. Knowles: On what basis is the revenue divided in the case of pool trains operated by the Canadian National and Canadian Pacific?

Mr. Chevrier: I am afraid I am not prepared to answer that question on this bill. That is a question which the directors of the railroads and their officials would be competent to answer when before the committee.

MARITIME FREIGHT RATES ACT

AMENDMENT AS TO APPLICATION OF WESTBOUND RAIL AND LAKE TRAFFIC

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport) moved that the house go into committee on Bill No. 7, to amend the Maritime Freight Rates Act.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

On section 1—Westbound rail and lake traffic.

Mr. McLure: I suppose the minister will be making a full statement on this bill?

Mr. Chevrier: I shall try to make the statement as full as possible. This is simply an amendment to carry out the recommendations of the royal commission. It legalizes a practice which has existed over the years of giving the benefit of the 20 per cent preference not only to rail traffic moving in the direction referred to in the act but also to rail and lake and rail-lake-rail traffic. For instance, it would cover movements to western Canada via the great lakes.

TAX AGREEMENTS

CANADA-UNITED STATES—ADDITION OF PROTOCOL DEALING WITH EXCHANGE OF RATIFICATIONS, ETC.

Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue) moved the second reading of Bill No. 28, to amend an act to amend the Canada-United States of America Tax Convention Act, 1943, and the Canada-United States of America Tax Convention Act, 1944.

He said: Parliament recently approved the supplementary income tax convention with the United States of America which amended the income tax convention which had existed since March 4, 1942. The supplementary convention was approved by chapter 27 of the statutes of 1950. The protocol which has now been added to the supplementary convention accepts on the part of the government of Canada the reservation which was made by the government of the United States, on the advice of its Senate, to the effect that paragraph 2 of article VII of the original convention as amended by article I (d) of the supplementary convention should be deleted. Article VII reads:

1. A resident of Canada shall be exempt from United States income tax upon compensation for labour or personal services performed within the United States of America if he conforms to either of the following conditions:

(a) He is temporarily present within the United States of America for a period or periods not exceeding a total of one hundred and eighty-three days during the taxable year and such compensation (A) is received for labour or personal services performed as an employee of, or under contract with, a resident corporation or other entity of Canada and (B) does not exceed $5,000 in the aggregate during such taxable year; or (b) he is temporarily present in the United States of America for a period or periods not exceeding a total of ninety days during the taxable year and the compensation received for such services does not exceed $1,500 in the aggregate during such taxable year.

2. The provisions of paragraph 1 (a) of this article shall have no application to the professional earnings of such individuals as actors, artists, musicians and professional athletes.

The one hundred and eighty-three days referred to do not have to be consecutive. In its reservation to the ratification of the convention the government of the United States did not accept the provision which restricted the article dealing with compensation for personal services in the case of actors, artists, musicians and athletes. That is one point being dealt with in this amendment.

Article VII, which I have just quoted, provided that a resident of Canada would be exempt from United States tax upon compensation for personal or professional services performed within the United States if he was present therein for less than one hundred and eighty-three days during the year and met certain conditions as to the residence of his employer or the amount received for his personal services, which I have indicated would be less than $5,000.

An exemption with respect to the application of this provision was made with respect to the professional earnings of such individuals as actors, artists, musicians and professional athletes. The United States senate committee which examined the convention considered that this restriction embodied a discriminatory principle which the committee could not accept. This bill will confirm the government of Canada's acceptance of that same reservation and will remove the restriction relating to actors, artists, musicians and athletes. The result will be that actors, artists, musicians and athletes from one country receiving remuneration for services performed in the other country will be treated for income tax purposes in the same way as commercial travellers, professional men, and others. The provisions are reciprocal and apply to Canadians who receive remuneration for services performed in the United States and to United States residents who receive remuneration for services performed in Canada. If you will look at the bill you will see that the only words added to section 1 are "and protocol". The section will read:

> The convention and protocol entered into between Canada and the United States of America, set out in schedule A—

That is the schedule at the back of the bill.

> —is approved and declared to have the force of law in Canada, and shall be deemed to be included in and to form part of the convention and protocol set out in the schedule to the Canada-United States of America Tax Convention Act, 1943.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I have nothing more to add until the bill goes to committee.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

[Mr McCann.]

On section 1—Convention and protocol approved.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I want to be clear as to what the minister said. Would he read again the part where he referred to the nature of the employment of the person? Was there a reference to being an employee of a Canadian corporation?

Mr. McCann: What I quoted from the statute?

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Yes.

Mr. McCann: It starts with article VI A which reads:

> "Pensions (including government pensions) and life annuities derived from within one of the contracting states by a resident of the other contracting state shall be exempt from taxation in the former state."
> (d) By amending article VII to read as follows:
> "1. A resident of Canada shall be exempt from United States tax upon compensation for personal (including professional) services performed during the taxable year within the United States of America if he is present therein for a period or periods not exceeding a total of 183 days during the taxable year and either of the following conditions is met . . ."

Then paragraph (b) reads:

> His compensation received for such personal services does not exceed $5,000.

Then it continues:

> The provisions . . . of this article shall have no application to the professional earnings of such individuals as actors, artists, musicians and professional athletes.

That was the original. The Senate of the United States objected to that, and if you will look at the protocol contained in the schedule to the bill you will see that it reads:

> As recited in the ratification on the part of the United States of America, the Senate of the United States of America, in its resolution of September 17, 1951, advising and consenting to the ratification of the supplementary convention aforesaid, expressed a certain reservation with respect thereto, as follows:
> "The government of the United States of America does not accept paragraph 2 of article VII, as amended by article I (d) of the supplementing convention, relating to professional earnings of individuals such as actors, artists, musicians and athletes."

They do not accept it and we have agreed not to accept it. That is what constitutes the protocol.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I understand that, and I think that is clear, but I think the minister omitted reading subsection (a). Would he read that?

Mr. McCann: The first condition is:

> (a) His compensation is received for such personal services performed as an officer or employee of a resident or corporation or other entity of Canada . . .

We have nothing to do with that at all. They accept that part of it but the second part they do not accept.

Mr. Knowles: May I ask a question in order to get it clear? I understand that as the convention now stands the provisions of the section which the minister read a moment ago do not apply to actors, artists, musicians and athletes.

Mr. McCann: That is right.

Mr. Knowles: And that exception is being removed by this protocol and convention?

Mr. McCann: That is all there is to it.

Mr. Knowles: That means that from now on the article will apply to these people.

Mr. McCann: From here on these people will be taxable the same as anybody else.

Mr. Knowles: And previously—

Mr. McCann: They had an exemption under certain conditions, that they were earning less than $5,000 and that they were not in the other country more than one hundred and eighty-three days.

Section agreed to.

Section 2 agreed to.

Schedule agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

JUDGES ACT

INCREASE IN NUMBER OF COUNTY COURT JUDGES IN BRITISH COLUMBIA

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (for the Minister of Justice) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to present a measure to amend the Judges Act, 1946, to increase the number of county court judges in British Columbia from fourteen to fifteen.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

Mr. Green: Will someone explain what this is all about?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I am informed that the British Columbia government has requested this further appointment to the county court. It was investigated by the officials of the Department of Justice and they believe this extra appointment is needed for the good administration of justice in British Columbia.

Mr. Green: Can the minister say in which district this additional judge is to be appointed?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): That is in the bill, but if I am not mistaken it is New Westminster.

Mr. Green: There have been press reports to the effect that it would be in New Westminster, and if that is so—

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Perhaps I read it in the press myself.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Bring the press in.

Mr. Green: I do not know how we would get along without the press. If that is the district, it is very timely that an additional judge should be appointed. There is a greatly increased amount of business going through that particular registry, and it is a very wise thing to provide for the appointment of an additional judge.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I wish to express my appreciation to the hon. member. I believe it is in New Westminster. I thank him very much for the praise he has just given us on this appointment.

Mr. Knowles: It is clear, is it, that the bill does nothing else than provide for this increase in the number of judges?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): To the best of my knowledge that is right.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in.

Mr. Fournier, Hull (for Mr. Garson) thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 29, to amend the Judges Act, 1946.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Mr. Speaker: When shall the bill be read the second time?

Mr. Knowles: Next sitting.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I move the adjournment of the house. Tomorrow we will take up third reading of Bill No. 12, to amend the Railway Act; third reading of Bill No. 24, to amend the Public Printing and Stationery Act. I understand that a copy of all information requested by the hon. member for Greenwood will be handed to him tomorrow morning or sometime before the house opens.

Mr. Knowles: I thought it was understood it would be laid on the table so other members could see it as well.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): If there is any objection—I am told there is an existing copy of all these details—it could be tabled tomorrow.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): The minister is quite a magician if that is the arrangement. I understood that the information was to be given to me on Monday morning, but if the minister has changed all that—

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I cannot recall exactly the date I mentioned, but during the week I was told they were preparing all this information and I was told tonight that they would have the copies in the morning and it would be laid on the table or handed to the hon. member. If there is any objection I will not call third reading tomorrow.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I would be obliged if the minister would do that. The minister will recall that we let second reading go through on this understanding. There are so many committees tomorrow morning that I will not have time to see it if it is available.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I will try to have the information tabled tomorrow morning and we will not have third reading tomorrow. We will postpone it.

Then we will take up Bill No. 27, to amend the Pension Act; then the bill based on the resolution which was just passed unanimously, increasing the number of county court judges in British Columbia. Following that we have two resolutions of the Minister of Justice to amend the Supreme Court Act to increase the salary of the registrar, and to amend the Exchequer Court Act to increase the maximum salary of the registrar. Then we have a resolution in the name of the Secretary of State to amend the Civil Service Act in respect of the tenure of office and salaries of the commissioners, and a further one to amend the Dominion Elections Act.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 9.45 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, November 30, 1951

The house met at two o'clock.

ST. ANDREW'S DAY

PRESENTATION OF REPLICA OF STONE OF SCONE TO MEMBER FOR SELKIRK

Mr. Gordon Graydon (Peel): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. This is a day on which we observe a most happy occasion, the anniversary of St. Andrew's day, the patron saint of Scotland. We are thus enabled at the same time to pay tribute to those of Scottish birth and extraction who have contributed so greatly to making Canada the fine nation she is. I have pleasure at this time in presenting to one of Canada's most prominent sons of Scotland and a great Canadian citizen, the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Bryce), a replica of the Stone of Scone.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that all members of the house are happy to have had the hon. member for Peel express their sentiments to the hon. member for Selkirk and other distinguished Canadians of Scottish birth, not forgetting yourself.

Mr. William Bryce (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, having been a good Canadian for thirty-two years I do not see why the hon. member for Peel has singled me out for this honour, but I assure you that I am delighted to have had it. I hope none of these Scotland Yard fellows get after me. If I refused at this time to take something for nothing I would be going against the best traditions of the race to which I belong.

KOREA

CEASE-FIRE ORDERS—REQUEST FOR CLARIFICATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gordon Graydon (Peel): May I ask the Prime Minister if he is now in a position to clear up the confusion which has been in the public mind with respect to the cease-fire orders which were alleged to have been issued in Korea? I am quite sure the house will be very glad to have any statement he can make.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I am not sure that the statement I have here will clear up the confusion but I have from our embassy in Washington the text of the statement made by General Van Fleet at the United States 8th army headquarters about this matter. It is in the following terms:

> An incomplete digest of military directive has led to unfounded speculation regarding a cease-fire in Korea. Eighth army headquarters released a statement 28 November, 1951, wherein it was explicitly stated there is no cease-fire order in Korea. I don't know how I can be more emphatic on this matter than by reiterating this statement. Amplifying the original statement, I can say that certain military instructions were disseminated from this headquarters to corps and division levels. War correspondents' reports indicate that when these instructions were passed down to some lower command elements there was a distortion of meaning in the text of these instructions. Action is being taken to clarify these instructions for those officers and enlisted men who misinterpreted the directive. I am not at liberty to disclose the contents of the instructions which are related to future operations of the 8th army. I can definitely say, however, there is no mention made in the text ordering a cease-fire in Korea.

ROYAL CANADIAN NAVY

"JOSEPH C. CYR"—DEPORTATION TO THE UNITED STATES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. A. Blanchette (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of National Defence): I should like to refer to the question asked by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra concerning former Surgeon Lieutenant Joseph C. Cyr. Ferdinand Waldo Demara entered the Royal Canadian Navy as a surgeon lieutenant under the name of Joseph C. Cyr, and as Joseph C. Cyr he was checked up to the maximum required for a lieutenant in the medical branch of the service. In addition, his credentials were authentic, and his general bearing and personality sufficient to merit the recommendation from the senior officers who convened to approve his appointment.

As Surgeon Lieutenant Joseph C. Cyr this officer conducted himself in all respects as a gentleman and officer, and at one period of his career he performed successfully duties over and above the normal requirements. Information is not to hand whether or not Ferdinand Waldo Demara is a qualified doctor. He has, however, been questioned extensively by others in the medical profession whose reports led us to believe that he had had all the necessary experience and knowledge which a doctor would be required to have. This theoretical assumption is also borne out in practice.

His entry in the Royal Canadian Navy conformed with all the conditions of entry which were required on March 13, 1951. As the result of the allegations by the real Dr. Cyr, a check was made on "Joseph C. Cyr" who was appointed as surgeon lieutenant to H.M.C.S. Cayuga. This check was along the lines of a check which would be conducted on any officer for a higher classification than normal. The real identity has been established by a complete liaison with all civil authorities, and it has now been definitely ascertained that former Surgeon Lieutenant Joseph C. Cyr is in reality Ferdinand Waldo Demara, a citizen of the United States. As Ferdinand Waldo Demara he has been discharged on the 21st November, 1951, under the charge of misconduct—fraudulent entry. The Canadian immigration authorities have returned him to the United States.

Mr. McCusker: I object to this statement. It is an insult to the medical profession. The doctors who examined this man and admitted him to the service should be examined themselves.

Mr. Green: May I ask the parliamentary assistant whether there has been any change in the method by which doctors are now taken into the navy?

Mr. Blanchette: The matter of any change is being looked into.

Mr. Graydon: May I ask my hon. friend if any certificates are required when a medical man enters the service of the navy?

Mr. Blanchette: He had Joseph C. Cyr's medical certificates, not his own.

PUBLIC PRINTING AND STATIONERY ACT

AMOUNTS OWING BY VARIOUS DEPARTMENTS TO KING'S PRINTER—NET DEBIT BALANCE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. F. G. Bradley (Secretary of State): I should like to lay on the table of the house the break-down of the information concerning the amounts owed by the various departments to the king's printer as well as the net debit balance in the treasury office against the king's printer, as requested by the hon. member for Greenwood.

[Mr. Blanchette.]

PUBLIC WORKS

RUSTICO, P. E. I.—STORM AND FLOOD DAMAGE TO BREAKWATER AND HOMES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. Chester S. McLure (Queens): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works. I only received word about this matter a few moments ago and was unable to send him any information concerning it. Has the minister been advised about the storm and flood damage to the government breakwater and fishermen's homes at Rustico, Prince Edward Island? If not, I would be pleased to give him the information I have received.

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (Minister of Public Works): I am grateful to the hon. member for giving me the information. Up till now I had not heard about this storm.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

INQUIRY AS TO RECOMMENDATION FOR INCREASE IN BASIC PENSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Lake Centre): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport in connection with the recent meeting of the general chairmen and the vice-presidents of the Canadian National Railways in a committee to review the Canadian National Railways pension plan. I should like to ask whether or not any recommendation has been made as a result of the meeting of that committee, to increase the basic pension of $25 a month for railway employees.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): I wonder if the hon. member would allow me to take that as notice. Perhaps I could bring in a reply early next week.

RAILWAY ACT

IMPLEMENTING CERTAIN RECOMMENDATIONS OF ROYAL COMMISSION ON TRANSPORTATION—MAINTENANCE OF TRACKAGE

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport) moved the third reading of Bill No. 12, to amend the Railway Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

PENSION ACT

PROVISION FOR INCREASES IN RATES OF PENSION FOR DISABILITY AND FOR DEATH

Hon. Hugues Lapointe (Minister of Veterans Affairs) moved the second reading of Bill No. 27, to amend the Pension Act.

Mr. Brooks: Is the minister going to make any further statement at this time?

Mr. Lapointe: No; it is not my intention to do so. I will give explanations in committee if my hon. friend wishes them.

Mr. A. J. Brooks (Royal): I should like to make a few remarks. Bill 27 is a short bill consisting of two sections. Of course the important part is the schedule. I think there is general approval among all members of the main principles of the measure. We took one objection the other day with reference to the date. I am sure we would have liked to have the payments made retroactive. However, we realize that an amendment to that effect cannot be submitted as it would mean an expenditure of money, and naturally would be declared out of order. There is also the question of pensioners receiving a pension under section 21 of the act. Under section 21 a compassionate pension is paid under certain conditions. I do not think this section is too widely known, and I think that I might read it.

Section 21 (1) of the Pension Act is as follows:

> The commission may, on special application in that behalf, grant a compassionate pension, allowance or supplementary award in any case which it considers to be specially meritorious, but in which the commission has decided that the applicant is otherwise unqualified to receive such an award or supplementary award under this act.

And then subsection 2 dealing with amount says:

> The amount of any compassionate pension, allowance or supplementary award granted under this section shall be such sum as the commission shall fix, but not exceeding the amount to which the applicant would have been entitled if his entire claim to payment had been upheld.

Our contention is that pensioners receiving pensions under that section should not receive the same consideration as those who come under the general Pension Act. We realize, of course, that the pension to which I am referring is granted by the authority of the commission. However, my understanding is that when in 1948 there was an increase in the pension we had an assurance from the then minister that these people would receive the same treatment as other pensioners. When the minister discusses the matter I would ask if we might not receive the same assurance from him.

In addition to this group, there is another that I feel should receive consideration. I refer to dependent parents. I believe they receive their pensions through the commission, under section 33 (2) of the act. I would ask the minister also to consider these dependent pensioners, and we would ask comment from him as to whether assurance cannot be given to them as well.

With reference to those receiving pensions under section 21 I would point out that those pensions are received on account of specially meritorious service. Their cases are usually reviewed with great care. It is found that they are soldiers who have given special service in the field of battle. Anyone who has been connected with pensions must know that, while possibly 90 or 95 per cent of our pensioners are undoubtedly deserving of their pensions, owing to the fact that, particularly in the first war, many got into the army although they were medically unfit, some became more or less of a burden on the army from the time they entered until they were discharged. I know of these cases, many of whom received not only a part but a full pension. If they are to receive this increase in pension, then it does seem to me that every consideration should be given to the man who has rendered meritorious service.

I would refer also to the case of the small pensioner who receives an allowance. I feel that the increase in the pension to the pensioner who receives an allowance should not be considered as income. In 1948, when an increase in pension was given to our veterans, this increased pension was not considered as income. Section 18 (3) of the amendment to the Pension Act in 1948 states:

> An increase in pension paid to any person by virtue of this section in respect of any period prior to the day on which this act receives royal assent shall not be included (a) as income for the purposes of the War Veterans Allowance Act, 1946.

If that section was put in the amendment in 1948, then I see no reason why the increase in pensions at this time should be considered as income. I say the same consideration should be given now as was given the war veterans in 1948.

Mr. P. E. Wright (Melfort): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a few words before the bill passes. All hon. members are pleased to have had this measure introduced at the present session.

I should like to pay a compliment to the veterans organizations in Canada, including the Canadian Legion, who presented their case so well to the public, to members of the House of Commons and to the government. I am sure it is largely because of the very able way in which they presented their case that we have this legislation at the present session, and in the form in which we now see it.

Those veterans organizations did an excellent job for the returned men. As a returned man, I am sure other returned men in the house will join with me when I say that every returned man should belong to a veterans organization. They have demonstrated that they can do a good job in presenting the case for their members. They have done so in this case, and I believe returned men should give those organizations their wholehearted support, by joining them and assisting in future presentations to be made on behalf of all veterans.

In 1948, at the time of the last increase in the pension, hon. members from this group thought that the pension payments should be attached to the cost of living index. We felt that when price controls in Canada were taken off we would have an increase in the cost of living index, and that veterans pensions should be governed by that increase. As a matter of fact in the veterans committee of that time we moved an amendment which, in effect, would have given one dollar of increase per month for each point of rise in the cost of living index. That amendment went to a vote, and that amendment was defeated by the deciding vote of the chairman of that committee. Had the amendment been accepted the veteran would have been in an even better position today than he will find himself with the increased pension set out in the present measure.

However, all hon. members are pleased to note the introduction of this measure. It has not gone as far as some of us would have liked. The hon. member for Royal (Mr. Brooks) referred to two groups, those receiving compassionate pensions, and the dependents of deceased veterans. With the hon. member for Royal, I feel the minister should give us a statement as to what is going to take place with regard to the pensioners in these groups.

We have the assurance of the government that at the next session of parliament war veterans allowances will be considered, that the case of those receiving war veterans allowances will be placed before a veterans committee, and that they will be given the same sympathetic consideration as was given to the pensioners affected by this measure. We hope the government will announce either that these groups will be taken care of at this session, or at least that their case will be presented to the war veterans committee at the next session.

There is also the matter of further increases in children's allowances. There is a very small increase in the present measure. Some will argue that because of the general payment of children's allowances in Canada, it was not necessary to increase the children's allowance under the present legislation. However, I would point out that in many cases, especially where the soldier did not return to Canada or where he has returned to Canada and is in hospital under treatment or is incapacitated, he is not in the same position to take care of his children as are some of us who were more fortunate. I think that the government should be liberal especially in their dealing with the children of war veterans. I have felt for a long time that that is one thing we have failed in with respect to our veterans legislation namely in making better educational provision for war veterans' children.

Mr. Lapointe: It is better than that anywhere else in the world.

Mr. Wright: The minister says that it is better than that anywhere else in the world. That may be so, but still I do not think it is as good as we could make it here in Canada. If there is one thing we should do, it is to see that every child of every veteran has the opportunity to receive in this country the maximum of education that he is able to use. We have a good educational system in this country, and I think that the opportunity for education should be given to the children of our veterans just as fully as it is possible for us to give it.

I should like to compliment the government on bringing in the legislation at this session. As I said before, I think the credit for its being brought in can largely be given to the war veterans organizations who so ably presented their case to the government on this matter.

Mr. G. A. Cruickshank (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, I shall be brief, but in order to keep the record clear, I should like to express one or two thoughts in this connection. I want to commend, in part at least, the fair manner in which the members of the opposition have brought the matter forward. I do not think that the bill, as it has been brought down at this session, goes as far as it should. But on the other hand, along with the hon. member who has just spoken and other hon. members opposite, I believe that the government, through the present minister, have gone a long way toward bringing about that which we in the veterans affairs committee wanted to be brought about on behalf of the veterans. Personally, I think that the War Veterans Allowance Act could be amended at this session with little difficulty. I believe that the compassionate pension could be amended with little difficulty this session. But on the other hand, Mr. Speaker, through you I should like to suggest to these hon. members that half a loaf is better than none. We have succeeded fairly well so far. I believe that at the next session we shall succeed in securing—

Mr. Brooks: We consider it as more than half a loaf.

Mr. Cruickshank: Yes, we consider it as more than half a loaf, as the hon. member for Royal (Mr. Brooks) has pointed out. Not being one of those who want to claim credit for anything, I will just say that I assisted in getting two-thirds of the loaf on behalf of the veteran.

Mr. Brooks: The hon. member is exceedingly modest.

Mr. Cruickshank: But through you, Mr. Speaker, I would say that the government have announced their policy. We voted on it. An amendment was moved by the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch). Before I came back here to Ottawa I expressed my views to my branches of the Legion and to the organizations within my branch, and I was supported throughout, unless it was a straight vote of confidence. I believe that the government have intimated, through the statement of the minister, that at the first of the next session we will have a committee set up. That is a matter of record.

It has also been intimated, as I understand it, that the war veterans allowance revisions, whatever they may be, will be made retroactive to January 1. If the hon. member for Royal will check up on the matter as recorded in Hansard, I think he will find that I was the first one to suggest that as to any exemption from income tax or otherwise of $1,000 on any income, the recipient of war veterans allowance should be treated in exactly the same manner as is the recipient of income of any other kind. If the hon. member will check the record, I think he will find that that is what I said. I think he will also find that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott), if he did not commit himself—although I think he did and I hope he did—at least intimated that he saw the matter in the same light, namely that a war veterans allowance recipient—and I think that was the argument the hon. member was bringing out a moment ago—should be treated in exactly the same way as any other income recipient. In order to expedite the matter, I personally am willing to give all credit even to the hon. member whom I think the most of in this house, with the exception of myself, namely the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) or to anybody for getting the legislation, as long as we get it on behalf of the veteran. Let us pass the bill as it is and get on with our legislation. I still believe that the government should bring down, during this session, legislation affecting recipients of the war veterans allowance. Mr. Speaker, through you I appeal to my good friend the hon. member for Royal and all the other hon. members. Let us try to do something for the veterans without trying in this connection—and I will try some other time—to do something for ourselves, and let us bring down this act immediately.

Mr. Brooks: I think the hon. member might explain his last statement. I do not know what he means by "doing something for ourselves". I certainly have not tried to do anything for myself, and I am sure the hon. member does not mean to imply that.

Mr. Cruickshank: Mr. Speaker, on previous occasions I think I made myself clear as to the respect and admiration I have for the work the hon. member for Royal has done on behalf of the veterans. I think I showed my consideration in voting for a certain amendment moved by him. I think the hon. member will agree with that statement. Let him be just as fair with me.

Mr. Brooks: I am not criticizing the hon. member at all. I just do not want any misunderstanding about what he means.

Mr. Cruickshank: I say to the hon. member: Just be as fair to me. I now suggest that, as far as veterans are concerned, all of us forget partisan politics and put this bill through as is.

Mr. Brooks: Mr. Speaker, I want to object to that last statement. If the hon. member is implying that I have introduced partisan politics into this debate, I think he should withdraw that statement because I have never, in any of my remarks, introduced or tried to introduce partisan politics. I am sure that the hon. member does not mean that, or else that he is grossly mistaken about it.

Mr. Cruickshank: I have not the time to look up Hansard now but, if I remember correctly, the other day the hon. member for Royal implied that the members of the veterans affairs committee on this side of the house were not in favour of bringing down the increase across the board at the last session. I have not the time in which to verify myself through Hansard, but I think he modified his statement by saying "with the exception of the hon. member for Fraser Valley." If he will check up on the matter, I think he will find that at that time I stated that at no time had I ever been instructed how to vote, and nobody is going to instruct me in this house.

Mr. Brooks: It was never suggested.

Mr. Cruickshank: I have never been asked or instructed to vote otherwise than according to my convictions. If the hon. member wanted to be fair in speaking about partisan politics, he should recall that I pointed out that I, at least, used my own judgment and I presumed other hon. members did too. I do appeal to the hon. member for Royal to let us forget partisan politics in so far as veterans affairs are concerned. I am not accusing him, either now or at any time, of adopting partisan politics. I am merely suggesting that we all, including myself, forget partisan politics and put this bill through in the next two minutes.

Mr. Robert Fair (Battle River): The hon. member who has just spoken has already made three speeches, yet he wants to have this bill put through in the next two minutes; that would not be fair. As the only member in the house who can be Fair to everybody, I want to say a few words. Bill No. 27 is one piece of legislation which need not take up much time of the house. I have personally expressed my gratitude to the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Lapointe), but I want to take advantage of this occasion to express my appreciation to the minister and the government for introducing this bill. When the speech from the throne was read, many of us did not expect this legislation would be introduced this session. I am glad that the veterans organizations, as well as the veterans in this house, have been insistent enough in their demands to have the government bring down this legislation. I feel that they realize this legislation was necessary, and I hope that before the end of the session another piece of legislation which many of us have advocated on other occasions will also be brought down. I am not mentioning any names, but the minister knows quite well to what I am referring. Then he will make the members of the house, and those to whom I refer, very happy at Christmas.

As I have stated on former occasions, we shall have many cold, stormy days before the committee which has been promised us for next session will have an opportunity of dealing with this matter. The question of dependent parents has been raised, and I do not see any provision in the legislation for dealing with that. Before this bill is finally passed I should like to have the minister introduce something which would take care of those people. In many cases, these servicemen have been the sole means of keeping their parents on a decent standard of living. Since they have given everything on the battlefield, I feel it is our duty now to see that their parents are properly cared for.

If there are in the act any weak spots which prevent the pension commission from doing the job as they would like to do it, I would suggest that those weak spots be remedied. Personally, I cannot pick out those weak spots now, but if they should show up then I hope no time will be lost in having those deficiencies repaired, so that the pension commission can give justice to those people in Canada who are entitled to it. Once again I shall ask the Minister of Veterans Affairs to give consideration to that other little group about whom I have spoken.

Mr. George H. Hees (Broadview): I should like to associate myself with the remarks made by the hon. members for Royal (Mr. Brooks) and Melfort (Mr. Wright), both of whom spoke on behalf of the dependent mothers and fathers of those who were killed in battle. I believe that these dependent parents are faced with the same rise in the cost of living as disabled war veterans and war veterans widows. I believe that their case is just as deserving of consideration. I should like to appeal to the government to have the pensions of these dependent mothers and fathers increased by the same percentage as the other pensions dealt with in this bill.

On this occasion I should like also to appeal again on behalf of those who receive war veterans allowance. I believe that theirs is a very deserving case, and should be dealt with at this session. If it is not dealt with until the next session, I earnestly request the government to make sure that whatever is done for those pensioners is made retroactive to January. I hope that whatever is done for them will be as generous as the provisions contained in this bill.

Mr. Clarence Gillis (Cape Breton South): I am not going to repeat anything that has been said already concerning the principle of this bill. I have said about everything I can say, and I believe every other hon. member has too, when speaking on the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch). I should like to make two points in connection with the Pension Act itself.

The older members of the veterans affairs committee will recall that up to about 1942 the Pension Act contained a provision whereby it was necessary to go back into the family history of an applicant for pension to determine his eligibility. Often the pension was refused on the ground that the disability suffered was of congenital origin. Previous to entering the service, his grandfather had handed him this particular weakness. The question of congenital origin was a bone of contention over the years. About 1941 or 1942 when the act was opened to take in world war II veterans, this provision was discussed at some length. It was decided then to remove from the act the provision concerning congenital disability.

While the wording of that particular formula was removed from the act, my impression is that the results of it are still being felt. Now instead of refusing a pension upon the ground that the disability was of congenital origin, it is termed a pre-enlistment disability. I think there is a large number of cases across this country where a man came back from the service and then broke down. Many of them are psychopathic cases. They are ruled ineligible for pension on the ground that the break-down was of pre-enlistment origin. I believe it is necessary for the commission and its advisers to sit down and take a serious look at that particular situation. We must remember, too, the figures that were put on the record of this house which show that 25 per cent of the men discharged from the service for medical reasons were those who were considered to have psychopathic disabilities—in other words, nervous break-downs. I do not think we are being fair when we refuse a pension to that type of case, and for this reason. If a boy is taken into the service he is examined by the medical men who attempt to discover, in so far as it is possible, whether or not that boy is fit for service. There are hundreds of men taken into military service who never should have been taken into the service. If they had not been taken into the service and subjected to the rigours of war they would have remained at home in civilian occupations and perhaps led a normal life. They were never constitutionally suited to engage in the kind of combat that one goes through today, such as Korea, Italy and other places where we have recently been engaged in a war.

I know that I receive many cases and many hon. members receive them as well. The point I want to make, for the benefit of the commission, is that I do not think a person who is affected by the decision that his disability is of pre-enlistment origin is getting the benefit of the doubt established by the act. I say that because much of the evidence I have read, where pension was refused, showed, in my judgment, that they were borderline cases. In some instances the summary of the evidence actually stated that the disability was of indefinite origin. There certainly was a doubt there, but in the few cases that I have read the benefit of the doubt was not given to the applicant.

I believe that a section of the commission at least should be set up to examine the number of cases of that type that exist, or that are in the process of having a decision made, or that have been refused, and to ascertain whether a more practical approach to the problem can be made. Whether a man is shot with a bullet or comes back with a nervous break-down, or has some other disability arising from a weakness that he may have had before being taken into the service, it must certainly be considered as a war disability, because if he had not gone in and been subjected to the type of thing he had to go through there is a possibility that that disability would never have appeared. I myself believe that in cases of that kind the examinations that the man received on going into the service were not adequate. If it can be ascertained after four years of service that a man had some weakness that brought on the disability because of his service, then it must have been known before he went in; otherwise some other decision would have been made.

Anyone who is watching enlistments today, and the large numbers that are being routed back out of the service after two or three months, can certainly form no other conclusion than that there is something wrong with the type of examination that the service personnel are getting when they go into the service today. The minister shakes his head. Well, I am going to give my own experience.

Mr. Lapointe: I did not shake my head. I said it was not the responsibility of veterans affairs, under which this bill comes.

Mr. Gillis: This bill has to do with disability pensions. I am talking about the establishment of a pension under this bill. I am talking about the boy who is taken into the service, and who is a potential pensioner. If he is not the kind of person, or if he has not a constitution that can stand up to service, but breaks down, then he should not have gone into the service. That is the root cause of a large number of cases that cannot be related to service. They break down for some other reason than being hit by a shell. You have to start at the root cause of that type of thing, and the root cause is taking into the service young men who have not the constitution to stand up to military service.

I said there was something wrong with the type of examination they were getting. We have been in this Korean thing only a short time, a year or so, but I am amazed at the large number of boys who come to me when I am home or write to me when I am here and say: "I was in the service for two or three months. When I went into the service I was declared fit, and I am out of the service now after two months, and I am declared medically unfit." That boy thinks he is entitled to a pension because if a doctor certified him fit three months ago, and another doctor certified that he was unfit three months later, something must have happened to him, he thinks, in between.

Mr. Low: That is reasonable.

Mr. Gillis: Within the last year or so, there has been a lot of that, more than I have ever seen before.

The government has gone to a lot of expense. They take that boy, give him a medical examination, transport him across the country and put him in a camp. Then they have to go through all the mechanics of discharging him again, sending him back to his home, rehabilitating him and finding some employment for him. A lot of money has been spent to no end. If he is a little tougher and gets overseas and then comes back with a disability, it is said to be of pre-enlistment origin. We get a lot of difficulties in cases of that kind because we did not take care of the problem where we should have taken care of it.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Do they ever hold a court of inquiry on the medical boards?

Mr. Gillis: I do not imagine so. I imagine that much of the difficulty today is in finding doctors who are willing to work for the money that is paid by the Department of National Defence. I have noticed items in the press where the Department of Veterans Affairs were bringing in doctors from the old country. I know that in my end of the country where enlistments are heavy, perhaps heavier than in any other part of the country, there is no regular medical board as such. The boys are gathered up in groups of twenty or thirty and taken to some ordinary practitioner, and he provides the medical examination.

I am saying all this for the benefit of the record, so that some of the experts in the minister's department will sit down, read it and give some attention to it, and later on try to iron out the difficulties that exist with respect to the question of pre-enlistment origin. We cut it out of the act either in the latter part of 1942 or early in 1942. We cut it out where the decision used to be made that the disability was of congenital origin.

The second point I want to make has to do with the question of administration. The benefit of all legislation is determined by the way it is administered. Over the years the Department of Veterans Affairs built up from coast to coast an excellent administrative organization. It took many years to build that up. I am speaking now of my own end of the country with which I am familiar. The veterans and the administration of veterans affairs had a very happy relationship, and in my opinion that is one thing that we should be very careful not to disturb. There was a fraternity built up there and mutual respect for one another. Within the last few months the department has changed its administrative set-up. In a district like Halifax, for example, you have the district administrator who was there for many many years and who knew practically all the veterans in his area personally and was familiar with all the branches through the secretaries. It was like a large happy family. The act of course determined the extent to which assistance could be given, but there was respect there; there was no questioning a decision made by a man like Tom Fenton, for example, of Camp Hill hospital. The boys knew, if they wanted something done and Tom Fenton said it could not be done, that was the end of it. Within recent months the department considered that it would be good economy to set up one administrative district for the whole of the maritimes, and we are going to superimpose on the district administration a super-administrator, and from now on that one man is going to have the authority and the responsibility of determining all matters of importance that have to do with the administration of veterans affairs generally. I do not think that is a good development. I think the decentralized administration as between province and province was the proper set-up. It brought the veteran closer to the man who made the major decisions.

When one man is administering Newfoundland, Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick he is placed in a fairly dictatorial position and he is removed completely from personal contact with the men. It is changing an organization that has been in existence for twenty-five years and which established mutual respect as between man and man. This man is going to be looked upon as a super-dictator and the confidence built up over the years is going to be destroyed.

During the two months when I was home before this session opened I was met by representatives of about thirty branches who told me in no uncertain terms that they protested vigorously this administrative change. I am sure the minister has received many telegrams from the Legion in Nova Scotia protesting this change. After twenty-five or thirty years' experience in the Legion dealing with the Pension Act and other matters from the bottom, I agree that this particular move is wrong. This centralization removes the personal contact that existed. I do not think any money is going to be saved and it will create headaches that were not in existence in the past.

The change is made and I understand we are to have this type of administration across the country. The country is being broken up into these super-administrative districts. I am simply telling the minister what the representatives of the branches told me in no uncertain terms a couple of months ago when they called me in to hear the views of the rank and file of the Legion. That is all I have to say on the subject. I have made my opinion known with regard to these changes. We regret the fact that the War Veterans Allowance Act is not being amended at this session, but the house has voted on it and we bow to the will of the house.

The minister is a young fellow and I am simply trying to give him some grandfatherly advice from my own experience. I have no ulterior motive; I merely want to help him. I believe the provisions of the act with regard to borderline cases are too tight. There is no flexibility in the administration. If we are going to solve this problem of pre-enlistment disability we will have to do something more. If a disability is said to be pre-enlistment, it must have been known when the man came in and he should not have been taken.

These problems of administration can be handled by the minister from day to day. I can assure him that the administration that was in existence previously in Nova Scotia made everyone happy. There was not much fault found with it over the years. We must realize that there are no supermen, and the closer you can get to the people in administering any legislation the better your administration is going to be.

Another suggestion I would make is that some of the field workers be made permanent. I know that in the end of the country from which I come they are all on a temporary basis. They do not know whether their jobs are going to continue or where they can fit themselves into the organization. It might not be a bad idea to make some of them permanent; I think this would add strength to the administration.

Mr. Speaker: Before there is any further discussion on this bill I should like to remind the house that it deals with one aspect only of the Pension Act, namely the increase in the disability pension. It is a well-established rule of this house that when an amending bill is before the house the main act cannot be discussed. I have not called any hon. members to order, but I thought the house would like to know just what is the rule.

Mr. J. A. Ross (Souris): Mr. Speaker, I should like to join with others in congratulating the Canadian Legion, and national council and other organizations upon the splendid fight they have made on this matter. They made a splendid presentation in May, 1950, but there was nothing for veterans on the agenda at the beginning of this session. Something is being done as a result of the continued fight put up by these people and by members in various quarters of this house. I am sure all hon. members are happy to have this legislation before us at this time. While it does not meet entirely our wishes as to what should be done, it is a move in the right direction.

I should have liked to see the department go further than they have. Until you put us straight, I had intended to say something more. However, there is one point which I think hinges pretty closely on this matter. If a basic rate has not been established no increase will be paid. I feel keenly about a number of applications now before the commission, similar to those referred to by the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis). Many young men who saw service in the last war now find themselves in a rather nervous condition. They were not wounded but in my opinion their condition was brought on by their service. I should like the commissioners to see their way clear to give the benefit of the doubt to these cases.

Another matter referred to is that of co-operation between departments. Lack of this co-operation is costing the country a considerable amount of money. Another matter I should like to refer to is that of dependent parents. These pensions are a matter of discretion on the part of the commissioners rather than of right. I should like to see something placed in the act to deal with this problem.

I did not speak on the amendment, but I must say that that is one case where we are very disappointed. However, we have been assured that this matter will be dealt with at the next session. There are many needy cases which could be taken care of under this other legislation. I just wanted to say these few words at this time and express the hope that the matter about which we are so disappointed will be taken up in the not too distant future.

Mr. W. G. Blair (Lanark): Mr. Speaker, I was interested in the remarks of the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) in regard to pre-enlistment disabilities. Before I deal further with that matter I want to say that I am glad and proud that this increase is being made in disability pensions. I hope that in the future the war veterans allowances will also be increased.

It is quite easy to talk about pre-enlistment disabilities, but they are most difficult to deal with. I can remember when early in the first war men with certain types of disability were taken into the service. It is true that they were earmarked for forestry, labour or railroad troops, but nevertheless they were taken into the Canadian army. Sometimes their disabilities were marked down on their history sheets, and sometimes not, but the fact is that those disabilities did exist. We have these conditions among railroad troops. Sometimes men are transferred from active work in the infantry to one of the labour troops. Take, for instance, a man with a hernia or a man with a heart condition. Then trouble would start because these men were put into certain classifications and found themselves in the wrong position. It was ridiculous to send a man with a heart condition to the railroad troops where he would be working in the mud or lugging heavy ties. Aware of their condition, these people asked for pensions afterwards, and it made proper administration difficult. These men were always going sick. They realized they had disabilities, and when they came back it was a difficult problem to deal with such cases.

That brings me to the matter raised by the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis). It is not very easy to find these disabilities once men have enlisted. Sometimes they break down under training and one becomes aware of the disability. I think these men have received good examinations. They have been properly examined by competent officers in the army. They have had their chests X-rayed and have passed certain standards, but you come to this point. Any person who has had any experience will know that sometimes you get a young chap who has been employed in a sedentary occupation. You may have some doubts and classify his general physique as being borderline. Nevertheless during the next few months when he is under training his physique will improve and he will develop under outdoor exercise, regular hours, and so on. Correspondingly, another man may break down. It is not very easy. It is easy to criticize the doctors who make the examinations but you do not know when a man is going to break down under training.

That brings up the question of those people who become psychoneurotic after they have been through a period of warfare. This is also a difficult matter because there is no standard whereby you can properly make a decision whether a man is temperamentally fit to be a soldier. You can be very easily deluded in the examination of such people. Therefore you have certain people breaking down under these conditions, and it becomes a difficult matter for pension administration. Sometimes I feel, as does the hon. member, that these people were taken into the army as physically fit to all intents and purposes, but deep down they were not temperamentally fit to become soldiers. They could not take a certain amount of what the soldier has to go through.

Having admitted that, the question then arises whether or not these people are pensionable. They did break down under warfare. Prior to enlistment they carried on in the world in a normal way. Some place in ensuing legislation we must go into that matter and make a proper decision as to what we are going to do with these people. They have a disability. I am reminded of one or two cases I have had in the last two or three months. I had one referred to me the other day, the case of a boy who enlisted perfectly fit and served for five and a half years. He missed nothing, but now he has had a nervous break-down. There is nothing on his history sheet, and I do not think he ever paraded sick, but just the same he is disabled. He has a wife and two children and he is in that position. I feel that Canada should look after that man because of his five and a half years' service.

I think of some of these borderline cases. I think of one case where a man was gassed in the first gas attack in 1915. He was sent to hospital and developed a heart condition from which he never recovered. His file is full of specialists' reports. He was never able to carry on and received about a 35 per cent pension which varied up and down. He was finally taken sick with his heart condition and was sent to the military hospital. His pension was for valvular disease of the heart but he proceeded to die from a coronary condition. I do not blame the pension board. At the present time coronary conditions are pensioned for aggravation. However, I felt that it was a case of splitting hairs, and again I do not blame the pension board. They could not do anything else. The man received his heart disability at the second battle of Ypres and he died of a heart disability. No person has yet told us fully in a medical sense the causes of coronary thrombosis, but yet this man died of it. His widow does not receive a pension.

As the hon. member for Cape Breton South has said, these are some of the things that we have to clean up. With respect to the case I have just mentioned, I feel that such a heart condition should be pensionable but under existing legislation the man can only receive a certain amount for aggravation.

However, he is dead, and as he was not a 50 per cent pensioner his wife receives nothing although she spent the best years of her life looking after this man when he was an invalid. Therefore we have to make a decision about such cases, and I agree with the hon. member for Cape Breton South that we might very well review some of these cases to see if we cannot in some way do something for them. They enlisted as fit men; at least there were no apparent disabilities. They carried on, in some cases throughout the war, have become markedly disabled, and in some instances have died. Therefore I feel that when the next veterans affairs committee is appointed we should review some of these cases.

Under the existing legislation there is nothing further we can do about them, but they are deserving cases. With regard to the young man who had five and a half years' service and now has a nervous break-down, I feel there cannot be any other answer but that it was due to his war service and is a war disability. There is nothing on his history sheet. He was absolutely fit when he enlisted. Again I should like to say that I think this is an excellent piece of legislation but we must not forget the war veterans allowance recipients—and I may be out of order in discussing this for a minute.

Mr. Speaker: I think the discussion recently has been a considerably long way from the bill. I am fearful if the house allows a general discussion to continue that it may be some time before we get to the principle of the bill, which deals with an increase in the pension. I am in the hands of the house. If the house, notwithstanding the rules, favours having a general discussion then I will abide by the wishes of the house, but otherwise I think the discussion should now be relevant to the bill.

Mr. Blair: I was going to say that the older group are also disabled and should receive consideration. I will put it that way. I had just about finished speaking, Mr. Speaker, when you rose.

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a few remarks with regard to three different questions having to do with this bill. In the first place, as has been mentioned by the hon. member for Royal (Mr. Brooks), there are certain pensions the amount of which is not definitely stipulated in the Pension Act. Discretion is given to the commission to pay whatever amount may be deemed proper. I have in mind, for example, the pension paid under section 21, and also the pensions payable to dependent parents. Section 21 reads as follows:

> The commission may, on special application in that behalf, grant a compassionate pension, allowance or supplementary award in any case which it considers to be specially meritorious, but in which the commission has decided that the applicant is otherwise unqualified to receive such an award or supplementary award under this act.
> (2) The amount of any compassionate pension, allowance or supplementary award granted under this section shall be such sum as the commission shall fix, but not exceeding the amount to which the applicant would have been entitled if his entire claim to payment had been upheld.

That section has been used, for example, in the case of veterans who were decorated for bravery under fire. They have not been able to establish a claim for pension; but because they had this specially meritorious service they have been granted pension under section 21. It has also been used in the case of widows of veterans who had specially meritorious service. I know a pension was granted to the widow of my own company commander, under this particular section.

It has always been understood that the amount of the pension would be practically the same as a pension paid as of right. Even though there is this discretion given to the commission, I repeat, it has always been the understanding that these meritorious service pensions would be just as large, or just about as large, as pensions paid as of right. When we had a special committee on veterans affairs in 1948 this question was thoroughly aired. Some of us said to the minister and to the chairman of the Canadian pension commission, "What are you going to do about these pensions under section 21?" We were given the assurance that every file for a pension of that kind would be reviewed just as quickly as possible, and adjustments made in the amount of the pensions, so that these recipients would get the benefit of the increase being given to the pensioners who were paid under the schedule in the act.

Mr. Mutch: Was not the assurance that they would be reviewed so that that might be done? I do not think there was a commitment that they would be.

Mr. Green: I do not remember whether there was a definite commitment that in every case there would be an increase. But we did have the commitment that the files would be reviewed at once; and I understood that in practically every case there would be an increase similar to the increase being made in the statutory amount of the pension.

When the minister closes the debate today I would ask him to give us the assurance that a similar practice will be followed in respect of the increases contained in this bill. I think, too, that the same practice should be adopted with respect to dependent parents. Here parliament is granting an increase in the pension. Let us carry out the intent in full by increasing also the pensions which are in the discretion of the commission.

In this connection I would point out also that in schedule B of the bill a distinction has now been made between the rate payable to a widow and that payable to a dependent parent of a veteran who has died. For some reason or other there is no increase in the amount which may be paid to a dependent parent. The amount to a widow is increased from $900 to $1,200.

My second point is on behalf of the small pensioners. There are many small pensioners who will not receive any increase in money as a result of the passage of this bill, because as their pension goes up their war veterans allowance goes down. In this way the money in pocket will remain exactly the same, and those particular pensioners will receive no benefit.

The minister has said that at the next session a committee will be set up and that war veterans allowances will then be dealt with, and that if there is an increase it could be made retroactive. Of course that would help these small pensioners. But they are faced with a hard winter. They would get no increase until next April or May, and a retroactive payment made at that time is not of very much use to a veteran who is trying to get along this winter on $40.41—it could be up to $50—part of which would be pension and part war veterans allowance.

These small pensioners will suffer during the coming winter, and I would hope the minister would take some steps to meet that situation, particularly as he has promised retroactive legislation next spring. When the bill reaches committee I intend to move that there be added as subsection 1 (a) the following:

> An increase in pension paid to any person by virtue of section 1 shall not be included as income for the purposes of the War Veterans Allowance Act, 1946.

I am telling the minister about that at this time, so that he may give it some consideration while debate is in progress.

In 1948 a special committee on veterans affairs was set up. At that time there was an increase in the amount of pensions. We find it set out in chapter 23 of the statutes of 1948. New schedules A and B were added just as in the present instance. A provision was made in 1948 to make the increase in pension retroactive for a certain period. It was made retroactive to October 1, 1947, and the provision was written into the bill that retroactive payment of pensions should not be taken into account for purposes of war veterans allowances. This will be found in section 18 of the 1948 amendment, which reads as follows:

> 18 (1) Schedules A and B to the said act—

That is the Pension Act; and incidentally, this reads very much like the bill now before the house.

> —as amended by sections thirty-one of chapter thirty-eight of the statutes of 1928 and twenty-three of chapter twenty-three of the statutes of 1941, are repealed and schedules A and B to this act are respectively substituted therefor.

That brought in the increases in the new schedule. Then the section continued:

> (2) Section eight of this act and subsection one of this section shall be deemed to have come into force on the first day of October, nineteen hundred and forty-seven, except that the percentage of disability figures appearing immediately below the class designations 1 to 20 shall come into force on the first day of June, nineteen hundred and forty-eight.

Then subsection 3, the one which is particularly important in my submission, reads:

> An increase in pension paid to any person by virtue of this section in respect to any period prior to the day on which this act receives royal assent shall not be included.
> (a) as income for the purposes of the War Veterans Allowance Act, 1946.

There are two other clauses, (b) and (c), but they are not material to my submission. I admit that these provisions had to do with a retroactive payment of pension, but I go on to suggest to the minister that there is no reason why a similar provision could not be written into this bill to provide that the increase being granted in the pension shall not be taken into account for the purpose of the War Veterans Allowance Act. That would preserve the situation until the special committee could meet next session. It would protect the smaller pensioners over the winter; they would thus benefit by the increase granted under this bill, in that they would not lose a portion of their war veterans allowance. Unfortunately they will lose some of it unless some such provision is made.

When the committee reviews the whole matter at the next session, the legislation can be changed to meet the wishes of the members of the new committee. That is my second suggestion, that the suffering and hardship that is bound to be the lot of these small pensioners on war veterans allowance could be alleviated by writing some such provision as I have mentioned into this bill.

My third suggestion I know is not going to be very popular. At the beginning the Canadian pension schedule was set up on the basis that higher ranking officers received higher payments of pension. Rightly or wrongly, that was the plan adopted in 1919 or whenever the Pension Act was written into the statute books. There have been many complaints about that. I believe perhaps it might have been wiser not to have a distinction of that kind. However, it was written into the law, and it has been the law ever since. In 1948 when an increase in pension was granted, there was no increase to these senior officers. Mind you, it is not a very popular plea to have to make. The veterans organizations and hon. members of the house are all hesitant about saying anything about the senior officers, because they get more than the rest of the forces.

In 1948 pensions were increased, but these senior officers were left out. The same thing has been done in this bill. You do not read anything about that in the newspapers. You do not hear it mentioned in the house. Only a handful of men and widows are affected, and no one brings forward their position. I suggest that if this principle was right in the first place, this is not a very good time to start getting around it in a sort of secret way without anything being said. The only people who know anything about it are the senior officers, many of whom are getting along in years because they were older than the other members of the forces, and the widows of these same men who, in most cases, will be a great deal older than the widows of the men who were not in the higher ranks. I place that before the minister.

There has been some change in this system. Before 1948 all in the army up to and including the rank of lieutenant were on the same rate. In 1948 it was taken a little higher, and captains were put in. In 1951 they have included the majors. The major gets a little increase, but he does not get as great an increase as the captain and all lower ranks. No one above the rank of major or lieutenant-commander (naval) or squadron leader (air) gets any increase whatever. I believe that should be brought out into the open so we all know what is happening. Under all the conditions, I do not think it is fair that there should be no increase whatever given to these pensioners.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I always find it very interesting, Mr. Speaker, to listen to a discussion of matters affecting veterans in which the main participants are veterans. One always feels that these men bring to a discussion of such questions not only intense familiarity with the subject but a very real concern for their comrades of the various wars in which our country has been engaged. The result is that we have a most interesting discussion which, in the long run, results in the kind of advantage to our veterans that we all desire.

As has been said before, I believe it should be pointed out that it is not only the veterans in this house who are concerned that we do the right thing by our veterans; that is true of all of us. So it is that I welcome the opportunity of taking just a few minutes to say how pleased we all are that this bill is now before us. The day the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Lapointe) announced the provisions of this bill, it was my privilege to be the first to make a brief comment. As a matter of fact the comment had two points, both of which I feel to be quite important. On the one hand I characterized the announcement of the increases being provided in the disability pension as most welcome. On the other hand I expressed the hope that it would not be long until we might have a similar announcement with respect to war veterans allowances.

I do not need to take up much time, because most of the matters connected with the legislation before us now have been amply discussed by those who preceded me. But I do want to support most strongly the arguments that have been put forward by almost all those who have been on their feet concerning the case of the dependent parents. It does seem to me that their plight should be considered at this time. As the hon. member for Melfort (Mr. Wright) pointed out, they will not be considered when the War Veterans Allowance Act is dealt with at the next session of parliament by the special committee because they do not come under that act. If dependent parents qualify anywhere, they qualify under the Pension Act which is being amended at this time; and I am still hoping that the representations which have been made to the minister since his announcement on November 16 will result in his telling us, when we get into committee of the whole, that he is prepared to accede to those representations.

We now have the bill before us; and on looking at it, particularly at schedule B, I find that the minister has had to go out of his way to avoid giving this increase to dependent parents. Schedule B to the act as it now stands—and I am looking at it as it appears at the end of chapter 23 of the statutes of 1941—has just one column headed "Widow or dependent parent". It is true that each of the figures in that column is preceded by an asterisk which draws attention to the note at the end of the schedule which reads as follows:

Pensions awarded to parents or brothers and sisters may be less than these amounts in accordance with the provisions of this act.

In other words that note makes it clear that although the amounts of pension for a widow or dependent parent appear in the same column with the amount as that for a widow in schedule B to the act as it now stands, in the case of the widow the amount is mandatory but in the case of dependent parents that amount is a maximum which it is within the power of the commission to award.

In the bill now before us we find that instead of just increasing the figures for the first two groups, from $900 a year for the first group and $1,008 a year for the second group, up to $1,200 a year or $100 a month in both cases, the government has separated what was in one column and put it into two columns. To me it looks as though the only reason the separation into two columns had to be made was that only in that way could the government deny to the dependent parents the increase being granted to widows of veterans where the disability pension is 50 per cent or more.

When we get into committee and get to the consideration of schedule B, I hope the minister will consider doing away with the second vertical column in that schedule and putting widows and dependent parents again in the one column, thus awarding to dependent parents the same possible increase that is being awarded on a mandatory basis to widows of disabled veterans. It seems to me there is no real argument against doing this. The representations for it made from all sides of the house have been most earnest and by way of sincere pleading on our part. I hope this matter will be dealt with today. As I have already said, if it is not dealt with today it seems to me these people are going to lose out in the shuffle, because they will not come in for consideration when the War Veterans Allowance Act is dealt with at the next session.

I want to say also that it seems to me the minister, when we get into committee, should give consideration to the matter drawn to his attention first by the hon. member for Royal (Mr. Brooks) and more recently by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green), namely that in the act of 1948 there was a special clause providing that over a certain period of time increases provided by that act were not to be regarded as income for the purposes of the War Veterans Allowance Act. In other words the very request we made when we were at the resolution stage of this bill, that something like that be done, has a precedent. When, at the resolution stage, it was suggested that this should be done, the minister or his parliamentary assistant—one or the other of them, or perhaps both—suggested that this was a matter to be dealt with under the War Veterans Allowance Act. Here we have a precedent indicating that it can be done in the Pension Act itself.

I can foresee a difficulty if a private member should seek to move the kind of amendment the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra has suggested. But at any rate, when he presents it in committee I hope the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Lapointe) will not start looking around for ways to argue that it is out of order; I hope rather that he will ask the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra to send the amendment across to him so he may have one of his ministerial colleagues move it. It seems to me we should make sure that the increases provided by this most acceptable bill which is now before us will not result in some veterans getting an increase in their disability pensions but suffering a reduction by the same amount in their war veterans allowances.

There are obviously many other matters that arise in relation to this bill, in view of the wide scope of the discussion this afternoon, but I shall confine my suggestions to those two points which I hope will be given earnest consideration by the minister when we get into committee on this bill.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to speak on this motion for second reading, as I made my remarks at the resolution stage; but in view of some remarks made by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra I feel that I must express my opinion on his suggestion. First of all I re-emphasize my opinion as to the defects of this bill: the failure to increase the provision for the children of pensioners to equal the amount being given the pensioners; the failure to make extra provision for dependent parents; and the failure to make certain that those who receive meritorious pensions or those who receive them on compassionate grounds shall receive the necessary extra consideration.

I greatly admire the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra. He often presents fearlessly an unpopular point of view in this house. I think he was quite correct when he said it was unpopular to suggest that the higher ranks should retain their higher ratings in pension and so on. He made some complaint that in the last amendment of the bill the schedules were amended so that those up to the rank of captain received the same rate of pension as other ranks, and in this bill it now includes up to the rank of major. I must support the government's action in this respect, because in Canada I think we live under different conditions from those upon which those first pension principles were based. The theory that the higher ranks require considerably higher pensions than do the lower or other ranks is based on the theory that those who receive commissions in his majesty's armed forces come from what were formerly termed as the upper classes, and that when they were retired from the army they had a certain above average standard of living to maintain. I maintain that those conditions do not exist in Canada and therefore we should not continue to follow a practice that was established under conditions that existed one hundred years ago in Great Britain. To illustrate my point, may I say that I had a former colonel and two former majors working on my farm on the same day, and I am sure they were quite willing to be considered as ordinary Canadians, returning from service to civilian life.

I have also heard this question discussed at Legion meetings. What the government is doing in gradually equalizing pensions as between the higher ranks and the other ranks receives the support of the great majority of veterans in this country and the great majority of the Canadian people. The opposition groups in this house advocated an increase in the basic rate of pension to compensate pensioners for the increased cost of living. We did not ask for an increase in the basic rate of pension for certain groups to maintain a higher than average standard of living. Therefore we in this group heartily commend the government on this further step in equalizing the basic rate of disability pensions, and in so doing showing a good understanding of the thinking of the Canadian people on this question.

Mr. Gordon Graydon (Peel): I should like to contribute an observation or two on this motion for second reading. Those hon. members who have sat in during the last few months with branches of the Legion and other veterans organizations were particularly impressed by the sane and responsible approach which these organizations have been making to the government, both before the committee which sat during the last session and in the intervening period when the representations were made direct to the government itself.

There is one thing about veterans legislation that distinguishes it from all others. The government need not fear any revulsion of opinion on the part of the public generally to reasonable and fair dealing in favour of the veterans in these measures. In my opinion the general public is always prepared in veterans legislation to go further than even the government or parliament sometimes suggests. In some instances the government may be somewhat reluctant to introduce measures which may have some unfavourable public reaction. but there is one thing about veterans legislation; the government need never fear an unfavourable public reaction to it.

One of the things that make parliament a great institution is the fact that on the question of veterans affairs there is great unanimity on all sides of the house. I think that is a reflection of the feeling of the people generally. I have always felt it was a good thing that years after the end of two great wars there is still an intense desire on the part of the Canadian people to do the right thing for those who served and contributed so much to our democratic stability and survival in the years that have gone by.

I wanted to raise my voice this afternoon to endorse the suggestions which have been made by several hon. members in this debate, without attempting to repeat those proposals in detail. It is not too late for the minister to give serious consideration to the proposals which have been made, because in the brief that was submitted to the committee last session and the numberless representations that have been made since to parliament and the government it seemed to me those veterans organizations adopted an attitude which can hardly be ignored by the department. The attitude was sane, reasonable and fair, and the claims they made were not extravagant.

I am hopeful that when the minister introduces a measure such as this, which I may say to him has received a most welcome response from all quarters, both civilian and service, he will be encouraged by what he has heard in the House of Commons and in the representations from elsewhere to go further and reconsider some of the suggestions which have been made in this debate and on previous occasions, and at the same time see to it that in some way the war veterans allowance—which I am not supposed to speak of on this occasion— is increased to take care of the increased cost of living that bears so heavily on the recipients of the war veterans allowance and other pensioners who are not mentioned in this legislation.

I do want to impress upon the minister with every bit of conviction at my command the necessity of taking a generous attitude, as has been proposed by a number of hon. members and by persons outside the house. If he does so he will find that his legislation, if it follows along the lines suggested, will receive an even greater and more enthusiastic welcome from the Canadian people than this bill has. I want to say to the minister that I personally am very grateful for the changes that have been made. They will be of great help to a great number of people who in my opinion who are the most deserving of all our Canadian citizens.

Mr. F. E. Lennard (Wentworth): In rising to speak for a moment on this bill, to avoid much needless repetition I wish to say that I support wholeheartedly the remarks made this afternoon by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). I have been very much disappointed because there has been no stepping up of the war veterans allowance this session. I would urge that at the earliest opportunity next session—not when it is half through or toward the end—this matter be gone into fully by, as has been suggested, the war veterans allowance committee, and also that full consideration be given to the widows and orphans who in many cases are certainly most deserving. Their cases are long overdue for consideration.

Mr. Victor Quelch (Acadia): When this matter was at the resolution stage I expressed my appreciation of the action of the government in bringing down this increase. I am sure the veterans across the country will very much appreciate this move. At that time I also drew the attention of the minister to what I considered to be some weaknesses in the legislation. However, at this time I rise to refer to a matter the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) brought up, namely the question of disabilities of pre-enlistment origin.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I thought the house agreed not to discuss questions other than those which are in the amending bill. As the hon. member for Acadia said, there was some discussion on the question which he proposes to discuss now. It is my impression the house decided that it would not further discuss questions outside the amending bill.

Mr. Quelch: I thought at the time you were referring to two references to the war veterans allowance, because this question will apply to the increase in the pension. I would like to draw your attention to the fact that members of two parties have referred to this matter, and it does seem to me that one member of this group should also be allowed to refer to the same matter.

Mr. Speaker: I think that seems fair. I am sure the house will agree.

[Mr. Graydon.]

Mr. Quelch: Our attitude on this matter has always been that a man's condition as recorded at his time of enlistment should be regarded as his true condition. Therefore no deduction should be made in the amount of the pension on the ground that the disability was of pre-enlistment origin. Veterans committees in the past have felt strongly on this matter; considerable discussion has taken place, and efforts have been made to remove what many felt was injustice to veterans who had served their country.

Many individual cases were investigated by the committee where veterans had been refused pensions, say in the case of stomach ulcers, on the ground that they were of pre-enlistment origin. It might be shown that at the time a man enlisted he admitted that he had indigestion, a tummyache, a bellyache or whatever you like to call it, and therefore it was ruled by the board that that condition existed before he enlisted. As a result he would be refused a pension, or receive only a pension for the aggravation of that condition.

It was the same with regard to tuberculosis. A soldier might admit on elistment that he had had periodic coughs, and it would be ruled that he had suffered from tuberculosis before he enlisted. There are other types of cases with which I am more familiar where men might have suffered accidents, perhaps five or ten years before enlistment. A man may have dropped a hammer or crowbar on his foot. For a time he would be unable to work, then would recover from his disability and go back to work. He would carry on for five or ten years and then enlist. After being three or four years in the army he might begin to have trouble with his foot; they would find it recorded that he had had an accident, and the ruling would be that his condition was pre-enlistment.

That is why we contend that the condition as recorded at the time of enlistment should be considered to be the true condition, unless its origin was within a few months of enlistment. After a man has served his country for two or three years under severe conditions it should not be claimed that such a condition existed prior to enlistment. Veterans committees on several occasions have tried to improve this situation. For instance, the act provided that no deductions could be made on account of disability of pre-enlistment origin unless it was wilfully concealed or recorded. The words "wilfully concealed" were struck out in the hope that the change would permit more veterans to become pensionable. I believe all those cases have been investigated, but I do not know how many have been awarded pensions or have had their pensions increased. We are still faced with the problem of the men whose condition is claimed to be of pre-enlistment origin.

Then we went into the benefit of the doubt clause. Members of the committee amended the clause because they felt that many veterans were not getting the full benefit of the doubt. I said at the time that I did not believe the amendment would bring about much improvement. I do not know whether there has been improvement as a result of that amendment, because we know there are many cases where the pension commission feel they have to rule that a condition was of pre-enlistment origin in order to carry out the act. I believe the officials of the pension commission and of the department bend over backward in carrying out the provisions of the act, but so long as the act is worded as it is they find it impossible to carry out its provisions and at the same time give many veterans a pension. It is necessary that we make further amendments to the Pension Act.

I hope that when the veterans committee is set up next year to deal with the War Veterans Allowance Act the terms of reference will be sufficiently wide to permit it to go into the Pension Act and deal with the question of disabilities of pre-enlistment conditions. There is a great deal of dissatisfaction among veterans on this count.

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I think this has been a model debate from the point of view of brevity and the thoroughness with which the subject has been discussed. I rise merely to join other hon. members who have supported the viewpoint expressed by the hon. member for Royal (Mr. Brooks) and the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) with regard to increases in pensions and in particular increases in the case of persons receiving small pensions at the moment.

What is being done by this legislation is to carry out the will of parliament and of the Canadian people. As a matter of fact increased pensions would have been passed a year or two years ago had the ministry brought this matter before parliament. Increases in pensions were being demanded by branches of the Legion everywhere in this country, and they would have received the support of parliament had the ministry seen fit to introduce the necessary amendments. One increase was given, but further increases would have been acceptable, not only to every member of parliament but to the Canadian people as a whole.

There are two matters I wish to refer to. The first is that the increase in pension should not be included as income for the purposes of the War Veterans Allowance Act, 1946. I think the arguments that have been advanced in support of that proposition are worthy of consideration. The minister would receive universal approbation if he followed out the suggestions that have been made by the two members to whom I have referred and the others who have followed their lead in that regard.

The second matter to which I should like to refer has to do with parents, in particular silver star mothers, and the allowances granted to them. I have found that the chairman of the pension board and those associated with him are most considerate and generous in their treatment of the cases brought to their attention, not only by dependent parents but by pensioners in general. However, misunderstandings do arise and I am afraid that too often the sections of the Pension Act are more restrictive than parliament intended them to be. Too many are being denied pensions because of the contention that their condition is of pre-enlistment origin.

The other matter to which I am referring has to do with allowances and pensions being paid to parents or persons in the place of parents. The pertinent section is section 33, subsection 5, which provides that a pension to any parent or person in the place of a parent shall be subject to review from time to time and shall be continued, increased, decreased or discontinued in accordance with the amount deemed necessary by the commission to provide maintenance for such person, but in no cose shall such pension exceed the amount of pension prescribed by the act. It would be a worthy action on the part of the minister and the government if they would agree that the amount of pension payable to parents and those in a similar position, in particular silver star mothers, should be increased to the extent being provided in the bill now before the house.

There are other matters one could discuss, but I am not going to detain the house. All I want to do is support the contention expressed by the hon. member for Royal (Mr. Brooks) in general and in particular by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) that the minister even now give consideration to action which will remove a source of deep dissatisfaction. Unless the suggestion is accepted the increases will have the effect of depriving some who are receiving war veterans allowance of at least a portion of their allowance. It is not going to be a costly change, and it will go a long way toward removing a cause of disaffection which will be intensified as the months go by and those in receipt of war veterans allowance begin to realize the effect of these increases. Parliament but carries out in the amendments to the Pension Act what Canadian people asked for long ago. I do not want to be one of those who by talking will do anything to delay bringing about a general increase in pensions which in my opinion should have been brought in a long while ago.

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I just wish to make one point. As I understand it the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Lapointe) has not taken the position that the question of an increase in allowance for those on war veterans allowances is an unfair suggestion. My understanding is that in effect he has said: "We are not going to deal with it at this session; we will deal with it next session". If that is correct, then it seems to me that is an intolerable position for him to take. He really says: "We are going to do this but we will just leave it over and let these boys get through the winter as best they can". Indeed somebody—it was not the minister or any representative of the minister—said to me this afternoon: "Oh, well, they will get along somehow; they can get unemployment relief". That seems to me an intolerable suggestion. Therefore I come to this point; that if I am correct, if this is something which is admitted in principle, if this is something which is going to be done, then it is an utterly intolerable position for the government to take to say they will just let these men stew in their own juice until some time next session. It really means, as far as I can see—

Mr. Lapointe: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order. It does occur to me that the hon. member is now discussing the War Veterans Allowance Act. Is the house ready for the question?

Mr. Green: Is the minister not making any statement?

Hon. Hugues Lapointe (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: If the minister speaks now he will close the debate.

Mr. Lapointe: In closing the debate I intend to follow the example of brevity given by hon. members today. I do not intend to follow their example on another matter, inasmuch as I do not intend to speak in such a way as to be out of order on the bill. Possibly the debate might have been somewhat briefer if some hon. members had debated the bill before them instead of introducing many other matters, interesting as they are, pertaining to veterans legislation. I am sorry the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) is not here. He always likes to give me fatherly advice—

Mr. Green: Grandfatherly.

Mr. Lapointe: —and I always respect it as such because I was brought up to believe in a certain deference toward what I might call advanced age. In other words, I was taught that regardless of whether or not the old man was right you never interrupted him at the dinner table. I did not call my hon. friend to order, but when we again have an opportunity of discussing the matters he raised today I shall be very glad to answer some of his points. So far as that is concerned, my remarks might also refer to the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Blair). There again we always find that his views on matters having a medical aspect are very interesting to the house, and I am not sure that in many instances I do not share them to some extent.

The point has been brought up by many hon. members that veterans receiving pensions under section 21 are not likely to benefit under this bill. As has been pointed out, however, the pension paid under this section of the act is one which is determined by the pension commission. It is not paid as of right, but the rate on which it is based may be the same as that of the disability pensioner who receives a pension under the act as a matter of entitlement. The last time increases were introduced in the Pension Act every pension paid, under section 21 for what is called meritorious service, either to the veteran himself or to the widow, was re-examined by the commission. I believe the assurance which the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) referred to as having been given in the committee at that time was that every one of these cases would be reviewed in the light of the new increases, and I am certainly happy to tell the house that this procedure will be followed again this time.

The same procedure will apply to pensions paid to dependent parents. There again these pensions are paid after a full investigation by the commission. I do not think it is necessary for me to give all the details of the procedure followed, but briefly when an application for payment is received the commission arranges for a pension visitor to call on the applicant. He submits a report containing full information as to the physical condition and economic circumstances of the applicant. Where there are unmarried children living with the parents who, in the opinion of the commission, should be earning sufficient to permit them to contribute to the support of such parent, section 33 (6) of the act provides that such child shall be deemed to be contributing not less than $10 per month for such support. This is the procedure that has been followed, and the cases of dependent parents will also be reviewed by the commission in the light of the increases that have been given. That of course will be done within the statutory limits. I might point out to hon. members, however, that while I do not know the exact number, I am informed that only a very small percentage at this time receive the full amount under the statute. This comes about as the result of investigations carried on by the commission. It might also be taken into account that of the slightly more than 11,000 dependent parents—that is, those who are receiving single pensions as fathers or as mothers, or where both parents are receiving them—over 5,000 will be qualifying under the old age security legislation after the first of January.

A further point has been mentioned by a number of members during the debate, when they have suggested that a section should be introduced into the bill so that increases made effective by this measure will not be considered as income for the purpose of war veterans allowances. The example was given of the procedure followed in 1948, when the last increases were brought forward. The bill introduced at that time stated that an increase in pension paid to any person by virtue of the section, in respect of any period prior to the day on which the act was to receive royal assent, was not to be included as income for the purpose of the War Veterans Allowance Act, 1946. The circumstances existing at that time which made necessary the introduction of that section were not the same as those existing today. It will be recalled that at that time the increases were voted by parliament after having been considered in the spring of the year—perhaps it was in June—by the parliamentary committee. It had been announced that these increases in the rates would be retroactive to October 1, 1947. So in order that the recipients of war veterans allowances who had received payments between October 1 and the date when the new increases became effective would not be considered as having received overpayment under the provisions of the War Veterans Allowance Act, and as a result have their payments reduced for a period of months, this section was introduced.

I am sure if hon. members who discussed the point this afternoon will refer to the report of the parliamentary committee of 1948, at which time the amendment was introduced—and while I may be mistaken I believe it was brought forward at the suggestion of the then chairman, who is now my parliamentary assistant—they will see that amendment was put in the act after it had been pointed out that, without it, the effect of the act would be to bring about overpayment to recipients of war veterans allowances. As I said before, under this measure the increases are to come into force on January 1. Whatever changes may be decided upon by the committee at the next session will be made retroactive to the first of January. So the situation which existed in 1948, and which made that section necessary, does not exist today.

I believe that is all I had intended to say at this time, with the exception of possibly adding a few words along the lines followed by other hon. members during the course of the debate, both on the resolution and on the bill.

Hon. members have said that the meritorious features of the legislation can be traced to the work of the veterans organizations in Canada. I would be the last to make any effort to deny the efficiency of the work done by those organizations, by the Canadian Legion on the one hand and the national council of veterans associations on the other. As Minister of Veterans Affairs it is my good fortune to administer a department which has to deal with a large section of the Canadian population. In so doing I have always been able to count on the co-operation and advice of the main bodies comprising this section of the veteran population. It is a relationship I have always appreciated, and one I hope will continue. Much has been said in the house on previous occasions with respect to legislation affecting veterans, legislation which has resulted from what I might describe as round-table conferences between these veteran groups and the department. I pay them this tribute today, and express the hope that this happy relationship may continue.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Dion in the chair.

On section 1—Schedules A and B.

Mr. Green: When the minister made his announcement on November 16, I believe it was, he said that the unemployability supplement would go out of use at the end of the present year. I should like to have him state what arrangements are to be made for the continued treatment of the veterans who have been able to qualify for this unemployability supplement. I believe provisions for that treatment are contained in class 5G of the regulations. Perhaps the minister will correct me if that is not the right class.

Mr. Lapointe: I believe that is correct.

Mr. Green: I should hope that these veterans would not lose their right of treatment because the unemployability supplement is being replaced by an increase in the pension. Unless some new regulation is brought in it would appear that they will lose those rights. Would the minister tell the committee what steps the department is taking to ensure that these veterans will retain such treatment rights.

Mr. Lapointe: I thought that at one stage I had made an announcement on this matter. I can assure my hon. friend that veterans who had qualified for treatment because they had become recipients of the unemployability supplement will continue to have this treatment.

Mr. Green: That hardly goes far enough, because there will be other veterans who, if the unemployability supplement had remained in effect, would have qualified for such treatment.

Mr. Lapointe: I do not know just what the wording of the regulation will be, but the general idea is that veterans who would have qualified had the supplement continued will get the treatment. I believe that is what I said the other day. I have not seen the wording of the regulation on which the officers of the department are working, but I am sure no one is going to lose any benefit of treatment which he had been receiving under the supplement.

Mr. Green: Or those who would have been able to qualify for the supplement in the future?

Mr. Lapointe: I am not sure about that.

Mr. Green: I believe, Mr. Chairman, that should be looked into, and I would hope that those who would have been able to qualify in the future for the unemployability supplement will be made eligible for this treatment.

Mr. Mutch: I believe it would be fair to suggest that neither the hon. gentleman who has just spoken nor any of the others who so bitterly attacked and eagerly demanded the removal of this supplement, at any time suggested that there was anything good in it. The hon. gentleman is not thanking us for having removed this unemployability supplement, but now he finds he wishes to preserve for posterity the benefits, if they were benefits, under that legislation. A little consistency might not be expected, but it would be called for in a situation of this sort.

Mr. Green: It is unfortunate that the hon. member for Fraser Valley is not here to remind the parliamentary assistant that partisan politics are supposed to be taboo in this debate.

Mr. Mutch: That is not partisan politics.

Mr. Green: The statement made by the parliamentary assistant is absolutely unfair, because we did say that the unemployability supplement should not be used as a measure to avoid increasing the pension. I do not want to go into that argument now because this is not the place to do it, but I am not withdrawing one word I said about that attempt to make the unemployability supplement take the place of a proper increase in the pension. What I am asking the minister about now is treatment benefits which were not contained in the unemployability supplement. These provisions for treatment were apart from the unemployability supplement, and I am asking if those treatment privileges are to be continued?

Mr. Lapointe: As I said before, they will be continued to those who have been recipients of unemployability supplements up to the first of January.

Mr. Green: What about those who receive the new old age pension? What will their treatment rights be?

Mr. Lapointe: What relationship is there?

Mr. Green: Are they to be given any treatment rights?

Mr. Lapointe: The fact that a veteran has reached the age of 70 and thereby qualifies for old age security payments does not mean that he gets entitlement to treatment in a veterans' hospital. By itself that would not be sufficient.

Mr. Green: The question is not quite as foolish as the minister thinks.

Mr. Lapointe: I did not think it was foolish. I wish my hon. friend would put his questions clearly so I could answer them.

Mr. Green: I shall try to put them clearly. There are veterans who have been on war veterans allowance who have been advised to go on old age pension when they reach 70 years of age. In some cases they are receiving a partial pension. What will their treatment rights be?

Mr. Lapointe: I have made an announcement in this house concerning that matter in answer to a question by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre. There has been no change in policy since that announcement some months ago.

Mr. Green: What was the policy then?

Mr. Lapointe: I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that this pertains to war veterans allowance and not to the Pension Act. I do not see why I should be called upon to repeat what I have said in the house, because it is not in order on this bill. Some of these men are receiving a small pension, but it is not by virtue of this small pension that they are getting the treatment.

Mr. Green: They are small pensioners who have been receiving in addition the war veterans allowance, and they have treatment benefits.

Mr. Lapointe: By virtue of the war veterans allowance.

Mr. Green: They are still getting a small pension, but if they are over 70 they are not getting the war veterans allowance but the old age pension. I should like to know whether they will have treatment benefits.

Mr. Lapointe: Those veterans who are receiving a small pension, to which is added war veterans allowance, and who are receiving treatment because they are recipients of war veterans allowance, are not affected by this bill. I am trying to explain to my hon. friend that their qualification for treatment comes from the fact that they are recipients of war veterans allowances.

Mr. Knowles: But they will still be entitled to that treatment?

Mr. Lapointe: We might as well continue to be out of order, and I shall repeat what I said some time ago, that those who would be recipients of war veterans allowance were it not for the fact that they qualified for old age security will qualify for treatment.

Mr. Knowles: I should like to have a few words with the minister on the question of dependent parents. There is no doubt, Mr. Chairman, that this is quite in order. Dependent parents are mentioned in schedule B, and we are now discussing section 1 which relates to schedules A and B. As I recall the statement of the minister when he closed the debate on second reading, the cases of pensioners who are drawing their pensions under section 21 of the Pension Act will be reviewed. I take it that the purpose of that review is to ascertain whether those pensions could be increased. It is also to be noted that the statutory ceiling on the amount that can be paid to pensioners under section 21 is increased by this act, because the statutory ceiling is the same as it would be if they qualified for a full claim as set out in schedule A.

The point I wish to make is that it seems to me it is an announcement of substance when the minister says that the cases of those drawing their pensions under section 21 will be reviewed. The ceiling has been increased, so there is a chance that the amount of pension those men are drawing may be increased. I hope that will be the case. Then the minister says that the same thing will be done with respect to those drawing pensions under section 33 of the act. He qualified his statement right away, as he had to, by saying that of course there is a statutory provision with regard to section 33. I am about to suggest that the same substance there was to the promise with regard to cases under section 21 does not obtain with respect to cases under section 33 because the ceiling on the amount the commission can award under section 33 is not being increased by this act. At the present time the ceiling on pensions paid under section 33 is $900 a year or $75 a month, as set out in schedule B in chapter 23 of the statutes of 1948. The ceiling in schedule B to the bill now before us is still the same $900 a year or $75 a month. To tell us that many of these cases—the dependent parents, dependent mothers and so on—are not now at the maximum does not, I submit, alter the fact that there is not as much hope that this review will produce increases of any substance as there was in the case of those that came under section 21.

As I listened to the minister, up to a point that was all that bothered me about his announcement, namely that the chances of much of an increase would not be great if you do not raise the ceiling. As I said when I was speaking on second reading, I do not see why the minister bothered to break into two columns what was formerly in one column. I think he should have kept the schedule as it was, and should have raised the figure for dependent parents just the same as he did for widows. But the minister went on this afternoon and said that some 5,000 of the people drawing pensions under section 33 of the act—that is, dependent parents drawing compassionate pensions—would qualify for old age security payments starting in January, 1952. Then I began to wonder what is going to be the result of this review concerning those under section 33. As to those under section 21, it may result in an increase. Is there any possibility that the review of those under section 33, once those 5,000 start to draw $40 old age security, will result in their pension under section 33 being reduced? I should like the minister to answer that latter question, and I should also like him to comment on why he troubled to divide one column into two in the schedule.

Mr. Lapointe: I might point out to my hon. friend that, as he knows quite well, under section 33 there is what you might call a means test. As I explained before, the commission has to take into consideration the degree of dependency, it has to look into the financial circumstances of the applicant and it has to consider all other sources of income of the applicant. That is why I mentioned this afternoon that it might be interesting to note that some 5,000 of these dependent pensioners will be receiving old age security. Under the act it is not a pension as of right, and the commission must take into consideration all these facts.

As to dividing schedule B of the act into three columns instead of two or two columns instead of one, I can assure my hon. friend that he is imputing to me motives which I never had. As a matter of fact, I may tell him this. Before any decision was made as to increases and what they would be, I personally suggested that in this schedule a separate column should be established for those pensions that were paid as of right and another column for those that were paid at the discretion of the commission. That has nothing to do with the present legislation.

Mr. Knowles: I will accept the minister's comment with regard to those columns although I would point out that as one looks at those two columns, the result is that, as to dependent parents, there is no increase for them. However, to come back to this other point, it seems to me that it gets worse as it goes on. Earlier in the game we were worried because dependent parents were not going to get any increase in the amount of their pensions under section 33 of the act. But now the minister has twice drawn attention to the fact that some 5,000 of these people will be drawing old age security as from January 1. He has also drawn attention to the fact that there is what he himself has called a means test in section 33. You have only to put two and two together in order to realize what is going to happen.

Mr. Lapointe: Not necessarily.

Mr. Knowles: The minister says "not necessarily".

Mr. Lapointe: That is not what happened when the last increase took place. At that time these cases were reviewed by the commission, and a great majority of them were increased because the decision of the commission was taken in the light of the general increases that had been given. I have every reason to believe that that will be the way the commission will review these cases. My hon. friend of course realizes that decisions or actions taken by the commission are not at the discretion of the minister, but I think that past experience would show that we can fairly well rely on a generous attitude on their part.

Mr. Knowles: I greatly appreciate the comment the minister has now made. I certainly hope the commission will operate in that manner. But we have had experience with these things and, from the emphasis that is placed upon the means test in section 33, it would look to me as though the result will be that if these dependent parents do not lose from their pension under section 33 the whole of the $40 they may get as an old age pension, they will lose part of it. They will get a bit of an increase, but their means will be assessed in the light of the new $40 and they will end up not with the $40 old age security as a net increase over their present position; and as a result of this review it is likely that there will be some cases that will not end up with any increase at all.

Mr. Lapointe: They will end up with an over-all increase in income.

Mr. Knowles: They may end up with an amount that will give them an over-all increase in income but it is not likely that it will be an increase to the extent of the full $40 which will be the case with so many of our older Canadians, again because there is a means test in section 33 of this act as there is—I know you are looking at me with a frown, Mr. Chairman, and I will just say this one word and then leave this subject—in the War Veterans Allowance Act as well.

To get back in order, Mr. Chairman, or in other words to get back to this specific act, may I say that the discussion we have had underlines more clearly than before the need for increasing the ceiling in column 2 of schedule B and for permitting payment of pensions to dependent parents equal to the increased amount that will be allowed to widows of veterans. The widow's pension is being brought up to $100 a month, and properly so; the whole house is grateful for that. I think the same amount should be the figure for dependent parents.

Mr. Green: From the minister's statement it would appear that the main reason for making this change is that several thousand of the dependent parents are over 70 years of age.

Mr. Lapointe: No.

Mr. Green: And that they will be receiving the old age pension.

Mr. Lapointe: I never said that.

Mr. Green: The minister has mentioned two or three times that 5,000 or more were now to get the old age pension. But surely that is not sufficient reason for changing this schedule. Previously the figure was set at $900 for the widows and for the dependent parents. The figure is raised to $1,200 for the widow but remains at $900 for the dependent parents. It does seem to me that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is right when he pleads for an increase to $1,200 in the ceiling on the pension that can be paid to the dependent parents. I do not think the minister has advanced sufficient reasons for failing to increase that figure in this particular case.

On section 2—Coming into force.

Mr. Green: Before we discuss clause 2 I should like to move an amendment, seconded by the hon. member for Lake Centre, reading as follows:

That the following section be added as section 1 (a) of Bill No. 27:

1. (a) An increase in pension paid to any person by virtue of section 1 shall not be included as income for the purposes of the War Veterans Allowance Act, 1946.

The Chairman: Order. I will put the amendment before the committee.

Mr. Green: As I pointed out in my remarks on second reading, this is similar wording to that which was used in the amendment to the Pension Act contained in chapter 23 of the statutes of 1948. Here we have this position. The Department of Veterans Affairs administers both the pension and the war veterans allowance. A bill is brought in to increase the pension, and in the case of the small pensioner the result is to cut the war veterans allowance so that in a good many thousand cases these pensioners will get no benefit whatever from the increase now being brought in unless there is some provision that they will not have the same or some amount deducted from the war veterans allowance.

I do not intend to repeat the submission I made earlier in the afternoon, but I do urge upon the minister that he accept this amendment. If he does, the result will be that when the pension increases come into effect on January 1, 1952, the small pensioners who are drawing war veterans allowance will be able to get this increase without taking a cut in the war veterans allowance which, of course, would result in their income being just the same as it is today.

The minister has referred to the amendment to the Pension Act which was passed in 1948, and has pointed out, just as I did in my remarks, that the provision in that act referred to a lump sum payment which was going to pensioners because the increase in pension was made retroactive for a period of approximately six months. He said because there was that difference there was no reason to make any such amendment to the present act. Actually, if he administers the War Veterans Allowance Act properly during these winter months he will have exactly the same situation, because the increase in pension will constitute overpayments, and under the law his war veterans allowance board will have to take those overpayments into consideration. In that way the amount received by the pensioner will be cut back to what he would have received if there had been no increase.

The main consideration here should be to make certain that these small pensioners, who are also on war veterans allowance, get the benefit of this pension increase. It will not be very great for them because they are not the pensioners receiving high amounts. I think the maximum would be a 35 per cent single pensioner and a 45 per cent pensioner if married, because over and above those figures the pensioner cannot qualify for any war veterans allowance. Therefore the increase in pension will not run into very large amounts; but for these veterans every five cents means a great deal. Every five cents or ten cents may mean the difference between getting a meal or not getting it. With prices high, as they are, and going higher all the time, many of these men are suffering greatly and will suffer more during the winter weather. I would urge on the minister that he accept this amendment. If it is not exactly in the proper terms, then accept an amendment which would bring about the result I am after, which is that the increase in pension given with the right hand shall not be taken away with the left because the war veterans allowance is reduced.

The Chairman: I must say that I have very great doubt about the amendment being in order, because it has the effect of increasing the charge on the public exchequer and such an amendment must be moved by a minister of the crown. I will be glad to hear hon. members on the amendment.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Mr. Chairman, I think you should have no doubt about it. Even the hon. member arguing his amendment pleaded with the minister to accept it, even though it did not meet all the conditions, and make it his own amendment, or put it in other terms.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): That shows how generous he is.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): He did it in a very able way, and I congratulate him. But in his own mind he knows that this will increase the expenditure which was announced in the message the minister gave when he first brought in the resolution. The hon. member made quite a plea for the committee to agree to the amendment, but if he looks at section 54 of the British North America Act he will see that a member, and even a minister, cannot move an amendment to increase an outlay without communicating to the house a message from the governor general. This would certainly increase the amount. There would be no object in moving the amendment if it did not increase the amount to be spent on the veterans. I really think that the hon. member will admit that his amendment is out of order.

Mr. Green: The Minister of Public Works is perfectly right when he says it would mean a larger payment to these small pensioners. I would hope that the minister himself would agree to some such provision being written into the law so these men will not suffer.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I do not think even the minister could move that amendment at this stage. We would have to refer the matter back and submit it to the governor general, and then give the message to the house that he has been informed of the subject matter of the resolution and recommends it to the consideration of the house. We would not be in order in moving it at this stage in committee.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am sure that would be a very easy thing to do. I suggest the minister do that immediately in order to meet a situation with which apparently the minister agrees but which, as he says, is faced with difficulties.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I never agreed that this should be done.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): We have had instances in this house before where that has been done while you wait.

The Chairman: Citation 458 of Beauchesne's third edition reads:

> A motion to amend a bill so as to provide for the appointment of additional government officials is out of order as it involves an increased grant of public money.

I must rule the amendment out of order.

Mr. Harkness: May I just add my voice to that of the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra in urging the government to move the necessary resolution, get the permission of the governor general and so on. In other words, I urge the government to go through the regular form and have something written into this bill so the situation which has been outlined will not continue, and those receiving small pensions may have them increased without the amount being taken off the war veterans allowance cheque if they are also recipients of that allowance. It seems ridiculous that a large number of pensioners who are drawing comparatively small disability pensions and are also in receipt of war veterans allowance should have the one cheque they receive increased, we will say by $10 or $15, and then have the war veterans allowance cheque knocked down by the same amount. Surely there are no insuperable difficulties in the way. It would not place any considerable strain on the treasury to do what has been suggested by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra and write something into this particular bill which would prevent that situation occurring.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I think we should be clear as to what will be the effect if the minister does not adopt this suggestion. What is happening is that having virtually admitted that this is a proper thing, that this is to be done at the next session, the minister nevertheless refuses to take any action now. In other words, as I said a few moments ago, these men are to be left to stew in their own juice, not because of any reason that has been given but because of what can only be described as stubborn unwillingness to change a view expressed.

Schedule A agreed to.

On schedule B—Scale of pensions for death.

Mr. Knowles: May I ask the minister once again if he will not consider moving an amendment? I will not go through the routine that we experience so often of moving an amendment and having it ruled out of order, but I do suggest that it would be in order for the minister to move an amendment to schedule B. The suggestion I make is that the figure $900 in the second column, top line, be changed to $1,200 and that the figure $1,008 in the second column, second line, be changed to $1,200. The effect of that would be to raise the ceiling on the amount of pension payable to dependent parents to $1,200 a year or $100 a month.

If the Minister of Public Works feels inclined to say that that would require the approval of the governor general to a prior resolution, may I point out to him that the resolution preceding this bill did not fix a ceiling. The resolution as introduced by the minister read as follows:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to amend the Pension Act to provide for increases in the rates of pension for disability and for death under the act.

When the notice of motion regarding that resolution was first presented to the house the minister stood in his place and said:

His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

There was no ceiling placed on the amount, and I submit that within the terms of the rules of the house the minister would be perfectly in order in now moving as an amendment that the dependent parents' pension be increased to $100 per month.

JUDGES ACT

INCREASE IN NUMBER OF COUNTY COURT JUDGES IN BRITISH COLUMBIA

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice) moved the second reading of Bill No. 29, to amend the Judges Act, 1946.

He said: Mr. Speaker, during the resolution stage of this bill I was indebted to my colleague, the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier), for attending to this item for me. I must say in confirmation that the information he gave to the house covered all the points in the bill and was all accurate.

Mr. Knowles: Even if he got it from the press.

Mr. Garson: That is right.

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I suppose now that I can speak as a member of the bar of British Columbia it would be in order for me to say that I agree there is need for an increase in the number of judges which is provided by this bill. I should like to take advantage of this opportunity to ask the minister with regard to a matter about which I made inquiry the other day, namely the report in the press to the effect that under the prospective amendments to be suggested or which have already been suggested by the criminal law commission provision is being made for the extension of the jurisdiction of district or county court judges. In view of the fact that the minister will shortly be leaving and will not be here to discuss this matter I wonder if he would amplify the statement he made the other day that no interim report had yet been received from that commission. If that report has since been received, and if it provides for a considerable widening of the jurisdiction now enjoyed by county court or district judges, the opportunity is now available to him to make a statement on what I consider one of the most important matters to come before parliament, either at this or succeeding sessions.

Mr. Garson: I confirm what I said on the last occasion when my learned friend inquired about this matter, that we have not as yet received a report, interim or otherwise, from the commission. They are meeting in Ottawa at the present time, or at least they were yesterday, and are hoping that this will be the last time they will need to confer with one another. I would not think we will have the product of their present conference in its final form for at least a month, if not longer. Until I receive that first written communication concerning their deliberations, I regret that I would not be in a position to reply to my hon. friend's question.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, as a layman I want to say a few words about this bill. I suppose it might almost be considered presumption on my part to speak on a bill of this type, particularly following the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker). I know that an increase in the number of county court judges in the province of British Columbia is necessary because of the amount of work they have to do as a result of the increase in population. During the last two or three years I have noted that some of the county court judges are rather overworked. They are doing an immense amount of work at the present time, and that fact is not generally recognized by a large number of people.

In my opinion county court judges are a very important cog in the administration of justice. On the one hand there are the magistrates in the lower courts and on the other hand the justices of the higher courts, but it is my observation that the county court judges have the greatest amount to do with the greatest number of people. In years past I have had close association with some excellent county court judges in the interior of British Columbia, and it is generally recognized by people who know that they have rendered excellent service to the country.

During the war I had the opportunity of close association with some county court judges, particularly one who is now a justice of the supreme court of British Columbia, in connection with conciliation and arbitration boards. I shall never forget one case where one of these county court judges was the chairman of the board. Some of the workingmen interested in arbitration spoke to me. They were of the opinion that the judge would naturally be wholly in favour of one side and would support that side. As the hearings proceeded I was very interested to notice that, as the judge came in close contact with these men and as they listened to what he had to say, their opinion changed; and when the proceedings were over they willingly recognized his painstaking methods and fairness in approaching the question under dispute. I think the county court judges of British Columbia have performed excellent service in many fields that are strictly outside court work.

As far as my own district of Kootenay is concerned, we are very fortunate in having had a succession of excellent men acting as county court judges. I have been informed by a good number of people representing all parties in this house how much they appreciate the excellent work that is being done by the present incumbent of the office of county court judge in the Kootenays.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Dion in the chair.

SUPREME COURT ACT

AMENDMENT TO INCREASE MAXIMUM SALARY OF REGISTRAR

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to present a measure to amend the Supreme Court Act to provide an increase in the maximum salary of the registrar from eight thousand to eight thousand five hundred dollars.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Will the minister make a statement on this matter?

Mr. Garson: In connection with the bill to which this resolution will lead, and in connection with the other bill the resolution leading to which is on the order paper, I might say that these are cases where the ceiling of the emolument of the officer of the court is fixed by statute. The result has been that in the salary adjustments that have been allowed the civil service during the past few years it has not been possible to include these gentlemen because of the statutory ceiling upon their salaries.

Mr. Diefenbaker: When was that statutory ceiling first provided?

[Mr. Herridge.]

Mr. Garson: I think it has always been in the statute in each case. If my hon. friend has not the statute before him, I have a pamphlet copy here if he wishes to see it. He will see that in setting up the office of registrar in each case it is provided that he shall exercise certain functions and shall be paid such salary as the governor general in council shall allow up to and not exceeding a certain sum. That is unlike other civil servants, who have no such statutory limit upon their salaries. The Department of Justice has received representations from the chief justice of Canada in the case of the supreme court, and from the president of the exchequer court in the case of that court, to the effect that it hardly seemed fair that these particular civil servants should be subject to such a ceiling which left their emoluments in a position of disparity as compared with those of other civil servants when the latter received increases in pay.

Our method of disposing of this request was to make a careful comparison with the emolument of the registrar of the supreme court of Ontario in Toronto, whose work is much the same in character, although in a court which would not ordinarily carry the same degree of dignity and importance as the Supreme Court of Canada. We have tried to relate the increase provided by the present amendment to the salary paid to the registrar of the Ontario high court at Osgoode hall.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Dion in the chair.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The minister stated that in arriving at the amount fixed in the bill for the salary of the registrar a comparison was made with the amount paid to the registrar of the Ontario high court of justice. Would the minister say what amount is paid to the official in question?

Mr. Garson: Yes. My recollection is that it is $1,000 less than the salary we propose for the incumbent of the Supreme Court of Canada.

Mr. McLure: What are the duties of a registrar, and what are his qualifications?

Mr. Garson: I think perhaps I can answer that by giving you the qualifications of the gentlemen who hold these positions at the present time. In the case of the Exchequer Court of Canada, the gentleman in question is a barrister at law of forty years standing. After his appointment in 1908 as a Rhodes scholar from Manitoba he attended Oxford university, took the English bar examination there, and was called to the English bar in 1911. He was a member of the honourable society of the inner temple and later in the same year was admitted to the bar of Manitoba. He practised law in Winnipeg from 1911 to 1923, later entering the dominion civil service where he acted for many years, until he was finally appointed to his present position. He is the chief administrative officer of the court. In addition to that he is a taxing officer, with authority to tax party and party costs which are incurred in court. Also, he has the jurisdiction of an exchequer court judge in chambers, and conducts inquiries into damages, in patent and other actions referred to him for that purpose.

Mr. McLure: But the registrar has no judicial duties?

Mr. Garson: Oh, yes.

Mr. McLure: He does not plead a case, decide a case or anything of that nature.

Mr. Garson: As I have already indicated, his duties as a taxing officer are semi- or quasi-judicial, and his duties in exercising the jurisdiction of an exchequer court judge in chambers are judicial in character. Then his duties in connection with references to him under the act are also judicial in character. In that respect he compares to a master or referee in a high court.

Mr. McLure: After all, he would be called only a clerk. A county court clerk would be the same thing.

Mr. Garson: No, my hon. friend would be quite wrong in supposing that. The judicial duties of which I have spoken are altogether different from those of a county court clerk.

Mr. Knowles: The Minister of Justice gave us an interesting account of the gentleman who occupies the position in the other court. Has he the same material with respect to the registrar of the supreme court?

Mr. Garson: They are much the same in both cases.

Mr. Graydon: The registrar of the supreme court has the additional qualification of having been a cabinet minister.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in.

Mr. Garson thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 30, to amend the Supreme Court Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: When shall the bill be read the second time?

Mr. Garson: Could it not be done now? It is a very simple matter.

Mr. Knowles: We had better see it.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Next sitting.

EXCHEQUER COURT ACT

AMENDMENT TO INCREASE MAXIMUM SALARY OF REGISTRAR

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to present a measure to amend the Exchequer Court Act to provide an increase in the maximum salary of the registrar from six thousand five hundred to seven thousand five hundred dollars.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Dion in the chair.

Mr. McLure: What are the duties of this official? Does he not have the capacity of a clerk?

Mr. Garson: No. Both these gentlemen to whom I have referred are registrars of courts. As I tried to explain a moment ago, the work of a registrar covers all the clerical duties my hon. friend has in mind in the case of the clerk of a county court; but in addition to that they have other duties of a quasi-judicial character, to which I have already made reference. For instance they have jurisdiction and power to try interlocutory motions of certain types which it would be quite proper to bring before a judge of the court. Lawyers who are involved in these cases come before the registrar to plead these interlocutory motions. The registrar will sit on such motions and render a decision.

In the same way a judge of the court has power to refer certain matters back to the registrar for judicial decision. When these references are made the registrar of the court will sit and listen to counsel on both sides in precisely the same way a judge would, and will render judgment on the reference. So the registrar combines clerical duties with duties which I think might properly be described as judicial, or if not judicial in the exact sense, certainly they are quasi-judicial.

Mr. McLure: They cannot plead a case.

Mr. Garson: No. Any officer of the court has to be a barrister of several years standing, but once he is appointed he has to give up his practice of law. As a matter of fact, in connection with the court we are now discussing the position is very much a full-time job, because the volume of business done by the Exchequer Court of Canada is very great.

Mr. McLure: I am opposed to both these increases in salary, and for this reason: We have been struggling all along to get increases for people such as pensioners and persons on retirement incomes. Yet when we come to these higher positions, where the salaries are already large and remunerative, the government goes to work and gives a big increase. Possibly it is all due to the surplus. These officials see an opportunity of getting something out of that immense surplus that may be on hand at the end of the year.

Notwithstanding what the Minister of Justice has just said, these men are just clerks, although they carry the glorified name of registrar. In our county courts throughout the provinces our clerks are doing the same class of work. Their qualifications may not be as high as those of registrars. I must say that I believe these increases are uncalled for under present conditions. These people cannot be described as overworked civil servants, or as civil servants overburdened with work. If you look at what a registrar or county court clerk does, you will find that he works about two hundred days a year. He is receiving a fine salary without any increase. If the minister wants to stand in properly with those for whom we have been pleading in the other branches of the service, and the men who have given war service, he should withdraw this measure. These men are overpaid now.

Mr. Garson: In fairness to these gentlemen and the courts which they serve, I believe I should place on the record, in relation to the remarks which have just been made by the hon. member for Queens, the fact that in the supreme court of Ontario at Osgoode hall the senior master receives $8,500 a year, the master $7,500 and the registrar $7,500. When one takes into account the fact that the Exchequer Court of Canada receives business from one end of Canada to the other it does not seem unreasonable that the registrar of the exchequer court should get as much as but no more than the registrar of the supreme court of Ontario.

Mr. Diefenbaker: When we were dealing with the supreme court amendment the minister was good enough to place on the record the qualifications of the registrar of the exchequer court. Since these two matters have become intertwined, perhaps he would be good enough to place on the record the qualifications of the registrar of the supreme court.

Mr. Garson: I should be glad to do so. The gentleman who is now the registrar, Mr. Paul Leduc, was appointed as registrar of the supreme court on October 1, 1940. He had practised law in Ottawa from 1915 to 1934, at which time he became a cabinet minister in the Ontario government. He was a prominent member of the Belcourt firm of this city which did a great deal of agency work for firms in other parts of Canada, particularly in the province of Quebec. In that way when he was appointed, although a lawyer residing in Ontario, he had had considerable experience in the Ontario practice and the civil law practice of the province of Quebec in relation to the appeals which would come to the supreme court from that province. He was a member of the bar of both provinces. I believe that in every respect he was qualified to become an official of the court.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Now that the supreme court, with the exception of the few appeals that are still en route or in the privy council, is the final court, what has the minister to say as to any increase in the duties and responsibilities of the registrar over what they were prior to the abolishment of appeals to the privy council?

Mr. Garson: The hon. member is quite right in implying by his question that inevitably there will be an increase in the volume of work in the supreme court over what formerly obtained. As yet I do not think we have been able to accurately measure the extent of that increase.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Has the minister any statistics at all?

Mr. Garson: No, we have not. One reason for not attempting to secure them is that we think the time is too short to accurately measure any increase in that work.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Has there been a material increase in consequence of making the supreme court the final court of appeal?

Mr. Garson: I think I would be correct in saying there has been. I would not say a material increase, but a significant increase. Whether that is due to the abolition of appeals to the privy council I believe it would be difficult to say; for the time within which appeals from cases which were current at the time the amendment to the Supreme Court Act was passed has not yet run out. Until that time does run out the privy council is just as available as the court of last resort for cases then current as it has been heretofore. It will not be until that period has run out that we can trace with any accuracy the effect upon the volume of work in the supreme court which the abolition of appeals to the privy council might bring about.

Mr. Diefenbaker: When will it run out?

Mr. Garson: It is not a definite period. It will run out when the last time for appeal has lapsed for a case which was current in the trial court at the time the legislation came into effect. It is very difficult to forecast just when that will be.

Mr. Diefenbaker: One other thing in connection with the exchequer court. I take it from the recital of the responsibilities of the registrar that one of his duties is to bring to the attention of the judges the question of judgments which should have been rendered. I do not raise this by way of criticism at the moment, but I do believe something should be done to assure more expedition in the giving of judgments in the exchequer court. The delay in some of these cases is difficult to explain to one's clients. After all, in the administration of justice it is just as important that justice be rendered with expedition as it is that justice be rendered. I would suggest that the attention of the registrar be directed to the situation.

Has the minister any record before him showing the number of judgments that are a year and a half overdue, or even more than that? The situation is not due in any degree to the judges; nonetheless it is the subject of very strong criticism across the country.

Mr. Garson: It just so happens, Mr. Chairman, that within the past week I received a report upon the arrears of judgments in the Exchequer Court of Canada. While I cannot recall the exact figures I am quite certain there was a substantial reduction in the number of delayed judgments from what was the case on the last occasion I had cause to check it. I sent this list to one of my colleagues as a matter deserving comment, and I am sure he would regard it with some gratification. There has been a distinct improvement in the condition to which the hon. member refers, although I agree there were formerly good grounds for his observation.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I thank the minister for that explanation. I do not want to ask a question on the order paper, but if he has a record showing the present condition of judgments it would be most helpful. In the past these delays have been unexplainable to clients and sometimes, in the opinion of those who know, inexcusable. A delay of one and a half or two years after a case has been heard might very well lead to a condition of affairs where the judge would remember the name of the case but the facts would long since have passed into the limbo of forgotten things. Regardless of the notes a judge takes, unless a judgment is delivered within a reasonable time certainly the client who loses the case is always of the opinion that had the judgment been given earlier the result might have been otherwise.

Mr. Garson: I have just received from my efficient staff here the statistics in question. For the year 1950 there are seven judgments outstanding; for the year 1949, one. That is the lot. I think the hon. member for Lake Centre will agree that is definitely an improvement from the situation of, say, two years ago.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Yes, that is an improvement. How many are outstanding of those heard in 1951?

Mr. Garson: There are a number.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Has the minister the record of that?

Mr. Garson: Yes.

Mr. Diefenbaker: How many?

Mr. Garson: Twenty-two in 1951. But my hon. friend knows that it is still necessary to be realistic. They may be outstanding for two days. As soon as the argument is heard and the case is closed, they become outstanding right away. To be realistic about a thing like this, the statistics should be in relation to the preceding year.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is true. Now that the minister has the statistics before him, is he able to say how many judgments were given in 1951 in cases heard in 1948?

Mr. Garson: No, I have not that statistic. They do not come in that form.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The minister has not that information?

Mr. Garson: No. I could get it for my hon. friend if he wishes me to do so.

Mr. McLure: I should like to ask one question about the registrar. At first, when the minister was speaking about him, I thought that he did all the work for the judges. But now I understand that he has a staff under him. What staff are under the registrar in carrying out his duties?

Mr. Garson: I am afraid that I cannot at the moment give accurate figures in that regard. I shall be glad to get them and give them to my hon. friend. The registrar has a staff. He needs stenographers and clerical staff because the volume of litigation in these courts is large and a staff is required for that purpose. Then a good deal of the registrar's time is taken up with these judical duties that I was speaking about. The taxing of bills of costs takes up a great deal of time, as does the hearing of these interlocutory motions and the hearing of references. My hon. friend would be under a quite wrong impression if he thought that this gentleman was just a sort of glorified county court clerk with a staff of clerks under him.

Mr. Knowles: Both the hon. member for Queens and the Minister of Justice have addressed themselves to the question of whether or not these registrars are persons of some importance or whether they are, in their words, just clerks. I think we should be careful about our use of that word. Sometimes a person who holds the position of clerk is an extremely important person.

Mr. Graydon: There is one at the end of the table.

Mr. Knowles: That is exactly the person I am thinking of. In other words, it can be quite an honour to be called a clerk, and I am sure we all feel that way with respect to the Clerk of the House of Commons. The question I wanted to put to the minister is this. What is the relation between the volume of work of the Supreme Court of Canada and that of the Exchequer Court of Canada?

Mr. Garson: As to the actual number of cases handled, the volume would be substantially more in the Exchequer Court of Canada than in the Supreme Court of Canada.

Mr. Knowles: Then does it follow that the work of the registrar of the exchequer court is heavier than that of the registrar of the Supreme Court of Canada?

Mr. Garson: I think the accurate answer to that question is that probably it would be, in quantity; but not as to quality or degree of responsibility.

Mr. Knowles: I notice that we pay the man who does the most work $1,000 less than the man who does the least work.

Mr. Garson: I did not say that. I said the work was greater in quantity but that the quality of responsibility involved was not necessarily as great. I think my hon. friend would probably agree that, having regard to the fact that one is a trial court and the other one is the highest court of appeal in the land, there is some ground for a distinction in salary between the two.

Mr. Knowles: But is it not true that in both cases the judicial functions exercised by these registrars are pretty much the same?

Mr. Garson: Well—

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. MacInnis: I was rather interested in the answer the Minister of Justice gave to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. He said that the work might be the same or a little more in quantity in the exchequer court but might differ in quality. I should like to know what he means by that.

Mr. Garson: What I said was the quality or the responsibility involved. The difference is this. To repeat myself, as I am bound to do because I think there is a certain element of repetition in my hon. friend's question, may I say that the exchequer court, as my hon. friend knows, is the lowest trial court in respect of certain classes of action between the subject and the crown, patent actions and the like.

Mr. Knowles: That is, it is a court of first instance.

Mr. Garson: Yes, it is a court of first instance. If a case involves subject matter of that type it is tried before the exchequer court. The Supreme Court of Canada is the highest court of appeal in the whole country. It is the court of last resort. By statute the registrar is given the rank of a deputy minister. The representations we received were to the effect that we should have salaries higher than those which we have authorized, but these are the amounts that have been approved by treasury board. In arriving at them we have tried to make a comparison of the actual work done by these gentlemen —that is, the kind of the actual work done— with the work done by the registrars of other courts, particularly the supreme court of Ontario at Osgoode hall in Toronto.

Mr. MacInnis: Then am I to understand the situation is that as the supreme court is a higher court than the exchequer court— although both courts are dealing with the matter of justice—regardless of the amount of work done by the registrar of either court, in view of the fact that the registrar of the supreme court is connected with the highest court in the land as a matter of prestige his salary should be higher?

Mr. Garson: I would not say that. If my hon. friend will reflect for a moment upon the fact that all the appeals from the ten provinces of Canada come to the Supreme Court of Canada, he will understand better what is involved. Not only appeals from the highest courts of these provinces but appeals from the county courts, if there are any, and also appeals from the Exchequer Court of Canada all come to the Supreme Court of Canada. In that way all of the more difficult and more controversial cases which have not, in the opinion of the counsel involved, been decided properly by the lower courts in the various provinces and in the exchequer court come to the Supreme Court of Canada. And the registrar of the Supreme Court of Canada has a duty in relation to it corresponding to that of the registrars of these lower courts. If my hon. friend went to any one of the provinces he would find the same distinction between the county court clerk and the clerk of the higher court. No person argues that the county court clerk in large cities does not handle more individual cases, but he does not get as large a salary because the quality of the responsibility which he has in relation to these cases is not considered to be as great as that of the registrar or clerk of the higher court, where usually larger amounts of money and more complicated legal issues are involved.

Mr. Blackmore: Before the resolution carries I should like to get some idea of the number of cases this man would try. The minister says he has the power and the jurisdiction to try cases. Is there any way of forming some sort of estimate as to the average number of cases he would be called upon to try in the course of a year?

Mr. Garson: I should like to emphasize that this gentleman does not try any cases in the ordinary sense in which we usually use the word "case". What he tries are motions of what are called an interlocutory character; that is, for example, motions for an order for an examination for discovery, and other types of motions which are made before the actual trial of the case comes on and which would be made to the judge if the registrar did not have the authority to try them.

Another type of matter that the registrar tries is this. After the case is over he sits in judgment to determine what costs the successful party can tax against the unsuccessful party. In that connection he has to exercise the same type of judgment that a judge would exercise if he were determining the matter. Then he also has to deal with matters which are referred to him in his capacity as registrar by the judge, being matters of lesser importance than the trial of the case itself yet perhaps more detailed. He looks after those in a judicial capacity.

I must say that I cannot tell my hon. friend offhand how many these would be in number. I would have to get that information and supply it to him, but I have no doubt at all that they would be quite substantial. That is in addition to this other work of looking after all these documents and seeing that cases are properly set down, subpoenas are issued and all the other work a registrar does.

Mr. Blackmore: I must confess that all this is entirely new to me, but that does not make any difference to my responsibility as being one of those in this house who should contribute a little bit toward looking after the public purse. I shall have to ask a question or two to become informed on the matter. I should like to get some sort of idea of how much time on the average would be involved in trying one of these interlocutory cases.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Blackmore: To the lawyers it is clear; it is a matter for fun. Well, it would not be a matter of fun to some of the farmers who have a mortgage on their property. We here have some responsibility, and I should like the minister to give information on the amount of work that is done. I do not mind paying this man; I have no objection at all to that, but I do feel that before we vote unanimously on a proposal like this we should get some sort of satisfaction as to whether or not the man is really earning the money.

Mr. Garson: I do not know how I can emphasize any more strongly than I have already attempted to do that these positions are not in any sense sinecures. This particular position we are talking about, and in relation to which my hon. friend has just asked his question, is very much a full-time job that he works at the whole year round. In connection with that my hon. friend asks, how long does he spend on one of these interlocutory motions. I would say that it might range from perhaps an hour as a minimum to several hours. It depends upon the issues that are involved in the particular motion that comes before him. There will be a wide variation in the time it will take to deal with any one of these motions or references. It depends upon the facts and the points that are being raised and the like, and also probably upon the long-windedness of the counsel involved. Therefore no universally accurate answer can be given to my hon. friend's question. I do want to emphasize that this is not a matter of a man going down to the courthouse, hearing a motion and then going off to play golf or going home. He is there all the time in the ordinary course of his duties. When he absents himself from his office to hear these motions that are made before him, or to deal with these references, the office has to remain open for the filing of papers, the issuing of court documents and the like, and that is the reason he has to have a staff.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in.

Mr. Garson thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 31, to amend the Exchequer Court Act.

CIVIL SERVICE ACT

AMENDMENT RESPECTING TENURE OF OFFICE AND SALARIES OF COMMISSIONERS

Hon. F. G. Bradley (Secretary of State) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to present a measure to amend the Civil Service Act in respect of the tenure of office and salaries of the commissioners.

Mr. Knowles: Would the minister like to make a statement?

Mr. Bradley: The present salaries of the civil service commissioners are greater than those actually specified in the Civil Service Act, the authorization for this being obtained annually by means of a special item in the estimates.

It is the purpose of the present amendments to the act to avoid the necessity of having recourse to the estimates by providing that the salaries of the civil service commissioners shall be set by the governor in council, which may also, on the recommendation of the Prime Minister, retain the services of a commissioner beyond the age of 65 years.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, this has a little more to it than met the eye when one looked at the resolution. I have referred to the salaries of the civil service commissioners several times as an example of something that needs to be tidied up in our financial administration. The Secretary of State has just pointed out their salaries are fixed by statute at a certain amount, but in addition to that they have been receiving a further $2,000 by virtue of items in the estimates. For example, in the estimates of the current year, passed in the session that ended last June, there is item 76 which includes $2,000 for each of the commissioners additional to the amount provided by chapter 53 of the statutes of 1947. I have pointed out several times how the Auditor General has frowned upon this practice. He has stated that we should not legislate by having an item in the estimates year after year. If there is something we want to make permanent it should be written into the statutes. I have suggested several times that that recommendation of the Auditor General should be implemented, namely that this statute should be amended so as to provide therein for the full amount of salary being paid to the civil service commissioners.

When I saw this resolution on the order paper I complimented the Secretary of State (Mr. Bradley), when I was speaking on the Financial Administration Act, upon what I felt was the intent of this resolution. From what has just been said I gather that this resolution goes a great deal further. It will take the question of the salaries of the civil service commissioners right out of the statute, right out of the control of parliament, and make them subject only to the governor in council. I strongly object to that being done.

We have just had a debate on two measures which fixed salaries by statute. There was no change in the general principle of parliamentary control over those salaries. Earlier we passed an amendment to the Judges Act in which the salaries of judges are fixed by statute. The salaries of cabinet minister are fixed by statute. I realize that the salaries of deputy ministers are not, and in fact I was surprised the other night when I learned that the salary of a certain deputy minister had been increased over and above what was indicated in the current estimates.

I think we should have some explanation as to why we are being asked to change the statute in this way. I think the government should tell us also whether they have any intention after this bill is passed of increasing the salaries of the civil service commissioners. At the present time they receive by way of statute and an item in the estimates $12,000 for the chief commissioner and $10,000 for the other two. I was sympathetic with the hon. member for Queens (Mr. McLure) a while ago in his attitude toward raising these other salaries, but those were salaries in brackets lower than these now under review.

As I say, I am wondering whether the bill to be based on this resolution will increase these salaries. At least we in parliament know in most cases what is happening, whereas this proposal seems to take this matter right out of our control. I question whether we should be asked to accept this without further explanation, without the government taking parliament completely into their confidence as to their plans.

Mr. Angus MacInnis (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, following the point raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) I wish to protest at having a resolution in these terms placed before us. There is nothing in this resolution to indicate what the legislation to follow is to be. If we are not told that in the resolution, we may as well have no resolution at all. How are hon. members going to be able to prepare themselves to debate the substance of legislation if there is nothing in a resolution to indicate what is going to be done? To use the vulgar term, in the sense that it is common, a resolution like this is merely making monkeys out of hon. members. The Civil Service Act is to be amended in a very important way and there is no indication whatsoever in the resolution as to what is to be done. Surely the house is entitled to more respect. What was referred to the governor general? What was he told? The resolution reads:

> That it is expedient to present a measure to amend the Civil Service Act in respect of the tenure of office and salaries of the commissioners.

I know what I would say if I were the governor general. I do not think I would take it under consideration when I was offered a resolution like that. I would tell the fellow to bring me back a resolution that meant something, that I could understand. There is nothing in this resolution that indicates anything. The government may be going to abolish the Civil Service Act altogether. They may be going to pay the civil service commissioners $100,000 a year instead of $10,000 or $12,000, or they may be going to reduce them to $1,000. It is just the sheerest nonsense, and I am surprised that the Secretary of State (Mr. Bradley) should offer so little explanation when asked to explain the resolution.

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I should like to associate myself with what has been said previously. I do not know which is the worst. We have a resolution which the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) has described as being completely inadequate and on the other hand we have had a slight glimpse at what is actually going to be done. The result is most unsatisfactory. We will certainly need considerable satisfying as to why these salaries should be placed in a corner and dealt with in a different way from other salaries.

I can easily keep this going until 6.15, but I suggest that we give an opportunity to the Secretary of State to give us further information. If you will allow me to adjourn the debate, I shall, and if you will not, I shall continue until 6.15.

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, this is really a simple resolution and as soon as it is passed hon. members will receive copies of the bill. I am not supposed to go into details, and I do not know whether my colleague will agree when I state that what we want is the power to extend the tenure of office of the commissioners beyond ten years. That seems to be the important section.

Mr. Tustin: What will that mean?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): That would take them to 65 or 70 years. There is not very much in the bill, and I do not think we should go on too long before we have the bill.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Only three minutes.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): The house can be kept going, as has been evidenced in the past, but generally the house takes more time on more important bills. I am not saying, of course, that this is not important; but it is not one of those major bills that imply a change of policy on the part of the government which would affect the lives of thousands of citizens. Experience has shown that perhaps it would be a good thing if we had the power to extend the term of office of the chairman and the commissioners of the civil service commission, which in my opinion is doing very good work. We can keep it up until 6.15.

Mr. Graydon: You practically have.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): We have time yet.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): As I understand it I have the floor and the minister has just been interrupting me—

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I thought I was making a speech.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): —and making part of my speech. My motion is still before you, Mr. Speaker, that we adjourn the debate.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Then we can take up the other resolution concerning the elections act.

On motion of Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood) the debate was adjourned.

DOMINION ELECTIONS ACT

AMENDMENT RESPECTING ADVANCE POLLS AND PRISONERS OF WAR VOTING REGULATIONS

Hon. F. G. Bradley (Secretary of State) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to amend the Dominion Elections Act to implement the recommendations of the special committee appointed to study the Dominion Elections Act, 1938, embodied in the draft bill prepared by the said committee and inter alia to make provision for: (a) a greater number of advance polls; and (b) the Canadian prisoners of war voting regulations, 1951.

Mr. Jean François Pouliot (Temiscouata): Mr. Speaker, there are a few minutes left before adjournment, and I want to protest most strongly against defamation of the language of the law by some translators. They are crazy, and I say that with reference to the translators of legislation that comes before the House of Commons. I do not know what is wrong with them, but they try to pick out words that are understood by no one. They try to change the legislation completely. Some members protested before the committee and some members are indifferent. The minister knows about the situation. Why is it that some translators, whom I will describe in French as "abrutis, moches et mabouls"—there can be no stronger expression—try to discover words that are understood by no one? Do they suffer from neurasthenia? What kind of disease have they in their brains? They are awful. This kind of legislation has to be applied by many people throughout the country who do not speak English, and they will not understand the language or the legislation. I hope when the bill comes before the house proper amendments will be brought forward in order that we may go back to the old language which is understood by all and which has been used since confederation.

On motion of Mr. Pouliot the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): On Monday we will continue and hope to conclude the debate on the address. Then we will take up third reading of Bill No. 34, an act to amend the Public Printing and Stationery Act. Then we will proceed with Bill No. 30, an act to amend the Supreme Court Act; Bill No. 31, an act to amend the Exchequer Court Act. Then we will take up the resolution in the name of the Secretary of State to amend the Civil Service Act and the other resolution in the name of the same minister to amend the Dominion Elections Act.

At 6.15 p.m. the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to the order of the house passed on November 2, 1951.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, December 3, 1951

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS

CONCURRENCE IN SECOND REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. A. F. Macdonald (Edmonton East) presented the second report of the standing committee on industrial relations, and moved that the report be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

ST. LAWRENCE POWER DEVELOPMENT

AGREEMENT BETWEEN FEDERAL AND ONTARIO GOVERNMENTS

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to be able to announce to the house that an agreement has been signed with the government of Ontario respecting the development of hydro power in the international rapids section of the St. Lawrence river. I now table two copies of the agreement which will of course have to be submitted for approval both by parliament and by the legislature of Ontario. As hon. members will have ample opportunity to consider its provisions at a later date, I will make only a brief statement now as to its general form and purposes.

The agreement with Ontario has been concluded in the expectation that the United States will not participate in the seaway project, and it has been drawn up on the understanding that the navigation works will be undertaken by the federal government and will be entirely within Canada. It contemplates that Ontario will undertake the power development concurrently with an appropriate agency in the United States.

In such circumstances it is desirable that a firm agreement exist between Canada and Ontario in order that Canadian treaty obligations be fulfilled and that other interests in Canada should be safeguarded.

The undertakings on behalf of Ontario are broadly to develop the power resources of the international rapids section of the St. Lawrence river concurrently with an appropriate authority in the United States in accordance with the plan known as the "controlled single stage project (238-242)". This is the same plan as was advanced and made part of the great lakes-St. Lawrence basin agreement of 1941 between Canada and the United States. However, the agreement provides that this plan may be modified as may be agreed upon between Canada and Ontario.

The Canadian government, for its part, undertakes to do all in its power to obtain the approval of the international joint commission to an application to be made by Ontario in an acceptable form for authority from that international body to construct the necessary works. Under the boundary waters treaty of 1909 this approval would be necessary since the international rapids section of the St. Lawrence river is a boundary water. Canada's undertaking in this respect is qualified, however, to the extent that its action must be consistent with its obligations under the boundary waters treaty and that regard must be had for all Canadian interests in the St. Lawrence river.

Some of the other more important provisions may be enumerated briefly:

1. Canada will transfer to Ontario the administration of such lands belonging to Canada as are required for the project, and Ontario will pay compensation for these except for lands or property forming part of the existing canal system.

2. Ontario will transfer to Canada the administration of such lands belonging to Ontario as are specified by Canada as being required for works to carry a deep waterway in the international rapids section.

3. Ontario will establish a commission to safeguard and enhance scenic beauty and historic associations in the section to whatever extent may be appropriate.

It is recognized that before all the arrangements are consummated, as contemplated in this agreement, the great lakes-St. Lawrence basin agreement of 1941 between Canada and the United States may be approved by congress and by parliament. In that event, it would be the intention of the government to reconsider with the government of Ontario the terms of the agreement signed today and to modify them in recognition of the arrangements that would then exist between Canada and the United States with respect to the seaway project.

DEFENCE PRODUCTION

INDUSTRIAL PERSONNEL—NATIONAL SECURITY MEASURES

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I should like to make a statement with respect to the security measures that have to be taken in connection with defence contracts. The hon. member for York West (Mr. Adamson) spoke in the debate on the address on Wednesday, November 28, of this matter, which is of general concern, and about which I think hon. members might wish to have a statement from the government. It has to do with the problem of safeguarding secret information in industries engaged on defence production.

The hon. member referred to the case of a Mr. George R. Jackson who was recently released from employment by the A. V. Roe Company. Mr. Jackson's case is currently being reviewed and I do not intend to deal with it now. It is the general problem about which I wish to say something.

I think the hon. member for York West has done a service in bringing this matter forward in the serious way he did. The government has to deal with a lot of difficult and unpleasant problems in the conditions of today and of these one of the most difficult, and certainly one of the most unpleasant, is trying to assess the reliability of people who deal or may have to deal with vital defence matters.

As a part of our defence program, contracts have to be placed for the production of various types of equipment, and in many cases this involves the use of details of a highly secret character; secrets which in many cases belong as much to other governments as to our own. Now there are people both in this country and outside who are very anxious to obtain such secrets and who are making constant efforts to find out as much about them as they can. It is, accordingly, vital that no risks be taken which can be reasonably avoided with the security of such defence items. The government is responsible for protecting their secrecy in so far as this country is concerned.

For that reason, any company entering into a contract for the production of defence equipment in Canada must agree that it will exclude from access to secret material any persons about whose reliability the government has any serious doubt. This means that in cases where an individual's background, particularly any associations with communist or pro-communist organizations, or his present associations or even, in some cases, some instability or other qualities of character raise doubts as to the security of secret matters placed in his hands, then that person must not be allowed access to any secret or vital defence items. It is not possible to give the individual the benefit of the doubt. Reliability for security is not the sort of thing about which conclusive proof one way or the other is usually possible. Sometimes it is, but more often it is a matter of judgment based on all the information that is available. Where the national security is involved, the government simply cannot take the position that defence secrets are to be available to everyone against whom a cut and dried case cannot be made.

The reliability of the overwhelming majority of industrial employees in Canada is beyond doubt. In the case of the few who cannot be said with certainty to be reliable, the government has always to consider two things: the need to avoid doing any injury to an individual and the protection of material vital to the security of this country.

In cases where it is considered that the security of secret material might be endangered by giving a particular individual access to it, the company employing him is informed that such access cannot be allowed. The company is not instructed to dismiss him. I want particularly to emphasize this because there have been statements to the contrary both in the Jackson case and on other occasions. Neither the Department of Defence Production nor any other agency of the government has instructed a company to dismiss an employee for security reasons. A decision that a person should not be entrusted with secret information is not a decision that he is disloyal, and it does not mean that he should be dismissed. It simply means what I have said—that he should not have access to secret information.

There are usually positions in a plant that do not involve security, and transfers to them can be made. It may happen that in some plants which are engaged wholly on defence work such transfers are impossible, for one reason or another. In those cases the company is faced with the choice of releasing the individual or giving up its contract. These are the most difficult cases to handle. It may be that in all instances companies have not done their utmost to find means of making transfers. The importance of always doing so is being brought to their attention. Employers should always try to avoid dismissals if at all possible. They have a duty not to increase the difficulties or disabilities of persons whose only misfortune is that their reliability is open to question. It is very important that such persons should not be branded as disloyal.

What I want to make clear, however, is that the decision of the government is solely whether it can or cannot risk the security of some vital matter by allowing a particular person to have access to it. It is up to the employing company to decide what to do about the particular employees who cannot be allowed access to the secret material.

I have dealt thus far with the nature of the problem and the character of the task that the government attempts to perform in protecting the security of defence production. The procedure in handling the matter is also a problem.

The hon. member for York West suggested, as others commenting on this matter have suggested, that there should be a board or panel to hear representations from individuals before decisions are taken as to their reliability for security. This suggestion appeals to most fair-minded people because it seems to accord with the general principles on which we proceed in dealing with charges or claims against a man in criminal or civil law and in other instances. There are, however, particular considerations that have to be weighed on the other side.

In the first place, the assessment of the reliability of a person does not necessarily, or even usually, involve anything that could be regarded as "charges" against him. Decisions on reliability are taken every day in the public service and, indeed, in business and in almost every sort of organization. Most hon. members will at one time or another have been in a position where they have to decide whether they could or could not rely on a particular person in some important matter.

The only thing that distinguishes the cases I am talking about is that in defence production, and more particularly in the development stage of defence production, some methods and processes are of enormous importance and their betrayal could do injury to the whole nation. Reliability is more critically important than in most other circumstances. The question at issue is not guilt or innocence of some particular charge. The sole question is whether a certain person can or cannot be entrusted with secret defence material. It would give a completely false atmosphere to the matter if it were assumed that reliability can somehow be put beyond doubt by meeting formal charges—or indeed, that reliability cannot be brought into doubt except on the basis of formal charges. Assessment of character may be the only consideration in some instances. That is not a matter of charges, or of trial or of proof. It is a matter of judgment.

A second consideration to be borne in mind is that in dealing with reliability in defence production we are not in the realm of what have come to be called "human rights" and "fundamental freedoms". There is no human right or fundamental freedom involved. No person has a right of access to secret defence items, and no man's freedom is infringed when he is denied such access. In a particular case a company may decide that it has no place where it can employ a man who cannot be given access to defence matters. In such a case the man's job becomes involved. Where that is so, it is always possible for a company to ask that a case be reviewed to see if the decision cannot be reversed, and the government is always ready to make such a review. But in the last analysis, the question for the government and the question it must decide is whether it is or is not satisfied that there would be no risk to the security of some secret material or process by letting a certain person have access to it. No outside panel or board can take that responsibility. No matter how much the government might like to be relieved of this very unpleasant duty no government would have the right to shift to others the responsibility for the security of our defence secrets.

There is a further consideration of an entirely different order that is also relevant. It is that hearings could and probably would compromise our general security precautions. Some of the people about whose access to secret material we have to be most concerned operate in the interests of an organization that is skilfully and tightly bound together. This organization acts with a ruthlessness and a readiness to sacrifice its own followers, which we find it almost impossible to appreciate. It is only by careful, long continued and patient work that means have been established by our police forces of getting information about the operations of this organization. The organization would be more than ready to precipitate hearings involving their own followers, even if it meant the personal ruin of those individuals, if the hearings would lay bare the sources of information that the police have established. If hearings were held, the information as to the background or other considerations causing doubt about an individual would have to be revealed. I do not see how a "hearing" could be regarded as serving any purpose if that were not so. More than that, it would be argued that the validity of such information or the grounds for doubt could not be assessed nor could any "charges" be properly refuted unless the kind and sources of information were disclosed, the informants questioned, and so forth. If that were done in even two or three instances, they might be sufficient to nullify, in very short order, such security defences as we have been able to build up after years of painstaking effort. The well-organized opponents of our way of life would be more than ready to sacrifice a good many of their supporters to gain the kind of information that hearings would inevitably reveal.

For the reasons I have given, the government has thus far taken the view that no one has a valid claim to be given a hearing before he is denied access to secret defence material or processes of defence production. It has considered that a system of hearings should not be instituted. This means, of course, that the responsibility of the government is the greater to see that every case is carefully assessed and that no decisions as to the reliability of an individual are lightly taken. They are not lightly taken. Moreover, the cases can always be re-examined and the government will have no reluctance about reversing an original decision if further review suggests that it can safely be reversed. This whole matter is, however, distorted and seen in a false light, if it is confused with loyalty and thought of in terms of specific, provable or disprovable charges. You can doubt the reliability of a man for the security of some vital defence matter without considering him to be disloyal. You can continue to doubt no matter how much he argues or protests.

The problem that is thrust on the government of assessing the reliability of employees in defence industries, and occasionally of deciding in some case that reliability is uncertain, is not a pleasant one. In the present state of things it is, however, an unavoidable one. It is the government itself which is and must be answerable for the security of our defence secrets. The government is, however, fully aware of the importance of ensuring in so far as possible that no injury is done to any individual through the decisions that must be taken. Security procedures are constantly under review, and if they can be improved, the government will always be ready to make the improvements and will always welcome and seriously consider constructive suggestions to that end.

NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY

STATEMENT FOLLOWING MEETING OF COUNCIL

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, it is usual for a statement to be made in this house when a minister returns from an international conference of major importance. The eighth meeting of the North Atlantic council concluded at Rome last week. This was the first meeting attended by the supreme commander, General Eisenhower, and the meeting met under the inspiration of his personality. At the conclusion of its business, the council of twelve nations agreed on a statement to be made public. Because of the nature of the meeting and of the business transacted there, and also because my colleagues, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) and the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson), as well as myself, have not yet had an opportunity to report to the government, it is not possible to go into greater detail than is contained in this statement. For the convenience of hon. members, however, I should like to table a copy of the statement that was issued in Rome.

CANADA'S CONTRIBUTION TO EUROPEAN DEFENCE—REFERENCE TO STATEMENTS IN "HANSARD"

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, while during these last two weeks I have been out of sight here, apparently, judging from Hansard, I have not been entirely forgotten. I feel that at this time the house would expect from me a word of personal explanation of matters arising out of press reports published in my absence. I have read the Hansard references and most of the press reports, but I do not intend to enter into details—that has already been covered here—and I certainly do not mean to indulge in any recriminations. My real purpose is to assure the house that I had no intention of making announcements in Europe of new policies of which hon. members had not been informed in this chamber.

I made references to accommodation for our troops and to airfields, and no doubt those matters were much less familiar to some hon. members and members of the press than I had supposed; and it may be that there was some justification for a feeling that some kind of announcement of new policy had been made. I am sorry indeed if any answers I gave to questions created the impression that I was making important announcements outside the house. I have always tried to give the house all possible information on defence matters and, when the house is in session, to make all statements of major new developments and new policies in this chamber.

On looking over the reports, I think I can understand how the misunderstanding arose. As hon. members had been informed, the decision to dispatch the 27th Canadian infantry brigade group was not taken until the government had been assured that temporary accommodation was available. That temporary accommodation would have to be replaced by new accommodation. It is a fact, not a policy, that troops must be housed. As for airfields for the use of our air squadrons, hon. members had already been informed that airfields were not available on the continent, and that pending their availability, Canadian squadrons would be stationed in the United Kingdom at North Luffenham. Consequently, it was known that airfields would have to be provided on the continent.

We knew also that, in accord with the policy that parliament had accepted that Canada should do its share in NATO, we would also have to participate in meeting the costs of infrastructure—to use that horrible expression. To me that appeared to be a statement of a situation, of a condition, of a fact, and not of a policy.

Indeed it was not possible for me to state a new policy because the government had not yet decided upon one; and the government had not yet decided upon policy because the North Atlantic treaty nations concerned had not and have not yet fully worked out an agreement as to precisely how this should be done or how the over-all costs should be shared. That is one of the matters we discussed on the other side and it is a matter that was under active discussion in connection with the Rome meeting, and it is still under the most active consideration at Paris.

There is also the question of working out arrangements for accommodation and other facilities in Germany when the occupation statute is converted into an agreement. This is under consideration by the three occupying powers and the German government today.

Consequently, it is not possible either to announce a policy or to give any details or estimates of the over-all costs that might be involved. Just as soon as firm arrangements are worked out with the other countries concerned, they will be announced.

Against this background I repeat that I am indeed sorry if any hon. member feels that I was discussing new policies of which the house had not been informed and I assure you, sir, I had no such intention. Now that the smoke has cleared from the atmosphere here and elsewhere, I must leave it to hon. members themselves to decide in the light of the real facts whether I did or not.

Mr. Graydon: May I ask the minister if he is in a position to indicate what our commitments are with respect to military installations on the continent?

Mr. Claxton: No. I have just said that I am not.

Mr. Graydon: Then the press report of four or five airdromes and landing fields is incorrect?

Mr. Claxton: We will need four or five airfields to furnish our eleven squadrons with flying facilities. We will also need housing accommodation. But how much will be needed, where it will be located or what it will cost, we are in no position to say today.

Mr. Green: May I ask the minister this question? Is the construction or purchase to be at the cost of Canada?

Mr. Claxton: Of Canada?

Mr. Green: Yes.

Mr. Claxton: I am not in a position to say that. I can go this far and say that part of the cost will form part of the costs that will be shared by all North Atlantic treaty nations in accordance with an agreed formula. Part of it may have to be borne directly by us. Preliminary estimates of the most tentative character would indicate that whichever course is followed would not make much financial difference to us.

Mr. Green: Is Canada proceeding at once with the construction of barracks and the construction of airfields in Germany?

An hon. Member: We are not in committee.

Mr. Claxton: I cannot go much further than I have gone, Mr. Speaker. We are at present occupying temporary accommodation for the 27th infantry brigade group in Germany. That will have to be relinquished at some future date and we will have to make arrangements for construction of accommodation for the brigade group in Germany. What those arrangements will be, who will do the construction, and how the payments will be made, remains to be worked out not only as between ourselves and the three occupying powers but as between the three occupying powers and Germany.

Mr. Green: What about airfields?

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Claxton: The position with regard to airfields is similar, but there the probability is that all airfields will be located outside Germany and probably in France. Arrangements therefore will have to be made with SHAPE for the location and development of the airfields and the sharing of costs in so far as they are to be shared and then in all probability either through SHAPE or directly with the French government for accommodation.

Mr. Green: May I ask the minister whether any request was made that Canada should increase her number of troops in Europe from a brigade to a division?

Mr. Claxton: I am not in a position to discuss that matter on this statement.

Mr. Wright: I should like to ask the minister a supplementary question. Does he expect that it will be possible to have a full discussion on this matter before the session ends?

Mr. Claxton: That will depend on the course of discussions that are going on at Paris.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

TABLING OF TEXT OF CONVENTIONS AND RECOMMENDATIONS

Mr. Paul E. Cote (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, in conformity with the provisions of article 19, subsection 5, of the constitution of the international labour organization, I desire to lay on the table the authentic text of the following conventions and recommendations which were adopted by the international labour conference at its 34th session held at Geneva in June, 1951, together with a copy of a letter from the deputy minister of justice setting out the legislative jurisdiction for each of these conventions and recommendations:

Convention No. 99 concerning minimum wage-fixing machinery in agriculture.

Convention No. 100 concerning equal remuneration for men and women workers for work of equal value.

Recommendation No. 89 concerning minimum wage-fixing machinery in agriculture.

Recommendation No. 90 concerning the question of equal remuneration for men and women workers for work of equal value.

Recommendation No. 91 concerning collective agreements.

Recommendation No. 92 concerning voluntary conciliation and arbitration.

DEFENCE EXPENDITURES

CHANGE IN PERSONNEL OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

Mr. W. G. Weir (Portage-Neepawa) moved:

That the name of Mr. Quelch be substituted for that of Mr. Thomas; and

That the name of Mr. Wright be substituted for that of Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North) on the special committee on defence expenditures.

Motion agreed to.

REVISED STATUTES OF CANADA

AMENDMENT TO PROVIDE FOR SUPPLEMENTARY VOLUME

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 32, an act to amend an act respecting the Revised Statutes of Canada.

Mr. Knowles: Explain.

[Mr. Claxton.]

Mr. Garson: The purpose of this bill is to authorize the statute revision commission to prepare a supplementary volume as part of the new revised statutes to contain any statutes that may be enacted between the time of going to press and the time of the appearance of the newly revised statutes.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

QUESTIONS

IMMIGRATION—PLACEMENT SERVICE—COST OF MOVEMENT

Mr. Churchill:

1. Is the Department of Citizenship and Immigration operating a placement service for immigrants?
2. Does the national employment service also operate a placement service for immigrants?
3. Does the Department of Citizenship and Immigration, and also the Department of Labour, have officials in the field seeking places of employment for immigrants?
4. If so, how many officials, and in what areas?
5. What is the division of responsibility between the two departments in placing immigrants?
6. Do the departments above-mentioned absorb the cost of movement of immigrants from the point of entry into Canada to the point of employment?
7. Does the Department of Citizenship and Immigration or the Department of Labour seek co-operation of or consult with provincial governments in placing immigrants?

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce):

1. The Department of Citizenship and Immigration operates a settlement service for the purpose of locating and developing suitable opportunities for immigrants who come to Canada to settle on farms, or establish small businesses of their own. The department also helps immigrants secure employment, and handles applications from employers for immigrant workers.

2. The facilities of the national employment service are available to, and used by, immigrant workers. Employment office officials keep in close touch with the hostels and assist in referring immigrant workers to prospective employers.

3. See answers to Nos. 1 and 2.

4. The immigration branch of the Department of Citizenship and Immigration has one settlement officer at each of the following locations: Vancouver, Edmonton, Regina, Winnipeg, London, Toronto, Montreal, Quebec and Halifax. These officers are assisted, as required, by immigration inspectors and other staff of the immigration branch throughout the dominion.

In national employment offices certain placement officials have the duty of keeping in close contact with employers in their area in order that they may advise the employers where workmen can be obtained to meet their needs. The total number of placement officers in the national employment service varies, depending upon the season of the year. When the claim load is great the duties of the placement officers change in some instances and the staff of the unemployment insurance commission works as a unit as between duties applying to unemployment insurance and placement work. The total number of men and women engaged on placement work in Canada varies from approximately 900 to 1,200.

5. The whole immigration movement is primarily the responsibility of the Department of Citizenship and Immigration. This involves development of settlement opportunities in Canada, recruitment and selection overseas, admission, assistance in becoming established, and integration into Canadian society with attainment of full Canadian citizenship as the objective.

As stated in the answer to No. 1, the settlement service of the immigration branch, Department of Citizenship and Immigration, locates and develops farm and business opportunities. The national employment service places immigrants brought in under group or bulk movements to meet general labour shortages, or the needs of employers who apply to the labour department for the admission of a number of workers. The facilities of both departments are available to the large body of immigrants, should they be seeking employment, thus placing a widespread placement or settlement service at their disposal. The whole operation is recognized as one which can best be carried out by the closest possible co-operation between the two departments. The facilities of the national employment service are available to immigrants as well as other residents of Canada.

6. The department of citizenship has been authorized to provide for the absorption of the cost of inland rail transportation west of Winnipeg for immigrants who come to Canada under the assisted passage loan scheme who remain for one year in the class of employment for which they were selected.

The Department of Labour absorbs the cost of inland transportation for immigrant domestics, and farm workers who are brought forward in group movements.

7. Yes.

IMMIGRATION—PASSAGE FARES, GROUP MOVEMENTS, ETC.

Mr. Churchill:

With reference to immigrants entering Canada since January 1, 1951, and by country of origin:

1. How many paid their own fare?
2. How many had their fare paid by the international refugee organization?
3. How many had fares paid by sponsors in Canada?
4. How many received assisted passage loans?

94699—97½

Questions

5. How many were brought in under group movements by (a) the Department of Citizenship and Immigration; (b) the Department of Labour?
6. How many immigrants entered Canada who did not fall into any of the above classes?

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce):

(To September 30, 1951)

1. 82,700.
2. 18,844.
3. 15,287 (prepaid passages).
4. 6,202.

5. Group movements include bulk movements to meet a general shortage of labour, and applications from employers for a specific number of workers. Such applications from employers may be made to the Department of Labour or the Department of Citizenship and Immigration, but with the exception of those admissible classes covered by sections 1, 2 and 3 of order in council P.C. 2856, dated 9 June, 1950, they are cleared with the other department before being approved. It is not possible to divide the total group movement to indicate the number "brought in" by either department, but the total is 14,564. Most of these immigrants could be considered as having been brought in under the auspices of the Department of Labour.

6. 6,852 (not falling within classes 1 to 4 inclusive. The group movement figures are included in the other answers).

Note: With the consent of the member the various parts have not been broken down into countries of origin.

IMMIGRATION—DIRECTED EMPLOYMENT IN CANADA—DISPLACED PERSONS

Mr. Churchill:

1. Do sponsored or nominated immigrants sign an agreement to take directed employment?
2. If so, of those who have signed agreements to take directed employment, how many have carried out their agreements under the following categories with respect to the years 1949, 1950, 1951 (a) skilled machinists; (b) bush workers; (c) mine workers; (d) farm workers; (e) domestic workers; (f) other categories?
3. How many in the above categories have been brought in by the Department of Citizenship and Immigration, and how many by the Department of Labour, since January 1, 1951?
4. Is refusal or failure to carry out an agreement to take directed employment a deportable offence and, if not, is there any other penalty?
5. Are the penalties exacted? If so, in how many cases for each of the years 1949, 1950 and 1951?
6. Has the Department of Labour followed the practice of demanding $150 (less $12.50 a month worked on contract) from d.p.'s in directed employment? If so, under what authority has this been done?
7. Has the Department of Citizenship and Immigration followed the practice indicated in (6) above?
8. How many cases have occurred in (6) and (7) above?

Questions

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce):

1. No.

2 to 5. Not applicable in view of answer to No. 1.

6. Yes. When arrangements were first made in 1947 with the international refugee organization for the group movement of displaced persons it was provided that workers who failed to fulfil their voluntary undertaking to the Minister of Labour would be required as a deterrent to pay $150 less a credit of $12.50 for each month which they did work in accordance with the voluntary undertaking.

7. D.p.'s who came forward in bulk movements to directed employment have all been handled by the Department of Labour.

8. (6) 1949-50, 445; 1950-51, 155; 1951-52, 59; (7) not applicable.

FILM BOARD—"HOW TO BUILD AN IGLOO"

Mr. Charlton:

1. What was the total cost for the production of the national film board picture, "How to Build an Igloo?"

2. What distribution has there been on this film to date?

Mr. Winters:

1. $2,831.01.

2. This film was made from purchased footage and released early in 1950. Prints placed in circulation are as follows: Canada, non-theatrical and circuit prints—69; abroad, through various non-commercial channels—61. In addition 96 prints of the film have been sold in Canada and abroad. Audience totals are reported only in respect to non-theatrical distribution in Canada, the total to August 31, 1951, being 242,345. This film is also in active circulation on a contract with Times Television Inc., New York, through television channels in the U.S.A., and has been televised on 12 stations to date.

ARMED FORCES—ENLISTMENTS AND DISCHARGES, 1951

Mr. Catherwood:

1. What has been the total combined enlistments in the three branches of the armed services for the first ten months of 1951?

2. Of this number, how many have been discharged from military service during the same period?

3. What proportion of the above-mentioned enlistments were for the army?

Mr. Claxton:

1. 32,817.

2. 1,978.

3. 56.5 per cent.

INDUSTRIAL AND OFFICE WORKERS—WEEKLY WORK PERIODS

Mr. Knowles:

1. Has the government any statistics as to the number of (a) industrial workers; (b) office workers now on (i) a five-day week; (ii) a five and a half day week; (iii) a six-day week?

2. If so, what are the numbers of each of the above groups of workers who are working for each of the periods indicated above?

Mr. Cote (Verdun-La Salle):

1. Yes.

2.

Distribution of plant and office employees working a five-day and more than five-day week based on 1950 Department of Labour survey.

Industries	Plant Workers		Office Workers		Total covered by Dept. of Labour survey	Total in industry (labour force survey)
	5-day week	Week of more than 5 days	5-day week	Week of more than 5 days
Manufacturing	468,000	256,000	94,000	41,000	859,000	1,261,000
Trade	34,000	107,000	13,000	40,000	194,000	518,000
Service	4,000	31,000	.....	.....	35,000	781,000
Mining	21,000	49,000	.....	.....	70,000	78,000
Forestry	10,000	67,000	.....	.....	77,000	96,000
Totals	537,000	510,000	107,000	81,000	1,235,000	2,734,000

Note: The Department of Labour annual survey is based on returns made by approximately 16,000 establishments having 15 or more employees, each.

The extent to which the five-day week applies to workers not covered by this survey is not known.

Complete statistics are not available on workers in construction, transportation or in agriculture. In transportation there are approximately 155,000 workers in steam railways on the five-day week, while in agriculture there are more than 100,000 paid workers, very few of whom are on the five-day week.

Questions

PURCHASE OF SEMINARY FOR USE OF R.C.M.P.

Mr. Hodgson:

1. Has the government purchased the seminary in the vicinity of Overbrook for the use of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police?

2. If so, how much was paid, and what were the terms of purchase?

Mr. Fournier (Hull):

1. No.

2. Answered by No. 1.

WAR VETERANS ALLOWANCE APPLICATIONS

Mr. Brooks:

1. How many applications for war veterans allowance were (a) received; (b) granted; (c) rejected, in each of the eighteen district offices (W.V.A.) between dates October 1, 1950, to October 1, 1951?

2. Of those rejected (a) how many were appealed to the war veterans allowance board from each district; (b) how many subsequently granted by the board from each district?

Mr. Mutch:

October 1, 1950 to September 30, 1951

MR. ROY G. PEERS

Mr. Hodgson:

1. Has Roy G. Peers of the city of Montreal, Quebec, been named vice-president of Canadian Commercial Corporation?

2. Where is the said Roy G. Peers presently located, and what are his duties?

3. Is the said Roy G. Peers and one R. G. Peers, named as vice-president of the Ming Sung Industrial Company of Canada Limited, one and the same person?

Mr. McIlraith:

1. Yes.

2. Mr. Peers is located in Washington. He was appointed to facilitate the integration of the Canadian and United States defence production effort and to make known in appropriate quarters in the United States the availability of productive facilities in Canada for defence work.

3. Yes. Mr. Peers severed his connection with the Ming Sung Industrial Company of Canada as of August 1, 1951.

PERMITS FOR BUTTER IMPORT

Mr. Fraser:

What are the names of the four firms to which permits were issued for the importation of butter, during the year 1951?

Mr. McIlraith:

F. Griffin, Board of Trade building, Montreal, P.Q.; Loblaw Groceterias Co., Ltd., Fleet and Bathurst streets, Toronto, Ont.; Lovell & Christmas (Canada) Ltd., 160 King street, Montreal, P.Q.; Olive & Dorion Ltd., 722 St. Paul street, Montreal, P.Q.

SUBSIDIES TO PACKERS OF APPLE JUICE

Mr. Diefenbaker:

1. Have any subsidies been paid, advanced or promised to be paid, during the present year, to packers of apple juice?
2. If so, what are the names of the companies that will benefit and what is the amount of the anticipated expenditure during the current year?

Mr. Gardiner:

1. No.

2. Answered by No. 1.

C.P.R. AND C.N.R., SASKATCHEWAN—MILEAGE AND GRAIN TRANSPORTATION, ETC.

Mr. Helme:

1. What mileage of railway in the province of Saskatchewan is owned and operated by (a) Canadian Pacific Railway; (b) Canadian National Railways?
2. What country elevator storage space in the province of Saskatchewan is located on (a) Canadian Pacific Railway; (b) Canadian National Railways?
3. How many bushels of wheat, oats, barley, rye and flax were moved from country elevators in the province of Saskatchewan to terminal elevators, during the period August 1, 1951, to October 31, 1951, by (a) Canadian Pacific Railway; (b) Canadian National Railways?

Mr. McIlraith:

1. (a) and (b).

Single track mileage in province of Saskatchewan, end of 1950: Operated by Canadian Pacific Railway 4,520 miles; Owned by Canadian Pacific Railway 4,329 miles. Operated by Canadian National Railways 4,411 miles; Owned by Canadian National Railways 4,410 miles.

2. Elevator storage space in the province of Saskatchewan is located on (a) Canadian Pacific Railway 76,520,400 bushels; (b) Canadian National Railways 73,839,000 bushels.

3. Adjusted car loadings in the province of Saskatchewan for the period August 1, 1951, to October 31, 1951 are as follows:

(a) Canadian Pacific Railway: Wheat 19,537 carloads; other grains 4,310 carloads.

[Mr. McIlraith.]

(b) Canadian National Railways: Wheat 21,041 carloads; other grains 4,171 carloads.

The railway companies compile their returns by railway districts which in some cases overlap provincial boundaries. These figures have been adjusted by the board of grain commissioners and should be considered as an estimate.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

MANITOBA AND BRITISH COLUMBIA FLOODS—ASSISTANCE GRANTS

Mr. Low:

1. How much did the Department of National Defence charge the province of Manitoba for assistance provided by that department, during the flood of 1950?
2. Was the bill paid by the province of Manitoba? If so, when?
3. How much did the Canadian government pay to the province of Manitoba as a grant to assist the province in meeting the expenditures involved in the 1950 flood?
4. How much did the Department of National Defence charge the province of British Columbia for assistance provided by that department, during the flood of 1949?
5. Was the bill paid by the province of British Columbia? If so, when?
6. How much did the Canadian government pay to the province of British Columbia as a grant to assist the province in meeting the expenditures involved in the 1949 flood?

MAINTENANCE OF LAURIER HOUSE AND KINGSMERE

Mr. Hodgson:

1. How much money was bequeathed by the late Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King for the maintenance of Laurier house and Kingsmere?
2. What is the cost monthly of maintaining each establishment including light, heat, telephone and staff?
3. Who are employed by the government on each property, what is the salary of each, and their office hours?
4. How much money was spent on each of the said properties since they have been taken over by the government?

AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTS—PRICES

Mr. Wright:

1. What was the ceiling price, support price and average market price of the following agricultural products in the period 1943, 1944, 1945 (a) eggs; (b) cheese; (c) butter; (d) whole milk; (e) hogs; (f) apples; (g) potatoes?
2. Are there floor prices established for any of these products today?
3. If so, what are these floor prices?

Mr. Sinclair: This question asks for the ceiling price of a number of commodities. In the years in question the wartime prices and trade board had a great number of ceiling prices on these goods depending on the locality and time of the year. I have discussed the question with the hon. member; he has agreed that he does not want a great deal of clerical work to be done, and has agreed to drop the request for the ceiling prices. Otherwise, the question is an order for return.

Mr. Speaker: Order for return.

CHINA

REPORTED CRUELTY IN TREATMENT OF CANADIAN MISSIONARIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gordon Graydon (Peel): I should like to direct an inquiry to the Prime Minister, notice of which I gave him earlier in the day. Is he in a position to say what official word has been received as to the reportedly harsh and cruel treatment being accorded to Canadian missionaries in red China?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Unfortunately, I am not in a position to give any information about the events that have been reported in the press as having taken place over the last two or three days. It will be remembered that on April 16 the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) made a statement in the house regarding the situation of five Canadian sisters of the Immaculate Conception who had been arrested by the Chinese communists in Canton. It was at that time hoped that representations made by the United Kingdom chargé d'affaires in Peking on their behalf as well as on behalf of other Canadian citizens held in custody would bring an improvement in their condition. Well, we are informed that no such improvement occurred, and the chargé d'affaires made further strong representations to the Peking government on September 1, and on September 10, when parliament was not in session, the department issued a press release. Perhaps it might help if for the convenience of hon. members I tabled a copy of the press release containing the information that was available up to that time.

During the past two days news services have carried stories of the formal prosecution and sentencing of the five nuns at so-called public trials on December 1. According to these reports, Sister St. Alphonse du Redempteur, (Antoinette Couvrette, born at Ste. Dorothée, Quebec) and Sister Marie-Germaine (Germaine Gravel of St. Pasteur, Quebec) were sentenced to five years' imprisonment. Sister Ste. Foy (Elizabeth Lemire of La Baie du Febvre, Quebec), Sister St. Victor (Germaine Tanguay, born in Acton Vale, Quebec) and Sister Ste. Germaine (Imelda Laperriere of Pont Rouge, Quebec) were ordered to be deported from China. The Canadian government has no official confirmation as yet of these reports.

We know that the five nuns have been in a Canton prison since March of this year when they were arrested on what was considered to be the fantastic charge of being responsible for the deaths between October 14, 1949, and January 14, 1951, of over two thousand children who had been receiving care in their orphanage. Their arrests followed upon Canton newspaper stories and the demands of women's organizations that they be severely punished for the maltreatment and murder of children. It may be true that quite a large number of children have died at the orphanage, but the Chinese authorities chose to ignore the fact that the majority of the children brought to the sisters were already ailing and beyond hope of recovery when accepted by them. The sisters consistently accepted all children brought to them for help, whatever their condition was at that time, and no matter what were their chances for survival.

As I have already said, no official report regarding the trial of the five nuns has yet been received in Canada, and it is possible that it may be difficult to secure any accurate and reliable information about the so-called trials. I can assure the house that everything possible will be done to help these unfortunate sisters without bringing more harm on them or other Canadians who are being detained by the Chinese communists at this time. I think that the order of expulsion may be perhaps the most happy denouement, and it would be unfortunate if anything we said or did brought about, as has happened in the past, revocation of the order of expulsion, or the placing of difficulties in the quitting of the country.

The house will be shocked and indignant at the treatment which has apparently been meted out to a group of missionaries who for years have consecrated their lives to the care of orphan children in China; but it will be at the same time sensitive to the extreme delicacy of the situation and the necessity of avoiding any act or word which may add to their present distress. Within the next few days we hope to have more definite information on the whereabouts of the three nuns whose expulsion has been ordered, and on the situation of the two who have been sentenced to terms of imprisonment. We are hopeful that we may, through the British authorities in Hong Kong, be able to get information from and about these nuns, because we presume that they would go through Hong Kong on their way out of the country. I shall naturally keep the house informed of anything that we can regard as accurate in the way of information about them.

Inquiries of the Ministry

GRAIN

ASSISTANCE TO FARMERS—PAYMENTS ON FARM STORED GRAIN, ETC.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. In view of the radio news reports concerning an announcement made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) in the west over the week end, can the Prime Minister say whether legislation will be introduced at this session to provide payments on farm stored grain and financial assistance to farmers with grain out under the snow?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker, I am not in a position to do that. I have already told the hon. member that we were having the matter investigated, and that just as soon as we had come to a decision I would hasten to apprise the house of it. It will not be expedited by repeating the question. I will not forget his anxiety to have the information, and will bring it down just as soon as we reach a conclusion about it.

Mr. Argue: I think I should tell the Prime Minister—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Argue: —that according to the radio news reports the Minister of Trade and Commerce has already announced such a provision.

IRRIGATION

SOUTH SASKATCHEWAN RIVER—SITE OF DAM—MEETINGS OF COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Lake Centre): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. It has to do with a report regarding the Saskatchewan river dam irrigation commission. Has the government advised that commission that the site of the dam on the Saskatchewan river was not finally determined by the government engineers? As a result of so being advised, has the commission ceased its meetings for the time being?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): That is all news to me, Mr. Speaker. We made available to the commission all the data that was in the possession of the government with respect to the engineering possibilities of that project. I was under the impression that it had been fully established by competent engineers that it was feasible, and that the only remaining question was whether or not it would constitute, as to its cost, a prudent investment of national funds.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I have not made myself clear. Did the government, in the report given to the commission, inform the commission as to the location on the Saskatchewan river where the dam would be constructed provided the government went ahead with it?

Mr. St. Laurent: Well, I will have to take that as a notice. I was under the impression that all the engineering features had been disposed of. There was not, to my knowledge, any communication about those engineering features, other than what was contained in the engineering reports that were made available.

Mr. Diefenbaker: And that did determine location.

Mr. St. Laurent: Whether or not that did definitely determine location is something I would have to inquire about. I cannot say at the moment.

PUBLIC WORKS

ALEXANDER AVENUE WHARF, WINNIPEG, MAN.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Public Works. Has the government received representations from the Winnipeg and St. Boniface harbour commissioners asking that the Alexander Avenue wharf, on the Red river at Winnipeg, be enlarged to meet the increased demand for dockage facilities? Will consideration be given to extending this wharf at an early date?

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the hon. member would be kind enough to let this stand as a notice. I will seek the information from my officials, and when I receive it I shall give the answer.

Mr. Knowles: I shall be glad to do so. However, may I say that I sent notice to the minister earlier today. Apparently it did not reach him.

Mr. Mutch: You have had the letter a week.

FINANCE

NON-DEFENCE EXPENDITURES—QUESTION AS TO EMPLOYMENT OF EFFICIENCY COMPANY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask a question of the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance, of which I have given notice. In view of the fact that the press release of the Acting Minister of Finance of November 24 last shows an increase in non-defence expenditures of $37·7 million in the first seven months of the current year—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I suggest the hon. member should put his question more briefly.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Yes. I wish to ask the parliamentary assistant whether, in view of the increase to the extent of $37·7 million instead of the $35 million decrease, predicted by the minister for the year, the government is proposing to employ the services of an efficiency company, as was done in the case of the national film board, with what we have been told by the Minister of Resources and Development (Mr. Winters) were excellent results.

Mr. James Sinclair (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Finance): I am indebted to the hon. member for giving notice of his question. His question is based upon a statement of the Acting Minister of Finance to the effect that our non-defence expenditures in the first seven months of this year are up $37·7 million over what they were in the first seven months of last year. In answer I would like first to put the question in proper perspective by saying that this amounts to one per cent of the budget for this year. When the hon. member realizes the increases in wages and living costs which have occurred in Canada over the last year, he will understand that every industrial firm in the country envies the efficiency of the Department of Finance in holding the increase in the cost of government over seven months down to one per cent.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): May I be allowed to point out that when the minister made the statement—

Some hon. Members: No, no.

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): May I be allowed to point out—

An hon. Member: Ask your question.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): —that the minister said he had taken into account the various increased expenditures anticipated—

Some hon. Members: Question, question.

An hon. Member: Steamroller.

FISHERIES

TREATY NEGOTIATIONS WITH JAPAN AND UNITED STATES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Fisheries if he will make a statement at an early date concerning the progress of negotiations with the United States and Japan with respect to a fisheries treaty. Incidentally I am sure we are all delighted to see him back in his seat today.

Hon. R. W. Mayhew (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, I left Tokyo after the principles of the agreement had been pretty well agreed to. The writing of the agreement itself was still in progress. The hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Applewhaite), who was also there, will be home on Wednesday. Just when my deputy minister will be back I cannot say, but it will probably be toward the end of next week. After his return, and after I have reported to my colleagues, I shall be in a position to make a statement to the house.

Mr. McIvor: I am sure we all approve of the Minister of Fisheries. He is not afraid to be shot at, either away from home or at home.

FURS

IMPORTATION FROM RUSSIA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. Chester S. McLure (Queens): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe). In his absence I shall address my question to the Prime Minister. Is it the intention of the government to follow the United States in prohibiting the importation of Russian furs into Canada?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): The matter has not yet been considered by the government.

NEWFOUNDLAND

CONSTRUCTION OF COLD STORAGE PLANT AT PETRIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. J. Browne (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Agriculture, of which I gave notice a few days ago. However, both he and I have been away. Is it true that the federal government is contributing to the cost of building a cold storage plant at Petries, Bay of Islands, in Newfoundland, and what is the amount of the commitment made for that purpose? Would the minister state the estimated cost of construction, the amount the Newfoundland government is contributing, and the amount private investors are contributing, and who will be charged with that?

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the Cold Storage Act provides that before any grant can be made by the federal government under that act, application must be made by those whose intention it is to construct the plant. It must be consented to before any work is actually done under the plan of construction. Up to date we have had no application from this company for assistance, and therefore I am not in a position to give any of the information asked for.

HOUSING

PROTEST AGAINST PREMATURE PAYMENT OF MORTGAGE MONEY UNDER NATIONAL HOUSING ACT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Resources and Development. Has the minister been advised of the protest of some forty residents of East Kildonan, Manitoba, against the payment of the balance of the mortgage money on their N.H.A.-built homes, before receiving clearance from the buyers of these homes? Will the minister look into this situation, and see what can be done to meet the claims of the purchasers of these homes?

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Resources and Development): Mr. Speaker, with respect to the first part of the question I have not been advised; with respect to the second part, my reply is that I shall look into it.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed, from Wednesday, November 28, consideration of the motion of Mr. Robert Cauchon for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Drew.

Mr. J. W. Noseworthy (York South): Mr. Speaker, when the debate was adjourned last Wednesday we were discussing the question of federal aid to education. That discussion arose out of an answer made by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) to a question asked by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) on Tuesday, November 27, 1951, as recorded at page 1355 of Hansard. I shall return to that question and answer later.

At the outset I wish to say that the question of federal aid is not one in which only a few individuals are concerned. It is one that is of wide concern to all Canadians, generally. It is a question that has been a subject of public discussion, to my personal knowledge, for nearly a quarter of a century. In 1938, as chairman of the educational finance committee of the Canadian teachers federation, I appeared with a committee on behalf of that federation before the Rowell-Sirois commission in this city to place before it arguments in favour of federal aid for education. During that same year teachers' organizations in every province throughout Canada appeared before the commission as it moved across the country. Since that date such national organizations as the trade union congresses, national and provincial organizations of ratepayers and school trustees, national and provincial organizations of home and school clubs, various manufacturers associations and boards of trade, and home owners associations throughout the country have all lent their support to federal aid for education. The matter is one of too much concern to too many people in Canada to be peremptorily laid aside and dismissed without any further consideration by any one person, even if that one person is the very highly respected Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. St. Laurent).

It is generally agreed that it is the right of every Canadian child to secure the best in education, consistent with his need and capacity, that the resources of the state can provide. That is accepted today as the birthright of Canadian children. It is also agreed that such an opportunity cannot be afforded to Canadian children so long as we continue to finance our schools as we do today. There can be no justification in a democracy for providing at public expense better educational opportunities for the future citizens of one section of the country than are provided for those of another part of the country. Since our children are born as Canadian children, as Canadian citizens and not provincial or municipal citizens, the educational opportunity which is afforded to any Canadian child in any municipality in Canada is a matter of importance to the whole of Canada.

It is true that the control of education was delegated by the terms of the British North America Act to the provincial authorities, and in my opinion it was delegated to them for two reasons. First, there was the necessity of safeguarding the racial and religious interests of the minorities. Without the safeguarding of these racial and religious interests, confederation would have been impossible. The second reason, which I think carried weight at that time, was that in 1867 there was no widespread belief in this country that education was a matter of great national importance or that education was of importance outside the provinces.

The necessity of safeguarding the racial and religious interests of minorities is as great today as it was in 1867. Nevertheless it has been proven conclusively over the years, and beyond any shadow of doubt, that federal support can be given to education without any interference with the rights of the provinces in this matter. Our most recent grants-in-aid to universities are being given with the distinct understanding that the federal government will in no way interfere with the freedom of our universities nor the right of the provinces to exercise their constitutional authority over these same universities. The federal government's magnificent support of education for the men and women of world war II is only another example of federal aid to education given within the terms of our constitution and without interference with provincial rights.

The need for federal aid for education at the elementary and secondary school levels goes much deeper into our national life than appears on the surface. It involves more than the provision of equal educational opportunities for Canadian children, important as that may be. It touches the conditions of home life in our communities. Today there are tens of thousands of Canadians, particularly in the low income groups, who require houses at a cost that they can afford to pay. The federal government recognized this fact in the terms of our national housing legislation. Provision was made therein whereby the federal government might enter into agreements with provinces and municipalities for the building of low rental houses. Even with the federal government's generous offer to bear 75 per cent of the cost and of the deficits of those houses, that has been a failure. So far as I can find out, not one single house has yet been built in Ontario under the terms of that legislation.

Provincial authorities in Ontario tell me that municipalities are reluctant to have low rental houses built within their boundaries. Why? Because working class people as a rule still raise comparatively large families—surely something to be encouraged rather than discouraged. Large families mean heavy taxes for education, and as long as municipalities and real estate in municipalities are required to carry the larger share of that cost you will have municipalities objecting to the building of low rental houses within their boundaries. Because we get no low rental houses, families today are forced to live in crowded and often unsanitary conditions, to live under conditions that discourage the raising of families and have a very undesirable effect upon those who are being raised. Federal aid for education is actually becoming a matter of more and more vital importance to the welfare of Canada as a nation. It is too important to warrant its rejection by the federal government on a mere technicality.

May I point out further that our neighbours to the south are faced with a similar constitutional problem, but they have in large measure solved that problem. The fact that the individual states in the union have constitutional control over education has not prevented their federal government from making generous grants-in-aid to education at every level. Their experience has shown that these grants can be made without impairing the constitutional rights of the states over education. Surely it is time that we in Canada took an adult view of this matter.

Returning to the question and answer which provoked this debate, the question asked by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), which will be found reported at page 1355 of Hansard of November 27, was as follows:

> Has the government received from the Winnipeg school board, and perhaps from others, a request that consideration be given to extending federal aid to education generally?

The answer of the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), to be found on the same page, was as follows:

> While I have the responsibility as the head of the government I would have to ask my colleagues to join with me in refusing to consider such a request.

When I spoke last Wednesday I did not have the exact wording of that answer before me and at the time I was inclined to agree with the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. McIlraith) when he said that the Prime Minister's reply applied only to a specific question with regard to the Winnipeg school board. The question asked by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre went beyond the specific question raised by the Winnipeg school board. It embraced others and asked whether consideration was being given to extending federal aid to education generally. It was in answer to that question that the Prime Minister stated that as long as he was leader of this government he would have to ask his colleagues to refuse to give consideration to that matter.

I submit that we should hear from the Prime Minister whether or not the interpretation I have placed upon his answer is the correct one. I say that that is about the only interpretation that can be given. Thousands of Canadians who are interested in this matter will be disappointed to learn that the Prime Minister refuses any longer even to consider the extension of federal aid to education generally, particularly after the sympathetic attitude which he seemed to take toward this subject when it was being debated on October 19, 1949, and I refer hon. members to page 947 of Hansard of that date.

While the Prime Minister did not commit himself or his government to the granting of federal aid he was far from refusing even to consider it. Possibly the Prime Minister has given consideration to this subject since 1949 and it may well be that he has discovered opposition which has led him to change his point of view. If that be the case then I think in a matter of such importance to so many people and to all parts of Canada we should be told what factors caused him to change his mind. That there has been a change of mind is I think borne out by a comparison of his statement last week with some of those which he made back in 1949. For example, we read on page 946 of Hansard of October 19, 1949, a statement by the Prime Minister as follows:

> I am sure all hon. members have welcomed this opportunity of focusing their attention upon this assertion, one which certainly appeals to each and every one of us, that there should be across Canada the greatest possible degree of equality of opportunity for the education of our young Canadians, the Canadian of the next generation.
> Whether or not the granting of financial assistance by the federal government to the various provinces could be arranged in such a manner as to avoid exercising any direct or indirect control over the field of education, which is essentially within provincial jurisdiction, is a question offering greater possibilities of controversy.

The Prime Minister admitted that this field did offer possibilities of controversy, but there was no indication that he would refuse to consider the question. As a matter of fact, every advance that we have made in dominion-provincial relationship over the years has been made in fields where there was a possibility of controversy. We faced up to those questions and arranged to work out a program that would be acceptable to both the provincial and federal governments.

The Prime Minister went on to say that a royal commission had been appointed to investigate questions regarding the promotion of the development of the aspect of national life in Canada which is not measured in statistical trade returns, or in dollars and cents, or in pounds and shillings. Then he urged that we wait until the report of the royal commission had been received, and he continued:

> —and I should think it would be wise not to attempt to determine with any degree of precision how the purposes can best be served until we have had that report.

I take it that that is spoken in a very different vein and indicates a great deal more sympathy than the answer given last week. I say again that either as a question of privilege or with the consent of the house the Prime Minister, not the hon. member for Ottawa West, should tell us at this time what is the government's position on this question.

Mr. H. A. Hosking (Wellington South): Mr. Speaker, it is an honour for me to rise today to take part in this debate, because it is a day of home-coming for so many famous and illustrious ministers, who have brought honour to our country by their performance in foreign countries. Sitting here listening to them today has been a treat and an honour which I shall remember as long as I live. I happen to be the 139th speaker who has taken part in this debate, and I should like to make some mention of the opinions of the speakers who have preceded me.

While I listened to the hon. member for Yukon-Mackenzie River (Mr. Simmons), the seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne, I was taken back to the time when I enjoyed the first fruits of education, and that was reading and enjoying a novel. I well recall struggling through the pages of Robinson Crusoe; living his trials, holding my breath at his dangers, and glorying in his successes. As I listened to the hon. member, I found myself following him with rapture as he turned the pages and chapters of the story of the northwest. I was just as enraptured as when I laboured over the history of Robinson Crusoe. The story was a challenge to anyone who prizes opportunity for advancement and progress above comfort and so-called security. May I thank him for the inspiration he has given to all of us.

I want to thank also the mover, the hon. member for Beauharnois (Mr. Cauchon). I noticed the rapt attention with which those who understood the French language listened to him, and I was envious that my education was not broad enough to permit me to enjoy the eloquence of his address. It took me back, however, to the time when I first heard a great man from his province, and I am referring to that distinguished corporation lawyer who is now the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) of the Dominion of Canada.

The time of which I speak was a convocation at Queen's university in the year 1930 when the present Prime Minister was invited to give the convocation address. I happened to be one of the thousand-odd students who, along with our parents and friends, had the opportunity of listening to this great educationalist. At that time he expounded most of the policies that he has put into effect since he has become leader of the Liberal party. His address was an inspiration to me, and I shall remember it as long as I live. After having heard him make that address, it is easy to understand why he assisted his government in deciding that they should give some 7 millions of dollars to the universities, Little did I think, as I sat listening to him, that I would have the opportunity of being a supporter of his in the government of Canada.

If I may, sir, I should like to put on Hansard some of the facts that he disclosed in his address, and some of the activities in which he expected students of a university might be engaged. During his address he said the country looked to the university graduates for leadership. This is the paragraph which I should like to put on Hansard:

> That leadership may take, and it does take, various forms. It may be leadership in the direction of the affairs of the state; leadership in the local affairs of the community; leadership in its economical activities whether industrial or commercial, or leadership in its intellectual and moral outlook on the problems which confront the individual and which he has to solve or with which he has to deal in his own daily life. It may be that leadership which places one in a position of authority where he compels others by regularly organized methods of constraint to do that which he determines and to abstain from that which he forbids. Or it may be that leadership which is effective only because its compelling force is derived from its own intrinsic appeal to the good sense and intelligence of those who recognize it and follow it.

Many times I have thought how that paragraph fits his performance in this house. In the same address he had a few words to say about some of the policies of our socialist friends down to the left. He is referring—

Mr. Brooks: May I ask from what the hon. member is quoting?

Mr. Hosking: A speech made by the Prime Minister when he was Mr. St. Laurent.

Mr. Brooks: Is it in book form or is the hon. member quoting from some magazine?

Mr. Hosking: No, I am just quoting from some notes of his speech. He said:

> Oh, we vote, and we criticize and we grumble frequently enough, but do we realize that the things we criticize and grumble about are just as bad for the other members of the community as they are for ourselves. . . .

I could not help but think how applicable that is to our socialistic friends who are never satisfied with the lot we have in this country, even although it is recognized as being the second best country in the world. I have often wondered just how much damage their propaganda does to the morale of the people of this country. It may be that in the years which lie ahead esprit de corps will be necessary in this country, and I wonder how much damage our friends to the left have done to our morale and to the esprit de corps of our people.

In this address the Prime Minister mentioned the challenge to the engineers:

> And now just a few words about the professional engineers. I will only venture a few sketchy observations. We have heard a lot about unemployment in the last few months. And I am told that the hydro electric power the engineers have put to work in the province of Quebec alone is equal to the working capacity of 25 million men. It amounts to 2½ million horsepower, and within five years another 2½ million will have been harnessed, and will be seeking employment.

That was at a time when everyone was complaining about unemployment, and how mechanization was creating unemployment. Here was a man speaking to university men who would be looking for jobs, and he was telling them that it was necessary for us to develop this country. He was advocating the development of these resources at a time when most people believed we should stop developing things which would have the tendency of eliminating manual labour. What would have happened had we not had men of his vision at that time to encourage the development of the natural resources in this country? What would have happened when Hitler attacked us had we not had men of his principles formulating the policy and telling us to go ahead and do what was right regardless of the cost?

My reason for introducing this speech by the Prime Minister, and its association with education, is due to an incident that took place in this house on November 27 when the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) asked this question, as recorded at page 1355 of Hansard:

> May I direct a supplementary question to the Prime Minister? Has the government received from the Winnipeg school board, and perhaps from others, a request that consideration be given to extending federal aid to education generally? Is consideration being given to this question?

The Prime Minister's reply was as follows:

> I do not know that any such representations have been received. While I have the responsibility as the head of the government I would have to ask my colleagues to join with me in refusing to consider such a request.

The reason for that reply is quite clear. Our Prime Minister, in his brief statement, enunciated a general policy of the Liberal party. It has always been the policy of the Liberal party, as long as I can remember, to take the stand that the dominion government must obey the provisions of the British North America Act. They have not the right to interfere in any of the laws which are the responsibility of the provinces and the municipalities. We are responsible for the money we collect in taxes. If we give grants to the primary and secondary schools, then we must be responsible to see how that money is spent. No one, by any stretch of the imagination, could consider that the dominion government should get down to the directing of primary and secondary schools. That is something that must necessarily follow if they make grants to them. We must be responsible for how the money we collect in taxes is spent. I was extremely proud to hear the Prime Minister, in two short sentences, express to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre the policy of the Liberal government not to interfere in the everyday life of the citizens; education is the responsibility of the citizens at municipal level. It was gratifying to hear the Prime Minister enunciate this policy. I hope he will long continue to carry out those policies.

Mr. Knowles: Did anyone ask him to interfere?

Mr. Hosking: The suggestion that he is not interested in education could be amply disproved by the fact that this government has seen fit to allot some $7 million to universities so that they could produce more graduates. I again suggest that the reason for this policy is that the government is possibly the greatest employer of university graduates. Such graduates are required by all departments. They are very important for the national research department. The dominion government therefore has a national responsibility to see that men with these qualifications are produced to carry out the necessary functions in order to give us good government. To ask the dominion government to take part in the everyday education of the lives of our citizens is something that I do not think should be done. I hope that I do not live in a state where that takes place.

Mr. Knowles: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Hosking: Yes; I am quite willing to do that.

Mr. Knowles: Will the hon. member explain why the making of grants to universities is not considered as interference but that the making of grants to education generally would be regarded by him as interference?

Mr. Hosking: The question is a good one.

Mr. Noseworthy: What is the answer?

Mr. Hosking: The dominion government is interested in all things that deal with the dominion as a whole. When the dominion government is assisting university graduates it is dealing with a finished product which the dominion as a whole will use to a greater and greater degree in every department. It is quite a different situation when we come down to the primary schools.

Mr. Knowles: Most people have to get a general education before they can go to university.

Mr. Hosking: I should like to commend the Prime Minister on the way in which he has dealt with this matter. I am envious of him also, because he could enunciate the policy of the Liberal party regarding education clearly and decisively in two sentences whereas I have had trouble in trying to enunciate the same policy to the satisfaction of my hon. friend in the space of several minutes.

There are one or two things further that this debate prompts me to say. One is with regard to our credit restrictions. I happen to be in a business that is hurt by credit restrictions possibly as much as is any other business in the dominion. When I was going to university I was in that business not as an owner but as a labourer. I should like to make a few comparisons between the period of 1929, 1930 and 1931 and the present day. I can remember quite well selling, in 1929, an automobile to a customer, going to school for the winter, then coming home the next summer and finding that car sitting in the place of my employment to be resold again because it had been seized. I can remember selling it again that summer, the next summer when I came home, finding the same automobile sitting there in that same lot to be sold a third time because it had been seized from its second owner.

Today I am in the automobile business as a dealer and I speak with some knowledge of the situation. I can say that most automobile dealers are extremely fortunate people in that these credit restrictions have been applied. I am referring principally to the credit restrictions as applied by the banks. I know of many dealers who have their credit set at the bank at a figure which was required by them six months ago when they had few used cars in stock and thus required a small amount of capital. Today many of them could use more capital in order to put more used cars on their lots, but the banks will not allow them to increase their borrowings. Thus, they are not allowed to put more dollars into used cars on their lots. If the credit restrictions of the banks were removed, I am convinced that we would see many millions of dollars in used cars standing around in the used car lots of the Dominion of Canada. You may well say to me: What effect has that on the financial stability of the Dominion of Canada? I would suggest that there would come a time when the banks, through fear as to the financial responsibility of the individual dealers, would come to them and say: You must somewhere find some money with which to pay off your loans. The minute that situation arose no new cars would be ordered from the producers by the dealers across the dominion and we would have a situation of serious unemployment in the manufacturing plants of the automobile industry, while millions of dollars' worth of used cars were being sold from the various dealers' lots. There is a marked parallel between conditions now and in 1930. Our government has prevented from taking place this year what took place in 1930. I should like to suggest that this situation applies also with respect to those who are selling electrical appliances, electric refrigerators, washing machines and so on. That applies to any industries where they are trading in used articles which they will have to sell to customers at a later date. I should like the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) to bear this in mind. If it should happen—and I hope it will—that some relief can be given in his taxation program in the next year, I hope he will remember that automobiles, refrigerators, stoves and washing machines are considered by many people to be essential. I hope he will remove some part of the new high tax which now exists on these commodities. I am very pleased that it would appear that this action might be possible. Thus I hope that when the minister considers his new budget he will bear this in mind, and I am sure that it will meet with favour amongst most of the people across the dominion.

Mr. Noseworthy: Will the hon. member permit a question? Will the hon. member tell us why, in his opinion, federal grants in aid of technical and vocational schools is not an interference with provincial rights, while grants in aid of secondary schools would be?

Mr. Hosking: The policy of the government has always been to allow the municipalities to run their own governments as they saw fit, and not to encroach on the rights of the provincial governments as laid down by the British North America Act. This would be a complete contravention of that.

Mr. W. Ross Thatcher (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, I rise to take part in this debate for one specific purpose. Since I have raised the same matter several times before I shall detain the house for only five minutes. I wish to protest, and protest vigorously the continued failure of the government to allocate to certain maritime and prairie provinces their fair share of the huge defence contracts. It seems to me that the greatest single weakness of Canada's defence effort so far has been the lack of any real attempt to decentralize this nation's industrial potential. Last February I asked the Minister of Defence Production (Mr. Howe) for a breakdown, by provinces, of the defence contracts which had been let in the first nine months of that fiscal year. When the figures were tabled I thought they were quite significant, because Ontario and Quebec in that period received 82 per cent of all the contracts that had been let. Prince Edward Island, New Brunswick, Newfoundland and the three prairie provinces together received only 4·5 per cent. My own province of Saskatchewan obtained only one-tenth of 1 per cent of the total contracts—only a little more than the Yukon.

Since that time many opposition members and some government supporters have pointed out the dangers of this policy, the weaknesses in it, and the unfairness. We were repeatedly promised by various government spokesmen that something would be done to rectify the situation; that something would be done to spread out these contracts in a little fairer way. I recall the Prime Minister speaking on February 26. He told parliament that it would be healthier for the country as a whole if industries were spread out in a more diversified fashion. The Minister of Defence Production time and again has told the house that his department was trying to diversify defence contracts. As a matter of fact, last February the premier of Manitoba wrote to the Minister of Defence Production and asked him for a larger share of defence contracts for Manitoba. According to the Toronto Saturday Night the Minister of Defence Production replied to Mr. Campbell, and I quote from page 23 of the issue of November 24:

> I can assure you at the outset that there is no lack of desire here to place contracts with Manitoba firms. The Canadian Commercial Corporation have instructions to give a preference to firms in Manitoba and on the prairies in considering tenders on military equipment, and I am sure that they are doing so.

Well, Mr. Speaker, as a western member I should like to know where that preference is. Despite all the promises which have been forthcoming, month after month as these lists are tabled, we still find that at least six provinces in this dominion are not being given anywhere near their share of defence contracts. I think the time has come to do something about this matter. I have been personally surprised at the reticence shown by the department in giving to the house actual provincial break-downs. Many hon. members have requested such information. I recall doing so myself on two or three occasions. I recall the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Dinsdale), the hon. member for Royal (Mr. Brooks) and others asking the minister to break down these defence contracts by provinces. But always he has refused to do so. The parliamentary assistant has maintained that they were not available. Here is what he said at page 1010 of Hansard:

> The information as to defence contracts awarded is available and published for each two-weeks period, but the break-down by provinces as asked for is not available.

The arguments that he has used for refusing the information have been twofold. First, he maintained that the lists do not contain subcontracts. Second, he argued that contractors' postal addresses are not necessarily in the province where the work is being done. For myself I cannot accept the validity of the parliamentary assistant's arguments in this connection. But even if we do accept them as valid, I think it is inconceivable that it would affect the over-all picture any more than in a very minor way. I say that this information has been refused opposition members simply to keep the facts from the country as a whole.

After trying every other way to get the information that I wanted I decided last week to analyse the lists myself. I want to say that I do not think a member of parliament should have to waste hours on detailed work of this kind. We have not got adding machines in our offices, and other office equipment which is necessary. There are hundreds of civil servants in Ottawa who are paid to do such a job. I think the parliamentary assistant has been lax in refusing us the desired information. Since April 1—I think that is the time the department was set up—13 lists have been put out giving all the defence contracts which have been let. They are numbered C-1 to C-13, and the heading of each of them is: "Defence contractors awarded defence orders aggregating in excess of $10,000." I would like to give the house a break-down of those figures as I have analysed them. I said that the period covered is seven months, April 1 to October 31. I have compiled them in round figures, omitting the thousands. They are as follows:

Defence contracts allocated April 1 to October 31

Province	Dollar value in thousands	Percentage of total
Newfoundland	162	·03
Prince Edward Island	1,520	·32
Nova Scotia	29,940	6·48
New Brunswick	8,218	1·78
Quebec	163,131	35·34
Ontario	186,431	40·38
Manitoba	16,981	3·67
Saskatchewan	4,460	·96
Alberta	11,884	2·67
British Columbia	37,164	8·05
Yukon and Northwest Territories	1,692	·36
	461,583

That means, Mr. Speaker, that the two central provinces received 75·72 per cent of all the defence contracts during the past seven months. It also means that the three prairie provinces put together received only 7·30 per cent, with Saskatchewan getting only ·96 per cent. I may add that most of Saskatchewan's contracts were airports. These days Alberta could almost be classified as an industrialized province. Yet it received only 2·67 per cent. Surely these figures make two things perfectly clear. First of all, at least six provinces of our confederation are being treated unfairly, as far as defence contracts are concerned.

Mr. Smith (Moose Mountain): Where did the airports go in Saskatchewan?

Mr. Thatcher: What has that got to do with it? One of them went to the best constituency in that province—Moose Jaw.

Mr. Smith (Moose Mountain): What is the name of it?

Mr. Thatcher: And I am pleased about the locality. The fact remains however—and I think my hon. friend would agree—that our province has not received our share of industrial contracts.

Mr. Smith (Moose Mountain): I am not quarrelling, but I was just wondering where they went.

Mr. Brooks: You know where they went.

Mr. Thatcher: One to Moose Jaw and the other to Saskatoon. Perhaps if a few Liberal members would cry louder for defence contracts we might obtain a larger share.

In the second place these figures indicate that no conscious effort is being made by the Department of Defence Production at this time to decentralize industry. I would repeat that in my opinion this fact is one of the greatest weaknesses in our present defence program.

The citizens of my province are going to be doubly perturbed by these figures, coming as they do on top of the recent census figures. We realized last month when we saw those figures that while most provinces have enjoyed sharp increases in population between 1941 and 1951, Saskatchewan lost 67,000 people. In the past few years the trend in rural areas has been toward larger and larger mechanized farms. In the war years we lost thousands of our younger people to the industries of central Canada. That trend is still continuing, and particularly since Korea. Unless something is done to help the outlying provinces industrialize, they may lose even more of their population in future.

I believe most hon. members would agree that, purely from the point of view of defence, it is not wise to have all our industries centralized in these two central provinces. If an atomic war should come, then, as has been pointed out, three or four well-placed atomic bombs could probably neutralize much of the nation's industrial potential. It seems to me that it is the duty of the federal government to help any part of the nation that is in danger of sliding backwards. My province and certain others need help today, so that they may have industries to keep their population.

In the allocation of defence contracts, the government could use its influence to promote the decentralization I have advocated. Therefore I urge the Minister of Defence Production (Mr. Howe) to give the outlying provinces, and without further delay, their fair share of defence contracts. The people of Saskatchewan want no more than is properly coming to them—but they certainly want no less. I have no doubt the same is true of the other provinces.

Mr. J. H. Blackmore (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, while I am deeply interested in federal aid to education, and have favoured it for a number of years, and while I am deeply interested in the decentralization of industry so that the other provinces may have a share of industrial development during the war, I hope I shall be excused for refraining from discussing either of these most interesting topics on this occasion.

For a short time I desire to turn my attention to the dairy industry of Canada. Canada needs the dairy cow. There can be no sound and enduring national economy without a dairying industry equally enduring and sound.

Particularly in the Canadian economy, the dairy industry must be sound. The percentage of the total cash farm income derived from dairy products in 1950 was as follows:

	Per cent
Canada	14·7
Quebec	29·2
Nova Scotia	23·8
British Columbia	18·9
Ontario	17·6
New Brunswick	16
Prince Edward Island	14·6
Manitoba	8·6
Alberta	7·3
Saskatchewan	4·7

These figures are provided by the national dairy council. From the dairy cow comes about 40 per cent of the beef and 60 per cent of the veal used by Canadians. The market for Canadian coarse grains in eastern Canada is provided by eastern farmers who buy extra feed for their stock—generally dairy stock. In western Canada 2·6 million tons of coarse grains each year, on an average, move into eastern Canada as feed, to be used mostly for dairy cattle. The figures show that 16·64 per cent of the entire live cattle shipments to the United States in 1950 consisted of dairy and purebred cattle, to the number of 67,900 head.

United States demands for Canadian dairy cattle and calves have been increasing in the last few years. Millions of dollars have come from that source to eastern Canadian farmers.

The figures show that 450,000 Canadian farmers alone depend upon receipts from dairy products, as a necessary source of income. We find this at page 3 in a fine little document published by the national dairy council, entitled "The Top Six Inches of Soil".

The dairy cow contributes $600 million annually to Canadian commerce. And, according to the same authority, the dairy cow at all times stabilizes the Canadian economy, and often she is the saving of many of the farmers. We had an excellent example of that during the depression. Production, manufacturing, processing and distribution of dairy products in some 2,000 dairy plants provide the direct or indirect livelihood of 17 per cent of Canada's total population. This is indicated in another fine little booklet of the national dairy council entitled "What is Best for Canada".

Soil fertility maintenance will always be a "must" for every wise people and government. In Canada this truth applies with cogent force. Many, many farms have been abandoned in Canada—far, far too many, and especially in Ontario and the maritime provinces. Great numbers of farms in Canada have simply become worn out. When we contrast that situation with the way in which the fertility and yielding capacity of soil in most parts of Great Britain have been preserved down through the centuries, we must find cause for complete shame in Canada.

Far, far too many of our farmers in Canada merely mine the soil. This is particularly true through the western provinces. The mechanization of our farms is rapidly displacing the horse, with his requirements of fibre-restoring pasture and his natural return of nutrients to the soil. This is a matter which has been given too little attention in calculating policy for Canada.

Over a great percentage of this country erosion by wind and water is taking place at an alarming rate. Surely we do not have to wait until this nation becomes a pile of rocks before the people in responsible positions take common-sense action, and do something about it.

As reported in the Alberta wheat pool budget of November 23, 1951, the research laboratory of the experimental farm at Swift Current points out that the weight of an inch of water falling upon an acre of soil is close to 110 tons. The drops falling upon the bare soil splash about 22½ tons of clay or clay loam. The run-off can carry away a substantial weight of this soil to where it becomes non-available. From the 1936-1948 progress report of the division of field husbandry, soils and agricultural engineering of the central experimental farm, Ottawa, we learn the following as to the effect of manure on water erosion of soil:

Results on soil and water runoff on summerfallow and corn plots on a 10 per cent slope are available from two series, one of which received 16 tons of manure per acre at the time the plots were established in 1944 and again in the fall of 1947, and the other has received no manure.

The average loss per acre for a cropping season during the period 1945 to 1948 inclusive on the manured summerfallow plot was 31·9 tons of soil and 228·2 tons of water, as compared with 38·1 tons of soil and 298·5 tons of water on a plot similar except that no manure was applied. Where corn was grown, the runoff was 31·1 tons of soil and 289·3 tons of water on the manured plot as compared with 39·3 tons of soil and 319·8 tons of water where no manure was applied.

Manure improves the physical condition of the soil favouring greater absorption of water, and consequently less erosion occurs.

The dairy cow is the greatest rehabilitating agent available to man. Let us never forget that. There are three main means of rehabilitating soils: first, through artificial fertilizers; second, through green manure by the plowing under of legumes, sweet clover, red clover and the like; and third, through livestock manure. Barnyard manure from cattle is in every way the best means of rehabilitating soil. I should like to refer to a national dairy council of Canada report based on experiments and observations at our experimental farm. The article reads:

Farmyard manure constitutes the most valuable by-product of the farm. During the last war the Department of Agriculture estimated that 114,147,000 tons of manure exclusive of bedding materials are produced each year by the livestock in Canada. On the basis of average chemical analyses of the excrement from various species of animals, the nutrients in the total manure produced would be equivalent to 3,353,550 tons of sulphate of ammonia, 1,024,145 tons of superphosphate (20 per cent P205) and 1,137,825 tons of muriate of potash.

In addition to these potential nutrients manure adds large quantities of valuable organic matter to the soil, thereby improving the tilth of both light and heavy soils.

The approximate amount of nutrients in a mixture of fresh manure from the common species of farm animals is 10 pounds of nitrogen per ton of manure, 5 pounds of phosphoric acid and 10 pounds of potash. One mature milk cow would produce about 1 ton of manure a month. At this rate milk cows in Canada last year produced over 43 million tons of manure of a fertilizer potential in terms of soil nutrients of 216,540 tons of nitrogen, 108,270 tons of phosphoric acid and 216,540 tons of potash.

What is the best combination of means of rehabilitating soils? Experiments have been conducted for a good many years in Canada in an effort to determine whether or not artificial fertilizers can replace manure, whether artificial fertilizers together with green manure can sufficiently rebuild soils, or whether it becomes necessary to have barnyard manure, and just what is the result of combining the three one way and another. An experiment has been conducted in Lethbridge in which hon. members will be interested. It has to do with sugar beets, wheat and alfalfa. I should like to quote a page from "Silver Sunshine", a document published by Canadian Sugar Factories Limited. It is the fall edition, 1951. I read from page 5, as follows:

Each plot consists of four fertility treatments: 1. Barnyard manure and mineral fertilizer; 2. barnyard manure only; 3. mineral fertilizer only; 4. no additions.

The barnyard manure is applied and ploughed in the fall of the year prior to the first year beets at the rate of 30 tons per acre. This manure taken from the livestock barns and feeding corrals is piled for a year to kill weed seeds, before it is spread on the plots. Until the last few years, triple superphosphate was drilled in with the beet seed at 100 pounds per acre on the plots receiving mineral fertilizer. Due to the shortage of this fertilizer, 11-48-0 is now used at the same rate.

The ten-year average yields (1941-1950) are tabulated below.

If I may have permission, Mr. Speaker, I should like to have the table put on the record. Is there any objection?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Beaudoin): Is there any objection?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Blackmore: The table is as follows:

Ten-year average yields* (1941-1950) of crops grown in an eight-year irrigated rotation at the Dominion Experimental Station, Lethbridge, Alta.

	Treatment
	B. Man. and Min. Fertilizer	B. Man. only	Min. Fertilizer only	No additions
Sugar beets ..	21·54	21·14	12·80	3·10
Sugar beets ..	20·15	19·27	14·03	4·00

Alfalfa hay ..	3·23	2·34	1·40	0·94
Wheat	41·30	33·00	31·80	27·40

*Sugar beet and alfalfa yields in tons per acre; wheat yields in bushels per acre.

Barnyard manure was applied at 30 tons per acre once in the rotation cycle. One hundred pounds of 11-48-0 was applied with the beet seed twice during the rotation. No fertilizers were applied directly to any crops but beets.

At page 23 of a 1936-48 progress report of the dominion experimental farm there is an article entitled "Soil Fertility Investigations" by A. J. MacLean, which is very valuable in this connection. To save the time of the house, I also ask permission to put this on the record. It contains a valuable tabulation.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Beaudoin): Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Blackmore: The article reads as follows:

The maintenance and increase in crop yields through the use of farmyard manure, green manure and chemical fertilizers has been the object of a number of experiments conducted over a long period of years.

Comparison of Farmyard Manure and Chemical Fertilizers

In order to learn the extent to which chemical fertilizers may be used to replace or supplement farmyard manure, an experiment begun in 1910 at Ottawa is still in progress. In this experiment, located on a sandy loam soil, a rotation of mangels, oats, clover, and timothy is followed, and the treatments consist of farmyard manure, chemical fertilizer, manure supplemented with chemical fertilizer, and a check plot where no manure or chemical fertilizer is applied. The manure treatment provides for 15 tons of farmyard manure per acre for the mangel crop. The chemical fertilizer treatment consists of 100 pounds of nitrate of soda, 300 pounds of superphosphate (16 per cent), and 75 pounds of muriate of potash, per acre for mangels, and 100 pounds of nitrate of soda per acre applied for each of the other crops in the rotation. Where farmyard manure is supplemented with chemical fertilizer, 7·5 tons of manure, 50 pounds of nitrate of soda, 150 pounds of superphosphate (16 per cent), and 37·5 pounds of muriate of potash are applied per acre for mangels, and 100 pounds per acre of nitrate of soda are applied for each of the other crops in the rotation. In terms of nutrients supplied, the rate employed for the manure treatment was higher than that for chemical fertilizer. A rate of 15 tons per acre of farmyard manure as used would supply approximately 120 pounds of nitrogen, 90 pounds of phosphoric acid, and 120 pounds of potash. The chemical fertilizer treatment is applied in the experiment at such a rate as to supply 64 pounds of nitrogen, 48 pounds of phosphoric acid, and 37·5 pounds of potash.

Safety in respect of supply of bedrock needs of life as to food, clothes and shelter must ever be a first-rating rule for a people who would be free and stay free. I am afraid this matter has been completely overlooked by those people who have been running us helter skelter into a margarine economy instead of a dairy cow economy. The need for self-sufficiency is altogether too little regarded in this age. We hear so much talk about nondiscrimination, multilateral trade, taking down trade barriers, and I don't know what not, most of these arguments being completely fallacious and originating in the notion that we should remove all our defences so that every other nation no matter how powerful economically can prey upon our markets.

Let us bear in mind that the only nation really safe economically is the one that produces its own. It is very much like the farmer. If he produces his own he has his own, and if he does not he may find himself without. Let us take sugar as an example. I have mentioned this several times in the house. During world war II we had to depend on the goodwill of an international board for the sugar we had to have for Canadians. We could have prepared ourselves to produce in Canada all the sugar we needed. We still could get ourselves into that position, but we persist in remaining in the position where we have to rely on an international board, a considerable number of whose members may be antagonistic to us at any given time. Such being the case, all that any group of internationalists have to do in order to bring Canada completely under their control is to threaten to cut off our sugar. Now we are getting to the position where they will be able to cut off our butter, cream and milk supply, or our vegetable oil supply, while we in Canada are capable of producing so much more of all dairy products than we can possibly use that our record would be astounding if we once liberated our productive capacity.

Let us bear in mind particularly now this matter of self-sufficiency. If we want to be free we have to become self-sufficient. That does not mean we can become completely self-sufficient, but it does mean we can become self-sufficient in so far as we are able to, and certainly that includes dairy products. There is a special need for self-sufficiency in respect of such a valuable product as milk. I should like to read from a pamphlet entitled "The Top Six Inches". It is a valuable document prepared by the national dairy council, and indicates just how valuable milk is. It reads:

> As a source of these vital nutrients, dairy products are undeniably leaders among the food groups. On the basis of eight principal food groups (dairy products, fruits, vegetables, cereals, meat, fish and poultry, eggs, fats and oils, sugar and syrups) Canadian food consumption figures show that dairy products:
> Rank first as a source of calcium, supplying 81 per cent. This nutrient builds bones and teeth and is essential to digestion, regular beating of the heart and the clotting of the blood.
> Rank first as a source of riboflavin, supplying 57 per cent. This vitamin aids metabolism and aids in avoiding eye difficulties.
> Rank third as a source of protein, supplying 26 per cent. This nutrient is especially important for the formation of new tissues during growth and convalescence after illness.
> Rank third as a source of fat, supplying 21 per cent. This supplies energy.
> Rank third as a source of vitamin A, supplying 17 per cent. This nutrient tends to reduce susceptibility to infection by keeping the tissues healthy.
> Rank third as a source of ascorbic acid, supplying 7 per cent. This nutrient prevents scurvy and anemia.
> Rank fourth as a source of thiamine, supplying 16 per cent. This vitamin stimulates growth.
> Rank fifth as a source of niacin, supplying 4 per cent. This vitamin prevents pellagra and skin diseases.

May I stop to make a comment. If for any reason we should be cut off from milk for our people, think of the dangers we should run into. I quote again:

> Special attention should be drawn to milk as a source of protein. While it is an important source of all protein consumed, it is vastly more important as a source of the essential amino acids which make up the structural units of protein. Research has shown that these essential amino acids must be consumed simultaneously in order to be effective for building tissue. Milk and milk products are a complete source of these amino acids, along with meat and eggs. Of the proteins containing all of the essential amino acids, milk and its products comprise almost half, and are the largest single source of these vital elements.

And again:

> Let's look at milk as a supplier of what nutritionists deem to be the daily minimum requirement of the various nutrients. Looking at it from this point of view, we find that one pint of milk alone per day would supply the average adult male with—93 per cent of the minimum requirement of calcium; 83 per cent of the minimum requirement of riboflavin; 29 per cent of the minimum requirement of protein; 18 per cent of the minimum requirement of vitamin A; 32 per cent of the minimum requirement of thiamine; 10 per cent of the minimum requirement of vitamin C; 8 per cent of the minimum requirement of niacin; 10 per cent of the minimum requirement of iron.

I ask any intelligent man or woman in Canada: Can we under any circumstances run the risk of depriving our people of these vital essentials by risking the destruction of our dairy industry? It just passes understanding that such a reckless thing as we are doing now should even be contemplated, much less indulged in, by intelligent men running a nation.

There is another aspect of this whole question. Canada, being one of the so-called "have" nations, must be more and more ready to help her neighbours in their need, those who live in less favoured lands. Have we not had plenty of evidence of that? What are we doing about it? Are we taking all the steps possible to see to it that in respect of dairy products, for example, we shall be able to help them? Not a step. We are just displacing our dairy herds as fast as we can through the importation of vegetable oils.

Canada's capacity to increase production is very great. As an illustration which is just a little off the beaten path may I show what Germany did. Germany has a very large population in a very small area. Germans have had to be good household managers nationally for a long time. Here is what they did in respect of sugar beets, which shows how rapidly the productive capacity of a nation can be developed. From 1870 to 1903 Germany paid out over $340 million in sugar beet subsidies. During that same period through crop rotation used in producing sugar beets she increased her average yield of cereals from 14 bushels per acre to 34·9 bushels per acre, more than double. Germany by becoming the greatest grower of sugar beets increased her average yield of cereals by 80 per cent in the period 1879 to 1909. An account of this can be read in a little booklet called "Why Canada needs Sugar Beets", at page 15. That document quotes from publications prepared by the league of nations up to 1934; the figures are authentic.

We often hear people say we cannot increase our production in Canada. Anyone who says that is absolutely unrealistic. We have had enormous increases in the production of many commodities. Think of what we have done in the past in respect of hogs, poultry, honey, dairy products and beef. Everybody knows that we can increase the production of all those commodities. Many people say that we have not the men to do the work. The men are already on the farms. Most of our farmers are able to do a fine job on the side in respect of producing any of these commodities, all of which would improve their farming condition, if we got off their backs with our idiotic taxation structure and ended this government's mismanagement generally with respect to costs. If that is done, they can produce far more than is needed in any province of this dominion.

What has been the result of our policy upon our dairy herds? Right now Canada's dairy herds face utter ruin, and I mean just that. No industry can stand up against the kind of competition we are subjecting the dairying industry to. It simply cannot be done. What is happening to Canada's dairying industry? I should like to read into the record some statements from another fine document issued by the national dairy council called "What is best for Canada? The coconut or the cow?" Here is what they say:

> Canada is paying out tens of millions of dollars each year for imports of cheap foreign oils.
> Milk production provided $750 million purchasing power for Canadians last year.
> Dairy facts
> 1945, human population, 12·1 million; 1951, 14·1 million; change, up 2 million.
> 1945, dairy cow population, 3,998,000; 1951, 3,541,700; change, down 456,300.
> 1945, total milk production, 17·6 billion pounds; 1951, 16·4 billion pounds; change, down 1·2 billion pounds.
> 1945, milk production per capita, 1,455 pounds; 1951, 1,163 pounds; change, down 292 pounds.
> 1945, total butter production, 347 million pounds; 1951, 307 million pounds; change, down 40 million pounds.
> 1945, total cheese production, 189 million pounds; 1951, 92 million pounds; change, down 97 million pounds.
> 1949, margarine production, 74 million pounds; 1951, 105 million pounds; change, up 31 million pounds.
> The critical decline in the dairy industry is due to two major factors:
> 1. Higher prices for other farm products such as beef, hogs, grains, etc;
> 2. The lack of confidence on the part of 450,000 dairy farmers as to the future of the industry as a result of the unfair competition created by inadequate controls on substitutes manufactured from cheap foreign produced oils. (An increasingly large portion of these oils, at prices of only 12 cents to 15 cents per pound, are imported without duty of any kind. The balance, from a country which has banned the import of Canadian dairy products, pay duty of about 1½ cents a pound only.)

And then further on:

> The decline in the dairy industry has become so acute that in 1951 Canada, an agricultural country: Imported: 21 million pounds of butter; 10 million pounds of cheese; 6 million pounds of non-fat dry milk powder, and was unable to supply sufficient fluid market milk to meet the demands of many urban centres in western Canada.
>
> Just a few years ago dairy products were among Canada's biggest exports. Today, with a deteriorating international situation we are not able to meet our own domestic needs. This is a national problem.

I would say it is a national disgrace.

> Unless these trends are halted immediately, prices for all milk products as well as beef and veal (about one-half of which come from dairy herds) will become scarcer and more costly.

The last occasion upon which the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) spoke of this matter he sought to minimize the seriousness of this decline. He produced figures to show that our dairy production is not seriously below that of 1939. The minister had neglected certain important considerations. The first is that 1939 was, in effect, still a depression year. In that year Canadians would have consumed far less milk than they needed for optimum health. They simply were not able to buy it. The second consideration is that Canada's population has increased since 1939 roughly 25 per cent. If the Canadian population continues to increase at the average rate of growth from 1946 to 1951, then in order to provide Canadians in the year 1955 with the amount of milk they consumed per capita in 1950 we shall have to produce an additional 1·7 billion pounds of milk, which will require an additional 300,000 cows. I do not know that the situation needs to be more serious than that.

Unless we take steps at once, and the right kind of steps, to aid our dairymen, Canadians will rue this day through which we are passing for a long time to come. Possibly they shall rue it when the means of remedying the situation will have been largely removed from their control.

What are the causes of this dangerous decline? The first cause is the low cost of margarine. The second reason for this decline is the high cost of butter. As everyone knows, butter has risen rapidly in price. On October 17, 1951, basis Toronto delivered, the price was 69 cents per pound, according to figures provided me by the national dairy council. The third reason is the low cost of vegetable oils, to which I have already referred. Prices in the United States market for crude vegetable oils on October 16 were as follows: cottonseed oil, 14·5 cents; soybean oil, 13⅝ cents; peanut oil, 16⅜ cents; coconut oil, 14 cents. In February, just a few months earlier, the prices for these same products were as follows: 24½ cents; 21⅛ cents; 27 cents and 24¼ cents. This shows how rapidly the price of these vegetable oils is going down, while the price of butter must unquestionably go up or we shall not produce butter.

The fourth reason is a lack of tariff protection against incoming vegetable oils. Oils, including copra, enter into Canada from British preference countries and certain other of the principal edible oil exporting countries in the world entirely free of tariff duty. Most oils from the United States used in substitutes pay only 10 per cent tariff duty, or approximately 1½ cents per pound at today's prices. This information was provided by the national dairy council.

The fifth reason is the rapid increase of percentage use of vegetable oils in margarine, 1950 to 1951. They have come to use more and more of this vegetable oil in the manufacture of a given weight of margarine. As the percentage of oils used increases, so the margarine becomes cheaper to produce. The percentage of coconut and other vegetable oils, mostly peanut, used in the manufacture of margarine increased from 10·8 per cent in the January-August period of 1950 to 23·9 per cent of the total in the same period of 1951. This represents an increase of 146·3 per cent in the utilization of coconut and other oils in the first eight months of this year compared with last. Again these figures are supplied by the national dairy council. What is the result? A tremendous growth in the over-all importation of vegetable oils. I have a set of figures which I shall put on Hansard, if it is the will of the house, which reveal the low cost of margarine to retail stores. This set of figures which was prepared by the dairy council is very enlightening.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Beaudoin): Is there any objection to these figures being put on Hansard?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Blackmore: The table is as follows:

Costs of Oleomargarine

	Cents per pound
	Cottonseed Oil	Soybean Oil
	(As of 5/5/49)
Crude oil	11·75	10·87
Freight from mill to refinery	·28	·28
Unloading and refining	·25	·25
	12·28	11·40
Credit for fonts	·65	·65
	11·63	10·75
91 per cent field	1·05	·97
Prices f.o.b. refinery	12·68	11·72

Present oleomargarine formulæ call for 70 per cent cottonseed oil and 30 per cent soybean oil, so:
Cost of cottonseed oil in formulæ is	8·88
Cost of soybean oil in formulæ is	3·52
Cost of oils in oleomargarine formulæ	12·40
Bleaching	·10
Hydrogenation	·14
Deodorizing	·24
Addition of lecithin	·10
Loading and icing cars	·02
Administrative	·15
Shrinkage (1½ per cent)	·37
Finished margarine oil—f.o.b. refinery	13·52
Freight from refinery to oleomargarine plant	·35
Cost delivered to oleomargarine plant	13·87
Over-run (produced by the weight of water, salt and milk solids in oleomargarine yield 122·5 per cent	2·30

Cost of oleomargarine (before following costs)	11·57
Manufacturing labour	·65
Manufacturing overhead	·41
Federal excise tax stamps	·25
15,000 units, vitamin A	·80
Salt, emulsifier, skim milk	·50
Wrapper, carton and shipping container	1·33
Shipping labour	·05
Shipping overhead	·07
Oleomargarine plant overhead	·21
Cost of packaged oleomargarine—f.o.b. factory	15·84
Selling expense	·57
Administrative	·15
Freight	1·00
Cost delivered wholesale warehouse	17·56
Delivery cost to retail store	1·50
Cost delivered to retail store	19·06
Gross profit (before advertising and taxes)	5·94
Average prices retailers paid for oleomargarine (est.)	25·00

The result of this has been again a tremendous growth in the over-all importation of vegetable oils. I have another table prepared by the council which illustrates this. With the permission of the house I should like to put it on Hansard.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Blackmore: The table follows:

Consumption of Oils and Fats in Margarine—July, August, 1951 and Jan-Aug. 1950 and 1951

(in thousands of pounds)

Grand totals	11,384	56,308	50,472

The high price of beef also is causing men to go out of dairy cattle. Everyone knows that excessive increases in farmers' costs is causing them to cut down their herds. From the Searle Grain Company's letter of November 21, 1951, I read the following statement:

> The study reveals that farmers' costs have risen from 217·4 in April last to no less than 226·7 for August, on a base of 1935-9 equals 100.

Most of the increases in those costs are the results of the policies of the government we now have in power. There have been increased freight rates, and all that kind of thing.

The next thing that is likely to cause our dairy industry to be ruined is the undesirability of the work, and the responsibilities involved in dairying. Anyone who has had the experience in dairying that I have had—and I lived all my life on a dairy farm, until I graduated from university—will know how undesirable dairying is. Once we drive the dairymen out of the dairy business, we shall have plenty of trouble getting them back into it or in getting others to go into it. Once we destroy our dairy herds, we shall have more than a little trouble replacing them.

What are we to do with this problem? We could use tariffs against vegetable oils. In one of its fine publications the national dairy council says:

> It is proposed that the imposition of adequate excise taxes on oils imported and used in dairy products substitutes would assist in re-establishing that confidence in the future of dairying which lack of action on the proposal up to this time has served to undermine.

This is from a publication "What Is Best for Canada", at page 4. It is small wonder that the council suggests this measure as its main remedy. As the council points out, Canada gives tariff protection as follows:

Product	Tariff Protection
Tobacco,	65 cents to 95 cents per pound.
Washing machines,	22½ per cent to 35 per cent.
Refrigerators,	20 per cent to 40 per cent.
Clothing,	25 per cent to 35 per cent plus per lb.
Hats,	27½ per cent, plus 90 cents per dozen to 35 per cent plus $1.25 per dozen.
Boots and shoes,	27½ per cent to 40 per cent.
Raincoats,	27½ per cent to 35 per cent.
Automobiles,	17½ per cent to 27 per cent.
Beer,	55 cents to 65 cents per gallon.

Now, think of that. Furthermore, the council has cited the fact that the Canadian tariff on dairy products ranges as follows: I have here a national council document which I would be pleased to put on Hansard illustrating this point. It would be very valuable for all members of the house.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Blackmore: The table is as follows:

CANADIAN TARIFF ON DAIRY PRODUCTS

Tariff Item	Commodity	Unit	Rate of Duty
			British Preferential	Most Favoured Nation Tariff	General Tariff
18	Butter	lb.	8¢ 5¢ Australia and New Zealand	12¢	14¢

44	Condensed milk with coffee	"	25 per cent	35 per cent	35 per cent

We protect our dairy products against other dairy products, but leave them defenceless against oil.

The council cites the United States duties applicable to dairy products from Canada. They are shown in another document which I think should be placed on Hansard because it will be of interest to the people of the country and the hon. members of the house. It was submitted to me on the authority of the dairy council.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Blackmore: The table is as follows:

United States Duties Applicable
Dairy Products From Canada

Whole milk—2 cents per gal. quota 3,000,000 American gals. In excess of this amount 6½ cents per gal. (Subject to possible reduction to 1·62 cents per gallon. Quotas subject to upward revision. Ex-quotas subject to reduction of ½ present rates.)

Cream—15 cents per gal. quota 1,500,000 American gals. In excess of this amount 56⁹⁄₁₀ cents per gal. (Subject to possible reduction to 14·5 cents per gallon. Quotas subject to upward revision. Ex-quotas subject to reduction ½ present rates.)

Butter—7 cents per pound. Quota of 50 million pounds for all countries for period Nov. 1 to March 31 and quotas of 5,000,000 pounds in each of the periods April 1 to July 15th, and July 16 to October 31st. Canada can participate in this quota. After quota is filled duty is 14 cents per pound.

Cheddar cheese—3 cents per pound, minimum ad valorem 15 per cent (Subject to reduction to 2 cents per pound or 12½ per cent minimum ad valorem.)

Whole milk powder—3¹⁄₁₀ cents per pound.
Skim milk powder—1½ cents per pound.
Lactose—25 per cent ad valorem.
Cream powder—6½ cents per pound.
Evaporated milk—1 cent per pound.
Condensed milk—1¾ cents per pound.

The remarkable thing in dealing with the United States is that here is a country with 150 million people, with better resources than any other nation on the face of the earth, with the highest industrial development probably to be found anywhere; and according to this information that nation strictly protects its dairy industry by the various means of control indicated in the document which I have put on Hansard. Yet we foolhardy people in Canada suppose that our dairy industry can get along without that protection.

The question is, what to do? A tariff would naturally tend to force up prices of dairy products substitutes greatly to the distress of consumers. I am opposed to any increased costs to consumers. At this time they are paying all they can possibly stand. Most consumers throughout this country are at their wit's end to know how to make ends meet.

We could use an excise tax upon the manufacture of margarine and all substitutes for dairy products. Again this would increase consumer costs. We could use a subsidy on milk and all milk products.

I have a document here prepared by the national dairy council which shows what it would cost to apply a subsidy. If it is the desire of hon. members, I should like to put it on Hansard.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Blackmore: This memorandum reads as follows:

Butter

To pay a 10 cents per pound subsidy on creamery butter (8 cents per pound on butterfat) on the basis of 1951 production estimates would require 27·7 million dollars.

Fluid milk

During the war years a 2 cents per quart consumer subsidy and a 1·5 cents producer subsidy was paid on milk for fluid consumption.

To pay a 3 cents per quart subsidy based upon fluid milk sales estimated for 1951 would require 41 million dollars per year.

Per capita consumption of fluid milk reached a peak of ·88 pints per day in 1945. In order to regain this per capita consumption on the basis of 1951 population an increase of 715 million pounds of milk would be utilized.

We could use guarantees of prices of materials entering into production of dairy products, also guarantees of prices and markets for our finished dairy products. We could use quotas to avoid vegetable oils displacing Canadian dairy production. We could use any effective combination of these five devices, but I demand that there be no increase in the cost of dairy products to Canadian consumers, or any increase in the cost to consumers of substitutes for dairy products. Personally as an adequate means of reviving our dairy industry I prefer an extensive and consistent use of subsidies together with rigid import quotas on vegetable oils entering Canada.

I have just this to add in closing, Mr. Speaker. The Canadian dairy industry simply must be saved and in the saving process there must be no increase in price to consumers of dairy products or substitutes therefor. If we are to avoid serious danger —and I mean every syllable of that phrase— we must begin the saving process right now.

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I wish to detain the house for a few minutes on a matter which I think is of interest and importance. But before doing so I wish to take just a minute to put on the record what I found some difficulty in putting on it earlier in the afternoon because at that time hon. members did not seem to be greatly interested. I was interested in the light-hearted brushing aside by the parliamentary assistant of the words which were, I think, uttered seriously by the finance minister and which were taken seriously by this house last April. I propose to read just a sentence or two from what the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) then said, which will indicate what I was not able to indicate owing to the enthusiasm shown an hour and a half ago by those who so valiantly support everything a government member says. This will indicate that the Minister of Finance apparently spoke seriously, and that he gave the house to understand that the various increased costs had been taken care of in his estimates. As reported at page 1801 of Hansard the Minister of Finance said:

> The estimates placed before parliament for this year show a reduction of $35 million below last year, despite an increase of more than 10 per cent in salary and wage levels, despite higher materials and construction costs, and despite an increase of nearly $40 million in old age pensions, family allowances, tax rental agreements with provinces, and similar payments that rise automatically with increases in population and the value of production. The numbers of employees engaged in normal government administration are being reduced . . .

And so on. I shall not pursue the matter further, Mr. Speaker, but I just want to reiterate that we had this afternoon, in the answer given to me, what I regard as a rather clever escape or attempt to escape by an utterly irresponsible answer, having regard to what the minister said last April.

I wish to take a few minutes of the time of the house in order to bring to the attention of hon. members some remarks made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) which seemed to me to have been in the highest degree uncalled for, to put it mildly. These remarks were made before the United Nations first of all last January; then further remarks were made a few weeks ago in Paris. At a time when it seems highly desirable to safeguard and nourish common understanding, the minister seems to have gone out of his way to heap criticism on commonwealth statesmen for decisions made by them. Moreover, the line which he took was entirely inconsistent with the line taken at the time by the government of which he is now a member and which at that time he was serving in another capacity.

I shall have to touch on matters which carry the mind back more than a decade; but the excursion into the past, which will be brief, is the minister's responsibility and not mine. I am sorry he is not here today. I have tried to give notice to his parliamentary assistant. I think today is my only chance to bring this matter before the house. It is a matter which has attracted attention outside of the house, and I consider it to be right and proper that it should be put on the record of the house also.

In a speech last January before the first —political—committee of the United Nations, the minister referred to a certain statement of principles prepared by the so-called "cease-fire" group of which he was a member, and referred to criticisms made of this group on the ground that they were, in the minister's words, "in danger of repeating the betrayal of Munich". The minister then went on to use these words:

> The tragedy of Munich . . . was not in going there. It might have been better if more governments had been able to accept the responsibilities of being there. The tragedy was in what was done there and our statement of principles did not I think recommend doing anything that meant the betrayal of a people or a principle, nor was it a weak surrender to armed pressure or a naive misunderstanding of a political situation.

Those are the minister's words. Then later the minister referred to > My country which—

In his words:

> —was not represented at Munich.

Munich was evidently greatly on the minister's mind because he returned to it again on November 12 before the United Nations in Paris. Here are the words that he then used:

> It is always easy to secure peace and a kind of security on the other man's terms. But we know where that can lead—to the humiliation of a Chamberlain or the death of a Mazaryk.

I am not one of those who applauded Munich. I was not satisfied then, and I have never been satisfied since, as to the wisdom of what was done there. I felt deeply the abandonment of the Czechs and the loss of the Skoda works and the Czech divisions. As I said a moment ago, nothing that has happened since has definitely satisfied me of the wisdom of what was done. But notwithstanding my views, it seemed to me that at that time any fair-minded man would feel that the statesmen who were carrying the appalling responsibility of that time were entitled to sympathy. I have refreshed my memory by rereading the press of that time, and it recalls the tension and the appalling anxiety which was felt by people who had not yet really girded themselves to face war again. We recall the stories of trenches in Hyde Park and all that kind of thing.

Again I say that no man of fairness or common sense should have criticized the decision except in moderate words, and never should have criticized it except as an error of judgment. How different are the words which I have already read such as "betrayal", "weak surrender" and "naive misunderstanding". I found them to be extremely jarring. The minister knows the meaning of words, and it will not surprise him to know that the dictionary defines "betrayal" as "a treacherous giving up to an enemy". One would have thought that the minister's own difficulties in reaching conclusions in the Korean affair would have prevented him from using language of this kind. For example, I contrast his language with the language of Mr. Eden, who had resigned from the Chamberlain government, who was extremely dubious about Munich but who hailed Munich as at any rate a "respite", who referred to the "unparalleled ordeal" that Chamberlain as prime minister had been through, and who said that the people of England owed him "a measureless debt of gratitude" for his "sincerity and pertinacity". Those were the words of a man who really did not approve of Munich but who understood and sympathized with the appalling responsibility which was carried.

I now return to one other point. The minister referred to Canada not being represented. The clear implication of that reference is that there would have been no "betrayal", no "weak surrender" and no "naive misunderstanding" if only we had been there. You will remember the facts, Mr. Speaker. What are the facts? Was the government of Canada silent? Was it critical or noncommittal as to what happened at Munich? What did Mr. King, Mr. Lapointe and their colleagues say at that time? It is quite clear. It is contained in a cable sent by the then prime minister, Mr. King, immediately after the events of Munich, in the following terms:

> Ottawa, September 29, 1938
> The Right Honourable Neville Chamberlain,
> P.C., M.P.,
> Prime Minister of Great Britain,
> 10 Downing Street,
> London, England.
> The heart of Canada is rejoicing tonight at the success which has crowned your unremitting efforts for peace. May I convey to you the warm congratulations of the Canadian people, and with them, an expression of their gratitude, which is felt from one end of the dominion to the other. My colleagues in the government join with me in unbounded admiration at the service you have rendered mankind. Your achievements in the past month alone will ensure you an abiding and illustrious place among the great conciliators whom the United Kingdom, the British commonwealth of nations and the whole world will continue to honour. On the very brink of chaos, with passions flaming, and armies marching, the voice of reason has found a way out of the conflict which no people in their heart desired, but none seemed able to avert. A turning point in the world's history will be reached if, as we hope, tonight's agreement means a halt to the mad race of arms, and a new start in building the partnership of all peoples. May you have health and strength to carry your great work to its completion.

W. L. Mackenzie King.

Here is the view expressed by the Canadian government. It is not my view, but it was held by people far more important than I am; by statesmen of Britain, by statesmen of the commonwealth and, as I have just indicated, by the government of Canada. In any event, this cable makes nonsense or mincemeat of the minister's implication that if we had been represented at Munich all might have been different.

However attractive it may be to criticize decisions after the event, I suggest that it is ungenerous and it sometimes has pitfalls.

(Translation):

Mr. J. I. Rochefort (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, in accordance with the policy laid down by the member for Bellechasse, my remarks will be brief. I would like to discuss certain current problems mentioned in the speech from the throne.

It would seem fitting, however, before I come to the heart of the matter, to point out the connection of my constituency, that of Champlain, with Ottawa, our federal capital, through the participation of our national madonna, Notre-Dame-du-Cap, who came here to preside over the great sittings of the Marian congress. The Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. St. Laurent) himself was pleased to consecrate our whole country to this madonna. Since then, she has travelled through the provinces continually, thus accomplishing a great pilgrimage through the country. Let us hope that soon a basilica, which will be the pride of the constituency of Champlain and of the whole country, will be built at Cap-de-la-Madeleine, close to her present shrine.

Mr. Speaker, may I draw a parallel to show that the people of Champlain county are living happily and rather comfortably in spite of a comparatively high rise in the cost of living.

You may rest assured that this rise does not frighten them in the least. To prove this, let us simply look at some industries, especially the paper mill, which is the pride of my district. The paper-machine operator earns $845 per month, because he works a full month, while, in 1931, he sometimes worked only two or three days a week, earning $200 a month. In 1942, on a six-day week he was getting $250 a month. The assistant operator earns $2.92 an hour, or $23.36 a day. Our paper-makers make up six categories, the first earning $2.45 per hour. Wages in the other categories follow a downward scale to $1.27 per hour, for the sixth category. Their wages are exactly 300 and sometimes 400 per cent higher than in 1932, and 100 per cent higher than in 1942. In fact the ordinary labourer or yardman at the paper mills now gets $1.26 per hour. That is the minimum wage in the paper industry.

In addition, working conditions are now completely changed, the workers enjoying a three-week vacation with pay, holidays with pay, a pension plan and improved sanitary conditions. In my constituency, machinists, casters and pattern-makers get $1.78 an hour, compared with 60 and 78 cents in 1942. In my own city, young girls in the textile industry are earning $37.50 per week, while they were earning only $9.60 in 1932 and $18.00 in 1942. Certain paper workers, those making paper bags, cement bags and such, were getting 50 cents in 1932 and 76 cents in 1942; they now get over $1.30 an hour, in 1951.

From 1930 to 1935, when the Tory party was running this country, our workers were compelled to queue up outside city halls to be handed welfare tokens worth $5.60 per week. At night they headed for the Meurling shelter or the breadline. In spite of the high cost of living, do you think that our people would change their present situation? Do you think that our people, in spite of the high cost of living, would exchange their present conditions with high salaries, obviously easy circumstances, social legislation which our government can be proud of, such as family allowances, old age pensions, blind persons' pensions or unemployment insurance, for the misery they underwent during the days of the Tory regime, between 1930 and 1935? At that time our country was going hungry under mountains of wheat which it had no money to buy. In every walk of life, from the lumberjack in the forest to the highly-paid workers of our factories, large and small, the standard of living has risen in such a way as to cause them to forget the increased cost of living. We therefore hear few complaints levelled at the present administration. On the contrary the people are happy to possess the leader, the cabinet, and the administration they now enjoy. They would be quick to take offence at the various doleful ballads which the hon. members of the opposition have been singing into our ears. That is what I have to say about workers and working conditions generally as compared with the rise in the cost of living and even inflation.

May I be allowed to bring to the notice of the government the question of national health. A few years ago a grant of thirty million dollars, to be spread over five years, was voted by the government at Ottawa with a view to assisting in the erection of hospitals. My own constituency has already received a grant of $139,500 for the construction of our hospital at Cap-de-la-Madeleine and this grant has been paid in cash. When these grants are compared with those of the Quebec provincial government, which are spread over a period of 20 years, it will be seen that, during that period, the religious orders which benefit from these latter grants pay as much in interest as the amount of the grant itself.

My plea to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) deals with the establishment of cancer prevention clinics in the big hospitals of our large centres. A few days ago, I visited a sick relative at the Montreal Radium Institute. At that time, this institute was celebrating the twenty-fifth anniversary of its foundation and I was grieved to see the difficult conditions under which the sick are treated. The former city hall of an erstwhile bankrupt municipality is used as a hospital. There are only two private rooms and even these contain two beds. The rest is made up of a public ward for men and another for women. There is only one lavatory for the men and the same condition exists for the women. Those patients however are taken care of by specialists who reflect credit on our race.

The Quebec provincial government continues to turn a deaf ear to the reiterated requests of the medical profession which is loudly demanding a modern hospital. Hundreds of patients are waiting for their turn, due to a lack of space, and in the meantime their ailments get worse. And, in the case of cancer, a few weeks' delay in getting treated is enough to make the treatment useless and the disease incurable.

May I therefore be permitted to request the minister to grant to certain hospitals in our large centres the assistance required for the establishment of cancer clinics or simply to allow radium treatment for the patients. Let scholarships be given to our young doctors so that they may specialize in the large centres. Last year, more than 16,731 persons died from cancerous diseases in Canada and among that number more than 500 were from the province of Quebec.

It is time to wage a relentless war against that disease to eradicate it, as was done in the case of tuberculosis. There again the provincial governments should get together with the federal government in order to put up a common front in this battle.

I wish to say a few words about the National Housing Act. The government should spare no effort to facilitate the construction of houses if they do not want the country to face a few years hence a greater crisis than in 1945. Houses do not cost appreciably more than they did two years ago, especially if the payments are spread over a period of twenty years. There again, the only obstacle is that the down payment is too high. All industrial areas in Canada should be considered as defence production areas. Indeed in each of those areas industry is producing for this new defence department.

In addition, there are 80 housing co-operatives in our province; unfortunately, only half of them operate because the members are unable to pay the down payment now required. There are 6,000 members of these co-operatives and 1,200 only are house owners. In addition, an equal number, 6,000 people, are on a waiting list expecting to join the co-operatives or waiting for projects to materialize.

In the Mauricie district, where co-operatives are well developed, only 400 units consisting of single houses and duplexes were built in the city of Three Rivers. At Cap-de-la-Madeleine, the La Familiale co-operative, in operation for just about a year, put up 25 single houses the first year. It will reach the 60 units mark in two years. Under the national housing legislation, the Compagnie de construction Sainte-Madeleine built 48 houses this year and aims to build others next year at the same rate. All in all 120 new houses will be built at Cap-de-la-Madeleine as a result of this legislation.

I therefore ask the Minister of Resources and Development (Mr. Winters) to facilitate the administration of this law, as far as the working class is concerned, by reducing the down payment. The government and the people would thus be relieved of a burden which threatens to become very heavy indeed. Family, society, public health, happiness and family spirit all benefit from home ownership.

I might add that my constituency has one of the finest of veterans' establishments, thanks to the understanding and the spirit of good will which inspired our municipal administration—which I presided over at the time—and the Department of Veterans Affairs. Thanks to this plan more than eighty veterans have benefited from the act and the advantages it provides.

From the agricultural point of view, there is only one threat to our farmers, that is the disappearance of our herds. Because of the high cost of meat, our breeders are now selling their stock at a high price. There might however be a real danger in this; this might constitute a serious threat to our dairy industry. On the other hand, our farmers as a class seem to be fairly comfortable. Farmers' sons are more apt to stay on the farm and even to start farming on their own. Should the farm loans act be amended to permit more loans to be made in the province of Quebec, it would help to develop what constitutes our real source of wealth, the soil.

I wish to congratulate the government for having adopted the recommendations of the Massey commission. I think we should ignore narrow-minded persons who sometimes criticize what is beyond their grasp and who, instead of considering the advancement of science in this country, think only in terms of politics. On one particular Sunday afternoon one premier in particular was praising the Massey report at the very moment when, in another part of the province, one of his ministers was ranting against it. Provincial rights in matters of education must be respected, but how can they be impaired when they are not even remotely touched upon? Those grants have nothing in common with the patronage seen in some of the provinces, in my own, for example, where the government is more inclined to put up buildings than to make a moral contribution to the cause of education and health. Federal grants will allow the creation of faculties leading to university degrees: they will enable universities to hold professors now eager to leave because they earn four times as much in their private practices. In philosophy, theology and canon law our teachers are the equal of, and some even say superior to, their European opposite numbers. And yet, these faculties were built up at great sacrifice by the boards of governors of our universities. These boards of governors will be able to make the same effort with respect to letters, arts and sciences and thanks to those statutory grants they will be relieved from future financial worries. The government do not require that only their chosen representatives sit on those boards of directors; they do not require, as a condition to the granting of larger sums, that director so-and-so be removed, as is sometimes done in the province of Quebec. It is simply and purely financial aid. It would be denying advancement to one's race to oppose those grants; it would be impeding the progress of arts and sciences in this country; it would be depriving our own talented people of the education that this aid to our Canadian universities might give them whereas they are now compelled to seek that education elsewhere. The legislation may not be perfect. Amendments may be enacted later, if not immediately, as certain provinces with few students will receive large grants whilst others with many students will receive smaller grants. To my mind this grant should be evenly distributed and based on the number of pupils per province.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the government for what they have done for my constituency, in the field of social legislation or through the establishment of war industries which are today operating under private management. I also wish to thank them for having established there an airport which grows more important every day and which should soon become as active as it has been heretofore. The people of my constituency, Mr. Speaker, are happy to live under an administration led by such a great leader.

(Text):

Mr. J. L. Gibson (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, it certainly is not my intention to delay the taking of the vote, because I feel that probably this debate has lasted long enough. In my view the reason we have had so many speakers making several speeches is that not many cabinet ministers have taken part in the debate, and we have not had many answers. However, in fairness we can say that many of them have been travelling all over the world, and probably have not had an opportunity to take part.

I should like to speak about the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott). I appreciate the fact that he has been doing very important work in Europe, but I would like to think that when he returns he will have a chance to read in Hansard some of the remarks that have been made by numerous members on all sides of the house with respect to credit restrictions on automobiles. I think it is pretty well recognized by all of us that motor car dealers in Canada have had a difficult time. I would like to feel that when he returns he will give sympathetic consideration to representations that have been made not only on their behalf but on behalf of the people who buy automobiles. I would point out, as I did in my first speech in this debate, that the factory cost of an automobile should be the determining factor, when one has to put up 50 per cent of the purchase price of it.

In my earlier speech I said that in my riding a logger who wanted to buy a new automobile had to put up $200 more in cash and pay about $18 more per month to purchase an automobile than would a citizen at Windsor or Oshawa. I appreciate the fact that this government is not going to do anything about equalizing automobile costs throughout the country. I feel, however, that the people in my constituency should not have to put up that extra $200 or the extra $18 per month because of the credit restrictions. I would ask the parliamentary assistant to call that matter to the attention of the minister when he returns. I should also like to point out to him, as I did in my first speech, that there is no public transportation system in my riding, as is the case in a great many other rural ridings in Canada. I should like him to see if there is any possible way of lifting the present credit restrictions on used cars. I am sure it would be of great assistance to the motor industry and, despite anything the economists may say, that it would contribute nothing to inflation; and we would not have large numbers of used cars lying around which could be put in service.

There is one other point I should like to mention. I want to commend the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Laing) on the fine statement he made as to the feelings of the maritimes and the west with regard to the St. Lawrence seaway project. I hope the government will not feel, by virtue of the fact that they have a substantial surplus this year, that they should make this year's taxpayers pay for the whole cost of the seaway out of the surplus. I hope the government has no idea of making the surplus look smaller by a process of that kind. I should also like to express my appreciation of the views of the hon. member for Vancouver South with respect to the necessity for continued public works in both the maritimes and the western provinces. I certainly must say that so far as the people of Comox-Alberni are concerned, they have received very fair treatment from the government in this regard, and I hope that will continue. I should like to send to the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier) a photograph that I have. When the time comes for the estimates I am sure he will give this matter careful consideration. I should like to send him a picture of the breakwater at Campbell River showing the tremendous congestion experienced there by the fishing fleets in trying to obtain safe mooring. We have asked him several times for an appropriation for dredging at this particular spot, and I would request him to give the matter serious consideration this year.

I have one other proposal. I am not going to enumerate all the things Comox-Alberni needs because it would take a great deal of time, and I would not want to wear out the patience of the house and the minister. However, I should like to refer to the small-boat basin at French creek. I have a petition from a large number of residents of Parksville and the Qualicum area asking the minister's consideration of further dredging at that point, and I would ask him to give the matter his usual careful attention.

The house divided on the amendment (Mr. Drew) which was negatived on the following division:

Mr. Graydon: I was paired with the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson). Had I voted I would have voted for the amendment.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): I was paired with the hon. member for Middlesex West (Mr. McCubbin). Had I voted I would have voted for the amendment.

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): Hon. members will know that for the past number of weeks I have repeatedly advocated that the government should take steps to assist farmers in financing the crop that is out under the snow, and should also make advance payments on farm-stored grain. I believe the government has delayed too long in bringing in legislation or making an announcement of the steps it intends to take. From a radio news report over the week end I learned that the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) had announced in western Canada that steps would be taken at this session of parliament to help farmers who were in financial difficulties because of unthreshed grain. As a result of that news report I asked the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) the following question on the orders of the day:

> In view of the radio news reports concerning an announcement made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce in the west over the week end, can the Prime Minister say whether legislation will be introduced at this session to provide payments on farm-stored grain and financial assistance to farmers with grain out under the snow?

To that the Prime Minister replied that he was not in a position to announce such legislation. The government was having the matter investigated, and just as soon as the government came to a decision the Prime Minister would advise the house. Opposition members have criticized a statement reported to have been made by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) while in Europe. Today the Minister of National Defence said he thought important statements of government policy should be made in parliament. I certainly agree. When the government is prepared to make important announcements of government policy, and when parliament is in session, those announcements should be made here.

I have reports in two dairy papers of an announcement credited to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Let me say that, while I do not feel the reported announcement goes far enough, I hope the government will do what has been announced. But it seems strange to me that the minister could make an announcement in western Canada concerning legislation that would be brought down during this session of parliament, and the Prime Minister have no knowledge of a government decision concerning that legislation. The report in the Winnipeg Tribune is headed "Grain Growers to Get Early '52 Aid." The front page of the Winnipeg Free Press had a big heading "Farmers May Get Aid Early in '52". The article has this to say:

> Right Hon. C. D. Howe, trade minister, said Friday that financial aid for distressed prairie grain growers is in prospect for early in the new year.
> The minister, in charge of grain marketing, said at the annual meeting of the Alberta wheat pool he is prepared to recommend legislation for interim credit for farmers with unthreshed grain and those who, for one reason or another, have been unable to deliver their grain to country elevators.
> Mr. Howe said the legislation would be introduced at the current session of parliament in the expectation the plan would be in operation by the early part of January.

Mr. Diefenbaker: He must have had a cabinet meeting out west.

Mr. Argue: Yes, the Minister of Trade and Commerce must have had a one-man cabinet meeting out west. This afternoon the Prime Minister said no decision had been reached as to a method of financing farmers with grain out under the snow or stored in the granaries. According to this Canadian Press dispatch the Minister of Trade and Commerce said that legislation would be introduced at the current session of parliament in the expectation that the plan would be in operation by the early part of January. I thought that since the Minister of National Defence had made a statement in Europe, and had been castigated over that reported statement, every cabinet minister would be most careful that he did not announce government policy outside of parliament while the house was in session. I cannot understand why the Minister of Trade and Commerce should have any right to make a statement of government policy in Calgary, when the Prime Minister says that no decision has been made concerning that announced policy.

All I can do now is ask the Prime Minister if he knows what legislation the government intends to introduce this session in order to finance the grain that is out under the snow, or finance the farmers with crops in the granaries. Does the government intend to introduce this type of legislation? Will the government's plan, as the Minister of Trade and Commerce has said, come into effect next January? I hope the announcement will be made, and I hope it is a good announcement. But I cannot object too strongly to one cabinet minister making an important announcement of government policy outside of parliament when the Prime Minister says the government has made no decision in that regard. Whenever the cabinet meeting is held, and whenever a plan is considered, I hope it may be brought into effect before January. Christmas is coming, and parents like to buy gifts for their families and friends. The local storekeepers like to receive something on their charge accounts before Christmas, so they too may have an enjoyable Christmas. Surely if this plan is to come into effect, it should come into effect immediately. Farmers should not have to wait until early January.

This much is not clear. If the government does in fact bring in such legislation, will it provide for an advance on grain stored on the farms? I hope that is done. Some such legislation should be permanently on the statute books of Canada, and it should provide that farmers can receive 75 per cent of the potential price as an advance on farm-stored grain. The situation we have had this fall—congested elevators, farmers unable to deliver even their small initial quota, farmers having to truck flax and other grains as much as 75 miles away from their local delivery points in order to get a few dollars—is nothing new. We had the same type of congestion and the same situation one year ago; it was experienced perhaps to a lesser degree, nevertheless it was a serious situation of the same kind.

I believe it is time we had on the statute books of Canada legislation whereby in the fall a farmer who has threshed his grain can obtain a 75 per cent advance on the initial price. When there is a situation such as we have today, where farmers are unable to market their grain through no fault of their own, when the government's transport controller has been unable adequately to cope with the situation, at a time when the farmers have millions upon millions of bushels of threshed grain in their yards, in their fields and in their granaries but are unable to deliver that grain, they should be able to get a 75 per cent advance of the initial price without interest charge to the farmer. If the farmer had an opportunity to market his grain or if there was space in the local elevators, I would say that he should not ask for a 75 per cent advance without cost merely because he might find it inconvenient or difficult to deliver his grain at that time. But where farmers, through no fault of their own, are unable to market their current crop the government should bring in legislation to provide a 75 per cent advance of the initial price without interest cost to the farmers.

I had expected, Mr. Speaker, that an announcement in this regard would have been made long ago. On November 5 I asked the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) whether the government had then reached a decision on making an advance on farm-stored grain. The Prime Minister replied as follows, as reported at page 696 of Hansard:

> No; no firm decision has yet been made. The whole situation has been and is under serious consideration by the wheat board and the Department of Trade and Commerce. When a decision is arrived at, it will be announced in the house without its being necessary to prompt that announcement.

That is no doubt true. But even with a good deal of prompting we cannot get an announcement from the Prime Minister. We get, however, an announcement by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) out west at a time when parliament is in session.

Then on November 12 the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) delivered a speech in the house in which he had quite a little to say about the serious problem facing western farmers at the present time. The Minister of Agriculture even went so far as to suggest that one of the reasons farmers were having difficulty in harvesting their crops was that they were using such large equipment that they could not seed or put in their crops at the proper time in the spring. Such a suggestion cannot be taken too seriously. If it were not for the technological advances in agriculture, if farmers did not have tractors and other large modern machinery, probably they would not have seeded any more than half the 1951 acreage on time. No matter what the farmers may think of the advice of the Minister of Agriculture on other matters, I am sure they will pay little attention to his advice on the type of equipment a farmer should use. They are not going back to the horse and buggy days.

The Minister of Agriculture informed the house that he was going west, that he would have a meeting with the Saskatchewan wheat pool delegates and that at that time there would be under consideration steps the government could take in order to alleviate this situation. The Minister of Agriculture made that trip west and he spoke to the wheat pool delegates in session. According to the report in the press he said to the delegates: If you have any suggestions to make to me, as Minister of Agriculture, about ways and means of financing this year's crop and of helping to correct this situation, I should like to hear them. He was given the views of the wheat pool delegates. The Minister of Agriculture had another conference in Regina. As a result of that conference there is a front page picture in the Regina Leader-Post of Saturday, November 17. Right under the photo we find the following text:

Farm aid meeting: How to give financial help to farmers who have been unable to harvest the 1951 crop was the subject Friday afternoon at a meeting in the executive council chamber at the legislative building. Shown above in the premier's office are (left to right) C. H. Fisher, Lipton, president of the Saskatchewan Association of Rural Municipalities; Les Bright, Regina, secretary of the Saskatchewan Federation of Agriculture; Federal Agriculture Minister James G. Gardiner, and Premier T. C. Douglas. Also at the meeting were C. G. Bryden, Regina, secretary of S.A.R.M., and members of the Saskatchewan cabinet.

The Minister of Agriculture met with the Saskatchewan wheat pool delegates on Friday, November 16. On the same date he had a meeting with the Saskatchewan government and other representatives of the farm movement in Saskatchewan. As I say, that was on November 16. As we all know, following that meeting or shortly after it the Minister of Agriculture made a trip to Rome, Italy, in order to take part in the food and agriculture organization conference over there. Twelve days after the minister's meeting in Regina, that is on November 28, I asked the Prime Minister, as reported at page 1400:

Has he received a report from the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) of the meeting he held in Regina with provincial government representatives and farm leaders on methods of assistance to western farmers?

Is the Prime Minister in a position to announce financial aid to farmers on unthreshed grain as forecast by the Minister of Trade and Commerce on November 15?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): The answer to both questions is no.

The Minister of Agriculture announced in parliament that he was going out west to meet farm leaders. He went out west and met those farm leaders. Following that meeting he had a meeting with Saskatchewan government officials and other farm leaders to discuss ways and means of providing financial assistance to prairie farmers in this year of emergency, and the Minister of Agriculture never reported on the meeting to the cabinet. The Minister of Agriculture went to some other place. I wonder what the purposes of these meetings were, the meeting with the premier of Saskatchewan—

Mr. Gardiner: I want to put my hon. friend in possession of the facts. I made my report to the minister concerned, namely the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. Wright: He made his announcement in an interview.

Mr. Argue: The Minister of Agriculture says he reported to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. But the Minister of Trade and Commerce also failed to report to the government. Is that any better? If two of them make a mistake, is that any better than for one to have made a mistake? I do not think so. I do not think any minister of the government should announce in parliament that he is going out west, or to some other place, to meet a farm delegation to discuss certain matters, and twelve days later fail to have reported on the matter to the government. What purpose could be served by the Minister of Agriculture having that meeting, taking up the time of important people, taking up the valuable time of hundreds of wheat pool delegates, when he has made no report to the cabinet of his discussions?

I wonder, Mr. Speaker, whether you would call it 6.15 o'clock?

Mr. Sinnott: No.

Mr. Cruickshank: Take all the time you wish; take a couple of weeks.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Beaudoin): Order.

Mr. Argue: If it is not the wish of the house, Mr. Speaker, to adjourn at this time I do not mind speaking for another three minutes until it is 6.15 o'clock.

Mr. MacInnis: The hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank) and the hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Sinnott) do not want to hear the farmers' case put to the house.

Mr. Sinnott: Do not worry about the member for Springfield; he will look after himself.

Mr. Argue: As I said, this situation is serious. It has not developed in the last few weeks. It is a situation that most westerners knew would come as far back as last spring, if we again had a large crop. In April of last session I asked the government to appoint a controller to relieve the box car situation. The government did nothing in that regard for a few months. Finally a controller was appointed. During this session I have been pressing the government to remove the congestion at elevator points, particularly at those points on the Canadian Pacific Railway lines. Anyone acquainted with the situation out there knows the congestion is generally much more severe at Canadian Pacific Railway points than at Canadian National Railway points. I have had letters from Saskatchewan farmers suggesting to me that if by appointing a controller the government cannot get the Canadian Pacific Railway to provide ample cars to move farmers' grain, they should take stronger steps and nationalize the Canadian Pacific Railway. The situation is truly desperate, Mr. Speaker, and so far the government has done very little to relieve the present hardship amongst western farmers.

Mr. Noseworthy: Six-fifteen.

At 6.15 p.m. the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Speaker, there are just two other matters in connection with wheat I should like to emphasize at this time, before I go on to deal with the matter of farm income tax. We in this group were pleased indeed with the affirmative vote given by the Manitoba farmers in the plebiscite when they were asked whether they wished the Canadian wheat board to continue the marketing of coarse grains. Eighty-nine per cent of the farmers of Manitoba voted in favour of the wheat board method of marketing coarse grains. I feel confident that if such a vote were held in Saskatchewan we would do even better than the farmers of Manitoba, and would register a 95 per cent affirmative vote for the wheat board.

If western farmers believe so strongly in the wheat board method of marketing grain, then I say there is no longer any excuse, if indeed there ever was one, for the government allowing the grain exchange to stay open now and gamble in flax and rye. I say the grain exchange should be closed, and closed permanently, and the method by which it can be closed is for the government to amend the Canadian Wheat Board Act, as I hope it will, to include flax and rye under the operations of the wheat board. I feel also the time has now come when the government should direct the wheat board to cease using the grain exchange in selling oats and barley. Through the Manitoba vote the farmers in western Canada have demonstrated that they are unalterably opposed to the grain exchange. Therefore the government should now place the marketing of all forms of grain exclusively under the Canadian wheat board.

I wish to say further, as I have already on a number of occasions this session, that the government cannot justifiably hold down to the international wheat agreement ceiling the price received by producers for domestic wheat. The international wheat agreement ceiling is now over 50 cents a bushel below the price received by the Canadian wheat board for class II wheat. The United States government gives the United States farmer the highest price, even though that government has to pay its farmers from the federal treasury as much as 73 cents a bushel on the wheat they produce. I say the very least the government of Canada can do is meet the request of the Saskatchewan wheat pool and the farmers' unions that the price of domestic wheat be increased at least to the extent of the increase in the farmers' cost of production.

I now come to the matter of farm income tax and the unfair and almost scandalous manner in which, through the Department of National Revenue, the government has collected very high income tax from farmers in certain provinces, but has failed almost completely to collect income tax from the farmers in certain other provinces. As a member representing a farm constituency I take second place to no one, either in the past or at present, in advocating that farmers should be assessed fairly for income tax purposes. In the past I have spoken out for increased exemptions to farmers, urging that certain items should be considered as expenses, and I am glad to say the government has gone a long way toward meeting those requests.

I believe the government could take other steps by allowing certain improvements on the farm as current expenses, rather than as additions to capital value. Having said that, however, I wish to object most strenuously to the way the government has gone about collecting income tax from farmers. I noticed with a good deal of interest a return brought down a few days ago in answer to a question placed on the order paper by the hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Fair). I congratulate him upon having brought the matter of income tax in respect of farmers to the attention of the government.

I have here a table prepared from income tax statistics and from certain figures in the return brought down for the hon. member for Battle River, and I have been wondering whether, to aid discussion, I might have it placed on Hansard.

Mr. Speaker: Has the hon. member unanimous consent to have this table placed on Hansard?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Argue: The table is as follows:

Province	Income tax paid by farmers on 1949 income	Net farm income 1949 (million $)	No. of farmers and stock raisers (i) (including active service) 1941 census	Net income per farmer and stock raiser	Income tax paid per farmer and stock raiser
	$	$	$	$	$
Manitoba	1,585,000	146·5	54,739	2,678	28·95
Ontario	1,940,000	441·2	161,607	2,730	12·00
Quebec	51,000	250·9	134,013	1,872	·38
Saskatchewan	6,647,000	378·5	125,548	3,015	52·94
Alberta	7,153,000	278·5	93,843	2,968	76·22
British Columbia	544,000	54·2	25,252	2,146	21·54
New Brunswick	11,000	32·1	24,751	1,297	·44
Nova Scotia	33,000	21·1	22,683	930	1·46
Prince Edward Island	4,000	12·8	10,492	1,220	·38

(i) Includes persons reporting farming and stock raising as their main occupation.

Hon. members will note that the table shows the amounts of income tax collected by the government, by provinces. These figures are for the income of 1949, and it will be noted from the table that in Manitoba the income tax paid by farmers in that year amounted to $1,585,000; in Ontario, $1,940,000; in Quebec, $51,000; in Saskatchewan, $6,647,000; in Alberta, $7,153,000; in British Columbia, $544,000; in New Brunswick, $11,000; in Nova Scotia, $33,000 and in Prince Edward Island, $4,000. Of course one does not expect the department to collect the same amount of income tax in each province. The amount of income tax collected from the farmers of any province will depend upon the number of farmers, and the average income received.

Mr. George: And the amount of wheat raised.

Mr. Argue: The amount of wheat raised has nothing to do with the income tax. It is the net income received from wheat and other farm products in a given year. The table I have placed on record goes on to show that in 1949 the average net income per farmer in Manitoba was $2,678. In Ontario in the same year the net income per farmer was just a little greater, $2,730, but the department collected almost two and a half times as much income tax per farmer in the province of Manitoba as it collected in the province of Ontario, even though the average net income per farmer was somewhat higher in the province of Ontario. It is easy to see from these figures that while the department made a real endeavour to collect all possible income tax from farmers in Manitoba the department has made nothing like the same effort—

Mr. McCann: The same effort.

Mr. Argue: —to collect income tax in the province of Ontario.

Mr. Low: If they did the effort was a failure.

Mr. Argue: It was a real failure. The Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann) cannot give a good reason why the farmers of Manitoba should pay two and a half times as much income tax as that paid by the farmers of Ontario, when the Manitoba farmer received a smaller net income for the year. There is no answer to that statement.

I come to the province of Quebec where the farmers earned somewhat less, an average net income of $1,872 for the year

1949. Out of an average net income per farmer of $1,872 in the province of Quebec the government has collected the fabulous sum in income tax of 38 cents per farmer.

Mr. Proudfoot: What about the number of dependents in the province of Quebec compared with other provinces?

Mr. Argue: I know families are larger in Quebec. I admit that. I know that on a per farm basis the farmers of Quebec cannot be expected to pay as much income tax as other farmers—

Mr. Sinnott: What are you complaining about, then?

Mr. Argue:—but look at the average net income per Quebec farmer in that year. It is $1,872. Let us take a look at Nova Scotia. The average net income of farmers in that province is nothing like $1,872. It is $930, less than half the average net income of the Quebec farmer; but instead of paying 38 cents per farmer in income tax the farmers of Nova Scotia paid $1.46. The Nova Scotia farmer paid almost four times as much income tax as the Quebec farmer, and on half the income.

Mr. Proudfoot: What about their dependents?

Mr. Argue: The difference is not that great. If my hon. friend thinks the difference is that great, he has even less intelligence than I give him credit for having.

Mr. Proudfoot: What is the difference then?

Mr. Low: We would like to find out.

Mr. Argue: Let us look at the income tax paid by the British Columbia farmer. On the average he has fewer dependents than the Quebec farmer, and he earns almost $300 more per year than the Quebec farmer. He earns $2,146 per year; but with one-fifth as many farmers in British Columbia as in the province of Quebec the British Columbia farmer pays almost sixty times as much income tax. From these statistics it is pretty clear that the government is playing politics in the income tax department so far as farmers are concerned.

Mr. McCann: You are crazy.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Argue: Everybody knows that the bulk of the government's support comes from Ontario and Quebec, and comparatively speaking very little effort is made to obtain income tax from the farmers of those provinces—

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): Oh, nonsense.

[Mr. Argue.]

Mr. Argue: —compared with the income tax collected in the four western provinces and in the province of Nova Scotia.

An hon. Member: Whom are you trying to fool?

Mr. Argue: I believe that certain things are necessary—

An hon. Member: Why don't you move there then?

Mr. Argue: —by way of increased exemptions for farmers so far as income tax is concerned; but when the government of Canada lays down a law I for one believe it should be applied equally to all people in all provinces of Canada. I do not believe the income tax law is being applied in that manner. For the consideration of the house I should like to move, seconded by the hon. member for Melfort (Mr. Wright):

That the following words be added to the address:

"This house regrets, however, that Your Excellency's advisers have failed to make provision for the immediate payment to producers of 75 per cent of the initial price of farm stored grain."

I move this amendment because I think such a provision is absolutely necessary. I move it because, in spite of repeated requests I have made to the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), the government has failed to date to make the necessary announcement.

Mr. J. S. Sinnott (Springfield): Mr. Speaker, I had no intention of speaking in this debate at all until—

An hon. Member: Why?

Mr. Brooks: You won't say anything, so don't worry.

Mr. Sinnott: —the very inexperienced young member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue), with his fantastic statements, with his pretence of farming ability—

An hon. Member: What do you call yourself?

Mr. Sinnott: —made so many accusations in the house tonight. He reminds me of the little boy crying for Castoria. When he thinks he has something that will be of political advantage he comes crying on the steps of the government to give and give and give.

An hon. Member: He is not peddling oil.

Mr. Sinnott: In my opinion the time to come to the government for assistance is after every effort has been made by the individual himself. With the break in the weather in the west at the present time, many hundreds of thousands of acres are being harvested. I checked in Hansard on what the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis), who talks as if his mouth was full of potatoes, said about my not wanting the farmers' case to be put forward in the house. I want the farmers' case to be put forward in the house, but in such a way that the house will understand it in the right light.

Mr. Brooks: Start all over again.

An hon. Member: You had better sit down.

Mr. Sinnott: I am not like the hon. member for Vancouver East. He made the statement in the house that he had never hired a man and never would. I want to know how Canada can progress under such conditions.

Mr. MacInnis: They made progress by hiring me.

Mr. Sinnott: Your job won't last long after the next election.

Mr. MacInnis: Oh, I have heard that before.

Mr. Sinnott: It is quite easy to understand that, with the equipment we have to harvest grain at the present time, all the grain cannot be harvested, delivered and stored at one time. It is only reasonable to believe that the farmers of western Canada generally, as in my own constituency, have the balance of the year in which to deliver their grain. So far as the amendment moved by the hon. member for Assiniboia is concerned, it is just a political dodge to try to make his position secure in his own constituency, and I am not falling for it. I will vote against his amendment.

Mr. P. E. Wright (Melfort): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a few words on the amendment, but in doing so I am not going to reply to the hon. member who has just resumed his seat because I think his words are answer enough to themselves. The amendment moved by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) concerns a matter which has had considerable attention over a number of years. Some eight or nine years ago legislation was passed in the United States under which they pay up to 90 per cent of the floor price for grain stored on the farm. That has worked most successfully in getting deliveries of grain spread over a period of time rather than having it all rushed to market immediately after being threshed.

That has been one of our great difficulties in western Canada in the last two or three years, particularly when large crops have been harvested under adverse conditions resulting in a serious piling up of grain at both country and terminal elevators. This is due in large part to the fact that the grain is out of condition, and when grain is out of condition it takes more working space in both the country and terminal elevators in order to handle it. The result has been congestion all along the line.

As the hon. member for Assiniboia has said, last year we asked that a controller be appointed to relieve the situation, which was serious at that time. The government delayed taking action but finally did appoint a controller to relieve the congestion which existed this year. That controller has done a reasonably good job and has tried to keep grain moving. Last year the principal bottleneck was at the head of the lakes. Boats were not available for wheat carriage, being mainly engaged in the hauling of ore. Boats could not be obtained at the proper time to take the grain from the terminal elevators at Port Arthur and Fort William. Even with the best the controller has been able to do this year a serious situation still exists in western Canada. I have in my hand a report from the last issue of the Western Producer of November 29, which states:

> Although harvesting operations have been virtually at a standstill during all of November, country elevator congestion has shown little improvement during the month. At the end of last week stock in store in Saskatchewan pool country elevators totalled 39,926,000 bushels as compared with 40,363,000 bushels one week ago and 41,589,000 bushels on October 31.

And again:

> Last week, Saskatchewan Pool Elevators Limited received 1,926 box cars for the entire system as compared with 1,686 for the previous week, but deliveries from farms also increased to 3,225,000 bushels as compared with 2,656,000 bushels the week before.

They are barely holding their position, let alone relieving it.

> Congestion in lakehead terminals presents a similar picture. With the close of navigation expected early in December pool terminals at the head of the lakes held total stocks of more than 11,000,000 bushels last week. At the peak period early in the month, stocks amounted to almost 15,000,000 bushels.

It goes on to give further statistics. As a result of the situation that existed, grain backed up on the farms, and farmers have not enough cash to meet their commitments to storekeepers and creditors. If the government would bring in some legislation to provide for payment for storage of grain on the farm it would not only relieve the situation this year to some extent but would be good permanent legislation.

I think the amendment is good, but to meet the situation that exists this year, some additional assistance is necessary. In the area which I represent approximately 60 per cent of the grain has not been harvested. It is lying out under six inches to one foot of snow, and it is doubtful whether much of it will ever be harvested in the spring. The reports I have from that area indicate that probably 25 per cent of the grain will be lost. The crop was extremely heavy and is down so tight to the ground that it is almost certain to rot in the spring and not be harvested at all. Payment for farm stored grain, while good as permanent legislation, will not meet the situation as far as the average farmer in that or in certain other areas in Alberta is concerned. They are asking, and the Saskatchewan government is asking, for an advance on unthreshed grain, such advance to be paid back later when the grain is harvested. Even that would not meet the situation faced by many of the smaller farmers. Many of these farmers will not be able to harvest their grain, and any advance would be a charge against next year's crop. Many will hesitate under those circumstances to take a loan to meet the debts they owe to the local storekeepers and tradesmen.

I think something should be done in that area under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. We in the north have been paying into that act ever since it was enacted, and have drawn little out of it. Now when there is what amounts to a complete crop failure in those areas they cannot qualify for assistance under that act. I think government inspectors should be sent into that area to determine just what the situation is and how much of the crop is likely to be harvested. If at all possible some of these areas should be brought under the act.

I should like to touch on one other matter this evening. A serious situation exists with regard to the drying of grain in western Canada. Up to the present the only drying equipment available has been that in the terminal elevators, which means that tough and damp grain must be shipped to the head of the lakes to be dried. Anyone who has had experience in handling damp grain knows that serious losses occur in movement. It often heats in transit or even heats on the farm before delivery. Up to the present time there has been no successful method to dry such grain on the farm. During the last three years in the United States a machine has been developed for drying grain on the farm or at the local elevator. The pool sent some delegates down to the United States this year to look over this equipment and see if it would be possible to bring some of it into this country to dry grain either on the farm or at the local elevator. The report of one delegation which went to North Dakota reads as follows:

> There is no doubt in the world of the need and the feasibility. The matter boils down to who and where, because there won't be many machines available for this winter. We saw a machine working on the same principle as the terminal dryers at a farmer's elevator; capacity 170 bushels per hour, 4,000 per day, continuous flow type burning 11 gallons per hour of No. 2 diesel fuel in a burner (injector type).
> They were drying 17 per cent moisture wheat down to 3·5 per cent. Originally installed price to them was $12,500, and operating costs on the above moisture content not over 2 cents a bushel. Depreciation would be very low because of the simplicity of the design.

Finally, here is what took place at the Saskatchewan wheat pool convention, as reported in the Western Producer of November 15:

> Saskatchewan wheat pool delegates, in session at Regina, took action to give full assistance and co-operation to any local grain drying co-operatives which may be organized to cope with the problem created by the large volume of tough and damp grain now on farms awaiting a chance of delivery.
> After hearing a full report from a wheat pool head office committee that had made an investigation into grain drying methods, the delegates passed resolutions calling upon the board of directors to continue to investigate the usefulness of all forms of grain dryers, and if found practicable, to offer local drying associations any assistance possible.

Some time ago I received a letter from one of these organizations concerning the possibility of bringing in this type of equipment. They wanted to know what the customs duty was and whether or not they would have to pay sales tax. I wrote the minister and asked him some questions with regard to the importation of this equipment. As hon. members may have gathered from the evidence this delegation obtained in North Dakota, this equipment will dry approximately 4,000 bushels of grain a day. This is more grain than one farmer has, and the machine costs about $12,500, which is more than one farmer can afford to pay. A number of districts decided they would form a co-operative group to bring in one of these machines to dry their grain. I asked the minister the following question: Would an individual farmer bringing in one of these machines for his own use have to pay the tariff? The answer was that he could bring in a machine for his own use. Then I asked the minister the following group of questions:

> 2. Can a group of farmers who are presently organized under a co-operative act in a province for the purpose of purchasing and using co-operatively other farm machinery purchase one of these machines duty free?
> 3. Can a co-operative farm, organized under a provincial co-operative act, where all of their operations are carried on on a co-operative basis, purchase such a machine duty free?
> 4. Can a group of farmers form a co-operative under a provincial co-operative act for the sole purpose of purchasing one of these machines for their own use, and bring such machine into Canada duty free?

The minister's reply to those questions was as follows:

From your letter, I assume you have in mind the stationary type of dryer, which is set up as a permanent or semi-permanent installation. Dryers of this design when imported by a group of farmers, by a co-operative association, company or miller, are dutiable at 22½ per cent ad valorem, under tariff items 427, 466a and 445k.

Bona fide manufacturers or producers, such as farmers, farmers' co-operatives and milling companies, would be permitted to obtain the grain dryers, with attached motive power, for drying their produce, sales tax free, under a certificate that they are to be used directly in the process of manufacture or production of goods. On the other hand, importation by companies doing custom work for farmers would not be entitled to the exemption, and the tax at the rate of 10 per cent on the customs duty paid value would be levied at the time of importation.

Gasoline engines and electric motors attached to the above-mentioned dryers are classified separately at 20 per cent and 22½ per cent ad valorem, under items 428c and 445g respectively.

There are also in use portable self-contained grain dryers mounted either on skids or on wheels. They are classified, when imported for use as stated above, either under tariff item 427 or 427a at 22½ per cent or 7½ per cent ad valorem, depending upon whether or not they are of a class or kind made in Canada. The attached motive power is classified separately under items 428c and 445g, as applicable.

As I stated in effect in the House of Commons on November 21, the department will accept entry of grain dryers imported for temporary use, under dutiable conditions, upon payment of duty and tax on one-sixtieth of their value for each month or portion thereof they remain in Canada, provided they are exported from Canada within six months from the date of entry, and provided they are being leased or rented, and not purchased outright. A minimum payment of $25, in each case, is required.

He states that any co-operative or company bringing in these dryers must pay the duty. I want to point out just what that means. In my constituency I have some twelve co-operative farms which are operated under the provincial co-operative act. Under this ruling of the minister these farms cannot import a dryer without paying the duty. On the other hand, an individual farmer may import one. Although the minister does not say so, his letter leaves the implication that if an insurance or mortgage company owned a considerable tract of land which was operated by a manager, the manager could import a dryer for use on that farm without paying the duty. I believe there is discrimination here. Co-operative farms should be allowed to import this equipment. There are farmers who have formed a co-operative for the purchase of farm machinery, and that is a piece of farm machinery which they should be allowed to import without paying the duty.

If we are to have weather such as we have had for the past two years, then dryers are going to become an essential part of farm equipment. Their importation duty free should be allowed, the same as other farm equipment, and certainly a co-operative farm should be allowed to import the equipment to dry their own grain. Otherwise there is certainly discrimination in this matter. I would ask the minister to give the subject further consideration, because I am quite sure there will be a considerable demand for this type of dryer in the next two or three years. They are not coming into Canada in competition with any machine made in Canada because none are made in this country. In my opinion they should come in duty free for use by groups of farmers in drying their own grain.

I should like to deal briefly with one other matter which arises out of the grain situation in western Canada. The hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) touched upon it lightly. That is the fact that on many Canadian Pacific lines in northeastern Saskatchewan there have not been the number of freight cars available that should have been available during the last two harvesting seasons. This is not a matter which has just arisen this year. A year ago I wrote to the wheat board and the board of transport commissioners on this matter. Last year there were many points in northern Saskatchewan where the Canadian Pacific was placing so few cars that many farmers had to deliver their grain miles away from home at points on the Canadian National. I know that in my own area, particularly the point to which grain is delivered from my farm, there were over 100,000 bushels that should have been delivered to that point last year which were delivered to points on the Canadian National. The same condition prevailed on the Canadian Pacific lines running out of Prince Albert to Nipawin, Nipawin to Wadena and Prince Albert to Humboldt. Most of the points on these lines were short of box cars and the farmers in those areas had to deliver to Canadian National points. The same condition prevails again this year. The C.P.R. in those areas simply have not been playing the game with the controller, with the government or with the C.N.R. They have been using their box cars in areas where they could make a quicker turn around on the main line, taking the grain to Vancouver and to the head of the lakes; and as to the areas served by the C.N.R. and the C.P.R. jointly, the outlying areas in the northern parts of the province, leaving the C.N.R. to shoulder the burden in taking the grain out.

That condition has prevailed now for some eighteen months; and if that is the way the C.P.R. are going to act I would seriously suggest to the government that they should put some pressure on them. The government have the means of doing that. The government are today probably the greatest shippers of freight or the greatest users of the facilities of our railroads. If the C.P.R. are not prepared to play the game with the government and the shippers in making available box cars in those areas, the government should give serious consideration to cutting down their use of the C.P.R. and transferring to the C.N.R. lines the freight they have for shipment. I would also suggest that if the C.P.R. refuses to place cars in those areas the farmers themselves should boycott the C.P.R. in other ways wherever possible; that is, with respect to C.P.R. telegraph, C.P.R. express orders and C.P.R. passenger service. The C.P.R. simply have not been furnishing reasonable service to those lines in northeastern Saskatchewan.

Another point with respect to those lines is this. Through their placing of cars the C.P.R. quite often are forcing farmers to deliver their grain to other than their own pool facilities. In many of these areas—and I know this is true in my own constituency—70 per cent, 75 per cent or 80 per cent of the farmers are pool members and want to deliver their grain to the pool elevators; but they find this situation: When the elevators are filled the C.P.R., in delivering box cars to that particular point, deliver car for car to each elevator there, although perhaps 70 or 75 per cent of the farmers in that area are pool members and would prefer to use their own facilities, their own pool elevators. But through their allocation of the box cars at that point the C.P.R. force the farmer to use the line elevators when he would prefer to use his own elevator. I believe that situation is unfair.

I think it is quite right that all elevators at a point should be filled in the first place. While space is available I think all the space should be used. But once that space is filled, cars should be allocated to these points on the basis of the wishes of the farmers in that area so they can deliver their grain to the elevator of their own choice. They are not able to do that at the present time. Some hon. member may get to his feet and say: "Well, you have your car allocation book or car order book. You can use that and get a car placed at whatever elevator you choose." That is not possible at the present time because under the quota system it is seldom that a farmer has a full carload of grain to deliver at one time. More particularly has that been true in these last two or three years, when the farmer has had three or four different grades of wheat on his farm. The result is that he never has a full carload of one particular grade to deliver at one time. He therefore cannot use the car order book unless he uses it in conjunction with one or more of his neighbours. This makes the position particularly difficult. I believe the transport controller should see to it that cars are delivered at elevator points in conformity with the wishes of the farmers who are delivering the grain at those points.

I hope the government will give serious consideration to the amendment moved by the hon. member for Assiniboia. As I said before, I do not think it goes far enough to meet the needs of all sections of the west at this time, but it is a step in the right direction. It is a good piece of permanent legislation which we should have on our statute books.

Mr. Victor Quelch (Acadia): Mr. Speaker, I certainly had not expected to speak again in this debate, but in view of the amendment that has been moved I feel obliged to say a few words. I was somewhat surprised that the hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Sinnott) should refer to this as a political amendment. To me a suggestion of that kind is idiotic. I am sure those farmers who today find themselves in the unfortunate position of having the greater part of their crop out in the snow or who, having threshed their crop, are unable to sell it, will not regard this question as a political one but rather as one of extreme urgency.

In the past we in this group have taken a stand similar to that advocated in the amendment. In other words, we have advocated that the government should institute a system of approved farm storage so that on that grain held in storage the government could make advances and at the same time pay storage on the grain. Provided that proper precautions were taken there would be little risk in such a proposition. For instance, we have to guide us the experience in the United States with respect to farm storage. The government could specify the type of storage upon which storage will be paid. The storage bins could be properly fire-guarded, fenced and insured, and such action would no doubt prevent a great deal of congestion in the elevators. At the present time I think we all realize that it would not be possible to insist upon the same precautions as would be required under a system of approved storage, inasmuch as we have the situation facing us now and the government have not already instituted a program of farm storage. The situation being what it is, I think the government should be prepared to make advances against all grain stored on the farms, provided of course that it is properly stored. I am not advocating that advances should be made on grain piled up in heaps on the ground or in the fields, but rather on grain that the farmers have moved into some kind of building on the farm, so that it can be properly looked after. I am not advocating either that advances should be made on grain that is not in a marketable condition; that is to say, if the grain is already damp so that it has gone into a solid lump and cannot be marketed, we are of course not suggesting that advances should be made under those circumstances.

No doubt the government might say: How would the government know just what the situation was with regard to any particular farmer's grain? My reply would be that they could utilize field men on the spot; they could use the district agriculturists; they could use men from the Department of Veterans Affairs; they could use local committees of farmers and municipal officials. In many cases it would be quite possible to take the word of the farmer himself where that man is recognized as having a sound standing.

I was greatly interested in the statement made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe). I heard the statement over the radio, I think it was last night or the night before, to the effect that he had told the farmers at the annual wheat pool convention that at this session of parliament legislation would be introduced for the purpose of making advances to farmers against grain that had not even been threshed. I was surprised that we had not heard anything about it here in the house. I was certainly even more greatly surprised when the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) gave the reply he did to the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue), because the Minister of Trade and Commerce is not an irresponsible individual. We all hold him in very high regard. Surely before the minister would make a statement like that he must have consulted the government. Surely he did not go out to Alberta and make a statement of that kind without having consulted either the Prime Minister or the rest of the cabinet ministers. Therefore I take it that when he made that statement it was apparently the result of conversations he had had with certain people, that he was summing up the situation as he found it; and then he made a statement to the convention.

The hon. member for Springfield said we should not be in too much of a hurry; that thousands of acres are being harvested every day. Evidently he did not read the amendment. The amendment applies only to grain in storage. It does not apply to grain that has not been harvested. The amendment reads:

> This house regrets, however, that Your Excellency's advisers have failed to make provision for the immediate payment to producers of 75 per cent of the initial price of farm stored grain.

Therefore it would have to be harvested before the amendment could become operative. On the other hand, whilst the hon. member says thousands of acres are being harvested, I would like to assure him that thousands and thousands of acres will never be harvested until next spring. There are large areas over which the snow fell almost continually for the best part of a month, and heavy winds whipped that snow into deep drifts. Even if you have many days of warm weather these drifts will remain, making it impossible to harvest the grain.

Mr. Sinnott: Go to your Premier Manning.

Mr. Quelch: Evidently the Minister of Trade and Commerce has a little more realistic understanding of the situation than the hon. member for Springfield, or he would not have made the statement he did. He realizes the extreme urgency of the situation, and he also realizes the tremendous difficulties facing the farmer, who has had the expense of a year's farming operations and now has his crop in the position where he cannot market it. You would not like to work for a year without wages and wait until the end of the year before you got your money. That is the situation many farmers are finding themselves in today.

I realize that advances against grain in the swath would have to be comparatively small. They would not be on the same scale as that advocated in the amendment, because there is a great deal of grain in the swath today that probably never will be harvested. It all depends upon the locations. Swaths in low lying lands, which are subject to flooding, will be in this position. The crop will be destroyed in the spring. On the other hand if the swaths are on land that drains well in the spring, provided it is well fenced so the stock will not get in and destroy it, it will fare better. There is every reason to expect that the crop will come off in the spring in exceptionally good shape. I know that last year many farms in the eastern part of the constituency that I represent came out in this way. Fifty per cent of the crop was left in swath last year, and the majority of that grain came through in really good shape. I heard from many local elevator men that actually the grain that was out in the swath last winter was delivered to the elevators in better shape than the grain that was delivered in the fall.

Mr. Sinnott: That is quite correct.

Mr. Quelch: For the simple reason that it was dry. I realize you could not just say you are going to make an advance to every farmer who has crop out under the snow. You would have to investigate the situation to see whether the land would be drained and make sure it was protected against stock, because it takes only a small bunch of cattle in a field of swath grain to destroy it totally so far as harvesting is concerned.

I realize that making loans against grain in the swath would not be an easy problem to handle. I believe it could be handled through the chartered banks. The government could guarantee the chartered banks up to a certain percentage of their losses, as they did under the farm improvement loan legislation or the veterans legislation. Then it would be up to the banks to investigate the situation. It would not mean that the banker himself would have to go and look at the field. He could find out through other farmers just what the situation was, and he would have a pretty good idea in the first place of what kind of land the farmer had who had his crop under the snow. I am satisfied that if care was taken the losses would be very small, provided the advance was not a large percentage of the estimated value of the crop. You would have to allow for shrinkage and for deterioration. If that were done I do not think the banks would face the danger of any large loss, provided they were guaranteed up to 5 or 10 per cent of the aggregate loss, as was done under the farm improvement loan legislation. I do not think there would be much danger of their sustaining losses. I am satisfied if that were the situation they would be very careful to see that loans were made only where there was a reasonable expectation of their being able to get payment in the spring.

To these farmers this is a very difficult situation. They have had all the expenses of the summer. Many of them owe store bills; many of them owe for gasoline. They have to finance the expenses of the winter; and then, more important still, they have to finance seeding operations. At least 80 per cent of the grain will be useless for seeding. I believe you can say that 100 per cent of the grain that is out in the swath would not be suitable for seed in the spring. If it were seeded in the spring there would be very poor germination. If the farmers cannot get help elsewhere many of them will try to thresh enough in the spring to use for seed. If that is done there will be the danger of a very poor crop next year. Steps will have to be taken to see that suitable seed is made available. It depends upon the spring whether they can harvest that grain before seeding. If we have a very early spring it may be possible for harvest operations to be well under way before seeding starts; but if we have one of those late, wet springs where harvesting operations cannot start until after seeding, then we are going to have a situation where there will be a very heavy weed growth in the swath, and in many cases that will mean no harvesting of the swath at all. Even if it is harvested it will be in a very mouldy condition.

Some mention was made that assistance should be given under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. I understand that assistance has been given on that basis. This assistance has been given where crops remained in the swath all winter, but then due to a certain situation developing the farmer was not able to harvest that crop and it was a total loss. I understand that payment has been made to these farmers under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, but that no action is taken until all possible chance of being able to harvest that crop is gone. Once the officials recognize that the crop is lost, assistance is given. I had one or two cases where action was taken, and I understand that assistance was given. As a matter of fact I had a peculiar condition referred to me. There were two townships where a large percentage of the grain had been left out all winter. That grain was still in the swath at the end of June. Then a hail storm came along and hailed out last year's crop and also this year's crop. The farmer had two crops hailed out by the one hail storm. Application was made for assistance under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act and assistance was granted to those farmers, but I think for only one crop, not two.

Something has been said about the international wheat agreement. It will be remembered that in 1948, when the international wheat agreement was before the house, we in this group urged the government to advocate that in setting the floor and the ceiling for the four years in advance they should tie that floor and ceiling to the general price level, so that if the price level went up the ceiling and the floor would go up, and if the price level went down the floor and the ceiling would go down. It seems to me that such a proposition is fair to both the producer and the consumer. It would mean that in shipping grain abroad, if the price level went up we would get a higher price for our wheat but pay more for our imports. On the other hand, if the price level went down we would get less for our wheat but we would pay less for our imports, so in that case you would be establishing a balance between the value of our exported wheat, and imports taken in exchange, whether the price level went up or down.

I never could understand why the government considered it necessary to tie the domestic price of wheat to the international wheat agreement. I should hope that the domestic price of wheat could be tied to the price of class II wheat. If the price under the international wheat agreement today represented a fair price with regard to the general price level then I would not suggest that the domestic price should not be in line with the international wheat agreement; but the cost of living has gone up 34 points since we set this price under the international wheat agreement. Therefore the price of wheat under the agreement has been tied down too low. That being the situation, I think we could very well have set the domestic price in line with the price of class II wheat.

The international wheat agreement expires next year, so I hope when our representatives go to sign the next agreement they may take a very strong stand on this question of tying future prices to the general price level. In other words I hope our representatives will advocate that an escalator clause be inserted so the price will go up and down with the general price level.

In closing I wish to make clear that I am a very strong, 100 per cent supporter of the wheat board. In spite of the disagreement that has taken place regarding the British wheat agreement, the international wheat agreement, and the domestic price, I am satisfied that at least 99 per cent of the farmers of western Canada will still support the idea of the wheat board. Had we not had the wheat board, what would have been the situation last year when we had the tremendous unmarketable surplus of low-grade wheat? No doubt the price would have gone right down to the bottom. Somebody would have made a killing, but it would not have been the farmer. As it is now, it is being handled in an orderly way, and the majority of farmers are well satisfied with the final payment on the 1950 crop, within the range of the present agreement. As I say, they still feel that the domestic price should have been tied to the price of class II wheat.

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, in rising to speak on this amendment perhaps I should first read it:

That the following words be added to the address:

"This house regrets, however, that Your Excellency's advisers have failed to make provision for the immediate payment to producers of 75 per cent of the initial price of farm stored grain."

As yet few arguments have been advanced by members supporting the government regarding this matter which is of transcendent importance to many thousands of western farmers. One made passing reference to the effect that this amendment represented a condition of mind, and that it has no connection with the situation prevailing on the prairies. I think it might be well to refer to the Canadian Press dispatch quoted in the Winnipeg Free Press of December 1, wherein the situation is set forth, although, sir, having regard to the number of occasions recently that Canadian Press dispatches have been disavowed by ministers of the crown, one does feel some diffidence in quoting them. However, this one has not yet been denied and so I presume it will be in order to quote it. After stating what the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) had said in Calgary—and it is a matter of no insignificance to point out that a by-election is taking place in Calgary, which may have had some connection with the visit of the minister to that city—the following appears:

Alberta farmers have some 230 million bushels of grain lying under the snow.

That is a very serious situation.

In Saskatchewan about 90 million bushels of wheat and 14 per cent of the coarse grain crop are unharvested. Manitoba has about $8 million worth of grain under snow.

Then it says:

A recent survey indicated as much as 75 per cent of the crop threshed or unthreshed remained in the farmers hands.

Then it gave the reasons the Minister of Trade and Commerce was in the west, that is so far as Winnipeg is concerned. It said:

Mr. Howe is making a swing through the west to size up the situation. He discussed the question of interim financial aid with the Canadian wheat board and the board of grain commissioners in Winnipeg earlier in the week.

Hon. members will recall that the other day when I asked the Minister of Trade and Commerce what could be done in this regard he indicated that he intended to spend some days in the western provinces with the very proper end in view of endeavouring to arrive at a conclusion as to what could be done in order to meet a dire and serious situation. He has been out there now for several days.

Today we had a curious thing happen when the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) answered as he did upon being asked a question that affects so many farmers on the western plains. So there may be no mistake about what took place, the record shows that the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) said—and I read only the pertinent parts:

In view of the radio news reports concerning an announcement made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce in the west over the weekend, can the Prime Minister say whether legislation will be introduced at this session to provide payments on farm stored grain and financial assistance to farmers with grain out under the snow?

That was the question the farmers of the western provinces have been asking, and to which they ask that consideration be given. The Prime Minister answered—and Hansard cannot record the inflection of the voice:

No, Mr. Speaker, I am not in a position to do that. I have already told the hon. member that we were having the matter investigated, and that just as soon as we had come to a decision I would hasten to apprise the house of it. It will not be expedited by repeating the question. I will not forget his anxiety to have the information, and will bring it down just as soon as we can reach a conclusion about it.

I presume the "we" to whom the Prime Minister referred was the cabinet of this country. Certainly the Prime Minister did not know what the Minister of Trade and Commerce apparently knew when he announced the policy, announced the decision, and announced what parliament was going to do. He did it on Friday last, and this is what he said:

Right Hon. C. D. Howe, trade minister, said Friday that financial aid for distressed prairie grain growers is in prospect for early in the new year.

The minister, in charge of grain marketing, said at the annual meeting of the Alberta wheat pool he is prepared to recommend legislation for interim credit for farmers with unthreshed grain and those who, for one reason or another, have been unable to deliver their grain to country elevators.

It is strange that on a matter such as this a recommendation to be made by the minister in charge should not be known to the Prime Minister three days later. Then the article goes on:

Mr. Howe said the legislation would be introduced at the current session of parliament in the expectation the plan would be in operation by the early part of January.

Parliament, according to the minister, is going to have this legislation at the present session. It will be introduced. The expenditures of money will be made early in the new year. Yet today we have the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) announcing that no decision has been arrived at, that the matter is being investigated, and that just as soon as they come to a decision parliament will be informed of it. Sir, this is but another example of why so often the cabinet of this country is described as C. D. Howe and Company. He makes the announcements, he says what parliament is going to do and the Prime Minister is not aware of that fact. I wonder what the decision will be when the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) arrives back in Ottawa. I remember so well reading in Hansard of March 20 last the description by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) of the happy relations between the Prime Minister, the Minister of Trade and Commerce and himself. What the Minister of Agriculture said on that occasion would lead me to believe that if the Prime Minister has the final say we are not going to get anything in western Canada, because what the Minister of Agriculture said on March 20 last, after describing himself and the Minister of Trade and Commerce is to be found at page 1448 of Hansard:

And, Mr. Chairman, there would be a number of reasons as to why we would not.

That is why they would not become members of the C.C.F. or Conservative parties.

We are both quite satisfied to be where we are. One of the reasons why we are satisfied to be where we are is that we both know that we can afford to make statements knowing that we might be incorrect because we have a leader who does not make many mistakes; and we are quite satisfied that when we present arguments upon which we do not fully agree, if we present them clearly enough and set forth all the facts, the judicial mind of the leader of the Liberal party and the leader of the government will so sift out the facts and so express the conclusions that, when he has expressed them, we can both agree with the decision that he has arrived at.

Mr. Gardiner: Don't you wish you had a leader like that?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I was pointing out that the Prime Minister has already given the answer, and that answer is that no decision has been made. On the other hand, the Minister of Trade and Commerce has stated in Calgary that a decision has been made.

Mr. Gardiner: No, no; he said he was going to recommend.

Mr. McCann: He said he was prepared to recommend.

Mr. Diefenbaker: If my hon. friends would listen, the Minister of Trade and Commerce said that legislation would be introduced at the current session of parliament—

Mr. McCann: Read ahead of that.

Mr. Diefenbaker:—in the expectation that the plan would be in operation—

Mr. McIlraith: Read the paragraph before that.

Mr. McCann: Read the paragraph before that. It is right there; you have the paper there.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, none of them know about it over there. Apparently this was a surprise to them, but this is not the first time the Minister of Trade and Commerce has surprised them with decisions he has made irrespective of the cabinet. It says that legislation will be introduced at the current session.

Mr. McIlraith: Read the paragraph before that.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I will give my hon. friend the opportunity. I have read it twice now, and apparently he does not understand it yet.

Some hon. Members: No, no.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Is it not passing strange, Mr. Speaker, that they all start to chatter at once? I point out again that the Minister of Trade and Commerce said the legislation would be introduced at the present session and that for the next few weeks final payments totalling $130 million—

Mr. McIlraith: Would my hon. friend permit a question?

Mr. Diefenbaker: —from the wheat board's 1950-51 pool would tide farmers over.

Mr. McIlraith: Would my hon. friend permit a question?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Yes.

Mr. McIlraith: Would the hon. member mind telling the house which paragraph of the Canadian Press dispatch, as found in the Winnipeg Free Press, he is reading?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I read every paragraph and if my hon. friend cannot count that is not my responsibility.

Mr. Sinclair: That is big stuff with a jury of farmers, but it is not very good here.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What is the observation?

Mr. Sinclair: I say that is big stuff with a jury of farmers, but it is not very good here.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is an observation that will remain unanswered. Coming from my hon. friend the answer is clear.

Mr. McLure: General Motors will reply to him.

Mr. McIlraith: It is paragraph 3.

Mr. Graydon: Get yourself a used car, Jimmy.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I was pointing out the fact that while the western farmer is asking for action one minister of the cabinet says he is going to get action and the Prime Minister, who ought to know, says that the matter is still under consideration.

Mr. McCann: What about it?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am glad this amendment has been introduced so that western members may be able to face a jury of western farmers on their votes on the amendment. The hon. member speaks with disparagement of a jury of farmers. If the farmers of western Canada get an opportunity as a jury they will speak as they did in Winnipeg, as they did in Brandon and other constituencies in the recent by-elections.

Mr. Sinclair: It took a little while to think that one up.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Having dealt with that phase—

Mr. Sinclair: One paragraph.

Mr. Diefenbaker: —I again ask that the government give serious consideration to this matter and at this session provide what is asked for in the amendment. I care not whether it be an advance to the extent of 75 per cent of the value or whether it be the suggestion I put before the house some time ago of $10 per acre. The farmers of western Canada today are asking for assistance and they have a right to receive it. What has happened in connection with the lack of storage facilities is and has been the responsibility of this government. Every minister of the government knew as far back as last June or July how serious the situation would be with the elevators in western Canada glutted with wheat that was unsaleable by reason of its low grade. Week after week the Minister of Trade and Commerce has been advising the people of Canada in the most optimistic manner possible that all was well. I have before me the Western Producer of November 29. It tells the story in so far as the wheat pool is concerned. It has this to say:

> Although harvesting operations have been virtually at a standstill during all of November, country elevator congestion has shown little improvement during the month. At the end of last week stocks in store in Saskatchewan pool country elevators totalled 39,926,000 bushels as compared with 40,363,000 bushels one week ago and 41,589,000 bushels on October 31.

In other words, the situation has improved but little.

> Five hundred and eighty-seven pool elevators were reported filled with grain last week. A week earlier there were 606 plugged elevators and at October 31, when congestion was at its peak, the number was 663.

I ask that something be done in this matter in order to raise the morale of the western farmer. But the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) has said over and over again in this house that all is well. Word has gone forth and every member from Saskatchewan must have received letters from his constituents pointing out the seriousness of the situation, particularly on Canadian Pacific lines. Mention has been made by several hon. members of the fact that the situation on Canadian Pacific lines is serious. It is as serious today as it was several weeks ago. Farmers in those areas where the quota has been increased found that elevators became filled. As a result many of them have been unable to market their wheat, and in a large majority of cases they have been able to market only ten or fifteen per cent.

This is a most serious situation that faces us. All we are asking, and all that those who come from the prairies have continued to ask, is that something be done to assure that congestion shall be dissipated as far as possible and that provision be made to transfer tough grain to the drying plants. We ask also that advances be made for grain on the farms, both for storage and as a payment in accordance with the amendment. These are the things the western farmer is demanding. These are the things that I believe are worthy of the consideration of this house.

In order to fill the two vacancies which I believe still exist on the wheat board I suggest that appointments be made of actual producers. Farmers are requesting that there be a larger producer representation on the board. Nothing would be more beneficial than for the Minister of Agriculture to insist that western farmers in production and recognized as leaders be appointed to the two vacancies on the wheat board.

Second, the amendment refers to a temporary situation created by the early snows of this year. Another thing the western farmer is asking is that wheat sold for domestic consumption be not sold at the present rate whereby the farmer loses from 40 to 50 cents per bushel, but that it be sold at a parity price.

Third, in order to assure parity the farmers are asking that the Agricultural Prices Support Act be amended to provide floor prices for cereal grains. The hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) referred to the plebiscite in Manitoba and indicated that farmers generally were satisfied. My own impression is that farmers want a larger direct producer representation on the board, and they want parity prices for domestic sale. If these two things were granted at least two major subjects of discontent would be removed.

Having said that I cannot take any other stand than to support the amendment. It provides an opportunity to hon. members to call upon the government for action. We have waited from week to week since this session began in the hope that something would be done to alleviate the conditions that prevail on the prairies. It is only a matter of two weeks at the very most until the end of the session, yet we had a statement today by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) that held out no hope that action will be taken at the present session. On the other hand we had the statement made in Calgary on Friday by the Minister of Trade and Commerce that action will be taken. My hope is that at this time the wishes of the Minister of Trade and Commerce will take precedence over the unhopeful statement made today by the Prime Minister and that before this session is over legislation will be introduced to provide for an advance payment to farmers, first, who have their wheat under the snow and, second, who have completed their threshing operations but are unable to market a reasonable portion of their grain because of the freight car congestions.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

Mr. Daniel McIvor (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, as I sat and listened to hon. members speak, I wondered how soon this debate will close. There are many important resolutions on the order paper. Wheat is important, but some of these resolutions concern matters just as important or perhaps more important than wheat. I am not a bit concerned about what the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) did or did not say. He is not in the house this evening, but when he comes back he will be able to answer for himself and what he says will be a credit to the government.

Mr. J. A. Ross (Souris): Mr. Speaker, the amendment before the house reads:

> This house regrets, however, that Your Excellency's advisers have failed to make provision for the immediate payment to producers of 75 per cent of the initial price of farm stored grain.

When the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) answered the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) as he did this afternoon I was very disappointed. I had read the statements carried in the daily press of western Canada, particularly the Winnipeg Free Press and the Winnipeg Tribune, which statements have been quoted in this debate already, in which the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), the minister responsible for the handling and marketing of wheat in this country, is reported to have stated emphatically at a meeting in Calgary that the farmers could expect aid early in 1952 and that legislation would be introduced during this session of parliament to provide for that financial assistance. When the Prime Minister was asked this afternoon if that statement was correct his answer was "No", and he went on to say that the matter was under consideration and he could make no further statement at this time.

That is a strange set of circumstances in a democracy such at this. As I say, I was very disappointed. As has been so well pointed out by previous speakers, this is a real emergency for many thousands of farmers on the prairies. If you could travel out among these people you would find that many are having to depend upon local people who are ready to extend credit in order that they may provide for their families this winter. This, in turn, has placed these people in an extremely unsatisfactory financial position. These grain producers find themselves in a very difficult set of circumstances. I am amazed that people are not so much concerned about the plight of these farmers at this time, because it is serious. I believe this resolution is well worded.

For some years past I have travelled into the United States of America studying the operation and administration of their agricultural set-up, and the manner in which that government guaranteed to wheat producers what is termed 90 per cent of parity. Today a farmer can obtain on properly stored grain a loan of up to 90 per cent of parity which, for this year's crop, is on the basis of $2.18 per bushel. Compared to what we receive for grain, that is a good price. As I understand the legislation, coupled with that the farmers are allowed a storage fee until next April. After receiving payment the farmer can decide that the government can have the wheat, or he can repay the loan and carry on. While the United States operates under the international wheat agreement just as we do, their farmers are subsidized for the difference between the world price and the price under the international wheat agreement. It costs the treasury of the United States a considerable sum to pay that difference.

The previous speaker has pointed out that, notwithstanding the many millions of dollars the western farmers have lost in the past four or five years under agreements concluded by this government, they are today subsidizing the consumers of Canada by over 50 cents a bushel. Like the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch) I am one of those who believe that the consumers of Canada should pay the prevailing price for class II wheat rather than the price set under this international wheat agreement. These wheat producers have had a very unfair burden saddled upon them by the government of the day. I want to protest as strongly as I can. I have raised this issue in the house at every opportunity, but instead of the price getting closer to what it should be the gap is widening as time passes. These people should not be called upon to subsidize the consumer.

I should like to say a word on a point which was raised by the hon. member for Melfort (Mr. Wright). It is connected with grain drying equipment. I happen to live close to the North Dakota border and some of the farmers along that border have this grain drying equipment. As was pointed out, this machine costs between $12,000 and $14,000. It was doing a satisfactory job in taking the moisture out of that grain. Like the hon. member I, too, had correspondence from co-operatives and individuals requesting me to interview the Department of National Revenue about obtaining this equipment from the United States. Apparently Minneapolis is the chief centre turning out this machine, and I understand it is not available in Canada. I carried on some negotiations with the deputy minister and other members of the department. Finally the minister made a statement in this house pointing out that he was prepared to recommend to cabinet that these machines be brought in on a lease basis for about one-sixtieth of the duty per month. The duty on these machines amounts to 22½ per cent plus a sales tax of 10 per cent, and all that can be set aside if an individual imports this equipment. When the minister made his statement I asked him, and it is on Hansard, whether the same consideration would be extended to a co-operative or a corporation, and he said no. I believe that is quite improper. Some consideration should be given to the cost of the machine and the amount of grain that can be cleaned, because it would have to be a co-operative effort.

Personally I have some fault to find with the distribution of feed wheat and the low grade wheat from last year's crop. I believe the asking price for that grade of grain has been out of all proportion to the price obtained for milling qualities of wheat. Because of this asking price there was a large carry-over of this grade of wheat as of July 31 of this year. I think the board, on behalf of the government, should have made a greater effort to get rid of that low grade wheat for feed purposes, thus making more storage space available for the milling grades of wheat today. For two years now this has been an extremely difficult problem in the handling and storing of grain. For some reason, in our province and the provinces to the west there has been much greater difficulty in getting a proper allocation of box cars on the Canadian Pacific lines than on the Canadian National lines. I do not know why that situation has existed, but it has been difficult. While I was not prepared to speak on this subject at this time, I want to say that it is a matter of deep concern. I cannot impress too strongly upon the government the difficulty for many thousands of farmers in the prairie provinces. A loan could easily be made to these farmers to cover operating expenses and help them provide for their families during the coming winter. I cannot see why this amendment is unsound. It mentions 75 per cent of the value of the grain in storage, and I do not believe there is any great gamble in that. True enough it would be a considerable undertaking from an administrative point of view, but I would support the amendment.

Let me repeat that when you have prosperous agriculture in this country, then everyone else does well. It is true that today many people are prosperous, but these farmers are suffering great hardships. I would hope that the government would decide to accept this amendment. Again I say how disappointed I was at the difference in the attitude of the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and that of the responsible minister as reported in the press over the week end.

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): I have waited to give the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) an opportunity to say something about this resolution. I thought it was a subject of such great importance that at least the Minister of Agriculture would have made an announcement of some sort. Of course the Prime Minister came in and the Minister of Agriculture stayed put.

I imagine it is occurring to the Prime Minister that he should brief his boys before they go off on a trip. I know that if I had had experiences similar to those of the Prime Minister during the past two or three weeks I would get them together and say: Boys, where are you going? We are going up to Calgary to see what is going on up there. Why? We want to see what the people are doing and find out just what the crop situation is. It might be that incidentally we will have a word to say about the by-election. All right, but maybe you had better let me know what you are going to say when you go out there, because I want to be able to say the same thing in parliament; because if this sort of thing goes on there will not be any such thing as cabinet solidarity. I would suggest, Mr. Speaker that it might be a right good thing to have this amendment debated thoroughly and perhaps to have it held over until Wednesday of this week, possibly until the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) gets back, so the Prime Minister can call his men together and decide just exactly what is what. Then maybe we can get an intelligent vote on the matter. Or in the alternative, perhaps the Prime Minister or one of his ministers can make an announcement in this house, where announcements of the kind should be made and where we can give them the proper applause. You see, Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Trade and Commerce is away out west, and he has made an announcement of great importance to the farmers of western Canada; but we fellows here cannot pat him on the back. I do not think that the situation is fair and just to the members from western Canada; not at all.

As I say, I was quite disappointed that we did not hear from the front benches tonight something in connection with such important legislation. I look upon this matter as being of tremendous importance. What has happened is this, Mr. Speaker. Our big-hearted Minister of Trade and Commerce went out west; and whatever he went out for, he did happen to see what the farmers are suffering today. They doubtless took him out into some of these fields around Calgary.

An hon. Member: Calgary West.

Mr. Low: And doubtless they showed him, field after field, thousands of acres of wonderful crop in the swath and down on the ground. No doubt they showed him crops that were matted, twisted and pressed into the soil by a succession of snow, rain, frost and what not, that they probably will not be able to harvest until spring, if they get it harvested then. They probably took the Minister of Trade and Commerce out to some of the elevators and showed him exactly what is going on there, and what a terrific problem these elevators have to handle the wheat successfully, to give the farmers storage space for their tremendous crops, and to process the grain without grain dryers. They see it rotting, matting together, musting and I suppose much of it will be rendered unfit for milling purposes.

Then they probably took the Minister of Trade and Commerce out to talk to some of the farmers individually. When I say "they" I am speaking now of the boys in Calgary West. They wanted him to see the facts, and they talked to some of these farmers out there individually and the farmers told this story: Look here, Mr. Minister, we have got to get a fence fixed up here, and a good one. You fellows are just about to let the calves out. There is quite a gap here, the biggest gap that you have left. The gap is created by the fact that our farmers throughout this area just have not anything in their pockets to jingle, and the reason is that they have not been able to market any of their crops this year. Not having been able to market any of their crops they cannot look forward to giving you fellows any help out in Calgary

West or anywhere else for that matter. Furthermore, if we are going to keep those doggone Tories out of here, you have to do something and do it fast.

So, Mr. Speaker, as I said, the Minister of Trade and Commerce is there. He is a big-hearted fellow and his sympathies would be right there with the farmers. It is natural that, when they got him back into the meeting place that night, he should stand up on the platform and say to that audience: We have to do something for these farmers, and I am going to suggest right now that this government, at the session that is now going on down in Ottawa, put through a bill to provide for farm storage advances and get it out before the first of the year or before Christmas, because you have to get some Christmas presents.

In all seriousness, Mr. Speaker, I am quite sure that the Minister of Trade and Commerce on this trip saw a great many things out there that he did not previously even imagine. I am quite certain in my own mind that in whatever he said out there he was giving expression to what he thought ought to be done. That is the important thing. He stated what he thought ought to be done. It may have been interpreted by the press as an expression of government policy. I am not saying anything as to that. But the fact remains that out of his firsthand knowledge —as a result of seeing conditions, not just hearing about them—he made up his mind that something ought to be done, he made that statement, and the press carried it.

I think the Minister of Trade and Commerce had a great deal of courage, even if he did not get in touch with the boys back home and the boss, and I commend him for it. But there is this that must be said, Mr. Speaker. The Minister of Trade and Commerce is right, and the boys back here are not up in the harness by any means. Our people out west are facing a disastrous situation. It is not that we love to come and just plead for handouts; not at all. But how in the world can we, the farmers of western Canada, be expected to do the job that it is expected we will do, in producing all the food that will be required by our Canadian people and fill the demands of the people of other nations, unless facilities are set up to save what we produce?

Just imagine the situation. Right there in the province of Alberta we had prospects of a 170 million bushel wheat crop this fall. It looked to be the most beautiful prospect we have had in twenty-five or thirty years. Then disaster overtook us; and that was not all. It was not just disaster caused by the elements. We found that another disaster or two befell us. When we did get the crop down, the elevator space was soon plugged and the farmers could not get any more in. Then they had to thresh their crops in the fields and put them up in conical piles, or into straw stacks, or surround them with snow fences or almost anything to keep them together, pleading for cars all the time. There again was another disaster. Something happened so that the cars did not get out there with which to ship this grain. In many areas —and I will take my own area, the Peace river country, as an example—there were millions of bushels of excellent milling wheat. What this country needed was milling wheat, and what the other countries needed was milling wheat. Cargo vessels were coming into the harbour at Vancouver and in the eastern part of this continent ready for milling wheat, and they could not get it. They had to sail away without it because the wheat was not there in port. The question is, why was it not there? Cars were being used for something else. I do not know what it was.

The people in the Peace river country were not able to get their wheat out—that is, that milling wheat they had taken to the elevators —and they were not able to get much in because the storage space up in that country is not great. Somehow or other few people have got into their heads the fact that this Peace river country has now grown to be a great inland empire, one of the great food-producing areas of the world. They also forget that it is four or five hundred miles removed from any storage centres, and that there is today a great long back haul of five hundred miles in order to get the grain on to the main line so it can be shipped to the coast. We were completely forgotten this year and the wheat lay there. We complained about it; we pleaded for cars and for storage space; but there was nothing doing. So today the farmers are not able to get anything for their crops, to provide for their families, to pay their debts and get materials and machinery repaired and ready for another crop season. This does not give them very much hope or optimism.

I suggest that the government's responsibility is twofold. In the first place, I think the government should have been looking ahead to years like this, and should have provided strategically placed storage facilities. They should have been assisting farmers to provide storage facilities on their own farms. In the Peace river country I think we have a logical claim for a $1 million or $2 million government elevator for storage and for processing purposes, to see that our grain up in that country is not wasted; that when we do produce these big crops we can get them into the elevators so that they may be saved and not wasted. Any grain that comes into elevators with a moisture content of 17, 18 or 20 per cent is in danger. Everybody knows that. I understand that this year a good deal of it is running up to 25 or 28 per cent moisture content. Well, it seems tragic, in the light of the world need for food products, to let that grain remain in that condition and take a chance on it spoiling so nobody can use it, especially in a country like this where we have these unusual seasons and this year so little milling wheat. Therefore it seems to me the government's responsibility is to see to it that complete storage is arranged for, and that the farmers are assisted to get storage facilities on their own farms.

It seems to me the second responsibility is this. Whenever disasters like this overtake the farmers, the government should get in there as quickly as possible and see to it that some advance is made on properly stored grain, as is called for in this resolution, so the farmers can pay their obligations, take care of their families and look forward to a crop year next year free perhaps from encumbrances, free from worry. The hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch) has just reminded me of something else that is tremendously important in this whole business. The man who is usually forgotten in all of these tragic years is the unsecured creditor, the local merchant. He is the fellow who takes it in the neck, because he has been financing the farmers in the communities pretty well through the whole year, expecting that when the crop was sold he would be able to get some return. Well, where are the small merchants this year? They are holding the bag. A good many of them are going out of business, Mr. Speaker. I am told there are more business failures in Canada just now than there were during the hungry thirties. Why? Simply because of the tragic situation that has developed in western Canada. These farmers simply cannot get money for their crops; therefore they cannot pay their obligations. Prices are high. There are restrictions on supplies, restrictions on credit purchases. All that is hitting the storekeepers and hitting them hard. They are the backbone of our communities, and we cannot overlook them. I plead with the government to take this appeal that is being made most seriously, and get in and formulate a policy and announce it so that our people in western Canada will not be kept so confused.

I can imagine what is going to appear in the press tomorrow morning. They will have the statement of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) in one column and what the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) said today in another column, and the farmers of western Canada will feel that they are meeting themselves coming back. Believe me, Mr. Speaker, there will be a great many of the juries of farmers referred to by the hon. member for Coast-Capilano (Mr. Sinclair), a good many juries around the hot stove in these little business places that I have been talking about who will weigh his statement well and bear in mind that there was some sort of little aspersion cast by what he said. I will tell you right now that the hon. member for Coast-Capilano has never been able to get together a jury that will do a better job than a jury of farmers. If any of the people out in the west country that I know about are called upon to be tried before their peers it is usually the farmers that they look to for justice, and they get it.

Mr. Sinnott: They did a good job in the Manitoba grain referendum.

Mr. Low: I see that it is close to ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker. Before I launch into the other subject about which I want to say something, I would ask you to call it ten o'clock, and I shall move the adjournment of the debate.

On motion of Mr. Low the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Mr. Speaker, tomorrow we will take up as the first item the resolution in the name of the Minister of Transport to provide a deep waterway between Montreal and Lake Erie and to create a corporation to be called "the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority"; then third reading of Bill No. 24, to amend the Public Printing and Stationery Act; Bill No. 30, to amend the Supreme Court Act and Bill No. 31, to amend the Exchequer Court Act.

Then we will take up the resolution in the name of the Secretary of State to amend the Civil Service Act, and the other resolution in the name of the same minister to amend the Dominion Elections Act.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to the order of the house passed on November 2, 1951.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, December 4, 1951

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

IRRIGATION

SOUTH SASKATCHEWAN RIVER—SITE OF DAM—MEETINGS OF COMMISSION

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Yesterday the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) raised certain questions regarding the commission investigating the proposed South Saskatchewan project, and I told him I wished to get further information before attempting a complete reply. The government has given no instructions to the commission other than those contained in the order in council in which the reference has to do with the two following questions: whether the economic and social returns to the Canadian people on the investment in the proposed South Saskatchewan river project—central Saskatchewan development—would be commensurate with the cost thereof, and whether the said project represents the most profitable and desirable use which can be made of the physical resources involved.

All the information about the project that had been tabled in the house was placed at the disposal of the commission, and of course they also have access to the various departments where they can see any other material about the project that may have been gathered at any time in those departments. I am informed that there is no ground for the supposition that there is any interruption of their work, that as a matter of fact they are having another meeting in Ottawa next week, and that the matter is actively under consideration by them for the purpose of making their report on the two points set out in the order in council by which the commission was established.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Thanking the Prime Minister, might I ask him whether the actual location of the dam on the river has been finally determined?

Mr. St. Laurent: As to whether or not these documents determine one location and one location only, I think the hon. member will have to do what I would have to do, and that is consult the documents. They speak for themselves. It was my understanding that there was a precise location indicated in those reports, but I would not want to assert that they could not be construed otherwise. I am not an engineer, but two of the members of the commission are engineers, and I would not want to attempt to put any final construction upon the reports. I took them to mean that a precise location was indicated therein.

[Later:]

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Supplementary to the question asked by the hon. member for Lake Centre, do I understand that no instruction or authority has been given the commission to recommend a site for the South Saskatchewan dam, other than the site recommended in the various reports that the government has received?

Mr. St. Laurent: No other instructions have been given but those expressed in the order in council. I have been unofficially informed that the question has been raised and is under discussion between the commissioners, as to whether or not the second part of the reference gives them authority to consider whether that site would be the best use of the physical advantages. I have not any official information about that, but it may be an interpretation that would not contradict the terms of reference. I can only say that when it was drawn in those terms that is not what was intended. Of course, it is not what was intended which should bind the commissioners, but the actual language which was used.

ST. LAWRENCE POWER DEVELOPMENT

AGREEMENT BETWEEN FEDERAL AND ONTARIO GOVERNMENTS

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to approve an agreement between the government of Canada and the government of the province of Ontario, respecting power development in the international rapids section of the St. Lawrence river; and to provide further for the transfer to the government of Ontario of the administration of certain lands or property pursuant to the agreement.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

Inquiries of the Ministry

LABOUR CONDITIONS

INDUSTRIAL DISPUTE AT WINDSOR

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. F. Brown (Essex West): May I direct a question to the Minister of Labour? I regret that I have not had the opportunity of giving him very much notice of it. Has the minister been advised of an industrial dispute at the Ford Motor Company in Windsor, Ontario, and has he any statement to make at this time?

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Labour): As to the first question, Mr. Speaker, I have not been advised officially on the matter, but I am acquainted with certain aspects of it through my colleague the Minister of National Health and Welfare, and through our own offices in Windsor.

As to the second part of the question, as the hon. member knows this dispute is a matter which is entirely within the authority of labour legislation of the province of Ontario.

OLD AGE SECURITY

APPLICATION OF RESIDENCE RULE TO NEWFOUNDLAND

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. J. Browne (St. John's West): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the uncertainty as to the status of Newfoundlanders who make application for the old age pension, to which reference was made in the debate on the old age security measure in the other place last evening, and in view of the fact that reports of the debate have been sent to Newfoundland, will the minister be good enough to say whether or not residence in Newfoundland is equivalent to residence in any other part of Canada?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): The hon. member was kind enough to send me notice of his question. As he says, this matter was raised in the other place, and in view of its importance perhaps I should deal with it here. The position briefly is that there is no difference between the status of applicants for old age security benefits in Newfoundland and applicants in other parts of Canada. The Old Age Security Act, together with the Old Age Assistance Act which was passed in June of this year, requires that in order to be eligible for benefit an applicant must be able to show that he has lived continuously for the last 20 years in Canada.

Section 9 of the Interpretation Act states that every act of the parliament of Canada shall, unless a contrary intention appears, apply to the whole of Canada. Where the word "Canada" is used in the present bill it means "Canada as presently constituted". Canada as presently constituted includes the province of Newfoundland. Furthermore, by the terms of union of Newfoundland with Canada it is provided that, subject to the terms of union, the province of Newfoundland must be treated, in so far as welfare and public services are concerned, on the same basis and subject to the same terms and conditions as in the case of the other provinces of Canada. The terms of union were approved by this parliament, by the parliament of the United Kingdom and by the government in Newfoundland, and are part of the constitution of Canada. "Residence in Canada", under the terms of this bill, and under the terms of other statutes of Canada, means "residence in the territory now known as Canada".

Newfoundland is part of Canada. It follows therefore that anyone who has lived for 20 years in any part of what is now Canada can qualify in accordance with the provisions respecting residence set forth in the Old Age Security Act and the Old Age Assistance Act. The same applies to the residence provisions in the Blind Persons Act, although there, of course, the residence period is somewhat shorter.

The hon. member therefore can be assured that, for applicants in Newfoundland, their residence in that province—either before or after April 1, 1949, the date of union—will be regarded under these new enactments as being residence in Canada.

I may add that for greater certainty it is proposed to pass a regulation under the provisions of section 6 (d) of the Old Age Security Act covering this specific point. Section 6 (d) of the Old Age Security Act gives the governor in council power to make regulations defining residence in Canada and defining intervals of absence from Canada preceding an application that shall be deemed not to have interrupted residence in Canada.

Justice has given the opinion that the governor in council has, under this provision, authority to make a regulation providing that residence in Newfoundland prior to the date of union be taken to be residence in Canada. We propose therefore to include such a provision in the regulations to be passed under the Old Age Security Act as well as in the regulations to be passed under the Old Age Assistance Act and the Blind Persons Act.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I thank the minister for his reply, and while I agree with the first part of it wholeheartedly I feel that the regulation does not seem to be necessary.

METEOROLOGICAL SERVICES

INQUIRY AS TO INSTALLATION OF WEATHER STATION IN BROCKVILLE AREA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. T. Fulford (Leeds): Will the Minister of Transport state whether Brockville or some other municipality in the area will be made a weather forecasting station for the upper St. Lawrence valley?

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): I know that there is no weather reporting station in that area at the moment.

Mr. Cruickshank: It rains there all the time.

Mr. Chevrier: No; I should think the weather is excellent there. I shall ask my officers to inquire as to the suitability of a weather forecasting station in that area.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

INQUIRY AS TO RECOMMENDATION FOR INCREASE IN BASIC PENSION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): I should like now to deal with a question asked by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) on November 30. He inquired whether or not any recommendation had been made as the result of the committee meeting with the general chairman and the vice-presidents of the Canadian National Railways to increase the basic pension of $25 a month for railway employees. I must say I have received no recommendation thus far from the committee or the officers of the Canadian National Railways. I am, therefore, not in a position to answer the question. When I have received such a recommendation, I shall be glad to impart its contents to the house.

PUBLIC WORKS

ALEXANDER AVENUE WHARF, WINNIPEG, MAN.

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (Minister of Public Works): Yesterday the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) asked me this question:

Has the government received representations from the Winnipeg and St. Boniface harbour commissioners asking that the Alexander Avenue wharf, on the Red river at Winnipeg, be enlarged to meet the increased demand for dockage facilities? Will consideration be given to extending this wharf at an early date?

The answer is as follows: By letter of September 13, 1951, the Winnipeg and St. Boniface harbour commissioners made representations for enlarged facilities at the Alexander Avenue wharf, Winnipeg. The enlargement of this wharf is being studied by the department, but full information must be available whether the arrival of freight boats from lake Winnipeg cannot be scattered throughout the week instead of the peak loads at week ends, as at present, resulting in wharf congestion.

ST. LAWRENCE WATERWAY

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY AUTHORITY—DEEP WATERWAY BETWEEN MONTREAL AND LAKE ERIE

On the order:

Government notice of motion—The Minister of Transport—Resolved, that it is expedient, for the purpose of providing a deep waterway between Montreal and lake Erie, to create a corporation to be called "The St. Lawrence Seaway Authority" with power, inter alia, to expropriate; to construct, maintain and operate all necessary works; to borrow amounts not exceeding three hundred million dollars; to establish tariffs of tolls and to employ such officers and employees as may be required for the purposes of the authority.

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, before the resolution is put to the house, I have a request to make. It was understood that the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) would speak for the opposition on this resolution. I understand that he is on his way back from the western provinces and that he has been delayed for a few hours. I would ask the house if it would agree that we delay the putting of this resolution until he arrives, which I understand will be about five o'clock. I am told that he has a prepared statement to make in answer to the statement of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier). I think it would only be courtesy that we agree to have this matter postponed for some time.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

PUBLIC PRINTING AND STATIONERY ACT

AMENDMENT PROVIDING FOR ADVANCES TO KING'S PRINTER FOR PURCHASE OF MATERIALS, ETC.

Hon. F. G. Bradley (Secretary of State) moved the third reading of Bill No. 24, to amend the Public Printing and Stationery Act.

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, at the time of second reading it was understood that further information would be made available. That information has been made available. Particularly in view of the fact that the whole question of revolving credits is going to be dealt with in the new Financial Administration Act, I think there is nothing further that I wish to say in respect of this bill at the present time.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, there are one or two questions that have occurred to me since we had the earlier debate on this matter. I recognize that we are now at the third reading stage. We have passed the committee stage where it is possible to indulge in the question and answer method of procedure, but I should like to put a question or two to the Secretary of State. I hope that he will be given the opportunity to reply.

From the document that was tabled the other day I note that we have been given a break-down of the amounts owed by the various departments. As at November 22, 1951, they totalled $3,788,752. That was the amount due to the printing bureau by the various departments of the government. In response to our request the break-down of that figure was given not only by departments but by various months. It is to be noted that the greater part of those arrears are for recent months such as September and October, but there are some rather large items that have been standing for a good many months. I do not think that any of us over here on this side, being reasonable people, question the delay in paying accounts that are only a month or two old. But it would be interesting to have a comment as to why some departments are paid up except for the last month or two whereas some other departments, such as the Department of National Defence, the Department of National Health and Welfare, the Department of Defence Production, the Department of Citizenship and Immigration and perhaps others have accounts going right back to January of this year. In that connection, can the Secretary of State tell us whether any of these arrears are for supplies of printing which the departments refused to accept? Was any of this printing sent back because it was not satisfactory in any way? Would that be an explanation for any of these arrears? If so, I would appreciate it if the Secretary of State would tell us to what extent that is the case. I would also be interested in knowing how much of this outstanding debt is for letterpress printing and how much is for offset printing.

As I say, Mr. Speaker, it would have been easier to handle these questions had we had this document when we were still in committee of the whole. But from this side of the house we agreed to allow that stage to go by provided we could get information of this kind on third reading. I hope that the house will grant permission to the Secretary of State to close the debate, although that is not usual on third reading, in order that he might answer these questions.

Hon. F. G. Bradley (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker—

[Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood).]

Mr. Speaker: Before the minister speaks, I should point out to the house that he is entitled to speak only once on third reading of the bill. In view of the fact that he made no statement on the motion for third reading I think I should allow him to speak now, but this will be the only opportunity that will be given to him to speak. I do not think that, on third reading, the house should take part in the kind of debate which has been carried on in committee of the whole.

Mr. Bradley: Mr. Speaker, I have not much to add at this stage of the bill, except to say that the questions which have been asked by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre are of such a detailed nature that I could not possibly be expected to have all of them available. If he had telephoned me some time before the house met, I could possibly have obtained the information for him.

Mr. Knowles: We really did not expect that this order of business would be reached until tomorrow.

Mr. Bradley: As to the arrears that are of comparatively long standing, running back into last May, I am not able to give him exact information upon each one but my recollection is that, in connection with one or two, there is some question as to whether the amount should be charged to the particular department or to the king's printer's department itself. As to the question of the amount to be charged against the ordinary type of printing and the amount against offset printing, I have not the faintest idea at the moment. But I can get the information for my hon. friend at any time, if he desires it.

Mr. Knowles: May I just say to the Secretary of State that I will place my questions on the order paper and try to get the answers in that way.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

SUPREME COURT ACT

AMENDMENT TO INCREASE MAXIMUM SALARY OF REGISTRAR

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice) moved the second reading of Bill No. 30, to amend the Supreme Court Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Dion in the chair.

On section 1—Rank and salary of registrar.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Now that the supreme court is the final court of appeal, some consideration should be given to enlarging the scope of the grounds for appeal to that court in order to enable citizens who have had their fundamental freedoms or rights interfered with unjustly to have a right of appeal to what is now the foot of the throne. As the law now stands, generally speaking appeals are limited almost exclusively to cases measured by money value, except in cases of leave; and leave cannot be granted in respect of matters that are primarily concerned with such fundamental freedoms of the individual as religion, speech and the like, unless in appeal in a criminal case in which there has been a dissent, or in which there is a direct conflict between the judgment of the court appealed from and that of a court of equal jurisdiction.

The law permits the continued existence of conditions that may constitute a denial of fundamental freedom, because the person who suffers personally from the alleged departure from one or other of the fundamental freedoms has no appeal to the supreme court. Now that the supreme court is the final court I should like to suggest that something should be done to assure the right of the individual everywhere in this dominion, regardless of whether it is a matter of monetary value or not, where a great principle in the field of fundamental freedom is at stake, to have the right of appeal to that court. He has an appeal under the criminal law, as I have already mentioned. He has an appeal in matters of certiorari; but where there is a direct invasion of his rights in consequence of municipal laws he has not, even when a citizen's fundamental freedoms are denied or abridged. I suggest that consideration should be given to placing in the hands of the Supreme Court of Canada the power, by leave, to grant any Canadian who claims to have been wrongfully deprived of any one of his fundamental freedoms the right of appeal to that court. By circumscribing the right of appeal to the extent that the court itself would be required to give leave, the abuse or unnecessary use of the right of appeal would thereby be avoided.

Over the years I have advocated a bill of rights for Canadians in order to assure the preservation and maintenance of our fundamental freedoms within the confines of our constitution. To assure those freedoms I have advocated either a statute or a constitutional amendment, wherein will be set forth the personal freedoms that are ours and in order to assure that wherever they are invaded unlawfully the individual shall have a right of recourse to the courts. As it is now, he has not that right. I have suggested to other ministers of justice that, in order to determine the division of authority as between the federal and provincial jurisdictions, the Minister of Justice should submit to the Supreme Court of Canada a bill of rights such as was drafted by the Senate committee two years ago, with a view to ascertaining by appropriate questions what, if any, of the fundamental freedoms are within the jurisdiction of the federal parliament.

Canadians should and must have equal rights before the law. I believe that the time has come to extend the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court of Canada so as to enable an individual, whose fundamental freedoms have been denied or abrogated, to have an appeal, with the leave of a supreme court judge, to the Supreme Court of Canada. Secondly, with a view to assuring the preservation of democracy within our country, thereby showing the world the superiority of democracy over its very antithesis, communism, everything should be done to maintain, develop and expand the principles of freedom and liberty, and to that end a major step forward would be the submission to the Supreme Court of Canada of the question of the respective jurisdiction of the federal parliament and the provincial legislatures in respect of the fundamental freedoms.

The supreme court is composed of men whose contribution to the jurisprudence and the development of this country is worthy of the highest traditions of our judiciary. Its judges are in a position to maintain and protect the liberty of the subject, provided that there is a right of appeal to that court. A right of appeal that is circumscribed by financial or monetary considerations is not one that will protect and preserve the rights of the individual when his fundamental freedoms have been encroached upon.

At the same time I should like to make a third suggestion. It has to do with the right of the subject to sue the crown. As the law now stands, the power the Minister of Justice had to deny the right of the subject to sue the crown for negligence and contract was removed last year. However, the crown in Canada continues to enjoy a position far superior to the subject and to the citizen.

In the United Kingdom the subject is a sovereign in his own right, in that he possesses equal rights with the king in the courts, subject always to two qualifications, namely that if he is a member of the armed forces he cannot sue for wrongful orders given him, and no citizen can sue the Post Office Department for neglect or for other wrong arising out of the transmission of mail.

Apart from those two limitations, before the courts the citizen has equal rights with the crown. And I suggest that the disabilities of the individual in his right to sue the crown which places the citizen in a position of subservience to the crown as to rights and obligations should be abolished to the same extent as in Great Britain.

The minister will recall that within the last few weeks in the city of Ottawa, during the course of an argument in a case in the exchequer court, Mr. Justice Thorson referred to the amplitude of the rights the crown possessed. If the press report was correct, he stated that a servant of the crown could take a citizen's motor car and dump it into the river, and there would be no right on the part of the person aggrieved as against the crown, under the law as it now is.

Such an anamolous condition cannot and does not exist in the United Kingdom and should not in Canada. In the United Kingdom the subject enjoys equality with the crown in the courts of law, subject to the exceptions I mentioned before.

These are three general submissions which I make to the Minister of Justice who, I am pleased to say, has taken interest in this subject, that merits the approval of the bar of this country. I ask him to give consideration to these submissions so as to preserve, maintain and extend the field of liberty of the individual; and provide access to the courts for every Canadian; and assure that the crown shall no longer enjoy any unequal privileges over the individual, in the courts of law.

Mr. Garson: I wonder if before my hon. friend takes his seat he would cite some concrete examples of the lack of access to the courts or the lack of fundamental freedoms enjoyed by any Canadians about which he has spoken, in order that I may deal with those concrete cases when I reply.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I could quote many examples. I do not wish to bring in anything that would make this discussion controversial in any respect. However, I would point out one instance which comes to our attention frequently, and that is in connection with orders in council passed by the government which deny the subject the right of recourse to the courts, regardless of illegal interferences that have taken place.

I would mention the order in council dealing with the radium development in northern Alberta. It is all very well to say that that was immediately after the war. It provided uncontrolled power to a controller and gave him a position of superiority above the law such as no one should enjoy. It gave to him the power to do anything legally or illegally; and no matter what he might do, the individual claiming to be wronged would not have recourse to the courts.

Before the Foreign Exchange Control Act was in the form of a statute it operated under regulations and orders in council. There was provision in those orders in council that, where an individual's rights were determined by an official in the department, there was no right of recourse to the courts to the person wronged. I have always taken strong objection to placing citizens of the country in a position of being under the direct domination of an official of the crown, without such persons having the right of appeal against unjust orders.

When the statute was passed, the Foreign Exchange Control Act, provision was made whereby the individual should have the right to proceed against any government official who did wrong in connection with the administration of the act. But with the limitation that such individual, although he is suffering loss of, we will say, $5,000, can recover in the courts only nominal damages, in other words $1, and without costs.

In effect the statute gives the citizen the right to his day in court but it is merely an ephemeral right. It means not only that he must suffer the loss of the damage directly attributable to the wrongful act, but he cannot secure his costs of action even when he is successful.

There has been a trend in the direction of providing that decisions made by governmental boards as a result of which individuals who suffer injustice therefrom are denied any appeal to the courts. I think the time has come, in order to extend the abiding principles of democracy within our country—except when the security of the state is uppermost, and when the ordinary processes of democracy have to give place to the need of action—for a declaration by parliament that never again shall an individual's right of appeal to the courts be denied.

I thank the minister for giving me this opportunity to mention one or two instances in a purely non-partisan matter for the purpose of bringing to his attention the need of giving to the subject in Canada, for the preservation of his fundamental freedoms, rights equal to those actually possessed by British citizens within the United Kingdom.

Mr. Garson: Mr. Chairman, the matter before the committee at the present time is whether the ceiling imposed by statute upon the salary of the registrar of the supreme court shall be raised. I do not think that even by the widest stretch of the imagination would it be possible to trace any relationship between that question and the matters which the hon. member for Lake Centre has just been discussing. However, in view of the fact that this is a short session and it will not be possible for the hon. member to raise these matters on the estimates of the Department of Justice I am quite willing, if you will permit me, to discuss, on their merits and as briefly as I can, the points which my hon. friend has raised.

For many years the hon. member has been a great proponent of fundamental freedoms and of a bill of rights which as he says would preserve them. As I understand his proposition today, it is that in respect of the Supreme Court Act, which I am sure he will agree is largely procedural in character and does not deal with substantive law, we should provide by some amendment to that statute a recourse to the supreme court for the purpose of protecting these human rights and fundamental freedoms.

I put it to you and to the hon. gentleman that what he is really talking about is not a matter of procedural law that could be secured by an amendment to the Supreme Court Act. He is talking about a matter of substantive law. If, as he contends, the law of Canada is at present defective in the matter of protecting human rights and fundamental freedoms, what is required is something which he himself has advocated on a number of occasions—a bill of rights.

Presuming that the law as it stands at the present time is defective—which I think is open to considerable doubt—I had hoped that some time I might have the opportunity of discussing the resolution for a bill of rights which has been almost permanently upon the order paper in the name of my hon. friend—it can be remedied only by some substantive provision of law which in the nature of things cannot take the form of an amendment to the procedural sections of the Supreme Court Act.

The point here is not whether the supreme court has jurisdiction to hear appeals from any courts which are junior to it. I think my hon. friend will agree that with the amendments which were introduced coincident with the abolition of appeals to the privy council, the jurisdiction of the supreme court to hear almost any kind of appeal from any court in Canada is now pretty much unlimited and that therefore we cannot meet the case which my hon. friend states by attempting to enlarge the jurisdiction of the supreme court upon appeal because they already have wide-open jurisdiction on appeal. If the law be defective it can be changed only by the method which I have always understood the hon. member to have been advocating, namely, by a bill of rights.

The hon. member says that he would like to have this question of whether human rights and fundamental freedoms fall within the federal or provincial jurisdiction submitted to the supreme court.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I said to submit the draft bill of rights which was prepared by the Senate committee.

Mr. Garson: Yes, submit the draft bill of rights which lists the various human rights and fundamental freedoms one after another to the supreme court to have that court determine which of those human rights and fundamental freedoms so listed fall within federal jurisdiction, on the one hand, or within provincial jurisdiction, on the other.

These suggestions, which my hon. friend has just now made in respect to a matter which is completely irrelevant to them, I must confess took me completely by surprise so I am not quite as well equipped to discuss them as I would have been if we had proceeded, for example, under the motion which stands in the name of my hon. friend on the order paper. I am just speaking offhand, but I should think that the supreme court would find some difficulty in deciding whether a subject like the liberty of a person fell under federal or provincial jurisdiction. The habeas corpus acts are provincial acts, for example, while the criminal law is a federal statute. I think my hon. friend will agree that the question of whether one or another aspect of the freedom of the person fell within provincial or federal jurisdiction would depend upon the substantive statute which was being considered by the supreme court at that time and it would be a matter of the greatest possible difficulty for the supreme court to consider human rights and fundamental freedoms in the form of abstract statements.

Therefore, as I said the other night and with great respect, I would be inclined to think that a much more satisfactory way of arriving at the objective which my hon. friend has in mind, if he considered any of the present protections which are enjoyed in the way of human rights and fundamental principles to be in any way defective, would be for him to introduce a private bill to amend the law in that respect. After having taken the precautions, which I know my hon. friend would take, to make sure that the matter fell within federal jurisdiction, he would then have a legal issue for presentation to the supreme court which would be much more satisfactory than the submission of the Hon. Mr. Roebuck's resolution.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The possibility of a private bill introduced by a private member becoming law would depend upon the consent of the minister.

Mr. Garson: That might be quite so, but if my hon. friend with his usual eloquence and persuasiveness were able to convince the administration that it was good law, I am sure we would be only too glad to accommodate him.

The reason I asked my hon. friend whether there were any specific cases of lack of freedom that he objected to was that when one examines these phrases, like freedom of the press for example, and the steps that should be taken to protect them, I think he will find that freedom of the press is very widespread in this country. If I am not mistaken in my recollection, on the only occasion when an attempt was made by one of the provincial legislatures of this country to abridge it, the matter, in spite of what my hon. friend has said today, did get to the Supreme Court of Canada, and as I recall it, it was held that the legislation in question was unconstitutional.

Mr. Diefenbaker: It got to the supreme court by a submission made by the minister of justice, did it not?

Mr. Garson: Yes, quite, which form of submission, as I am sure my hon. friend will be the first to agree, is still available as a means of getting matters of that sort to the supreme court.

When he speaks of this one concrete case he was able to offer by way of objecting to provisions in an order in council dealing with uranium, I am sure that upon meditation he would agree there is really no invasion of any human rights and fundamental freedoms if the democratically elected representatives of the people in parliament assembled, for reasons which seem adequate to them, clothe the governor general in council with certain powers which he proceeds to exercise in a reasonable manner in order to meet very dangerous circumstances. In connection with the particular matter to which he referred, I am sure that after reflection he will not then say that the courts and the remedies therein are being made unavailable to citizens of the country.

I am sure my hon. friend is aware that it is not only in respect of these orders in council passed in the federal field, and which he will agree are passed within the limit of the powers granted by parliament, but also in the provincial sphere that examples of this sort of thing are to be found. I agree with him that provisions of that sort should not be inserted in an order in council or in a statute except for very strong reasons, but I should think if the reason with respect to the matter of uranium which he raised was the withholding of information from the mortal enemies of the country we might very properly consider putting a clause of that sort in a bill or order in council. If we did so I cannot see what connection could be drawn between it and the fundamental freedoms of which he speaks. While there may be differences of opinion between the administration and the opposition upon the matter, I think if any allowance is made for a conscientious approach to their duties on the part of the ministers it will be found upon analysis in all these cases that it is for the protection of the fundamental freedoms of the majority of the people that provisions of that sort are inserted in statutes.

In any event, I cannot see what advantage there would be in an amendment to the Supreme Court Act such as he suggests because these provisions in the statute or order in council are either constitutional or unconstitutional. If they are not constitutional I am sure my hon. friend will agree that at the present time the subject has full rights and a complete remedy in that he may take an appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada which will declare the order in council or statute, as the case may be, to be beyond the power of the legislative body or cabinet which passed it.

His third point was that he wanted the rights of the subject to sue the crown extended. Surely he will agree this has nothing to do with the Supreme Court Act. It might perhaps be better raised under the next bill to come up having to do with the exchequer court. However, in this connection I can only repeat what I said on an occasion when it was much more in order than at the present moment, that in abolishing fiats as we did at the last session in those cases which are now covered in the form of substantive law in the Exchequer Court Act we were taking care of the enormous majority of cases which are likely to arise against the crown.

I am sure my hon. friend, who has had a wide practice in these matters, will agree that when one takes care of negligence actions against the crown one takes care, I should think, of at least 95 per cent of all cases likely to arise between the crown and the subject. Like the hon. member, I have not seen any reports than those contained in the newspapers, of the case that took place the other day concerning certain events in Hull. Like him I am not in the habit of forming my legal opinion in matters of that sort upon the basis of newspaper reports. Therefore I must say that I cannot comment upon that particular case. I appreciate the references which the hon. gentleman made to myself. I appreciate his interest in this subject. I am very glad he raised these points, and I shall be pleased to take them under consideration, but I must enter the proviso that it seems to me that what is required, if anything be required at all, is not a procedural amendment to the Supreme Court Act but a matter of substantive law in a form which I had always thought my hon. friend had systematically advocated.

Mr. Diefenbaker: As an addition to the last statement made by the minister, I should like to say that at all times together with a bill of rights I have advocated the extension of the right of the individual to appeal to the courts in order to ensure that governments, however powerful and of whatever persuasion they may be, shall not have the right to take away from the subject the right of appeal to the courts.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Would the minister explain why he is leaving in this section the provision for a minimum salary of $4,200? Does he think there will ever be a time when the registrar will be paid so low a salary? What is the point of leaving it there?

Mr. Garson: I do not think there will be but I am sure the hon. member will understand that in all matters under the civil service there is an effort that has to be continued at all times to maintain a reasonable relationship between salaries paid for one position and for another with respect both to their minima and maxima. This is the form in which we got it back as approved by the various officers of the civil service who had to check it, and I would be very reluctant to change it. My hon. friend is quite right in saying that under present conditions it has no real application.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Further, I would point out that the section says the registrar shall have the rank of a deputy head of a department. Where can he find a comparison in salary between a registrar and a deputy head of a department? It seems to me it is an absurd position, and I would suggest to the minister that he should amend the section.

Exchequer Court Act

EXCHEQUER COURT ACT

AMENDMENT TO INCREASE MAXIMUM SALARY OF REGISTRAR

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice) moved the second reading of Bill No. 31, to amend the Exchequer Court Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Dion in the chair.

On section 1—Registrar of exchequer court. Tenure of office and salary.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I should like to ask the minister why there is no minimum salary set in this bill.

Mr. Garson: I do not think there ever has been. We have simply retained the language of the old section and changed the maximum salary.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): You are a true conservative.

Mr. Garson: Coming from the hon. member, that is a compliment.

REVISED STATUTES OF CANADA

AMENDMENT TO PROVIDE FOR SUPPLEMENTARY VOLUME

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice) moved the second reading of Bill No. 32, respecting the revised statutes of Canada.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Dion in the chair.

On section 1—Supplement.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Will the minister make a statement?

Mr. Garson: As hon. members are aware, since I have made the statement several times, we have a statute revision commission preparing the first all-over revision of the federal statutes since 1927. This body has been engaged for some time, and is now approaching the completion of its work. The idea is that, at the next session of the house in 1952, we should pass a revision of all the statutes which will include all acts passed up until the end of 1951. It is proposed to have all the final copy ready, the type set and the platens taken off and ready to print when this work is completed. It will take about eight months to complete the printing of this huge mass of material. I have no doubt that during this time parliament will be busy enacting more legislation.

Mr. Knowles: And amending some that has been passed.

Mr. Garson: Yes, and amending some that has been passed. But I would point out that the acts we are likely to amend we will likely amend on the terms of the 1927 revision and amendments. The purpose, and the only purpose, of this bill is to get over this difficulty of the legislative process continuing simultaneously with the printing process.

The amendments presented to the house during the 1952 session will not be incorporated in the 1952 revision, because the 1952 revision will include all of the statutes passed up until the end of 1951. When that work is finished we have to set it in printed form, so there has to be a cut-off date. The whole purpose of this bill is to authorize the governor in council to make provision for adding a supplement to the 1952 revised statutes. In others words, you will have volumes I, II, III and IV and an index. Then there will be this supplement. In the future, anyone looking at the revised statutes will look in the index and the index to the supplement, and will know that he has all the 1952 revised statutes listed in these two indices here.

In the meanwhile, we shall put out a 1952 volume of the annual statutes which will contain the appropriation acts, private and local acts and temporary acts that have no particular legislative character. Now, that is the purpose and the only purpose of the bill.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The other day the minister mentioned that he had not as yet had a report from the commission engaged in revising the Criminal Code, which of course will be one of those statutes. In view of the fact that he expects that, with the exception of the amendments passed in 1952, he will go ahead with the printing of the revised statutes, does that mean it is expected the house will be made aware of the suggested changes in the Criminal Code at the next session so that the new Criminal Code may be included in the revised statutes?

Mr. Garson: As my hon. friend is aware, the body which has been revising the Criminal Code is a separate body from that which has been revising the statutes. At the next session we shall introduce the report of the body revising the Criminal Code, and we shall be asking the house to enact a revised Criminal Code in which we hope we can reduce the number of sections from somewhere between 1,100 and 1,200 to something between 700 and 800. This will be published, either with this supplement or as a separate consolidated statute. I believe most lawyers will agree that there is a great deal to be said for having a consolidated Criminal Code in a volume by itself.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): If that is so, why does not the minister decide on that now? I think it is a wonderful idea.

Mr. Garson: Decide on what?

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Why do we not decide now to have a separate volume for the Criminal Code and keep it separate from the rest of the revised statutes?

Mr. Garson: I think we shall.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I am glad that is going to be done but do not be in any doubt about it. Further I should like to ask the minister when he expects that the consolidation will be ready for printing.

Mr. Garson: That is, of the statutes or of the code?

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Of the revised statutes.

Mr. Garson: I would think they will be ready by not later than February 1. That is an estimate, but I think it is a reasonably accurate one.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): That is, they will be ready for printing?

Mr. Garson: Yes.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): When does the minister expect that they will be printed after that?

Mr. Garson: As I said a few moments ago, it will take about eight months to complete the printing, the proofreading, galley proof, page proof and so on. Then there is the binding of them. It will take about eight or nine months in order to get them out in book form.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): My purpose in asking that series of questions is this. What is the point of having a supplementary volume? The statutes for 1952 will begin again and go right on, in another series.

Mr. Garson: I am afraid that I did not make myself clear to my hon. friend. When the process of printing is started, we will say in February—the middle of February, 1952—of the 1952 revised statutes, about the same time or maybe a little bit later or a little bit before we will start passing the annual 1952 statutes. If we do not make the provision which we attempt to make in this present bill, to have included the statutes which this house passes while the 1952 revised statutes are in the course of being printed, then we will have a hiatus in the revised statutes in that they will not reflect the bills that we pass in 1952. That is the reason we are doing that.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): But the statutes published in 1952 will be themselves the statutes. You have your revised statutes up to the end of 1951. What is the point of having a supplementary volume?

Mr. Garson: For this reason, Mr. Chairman, amongst others. As my hon. friend who is himself a lawyer knows, when one speaks of the 1927 revised statutes, one always thinks of the 1927 revised statutes which include the statutes or any amendments which were passed in 1927. In the older days when parliament did not sit so continuously, this printing could be done in between sessions of parliament. But at the present time when the statutes are of their present magnitude, it takes a long while—a matter of some eight or nine months—to print them; and when, simultaneously with that printing process, there is a legislative process going on changing perhaps some of the very statutes which are being printed, if you do not make the provision that we are seeking here, you will end up with 1952 revised statutes which lawyers and others subsequently will not be able to refer to as being inclusive of all the statutes that are passed up until the end of 1952.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Perhaps I did not make myself clear to the committee, Mr. Chairman. We are now making a consolidation and revision of the statutes which will be up to the end of 1951. Let us assume for the sake of argument that the prediction of the hon. member for Lake Centre as to an election in 1952 is correct and that the house were to adjourn suddenly without passing any legislation. The consolidation would be up until the end of 1951. Does the minister not agree? Then suppose for the sake of argument we passed two statutes only. They would be the statutes of 1952, first session. If there was a session following the first session, what is the objection to having that as the supplement to the revision instead of publishing a special volume? What is the point of publishing a special volume? It does not matter whether there are two or one hundred and two statutes. It is all in the session of 1952. They can still be used ipso facto as a supplement without having any special volume published at all.

Mr. Garson: I think my hon. friend would perhaps agree that, in the first place, parliament would not want to feel shackled in respect of any amendment that it would like to introduce to statutes which are included in the revision, during its 1952 session. If it wishes to do that I think it would be much better, in view of the small amount of extra cost that would be involved, to be able to present to the people of Canada for the next period of years—it is now twenty-five years since our last revision—revised statutes of 1952 which in all their volumes will contain all the statutes as revised up until the end of that year. If by putting that supplement in we can achieve that end, I think it is desirable that we should do so.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): May I ask the minister one question?

Mr. Garson: Yes.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Will that supplementary volume be any different from the statutes of 1952?

Mr. Garson: Oh, yes. I explained that point before to my hon. friend. I said that all of the statutes of a legislative character, as distinguished from those which provide for supply and are of a sort of administrative character, will be included in this supplement. But the other ones that have nothing to do with legislative acts of general application will not be brought into the 1952 revision as a part of it, although under the circumstances they will have to be published in the form of a small separate volume. But then, fifteen years from now, anyone wanting to know what the revised statutes of 1952 are can go to the one small shelf of books and he has there the whole thing complete for 1952.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): To refer back to the question of the criminal code, is it the intention of the government to have a separate volume for that?

Mr. Garson: Yes.

Mr. Brooks: I should like to ask the minister whether the printing is all to be done by the king's printer. I have heard him state a number of times that the king's printer is extremely busy and that they have to wait sometimes eight or nine months to have work of this kind done. It seems to me that it could be done outside of the king's printer, under contract. I am just wondering if the minister can tell us about that?

Mr. Bradley: Part of it is now set up in type.

Mr. Brooks: Part of it may be set up in type, but is it all being done by the king's printer?

Mr. Bradley: Yes.

Mr. Brooks: Is it necessary that this should all be done by the king's printer?

Mr. Garson: I hope my hon. colleague will correct me if I am wrong, but I think all those arrangements have been made in the ordinary course. It is a peculiar set-up and we would prefer to have it done as an internal job. We must have specially skilled proofreaders and the like for the proofreading of the statutes. In many ways it is quite a difficult and important task.

Mr. Knowles: I have no objection to the proposal contained in this bill, Mr. Chairman, but it seems to me that both the minister and the hon. member for St. John's West are making a mountain out of a molehill. It seems to me that the difficulty could have been resolved by just calling it the revised statutes of 1951, including the statutes up to the end of this year and then starting with one annual book for next year. If it turned out that there were two sessions of parliament in 1952 I can see that we might end up with three volumes for 1952; one would be the supplement to the revised statutes, another would be the statutes passed in the first session and another would be the statutes passed in the second session. In other words, the confusion which has been indicated by the minister is capable of being compounded, if one wants to do so. However, it is good to know that these revised statutes are on the way and will soon be available.

When the minister first began his explanation in committee today, I thought I heard him say something to the effect that it was the intention of the government that in 1952 parliament would pass these revised statutes. Am I correct in understanding the minister to use that language? That is not the case, is it?

Mr. Garson: Oh, no, that is not the case. I am glad that my hon. friend has raised that point. The very act that we are amending here provides for their being taken care of in the manner outlined in this act. If I have said anything to the contrary, I was in error. I will check on what I said.

Mr. Knowles: Whatever the minister said previously, it is clear now that the commission that is doing the job has the authority of the previous act—

Mr. Garson: That is right.

Mr. Knowles: —with the sanction of the governor general or the governor in council to issue a certified revision.

[Mr. Brooks.]

Mr. Garson: That is right.

Mr. Knowles: May I ask whether certain cases that I have in mind will be covered? For example, at this fall's session of parliament, amongst the bills we have passed was one that I think was entitled "The Canadian Forces Act". It included amendments to a score or more of existing statutes. I believe it was the hon. member for Kamloops who asked the Minister of National Defence whether it should not have been done by the process of amending each one of these statutes. The Minister of National Defence said that his department preferred it this way. I am asking the Minister of Justice now whether these respective amendments to a score or more of different statutes will come before us in the revised statutes as the Canadian Forces Act of 1951, or will these amendments be distributed amongst the various acts which were thereby amended?

Mr. Garson: Well, I must not leave the impression with my colleagues in the house that I have specifically directed my attention to this point so that I can speak with complete authority. But my impression would be that in a case of that kind it would be covered by either of those two methods that my hon. friend has referred to, or possibly by a third one, by cross references or footnotes, making it clear that an amendment to a particular statute which the reader was examining was to be contained in another statute; and there would be a footnote at the bottom to indicate what that amendment was. There is a drafting difficulty to overcome there, I will grant you, but I am sure that that would be picked up in the ordinary course of events. I will make inquiries as to which of these alternatives will be employed.

Mr. Knowles: The same thing would apply with respect to the Statute Law Amendment (Newfoundland) Act?

Mr. Garson: Yes.

Mr. Knowles: The purpose of that act was to amend a whole host of statutes of Canada to include reference to Newfoundland where that reference was needed. I presume the minister will make the same answer as he made to my previous question. It does seem to me that the more sensible thing is to have those amendments incorporated right into the act concerned.

Mr. Garson: Of course the difficulty about that is that the amendments in the form in which they were originally passed were the separate sections of, we will say, the a, b, c act, and if you put one into the x, y, z act and another into the p, d, q act and another into another act you leave the reader of the volume in the position where he is wondering whether in coming from one place and appearing some place else they have not lost their original connotation. However, I think these are matters that we really do not need to worry our heads about, because they are technical matters for the draftsmen. If I had thought there would be any curiosity on the part of any hon. members in this connection I certainly would have briefed myself on this point.

Mr. Knowles: I can tell the minister that there is at least one curious member here.

Mr. Garson: I thought you said "purist".

Mr. Knowles: No. Even so, I had better get on before someone picks up that comment and makes something else out of it. I have in mind legislation affecting veterans, the Pension Act, and the War Veterans Allowance Act, and all the other statutes affecting veterans. As the legislation now stands, these acts in themselves do not contain the necessary references to cover veterans who served in world war II as citizens of Newfoundland. The legislative sanctions covering them are found in the statute called the Statute Law Amendment (Newfoundland) Act. I will not pursue the matter further, but it did seem to me that the proper place to have these references would be in the veterans legislation itself.

CIVIL SERVICE ACT

AMENDMENT RESPECTING TENURE OF OFFICE AND SALARIES OF COMMISSIONERS

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Bradley that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to present a measure to amend the Civil Service Act in respect of the tenure of office and salaries of the commissioners.

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I had the honour of adjourning this debate, with some assistance from the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier).

Mr. Knowles: Assistance?

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): It turned out that we had later a surprise, because this resolution which sounds very interesting and very very innocent in its wording turned out to have more of a sting in the tail of it than was apparent to us or to the Minister of Public Works, who seemed to think right to the end of the interesting debate we had that the purport of the resolution was not quite the same as indicated by the Secretary of State (Mr. Bradley).

The resolution reads very briefly:

That it is expedient to present a measure to amend the Civil Service Act in respect of the tenure of office and salaries of the commissioners.

When this matter was up before, the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) made some comments on the inadequacy of the resolution, which were very pointed, clear and forceful, and I propose to say nothing more on that point. But I wish to refer to what the Secretary of State said in introducing the resolution. He said in part, as reported at page 1500 of Hansard:

The present salaries of the civil service commissioners are greater than those actually specified in the Civil Service Act, the authorization for this being obtained annually by means of a special item in the estimates.

Then he added what I feel expresses very accurately and sincerely what he meant, and what no doubt members of the government often feel. He said this:

It is the purpose of the present amendments to the act to avoid the necessity of having recourse to the estimates . . .

Now, I am sure that idea is very attractive to members of the government, "to avoid having recourse to the estimates." But I go on. The minister said:

. . . by providing that the salaries of the civil service commissioners shall be set by the governor in council, which may also, on the recommendation of the Prime Minister, retain the services of a commissioner beyond the age of 65 years.

The Minister of Public Works seemed to think that the matter was a very simple one, and had to do only with the tenure of office of the commissioners. He says this seems to be the important section. Well, of course, we have not seen the bill and therefore we are not able to judge as between one section and another. But I want to go back—and this is my chief point—to a remark made by the Secretary of State. He said:

It is the purpose of the present amendments to the act to avoid the necessity of having recourse to the estimates by providing that the salaries of the civil service commissioners shall be set by the governor in council.

As I said before, it seems to me we should have further information; because I think it would be difficult to persuade us that these salaries—if I have correctly understood the Secretary of State (Mr. Bradley)—should be dealt with in a manner so entirely different from the manner of dealing with other salaries.

We have spent considerable time in this chamber in the last three days settling certain other salaries by statutes. Here however we are not even to have them settled and presented in the estimates. Rather, we are to have them fixed by the governor in council. When we get into committee we will certainly need to have information on that subject because, on the face of it, it is repugnant to the whole idea of the fixing of salaries.

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a few words on this resolution, and would direct my remarks first to the adequacy of it. I do not believe it is necessary to repeat what has already been said by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). All I will say in that regard is that there is not enough information in the resolution to make it possible for us to judge as to the value or the foolhardiness of the legislation to be introduced. My own feeling is that it will be quite foolhardy.

The information given by the Secretary of State (Mr. Bradley) does not indicate in any way what will be contained in the bill, other than that there is a desire to get away from the necessity of talking to this house about salaries during discussion of the estimates. As the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) has said, it would be desirable to get away from that necessity each year; but there is a suggestion that the salaries will be fixed by orders in council. That is completely contrary to practice, and certainly, as the hon. member for Greenwood has said, it is repugnant to members of the house.

I say that, of all salaries, those of the civil service commissioners ought to be set by statute. They are the body who are supposed to be as far removed as possible from any political influence. The suggestion in the resolution is that the civil service commissioner be brought as closely as possible under the control of the government, not the control of members of the House of Commons. That principle is wrong, completely wrong. Members of the house do not want the government tampering with the civil service commission—and it could tamper with them, through salaries, and do so by order in council and without reference to the House of Commons.

There is also for consideration the matter of the tenure of office. I should like to know what special dispensation ought to be given the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) to recommend the extension of service of any man, without reference to the house. Especially is that true in a body like the civil service commission. I am completely opposed to the principle here suggested. I think the recommendation of the Auditor General ought to be implemented, and that is to have the salaries of the civil service commissioners set by statute, after that statute has been brought here, before members of the house. We should not have a condition whereby part of the salaries is set by statute and another part is set by the insertion of an item in the estimates. That is not a good way, nor is the present suggestion a good one.

If I am right in assuming that the intention is to give the governor in council the right to set these salaries and the tenure of office, and to do so by order in council, then I am completely opposed to the resolution, and I shall vote against it.

I strongly urge that the government ought not to proceed in this way. Let us take care of the matter in the ordinary fashion, by bringing in an amendment to the statute stating that these salaries and tenures of office shall be made statutory, subject to change from time to time by reference to the House of Commons. If that is done I shall have no further opposition to it.

Mr. W. J. Browne (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to support what has been said by hon. members who have preceded me in the debate. It would seem to me, from the statement of the Secretary of State (Mr. Bradley), that there are two points to be considered: one is that the salary of the civil service commissioners shall be set by the governor in council, and the other is that the tenure of office of these commissioners, who are generally men advanced in age, may be extended beyond the ordinary retirement age of 65 years, and that this may be done at the wish of the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent).

It seems to me that this is a backward step. Indeed, both of these suggestions are backward steps. What we want to see in this country is civil service commissioners becoming as independent as the Auditor General, and not being subjected to political influence. In what other way can the public have confidence in the appointment of civil servants? If the salaries and tenure of office of these commissioners are placed directly under the power of the governor in council, then I do not think they could do anything that would have a greater effect in taking away confidence in the civil service commissioners.

We would like to see the civil service commission a body in which the general public would have confidence, and especially one in which members of the civil service would have confidence. But if the civil service commissioners are going to be placed in the hands of the cabinet, then that confidence will be destroyed. Let me repeat my belief that, if this is done, it will be a backward step.

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I think before passing the resolution, without giving the details of the bill, I might state that it is a very short one and deals exactly with what is mentioned in the resolution, namely the tenure of office and salaries of the commissioners.

The civil service commissioners are and always have been appointed by order in council. They shall hold office—and this is as it is stated in the old act—during good behaviour, for a period of ten years, from the date of their appointment. That is as it exists right now. In other words, if we withdrew this resolution we would remain in the position where they are appointed for ten years. So I cannot follow the suggestion of the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Browne) that they are not independent of the government. They are in fact appointed during good behaviour.

An hon. Member: What does that mean?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I do not know.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): What about the statement of the Secretary of State as it appears at page 1500 of Hansard?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): You read it carefully, and you will see it is the same thing I am now repeating. They are appointed during good behaviour, for ten years. Other appointments, such as those of judges, on the other hand, are made for life. In this instance I repeat it is for a period of ten years.

What the government is seeking to do is to be able to extend that period of appointment, so that when they have completed ten years the period could be extended for another term of ten years, or for less than that. That is the only amendment suggested as to tenure of office.

Then, as to salaries: actually, the amount of the salaries is stated in the statute. But with increased salaries in recent years, in order to keep the salaries of the commissioners on the same level as those of other civil servants, the government has had to include an estimate superseding the statute —because the estimate was, in itself, a statute.

We wish to have the commissioners placed on the same footing as other officials such as deputy ministers, so that when increases in salaries are requested the government can increase those salaries.

Mr. Knowles: What about the Auditor General?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): No, I am not going to start in with the Auditor General who, for decades, has been an official of the House of Commons, or parliament.

I understand you gentlemen would like to have the civil service commissioners employees of parliament. The policy of the different governments since I have been here was not to put them under parliament. Friends of my hon. friends on the other side modified the act and had an inquiry between 1930 and 1935. In their wisdom they did not think that the commissioners should come under parliament; they kept the appointments under the governor in council. If the opposition has changed its policy, I have no objections, but we have not changed ours as yet.

Mr. Clarence Gillis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier) has not done his usual good job because he can generally convince me when he is dealing with his own department. This time he sounded rather apologetic. The resolution before us will eliminate for all time the right of parliament to determine what shall be the salaries of the civil service commissioners, and that is a bad principle. If it was just a matter of letting the cabinet determine what these three persons were going to receive by way of remuneration from time to time, it would not be so bad, but that is not the case.

These three civil service commissioners preside over the destinies of all civil servants. They determine the formulae for the hiring of civil servants, and they determine also the salary ranges. When the Department of Veterans Affairs, for example, think that they should lift the salary range of their employees they must go before the civil service commission and prove that that is necessary. Actually these three men are presiding over all the functions of government outside this house.

I think that this House of Commons should at least keep them coming back here at any time they feel that they want increased remuneration. The principle now being established goes a long way toward eliminating control of parliament in the matter of governmental expenditure. Dealing with their own salaries is not important, but these three persons have to do with considerable expenditures outside this house. As I said before, they have to do with practically all the functions of government in the way of remuneration, hiring and so forth.

If there are three people in the civil service who should be tied up closely to this House of Commons in the matter of their own remuneration, it is these three civil service commissioners. If he examines the principle that is being advocated by this resolution I think the Minister of Public Works will realize that the government is taking a step in the direction of giving the governor in council the power of setting the remuneration for every department of government.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): That is what they do.

Mr. Gillis: No, they do not.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): On recommendation of the civil service commission, approved by treasury board.

Mr. Gillis: Oh, no.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Oh, yes.

Mr. Gillis: The Minister of Public Works knows that for two years we have been reading reports in the press and other places referring to the salaries of civil servants and the fact that they should be increased or otherwise. What does the average civil servant have to do? First, he has to band with others in an association of employees, executive officers have to be hired who sit down and prepare their case, and prepare it well. Then they have to go to the civil service commission and fight it out. When that is decided, the matter comes back to the treasury board. In the final analysis, if there is going to be an increase it is brought into the house by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) and ratified here. There are a lot of stop blocks in regard to increasing the remuneration of civil servants.

The only people the civil service commissioners have to negotiate with are the treasury board. If the Minister of Public Works felt that they were entitled to an increase in salary he would come to this house and recommend it. As a rule he got it. Now they will not even have to take the trouble to bring it into the house. The prerogative of the House of Commons to determine expenditures of money is being taken away. I think it is a step in the wrong direction to take away from the House of Commons the control which it has at the present time.

The house divided on the motion (Mr. Bradley) which was agreed to on the following division:

ST. LAWRENCE WATERWAY

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY AUTHORITY—DEEP WATERWAY BETWEEN MONTREAL AND LAKE ERIE

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient, for the purpose of providing a deep waterway between Montreal and lake Erie, to create a corporation to be called "The St. Lawrence Seaway Authority" with power, inter alia, to expropriate; to construct, maintain and operate all necessary works; to borrow amounts not exceeding three hundred million dollars; to establish tariffs of tolls and to employ such officers and employees as may be required for the purposes of the authority.

He said: Mr. Speaker, of the various occasions upon which I have had the privilege of rising in this house, there are two which have a particular significance for me and will always stand out in my mind. The first was a number of years ago when I rose, not without some trepidation, to join with the then member for Brandon in seconding the address in reply to the speech from the throne. The second is upon this occasion when I rise to propose a resolution dealing with a subject of great importance to the economy of Canada, the development of the great lakes-St. Lawrence seaway. This subject has been agitating public opinion for over a century.

It has been the subject of negotiation between Canada and the United States for over half a century. These negotiations culminated in the treaty of Washington of 1932, defeated in the United States Senate, and the great lakes-St. Lawrence development basin agreement of 1941 which after ten years still awaits congressional approval.

The object of this resolution is to establish an authority for the purpose of constructing a deep waterway between the port of Montreal and lake Erie. The works necessary for the waterway may complement other works on the United States side of the border, or they may provide a waterway wholly within Canada. It is intended further that the authority should maintain and operate the completed Canadian works of this waterway.

I should say at once that another resolution will follow, seeking approval of an agreement with the province of Ontario with respect to the power to be developed in the international section of the St. Lawrence river in conjunction with the seaway.

While the terms of the resolution now before us relate strictly to the St. Lawrence seaway authority, the house will I think expect me to give a broad general review of the whole project, which of necessity includes both power and navigation. For that purpose perhaps it would suit the convenience of hon. members if I should direct my remarks not only to the resolution now before us but also to the resolution concerning the agreement between Canada and Ontario, tabled yesterday.

In the first place, Mr. Speaker, I need hardly tell a forum such as this, composed of members from all parts of Canada, what an important part water transportation has played in the development of our country. In fact for many years it was the only method of conveyance and it played a determining part in the establishment and the location of many of our important cities.

St. Lawrence Waterway

Without going into details, let me refer briefly to the canal developments in our country which divide themselves under three heads:

1. A series of canals providing a 9-foot channel from Montreal to lake Erie. Although these canals were built in 1850, they were considered then as a considerable achievement by our people.

2. By 1904 all of these canals had reached a depth of 14 feet.

3. At Sault Ste. Marie four separate canals had been constructed to pass the rapids in the St. Mary's river which separates lake Superior from lake Huron. The two deepest of these were about 18 feet deep, and they included one which had been built by Canada.

The present period of international interest in the St. Lawrence river begins officially about the turn of the century. It involves the concept of a deep waterway with uniform standards from the lakehead to Montreal. The interest had a grass-roots origin in the demands of the inland population of both countries for a more economical connection with the outside world, without regard to boundary waters, without regard to boundary lines and particularly without regard to the political border.

This period has been marked by much talk but no new works in the St. Lawrence, and by little talk but continued works and improvement in the upper reaches of the great lakes. Canada built the Welland ship canal through the Niagara peninsula. The United States provided three deep locks at Sault Ste. Marie, including the MacArthur lock opened in 1943 which has a depth of 31 feet. Over and above that the United States has deepened the river channels in a series of successive programs. The result has been that today there exists in the upper region a channel for downbound traffic of 25 feet and a channel for upbound traffic of 21 feet, extending from Duluth and Fort William at one end of the lakes to Prescott.

The continued improvements for navigation above lake Erie came largely in response to the demands of the iron ore trade. Last year the five locks still in service at Sault Ste. Marie passed a total of some 106 million tons, over 80 million of which was iron ore.

The iron ore ranges near lake Superior would not have reached their present development were it not for the limestone near lake Michigan and the coal near lake Erie. Neither would the present steel centres be producing the great volume of comparatively cheap steel. But something more was needed. It was deeper navigation. It was large channels that were required for the additional trade. It was the canal and channel development which made cheap water transportation a reality. But I should like to say more about that at a later stage.

The boundary line which separates Canada and the United States follows by treaty the 45th parallel of latitude until it strikes the St. Lawrence river at a spot a short distance east of Cornwall, and from thence for a distance of 115 miles westerly it follows the middle of the stream until it strikes the foot of lake Ontario. Because the Long Sault rapids in the international rapids section of the river St. Lawrence—about which much will be said in this debate—are in what is known as international waters, in order to develop those rapids it has therefore been necessary to seek the concurrence of both countries. Since 1895 Canada and the United States have co-operated in a series of investigations. They have covered both the engineering and economic aspects of the project. No other project of comparable size has had the benefit of such careful scrutiny and such complete engineering data. Every report has favoured the development of deep draft navigation in the St. Lawrence river, and from an early date all have recommended a power development in the international rapids section as an integral part of the project.

What then, sir, is the proposed great lakes-St. Lawrence seaway development? It is a 2,000 mile channel, 27 feet in depth, extending from the Atlantic seaboard to the heart of the North American continent. Coupled with this is a large power development at two sites at least, if not three. The first is in the international rapids section of the St. Lawrence river, where it is proposed to develop jointly with the United States 2,200,000 horsepower of electrical energy, one-half of which will belong to Canada and the other half to the United States. The second is in the Soulanges section, where power development is already far advanced and where the Beauharnois installations will reach 1 million horsepower before the end of this year, with an ultimate expansion to 2 million horsepower when the installations are fully completed. The third site is the Lachine section where a projected 1,200,000 horsepower development might well be installed.

The great lakes-St. Lawrence seaway must first of all be distinguished from the St. Lawrence ship channel, which is a channel 35 feet in depth extending from the port of Montreal to a point 30 miles east of the city of Quebec. This channel has been deepened at substantial cost by the federal government in order to bring deep-sea navigation into the port of Montreal.

The St. Lawrence seaway should also be distinguished from the great lakes-St. Lawrence basin. This is a vast drainage system covering an area of 678,000 square miles, of which almost 500,000 are in Canada and 185,000 in the United States. It includes lake Superior, lake Michigan, lake Huron, lake St. Clair, lake Erie, lake Ontario and the St. Lawrence river, together with all the tributary rivers and streams which flow into the basin, the chief of which are the Ottawa, the Saguenay and the St. Maurice rivers.

What does the great lakes-St. Lawrence basin consist of? It consists of five steps which are its chief assets and its chief liabilities; chief assets because within the steps lie tremendous amounts of waterpower awaiting development; chief liabilities because in order to circumnavigate these steps side canals must be built at some cost to the government.

The five steps are: 1. St. Mary's falls lying between lake Superior and lake Huron, where there is a drop of 21 feet; 2. The St. Clair-Detroit passage joining lake Huron and lake Erie, where there is a drop of 8 feet; 3. Niagara river, emptying from lake Erie into lake Ontario, with a drop of 326 feet; 4. The upper St. Lawrence river from lake Ontario to Montreal, with a drop of 225 feet; 5. Montreal to the sea, a drop of 20 feet, entirely in Canada. These five steps will, it is estimated, develop approximately 9 million horsepower, divided as follows: At Niagara, 3,600,000 horsepower; in the international rapids section, 2,200,000 horsepower; in the Beauharnois or Soulanges section, 2,000,000 horsepower; in the Lachine section, 1,200,000 horsepower. All of this power is Canadian with the exception of 1,800,000 horsepower at Niagara and 1,100,000 horsepower in the international rapids section.

There is no need to labour the economic significance of this white power in an area of Canada where no coal or black power is found.

To what extent have these facilities been developed? From a power point of view 100,000 horsepower have been developed at the Sault, 1,800,000 at Niagara, 93,000 at Massena, New York, and over 1,000,000 in the Soulanges section. Therefore out of a total potential of 9,000,000 horsepower, barely 3,000,000 have been developed, or about one-third.

For navigation, I have already mentioned the facilities that provide 25-foot channels past the first three steps, from the head of the great lakes to Prescott. The fleet of lake vessels using these facilities is said to provide the cheapest transportation in the world, the largest of them carrying over 20,000 tons.

From Montreal to the open gulf, the fifth step, the federal government has provided the St. Lawrence ship channel. It has been sufficient to make Montreal one of the busiest ocean ports of the world.

But at the fourth step, between Montreal and Prescott, there remains the 14-foot bottleneck. In other words, from Prescott to the head of the upper lakes are navigational facilities for 25-foot craft, and from Montreal to the sea are navigation facilities for 35-foot craft, but between the two is the neck of the bottle which should be made to disappear. The largest vessels that can pass the small locks of the present canals can carry less than 3,000 tons. These canals have served Canada well in their time, but their time is now past. They are obsolete, if judged by present day standards of traffic, method of construction and operation.

What new works are proposed with reference to this project? The new works proposed are those outlined at the time of the 1941 agreement. They are a matter of public record, so I need only refer to them here in general terms. However, attention centres chiefly on requirements in the upper St. Lawrence river, and that for obvious reasons. This part of the river, from Kingston to Montreal, divides naturally into five sections; the thousand islands section; the international rapids section; lake St. Francis section; the Soulanges section; the Lachine section. The second of these sections, namely in the international rapids section, is the area where the most of the works referred to in the agreement will have to be performed. Here the basic power development would include an upper control dam near Iroquois and a main dam and powerhouse near Cornwall. The project is what is known as the 238-242 single stage control project. This means that when the project is completed the elevation will be from 238 to 242 feet above the level of the sea. When one considers that the present elevation along the highway extending from Morrisburg to the city of Cornwall is 225 to 230 feet one will immediately realize that when the project is completed all those communities extending along that highway will be submerged to the extent of from 10 to 15 feet. It will be necessary, too, to construct short canals around both the control dam at Iroquois as well as the main dam in the Long Sault rapids. In the 1941 agreement it was proposed that the canals be on the United States side, but there is no problem about putting them on the Canadian side. As a matter of fact general plans have been prepared for such Canadian canals.

The other section that I had reference to a moment ago is Soulanges. Here the basic power development already exists at Beauharnois, and a wide power canal is available for navigation. Little more is necessary than to add the locks and short access channels.

Third, in the Lachine section the minimum development will be a 10-mile canal and considerable channel enlargement. But a large-scale power development is possible in this section too. Discussions have been opened with Quebec, out of which may come an agreement for a combined power and navigation development in the Lachine section.

As for the work required in the great lakes, it will be necessary to enlarge the various connecting channels and deepen them to 27 feet. Except for the Welland ship canal, the work would be done by United States. This is no more than a continuation of a development that has been going on for over a century, it will be observed. And it is worth noting that this development could proceed independent of the 1941 agreement.

Why is the project necessary from a power standpoint? I need hardly dwell on the need for power, for the case has been clearly put by those who are interested in that part of the project. However, let me say in general terms that as a result of the rapid post-war expansion of industry, together with a constantly rising domestic consumption, the province of Ontario has been, for the past few years, faced with an acute shortage of power to meet demands. The house will recall that Canada negotiated a treaty last year with United States, ratified early this year, permitting a larger diversion of water for power at Niagara. The Ontario Hydro Electric Power Commission lost no time in beginning a redevelopment there that is expected to harness another 600,000 horsepower or so before the end of 1954. But demand cannot wait in Ontario till 1954. In a province that prides itself on cheap hydro power, two large steam plants have already been started at Toronto and Windsor, and in each case the planned installation has been increased before the plant could be completed. I believe that the ultimate capacity now planned for these plants is nearly 900,000 horsepower. It appears that still more steam capacity will be required in the near future if the international hydro site is not developed. It comprises the one large block of undeveloped hydro power that now remains available in the southern part of the province. The Financial Post in its issue of November 10 quotes Mr. R. H. Saunders, chairman of the Ontario Hydro Electric Power Commission, to the effect that present estimates show demands for power can be met up to the end of 1956, and that after that the commission stands at the crossroads if the St. Lawrence power is not available.

Post-war demand has been growing rapidly in Quebec too, including more particularly the metropolitan area of Montreal. Several power developments or expansions are under way right now, but it appears that construction of additional facilities must start in the near future as well. Quebec is fortunate in that Lachine is not an only choice. Power needs could be met for some time by first a final expansion at Beauharnois, and next by the expansion of other sites such as that at Carillon, for instance. It is my hope nevertheless that an agreement can be reached with the province of Quebec for a joint development for power and navigation at Lachine.

Why is the project necessary from a navigation standpoint? With respect to navigation, the main objective is to remove the present bottleneck in the St. Lawrence river. Removing the bottleneck would save many millions of dollars a year in the cost of moving shipments that today pass its small canals or follow alternative routes to market. This alone would be sufficient reason to construct the seaway. Now it also promises to be the key that will unlock the future for the iron ore fields of Quebec and Labrador. It will open large new markets for these ores in the great lakes area, otherwise largely out of economic reach. And on the other side of the coin it will give those interior steel mills the best new source of ore at the lowest cost, a matter of serious concern at the moment.

Iron ore: The mills within reach of the great lakes account for about 75 or 80 per cent of the steel produced in United States. They draw ore preponderantly from the iron ranges of the lake Superior district. The immediate problem is not the exhaustion of these ores, although that too may be expected at some more or less indefinite time. The point is that production of the ores now in use has just about reached its maximum annual rate, and that maintenance of even that rate promises to involve a continued increase in costs. Meanwhile ore requirements continue to rise, not only because of additions to steel capacity but because with a shortage of scrap it is taking more pig iron to make a ton of steel. The problem thus is one of a growing gap between supplies and requirements.

This gap can be filled partly with imported ore from Quebec-Labrador, Venezuela, Liberia and other countries, partly by resort to such low-grade sources of iron as the so-called taconite found in vast quantities in the lake Superior district. It is likely that each of these sources will get some call in any event. But without the seaway, the great inland steel mills can expect to find their ore more costly and their supply position less satisfactory all around.

Obviously enough, the steel mills are going to use the ore that is cheapest to them. At present that is lake Superior ore, broadly speaking. But the delivered prices of these ores have been moving upward for many decades. I have just indicated that an even sharper upward movement is in prospect. This price increase may be limited to the amount that would cover the cost of delivering imported ores to the same markets.

Processes are being developed for concentrating one type of taconite, a low-grade iron formation that exists in large quantities in the lake Superior ranges. But the best hope is that the product would be competitive with natural ore if production could be maintained at full plant capacity. The high overhead of the concentration plants would make them vulnerable to any slackening of demand. Accordingly it appears in like manner that it would take a substantial increase in ore prices to bring a development of this source on the scale required.

The new ore traffic: Completion of the seaway would change this picture completely. Quebec-Labrador ores, after paying any likely toll, would be enabled to compete in most of the lake districts at current prices for ore. The ore deposits occur near the surface over a wide area, readily mined from open pits, and hence low-cost shipments could be made in any volume likely to be required. Accordingly the seaway will give the best possible answer to the ore problem, both in terms of cost and of ready availability.

This invites a sober comparison with the role that has been played by the navigation facilities in the upper lakes. These facilities made available a plentiful supply of iron ore at a low cost, on which were based the great steel centres of today. Now that production of those ores has reached its limit and costs threaten to increase sharply, the new facilities will make available new and expansible supplies at comparatively low cost.

The Quebec-Labrador development already is going ahead. The production goal is 10 million tons a year. Given the seaway, however, the mining interests have already indicated that they would expect to sell 20 million tons a year as soon as production could be raised to that volume. They could expect a further growth of demand in following years.

Canada has a twofold interest in this matter. We are concerned with making the best and greatest use of a rich natural resource. But we are interested in the other side of the coin too, the ore supply problem facing the steel mills. A plentiful supply of iron and steel at comparatively low prices has been taken for granted in our economy. It can be taken for granted no longer. A little thought will show the serious implications of the threatened higher costs in these fields. The seaway promises to avert the worst of this threat. We cannot afford to do without it.

Other benefits: I have referred to transportation economies in other fields as well as iron ore. They may attract less attention but they will be important too. It so happens that they promise to be all the greater because of the new ore movement. It appears that the lake carriers delivering ore from Seven Islands to lake Erie will find it of advantage to proceed to the head of the lakes to pick up cargo for Montreal or beyond, and that for such offerings they could underquote any other vessels that did not have a like advantage in two-way cargoes. This of course means a more economical use of shipping. Moreover, it is expected that the up traffic will outweigh the down, what with the preponderance of iron ore. The difference may not be great, but it should be enough to shift the rate advantage to the downbound cargoes as a result of normal competitive forces.

In this connection it may be of interest to note that ocean-going vessels are not expected to play a major role on the seaway. They may very well enter in some numbers, to be sure. But in the circumstances I have outlined it would appear that an ocean vessel would not enter unless it had an inbound cargo as well as an outbound offering. No doubt there will be those that would have this advantage, but otherwise most of them will find it more attractive to pick up their cargoes at Montreal or some other transfer point.

Is the project necessary from the point of view of defence? From the point of view of national defence, I believe that the development of the St. Lawrence deep waterway is of the greatest urgency. The main contribution perhaps would be in the field just discussed, iron ore supplies. The demand for ore has risen in the present period of preparedness, and would rise sharply again on the outbreak of a major war. The possible sources are sea-borne imports, taconite concentrates, and seaway shipments from Quebec and Labrador. But sea-borne imports would be highly vulnerable in war. Far from increasing, they would decline or disappear, putting a still greater strain on other sources. This did happen during the late war, when millions of tons had to be shipped from the lake Superior ranges to the east coast. Yet taconite production could not be expanded rapidly unless expensive plants were held idle in reserve. New plants would be so costly in time and materials that it might prove too late to start them after the emergency arose, and hence the war effort would be seriously handicapped. On the other hand, once the initial mining development is complete in Labrador and the seaway is open, it would be little more than a matter of putting additional shovels to work to get all the ore that the steel furnaces could use. Even those mills on the east coast of the United States could draw Labrador ore from lake Erie.

The seaway would make at least four other contributions to defence. Important as they are, I will do no more than mention them now. The project would create a reserve of power in the industrial heart of Canada, to be drawn on in the emergency. The combination of power and navigation will stimulate industrial growth, permitting more of the specialized production required in modern war. The seaway will add flexibility and dispersal to a shipbuilding and ship repair program in a sheltered area in the upper and lower reaches of the great lakes. And it will provide an additional transportation route between the factories and the battlefront.

Will the seaway be vulnerable to attack? In the first place ore carriers and other vessels from the gulf of St. Lawrence to the seaway would be infinitely less vulnerable to submarine attack than on the open sea, where this is the main menace. On the other hand it is true that a determined enemy attack could damage or destroy some of the seaway installations. The same can be said for any one of the existing hydro developments, steam power plants, the locks at Sault Ste. Marie, taconite concentration plants, the ore docks on lake Erie, the steel plants themselves, or the railway lines. But an enemy would find it extremely difficult to knock out all the various alternatives at the same time. Surely, then, the best over-all defence is to increase and disperse the most promising alternatives. Just as surely, the deep waterway and the associated power development qualify for a high priority.

What about the materials and manpower for construction? The same considerations give the answer to this pertinent question, whether the project warrants the use of scarce materials and manpower in today's circumstances. The present period of defence preparation may be short or may be long, but it is precisely in such a period that works should be undertaken to add to our economic strength and efficiency. That is this government's attitude toward resource development and defence-supporting projects generally. Postponing the project would not relieve the pressure on men and materials. It might rather increase it. For without the seaway, other hydro or steam capacity would be required, other transportation facilities, more ore concentration facilities and other works. Moreover, as I have suggested above, a large part of these alternative facilities would be less suitable to the needs of war if it came.

What are the regional benefits of the project? Perhaps I have given enough reason already for saying that this project is of national concern, that it will benefit Canada from coast to coast. That is my own firm conviction. I have been gratified therefore to hear many hon. members from widely separated points give it their support. But I would like to mention some of the direct benefits that I see for each of the ten provinces.

Let me say at once that the main benefits do not promise to fall to the areas of industrial concentration in Ontario and Quebec. The outstanding industrial stimulation promises to be in the ore fields of Newfoundland's Labrador and Quebec's Ungava district. It has been arranged that the men to be employed in Labrador shall be recruited as far as possible in Newfoundland, and indeed the two most obvious benefits in both provinces are the new employment opportunities and the provincial royalty revenues.

Both the power and the navigation facilities provided by the project will be important for a number of industries in Ontario and Quebec, of course, and in some cases there will be obvious benefits on both counts.

Further development of power from the St. Lawrence certainly will serve the expansion of industry. That is its purpose and its justification, for the demand for power is growing rapidly. But that demand is going to grow in any event. It is simply a matter of meeting it in the most economical manner. Whether industrialization comes from this scheme or from another, namely from coal by the development of steam plants, I do not think it would be possible to stop that development. This is particularly true in Ontario, where still more steam plants are the only alternative to an international hydro development in the St. Lawrence. Quebec on the other hand can develop its St. Lawrence power independently of the seaway project, and has other hydro sites as well that will serve its industrial expansion.

On the navigation side, the benefits will be most important for commodities having high transportation costs relative to their value. The volume of such commodities used or produced in central Canada and likely to be served by the seaway is only a small part of the prospective traffic. Without meaning to belittle the advantages to this area, it must nevertheless be observed that the main benefits will be felt elsewhere.

As a matter of fact it is difficult to go very far in ranking the benefits to the various provinces in order of importance. Rather than argue about which will gain the most, let us look at what concrete opportunities will be opened up for each.

The prairies would find a substantial saving in the cost of moving grain, flour and other products to markets in eastern Canada and overseas. Moreover the seaway would permit large ocean vessels to move into the great lakes to relieve such shortages of shipping as occurred this year. Shortages occur from time to time to hinder the grain movement, for at present the only vessels that can enter the lakes are too small and too few to make much impression.

I have mentioned already Newfoundland's interest in the Labrador development. Beyond this, the four maritime provinces would get a new and low cost transportation route to the heart of the continent. They complain now with some justice that there is no effective water competition to keep down the rail rates. Well, this is it. There can be no doubt but that it would bring new opportunities to explore in pulpwood, wood pulp, paper, lumber, specialty agricultural products, minerals and other products.

Mr. Gillis: Say that a little louder.

Mr. Chevrier: My hon. friend interjects, but I well remember the essence of the debates on the freight rate legislation both in the house and in the committee. It was said that the maritime provinces required a greater opportunity to move their commodities into the markets of central Canada. This will provide a cheaper route than the one which already exists, and I am sure, knowing the maritimers as I do, that with the initiative they possess they will make use of these many advantages.

The seaway would bring British Columbia much closer to the centre of this continent. For example, British Columbia lumber now moves all rail to these markets, but at Montreal it has been delivered cheaper by the all water route through the Panama canal. The possibility of a continued water movement without transshipment holds great promise, for the market to be reached is substantial.

What will be the effect on the railways of Canada? I do not think that the fortunes of the railways nor the economy of the railways would be materially affected by this project. For one thing, almost half the seaway traffic foreseen is in iron ore. That is traffic which does not exist at the moment in so far as the lower St. Lawrence is concerned, and in so far as the railways are concerned it is new traffic. Another large part already uses the water route for a good deal of its movement, and either leaves the lakes to move by United States routes or transships to small canallers. Still another substantial part now moves all the way by water in those canallers. Such traffic as is lost by railways will be largely in items now paying rates among the lowest in the schedule, rates that are low in the areas affected because strong competition from vessel service already exists.

On the other hand a continued industrial development, further stimulated by the project, may be expected to bring new and high class traffic to the railways, including new traffic in the very areas where diversions may occur. Canada has not stopped growing yet, and the coming decade looks as promising as any in the past. We are going to need not only the seaway but a continued expansion of railway facilities as well.

Do we want the United States to participate in the project? This brief review—yes, I still maintain that it is brief because it is a large subject and almost impossible to consider fully in the time at the disposal of any hon. member—has outlined the reasons as I see them why Canada should press forward with the seaway. To me the case from the United States point of view is just as strong or even stronger than that which I have attempted to make for Canada. That is why we would welcome full participation of the United States along the terms of the 1941 agreement. But that agreement, as I stated earlier, after slightly more than ten years still awaits congressional approval. In the face of this uncertainty we are forced to consider how else our objective can be achieved.

The whole project hinges on the development of the international rapids section. Above it Canada could deepen the Welland ship canal, and the improvement of the other canals could be left to the United States to undertake in the normal process of expansion of water transportation, as has been the case down through the years. Below it the river is wholly within Canada and the necessary works will be Canada's responsibility in any event.

I believe I have shown to the house the benefits to be derived by Canada through the joint development of power and navigation in the seaway. The project is not one of navigation alone nor of power alone. It is jointly one of power and navigation, and to achieve this maximum objective it is obvious that some form of international co-operation is necessary for the successful development of the international rapids section of the river. Without a doubt the final solution is to be found either in the approval of the 1941 agreement with some modifications or in the 1909 treaty between the United States and Canada.

But let me say again that Canada would prefer approval of the great lakes-St. Lawrence basin agreement of 1941 with modifications as already discussed in the United States congress, such as provision for the charging of tolls. That agreement was signed in recognition of the fact that the international section of the St. Lawrence river is a boundary water. It was signed in recognition of the fact that both countries would participate in the benefits and each would have a continuing interest in the success of the project. These considerations are as valid today as they were in 1941. We want these considerations expressed today in terms of that agreement if possible because we want to respect the agreement of 1941. But over and above that we are anxious to get on with the job.

In the event that approval of congress is withheld or action further delayed, this government is prepared to undertake an alternative, namely an all-Canadian seaway, and to endeavour to bring about the development of power in the international rapids section by the province of Ontario and an appropriate United States authority, through the machinery established under the 1909 boundary waters treaty or by whatever other means may be found suitable. Canada could and would add the navigation facilities and complete the other essential parts of the seaway. If the costs not borne by power are covered by tolls on shipping, it is of much less consequence who makes the initial expenditures, and Canada can do any necessary financing.

It is in this context that the resolution before us today and that covering the bill implementing the agreement between Canada and Ontario should be considered. The proposed St. Lawrence seaway authority would have power to act for Canada under whatever arrangements the project does proceed. If the Canada-United States agreement of 1941 is approved, it would be the agency to construct the works assigned to Canada as provided therein. If the project proceeds on any other basis, the authority would undertake the works required to provide the navigation facilities from Montreal to lake Erie, and such other work as might be the responsibility of this government.

On completion of the project the authority would be responsible for the operation, maintenance, and administration of the Canadian navigation works from Montreal to lake Erie, including not only the new works but such existing works as may be entrusted to it. It would be responsible for levying such tolls as would cover its current expenditures and recover its capital expenditures over a period not exceeding fifty years.

What will be the cost to the federal treasury? Ontario and New York already have indicated their willingness to undertake the basic power development in the international rapids section, which it is estimated would cost something over $400 million, and this would be a normal business investment. If Quebec joins with the federal government to develop power in the Lachine section, it will be because that, too, is a good and timely investment. The remaining cost to be borne by Canada on behalf of navigation would not much exceed $250 million, which would provide a 27-foot waterway from Montreal to lake Erie.

This might appear to be a large sum of money, but let us take a look at it from this angle. Already Canada has invested about $300 million in the ship channel below Montreal, the 14-foot canals into lake Ontario, the Welland canal, and the lock at Sault Ste. Marie. Most of those expenditures date back to years when a dollar meant a great deal more than it does today, and when Canada was much poorer in material resources. The Welland ship canal cost $132 million. If the work and material that went into it were priced at today's levels, this figure alone would exceed the estimated cost of the remaining navigation works now contemplated. And whereas the earlier investments have been carried without benefit of tolls, as part of the cost of national development, it is now proposed to liquidate the investment in the seaway by a levy on the traffic served.

In conclusion, let me summarize the government's view in a very few words. We believe that Canada needs the St. Lawrence seaway and power development at the earliest possible date. We believe that it is important for economic development and urgent for national defence. We believe not merely that it can pay its own way, but that the benefits to both Canada and the United States will far outweigh its original cost.

We would prefer to have full United States participation in the project under the terms of the 1941 agreement, perhaps with some modification along lines already discussed in congress, providing the agreement is approved at an early date. We are now recommending to parliament that, failing such approval, the all-Canadian seaway be undertaken on the most suitable basis that can be established.

Mr. Speaker, when it is realized that more traffic now passes through the locks at Sault Ste. Marie in a season than passes in twelve months through the Panama, Suez, Manchester, and Kiel canals put together, one can get some idea what the opening of this river would mean to the economy of Canada as a whole. The traffic foreseen for the new canals —and for the Welland canal—will also far outrank that on any of these other famous canals. One glance at the map of the world will indicate why it was decided to build the Panama canal, for instance, through the isthmus of Panama, or the Suez canal linking the Mediterranean with the Red sea. One glance at the map will indicate that those were logical things to do; they were inevitable things to do, and they were the right things to do no matter what the cost. On the proposal to construct a deep waterway in the St. Lawrence river to link the great lakes with the Atlantic ocean, the verdict must be the same.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the motions now before the house deal with a subject that has been in the minds of Canadians for a great many years. The review that has been given to the house by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) has been a combination of an historical survey of the canal system and the waterways with which they are associated, and also the presentation of what he regards to be the compelling reasons why this project should be proceeded with at this time.

At the outset I can say that the decision to proceed with the waterway not only should be supported in itself, as it has been put forward by the minister, but in combination with the power development with which it is associated it calls for development now—a development that is long overdue. At a time when cheap power available in large quantities is so closely associated not only with national expansion and development but also with defence itself, it seems unreasonable that there should have been as great delay as there has been in the development of these resources.

I should like to speak, however, for a short time about the waterway as distinguished from the power development. In much of the discussion of this subject that has taken place, it seems to me there has been a noticeable tendency to regard the waterway as a new development. Actually the St. Lawrence waterway is part of an integrated waterway system which has been in operation for a great number of years. The facilities through the St. Lawrence and across the Niagara peninsula to lake Erie have been available for more than one hundred years, and the facilities at Sault Ste. Marie have been available only for a slightly shorter time. For many years ships could use those facilities right through to the head of the great lakes and the capacity of the canals to handle shipping was relatively the same throughout that distance. In more recent years the lock facilities at Sault Ste. Marie, particularly on the United States side of the river, have been deepened and widened so the immense ships carrying iron ore and grain can move through that canal system. So also have the locks and other facilities across the Niagara peninsula known as the Welland canal.

The bottleneck now exists at the St. Lawrence river simply because the facilities there have not kept pace with the facilities across the Niagara peninsula, through the St. Clair river and at Sault Ste. Marie. So far as the waterway aspect of the matter is concerned, it seems to me that we are simply called upon to ask ourselves whether we believe that a waterway which was started as one integrated system some one hundred years ago is to continue as an integrated system with similar facilities for the whole 2,000 miles of that waterway.

I agree with what has been said about the desirability of proceeding with that project. So far as the waterway is concerned, I think it is simply a case of following ordinary business methods and of bringing up to the standard—which justified the huge expenditures on the Welland canal, to some considerable extent—the lower canal system which would carry ships still further and make it possible to use ships of a uniform depth and uniform size for a great part of tonnage that would pass through that waterway.

As has been pointed out, however, we are also dealing with power, and we are doing so at a time when it is generally recognized that power should be made available as rapidly as possible from the great sources that we possess, not only for the immediate purposes of defence but for the immense industrial expansion which is going to take place in this country in the years ahead. To me this is something that challenges the imagination, and that has challenged the imagination of our people for a great many years. It would hardly be expected that I personally could do anything but support these motions in view of the fact that for many years I had occasion to be seeking the fulfilment of that hope while I was in another legislative body. Certainly we wish to proceed with this development; but there are other considerations which must be borne in mind.

The Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) has reviewed the reasons why this development is, in his opinion, so important. He has indicated that it would provide additional opportunities for shipping in the St. Lawrence section of that combined waterway system. He has also pointed out that there are certain immediate reasons why it should be carried out. He has pointed out that a shortage of hydroelectric power is anticipated in Ontario and that this calls for early action. He has also pointed out that there is now available iron ore which was not previously available. With that thought in mind, he has indicated why he thinks this canal system should be developed.

I should like to deal with that particular aspect of this problem because, while the dominion government now states that it is prepared to proceed with this development on its own if the government of the United States is not ready to join in the enterprise, nevertheless I have not been able to find any report which would indicate—nor have I any information which would suggest—that the Canadian government has taken nearly as vigorous steps as it should to seek the approval of the United States for their joint action at the earliest possible date. Certainly, by all means, let us proceed alone if we cannot obtain that consent. But I think there are reasons for their participation that can be put before the government of the United States which should be emphasized with the utmost vigour. I do not think this is something that should be simply presented as a project that Canada wishes to undertake, and in which she hopes the United States will join. I think it is time for us to say to the government of the United States that while we reap great benefits from our association with them, they should recognize, to an extent which they do not seem to be recognizing, the fact that they depend on us to a great extent for many of their raw materials and other requirements in these extremely difficult days. We know that the vital metal nickel is found almost exclusively in Canada. We know that from her forests Canada supplies more than 80 per cent of the newsprint of the United States. We know that the United States fills the bulk of her demand for asbestos from Canada. We know of developments under way which will make Canada a great producer of aluminum for the world, a substantial part of our production going to the United States. Now we are reaching the stage of being a great producer of oil; and arguments are being put forward that oil from western Canada, as well as natural gas, should be used in the United States as well as in Canada. We are also the one assured source of that vital metal uranium in the whole western hemisphere. Now we are told—and we know—that we have in Canada immense, almost limitless, reserves of high-grade iron ore.

The Minister of Transport has indicated quite clearly that he is associating the development of this waterway with the employment of the iron ore from Quebec and Labrador. I am not suggesting for one moment, and I hope that through the contraction of any remarks I may make—and I recognize the necessary contraction—it will not be suggested that I am putting forward any proposition that we should not pool our resources with that great neighbour with which we are so closely associated for the purpose of defence as well as for industrial development. Nevertheless, I think the discovery of iron ore on a scale never previously contemplated opens up new possibilities for this country which we have scarcely yet started to visualize.

There are many precious metals; there are many metals which throughout the long history of the world have been regarded as more precious than others. At a time when freedom, and the defence of freedom, are the most precious things there are for mankind, the most precious metal of all is that which forms the base of our great defence efforts, namely steel. Therefore the discovery of iron, which we should think of in terms of steel, is something that gives a new perspective to our future hopes and our future expectations. During the last hundred years it has been steel which has measured the strength of nations, and to a very substantial degree the prosperity and economic power of nations as well.

At the time of the Napoleonic wars, when Great Britain assumed the leading role in bringing order out of chaos, the population of the British isles was no greater than Canada's population today. The immense increase in population, in industrial strength, in economic power, and their position of financial leadership which was unchallenged until they exhausted their resources so greatly in two world wars, saw its great development when an Englishman, Henry Bessemer, invented a process for smelting iron ore and producing steel in large quantities at economic prices. It was not iron but steel that built the power of the British isles, and it was steel that gave to the world what was known for so many generations as the Pax Britannica. It was steel that gave to Britain not only population, prosperity and world importance on a scale not hitherto known, but also the naval and military power which played so great a part in the preservation of peace throughout the world. Now with the shifting balances of national strength it is steel that has given the United States its great position of leadership. And that leadership can be measured in the immense tonnage of steel which pours out from the steel mills of the United States. That has depended upon their possession of great ore reserves, the largest being in the Mesabi range. Their reserves are not exhausted. Nevertheless they have made such great demands upon those resources, not only for their own domestic purposes but in the common cause of freedom throughout these years that have passed, that the ore from their remaining reserves is becoming more expensive, and they are looking to other sources for that iron ore.

It has been pointed out by the Minister of Transport this afternoon that the construction of this seaway is, in his mind and I assume in the mind of the government, at this point, closely associated with the demand, and the increasing demand, of the steel mills of the United States for greater quantities of iron ore, for iron ore they can bring to their mills without having to carry it along extended sea routes if we should again at any time face the unhappy possibility of war.

I think it is proper that the minister should have pointed out this aspect of the problem, because all the discussion that has been taking place in public on this subject has emphasized the fact that one of the reasons for the construction of the waterway is that as a defence measure it will make possible the movement of iron ore from these new and vast resources in Quebec and Labrador to the established mills in the inland areas of the United States.

I recognize—as I am sure every hon. member in this house recognizes, and as I think all informed Canadians recognize—that it is important to us to be sure there will be ample steel production in the United States to maintain their great efforts and to provide not only their requirements for new structural steel but also their immense requirements for the weapons and the engines of war for themselves and for other countries less fortunately situated from that point of view. However, while we recognize that need, since Providence has placed at our disposal so much of this vitally precious metal, as we make our plans for supplying iron ore to the mills of the United States we should be laying plans now for the construction of mills in Canada to produce steel on a scale we have never contemplated at any time in the past.

The limits of the development of this country, and the increase in prosperity and employment from the Atlantic to the Pacific, in the years ahead will be measured largely by the extent to which, right now, we plan our course, so that from the maritimes on the east to British Columbia on the west this iron ore will be used not merely as iron ore but for the production of steel in mills planted strategically right across this country.

We have spoken about the need for the decentralization of industry in Canada. This is the time for us to plan the decentralization of great industries in every part of Canada. We have mills on the Atlantic seaboard today. As we plan for the use of our iron ore, let us make sure that those mills now existing in eastern Canada are supplied with iron ore on a scale which will require much greater milling capacity than they have today. And let us recognize that while there are immense advantages in carrying iron ore to the established mills in the central part of Canada, there are equally great advantages in assuring steel supplies at seaports both on the Atlantic and the Pacific, so that we may be shipping steel in the form of steel to our friends and allies in other parts of the world.

We have reason to be proud of Canada's growth and expansion during the first fifty years of this century, but steel will make growth possible on a scale we have hardly imagined, if as we plan the use of these new facilities we recognize that it will be to the extent that we fabricate steel from that iron ore in Canada that we will really measure our growth in the years ahead.

At 6.15 p.m. the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, before the adjournment for dinner I was referring to the importance of steel in the development of this and every other country. I do not propose on this occasion to go into statistical details of our present consumption of steel and our requirements from the United States because we know that we are short of steel. That is emphasized every day. And while we recognize that we are very short of steel at this time we know also that we have not yet felt the real pressure which is bound to come when substantial efforts are made to produce weapons and equipment of various kinds which are required for our general defence effort.

The steel mills we have already in the maritime provinces, in the central provinces and on the Pacific coast can all be greatly expanded, and new mills can be built. The question is how that can be done. Always the question arises as to whether a development which may appear to be related in some way to the emergency of defence itself is to be carried out by the government or by private enterprise in the usual way. I think we can all look back for a practical suggestion as to the way in which this can be done.

At the beginning of the present century we looked upon our forests as being mainly a source of building lumber, firewood, railroad ties, pit props and other commodities usually made from wood. A great deal of wood was being cut in this country for export to the United States in the form of pulp logs. The time came when some of the provincial governments decided that it would be wise to employ Canadian workmen in processing our raw materials instead of exporting them in the least valuable form and providing extremely profitable employment for the workmen of other countries. I do not recall ever having heard it suggested that in so doing any Canadian province or Canada as a nation was selfish or unfair or in any way acting outside of its rights. Provisions known as manufacturing clauses were introduced into the contracts permitting the cutting of pulp logs. These clauses provided that where wood was being cut in this country it should be processed into manufactured form in Canada except under such arrangements as permitted a mutually satisfactory exchange of skill and effort whereby some of the well-established companies in the United States built mills in Canada to manufacture pulp and paper and in return received a certain supply of cut pulp logs to continue production in their own mills.

Those manufacturing clauses were the beginning of large-scale employment in Canada from our forest resources. Today the largest earner of dollars is the forest products industry, which makes more money than any of the mining enterprises. That has been almost directly related to the insistence that those resources which Providence has placed at our disposal should be used to the advantage of our own people and for the employment of our people at the highest level of skilled workmanship.

This meant new towns and new cities right across the country. I have seen them, and most hon. members have seen them. I do not think there is anything more thrilling than to watch the emergence from the virgin forest of some of these beautiful communities based upon no other enterprise than the employment of our forest resources to their highest level of production right here in Canada.

I cannot recall the United States having raised any objection at any time either by formal presentation to the Canadian government or in any other way. I cannot recall a time when it was ever suggested that there was anything improper in this course. If it was sound for us to raise ourselves from the position of wood choppers for the workers of the United States, it is equally sound for us to say that we shall not limit ourselves to the digging of the iron ore, that we shall give to workers here in Canada, and workers yet unborn, employment on a scale we have never even contemplated, through the use of these new resources now available to us.

I should think it would be very proper and wise that we should have manufacturing clauses in these contracts under which iron ore is exported from Canada. Then we would see great steel mills in the maritime provinces taking advantage of their seaports to ship steel and steel products to the ports of the world which in turn would distribute those products to the nations which need steel so much today. I can visualize great trade from Vancouver and the other great ports of the Pacific coast when in due course we once again return to a somewhat normal measure of trade with the oriental countries to the west. I can visualize immense traffic bringing its return of business of every kind to our shores. Along with that I can see the expanding production of industry of all kinds in the central provinces, and in the prairie provinces where this great waterway we have been discussing would give special advantages.

I have said that I believe steel is the most precious metal of all, but let us not for a moment forget the other things we have, copper, lead, zinc, the new metal titanium which can do such remarkable things, nickel, gold, silver and, as I mentioned before, uranium. These are only some of the metals we possess. These are the great metals. Then we have our forests, and now we have oil in such abundance that people are beginning to wonder if this is not possibly the greatest oil deposit in the world.

The fact is that people living in Canada today have everything with which to build the firm foundation of a productive country which would sustain in great prosperity a population many times that which we now possess. There are those who are inclined to remind us that we have great mountains, vast tundras and the rock belt in the north. We have. The rock belt, the mountains and even the tundras all have their value, and all have demonstrated that they contain great wealth. In this enormous country, the third largest in the world, exceeded in size only by Russia with 200 million people and China with 450 million, we have 14 million people. Yet there are those who use that ugly word "optimum" and say that the optimum population of Canada is somewhere in the neighbourhood of 20 million. That is statistical nonsense. Even today we can feed 100 million people with what we are able to produce from our soil, and we could exceed that number greatly if with a larger population more intense agricultural methods became profitable and were employed. With all these metals, with our timber and our oil, there is not the slightest question in the world that Canadians of future generations will be very foolish if they start talking about any optimum until the population of this country has exceeded 100 million people.

When I say that I am not suggesting that we are going to have 100 million people in Canada tomorrow, a year from now or five years from now; nor am I suggesting that we are suddenly going to move great populations to Canada to build up to that number. History shows how quickly populations increase when conditions provide the basis for a larger population. All we need to decide is that there is going to be a larger population and that we can support it with advantage to the people of every part of our country. I cannot help calling attention to an editorial which I found in Le Canada of Montreal under today's date, in which that newspaper takes exception to somewhat similar comments I made in Vancouver last Friday. The suggestion is that in making the statement that Canada's population can reach 100 million people with advantage to all of us I am suggesting that we suddenly start a flood of immigration which will build up to that extremely large number of people. I mention that only for the reason that the editorial seeks to convey an impression which was never contained in anything I said. I regret that a newspaper carrying the name Le Canada should suggest that in making a statement of that kind I was making a statement I would not be equally ready to make in any part of the province of Quebec as well as in any other part of Canada.

I would have thought that a newspaper with the name Le Canada would be proud to claim that Canada can grow, and that on the basis of that very ore which is now found in such vast quantities in the soil of Quebec that province, together with the other Canadian provinces, will expand its population and prosperity. I simply repeat what I said on the earlier occasion, that in mentioning a figure of that kind I am merely saying we need not worry about when that figure will be reached as long as we are confident we can support a population of that size, and then make our plans accordingly. The plans to which I was referring were plans to expand our own production by the best possible use of our resources, and that is what I am suggesting again tonight.

Once again I want to emphasize the vital role that iron and steel play. No oil would be found without steel. No copper, zinc or aluminum would be produced without steel. None of the great synthetics that we are producing today would be produced without steel. It is the basis of modern industrial expansion. That being so, of all the resources we possess I suggest it should be the declared policy to make sure we will use that raw material to the very best advantage of all Canadians when it is actually brought out from the soil.

I believe there are reasons why the people in some parts of Canada other than the central and prairie provinces can see some direct advantages from this waterway. Perhaps those advantages are more apparent to them than to the people of the east and west coasts, who view with some concern the possibility of a still greater concentration of industrial development and other activities which will be associated with this great enterprise. I suggest there are reasons for that concern.

The speech from the throne mentioned that we would be dealing with this subject. It referred also, for example, to the South Saskatchewan power and irrigation project, about which the government is still waiting for the advice of a committee, although for years competent engineers have reported that the South Saskatchewan project could be proceeded with to the advantage of our people. We know, too, that highly competent engineers have been reporting for years that there are developments in the maritime provinces which could be carried forward with great advantage to those provinces as well as to the rest of Canada. For years we have heard of the possibility of using coal in Cape Breton, not only for ordinary industrial activities but also for the production of low cost electricity. We know of the Passamaquoddy project; we know of the developments that have been proposed in the lower St. Lawrence. We know of the desire of Prince Edward Island for some industries associated with defence activities, and of the training activities being carried on in that cradle of our confederation. We know also of the immense possibilities of new developments in northern Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta and throughout the great coastal and northern areas of British Columbia. I believe some of the concern that has already been expressed might well be removed if there were a broad declaration that we propose to develop all those resources for the advantage of our own people, and that we propose to follow whatever legitimate course we may to assure that it will be Canadian workmen from the Atlantic to the Pacific who will be employed in the fabrication of the things that are made from our raw materials.

We come back to the question of whether this is to be a joint effort in association with the United States. The Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) correctly interpreted the sentiment that has been widely expressed that this new waterway will carry at low cost to the steel mills on the great lakes the ore which is required there. At the same time we are discussing the possibility that Canada alone will build this waterway. May I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that if the United States does not think this waterway is important for defence, I do not know why we should tell them we are going to build it for them. I believe it is important. It is important for the development of our resources and for the expansion of business in this country. But surely if it is as important as all that the United States would recognize that importance. If we are convinced that it is so important for defence, I should think that in the discussions with the United States the whole subject of the exchange of raw materials should be considered upon that basis. We should point out that if they do not believe the waterway is sufficiently important for defence, then we are going to use that waterway for Canadian mills at Hamilton, at the Sault and other points on the upper lakes as well as in the maritime provinces, for the employment of our own people. I believe we have a right to do that. We have a duty to our own people to do it.

I would hope, however, that we shall not find ourselves in a position where it becomes necessary to say that if the United States does not regard this as important from the point of view of defence, we must of course build up our own defence production as quickly as possible with our own raw materials. I hope the United States congress will decide that this is not only an advantage from their point of view, but will realize also that it would be one of the finest gestures in a troubled world if it were shown that two nations could develop an international waterway under terms of this kind. There is no other place in the world of which I know where there is any similar development. At a time when we are all thinking of peace and hoping for peace, this would be a great demonstration of what two nations, confident in the possibilities of peace, were prepared to do for their own future. I hope it can be approached on that basis, and I hope it will actually work out on that basis. I am not suggesting that we should, in any selfish expression of any kind, threaten United States by saying, "You do this or else".

I do suggest, however, that as Canadians, concerned first of all with the welfare of Canada, we point out to them that it is Canadian workmen and the growth of Canada with which we are concerned. Whatever we do in co-operation with them is, nevertheless, always done with that first thought in our minds. I hope the United States, which at all times has built its strength on the acceptance of the principle that its first duty was to the people of the United States, will recognize our legitimate aspirations and join us in this great peaceful expression of mutual confidence. If that is done, then I think we may find this waterway will become the key to Canada's new era. For centuries and more alchemists have been trying to convert base metal to gold. By the alchemy of good will a great joint effort of this kind could convert our vast iron resources to produce the gold that is found in the productive work of men profitably employed. If, with that vision, our government places before the United States the proposal that will emerge from this resolution and from the legislative steps which follow, then I think this may well be the beginning of Canada's golden age based upon the use of iron.

I should like also to go back into legend and recall the fact that the thousand islands section of the St. Lawrence waterway which we are now discussing carried the Indian name of Manatoana, which means "garden of the great spirit". I hope, Mr. Speaker, it will be the garden of the great spirit of friendly co-operation between nations which will shine as an example to the whole world.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Not since 1941, Mr. Speaker, have we had before us a definite proposal for the building of this great waterway. I agree with the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) that the building of this waterway is perhaps, in a sense, the beginning of an era of new development in Canada the like of which we have not known as yet. I join with him in hoping that the rich resources of the northland and the great iron ore deposits in Labrador and in the province of Quebec may be used not to build great industries in the country of our great and good neighbour to the south, but may be used more and more to build great industries and give productive opportunities to the young men and women of our own country. In saying that I am not indulging, I hope, in any narrow nationalism. I think it would be a great pity if these vast resources that are now being developed were in part, we will say, shipped down the Atlantic coast of the United States to New Haven, New London, Connecticut, or some port on the United States coast line, passing the great coal fields of Nova Scotia, and were used rather to belittle our own resources of coal and so on in the maritime provinces and build up industries in another land. In the same way I think it would be regrettable if the ore passing up this great seaway were used mainly to expand the great iron and steel industry along the shores of lake Erie and at Port Huron, Cleveland, Buffalo and so on and were not used to build up industry in our own country.

I join with the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew), the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) and others in the house in the hope that this may not occur. But I want to say to the government that I do not quite know how our objective is to be achieved if we have no regulation of that industry, or if we allow the matter to be determined purely by the profit motive and by free enterprise. Hon. members have heard me recount this incident before; but when early in the war steel plate was needed on the Pacific coast, and when the late hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard, Mr. McGeer, the present Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Mayhew), the present Senator Reid and others of us on the committee dealing with war expenditures urged that, instead of building up industry in one part of Canada or in one or two spots, the great deposits of iron and coal lying in close proximity to each other on Vancouver island should be used to build up a steel industry on the Pacific coast, I remember how we were told categorically that such a procedure would not be permitted. We were told that the expansion was to be undertaken at Algoma, at Hamilton and where the steel industry was then located. In other words, we said at that time that the steel industry expansion was going to be in certain parts of Canada. If the government, as they may well have to, give any concessions in the building of this greatly expanded steel industry, whether it be under public or private enterprise, I would hope that the placing of industry in various other parts of Canada than those where that industry now exists will be undertaken; and that, if it is done by government support for established industry—free enterprise, if you like—we will say to them: We expect you to place some of your industries elsewhere than where they are to be found at the present time, or to expand in regions where there is at present both coal and iron, as in the maritime provinces.

But this is a great project. I suppose we think of it largely as a transportation problem, and that is the manner in which the leader of the opposition discussed it this evening. We think a great deal of the moving of ore from the province of Quebec, from Labrador, up the St. Lawrence river to the mills located along the great lakes. But to those of us who come from the prairie provinces there is another reason why we are interested in this project. We are convinced that when the channels now forming what the Minister of Transport calls a bottleneck have been deepened, and when ocean-going vessels can go right through to the ports on the great lakes, the products of the prairies will move more easily and at lower transportation costs. If ships bring iron ore up the St. Lawrence through the great lakes it is quite conceivable that some of those ships might at least carry grain down the great lakes, even if the cargo has to be transshipped at Montreal or one of the ocean ports. Consequently those of us who are looking at this matter from a prairie point of view hope, and indeed believe, that the expenditure which is to be made to deepen this channel in order to give our products access to the sea in ocean-going ships from the inland ports will be beneficial to the producers of the great plains.

While I indeed appreciate the remarks made by the leader of the opposition in relation to the value of this being a joint project between ourselves and the United States, may I say that I would not be at all worried if we had to undertake it by ourselves. As a joint project you have two nations exercising control over it. We might find that such joint control would lead to some awkward situations in the future, and that one or other of the two nations might find it beneficial to both that one nation, and not the two nations together, should undertake this great project.

Do not misunderstand me, Mr. Speaker. I am not suggesting that, if the opportunity arises for this to be a joint undertaking, it should not be undertaken as such. It would relieve Canada of a vast expenditure of money if it were a joint undertaking. What I am saying is that there are some reasons why the undertaking of this project by Canada alone might be of benefit not only to Canada but to the two countries, since it would remove the possibility of misunderstanding and perhaps dispute in the days to come. Consequently I think that side of the picture should be considered.

But whether this is a joint undertaking or not, it is going to have a tremendous effect, not only in the field of transportation but in many other ways, upon the future of a large part of this country. When we think of what this project will mean along the shores of the great lakes—the building of additional port facilities, the enlargement of the port facilities we now have in order to accommodate larger, ocean-going vessels and so on—it opens up vistas of expansion which may well beggar description and which we perhaps cannot adequately and properly conceive at the present time.

The proposed St. Lawrence seaway project is, of course, a dual purpose plan. I think we must keep that fact in mind. It combines both navigation and power projects. I am not going to say much about the power project side of this because a great deal will be said on it in this house in the near future, and possibly in this debate. One of the features of this project is that it is not a navigation project alone but a great power project as well.

I have not had time to study the agreement that was tabled in the house yesterday, between the province of Ontario and the federal government, with regard to power development in this region. I am happy indeed to know that an agreement has been reached between the two governments.

As a navigation project of course it is one of the great projects in the history of the world. It means that there will be a 2,500-mile channel 27 feet or more in depth joining the Atlantic ocean with the chain of great lakes, permitting ocean-going vessels to ply backward and forward from the very heart of this continent to all the ports of Europe and the world. What a remarkable project it is in that respect. To appreciate the significance of this we have to understand the role the St. Lawrence river has already played in the history and the development of Canada. Years ago it provided the only great route from the Atlantic ocean to the interior of the North American continent, and the impact this great route has had upon the history and the development of Canada and the United States is indeed almost incalculable. Its potentialities have undergone continual development until the present, when most of its length is navigable to deep draft vessels from the mouth of the St. Lawrence to Montreal. I remember when I was a boy at school I was taught that Montreal was the seaport, as it were, farthest away from the ocean; and it seemed almost inconceivable, until I first rode up that great river now over forty years ago, that a seaport could be situated a thousand miles from the open sea.

At the present time there is no obstacle to navigation which will prevent a ship with a draft of some 35 feet, I think the minister said this afternoon, reaching that great inland city and port of Montreal. From Prescott to lake Erie we have spent a tremendous amount of money as a nation in order to deepen and make navigable the canals in that region. It is already to a depth of 25 feet, and downbound ships with drafts of 21 feet can navigate from lake Erie right through to the narrower and shallower channels near Prescott. Therefore the main section to be improved, as the minister said this afternoon, is the 115 miles from Montreal to Prescott, where navigation is seriously limited owing to the 14-foot depth that exists between those two points. He well called that this afternoon the bottleneck of this great inland waterway.

I believe we have already spent something over $300 million on the St. Lawrence in providing a 35-foot channel to Montreal, a 14-foot canal system from Montreal to lake Ontario, and a 25-foot channel from lake Ontario to lake Erie; and then of course the locks at the Sault. I hope all hon. members at one time or another have seen these remarkable projects; the Welland canal, the great locks that let ships in and out of lake Ontario, and the great locks along the Sault in the province of Ontario. And so it seems to me that having done this much, it is logical that an attempt should be made now to complete this project.

There are two projects, as the leader of the opposition said a short time ago, in which many of us are interested, and they both involve rivers: this great project, the seaway, and the great project of the South Saskatchewan, so there will be more produce to be exported along this waterway to the sea. It seems to me that the two things are related, because they both deal with the possibilities of not only an expanded economy but an expanded policy, and all that an expanded policy brings in its train in a country of this kind.

As I said earlier, one of the chief enticements to the support of this project is that we believed there would be a reduction in the cost of transportation between the lower St. Lawrence and the great lakes. I do not intend to go into the whole route; the minister went into that this afternoon, but I intend to say something more than I have said about it. We have already completed a large section of it, and it seems to me we should now make up our minds that this is to be completed, whether we do it in co-operation with our great friendly neighbour to the south or whether we are compelled to go it alone.

I am not much impressed with the argument that this is a defence project. I hope that before this is completed the situation in the world will be somewhat different, that we shall have achieved a larger amount of peace among the nations and not have to regard this as a defence project. Indeed as a defence project, if was came, it might offer an inducement as a very interesting target to an aggressor nation who could deliver either guided missiles or atom bombs by planes. One atomic bomb dropped at the Sault could tie up lake shipping over the whole route. As I say, I do not regard this as a defence project but as an economic project, which will be useful to Canada in the years and probably the centuries to come.

I repeat, I am not going into all the details; but I think I might refer to some of them. In one way or another the leader of the opposition and the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) have already referred to them. I might refer to the tremendous quantities not only of iron ore but of wheat and of other produce that I believe can be shipped over this route at lower costs, which should urge us to consider it in all its aspects. I know there will be criticism of this project, and there should be criticism because some of us are looking at it very largely from the point of view of the areas from which we come. The prairie area, which was my home for many years, always looked to the day when Fort William and Port Arthur would be ocean ports from which we might ship our wheat and our other produce without undue freight costs, without transshipment at Port McNicoll or Port Colborne or Prescott or Buffalo or other points. I am thinking of wheat now, of course, but there is other produce. We should be able to ship it from coast to coast without the necessity of moving our produce from one type of lake ship to an ocean-going vessel. Therefore I say this project should be carefully examined by every hon. member. Those of us who come from regions where we think this would be beneficial should listen to those who come from regions where the people think it may be harmful to them.

In the main, my personal belief is that if undertaken and completed, this project will open up a new era of progress and prosperity for many parts of this great country.

Mr. J. H. Blackmore (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, when this project was mentioned some time ago I said the Social Credit group would support it. We still support it. I have liked generally the attitude of the government in going forward with this development. Canada is sufficiently grown up now that she does not need to have the co-operation of any neighbours in the building of a great project of this kind. She has so intimated, and so stated. She is going forward to build this project, which I believe is the right thing to do.

I always like to get along with my neighbours just as well as I possibly can. But I have always had the idea that I get along better with them if we do not go together in some project such as the building of a shed or something like that. And I think we would get along better with this project if it were all our own. In that respect I think the government can see quite readily the position we will take, so far as Canada going ahead with this project herself is concerned.

I am not sure just what the impact of this project will be immediately or ultimately upon the other provinces. But there is one thing I hope Ontario and Quebec will learn very soon, and that is that if they use a project of this kind greatly to increase their industrial strength and their strength of population, and consequently their voting strength; if they use the power they get from that added strength to seek to impose their will upon the other provinces to the detriment of those provinces, they are courting trouble. They are going to injure the other provinces, and thereby injure Canada. Therefore I hope the governments of Ontario and Quebec will do some good, earnest, serious thinking while this project is being built, and that they will take steps to see that the results of this project will be felt to the benefit of all provinces in Canada.

There are provinces that are worried about what this project will do to their economies. I would be in favour of giving those provinces the positive assurance that no injury will be done them, and that if there is any injury it will be made good in one way or another. I have in mind particularly the maritime provinces. My opinion is that Canada has treated the maritime provinces scandalously ever since they entered confederation. Many people act as though they do not care. "What difference does it make? They have not enough votes to bother us, anyway. Why bother about them?" Then, of course, when those people go down to the maritimes they talk nicely and get the people in the maritime provinces to vote Liberal or Conservative all the time, one or the other. And they are just as badly off when they vote for one as when they vote for the other. They go on suffering, from generation to generation. That has been the record. No Conservative administration can point to any more advantage given to the maritime provinces than any Liberal administration has given. And no Liberal administration can point with pride to its record of treatment of the maritimes. If anyone thinks he can point to any such administration, then I will listen to him when he rises to speak. Whatever is done we must keep in mind the maritime provinces. We must remember that those provinces should be given the opportunity of growing into the great and happy areas the Creator intended they should be, and that they should not be trailing in the wake of federal policy in this nation, greatly to their disadvantage, as has been their unhappy experience in the past.

This project is one of the most serious, from the standpoint of the maritime provinces. I sympathize deeply with them when I cast my eye over past records. If I were a maritimer I would be greatly worried about this project until I was given positive assurance that my area was not going to suffer. The minister's admirable speech this afternoon sounded all right for the maritime provinces. If it only works out that way no one will object. I think there is not much more to say in that connection, so far as we Albertans are concerned. We have not had the opportunity to study the project deeply enough to see all the possible pitfalls, but in a general way it would appear to be a good thing for Canada. It is going to be a good thing for Ontario and Quebec. Ultimately what is good for Ontario and Quebec is going to be good for the rest of Canada, if Ontario and Quebec use the common sense they ought to use. We certainly will pray that statesmen will arise in those two provinces who will realize their responsibilities in the future as their men have never realized them in the past.

The power aspect of the project is a great consideration. It is important that we have adequate power for Ontario and Quebec, and it is very important that we should have no neighbour in a position to meddle in our affairs when we endeavour to use the power which will be derived from that project. That is another reason I would like to see us have the thing all to ourselves. I would want Canada to be generous with her neighbours in permitting the use of the development both in respect of travel and the use of power. But I want to be in the position that they realize that whatever they do is only with our consent.

I repeat that Alberta and the Social Credit movement will support this great project.

Mr. Robert Cauchon (Beauharnois): Mr. Speaker, as political economy depends upon the observation and study of both physical and human factors, it is of great interest to see how the peoples of nations react to the programs proposed to and imposed upon them. This enables us to judge a national policy not only by the intention which motivates it but also by its results. For instance, policies resulting in such services as railways and social security measures have always drawn heavily upon public finances, but who would criticize those undertakings for that reason? Would Canadians today say that the building of our transcontinental railways was ill advised?

Again, it has been often shown that increased production and work efficacy are means of improving the conditions of the workers. That being true, the prosperity of a country will be augmented by increasing the efficiency of human labour both by mechanization and more particularly by utilization of our potential electrical power. Only thus will our standard of living be improved, especially that of the workers who constitute the most important part of our population, for they produce what Canadians consume and export to maintain our foreign trade.

Quite apart from the substantial improvements through intelligent application of more efficient work methods and consequent increased production, an essential to prosperity is the investment of new capital. Such an opportunity for sound investment is afforded by the proposed plan to develop the St. Lawrence seaway. Can there be a more profitable investment for a nation than the development of the St. Lawrence, which is both a national and international asset? In fact, no greater opportunity for the successful development of commerce and of electrical power has ever been offered to mankind. The advantages cannot be regarded as of local importance only, because they give all Canada the opportunity of expanding her world trade by meeting competition through cheaper transportation.

The government which has suggested that our nation undertake the construction of this waterway, alone if need be, is now in a position to know the advantages to be derived from it. From the findings of numerous joint commissions which have been set up from time to time to study and report on the feasibility and need of the waterway it has been able to weigh the advantages and the costs. Ever since Dollier de Casson built a one and a half foot canal at Lachine in 1700, attempts have been made to use the great east and west waterway in the interests of both Canada and the United States. Together in 1905 these countries set up a joint standing national waterways commission which in turn led to the boundary waters treaty, effective in 1910. From that time matters pertaining to our international waters were under the jurisdiction of the international joint commission. This commission obtained reports from an engineering board, and held hearings in five of our provinces and several of those states most intimately concerned. Its report to the government—a report entirely favourable—recommended further study of the subject. This was in 1921.

Acting on the commission's recommendations further study was undertaken, which showed unanimity of opinion as to the economic value of the proposed waterway. But in 1924 fuller examination by six engineers, constituting an international joint board of engineers, resulted in a conference between Canada and Ontario, because the international section lies in that province. Again a favourable report was submitted.

The treaty drawn up by Canada and the United States as a result of these findings provided, among other terms, for a combined power and navigation project in the international section. There would be, according to its provisions, 2,200,000 horsepower to be divided equally between the two countries, and a 27-foot waterway from lake Superior to Montreal. The treaty, being defeated in the United States Senate in 1934, was never ratified.

But in 1940, because our war effort drew heavily on our supply of electrical power, the Canadian government proposed to the United States that conversations be held regarding the development of power on the St. Lawrence. As a result concessions were made which permitted Ontario to develop at Niagara 70,000 horsepower. Moreover, committees were set up to investigate development of the international rapids section. The government, after having received the reports of these committees, signed the great lakes-St. Lawrence agreement. As in 1934, under the St. Lawrence waterway treaty, it provided for a 27-foot waterway to Montreal, and for the development of 2,200,000 horsepower.

In reading the recommendations and reports submitted one is impressed by the fact that all these commissions were in favour of the undertaking. But history shows that opposition has always been encountered when a new project is under consideration. Such opposition may spring from lack of foresight, as in 1840 when, at the instance of the Michigan legislature, a bill was introduced in congress for a grant of land to aid in building the first canal at the Sault. Even Henry Clay argued against it and said that this region was beyond the reach of the remotest settlement. Today that statement would be ridiculous.

Opponents to the present scheme base their objections on:

(a) The shortage of the navigation season.

(b) The loss of trade that might be suffered by existing facilities.

(c) The cost of construction.

(d) The traffic's not justifying the cost.

(e) Cost of maintenance.

In answer to those who fear that the shortness of the navigation season, averaging 215 days in Montreal and 237 days at the Welland canal, would make the scheme unprofitable I would point to the commerce on the Baltic sea. The tonnage is very heavy, but so organized that it can be carried during the open season. Understandingly there is in some quarters fear that the undertaking will militate against existing facilities. The experience of Liverpool, which strongly opposed the construction of the Manchester ship canal, is an indication of what happens under such circumstances. Both ports prosper.

In carrying out the present plan of construction, alone if necessary, I am convinced that the enormous sum involved will in the near future be proved insignificant when set against the development of resources, the expansion of trade and the investment of new capital attracted by reserves of low cost, available power and cheap transportation. The attraction exercised by such facilities is well exemplified by the aluminum industry in the Saguenay area of Quebec and at Kemano, B.C. The big advantage of such development is that the deepening of a channel to aid navigation is at the same time providing power for an area almost entirely dependent on white coal.

Let us next look at the benefits resulting from the improvements at the Sault. These paid for themselves five times over in the 1918 season alone. The saving that year in freight was $180 million but the cost had been only $32 million. It is impossible to reckon in advance the increase in traffic as a result of improved water transportation, as a study of the Panama and Suez canals clearly indicates. Improved transportation facilities create the demand for such facilities.

A study of the distribution of population proves that minerals, timber and other national resources if not accessible are of little value. The richest agricultural land is worth, depending entirely on transportation facilities, anywhere from a few dollars to several hundred dollars an acre. Transportation is the greatest creator and stabilizer of wealth. Moreover, in order to carry the traffic that will inevitably follow the steady growth of our country it is absolutely necessary to provide some other kind of transportation than is now available.

The need of better and cheaper transportation facilities is urgent and of interest to the entire country. With more power available, industry will expand and this expansion will demand the fullest employment of both water and rail transportation to meet the needs of those industries. Engineers assure us that conditions in the St. Lawrence are excellent for the maintenance of a navigable channel. Sediment is largely settled in the great lakes and the hard rock of the river assures a permanent bed. If the Suez canal with its high cost of maintenance has proved a profitable venture why should the St. Lawrence waterway, where physical conditions are more favourable and maintenance costs therefore much less, not prove profitable?

We must remember that the opening of the great lakes channel to the sea, thereby giving that area in effect a seacoast, is also as economically sound as a waterpower project is economically sound. The water supply is constant and adequate, a factor important both to power and navigation. The harnessing of hydroelectric power is of particular urgency to those provinces which have no coal and little or no oil or natural gas. I do not need to elaborate on the position of the province of Ontario in this respect. But I do believe that it is a duty of the federal government to make available to the provinces from the waters under its control a reserve of power upon which they can draw when and as required to enable them to make full use of their natural wealth.

Power and navigation have been and are closely associated in considering the St. Lawrence waterway, for power will be sold and traffic on our inland waters will be multiplied and accelerated. As intimated previously, in the province of Ontario there are municipalities today seriously handicapped by lack of power. The project under consideration would alleviate this acute shortage. We are indeed failing to fulfil our obligations if we neglect to make possible a power project vital to so large a section of our population. Certainly the provinces of Ontario and Quebec understand the value of water-borne traffic and cheap power. Toronto alone saved many millions of dollars. I might also point to the growth of Arvida and Beauharnois. It is not necessary to speak at length of Cornwall's hopes for the future, as revealed in a recent issue of Saturday Night. I know its interests are in good hands.

Having watched since 1932 the growth of different municipalities in my own riding, I am in a position to know what the development of hydro power can do for a region. Several new industries have been attracted to Beauharnois, which has, as a result, nearly doubled in population. The same remarkable growth is apparent in Melocheville and St. Timothée. Valleyfield too has witnessed a large industrial development. Moreover, all these municipalities have a most promising future. Harnessing of the hydroelectric resources after the St. Lawrence seaway project is completed will produce a further industrial expansion.

What commodities will be affected by better and cheaper transportation to and from the great lakes area? Traffic in iron ore and petroleum is likely to be much heavier, in addition to the ever-increasing tonnages of grain and coal. Under present conditions tankers carry approximately 3,000 tons of gasoline and grain and coal carriers have a capacity of 2,500 to 3,000 tons. We are told that the St. Lawrence is to handle many millions of tons more, but because additional locks can be built its capacity is almost limitless. Savings in transportation cost on meats and lards, timber, automobiles and agricultural machinery, and the ores and coal necessary to their manufacture, would be passed on ultimately to the consumer.

Now let us consider what this project will mean to the western grain producers. Up to the time of my election to the House of Commons I knew relatively little about wheat. I now share an office with the hon. member for Yorkton (Mr. Stewart). Strange as it may seem, my heretofore neglected education in this respect is in the process of being completed. I may say he makes it a continuing process. A saving of several cents per bushel on grain moving eastward by the proposed all water route has been estimated.

Mr. Louis Sabin, general superintendent of the St. Mary's fall canal, in giving evidence before the international joint commission in 1921 drew attention to the saving in distance and time effected by the use of the St. Lawrence all-water route compared to the Erie canal and Oswego-Mohawk route, 16 days and 15 hours against 19 days and 13 hours, and 4,148 miles as against 4,641.

The cost of sending grain by the all-water route to Montreal is 12½ cents per bushel, by water and rail 25·2 cents and by rail 28·2 cents. These figures were obtained from the bureau of statistics. More grain could be shipped by the cheapest method if steamers of sufficient draft could load at the lakehead for eastern Canadian ports and the Atlantic. By thus removing the necessity of reloading, with its heavy costs in time and labour, loss by unrecoverable wastage from grain erosion could also be eliminated. This wastage, as estimated conservatively by an experienced elevator superintendent, is appreciable, as much as 30 pounds in each 1,000. It follows, therefore, that the benefits derived from lower transportation costs on grain alone would justify the required expenditure. Such reduction in transportation costs to foreign markets tends to increase the farmer's return on his entire crop. It is axiomatic that in a surplus producing country the farmer's price is largely determined by his return on the surplus.

Before making the momentous decision the government has considered all the arguments in favour of and against the project. I am firmly convinced that after the debate on this subject is concluded it will be clear to all hon. members of the house that the St. Lawrence waterway should be undertaken by Canada, and undertaken now. Mr. Speaker, coming generations will remember with gratitude the government which had the vision to invest in Canada's future.

Mr. Clarence Gillis (Cape Breton South): I am sure, Mr. Speaker, that it must be dull for you to have to sit there listening to the same story all night. In order that this may not look as if it were unanimous or prearranged, and for the sake of variety, I am going to take the other side of the argument. I agree with the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) that this is perhaps the most important statement he ever made in this house. I view the action now proposed by the government in the light that it is going to have the most serious repercussions upon the economy of this country of any action that has ever been taken, that is if the government mean what they have said.

On another occasion I took the stand that I am going to take tonight, perhaps more briefly, and at that time I was told the policy I was advocating was my policy. I want to assure you that so far as I am concerned I represent people in this House of Commons, people who marked an X on a ballot and sent me here. They have a right to expect me to do the things they want done. I want to make that quite clear. Perhaps the province of Nova Scotia is the only province in Canada that has a policy on this particular question. I listened to the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew), and he made a fine oration. My impression is that when I have said that, I have said it all. I listened to the minister, and I believe he did a good job with a bad case. To a large extent both hon. members were expressing their own opinions or the opinions of their party.

So there would be no misunderstanding about the attitude I am taking, I checked with my people during the past months. In so far as the Nova Scotia section of the C.C.F. is concerned, they have a policy on this particular matter. On November 2 and 3 I attended a convention of the party and listened to this matter discussed by about one hundred delegates. While they modified their stand, which was unalterable opposition, that section of the C.C.F. movement now takes the position that they will go along with this proposal provided the government considers it as an investment program that will mean equality of development in all sections of the country. I shall go into that in more detail later.

I was not satisfied with merely obtaining the opinion of the political party I happen to represent in this house—although they have a definite policy on the matter—and I checked with the united mine workers. Thirteen thousand coal miners, the major portion of them in the province of Nova Scotia, discussed this matter at their last convention held in Truro in August of this year. The convention instructed the executive board to go back and study the matter. There was to be no guess work about it, no ifs, ands and buts. They studied the matter from a practical standpoint through their research department, and they have a good research department. This union wrote the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), and I imagine all hon. members received a copy, setting out their considered opinion of the navigational portion of this project. They believe that the navigational part of the project is a threat to their means of livelihood. This memorandum issued by the union is dated October 16, and contains seven reasons for the union's belief that the navigational portion of this development would interfere with their means of livelihood. I am not going to put it on the record because the Minister of Transport likely has a copy.

Mr. Blackmore: Why does the hon. member not put it on the record?

Mr. Gillis: I believe the members of the house received copies of it, at least I have spoken to many people who did. I know it was sent to the Prime Minister.

Mr. Blackmore: Why not let the readers of Hansard know about it? The people in British Columbia and Alberta know nothing about it.

Mr. Gillis: If the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) wants this information on the record, I am quite prepared to read it. If he wants it put on the record without me reading it, I am satisfied with that.

Mr. Blackmore: I am anxious that everyone should read it.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Beaudoin): Order. Is it the pleasure of the house to have the document put on Hansard?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Gillis: The memorandum reads as follows:

United Mine Workers of America
District 26
P.O. Box 110—Glace Bay, Nova Scotia

October 16, 1951

Dear Sirs and Brothers:

At the last convention of district 26, United Mine Workers of America, a resolution was presented protesting the construction of the St. Lawrence seaway and power project. The delegates, at that convention, voted unanimously to refer said resolution back to the district executive board for further study and comment.

After a thorough review of the St. Lawrence seaway and power development project, your district executive board is of the opinion that this project, created with or without the help of the United States, will have a most adverse effect on the economy of the maritime provinces particularly in the realm of steel and coal. This opinion is based on the following facts:

1. That the construction of this project will tend to create a further concentration of industry in the central provinces of Quebec and Ontario. This will come about in two ways. First any new industry that is contemplated will be lured to the central provinces by the promise of cheap hydro electric power and cheap water transport and secondly existing industry in the maritimes would be induced to move to the central provinces to take advantage of these two facts.

2. That markets for maritime coal in Ontario and Quebec would be seriously jeopardized in the resulting change over from steam to hydro electric power.

3. The further concentration of industry in Ontario and Quebec would seriously curtail railway traffic in the maritimes thus reducing an important local market for maritime coal.

4. The construction of the seaway could conceivably create a dumping market in central Canada for United States and overseas coal.

5. The huge deposits of iron ore in Labrador would be enabled to reach the central markets very cheaply thus curtailing the expansion of the steel industry in the maritime provinces.

6. There is the possibility of an ever-increasing flow of oil transported by ships under registry of other nations, delivering petroleum products into the heart of the Canadian industrial region to displace maritime mined coal.

7. The taxpayers in the maritime provinces would be obliged to pay their just share of this project thus helping to expedite the process of committing industrial suicide in the maritime provinces.

Your district executive board therefore takes the stand that we are unalterably opposed to the construction of the St. Lawrence seaway and power project because of the dire effects which the project will have on our economy in the maritime provinces.

Fraternally yours,

On behalf of the District Executive Board
Freeman Jenkins, President.
Stephen Dolhanty, Acting Secretary-Treasurer.

This document represents the opinion of 13,000 mine workers living in New Brunswick and Nova Scotia. As I said before, there are no ifs, ands and buts. Through the research department they have studied the project and set forth seven very definite reasons for thinking it will militate against them. Before I conclude I may summarize those reasons.

I have another document from one of the local organizations of the mine workers, and local 4529 of the united mine workers is unalterably opposed to the scheme. There are 1,600 members of that local, and they are concerned about this. Another section in Pictou county, local 8672 of the united mine workers, forwards a resolution to the same effect. The development of the navigation project will militate against them in marketing their coal in central Canada, particularly in Montreal. From another local union of the mineworkers I have a lengthy letter; it is from the secretary of the mechanics' local. I may say there are about 800 members in this local union. They are machinists and mechanics who are employed in the coal industry. They are unalterably opposed to this project. I want to emphasize again that this is not guesswork. These people have studied this matter. I want to clear up the point that in my opposition to this seaway project I am stating my own policy. I have never spoken in this house on any subject without being certain of what people thought about it. I figure it is my job to do that. The mine workers as an organized body have studied this question over the years. On a previous occasion I said in this house that twenty-six years ago I wrote a resolution opposing this particular project. There is therefore no guesswork about the matter on the part of that mine workers' union.

The Minister of Transport worked extremely hard this evening, in my opinion, and he did a good job for the average person who will read Hansard and also for the average person in this house who has never studied this problem. But as far as I am concerned I want to say that he did not offer one new argument tonight, or one that I had not heard many years ago; and I was not impressed. I am not questioning his honesty. He is the last man in the world whose honesty I would question. I should like to be on his side; I hate to oppose him. But in this particular instance he just proved this to me. First, he proved that the resolution we are discussing to set up an authority is merely window dressing for the resolution that is still on the order paper and that is to make provision for the development of the power project for the province of Ontario. It will be noted that the resolution on the order paper does not say anything about developing power in the province of Quebec. It is a straight Ontario-federal government agreement for the development of power in this province. I believe the resolution we are now discussing—and we are discussing it first—is merely window dressing for the purpose of putting through that agreement to develop that power in the province of Ontario.

In support of what I have just said, I am reminded of a statement made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) to the press in September. In a press interview he stated that the seaway might be delayed for three years because they had run into some political snags. In my opinion the political snags they ran into were in the province of Quebec. If Quebec is reluctant to go ahead with this project at the present time, in my opinion the judgment of those in that province who may be doubtful of it is absolutely correct.

I am not objecting to this project, nor are the people in the maritime provinces to whom I have talked and who have submitted documents to me objecting to it, because of the good it will do to any other part of the country. We are not objecting to it on that ground. If Ontario needs power and the federal government wants to develop that power, we are not objecting because some benefit is going to accrue to this province. But we are objecting to the whole project, the power project and the navigation channel because of the injury it is going to do to the part of the country from which I come. That is why we are objecting to it, and we are objecting to it on legitimate grounds.

We are objecting to it first on the ground that it will militate against the coal mining industry in Nova Scotia. That industry at the present time is threatened from three different directions. First, it has the competition of oil. Second, it is now threatened by a pipeline development to bring natural gas from the province of Alberta into Montreal and Quebec city, the main market for Nova Scotia coal. In addition, if this channel is opened up it means that the Americans have a straight, cheap water route into that main Montreal market where about half the total production of Nova Scotia is marketed at the present time. Today we cannot compete in that Montreal market, even with our water route, without substantial subsidies from the federal government. We are assisted in that market now despite the fact that the Americans have a rail route in there and we have a water route. Despite that fact we still cannot compete. If the development visualized by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew), by the leader of this group and by the hon. member for Beauharnois (Mr. Cauchon) takes place, it means that we are going to provide a water route into that market, with the result that whatever market we have left is going to be pushed away from the Nova Scotia product. I want to point out seriously to the members of this house that the coal industry is the basic industry of Nova Scotia. If it is crippled it means that province goes down with it. That is what we fear, and we have legitimate fears unless we have reasonable guarantees from the government that what we anticipate is not going to take place. But in this world of free enterprise, competition, and get what you can for yourself, the logical thing to happen is that the Americans will be able to undersell us in that market.

Mr. Blackmore: Will the hon. member permit a question before he goes into another aspect of the matter?

Mr. Gillis: Yes.

Mr. Blackmore: Has he given some thought to the nature of the guarantees that he feels should be given?

Mr. Gillis: Yes.

Mr. Blackmore: Would he care to mention those guarantees now, or does he propose to do so later on?

Mr. Gillis: In summing up I will mention the guarantees. I have in my hand a file containing representations from some influential bodies; for example, from the city of Sydney, where the basic steel industry on that coast is located. The committee for industrial expansion in Nova Scotia, headed by the Nova Scotia federation of labour, presented a brief to the cabinet of Nova Scotia on April 20 of this year, urging the provincial government to get in touch with the federal government for the purpose of expanding the basic steel industry in Sydney, Nova Scotia, the logical place for them to expand. They see the threat to the coal industry. They realize that there is maybe a necessary shift in their basic industry, and that it should be based on steel, in view of the threat of natural gas and oil competition and so forth from other sources. I am sure the province of Nova Scotia must have got in touch with the Minister of Trade and Commerce and must have brought to the attention of the department all the facts and figures on steel expansion in that area. I am not going to go into it, but I have reams of it. We calculated that there would be some steel expansion on that coast. I am afraid that the navigation end of this project is designed to do just the reverse; and I do not say that idly, because I hold in my hand a clipping of a speech made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), who generally knows what he is talking about. It was made in the United States, and in urging this project he did not leave any doubt in anyone's mind as to why he was anxious about it. An extract from that speech reads as follows:

> The St. Lawrence seaway must be built. Without it the steel industry now on the great lakes would have to migrate to the Atlantic coast.

That would be an awful thing. But that is his reason for it, and all of the arguments advanced this afternoon by the minister merely confirm my opinion on that point. He pointed out the great iron ore deposits in Ungava and Labrador. The leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) stressed the future of this country, and rightly so, based on steel. He said that was basic to our whole economy and our whole defence effort. That is true, but there was no suggestion from the government that any expansion at all should occur where it naturally should take place, where the Lord placed the iron ore, or as close to that spot as could be utilized. There was no suggestion of that at all. While the leader of the opposition made a reference to the necessity of some such program, at the same time he backs the channel that prevents it. I say that with some assurance, because the minister convinced me of that all through his speech today. According to him there were the two musts: First of all power is necessary. I am not doubting that. Perhaps it is. But if it is necessary, that is because of too great concentration of industry in Ontario. That is the reason for it. Making the iron ore available was said to be a must. To whom are we making the iron ore available?

Mr. Drew: I do not want to interrupt the hon. member, but I would not want the record to leave the impression, which I think his words unintentionally conveyed, that I had merely made a passing reference to the possibility of steel being produced in the maritimes. On the contrary, I said positively that it should be and that there were great advantages in seeing that it was done there; that I thought at a time when we were planning to create facilities for moving the ore elsewhere we should by contractual arrangements assure the increased production of steel in the maritime provinces as well.

Mr. Gillis: I listened to the leader of the opposition very carefully tonight. I agree that he did make those suggestions, but he did not suggest for one minute that he was going to oppose the navigation channel which would prevent the hopes he had expressed from coming to fruition. That is the point I am making.

I am a Canadian, and I believe in developing Canadian resources for Canadians. I do not believe there should be any doubt in anybody's mind about that. Let us have a look at who is going to use this iron ore if that navigation channel is deepened. First of all, who owns that ore at the present time? Have the Canadian government or the Newfoundland government any control over that iron ore? I say they have not. That iron ore has been leased for the next ten years by the Newfoundland government and the Quebec government. A franchise was passed in this house permitting the development of railroad lines up through northern Quebec, the development of hotels and bus lines and all that kind of thing for the next ten years. The Americans have the franchise to operate the iron ore deposits in Ungava. Someone will say they are leased to the Hollinger Exploration Company. That is correct, but that is a front company in Canada for United States interests. Actually the people who control it, through their financing, are the M. A. Hanna Company of the United States. That is number one. They have the franchise now. Well, we are not satisfied to give them a franchise to exploit that ore for the next ten years. We are now going to dig the channel all by ourselves to make it more available to them. That certainly does not mean the development of any steel on the Atlantic seaboard as far as I am concerned, and I like to be fair to the minister and I try to be charitable in my thinking. I am convinced, and the people whom I represent here—and I have gone to the trouble to provoke their thoughts and get them to restudy this matter in the light of 1951 conditions—are convinced that the channel end of that development ends any possible chance of expansion on the Atlantic seaboard. The Americans own it; we are going to go it alone in order to make it more available to them.

This afternoon when the minister was talking he said it was going to benefit every section of Canada. It was like Santa Claus's bag; there was something for everybody. I listened to him very carefully and hopefully when he was making his statement to see what was in that stocking for the maritime provinces. He started at Newfoundland, and rightly so. He said Newfoundland will get a great stimulus in employment. The Newfoundlander is going to be permitted to go underground, to dig the iron ore and to ship it up the Canadian-paid-for channel to the steel mills at Duluth or somewhere along the lakes to be fabricated and what have you by United States interests. That is something for him to look forward to. He is going to be the hewer of wood and the drawer of water. He is getting a lot out of that. Well, I will say this to the credit of the present Newfoundland premier. He at least has said that he is going to develop a basic steel industry in Newfoundland. He is going to do it with European capital. It is on paper yet. I hope it is not a dream. I hope he will do that, but it means he is going to have a lot of opposition. He is running into some pretty big stuff when he bucks the North American steel interests. He has said he is going to do it, so the Newfoundlander at least has this to look forward to. There may be a chance of him getting out from underground, from lifting heavy iron ore, into a steel plant that the premier of Newfoundland is going to establish.

Mr. Stick: But not from Labrador ore.

Mr. Gillis: The minister promised that the Newfoundlander will have more work, but that product which means so much to the future of the world is going to be taken up to the head of the lakes further to concentrate the steel industry and perpetuate it there for all time. Then he came to Quebec. There are potential power possibilities there, but I think Quebec is hesitating at this time. I believe Quebec expected, when they gave the franchise to the Hollinger Exploration Company, being the M. A. Hanna Company of the United States, a great development in the north country. There was no talk about a seaway at that time. I think they are smart enough to see now that we are not going to get all these railroads built and these bus lines and hotels and all that made available in northern Quebec. They are just going to develop the mines in there, take the ore down to the coast and drag that iron up past Montreal, by-passing it altogether, and take all the wealth that belongs to northern Quebec or Ungava and Labrador and centralize it in the United States. If I were in Quebec I would be doing a lot of thinking about that project, despite the advice of the hon. member for Beauharnois (Mr. Cauchon).

So much for Quebec. There was something in the stocking for the prairies, of course. I have been in this house for approximately twelve years, Mr. Speaker. I have listened to that grain debate two or three times every year, and I have not yet once heard any complaint in the house that there has been a lack of ships. The great complaint was about box cars: "The grain is lying out; we need box cars from the C.P.R. We want the transport commission to see that we get box cars." But there did not seem to be any shortage of ships.

I hope those who anticipate that this project may do something to stimulate the movement of wheat from the prairies will not be misled. I would say this also, that if that is true, then we wasted a lot of money in developing the port of Churchill. I was led to believe that was the logical and natural outlet for western grain, that it was the closest point to Europe. But that has all gone by the board. The arguments I heard in favour of Churchill were perhaps no more valid than the ones we were hearing in favour of this seaway, so far as doing something to help in the shipment of wheat is concerned. It is just an "if" and a "but" and a hope; there is nothing concrete.

There is before the house now a motion to get more box cars. One hon. member actually proposed that we should nationalize the C.P.R. in order to get more box cars to move wheat; but I have never heard any talk about any shortage of ships.

I hope that if this goes through they realize their hope, because it is only a hope. There is nothing concrete to support any contention that this project is going to benefit anybody or anything, except the power project in Ontario. British Columbia—

Mr. Green: He was pretty weak on that one.

Mr. Gillis: They just got the go-by. When the project is fully developed British Columbia will be away back in behind the mountains, pushed farther and farther toward the Pacific coast. So British Columbia had better line up with me, and give a little opposition to this.

I suggest again to the minister that he pay some attention to the maritime provinces. Over the years the Halifax Chronicle-Herald has done a good research job on practically every project affecting the maritimes. I hold in my hand some up to date editorials from that newspaper concerning this project. One of them, dated May 7, 1951, bears the caption "It Gets Beyond My Understanding." I am sure no one will accuse the editorial staff of the Halifax Chronicle-Herald of being just oppositionists or wild-eyed radicals or straight maritimers. They have always taken a pretty broad view of everything. I am not going to read these editorials, but their contention is this: Where would the materials come from? Provided the authority the minister is setting up were instructed to go ahead and to develop this power project in Ontario, provided it was told to get busy and put the seaway through, where would that body go to find the materials and the labour and all those things necessary for such a project?

The editorial is very thoughtful on that point. These are practical things. It is all right to be a visionary and to give long orations. I could do that, too, if I wanted to. But when we get down to concrete cases and have to find the men, the materials and the steel, it is a different matter. And as an hon. member points out to me there is also the matter of finding the concrete. Where is all this to be found? These are practical questions. This is not pie in the sky. A report on the great lakes-St. Lawrence deep waterways issued in June of 1949 sets out some pretty definite figures on this question. The Halifax Chronicle-Herald, again in its own practical way, directs our thoughts along other lines, that of shipbuilding. In years gone by the maritime provinces were looked upon as the logical place for shipbuilding, and shipbuilding was recognized as one of their industries. Even if this channel were built the maritimes would continue to be the logical place for shipbuilding. But that is not to continue. This afternoon the minister elaborated upon how the building of this project would stimulate the shipbuilding industry, and said that ships would be built at inland ports. No mention was made of any place east of Montreal. It was all going to be concentrated along the great lakes. Of course I do not blame the minister for that, because it is pretty generally recognized in Ottawa that Canada ends at Montreal. Survey beyond that? Oh, no one ever thinks about doing that. The minister's remarks this afternoon with respect to shipbuilding simply reflected the attitude of the ivory tower, the Ottawa approach: Canada ends at Montreal.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe)—and, poor fellow, he is getting a beating these days—

Mr. Green: He is in trouble.

Mr. Gillis: According to this editorial from the Halifax Chronicle-Herald of December 3—and this is right up to date—he was selling the St. Lawrence seaway in central Canada, on the ground that that is where the shipbuilding would be concentrated. Well, I am glad they are going to have water this time. The last time they built ships at inland ports they had to carry them by sections on box cars or flat cars to find the water in which to float them. At least they are a little more up to date this time. It appears that the shipbuilding will be done at the inland ports, and the minister confirmed that this afternoon.

On motion of Mr. Gillis the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Tomorrow we will proceed with business in the following order: First, debate on the address; second, the two resolutions concerning the St. Lawrence seaway; third, the resolution concerning the amendment to the Dominion Elections Act, and then, fourth, we will try to pass the resolution to amend the Civil Service Act.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to the order of the house passed on November 2, 1951.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Wednesday, December 5, 1951

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

THE PRIME MINISTER

CONGRATULATIONS ON TENTH ANNIVERSARY OF ENTRY INTO PARLIAMENT

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I wish to avail myself of the privilege, which is afforded at this time, of congratulating the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) on the tenth anniversary of his entry into the House of Commons. Each one of those of us who believe in our particular form of democratic government shares the hope that men who have attained success in their own particular field of activity, whatever it may be, will show the same willingness to serve the public that has been shown by the Prime Minister of Canada. It was to serve his country that he gave up the comfortable security of his own home and, may I add, the assured income of a leader of the bar. Those who do not belong to his own party will, I am sure, pay tribute to the spirit of public service which prompted his entry into this house just as much as those who are associated with him in his own party.

I am particularly pleased that we are afforded the opportunity to pay him our respects in this way, because I am inclined to think that never was there a time when it was so desirable that the thought be impressed upon the mind of every Canadian, particularly young Canadians, that the vigour and surviving strength of our democratic system depends on the willingness of those who are able to do their own job well to enter the parliament of Canada and give the advantage of their experience to the deliberations of this house. Whether it may be in public or in private life, I trust and I am confident that the Prime Minister will at all times have in his heart a feeling of satisfaction in knowing that, whatever our political opinions may be, we all respect him for the public service he has rendered.

Mr. Angus MacInnis (Vancouver East): This group would like to associate itself, Mr. Speaker, with what the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) has said concerning the service of the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) to his country and this parliament. It is not often that we find ourselves in such complete agreement with the leader of the opposition as we do on this occasion. Speaking for myself, I can say that I have particularly enjoyed—I think that is the word I should use—the almost unfailing courtesy of the Prime Minister in dealing with the matters that come up in this house. I say "almost" because there are perhaps moments that would try the temper of any person; but he seldom allows himself the pleasure of replying in kind. I think that those of us who have been here for some time all appreciate the parliamentary courtesies that he has shown us. I want to wish him success and long life to carry on the duties that he has taken up at a critical time in Canada's history.

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that we all appreciate this opportunity of joining in an expression of good will and congratulations to the Prime Minister. After ten years in parliament one can truthfully say that he has certainly maintained and retained a sense of fairness and a sense of balance. One often wonders just how he has been able to keep his sense of proportion in view of all the things with which he has to contend. I know that sometimes we are inclined to try to rub the Prime Minister a little bit in order to get a certain reaction from him. I think that is only natural because he is so delightful when he is rubbed. I personally have always felt that it is worth while to bring out the little bits of Irish in him. If we do so occasionally, it is only because we love him. I think that it is a sincere statement on the part of anyone who cares to speak in this house, when he says that we all greatly appreciate the fine qualities of the Prime Minister. We all join in telling him this. If we have a little bit of fun once in a while out of his reactions, it is certainly only because of—

An hon. Member: The savage in us.

Mr. Low: Yes, the savage in us. We just want to show him how much we appreciate him. I join with the others who have spoken in wishing him a good many years more of happiness and of service to this country. We are not unmindful of the sacrifices that our Prime Minister has made and is making.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it is not easy to find words to express adequately my appreciation of what has been said here this afternoon and, over and above that, my appreciation of the sentiments that have prompted the kind remarks that you have just heard. They are compensation for whatever one can do in the attempt to be of service to his fellow citizens and to carry out his part in this undertaking in which we are all engaged, namely that of making our democracy effective and worth while for all Canadian citizens. I appreciate, even more than the expressions that were used this afternoon, the constant friendship that I have felt from every member of this house during a period of almost ten years now that it has been my privilege to sit here. I think the leader of the opposition has uttered a truth that we ourselves should not forget and that we should not allow our fellow citizens to forget, namely that each one of us who feels that this system of social organization is the best that human ingenuity has been able to devise for the administration of the common interests of free men and women in organized society must also feel that each one of us should be at the disposal of his fellow citizens for any responsibility they wish at any time to entrust him with. I am sure that this is as true of every other member of this House of Commons as I hope it is of me: our real compensation for any public service we perform is the satisfaction of knowing that we are doing something for the maintenance of that system for our own generation and for the generations that will follow us in this country which has such a glorious future before it.

PENSION ACT

PRIVILEGE, MR. LAPOINTE—REFERENCE TO REMARKS IN DEBATE ON NOVEMBER 30

Hon. Hugues Lapointe (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, I should like to clarify certain information which I gave to the house on Friday last during the discussion of Bill No. 27, to amend the Pension Act, in the committee stage. The hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) asked if those veterans who had the right to treatment because they were receiving the unemployability supplement might not lose the right because the supplement was being replaced by an increase in the pension. My reply might have indicated that such veterans' treatment rights would be unchanged.

On further considering the question and reply in Hansard, I find that my answer might be construed as going beyond what I intended. I had in mind then what had been decided in regard to a certain group of those who received the unemployability supplement, namely those who had formerly been on war veterans allowance. It is certainly the intention that these veterans, though they went off war veterans allowance to receive the unemployability supplement and may now not be eligible for war veterans allowance by reason of the increase in pensions, will still be eligible for treatment.

It is intended to protect the eligibility for treatment of veterans in this group by a revision of the regulation which provides for free treatment for pensioners and veterans with service in a theatre of actual war who are unable to pay for the cost of their treatment. I believe it is done at the present time under regulation 5A. As hon. members know, an income ceiling is set in this regulation, and the veteran with an income below the ceiling is eligible for treatment. The ceiling was previously set so that the 100 per cent pensioner who had no other financial resources would be eligible. It will now be necessary to adjust the income ceiling to provide that this principle will apply when the new rates of pension are in effect after January 1.

In other words, those eligible for free treatment before the unemployability supplement was brought into effect will still be eligible for it after it has lapsed and in spite of the pension increases.

COMMITTEES OF THE HOUSE

RADIO BROADCASTING—SECOND REPORT

Second report of special committee on radio broadcasting.—Mr. Robinson.

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS—CONCURRENCE IN FIRST REPORT

Mr. L. Philippe Picard (Bellechasse) presented the first report of the standing committee on public accounts, and moved that the report be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

RADIO BROADCASTING—PUBLIC ACCOUNTS—CHANGES IN PERSONNEL

Mr. W. G. Weir (Portage-Neepawa) moved:

That the name of Mr. Knowles be substituted for that of Mr. Coldwell on the special committee on radio broadcasting.

That the name of Mr. Argue be substituted for that of Mr. Thatcher on the standing committee on public accounts.

That the name of Mr. Noseworthy be substituted for that of Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North) on the standing committee on public accounts.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTIONS

REMEMBRANCE DAY CEREMONIES, QUEBEC—INSTRUCTIONS

Mr. LaCroix:

1. Did the acting army commander of the eastern Quebec area issue special instructions for the Remembrance day ceremonies at Quebec in English only?

2. If so, for what reason?

Mr. Blanchette:

1 and 2. Orders in the Quebec area are regularly issued in French and English, but the Remembrance day ceremonies at Quebec, like those in many centres in Canada, are arranged for primarily by the Canadian Legion and the instructions to members of the armed forces participating conformed to those of the Canadian Legion and were in English. Care will be taken to see that such special instructions will, like the regular orders, be in future issued in French and English.

CAMP SHILO, MAN.—HOCKEY

Mr. Dinsdale:

1. Have the military authorities at camp Shilo hired a hockey coach? If so, at what salary?
2. Are the military authorities at camp Shilo offering financial inducements to hockey players?
3. If so, what is the nature of employment or services offered such hockey players?

Mr. Blanchette:

1, 2 and 3. The military authorities, that is, components of the Canadian armed forces, at camp Shilo have neither hired a hockey coach nor offered financial inducements to hockey players. It is understood, however, that the garrison recreation committee, an organization representing officers and men and their dependents, has engaged the services of a coach and pays the expenses of individual players out of non-public funds raised through the activities of the committee.

DEPARTMENT OF LABOUR—OFFICES IN EDMUNDSTON, N.B.

Mr. Dube:

1. How many offices are occupied by the Department of Labour in Edmundston, New Brunswick?
2. Are such offices the property of the dominion government or are they rented?
3. If rented on lease, from whom are they rented?
4. What is the annual rental?
5. Does the said rental include heat, light and janitor services?
6. If so, what part of such rental is allowed for janitor service?

Mr. Fournier (Hull):

1. One office at 39 Canada road occupied by the unemployment insurance commission.

2. Rented.

3. From D. J. Long, Clair, Madawaska Co., N.B.

4. $5,584.95.

5. Rental includes heating, but not lighting, cleaning or janitor services.

6. Answered by No. 5.

SMUGGLING OF CIGARETTES

Mr. Coyle:

1. How many prosecutions have been launched in Canada from April 1, 1951, to date, for smuggling cigarettes into Canada?
2. How many convictions were registered for the same period?
3. What was the total number of cigarettes seized from April 1, 1951, to date, for violations of the customs regulations?

Mr. McCann:

1. Prosecutions are recorded on completion and the number of such prosecutions completed between April 1, 1951, and October 31, 1951, was 306.

2. Number of convictions—301.

3. Number of cigarettes seized between April 1, 1951, and November 30, 1951, was 8,434,963.

S.S. "AORANGI"—PASSENGER AND FREIGHT SERVICE UNDER SUBSIDY ARRANGEMENT—REPLACEMENT ASSISTANCE

Mr. Laing:

1. (a) How many passengers; (b) what tonnage of freight, have been carried on each trip of R.M.S. Aorangi since renewal of service under the present subsidy arrangement nine months ago?
2. Is any consideration being given to assisting the replacement of this vessel by a fast combination passenger and reefer ship of Canadian registry capable of quick turnarounds?

Mr. Benidickson:

1. (a) 517, 591, 639, 502, 552. (b) 1434, 1327, 2033, 2229, 1474.

2. No.

CANADIAN PACIFIC AIR LINES—1952 PACIFIC RUN

Mr. Laing:

1. What points will be served by Canadian Pacific Air Lines upon inauguration of their Pacific run in 1952?
2. Have arrangements been completed to land at Auckland, New Zealand?

Mr. Benidickson:

1. Canadian Pacific Air Lines are operating two international routes in the Pacific. It is not expected that any new routes will be inaugurated in 1952 although it is hoped to add New Zealand as a point of call on the southern route.

2. No.

VANCOUVER INTERNATIONAL AIRPORT—DAILY AVERAGE OPERATIONS

Mr. Laing:

1. What is the daily average for last six months operation of (a) passengers carried; (b) weight of airmail; (c) freight transport, at Vancouver international airport?
2. How many public carriers and how many contract companies used the facilities of this airport?
3. How many people are employed in the combined services at this airport?

Mr. Benidickson:

Complete answer to the question asked by the hon. member cannot be supplied since

Questions

Vancouver international airport is operated by the city of Vancouver and not by the federal government; information would therefore have to be obtained from the municipal authorities. However, partial information can be supplied from federal sources as follows:

1. While the daily average of all air traffic over the last six months is not available, during the month of March 1951 the daily average of scheduled traffic was 823 passengers, 5,663 lbs. of mail, 3,550 lbs. of express and of other cargo.

2. Ten domestic commercial air carriers and two foreign commercial air carriers are licensed to operate into or from Vancouver international airport. No information is available as to the number of additional commercial carriers which use the airport on an itinerant basis or the number of private companies or private persons basing aircraft there or using the airport.

3. Ninety employees of the air service branch of the Department of Transport are located at Vancouver international airport including telecommunication, meteorological and air traffic control service.

IMMIGRATION—ENTRIES THROUGH PRAIRIE PORTS

INQUIRY FOR RETURNS

NATIONAL DEFENCE—FRENCH-CANADIAN OFFICERS—SERVICES COLLEGES, ETC.

Mr. Leon Balcer (Three Rivers): On Wednesday, October 31, I put seven questions on the order paper and they were passed as orders for returns, but I have not yet received a single answer. I wonder whether the Minister of National Defence, or his parliamentary assistant, can let me know at what time I may expect an answer?

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): I will have to look into that.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

INTERNATIONAL SERVICE, C.B.C.—BROADCASTS TO SOVIET RUSSIA AND CZECHOSLOVAKIA

Mr. Hodgson:

For a copy of the English translations of all broadcasts of the international service of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation transmitted to Soviet Russia and Czechoslovakia.

He said: You may have it taken off, if you wish.

Mr. Speaker: Dropped.

MR. R. G. PEERS

Mr. Hodgson:

For a copy of all correspondence exchanged between Mr. R. G. Peers and the government of Canada or any department or agency thereof since January 1, 1946.

Mr. McIlraith: Before the motion is put I wonder whether the hon. member would consent to its standing over until Monday?

Mr. Hodgson: That is fine.

Mr. Speaker: Motion stands.

TRANS-CANADA HIGHWAY—CONSTRUCTION IN NOVA SCOTIA

Mr. Black (Cumberland):

For a copy of all correspondence, telegrams and other documents, in the possession of any department of the federal government dated January 1, 1949, to November 30, 1951, relating to the construction of the trans-Canada highway in the province of Nova Scotia.

Mr. Winters: There is no objection to this correspondence being tabled, Mr. Speaker, subject to the reservation that we shall have to seek permission from the government of Nova Scotia with respect to their part in it.

Mr. Speaker: Motion agreed to, subject to the reservation of the minister.

Inquiries of the Ministry

CIVIL SERVICE

DECEMBER 24 AND 31—QUESTION AS TO HOLIDAY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. T. Richard (Ottawa East): I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State, of which I have given him notice. Will he make a statement as to the granting of a full day holiday to civil servants on the eve of Christmas and New Year?

Hon. F. G. Bradley (Secretary of State): I thank the hon. member for giving me notice of his question. The position is that Monday, December 24, and Monday, December 31, 1951, will be observed as civil service holidays, subject to the discretion of the deputy heads of the departments making such arrangements for skeleton staffs as may be required. The whole of both of these days will be counted as overtime for such employees of the Post Office Department as are unable to take either day off.

AIR TRANSPORT

REGULATIONS REGARDING PASSENGERS IN OPERATIONS COMPARTMENT, ETC.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. K. Fraser (Peterborough West): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Has the Department of Transport changed its regulations recently in regard to not allowing Trans-Canada Air Lines and other commercial air lines to carry passengers on flight decks, that is, the operations compartment of the planes, except qualified personnel and transport officers?

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): I wonder whether the hon. member would allow his question to stand as a notice so that I can get the information and give it to him?

Mr. Fraser: Yes. I should like to address a question to the parliamentary assistant of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, under whose department Trans-Canada Air Lines are administered. Will the parliamentary assistant make a statement as to why passengers have been sold tickets in the operations compartment of Trans-Canada Air Lines planes, and also why pilots have been suspended for obeying the Department of Transport regulations and safety measures?

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Trade and Commerce): I have had no notice of the question.

Mr. Fraser: I did not think it needed any.

Mr. McIlraith: I regret I am not able to answer it at the moment. If the facts in the statement part of the question are true I of course will see that an answer is brought forward as quickly as possible.

Mr. Fraser: The facts are according to the press.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Fraser: And I believe they are correct.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

CIGARETTES

AUTOMATIC VENDING MACHINES—PURCHASES BY MINORS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. John Hunter (Parkdale): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. What legislation, if any, is the Department of Justice contemplating to prevent persons under sixteen years of age from buying cigarettes from automatic vending machines?

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): This is the type of question in reference to which I am very glad that my hon. friend gave me notice. We are not contemplating any change in the law because we are of the opinion that the law as it stands at the present time is sufficient for the purpose. It is contained in section 2 of the tobacco restraint act or, more fully "an act to restrain the use of tobacco by young persons". This section reads in part as follows:

> 2. Every one is guilty of an offence and liable on summary conviction . . . who, directly or indirectly, sells or gives or furnishes to a person under the age of sixteen years any cigarettes or cigarette papers, whether for his own use or not, or sells or gives or furnishes to such person tobacco in any form other than cigarettes which tobacco he knows or has reason to believe is for the use of that person.

We believe that that section, if enforced, is adequate for the purpose.

Mr. Hunter: Since such sale can only be prevented by prohibiting the use of such machines, is the department contemplating such prohibition?

Mr. Garson: Outright prohibition, do you mean?

Mr. Hunter: Yes.

Mr. Garson: The position we take is that the purpose of the act is to restrain the sale of cigarettes to minors. So far as we know, we have no reason to suppose that the law is not effective for that purpose. The administration of it, as my hon. friend knows, is the responsibility of the attorneys general of the provinces. We have received no communication from any of the departments of attorneys general to the effect that the law is inadequate, or that some other new law should be passed. So far as the outright prohibition of the use of vending machines is concerned, that is a matter relating to the sale of goods which more properly could be considered to fall within provincial jurisdiction.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

INQUIRY AS TO RECOMMENDATION FOR INCREASE IN BASIC PENSION—INCREASE TO THOSE ALREADY RETIRED

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Transport. When the minister seeks from the Canadian National Railways the information asked for on November 30 by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) and by myself on November 15, regarding Canadian National Railways pension changes, will he ascertain as well whether there is to be any increase in the pensions being paid to those already retired?

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): The answer is yes; but, as I indicated to the hon. member for Lake Centre yesterday, I have as yet received no recommendation. When I do receive it, however, I intend to impart the information to the house. I presume it will cover both points; I hope it does.

Mr. Knowles: So do I.

ARMED FORCES

RATE OF ENLISTMENTS—REPLACEMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. Earl Catherwood (Haldimand): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of National Defence. Would he state whether the present rate of enlistments in the three branches of our armed services is adequate to supply replacements for our forces in Korea, and also to fill our commitments for additional troops in Europe to meet our obligations under the Atlantic pact agreements?

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member gave notice of his question, but it was in slightly different form. I do not know what he means by "our commitments for additional troops in Europe to meet our obligations" under the North Atlantic pact. The only commitments we have made are those which have been reported to this parliament.

With regard to ground forces, we shall fulfil our agreement to have a brigade in Europe before the end of the year. We have no present intention of increasing this force.

We have in the replacement groups and schools sufficient men to meet all estimated wastage and replacements for a considerable time ahead. However, we want a continuous flow of recruits at an average rate somewhat in excess of what we are getting today.

In this connection the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) said in a broadcast last night:

> In building up the strength required to prevent aggression and ensure the peace, there is a duty for everyone. It is not something we can leave to the other fellow.
> We need a steady flow of young men for the highest service of all—whether it be on the battlefields of Korea, on the ramparts of freedom in Europe, or in our own northland.

HOUSING

PROTEST AGAINST PREMATURE PAYMENT OF MORTGAGE MONEY UNDER NATIONAL HOUSING ACT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Resources and Development): Mr. Speaker, on Monday last the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) asked about loans under the National Housing Act to some forty residents of East Kildonan.

I have looked into the matter and I find that these owners made a complaint to the Winnipeg office of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation about two weeks ago. Because the lending institution is the administrator of the mortgages, complaints of this kind are referred by Central Mortgage to the lending institution.

It appears that the dispute between the owners and the builders arises not on account of failure of the lending institution to retain a hold-back because of unfinished work, but rather dissatisfaction by the owners about the quality of work performed by the builder.

The hon. member refers to a protest against the payment of the balance of the mortgage moneys before receiving clearance from the buyers of these homes. At the time of the completion of the sale, each one of these purchasers signed a direction to the lending institution which reads:

> The undersigned hereby declares that the said premises have been accepted from the vendor and irrevocably authorizes the company to pay the proceeds of the said additional loan to . . . the vendor of the property, upon registration of transfer of title to me.

Therefore, it would appear that the buyers were satisfied with the houses at the time of occupation and the complaints are, as I have already suggested, about work which, after occupation, is not satisfactory to the owners.

94699—103½

The hon. member asks what can be done to meet the claim of the purchasers of these homes. The present status is that they may have a claim against the builder for unsatisfactory work, and if so they can proceed against the builder through ordinary channels. There is nothing that the mortgagees can do at this time to assist the owners because no contractual relationship exists between the builder and the mortgagees. Each one of these owners was informed in writing that he must make his own contract with the builder and look after his own interest in this respect.

I should add, however, that should it appear to Central Mortgage that the builder has taken or is taking an unreasonable position against just claims by the owner, then Central Mortgage will be unwilling to approve further loans to the builder.

OLD AGE SECURITY

REGULATIONS UNDER OLD AGE ASSISTANCE AND OLD AGE SECURITY ACTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Have the regulations under the Old Age Assistance Act and the regulations under the Old Age Security Act been made? If so, are they available? If not, when will they be available?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the regulations have been formulated. They will be transmitted, of course, first to the provinces. It is hoped they will be mutually agreed upon well ahead of time, sufficient to permit the operation of the Old Age Assistance Act on the proclamation date.

Mr. Knowles: The minister has answered the question with respect to the regulations under the Old Age Assistance Act. What about the regulations under the Old Age Security Act?

Mr. Martin: I thought my hon. friend was asking about the regulations under the Old Age Assistance Act.

Mr. Knowles: I asked about both.

Mr. Martin: The regulations under the Old Age Security Act will be tabled here as quickly as it is possible so to do.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed, from Monday, December 3, consideration of the motion of Mr.

Robert Cauchon for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Argue.

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, at the adjournment of the debate on Monday we were discussing the amendment of the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue), which was in these terms:

That the following words be added to the address: "This house regrets, however, that Your Excellency's advisers have failed to make provision for the immediate payment to producers of 75 per cent of the initial price of farm stored grain."

I had just completed saying that it was our fond hope, under the circumstances, that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) might be inclined to pull a Pete Karpuk play, and rush out from the bench to the assistance of his teammates. We were very much disappointed. I went home that night sad at heart. The reason I was sad at heart was that I could not help thinking about what the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) probably was doing. I knew that he must have gone home and spent many long sleepless hours saying over and over again to himself, "Oh, where is my wandering boy tonight?" The boy was wandering in more than one sense, I would judge, from what transpired during last week and the early part of this week.

I do not suppose that there is very much we can do about that particular part of the discussion until such time as the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) returns to Ottawa and we find out exactly what is to be done. Let me say, however, that I support the amendment which has been moved by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue). I do so because I think it is a good amendment; I think it is timely and I think the assistance it requests from the government is not only necessary but urgent.

All too often when such matters as those covered by this amendment are brought before the house some members will say, "Here is just one more unjustifiable beef on the part of the western farmers." I know that a good many hon. members are inclined to disregard appeals by western members made from time to time on behalf of their constituents. Perhaps their indifference arises from the fact that they lack firsthand information. They have no knowledge of the facts concerning the conditions under which western farmers are trying to carry on and to do their part in feeding the Canadian people as well as many people in other lands.

Let me point out that there are many things which the Canadian farmers cannot possibly do for themselves, which only the government can accomplish. It is those things about which we speak so often in this house. I am quite sure that no one can say honestly that the farmers of Canada have been given too much help in times past. I doubt if anyone can bring facts to prove such a case. To me it is just as certain that it cannot be honestly said that the farmers have had even a fair deal. In my judgment, they have rarely had a fair deal. Until comparatively recent years the farmers in this country were looked upon as clodhopping work horses who should not grumble as long as body and soul were able to hang together. However, with the growth of farm organizations and commodity pools the situation became somewhat better and since that time governments have been inclined to listen more attentively to the farmers and their requests for justice.

Even with all that, the farmers still are not getting a fair deal as compared with the other component parts of Canada unlimited. I do not need to remind the house of some of the reasons why I make that statement. In the first place, let me name a few things to bring back to the minds of hon. members how the farmers of this country have suffered. At any time when our farmers have been called upon in emergencies they have responded nobly with an all-out effort. I think one of the finest examples of this was their response during the second world war, when, faced with a shortage of labour, with their sons in the army, navy and air force, they carried on and put forth a prodigious effort to produce the necessary foods and commodities so that we could make a real war effort.

In the second place, our farmers have always been prepared to make sacrifices in the national interest. No one can disprove that. Some of us object to the unnecessary and unequal sacrifices which they are often called upon to make. It is just that feeling that activates us in protesting against the inaction of the government with respect to advances on farm-stored grain.

In the third place, down through the years our farmers have been hounded by income tax sleuths under one of the most unfair enforcement programs I have ever heard of anywhere. They have been hounded into making admissions and doing things which have placed an unnecessary burden of taxation upon them. None of us mind paying fair taxes. We do not mind having to make these payments when they are fair and just, but some of the things that have been done in carrying out this enforcement program in western Canada would make you weep.

Farmers out there have been discouraged because of this. It is going to take a long time to regain their confidence.

In the fourth place, our farmers have borne the cost of subsidizing cheap bread for all the Canadian people over a fairly substantial number of years. At the same time they took a beating under the British wheat agreement. When it was finally decided by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) and the government that a partial compensation of $65 million should be made to the farmers we heard complaints all through the house of this "gift" that was being made.

I want to say just a word about some of the newspapers in this country which indicated in large headlines that the government had decided to make a gift of $65 million to the farmers. That was the most unfair insinuation that could possibly be made against a portion of our population which had risen so nobly to the occasion during the war and since. That $65 million was not a gift even in the most extreme view that anyone might take. It was nothing but partial compensation for the losses the farmers had suffered as a result of the subsidization program for cheap bread in Canada and for the beating they took under the British wheat agreement. It was nothing more than a token payment.

An hon. Member: The government did not pay it.

Mr. Low: That is quite true; the government did not pay it, it came out of the taxation of all the people of Canada where it should have come from. Any program of subsidizing ought to be borne fairly and justly by all the people and not by just one-third of the population as was the case here.

The fifth important thing to remember is that as far as my memory goes the farmers have been forced to buy in a protected market the things that they require in order to be able to produce, and have been forced to sell in unprotected markets. As a consequence the farmers of this country have constantly been subjected to a beating under the Canadian tariff. Very little if anything has been done about it and they still must suffer.

The farmers were promised parity prices after the war as a reward for accepting lower than world prices for their wheat and wheat products during the war and afterwards. There is no sign of parity as yet although it is now six years since the war ended. We hope most sincerely that parity prices will come and we should all put forth our best efforts to achieve that result. I feel that in no other way can fair treatment and justice be extended to the farmers of our country.

It seems to me that what is asked for in this statement is quite reasonable. There may be some hon. members who will feel that the 75 per cent asked for is hardly justified, and perhaps that is so. I cannot justify it entirely but I do think it is something to shoot at. But if the government should come forward with a program of advances of something less than 75 per cent of the initial payment, I do not imagine the farmers are going to kick too much, although 75 per cent may possibly be perfectly justified. Keeping in mind that the initial payment for wheat is only a portion of the final price, it seems to me that 75 per cent may not represent too high a percentage by way of advance. Certainly no one can put up a case that would in any way change our minds with respect to the need of some such advance being made.

Let me say a word about one other matter. About ten days ago the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann) was asked if he would announce government policy with respect to the importation into Canada of commercial driers. I think it was understood that there were two types that would be involved. First there was the type that might be brought in by a small co-operative association of farmers as a co-operative enterprise to dry their own wheat. The other type was the kind that would probably be installed by commercial line or pool elevators for the purpose of drying wheat as it came into the elevators. The minister made an announcement as the result of which co-operatives or individuals will be allowed to bring in driers to do co-operative or commercial work, not completely free of duty but on the basis of paying for each month or part of a month that the drier remains in Canada one-sixtieth of the duty that normally would be paid. Under that policy the understanding was that the driers would only be in Canada on lease and would be returnable or exportable at the end of a certain period of time to the country from which they came.

I do not think that is sufficient. We are in an emergency year when there is a tremendous amount of grain that needs to be dried. The grain will spoil if it is not dried soon. If it is left until spring, with the advent of warm weather it is inevitable that a great many thousands and perhaps millions of bushels will never reach the mills in anything like millable condition. In such an emergency year I think the minister would be thoroughly justified in allowing a reasonable number of commercial driers, which would be installed by country elevators, to come into Canada duty free, not just on lease but on purchase. My own feeling is that nobody would criticize action of that kind. The grain has to be dried somewhere and the best place to dry it is where it is first received. Most of the line elevators just have not the drying facilities, and for that reason I think the minister should give careful consideration to allowing such driers to enter the country duty free.

To sum up our attitude, we bespeak for our Canadian farmers only those things that are fair and just. We do not want for them anything that is not fair and just. The farmers should be assured of a return for their efforts that will represent their fair share of the national income. I do not think we should go on year after year imposing conditions upon the country, or allowing conditions to continue, under which our farmers, although they represent perhaps 23 per cent of the population, to receive out of the national income not more than 10 per cent, and in some cases somewhat less than 10 per cent. That condition must not be allowed to continue. If it is, no one can say that justice is being done to Canadian farmers. I want it definitely known that my associates and I strongly support the amendment before the house.

Mr. A. J. Bater (The Battlefords): Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to take part in this debate but some of the efforts being made by opposition members to give the impression that they are the only friends the western farmers have are just a little hard to take, particularly for one whose only occupation is that of a farmer. Liberal members from western Canada are concerned not only about the farmer who has grain in storage which he is possibly not in a position to sell at the present time but also with those whose crop is still under snow. Hon. members know that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) and the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) have constantly been in touch with the problems of this year's harvest and that they are doing something about them. We have had repeated evidence that other ministers, particularly the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier), are doing what they can to help.

Mr. Wylie: Tell us what they are doing.

Mr. Bater: Moreover, hon. members know perfectly well that the Minister of Trade and Commerce is in the west this week concerning this problem and is working on it. I suggest there is no possible excuse for the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) to move such an amendment except a desire to give the impression that he and not the government is deciding the policies of this country. I do not think that is a correct impression, and I believe the proceedings of this house should reflect the situation as it really is. Accordingly I am going to move, seconded by the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Decore):

That all the words in the amendment after the word "regrets" be struck out and the following substituted therefor:
"the serious difficulties encountered by the western farmers in harvesting their crops, and commends Your Excellency's advisers for the continuing attention they have given to the problems caused thereby, and is confident that effective measures will continue to be taken to help the farmers in meeting these problems."

Mr. Wylie: Pretty weak.

Mr. William Bryce (Selkirk): I want to say a few words, and I do not want to get into any argument with my good friend who preceded me. I congratulate him on having the courage to get up and express his views.

Mr. Brooks: "Temerity" is the word.

Mr. Bryce: I am getting so much help I do not know what to do with it. I resent what the hon. member for The Battlefords (Mr. Bater) said about the opposition because I am one of them. I hope there will be that bond of friendship which should exist between all farmers in the west and those in the east, and I think the matter should not be put on the basis of political connivance. I rise to support the amendment moved by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) because I have been in the same position as these poor people are now in western Canada. I say "poor" because anybody is poor, no matter what spirit he may have, if he cannot pay his bills. The hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Sinnott), my next door neighbour, said that there are so many bushels being threshed every day. I am very pleased to hear it.

Mr. Sinnott: Hear, hear; so are we all.

Mr. Bryce: We live in constituencies where God has been good to us. I have lived in my constituency for thirty-two years and there has only been one crop failure. However, there are other poor mortals who have not threshed a bushel yet this year, and I think the government should do something for them. That is why I rise to support the amendment of the hon. member for Assiniboia which reads:

This house regrets, however, that Your Excellency's advisers have failed to make provision for the immediate payment to producers of 75 per cent of the initial price of farm stored grain.

To appreciate the predicament in which these farmers find themselves, one need only to have had a crop lying in the field covered with snow, while the storekeeper is asking for payment of the bills you ran up during the summer. I believe the government should do something for these farmers. I do not want to thresh old straw, but the only way one can be sure of anything is to get up in the house and say you are either for it or against it. I am in favour of the amendment moved by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue).

I should like to take this opportunity to congratulate the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann) upon having the most efficient collection agency in the income tax field in Manitoba. I do not think there is anything that can touch it, and I speak from practical experience. I tried some of the stunts that my colleagues in the house have tried in other provinces, and the department sent for me. They said "You cannot do that". I said "Well, other people are doing it." They said "It does not matter whether or not they are, you cannot do it in Manitoba". Then I suffered a loss from my bee industry, and I charged up that loss. I was told that I could not do that, and I asked why. The department said "If you were a cabinet minister you could charge your loss up to your indemnity, but not when you are just a backbencher." Therefore I was not only stung by my bees, but I was also stung by the tax department.

Mr. McCann: Who told you that?

Mr. Bryce: I have it in black and white. I would not make such a statement unless I could back it up. No other branch can touch the Manitoba branch in collecting income taxes. A lot of credit is due to these officials. They are good civil servants doing a good job. I believe you could go to the Manitoba income tax branch and they could tell you what the 52,000 farmers will be able to pay. Some of the other provincial branches should take a leaf out of their book, and we would not have to pay so much.

Mr. Wylie: You mean the eastern provinces?

Mr. Bryce: Any branch that is not collecting enough taxes, or the taxes that are due. I have a clipping here from the Winnipeg Tribune. It reads as follows:

Farmers, as a group, lead the parade in Manitoba in the amount of income taxes paid, according to the most recent issue of taxation statistics by the Department of National Revenue. Here is the picture as given in the official publication.

Occupation	Number of Taxpayers	Tax Paid
Farmers	6,590	$1,585,000
Medical doctors	390	538,000
Salesmen	1,200	296,000
Lawyers	200	281,000
Dentists	210	168,000
Entertainers	120	20,000
Engineers and architects	10	9,000
Osteopaths, chiropractors	20	8,000
Nurses	100	7,000

These figures account for only a small part of the more than $35,000,000 paid in income tax by individuals in Manitoba in the 1949 taxation year. The list does not include dominion, provincial and municipal government employees, members of the armed services, employees in private business or owners of small businesses. But the figures are nevertheless interesting.

Incidentally it should be added that $268,000 was collected from 160 dead persons in the same year. But as this could hardly be classed as a profession it was not inserted in the above table between lawyers and dentists.

Before leaving this subject I should like to repeat my congratulations to the minister upon having such an efficient collection service in Manitoba.

Mr. Low: You like it, do you?

Mr. Bryce: I have a clear conscience, because they have taken every cent I ever owed. I do not mind that because I believe everybody should pay their income taxes. In my opinion it is the fairest form of taxation. If you do not have the income you do not pay the tax. The taxes of the country have to be paid, and this is a fair way of paying them.

I should like to offer hearty congratulations also to the farmers of Manitoba on the outcome to the plebiscite on November 24. There can be no mistake as to where the farmers of Manitoba stand today. The government called for a referendum to give those who were interested an opportunity of expressing their opinion on the marketing system they wanted for their coarse grains. The farmers have given an emphatic answer, because 89 per cent favoured the wheat board. Perhaps it would save time if I quoted from an editorial appearing in the Manitoba Co-operator of November 29, which is headed "The Producers' Decision". It sums up the situation perhaps better than I can.

Some day perhaps those who weep crocodile tears, and purport to speak with all the sincerity and understanding of the farmers' problems, will realize that the producer is more than ever determined that the commodities he produces shall not furnish the pigskin to hold the balloon juice that inflates a speculative football. He is done with speculative marketing. While many will undoubtedly admit that the wheat board is not a cure-all, and does not solve all the problems in their marketing picture, the farmers of western Canada have no intention of permitting speculative trading to fix the prices they receive for their commodities.

Further down the same editorial says:

It must be with a great deal of pride that the Canadian wheat board recognizes the vote of confidence which they have received from the producers of Manitoba in the referendum. At the same time, it lays a greater degree of responsibility on the Canadian wheat board. Undoubtedly, from time to time, there will be criticism from producers. It is to be anticipated that the board will be receptive to such criticism, so long as it is intended to be constructive.

I believe the wheat board should go much further today and market rye and flax. I have the market reports here, but I shall not put them on the record. The farmers know what they reveal. The fluctuation in flax has been over a dollar within the last three months. The man who was fortunate enough to get his crop threshed received $4.00, while the man who has not got it threshed will receive $5.00 if he ever does get it threshed. This leads me back to the question of stable prices, and I am in favour of them. I hope the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) will have something to say about the drop in the price of eggs. People who have paid high prices all winter for feed for chickens are going to suffer a loss. The government should step in and do something about it.

I do not want to take up any more time, but I should like to assure hon. members that I support the amendment moved by the hon. member for Assiniboia.

Mr. J. S. Sinnott (Springfield): I am speaking on the amendment to the amendment, Mr. Speaker. I should like to read the amendment moved by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) first, then read the amendment to the amendment and give my reasons for speaking against the amendment of the hon. member for Assiniboia, which reads:

That the following words be added to the address: "This house regrets, however, that Your Excellency's advisers have failed to make provision for the immediate payment to producers of 75 per cent of the initial price of farm stored grain."

The amendment to the amendment reads as follows:

That all the words in the amendment after the word "regrets" be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

"the serious difficulties encountered by the western farmers in harvesting their crops, and commends Your Excellency's advisers for the continuing attention they have given to the problems caused thereby, and is confident that effective measures will continue to be taken to help the farmers in meeting these problems."

I support the amendment to the amendment, and I am giving my further reasons as to why I spoke against the amendment moved by the hon. member for Assiniboia. If you will follow it closely, Mr. Speaker, you will find that the amendment does not take into consideration at all those farmers who have their crops under the snow today. It only takes into consideration the payment to farmers who have grain in store now. These members who profess to want to be helpful do not even consider the men who have their grain outside in the snow, but they are willing to help those who already have their grain in store on the farms. I am not in accord with that policy because the poor man who has 400 or 500 bushels in store in the granaries will have little coming to him, while the man who has possibly 40,000 or 50,000 bushels in store—and there are some of those in parts of Saskatchewan—will be getting the big help. In other words the help will be coming to those who need it least. To make a long story short, the man who has his grain outside in the swath is more entitled to help than anybody that I know of; and I hope the government will see to it, after the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) has come back and sized up the situation, that some assistance per acre will be given rather than this assistance to those who have their grain stored in the granaries at the present time.

Mr. Speaker, a campaign has been carried on by certain people in this country to discourage the actions of the wheat board. The hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Bryce), who is a neighbour of mine, touched on the subject a little bit, but I am going to touch on it further and possibly make the situation a bit clearer. Regardless of the campaign that was put on against them, the farmers voted in the coarse grain referendum in Manitoba. In that referendum 67 per cent of those eligible voted; and 89 per cent of those voted for the continued handling of coarse grains through the Canadian wheat board.

To put the situation more clearly may I say this. The hon. member for Selkirk did not speak of his own experience in selling grain this fall, but I am speaking from my own experience. I sold my flax for $4.01 a few days after it was combined. That same flax, six weeks later, was selling for $5.01 net. There is no fairness in an up and down market of that kind. We as farmers and as businessmen do not need to be told by anyone what should be done. From our past experience with regard to the marketing of grain we know that if an enormous amount of tough, damp and feed wheat and coarse grain had been dumped on the market, at the mercy of the grain exchange, our losses would have been colossal to say the least.

The farmers of Manitoba are happy at the present time with the final payments they have received for their coarse grain and the payments they will receive for their 1950-51 wheat crop. The money they are receiving rightly belongs to the growers, and with it going into the pockets of the growers the situation is much more satisfactory than it would be if the money were going into the pockets of those residing on Wellington Crescent and the gamblers of the grain exchange.

An hon. Member: Suppose the market had gone down. What then?

Mr. Sinnott: Those who weep crocodile tears weep them under a cloak, pretending to speak with sympathy and understanding of the farmers' problems. They do not need to inflate the speculative football of the grain exchange any longer. Perhaps it would be better for them to put forth the idea that the consumers of wheat throughout all of Canada would not mind paying another 15 cents a bushel over and above the international wheat agreement price. We, the farmers in western Canada, and all of the people in western Canada do not have a protective wall. We are therefore forced to pay this tariff for almost everything produced in eastern Canada. The majority of the population of Canada resides in Ontario and Quebec. If those people were shown, through the medium of the newspapers and by the people who are responsible, that the farmers are entitled to 15 cents a bushel more for the domestic wheat which is consumed in Canada, I am sure there would be a better understanding between the east and the west. If more of that idea were put forth I am sure—

Mr. Ross (Souris): Why only 15 cents?

Mr. Sinnott: Oh, maybe I should say $1.50. If I were a politician I would say $1.50; but I state facts.

Mr. Ross (Souris): You are a statesman, are you?

Mr. Sinnott: I want to be honest. I do not pretend to be a politician. I try to state the facts as I see them. If I cannot come to this House of Commons and state facts rather than play politics, then I will tell the hon. member for Souris that I do not want to be here at all. There is too much politics played with the people of Canada.

Mr. Ross (Souris): What is the 15 cents based on? What is the comparative figure?

Mr. Sinnott: It is based on the international wheat agreement price, in connection with what we sell as class II wheat. There has to be a happy medium.

Mr. Ross (Souris): That is 50 cents, not 15 cents.

Mr. Sinnott: If you consider the 40 to 50 million bushels of wheat we sell as class II and what we consume in Canada, and couple that with the 200 million bushels we are selling now under the international wheat agreement, I think you will see that my estimate comes pretty close to the mark.

Mr. Bryce: I did not want to interrupt the hon. gentleman when he was speaking, Mr. Speaker, but with your permission I should like to ask him a question. What justification has he for saying that I am not talking from my own practical experience this fall in selling grain?

Mr. Sinnott: From the statement you made today. You quoted from the newspaper.

Mr. Bryce: No, I did not. I want that matter corrected. I quoted the article in the Manitoba Co-operator, what they said about the plebiscite, and what the Winnipeg Tribune said about income tax. I gave my own personal experience with regard to income tax and my own personal experience with regard to selling rye and flax. I hope the hon. member will accept that statement.

Mr. Sinnott: Will you permit me a question? How much did you receive for your flax?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Bryce: I do not think that is a fair question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Sinnott: As a matter of fact, he had no flax.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. As we are not in committee, I do not think this is the time for the asking of questions.

Mr. J. I. Hetland (Humboldt): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a word on the amendment to the amendment. I am opposed to the amendment for one good reason, namely that it does not take in enough territory.

Mr. Wylie: It takes in plenty.

Mr. Hetland: No, it does not. The amendment to the amendment allows the government to give advances to farmers who have not threshed a bushel of grain. The amendment mentions 75 per cent on stored grain. I bought grain for twelve years, and I know that you cannot have grain stored any place on the farm and get an advance on it unless it is dry; and it has to be well housed. Last fall the majority of the farmers threshed their crops damp, and a lot of the grain has a moisture content of 20 per cent. This advance is not going to help any farmer who has tough grain. Therefore it just leaves a small group who will get some benefit from the amendment. But the amendment to the amendment would permit the government to advance money on grain that is in the swath, or that has not even been swathed. These are the people who need help, certainly not the man who has well stored grain that is dry. He does not need help very much. The average man can go to the bank and get an advance, but the man who has his crop in the swath certainly cannot get an advance.

This government have told us several times that they are considering some plan to help the farmers in need. Any plan that is brought forward by this government has to be more or less foolproof. I do not know of anything that would please the opposition more—I will not say all of the opposition, but some of them—than to have some scheme that was not foolproof. What ammunition they would have to use in the next provincial election if the scheme failed. Therefore any scheme that is put forward by the government has to be foolproof.

If we adopted the amendment to the motion we would need an army of inspectors to inspect all the grain. If you went to a farmer and told him that his grain was tough I can just imagine what kind of a reception you would get. All the farmers believe their grain is dry. Naturally that is wishful thinking. The elevator man and the man who went around inspecting would have to test this grain, and would have to tell the farmers that their grain was not fit to justify an advance. Then he would certainly run into a lot of difficulty there.

What about the expense? It is a little different in the United States. The government assumes all the expense in that country, but here the wheat board would have to assume all this expense. And who would pay for it? The farmer himself. It is true that the government is trying to come out with some plan, and I believe when the Minister of Trade and Commerce comes back he will have the O.K. from all our farm organizations. Therefore I am very glad to support the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I rise on a point of order with reference to this alleged subamendment. I submit that it is not an amendment. It is simply a means whereby a further opportunity will be given to members supporting the government to indulge in further back-scratching of the government. As I read the subamendment, it is something that derogates from the subject amended. Before you is a motion to approve the speech from the throne. An amendment is moved to that. This purports to be an amendment to the amendment. Approval of the government can be given by voting in favour of the motion, but this is an extra approval. It provides:

> That all the words in the amendment after the word "regrets" be struck out and the following substituted therefor:
> "the serious difficulties encountered by the western farmers in harvesting their crops, and commends Your Excellency's advisers for the continuing attention they have given to the problems caused thereby, and is confident that effective measures will continue to be taken to help the farmers in meeting these problems."

I submit that what purports to be a subamendment requires no argument. It is in effect not an amendment, but a further motion of approval and approbation of the government and its advisers. I ask Your Honour to rule that it is clearly out of order.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, in support of the point raised by the hon. member for Lake Centre may I quote a sentence from May's Parliamentary Practice, thirteenth edition, at page 291. It reads as follows:

> An amendment to a proposed amendment cannot be moved, if it proposes to leave out all the words of such proposed amendment; but in such a case the first amendment must be negatived before the second can be offered.

It may be argued, Mr. Speaker, on the basis of strict technicality that the amendment of the hon. member for The Battlefords (Mr. Bater) does not strike out all the words of the amendment moved by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) because it does leave in three words: "This house regrets".

Mr. Fournier (Hull): That is the important part of the amendment.

Mr. Knowles: Oh, no. But it does strike out all the substance of the amendment and proposes an alternative proposition, which I submit is not in order for the reasons I have just given, and not in order because it is not relevant to the subject of the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Assiniboia. The hon. member for Assiniboia submitted a distinct proposition. That proposition does not exclude the consideration of other matters such as grain under the snow. It is a distinct proposition with respect to farm stored grain. The amendment of the hon. member for The Battlefords seeks to strike out completely that distinct proposition and substitute another one; and I submit that is out of order on the basis of the citation I just read from page 291 of May's Parliamentary Practice, thirteenth edition, for it would deny to the house the right to vote on my colleague's amendment. While I am on my feet, Mr. Speaker, I might raise a question as to what might be the course from here on; whether or not the result of this amendment, if it were allowed, might be the defeat of the government at the hands of the government's own supporters, because, Mr. Speaker, I think it would be in order to anticipate what might happen.

Mr. Smith (Moose Mountain): Are you worrying about that?

Mr. Knowles: No; I would be very glad to join with my hon. friend in that.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): That would be out of order.

Mr. Knowles: May I point out, Mr. Speaker, that since this amendment has been moved by a government supporter I presume he has support for it in the government ranks, and that one might even anticipate that the subamendment will carry and then the house will have before it the amendment as amended. Since that amendment as amended would be no longer the words of the hon. member for Assiniboia but rather the words of the hon. member for The Battlefords I assume that the hon. member for The Battlefords would get support from his colleagues, and that the amendment as amended would carry. Then, Mr. Speaker, we would have the motion for the address in reply to the speech from the throne amended by the amendment of a private member on the floor of this house; and it is usually understood that unless the motion for the adoption of the address in reply to the speech from the throne carries without amendment it is a vote of non-confidence in the government. Therefore I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that what the hon. member for The Battlefords has done is to set a trap for the supporters of the government. Every Liberal will be faced with the dilemma whether to support his subamendment in the final stage in order to vote for the proposition he has put forward, or whether to vote against it in order to make sure that the motion for an address in reply is not amended, which would mean that the government had been defeated.

Mr. Decore: How do you know?

Mr. Knowles: We will deal with that situation later. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that you should consider the point as to whether it is in order, in view of what I have quoted from May that when an amendment is before the house a proposed subamendment, which is a distinctly different proposition, should only come forward after the original proposition has been dealt with.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): First, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre stated that it would be out of order because the hon. member for The Battlefords had erased the amendment of the hon. member for Assiniboia, but he did make the remark that the important words of the amendment are that somebody regrets something. We left that regret in.

Mr. Knowles: Whom does the hon. member mean by "we"? I thought it was the hon. member for The Battlefords (Mr. Bater) who moved the subamendment.

Mr. Fraser: He and the rest of the cabinet.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I just learned of the amendment to the amendment when it was brought into the house, and I can assure hon. members that I was not a party to it when it was brought in. However, I like to discuss these points of order, especially when they are discussed by such learned confrères as the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). It has been pointed out that the taking away of all the words after the word "regrets" would be out of order, because it would be foreign to the amendment, and in support of the hon. member's contention he cities May.

Well, perhaps I might be permitted to cite Beauchesne, whose work is recognized as an authority here, and who says that an amendment to an amendment should not enlarge upon the scope of the amendment, but should deal with matters that are not covered by the amendment.

We are not enlarging upon the amendment. The first amendment moved was an expression of regret that the government had failed, so it is alleged, to pay 75 per cent of the initial price of farm stored grain. We say we do regret the plight of western farmers; everybody does. I cannot see why hon. gentlemen opposite would object to expressing that regret publicly in the house, so as to show these farmers the sympathy we all have for them.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Well, I do not know if an expression of regret by these gentlemen is a matter for laughter. I do not take it that way.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): We want to see more than expressions of regret.

Mr. Fraser: We want action.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): You are acting every day, but with very little result. We are doing the best we can, and we are telling these farmers in the subamendment that we know about the serious difficulties encountered by western farmers in harvesting their crops.

The two amendments relate to the same subject matter, but in a different way. We do not express regret in the amendment to the amendment that the government has not paid 75 per cent of the initial price of farm stored grain, which could not be delivered to the elevators, but we say here that this house commends His Excellency's advisers "for the continuing attention they have given to the problems caused thereby, and are confident that effective measures will continue to be taken to help the farmers in meeting these problems."

Mr. Ross (Souris): You wish them well.

Mr. Knowles: Explain.

Mr. Diefenbaker: A confession of confidence.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): This subamendment gives a good many explanations—

Mr. Fraser: You mean it needs a good many.

Mr. Knowles: But no help to the farmers.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): If hon. members will look at citation 371 in Beauchesne's third edition perhaps they will be satisfied as to the legality or the propriety of the subamendment. This citation reads:

A subamendment which proposed an alternative to the original amendment is in order provided it is relevant to the question.

Mr. Knowles: "Provided it is relevant".

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Would the hon. member say that this subamendment is not relevant to the plight of the western farmers? The only difference is that we do not fix an amount that we agree to pay to these farmers.

Mr. Ross (Souris): You do not offer any help.

Mr. Knowles: Would you like an answer?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): No. The subamendment is certainly relevant to the question, because in the speeches to which I have listened on this question there has been an expression of regret that these farmers will suffer, especially during this season, if something is not done right now. The subamendment moved by the hon. member for The Battlefords goes into that same question. On that point of relevancy I submit the subamendment is in order.

Mr. Knowles: May I have a moment to answer the comments of the Minister of Public Works, and his attempt to argue that the subamendment is relative to the amendment. I based my objection to it on the citation I read from page 291 of May's thirteenth edition. The Minister of Public Works has based his defence of the amendment to the amendment on citation 371 in Beauchesne's third edition. But I have emphasized the last few words of that citation, where it states that a subamendment which proposes an alternative to the original amendment is in order "provided it is relevant to the question". The amendment of the hon. member for Assiniboia is that such and such a thing should be done with respect to farm stored grain. There may be other problems facing the farmers of western Canada, but his amendment deals only with that one problem and submits a distinct proposition as to what should be done about it.

On the other hand the subamendment raises a different question altogether. By the process of an expanded negative it simply wipes out the proposition set forth by the hon. member for Assiniboia, denying the house any chance to vote on it, and substitutes something quite different. As a matter of fact what it wipes out is a substantial proposition that something be done for the farmers, and what it substitutes is a pious expression of sympathy. I submit it is not relevant at all. It is a substitution of an alternative which is quite different. If it had been added to the amendment, it might have been in order. It certainly would be in order as a proposition for presentation after the first amendment has been disposed of. But as to the matter of relevancy I am sure the Minister of Public Works realizes that it just does not qualify.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Oh, no.

Mr. Speaker: When the subamendment was moved I must admit to the house that I was quite concerned as to whether it was in order, even though considerable latitude is traditionally allowed in amendments to the address in reply. During the interval I have endeavoured to look up the precedents. Hon. members will realize that I have had only a limited time at my disposal in which to do so.

Hon. members who have taken part in the discussion of the question as to whether or not the subamendment is in order have first faced the question of its relevancy. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) has said that the subamendment is not relevant to the amendment, in its present form.

The amendment reads:

"This house regrets, however, that Your Excellency's advisers have failed to make provision for the immediate payment to producers of 75 per cent of the initial price of farm stored grain."

The subamendment reads:

"This house regrets the serious difficulties encountered by the western farmers in harvesting their crops, and commends Your Excellency's advisers for the continuing attention they have given to the problems caused thereby, and is confident that effective measures will continue to be taken to help the farmers in meeting these problems."

The Minister of Public Works referred to citation 371 in Beauchesne's third edition, which reads:

A subamendment which proposed an alternative to the original amendment is in order provided it is relevant to the question.

One important question I must decide is that raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). It has been argued that the amendment deals with one question only and that the subamendment does not refer specifically to that matter. It seems to me that the subamendment is wide enough to include the question which is brought forward by the main amendment. In view of the fact that the subamendment does include the question raised by the main amendment I do not see how it could be irrelevant to the main amendment, within the meaning of citation 371 of Beauchesne's third edition.

Hon. members will realize that during the debate on the speech from the throne I have allowed considerable latitude in the amendments which have been proposed, and I feel that I shall have to allow the subamendment to stand on the question of relevancy.

The further question has been raised that the subamendment strikes out most of the words of the amendment. During the time I have had to look into this question I find that a similar motion was moved on April 13, 1899, and I refer to volume XXXIV of the Journals for 1899, page 55, as follows:

Mr. Clark moved in amendment, seconded by Mr. Hale, that the following paragraph be added to the said proposed motion, viz:

"10. That this house deems it expedient to inform His Excellency that in view of the widespread charges of incapacity, misconduct and corruption in the administration of public affairs connected with the Yukon, it is the duty of the government to appoint, without delay, an independent judicial commission to make a thorough investigation into that subject and report the result;"

And the question on the amendment being proposed;

Mr. Bertram moved, in amendment to the said proposed amendment, seconded by Mr. Bourassa, that all the words after the second "that" in the amendment be left out,—

Hon. members will realize that up to that point the subamendment moved in 1899 was similar to the subamendment which has been proposed today.

—and the words "we have observed with pleasure that on receipt of complaints against some of the officials in the Yukon district, His Excellency's government took prompt action to enquire into the matter of such complaints by appointing Mr. William Ogilvie as a commissioner for that purpose. Having entire confidence in the integrity and ability of Mr. Ogilvie, we are satisfied that his enquiry will be impartial and thorough, and that it will place His Excellency's advisers in possession of all information necessary to enable them to do justice to all parties concerned," inserted instead thereof;

I have not been able to find a parallel case or a ruling contrary to the one given at that time and while, as I have said, I have some doubt, I feel that, in view of my finding on relevancy and of the precedent of 1899 which I have just referred to, I should allow the subamendment to stand.

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): I regret that the hon. member for The Battlefords (Mr. Bater) has moved this subamendment. It is not that I object to the wording of the subamendment as being something to which we might not devote some time, but the fact is that an affirmative vote for the subamendment, which is almost sure to result, will eliminate any opportunity of voting upon the proposition that an advance of 75 per cent of the initial price be made to farmers for grain stored on the farm. In my opinion it is a disservice to our farmers for a western member of parliament to move such a pious amendment and by so doing prevent a vote on a proposition which is so important to the welfare of western Canada at this time. The Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier) said the amendment would then read:

This house regrets the serious difficulties encountered by the western farmers in harvesting their crops—

What earthly good is it for this house to say it regrets that a serious situation exists? The farmers do not want sympathy from parliament; they want action from the government.

The hon. member for Humboldt (Mr. Hetland) has said that the amendment asking for an advance of 75 per cent on farm stored grain did not go far enough. When I was considering the substance of my own amendment I considered whether or not I should add to it an indication of want of confidence in the government for not making provision for financial assistance to farmers in connection with grain under the snow. I did not add that feature to my amendment for what I considered was a good reason. On November 15 the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) replied to a question of mine, and I quote from page 1041 of Hansard as follows:

I have stated before that the government is actively considering the problem of wheat, oats and barley that are still in the fields. Representatives of the Department of Trade and Commerce and the Canadian wheat board are in western Canada at the present time exploring the situation with the wheat pools and with elevator companies, and I hope very shortly to be able to announce a method of financing wheat that could not be harvested.

I was willing to take the word of the Minister of Trade and Commerce that the government was dealing and would deal with the matter of providing assistance for farmers who have grain under the snow. Any suggestion by the hon. member for Humboldt that my amendment does not go far enough merely indicates that the hon. member has no faith in the announcement by the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I did not think it was necessary to move a subamendment saying this house regrets that the government has not decided to do a particular thing when the government, through a responsible minister, announced to parliament a short time ago that action would be taken along those lines. The hon. member for Humboldt said that the amendment to the amendment would enable the government to advance money on crops out under the snow. Of course the government does not need an amendment to the amendment or a motion by parliament to advance money on crops under snow. The government has ample power now to make that provision, and it certainly has the power to introduce legislation for that purpose. The hon. member for Humboldt (Mr. Hetland) went on to cite difficulties that would stand in the way of a 75 per cent advance payment on farm stored grain. He was opposed to it, and he gave his reasons. He said it would be an expense to the wheat board. But it would not need to be an expense to the wheat board if the government brought in proper legislation to make such a provision. If adequate legislation were brought in it would not mean any expense to western farmers. This is an emergency. The farmers need emergency action, and to suggest that necessary emergency action should be a further burden on the farmers of the west is not doing them a service.

The hon. member for Humboldt raised another bogeyman. He said that money could not be lent on tough grain. You can sell tough grain and get a good price for it. You can sell damp grain and get a pretty good price for it.

Mr. Hetland: You cannot get an advance on damp grain.

Mr. Argue: You cannot get an advance on anything from this government. That is what I am complaining about. You could under the terms of the amendment I moved, even though the hon. member for Humboldt is objecting to an advance on farm stored grain. The hon. member for The Battlefords (Mr. Bater), by moving an amendment to the amendment and getting the support of the cabinet, has prevented the house taking a decision on the question of an advance on farm-stored grain. In the first part of the subamendment he regrets the serious difficulties encountered by the western farmers in harvesting their crops. We all regret that. It is hardly necessary to put it in an amendment. Then the subamendment continues:

> . . . and commends Your Excellency's advisers for the continuing attention they have given to the problems caused thereby—

I do not mind their giving continuing attention to this matter or anything else. We do not want merely continuing attention; we want action. The last part of the subamendment reads:

> —and is confident that effective measures will continue to be taken to help the farmers in meeting these problems.

I say that effective measures have not been taken, and for that reason I will certainly vote against the subamendment. As I said at the outset, I regret sincerely that a western member, with the help and support of other western Liberal members, in the face of the critical situation confronting the farmers of western Canada, would endeavour by this method to prevent parliament from voting on a proposition that is absolutely necessary for their welfare.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I rise to say that I support the amendment moved by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue), after having listened to the arguments presented by the various members who have spoken in this debate. I am one of those members who are not very well informed about the details of the wheat marketing situation, but I think members who have spoken in favour of the amendment have given valid reasons for the government taking such action. I also think that, according to reports we have read in the press of the statement by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), the amendment is not far out of line with government policy.

When the hon. member for Assiniboia was speaking the other evening I am sure a good many members were interested in the figures he presented dealing with the income tax collected from farmers in various provinces of Canada. I am sure many of us were much concerned with the apparent disparity in the amounts of tax collected. I am one of a goodly number of members in the house who look forward with some interest to an explanation of those figures on the part of the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann). I am not going to say any more on that point at this time because sometimes explanations can be given for bare figures that present a somewhat different picture.

The amendment largely has to do with something that concerns the life of the body. I am going to take the opportunity presented by this debate to deal with something that I consider concerns the life of the spirit, and a good many other persons in Canada are of the same opinion. I want to speak for a few minutes on a matter that is of great concern to many of my constituents and other Canadians at this time. It is a matter that is of great concern to the members of this group. I refer to the mystery surrounding the possible release of the former nazi general, Kurt Meyer.

I am anxious to express the anxiety of this group because we know a large number of Canadians are concerned about this question. All members of the group for whom I am speaking have received resolutions from trade unions, Canadian Legion branches, women's organizations, and also quite a number of letters. In addition, the press generally throughout Canada has shown in various editorials considerable concern, and with respect to my own constituency editorials in the press have expressed similar concern. In this, the press is reflecting the concern and opinion of a large number of Canadian people. I was interested to receive only yesterday a letter from a Canadian of French descent in my constituency who is over 75 years of age, a man on whose logging sleds I used to ride as a boy forty-five years ago. He writes quite a touching letter to me. He cannot understand why, if this man has been sentenced as a war criminal and in view of what has been suffered by Canadians as a result of his actions, there is a possibility of his being released.

It is because of that concern that I feel justified in taking a few minutes to deal with this very important matter. I must explain before proceeding that it is not a question of a vindictive attitude toward a person or an enemy. This is a matter that concerns the Canadian people from the point of view of justice, the principles we have declared from time to time in this house and throughout the country, and from the point of view of national policy. It is on that basis I wish to make some representations this afternoon. The concern of the Canadian people has been considerably increased as a result of the newspaper account written by Mr. Douglas How, Canadian Press correspondent, dealing with the fact that Kurt Meyer had been given several days holiday from prison in Germany. In view of the concern of the Canadian public as a whole, I think parliament and the people of Canada are entitled to a frank and complete statement from the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) before this session ends. Only something of that nature can allay the fears of many persons throughout the country.

In order to bring the picture into focus within the compass of one very short speech, I want to review briefly the developments in connection with this matter. I find that the question was first raised by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) in the external affairs committee of 1946. At that time he brought to the attention of the committee the fact that the War Measures Act had expired, and that it was quite possible that the release of Kurt Meyer could be obtained because he was formally held under the terms of that act. I judge from a reading of that evidence, and a reading of Hansard of a slightly later date, that it was because of the alertness of the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) that shortly afterwards the government introduced the War Crimes Act.

I am going to read briefly from the debate in connection with that act. At page 4382 of Hansard for 1946 the hon. member for Lake Centre had this to say in dealing with the question:

> In other words, while now the minister takes the view that these regulations were drafted as part and parcel of international law, or under the powers of His Majesty under royal warrant, the regulations provided that they were drafted entirely under the War Measures Act with the result—at least so I contended—that in view of the fact that penalties under the War Measures Act were restricted to five years or a fine of $2,000, no statute could grant to a subsidiary measure by way of order in council passed thereunder the power to impose a heavier penalty. Among others, Kurt Meyer, a prisoner in Dorchester penitentiary, might have made an application to the courts for the purpose of determining that his imprisonment was illegal and, as a result, the doors of that penitentiary might have been opened, should the court find that an illegal sentence, beyond that provided for under the War Measures Act, had been imposed.
> While the minister has said there was an opinion from the Department of Justice that such a possibility was not a probability, I would point out that in giving evidence on the matter before the committee on external affairs the deputy minister of justice said he had no doubt that a forceful argument could be made in support of the contention that I advanced to the contrary.

So I presume, Mr. Speaker, that Canadians generally have to thank the alertness of the hon. member for Lake Centre for the fact that Kurt Meyer is not free today.

Proceeding with a short review of this case, I find that I raised the question on March 2 of this year during a debate on the Defence Production Act, as a result of receiving a number of representations from individuals, trade unions and the Legion. I did not get very far, as I was ruled out of order. I was able to express my views only briefly. Then on October 19 the question of Meyer's release was raised by the hon. member for Lake

Centre, and on October 22 the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) replied. The hon. members for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) and Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) also asked certain questions.

Then on November 26, the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) spoke on this question on a point of privilege. His remarks were based on a newspaper report by Douglas How of the Canadian Press. The same day the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Campney) made a statement. I am not going to read his reply in full, but in part he had this to say, as recorded at page 1301 of Hansard:

> Mr. Speaker, the fact is that Kurt Meyer was transferred to a British prison at Werl in Germany —a prison which is operated for the punishment of war criminals convicted by Great Britain. While he was so transferred for purposes of incarceration, as the Minister of National Defence said at page 245 of Hansard, he remains under the control of the government of this country so far as sentence is concerned, and any release—that is, permanent release—would be within the jurisdiction of this government.

A few days later a Reuters news dispatch in reporting the reply of Anthony Eden to a question in the British House of Commons stated that Canada was not asked about Meyer. This press dispatch reads as follows:

> Foreign Secretary Anthony Eden was asked in the House of Commons Monday if the Canadian government was consulted or informed before the former nazi General Kurt Meyer was released on compassionate leave in the British zone of Germany.
> He replied that it was not, but a Canadian order in council had previously enacted that Meyer—sentenced to life imprisonment by a Canadian military court for ordering the murder of 18 Canadians—would be dealt with in the same way as the other prisoners detained at Werl.
> He added that Meyer was released from Werl prison on seven days' compassionate leave. The granting of leave for strong compassionate reasons or to attend to urgent family business was recognized German penal practice which applied to war criminals of the Werl.

My point in that connection is that the parliamentary assistant's answer indicated that Kurt Meyer was under the control of the Canadian government. Here we find that he was released temporarily without the Canadian government being consulted. It is obvious that, regardless of the statement made by the parliamentary assistant, Kurt Meyer is in a German prison under the control of the German government, which prison is operated according to German regulations.

The Canadian people are concerned as to the identity of the parties who applied for the release of this former nazi general. On October 22 the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) informed the house that the German ambassador-designate had discussed the question of this man's release with certain officials of the Department of External Affairs on October 15. Apparently the German ambassador-designate was making representations on behalf of the German government for the release of Kurt Meyer while the ladies' auxiliaries of the Legion in this country were preparing for the sale of poppies on November 11, and while the veterans' organizations of this country were making preparations to pay their annual tributes to the war dead of Canada.

I believe it would be wise to put on the record, because newpapers are easily lost and a good many Canadians are confused in connection with this case by what has been said in so many quarters, what the prosecutor of Meyer has to say. In this respect I am going to quote briefly from an article in the Globe and Mail of December 3, 1951. This article is entitled "Prosecutor of Meyer supports conviction". It reads:

> Bruce J. S. Macdonald, now Windsor's crown attorney, issued a statement in which he said he was supported by Clarence Campbell, president of the National Hockey League, and Mr. Macdonald's assistant at the war crimes trials.
> The statement follows:
> "It was not my intention to say anything about the return of Kurt Meyer to Germany. There has been much uninformed public comment about the whole matter which could be ignored.
> However, the statement volunteered by Lt. Col. Dalton Dean of Haileybury, who assisted me at the trial, does call for consideration. I have been in touch with Lt. Col. C. S. Campbell, MBE, K.C., of Montreal, who was assistant prosecutor at the trial, and we are in complete agreement in the following expression of our views.
> It will be recalled that Meyer was charged with the commission of five war crimes. On only four he could be convicted (one being an alternative.) He was found guilty of three of the four possible charges and acquitted on the remainder.
>
> He was convicted of inciting and counselling troops to deny quarter. This occurred prior to their commitment in action.
>
> The evidence came from German personnel and was amply sufficient to justify conviction in any civil court.
> The other two convictions had to do with the shooting of 18 Canadian prisoners at Meyer's own headquarters at a distance of only 100 metres from his command post.
> The evidence of a German eyewitness was that seven of these prisoners were individually executed by a senior NCO at the headquarters following their interrogation by Meyer's adjutant.
> This immediately followed the open statement by Meyer to the adjutant and others present that 'in future we will take no prisoners and a sotto voce conversation between them.
>
> On this unshaken testimony and much corroborative evidence of a circumstantial character, the court, consisting of five of Canada's most experienced and distinguished field commanders, found Meyer guilty.
> The finding and death sentence imposed by the court were then confirmed by the convening officer, Major-General Vokes. Later, after all the presentations had been completed for the execution, General

Vokes, as senior theatre commander, for reasons then given, commuted the sentence to life imprisonment.

As I said before, Mr. Speaker, large numbers of Canadians are concerned about this matter, because it is something that is a sort of symbolic act; I refer to the possible release of Kurt Meyer. I understand that the national officers of the Canadian Legion have made representations in this connection. In a recent issue of the Globe and Mail I read the following:

The executive of the dominion command of the Canadian Corps Association said last night in a resolution that the release of Kurt Meyer, German war criminal, "under any circumstances," would be a direct insult to present or past members of the Canadian armed forces.

In my own district I know that some of the largest branches have recently had meetings on this question and have forwarded resolutions to our provincial command urging that they ask for a further and immediate investigation into this case. In addition to that, trade unions, women's organizations and a large number of individuals have written to members of this house expressing their opinions in this case. It is obvious, Mr. Speaker, that there has been some continuous effort to release Meyer. I quote briefly from the Gazette of November 30, which has an article entitled "Meyer All but Freed says Ex-Nazi's Journal". The article was by Douglas How; and incidentally, Douglas How is a reliable Canadian Press correspondent. The article reads as follows:

A new German monthly paper, published by former S.S. (elite guard) troops, said today Kurt Meyer came within a hair's breadth of being released by Canada this year.

In its first issue, the paper says Meyer—a major-general in Hitler's S.S. during the war wrote his wife from Dorchester, N.B., penitentiary last March that he expected to be released soon.

It says further that an Aurich lawyer named Schatt almost managed to get Meyer out of prison this year "but there are circles in Canada who know how to stop an innocent man from getting his freedom."

In addition, Mr. Speaker, it is obvious that anyone who read the press dispatch in the Gazette of November 26, forwarded by Mr. Douglas How, of his interview with Kurt Meyer, will realize that this man is completely unchanged. In my opinion he is an unregenerate nazi. On being questioned as to his opinion of Hitler, here is what he said. He was asked:

Do you still think Hitler was right?

His answer was:

The past is dead. History is its own answer about that. I live for the future.

He completely avoids the issue. Then he goes on to give answers which indicate that he is still a German general, that he still looks at life as a military man and has that point of view. He mentions that the western powers cannot afford to have a soft youth, and so on. In addition to that, friends of mine tell me that the troops who were guarding him when he was a prisoner in Germany, prior to his coming to Canada in 1945, had discussions with him and found that he was a fanatical nazi; that when they tried to talk with him and discuss the foolishness of the nazi faith he would say, "Oh, the thing is that you men never met the fuehrer." In releasing a man such as Kurt Meyer, Mr. Speaker, I think it is quite obvious that we would not be releasing a man who would make any contribution, in the moral or the spiritual sense, to the defence of democracy.

I am not going to speak at much greater length. In Canadian papers there are many editorials in connection with this case, and I am just going to quote briefly from the one in the Citizen of November 29, because I think that brief editorial expresses the general Canadian attitude extremely well indeed. It is entitled "The Kurt Meyer Riddle" and reads as follows:

Even before the government quietly transferred the nazi war criminal, Kurt Meyer, from a Canadian prison to one in the British zone of western Germany, there had been doubts as to its ultimate intentions respecting this man. Was it or was it not intended that he should be released in order to serve in a western European army? This question has never been answered.

Before proceeding further with the reading of the editorial I should like to draw to the attention of the house the fact that within two or three years of the conclusion of the first world war the German general staff had a dominant influence in the Weimar republic. But we must not forget that on the last visit to Ottawa of the late Field Marshal Wavell he said in a public address: In my opinion the greatest danger to peace in the future is a reorganized German general staff. In any efforts to utilize the democratic forces in Germany that are willing to assist us in the defence of freedom, I trust that we do not on any account support any proposals or any actions that would tend to the rebuilding of the German general staff.

I continue reading the editorial:

On October 22, Mr. Claxton assured the House of Commons that Meyer continued to be "under the control and jurisdiction of Canada," that he could not be released without the express authority of the Canadian government. The minister, however, did not deny outright the suggestion that the former nazi general might be allowed to take a command in a European army. All that Mr. Claxton said then was that "it would be impossible for him to do so, as he is still serving the sentence of life imprisonment imposed upon him."

It now transpires that Meyer has been allowed out of prison to visit his family. A British—not Canadian—source says that this temporary release was granted on "compassionate grounds." The government has promised to find out and tell parliament what are the regulations in this British prison as to treatment of inmates. When the government does this, it might answer the question it has so long evaded: Does it intend to release Meyer?

Until this question is answered, many Canadians will continue to fear that a commander of SS troops found responsible for the murder of Canadian prisoners is to be given his freedom. That such a man should be set free to serve in NATO forces is an intolerable proposition to almost everyone except the communists, who would be handed a choice piece of anti-democratic propaganda.

The government can settle this uncertainty quite easily. All that is required is a statement that under no circumstances will Meyer be released.

The release of Kurt Meyer for use in a future German army is, I am sure, in the opinion of the majority of the Canadian people completely morally indefensible. On that basis, if Hitler were alive we could seek his support as an ally in the defence of freedom. Just let us realize, Mr. Speaker, that if this man were released and assumed command of a German division, under the terms of military law Canadian troops serving in Germany would be required to salute this German war criminal when passing him on the street. I am sure there are a great number of Canadians who do not view that situation with any relish.

Mr. Speaker, in view of the circumstances and in view of the concern felt by the Canadian people, the release of Kurt Meyer would be an offence against the memory of our gallant dead. It would be an offence and an outrage against their sorrowing next of kin. It would show a complete lack of consideration of the efforts made and the fighting done by the veterans of this country in two great wars. It would mean the complete disregard of the opinion of the great majority of the Canadian people. His release would be a violation of our declared democratic principles and practices. As a policy it would have, psychologically, most unfortunate effects. It would affect the morale of the Canadian people. It would affect their confidence and faith in our democratic cause. In my opinion, Mr. Speaker—and I speak with some heat on this question—in the long run democracy and freedom can only be satisfactorily defended by people who believe in freedom. Public concern demands from the minister before this session ends a complete and frank statement concerning this whole question. Only that will allay the fears of the Canadian people at this time.

In conclusion I say that if we have faith in freedom's truth, let us prove it by our acts.

Mr. John Decore (Vegreville): I rise to make a few brief remarks in regard to the subamendment before the house. As a member coming from western Canada I appreciate the difficulty the farmers are facing today with regard to their grain. One of these difficulties is that a lot of the grain that has been threshed is stored on the farm, and the farmer is not able to sell it owing to lack of facilities. But that is not the only difficulty. In introducing his amendment to the main motion no doubt the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) had this in mind. But I say that, although a serious problem, it is not the main problem that faces the farmer in western Canada today. The farmer is western Canada has had similar difficulties in previous years. He has also had a lot of grain on hand, but through the facilities of our wheat board he has been able to sell his grain eventually. No doubt the same thing will happen at this time.

The main problem that faces the farmer in western Canada today is that, according to the last figures I have, in the province of Alberta some 230 million bushels of grain are still lying under the snow. In Saskatchewan there are some 90 million bushels of wheat and 14 per cent of the coarse grain; in Manitoba, which is probably the most fortunate province, there is about $8 million worth of grain under the snow. The province of Alberta is probably in the worst position. That applies to Saskatchewan as well. In these two provinces we have a lot of grain that has not been threshed. That is the condition with which the farmer is faced today. It is something that happened owing to the weather, conditions beyond his control. For that reason the subamendment is moved, and I shall read it once again:

This house regrets the serious difficulties encountered by the western farmers in harvesting their crops, and commends Your Excellency's advisers for the continuing attention they have given to the problems caused thereby, and is confident that effective measures will continue to be taken to help the farmers in meeting these problems.

That is the position in which we find ourselves today. We have had assurances from the members of the cabinet in the house from time to time, and I notice that according to the Winnipeg Free Press of December 1 the Minister of Trade and Commerce made a statement in Calgary before the Alberta wheat pool. This is what he said in part:

The minister in charge of grain marketing said at the annual meeting of the Alberta wheat pool he is prepared to recommend legislation for interim credit for farmers with unthreshed grain and those who, for one reason or another, have been unable to deliver their grain to country elevators.

When we have this statement, if it is the statement the minister made, certainly there is no reason why the hon. member for Assiniboia should express regret in this house in the amendment that is before us now. I know the hon. member for Assiniboia was not very happy when the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) went out west. No doubt some of my Social Credit friends from Alberta were not very happy when he went to Alberta.

Mr. Wylie: We have no worry.

Mr. Decore: The hon. member for Assiniboia was not very happy when the Minister of Trade and Commerce made this statement which I have just read; but the fact remains that this government is interested in the problems of the western farmers, and for that reason I am in favour of the subamendment.

Mr. Robert Fair (Battle River): When I came into the house this afternoon I intended to speak for a few minutes in support of the amendment moved by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) on Monday, which reads as follows:

This house regrets, however, that Your Excellency's advisers have failed to make provision for the immediate payment to producers of 75 per cent of the initial price of farm stored grain.

I believe this amendment is quite sound, regardless of the fact that the hon. member for Humboldt (Mr. Hetland) says it is not possible to get an advance on tough grain. Advances have been given on tough grain before, can be given now and will be given again. Possibly that is one method of clearing his conscience. However, they will have some questions to answer later on.

I find that the mover of the subamendment is my neighbour to the east, just the meridian separating us, and the seconder happens to be immediately west; but I have to disagree with both in the interests of farmers in western Canada. The subamendment reads as follows:

This house regrets the serious difficulties encountered by the western farmers in harvesting their crops—

Let me pause there for a moment. A little help would be a whole lot better than a lot of sympathy. While the farmers in the west have had sympathy over the past number of years, since I came to the country and before, a little help would be much more appreciated. The amendment continues:

—and commends Your Excellency's advisers for the continuing attention they have given to the problems caused thereby,—

In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, there is nothing whatever to commend there, because while they have been looking on, nothing, nothing, nothing has been done up to the present time. If anybody has any doubts about things being done up to the present time let him read in the Ottawa Citizen of yesterday an article under the heading: "U.K. wants wheat but none ready." This is by Frank Swanson, Citizen parliamentary writer, and it reads as follows:

Agriculture Minister Gardiner said last night that Britain would take more high grade wheat from Canada if Canada could provide it.

Just back from Europe and talks with British food officials, Mr. Gardiner said that the only thing that was preventing Canada selling more wheat to Britain was the lack here. With much of the 1951 crop lying in the fields of western Canada under snow, it's just not available now.

"At the present time, Britain is taking all the wheat she can get from us and is prepared to take more. But we have not got the supplies available to ship them. Britain wants the wheat right now, not next spring when the grain out in the fields should be available," he said.

While in Britain, Mr. Gardiner talked with Lord Woolton, lord president of the council, and with the new Conservative agriculture minister, Major Sir Thomas Lionel Dugdale. He also talked with Right Hon. Gwilym Lloyd George, new minister of food.

The U.K. needed food shipments generally, he said, and was particularly in need of more wheat products. But she was finding difficulty in finding the dollars to pay for more food.

The British food ministry last summer indicated the U.K. would be interested in making additional purchases of high grade wheat from this country, outside the international wheat agreement.

"The U.K. is still interested but we just haven't got the wheat to sell right now," he said in an interview.

May I comment on that and on the central part of the amendment which I read, Mr. Speaker. It is well known that for many months individuals and farm organizations in western Canada have been prodding the government, trying to get some action with respect to moving the crop out of the elevators in the west and into delivery position at the head of the lakes. Because of that I understand that the wheat board had had difficulty in getting sufficient grain to fulfil their commitments. Had the government been looking after the interests of the farmer I believe sufficient storage space would have been available in western Canada to take care of much of the crop that was held up and is still stored on the farms. At the present time we have millions of bushels of millable wheat needed by Great Britain remaining on the farms of western Canada. Because of the lack of space at the head of the lakes, the lack of box cars and of ships to move that grain, it is not in a position in which it can be delivered. So for the time being we are losing the sale of at least a portion of our wheat.

The amendment to the amendment continues:

—and is confident that effective measures will continue to be taken to help the farmers in meeting these problems.

I have pointed out that up to the present time no effective measures have been taken. Those of us in this group, the Social Crediters, cannot be true to our constituents by supporting a do-nothing policy. In effect that is what government policy has been up to the present time. We have been told that the world needs food, and Canada has been asked to do its share in supplying that food. I feel the farmers of Canada have been doing everything possible in times of pressure to fulfil that requirement. But because of government policy there has been withheld from the farmers a proper share of the national income, proper prices for the things they produce, as well as allowances through tariffs and other means whereby they are charged exorbitant prices for the things they have to buy. If the farmers took the same position as many other occupational groups have taken they would go on strike. That, of course, is not the nature of farmers, and I am not for one moment advocating that they should do so. But had they taken the same stand as many other occupational groups we would not have the production we are having today. When conditions are made satisfactory for the farmers we can look for much greater production.

I do not think it is necessary for me to say much more at this time. I have already spoken twice in the debate on the address in reply. The high cost of living is another condition about which the government has not done much. The single thing they intended to do this session was to bring in legislation dealing with the prevention of price fixing by manufacturers and suppliers. Since that has now been referred to a committee and, so far as we can see, will not be dealt with at the present session, this government has not taken one single step to bring down the cost of living.

Some people are taking undue advantage of the situation. With the exception of the price of hot dogs which, I see, has been reduced to the extent of 5 cents from the 20 cents being charged, the prices in the restaurants on Sparks street are not coming down. To make up for that, perhaps, some of those restaurants are taking advantage of another gyp game by using tea bags time after time, so that the fourth or fifth user of a tea bag gets no colour whatsoever in the water put in the teapot.

In my opinion this represents a danger to the health of the people in this city. I am not sure whether the practice which I shall now describe is being followed in other places, but I have been told by people who have been supplied with these used tea bags that it is done down on Sparks street. It is customary for many people to stir the tea bag with a spoon, to dip the spoon into the teapot and stir the contents in an effort to get a little juice out of the tea bag. Then they eat ice cream or some other dessert, using the same spoon, and by that method they are in danger of contracting some disease from which a former user of the tea bag might have been suffering. I say the city health inspectors should act as they have on other occasions, and check some of these irregularities now taking place.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I hear groans, but I take it the government has to take full responsibility for those groans. I have only a few comments to make. It has been most interesting to note what has happened in the last three days, to look back for instance to what happened in this chamber on Monday evening when there was a sense of what, to the uninitiated like myself, looked like something approaching panic, if one could judge from the distressed action on the other side of the gangway. But now all is well because, apparently, they have found a funkhole, and they are now going to crawl into that and get out of their trouble.

I am not clear in my own mind just why this has happened. I cannot be sure whether it is because they do not know yet what the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) actually did say when he was in Calgary and because nothing can be done until he comes back and tells them what he did say, so they will know what they are going to do.

That is one possible explanation. For myself, I might say that I was prepared to vote for the amendment of the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) because, as I understood it, what it was doing was to assist, by an advance, the farmers who are in great distress owing to what we usually call acts of God; and because I further understood that, if properly administered, there is no reason in the world why it should cost the public treasury one cent. They were going to receive an advance on their own assets, by reason of an overwhelming calamity which had befallen them. That seemed to me a reasonable thing to do, and I was prepared to vote for it.

As I say, I do not know just why the government has taken the attitude it has. But one thing I think should be very clear; no one should doubt what has happened, particularly in the west, and that, in spite of the honeyed phrases of the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier). All that is being offered to the farmers in distress is some kind words. And, of course, if they could only be here and see how those kind words of the Minister of Public Works are offered, perhaps it would help them. Actually they are not here; they do not even hear those words uttered. They are being left to face their own calamity without anything more substantial than those kind words.

That, of course, is subject to this, that when the Minister of Trade and Commerce does come back we may see something very different. Perhaps something may happen on Tuesday, after the event which is to take place on Monday, in which we are all interested. And there are two days left in this week, too. At any rate it may be that an explanation will be given when the Minister of Trade and Commerce comes back. We have had many things explained by him when he has come back from his various journeyings.

Meantime the situation is absurd. I offer no opinion about the regularity or otherwise of the amendment. It has been ruled in order, and therefore I have nothing further to say about it. All I can say is that, if it is according to the rules, then it does not seem to me to be in accordance with common sense or in accordance with the ideals of responsible government; because we are in the precise position where a genuine amendment is going to be superseded by one that is merely adding a lot of soft words for which the government's own supporters can vote.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, it seems to me one hon. member who has just spoken has indicated that there is a much more important aspect to this discussion than emerges from the rather unique subamendment now before us. That subamendment, of course, simply repeats the expression of confidence which presumably would be contained in a vote in support of the address in reply, in any event.

As has already been indicated, this is not the proper time for any of us further to express our opinions as to the propriety of a subamendment of this kind. The hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Decore) has just introduced into this discussion the circumstances under which the statement was made. That has some bearing on the purpose of the amendment that is before the house, which calls for some financial support to the distressed grain growers of western Canada, in the form of a declaration by this house that there should be paid to those grain growers a specified percentage of the value of their grain in advance. That is a clear declaration which, if the members of this house had supported it, would have called for action by this government during the present session.

To remove the opportunity for a clear expression of that sort a subamendment is now before us which merely says that everything is all right, that the government is doing everything that can be done and that in this situation we have continuing confidence that the government, which has done nothing about this situation, will continue to do nothing and all will be well. That is what it says. It is for that reason that I think we should examine what is behind this evidence to which the hon. member for Vegreville has referred.

The hon. member has suggested that one hon. member who spoke previously was not happy about the fact that the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe)—I do not know just in which capacity he was then speaking—was in Calgary last week. Presumably he was not making a political speech. In the minds of hon. members on the government side that may be a dangerous presumption, but nevertheless presumably he was not. He was speaking to the Alberta wheat pool and there was a Canadian Press dispatch of that speech which so far has not been contradicted by any member of the government. I presume that is the same organization which carried a dispatch from Rotterdam not very long ago which resulted in some discussion as to what another minister of the government had said. We all know that the Canadian Press is a reliable organization for the purpose of gathering news in different parts of Canada and the world and presenting it through the channels of the press of this country.

The hon. member for Vegreville has conveyed the impression that the Minister of Trade and Commerce was simply giving one of those reassuring statements of his. I gather that what he implies is that no one was expected to take it seriously. The unfortunate thing is that the Minister of Trade and Commerce is not in the happy position, even if members supporting the government may think he is, of having his statements taken in that way. The Minister of Trade and Commerce is a responsible minister—I am using the word "responsible" in the sense of responsible government—who is responsible to this house. When he makes a statement as to what is going to be done in regard to legislation the members of this house and the people of Canada have the right to assume that he is accepting the responsibility which lies at the foundation of our parliamentary system. For that reason it is interesting to see what the Canadian Press has to say in its dispatch of December 1 about what the Minister of Trade and Commerce said in Calgary to the Alberta wheat pool. I quote:

> Rt. Hon. C. D. Howe, trade minister, said Friday that financial aid for distressed prairie grain growers is in prospect for early in the new year.

Then the report goes on to extend the remarks, and continues:

> Mr. Howe said the legislation would be introduced at the current session of parliament in the expectation the plan would be in operation by the early part of January.

Those words are not uncertain; they are not vague; this was not a pleasant prospect of something that might come. The legislation was to be introduced during the current session for the purpose of meeting this situation.

Mr. Decore: Would the leader of the opposition read the report in the Winnipeg Free Press which contains the statement that the minister was going to recommend to the government that certain steps be taken?

Mr. Drew: I am quoting the Winnipeg Free Press. I might point out why it is so difficult to know exactly in which capacity the minister is acting at any given moment. The next paragraph covers the point referred to by the hon. member for Vegreville. This reads:

> The minister, in charge of grain marketing—

That is a new capacity.

> —said at the annual meeting of the Alberta wheat pool he is prepared to recommend legislation for interim credit for farmers with unthreshed grain and those who, for one reason or another, have been unable to deliver their grain to country elevators.

A minister of the government is not in position to state that he is going to recommend something unless it is already a matter of government policy. A minister cannot go around saying that he would like to have something done and will try to have it done. If that policy were once followed we would have nothing but chaos. Ministers of the crown must operate under the principle of cabinet solidarity. When a minister starts talking about legislation that is going to be introduced, or says he will recommend the adoption of certain measures, that presumes it is a government decision which he is announcing. The people of western Canada had every reason last Friday to believe that the Minister of Trade and Commerce was announcing a government decision on policy.

It is in the face of that fact that we must read the statement made by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) on December 3 in regard to this very statement, and I quote from page 1514 of Hansard:

> I have already told the hon. member that we were having the matter investigated, and that just as soon as we had come to a decision I would hasten to apprise the house of it.

I would remind hon. members that not very long ago I asked the Prime Minister if any new legislation would be introduced during this session, and I was assured that all the important legislation that was contemplated was already before the house. Here we have the Prime Minister saying no decision has been made, and we have the Minister of Trade and Commerce, in charge of grain marketing, informing the farmers of western Canada, according to this press report, that they may expect legislation during this session so that payments can be made in January.

Parliamentary responsibility and our system of government are not tawdry things to be played with in a political campaign in this country. It is bad enough to have a minister going abroad and announcing policies which he now says have never been decided upon, but it is a still greater breach of parliamentary responsibility for a minister charged with particular responsibility over a given matter to tell the people in a part of Canada that they can expect legislation during this session when the government itself has not yet considered that very subject.

This house is entitled to an explanation as to why that should be done. Since the hon. member for Vegreville has raised this subject in relation to the democratic rights to be exercised in Calgary West next Monday, may I hope that at that time the voters—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Drew: —may I hope that the voters of Calgary West will bear in mind next Monday the very clear implication of these two statements, namely, that they have no reason to rely upon the statement made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), and that the hon. member for Vegreville, who happens to come from Alberta, suggests to all of us that we should attach no importance to it, that it was just a pure expression of hope so far as the minister was concerned. May I say to those hon. members who have greeted the reference to the by-election in Calgary West next Monday with such laughter that I trust their laughter will be as loud on Monday night.

Mr. Daniel McIvor (Fort William): I should like to congratulate the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe).

An hon. Member: The old story.

An hon. Member: Forget it.

Mr. McIvor: In view of the attention that is paid to him when he is not in the house he must be of first importance.

Mr. H. A. Hosking (Wellington South): Mr. Speaker, I rise to take part in the debate on the subamendment because I am quite certain that the people of my riding, particularly the farmers, do not like to think there are people in other parts of the dominion who feel that they are not paying a just and rightful part of their earnings to the income tax department. I am quite certain that the farmers of my riding are honourable people and that they have no intention of defrauding the government out of the money that is used to provide the necessary protection for them and for the general operation of the government. On Monday I sat in the house and listened to the remarks made by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue). He said, as reported at page 1540 of Hansard:

> I now come to the matter of farm income tax and the unfair and almost scandalous manner in which, through the Department of National Revenue, the government has collected very high income tax from farmers in certain provinces, but has failed almost completely to collect income tax from the farmers in certain other provinces.

At page 1541 he said:

> The Minister of National Revenue cannot give a good reason why the farmers of Manitoba should pay two and a half times as much income tax as that paid by the farmers of Ontario, when the Manitoba farmer received a smaller net income for the year. There is no answer to that statement.

The farmers in my riding feel it is the responsibility of every person to pay the correct amount of income tax. They believe it is their responsibility, if they earn sufficient to pay income tax, to fill out the forms which set out their earnings, and pay the necessary tax. If they do not do so and they are caught, then they are guilty of an offence and are prosecuted. I suggest to the hon. member for Assiniboia that the farmers of my area are paying their correct share of income tax. He comes from the west and possibly does not know that the average size of farms in the section of the province that I represent is 100 acres, that each 100-acre farm is fenced, that in most cases they are broken down into 10-acre fields, and that each 10-acre field is fenced. I suggest that the cost of maintenance of fencing is something with which he has very little experience.

Each hundred acres has a barn and in most cases there is stock such as hogs, cattle and sheep. It is necessary to have stables, and normal wear and tear apparently is an item with which he has very little experience. Because of the nature of our farming we have to have shelter for our farm implements. We have to house and protect the various machines necessary for mixed farming. The cost of maintaining a farm in eastern Canada is much greater than in western Canada. With that in mind I can very well account for the difference in the income tax paid by the farmers of Ontario compared with that paid by farmers of western Canada. Fortunately, and correctly so, the government has seen fit to allow the farmers in Ontario to deduct the replacement cost of usual wear and tear before income tax is paid. In doing so the farmer of eastern Canada has less left for himself than the farmer of western Canada.

But this is not my main reason for speaking now. I rose to speak particularly on a matter of principle. The socialists to my left always adopt the point of view that it is wise to separate before attacking. The hon. member for Assiniboia attacks the government on their policy for taking care of the hardships that have occurred in the west, and the purpose of the subamendment is to take care of the amendment moved by him. I am very proud that two members from western Canada moved the subamendment. The hon. member for Assiniboia in planning his attack said: Let us divide these people; let us get the west against the east; let us arouse animosity between the farmers of western Canada and those of eastern Canada; let us separate them, and then we will take them on one group at a time. That is the usual procedure in any communistic country. I resent very much that they should have adopted such a course. I do not think it is a good thing. When a member from one section of the country tries to create the feeling that his people pay all the taxes and that we do not pay our share I say to everyone that these communist tactics are not good for the country.

Mr. Sinnott: They will resort to anything.

Mr. Hosking: It is a very bad thing for people to agitate to set labour against management. It is a bad thing for people to agitate to set management against labour. It is a bad thing to agitate to set farmers against the labouring class. These are all bad things, but it is even worse when they try to separate farmers in the west and the east, and set one group against the other. This is purely a matter of principle. I am opposed to that type of thing. I do not think it is a good thing for Canada. I should like to say that I am very glad we have in the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) a man who can appreciate the hardships caused by the early snowfall in the west, and I know he will recommend that certain things within the powers of the government be done to correct the situation.

Mr. E. G. Hansell (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to take part in this debate until the hon. member for The Battlefords (Mr. Bater), seconded by the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Decore), moved an amendment to the amendment. I have had an opportunity to read the subamendment, and I feel called upon to say a word or two about it. The leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) referred to the statement made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) in Calgary the other day. While we do not like to be always bringing forward the political angle in these statements, I feel compelled to put forth my views on the matter because the statement is extremely significant. We have been riding the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and the government for permitting cabinet ministers to make statements which eventually cause considerable confusion. I do not blame the Minister of Trade and Commerce particularly for making such a statement during the Calgary West by-election, because I suppose anyone taking part in an election of that kind desires to make the best of every possible opportunity.

Nevertheless there is a principle involved, and I think it might be as well for me to explain just what the situation is in connection with the Calgary West by-election. I believe it is that situation which called forth this encouraging statement by the minister. The Calgary West by-election is rather important in that there are three candidates running; one is a Liberal, one a Conservative and one a Social Crediter. I believe all three are fairly good men, and I am not saying anything derogatory about any of them. The Liberal candidate is a retired school superintendent in the city of Calgary proper, and I believe he is well respected by the citizens of Calgary whom he has served for a good many years. But the constituency of Calgary West is not confined to the city of Calgary. It runs into the rural areas and into the mountainous country at least as far west as Banff national park, taking in the town of Banff. It takes in a good deal of the foothills country and a good section of the wheat growing areas west of Calgary. While the Liberal candidate may have an appeal to the people of Calgary proper, I do not suppose the farmers in Calgary West were particularly fascinated by the prospect of having to vote for a retired school superintendent. The Minister of Trade and Commerce, therefore, had to make the best of it.

Mr. Decore: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Wylie: You have made your speech.

Mr. Decore: Is the hon. member aware that the minister spoke at the annual convention of the Alberta wheat pool, and not to the electorate of Calgary?

Mr. Hansell: I am not aware of that fact at all.

Mr. Decore: Then you should be.

[Mr. Hansell.]

Mr. Hansell: My hon. friend is wrong when he assumes that. He may have been—

Mr. Decore: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, according to the newspaper reports the minister spoke at the annual meeting.

Mr. Wylie: You read that once.

Mr. Hansell: The minister was speaking to the members of the wheat pool in just the same fashion as the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Decore) speaks to this house. It may take a little while for that to sink into my hon. friend's mind. Every speech the hon. member makes in this house he makes for the benefit of the people who live in the Vegreville constituency.

Some hon. Members: Why not?

Mr. Hansell: When the Minister of Trade and Commerce spoke to the wheat pool, he was speaking on behalf of the Liberal candidate in Calgary West, make no mistake about that. It was for that reason that he made some reference to the western farmer. Might I speak to this particular subamendment, Mr. Speaker. Let me read the wording of it:

> That all the words in the amendment after the word "regrets" be struck out, and the following substituted therefor:
> "the serious difficulties encountered by the western farmers in harvesting their crops,—

No one could have any objection to that part of the amendment and I certainly could support it. Then the amendment continues:

> —and commends Your Excellency's advisers for the continuing attention they have given to the problems caused thereby,—

With that part of the amendment I cannot agree, because the government has not been giving continuing attention to the problems. If they have, they have been on the outside looking through the farm window at the plight of the farmer who is on the inside. As the hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Fair) said, they are giving the farmer plenty of sympathy; but he cannot live on sympathy. His Excellency's advisers continue to stay on the outside and look in at the farmer's plight. The amendment might just as well read that way; it commends Your Excellency's advisers for standing on the outside and sympathizing with the farmer on the inside.

Then the amendment continues:

> —and is confident that effective measures will continue—

How can something continue if it does not exist? The effective measures do not exist, and that is why the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) put his amendment. He wants some effective measures to be adopted; we all want effective measures to be adopted.

How can we vote for the continuance of something that does not exist? When the hon. member for The Battlefords (Mr. Bater) and the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Decore) spoke to this subamendment they failed to tell the house of a single effective measure that exists today. You cannot find it in their speeches.

I close on that particular point and suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that I cannot see how anyone with any perception and appreciation of amendments can vote for an amendment like this one. The hon. member for Wellington South (Mr. Hosking), who spoke a little while ago, said that this amendment was designed to split the farmers into groups. Nothing of the kind. What it may do—and I do not suppose it is designed to do it—is split the members of parliament from the west into groups, but that is another thing altogether. It does not split the farmers into groups, for there is not a farmer in the country who would not vote for the amendment offered by the hon. member for Assiniboia. The fact of the matter is that every member of parliament would be required to vote as to whether or not he wants the farmers of the west to receive an advance payment on their stored grain. In order to avoid that necessity, my hon. friends of course come forward with a nebulous and meaningless subamendment. So far as we who come from western Canada are concerned, we are not going to vote for anything as nebulous as this subamendment.

Mr. P. E. Wright (Melfort): Mr. Speaker, I rise to deal briefly with an inference which was raised by the hon. member for Humboldt (Mr. Hetland) when he spoke with regard to the amendment moved by the hon. member for Assiniboia. He indicated that if the amendment passed, any moneys advanced by the government for grain stored on the farm would become a charge against wheat board accounts, and any losses therefrom would be borne by the wheat growers as a whole. That inference cannot be drawn from the amendment at all.

Mr. Hetland: Mr. Speaker, I did not say that. I said that expenses in connection with inspection would be charged to the wheat board.

Mr. Wright: I will accept the hon. member's statement that he referred to expenses with regard to inspection. The amendment does not state that at all. The amendment asks His Excellency's advisers to give consideration to making an advance of 75 per cent of the value of farm stored grain.

Mr. Hetland: It does not go far enough. How about the man with grain in the swath?

Mr. Wright: It states nothing about who shall take care of the expenses incurred in doing that; and it certainly was not the intention of the mover of this amendment that those expenses should be charged against the farmers through the wheat board. When the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) comes back to this house, I hope any legislation he may present to take care of the serious situation which exists in the west will not be along that line, and that it will not make provision for an advance to the farmers on wheat that has not been threshed or that is under the snow in western Canada, which advance will be made by the wheat board, and that any losses which may be incurred as a result of that advance be a charge against the wheat board. If that is the type of legislation he intends to introduce I can assure the government that it will be opposed by those of us on this side of the house.

I know the hon. member for The Battlefords (Mr. Bater) quite well. He is a practical farmer. When he introduced this subamendment I am sure he would have much preferred to introduce one which would add something to the amendment rather than one which merely expresses a pious hope. I am afraid he was in the unfortunate position where he could not offer any subamendment which would be an addition. The Minister of Trade and Commerce has not yet returned. Until he does, and until he informs the government what the government's policy is going to be with regard to any further advances, the government members find themselves in the position that they cannot offer anything in the way of substantial help to the farmers in western Canada. Apparently this is a one-man government.

We did not bring in this amendment with the idea that it met all the problems this year in western Canada. We introduced this amendment for one purpose, namely to get provision made for an advance on farm stored grain. That is something we in western Canada have been asking for, and which farm organizations have been asking for many years. A vote for the subamendment is a vote against the policy the farmers of western Canada have been asking for over a number of years now. That is the effect of it. It is voting for some pious hope rather than voting for something concrete, something we have been asking for over a number of years, which is quite another matter. When the amendment was introduced I stated that I thought it was good but that to meet the situation which existed this year some additional assistance was necessary. I recognized the fact that some additional assistance was necessary. Because the Minister of Trade and Commerce had indicated that the government were considering something in the way of further assistance, we did not extend our amendment. As reported at page 1546 of Hansard I stated:

> I hope the government will give serious consideration to the amendment moved by the hon. member for Assiniboia. As I said before, I do not think it goes far enough to meet the needs of all sections of the west at this time, but it is a step in the right direction. It is a good piece of permanent legislation which we should have on our statute books.

That is all we were offering, a sound amendment which would instruct the government to place on our statute books legislation which would make it possible for an advance to be made to farmers on grain stored on the farm. I hope western members will oppose the subamendment offered by the hon. member for The Battlefords because, in voting for it, they are voting against the best interests of the farmers in western Canada; they are voting against something for which the farmers in western Canada have been asking consistently over the last number of years, namely an advance on farm stored grain.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Beaudoin): Is the house ready for the question?

Mr. Graydon: I was paired with the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson). Had I voted I would have voted against the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. Ross (Souris): I was paired with the right hon. member for Melville (Mr. Gardiner). Had I voted I would have voted against the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. Fulton: I was paired with the hon. member for Yorkton (Mr. Stewart). Had I voted I would have voted against the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I believe some other members would like to declare their pairs.

Mr. Cardiff: I was paired. Had I voted I would have voted against the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): I was paired with the hon. member for Middlesex West (Mr. McCubbin). Had I voted I would have voted against the amendment to the amendment.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise for the purpose of moving another amendment—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Diefenbaker: —and it will not have the paradoxical result that followed the amendment of this afternoon moved by the hon. member for The Battlefords (Mr. Bater). I intend to give this house an opportunity to vote disapproval of the excessive, unwarranted and unjustifiable high taxation that today rests upon the Canadian people. I point out, sir, that the predictions of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) made seven months ago, that the surplus of revenue over expenditure would be $30 million in one year, has been multiplied twenty times or to the extent of $604 million in seven months, more than is needed for the purposes of civil expenditures and defence.

No Canadian worthy of the name—

Mr. Knowles: May I rise to a point of order. I gather, from what the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) is saying, that he is going to move another amendment which will deal with taxation. Is it not so that we are not yet back to the main motion?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I understood we were.

Mr. Knowles: We now have before us the amendment as amended, on which the vote has not yet been taken.

An hon. Member: That is right.

Mr. Knowles: The amendment as amended has not yet been put to the house.

Mr. Speaker: The next question before the house will be on the amendment as amended.

Mr. Blackmore: Mr. Speaker, I am speaking on the amendment as amended.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I believe I had the floor.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Lake Centre has the floor. The motion is debatable and he has the right to debate it without at this time moving an amendment.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I was pointing out that no Canadian worthy of the name would object to paying a fair share of the taxes necessary to run this country, but that what Canadians are objecting to today is that there is to be no baby budget and no reduction of taxation at this session of parliament. The cost of living continues to rise; the latest available index indicates a further increase in the cost of living, induced in part by the fact that in his estimate last April the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) made one of the most serious errors ever made in the history of this country.

As a consequence of that guess extra taxation was imposed. We in His Majesty's loyal opposition pointed out that such extra taxation was unnecessary in order to meet the costs of defence and the ordinary costs of government; but the government, with its all-powerful majority, brought in new taxes and increased the sales tax by 25 per cent and the income tax by 20 per cent over and above what had been paid in 1950. The Canadian people have been taken in to the extent of $604 million in the last seven months, or $45 per head.

On motion of Mr. Diefenbaker the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Tomorrow we will take up the two resolutions concerning the St. Lawrence seaway. If we could have unanimous consent the Minister of Transport would like to proceed with the bill ratifying the agreement between the government of Canada and the government of Ontario which was tabled by the Prime Minister on Friday afternoon. Then we would be ready to proceed with the St. Lawrence seaway bill on Friday. After that we would take up the resolution to amend the Dominion Elections Act, Bill No. 18, to provide for the establishment of an agricultural products board, and Bill No. 8, to amend the North Fraser Harbour Commissioners Act.

At 6.15 p.m. the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to the order of the house passed on November 2, 1951.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, December 6, 1951

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

CONGRATULATIONS TO MR. CASSELMAN, MR. WARD AND MR. HARRIS (DANFORTH) ON THIRTIETH ANNIVERSARY OF ELECTION TO PARLIAMENT

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I know I shall be speaking for all hon. members on both sides of the house in expressing admiration for those beautiful flowers on the desk of the hon. member for Grenville-Dundas (Mr. Casselman) and in extending to him our warmest congratulations on this the thirtieth anniversary of his first election to the House of Commons. During a great part of that time, and during the whole of the time that it has been my privilege to be in the house, the hon. member has served as the whip of his party. He has done so in a manner and with a courtesy that has been helpful in the conduct of the business of the house. I know that we all wish him many more years of useful public service.

Another hon. member, the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Ward), was also elected to this house for the first time thirty years ago. I am sure that, though it may for some of the members of the house have been the result of an event that was not entirely pleasing to them, we were all glad to welcome him back to this house. I am sure that to him also all hon. members would wish many more years of useful public service.

The third member of the house who unfortunately is prevented by indisposition from being here today but who was elected at the same time and who has been over the thirty years a constant attendant in the house is the hon. member for Danforth (Mr. Harris). I am sure we regret that he is not here today so that we might have the opportunity of extending to him personally our congratulations and good wishes. I think all hon. members would agree with me, Mr. Speaker, in asking you to inform the hon. member that we are thinking of him today and that we are all extending to him our very best wishes.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasant thing to be able to join in felicitations of this kind. Naturally I join with the Prime Minister in the good wishes he has extended not only to the members who are present but to the hon. member for Danforth who is unable to be here. I wish particularly to express my warm good wishes to the member of our party who sits behind me and whose desk is today decorated with these beautiful flowers to which the Prime Minister has referred. May I say that it is an impressive thing to be able to look back over thirty years and to realize that this still young-looking member of the House of Commons—not only young-looking, but, as years go in the political life of this country, young in fact and young in everything he does as well—has been here so long. May I say it is a great pleasure to be able to record the fact that since he was elected thirty years ago today he has never been defeated in his own constituency. The only time he has not sat in this house during those years was when he resigned his seat to make way for a very great Canadian who temporarily represented that constituency.

In addition to the fact that I join in the expressions of felicitation to him as a member of the house, I might add there is naturally the association in the same political party, and there is also a long personal friendship. And may I confess that perhaps there is also a special interest in the fact that he entered the House of Commons shortly after the first world war when he belonged to that very special branch of military service, the Canadian artillery. Having served with the 10th siege battery with distinction he carried forward into the years of peace the same sense of public service that had carried him outside of Canada at that time. I join with the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) in wishing him many happy years ahead of service to the public and in the association of the friends that he has made here in this House of Commons.

I regret very much that the hon. member for Danforth (Mr. Harris) is not here similarly to receive the friendly expressions from his associates on both sides of the house. He has continuously represented a Toronto constituency throughout all those years, and at all times has been a faithful public servant in everything that these words mean. I know that everyone here will regret the fact that through indisposition he is unable to be with us, but we will certainly all wish him good health and many years of public service here in the House of Commons and in the other capacities where he has served so well. I would like to include in that a reference to the kind of public service which so many men who are members of parliament give in other fields. For scores of years and longer to come the name of Joe Harris will be remembered in Toronto because of a very large and efficient hospital which, to a very considerable extent, has been the result of his untiring effort and activity. It is in things of that kind outside of the House of Commons that so many members of this house do serve their public in addition to their ordinary capacity as members of parliament.

May I further add my good wishes to the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Ward). In the very nature of the association it has not been my privilege to know him as well as the other two members whom I have mentioned; but he has carried with him throughout the years the friendship of those who have known him, and I join with the Prime Minister in wishing him also through the years ahead health, happiness and the enjoyment of his years of service.

Mr. Angus MacInnis (Vancouver East): I should like to associate this group with what the Prime Minister and the leader of the opposition have said in congratulating these three remaining members of the 1921 general election. They are members who have been engaged almost continuously since that time in the work and in the life of this parliament. We wish them many more useful years in this house.

Mr. J. H. Blackmore (Lethbridge): It is the desire of the members of the Social Credit group to be associated with the kind words, and well earned words of praise, which have already been offered in recognition of the thirtieth anniversary of the three hon. members.

Mr. A. C. Casselman (Grenville-Dundas): Mr. Speaker, as one whose duties as whip for approximately the last twenty years of this parliament have curtailed the opportunities to express views in the house, I know I will find it most difficult to express the thoughts that have come to my mind in the last few minutes.

It was my privilege in my early years to be given the confidence of the electorate in my district, a confidence which has been continuous over the last three decades. I think you would expect me to express my deepest thanks to the electorate of Grenville-Dundas for their kindness in doing so. This I now do.

During that period of time as a member of this house, I have seen many changes, advances which have been to a large degree advantageous not only to my constituents but to the people of Canada as a whole.

Over this period of time it has been my privilege to make the acquaintance and, I hope, gain the friendship, of many members from all parts of Canada. That I consider one of my most precious possessions. I sincerely hope that they feel towards me the way I feel towards them. To have been associated with so many people of such divergent views has, I trust, impressed me in such a way that I bear ill will to no one.

I am very sorry that my friend the hon. member for Danforth (Mr. Harris) is not here today. I am delighted to know that the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Ward) is here today. I know that he needs sympathy, but possibly not quite as much as I do. I take this opportunity to express to the Prime Minister, to my leader, to the leader of the C.C.F. party for the time being, the hon. member for Vancouver East, and to the hon. member for Lethbridge my thanks for the kind words which they have uttered with respect to me.

I trust that, having lost twenty minutes already in the business of the house as a result of the fact that I have been here a long time, the house will be able to get down and proceed with the urgent business that is before it.

COMBINES LEGISLATION

PRIVILEGE, MR. BEAUDRY—REFERENCE TO REPORT IN "GLOBE AND MAIL" OF DECEMBER 6

Mr. Roland Beaudry (St. James): Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, my attention has been drawn to a news item in today's Globe and Mail. Referring to yesterday's sittings of the combines committee the article says in part:

> Throughout today's committee divisions Mr. Beaudry and Mr. Murray bolted the government ranks and consistently voted with the minority group—

I say that it requires a phenomenal amount of imagination to construe as "bolting" my affirmative vote on a motion moved by myself on a question of procedure. I have never bolted the government ranks, and I am reasonably sure that the dictates of my heart and of my reason will make me live and die a liberal.

GRAIN

REFERENCE TO REPORTED REMARKS OF MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE IN WINNIPEG "FREE PRESS"

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. On Monday last a question was raised by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) in reference to a statement which had been made in regard to legislation that was to be introduced in this house. I do believe that this is something that should be definitely placed before the house, in view of the stage that this session has now reached and in view of the very positive statements contained in a Canadian Press dispatch of December 1 from Calgary, which was referred to in this house yesterday during a debate. I would point out that the Canadian Press dispatch, to which I refer, in addition to indicating that the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) was prepared to recommend certain legislation, contained statements of a positive nature which must have left that impression upon the minds of those who read the statement.

I would quote the positive statement contained in the Canadian Press dispatch of December 1 from Calgary, which says:

> Right Hon. C. D. Howe, trade minister, said Friday that financial aid for distressed prairie grain growers is in prospect for early in the new year.

And then later on, after indicating his own willingness to place this before the house, and to support it, the report goes on to say:

> Mr. Howe said the legislation would be introduced at the current session of parliament in the expectation the plan would be in operation by the early part of January.

The question of privilege is this: If that press report is correct, then the minister responsible for the handling of grain has stated there would be legislation during this session which will provide payments to the farmers in January. If that is correct, then naturally the farmers in making their arrangements, in those distressed areas where harvesting has been seriously affected by the weather, would wish to know. If that is not a statement of policy and if it does not represent the government's intention, then at the earliest possible date they also should know it. In addition to that, since what is reported does not constitute a statement of policy by that minister in the house, and as the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) has had an opportunity to give the matter further consideration, would he inform us as to what the exact position of the government is?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the position of the government is that it is never responsible for newspaper reports. The Minister of Trade and Commerce has said on several occasions in this house that this matter was under consideration, and that there would be an announcement of the measures that the government might find it appropriate to recommend for the relief of those who, because of circumstances, were prevented from deriving immediate advances or benefits from their expected crop.

That is still the situation. And, although I have no right to divulge what goes on in council meetings, I can say the matter has been considered—on the latest occasion this morning. In the circumstances, and because of the information that the Minister of Trade and Commerce is expected to bring back tomorrow morning, we did feel that we wished to have a further conference with him, and I did not put on the order paper this afternoon the notice of a resolution that had been prepared. One aspect of the matter under consideration has been as to whether or not legislation was required to deal with the situation.

The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) was in the west a while ago, just before he left for Rome, and had interviews with many of those representing large sections of the grain growers; and the Minister of Trade and Commerce has met the representatives of the grain growers at Calgary, at Edmonton and in Winnipeg, and has canvassed the situation. We expect it will now be possible, within the next two or three days, to come to a conclusion as to whether or not the matter can be dealt with without legislation, or if in fact it does require legislation. I am inclined to think it will require legislation, no matter what form the emergency assistance takes. But that is a matter upon which I would not wish to make a definite pronouncement at this time.

I saw the suggestion somewhere that there had been an undertaking that there would be no further legislation. That may have been made, in general terms. But I think it had been made clear to the house, from the first time the question arose, that the government was studying the situation and would determine what recommendation to make to assist in dealing with it in view of the fact that it has arisen out of climatic and other unavoidable circumstances.

Mr. Drew: I recognize of course that any statement that there will be no further legislation is always subject to events that may occur. I would point out, however, that this has been under consideration for some time. I do point out further that if the Prime Minister's words are to be taken as an indication that something is to be done along the lines mentioned, then once again we are confronted with the fact that a statement of policy has been made outside the house, instead of being presented in the usual way.

Mr. St. Laurent: I have read the clippings from the papers in Calgary and Edmonton.

They contain the statement that the Minister of Trade and Commerce had said that something should be done, but they do not indicate in any way what form it would take. I do not know where the Canadian Press got the information for the dispatch that was published in Winnipeg. At the time it appeared in Winnipeg the Minister of Trade and Commerce had not yet reached Winnipeg.

Mr. Drew: Do I take it, then, that the Prime Minister does in fact say that the quotations from the Canadian Press dispatch to which I have referred do not correctly represent the situation, so far as the government is concerned, as of December 1?

Mr. St. Laurent: No, I shall not say and I cannot say that there was not something said that would justify the report. The Canadian Press is usually careful, although there are times when statements are expanded or backgrounded. I do not know to what extent that may have been done in this case.

NATIONAL GALLERY

INCREASE IN MEMBERSHIP OF BOARD OF TRUSTEES —EXPENDITURES—APPOINTMENT OF OFFICERS, ETC.

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure respecting the national gallery of Canada to increase the number of members of the board of trustees; to provide that the board may enter into contracts and may dispose of property vested in the board; to provide for a national gallery purchase account and for a national gallery special operating account to meet the expenditures of the board; and to provide further for the appointment in accordance with the provisions of the Civil Service Act of the necessary officers, clerks and employees.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

CIGARETTES

PREVALENCE OF SMUGGLING—REQUEST FOR REMOVAL OF PART OF TAX

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of National Revenue. Is he prepared to make a statement regarding the degree to which cigarette smuggling is taking place, what is being done to meet the situation, and whether consideration has been given to the removal of the tax, in part, in order to alleviate the situation?

[Mr. St. Laurent.]

Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, the question was sent to me by the hon. member, in which he asks what is being done with a view to protecting the Canadian public from the effects of cigarette smuggling. Customs officers at border points are alive to the situation and I understand that the Royal Canadian Mounted Police have increased the border patrols in those districts where cigarette smuggling is prevalent and have also intensified their efforts inland. I am sure the hon. member will appreciate that the penalties for smuggling are severe and one would naturally expect that they would act as a deterrent to that type of law breaking.

With reference to his question as to whether consideration is being given to a reduction in the tax, may I say that that is not a matter for my department. We are only the administrators of the law and if the tax should be changed at any time we will so regulate our administration as to carry it out.

CHINA

EXPORT OF CANADIAN FUNDS—FACILITIES FOR IMMIGRATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Arthur Laing (Vancouver South): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration arising out of a reply made by the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Sinclair) on November 28, as reported on page 1401 of Hansard. In the light of the blackmail being faced by Canadians of Chinese origin and the conditions of terror imposed on their families in China, could the minister give us some assurance that every facility will be afforded under the regulations to permit them to bring their families to this country of decency and security?

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): As the house knows, in the past four years a number of changes have been made in the regulations with respect to immigration from China. The result has been that immigration from China has increased from seven in 1946 to about 2,500 this year. We accept the wife or husband and unmarried children under twenty-one years of age of a Canadian citizen of Chinese origin. We announced in June that we would accept unmarried children up to the age of twenty-five years under special circumstances.

We recognize that Canadian citizens of Chinese origin are greatly concerned about the welfare of their children and relatives in China. Last year we added to the staff at Hong Kong, and have made further additions this year. We have also added to the staff of the Chinese section of the immigration branch at headquarters here in Ottawa.

The result has been that the time between the receipt of an application and the granting of approval has been considerably shortened in Canada and the time taken to process immigrants in Hong Kong has been greatly reduced. As a matter of fact, the backlog of those in Hong Kong awaiting processing at the moment is only about the number which could be handled in the course of a month.

The government is most sympathetic toward Canadian citizens of Chinese origin who wish to bring forward their dependents and relatives within the regulations and we are doing everything we can to expedite the processing. I should say that we do not communicate with the intended immigrant in the interior of China. It is left to the parent or applicant to get in touch with him and ask him to come out to Hong Kong. When these people reach Hong Kong we handle them as expeditiously as possible and we are quite prepared to expand our services in any way in order to handle this group of immigrants.

Mr. MacInnis: With respect to the question asked by the hon. member for Vancouver South, does the Chinese government restrict in any way the movement of those who wish to emigrate to Canada?

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): We have no knowledge of any direct restriction because, as I say, the applicant here notifies his relative in China to come to Hong Kong for examination, and they are still coming. The numbers who arrive are in the order of about 200 or 225 a month, and are being dealt with as expeditiously as possible.

Mr. Fair: I should like to inquire whether the word "children" also includes adopted children.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): No, it does not.

WAR DAMAGE

REQUEST FOR INTERIM PAYMENT TO CANADIANS WHO SUFFERED FROM JAPANESE ACTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister relating to one which I addressed to him on November 20 before the orders of the day. At that time I asked what the situation then was in regard to the possibility of making at least an interim payment to those who had suffered as a result of enemy action during the past war, with particular reference to enemy action in the Pacific. The Prime Minister pointed out that the matter was under consideration and that an answer would presently be given to a question which was then on the order paper. That question was answered on November 26 by the Secretary of State (Mr. Bradley) and it showed that the custodian had approximately $3,425,000 of assets under his control which had formerly been owned by Japanese enemies. The answer of the Secretary of State, as reported on page 1304 of Hansard, goes on to state:

> When the treaty of peace is ratified such assets will be at the disposal of the Canadian government.

In view of the real and terrible hardship which to my knowledge is being suffered by some women whose husbands were starved as a consequence of action in the Pacific and who are desperately in need of some temporary assistance at this particular time, and under the weather conditions they will have to face, I should like to know if it is possible to provide some interim monthly payments which will give them some feeling of security during the winter months.

At times it is only by quoting a particular case as an illustration that we can understand the general problem. There is a lady here in Ottawa, the wife of a Canadian bank manager who died from starvation in a Japanese prison camp, whose physical condition was severely impaired by near starvation to the extent that she is unable to work and cannot look to anyone for assistance. It seems to me that there could be no question about the legitimacy of this claim and that some substantial financial payment should be made to give her compensation at least in a limited degree for what she has suffered.

I use that case only as an illustration of a number of cases. I ask the Prime Minister if at this particular time of the year it is not possible to make some interim payment.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): The general principles recommended by the right hon. Chief Justice Ilsley as commissioner were accepted by council some days ago and regulations for the method of handling applications for interim payments are being drafted. When instructions were issued for their drafting special recommendation was made that that be done with dispatch because we wished to be able to proceed with the implementation before Christmas.

The case the hon. member refers to is one that gave considerable difficulty with respect to the application of the principle because this lady's husband had formerly been a bank manager and in that capacity could have been regarded as having been domiciled in Canada. However, when he retired from the bank he went into business on his own in the Pacific and that created the legal position where his domicile was fixed there. The government is prepared to assume whatever risk may be involved in recognizing the claim of a Canadian national in those circumstances and it does not feel that it will in any serious way affect the rights of others who may have claims. If we made a mistake in that respect and it were found that it did affect other rights we would come to the house, declare the mistake and ask for an appropriation to make good whatever the prejudice to others might be.

Mr. Drew: Do I take it that some early action will be taken?

Mr. St. Laurent: Yes, the general principles have been approved. Instructions were issued on the draft regulations that have to be made as directives to those who will be handling the claims, and when those instructions were issued they were asked to proceed with as great dispatch as possible because Christmas was in the offing.

AIR TRANSPORT

REGULATIONS REGARDING PASSENGERS IN OPERATIONS COMPARTMENT, ETC.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. K. Fraser (Peterborough West): I should like to ask the Minister of Transport if he is ready to answer the question I asked yesterday with respect to allowing passengers in the operations compartments of airplanes?

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): I have an answer to the hon. gentleman's question, which was as follows:

> Has the Department of Transport changed its regulations recently in regard to not allowing Trans-Canada Air Lines and other commercial air lines to carry passengers on flight decks . . .

The answer is that the air regulations of the Department of Transport deal with airworthiness, safety, and competency and responsibility of personnel generally, but there are no specific regulations relating to access to the flight decks of commercial aircraft.

Mr. Drew: Is it not so, that the real issue which is causing the present difficulty is the question of the authority of the captain of the aircraft over the flight deck?

Mr. Chevrier: I am not able to say whether or not that is the question. The air transport board is looking into three or four cases that have arisen within the last three or four days. As I understand it, the position is this, whether or not Trans-Canada Air Lines, which issues its own regulations with reference to its personnel going on the flight deck, will be maintained in its view, or whether or not the resolution of the pilots' association, which stipulates that none but the air crew shall go on the flight deck, shall predominate. The air transport board has regulations but they do not cover this point. Until we have all the facts before us I think it would be foolish to attempt to be an umpire between the two. After all, it is a matter for the air line pilots on the one hand and T.C.A. on the other to get together and come to some understanding. If that is possible, I think we can bring in a regulation which will meet the situation.

Mr. Drew: I wish to suggest to the Minister of Transport that regard should be had to this point, in view of the immense importance of the question that has arisen. As I understand it—and I think he will find there is no question about it—the point raised by the resolution of the air pilots' association is the authority of the captain over the flight deck and whether or not he is in fact the captain of the ship so far as what one might regard as the bridge of the aircraft is concerned. Apparently the point is that people who are not members of the crew may be placed in the flight deck compartment without consulting the captain, and that raises the question whether the captain has authority on the flight deck or whether he has not. I might say that the air regulations in the United States and Great Britain make it clear that the captain has absolute authority. I suggest that point is one that should not simply be left to negotiation but should be determined.

Mr. Chevrier: I am not suggesting that it be left to negotiation. All I am saying is that until the air transport board has the facts it is pretty difficult to determine the point.

Mr. Fraser: May I ask the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Trade and Commerce to answer the question that I asked him yesterday?

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Trade and Commerce): Yesterday the hon. member for Peterborough West asked two questions. They were:

> Will the parliamentary assistant make a statement as to why passengers have been sold tickets in the operations compartment of Trans-Canada Air Lines planes, and also why pilots have been suspended for obeying the Department of Transport regulations and safety measures?

The answer to the first question is that there have been no tickets sold to anyone to occupy space in the operations compartment or flight deck on Trans-Canada Air Lines planes. The answer to the second question is that no pilots have been suspended for obeying the Department of Transport regulations and safety measures.

Mr. Fraser: If tickets are not sold for the operations compartment, then who are the people and how many of them are there who have been allowed to travel free in such compartments?

Mr. McIlraith: Obviously I cannot answer that question offhand. I do not know whether it is possible to get the information concerning who the people are. However, I will try to get whatever information I can and bring it forward.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, with perhaps some extension of the strict interpretation of the rules, I should like to suggest, because of the importance of this matter and the suggestion in the press that there even may be a strike, that the subject should be given the most urgent consideration. I am sure that the point is that passes are used for trips on the flight deck without the captain knowing anything about it. Some time ago the department was warned there is a danger factor involved which the pilots are not willing to accept.

TRADE

TEXTILES AND VEGETABLE OILS—INVESTIGATIONS REGARDING DUMPING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Lake Centre): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Revenue. Is an investigation being conducted into the dumping of textiles from communist countries into Canada, and particularly the dumping of gloves from Czechoslovakia? What course is going to be followed in order to meet the situation?

Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue): I thank the hon. member for having given me notice of his question. The matter of the value of fabric gloves imported from Czechoslovakia has been drawn to my attention by a number of Canadian manufacturers. An examination of invoices covering such gloves does not disclose any evidence of dumping, but the department is making inquiries in regard to the values at which these gloves are being sold for consumption in Czechoslovakia. I might point out to the house that I am sure hon. members will appreciate the difficulties involved in getting information with reference to values. Matters of exchange and national excise taxes all enter into the question, and we find it difficult to get proper information with reference to the values in the country of origin. We use such officers as we have in Europe in order to obtain the information. However, shortly a delegation from Czechoslovakia is to visit this country, and we expect to have a conference with them with a view to setting up better facilities for obtaining information.

Mr. Cruickshank: Will the same investigation be carried out with respect to the dumping of cheap vegetable oils used in the manufacture of oleomargarine?

Mr. McCann: Investigations are being continuously carried on with reference to the importation of all goods into this country.

INQUIRY FOR RETURN

ARMED FORCES—ENLISTMENTS—EXPENDITURES FOR RECRUITING AND PUBLICITY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): On November 12 a question of mine inquiring as to expenditures on recruiting and recruiting advertising was passed as an order for return. I should like to ask the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of National Defence when I may expect to have the return tabled, and whether he will please see if he can speed it up.

Mr. J. A. Blanchette (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of National Defence): I will have to look into the matter.

KURT MEYER

COMMITMENT TO WERL PRISON, GERMANY—REFERENCE TO STATEMENTS IN DEBATE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. O. Campney (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of National Defence): In his remarks in the house yesterday the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge) made extensive reference to the Kurt Meyer case. In that connection he referred to a statement which I made in the house on November 26, concerning the transfer of Kurt Meyer from Dorchester penitentiary to a prison for war criminals under the administration of the United Kingdom at Werl, Germany. In view of the hon. member's remarks, and of the discussion taking place generally concerning this matter, I should like to restate very briefly the salient facts of the case.

Meyer was tried as a war criminal, in accordance with the procedure established for the trial of war criminals, following the conclusion of the second world war. He was convicted on certain of the charges brought against him. As a result of that conviction he was sentenced to death. His sentence was reviewed, in accordance also with the procedure with respect to trials of war criminals, by the general officer commanding, third Canadian infantry division, who commuted his sentence to life imprisonment.

Meyer was subsequently brought to Canada and incarcerated in Dorchester penitentiary in the month of May, 1946. Because Meyer was the only German convicted of a war crime imprisoned anywhere in Canada or, in fact, outside Germany, he was in October last transferred to a prison for war criminals in Germany at Werl, under the administration of the United Kingdom. As I stated on November 26, and for reasons therein set out, he became subject to the general discipline and regulations applicable to all war criminals in that prison as administered by the United Kingdom authorities. It was under rules as applied by the United Kingdom authorities to all prisoners incarcerated at Werl he applied for and was granted compassionate leave a short time ago.

Because Meyer by order in council was placed under the rules and regulations of the prison at Werl, his application for compassionate leave was dealt with in the ordinary way and, as it was a matter of prison administration, without reference to the Canadian government. As the Minister of National Defence stated in the House of Commons on October 22, at page 245 of Hansard:

. . . the prison in which he—

That is Meyer.

—is now incarcerated, is under the control of the United Kingdom occupation authorities in Germany but they have no power to interfere with his sentence.

Meyer's sentence was and remains exclusively within the control of the Canadian government, and has been in no way changed.

Mr. J. H. Ferguson (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, I have a great deal of regard for the fighting ability of the German soldier. I have every reason to have that regard because I experienced the pleasure of fighting against him. A question has been raised in this house concerning a German major general. The parliamentary assistant to the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Campney) has made a statement. This man was tried fairly, I am sure, was found guilty and sentenced to death. One of our generals commuted the sentence to life imprisonment.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Ferguson: This matter is of vital importance to the people of Canada, particularly those who have served overseas in the various wars. Either this man should have a retrial or he should go to the penitentiary and properly serve his life sentence.

[Mr. Campney.]

FISHERIES

NEWFOUNDLAND SALT CODFISH—PAYMENT OF SUBSIDY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. J. Browne (St. John's West): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries. When does the fisheries prices support board expect to issue cheques to the fishermen in payment of the subsidy recommended for the 1950 catch of salt codfish in Newfoundland?

Hon. R. W. Mayhew (Minister of Fisheries): The hon. member for St. John's West sent notice of his question to me. At the moment 600 fishermen have reported on the semi-dry salt codfish, and these submissions have been examined. The cheques will be sent out before the end of the year, and I hope before Christmas.

With regard to the offshore codfish, some 13,500 fishermen have made returns. Evidently these returns are not all in yet, and are coming in very slowly. We believe they will be completed so that the cheques can be issued sometime in January.

ST. LAWRENCE WATERWAY

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY AUTHORITY—DEEP WATERWAY BETWEEN MONTREAL AND LAKE ERIE

The house resumed, from Tuesday, December 4, consideration of the motion of Mr. Chevrier that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient, for the purpose of providing a deep waterway between Montreal and lake Erie, to create a corporation to be called "The St. Lawrence Seaway Authority" with power, inter alia, to expropriate; to construct, maintain and operate all necessary works; to borrow amounts not exceeding three hundred million dollars; to establish tariffs of tolls and to employ such officers and employees as may be required for the purposes of the authority.

Mr. Clarence Gillis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, after the members who are apparently making up their minds whether they will stay or go have settled down, I shall proceed with my discussion from the point at which I left off when this debate was adjourned. The first thing I want to make clear is that a proper analysis of the subject matter before the house would take more time than is allowed a private member or than could comfortably be occupied by a cabinet minister at one session.

When I concluded my remarks I was documenting the fears that exist in the maritime provinces of the repercussions that the final completion of this seaway project may have on the economy of the maritimes. I believe that the evidence I submitted from organizations that have studied the matter expressed legitimate fears. For example, I was pointing out that if any of the statements made by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) in the house, or by any of the other speakers outside the house, had contained a suggestion that some consideration would be given to future development in the maritimes, those fears might have been eased. But the reverse is true. Every statement at which I have looked seems to indicate that, instead of expanding or retaining the organizations that belong in the maritimes, these organizations were going to be further centralized.

I was dealing with the shipping industry. The Minister of Transport and the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) made statements outside the house clearly indicating that, so far as the future of the shipping industry was concerned, the hopes were that it would be centred in the head of the lakes so far as the Minister of Trade and Commerce was concerned, but the Minister of Transport was a little more general. If a statement had been made that there was a possibility that completion of this seaway would stimulate or add to the shipbuilding industry of the maritime provinces, the feeling would have been different. At present the Canadian shipbuilding industry is centred in the maritimes; that is where it got its start. Through confederation these industries over the years have been siphoned off. It would have at least given us the impression that there is some thinking of the final stages of this development assisting or bringing some benefits to the maritime provinces. I suggest that the miners of Nova Scotia have a legitimate fear. They have presented their case, and I have put it on the record here. A few days ago the hon. member for Cape Breton North and Victoria (Mr. MacLean) received a return with respect to a question as to what progress, if any, had been made in research in taking oil from coal. The answer he received was rather discouraging. There were not any figures. Apparently there was not any interest in the matter. Then I pick up a statement like this in the press. This again is from the Halifax Chronicle-Herald. They do a good research job for the maritimes, and they have this to say:

> In the matter of utilization of coal, this coal-producing province usually can sympathize with the lady who is "always a bridesmaid, but never a bride." And so we have this little dispatch from North Sydney: "South America took it away again today. The freighter Shan Trader sailed for Brazil with a cargo of 10,000 tons of specially selected coal from Dosco's old Sydney collieries, which will be processed into nylons. Princess colliery coal was selected for the nylon trade after a series of tests."

That is rather disconcerting and I think it reflects on the thinking of our research people —and we have a great many of them— centred in this city. If it is possible to establish in Brazil an industry manufacturing nylons—and there is a great demand for nylon—and if it is economic to transport coal from Nova Scotia to Brazil and to process that coal into a product that is easily marketed, it clearly shows that what I have said about the thinking of those in the ivory towers in Ottawa is correct. Why have we not done enough thinking to establish the utilization of the product of an industry that is losing its place in our economy because of the advance of natural gas, oil and other commodities? I merely use that as an illustration to show that, as to the maritimes, our thinking leaves much to be desired.

All of the evidence I have put on the record so far has been from organizations that have expressed legitimate fears that the ultimate development of this St. Lawrence seaway means that they are going to lose their means of livelihood. I hope that is not true.

Mr. Chevrier: It is not, I am sure.

Mr. Gillis: When the minister gets to his feet again, I hope that he is going to give us some reassuring remarks on some of the things that I think should be coupled up with this seaway, and I will mention them before I get through. When you threaten the bread and butter of an individual or a group of individuals, the natural thing is for him or them to fight back. To get an illustration, we have only to look at the members of parliament at any time an election is coming up. They fight to get back here. They go out and put on quite a show; they spend money. For a great many of them it is to some extent their means of livelihood. We want to try to place ourselves in the other fellow's position—for example, if you were a coal miner, a steelworker or a small farmer in the maritime provinces, and particularly if you have read the history of Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick since confederation—and take a look at the industries that have been lost over the years. It makes you stop and think, because that is where people live, eat and work; and they want to stay there. It is their home. I think the fears expressed by the organizations whose submissions I put on the record are quite legitimate.

When I began my remarks I said that the political party to which I belong in that province are not unalterably opposed to this project. While they too fear, nevertheless they are prepared to give the government the credit for honesty of intention and to believe that it is not the intention of the government to injure any section of the country if it is possible to avoid doing so.

I have here in my hand a survey of this project and its implications when completed. It is dated November 9, 1951. The man who writes this report is Professor David Cass-Beggs of Toronto. The caption of it is: "The Need for a Federal Authority with Wider Responsibilities". Just a week or so ago I heard the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) quote Professor Cass-Beggs with approval on a survey that he made for the Saskatchewan government, I think it was, in regard to that irrigation project that has been under consideration there for some years. I am not going to read this report but I will say that it is a thought-provoking one. I think it is a fair report. It covers the implication in each province. I agree with this report. I think it is an excellent one. In his conclusions, Professor Cass-Beggs points out that, in his opinion, this St. Lawrence seaway with its related developments should be, so far as it is possible to make it, the kind of project that could be likened to the Tennessee valley project in the United States, better known as the TVA. If that is followed through, we should be glad if the Minister of Transport, when he is summing up in this debate, can give the members of this house the assurance that the authority now being set up will be, in so far as it is possible to make it, the kind of authority that will be a continuing one, that will have the kind of qualified personnel on it that will not only have authority and the power to develop the power in the provinces of Ontario and Quebec but will also have the power to follow through, so that any potential development that may be available because of this St. Lawrence seaway, from coast to coast, could be undertaken under the management of that authority, subject to the approval of this house, of course, from time to time. We should like to be assured that that is the kind of authority that the minister visualizes that we are setting up at this time. For example, I should like from the minister the assurance that when this authority is set up and when the preliminary things that have to be done are completed, this authority would have the right to complete the study of this project which is better known as the "Quoddy" project in the province of New Brunswick. There is a power development there, and I have the report in my hand. All that the province of New Brunswick is asking for with respect to that power project is that the government would continue the investigation into the possibilities of developing that power in that area. According to this report, it will cost approximately $3 million to complete the investigation. If the evidence then proves that it is a possible and feasible project it could be undertaken, in co-operation with the United States authorities, to serve the same purpose in Maine, New Hampshire and New Brunswick as the power project now agreed to by the Ontario and federal governments under the terms of the resolution which the minister has on the order paper.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member has exhausted his time. He may continue with the unanimous consent of the house.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Gillis: I will not be very long. I thank you very much, Mr. Speaker, for calling my attention to it. I should like the assurance of the minister that that project can be developed. I hold in my hand a clipping date-lined Quincy, Massachusetts, December 3, which reads:

> Sidney Grossman, building materials firm executive, said today he is prepared to raise $10 million to develop the Passamaquoddy project as a private venture.

Apparently there is private capital in the United States prepared to do something about that particular power project. When the minister closes the debate I should like him to tell me whether the authority that is being set up will be empowered to undertake that kind of development in that province, or at least have power to complete it.

The Saint John river project is another power project. It is feasible. All the evidence you can examine shows that. It is necessary; it is feasible; it is desirable. What I am afraid of, under this development as we visualize it at the present time, is that we are going to duplicate the economic organizations that they have in the United States; that Ontario and Quebec are to be placed in the same position as the states of New York and Pennsylvania are in the United States, with complete centralization of everything. Anyone who takes a drive through the states of Vermont, New Hampshire and Maine in the United States will agree that that end of the country has been very badly neglected. While the disabilities of the maritimes may be great in comparison with central Canada at the present time, they are as nothing in comparison with what exists between the eastern United States and the central United States. I think that is a bad development; I think it is an unequal development; and I think it is a dangerous development.

If our fears of an over-all atomic war are well grounded, a greater decentralization of industry is necessary on this continent. Do not forget that if war comes this will be the target. We do not want to have all our eggs in one basket where they can be knocked out overnight. In that respect I think the United States has a bad development. A press item just a couple of nights ago pointed out that one of their top flight men in the field of atomic war or its potentialities emphasized to the defence organizations in the United States the urgent necessity of considering decentralization of industry in that country. I merely leave that thought with the minister, because that seems to be the kind of world that we are going to live in in the future. We have to keep our guard up, and it is much easier to plan your industries on a decentralized basis than to have to drag them somewhere in the middle of a war, as some other countries had to do in the last war.

I could say a great deal on this subject, Mr. Speaker. I could talk on it for a long time. No one should be uninformed on it. The material that has been available over the years and is available now on this subject, for and against it, is sufficient to keep one interested for a long time. I want to tell the minister that while I put a lot of evidence on the record that expressed fear as far as the maritimes are concerned—I think justifiable fear of people who are directly affected—at the same time I am not unalterably opposed to it. A good feature about it is that it is a government development. It is a development that can be watched by hon. members. The authority now being set up has great possibilities. When the minister closes the debate I would like his assurance that the body to be set up will have authority, in addition to developing the power end of it in the centre of Canada, to take on the power possibilities in New Brunswick and in other parts of the country that have been under consideration for some time. I would like his assurance that consideration will be given to the possibility of power from coal in parts of the country where it is necessary to do that, and that more attention should be given by an authority of this kind to the development of other industries based on coal, in view of the fact that coal as a fuel is threatened from many directions today.

I thank hon. members for granting me an extension of time. I will be listening with interest to the minister's reply and the assurances that I hope he is going to give us.

Mr. Daniel McIvor (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, I would be very remiss in my duty indeed if I did not have a word to say on this outstanding project. My first word is to congratulate the minister on his courage and foresight and on the splendid way that he expressed them in his brief. Fort William will be the last port of call for the ships coming up the great lakes. I can see that first ship coming up. It may be that the premier of Ontario will be on that ship as well as the Prime Minister of Canada.

I can think—at least I am free to think—that one of the outstanding reasons why the provincial government of Ontario was elected was the co-operation of the premier of the province with the dominion on this great question. That may not be the only reason, but to us at the lakehead it was an outstanding reason.

Unlike the United States, we are not self-contained. The United States can pretty well get along without the waterways. The tie that binds us to the United States is a tender one. Perhaps in no other place, though I come from the old land, have we so many near relatives as we have in the United States. But the United States can get along without this waterway, while we cannot. It now looks as if Canada was not going to try to get along without it very much longer. When the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) addressed a group of leaders in Washington the other day he said: "We are not bluffing." And any minister and any government that declines to wait ten years, or more than double that, for the United States to make up its mind to co-operate is not bluffing. When the United States knows that this resolution is before the House of Commons it will be more proof that we mean business.

It has been said that we need this waterway. We need it for at least four reasons. The first one is power. When we see in different parts of Ontario steam plants being built to generate electricity it is time for our government to wake up. I know the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) thinks that this is only for Ontario. That is only his argument, and I do not think he is convinced that he is right. Anyone who will say that this is for Ontario only is thinking in the wrong direction and for the sake of argument.

He also said there was no scarcity of ships on the great lakes. Had he been at the lakehead when that bottleneck occurred in connection with the handling of grain he would know that ships were taken off the work of carrying ore and placed on that of carrying grain.

Mr. Gillis: I know the hon. member wishes to be fair and accurate. I said I had never heard the question raised in the house concerning a shortage of ships for the movement of grain; and I have not.

Mr. McIvor: Thank you. I am glad you are changing your mind.

Mr. Gillis: I am not changing my mind; I am putting you straight; and sometimes that is a difficult task.

Mr. McIvor: The hon. member's statement is reported in Hansard, that there was a shortage of ships on the great lakes. If that is not so, then I forgive him.

Mr. Gillis: I suggest you read Hansard more carefully.

Mr. McIvor: We need power in Ontario, and if we do not have that power to develop our raw materials, then our railways will suffer. How are we going to manufacture our raw materials if we have not the power?

The second reason for the development is that of navigation, and it will be concerned principally with the carrying of freight. We expect however that passengers will be carried, as well. I am not going to say much more along this line. The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) has said that this great waterways development will be another step to keep pace with the agricultural and industrial development of our country. If we are going to keep up our industrial development, then we must have our waterways.

I know there is opposition to this project. I have received long letters and resolutions from the constituency of the hon. member who has just taken his seat. Their objections are reasonable, from their point of view, but not from the point of view of the whole of Canada. This country does not begin at Montreal and end at Toronto. The centre and hub of Canada is at Fort William; and when these waterways are developed, it will be a revelation to many to realize that there is as much beyond the great lakes as there is on this side of them. We were taught at school that when one part of the body suffers, the whole body suffers. If Ottawa is the brains of Canada, then Ontario is the stomach. If we are going to supply the needs of industry we will have to have this great waterways development. To me it is absolutely necessary.

A further objection is that the project will cost too much. I ask hon. members to keep in mind that Canada built the longest railway in the world, and that it was done many long years ago at a time when many who now sit in this chamber were unborn. That railway was paid for. Of course in the building there was assistance from the Scottish, the English and the Irish; but those who invested their money did not lose it. If they could build the longest railway in the world, why cannot we at this time build a great waterways system? We will do it.

I am sure when we see the first ship coming up into the Kam river and turning around in that big basin in which the boats turn, it will be a thrilling sight. I hope that no matter what the opposition may be, or where it comes from, the minister will look at it fairly and squarely, so that he may be fair not only to Nova Scotia and the east but also to others.

I know that if we had had ships when the bottleneck occurred in connection with the carrying of wheat—and there have been other bottlenecks—it would have helped materially in the shipment of that grain. Again I congratulate the minister upon his courage and foresight, and I hope he will stick to his job.

Mr. A. J. Brooks (Royal): Mr. Speaker, I am not going to follow the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McIvor) in his remarks. He has always been most complimentary to the government; no matter what it has done, it has always been right, so far as he is concerned. While I cannot agree with him in that, I am not going to enter into an argument at this time.

I do agree to a great extent with the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis). I should like to congratulate him upon having made an excellent case for the maritime provinces. I do not suppose any part of Canada would be more adversely affected by this project than would Cape Breton, nor is there any part of Canada that would benefit to a greater extent than Cape Breton, if the recommendation made by the hon. member were carried out.

He has placed on Hansard statements from a number of sources in the maritime provinces, particularly one from the united mine workers of his own district. I agree with almost every paragraph of their recommendations. I would add that the united mine workers of the district from which the hon. member comes is the same organization which governs the miners at Minto, in my constituency.

We are not as definitely concerned as are the miners in Cape Breton, because our New Brunswick coal enjoys, more or less, a local market, and we do not feel our market will be adversely affected to the same extent as will the coal industry of Nova Scotia.

Without the power to look into the future it is difficult to estimate just what the development of the St. Lawrence seaway will mean to this country. We have seen great developments and great undertakings in the past, of which some have turned out as anticipated, while others have not been so successful. There are very few that have not gone beyond the estimated cost for their construction; on the contrary, most have cost two or three times as much. I fear this St. Lawrence seaway development will be far more expensive than is expected.

In this connection I would refer to the building of the Hudson Bay railway to the port of Churchill. With a number of members of parliament I visited that port last winter and was amazed at the barrenness of the country. It occurred to me then that the building of the Hudson Bay railway must have been more or less of a mistake. That was impressed more upon my mind when I looked at the great grain elevator at Churchill and was told that the shipping season opens in August and closes before October and that last year only twelve ships sailed from that port with grain for Europe. When that matter was before the house all parties were in favour of building the railroad in the belief that it would mean much to the people of western Canada by providing a cheaper method of shipping grain across the ocean. That expectation has not been realized.

As I understand it, there are four principal reasons for the construction of the St. Lawrence waterway. The minister mentioned them the other day and the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McIvor) referred to them this afternoon. The first reason is that it will provide a cheaper means of carrying the produce of central and western Canada to the markets of the world and for the carrying of iron ore to central Canada and the United States. Another reason was that it would provide more cheap power for Ontario and possibly Quebec; and the fourth reason was that it was necessary for the defence of Canada.

Let us look at the first reason, that it will provide lower freight rates for the people in central and western Canada. The hon. member for Fort William said that the railroads of Canada are in favour of the development of the St. Lawrence seaway. The hon. member must have been reading material which I have not seen because any report or statement that has come to my notice indicates that the feeling of the railroads is much to the contrary, that they are much concerned over the development of the St. Lawrence seaway because they believe it will interfere with their freight revenues. There is no doubt in my mind that considerable traffic will be taken from the railroads.

I do not think it is necessary to point out that today the railroads of Canada are having a desperate struggle to maintain their equipment and roadbeds and to make enough to cover the ordinary operating expenses. If revenue is taken from the railroads, how will it be made up? No country, and particularly Canada, can get along without railroads. We can get along without our trucks, our aeroplanes and our ships but Canada today and in the future must have railroads. Anything that interferes with the development and future maintenance of our railroads interferes with the development of Canada.

The ports on the great lakes and the seaway will be in use for only seven months in the year; for five months of the year they will be idle. I saw a statement the other day that the thousands of men who might be employed in these ports during the seven months in the year will be without employment for the remainder of the year and be more or less on unemployment insurance and be a burden upon the people of Canada to that extent. If the railroads lose revenue through the building of this seaway, that loss will have to be made up by subsidy or in some other way by the people of Canada. If men are thrown into unemployment for certain months of the year the money to maintain them will have to be provided also by the people of Canada. I wonder if our situation financially is going to be improved through cheaper water rates.

The next point was that this would provide cheaper power for Ontario and possibly Quebec. We in the maritime provinces are sometimes envious of the central provinces because of their great power developments. A moment ago the hon. member for Fort William said that power was needed in the central provinces for the development of industry. I would point out to the hon. member and to this house that there is no part of Canada so much in need of cheap power as the maritime provinces.

What will be the result of additional cheap power in the central provinces? We have heard a lot in the house about centralization and decentralization of industry. It is only logical to come to the conclusion that if there is more cheap power available in the central provinces of Ontario and Quebec there will be a greater concentration of industry there and less industry will be available for the maritime provinces and other parts of Canada.

The hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) referred to the development of power in the maritimes. If that can be linked up with the development of the St. Lawrence seaway, all to the good. That is something that should be done. We are not small-minded and we have no objection to the development of Ontario, Quebec or any other part of Canada, but we want our own part developed also. That is all we ask for; that is all we want.

Another argument used by the minister the other day was that this would strengthen national defence. As far as defence is concerned, we are linked up with the United States. If the development of the St. Lawrence seaway is going to aid in the defence of Canada and the United States I should like to ask the minister why the Senate of the United States turned down the proposition. I think they are and should be just as much interested in the defence of the North American continent as we are.

The minister said that ships using the St. Lawrence seaway would not be vulnerable to submarine attack in case of war. That may be true, but ships using the St. Lawrence seaway will not confine their operations to the seaway and the great lakes. Many of those ships will be leaving the St. Lawrence and will be subject to attack by submarine in the Atlantic ocean. As far as I am concerned, that argument does not carry any weight.

Decentralization of industry is being carried out today in the United States and many other countries. For instance, Russia has moved her great factories beyond the Urals or to different sections of that great country so that they will be less open to air attack. In Canada we have a great concentration of industry in cities like Toronto, Montreal, Hamilton and other centres. Our industry is very vulnerable to attack. If our industry were dissipated throughout the country and more placed in the maritimes or on the prairies it would add to the protection of this country and make it much stronger.

The hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) referred to the next point with which I wish to deal. I do not wish to repeat too much, but following him it is difficult not to do so because he has mentioned nearly everything. The minister dealt with the building of ships and said that the construction of the St. Lawrence seaway would permit the building of ships in the sheltered areas of the great lakes. As the hon. member for Cape Breton South has said, the great ports of Halifax, Saint John, and Pictou form the cradle of the development of the building of ships on this continent. I should like to ask the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. McCulloch), the hon. members for Halifax and the hon. member for Saint John-Albert (Mr. Riley) what they think of the proposition of the future ships of this country being built in the protected areas of the great lakes, thus taking employment away from the people of Saint John, Pictou and Halifax. I do not believe that will be very much in the interests of the maritime provinces. In fact will be a decided loss.

To my mind one of the chief reasons why the St. Lawrence seaway is being developed is because of the Labrador ore. I think it is the nigger in the woodpile so far as the present haste is concerned. I believe it is one of the chief reasons why the St. Lawrence seaway is to be built now. We understand that the ore in Labrador and the northern part of Quebec is owned by United States interests. In developing the St. Lawrence seaway we are supplying transportation for the conveyance of this great asset to the mills of the United States. The raw material is to be taken out of Canada and processed in that country.

If we look at a map of Canada we will notice that the nearest and logical area for the development of this ore is the maritime provinces. As has been pointed out, it is necessary that coal and iron ore be in close proximity in order to produce steel. In Cape Breton there are mines which can supply any quantity of coal for the production of steel, and if it were not for the fact that the United States and central Canada are anxious to obtain the ore for their established mills anyone who was disinterested in the matter would look at the map and say that the great steel industry for the processing of this ore should be in Nova Scotia and the maritime provinces generally. We have an abundance of coal and an abundance of labour. There is no reason why there should not be greater development in that region than there is at the present time.

It is also a well known fact that other industries locate where the development of steel production takes place. We in the maritime provinces have felt that we are more or less of a depressed area. If we could secure the development of steel production and the establishment of other industries I believe our provinces would be in a position to take their place beside the other provinces of Canada. I should like to point out that in Australia they have more or less the same problem. Not very long ago I read an article in the Christian Science Monitor. The heading is, "Australia Begins to Work Remote Iron Ore Deposit". They have discovered tremendous iron ore deposits in the northern part of Australia at a place called Yampi Sound. The article reads:

Located on the north side of the Sound on Koolan and Cockatoo islands, this 100-million ton deposit will give new industrial stability to this vast thinly populated region which formerly was dependent on the seasonal fluctuations of the cattle industry for its prosperity.

Australia has realized that the development of a steel industry in the area where iron ore has been found will bring about new industrial stability for that region. I am sure the development of the steel industry in the maritime provinces to a greater extent would give new industrial stability to that area of Canada. I should also like to point out that the same article states that India, where there is a colossal reserve of some 6 billion tons of iron ore, is developing her own steel from her own iron ore. It is not being shipped out to some other country. Besides having the raw product, India is also developing the production of steel and giving employment to her own people. The article compares India's reserves of ore with those of the United States and points out that India has 6 billion tons compared with 3·6 billion tons in the United States.

The thought occurred to me that inasmuch as the United States has 3·6 billion tons of iron ore in her own country it should not be necessary for Canada to ship her iron ore to a country which has such large deposits. Like the hon. member for Cape Breton South, I do not wish to appear narrow in this matter. We are interested in the general development of Canada, and we always have been. We have always paid our share in the development of the great railroads and canals and everything else which goes to build up this country. We are still interested in the development of other parts of Canada. I have listened with much interest to the proposal for the development of the South Saskatchewan river project for the purpose of providing more power for the people and to irrigate certain lands to make them fertile so that there will be greater productivity. We in the maritime provinces are 100 per cent in favour of that development. I believe that the people of Ontario, Quebec and western Canada are prepared to assist in the development of any part of Canada where it is necessary.

When the matter of equalization of freight rates across Canada was being considered in the special committee on railway legislation I was very much pleased to see that the other parts of Canada, Alberta, Saskatchewan, British Columbia, Manitoba, Ontario and Quebec, realized the position of the maritime provinces. Every other part of Canada sympathized with their position and gave practical assurance of their sympathy for our problems in the legislation which was brought before the house. I believe that the people of other sections of Canada would take the same attitude if some practical idea for development in the maritimes were put before them. The hon. member for Cape Breton South spoke this afternoon about the Chignecto canal and Passamaquoddy projects. I think they should be linked up with the St. Lawrence seaway, and I believe we would receive support from every section of Canada.

Some of the fault lies with our own people. I should like to see the governments of the four maritime provinces tell the federal government just what they want. Some will advocate the Passamaquoddy project and others the Chignecto. Others will say we should develop cheap power from coal. Someone else will advocate the Petitcodiac project. I should like to see the premiers of the governments of those provinces get together and decide definitely on what they want. I should like to see them come as a united body and present their needs to the federal government. With the sentiment there is throughout Canada, as expressed in the special committee on railway legislation and in other places, I believe that Canada would be willing to give them what they want and we could get something definite. This idea is along the line of the suggestion of the hon. member for Cape Breton South a moment ago.

I do not know, Mr. Speaker, that there is very much more I can usefully say. As I said a moment ago, we do not like to object to a development of this kind, but we do express the hope and wish that the development will not be at the expense of one section and for the benefit of another section of the country; it should be for the benefit of the whole of Canada. I must say that I agree wholeheartedly with the statement made by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) a few days ago. I should like to read a portion of it which is found at page 1583 of Hansard for December 4:

> We have spoken about the need for the decentralization of industry in Canada. This is the time for us to plan the decentralization of great industries in every part of Canada. We have mills on the Atlantic seaboard today. As we plan for the use of iron ore, let us make sure that those mills now existing in eastern Canada are supplied with iron ore on a scale which will require much greater milling capacity than they have today. And let us recognize that while there are immense advantages in carrying iron ore to the established mills in the central part of Canada, there are equally great advantages in assuring steel supplies at seaports both on the Atlantic and the Pacific, so that we may be shipping steel in the form of steel to our friends and allies in other parts of the world.

As I say, Mr. Speaker, I agree with that statement contained in the paragraph I have read. I feel we must be practical in this matter of the development of the St. Lawrence seaway. I realize that probably 90 per cent of the members of this house are in favour of that development, and that it will become an established fact. I do not think anything I or anyone else can say or do will stop it. We realize also that there will be a power development for the province of Ontario, which needs that development. We realize that the iron ore which is owned by the United States will, to a great extent, go to United States foundries. But I believe our government has it within its power to see that a fair share of that iron ore will be smelted and fabricated in the Dominion of Canada.

We realize all those things. We realize also that if we are to have a great country we cannot ship all our raw products such as iron ore or pulpwood out of the country. We have an example of that in my own province. Companies in the United States own large areas of timber land, from which they cut and ship out of the country about half a million cords of pulpwood a year. The people of New Brunswick do the manual labour, and someone else performs the other work which commands higher pay. Only the other day the minister said the St. Lawrence seaway would be a great advantage for our maritime shipping. I noticed that last year, for instance, practically the only shipping on the St. Lawrence from our province was about 191,000 cords of pulpwood. Much of the freight for Newfoundland and parts of Quebec consisted of shipments of coal from ports on the great lakes. To my mind that sort of business is not of great advantage to our country.

I would close with this. I hope something will be done to provide cheaper power so that we may have more industry in the maritime provinces, and something will be done to see that our raw materials, such as this iron ore in Labrador and our pulpwood, are not shipped out of the country but are manufactured and developed here. If that is done then young people, not only from the maritime provinces but from other parts of Canada, will find employment in their own country, and be able to live here in peace and prosperity.

Mr. H. P. Cavers (Lincoln): Mr. Speaker, I consider it a great honour to have the opportunity of taking part in this historic debate, which will be long remembered for the contribution it will make to the commerce and industry of the whole of Canada. I should like to commend the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) for his masterful presentation when presenting this resolution to the house. I believe there was nothing lacking in any of the details of construction as given by him to the members of this house.

Canada has been blessed with the most important means of inland transportation in the world. From Father Point to the western end of lake Superior it extends 2,500 miles inland into the heart of the North American continent, nearly half way from Cape Breton to the Pacific coast. For sheer size the great lakes system is tremendously impressive. It consists of a water area of 95,000 square miles. Its total shore line on the inland lakes is longer than the combined shore line of Canada's Atlantic and Pacific coasts. Are we going to make the most of this great natural advantage that has been given to us? I say, Mr. Speaker, we cannot take advantage of these great natural resources until we have removed the bottleneck which exists between lake Erie and Montreal. The elimination of the bottleneck is what is proposed in the resolution introduced by the Minister of Transport.

It is not a new proposal that is being made to the house at this time. For over one hundred years Canadians have heard a great deal about the development of the St. Lawrence seaway. A celebrated citizen of my district of another day, the late Hon. William Hamilton Merritt, the founder of the Welland canal in 1824, envisaged a great waterway extending from our district up to Montreal and through this bottleneck. In September, 1895, a meeting was held with United States citizens in Cleveland, Ohio, to discuss the project which we are discussing today. We have heard a great deal of the matter since that time.

What does the scheme involve? It involves the building of a channel, 27 feet in depth, extending 2,000 miles into the heart of the North American continent. It has been suggested to me that possibly we have not gone far enough, that 27 feet is not deep enough to carry the type of ship we should like to have come up into the heart of our continent. It has been suggested that it should go deeper and the depth of the channel should be 35 feet.

With the great waterway we desire in Canada we have coupled the gigantic power development which will provide two or three power development sites. I often wonder whether the promoters of the St. Lawrence waterway proper have not been too ambitious and placed too much emphasis on the gargantuan proportions of the scheme, thus frightening some people in this dominion. The greatest obstacle to navigation, the rise of 326 feet between lake Ontario and lake Erie, has been overcome already through the building of the Welland ship canal, which was completed in 1930 at a cost of $133 million. We are not getting the most out of this great engineering feat which passes through the constituency which I have the honour to represent. It is true that there is much work to be done in the area between Prescott and Montreal. How much will it cost to complete this work? The best estimate that has been given up to the present time is $900 million. In his address the other day the minister made the statement that Ontario and New York indicate that they will undertake to pay for the development of power up to the sum of $400 million. If Quebec joins in the scheme for the development of power at Lachine they will pay an additional $250 million. In this resolution the government asks for power to raise $300 million to complete the proposition. Is it too much to ask that, for the great advantages that will be derived by Canada, we should authorize the government of Canada to borrow $300 million for the completion of this scheme?

Many years ago our forefathers built transcontinental railways to open up the great west. In recent times we have built such projects as the Welland ship canal costing great sums of money. I believe that it would bolster the morale of the Canadian people and give them confidence in themselves if they were to undertake and complete this great project. When can it be finished? As to the development of power, I am told that it will take four working seasons from May until December in each year, and that additional power can be made available to the people of Ontario and Quebec in 1955. It will provide for the generation of 2,200,000 additional horsepower, half of which will benefit Canada, to the extent of 1,100,000 horsepower. We need that power in Ontario and Quebec.

From the standpoint of navigation I am told that it will take about two years longer than the estimated time for the development of power. That would mean that it would be six years before we would have completed the seaway. The navigation and power development factors, it seems to me, are both compelling arguments for the completion of this project. For some period of time we have brought great amounts of iron ore from the Mesabi range at the head of lake Superior, but as time has gone on this great deposit of high-grade ore has been depleted. We now find that we must depend to a great extent on the ore fields of Quebec and Labrador. I can visualize great ore-carrying ships bringing ore from those deposits down the St. Lawrence river and the great lakes to steel-producing mills situated in Canada, developed by Canadian capital on the great lakes and on the Welland ship canal. We already have great steel mills in Hamilton, Toronto and Sault Ste. Marie. If this project is completed many more will be established and located on the great lakes system.

Western Canada has a great deal to gain with regard to the transportation of grain, especially wheat. I have discussed the matter with members of this house who come from western Canada and they are of the opinion that this seaway will be of great benefit to the western grain grower. Grain will be loaded in ships at Port Arthur and Fort William and carried to overseas ports.

Mention has been made of the great shipbuilding industries that can be developed on the great lakes. I do not need to inform many hon. members of the fact that we have already commenced a great shipbuilding industry on the great lakes. Last spring I had the honour to attend, along with the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier), the launching of the greatest steamship built on the great lakes. I refer to the S.S. Scott Misener, built by the Port Weller Drydock Company at the northern end of the Welland ship canal, which is within my riding. I know they are ready to go ahead with the building of more ships in their great yards. This work can be undertaken and completed in the comparative safety of the great lakes. I see other great industries expanding and developing along the shores of the great lakes and the Welland ship canal. From the standpoint of defence consideration, we need this great waterway not only for the development of power but for the fact that it will give protection to trade within the boundaries of our country.

Some residents of my own district have expressed considerable alarm lest the great lakes seaway will cause further erosion damage in the Niagara district. I am informed that the development of the St. Lawrence will not have the effect of raising the level of the lakes. I have been assured by competent engineers that the mean water level of the lakes will not be raised as a result of this development.

What then, Mr. Speaker, is the attitude of the United States? Every president from Harding to Truman has endorsed this plan. They have then sought the approval of congress, which has not seen fit to approve their decision. In 1941 Canada entered into an agreement with the United States, after years of study by engineers on both sides of the border. That agreement still has not been confirmed by the congress of the United States. During this debate the suggestion was made that the government of Canada had not made a strong enough or vigorous enough appeal to the United States of America. We do not need to remind the government of the United States of this great project because it has been before the minds of the governments of Canada and the United States for many years. You will recall, Mr. Speaker, as will hon. members, that the public works committee of the House of Representatives visited Canada less than a year ago. They were greeted by the Minister of Transport and other Canadian dignitaries, and were given the opportunity of going over the proposed undertaking, of perusing the plans and specifications that had been drawn. But when they returned to their native country, by a slight majority they voted against the scheme.

Then the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) made every effort in his visit with President Truman to see that this great scheme was carried to completion. I therefore believe that we should not be accused of not taking a vigorous attitude in regard to the development of this plan. In an international situation of this kind I think the government might have been criticized had they been too aggressive and too forceful with our neighbours to the south. It is my earnest hope, Mr. Speaker, that congress will still see fit to ratify this plan. If they do not, then we must proceed at once. Our people expect us to give leadership in this great project. They expect us to go ahead with this great development of Canada as a whole.

What about the matter of collection of tolls? If Canada does go ahead with this great project on her own, I submit that we are entitled to charge tolls on other than domestic shipping passing through the St. Lawrence seaway. We have already expended large sums of money on the development of the Welland ship canal and in dredging the watercourse from Montreal down to tidewater. It is only reasonable that we should charge tolls in order that we might collect the original investment and the interest that would be payable on an investment of these proportions.

As a citizen of Canada I am proud to support this resolution. I do so because it affects not only the district from which I come, but will be beneficial to all parts of Canada. As a citizen of the Niagara district I know how much it will benefit the area in which I live. We are in close proximity to power at the present time. We know what power will do for the expansion of industry, and I can see many new establishments bringing employment to our people and a higher measure of prosperity in our district. The St. Lawrence seaway, in peacetime, would strengthen prosperity in Canada. In time of stress or danger it would strengthen our defences to a common foe.

[Mr. Cavers.]

Mr. J. W. Noseworthy (York South): Mr. Speaker, the resolution before us is concerned with the setting up of a corporation for the purpose of providing a deep waterway between Montreal and lake Erie, and to provide an authority with the right to construct, maintain and raise money for the payment of that construction. The minister himself indicated how important he felt this project was in the progress of Canada. I agree with him that this is probably one of the most important measures that has come before this house in so far as its effect upon the general economy of the country is concerned.

The project can be a blessing to Canada. It is a mark of progress. When we realize that it is now just about a hundred years since we opened up that seaway for traffic of low draft vessels, and built our earlier canals; when we consider it is now just about twenty years since we signed our first treaty with the United States for the development of this project, which treaty was rejected by the United States Senate; when we consider that it is now twenty years since we spent what I am told would now be the equivalent of close to $500 million on the construction of the new Welland canal and the new locks, it seems a very appropriate time to move forward, to create this 2,000 miles of unobstructed waterway from the head of the great lakes to the Atlantic.

As has been pointed out, the project is twofold. It involves the development of power for the use of the province of Ontario, as well as the seaway. There can be no question regarding the necessity of developing that power. We are told that there are 1,100,000 unharnessed wild horses not being utilized by the province of Ontario, whose energy is available for the use of industry. One engineer has estimated that the power going to waste in the international section of the St. Lawrence is equivalent to the energy that could be created by 28 million men. It is certainly opportune that we develop that power. Those of us who recall the difficult straits through which we passed in Ontario during the latter years of the war and shortly after, those of us who realize the extent to which industry was handicapped by the shortage of electric power in this province, can visualize quite fully the need for the development of the available power in the international section of the St. Lawrence.

It is quite apparent that the power project could be developed without the seaway. As a matter of fact I understand that the Ontario Hydro Electric Power Commission was very seriously considering trying to get an agreement between the government of Canada, the state of New York and Washington that would enable them, in conjunction with the appropriate authorities in the state of New York, to develop that power without a seaway, since it seemed obvious that there was not much likelihood of getting a very speedy agreement between the two countries regarding the development of the seaway itself.

It does seem sensible that when we are developing that power project we should at the same time make provision for the development of the seaway. As far as I can gather, it is much more economical to develop them both together. The waterway itself will have an enormous effect upon the economic life of Canada, an effect that itself can be for the good, or one that may not become an unmixed blessing. Whether or not it becomes an unmixed blessing will depend, I think to a large extent, upon the policy which is followed by the government in conjunction with the building and maintenance of this great waterway.

Certainly I shall favour the resolution. To me it is unthinkable that at this day and age Canada, with a prospective 2,000 miles of unobstructed waterway from the heart of the continent to the Atlantic, should continue to permit that waterway to be obstructed for a distance of approximately 100 miles. Ships take on and bring down through the great lakes half a million bushels of grain. Some of those ships can carry 15,000 tons of cargo, all of which has to be transshipped into smaller boats which have to climb up and down twenty-one locks. Then at the other end we have available facilities for ocean liners to reach the port of Montreal. It does seem in line with progress that we should connect those two sections of our waterways system, and that we should provide through the hundred-mile international section a waterway that will permit vessels to pass from the head of the lakes to the coast.

The next point is as to whether Canada is justified in proceeding alone, without the co-operation of the United States, if that becomes necessary. If we fail to obtain that co-operation, then I am all in favour of proceeding with this project. Indeed, I am not sure but that in the long run it would be better for Canada if we were to proceed with the development alone. It can be built entirely within Canadian territory, and after waiting twenty years I think we should not wait longer for the co-operation of the United States. This becomes of greater significance when we are given to understand that it will be self-sustaining.

I believe we should keep in mind that in connection with this waterway the United States is in a different position from Canada. We have been told this afternoon there are sections of our country that question the final outcome of this development. In the United States there are more sectional interests, great financial and industrial interests, that have opposed and continue to oppose the development. On the other hand the United States is no longer a frontier country, and there is not the same national need for this type of project. Our neighbouring country is well settled and is crisscrossed with numerous means of transportation: it does not depend as we do upon the export of raw materials and natural products. There are many reasons why the United States may be less interested in the carrying out of this development. For these reasons I would certainly support the government's move to proceed with the building of the waterway, with or without the co-operation of the United States.

For a few moments I should like to refer to the authority to be set up for the construction and maintenance of the project. There is no doubt that it will bring about a marked change in the economy of Canada, and will have a direct effect upon east-west transportation in this country and upon transportation generally. I suggest, as did the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis), that when we embark upon work of this kind, where we are spending so much money on something that will affect all parts of Canada, the authority established should have the financial means to study how the development will affect our Canadian economy, and should have authority to undertake the wide range of activities that will be necessary if Canadians are to derive the full social benefits of the undertaking. If the St. Lawrence waterway development is left for the exploitation of private interests, the people of Canada may well stand to lose many of the social benefits that would naturally accrue. Then, the authority should take measures to avert any harm or anything detrimental that may flow from the development and affect any region in our country. We have heard this afternoon how it might have a detrimental effect upon the economy of the maritime provinces. The authority should be such that it can consider those factors, and should be permitted to take whatever steps are necessary to offset them.

Transportation is one aspect of our economic life which will be affected by the opening of the canal. The whole east-west transportation system in Canada will be affected. The toll fixed will have to be tied in with road and rail freight rates. Our transportation system was not built to tie in with a great waterways scheme such as is now visualized. In my opinion the authority to be established to construct and maintain this project should be in the nature of the Tennessee valley authority. It might very well be called the Canadian great lakes-St. Lawrence authority. One matter that should receive consideration is the effect this project will have upon the transportation systems of Canada.

The minister referred to shipbuilding, but there is more than that involved. There is involved the whole question of the use of ships, what types of ship will be used on this great waterway and so on. The minister indicated that the boats plying the seaway would not eventually cross the ocean, that their cargoes would have to be transshipped at Montreal or some point on the Atlantic. Would it not be possible for a research project to develop a type of vessel which could be used economically on the great lakes and at the same time be sturdy enough to stand the Atlantic ocean in order that goods from the head of the lakes could be carried to various parts of the world without having to be transshipped on the coast?

Certain it is that the huge carton-like ships that now ply the great lakes and which carry, as I said, up to 15,000 tons of iron ore or coal could not venture out upon the ocean. It is also pretty well established that the majority of ocean-going vessels would not be able to come up into the great lakes even after a 27-foot canal is provided. I have here a report by the Brookings institution on this subject. This report indicates that a 27-foot waterway would be of little use to combination passenger and cargo vessels; that 85 per cent of the passenger-cargo vessels now plying the Atlantic would not be able to use such a waterway. These vessels represent 95 per cent of the aggregate tonnage. The report states that the proposed 27-foot channel could not be navigated by 85 per cent of the faster cargo ships, that now reach a speed of 12 knots or over and represent about 65 per cent of the total tonnage.

It must be realized that the day of the slow vessel is past and that speedier and larger vessels now form a much greater percentage of the total tonnage in use than when this report was prepared. A 27-foot channel would exclude 87 per cent of the tonnage that operates under regular schedules out of Montreal and Quebec, and it could not be navigated by 60 per cent of the aggregate grain tramp tonnage engaged in overseas trade. This channel could not be navigated by 81 per cent of the cargo vessels, nor by any of the tankers now engaged in international trade.

It is quite obvious that we cannot expect a large percentage of the vessels now cruising the ocean to enter this waterway even with a 27-foot channel established to the head of the lakes. It is also apparent that ships now using the upper lakes and the sheltered waters of the St. Lawrence will not be able to cruise the ocean. A question worthy of consideration is whether there could not be developed a type of ship which could navigate that 2,000 miles and then carry on to world ports without its cargo having to be transferred. I think this would involve a research problem which an authority such as this might well undertake.

Then there is the question of shipbuilding and the establishment of outfitting docks and yards. This will depend upon the government's policy regarding centralization or decentralization of industry and population. This waterway is bound to have a great effect upon the location of population and industry in Canada. Great changes in the location of industry and population may well follow the opening of this waterway. Whether or not we are to continue to enlarge a few centres now equipped with docks or whether some of the smaller towns along that waterway which at one time were important are to be revived and dockage provided will depend entirely upon the policy of the government with regard to the centralization or decentralization of industry and population.

Many new towns may be developed along that waterway and many ports whose past glories have faded may be revived. Here is an opportunity to decentralize industry instead of bringing more to the larger industrial centres of Canada. This is a question which I think should receive the consideration of some such authority.

It is because these and many other problems are bound to arise from the development of this waterway that I suggest the authority to be set up should have its scope and responsibilities enlarged. A question raised this afternoon had to do with the extent to which the maritimes might suffer. Certainly it should be the business of this authority to plan the economic development which will follow upon the construction of the waterway. As hon. members have pointed out, part of that planning should be toward the establishment of new industries based upon the natural resources already available in the maritimes and other parts of Canada. There is also the question of conservation. In certain parts of Ontario the shore line is being washed away year by year. The building of the seaway with the consequent creation of large reservoirs of water will destroy much scenic beauty and may very well increase the problems we now have in connection with the conservation of the shore line. I certainly think an authority such as this should assume some responsibility. It should be given the right to co-operate with the provinces in the preservation of land along the route, and particularly in the creation of recreational facilities. That is a very large field there.

I am supporting the resolution and the project both with respect to power and the waterway, but I am suggesting that consideration should be given to the setting up of an authority with much wider power than is visualized in the resolution; and I have tried to indicate a few of the problems with which such an authority would have to deal.

Mr. J. H. Dickey (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I will not delay the house long, but I think I should say a few words at this stage of our consideration of this extremely important subject. It is quite obvious, I think, that most of the members of the house who represent constituencies in the maritime provinces are approaching this very important matter with a real effort to avoid taking a negative attitude. I can assure you, sir, from my knowledge of the feelings of the members from the maritime provinces who sit on this side of the house we do not approach this problem with a negative attitude at all. We regard, as I think most Canadians do, the proposal for the St. Lawrence deep waterway and power project as a most important development. I am sure hon. members and the government, however, will recognize our responsibility to consider every implication of this tremendous undertaking, to express, not only now but in the future stages of this legislation and also during the years in which the whole project will be developed, the interests of the maritime provinces, and to take every step that we feel is required to ensure that the vital interests of the part of the country we have the honour to represent are fully considered and protected.

I do not propose to go into any great detail on this subject at this time. A number of speakers preceding me in this debate have dealt at some length wth the aspects of this proposal which they, or groups in the maritimes from whom they have received representations, regard as threats to the essential economy of that part of the country. The hon. member for York South (Mr. Noseworthy), who preceded me, spoke at some length at the end of his address on the nature of the authority which he considered should be set up to carry out this important development. It is certainly my view that nothing should be done in the setting up of the authority which would in any way shift the responsibility of parliament and the government to oversee the effects and implications of the carrying out of this policy in order to ensure that it does not do direct damage to the maritimes, the west or any other part of Canada. That responsibility should remain in this parliament where the elected representatives of any part of the country that may be adversely affected can raise their voices to explain the difficulties and use their influence to ensure that policies are adopted which will prevent any damage of that kind. I hope that the hon. member had no thought of that kind in his mind, but in view of his expression of opinion I wanted to place myself on record as feeling that this important responsibility should remain in the hands of the people's elected representatives and not in the hands of any authority which might be set up to construct or carry forward this project.

I think all members of the house should be grateful to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) for the masterly way in which he opened this debate. His exposition of the policy underlying the resolution was not only a treat to listen to but I think gives us a very sound basis upon which to proceed with this discussion and the consideration of the resolution itself. He laid some stress on the importance which he attached to the project, and of course that importance should not be underestimated. He spoke of the project from the point of view of defence. I think that is a matter we should consider very carefully indeed. Any work of this magnitude which is urgently needed for the defence of the country must demand our consideration. The actual construction and existence of the waterway would of course involve the creation of a number of vital points that in themselves would require protection, and in that sense they create a problem of defence. But given the ability to provide local protection for the important works and structures which will form the physical part of this development, I think we must recognize that its existence will be an important tool of defence if this country is ever again faced with the kind of emergency that we passed through between 1939 and 1945.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, we should never forget the continuing importance to the country of this development from the point of view of defence. The Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) in this house, and the Minister of Defence Production (Mr. Howe) in a speech at Washington, referred, as part of its importance from the aspect of defence, to the expansion of shipbuilding facilities in the protected waters of the great lakes. I believe that is of importance, but I should like to point out that adequate shipbuilding and ship repair facilities will continue to be of the utmost importance on the Atlantic and Pacific coasts, in spite of the provision of new facilities in the central provinces. The facilities at Halifax, Saint John and in the St. Lawrence river are of fundamental importance. While we would never take the position that facilities should not be expanded as they are required in other parts of Canada, we must insist that the facilities on the Atlantic and Pacific coasts be maintained because of their national value. As the needs require, they should be expanded and developed.

Over the last two years a great deal has been said in this house concerning the decentralization of industry. One thing about the St. Lawrence seaway and power project that worries the maritime provinces is that it appears to have a strong centralizing influence. I believe the government recognizes the importance of carrying out, in so far as it is possible, an orderly and economic policy of decentralizing the industry of this country. I should like to suggest that in the important developments which will follow the opening of the seaway, and the development of power facilities which will be a companion to that project, the important objective of the decentralization of industry be not forgotten. Steps should be taken to see that this policy is followed in every field in which it can be followed.

The hon. member for Royal (Mr. Brooks) spoke with feeling earlier in this debate about the use in this country of our natural resources, and the importance of seeing that great resources such as the iron ore bodies in Labrador and Quebec are used and processed in this country. That is a sentiment with which we all can agree. He asked why it was that according to present indications this iron ore will go to the United States to supply the needs of the steel mills in the central part of that country. The hon. member suggested that there was some direct connection between the development of the seaway project and the use of those iron ore deposits for that purpose. I believe he is probably correct when he says there is some direct connection between those two propositions. After all, when transportation facilities exist they create traffic, and the need for the movement of traffic creates transportation facilities. However, I should like to point out that in considering the development of the tremendous volume of iron ore situated in the central part of Quebec and Labrador, we must remember that it would be impossible to conceive the amount of capital that might be required to make those resources available to an industry which could not possibly take the volume of the product which would be required to make that development economic.

I wonder, Mr. Speaker, how many years it would be before there would be any possibility of undertaking the tremendous job of making these iron ore resources available to a purely Canadian steel industry. I should think it would be a matter of generations. However, under present conditions the existence of a demand in the United States for large yearly supplies of iron ore will make it possible to develop from these resources, in the first year of operation, something like 10 million tons of ore. I foresee that once that development has been undertaken, and once that ore is flowing down the railroad to Seven Islands and to tidewater, it will create a situation which should provide companies and individuals in the maritime provinces with an opportunity to show their initiative in the employment of supplies of iron ore of a very acceptable nature for the development of our basic steel industry.

Representing the city of Halifax, as I do, I should at least make some reference to the effect which this great project may have on ocean-borne trade. In this connection the Minister of Transport said, as recorded on page 1577 of Hansard for December 4, 1951:

> In this connection it may be of interest to note that ocean-going vessels are not expected to play a major role on the seaway. They may very well enter in some numbers, to be sure. But in the circumstances I have outlined it would appear that an ocean vessel would not enter unless it had an inbound cargo as well as an outbound offering. No doubt there will be those that would have this advantage, but otherwise most of them will find it more attractive to pick up their cargoes at Montreal or some other transfer point.

I think this shows that, so far as can be foreseen at the present time, the indications are that the construction and the use of this seaway will not have a significant effect upon the present pattern of the handling of Canada's export trade. In Halifax we have the disability of a seasonal port business. But I think the normal expectation would be that the pattern of this business will not be fundamentally changed by the existence of the seaway, and that we can look forward to some substantial increase in the winter traffic through Canadian Atlantic ports by reason of the expected increase in the general export business of this country which will be assisted and influenced by the existence of the seaway.

The extremely important element of cheap power has also been mentioned in this debate. The development of hydroelectric power has been of tremendous advantage to the provinces of this country which are so magnificently endowed with those resources. However, they are resources much in the nature of coal fields, oil wells or other resources of that kind. We in the maritime provinces certainly are not well endowed in the field of hydroelectric power. We shall have to turn more and more to the development of power by other means which are as cheap as we may be able to devise. However, we have never taken the attitude that, just because we do not possess these great natural advantages, those fortunate enough to possess them should not develop the resources that lie within their borders. I think that same argument applies to the development of the tremendous sources of power which, as has already been pointed out, are now running to waste to no advantage to anybody. However, I think the principle must be maintained, Mr. Speaker, that the cost of the development of this power must be borne by the people who will use it, and who will reap the advantage from it.

As to the cost of this development, I should like to point out that both as to the power development and the seaway, the proposal is for a self-liquidating project which will not be a burden upon the general revenues of this country and which will not be paid for by the taxpayers generally. The existence in this country of a magnificent system of inland waterways which have been paid for and maintained out of the general revenues of the country has for many years been a disability to the maritime provinces, which were not in a position to get any direct benefit from the existence and the maintenance of works of this kind. If the proposal for the seaway were to be of that nature, we would have to oppose that feature most firmly indeed. That, however, is not part of this proposal; and it should be remembered by all that this undertaking will not be a charge upon the ordinary revenues of Canada.

That is all I propose to say on this matter at this time, Mr. Speaker. I propose to support this motion on the basis of the few remarks I have made. I assure you that we will follow with the greatest interest the development of this matter both with the idea of forwarding the development of Canada in every way which may be proper and at the same time protecting the essential interests of the maritime provinces.

Mr. G. C. Nowlan (Annapolis-Kings): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the pattern of this debate is becoming painfully familiar to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) and to him must be somewhat reminiscent of the debate upon the railway bills, in which he heard much talk about the plight of the maritimes. Even the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Dickey) also made an address at that time along somewhat the same pattern as the one he has just made. All I can say to the Minister of Transport is that if he listens this time to the representations we make as carefully as he did during that former debate, and if he acts with as much kindness and generosity towards us, we will make him an honorary member of the maritime provinces association.

It is difficult to speak on this proposal in a critical way. One is open to criticism for being an isolationist, a maritimer or a small Canadian. It is particularly difficult to speak in a critical way on this matter when obviously the views which one expresses may not be held by the great majority of the members of this house; and it is quite obvious that they are not. Nevertheless, coming as I do from the maritime provinces and with certain definite mental reservations, at any rate, I feel that I must express these views at this time.

There is one matter I should like to raise at the outset—and it was referred to by the hon. member for Halifax a moment ago—namely the question of the cost of this undertaking. Frankly I am far from satisfied with any information we have so far received with respect to the cost. If, as I understood the hon. member for Halifax to imply, this is not going to cost the treasury of Canada anything, then certainly I would ask the Minister of Transport to give that assurance when he closes this debate. We have heard talk about tolls, and it has been suggested that revenue would be derived therefrom. Frankly I doubt if the minister is in a position to give any assurance as to the quantum of money which will be derived from tolls or to suggest that those would provide for the liquidating of the enterprise as a whole. Obviously the hydro angle would be a self-liquidating enterprise, we will assume. But I have here clippings galore, with which I am not going to bore the house at the moment, from shipping associations and various groups such as that, all pointing out that it would be impossible to charge tolls which would make this a financially profitable venture, or even a liquidating or an operating one. Not at this stage, of course, during debate on the resolution but when we are in committee on the bill itself I would ask that the minister be specific as to what is anticipated with respect to tolls on traffic which will go through these canals, whether the tolls are going to be applied to all traffic or only to some. I have read the debate which took place before the United States congressional committee, and there it was stated that no tolls would be levied upon traffic which came through the other canals. I do not know whether that statement is right or not, but there is a great deal of vagueness and uncertainty with respect to the matter. I must also say that it is not a matter with which the minister dealt clearly in that admirable speech he made the day before yesterday. The impression I gained from reading his speech was that he found so many things on which he should speak that he omitted to speak with respect to the costs of this undertaking. Not only is there the operating cost; there is the capital cost. We have a conglomeration of figures, of suggestions and estimates, but nothing specific whatsoever. We are told: if you combine hydro and navigation you get so much; if you have co-operation between the United States and Canada you get so much, and if you have this and that you get some other treatment. But nowhere have I seen a definite estimate. In the resolution we have the creation of an authority and the empowering of that authority to spend so much money. Is that all that is contemplated? How much more is it estimated that it will cost to build this enterprise? What is the situation if the United States remains out?

As I understand it, there were discussions during which it was suggested that if this were a joint enterprise the United States would contribute part of the amount which we have already expended on former capital works, certain parts of the Welland canal, and that has been included in these figures. That we know. But if the United States stays out what is the situation, Mr. Speaker? All I am suggesting is that at the appropriate stage this house will expect from the minister a very clearly defined statement of the financial position of this enterprise, as to its capital cost, as to the operating cost and as to where the money is to be derived from to operate it. What will be the tolls imposed on what traffic, and what proportion of the operating expenses will be met by those tolls? That is one general matter on which we will look forward to hearing the minister at a later date.

There is another general observation that I should like to make, Mr. Speaker, one which is perhaps not too popular here. I say it with deference, and I say it sincerely. I must say that the minister did not stress it too much the day before yesterday. Personally I am rather weary of hearing this justified as a defence measure. Obviously we intend to get more steel production some day, and as steel is essential to defence then to that extent I suppose it may be termed a defence measure. Well, I have before me a copy of the Financial Post of August of this year, which contains a leading article written by Mr. Ken Wilson, an authority whom I think most people would accept. I notice in it he says it will take eight years at least before this seaway can be brought into operation, and it will take six years before the hydro development can be completed. Now, Mr. Speaker, if our war effort is harnessed to such a slow, leisurely pace as that then I think the suggestion made in this country is most unfortunate. We heard the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) speaking to the nation over the radio the other night. We heard the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton), speaking in this house within the last forty-eight hours, emphasizing the need of more men and the fact that this country was facing an emergency with which it had to deal. How do you combine that statement with this other one that it is essential to our war effort? Yet, it is something that does not materialize in one phase until six years from now and in another one until eight years from now. I think frankly it is part of the propaganda which is being used to sell this enterprise to this country. It makes a very plausible argument, but I do suggest that it is not in keeping with the realities of the situation.

I am not going to enter into a discussion at this time as to the relative defence qualifications of this canal with respect to the easy shipment by water to the Atlantic coast; but it has been suggested that by inland waterways you have absolute protection and by other shipment you face great danger. There is a real question about that. Why, Mr. Speaker, are we apparently erecting a network of radar stations in this nation? Why do we need large sums of money in the estimates for civilian defence? We are not anticipating attacks by submarine in the city of Ottawa and in the city of Winnipeg; we are anticipating attacks from the air. Apparently the suggestion is that planes may come over and pinpoint a refinery at Sudbury or an oil well at Leduc, yet they may miss completely the vast network of waterways which is contemplated by this resolution. I do not think it is a reasonable proposition. That could be justified only if the same fog rises from these waters as sometimes has been created by the propaganda which is released.

There is another general observation which I should like to make because I come from the east, as some others do. I think our position is relatively analogous to that of the eastern seaboard of the United States. Some will say: You are a little Canadian. There are Americans in the House of Representatives and the Senate of the United States who come from the Atlantic seaboard. As I said, I have read the debates which have taken place in the committees there, and as I recall it every member of either party representing the Atlantic seaboard in these congressional committees was opposed to a similar resolution with which they were dealing at that time. They have taken that attitude not because they are little Americans, but because they thought it was prejudicial to the interests of the Atlantic seaboard of the United States. If they were justified in that stand then I suggest that possibly there is some justification for the same position that we take here.

It is true that the opposition has diminished in this country; it is true that fewer voices are being raised. There is no questioning that whatever. I sometimes wonder whether that is owing to the vast influence of government entering into all sorts of organizations, industries and even municipal affairs, where possibly criticisms are not voiced which would have been voiced heretofore. At any rate you do have that opposition there, and it is one that I think we should recognize.

What may be the results of this action? One does not want to be positive in this debate, as I think the minister pointed out in his own address. This is a matter dealing with the future, and far be it from me to make specific declarations of gloom, disaster or abundant promises arising from it. But I think there are certain consequences one can suggest which would inevitably follow; and in this I follow very largely the thoughts which have been expressed by the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis). I do not think there is any question in the world, Mr. Speaker, but that this will adversely affect the coal industry of Cape Breton. There can be no question about that because at the moment coal from Cape Breton moves by water up the St. Lawrence river to Quebec and through an area that may be termed the Quebec region. United States coal, operating back and forth across the great lakes, cannot come down the St. Lawrence without having to be reloaded into those small barges, and the expense is such that it is not done. Once you have your seaway established I suggest that United States coal, coming out of the great lakes, will come down the St. Lawrence river to the city of Quebec, and to those areas which are now being serviced by Nova Scotian coal, and the result must be unfortunate to the Nova Scotia coal mining industry. If that follows it will also be unfortunate for the agricultural industry of the maritimes and of Nova Scotia, because to some considerable extent we are dependent upon the markets of the industrial area of Cape Breton with respect to many agricultural products in Nova Scotia.

I suggest also with great deference to the Minister of Transport, who is an authority on this matter and with whom I would not want to quarrel or argue, that there must be some adverse effects for the railways as well. The minister said there would not be. He said: You are going to develop a great deal of industry and an increase in production, and that will result in greater traffic to the railways. It is a plausible argument, Mr. Speaker, and one which I would not completely deny. But I would ask the minister: Where is your concentrated area of population? It is in this area of the great lakes and the St. Lawrence basin, is it not? What will happen? You will get the result of this increased production moved by water to various centres along that great waterway of which he spoke. Then what happens? It will be distributed from there by truck on both sides of the river and both sides of the lake, to all the adjacent areas. I suggest that the railways will get but very little of this increased traffic in the concentrated areas of population of Canada. They will, of course, have to carry freight to the outlying portions of the west and the maritime provinces; and what will happen? The freight rate will have to be increased in order that they may do so. The minister himself said, with a degree of optimism which I would like to emulate, that we would be shipping goods by water from the maritimes to the head of the lakes. I think it is possible that casual shipments will be made. But, as the minister himself pointed out, shipment by water is not a one-way route. Ships are not going to load and come back empty. We will have those ships operating only when they are carrying a load one way and bringing a return load the other way. I suggest there will be very few of those shipments made from maritime ports to the head of the lakes. What goods are moved will be at the expense of the railways. After all, one does not have to be very old to remember that ten or fifteen years ago there was a great problem confronting this nation. It was not the problem of defence or the problem of war; it was the problem of transportation. The Canadian Pacific Railway was facing financial troubles and had to come to the government, to parliament, for assistance. The Canadian National Railways were looked upon as a conglomerate lot, draining the public treasury of money. Then there was enforced co-operation; and we dealt with one of those bills the other day. It was popular to say that in our transportation facilities we were overbuilt for the next fifty or seventy-five years, and that we were facing disaster because of that condition.

Then came the war and ten years of an inflationary boom. Now we are proposing to build another great transportation system which will compete with the railways to a greater extent than ever before. I suggest to the house that, given a reduction of the present level of production, and given a return to former conditions—and one does not wish to describe them as normal—given a return to conditions which prevailed before the war, the transportation facilities of this country will be facing problems which will make it most difficult for them to carry on, and which will have been accentuated by this development.

Then there is another problem—and perhaps it is a psychological one—which confronts the maritimes. The hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Dickey) suggested it. I refer to the whole problem of the production of steel. In the maritimes, rightly or wrongly, we have had the feeling for many years that the steel industry, based as it was on iron ore from Labrador and limestone and coal in Cape Breton, could develop Cape Breton into the rough equivalent of a Canadian Pittsburgh. That is what we believed; that is what we still believe. Now what do we see? The main argument advanced for this waterway is that it will facilitate the shipment of iron ore to mills at the head of the lakes. One cannot accept that with too great a degree of equanimity. I can understand why the people of the maritime provinces resent the implication contained therein. I say there is a real danger for any government that progresses too far along that road and recognizes or admits that these iron ores should be exported to the United States over an indefinite future.

In that respect my leader yesterday afternoon made our position abundantly clear. I wish to support what he said in that connection, because there is a belief which could be developed into an emotional feeling in this country—and emotional feelings are dangerous as applied to governments or to any other group—that we are being exploited to a certain extent. We recognize the necessity for the maintenance of contractual liabilities. We admit all that was said by the hon. member for Halifax about American capital coming in. But we do say that the government, through the Minister of Transport, should say in this debate that adequate steps will be taken to safeguard our iron ore, so that having fulfilled our contractual obligations to the United States quantities of steel will still be reserved for manufacture in Canada, and particularly in the maritime provinces.

Give us heavy industry and secondary industry will follow. That is our problem in the maritimes, and we believe this is an opportunity to rectify it. That is the feeling against this whole proposition today. As I have said, to some extent it may be psychological; but the fact that it is psychological makes it none the less real. Certainly the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) did not relieve that feeling when he suggested one day, apparently with great horror, that if this seaway were not built the steel industry would have to migrate to the Atlantic seaboard. Well, let me point out that in the United States three vast steel plants are now being erected on the Atlantic seaboard. What is good for the Americans in this respect would also be good for Canadians. Steel does not follow industry; industry follows steel. If we get a steel industry located in the maritime provinces we will have other industries following it. That is something I trust the minister and the government will bear in mind when they are dealing with this matter.

So far as our ports are concerned, to a large extent I agree with the hon. member for Halifax. I think the effect on those ports has been exaggerated. After all, Halifax and Saint John are winter ports. The other ports along the St. Lawence are used in the summer, as are the ports of Montreal and Toronto. But in the winter the ports on the Atlantic seaboard should be used as they have been in the past, and I doubt if there would be any adverse effect upon the maritime provinces in that respect.

Then, of course, there is the financial question. That may not be so important, but if the waterway is built we will have to bear part of the cost of the undertaking—unless the minister qualifies that to some extent in his speech later on. Why should we be asked to bear part of the cost of an undertaking which militates against our welfare? Why should we pay part of the cost of an undertaking which makes no contribution whatsoever to the solution of our problems, on a national basis? We are not small Canadians. We are not asking special concessions. But we do say—and in this I join with the hon. member for Cape Breton South and others—that this should be considered as part of a national plan. If it were considered on that basis we would be prepared to accept it, provided we are shown that in the national plan our special problems will receive consideration and fair treatment. But there is no suggestion of that whatsoever. The discussion thus far has been carried on on the basis of this development being something that will solve the hydroelectric power problem in Ontario, which I think Ontario might very well solve herself if she were free to do so. There has been mention that there will be great industrial development around the lakes. I do not believe I would be reflecting unduly upon that development if I were to suggest that the development and industrialization south of the border, on the United States side, will be far greater. They will benefit from this to an even greater extent than will the cities on the Canadian side. Yet we are paying for it. I saw a figure expressed by a United States engineer the other day, who said that 90 per cent of the benefits from this seaway development would enure to United States cities, United States industries and United States manufacturers. Yet Canada is paying the whole shot.

It has been suggested that we are winning in some sort of game in which we are bluffing the Americans by saying we will go ahead alone. I am sure we are proud of our developments, and we are proud the Prime Minister was able to go to Washington. The shock he gave them over there was a thrill for all Canadians. But, irrespective of that, the fact remains that United States industry which is buying raw material, manufacturing it and shipping it out is in a position to benefit far more from this development than are any Canadian industries.

Hon. members to my left, from the beginning, have said that this will assist in the shipment of wheat, and that it will help the wheat producers of the west. That is an argument I should like to accept. I know nothing about the production of wheat and less about its marketing, but my thought has been that the marketing of wheat is settled not by the farmer on the prairies but by the buyer somewhere else. In fact I have heard it suggested in the past that it was settled by the Winnipeg grain exchange, when that body has been criticized from time to time. It may be that there will be a saving of four cents per bushel, but who is going to profit from that? Will it be the farmer in the west?

An hon. Member: Absolutely.

Mr. Nowlan: I just hope the hon. member is right. How can they profit from it when the British government buys it and they agree to the price? Without entering into any argument on the technicalities of marketing wheat, I suggest that if there is a saving, and I think there may be, that saving will enure to the purchaser on the other side of the water and to the middleman who handles the wheat. I say to my hon. friends that it may happen that instead of profiting from it they will find the price of wheat lowered because the cost of transportation is lowered, and consequently they will have to sell at a lower price than they are receiving today. I hope that I am wrong, but I am suggesting that is a possibility which has been argued by many people who I think are greater authorities than anyone sitting in this house right now, outside of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier). I am giving it as my own impression of something one should consider.

There is another matter I should like to mention. I am glad to see the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) is here. I have heard him speak many times in the house, and properly so, about the decentralization of industry, how industry should be decentralized throughout this country and particularly in Saskatchewan. I suggest to him that when this goes through the opportunity for the decentralization of industry will be a thing of the past. Industry will become more and more centralized. He can bid good-bye to Churchill. Possibly that is where the Minister of Transport intends to get the steel to be used for this project, by tearing up the railroad now running to Churchill. Certainly that route will not be used, that route will be a thing of the past when this waterway goes through.

Mr. Ferrie: Do not be so small.

Mr. Nowlan: We will see what the future has to say about that. I am not being small; I am presenting an argument. I suggest that we in the maritimes are prepared to accept this if it is to be part of a national plan, an over-all plan whereby the needs of all Canada will be recognized and proper arrangements made therefor. We realize that this is a vast nation and that there are bound to be sectional differences, that there are bound to be unequal opportunities. I suggest that any government in the future, particularly one which assumes the responsibility for this gigantic project, must bring it forward as part of a national plan.

One thing said by the minister the other day rather shocked me. We are not shocked when the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) says something because we are getting used to being shocked by the things he says and one does not expect to take them too seriously. But the Minister of Transport is a gentleman, he is an astute minister who usually holds the house in the hollow of his hand. The other afternoon he used as one of his arguments as to why this scheme should be accepted the fact that the shipbuilding industry will be moved to the head of the great lakes. Not satisfied with losing a steel industry, not satisfied with the fact that the decentralization of industry about which so much has been said is not being recognized at all, we are faced with the bland assumption that the shipbuilding industry is going to be transferred there.

Mr. Chevrier: I am sure the hon. gentleman does not want to misquote me or say by inference something that I did not say. At the time I was giving four reasons why the project was beneficial from the point of view of defence. One reason I gave was that it would create a shipbuilding and ship repair industry in the great lakes in wartime. That does not by any stretch of the imagination indicate that shipbuilding will be taken away either from the St. Lawrence yards or from the Halifax or Saint John yards.

Mr. Nowlan: I realize that shipbuilding is a private industry, and I realize that no government can transfer shipbuilding to the head of the lakes or elsewhere, but I do suggest that at least it was not tactful at this stage of the proceedings to raise the red flag of shipbuilding. Shades of Samuel Cunard, shades of the Nova Scotia flag and the great ships we have built and which have sailed the oceans of the world! Regardless of what may happen in wartime, I suggest that the minister is a little optimistic with regard to the shipbuilding industry. It may be that instead of having a shipbuilding industry at the head of the lakes it will be found that the ships will be built on the Clyde or the Elbe on the other side of the water and sent into the great lakes, and that any shipbuilding industry now at the head of the lakes might well vanish.

There are other projects which should be made part of a national plan, some of which were suggested by the hon. member for Cape Breton South. Reference has been made to the 'Quoddy project and the benefits that would accrue to Nova Scotia. I know nothing about engineering, so I cannot say whether power can be developed and transported such great distances. But anything that would be of advantage to the maritimes should be investigated in evolving a national plan. There is the Chignecto canal, and also another matter in my constituency, the development of power by the great rush of waters past cape Split. Hundreds of thousands of horsepower could be developed there.

Then there is one other thing to be considered. I do not want to appear to be living in a Buck Rogers age, but frankly I would hate to be a minister who would suggest the expenditure of hundreds of millions of dollars in developing hydro power in this day and age when we have a statement by our own atomic energy commission that the development of power for civilian use by atomic means is a possibility within the next five years. There is one thing the government of Canada must do, regardless of the possible development of power at 'Quoddy or at cape Split; that is, investigate the possibilities of the development of atomic energy to be used in those places which would benefit most and thus be compensated for their lack of power.

Mr. Chevrier: May I suggest to the hon. gentleman that the minister has not suggested that one red nickel be spent for power.

Mr. Nowlan: I realize that this is a combined power and navigation project.

Mr. Knowles: Red cent.

Mr. Chevrier: I reduce it accordingly.

Mr. Nowlan: The two must run closely together, and I am quite sure considerably more than a cent or a nickel will have to be used in the effort. As I said, we are not opposing this matter at this stage, at any rate, but we do represent people whose feelings are definitely aroused. Unless some of our doubts are removed, unless the position can be made clear, we may have to take action at a later stage of this resolution when the bill is before the house.

If this project can be developed and recognized as part of a national scheme, then I think it will be accepted by all parts of Canada. If it is simply to be a project which is to have only local merit, if it is to be something which will result in further centralization of industry and the increase rather than diminution of disadvantages faced by other parts of Canada, then it is not something that will meet with the approval of many people in outlying parts of this country.

At 6.15 p.m. the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. J. H. Ferguson (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, for many years I have heard the great St. Lawrence waterway project discussed. I was very intimate with the late O. E. Fleming of Windsor who for over thirty years sat on a commission investigating this matter. On many occasions I had the privilege of discussing with him the great advantages which he anticipated would result from the development of the St. Lawrence waterway. In later years he changed his opinion because of the terrific cost involved for the taxpayer of Canada. I have talked to many citizens in the beautiful cities of Toronto, Windsor, Sarnia, and my home city of Collingwood. Some of them say: Well we are developing rapidly now but when the St. Lawrence waterway is put through industries will pop up like mushrooms; houses will do the same thing, and we will not know what to do with our wealth.

Level-headed men and women seem to forget that progress is only made by labour and great foresight. One national project of this kind, not coupled with terrific national planning, in my opinion is absolutely useless. Right now the people of Canada are confronted with a problem. For instance, bacon of comparable quality to ours can be purchased in stores in the United States for 45 to 47 cents a pound. You may ask what that has to do with the St. Lawrence waterway. I will tell you in a minute. The price in Canada is 75 to 80 cents a pound. Shortening is 3 pounds for 97 cents in the United States compared with 40 cents a pound in Canada. Coffee can be purchased in the United States for 78 to 85 cents per pound compared with $1 in Canada. Eggs are as low as 49 cents per dozen in the chain stores in the United States contrasted with the recent price of 80 cents in Canada. Such prices are almost necessary in Canada for those who participate in paying our taxes. The grocer, the butcher and the automobile producer must pay terrific taxes in Canada for this country to make progress. We have such a small population compared with the United States. People in Canada pay the federal government $400 in taxes on an automobile compared with a tax of $80 on a similar car in the United States.

I do not blame our grocers and butchers for charging the prices they need to get in order to meet the taxes that are now being imposed upon the public of Canada. Cigarettes are a good example. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott), in search of shekels with which to run the country, imposed taxes which have brought about the cigarette bootlegger. The cigarette bootlegger makes a profit even though he has to spend some time in jail because some people would rather buy cigarettes from him than pay the exorbitant taxes imposed on cigarettes in Canada.

The people of Ontario—and I come from Ontario—with whom I have talked about the St. Lawrence waterway are very enthusiastic. Last evening in the city of Toronto I was talking to a man of some substance. He is the manager of a large corporation, and I complimented him on the steady growth of his city. He said "Oh, wait till the St. Lawrence waterway is finished." The benefits to be derived from it seem to be on everybody's tongue. I said: "Just how will it benefit the city of Toronto?" He said, "Well, it will benefit Toronto; Montreal will be out". I said, "Do you realize Montreal is the end of the bottleneck, the end of the line so far as shipping is concerned today?" I pointed out that ships must stop there because they cannot proceed through the shallow waters of the St. Lawrence. That is why they stop at Montreal. It is the end of the line. "But do you mean to tell me the city of Toronto will be the end of the line if the St. Lawrence waterway is opened?" "Oh, no," I said. "Do you realize that the men on the grain boats loaded at Fort William are not going to stop off to shake hands with the mayor of Toronto? Toronto will never see them." I said, "You talk as if you can visualize the Queen Mary coming up to Toronto and dropping off passengers there." He said, "Well, maybe they will winter her here." Why would they winter in the city of Toronto? Why would foghorns hail the arrival of great passenger traffic in Toronto? What are they going to ship to Europe from Toronto? Let us be realistic about it. Sure, they are going to ship tons and tons of grain from Fort William if Europe will buy it, but the price will be a big factor as to whether or not they buy grain. Without the St. Lawrence waterway having anything to do with it, we know the taxpayers of Canada had to subsidize the western farmers to the tune of $65 million because the British people would not increase their price

Mr. Blackmore: That is not right.

Mr. Ferguson: According to the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), they paid a proper price. He said they paid ample for it. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) disagreed. The government got together—

Mr. Knowles: Did they?

Mr. Ferguson: —and rubber stamped the payment of $65 million. It was the buyer who set the price. It was the buyer who said: That is the price we will pay irrespective of the freight. The people of western Canada believe this great waterway is going to give them a much greater price for their wheat. That is not so at all. It will be the buyer who will set the price, and if Mr. Stalin lifts the iron curtain the British will be buying in Russia the same as they have in the past. Grain may accumulate in the western provinces. The time is not so far distant that we cannot remember when grain was stacked all over the place in western Canada. Freight rates had nothing to do with that. There were no buyers in Europe. The barns, granaries and elevators were bulging.

The hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Dickey) made the statement in the house that this project was not going to cost the taxpayers any money. I think he is the only man who has the secret of how to grow money on trees. There was never a dollar expended in Canada that was not a cost to the taxpayers.

Mr. Blackmore: That is not right.

Mr. Ferguson: It does not come from the air. I know the Social Crediters have new ideas about money. So have I; but it is real money. This project is going to cost the taxpayers money. Therefore they are going to have to pay greater taxes, instead of having taxes reduced. The people of the United States do not want to contribute a dollar towards this deeper waterway. Why should they if the Canadian taxpayer will pay for it? The Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) has not even given a partial guarantee of any positive advantages Canada will derive from the waterway. Undoubtedly the power end of this transaction is necessary, and will pay for itself in time.

The commodity which is shipped out of Canada in the largest quantity today is wheat. It is shipped to Europe as European buyers can afford to pay for it. Just what portion of the great lakes is going to benefit tremendously from this development? The hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McIvor) talks about great steel plants at Fort William. If this project were being developed at the same time as other necessary projects in Canada, I could see where there would probably be great advantages. So far I am convinced it will only be of great advantage to the United States steel companies. I cannot see how we are going to develop our steel mills to any extent. In today's newspaper I noticed an advertisement of A. E. Ames and Company soliciting the purchase of Atlas steel first mortgage bonds and debentures. The total issue is for $8 million and is for the expansion of their plant. I understand that the Steel Company of Canada at Hamilton is now working on an expansion program totalling $50 million. Canadians buy a fair quantity of steel in Canada, and then go around with their hat in their hand asking the United States to please give them a little steel because it is badly needed.

If the dominion government would lend Atlas Steel $8 million, not at 4¾ per cent but at 1½ per cent, it would create employment in Canada and help in the fabrication of Canadian raw material. Then we would not have to beg from the United States. I believe such a program would have the full support of all citizens. If the government had offered to lend the Steel Company of Canada $50 million at ¼ of 1 per cent to encourage the expansion of plants for the fabrication of steel, so we would not be subservient to the United States as we have been for this most necessary product, they would have been better advised than putting the cart before the horse and advocating this gigantic seaway plan. There are so many necessary projects in Canada which have not been completed, such as the irrigation scheme in Saskatchewan. Almost every Canadian must be sick at heart when he realizes that the population of that great province has dropped this year. How in the world can the other provinces in Canada progress when a province such as Saskatchewan actually has a drop in population? The maritime provinces have coal. There is iron ore in Quebec and Labrador, but it is all controlled by United States capital. Canadians will become again the drawers of water and tillers of the soil, while the profits from these products go to our lovely cousins to the south.

I am glad the people of the United States are investing their money in Canada, but I should like Canadian investors to be encouraged to put their money into these things so they will reap the profits and reinvest them in Canadian enterprise. I should like to see steel plants developed in the maritimes and in Quebec. I should like to see them developed in Fort William. I believe steel plants could be developed in Fort William today just as they were developed at Hamilton, Sault Ste. Marie and Welland, Ontario. What is wrong with the people of Fort William? I ask the hon. member why these plants were not developed long ago. Is the mere fact that they have a deeper waterway going to cause a boom in Fort William? I can recall forty years ago when all the real estate men for hundreds of miles around were flocking into Fort William and Port Arthur. It was going to be another Chicago in ten years, but it is still not a Chicago. Many people bought property there at exorbitant prices, but today property values are far below those prices. If cities like Port Arthur and Fort William have a sane sensible growth they will not skyrocket just because a project like the St. Lawrence waterway has been completed. The taxpayer of Fort William will have to pay his share of that development. Just how much is it going to mean to Fort William and Port Arthur?

Ships are being built today in Fort William and Collingwood because those boats are too large to go up and down the present St. Lawrence waterway. A $4 million tanker is being launched at Collingwood today. I believe it would have been built in Italy, Germany or England if there had been a deeper St. Lawrence waterway. If this scheme goes through we may see grass growing again in the shipyards on the great lakes. I believe we shall see many of our inland sailors laid off and supplanted by cheaper European sailors. I predict that with the completion of this seaway most of our grain will go out in foreign bottoms, manned by foreign sailors. A terrible blow will be dealt to the ports on the great lakes. I should like to ask the members of this house exactly what we know about the benefits that will be derived from this project. I feel that 90 per cent of the members are in favour of it. I am in favour of the hydro development being completed as quickly as possible. I am in favour of the St. Lawrence seaway if I can see great advantages to counterbalance the heavy expenditures. I believe there are other parts of Canada upon which money should be expended from which immediate and positive benefits would be derived. Unless we call upon the taxpayers of Canada to dole out almost unbelievable sums of money in order to induce immigrants to come to this country, to construct factories and work in the factories, then this canal is years ahead of its time.

Today we are bringing in immigrants at the rate of about 100,000 a year, about 50 per cent of whom are children; and our taxpayers have to pay for their education. There may be 35,000 immigrants spread across Canada to help fill the need for labour in this country. I believe this government should have given greater guidance with regard to the over-all picture in Canada, in the development of industries and power projects in all provinces. But the great hullabaloo reminds me of a government which is sending up balloons constantly. When the public gets sick of one balloon they throw up another. One such balloon was that there would be no conscription; then there was conscription. Then they said: We will throw up the balloon of the baby bonus. Now they have another balloon, in my opinion, and that is the great St. Lawrence waterway. It is a great vote-getter. I hope all those who are talking in favour of it are satisfied that this government is going to look after the other projects in all provinces, that need looking after so badly. You know full well, Mr. Speaker, that the development of power and irrigation in Saskatchewan has been on the hooks for years. Now another commission is debating as to whether or not it will ever go through.

I should like to have a yes or no answer on these things. I should like to know whether we have gone to our limit in doing what we can for our maritime provinces. I am an Ontario man, but I know it is not a healthy condition to see Ontario booming ahead and at the same time the other provinces, whose prosperity is so necessary for an over-all great Canada, slipping back. That sort of thing simply cannot go on. I am speaking in fairness to the entire dominion of Canada, from my viewpoint. I hope that this government have given every consideration to such necessary things as immigration, the development of all of our provinces and a fair share of expenditures to them all rather than a concentration on this St. Lawrence waterway.

I am positive that some people in Toronto will say: There is the member for Simcoe North and he is against the great waterway. I feel it better to be against it rather than to be like a friend of mine who talked to me in Toronto last night, and who can visualize the Queen Mary in Toronto harbour. He can visualize all the concentration of shipping that is going to Montreal being dumped into Toronto. That is a fallacy. Why not make Windsor the great point, or Sarnia? Why not construct a new port on this canal down at lake Erie?

Mr. Knowles: Do not forget Collingwood.

Mr. Ferguson: Well, last but not least, Collingwood. Is this waterway going to affect our railroad system that we are constantly paying to keep going? Is the effect going to be such that there will be increased taxation to pay for the lack of freight on our railroads? I just wonder how many men in the House of Commons have given this matter a great deal of thought, outside of visualizing the continual stream of traffic up the St. Lawrence river, in to Toronto, through lake Erie, up the St. Clair river, in to Owen Sound, and every town booming on account of this seaway. I really think most of them have not given the matter thorough study, having regard to what we are not doing in other parts of Canada.

To me, this project is not worth anything running on its own. What freight are we actually going to ship to Europe outside of our wheat? Our manufactured products? The Europeans are down on their hands and knees now trying to ship us their manufactured products so they can buy our wheat. We all seem to think the St. Lawrence waterway is going to make all the manufacturing concerns of Ontario and Quebec boom, that they will load up these boats with goods, send them down the river and over to buyers, who cannot afford to pay for our products. The next thing will be that you will find this government wanting to lend money that they know they will never get back. We are doing that with regard to our wheat today. They will say: Buy our electric trains made in Owen Sound and Collingwood. We will lend you the money to buy them with. We have the deep waterway. We must use it. We spent the public's money on it. Two hundred and fifty million dollars? Watch it when it is finished. I will go on record tonight as saying that it will cost closer to $400 million before it is finished in six, eight or ten years time. This country has only so much money to spend. The taxpayers can afford only so much.

Mr. Fraser: They are gouged now.

Mr. Gillis: They are going to be gouged some more.

Mr. Ferguson: Can they afford this expenditure? I am not trying to take some political stand on this subject. I am not trying to catch votes. I am trying to talk facts. Can the taxpayers of Canada, with a population of 14 million, afford this enterprise at the present time? Are there not many more essential things that we need?

I know western Canada. I know every part of it. I know this country from the border at the south to Hudson bay; I know it from Saint John to Vancouver. I have not said of Ontario that it is the greatest province in the world. I prefer to say that this could be the greatest country in the world. I prefer to say that our workers are getting top wages with United States labour. I prefer to say that a man can buy an automobile within reason in this country without being gouged $400 in taxes on his Ford car. I am speaking because I hope soon, owing to a greater population, taxes will be reduced due to the fact that we have a greater home market than we have today.

I would say: Go across the sparsely settled western provinces. I remember going across them with my father over fifty years ago, when he said to me: Son, when you are my age this country will have 50 million people. I have passed his age and he has passed to the great beyond, and we have 14 million people owing to nothing but lack of foresight on the part of the governments, both Conservative and Liberal, that we have had in power. We need in Canada today men like those who built the C.P.R. right across this country, who had vision and confidence, and who were willing to develop the gifts that God gave to Canadians in the way of great resources. This is not a gold mine in the St. Lawrence river. It is not an oil well. I believe all industries across this country should have been encouraged to develop themselves so they would all go along in harmony and this country would have developed into what it should be. I say that Canada's population today of 14 million people is an absolute disgrace to the planners of the past, particularly to the planners of the past 35 years. We have said that we do not want immigration here lest we be contaminated. My family have lived in this country for over 150 years; and when I cannot compete against a newcomer who cannot even speak my language, the sooner I walk into the river until my hat floats, the better.

I have heard men who had good positions say: We do not want a melting pot here as in the United States. I heard one man say it today. I have heard another man in my own constituency say: We do not want these foreigners; they will take our jobs. I just looked at him in utter disgust. Just imagine a man who has been educated at the expense of the taxpayers of this country and who speaks the language prevalent in this country being afraid that a man who cannot even speak his language and who has half his education is going to take his job away. I have had men say: Well, these newcomers do not eat as well as we do. Let me say this. They ought to visit some of my foreign friends, where they do not get their food out of tin cans. They get it from the back garden, and it is succulent food at that. It is probably far more healthy than the stuff most of our Canadians are trying to eat. Just one excuse after another is offered. It is selfishness that holds back the growth of this country. It is time we members of this House of Commons spoke our minds and stopped this nonsense of Canada being talked of as a melting pot. Let us go ahead and encourage immigration. Let us bring artisans out here as well as farmers. Let us show them what we want them to do. Let us give them an opportunity of doing it.

Not many months ago a doctor from Roumania arrived at our shores. His wife is a Viennese. There is one gentleman in the House of Commons who does not know what I am talking about. I have always advocated a loudspeaker system in this house so hon. gentlemen could hear the speeches. I am sure if that hon. member could hear what I am saying he would profit by it.

This doctor from Roumania to whom I referred, for the privilege of coming to Canada, the land of the free, had to wash dishes in a Gravenhurst sanatorium for one year. How can we expect our newcomers to tell their children what a great country we live in when they reflect back upon the sentence they had to serve on coming to the land of the free, namely washing dishes in a Gravenhurst sanatorium for one year. We are asking doctors to do that. That is the way we have been handling immigration. We should have a planned immigration scheme in this country. Bricklayers, carpenters and others should be coming here and being spread amongst all of the provinces of Canada to develop our country. Instead of doing that we are concentrating our thoughts on the St. Lawrence seaway. In my opinion the cart is being placed before the horse. I am not saying that it will not be beneficial in years to come; but there are many items that are far more essential and on which the taxpayers' money could be spent at this time than the St. Lawrence waterway project.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the resolution carry?

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I wish to make a few comments on this, Mr. Chairman. They are really inspired by the remarks made this afternoon by the hon. member for Annapolis-Kings. I am going to vote for this resolution. I shall do it with certain questionings as to detail. It seems to me the leader of the opposition was right when he said that in a sense this is not a new plan, not a new design, not a new undertaking; it is merely to complete an existing undertaking. As I say, I propose to vote for it; but in saying that I should like to say also that I share some of the questions which have been raised as to whether this is going to be just as rosy all the way through as some people imagine. I could not help feeling this afternoon that the hon. member for Annapolis-Kings might have been warranted in raising certain questions as to whether this would immediately benefit the railways; whether it may be creating problems that none of us want to create. But I shall not take up the time of the committee on that. What I really want to do, speaking as an Ontario man, is say that I feel at the present time we are leaving our brethren from the maritimes in a position in which they should not be left.

We have listened to them this afternoon. We have heard the arguments they have made, and I do not think that we can regard them as trivial or unwarranted. Really all we have to say to them is: Come along. This is a big conception, a big project; it is going to be for the welfare of Canada, and you will be on the band wagon. You come along, and you will benefit like the rest of us. Well, the people in the maritimes have been hearing that for a long, long time, and I am not surprised that it sounds a little hollow. And although none of us intended it should be false, it may sound a little false to them. I do not mean that in the sense of being dishonest; I mean it is something which we may really intend, but which may never come true. I mean by that, it may never come true in any future near enough for them to be able to take much interest in it. There is no use talking to people who are going to live their lives in the next ten, twenty or thirty years and telling them that this will be a grand thing for their children or their grandchildren, and that they will benefit from it, because it is altogether likely that their children will have left the maritime provinces by that time.

It is not as if it were merely that they did not think this project would benefit them. They actually think it will do them harm, very substantial harm; and as one listens to them again, as I said a moment ago, it is awfully difficult to meet those arguments. The minister shakes his head. Perhaps he can meet them better than I can; but at any rate I am expressing my view for what it is worth. I find it very difficult to meet them. I will say this to the minister: No matter how persuasive he may be, I doubt very much whether even he will find arguments which are going to satisfy the people from the maritimes if things are left as they are at the moment. When I say "left as they are at the moment" what I mean is this. I submit the minister has done what has been done so often in the past. He is only holding out hopes to them that they will benefit. There is an exception to that. He pointed out that work would be provided in the maritimes by the iron ore production, but apart from that there was little enough hope. Indeed, as has been pointed out in the speeches which have been made, there was a great deal in his speech to alarm them and make them feel that actually not only would the seaway not help them but it would hurt them.

I want to go on from there to make this point. This afternoon the hon. member for Annapolis-Kings went a long way. I think he showed himself a true Canadian in his desire to find a common ground. He said in effect: "We want a common ground; we want to look at this in a broad sort of way. But there must be an over-all plan, not merely a plan which is going to come true in some vague far-off time which nobody can be sure of." In the past, of course, similar situations have existed; and I think in the past governments have been in difficulty because they did not have the means, unless they were going to abandon all their idea of government, to directly influence enterprises to establish here or there. They could do it to a small extent by taxation, but not to any very substantial extent.

My purpose in rising tonight, Mr. Chairman, is to point out that situation exists no longer; that the government now, if it wishes, has in its own hands the power to make definite statements as to what can be done, not this year, next year, sometime or never, but at once. My reason for saying that is what was explained to us this morning in the committee which is dealing with defence expenditures. I wish to read briefly from some of the information which was given there, which will show what I mean when I say that government at this time has it in its own hands, if it wishes to take definite steps toward the end. This is not a new thing; I know it has been mentioned to this government again and again. They have been asked to spread out industry. Let me come to the point. Briefly—

Mr. Benidickson: Order. Has the committee made a report, Mr. Chairman?

Mr. Fulton: He is not talking about the committee's proceedings; he is talking about a document.

The Deputy Chairman: If the hon. member is referring to the proceedings before that committee, and if the committee has not yet reported to the house, it is not in order at this time to read from the proceedings.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Then I will just give it of my own knowledge, Mr. Chairman. I believe it to be a fact that the defence production committee has spent $100 million on construction in the past six months, and presumably will spend more than that in the months to come.

Mr. Knowles: It is really the department, not the committee.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): The Department of Defence Production. The second point I wish to make is that a great deal of that expenditure is being made for the purpose of bringing into being new industries which are being developed on what is called the insurance plan. That is to say, if international affairs become worse we have to be in a position to quickly expand production. We must have plants developed for various purposes, which we can scarcely expect unassisted private enterprise to do. Therefore the government is stepping in. In certain cases it is providing buildings and in other cases it is providing tools. In various ways it is directly assisting the establishment of industries in various parts of this country to the tune, as I said, of $100 million in a six months period. And I suppose it is extremely likely that amount may accelerate.

Therefore I say we have to meet a situation which, so far as I am aware, has not existed in this country in the past. The government is able, if it wishes, to make definite commitments, definite assertions as to a plan which could be put into effect in the immediate future and which would do a great deal to allay the misgivings of our friends from the maritimes, which no one who has been in the house can doubt are very real. The minister thinks he can answer them, and he may answer them to his own satisfaction. But he will agree with me in this, I know, that it is not desirable that we should have a whole area of this country, an area inhabited by people whom we all respect as being among the very best, an area in which the people feel that fortune is against them and that they are not marching on with the progress of this country. They feel deep regret when they see their sons leaving their own provinces and coming to central Canada. I am sure no one regrets it more than the minister.

I come back to refer to what was said by the hon. member for Annapolis-Kings; that he wishes to take the broad view but points out the difficulties. The minister will remember that he said something like this: "If we could only have an over-all plan for all the people, it would be all right". The minister will agree that the over-all plan, except in so far as it affects the country west of Montreal, is rather nebulous. It embodies hopes which neither he nor I nor anybody else in this house thinks will satisfy the maritime members.

And so I say that, speaking as one from central Canada, I feel we have gone on long enough asking our friends from the maritimes to be content with just hopes for the future. Now the government has it in its power, with these tremendous expenditures it must make, to make a definite plan which would satisfy the maritimes and which, if announced now, might permit them to vote for this measure.

Mr. Green: Is the minister not making any reply to the comments of the hon. member for Greenwood or other hon. members who have taken part in this debate?

Mr. Chevrier: I would prefer, if I may, to reply not only to those comments but to the comments of all hon. members who have spoken thus far against the resolution. I would prefer to make those comments on the bill. I understood from the statement made yesterday by the leader of the opposition that he was prepared to consider both these resolutions at the same time. I also understood from him—perhaps I was mistaken; if I was, I shall take it back—that there might be a possibility of reaching the second reading stage of the bill with respect to power.

I believe the discussion on the first resolution has been fairly complete, and I would hope it might be possible to complete that discussion and get on to the resolution concerning power, and then to the bill. At that time I would be delighted to take up some time of the house, in fact a considerable portion of time, to make the necessary reply.

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, this is one of the most important measures to come before the Canadian House of Commons for decades. Questions have been raised today which merit a reply from the minister. I suggest this is not the proper time to take short-cuts, and that it would be in the interests of the country if the minister were to reply at this stage, as is the usual custom, rather than wait until we reach second reading. After all, at the resolution stage questions can be asked. I would urge that the minister deal with these matters now.

Mr. Chevrier: I am prepared to do so now. I had hoped to do so later, but if the committee feels that I should speak now I am prepared to proceed.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Are we dealing with the two resolutions now?

Mr. Green: No.

The Deputy Chairman: We are dealing with the resolution having to do with the deep waterway.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, I feel that perhaps at the outset I should commend the leaders of the house for the attitude they have taken in the debate. There can be no doubt that the statement by the leader of the opposition strongly supports the resolution; and, I take it, both resolutions. I must say, however, that I am somewhat surprised at the attitude of some hon. members who have taken part in the debate, because the discussions have not followed the course one usually sees. I have yet to hear anyone rise in his place and say that he is diametrically opposed to the scheme. Perhaps I should qualify that by saying that some members—two, if not three—have said, "We are all for this, if it is for the good of the country", and then have proceeded to make a forty-minute speech against it.

That is why I say we have witnessed a strange kind of debate. I would refer particularly to the hon. member for Annapolis-Kings, who took that particular attitude. His statement was that 90 per cent of the members in the house are for these resolutions, and that he would not put his knowledge against that of the others. Then he proceeded, with a list of things which I shall discuss later on, to give all the reasons why this development should not be carried out.

At least we must accept the fact that the hon. member for Cape Breton South started off by saying he was opposed to it, and then wound up by saying, Well, perhaps it was not too bad, after all.

Mr. Gillis: Mr. Chairman, I know the minister does not want to make an incorrect statement. That is correct, and the record will prove it. I said I was going to document evidence that was unalterably opposed to it, and that is what I did. Then this afternoon, in the last ten minutes I made my own statement, and I said I was not unalterably opposed to it.

Mr. Chevrier: I accept the hon. member's statement and his correction of my statement. Then I take his position to be this, that when he made his initial remarks they were to the effect that those whom he represents in the house were against it; but then, toward the end of his remarks, he gave his personal opinion as being favourable to it, on the whole.

Mr. Gillis: No, that is too all-inclusive. I did not refer to "everybody" I represent in the house. I called witnesses through documentary evidence from the mineworkers, the steelworkers, the municipalities and the like.

Mr. Chevrier: Well, I wish to go on with my statement.

Mr. Gillis: Well—

Mr. Chevrier: Just a moment, now.

Mr. Gillis: I am not going to sit here and let the minister put words in my mouth. As long as he keeps misinterpreting me, I will continue to interrupt.

Mr. Chevrier: Let me tell my hon. friend if that is the statement he makes, then I have no alternative but to accept it; and I do accept it. I shall deal with his arguments later on, and we will see how serious they are.

Then, in the remarks of the hon. member for Simcoe North, if anyone was listening to him, it was difficult to find out whether he was for or against.

Mr. Ferguson: I am glad to hear the minister say that at least he was listening. I made mighty sure he was listening, too.

Mr. Chevrier: I do not know whether he was for or against it, and I doubt if anyone else in the house knew whether he was for or against it, from what he said.

Mr. Ferguson: I am against it because I do not believe this government have developed the things they should have developed. I am against this until those things are done. There is no indecision about that; I am definitely against it.

Mr. Chevrier: Have I the floor, Mr. Chairman? I believe I have, and I should like to proceed. I am dealing with the remarks of the hon. member for Simcoe North, and I say that no one who listened to him could make up his mind whether the hon. member was for or against it. I will quote his words, which I took down. He said, "I am for the power," and a little later on, "I am for the waterway provided I can see my way clear to support it."

Mr. Ferguson: That is right.

Mr. Chevrier: What that means I do not know, and I am sure members of this house do not know. That is why I prefaced my remarks with the statement that I thought this to be a rather strange debate. Most hon. members got up and said this was a good thing provided it was beneficial to all parts of Canada, and then many hon. members proceeded, either in their own words or with documented evidence, to give arguments against it. I would like to deal with the arguments that were given against it, and I do this in answer to what the hon. member for Greenwood said. I do not pretend that I shall be able to answer all his arguments or that I shall be able to satisfy members from the maritimes, but I shall attempt to answer the arguments as I understand them and I will do it with all the sincerity of purpose of which I am capable.

The hon. member for Cape Breton South began his remarks the other night by stating that the united mineworkers of his constituency were against it, and he put on the record seven reasons why they were against it. He then proceeded to say that they had made a series of careful researches over a period of time and found that they were against it. Why were they against it? Because it was going to be a danger to their livelihood. What I intend to say in reply to that is not said with the slightest idea of disparaging the united mineworkers. I am sure it will not be taken as such, either by them or by my friend.

Over the last fifty years Canada has been studying this project and has had at least ten or twelve reports strongly in favour of it. It began away back in 1919 when the international joint commission, after having given it the most careful study, decided that power and navigation should be developed on the St. Lawrence. Later on they appointed a joint board of United States and Canadian engineers which went into the matter most carefully and decided it was a good thing for Canada. Then later on both countries appointed a board composed of three Canadian engineers and three United States engineers who studied it for several years and came to the conclusion that it was a good thing for Canada from the point of view of engineering and economy as well. The international joint commission gave it further consideration and again reported in favour of it.

Then there was convened in Ottawa in 1928 a conference of Canadian engineers who gave it their unqualified approval. Later on—this will reply in part to some of the allegations made by the hon. member for Cape Breton South concerning the lukewarmness of the province of Quebec—a board composed of one Quebec engineer, one Ontario engineer and one federal engineer declared themselves in favour of this project.

In 1932 a treaty was signed by Canada and the United States known as the treaty of Washington. This supported the project, the only difference being that it was to be a two-stage development instead of one-stage, with a control dam. The Prime Minister of that time was a maritimer. Surely he must have weighed the arguments for and against the part of the country from which he had originally come. He declared himself in favour of the scheme. Then in 1941 a government headed by the late W. L. Mackenzie King signed the great lakes and St. Lawrence basin agreement. That was done only after careful consideration. Economic studies were made by various departments of government, a recent one being by the Department of Trade and Commerce which was made in 1951. After careful investigation they concluded that this was a good thing, not for one part but for all parts of Canada.

The last but not the least of the arguments which I think should be replied to and which was put forward not so much by the hon. member for Cape Breton South as by the hon. member for Royal, and the hon. member for Annapolis-Kings, was that by no stretch of the imagination could this be conceived as a defence project. They asked by what means this could be considered as being helpful to defence. My answer is that the permanent joint board on defence composed of United States and Canadian representatives gave this project most careful consideration. Let me read the evidence given by none other than Hon. Dean Acheson, Secretary of State of the United States of America, before the committee on public works of the United States congress. He said:

> Our reliance on Canada, and Canada's reliance on us, is not confined to the economic or political field. From a military point of view the defence of the United States cannot be conducted independently of the defence of Canada. The two countries compose a single defensive unit. This fact was officially recognized in 1940 when the permanent joint board on defence was established to consider means by which the United States and Canada could co-operate more fully for their common security. This board functions today with increasing effectiveness and earlier this month it made a joint recommendation concerning the military value of the St. Lawrence seaway and power project. The board's statement is as follows:

"The board re-examined the St. Lawrence seaway and power project in the light of the serious international situation and the needs of the continental defence. The board also reaffirmed the value of the project in peacetime and considered anew its immediate importance in terms of the present-day defence of the northern half of this continent.

"Since the board's previous recommendations of May, 1947, and December, 1948, the international situation had deteriorated markedly. In the Far East, there had already been fighting which involved both Canada and the United States. Other dangerous situations which might lead to open combat involving our two nations existed in other parts of the world. It appeared that the free nations might be entering a period of protracted crisis during which it was imperative that our military strength be steadily increased.

"In view of these ominous circumstances, the board believed it had a duty again to recommend early construction of the St. Lawrence seaway and power project. The project would yield additional supplies of hydroelectric power—supplies which were already needed in the northeastern United States and eastern Canada, and which later would become vital to the expansion of our military strength. The seaway would provide an inland waterway relatively safe from enemy action. It would enable the two countries to move war materials at less cost in money and resources than by any other means. In addition, the seaway would permit greatly increased shipbuilding and ship repairs in the relatively well protected great lakes shipyards.

I am not making that statement.

Mr. Brooks: Would the minister explain why the United States turned it down after such a strong recommendation?

Mr. Chevrier: In a moment, I am going to deal with the very argument you brought up, but I should like to say now that these are not my words. These are the words of the Secretary of State of the United States, who also quotes the permanent joint board on defence. He continues with the statement of the permanent joint board on defence as follows:

The diminution of the iron ore supplies of the Mesabi range, coupled with the discovery and development of large new deposits of high grade ore in Labrador, constituted an added reason for immediate commencement of work on the project. Since Labrador iron ore could be transported most economically by ship to the large steel producing centres of the great lakes, the value of the Labrador mines, so necessary to defence industry, could be fully exploited only by building the seaway. In the board's opinion the addition which the project would make to our military potential would far outweigh the initial expenditure in manpower, money and critical materials. Much of these materials would be required in any event because if the combined project for navigation and power were not now proceeded with alternative sources of power would have to be provided. The board recognized the risk to the St. Lawrence seaway project from enemy attack. It was of the opinion, however, that this risk was no greater than the danger to many other existing installations of comparable importance. Since the area concerned was already one of high defence priority, the board believed that adequate protective measures would be possible on a reasonably economic basis. Having in mind these considerations and reaffirming its previous recommendation, the board recommended: "That the two governments take immediate action to implement the 1941 St. Lawrence agreement as a vital measure for their common defence."

I have cited that at some length for the simple reason that I felt the words I had uttered in my original statement did not suffice. Therefore I bring to my support not only the statement of Dean Acheson but also the statement of the permanent joint board on defence. Then I go on to the second argument raised by the hon. member for Cape Breton South. He said—and I presume I am not misquoting him when I say he referred to the supporting documents which he had from the united mine workers union—that if this project goes through they fear that the coal industry in the maritime provinces will be made to disappear. My answer to that is twofold. First I say that we have just concluded a debate on railway legislation. I say that we have also had the benefit of the report of the royal commission on transportation. I say that the maritime provinces were represented by very able counsel before that royal commission, who brought forward the point of view of the maritimes. What did they say to the royal commission? In effect they said: We live in a far-away part of the country in so far as the central markets are concerned. Therefore we have a long haul to get into those markets and very often we have an equally long haul to bring back our raw materials to the maritime provinces. We have not, like the central provinces, highway competition and the like. Our economy, they said, is one which should normally move from north to south but because of confederation it has been forced to move from east to west. I do not think anyone will challenge my statement, because I think those are the facts. The maritime provinces complained at that time, and with reason and justice, that that position created a disadvantage in so far as they were concerned.

Having said to the royal commission on transportation that that was the position in which they found themselves, namely that there was this long rail haul to the markets and the long haul back, surely when an open seaway is offered, when an alternative route is offered whereby they can move their products not only into the Montreal market but into the great Toronto market and the markets of the great lakes, to my way of thinking that has relieved the situation to some extent. Then I add that not only is the position relieved by the construction of the seaway; it is also relieved by the fact that rates will be equalized in the rest of Canada. East-west rates will be reduced because of the subsidy of $7 million which will be paid and because of the one and one-third rule. The maritimes will also get the benefit of that. I submit, with deference, that is an answer to the point raised by my hon. friend when he says that their livelihood will be made to disappear on account of the construction of the seaway.

Mr. Gillis: The minister has just confirmed what I said.

Mr. Chevrier: The next argument I make has to do with the coal industry. What is the position of that industry? Without wanting to disagree with my hon. friend, or with the hon. member for Annapolis-Kings and the hon. member for Royal in their summation of the position in so far as the coal industry is concerned, I do not think they need be so apprehensive as they were in their speeches because I do not think the position they put on Hansard is an accurate one. I have before me statistics furnished by the bureau of statistics which indicate the distribution of Nova Scotia coal production. With the consent of the house I should like to place it on Hansard. It indicates that the total Nova Scotia production of coal in 1939 was 6,857,000 tons, and the total production of Nova Scotia coal in 1950 was 6,517,000 tons. The point I wish to make is that of the total of 6,857,000 tons in 1939, some 3,743,000 tons were used in the maritimes and 3,114,000 tons were shipped to central Canada, Quebec and Ontario, whereas in 1950 of the 6,517,000 tons of coal produced in Nova Scotia 4,717,000 were used for local consumption and only 1,800,000 were moved into Quebec and Ontario.

The point I am making is that the table indicates that the demand for coal within the maritime provinces has increased from 3,743,000 tons in 1939 to 4,717,000 tons in 1950. In other words, local demand consumed 55 per cent of the production in 1939 and 72 per cent in 1950. These are facts. At this rate the full production will be consumed in the maritimes in another ten or fifteen years. The simple fact, as I understand the problem, appears to be that Nova Scotia coal already is withdrawing from the central Canada markets. Before the war as much as 2,300,000 tons of maritime coal were shipped into Quebec in one year and as much as 1,300,000 tons into Ontario. The total shipment of Nova Scotia coal to central Canada in 1939 was 3,114,000 tons. The decline is not for want of transportation facilities or assistance, and certainly not for lack of demand; because if I correctly recall the statement made by the president of the Canadian National Railways in the committee on railways and shipping it was that the Canadian National Railways could have taken another 1,100,000 tons of Nova Scotia coal if it had been available. It was not available, and the railway had to obtain coal from the United States. I believe it can safely be said that at least another 2 million tons of coal would have been required in the central market. What is happening to Nova Scotia coal is simply this. Because of requirements for power production, coal for their own employees, for their own collieries, for bunkers, for railways in the maritimes, for their steel plants and for Newfoundland, the maritimes are gradually using up the full production of coal. If I have permission I should like to put this table on Hansard.

The Deputy Chairman: Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Chevrier: The table is as follows:

Distribution of Nova Scotia Coal Production

	1950 tons	1939 tons
Employees use	140,000	123,000
Colliery use	310,000	361,000
Bunkers	85,000	310,000
Railway, maritimes	1,190,000	841,000
Steel plants (coking coal)	1,100,000	767,000
Other maritime	1,588,000	1,195,000
Newfoundland	247,000	143,000
Export	57,000	3,000
Total maritime	4,717,000	3,743,000
Quebec and Ontario*	1,800,000	3,114,000
	6,517,000	6,857,000

* (Includes about 250,000 tons for railway use. Subvention paid on about 1,200,000 tons.)

The above table indicates that the demand for coal within the maritimes has increased from 3,743,000 tons in 1939 to 4,717,000 tons in 1950. In other words the local demand consumed 55 per cent of the production in 1939 and 72 per cent in 1950. At this rate the full production will be consumed in the maritimes in another 10 or 15 years.

As I see it, Mr. Chairman, this thing promises to continue. There is an increasing use of coal in the maritime provinces in producing electricity and for serving new industries. Consumption in blast furnaces and steel mills may increase. If these trends continue, as I said, by the time the seaway is opened there may be little or no surplus of Nova Scotia coal. If my hon. friends argument is sound in so far as the deepening of the channel to 27 feet is concerned, surely it was sound with reference to the 9-foot channel and with reference to the 14-foot channel. I do not think anyone in the house would attempt to argue that construction of the 9-foot channel or the 14-foot channel has had any effect on the coal industry of the maritime provinces.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): Before the minister leaves this point, would he reassure the house with respect to the position of Nova Scotia coal? I point out that it has been recognized that Nova Scotia has to market a large tonnage of coal in central Canada where it meets the cheap water-borne coal imported into Canada, and which would come into Canada under the conditions which would exist if this canal were constructed.

Mr. Chevrier: I am not admitting that cheap water-borne United States coal is going to come down to Montreal, because United States coal has to travel all the way from the mines up to lake Erie, then be transferred to ships and moved down to Montreal. I am not admitting, therefore, the premise of my hon. friend's argument. The point I am trying to make—

Mr. Nowlan: The minister admits it is being transported on the lake now, does he not?

Mr. Chevrier: The point I am making now is that according to the table I have put on Hansard the maritime people are gradually consuming greater amounts of their own coal production. For the year 1950, according to the table, they consumed it to the extent of 72 per cent. This is an increase from 55 per cent in 1939. I should like to go on, Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Black (Cumberland): I should like to point out that Nova Scotia has an objective of 10 million tons per year; that has been the objective for a long time. This objective will never be reached under the proposal put forward by the minister. It would appear to me that he is satisfied with that condition. We must allow our production to diminish, and we are not to expect the expansion of that industry in order to market coal in central Canada.

Mr. Chevrier: Nothing that is going to be done under this resolution or either of the two bills following will affect the production of coal, as I see it.

If I may I should like to go on with the other point made by the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis), and I believe supported by other hon. members, although my memory does not serve me sufficiently well to be able to quote them, and perhaps they may get up and say I am mistaken in the statement. In any event the point was made by the member for Cape Breton South: why export iron ore? I believe the words he used were these: To whom are we making the iron ore available? Why export iron ore? Well, Mr. Chairman, I do not think I need answer that argument, because the people of this country answered it many years ago. What happened to our gold and our silver in northern Ontario and northern Quebec? Did we not decide to export it? Were not whole groups of communities established in both provinces because of that development, and because of that policy to export those natural resources? What happened to the lake St. John district in the province of Quebec in which aluminum is being produced? A whole area that was undeveloped and uncolonized for many years was developed because the aluminum industry came there and exported the product to the United Kingdom, the United States and perhaps to other countries. A series of communities was built along that area.

Mr. Brooks: Do they export the raw ore or do they refine it?

Mr. Chevrier: Will my hon friend allow me to continue? My hon. friend made his speech. He is at liberty to make another speech if he wishes.

Mr. Brooks: I am sorry to interrupt the minister.

Mr. Chevrier: I should like to reply to the arguments that are being made, but if I am to be interrupted continually it is rather difficult to make an argument.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): I believe it is proper that we should deal with these points as we go along. I should like to ask the minister whether his argument applies to the great pulpwood industry. Is he opposed to having the pulpwood manufactured into its final form here, or should we go back 25 years or more and ship it in the rawest form possible to the United States.

Mr. Chevrier: If my hon. friend will only hold his peace I shall deal with pulpwood in a moment. At the moment I am dealing with this argument: why should we export iron ore? I ask your permission, Mr. Chairman, to be allowed to continue. If there are any questions I will do the best I can to answer them afterwards. When I am attempting to answer this argument I do not think it is fair that I should be subjected to continual interruptions from the other side. I said, why did we decide to export Steep Rock ore? Why was it that we decided to export copper and nickel from northern Manitoba? Why did this house at the last session vote substantial sums of money to the Canadian National Railways to help develop the nickel and copper deposits at Lynn Lake by the building of a railway? What about oil in Alberta? Is it a crime to export aluminum from Kitimat? At the next session of parliament I hope to be in a position to introduce a bill which will, I trust, bring about the construction of a railway from Kitimat to join with the Prince Rupert-Prince George line. In this area there will be a tremendous aluminum development, and I am informed a white man has never put his foot on that spot. Why do we do that?

Mr. Ferguson: To keep on exporting the aluminum we have instead of manufacturing it; that is why we do it.

Mr. Chevrier: If the hon. member wants to follow his argument to its logical conclusion, why do we export wheat?

Mr. Ferguson: We do not export any more than the surplus we have. My argument is that we are not manufacturing enough in this country; we are exporting.

Mr. Chevrier: All right. That is exactly what we are going to do, as I see it. That is exactly what we are doing with aluminum. That is exactly what we are doing with all these natural resources.

Mr. Ferguson: This country exports—

The Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mr. Chevrier: We do not export any more than we have surplus to our own requirements; and if that is the case, I think that is a reply to the argument raised by my hon. friends. I could go on and say this. If our friends on the other side of the line were to adopt the same argument, where would we in central Canada get our coal? Where would we get our oil, our cotton, our steel, our rubber or our tin?

Mr. Ferguson: You can get anything you want.

Mr. Chevrier: Those are questions that I think are significant answers to those raised by the hon. member for Cape Breton South.

Another point that was made was this: Why not build up our mills in our own country? On that point, Mr. Chairman, I find myself in agreement with the hon. member for Cape Breton South, the hon. member for Annapolis-Kings and the leader of the opposition, who did not go nearly as far as did the hon. member for Annapolis-Kings or the hon. member for Cape Breton South.

Mr. Gillis: He did not understand as well.

Mr. Chevrier: He said: I have no objection to exporting ore provided we see to it that some assistance is given to our own mills. I hope it will be possible to do that, and that takes me to the point raised by the hon. member for Cumberland with respect to pulpwood and the paper industry. That was a point made by the leader of the opposition, namely that in the pulpwood industry and in the timber industry we were able to place certain conditions on the export of this pulpwood, when we stipulated that mills for the production and fabrication of paper would be established in our own country, as they have been.

But the position as to pulpwood compared with the position as to iron ore is as day is to night. In pulpwood and in timber we have a monopoly; but in iron ore we are not in that fortunate position. In iron ore we are in a competitive position. We have to compete with iron ore from Liberia, from Venezuela and from other countries. We therefore cannot stipulate. Then again, when I say "we cannot" I refer unquestionably to the provincial governments; and I say this without the slightest desire to be disparaging of them, because these are matters which concern provincial governments. The timber rights and the rights concerning iron ore in Ungava and Newfoundland are those arising out of provincial jurisdiction; and if anyone can tie down the owners, it is the provincial governments. But I am saying that the position, so far as a provincial government is concerned, with reference to iron ore is entirely different from that with reference to pulp and paper.

Then again it has been suggested that Canadians do not want to be merely hewers of wood and drawers of water. I agree with those sentiments. I wish to make it clear that I am not disparaging in any sense the hewers of wood and the drawers of water; but that is not the point. The point is that we want other Canadians to work on the wood and on the water too, in shaping them to their ultimate uses. In this case, that of iron ore, we want Canadians to have the opportunity of mining it and moving it to market. We hope also that other Canadians will have a large share—the larger the better—in the smelting of the iron, in producing the steel, yes and in fabricating the steel into finished products. The production of steel ingots and castings in Canada, for instance, has increased from a total of 1,551,000 net tons in 1939 to a total of 3,383,000 in 1950. I am not able to say what the production is in Nova Scotia, because this concerns one company alone and I am not at liberty to produce the figures I have; but I may say that the Nova Scotia production was substantial and that province has shared tremendously in the expansion which I have just mentioned.

There is no evidence—certainly none on the record so far in this debate—that the completion of the seaway will put an end to the expansion of Nova Scotia's steel industry. As a matter of fact it appears that some reduction in the cost of production, possibly a substantial one, can be effected by mixing Labrador ore with Wabana ore in the blast furnaces. Iron and steel costs may be further reduced to the extent that the cost of coal is lowered by the mechanization now under way in the coal mines. All these forces will, I think, tend to strengthen the steel industry not only in other parts of Canada but in the maritime provinces as well. The day before yesterday I had the good fortune of discussing this very problem with one greatly concerned with the production of steel in the maritime province of Nova Scotia. He immediately said to me: The seaway will not in the slightest degree harm our steel industry in Nova Scotia.

I now go on to the point which was made concerning navigation being window dressing for power. It has been suggested that we are not serious about the navigation, that it is only a question of window dressing. The federal government is using its best efforts, in this resolution and in the bills which will follow, to assist Ontario in developing 1,100,000 horsepower in the international rapids section of the river where it is required by that province. Then, in case my hon. friend should think that the statement made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs sometime ago was indicative that there was a snag in Quebec, let me assure him that there is no snag in the province of Quebec; because there at Lachine it is hoped it will be possible to develop a joint power and navigation scheme as a result of which 1,200,000 horsepower of electrical energy will be produced. What prompts me to make the statement is that some two years ago I tabled in the House of Commons a joint report made by a board established by this government—the chairman was Mr. R. A. C. Henry, a prominent engineer of Montreal, a former deputy minister of the Department of Transport, a former chairman of the air transport board and a former officer of the Canadian National Railways—together with the Quebec hydro, in which several plans were submitted for the production of power and the development of navigation at Lachine. One of them particularly was recommended. It had to do with a joint power and navigation scheme at Lachine.

My hon. friend spoke disparagingly, I thought—I am sure he did not mean to do so but it looked to me as though he did—of the statement made in western Canada by my colleague the Minister of Trade and Commerce. He spoke disparagingly, I thought, of his statement which he quoted to this effect: The St. Lawrence seaway must be built. Without it the steel industry now on the great lakes would have to migrate to the Atlantic coast.

Mr. Gillis: That statement was made in the United States.

Mr. Chevrier: I am not denying that it was made there.

Mr. Gillis: You said the statement was made in the west.

Mr. Chevrier: I accept the correction. But the point I am making now is that surely that statement, taken out of its context, means an entirely different thing than if read with the context. What the Minister of Trade and Commerce was referring to unquestionably was the migration of steel industries to the Atlantic sea coast of the United States. And the argument he was probably making—I have not his text before me—was that it would be much better for us to take our iron ore in Labrador and Quebec and move it up to the great lakes, through the St. Lawrence seaway, and there sell it where there is a market, than leave it where it is doing nothing. That is the position I think he took.

Then he referred to shipbuilding in the great lakes, as I did, too. I think my friend the hon. member for Annapolis-Kings misunderstood or misinterpreted, not intentionally I am sure, the statement I had made. I had no intention of saying anything concerning the shipyards on the Atlantic coast. I was dealing with one thing only, and that was the great lakes-St. Lawrence seaway for defence purposes. I was trying to make the point that if we had the seaway we could build there, in an area which would be practically invulnerable to attack, destroyers, submarines, escort vessels, trawlers and the like, which could be taken down the deep waterway for defence purposes. That is the point I was trying to make, and I think it is exactly the point the permanent joint board on defence made. Certainly there could be no damage done to our maritime yards on the St. Lawrence river or on the Atlantic coast, because at the moment I think they have a considerable number of orders.

The hon. member for Annapolis-Kings discussed the question of finance. He will excuse me if I do not go into that now, because I do not think this is the stage to do that. There are financial sections in the bill which we will come to at the appropriate time. But I think the main point he made, and which I have not referred to up to now, is the adverse effect that this will have on the railways. Well, I made what I thought was a fairly considerable explanation of the position of the railways. Apparently it did not satisfy my hon. friend, and I do not think it satisfied the hon. member for Royal. However, he is entitled to his opinion. Perhaps if he will not take my argument he will at least take the argument of the president of the Canadian National Railways when he spoke to the railways and shipping committee—

Mr. Nowlan: I would rather take the minister's.

Mr. Chevrier: —on March 25, 1949. Mr. Hazen asked this question:

> There is another matter you referred to in addition to truck and air competition: you referred to the deepening of the St. Lawrence waterways. Now, you must have made some study on that, I presume?
> Mr. Vaughan: Yes, sir.
> Mr. Hazen: What losses in revenue, or in railway business, do you anticipate if the St. Lawrence waterway is deepened?
> Mr. Vaughan: We had our research and development department, and bureau of economies make a thorough study of that situation, because we were very anxious to know what traffic we might lose if the canals were deepened. After giving the matter much study and making a thorough investigation their report is, as I recall it, that they do not expect the railway will suffer any substantial loss of business at all because they consider that there will be so many new industries built up along these new waterways that the business we would get from these new industries would more than make up for what we might lose in any other direction.
> Mr. Hazen: When was that report made?
> Mr. Vaughan: That report was made two or three years ago.
> Mr. Hazen: Was it in 1947, or 1948, or prior to that time?
> Mr. Mutch: In any event that was the conclusion.
> Mr. Vaughan: I remember distinctly that the conclusion reached in the report forecast no great loss of business. The report was made about two years ago but I cannot give you the exact date.

The successor to Mr. Vaughan, Mr. Donald Gordon, is of the same view and has so declared on more than one occasion in public statements. I think I am not taking too much upon myself when I say it is our view that the Canadian Pacific Railway are of the same opinion.

I have spoken altogether too long, Mr. Chairman. I had no intention of being so lengthy, but I did want to assure the committee and the hon. member for Cape Breton South that, like himself, I too am a Canadian and I believe in the development of our Canadian resources. If I did not I probably would not be in the house at all, because those who sent me here felt that was one of the first duties that I owed to them and to this parliament. That, too, is the duty of the government. It feels that the resources of the country should be developed. Unquestionably, both from the point of view of power and the point of view of navigation, as well as from the point of view of iron ore and all the allied industries that will come out of it, those resources will mean a great deal to the economy of Canada. And to those who say that the taxpayers cannot foot the bill I say: wait a little while and see what the bill contains. I think it will be established, I hope beyond doubt, that it will be possible, as I stated in my initial speech, to self-liquidate the whole navigation part of this scheme by means of the imposition of tolls. With that, Mr. Chairman, I hope it will be possible to get on with the resolution.

Mr. Gillis: I have no intention of arguing the details of his last statement with the minister, but I do know that he put figures on the record, accepted by him in good faith, that are completely erroneous to anyone knowing the marketing and mining situation in Nova Scotia. I want to straighten him out for his benefit, as well as for the benefit of the members of the committee, on the point the minister made in regard to research and in comparing the research of the Canadian government with the research of the mine workers union. I am not going to criticize the research the Canadian government has done on this project, because I have read several reports concerning research into the engineering possibilities, the financial aspects of the properties that would be destroyed in the process and the benefits that might accrue to one or two particular parts of the country.

The research that I mentioned the mine-workers have done was in regard to the threat this might be to their means of livelihood, which is a completely different type of research and a type that was not done by the commission the minister mentioned. Their research was done from the point of view of how it was going to affect their particular industry which meant the means of livelihood for the miners. On that specific point they were convinced that there was a threat to their means of livelihood. I did not see anything in any of the reports—and I read a lot of them—the government made in regard to that particular point. I want to leave that with the minister for his information. The minister made an analysis of coal production in Nova Scotia and the marketing of that coal in the central market of Ontario and Quebec. The minister picked a bad period to get his figures when he took the years 1939 and 1950. All he did when he put those figures on record was to confirm in my own mind what I had suspected, and the evidence he had given does not serve in any way to bolster his case. He gives a production figure in 1939 of 6,857,000 tons. But the thing the minister probably does not remember, or was not told by those who gave him the figures, was that in 1939 the industry was in a depression, and was working perhaps on an average of two days a week. So that production figure of 6,857,000 tons was on the basis of a very short work week. Then for 1950 he gave the figure of 6,517,000 tons, or about 300,000 tons less in 1950 than in 1939. The 1950 figure was based upon a five-day work week, or just a little more than twice the time worked in 1939. This shows the continuous shrinking of the industry.

I have made the accusation many times that the policy of the Nova Scotia coal industry was not to expand. Their policy has been one of shrinking the industry to care for maritime needs. That is very obvious from the figures the minister put on record. He has pointed out that in Ontario we had a coal market in 1939. That is right. The government was subsidizing the coal market in Ontario to the extent of a million and a half tons, a market that is not now supplied by that industry at all. And the reason it is not supplied is in line with the shrinking of the industry to take care of maritime needs only. Dosco has become a coal importer from the United States. They are importing and selling coal to customers in Ontario who at one time used a million and a half tons of Nova Scotia coal, and at the same time the industry has been shrinking?

Mr. Blackmore: Why is that?

Mr. Gillis: They can make more money, and it is cheaper to import the coal and get the drawback from the government. That point the minister brought out in his figures. We are not putting any coal at all into Ontario at this time. Another thing of which I would remind the minister in connection with the production figures he gave us is that at least three large coal-producing collieries, namely collieries Nos. 2 and 11, and the Allen shaft, have closed, but which were operating on that short-week basis. One of them employed 1,500 men, but they have closed down since.

So the production figures do not help the minister's case at all. They merely prove what I have been saying over the years, that so far as that industry is concerned there is no national vision. It is a matter of shrinking the industry to cater to the market handiest to them, while they import coal from the United States and fill the market for which they themselves should be reaching.

Mr. Blackmore: I should like to make one comment. The hon. member is making a most admirable case. Everyone is rejoicing because of the work he is doing; a man who comes from the mines, and who can express himself so admirably here in the House of Commons. I compliment him in the highest measure. I should like to ask him one or two questions so that he may enlighten us with his answers. Can he give us any connection between this shrinkage and any economic factor the impact of which is likely to be intensified by the construction of the St. Lawrence seaway?

Mr. Brooks: That is a poser.

Mr. Gillis: No, that is not a poser. There is no particular economic factor in Nova Scotia that would work to the detriment of that industry, due to the building of the St. Lawrence seaway. But there is one point, and I was just about to discuss it. The minister made the statement again that the opening of the seaway would increase the opportunity of putting Nova Scotia coal on the Ontario market, and that it would not affect the future of that industry at all. He pointed out the argument related to subsidies, subventions and the like, as applied to long hauls. Let me point out to him that we already have our water route. We can ship from Louisburg and Sydney—more particularly from Louisburg, which is open all winter—by way of the St. Lawrence during the months it is open. Indeed that method of shipment could be used nearly all winter, if necessary, although the insurance is lifted at the end of eight months.

I am pointing out that we already have that water route for the shipment of Canadian coal. The only reason we are able to stay in the Montreal market is that it is the only market that is economical so far as Nova Scotia coal is concerned. We stay in that market because the Americans cannot get in there by a water route. Even now the coal marketed in Quebec is subsidized by the federal government to enable it to get in there on a competitive basis with United States coal, even with the handicap of the rail haul. Therefore, instead of doing what the minister suggests it will do, namely expand the market for us, it will open up a water route and cheapen transportation for United States coal. This will back the Nova Scotia product out of the Montreal market.

I am not blaming the government for the policy of shrinking the industry, and for the fact that the Dominion Steel and Coal Company has gone into the importing business. That is entirely a matter of the policy of the company, and it is one I have kicked around for a long time.

Mr. Blackmore: May I interrupt again by asking another question? I am looking for a solution, of course. If the dominion government were to agree to a subsidy on Nova Scotia coal, to offset the advantage given to the United States, would that not obviate the difficulty mentioned by the hon. member?

Mr. Gillis: No; I think it is false economy to spend $400 million to build a seaway which will give the Americans the advantage in that market, and then ask the taxpayers of Canada to subsidize the movement of one of our own resources into a market they have already paid to get. There is a limit to the extent to which we can keep going down into the pockets of the taxpayers.

Let me point out to the minister that his arguments with respect to the coal situation are not valid. I am not criticizing him. I would not argue stare decisis with him; that is his field. But in this particular field let me tell him that I have a lot of kinks in my spine from shovelling coal, which was my business for years. I am not biased; I like to be fair; but when a company follows a faulty policy in developing an industry, and follows the line of least resistance by shrinking the industry, and leans on the arm of the government wherever it can, as well as going into the importing business because it is cheaper and perhaps more lucrative, I believe I am called upon to say something. It is not building a Canadian industry.

One other point I would like to make, in respect of what the minister had to say. On the point as to why we should export our iron ore, my answer is that we should export our surplus. I have no objection to that. But we should not be in the position of simply developing and opening up our raw materials in order to make them available to the United States. As far as steel is concerned, we are completely dependent today upon the United States. The scream all the time is that we cannot get steel for automobiles and for our defence requirements. I know of one city that wants to get a 200,000 gallon boiler for the water supply in one important section and they cannot get it because there is no steel. If we are not able to supply our own requirements in steel the logical thing for us to do is to export our surplus ore. That is what we are doing with wheat. I think it is wrong to think just in terms of opening up our raw materials and making them available to the United States.

I say to the minister that this business of depending on the United States is going to catch up with us some day unless we are going to sit by and be absorbed by them. We must make up our minds one way or another. The minister said that we are dependent upon the United States for coal. That is quite true, but we should not be. The minister asks where we would get coal. We can get it in New Brunswick, in Nova Scotia, in Saskatchewan, in Alberta in unlimited supply and in British Columbia. It is merely a matter of developing our own resources and freeing ourselves from the economic dictatorship which the United States can wield if they so desire. The same thing is true of steel. This country should not be in the position of having to import steel to meet our ordinary requirements. As I suggested when I spoke before, I am prepared to support this project as one part of a large public investment program by the federal government. This authority to be set up should have the right to develop any potential power or other resource within a reasonable distance of that area.

I should like to point out to the minister that steel production in this country is not as great as it should be. It is no good going back to 1939 because we were in a pretty bad way from the production standpoint in that year. When you start with 1948 you really get at the place where we began to slip with a lot of things. I put the figures on record a couple of days ago when the Minister of Trade and Commerce was present. In the last fifteen months the production of basic steel in this country has been stationary while production in the United States has gone up from 35 to 40 per cent. They are really going ahead down there.

I think the government would be well advised to have another basic steel plant. This would not be asking very much. We would still be exporting our raw materials to the large centres for fabrication. The steel plant at Sydney employs about 4,500 men in the manufacture of basic steel. I do not care where you pick a site, in Pictou county or in Prince Edward Island or in Newfoundland; you would still be close to the raw materials. A new plant could be set up or the Sydney plant could be expanded, possibly by the use of public funds. That would cure a lot of problems. A market would be provided for what Prince Edward Island is producing. I should like to see enough industry down in that part of the country to absorb all the production of the maritimes. It is not asking very much to say that we should try to stand on our own feet in this matter of using raw materials. Another instance is the aluminum industry.

There is no excuse for allowing United States capital to come in here and develop the great aluminum industry practically at the expense of the taxpayers of Canada. The headquarters of that industry is in the United States, and the control lies in that country. The same thing is true in connection with pulpwood. Go down along the New Brunswick border and take a look at what is happening. People from the United States have been coming there to lease our timber lands and cut our pulpwood. They have a belt line running across the border to take the raw materials over there to be processed into paper which we buy back at $90 per ton.

An hon. Member: More than that.

Mr. Gillis: It was $90 the last time I heard about it, and that is bad enough. I am quite sticky on this business of looking after ourselves first. If we have any surplus we can export it as we do with wheat. I am not going to argue any longer. I have stated my case, and I simply wanted to straighten out the minister on these production figures. Instead of hurting my case all he has done is confirm what I suspected right along, that there is no intention to look after maritime needs. I suggest to the minister that it is nearly time that we developed our own resources, such as coal, for ourselves. With the potential supplies of coal we have we should not have to depend upon the United States to the extent we do at the present time. We should not have to face a recurrence of the fuel crisis on the Canadian National which we had a couple of years ago.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): Mr. Chairman, the minister seems to want to rush through this important legislation about which a great many people in my part of the country have considerable doubt. Some of the members from down there have expressed trepidation as to what the results will be. I think we should have all these matters cleared up. I am not going to delay the committee but I just want to express my views. I have expressed them before and they are on record.

I am not opposed, as one good Canadian in a family which has done a lot over the years in making Canada possible, to the development of this country or to the development of the power resources in central Canada, but I want to know what there is for Nova Scotia and the maritime provinces to compensate for the contribution they have made to Canada and to give them the place they should have in confederation. We should have a more definite statement from the minister and the government at this time than the minister gave today or a few days ago. I am not opposed to what is being done in central Canada, but I am not satisfied with what is being done to develop our resources in Nova Scotia. I am opposed to having this go through until there is further discussion.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Mr. Speaker, tomorrow we will continue the debate on these two resolutions. The debate to date has covered both resolutions because nearly every speaker has referred to power. I thought it was understood that both resolutions would be discussed on the motion and in committee. I think that was agreed to by the leaders of all parties. I would suggest that tomorrow after we complete the resolution the house agree to undertake a study of the bills. We would propose starting with the large one concerning the seaway.

Mr. Green: We will not even have seen the bills.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I will give the hon. member my copy. We could proceed with the power bill. The agreement has been on the table since Monday, and if you would prefer we could proceed with the bill to ratify the agreement with the province of Ontario. If we do not come to any agreement, we will take up the resolution concerning the Dominion Elections Act; the bill to provide for the establishment of an agricultural products board; Bill No. 8, to amend the North Fraser Harbour Commissioners Act, and then the resolution of the Secretary of State to amend the Civil Service Act.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I asked you when we were in committee if we were discussing both resolutions or just one, and I think you replied we were discussing the waterway. I did understand that we were on both resolutions at that time.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Beaudoin): Any reply that I might make should have been made when we were in committee, but if the house will permit me, may I say that I think I was right. The only resolution I had before me was the one concerning the waterway.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to the order of the house passed on November 2, 1951.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, December 7, 1951

Tho house met at two o'clock.

ARMED FORCES

DUTY-FREE ADMISSION TO CANADA OF GIFTS FROM FORCES SERVING ABROAD

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I should like to lay on the table two copies in English and French of order in council P.C. 6598 of December 6, 1951, passed under the provisions of the Emergency Powers Act, authorizing the admission to Canada, free of customs duty and excise taxes, of personal gifts, not exceeding $25 in value, and not including cigarettes, tobacco and alcoholic beverages, from members of the Canadian forces serving abroad. This provision is similar to that which was made during the last war, and it is intended to allow these brave young men serving abroad to feel that they are in closer contact with their families at home.

PRIVATE BILLS

REFERENCE OF CERTAIN PETITIONS TO COMMITTEE ON STANDING ORDERS

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I understand that the clerk of petitions has laid on the table four petitions from religious bodies for private bills. It had not been intended, as hon. members know, to have any private bills dealt with at this session; but it has been represented to us, and to the leaders of the other groups of the house, that with respect to these four bills they were intended to relieve their anxieties about some possible illegality in the investment of trust funds of these religious bodies; and after discussing the matter with the leaders of other groups I felt we might ask for unanimous consent to make an exception for these religious bodies, it being still understood this will be the only exception, and that none will be made for any private interests.

The petitions are from the general synod of the Church of England in Canada and the missionary society of the Church of England in Canada, for an act authorizing them to consolidate, manage and invest the trust funds under their control as one fund to be known as the Church of England consolidated trust fund, and for other incidental purposes. I understand that these trust funds are now in a provincially incorporated trust company, and that as the investments are made in more than one province in Canada the synod of the Anglican church has been advised that there may be some illegality in their proceedings, and they are quite anxious to have that removed at the earliest possible opportunity.

The other is from the Sisters of Charity of the House of Providence of Kingston, Ontario, for an act to incorporate the Sisters of Providence. They have provincial charters in several of the provinces, but they also have the same body of assets distributed throughout several provinces, and they have been advised that their position in that regard is not strictly in conformity with our general laws.

The next one is from Edward G. Wheeler and others, of Langham, Saskatchewan, representing Canadians of the Mennonite brotherhood. They are applying for the usual incorporation as a recognized church society. It was felt that if any exception were made for any one of these groups the exception would have to extend to the other two, because it would be felt, I was sure, by all members of the house, that there should be no discrimination between them on religious grounds. But again I wish to assure the house that it is not intended to make any exception for any private interests. It is only because these are semi-public bodies that it was felt the house might be prepared to allow a special exception in their regard. I move, therefore:

That the following petitions for private bills presented on December 6, 1951, together with the report made thereon by the clerk of petitions on December 7, 1951, be referred to the standing committee on standing orders for such recommendations as may be deemed advisable in relation to standing orders 92 and 93(3)(a) and (b), namely:

Of the general synod of the Church of England in Canada, and the missionaary society of the Church of England in Canada, for an act authorizing them to consolidate, manage and invest the trust funds under their control as one fund to be known as the Church of England consolidated trust fund, and for other purposes.

Of the general synod of the Church of England in Canada, for an act amending its act of incorporation with respect to investment of its funds, and for other purposes.

Of the Sisters of Charity of the House of Providence at Kingston, Ontario, for an act to incorporate the Sisters of Providence.

Of Edward G. Wheeler and others, of Langham, Saskatchewan, for an act to incorporate Evangelical Mennonite Brethren of Canada.

Motion agreed to.

Inquiries of the Ministry

AIR TRANSPORT

REGULATIONS REGARDING PASSENGERS IN OPERATIONS COMPARTMENT, ETC.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. K. Fraser (Peterborough West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Trade and Commerce or his parliamentary assistant, to whom I have given notice of the question. How many Trans-Canada Air Lines pilots have been suspended from the service because they have refused to allow extra passengers or transportation officials on the flight deck of T.C.A. planes?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, this question refers to a matter of internal management of Trans-Canada Air Lines. No one outside the personnel of Trans-Canada Air Lines is involved. It has never been the practice to answer questions in the house about the internal management of either the Canadian National Railways or Trans-Canada Air Lines. Therefore I must decline to answer the question.

[Later:]

Mr. Fraser: I would like to ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce if it is not the custom for the house to have information when a strike is pending on the C.N.R., or any organization that is publicly owned.

Mr. Howe: I know of no strike pending anywhere. If my hon. friend does,—

Mr. Fraser: Impending, I should say.

Mr. Howe: —then, a question in the house would be a very good way of fomenting such a strike.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the last statement made is one that is not in keeping with a response to a member who asks for information on the orders of the day. I say the last answer given is not one that is in keeping with the minister's responsibility to the house, if it is directed to the government which operates the business in question. There is no reason why an answer could not be given in regard to any detail of the operations of Trans-Canada Air Lines or the Canadian National Railways in connection with a matter which is not the subject of strict secrecy. It is a question to which every member of the house and the people of Canada should receive an answer.

[Mr. St. Laurent.]

GRAIN

REFERENCE TO REPORTED REMARKS OF MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE IN WINNIPEG "FREE PRESS"

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a question of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I wonder if the minister would care to comment on press statements to the effect that legislation would be introduced at the present session to provide credit to farmers for unthreshed or unsold grain.

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend has somewhat distorted the statement in the paper. The statement in the paper was correct. It said I was prepared to recommend to my colleagues that legislation be introduced—and if my hon. friend would just be a little patient, perhaps he will see the outcome of my recommendation.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

NATIONAL EMPLOYMENT SERVICE—RECOGNITION OF PROVINCIAL LABOUR LAWS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. W. Noseworthy (York South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Labour. To what extent do the offices of the national employment service recognize the labour laws of the various provinces in which national employment service offices are located, when making referrals? If there are any exceptions, will the minister give an explanation?

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for York South warned me that he was going to ask this question. In reply I think I could not do better than quote the pertinent instructions issued to officers of the national employment service of the unemployment insurance commission. Those instructions are:

When orders are listed with any local office by an employer, and when such orders do not offer the minimum wages or working conditions specifically required by dominion statute or regulation, or by provincial statute or regulation, any variation from prescribed conditions will be brought to the attention of the employer in order that he may have opportunity to make correction. Only if the employer fails to make such correction, should the office refuse to undertake to fill the vacancies listed. The fact that an applicant may be willing to accept employment at a standard lower than that prescribed by governmental regulations furnishes no warrant whatever for the office to make a placement at less than the standard.

It is the responsibility of each local office to keep itself informed of all statutes or regulations fixing wages and working conditions in its district. These may include the fair wage schedules set by the Department of Labour regulating rates of pay on dominion government contracts; minimum rates of pay for workers fixed by the minimum wage board of the province; wage rates called for in legalized wage agreements between groups of employers and employees; and any other comparable legislation or regulations which may be issued from time to time.

As to the last part of the question, in which the hon. member asked me to give an explanation, if there are any exceptions, I would say that, in reality, there are no exceptions. But if an employer quotes in his order to the national employment service less than the provincial minimum rate of wages, the matter is drawn to his attention and, if he corrects it, nothing further is done.

MING SUNG INDUSTRIAL COMPANY

USE OF CANADIAN FLAG

On the orders of the day:

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day are called I should like to ask a question regarding a subject which has been before the house for some time. Can the Prime Minister inform the house whether the government has yet passed an order in council revoking the right of the Ming Sung Company to fly the Canadian flag?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): No; the government has not yet passed an order in council revoking the right of the Ming Sung Company, on the ships registered in Canada, to fly the Canadian flag. As a matter of fact that is incidental to the registry. What would have to be done would be to remove the ships from Canadian registry, and that is a matter which is still under consideration.

ST. LAWRENCE WATERWAY

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY AUTHORITY—DEEP WATERWAY BETWEEN MONTREAL AND LAKE ERIE

The house resumed, from Thursday, December 6, consideration in committee of the following resolution—Mr. Chevrier—Mr. Dion in the chair:

That it is expedient, for the purpose of providing a deep waterway between Montreal and lake Erie, to create a corporation to be called "the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority" with power, inter alia, to expropriate; to construct, maintain and operate all necessary works; to borrow amounts not exceeding three hundred million dollars; to establish tariffs of tolls and to employ such officers and employees as may be required for the purposes of the authority.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): Mr. Chairman, in previous sessions, and again yesterday, I have stated that I am not opposed to a deep waterway serving central Canada and for the development of power resources, but I am interested in any menace there may be to the interests of the maritime provinces. I am interested in what compensating expenditures are proposed to benefit my part of the country.

I am very much disappointed in the statement of the minister, in that there appears to be no compensating expenditure proposed which would be of direct benefit to the maritime provinces. Instead, to some extent our interests are menaced. In addition we have to make a very definite contribution to the provision of $300 million, and probably double that amount, for the development of the St. Lawrence waterway. From every standpoint I say there should be a statement from the minister as to what is proposed by way of direct assistance to us in Nova Scotia, and the other maritime provinces. There is the question of the Chignecto canal. The minister made a personal investigation of the St. Lawrence seaway and brought in direct recommendations involving large expenditures, but even though it comes under his department he has not made a similar investigation of the proposal to build the Chignecto canal which has been before Canada ever since confederation and even before that time. A large delegation made representations on behalf of New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island and I believe Newfoundland, for the building of the Chignecto canal, but they were brushed aside. Nothing is being done. This is an opportune time for the minister to state what is proposed with respect to the Chignecto canal and what compensating expenditures will be made to us for the development of the St. Lawrence seaway and power projects.

I made a statement on June 7, 1951, and at that time I asked the Minister of Resources and Development (Mr. Winters) whether he had made an inspection of the Chignecto canal. At that time I said, and I quote from page 3840 of Hansard:

I doubt whether the minister has made an inspection of the Chignecto canal and whether he gave support to its construction when a very large delegation came here. It was rather enlightening to see the interest which the Minister of Transport took in the proposed St. Lawrence seaway. He accompanied a large delegation over the St. Lawrence river inspecting that part of the river in which the seaway is proposed to be built at a cost of hundreds of millions of dollars, and perhaps a billion dollars, which would give cheap power to central Canada when constructed. I do not say that I am opposed to that expenditure, but I would expect some compensating expenditures in my part of the country.

I again put that question to the minister and to the government. I repeat that this is an opportune time to have a statement. We are a part of Canada and we have rights in Canada. We have the right to expect the adoption of policies that will be of direct benefit to us. Originally we had vested rights in the hinterland of Quebec and the great iron ore deposits in Quebec belonged to Nova Scotia as one of the original provinces. We are receiving no benefit from the development of that great resource. The same applies to the great nickel industry in central Canada; no direct benefit accrues to us in that connection. I think we have certain rights in the power development on the St. Lawrence. We were interested in the seaway at the time of confederation and I think we have some rights there. The same would apply to the great oil deposits in Alberta and western Canada. We are not receiving any benefit in that connection and in many others that I could cite.

In 1947 I quoted figures to show that up to that time there had been expended in Canada for canals a total of $243,352,399.78; practically all in central Canada, and hardly a dollar in our part of the country. There had been paid out for deficits and maintenance on the canals a total of $114,130,209.81 up to that time, with hardly a dollar of that being expended in the maritime provinces.

Then there is the question of shipbuilding. Shipbuilding is the birthright of the maritime provinces. At the time of confederation we had scores of shipyards and I contend that that industry should be developed and not be permitted to follow the lead given by the Minister of Transport when he proposed, I suppose in encouragement of central Canada, that there should be a further development of shipyards in central Canada but nothing for us in the east. That was confirmed by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) who stated a short time ago that shipyards are to be developed in central Canada. No hope is held out by the minister or the government of a development in our part of Canada.

I say that we are entitled to that. That is our birthright as Nova Scotians who came into confederation eighty odd years ago. There is nothing in this proposal now before us which holds out any hope of any development in our part of the country. Most shipyards are developed by direct appropriations by the government for naval or transport purposes. The government not only has the power, it has the duty to allocate expenditures to our part of Canada, especially as we have not fared as we should have fared under confederation. We have always been prepared to make our contribution, but there is never any development for us. The government is spending $300 to $600 million here and more than that for power development, but there is nothing whatever for our part of Canada.

In the statement he made the minister said that 75 to 80 per cent of the steel mills in the United States would be tributary to this development of iron ore in Quebec and to our seaway. An effort is being made to divert these great iron ore deposits largely for the benefit of the United States. Nothing is being done to build up a steel industry in Nova Scotia. I think it is the duty of the minister and the government, at a time when steel is so greatly needed, to enlarge the present steel plant there or build supplementary industries. That must be done if we are to take our proper place in the development of Canada. At page 1576 of Hansard for December 4 the minister said in reference to this iron ore:

> The problem thus is one of a growing gap between supplies and requirements. This gap can be filled partly with imported ore from Quebec-Labrador . . .

Further on he had this to say:

> The new ore traffic. Completion of the seaway would change this picture completely. Quebec-Labrador ores, after paying any likely toll, would be enabled to compete in most of the lake districts at current prices for ore.

It is all for the development of that part of Canada and the United States, and there is nothing whatever for the people of Nova Scotia or other parts of eastern Canada. Further on he had this to say:

> These facilities make available a plentiful supply of iron ore at a low cost, on which were based the great steel centres of today. Now that production of those ores has reached its limit and costs threaten to increase sharply, the new facilities will make available new and expansible supplies at comparatively low cost.

I could quote more of what the minister said, but what I want to point out is that his whole interest is in providing for development in central Canada and the United States. He does not utter a word to give any indication of assistance to Nova Scotia or eastern Canada generally. In putting forward these observations, I want to repeat that I am not opposed to the development of the St. Lawrence waterway and power project, but I want some statement from the minister and the government on what is proposed for the building up of Nova Scotia and eastern Canada. Some encouragement was in the statement of the leader of the opposition which was quoted the other day by my deskmate, the hon. member for Royal. I should like to quote it again. It is to be found at page 1465 of Hansard for December 6, and reads as follows:

> We have mills on the Atlantic seaboard today. As we plan for the use of iron ore, let us make sure that those mills now existing in eastern Canada are supplied with iron ore on a scale which will require much greater milling capacity than they have today. And let us recognize that while there are immense advantages in carrying iron ore to the established mills in the central part of Canada, there are equally great advantages in assuring steel supplies at seaports both on the Atlantic and the Pacific, so that we may be shipping steel in the form of steel to our friends and allies in other parts of the world.

That is part of the quotation from the remarks of the leader of the opposition. There is also the question of the development of power. I pointed out a while ago that I think we have a vested interest in power development in central Canada. It constituted a part of the assets when we entered confederation. The minister pointed out that there was a potential of 9 million horsepower involved in the St. Lawrence waterway project. The United States has only 2,900,000 horsepower out of the total of 9 million: 1,800,000 at Niagara and 1,100,000 at the international portion of the St. Lawrence. The total amount developed at the present time is 3 million horsepower in Canada and the United States, leaving a balance of 6 million to be developed.

That means the continued concentration of industry in central Canada, and little is being done to encourage industry in eastern Canada today or in the future. I think the maritime provinces should also be provided with cheap power in order that we may develop our resources and industry. It has been pointed out in the house at different times that we have great power resources in the maritime provinces. About two years ago the possibilities of the St. Mary's—bay of Fundy tidal development were placed before the house, and a reply was made by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier). He said he would look into the matter, but that is all I have ever heard of it. He was going to look into it. Two million horsepower are available there. If it were in central Canada it would not only be looked after but the minister would be going up and down the St. Lawrence river to see where it was, whether it could be developed and what could be done for central Canada. He never comes to Nova Scotia to find out. Neither does the Minister of Resources and Development (Mr. Winters) come down there to look at the power possibilities.

Mr. Chevrier: I am sure my hon. friend would not want to make a misstatement. I have been to Nova Scotia many times. I have been to Halifax, Saint John, Charlottetown and several other places. I try to make an annual trip to the maritime provinces but unfortunately it has not been possible for me to do that in the last two years.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): I am not saying the minister has not gone to Nova Scotia and the maritimes; it would be a strange thing if he had not. But I say he has never made a personal inspection of the Chignecto canal project. He has never made a personal inspection of the St. Mary's—bay of Fundy power project where it is said that 2 million horsepower can be generated on an economic basis. I doubt whether he has ever visited the Passamaquoddy region where it is possible to develop a million or two million horsepower. He is not interested in these things because they are in the maritime provinces.

Mr. Chevrier: I am not going to let my hon. friend make the statement that I am not interested in these projects. That is an unfair statement for him to make. I am sure he does not want to imply that I am not interested in projects in the maritimes, because that is not so. I am stating now that I am.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): I am glad the minister is interested. He has made that statement, but I am merely saying that I doubt whether he has ever visited the Chignecto project. I doubt whether he has ever visited the Quoddy project. The cape Split—Minas basin project was referred to yesterday by the hon. member for Annapolis-Kings (Mr. Nowlan). We have been told for years and years that millions of horsepower are available there if they can be harnessed, but I do not think any interest has been shown in the harnessing of that power at cape Split. The same applies to Petitcodiac. There are sources of power in that part of the country, and we require cheap power in the maritime provinces. The development of the St. Lawrence project would not be undertaken at this time unless $600 million of Canadian money was being made available for the building of the seaway, thus making possible as a secondary undertaking, almost a primary undertaking, the construction of this power development in central Canada.

We also have great power resources that could be made available as the result of the use of coal. Important developments in power from coal are taking place in Nova Scotia at the present time. Electric power can be generated by this means comparatively cheaply. In my own county of Cumberland the Canada Electric Company, a private enterprise, is developing considerable power but it is not in great quantity, and it is not as cheap as it should be. The cost is not comparable with the cost in central Canada. I think that industry should be subsidized in its use of second grade coal. Some assistance should be given by the federal government to aid in securing the low price coal that is available in the seams in my county in order that industry may be developed and in order that steel smelters may be started in the Chignecto canal region.

The same applies to Pictou county. It has large deposits of low quality coal that might be used for the development of great power undertakings. The same thing applies to Cape Breton. In the coal areas there are enormous deposits of splint, I think they call it, or low grade coal which can be used and which is being used at the present time. This low grade coal can be used for the generation of cheap power. We want some encouragement from the minister and from the government to the end that if this development takes place, the funds will be made available in eastern Canada so that we can supply the electric smelters and other big enterprises in Nova Scotia with cheap power, and that the amount will be comparable with that which is being made available for these enormous expenditures in central Canada at this time. So far there is nothing for us. There are great possibilities in Nova Scotia in the way of waterpower projects and the development of coal-electric power.

It is my opinion that, if the minister had the real interests of Nova Scotia at heart, in view of the hundreds of millions of tons of iron ore to be developed in the Quebec and Labrador deposits, the government's policy would be to see that 2 million to 5 million tons of it is refined in the smelters in eastern Canada, by coal or electricity. But no such undertaking has been given to us under this legislation. A menace appears to be facing our present established industries there, as set out by the hon. member for Cape Breton South, the hon. member for Annapolis-Kings and my seatmate, the hon. member for Royal. Great misgivings are felt as to the effect of this development in eastern Canada. But no assurance is given that we will in any way have any development in order to assist us, no matter how old, how definite and how important have been our associations with the establishment and development of Canada. I do not believe that it would be out of place for the government to make available $200 million and more in order that there might be a development of power, the refinement of iron ore, the building up of basic industries and the establishment of refining industries in eastern Canada, to the end that we might share in the development of Canada, as is our right. That is something that is owed to us by the rest of Canada.

As I said earlier in my remarks, members of the house with whom I have talked and others wherever I go in Ontario, in Quebec and in the west tell me that we in eastern Canada have not fared as we should have, and particularly so in Nova Scotia, in view of the contribution we have made. Here is an occasion on which expenditures running into hundreds of millions of dollars are being made to construct a seaway which it is claimed will develop that part of Canada, build up shipbuilding and so on, and make a great seaway free from the menace of submarines. That could be done in Chignecto; there would be no menace from submarines there. If the Chignecto canal were built, the naval and commercial shipping could go through it and avoid going along the exposed Atlantic coast. But it never occurs to the minister that he is going to construct the Chignecto canal in order that there may be protection for our shipping and our naval interests at Chignecto.

I do not know that there is much more that I need to say, although there is a great deal that can be said. The minister talked about the expenditure for the seaway. I think that we, as responsible members of parliament, should analyse these figures. The amount of $300 million is mentioned. It is the impression of a great many people—and I am not able to judge as to the amount—that this expenditure will be at least double that sum. Since the house met last night I have taken occasion to look into what has been the experience with regard to the Panama canal.

A review of the last report of the governor of the Panama canal shows that appropriations for canal construction up to July 1, 1921, amounted to $386,910,301, less capital stock of Panama railroad, $7 million, making a net amount of $379,910,301; plus annual payments to the republic of Panama, 1913 to 1920, of $2 million; additional construction funds appropriated July 1, 1921, to July 1, 1950, amounted to another $223,223,859, making a total appropriation for the canal of $605,134,160.

Then this report sets out these figures, Mr. Chairman, with respect to the compounding of annual interest, something which is not placed before hon. members by the minister. Further, interest on construction funds compounded annually from 1904 to 1920 totals $128,991,063, making a total capital investment of $734,125,223. A review of the operating statement of the canal for the fiscal year 1950 shows that tolls charged to shipping using the canal, including miscellaneous receipts, amounted to $24,810,323. The net appropriation for expenses amounted to $22,557,703—and we have no estimate from the minister as to what the expenses are going to be in the operating of this canal—resulting in a net revenue in 1950 of only $2,252,620. As I said, the capital expenditure for the Panama canal was $734,125,223. The total revenue for the fiscal year 1949—that is the year previous to the one I quoted—was only $534,374. The minister told the house that the St. Lawrence project is going to be a self-liquidating one. That may be so and I hope it is; but I have my doubts, and we in Nova Scotia will help pay for it. That is the record of the Panama canal that connects world trade in two oceans. We cannot expect a project such as the St. Lawrence waterway, which serves only as an inland medium of transportation, to be any less costly. The tolls will be low because of low cost articles such as coal and wheat.

We are obliged to contribute to this cost, Mr. Chairman. We in our part of Canada are obliged to contribute to the credit that is supplied in order to build this project. I want to repeat, for the third or fourth time, that I am not opposed to this undertaking, but I want some statement at this time as to what is going to be done for the maritimes. I want it from the minister as spokesman for the government; I want it from the government. I do not think he should ask the members from the maritimes to support this undertaking, which will be a menace to the maritimes, without giving us some undertaking or some hope that something is going to be done for the development of the industries and the refinement of steel in the maritime provinces. That is the position we are in. I want to vote for the minister's resolution but I want some statement from him.
