Mr. Gardiner: It would not be correct.

Mr. Knowles: Does this section of the bill or any other section give the agricultural products board power to be the exclusive importer of butter from abroad?

Mr. Gardiner: The government has authority under other measures to take that action, and the government has taken it.

Mr. Knowles: That is exactly the point that is in my mind. I take it from the minister's avoidance of my direct question that there is no power given in this bill to the agricultural products board to be the exclusive importer of butter; but it so happens that by an order that became effective on August 1, 1951, that is the situation at the present time. The minister now tells me that that action was taken under other powers enjoyed by the government. I gathered from what he said earlier in the debate today that that power is derived from the Emergency Powers Act which was passed at the last session of parliament. It now appears, Mr. Chairman, that the government is already doing, without this bill, more than it is going to be able to do under the bill. I begin to wonder what the reason for the bill is, if that is the situation.

I would be glad if the minister would pursue the other question a little further and explain it to me. For example, I hold in my hand a copy of Foreign Trade, a publication put out by the Department of Trade and Commerce. This is the issue of September 22, 1951. I read a bit from page 415:

> In addition to the purchases of butter by the agricultural products board, the trade has been given import permits for approximately 4½ million pounds of butter from certain European countries, because contracts had been made by the trade prior to August 1, the date on which the government took control of the imports of butter.

Was that done by the agricultural products board? Was it done on the advice of the Minister of Agriculture, or was it done on the advice of the Minister of Trade and Commerce? What is the relationship between the way in which the agricultural products board seems to have been working when it has not had a statute, and the way it will now work when this statute is passed?

Mr. Gardiner: The position in relation to these matters is exactly as I stated it at the beginning. In the first place, I stated to the house on the resolution that we are asking the house to put in the form of legislation the same authorities and powers as were taken under the order in council which was passed under the special powers given to trade and commerce last year.

Mr. Knowles: There has been a gap—

Mr. Gardiner: Wait, and you will get an explanation of it. We certainly believed that we had the authority to pass it and we had the authority to operate under it. But we anticipated that if we came to this house and reported that by order in council we had done so and so, and it had to do with something we might desire to continue to do, the house itself would suggest that it ought to be put in the form of legislation passed by this house. Therefore it has been put in the form of legislation and brought here for the house to pass or turn down as it sees fit.

The present position is that the board is buying the butter. It could be purchased by some other authority under the terms of other legislation, but the government has decided that it should be purchased by this board so long as the board is there. Up until the time this legislation passes it is done under the order in council. If this house were to refuse to pass this bill then I suppose consideration would be given to doing away with it altogether. But as soon as it is passed the authority which is now exercised by the board under order in council will be exercised under legislation.

Mr. Knowles: In other words the board expired when the previous statute lapsed on March 31, 1951. The board has not yet been reconstituted by an act of parliament. In the meantime I take it the board has enjoyed its existence by virtue of an order in council passed under the Emergency Powers Act.

Mr. Gardiner: It was legislation passed by this house.

Mr. Knowles: On whose recommendation was that order in council passed?

Mr. Gardiner: I believe it was on a recommendation from my own department. Probably it was signed by me, though I am not sure whether I was here at the time. It was either signed by me or by the acting minister. It was submitted to council and agreed to, so it is the product of the mind of the whole council.

Mr. Knowles: During this interval that the board has enjoyed its existence not directly on the basis of a statute but on the basis of an order in council, it appears to have been under the aegis of the Department of Trade and Commerce. Will it be there after this statute passes?

Mr. Gardiner: As I remember the terms of the legislation, it gives authority to have certain things done in, I believe, any department of government, and under that legislation this particular thing was done in the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. Knowles: I wonder if the minister is sure of that.

Mr. Catherwood: The minister has said that the board would act on the recommendation of the government. I trust it will act on the recommendation of the advisory board, as well. Will the minister assure the committee that in connection with the importation of farm requirements the board will work in conjunction and co-operation with those who have been importing farm products, and who know the extent to which these products are required?

Mr. Gardiner: I did not catch the last part of the question.

Mr. Catherwood: Is the board to work in conjunction with those people who have been carrying on the importation of farm goods over the last number of years? Would this board work in conjunction with them in connection with importations of seed and other farm requirements? I understand the board would not in any way interfere with importations that have been in effect in the past?

Mr. Gardiner: I am quite satisfied the board will not in general interfere with those who are importing products into this country. But where there is no other authority doing the job to the satisfaction of those who desire to have it done, the government can assign that the work be done by this board.

Section 5 agreed to.

On section 6—Penalties.

Mr. Charlton: This is the penalty section, and I should like to read it:

> 6. (1) Every person who violates an order of the board made pursuant to paragraph (d) of subsection one of section four is guilty of an offence and is liable on summary conviction to a fine not exceeding five hundred dollars or to imprisonment for a term not exceeding six months or to both fine and imprisonment.
> (2) In any prosecution under subsection one evidence of an order of the board may be given by the production of a copy thereof purporting to be certified to be a copy by the chairman, vice-chairman, secretary or other official of the board.

My contention is that a fine of $500 or imprisonment for six months, or both fine and imprisonment, is too heavy for the ordinary producer. It may not be heavy enough, however, for some processor. Although the expression is "not exceeding $500" it is possible for a producer to be fined that much. For instance a producer may be holding a few hundred dozen eggs, a few tons of honey, or a small quantity of various other products, whereas a processor may be holding thousands of dozens of eggs or thousands of tons of honey. Therefore I move in amendment, seconded by the hon. member for Middlesex East (Mr. White):

That section 6 be amended as follows:

(1) that all the words after the word "conviction" in subsection (1) to the end of the subsection be deleted, and the following substituted therefor:

(a) in the case of a producer, to a fine not exceeding $300 or to imprisonment for a term not exceeding three months, or to both fine and imprisonment.

(b) in any other case, to a fine not exceeding $1,000 or to imprisonment for a term not exceeding six months, or to both fine and imprisonment;

(2) that the following be added as subsection (2):

"If a corporation is guilty of an offence under this act, any officer, director or agent of the corporation who directed, authorized, assented to, acquiesced in or participated in the commission of the offence is a party to and guilty of the offence."

(3) That subsection (2) of the said section be renumbered subsection 3.

That is taken in practically the exact words from the Canadian Wheat Board Act. Therefore I suggest there is nothing in the wording that would be objectionable to the Department of Justice. I have a copy of the Canadian Wheat Board Act, if the Minister of Justice would like to check it. I would be happy to let him have it, so long as it is returned to me.

Mr. Knowles: I take it that the reference is to the word "conviction" as it appears in line 34. Perhaps the amendment should be so worded.

Mr. Charlton: Yes.

Mr. Gardiner: Mr. Chairman, we are prepared to accept the amendment as suggested.

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT

AMENDMENT TO FORBID THE FIXING OF SPECIFIC OR MINIMUM RESALE PRICES

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice) moved the second reading of Bill No. 36, to amend the Combines Investigation Act.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Graydon: Just a moment, Mr. Speaker; just a moment.

[Mr. Charlton.]

Mr. Garson: Mr. Speaker, I never like to disappoint the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon), so if he will take the responsibility for what I am now going to inflict upon hon. members I shall be glad to make a statement in this matter. In view of the importance of the bill now under consideration I think in fairness to those who will take part in the debate later I should begin by tracing briefly the different steps which have led up to this matter which is now before us at this stage.

In June of 1950 a committee, which has come to be known as the MacQuarrie committee, was appointed to study the whole field of combines legislation and to recommend what amendments, if any, it thought should be made in order to make the combines act a more effective instrument for the encouragement and safeguarding of our free economy. Hon. members can see from the terms of reference that the committee's authority was as broad as it possibly could be. The committee in beginning its work by soliciting representations from various trades which were concerned and from individuals, drew attention to what had been said about the subject of resale price maintenance by the royal commission on prices in 1949, and it invited from organizations and individuals, in the light of the findings of that royal commission in 1949, their views upon this subject. Far from this bill having been thrown together very hastily and in an ill-considered manner at the last minute, as some of its opponents have suggested in committee, it deals with a subject matter which was considered carefully by the royal commission on prices in 1949 and referred to in its report, which report was then fully considered by the MacQuarrie committee, which in its proceedings in 1950 and 1951, expressly requested information and representations from the various trades concerning resale price maintenance.

This subject matter emerged in the speech from the throne as an item of government policy after we had asked the MacQuarrie committee in the late summer of 1951, when its general report had been held up by the magnitude of its task and some delays in receiving representations, whether it could give us a special interim report upon the subject of resale price maintenance which would be interim only in the sense that it was delivered before its final report, but which would be final so far as the subject of resale price maintenance was concerned.

The MacQuarrie committee replied in the affirmative, and made its report available in early October. The report of the committee, which has come to be known as the MacQuarrie report, recommended against the practice of resale price maintenance, and in particular, recommended that it should be an offence for a manufacturer, first, to recommend or prescribe minimum resale prices for his products and, second, to refuse to sell, to withdraw a franchise or to take any form of action as a means of enforcing minimum resale prices.

The committee did not recommend that it be made an offence to prescribe resale prices which are not specific or minimum prices, from which it follows that suppliers would be free to fix and to enforce maximum prices. Nor did the committee recommend against the right of a manufacturer to indicate a resale price as long as such price was not recommended or prescribed as a minimum. In addition, the MacQuarrie committee went on to make some observations on the subject of loss-leader selling, a subject with which I shall deal later.

Perhaps at this point I should define resale price maintenance. It is most important in dealing with this whole subject that we should have a clear understanding as to just what type of resale price maintenance we are dealing with in the context of this bill. There are two kinds of resale price maintenance. First, rival suppliers, whether manufacturers or distributors, may agree among themselves to maintain prices of comparable articles at agreed levels at various stages of distribution. This is commonly referred to as horizontal resale price maintenance and, generally speaking, it is already an offence under the Combines Investigation Act. That is to say, it takes place largely horizontally, as it were, among all the dealers in a certain trade.

The second kind takes place when a single manufacturer prescribes the prices at which his goods are to be sold or resold at the various stages of distribution. That is, he steps down out of his own level to suggest to those at either a lower or higher level, depending on one's viewpoint, the basis at which they can sell or resell his goods. Therefore this type of resale price maintenance is commonly referred to as vertical resale price maintenance, as distinguished from the horizontal type to which I referred a moment ago.

This vertical resale price maintenance may or may not be forbidden by the present terms of the Combines Investigation Act, depending upon the particular circumstances of the case which comes before the courts. In most cases, however, it will not be illegal under the act as it now stands. It is this latter type of vertical resale price maintenance which the MacQuarrie committee studied and reported against, and with which the bill now before us is concerned.

The interim report of the MacQuarrie committee on resale price maintenance was made, as I have said, early in the month of October. The speech from the throne delivered on October 9 contained the following paragraph:

> The government has received an interim report from the committee studying the combines legislation recommending that suppliers of goods should be prohibited from requiring or inducing distributors to resell such goods at fixed or maximum resale prices. You will be asked to consider legislation arising out of the committee's interim report.

The speech by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) on the address in reply to the speech from the throne and the radio broadcast I made over a coast to coast hook-up also made it clear that we accepted this report and were prepared to act upon it. I maintain, in the face of some of the contentions which have been made to the contrary, that the position of the government has been crystal clear at all stages of this matter. We accepted the MacQuarrie report and proposed to act upon it at this session.

It is quite true, of course, that following these announcements representations were received from a large number of trade associations as well as from individual manufacturers and merchants all across Canada, large and small, to the effect that in their opinion the prohibition of resale price maintenance would very seriously affect their businesses. They felt that it would be most unfair to proceed with this prohibition of resale price maintenance until they had an opportunity to be heard before the bar of public opinion.

We decided to accede to their requests. On November 6, as hon. members will recall, I introduced a resolution for the establishment of a joint committee of the Senate and House of Commons, and I quote:

> —to consider the interim report of the committee appointed to study combines legislation tabled in the House of Commons, Friday, October 12, 1951, and to consider appropriate amendments to the Combines Investigation Act based thereon.

The joint committee was duly constituted; it commenced its sittings on Tuesday, November 13, and concluded them on Friday, December 7. During the course of the committee's sittings there had been placed before it by the combines commissioner a draft amendment to the Combines Investigation Act which translated into legislative form the recommendations of the MacQuarrie committee. The joint committee in its report which was tabled in this house on Friday, December 7, recommended legislation along the lines of this draft and went on to make some comments on the question of loss-leader selling to which, as I have already said, I shall refer later.

This completes this short review of what has led up to the introduction of the bill now before hon. members. It indicates that this matter has been under periodic consideration ever since 1949.

I should like next to deal with the substance of the bill before us and to indicate what in my opinion are the principles involved. First of all, however, I should like to refer to the principles upon which the MacQuarrie committee based its conclusions that resale price maintenance should be forbidden. These were as follows:

1. That the direct and immediate effect of resale price maintenance is the elimination of price competition among retailers in price-maintained goods, this being one of the main objectives of the practice.

2. That resale price maintenance facilitates and makes more effective the formation of combines among manufacturers.

3. That the practice of resale price maintenance establishes a private system of law under which the business of a non-conforming retailer or of a retailer who is merely believed to be non-conforming may be seriously prejudiced without that retailer having any recourse to the courts of justice.

4. That the tendency of the practice is to maintain prices at a higher level than would be the case under competitive conditions.

5. That to the extent resale price maintenance stabilizes prices it contributes to the instability of production and the reduction of sales, results which serve neither the interests of manufacturers nor the general welfare.

The MacQuarrie committee also dealt with certain arguments in favour of resale price maintenance. As to the fact that resale price maintenance prevents a retailer from taking advantage of his geographical position or of a temporary scarcity of the article in question to charge excessive prices, the MacQuarrie committee pointed out that the authority to fix and enforce maximum prices which this new legislation will permit would be adequate to prevent this. In other words, if merchant men up in, say, the Peace river area wanted to charge more than this maximum price for a certain article of merchandise and the manufacturer of that article were desirous that he should not do so the manufacturer would have power under the legislation to prevent it.

[Mr. Garson.]

As to the argument that resale price maintenance prevents loss leaders, the MacQuarrie committee stated that more direct and desirable weapons could be found to curb loss leaders, which they did not believe to be an immediate problem at the present time.

As to the contention that resale price maintenance encourages the operation of more retail outlets and the view that it affords a measure of protection to the small retailer, the committee pointed out that this protection was likely to be illusory because

(a) the high margins fixed by resale price maintenance can be used by large stores to expose the small retailer to a more acute form of competition in the field where prices are not maintained. In other words, they can take the profits they make on the maintained prices and use them to cut the prices of goods which are not maintained.

(b) High margins, below which the retailer cannot go, merely transfer competition—and even the supporters of resale price maintenance argue this as part of their case—from the field of prices into the field of services and as a result wasteful forms of competition in services are thereby created, increasing the costs of the retailer to some appreciable part of the amount that he might conceivably have saved by having his prices maintained.

(c) Fixed margins provide an inducement to newcomers to enter into the retail field so that too great a number of outlets with consequent reduction in individual volume may result. This has been the experience, for example, in the drug trade in Great Britain, where under the umbrella of resale price maintenance there have been increases of the order of 8,000 or 9,000 newcomers into the trade each year to take advantage of what seemed to be a superficially favourable situation created by this practice.

The MacQuarrie committee believed that there would always be a place for small dealers in retailing but considered that resale price maintenance contributed more to discourage individual efficiency than to protect the small business. That is to say, if it did in any respect protect small business—and I will argue later that it does not—any merit it might possess in that respect was much more than offset by its discouragement to individual efficiency.

In reply to the argument that resale price maintenance was necessary to protect the reputation of branded goods—we were told that it was not fair to the manufacturer who has spent hundreds of thousands of dollars to build up prestige for his brands to have them made subject to any kind of price cutting—the committee expressed itself as not convinced that the reputation of branded goods suffered greatly from normal price variation.

During the last month or so, and particularly after the committee sat on this matter, we have heard inside this house and out of it, before the committee and outside of it, many of these arguments I have mentioned and others besides. I must say that some of them seem to me to range pretty far afield, and not all seem to be completely relevant or entirely helpful to a consideration of this subject. But having regard to the fact that, since we decided to accede to the request of those concerned to send the bill to a committee, the only way in which the bill could be got out of the committee in order to be passed at this session of the house was by our not hearing those who were in favour of the bill but only those who were opposed to it—

Mr. Fleming: And only some of them.

Mr. Garson: And all of them that were not repetitive. The steering committee analysed the briefs presented, and the committee heard from all opponents of the bill all arguments which were not mere repetition. In view of that fact this issue comes before the house today in the position that a very great deal has been said over quite a long period of time against the legislation. Many such arguments have been developed, and this is really the first opportunity we have had to develop any arguments in favour of the legislation. That being the case, I should like today to deal with the arguments which have been raised against it. I will try to take them up one by one and show, if I can, that they are fallacious.

This of course is not a simple subject, and it would be a great mistake to deal with it as such. I think we must all concede that there are many aspects which require particular consideration.

Nevertheless it seems to me that the crux of the matter can be stated with some clarity and brevity. The Canadian way of life has always proceeded upon the majority view—I know there are some of our friends in the house who may not agree with this—that free enterprise spurred by competition is the system that will produce the most abundant returns for the greatest number of people. There are, even under a system of free enterprise, it is true, such things as public utilities where free enterprise has had to be replaced to some extent by government control. Each one of these exceptions depends upon its own peculiar circumstances, but in general the economy of Canada is free and it is, thank goodness, competitive. The question involved in resale price maintenance therefore is whether this principle of competition which is the very essence of our free economy is to be replaced by a practice under which the manufacturers and the distributors alone determine price without effective intervention of consumers or the government. That is the issue involved in this matter.

In this connection, the first point I should like to make is that in the determination of resale prices the profit mark-ups taken by the wholesaler and the retailer are quite important. Sometimes, I am afraid, we are inclined to regard the consumer price of a given commodity as the cost of manufacturing it plus a comparatively small mark-up to get it from the manufacturer to the consumer; in other words, we are inclined to think that the bigger part of the job is in getting it created, and that getting it merely from the manufacturer to the consumer is the lesser part of the job. This thought is deceptive; it is not true, because in many cases these wholesale and retail mark-ups together equal or exceed the manufacturing cost. That is one thing that the statistics—and, I may say, the inadequate and sketchy statistics—which were submitted to the joint committee proved.

As I said a moment ago, we are all agreed that competition is vitally important in our free economy. I think we are all equally agreed that both primary and secondary producers turn out goods at a lower cost to consumers, and thereby raise the standard of living, by competing with one another. Our contention is that competition is no less important in the distributing field than it is in the field of production. I submit that no convincing reason has been brought forth, in all this mass of material that was presented to the committee by the opponents of this bill, to show that the process of distribution can be discharged efficiently and economically without competition; and for these purposes the only really effective competition is price competition. For not only does price competition provide a high standard of living by guaranteeing an efficient production and distribution at a low cost to the consumer; it is also my submission that it guarantees what the supporters of resale price maintenance say resale price maintenance guarantees but what we say resale price maintenance does not guarantee, namely the genuine independence of the retailer, particularly the small retailer.

I propose to submit to you, sir, that competition does protect the genuine independence of the small retailer, and that resale price maintenance does not protect his independence; for under competition it is self-evident to anyone who has the slightest knowledge of trade in this country that the independent retailer is really independent. He buys from whom he pleases. He establishes his own price policy at all times. He runs his own business. Under resale price maintenance, on the contrary, what is his position?

I do not think we could get a fairer or more accurate statement of the position of the independent retailer under resale price maintenance than that which is stated in the Fair Trade Manual which is put out by a body which should know all about this matter, if any body does, namely the American Fair Trade Council Incorporated. This is the official body which supports, lobbies for and produces the philosophy and the thinking for the so-called fair trade laws in the United States. These fair trade laws, which are now in force in 45 out of the 48 states, make it legal at least in state commerce for the manufacturer to force the retailer to charge the consumer the retail prices which the manufacturer places upon his branded products. I am quoting now from the Fair Trade Manual of 1950, which states clearly, accurately and knowledgeably—for if they do not know about this subject, I do not know any body that will know better—that under resale price maintenance—

> In the business sense, the retailer is but an agent for the manufacturer, a conduit to the purchaser.

The resale price maintenance concept is that the only real competition is that which takes place at the manufacturers' level. Under such an arrangement the independent retailer loses his independence and becomes, as this manual states, merely the agent of the manufacturer, a conduit to the consumer. His function in society becomes, under resale price maintenance, not dissimilar in principle to that of the automats which can be found in the large American cities. He is a vending machine who places goods on the shelves, takes them off, puts them on the counter and in respect of them takes a mark-up, fixed in all cases, with which he need not concern himself at all and which is fixed by the manufacturer.

We who believe in a free economy and who believe in genuine free enterprise do not accept these views. We believe that the independent retailer is one of the most important economic and social factors in our society. We believe that the genuine independence of the independent retailer is to be treasured and preserved. It cannot be preserved through resale price maintenance which, even in the terms of its own proponents, makes him a mere agent of the manufacturer and a conduit through which goods pass from the manufacturer to the consumer.

[Mr. Garson.]

The main and obvious purpose of resale price maintenance is to eliminate price competition among retailers. Yet while this purpose is being served the supporters of resale price maintenance continue to affirm that it does not seriously eliminate price competition. They say it is to eliminate retail competition but it does not eliminate competition. They explain this paradox by saying that after resale price maintenance has eliminated competition at the wholesale and retail level, the competition nevertheless still exists, not of course amongst retailers or wholesalers but amongst manufacturers. They cannot deny, of course, that where the consumer, before resale price maintenance appeared upon the scene, had the benefit of price competition amongst manufacturers, wholesalers and retailers, he has it at only the one manufacturing level after resale price maintenance is in effect. But they argue that the consumer still has the benefit of competition between manufacturers of different branded goods and between manufacturers of branded and price-maintained goods on the one hand and the manufacturers of branded or non-price-maintained lines on the other. Then, undertaking as manufacturers to speak for the consumer, they say that is all the price competition the consumer needs. My purpose today will be to try to prove that is not so.

The supporters of resale price maintenance also say that even among the wholesalers and retailers competition still remains; and I quote again from the Fair Trade Manual: competition "in service, sales promotion, salesmanship, display advertising."

There are two separate considerations involved here, and I should like to take them separately. First, and most important, there is no doubt, and indeed it is not denied, that price competition among retailers is eliminated by resale price maintenance. What does this mean from the standpoint of the retailer? It means, to begin with, that the price he charges cannot reflect his own individual cost of doing business. His price is set for him by the manufacturer. If he wishes to compete with his fellow retailers to bring more business into his store, the only way he can do it is by offering his prospective customers a fancier store front or a carpet on the floor, by giving credit or any other form of service of that sort. If he is a volume buyer who, because he does a big business, gets more than the ordinary discount from the manufacturer, he must charge his customers exactly the same price as any other retailer. If he wants to pass anything back to the customer it would be by way of even fancier store fronts, even thicker carpets or ever better display cases and so on.

What does this mean to the customer? It means that he cannot buy the kind of service he most wants or needs. We all know there are different kinds of stores. There is the smart store with its high taxes and overhead; its expensive advertising and expensive interior; its other services and its charge accounts. If it is a really "posh" store it may have glamorous models to display the gowns. I am not speaking from experience, but those who patronize such stores are under no illusion as to who is paying for this kind of service; or if they are when they go in they are disillusioned before they come out.

On the other hand there is the plain cash and carry store which eliminates all these frills, and bases its customer appeal upon the price reductions which the elimination of such things makes possible. In the absence of resale price maintenance, and only in the absence of resale price maintenance and only because we still have trades in Canada in which there is no or relatively little resale price maintenance, the customer can exercise his freedom of choice amongst these different alternatives.

If the customer cannot afford the glittering exteriors or the colourful interiors he goes to the stores which, in lieu of those splendid things, offer him savings in price. For example, one could go into any store in Ottawa of the less colourful kind, one which is for the most part not under resale price maintenance but which makes a policy of offering goods at somewhat lower prices—a shoe store, for example—one finds that the surroundings are not luxurious. They will be quite plain and unattractive. But in that store the customer will be able to buy articles of standard footwear for about 10 per cent less than they can be purchased for in more luxurious surroundings. The Fair Trade Manual says that "competition between dealers remains in service, sales promotion, salesmanship and display advertising." The point here is that many people, and especially those whose purse is not too long, who are not in the high income group, who therefore patronize these less expensive stores get all the service and salesmanship they want to pay for. They need shoes, and they need them at the lowest possible cost. They do not need these luxurious surroundings.

When it is in effect, what does resale price maintenance do for a customer of this type? It thrusts upon him competition in these extra services, extra sales promotion and the like, everything he does not need, and denies him the kind of competition he wants most of all, which is competition in price. What do these extra services, these luxurious surroundings and the like mean to a man who has $5 in his pocket and wants to buy a pair of shoes which are price maintained at $5.50 and which cannot be reduced because of price resale maintenance? It simply imposes upon him something he does not want, and denies him the benefit of buying at $5 that which he would be very glad to get.

I should like to turn for a moment, Mr. Speaker, to the manufacturers' side of the picture. Aside from the fact that resale price maintenance takes competition out of the distributive field, does it really leave, as its supporters say, competition in the manufacturing field? I submit that it does not. This was made quite apparent in the evidence submitted to the joint committee. In the first place, it was clear to all the members of that committee, and I think it will be clear to the members of this house if they stop to reflect upon it for a moment, that once a policy of resale price maintenance gets into operation it cannot, in the nature of things, remain static. Once the practice is established by one manufacturer the trade sees to it that pressure is brought on other manufacturers to follow suit.

I do not want to single out any particular trade, but in the trade that made the strongest representations before the joint committee the members of the committee must have been strongly impressed by the organized efforts that were continuously made to have resale price maintenance extended to articles to which it had not been previously extended; to press for bigger and better margins on articles already within the practice, and to restrict certain borderline products to that trade with its high profit margins rather than have them go upon the grocery shelf with its comparatively small margin.

Now, Mr. Speaker, is anyone naïve enough to assume that it is the manufacturer who absorbs those bigger and better margins? Of course it is not. If he does absorb the high retail margin, then the manufacturer must have been making an excessive profit previously. In either case it is the consumer who pays the shot. What happens is this. As the practice of resale price maintenance is extended to an ever wider area of the field which it covers, the nature of the competition changes entirely. When retailers are competitive among themselves in their prices, that is when there is no resale price maintenance, each of them, by the fact he is severely competitive with his fellow retailer, is under the necessity from time to time of going back to his wholesaler and saying "My retail competitor is selling a shirt of the same quality as yours for 50 cents less. Unless you can give me a better price I cannot sell your shirt in competition with him, so you will have to sharpen your pencil and give me a better price on it." But when the retailers are not competitive—when the retail price is fixed—their direct interest in getting manufacturers' prices down disappears, because the higher the manufacturers' prices go the higher the price their mark-up will apply to. Indeed it is more serious than that, because instead of the retail trade bringing pressure upon the manufacturer to reduce his price the manufacturer seeks to secure the goodwill of the retailer by providing him with bigger and better margins than other manufacturers will provide him, and the consumer foots the bill.

You might think perhaps this is rather a strong argument for me to develop, but let me give you a few examples.

Mr. Hees: Don't worry about us.

Mr. Garson: Well, strongly worded, shall I say, as a concession to my hon. friend. Let me give you a few examples of what I mean. I am not going to give the names because I do not wish to be unfair, but if any hon. member is curious about these matters I can show him privately a photostatic copy of these advertisements which I have here on my file. I will show them to him privately. These are all recently published full-page advertisements from a reputable trade journal. The first concerns a cough syrup.

Mr. Drew: That is not made in Brockville, I hope.

Mr. Garson: I do not think it is, as a matter of fact. I do not think it is made in Carleton, anyway. The first concerns a cough syrup that, I venture to say, many hon. members have used. It is quite a well-known product. The advertisement reads in part:

> Longer-profit deals—up to 42·8 per cent profit! Don't be caught short! Blank—

That is the name of the so and so firm.

> —blank is offering the widest profit spread on the fastest-growing cough syrup in Canada . . . hurry! Time is short—profits are long!

The second advertisement is that of a type of throat lozenge which doctors in the city, to my knowledge, are recommending to their patients at the present time, and I have not the least doubt with every justification. Here the profit is somewhat lower, 40 per cent, but please note the approach:

> When the doctor says "get blank's," the patient gets 'em. Price is no object. And you profit accordingly.

And a third is even more revealing. It concerns a popular medicated plaster, and the advertisement is run by a highly reputable and leading manufacturer in this country. This special offer "Boosts your average profit—per—backache to a whopping 48·1 per cent." I should interpose here, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Fleming: What was the date of that advertisement?

Mr. Garson: These are within the past six months.

Mr. Knowles: What was the date of the backache?

Mr. Garson: No, the date of the advertisement. If my hon. friend is interested at all I can show him the photostatic copy.

Mr. Drew: He wants to find out how much he has lost.

Mr. Garson: I should interpose here that these percentages are percentages of selling price. Translated into retail profit, which the retailer makes upon his own costs, they mean that for handling the cough syrup, the lozenge and the plaster, respectively, the retailer gets for his service a retail profit of 74 per cent, 66⅔ per cent and 93 per cent respectively. Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not think it is too much to say that there is resale price maintenance at work. That is the kind of competition it engenders in this one particular field. Does the tone of that advertising convince you, sir, that the system should be perpetuated?

Moreover, in most of the cases these figures I have quoted do not include the additional profits which are offered for quantity purchases. Ordinarily a larger volume should make possible smaller individual profits, but under resale price maintenance increasing volume is associated with wider profits; not only wider profits based upon volume, but wider profits on each unit sold.

I think, judging by some of the remarks of the apologists before the committee, the manufacturers concerned here, if I were to name them, could make a very plausible reply. They might be able to argue, as did some of the witnesses before the parliamentary committee—and if I am not mistaken, Mr. Speaker, I think one or two of the members argued to the same effect, although they were not on the government side—that—

Mr. Fulton: Some of them were.

Mr. Garson: No, I think not, by any means. They would reply that the retail price of this particular type of product over the last ten years, in spite of all the rise in the cost of living, the rise in the price of eggs and in the price of beefsteak and so on, had not risen at all. That was one of the statistical red herrings which certain persons sought to draw across the path of the committee. But I submit that if this contention were true—and it may be true; I am not suggesting that it is not—it would still be irrelevant because I suggest it could only be true because of economies effected by increased efficiency of production, which the public would have shared in any event, and I think more fully, without resale price maintenance; or perhaps because the original prices were so high ten years ago that all the increases in labour and material costs involved in them could be easily absorbed, still leaving a quite adequate profit.

Let me take three typical cases from the electrical appliance field. These are taken from the material submitted by the trade to the joint committee, and I have taken the first specific instances given in their material, that of an electric range, an electric washer and an electric refrigerator respectively. The information on the range shows that the cost to the wholesaler, in 1950, including all taxes, was $204.15. The retailer's cost was $230. He sold the product to the consumer for $349. This means that the retailer's mark-up was 52 per cent over his cost, or $119 on an article that he had bought for $230. The wholesaler's mark-up and the retailer's mark-up together amounted to 71 per cent of the manufacturer's selling price, which included the manufacturer's costs, his profit, taxes and freight.

In the case of the washing machine which retailed for $159.50 in 1950 and the refrigerator which retailed for $375 the figures tell substantially the same story.

Some people may regard these mark-ups as excessive, notwithstanding the explanations to which I think it is only fair that I should refer, that in carrying these articles in stock it was necessary to service them and to keep them in shape so they would be in good order when they were sold, and to take care of the claims that were made by the purchaser during the guarantee period, and the like. I express no opinion myself as to the adequacy or otherwise of the prices. I cite them for another reason altogether. I submit that the druggist who sold the medicated plaster made on his cost of 52 cents a mark-up of 48 cents. The retailer who sold the range made $119. What I say is this: I think it is a very reasonable assertion to say that these margins, under resale price maintenance, are set by the manufacturer who, in the nature of things, cannot have a direct knowledge of the individual retailer's cost of doing business.

Then, to put the next point in the form of a question: Would any reasonable person maintain that margins like these do not leave room for a retailer to pass back to his customer the savings he can make by the efficiency with which he runs his store, as compared with the efficiency with which his competitor runs his store? That may not be a very great amount, nothing like the margin provided here. But is there anything in the size of the margin to indicate that it does not leave room for the retailer to pass on to his customer any efficiency he has developed in the running of his own business? Yet under resale price maintenance he cannot pass back one penny. He cannot compete in price. The only way he can compete and try to get business from the other fellow is by keeping the whole of the margin and spending the money he thinks he should spend to outdo the other man in sales promotion, fancy store fronts and the like, which I am sure most buyers of goods would regard as a very poor substitute for a competitive cut in prices.

How difficult it is for the manufacturer to fix the retail mark-up is shown by the variation in distributors' costs, which do vary considerably from one merchant to another, just as manufacturing costs vary from one factory to another. The dominion bureau of statistics has published a recent report which shows the operating expenses of certain businesses. The table to which I am now referring and which, if I may have permission, I should like to place on Hansard in full —I shall quote only a small portion of it—

Mr. Fleming: What is the source?

Mr. Garson: The dominion bureau of statistics. The table I shall place on Hansard shows the average and then the middle range of distributors' costs. That is to say, if one considered that there were four levels of distributors' costs, in arriving at this middle range he would eliminate the two outside ones. Then the middle range represents the high and the low of the inside ones. All the extremes are eliminated.

It shows the middle range for groceries running from 5·6 to 8·4. These figures are shown as a percentage of net sales. In another range, of tobacco and confectionery, it is 4·2 to 7·6. Then we come up to automotive parts and accessories, which varies from 16·5 to 28·0. This comparison, it will be remembered, is just in the middle range. In connection with hardware the figures are from 11·8 to 19·0. I suggest that these variations show how impossible it is for a manufacturer, under resale price maintenance, to select any common margin or mark-up as the fixed spread which should prevail in the sale of one of his items in the hands of all the retailers to whom he supplies it.

The illustrations I have given do not cover the whole story, but I believe they are sufficient to make my point.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Do I understand the minister has permission to place the table on Hansard?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Fleming: What was the date of the return of the bureau of statistics?

Mr. Garson: It was 1949.

Mr. Fleming: Is there anything more recent than that?

Mr. Garson: I do not think so. As my hon. friend knows, there is a time lag in the gathering of these statistics. Those I have are the latest available. It will be understood that I did not gather these figures myself, but I am sure my staff would have gathered the latest available. I believe these are the latest available. Then, as I have been given permission to place the table on Hansard, may I say it is as follows:

	Per cent of net sales
	Average	Middle Range
Grocery	7·1	5·6— 8·4
Fruit and vegetable	9·5	7·7—12·5
Tobacco and confectionery	5·6	4·2— 7·6
Dry goods	13·4	10·1—16·7
Piece goods	12·6	9·6—17·3
Automotive parts and accessories	20·0	16·5—28·0
Hardware	14·1	11·8—19·0
Plumbing and heating supplies	12·0	9·4—14·7

I should like to supplement these points by one further detail. In addition to these middle range variations in the cost of distributing goods, we found upon inquiry that in representative lines of electrical appliances the retailer's margin varied quite substantially with the volume of business he did. To take an example: In the case of a certain refrigerator, the retailer's selling price being fixed under resale price maintenance but his buying price being dependent upon volume, his mark-up on cost varied by as much as 16 per cent, depending upon the quantity he got from the manufacturer.

Now, as I said earlier, ordinarily increased volume means reduced prices by virtue of the fact that many of the articles we are buying today at a modest price are available at that price because they are produced in volume. The more volume there is, the lower the price becomes. But in this particular case the man who buys in volume like this gets that 16 per cent, but under resale price maintenance he cannot pass any of it back to his customer except by way of extra service of one kind or another.

To give an example of such services there is the running of charge accounts at no extra cost to the person opening the account, if he wishes to pay in that way. Ordinarily when a man buys for cash he saves the merchant a great deal by way of bookkeeping expense, time and trouble, and also there is a saving in bad debts.

One would ordinarily think that if he made a saving by that method of purchasing, which he had chosen, he should be able to get that saving. But under resale price maintenance he cannot get it. In effect, under resale price maintenance the manufacturer says, in relation to the pair of shoes about which I was speaking a moment ago—and I am afraid the price of $5.50 I mentioned is not up to date; perhaps I should have said $11—

Mr. Fraser: That must have been 1935.

Mr. Garson: Yes. I am a little behind in that respect. In effect the manufacturer says this: "I am sorry; this is a packaged commodity I am selling, and it consists of $5 for the shoes and 50 cents for sales promotion and fancy services. If on top of the price for the shoes you, having only $5 in your pocket, cannot pay for this service, then you cannot have either the shoes or the service; for under resale price maintenance I cannot reduce my price below $5.50. In this way you must go without shoes and I must go without the sale." That is exactly what it means. There is no way of price reducing under resale price maintenance.

I next submit that vertical resale price maintenance may promote or assist the operation of a horizontal, price-fixing combine. Resale price maintenance may be developed in two different ways. It may be used by a single manufacturer in the first instance, independently, because he thinks it will maintain the reputation of his product and give him the best possible return upon it. But, sir, let us suppose that each one of a number of manufacturers of comparable products in a certain line of business is able to tie up all his retail and wholesale outlets by a perfectly legal resale price maintenance understanding, which fixes the prices they are to charge at the wholesale level and at the retail level. He has already fixed the price at which they are to be charged at the manufacturing level. I suggest that once each of a number of manufacturers has thus tied up his outlets in a lawful manner then all those manufacturers are in a much more favourable position to conclude among themselves a horizontal price fixing agreement which is illegal under the Combines Investigation Act. Moreover, behind the lawful facade of resale price maintenance such horizontal price agreements will be very hard to detect and prosecute.

My next submission is that price maintenance may provide an effective substitute for combines. If a group of distributors, we will say in the X trade, agree among themselves and with the manufacturers to maintain prices on the goods in that trade, that would be a combine unlawful under the Combines Investigation Act. But suppose that, instead of agreeing among themselves to fix prices, they go separately to all the manufacturers who produce for that trade and persuade them to introduce resale price maintenance on their products, then I suggest that virtually the same results will be achieved and within the law as it now stands, but with all the harmful effects so far as stifling competition is concerned as would be present in a combine itself.

Evidence submitted to the joint parliamentary committee was rather illuminating on this subject. The evidence submitted indicated that the movement toward resale price maintenance came as often from the retail trade as from manufacturers, and its purpose was to achieve by indirect means that which if achieved by horizontal price fixing agreement would have constituted an indictable offence under the Criminal Code and the Combines Investigation Act.

There was a tendency on the part of some witnesses before the joint parliamentary committee to minimize the extent of resale price maintenance in the distributive trades as a whole. As I understood it, the argument was: "Well, after all, it is only a small segment of the entire picture that is affected by this practice, so why bother? Why not wait until it becomes a much more serious abuse than it is at the present time before taking cognizance of it?"

It seems obvious that if the practice affected such a small part of the retail trade as these advocates alleged then such strong efforts to maintain the practice would not have been made before the committee by so many and varied trades. I am sure members of this house would not have received nearly the amount of correspondence and the number of telegrams they have received during the last few weeks if the allegations of those gentlemen had been correct.

I am not going to take up the time of the house with any detailed statistical analysis of the practice. We have done an accurate job, but to outline this in detail would take up a great deal of time which I think could be spent to better purpose. In any event I think we can rely upon the general conclusion of the various inquiries into this subject that retail price maintenance is now applied widely to a great many lines of commodities and that the practice is increasing. For example, the royal commission on prices in 1949 stated in its report:

> Throughout our inquiry we have been impressed by the degree to which individual manufacturers fix the resale prices of their products and so narrow the area in which price competition amongst wholesalers and retailers is operative.

Having read the MacQuarrie report, I am sure hon. members are aware that it referred to the widespread practice of fixing resale prices, and to the growing proportions of the practice. I might supplement this by one or two references to the evidence given before the joint committee. The first trade group to appear were the manufacturers and distributors of that important commodity, beauty supplies. While perhaps not typical of trades generally, its representative estimated that resale price maintenance in his field had increased from about half in 1940 to approximately 90 per cent now. The Canadian association of radio and appliance dealers stated that price maintenance applied to 80 to 90 per cent of the industry. Mention was made before the joint committee of an estimate that over 60 per cent of the volume of trade of a druggist is in price-maintained lines. On the other hand only a very small proportion of the total volume in such lines as groceries and hardware are price maintained. But even in those fields there was evidence that greater emphasis was being placed upon branding and efforts are being made to extend resale price maintenance. I think the most significant statement was that made in the brief of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture to the effect that more than half of all the purchases made by farmers for productive purposes came directly under some form of private resale price fixing, which in itself it seems to me is a pretty serious situation.

The practice therefore certainly does not play an insignificant role in trade in this country, and there is nothing in any evidence that has come before us to suggest that the practice has by any means reached the limits to which it might very easily go if left unchecked. The fact that resale price maintenance has not yet extended over a predominant portion of trade as a whole is not, in my view and in my submission, a reason for refraining from dealing with it. Being convinced as to the undesirability of the practice and the fact that it is growing, it seems clearly preferable to prohibit it in its present stage when any consequent dislocation will be of small order, rather than to deal with it, as the British are now doing, when it has become as widespread as it has in that country.

I should like to deal now for a moment with the argument which recurred again and again in the proceedings of the joint parliamentary committee. We heard from witnesses and from several members of the official opposition that we should keep this committee in existence and superimpose, like Ossa upon Pelion, this inquiry upon that of the MacQuarrie committee which, in turn, was on top of the royal commission on prices of 1949. The argument was that it was all very well to have these professors and other academic individuals give their opinion, but what we needed were some good sound statistics showing, among other things, that the best comparison to make was the simple comparison of the retail margin on price-maintained articles with that on non-price-maintained articles. It was contended that if we could just get enough of that and take time enough we would get at the root of this problem.

I suggest that such a study would be largely meaningless. The retailer's margin is only one of a series of costs involved in moving goods from the factory to the consumer. Differences in these margins will depend upon a variety of factors such as trade custom, the extent of selling and advertising assistance, the age and reputation of the brands under consideration, the relative amount of consumer recognition and preference, and the volume of turnover. To give a proper weight to each of these factors before arriving at what could be realistically regarded as comparable marketing margins would be a hopelessly difficult task, and anyone who suggests otherwise has not scratched the surface of a consideration of this subject. It is a task, may I also say, that has been wisely avoided by serious and competent authorities upon resale price maintenance, who affirm that the only meaningful analysis of the effect of resale price maintenance on the price of an article would be to compare the price of the article under resale price maintenance with the price of the same article under similar conditions of sale when the price was determined by freely competitive forces. In other words, compare things that in all other respects are identical under conditions that are identical but which differ only in that in the one case they are exposed for sale under resale price maintenance and in the other case under free competition.

The difficulty of course in this country is that such comparative conditions are rarely met with; for the practice of resale price maintenance where it exists is so universal as to leave no islands where free competition can make itself felt on the prices of products which in other parts of Canada are price maintained. Indeed we all face a difficulty—and I think the MacQuarrie committee, the joint committee and the government have faced it—in that there is in Canada a relative dearth of comparable material of this and other sorts. It was very significant that in my view much the best brief presented to the joint committee was that of Professor Fuller upon behalf of the pharmaceutical association of Canada, a very honest and competent job, if I may presume to say so, in spite of the fact that I do not agree with many of its conclusions. But Professor Fuller was under the necessity of admitting under cross-examination that no single fact or figure in his long brief was from Canadian sources. He was critical that the MacQuarrie committee and the government had not examined to a greater degree figures available in the United States which formed almost the entire foundation for all his reasoning, and he was critical that we had not examined figures available in Great Britain. That was a pure assumption on his part. There was no evidence at all that the MacQuarrie committee either did or did not examine these other figures, but in so far as any observations he might have made referred to the combines investigation department I should like to place upon record that we have examined the figures in the United States and we have examined figures and material in Great Britain. I will be referring to some of those figures before I complete my remarks.

Mr. Fleming: Will the minister permit a question? When he says "we" to whom does he refer?

Mr. Garson: I mean the combines investigation branch of the Department of Justice. To support my point I can cite what the proponents and the opponents of our legislation before the committee praised as a very competent report. The British Lloyd Jacob committee investigating this problem in 1949 concluded that it was futile to attempt to compare margins on price-maintained lines with those on free price lines. Their report emphasized that much smaller sales effort was required from the retailer to sell the branded price-maintained product than to sell the non-branded free price product. At page 14 of their report they said, "There is therefore no comparison between the two classes of trade." Yet some hon. members opposite were anxious that we should sit at least until next spring and perhaps until next fall to gather all this evidence that in the opinion of the British Lloyd Jacob committee was largely meaningless.

More fundamental by far in our view are the long-run effects of resale price maintenance in discouraging efficiency in distribution and in imposing rigid price policies upon the economy. These are factors, the discouragement of efficiency in distribution and the imposition of a rigid price policy, which defy statistical analysis but nevertheless constitute the heart of the problem of resale price maintenance. Yet Mr. Speaker, there is scattered throughout the literature on resale price maintenance some statistical data, which Professor Fuller said the MacQuarrie committee could have secured, and which he set out in his brief. I am not quoting from his brief, but these are the same figures he used on the relationship of maintained prices and non-maintained prices on identical commodities that will be of interest in any event to evaluate the significance of resale price maintenance. Fortune magazine of January, 1949, undertook a summary of the prices of 117 drug products in Washington, D.C., a free trade area; that is, non-price maintained, and in nearby Maryland—if I remember correctly, Baltimore was the city chosen—where resale price maintenance is legal. This study showed that 35 of the 117 cost about one-third less in Washington than in Maryland, 38 about a quarter less and 29 about a seventh less. The same article carried a report of a comparison between prices in free trade Missouri and fair trade Illinois which showed much the same result. Fifty-four fair trade drug items cost an average of 16.2 per cent more under fair trade on the east bank of the Mississippi than under free trade on the St. Louis side.

The report of 1945 of the United States federal trade commission on resale price maintenance concluded that with reference to the grocery trade, where resale price maintenance is not widely practised, the impact of resale price maintenance, following the passage of fair trade laws, upon the general level of grocery prices was small, but that "price increases fell most heavily upon those consumers who from necessity or personal choice patronize minimum service stores." In other words, people who from necessity had to patronize minimum service stores were those who bore the heaviest brunt of the introduction of resale price maintenance. Similarly, in the drug trade the United States federal trade commission found that the burden of price increases fell most heavily upon the patrons of stores selling at lowest prices. Those consumers who were willing to accept less service and to shop in less attractive surroundings in order to achieve some economies in their purchases were, under resale price maintenance, precluded from doing so.

This finding of the United States federal trade commission is echoed in the conclusion of the Canadian royal commission on prices of 1949 in which it was stated that, among other undesirable effects, resale price maintenance:

> . . . deprives the consumer of his right to seek and patronize the most efficient distributors, namely, those who over a period of time can offer goods for sale at prices lower than their competitors.

Finally we have in the case of the entry of Newfoundland into confederation some of the best evidence, a classical example in fact, of the harmful effect on prices of the introduction of the practice of resale price maintenance. Before it entered confederation there was no resale price maintenance in that land. After Newfoundland became a part of Canada, Canadian price maintenance was made applicable there. I am glad indeed that the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo (Mr. Carter), who was one of the government members on the parliamentary committee, intends to speak on this aspect of the matter; I shall therefore refrain from going into detail on it.

These data I have listed establish, I submit, two generalizations which hold true, broadly if not universally, concerning the effects of this practice of resale price maintenance. First, prices are higher than they would be under conditions of free competition; and, second, the poorer or economy-minded purchaser is deprived of the chance and indeed of the right of buying at lower prices in minimum service stores. This, indeed, Mr. Speaker, may seem to many hon. members like proving the obvious; for, as Mr. McGregor, the former commissioner under the Combines Investigation Act, stated in his evidence before the joint committee as reported at page 395 of the proceedings:

> As the very purpose of resale price maintenance is to prevent sales below the minimum price established, it is obvious that the effect is to keep prices, right across the board, higher than they would otherwise be.

I should now like to deal with the position of the independent retailer in relation to resale price maintenance.

Some hon. Members: It is 6.15.

Mr. Garson: This is a fairly big subject upon which I am entering now, Mr. Speaker, so it might be convenient if you would call it 6.15.

At 6.15 p.m. the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Garson: Mr. Speaker, when the house took recess at six o'clock I was just about to examine the position of the independent retailer in relation to resale price maintenance. This is a rather important aspect of the matter because no argument has been raised more frequently or stressed more strongly by supporters of resale price maintenance than that resale price maintenance is necessary to protect the independent merchants against loss-leader selling and other forms of competition. They go on to say that without such protection the small retailer would be driven out of business by the large retailer. Indeed the claim is made that resale price maintenance renders to the consumer an important service by enabling a number of small independents such as the convenient community drug store or the corner grocery store, or perhaps a general store in an inaccessible location in the country where the volume of business is not very great, to stay in business. In addition to that, it is argued—and no person, so far as I know, ever contradicts this argument—that the independent retailer, wherever he is, is always an important element in the social, economic and cultural life of the community which he serves. They say that being such he is entitled to protection against the superior financial powers of the large departmental store, mail order house, chain store and the like.

Well, sir, these are all arguments which are worthy of the most serious consideration, because I am sure every hon. member knows that this country would sustain a grievous loss if the independent retailer should disappear from our community life.

In this connection it seems to me that the critical questions are these: First, whether resale price maintenance does give the independent retailer the protection which is commonly claimed; second, whether without resale price maintenance the independent retailer will really be placed in a more difficult position, which I think is open to considerable question; and third and perhaps the most important, whether the broader implications of uniform price fixing do not possess inherent dangers for all concerned, including the independent retailer himself.

I suggest that there is no convincing evidence, but if I am wrong I hope that those who contend the contrary will produce it—that there is no convincing evidence that the position of the independent retailer has been substantially affected by the absence of resale price maintenance in the past, or that it will be substantially affected by the removal of resale price maintenance at the present time. The growth of large-scale enterprises, whether in the field of manufacturing or distribution, has been an aspect of economic development in most industrial countries during the present generation; and there is nothing to indicate that, in the case of the retail trade, the growth of big departmental stores, for example, or chain stores, has been different in those countries where resale price maintenance has been firmly established for a lengthy period from those in which the practice is less extensive. An eminent authority, to wit Professor M. T. Copeland of Harvard university, who for a considerable period directed the studies of the graduate school of business administration which were referred to, I presume with approval, in the pharmaceutical and hardware briefs, wrote in the encyclopedia of the social sciences in 1935 as follows:

> Similar changes in retail trade have taken place in England despite the measures for control of resale prices adopted in that country, and in the United States the enactment of resale price maintenance legislation would not have given and will not give effective protection to small retailers against types of organizations which have inherent competitive advantages.

So that we are here discussing resale price maintenance as if it had provided a protection which in fact does not exist, and proof of which protection cannot be adduced. If one examines, for example, the available information on the structure of retail trade in Canada, the United States and Great Britain, he will find that, if anything, the independent retailer has the smallest share in Great Britain where resale price maintenance is most strongly entrenched. As compared with almost 73 per cent in Canada and about the same proportion in the United States, it is estimated that the independent retailers have less than two-thirds of the volume in Great Britain, the balance being divided between the chains, the departmental stores and the very powerful co-operative movement, which in part is the product of resale price maintenance.

The fact is that the independent retailer's share of Canadian retail business has been well maintained throughout the whole period from 1930 until 1949. These figures which I am about to submit are not the figment of anyone's imagination. These are the facts as to the position of the independent retailer in this country.

Many hon. members will recall the predictions which were made during the depression of the 1930's that the small retailer, under the fiercely competitive conditions which prevailed then, would be forced out of business by the chains and the departmental stores with their mass purchasing power; and the situation the small merchants then faced, as we all know, was one of the principal reasons for the setting up of the price spreads inquiry at the instance of Hon. Harry Stevens. If there were to be a serious decline in the position of the independent retailer, surely it would be expected that this would be most evident during the decade between 1930 and 1940 when our economy at all levels was subject to the most severe strains, and when not only the little fellows but many of the big fellows were going into bankruptcy and receivership. When the census was taken in 1941, however, it was found that instead of there being a decline in the position of independent retailers, they had a larger proportion of the total retail trade in 1941 than they had in 1930.

The figures for 1930 and 1941, and the figures for 1949 based on a sample of independent retailers, are as follows: Independent retailers in 1930 had 68·8 per cent of the total business in Canada. In 1941 that 68·8 had risen to 70·3 per cent, and in 1949 it had risen again to 72·8 per cent. The chain stores started out with 18·3 per cent in 1930; they had 18·7 per cent in 1941 and 17 per cent, a small decline, in 1949. The departmental stores, including the mail order stores, began in 1930 with 12·9 per cent, which sank to 11 per cent in 1941, and sank further to 10·2 per cent in 1949. After quoting these 1941 and 1949 figures the Canadian retail trade federation brief goes on to say:

> It is quite apparent that the smaller retailer in Canada is effectively maintaining his competitive position.

I do not advance these figures to suggest that a fixed position has been reached in retail trade, or necessarily to prognosticate that that growth in the independent retailer's share of the business will necessarily continue, because as we all know in the type of economy in which we live changes take place. It is a dynamic economy. New and better ways are found to do things, and they all have their impact upon chain stores, independent retailers and department stores. I do present these figures to show that where retailers operate efficiently in a competitive market they are in no danger of disappearing, and I think all members will agree with me that no more difficult conditions could be found than those experienced during the thirties.

Of course the argument in relation to these figures, and the widespread tendency amongst retailers themselves, is to regard their present prosperous condition as being, to a substantial degree, the result of resale price maintenance practices. I do not think they could claim that as the basis for the increase in 1941 over 1930, because from my observation it seemed that under the stress of depression even resale price maintenance collapsed. But I do not admit that the present position is in any substantial measure the result of resale price maintenance. Upon a moment's reflection most of the members, those who approach the matter with an open mind, will agree that this is most unlikely, to put it mildly. Fundamentally the welfare of the retailer, along with other economic groups in the community, is intimately tied up with many important economic phenomena, each one of which has an impact upon his position. It is tied up with the level of prices prevailing in our export markets, which in western Canada at any rate is a very important consideration in the prosperity of the independent retailer. It is tied up with the rate of growth of the economy arising from the development of new industries; with the opening up of new natural resources; with the soundness of monetary and fiscal policies pursued by the government—I forbear the temptation of drawing any comparison between the policies of the thirties and those of today.

When these factors function favourably, all classes in the community enjoy a high level of material well-being. If they function adversely, then the whole community is likely to suffer a decline in its living standards and a decline in its net profits which will have, in my view, a much more significant effect upon the fate of the independent retailer than any amount of resale price maintenance. These factors I have named are the fundamental factors behind the prosperity which all groups in the Canadian economy are now enjoying. Indeed, so far as resale price maintenance has made possible, and I think we have to admit that it has in some cases, a higher per unit mark-up on unit sales, it by no means follows that this has necessarily operated to the profit of the retailer. Profit, I suggest, is the result both of volume of turnover and the profit margin per unit. He would be a brave or reckless man who would insist that lower prices would not lead, and have not led in post-war years, to a substantial increase in turnover and therefore probably to a higher profit.

In proof of that we have only to look around us to the great Ford industry. It was built by a man who believed in turning out a product which, in its initial development stages, he priced at lower than he could produce it for at that initial volume, in the expectation that the low price would produce the larger volume. He built a great industry and made himself a multimillionaire by that reasoning. This is the very antithesis of resale price maintenance. It is perhaps natural for many retailers to regard resale price maintenance as offering to them an important degree of protection, particularly when this view is so assiduously promoted by the trade organizations by which it is generally proven that, without resale price maintenance, prices would be determined amongst the distributors by competition. Now when prices are determined by competition the competition necessitates the individual retailer watching his cost very closely and working out his selling prices on the basis of competition.

When resale price maintenance comes along and relieves the retailer of this burdensome business of watching costs or watching his price mark-up, and assures him that if he is not doing it none of the other people in the business are doing it either, it lulls him into a false sense of security. What he too often fails to see is that this is a curtailment of his freedom to determine his own pricing policy while limiting his ability to alter that policy as conditions may require. If he gets in a position which is different from the market conditions of today, when there is less purchasing power and it is more difficult to make sales, how can he modify his pricing policy at all under resale price maintenance in order to meet those changing conditions? Moreover, resale price maintenance, which holds the same umbrella over the just and unjust, over the inefficient and efficient, does not protect any of them against the entry of newcomers, including co-operatives, into their market, who attracted by stable margins and prices, slowly but surely cut down the volume of trade for each retailer, while at the same time, with the only competition available under resale price maintenance, that of expenditures upon services, make his costs rise. Sooner or later the declining sales and rising costs whittle away the security he thought he had and the protection he believed was being provided for him by resale price maintenance. The time taken for this effect of price maintenance to be felt varies from trade to trade. In those to which entry is comparatively easy the effects will ordinarily be quickly felt, but in those few businesses in which professional training limits numbers, the effects may be long delayed.

I would like to bring to the attention of the house an example of how it works under a well-established system of resale price maintenance, even in a trade in which professional training limits the number of those who can enter. In this connection I should like to quote from a letter by the secretary of the British national pharmaceutical union published in the American journal, Drug Trade News for September 13, 1937. The date is a little old, but the point it illustrates is very apt to my argument. It must be remembered that at that time, in 1937, resale price maintenance had been prevalent to an increasing degree in England for a period of thirty-eight years. This is what the secretary of the British pharmaceutical union stated:

> In our country all proprietary medicine vendors have to be licensed and we woke up to the fact that the number of those vendors was increasing at the rate of eight to nine thousand per year. It is a fact that owing to the success of the price maintenance movement initiated . . . thirty-eight years ago, the prices of proprietary medicines are in fact maintained and the 20 to 30 per cent profit which those articles yield has proved a tremendous temptation to other shopkeepers to invade the proprietary medicine business . . . Hence you will see that the success of our own war to prevent price cutting within our own ranks has produced an army of competitors in our own business.

I cite this as an example of what the next step in the development of this process is. What are the remedies when the retailer, who has been dependent upon resale price maintenance to protect him, finds that protection is false and illusory? What is the next step to remedy that situation? The secretary gives the answers to these questions as follows:

> My own organization decided that it would be reasonable to ask manufacturers of proprietary medicinal and surgical goods to restrict their channel of distribution to the chemists' trade. We ask the proprietors of these articles to sign an agreement for seven years, undertaking only to sell these goods through chemists. In return we, on behalf of the chemists, undertake to give those goods . . . the utmost possible sales assistance . . . On the other side, we ask all our members to refrain from giving window, counter or other displays of any kind to the goods or advertising material of any article within our specification which is not upon our list.

Is that the desirable end result that we seek to achieve in this country?

Mr. Graydon: To whom was that addressed?

Mr. Garson: That is a letter from the secretary of the British national pharmaceutical union, published in the American journal, Drug Trade News, for September 13, 1937.

Mr. Adamson: Signed by whom?

Mr. Garson: By the secretary of that organization.

Mr. Adamson: What is his name?

Mr. Garson: I have not the name; but I could get it for the hon. member.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Who issues those licences?

Mr. Garson: I am not sure. I think probably it was the pharmaceutical associations. Would that not be correct? If they had a professional association, it would be that association. Otherwise it would be the government. It will be noticed that in this dilemma, instead of attributing his difficulties to resale price maintenance itself, this secretary concludes that more resale price maintenance, or wider margins on price maintained lines, is the only effective solution. Thus the demand for resale price maintenance becomes more insistent, and the practice is extended to more and more products. The marginal dealer's existence is—what shall I say—prolonged, but it is not assured by any means. And the whole process goes on at the consumer's expense.

It has been suggested by those who oppose the bill that independent retailers cannot compete, that they cannot exist without resale price maintenance. I suggest that does not follow at all. I have here statistics submitted on behalf of one of the bodies opposing the legislation, which prove that point and prove it conclusively. In the brief submitted to the joint committee by the Ontario retail hardware association there is a table, known as table No. 2, appearing at page 790 of the report of proceedings, and this table gives the figures on comparative efficiency in independent, chain and department stores. The important feature of the table, for our present discussion, is the material on operating expenses and net profit. The data for department and chain stores relate to experience in the United States and for the independent hardware stores to experience in Canada. The gentleman who introduced the material was frank in saying, and quite correctly, that he could get this data in the United States but it was not available in Canada. However he said he had good reason to believe that the Canadian data was of the order of the American data. The following table will serve to give the information about which I have been speaking:

	Operating expenses per cent	Net profit per cent
Dept. stores U.S.A. 1949	32·5	2·7
Chain variety stores U.S.A. 1943	28·60	7·72
Hardware stores Canada, 1950 ..	20·9	6·2

It will be noticed that the operating expenses in hardware stores in 1950 was not 32·5 per cent or 28·60 per cent, but was 20·9 per cent. That is a difference in operating expenses of 12 per cent. And the net profit figures, it will be noted, were 2·7 per cent in department stores in the United States in 1949; 7·72 per cent in chain variety stores in that country in 1943, and 6·2 per cent in hardware stores in Canada in the year 1950. The percentages in the table are expressed as percentages of gross sales.

It is apparent from these figures that the independent merchant stands in a quite strong competitive position. It is true, as counsel for the Ontario retail hardware association argued before the committee, that the large departmental and chain stores have an advantage in buying from the manufacturer, in that they order in larger quantities. But, in the words of Mr. Dunn, the lawyer who represented this organization, "it more or less evens out."

Mr. Fleming: What page is that?

Mr. Garson: About page 30 of the proceedings. I am afraid I have not the exact page number.

Mr. Fulton: Does the minister mean page 30 of their brief?

Mr. Garson: No. The brief was submitted, and then Mr. Dunn proceeded to give evidence based on the brief. In the course of doing so he made these remarks to which I am now referring.

Mr. Fleming: That is nowhere near page 30.

Mr. Graydon: Perhaps it is page 30 of the minister's speech.

Mr. Garson: No; my hon. friend is doing me less than justice. It is only page 27. My hon. friend can check this, but I am sure he will find it is correct. Mr. Dunn said:

> It more or less evens out. The big store buys cheaper and has a much larger gross profit but the big store has a higher operating cost. Therefore, when it comes to the end the net profit of the big store is 2·7 per cent.

I will complete the comparison—against the net profit for the independent Canadian hardware dealer of 6·2 per cent, or nearly three times higher.

In this connection I do not think it should be overlooked that a great deal of our thinking on this subject has been conditioned by the depression ideas of the middle 1930's. Undoubtedly manufacturers who were hard up to get any kind of order were unduly impressed by the mass purchasing power of these big retail organizations and perhaps made improper price concessions to them. The price spreads inquiry indicated that these goods were purchased at a low price and then sold at a price which was most attractive to the consumer, but which was pretty difficult for the smaller retailer to meet at that time.

However, I would point out that the factors which prevailed in the 1930's, of a glut of goods on the market with a great deficiency of purchasing power, both signs of severe deflation, are now almost exactly in reverse. We are in error and we produce fallacies when we apply to the very much changed conditions of today reasoning which would be appropriate to the conditions of the 1930's.

I submit that the changes which have taken place are calculated to make the competitive position of the independent retailer comparatively stronger and that of the large chain and departmental stores comparatively less strong as of the present time. In the first place, I do not think there is any doubt at all that the large departmental stores are not able to drive the hard terms with the manufacturers that they did in the 1930's, so they do not get their supply of goods at as low prices in the first place. Then it is very obvious that the operating expenses of the departmental and chain stores, due among other things to increased labour costs and increased taxes, have increased at a faster rate on the average than those of the independent retailer. Unless he is incorporated, the independent retailer pays no corporation tax, a tax which is now over 50 per cent, and having regard to the personal part he plays in the conduct of his business his labour costs are likely to be lower. The independent retailer also has other advantages. As we all know, one advantage he has at all times is that many people would much prefer to pay something extra for the local convenience and the pleasure of getting personal service from a man whom they know.

In this connection I should like to make reference to a matter which was raised the other day by the hon. member for Oxford (Mr. Murray). The hon. member brought me a letter from a constituent who holds a prominent position in the business life of Ingersoll, Ontario. That gentleman made what seemed to the hon. member and to me an important point. That is, that under present conditions, with the operating expenses of the large stores at their present relatively high level, if the small independent retailer was not under too great a handicap in buying his supplies from the manufacturer, if he could get a price which was reasonably comparable with that paid by the large store, he could hold his competitive position with the large stores.

When the hon. member brought that letter to me he said, "I think my constituent has a good idea," and I said, "Well, I think it is important also, and others have thought that it was important." The Stevens price spreads committee of the middle 1930's saw the importance of that very idea and it was carried into the statute law of the country in the form of section 498A of the Criminal Code, which I should like to read to hon. members to show how closely that fits the point raised by the gentleman in Ingersoll. Section 498A reads:

> Every person engaged in trade or commerce or industry is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to a penalty not exceeding one thousand dollars or to one month's imprisonment, or, if a corporation, to a penalty not exceeding five thousand dollars, who

> (a) is a party or privy to, or assists in, any transaction of sale which discriminates, to his knowledge, against competitors of the purchaser in that any discount, rebate or allowance is granted to the purchaser over and above any discount, rebate or allowance available at the time of such transaction to the aforesaid competitors in respect of a sale of goods of like quality and quantity.

I think that covers the case which was raised as closely as any statute could. As hon. members know, this is the section of the Criminal Code which was added as a result of the price spreads inquiry. That takes care of the case in which a large dealer is put in the position where he can cut prices by getting a special discount from the manufacturer. Then clause (b) reads:

> (b) engages in a policy of selling goods in any area of Canada at prices lower than that exacted by such seller elsewhere in Canada, for the purpose of destroying competition or eliminating a competitor in such part of Canada;

If one of the large transcontinental organizations goes into one town and starts quoting predatory prices to put a competitor out of business, they would come within that section. The next paragraph reads:

> (c) engages in a policy of selling goods at prices unreasonably low for the purpose of destroying competition or eliminating a competitor.

I think the retail trade itself realizes some of these facts. I should like to quote from the April 1951 issue of the Ontario Retailer, published by the Retail Merchants Association of Canada (Ontario) Incorporated. This issue contains an article entitled "Is the Independent Retailer Too Modest? The Story of the Timid Giant." This article reads in part:

> Once upon a time there was a Timid Giant. He was more than three times as big as the next largest giant and yet, believe it or not, he used to refer to his rival as the Big Fellow. He used to watch everything the Big Fellow did in fear and trembling and when he heard that the Big Fellow had actually grown an inch, he got into such a panic that he almost died on the spot. And that is no fairy tale either—although you might call it a parable.
> To cut out the fantasy and get down to figures, here are some extracts from the dominion bureau of statistics report on the retail trade for 1949—the latest complete figures available. It states that Mr. and Mrs. Consumer spent a total of $8,427,900,000 in all the retail stores across Canada during that period. Of this impressive total $6,137,990,000 went through the cash registers of independent retailers, and $2,289,910,000 through departmental and chain stores.
> Percentagewise that means that the independent retail giant did 73 per cent of the retail business, and the big fellow did 27 per cent. Surely that is not a situation that should develop an inferiority complex in the independent retail trade. But do you refer to the department store and chain store operators as the big fellows, and do you watch their operation in fear and trembling? We are not advocating a feeling of complacency by any means. The disturbing fact is that the big fellow is growing by inches over a period of years and the independent retailer either as an individual or a group cannot afford to sit back and rest on his laurels. But we see no cause for panic.

The author of this article goes on to point out ways—and I think I should refer to them—in which the independent dealers can undertake joint actions to plug such chinks as there may be in their competitive armour. But it is a matter of historical fact that after the temporary consternation experienced by independent retailers in the early days of the chain stores, there followed a program of improved merchandising methods through the betterment of stores, in some cases through the formation of various types of voluntary chains and so on, which has placed the independent retailer in a strongly competitive position. I would suggest that it is grossly pessimistic to believe that he cannot meet the current marketing problems without the deceptive crutch of resale price maintenance.

One of the arguments brought against this legislation was that but for resale price maintenance many independent retailers would be wiped out by the practice of loss leaders. At the very beginning of any discussion of this item I wish to make it entirely clear that the use of predatory price cutting tactics with the aim of driving competitors out of business and establishing a monopoly is contrary to public interest. I just finished reading the legislation against it a moment ago. But price cutting of such obviously predatory character is, I suggest—I was going to say "comparatively rare"—but I think it is exceedingly rare nowadays. It would be almost impossible to find an example of it. The fears which nowadays we hear expressed about loss-leaders, the fears that are the basis of the arguments which were used against this legislation, apparently refer to something less, including any noteworthy reduction in price which is widely advertised in order to attract customers to a particular store. One witness, prominent in the retail trade, before the joint parliamentary committee went so far as to define a loss leader in these terms:

> I think if I were to give a personal definition of loss leader the closest I could come to it would be: a loss leader is a price which does not represent the full mark-up, and which is designed to attract traffic into your place of business.

It was argued that accompanying this legislation we should have legislation which would bar loss leaders defined in those broad terms. If that is the case we might just as well not pass this legislation.

Here are some other definitions: The sale of merchandise below its net invoice cost to the merchant, with or without cash discounts; the sale of merchandise below net invoice cost plus a percentage equal to the average operating cost of the merchant, or of the trade; or simply the sale of merchandise at less than its usual retail price. The purpose in all these cases is to attract the customer into the store by means of a loss leader and then make up on the swings the prices of which are not cut for what is lost on the roundabouts or loss leaders that are.

In all these arguments it is assumed that resale price maintenance by eliminating loss leaders will be more favourable to the small merchant than it will be to the chain or departmental store. But this is another conclusion that is by no means necessarily well founded. A study of retail distribution in Great Britain made by Mr. Henry Smith and published by the Oxford university press—and Mr. Smith was a member of the Lloyd Jacob committee in Great Britain and therefore an authority on the subject—points out that "the highest proportion of multiple shops is to be found in the druggist's trade . . ." that is, in the trade in which price maintenance is most thoroughgoing and has been in force for almost half a century. Incidentally it is the same trade concerning which I related the remarks of the secretary of the British pharmaceutical association as to the sorry plight into which it had got under resale price maintenance.

Then there is another development in this connection which I think is not without significance. In the early stages of their growth the chain stores in order to attract customers into their shops indulged in aggressive price reductions in nationally advertised branded lines. In the early stages this was effective because there would be only one chain store in a city block surrounded by a number of independents. Now, however, when the chain stores have to face the competition of other chains it will be noticed that while they do reduce prices the extent of the reduction is nowhere as great as it was in the early days, and the experience in the last five or six years in the United States is that every time there is any move to secure or strengthen the fair trade laws the chains can be found in the vanguard making a great contribution to the necessary costs and taking a prominent part in all proceedings. Why? Because in the first place they cut nationally advertised lines and made up for it in selling their own brands, and then they discovered that under resale price maintenance, where nationally branded lines were maintained, they could make their profit on them and cut their own brands which the independent retailer could not even duplicate at any price.

May I say—and I am sure hon. members will be relieved when I add "in conclusion"—that there are only three ways in which the prices of goods can be fixed.

The first is by competition. A witness before the joint committee told us that as to the great majority of goods in Canada their prices, their wholesale and retail mark-ups, were determined by competition. For example, this is the case with over 95 per cent of the grocery trade and over 92 per cent of the hardware trade.

The second way is by government control. I think most of us agree that in our free Canadian economy government interference in business should be kept to a minimum and therefore price fixing by the government should be avoided if possible.

The third way that prices can be fixed is by the control of private interests either in the form of (a) price fixing combines, which are quite illegal and indeed criminal under the existing law, or (b) by resale price maintenance which in certain forms and under certain circumstances is also illegal under the existing law. It is for the purpose of making all forms of resale price maintenance illegal that the present bill is being introduced.

I suggest that if this parliament and this government allow price competition amongst wholesalers and retailers to continue to be eliminated by resale price maintenance in certain trades, we shall have to answer four vital and searching questions by the Canadian consumers and by the many hundreds of thousands—some people will say millions—of little fellows amongst these consumers. These consumers being largely unorganized and unprotected, are forced to look for justice in this matter to this parliament and this government. Judging by what some of them have written and told me, I think this is what they are saying to us: We are little fellows ourselves, so naturally we are on the side of the little fellow in the retail business. All we ask is that he work as hard and plan as carefully as we must do in our walk of life. But is there one good reason why the independent retailer, the little fellow, who will not take the trouble to make himself reasonably efficient—not extremely efficient; just reasonably efficient—should be protected under resale price maintenance by profit margins which, at our expense, will provide for the reasonably efficient merchants profits which they do not need, and in some cases do not wish to take, but which resale price maintenance compels them to take? That, they would say, is question No. 1: Is there one good reason for this sort of protection?

Then I think they would say to us: Our second question is this. Can anyone bring forward a reason why the little fellow in some trades needs heavy protection from resale price maintenance whereas in the grocery and hardware trades, for example—and there are others—the independent dealers, including all the little fellows, when they are reasonably efficient have demonstrated for many years that they can keep their share of the retail trade and the profits in it, against all competition?

The third question they would ask is this: If the government will not control prices itself, is there any good reason why wholesale and retail profit mark-ups should be left to a substantial extent under the private control of manufacturers?

The fourth and final question which they would ask of this parliament is this: Is it reasonable to expect the Canadian people as consumers to tolerate indefinitely the practice of resale price maintenance whereby the cost of distribution of goods and the prices of the goods themselves are fixed by the manufacturers without the safeguard of price competition amongst wholesalers and retailers?

These are all very just questions. They are all questions to which the men and women in Canada who are consumers are entitled to an answer. In the government's view the answer to every one of those questions is: No, there is no good reason; and these negative answers, in our view, constitute one of the strongest arguments in support of the present bill.

This bill proposes to make it an offence for a manufacturer or a dealer to prescribe fixed or minimum resale prices. He may still prescribe and enforce maximum resale prices. He may also indicate resale prices as long as he does not do so in such a way as to require or induce another person to maintain them. The man who wishes to be law-abiding in this regard, I suggest, will not have any trouble at all in avoiding any action which could be interpreted as requiring or inducing another person to maintain prices.

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, it is now quite obvious that the government is certain that it is not wise to proceed with this legislation. We have just observed the spectacle, for the last two and a half hours, of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) doing his best to talk out his own bill.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Fulton: The whole course followed by the government in connection with this legislation has been as extraordinary as has been the spectacle we have just witnessed. That they themselves are unconvinced of the merits of the bill and that, if they press it through to a conclusion, they are doing so for nothing more than party political purposes, was nowhere more clearly demonstrated than in the tactics they have followed during the whole of this session. At every turn since the beginning of the session in October they have attempted to choke off discussion on the merits of the proposal to outlaw price maintenance.

The speech from the throne announced the proposal to bring in legislation at this session. Nothing was done about that matter and no further reference was made to it until the beginning of November, when it was announced that it was intended to refer it to a committee. The committee was not set up for a week after that announcement was made. The committee's sittings were limited. An artificial termination date was placed upon them. The evidence which that committee was allowed to receive and consider was curtailed. But most reprehensible of all in connection with this extremely important matter has been the delay of a whole week at this stage, after the presenting of its report by the committee and the reference of the matter back to the house a week ago last Friday, before proceeding with this legislation in the house in the obvious hope, Mr. Speaker, that the approach of Christmas and the human desire on the part of the members to rejoin their families would have the result that those opposed to the legislation—and I may say that they are to be found on both sides of this house—would be induced to leave; and thus the bill would, they hoped, enjoy in the house that cursory and inadequate examination only which the government majority had allowed it in committee, and its passage would, they hoped, be expedited.

Never was a more serious and far-reaching step affecting some 700,000 Canadians directly engaged in or dependent on the retail trade more summarily and inadequately treated—and thus treated for political purposes only. Indeed, Mr. Speaker, the anxiety of the minister not to deal with the merits of the matter in the house but to play politics and to build up political pressure outside the house was nowhere more clearly demonstrated than in the fact that, even after this long delay before bringing the bill back into the house and dealing with it, his speech of this evening was reproduced in the press before it was delivered in the house.

Mr. Garson: I rise on a question of privilege. I am glad my hon. friend has raised this matter; in fact I wondered whether I should not do it myself. This speech was prepared and was handed to the press today, with the usual condition that it was not to be released until delivery. That condition was observed, so far as I know by all the members of the press gallery with the exception to which the hon. member refers. I therefore do not think that my hon. friend can hold me accountable for what has taken place.

An hon. Member: A Tory paper.

Mr. Fulton: I am not holding the minister accountable for whether it appeared in one paper or not. I am merely referring to the fact that the whole course of action followed by the government with respect to this legislation has had the result that the matter has been dealt with on a political basis in the country before there was ever an opportunity for discussion on the merits in the house because its introduction here has been held up in the hope Christmas would take members home so the bill would slip through. I think what the minister has just said verifies that statement.

As to the minister's speech itself, I shall not follow him in all of the extraordinary mental convolutions, if I may use that term, which he has followed. I would say that his whole speech was characterized by the last four questions with which he concluded, and which he said the consumers of Canada would be asking. About that time, Mr. Speaker, one began to doubt if the consumers would even get an opportunity to say a word let alone ask a whole question. But these questions can be characterized as nothing more or less than trick questions. Indeed, while it was a lengthy and, I would say, a laboured speech, it was in fact a trick speech. When you analyse the speech and the points made by the minister and compare them with the evidence which was actually submitted—that is, such evidence as we were allowed to have brought before the committee—you will find that the facts upon which those points are based, like the facts upon which the questions are based, are not correct. It was a highly selective speech in its choice and presentation of the evidence. Rather than attempt to follow further the speech itself and the course which the minister took in dealing with this subject, I shall deal with the matter generally and answer the minister's points in the course of my own analysis of this problem.

Much has been made in the course of the discussion, both in and outside the house, of the effects which it is alleged this legislation is going to have upon the cost of living in Canada. I suggest that in the legislation before us today we can see evidence, when we view it in that light and when we ask ourselves just what effect this is going to have on the cost of living in Canada, of the government's impotence and inability to deal with that problem. We are presented with this bill as the government's contribution towards reducing living costs, the one and only solution offered by the government at this session, when their major responsibility should have been to take effective action to deal with this problem. Considered as a solution, as a contribution, as an answer to a problem or as anything more than shadow-boxing with the cost of living, it is a sputtering and fizzling farce.

But if it were only that, if it were nothing more than that, then we could be done with it by laughing it to scorn for the poor inadequacy it is. But unfortunately, obvious though it is that this measure is intended to delude the consumer into thinking something is being done about the cost of living, of itself it will have little or no effect in that field, as the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) has agreed. Yet it is positively a dangerous and improper piece of legislation to be enacting now because of the threat it presents to the existence and welfare of the small independent retailer. Indeed, the absence of any evidence that would justify the statement that it will reduce the cost of living, coupled with the existence of positive evidence that the legislation is desired by some of the largest and most powerful business interests in the country, and is opposed by thousands of small business men, supports the conclusion that the bill is so designed that it will accomplish nothing more effective than to increase the power and competitive advantages of the large chain and department stores at the expense of the small retailers.

As such it gives every impression that the government has produced a piece of legislation which will promote special interests and advance the welfare of some of their friends in the field of big business, without any corresponding benefit to the consumer, but to the peril and increasing disadvantage of the smaller, weaker independent retailer who is less able to take care of himself. Because we are unable to subscribe to such an unfair and prejudicial course; because we believe the independent merchant is a vital part of our economy; because we prefer a larger number of independent businesses as being in the best long-run interests of the consuming public and of the nation, as opposed to an increasing concentration of power in a small number of monopolies; because we consider this legislation ill-considered, hasty and unfair, we propose that it be not proceeded with, and I intend to move an amendment accordingly.

But first may I mention some of the more objectionable features surrounding the present legislation. In doing so I wish to emphasize that we are not taking a strong position either for or against the merits of the price maintenance system as presently practised. Indeed, one of our strongest objections to the course now being followed by the government is that resale price maintenance is being disallowed without sufficient evidence as to whether it is, in fact, harmful or beneficial in its results to the consumer. We do not know from any evidence already before us, because we were not allowed sufficient time to get evidence, just what its effect is on prices.

We did not have sufficient evidence to enable us to say whether it is desirable or undesirable in theory, let alone in its present effect on prices and upon the economy generally. But we did have available very positive evidence that the vast majority of independent retailers are fearful of the results in terms of unfair competition, loss leaders and increasing power in the hands of the big chain department stores, which will result if price maintenance is eliminated.

It is true, Mr. Speaker, that one or two of the very large chain departmental stores—Eaton's is the conspicuous example—said they were opposed to the practice of price maintenance and in favour of the government's legislation. But we had no evidence that any small retailer supported Eaton's stand. As I have said, they were all genuinely concerned over the vastly increased powers which would be given to the giants such as Eaton's if the protection of price maintenance were taken away. If there were nothing else but the fact that Eaton's is in favour of the government's proposal and the little man is opposed to it, I would proceed with caution, if not with suspicion. Without going any further into the merits or demerits of price maintenance itself, I say we have not sufficient evidence to justify us in enacting this legislation eliminating price maintenance, bearing in mind that it will place the small man at the mercy of the big fellow without giving him any alternative protection.

This refusal to allow us to get evidence was persistent and extraordinary. In fact, it was such as to go a long way towards confirming my suspicion, referred to already, that this legislation is calculated to help the big fellow. Even after Eaton's had come out against price maintenance in a well publicized brief which was circulated in advance to the press, the government consistently refused to let us call any witnesses from that concern to state why they were so much in favour of the government's proposal. Not only did they refuse to allow us to call evidence from the big men—I should point out that the one

I have named is not the only one—to ask them to justify their position, but they consistently refused to allow us the time and opportunity to call witnesses from the small retail trade who desired to be heard, or to get evidence in facts and figures from the retail trade as to the results of price maintenance, which would establish whether or not the practice worked to the advantage or to the detriment of the consumer.

We are opposed to proceeding in this manner with legislation which condemns the small retailer and deprives him of his only means of protection against the chain store and the mail order department store without having had sufficient evidence to justify such a course, and particularly without having given the small retailers of Canada a fair hearing. For the retailers of Canada, Mr. Speaker, the independent merchants, will be condemned without a trial if this bill passes, because by this bill now before the house the government proposes to condemn them practically unseen and unheard.

I have spoken of the lack of evidence and the refusal of the government to grant us the opportunity to obtain evidence. Mr. Speaker, I wish to make it perfectly clear that the lack of evidence to support the proposal now before the house is in no way the fault of the official opposition. We pressed repeatedly in the committee for the right to call witnesses and to question those witnesses on all subjects, whether they were included in their brief or whether they were in their general knowledge as people with an intimate knowledge of the retail trade of Canada. But a glance at the proceedings, both in this house and in the committee, will show the inadequacy of the consideration given to this matter and the folly of passing legislation of this kind with so little evidence.

This is a big subject, Mr. Speaker. The Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) himself, in the course of his remarks tonight, made that as one of his main points. He said: "This is not a simple subject," one of the few conclusions in which I could agree with him. It is far from a simple subject. It affects directly at least 700,000 people who are either engaged in or immediately dependent upon the retail trade of Canada. It is going to have a profound effect on every one of these people, and it may have a more considerable effect on the economy of the country generally, quite apart from its effect on the retail trade.

What consideration has, in fact, been given to this matter? What evidence do we have that there has been sufficient consideration? What evidence do we have of the facts and figures of the results that flow from the practice of resale price maintenance upon which we are asked to base a conclusion, and now to translate that conclusion into legislative form, absolutely outlawing and banning the practice? Well, not to go too far back—the minister went back into history, but I do not intend to follow him all the way—there has been particularly the MacQuarrie committee which is relied upon by the government as the main basis upon which they say this legislation should be enacted.

When one looks into the consideration which the MacQuarrie committee gave to this matter very serious doubts are raised as to whether that committee itself had sufficient time to give the matter the consideration it deserves, and whether they gave themselves sufficient time to justify the conclusions at which they arrived. I call to witness first the Minister of Justice to establish that the MacQuarrie committee had by no means finished their investigation when they were asked suddenly to present the interim report upon which this legislation is in the main based. Speaking in the house during this session on November 2, the minister said, as reported at page 664 of Hansard:

> It therefore became clear some time ago that the MacQuarrie committee could not hope to finish its work until the end of the present calendar year at the earliest.

There is no suggestion that the MacQuarrie committee—and if there is a suggestion, there is certainly no evidence upon which the suggestion is based—had in fact completed and concluded in every way their study of the question of resale price maintenance, or of the general subject which was referred to them, when on September 10 the minister wrote them a letter in which he asked them to make a report with respect to this question of price maintenance. That report, Mr. Speaker, in spite of the fact that the minister said it was clear the MacQuarrie committee had not finished its work, was produced by October 1, just twenty days after the committee was asked to report on this matter. That report, Mr. Speaker, contains no evidence; it is nothing more than a collection of opinions; and indeed from the evidence we heard at the parliamentary inquiry into this matter, it became very doubtful as to whether or not the MacQuarrie committee had in fact received anything more than an expression of opinion. Whether they had asked for or been presented with any facts or figures upon which to make a statistical analysis which would justify them in their conclusion that price maintenance as a practice is against the best interests of the Canadian consumer is, to say the least, extremely doubtful. All that appears in their interim report is a collection of opinions, and from appearances they simply added up the opinions for and the opinions against and subtracted one from the other, and came to the conclusion that "the ayes had it."

That is not my own opinion only, Mr. Speaker, with respect to the adequacy of the evidence before us and its efficiency as the basis for the legislation we are now asked to pass. I would refer particularly to the opinions of the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada, as presented in a brief to us and as substantiated by Mr. Percy Bengough, the president of the trades and labour congress, in his evidence before the committee. The brief of the trades and labour congress, which incidentally I should say here and as will appear in more detail later as we analyse the evidence that we were allowed to get, did not take a strong position opposed to the practice of price maintenance—

Mr. Sinclair: They certainly were not for it.

Mr. Fulton: That will appear more particularly later. They certainly did take a very definite position that the MacQuarrie committee's report was not a substantial basis upon which to condemn the practice. I will read from page 380 of the proceedings of the committee, where after referring to the question of whether or not the factors mentioned by the MacQuarrie committee justified their conclusions, they say:

> No concrete evidence has been produced in the interim report to show the real influences in this regard and in the absence of such facts your committee is, in essence, acting in the dark.

That of course, Mr. Speaker, as it turned out, became more and more apparent the longer the committee sat; because the more it became obvious that in order for us to be able to make an intelligent conclusion on this subject we must have statistical evidence, the more determined the government became to deny us every opportunity of obtaining such evidence. The trades and labour congress brief on the same subject says as follows, as reported at page 381:

> We have raised these doubts about these matters, not because we favour resale price maintenance as such, but because we are not favourably impressed with the interim report. There is an air of artificiality about the interim report. It states its case and reaches its conclusions without adducing any pertinent or concrete evidence of resale price-fixing practices in Canada. The effect of its vague and quasi-technical exposition is to suggest that it is merely a contrived argument to support a preconception.

It was upon the basis of that report, whose very form suggests that it was merely "a contrived argument to support a preconception"—and that is the considered opinion of the largest and most responsible labour organization in Canada—that the government committed itself in the speech from the throne to introduce legislation outlawing price maintenance. And in the same speech from the throne they coupled, immediately after the undertaking to introduce this legislation, the inference that it was designed to reduce the cost of living.

Then, as the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) himself has confirmed this afternoon, a form of second thought set in as a result of many protests from retailers affected, which the government and others began to receive. So the government decided it would appoint a joint parliamentary committee of both houses of parliament. At this moment I think I should pause to pay tribute to the chairman of that committee, who revealed himself as very able indeed. It is unfortunate that his ability was demonstrated chiefly in his success in preventing the committee from getting evidence. But he was very able in that regard.

But, Mr. Speaker, if this subject, upon which the government said in the speech from the throne that it was proposing definitely to base legislation, was thus suddenly to be referred on second thought to a parliamentary committee, one would have assumed at least that it was intended to give that committee the opportunity to study the merits of the question. After all, if the matter is referred to a committee and that committee is not given the opportunity to study the merits of the question, the only conclusion to which one could come, and the only conclusion which the facts support, is that the government appointed that committee and referred the MacQuarrie report to it for the sole purpose of enabling themselves to evade their proper responsibility, and to have the committee act as a rubber stamp of the MacQuarrie report so that the government, if taxed with its responsibility for the legislation, might be able to say, "Oh, but we referred the whole matter to a joint committee of parliament and it recommended legislation."

That is in fact all that has happened, except that the committee did not act only in the capacity of a rubber stamp. We were allowed to add to our functions that of an adding machine. We were allowed to add up the opinions, both pro and con. We were allowed to add the number of briefs in favour of price maintenance and to add the number of briefs opposed to price maintenance, and to subtract one from the other. Then, having acted as an adding machine, our functions were limited to that of rubber stamping the MacQuarrie recommendations.

Sir, I object most strenuously to this improper use of the parliamentary committee.

I object to the appointment of such a committee on the pro forma basis that it is to have referred to it a committee's report, that it is to consider that report, and then to having the committee's investigation cramped and confined and effectively gagged so that an adequate consideration, indeed any consideration, is made quite impossible.

I have referred to the lack of evidence before the MacQuarrie committee upon which conclusions could properly be based, as well as to the lack of evidence before the parliamentary committee. There were no less than six separate demands by way of substantive motions on the part of opposition members in that committee in an endeavour to obtain evidence which would enable us to reach an intelligent conclusion. Each one of those motions was voted down by the government's majority on the committee.

On two occasions those adverse votes were reversals of previous decisions the committee had arrived at. The procedure was most extraordinary. On two occasions members of the committee, as one would have expected intelligent men to do, had arrived at the conclusion that we should in fact place ourselves in possession of sufficient evidence and sufficient facts and figures surrounding this practice to enable us to reach a proper conclusion. But overnight, after an opportunity for consultation between the chairman and the government which had appointed him, efforts were made—

Mr. Sinclair: On a question of privilege; the hon. member has been carried away by his own opinions. I am sure he will recall that I was elected chairman by the committee.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Hees: Marks for humour!

Mr. Fulton: I also recall that it was the hon. member himself who pointed out to one of the members of the committee that there never had been a parliamentary committee since 1867 on which the government did not have a majority of the members. So it was perfectly obvious that the government would have a chairman of the committee.

However, I think the hon. member is overly sensitive, because what I had said was that, after the opportunity for consultation between himself and the government, he had instituted proceedings and a line of argument supported by the government majority, which resulted in a reversal of that decision to obtain evidence.

One would have thought that in the light of the fact that the government had placed in the speech from the throne the proposal to bring in legislation, and the proposition that such legislation would have the effect of reducing the cost of living, after they had referred the matter to a committee they would have been anxious to produce evidence to prove that the enactment of the legislation would in fact have the effect of reducing the cost of living.

Well, it became obvious that the government was not anxious to produce that evidence. And so in a desire to get at all the evidence on all sides of the question, and in a desire to force the issue as to whether we would be allowed to reach intelligent conclusions, we moved that all the relevant facts and figures be placed before the committee.

Let me say here, by way of digression, that when he dealt with this subject the Minister of Justice showed an example of that amazingly selective mind of which he is possessed.

Mr. Fleming: That is another word for partisan.

Mr. Fulton: He said that opposition members of the committee had asked for evidence of profit margins on price-maintained and non-price-maintained goods. In fact, he said, statistics on this complicated matter would not justify any conclusion. He implied that, after all, the ordinary member of parliament is not intelligent enough to be able to understand these figures, and that only experts like the members of the MacQuarrie committee—or cabinet ministers—could analyse intelligently any figures which might be presented. He suggested therefore it was not proper that these figures should be placed before the committee.

These were his words:

> In most cases the statistical study advocated was a simple comparison of retail margins on price-maintained with those on non-price-maintained lines.

And he went on to say at page 18 of the text he released:

> To give a proper weight to each of these factors before arriving at what could realistically be regarded as comparable marketing margins would be a hopeless task.

And he interpolated in the course of expanding his 7,500 word address to approximately 10,000 words that—as I took it down—

> Anyone who suggests otherwise has not scratched the surface of this subject.

I do not know how much the minister has scratched; but his argument that all we asked for was a comparison between profit margins on price-maintained and non-price-maintained goods indicates that he has not even read the evidence before the committee. He has not considered the motions which in fact were made asking that evidence be produced.

He has overlooked entirely the fact that our motions asked for a comparison not only of profit margins but of end prices in Canada, not in the United States. We asked for a comparison of end prices of comparable goods, both price-maintained and non-price-maintained.

Mr. Garson: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Hodgson: He did not interrupt you.

Mr. Garson: If he does not permit a question—

Mr. Fulton: I shall be glad to.

Mr. Garson: Will my hon. friend tell me how it would be possible to make a comparison between identical goods sold in Canada under resale price maintenance and those not under resale price maintenance when those sold under price maintenance are sold right across Canada?

Mr. Fulton: The minister's question is about as clear as the four questions at the end of his speech. Our motion asked for a comparison of goods of comparable quality and category in Canada, both price-maintained and non-price-maintained. I think I had better read the motion so that the actual request for information will be before the house. I quote from page 301 of the minutes of proceedings and evidence of the committee as follows:

> Mr. Fulton moved that the steering committee in conjunction with the committee counsel and the Combines Investigation Act commissioner formulate a series of questions to be put to all manufacturing groups coming before the committee; and in cases where the witnesses wish that the names of the manufacturers producing figures be kept secret, committee counsel and the Combines Investigation Act commissioner sit in with the witnesses in order to assure the committee that the figures are representative.

The minutes then record that:

> After discussion, and the question having been put on the said motion, it was resolved in the affirmative.

That was the first motion, on November 26. Then, on November 27 the steering committee reported against that suggestion. In amendment to the report of the steering committee I moved the following motion, and I quote from pages 345 and 346 of the minutes of proceedings, as follows:

> That for the purpose of enabling the committee to compare profit margins and cost to the consumer in both price-maintained and non-maintained goods, committee counsel together with the combines commissioner procure from manufacturers and retailers appearing before the committee (as individuals or through their association) figures for typical commodities in the lines produced or handled by them, showing the following stages in the distributive process:
> (1) the factory cost
> (2) the price to the distributor
> (3) the price to the retailer
> (4) the price to the ultimate purchaser
> for price-maintained and non-maintained goods of comparable category and quality; > and that with respect to a departmental store or manufacturing concern which does its own manufacturing and distributing the figures be given with the omission of the appropriate stages outlined above; > and that counsel be empowered to employ a cost accountant as and when necessary for the purpose of such study.
> After discussion and the question having been put on the said amendment, it was negatived—

There was only one member on the government side who voted for the motion, the hon. member who has been mentioned by the Minister of Justice as being very much concerned about the course proposed to be followed. I refer to the hon. member for Oxford (Mr. Murray). On that occasion the committee reversed its previous decision and decided that it would not obtain evidence of either profit margins or the price to the consumer on price-maintained and non-maintained goods of comparable category and quality in Canada. This decision was reached although one of the witnesses, in fact more than one but especially Mr. Harris, president of the Canadian retail federation, a most excellent witness, advised us definitely that such a study could be made and that his organization would be glad to help in producing such evidence, that is, evidence relating not only to profit margins but to the end price to the consumer of price-maintained and non-maintained lines.

It will be seen that the committee decided definitely by that vote that it would not obtain factual evidence of the only type which would have enabled it to decide intelligently whether or not the system of price maintenance in fact operates to the detriment of the consumer with respect to prices. After all, it seems to me hardly reasonable to say the least to ask parliament to condemn a practice of such widespread nature throughout the retail trade, the elimination of which is causing such concern to independent retail merchants, without allowing us to get the facts as to whether or not the practice actually raises prices. That seems to me to be asking us to indulge in a course of legislative folly.

After the attitude which government supporters showed in the committee—government supporters led mainly by the Minister of Justice, who was a member, and by the chairman of the committee—of insisting that such evidence would be meaningless and beyond the powers of the members of the committee to apprehend, it is extraordinary to say the least, to note the same minister who said that even if we did make that full study it could not be of any value to us, now producing the relatively infinitesimal amount of statistical information with which we have been served in the course of his speech tonight, and stating solemnly that the statistics he has quoted justify the conclusion that price maintenance operates to the disadvantage of the consumer. It is a most atrocious contradiction in attitudes. This same minister who said we could not and should not take the time to have these figures produced because we could not understand them and because they would not prove anything in any case now states, according to page 21 of the text of his remarks tonight:

These statistical data—

Based mainly on United States statistics, not Canadian.

—are sufficient to establish two generalizations that hold true, broadly if not universally, of the effect of resale price maintenance.

The minister in charge of these proceedings who told the joint committee of parliament that they should not have figures because they could not understand them and because they could not base any conclusions on them now comes solemnly into this house with two or three American figures and says that "these statistical data" are sufficient to establish the proposition that price maintenance operates to the detriment of the consumer.

The result of that extraordinary mental process and the insistence of the government majority that we were not allowed to have any adequate evidence is that the joint parliamentary committee was not and this house is not in possession of sufficient facts and figures from which to draw any conclusion that price maintenance does in fact operate to the detriment of the consumer. But as though there were not a sufficient limitation placed upon our deliberations by the refusal to allow us to get statistical figures, our deliberations were further stultified by the limitation of the time available for the consideration and study of this problem. A few figures here will, I think, suffice to demonstrate what I have said. Our sittings started on November 13 and concluded on December 7. During that time we held nineteen sittings, of which one was an organizational meeting and the last two were executive sessions. We only had sixteen sittings during which it was possible to hear evidence and examine witnesses. In that short time, sixteen sittings, we were expected to consider forty-two briefs, two supplementary briefs, three briefs by way of letter or resolution, the foregoing being material which was laid before the committee, making quite an impressive list, in addition to many hundreds of private wires and letters received by members.

For all that mass of information and opinion we were allowed just sixteen sittings to examine witnesses, consider the representations, discuss the problem and arrive at an intelligent conclusion on it. I am not one who shares the rather low opinion that members of the government obviously have of the capabilities of members of parliament but even I, although I do believe we could have comprehended statistical data, certainly do not set our ability so high that I would say we could arrive at an intelligent conclusion on the great volume of matters laid before us within the time which we were allowed to consider them.

In contrast to this general refusal to allow our committee to get any facts and figures on which we might base an intelligent opinion is the attitude of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) that the MacQuarrie committee's conclusions must be accepted because they are a group of experts. That opinion is, I think, completely disposed of when one considers the evidence of three of the witnesses who appeared before the special committee, to the effect that the MacQuarrie committee had neither asked for nor been provided with facts and figures from the witnesses appearing before them to substantiate the simple statements of opinion which they had heard. I refer to Mr. Harris, the president of the Canadian retail federation, Mr. Preston, secretary-manager of the Canadian pharmaceutical association, both of whom said their organizations had neither been asked for nor provided any statistical data to the MacQuarrie committee, and Mr. Fred McGregor, who stated from his knowledge of the matter he considered it proper that the MacQuarrie committee had not had any such evidence

I submit that the facts I have presented establish that we have not sufficient evidence to justify the legislation outlawing price maintenance which we are now asked to endorse. On the other hand we do have evidence that it is extremely unlikely that the enactment of this legislation would have any substantial effect on the cost of living. You see, Mr. Speaker, we are being asked to embark upon this course largely as a result of political pressure which has been built up throughout the country, inspired by the government's propaganda to the effect that if this legislation is introduced the cost of living will be substantially reduced. Against that I would cite the opinion of the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. St. Laurent), as reported at page 41 of Hansard for October 15, in the course of the throne speech debate. He said:

. . . and again I can say that as regards immediate additional measures to curb inflation, while others may develop, the only one we are prepared to submit at this time is the one that will arise out of this report of the combines committee with respect to resale prices. I do not think that is going to have a very substantial effect on the index of the cost of living . . .

That is the opinion of the Prime Minister of Canada, a man whose experience in these matters I would put as at least comparable to that of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson). Not only do we have that opinion, but we also have statements from witnesses appearing before the special committee to the effect that it is highly unlikely it will have any substantial effect on living costs because of the very minute quantity of goods entering into the cost of living index which are subject to resale price maintenance.

Now it is a fact that there is no statistical study of this matter. One would have thought again that if the government wished to substantiate its case it would have a statistical study of this type of question carried out by the dominion bureau of statistics. But there are no statistics as to the percentage or quantity of goods and services subject to resale price maintenance which enter into the cost of living index. But some of the witnesses appearing before the committee gave well-informed opinions on the matter, and I would refer particularly to the evidence of Mr. Harris, the president of the Canadian retail federation, as found at page 267 of the report of the proceedings of the committee. I asked Mr. Harris the following question:

What percentage of goods which are subject to price maintenance would be purchased by that family?

Mr. Harris replied:

The only guide I can give you, sir—and I am relying entirely on memory—perhaps Mr. McKee can help me on that—but I think something like 5·7 per cent or 6 per cent of purchases from department stores are of that type of goods.

As I say, these are only informed guesses, but it seems to me reasonable to assume that the broad category of purchases from a department store would be in general the type of purchases which would enter into the monthly budget of a family. Some would not because they are luxury goods, but by and large it seems to me they would be the type. Only 5·7 to 6 per cent of such goods are subject to price maintenance, and I believe it is estimated that only ·066 per cent of all foods are subject to resale price maintenance. Therefore it seems safe to say that the practice of resale price maintenance would affect less than 5 per cent of articles entering into the cost of living index. If that be the case, then it is surely folly to say that to eliminate price maintenance is going to have any substantial effect on the cost of living. Indeed it seems to me this argument is used by the government to whip up prejudice, and in a further attempt to avoid allowing us to arrive at an intelligent conclusion on the matter.

The next consideration is that we have no positive evidence that price maintenance has a harmful effect on the consumer with respect to prices. Not only is there no evidence that its elimination will have any effect on the cost of living; in addition there is no positive evidence at the present time that price maintenance is detrimental to the public with respect to prices. Here I would refer largely to the evidence of Mr. Fred McGregor who, I think it fair to say, was one of the main witnesses for the government appearing before the committee. It is also interesting to note that Mr. McGregor was the one and only outside witness the committee was allowed to call before it.

Mr. Sinclair: The Tories wanted him.

Mr. Fulton: That is quite so but we also wanted others. We are not prejudiced like the government. We did not want to hear only one side of the matter. We genuinely wanted to get all the evidence and information available.

Mr. Sinclair: He was your man and you got him.

Mr. Fulton: We asked for Mr. McGregor and a number of other witnesses but it is significant to note that after Mr. McGregor had appeared and read a brief which was highly favourable to the government they closed off all further witnesses and absolutely refused to allow the committee to call any other outside witness who might have shed any light on the subject.

Mr. Sinclair: He was a Tory witness.

Mr. Fulton: Quite so; he was asked for by us, but it will not be denied—

Mr. Sinclair: A dandy, too.

Mr. Fulton: Perhaps I did not understand the hon. gentlemen. I have said before that Mr. McGregor was called on the initial suggestion of members of the opposition, and I have no apology to make for that. But I think there is some explaining to be done on the part of the government as to why, after hearing him, they refused to allow any other witnesses to be called as requested by us.

Mr. McGregor, whose evidence is relied on to such a great extent by the government, makes it quite clear that his opposition to the practice of resale price maintenance is based entirely upon theory, and that it proceeds in no way from any conclusion or finding of fact on his part that the practice of price maintenance operates to the detriment of the consumer by increasing prices. I refer the house to the evidence of Mr. McGregor, as reported at page 596 of the proceedings of the committee, where I asked this question:

Q. . . . then do I take it that in arriving at your conclusion that it is against the public interest—

That is, the practice of resale price maintenance.

—you divorce from your mind any consideration of whether or not in the long run it operates to reduce prices to the consumer? Do I understand you are simply saying that because it restricts competition it is adverse to the public interest?

A. That is pretty much the basis of my own thinking on it, except that I would add that not every restriction of competition should be regarded as offensive; it must be an undue restriction.

Q. Your opposition to price maintenance as set forth in your brief proceeds entirely from your proposition that it is a restriction of competition, and not at all from the basis that it affects the public adversely from the point of view of the ultimate price to the consumer?

A. Correct, undue restriction of competition is the basis in my opinion.

You therefore see, Mr. Speaker, that it is the definite and unequivocal opinion of the star witness for the government that price maintenance should be opposed not because it has any adverse effect upon prices or that it affects the consumer price-wise, but simply because of his theory that it is an undue restriction of competition.

Together with that fact, Mr. Speaker, I ask the house to consider this significant point. It is in no wise the manufacturer who is responsible for price maintenance. An attempt has been made by the government, through its propaganda, to create the impression throughout the country that this practice of resale price maintenance is brought about by powerful manufacturers' organizations seeking, to serve their own selfish interests only, to gain control over the whole Canadian economy and to grind consumers by raising prices. That is the impression they have sought to create but it is one that is most definitely at variance with the facts; because the evidence—such evidence as we were allowed to get before the committee—definitely tended the other way. Again I rely upon the evidence of Mr. McGregor in this connection, that it is not the manufacturer who wants this, that it is not even the manufacturer who benefits mostly by it, but that it is the small retailers who want it. I ask the house to consider Mr. McGregor's answer as found at page 596 of the proceedings of the committee in reply to this question:

Q. You have also I think referred to the desire of the manufacturers to have their prices maintained. Now, as between the manufacturer and the retailer, who benefits most, who wants it most?

A. Unquestionably the retailers.

There was no hesitation or equivocation about Mr. McGregor's answer: Unquestionably the retailers. I therefore ask the house again, Mr. Speaker, in considering this matter, to bear in mind that such evidence as we have not only fails to establish that price maintenance has an adverse effect upon the consumer with regard to prices, or an adverse physical effect upon prices; but that there is evidence that establishes quite conclusively that it will have little or no effect in reducing the cost of living, if outlawed; and furthermore, that it is the small retailer who desires it—and designed it—as a form of self-protection and not the manufacturer who wants it to enlarge his influence.

I see that it is close to ten o'clock. I just want to lay before the house one other consideration and then the amendment which I propose to move, before adjourning the debate. The other consideration with which I wish to deal just for a moment is the question of whether or not there is adequate protection against the practice of loss leaders which are so much feared by the small retailer and by which he feels he will be knocked out if price maintenance is eliminated. The minister says: Well, we will get evidence on this matter, and if any untoward practices develop we will act to meet them. On this subject of whether or not the elimination of price maintenance by the passage of this bill will harm the small retailer the government in effect says: Wait and see. The Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) has said: Pass the legislation and let us put it into effect; then we will take a good look at it, and if we see that it is having harmful effects on the small retailer, then we will consider some adequate form of protection. That has been said in the committee as well as implied in the house.

This surely is a most irresponsible and callous attitude for a government in charge of the administration of the nation's business to adopt. It reminds me of nothing more than the cases we so often read about in the paper, of the small boy who picks up the gun, pulls the trigger and then, when his father or brother lies dead on the floor, says: I didn't know it was loaded. But in this case the difference is that the government is deliberately pulling the trigger first, not just because they did not know it was loaded but because they had a shrewd suspicion that it was loaded but they thought this was the best way of finding out whether it would have damaging results. What they are saying is the same as if a doctor said: We do not know whether the medicine will cure or kill, but let us administer it to the patient anyway, whether he likes it or not; and then if he dies, we can always hold a post mortem to find out whether the cure was responsible for the death.

For the reasons which I have outlined in part so far, Mr. Speaker, we feel that this legislation is being proceeded with without adequate consideration, that it should be given much more consideration, and that alternative methods of protecting the small retailer must be enacted simultaneously with any legislation eliminating price maintenance. I therefore propose to move,—and the motion will be seconded by the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming):

That this bill be not now read a second time but that it be read a second time this day six months hence.

Mr. Speaker, I move the adjournment of the debate.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Speaker: Order. If I now put the question on the amendment—

Mr. Fulton: No, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: If I read the amendment now, the hon. member for Kamloops will not be allowed to speak further tomorrow. Does he wish me to read the amendment now?

Mr. Fulton: No, Mr. Speaker. I thought I had covered that point. I said that I proposed to move, at the conclusion of my address, the following amendment. Then I asked to be allowed to move the adjournment of the debate. I handed in the amendment, I must confess, but perhaps it could just be taken for information purposes.

On motion of Mr. Fulton the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Mr. Speaker, tomorrow we will continue consideration of this Bill No. 36; and I would announce all the other items on the order paper, without giving the order in which they will be taken because I do not know how long this debate will last.

Mr. Drew: It will not be necessary to announce anything else.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Nothing else?

Mr. Drew: No.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): In case I should be caught, I will announce every other item on the order paper.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to the order of the house passed on November 2, 1951.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, December 18, 1951

The house met at eleven o'clock.

THE LATE ARTHUR L. SMITH

TRIBUTE TO FORMER MEMBER FOR CALGARY WEST

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I had a word with the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew), the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) and the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low) after I heard over the radio this morning the sad news of the death of Mr. A. L. Smith. We all felt that, though it would be a departure from the usual practice of the house, it would be the wish of all hon. members that we ask you to send Mrs. Smith a message of our deep sympathy in her bereavement.

I think there are two principal reasons for such a departure in this case. One is that Mr. Smith was a member of the House of Commons during this very parliament and up to the end of the last session, when he resigned only because the state of his health was such that he felt he could no longer devote to the discharge of his duties the time and close attention that he felt such duties required. And the second, and I think the very compelling reason, is that during the six years of his membership he had, by his great qualities of intellect, of humour and of warm-hearted love of his fellowmen, endeared himself to each and every one of us, and secured in our regard for him a place of high esteem and enduring affection.

I trust, Mr. Speaker, that you also will feel it is proper to make this departure from our usual practice, and convey to Mrs. Smith the expression of our condolences and of our lasting admiration for a dear personal friend, a distinguished citizen, a great lawyer and a great parliamentarian.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I know every hon. member will appreciate the very gracious words with which the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) has paid tribute to a dear friend of every one of us. I feel, too, that the exception he has made on this occasion, for the reasons he has explained, will meet with the approval of all hon. members.

I know that the death of Mr. Smith is a shock to every one of us, because by his gaiety and wit, combined with his wisdom, he left upon the minds of members of the house an impression which certainly will not be forgotten during the lifetime of any of us.

I had the privilege of being with him in his home just a little over two weeks ago, and I thought he looked better than he had at any time since he was compelled to leave here last spring, owing to ill health. The occasion of two weeks ago was a typical evening in the Smiths' home. His family were there. I believe all who knew him well—and that would include members of the House of Commons—realized that it was one of the most closely-knit families one would find.

Every afternoon his son and daughter would drop in and, with that familiarity which expresses respect, in recent years they always addressed their father and mother as Sarah and Art, as indeed all the rest of us did.

I know that those who do not belong to the party to which he belonged will not misunderstand me when I say that, when I saw him last, he was confident that Carl Nickle would be coming down here; and Mr. Smith had promised to be here on the occasion of the swearing in of the new member. We were all looking forward to the reunion, because I think it may be said with confidence that no member of the House of Commons has more completely shared the affection of all members than did Art Smith during the years he served here.

Through his service in the House of Commons he made a great sacrifice, a very great sacrifice indeed, for his own community and for Canada. As the Prime Minister has said, he was an outstanding lawyer. His name is associated with some of the most famous cases in western Canada; and it was only a compelling sense of public duty that persuaded him to offer himself for service in the House of Commons.

I believe it may be said that in some measure his life was probably shortened by the fact that he was compelled to be away from those surroundings which meant so very much to him. He and his wife were fond of music, were fond of fellowship, were fond of simply being with other people and sharing ideas about the daily things that happened and that meant so much to every one of us.

He was known in his early days as Sport Smith. I recall that fact because one of the causes of his great popularity was that in everything he did, whether by way of witty comment or of sharp criticism, he was always a sport in the very best meaning of that word.

Calgary has lost an illustrious son and Canada has lost a truly faithful public servant. I know that all of us would wish to join in the expression of sympathy to his wife and family. We would wish particularly to convey to his wife Sarah the thought that all members of this house who knew him so well are in some measure sharing her sorrow at this time. I think we will all hope that there may be some very real comfort in that knowledge.

Because it is so difficult to realize that this gay and vital personality is gone, it seems natural to close these remarks with the sort of expression we might have used in our ordinary meetings: Good-bye, good old Art, we will be thinking of you.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that every member of this house joins in the gracious tributes paid by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) to the memory of one who not only adorned this chamber but who often enlivened a dull evening with a witty contribution. Only ten days ago I happened to be in the west and I spoke to Mr. Smith over the telephone. He told me how well he was feeling and I was very glad indeed to know that the rest was doing him good.

We shall long remember him. Regardless of our political differences in this house we do admire a bonny fighter, a man of courage and of wit, as he was. Mr. Speaker, we join with all others in this house in extending to Mrs. Smith, a charming personality herself, and to his family our heartfelt sympathy in their loss.

He was always busy, kindly, interested and friendly. I think it might be fitting to say that we all hope and pray he may rest in peace.

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, those who have preceded me have in fact spoken for all of us. There is little that I can add to what has been said already by way of tribute to this great man except to say that while I was a member of the Alberta government I was more or less closely associated with Art, who was the crown prosecutor in Calgary for a good many years. During those years of close association I learned to admire his great capacity, his great abilities and to know him for the lovable character he was.

When I came to the House of Commons and shared with him membership in this assembly I learned to love him even more. On behalf of our group I want to say that we do join in the gracious and loving tributes that have been paid this morning to our departed friend, and join with others in extending to Mrs. Smith and the family our deep regrets and assuring them that we are with them in spirit at this time of their trouble.

Mr. D. S. Harkness (Calgary East): Mr. Speaker, I believe I knew Art Smith better than anyone else in the house. We were elected to the House of Commons at the same time in 1945. We came down to Ottawa together and occupied the same office throughout the time he was a member. Probably no two men ever enjoyed a closer, finer and more harmonious political partnership and friendship, one which to me was an education and inspiration. Art Smith had an extraordinarily quick mind and an unusual gift of expressing his ideas in forceful and clear language. His wit was proverbial in this house and in Calgary, and I think probably I can say throughout the country.

His death is a great shock and a great loss to all of his very wide circle of friends. I wish to join with others in offering my deepest sympathy to his wife and family and to express my own grief at the loss of a great friend and a great Canadian.

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, as Art Smith's deskmate, perhaps I may be allowed one word. He had the unique gift of winning the love and admiration of all who knew him and I am sure that none of us here will ever forget him.

Mr. Jean François Pouliot (Temiscouata): Mr. Speaker, as one of the senior members of the house I wish to join with those who have paid such fine and well-deserved tributes to our departed friend. You must remember, sir, the evening when you were kind enough to call me over the telephone to invite me to a reception you were giving for the late Mr. Smith after he had delivered his famous farewell speech in the House of Commons. That speech will always be considered as a classic example of parliamentary eloquence. I had the privilege through you of meeting Mr. Smith for the last time with some of his friends in your study. At the time he was suffering from the illness which took him away, but he was just as genial, kindhearted and thoughtful as ever. I had one more occasion, thanks to you, to appreciate his serene philosophy of life.

Mr. Smith was an outstanding member of the bar, of the Canadian Bar Association and of the House of Commons of Canada. He made a success in each field that he entered. Why? Because, as has been so well said, not only was he gifted with a powerful intellect, he had a big and generous heart. This is the reason why this faithful servant of the people before the bar of his province and of Canada at large, as well as in the House of Commons of Canada, belongs to a legion. He will belong forever, like Tommy Church and others of my dear friends, to that legion. Why? Because he has done his duty and because he has been so generous and kind to all. I wish to convey my heartfelt sympathy to his charming wife, Mrs. Smith, to his children, and to his roommate and closest friend in the House of Commons, the hon. member for Calgary East.

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I am sure many of those who were associated with Art Smith in the days when he was "Sport" Smith would expect me as one of two members of this house who were of the group to express a word on their behalf. The hon. member for Fort William was associated with him in the days when he became known as "Sport" Smith in the college life of the city of Winnipeg. I myself had the privilege, and it was a privilege, of engaging in contests with him on the football field in Regina as long ago as 1904 and 1905. From then until the time he left this house a very close understanding and friendship existed between us.

Reference has been made to the fact that he thought quickly. Anyone who ever contested with him in sport on the football field or on the hockey ice knows that his quick thinking was not only a fact of recent years. He was one of the most effective players of his time and earned the title of "Sport" Smith because of his quick thinking followed by action on the football field and hockey ice. I am sure all those who were about his own age and who are still with us would expect me as one who knew him in those days, and who was associated with him, usually on an opposing team, to say a word of appreciation of the long association we had with him as athletes in the early days and in politics in later years. I do not need to say that I have already sent a message of personal sympathy to Mrs. Smith, and am very anxious to join with members of the house in extending the sympathies of the whole house to the family of one who was appreciated, respected and liked, both in his days of sport and in his active political life, by opponents and those who were associated with him as well.

Mr. Speaker: If it is the wish of the house I shall immediately send a telegram of sympathy to Mrs. Smith, and when Hansard is printed tomorrow I shall write to Mrs. Smith and send her a copy of these proceedings.

PRIVILEGE

REFERENCE TO EDITORIAL IN "LE DEVOIR"

Mr. Charles Cannon (Iles-de-la-Madeleine): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege in order to call the attention of the house to an editorial published in yesterday's Le Devoir. This newspaper criticizes certain remarks I made in this house on the Canada Elections Act. The writer of this article expresses opinions which differ from mine; that is his privilege. There is however one statement against which I wish to protest most energetically. It is stated there that French is only my second language.

Mr. Speaker, I flatter myself that I speak French and English with equal facility but if there is one language which is most assuredly not a second language with me it is French. I have learned French as a child, in my own home; my whole upbringing has been in that language.

I was a student in the Quebec seminary for eight years and at Laval university for three more. All my studies, in these two institutions, were carried out in French.

That is why I wish to put matters right and to state, most emphatically, that French is certainly not a second language with me.

Mr. Jean François Pouliot (Temiscouata): Mr. Speaker, a friend of mine told me that Le Devoir was taking me to task, along with my distinguished colleague, the hon. member for Iles-de-la-Madeleine (Mr. Cannon). I do not know what Le Devoir has said because I sent that newspaper back when I found out it was falsifying my speeches and I have not read it since then. If Le Devoir feels I am wrong, that means I am right.

POSTAL SERVICE

REQUEST FOR MAIL DELIVERY AT WOODROFFE, ONT.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): It is possible that this question should be, regarded as a notice rather than as a question because the matter was brought to my attention just this morning. I am directing my inquiry to the Postmaster General and it relates to earlier questions. In view of the very great increase in population, and the extremely heavy mail delivery to Woodroffe on the outskirts of Ottawa, is it possible that delivery from house to house may be arranged there instead of the present very difficult arrangement of picking up that mail from the local post office? I end these remarks by saying that I would naturally expect the answer that this will be merely treated as a notice on this occasion.

Hon. Edouard Rinfret (Postmaster General): I will take it as such.

Mr. Graydon: Look over Lakeview, Ontario, at the same time.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

FRENCH-SPEAKING OFFICERS IN ARMED FORCES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. George H. Hees (Broadview): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. In answer to a question by the hon. member for Three Rivers (Mr. Balcer), last Thursday the department stated in a return that of 700 officers in the Canadian forces above the ranks of lieutenant commander, major and squadron leader only 17, or 2½ per cent, are French-Canadians.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Hees: In view of the fact that they are providing one-third of our fighting forces in Korea and Europe and, in the opinion of those who served with them overseas, they are the equal—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Hees: —of any servicemen who ever fought for this country—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the hon. member is going a little beyond my ruling of the other day. I suggest he might put his question now.

Mr. Hees: I was just coming to it, Mr. Speaker. Will the minister—

Mr. Mayhew: I would expect the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) to raise the same objection that he raised the other day.

Mr. Hees:—tell the house why his department has promoted only such a very small proportion of French-speaking Canadians, in view of their proven ability and courage? I believe that all members of this house—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Hees:—will agree that they are deserving of equal opportunities for promotion.

Mr. Abbott: Answer in French.

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I will be very glad to answer, and I will make it a good deal shorter than the question. The answer is that the relatively small number of French-speaking officers holding senior posts in the armed forces is due to the fact that there were a relatively small number of French-speaking officers in the armed forces in 1939 who are still in the armed forces. Altogether there are only 24 French-speaking officers in the armed forces today who were in the armed forces in 1939. A list appears in Hansard for yesterday showing the ranks they held then and the ranks they hold today, and I think it will indicate that they have done very well indeed.

AUXILIARY SERVICES IN KOREA—USE OF WELFARE AGENCIES

Mr. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. In view of the discussion which has taken place in the house during the present session, has the government made any decision concerning the offer of the voluntary welfare organizations to provide welfare services for the armed forces?

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I have nothing to add to what has already been said in that connection. There is, we believe, neither occasion nor opportunity for using the welfare agencies in action in Korea. There is only one there, which is a small unit of the Salvation Army, which was in Japan with the Australian occupying forces, and it moved with the Australian regiment to Korea. There are no other welfare agencies. No responsible person who has been there has recommended to me that there should be any welfare agencies. In fact, the only recommendations regarding welfare we have received from responsible people who have been there are to the effect that friends of the troops should write more often, more local news should be sent, and there should be Canadian entertainment.

IDENTIFICATION FOR SOLDIERS ON LEAVE IN NATO COUNTRIES

Mr. Gordon Graydon (Peel): May I direct a question to the Minister of National Defence? Is it true that Canadian soldiers in the 27th brigade who are going on leave to various NATO countries in Europe are required to have a passport before they enter those countries? If so, who is paying the $5 for the passport fee that is so charged?

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): This is one of the questions which depend on the adoption of legislation by the other countries along the lines of the legislation that we have already passed through both houses this session. So far as I know, no other countries have yet adopted that legislation. In the meantime, however, our soldiers do not carry passports; they carry identification certificates, for which no charge has been or will be made. I am informed that these identification certificates will be accepted by other countries in lieu of passports.

RYE AND FLAX

REQUEST FOR CONSIDERATION OF PLACING CROP UNDER WHEAT BOARD

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. M. Ferrie (Mackenzie): Since this session is drawing to a close, I wonder whether the government would give consideration to putting the 1952 rye crop under the wheat board?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, this is rather a searching question on government policy—

Mr. Ferrie: I do not need an answer.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: I understand the question is withdrawn?

Mr. Ferrie: No. I do not need an answer. I just asked for consideration; that is all.

Mr. Sinnott: I should like to add a question supplementary to the question asked by the hon. member. When the minister is considering putting rye under the wheat board will he also consider flax?

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (Minister of Public Works): Before proceeding with the orders of the day, and considering Bill No. 36, may we move concurrence in the amendments made by the Senate to Bill No. 33?

Mr. Speaker: I understood the hon. member for Queens wanted to ask a question.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

ACCIDENT AT TRAVELLERS REST, P.E.I.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. Chester S. McLure (Queens): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I desire to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Has the minister been advised of the tragic accident at Travellers Rest, Canadian National Railways crossing, Prince Edward Island, on Wednesday last when two people met death, and three more were seriously hurt?

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): Yes, I have been advised of the accident. An investigation is taking place at the moment.

ST. LAWRENCE WATERWAY

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY AUTHORITY—CONCURRENCE IN SENATE AMENDMENT

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport) moved the second reading of and concurrence in an amendment made by the Senate to Bill No. 33, to establish the St. Lawrence seaway authority.

Mr. Adamson: Will the minister explain the amendment?

Mr. Chevrier: This is an amendment to section 7 of the act, which has to do with the powers of the president. It is a cutting down of the powers, and the amendment reads as follows:

7. (1) The president is the chief executive officer of the authority, is charged with the general direction and control of the business of the authority, and shall have such other powers as may be conferred on him by the bylaws.

In other words, it gives to the other directors the authority to pass bylaws authorizing the president and general manager to do certain things. The government is prepared to accept this.

Mr. Adamson: To what extent does it restrict the president's powers as compared with the original legislation?

Mr. Chevrier: Unfortunately I have not section 7 before me. But section 7, over and above giving to the president the control of the corporation and also authorizing him to delegate to the other members of the authority powers, has no longer that discretion here except that they be given to him by the bylaws. In other words, the bylaws may authorize the president to have such authority. As I said originally, it is a cutting down to some extent of the authority of the president.

Motion agreed to, amendment read the second time and concurred in.

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT

AMENDMENT TO FORBID THE FIXING OF SPECIFIC OR MINIMUM RESALE PRICES

The house resumed, from Monday, December 17, consideration of the motion of Mr. Garson for the second reading of Bill No. 36, to amend the Combines Investigation Act.

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, when the house rose last night I had dealt with the fact that the government has denied us the right to obtain evidence of the effect of price maintenance on prices in Canada, so that we are in no position to determine whether or not it hurts the consumer. I had then shown that there is no evidence that its elimination would result in a reduction in the cost of living; whereas there is evidence that the number of items which are subject to price maintenance, and which enter into the cost of living index, is practically negligible. Therefore we are absolutely without evidence from which to make up our minds whether this practice hurts or helps the consumer, and certainly without evidence on which to base the harsh criticisms made by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) last night.

The government's whole approach to this problem has been to raise great hopes in the minds of the public that they will do something to reduce living costs. Having raised those hopes they find themselves impotent to act effectively, and they are now seeking a way out of their awkward position by an attempt to make a scapegoat of the small retailer who relies on price maintenance for his protection. If this bill passes it will be at the expense of the retail merchant who is being condemned unheard.

I quoted the evidence of Mr. Fred McGregor, the star witness for the government's case, to the effect that it is not the manufacturer who wants or benefits most from this practice, but the retailer. This fact should be most carefully assessed. It shows the error of those government propagandists who seek to whip up prejudice by painting a picture of greedy manufacturers weaving a web of control over the whole economy. The truth is that the system of price maintenance was worked out by the small retailers as a means of self-protection against the power of big interests. In the absence of any conclusive proof to the contrary—and certainly none has been offered —our position is that anything which preserves and promotes a system whereby trade in Canada is shared amongst a large number of independent businesses, and prevents a further concentration of control in the hands of a few powerful interests, is in the long-term interests of our general economy, including the consuming public.

Before passing on to the next consideration, that is the extent to which the retailer may be harmed if this legislation passes, I think we should mention the fact that, while there is no positive evidence that the principle itself is harmful, there is some evidence which we did manage to get on the record—even though the government resisted—to show that the practice has been beneficial in a small way. I should like to refer to some figures in this respect, but without drawing general and sweeping conclusions from them as the minister was prepared to draw last night from the few figures which he put on the record. I feel it is important to have them before the house so that it can be shown that there are figures which tend to establish that price maintenance is not harmful but rather beneficial to the consumer.

I would refer particularly to the table which appears at page 787 of the committee's proceedings. It was furnished to us by the Retail Hardware Association of Ontario. I would ask the permission of the house, Mr. Speaker, to place this table on Hansard as it appears in the committee proceedings.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Fulton: The table is as follows:

	1939	1951	% increase	Retail mark-up in % of retail price
Paint (gallon outside white)
Price maintained
Imperial varnish "Floglaze"	4.35	7.40	70·1	21·6

National price trends (D.B.S.)

	1939	1951 (Sept.)	% increase
All commodity prices	100	221·6	121·6
Food	100	251·1	151·1
Clothing	100	206·9	106·9
Home furnishings	100	199·1	99·1
Cost of living index	100	189·8	89·8

I should like to refer to some figures in that table, showing trends for both price-maintained and non-maintained lines of goods. They show, first with respect to paints, the percentage increase in price from 1939 to 1951 in the price-maintained lines averaged about 70 per cent, whereas the increase in a line of non-maintained paints was 83·7 per cent in the same period. The table also contains a comparison between maintained and non-maintained items of a type which enter into the requirements of an ordinary household, aluminum cooking utensils. The Supreme Aluminum "Standard" No. 402 double boiler showed a price increase from 1939 to 1951 of 74·2 per cent, that article being price maintained, whereas General Steel Wares "Triumph" No. 53 double boiler, non-price-maintained, showed an increase of 106·2 per cent. It is significant, Mr. Speaker, that the two articles started from the point where the non-maintained article was 10 cents lower in price in 1939 and they ended up with the non-maintained article 29 cents higher in price in 1951.

This table contains other figures which tend to illustrate that, in the general field of commodities not covered by price maintenance, the percentage increase in price during that period has been very much higher than the percentage increase on prices which are subject to price maintenance. The other interesting feature showed by this table is that the profit margins for those lines of goods taken by the retailers on both price-maintained and non-maintained lines are so close as to be almost identical in the different categories of goods of the same quality. I believe it can be said that there is evidence to the effect that price maintenance, instead of hurting the consumer in those respects, benefits him.

There are two other tables to which I should like to refer. The first is found on page 641 of the committee's proceedings, and is a table submitted by the Canadian Association of Radio and Appliance Dealers. They show the profit margin as between price-maintained and non-maintained goods. For washers they show an average discount under resale price maintenance of from 30 to 35 per cent, and for non-price-maintained, of from 40 to 46 per cent; for electric stoves, the price-maintained average was 33½ to 37½ per cent, and the non-price-maintained average was from 30 to 50 per cent. For refrigerators, the comparable figures are 30 to 35 per cent against an average of from 35 to 50 per cent on non-maintained items.

The next table, beginning at page 643 of the committee's proceedings, is of particular interest since the Minister of Justice last night stated as a fact, without any evidence to support it, that resale price maintenance effectively eliminates competition. I am not going to go into detail on this point, but I do wish to state that that was a conclusion which was not warranted by the evidence before us. The evidence before us shows that, though there is a restriction on competition in one way, that is vertically, in effect there is created a greater and more effective competition between manufacturers and retailers of competing lines. This tendency is borne out by the table appearing on page 643 of the committee's proceedings. It shows that in the field of the electric appliance manufacturing industry, which has been so much condemned because it follows this practice of price maintenance, far from there being too little competition there is as much competition as in any other field, if not more. In the field of radios there are over seventy different brands competing generally in Canada; in electric refrigerators twenty-eight different brands; electric stoves, twenty-three different brands competing in Canada; and in electric washing machines, seventy-five different brands all competing for the market. It simply cannot be said, therefore, that resale price maintenance eliminates competition when you have that number of brands competing in the Canadian market, unless the minister is prepared to say that, for instance, some seventy-three makers of washing machines have all united to form a gigantic combine to eliminate competition between them. If that is the inference we are to draw from the minister's remarks, it is a sorry reflection upon his administration of his own department, and the efficacy of the combines administration branch, which latter implication I for one do not accept.

[Mr. Fulton.]

We have seen that there is an almost complete lack of evidence as to whether harmful effects follow from this practice of price maintenance. On that basis we submit there is no justification for taking the drastic steps contemplated by this legislation. This position is reinforced by the fact that there is specific and convincing evidence of the dangers and disadvantages which will follow to the small retailer. I have mentioned the fact that it is not the big manufacturer but the small retailer who designed and wishes to maintain the assistance of this practice, as shown by the evidence of Mr. McGregor, where he said the person who wants it and benefits most is, unquestionably, the retailer, not the manufacturer.

I should like to refer to the evidence contained in the brief submitted by the president of the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada, as reproduced at page 380 of the proceedings of the committee. In the brief which he submitted, Mr. Bengough pointed out that in the view of the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada the elimination of resale price maintenance, far from increasing competition, might in fact lessen it to the detriment of the independent operator. Here is what Mr. Bengough said:

> Before accepting these general conclusions without reservation, it might be worthwhile to consider what would happen in specific cases when and if the law is amended to make resale price fixing practices illegal. Take for example two large manufacturers of men's clothing. The one manufacturer owns or controls, or owns and controls, his retail outlets. He, of course, has full control of the resale prices of his products. The other manufacturer operating in direct competition with the first does not own any retail outlets. He, however, provides services to those independent retailers who handle his products and, as well, fixes the resale price of his goods. If the practice of resale price maintenance is ruled illegal, it would seem fairly obvious that the second manufacturer would be required to cease his present practices. Would the first be required to stop fixing the retail price of his goods which are sold through his own retail stores? If the answer to this question is in the negative, then will not the result of the new law be to reduce effective competition in the men's clothing trade rather than to strengthen it?

Perhaps the most conclusive evidence that it is the little man that wants this resale price maintenance as a form of self-protection is to be found in the fact, already referred to, that the big men represented by Eaton's and one or two other large department stores have come out definitely as being opposed to the practice.

Upon the question of whether or not there is in fact danger of disaster to the small retailer if price maintenance should be eliminated, it must be recognized at the outset that there is a great deal of conflicting opinion. There is much theory, based upon a difference in economic circumstances between now and former years, and alleged differences in trading conditions which that brings about, enlarged upon by the minister and particularly emphasized by Mr. Fred McGregor who, as I have pointed out, based his whole opposition to resale price maintenance exclusively on theory and who rejected any consideration of fact and physical results in arriving at his conclusion. There is much theory to the effect that the elimination of this practice will not adversely affect the retail merchant—that is, the elimination of price maintenance—because, it is said, loss leaders cannot arise under present day conditions.

Mr. Speaker, I do not question the right of members of this house to form opinions and conclusions. Indeed, it is our responsibility to do so. I say, however, that we should place ourselves in possession of the facts before being asked to form those conclusions; and we are not in possession of the facts. But while I certainly believe that it is our right and our duty to form conclusions, I also believe that the person who is in the best position to form a correct and accurate conclusion as to what will be the effect upon him of legislation eliminating price maintenance is the retail merchant himself who has experienced the lack of resale price maintenance in the past and who is going to experience it in the future if this legislation is passed. I make no bones about it that I would rather accept the opinions and the conclusions of these gentlemen, based upon their practical experience, than the conclusions and theories, based upon considerations of policy only, of those who have absolutely rejected any question of fact in arriving at their conclusion.

We have had evidence from many independent retailers to the effect that they will be disastrously affected by the practice of loss leadering at the hands of the big stores, if price maintenance is eliminated. In the proceedings of the committee there are certain passages that I think I should read in this connection, but before doing so, as perhaps the most authoritative statement of the dangers and the evils of the practice of loss leadering, I should like to quote a statement from the report of the royal commission on price spreads of 1935, at pages 228 and 229. In the chapter dealing with distribution we find these passages; and I am going to take the liberty of placing them on the record at some length because, as I say, they are the most authoritative statements of the effects and the evils of this practice in Canada. They start by saying:

> One of the most common practices of modern merchandising is the use of "leaders" or "loss leaders".

Then they go on to say:

> Special mention must be made of the disastrous effect of loss leaders on the primary producer. The use, for example, of butter as a loss leader was proved to be a very widespread practice. Since a reduction in the price of butter will not perceptibly increase its consumption, this practice very definitely causes a loss to the dairy producer that far outweighs any possible gains to the consumer. This is equally true of other standard agricultural products. Their use as loss leaders establishes, as customary, a price that reacts to the detriment of the primary producer.

May I pause here to interject that it is a fact that marketing legislation, such as we know it, to an increasing degree has been designed to protect the agricultural producer, and those dependent upon the agricultural economy, against this vicious practice of loss leadering, amongst other things, and to protect him in general from unfair competitive practices. Then they go on to say:

> Likewise, a manufacturer, who has built up a wide demand for his products, is injured when these are regularly sold at cut prices. Because the profit margin is thereby lost on such goods, competitors of the price-cutter lose interest in the goods and push more profitable lines.

Then they go on to point out the dangers to the consumer that result from this practice, and they emphasize the point that although the consumer may get some small immediate benefit—although that itself is questionable, owing to factors which they emphasize—in the long run the consumer suffers. They emphasize that point as follows, and I am now reading at page 229:

> The consumer who purchases goods at cut prices undoubtedly gains on those items. But leaders—

That is, loss leaders.

> —are offered primarily to draw the public and create the impression of similar value as applied to goods on which prices have not been cut. While the difficulties of judging quality and price are growing with the increasing use of branded and trade-marked articles, the average purchaser can pick out the "loss leaders" from the other goods offered; otherwise there would not be the same widespread use of this device.

Then they go on:

> The competitors of the store using the "loss leader" are, however, the persons chiefly affected.

Those are the persons that I am dealing with at the moment: the competitors of the big stores who use loss leaders. I continue:

> That the deliberate use of cut prices to draw patronage away from competitors is an unfair trade practice, is quite clear. Such reductions are not prompted by any desire to serve the public by giving lower prices. One purpose is to attract customers to whom the store hopes to sell goods that are not loss leaders, at substantial profits. Another purpose is to create the illusion of lower prices on all articles. That this end is not always attained does not in any way lessen the unfairness of the practice.

They then go on to say:

> As independent merchants, singly, cannot meet the leaders of chain stores, many have joined the voluntary associations already described. By acting together, such groups of merchants can and do follow practically the same policy of using "loss leaders" as is pursued by the corporate chains. Those independent merchants who are not members of such associations are, therefore, subjected not only to the unfair competition of chain stores but also to that of voluntary chains.

Surely nothing could make more clear the danger that, by eliminating resale price maintenance—the only protection the retailer now has against the practice of loss leadering—the effect will be not to increase competition but, on the contrary, more and more to drive merchants into organizations, associations or chains, either voluntary or compulsory, whose only effect and whose only purpose would be in fact to decrease competition. That emerges most clearly from this considered statement of principle of the royal commission on price spreads. They conclude as follows:

We condemn the practice of loss leaders as unfair, promoting wasteful competition and seriously affecting the income of certain classes of primary producers.

Then they go on to mention the difficulties of designing effective legislation against loss leaders. I shall have something to say later about the question of the difficulty of legislating against it.

Then, so far as the evidence before our committee is concerned, let me refer particularly to the evidence given by Mr. Bengough at page 372, where it says:

Q. What is your view, would you agree that it would only be fair, if we are going to introduce legislation to outlaw in blanket fashion all price maintenance agreements, that we should at the same time introduce legislation to prevent the loss-leader practice?

Mr. Bengough: I think it would be vital it should be done.

And then there was further evidence from the retail merchants. I refer to the evidence of Mr. Preston, who was secretary-manager of the Canadian Pharmaceutical Association. At page 132 of the proceedings of the committee we find this passage—and it should be noted that for many years Mr. Preston was a practical retailer before assuming the position he now holds. He referred to the length of time that the loss-leader device has been in effect, in this fashion:

The loss-leader device is not a new device; it has been in practice particularly in the province of Ontario since the turn of the century, and the only effective means that has been found so far to curb it is price maintenance as we know it today.

We maintain that without price maintenance the loss leader would be on our doorstep tomorrow and chaotic conditions similar to those in the 1920's would result.

Mark that—not the 30's, but the 20's, when there was chaotic condition in the retail trade. He goes on to say:

We do not like monopolies; they are bad for the country, whereas the independent merchant is the backbone of every village, town and hamlet. Surely the government will do nothing to hurt him.

Unfortunately Mr. Preston's confidence in the present government is not justified.

Then he proceeds to give some specific examples of how it operates. At page 147 we find this statement by Mr. Preston:

A. No. That is right. The loss leader in the drug business has been a thing sold at crazy prices. For example, I have sold Baby's Own Soap which sold normally for 10 cents, and when we opened our stores we sold it at 1 cent—we started off at 5 cents and the independent druggist thought he could beat us and he cut the price to 4 cents; then we brought it down to 3 cents and he sold it at 2 cents, and, finally, we sold it at 1 cent, and we did that—I say "we", I mean the chain store—"we" put that independent druggist right out of business, and he was a good solid citizen, a member of the city council in the city of Toronto. That is loss-leader.

And continuing with the evidence of Mr. Preston at pages 151 and 152:

A. Well, we assume that the minute the government were to legislate against price maintenance every article that is now price-maintained would become overnight a loss leader.

And again:

A. Yes, sir, and that is why it was very difficult to operate a retail drug store in the urban centres prior to price maintenance. It was almost impossible to make a fair living.

Sir, I submit that those answers from a practical man, a man as well qualified to draw conclusions as most other people would be, if not more so, demonstrate clearly, quite contrary to the theories which have been advanced to the effect that loss leadering could not occur at the present time, that there is imminent danger of loss leadering if this legislation passes. There is no other protection available to the retail merchants against the practice of loss leadering. That has been most clearly established by the evidence.

Here I would observe that our committee, in its majority report, which was dissented from by all the members of the official opposition, says that there is an effective answer to the practice of loss leadering, in section 498A of the Criminal Code. That statement was supported in his speech last night by the Minister of Justice.

Let me point out that the opinion of these theorists—for the minister advanced nothing but theory—is contradicted by the opinion—not just the opinion, but by the factual statement—of the government's star witness, Mr. Fred McGregor.

Mr. Sinclair: Your witness.

Mr. Fulton: No.

Mr. Sinclair: The Tories asked for him and the Tories got him.

Mr. Fulton: Oh, the hon. member for Coast-Capilano takes great pleasure in recalling the fact that the evidence given by Mr. McGregor, in general, supported the case of the government. But the hon. member has not yet justified his refusal to allow us to call any other witnesses, after Mr. McGregor had finished his evidence, and after Mr. McGregor had been allowed to depart from the rigid procedure that was laid down in the case of every other witness who came before the committee.

Mr. Sinclair: He was your witness. I was very generous.

Mr. Fleming: You do not know the meaning of generosity.

Mr. Fulton: The attitude now being taken by the parliamentary assistant, who was chairman of the committee, is ample demonstration of the fact to which I directed attention yesterday, that his policy in committee was directed mainly toward effectively throttling all attempts to get an impartial and informed opinion. He is doing his best now to carry that same effort forward in the House of Commons. I suggest he will have his opportunity to make his case a little later on.

Mr. Sinclair: And I will not take the two hours you are taking.

Mr. Fulton: I know the points I am making are hard for him to take.

An hon. Member: What points?

Mr. Fulton: He did his best to prevent their coming out in committee; but I can assure him that he will not succeed in preventing their coming out in the House of Commons.

I have just pointed out that the government majority on the committee, along with the Minister of Justice, have stated that there is adequate protection against the practice of loss leadering, in section 498A of the Criminal Code. However, the star witness for their case, the man who has had more experience than any other man in Canada in dealing with combines, the man who was combines commissioner for twenty-five years, before his resignation was forced upon him by the government, has stated clearly that section 498A is no answer at all to the danger of loss leadering.

Let me read from his evidence as it is set out at page 604. At that point there had been some discussion as to whether or not there was danger of loss leadering if price maintenance was eliminated. We had been asking him whether or not in fact there could be legislation which would be effective against the practice of loss leadering, or whether it was a fact that the price maintenance system was the only effective answer yet devised.

Mr. McGregor referred to the efforts to deal with loss leaders by legislation, in the form of certain provincial statutes. Then, in connection with the British Columbia statute, I took the opportunity of saying:

> It just does not work. It had to be made so full of holes it just does not work.

This is the answer by Mr. McGregor:

> A. That is the difficulty of producing any bill that will work, and that is the point I am stressing here. It is exceedingly difficult to draft legislation that will prevent these practices we have in mind and still not injure the public in a serious way.

The "practice we had in mind" was the practice of loss leadering.

The next question and answer were as follows:

> Q. You said on Wednesday, in answer to a question from me, that it could be done. You are not now going back on that, are you?
> A. I said that lawyers should be able to produce something. I still think they may. We were not able to do it in our struggles with the problem.

Mr. McGregor was the combines commissioner when section 498A was placed on the statute books. He did not refer us to a single prosecution under section 498A and at no point did he say, when under questioning about loss leadering, that that section was the answer to that practice. But he did say that they had not been able to design effective legislation against the practice of loss leadering.

Then we have the report of the price spreads commission, which deals with this matter at page 229, and I quote as follows:

> We condemn the practice of loss leaders as unfair, promoting wasteful competition and seriously affecting the income of certain classes of primary producers, but in seeking a solution for the problem through legislative remedies we are confronted with certain difficulties.

They then point out that you have to make so many exceptions to meet legitimate cases of reduced prices that your legislation becomes practically unworkable.

I rely not only on those authorities but on other authorities as well. Perhaps these authorities will be acceptable to the Minister of Justice and the hon. member for Coast-Capilano (Mr. Sinclair), because they are authorities of the Liberal party. When section 498A was discussed in the house in 1935 we had clear and specific statements from prominent Liberal authorities, both lawyers, that the section as then enacted was completely unworkable, was absolutely useless, and that we should not even bother to put it on the statute books. I refer first to the statement by Colonel Ralston. I do not think the hon. member for Coast-Capilano will condemn Colonel Ralston or dismiss him as a man whose opinions are not to be regarded. Here is what he said, as reported at page 3479 of Hansard of June 10, 1935.

Mr. Knowles: That was before the election?

Mr. Fulton: That was before the election. I quote:

> I say on the construction of the act itself it is nothing less than a snare and a delusion so far as the mercantile people of this country are concerned, and nothing less than a sham and mockery so far as the relief of the consumer is concerned.

After dealing with the fact that this was supposed to be protection against the practice of loss leaders, he says:

> I submit to you, Mr. Chairman, that a section of this kind is just silly; it is just meddling, that is all; interfering and irritating without doing the slightest good.

That was section 498A, the section upon which the minister relies.

Mr. Garson: Does the hon. member agree with the sentiments which he has just quoted in relation to legislation that was brought in by the Bennett government.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, I am quoting—

An hon. Member: Wiggling.

Mr. Fulton: If I may have the floor for a minute I will answer. Everything that was said in our committee by the government members and by the government experts who were before us indicates to me that although Colonel Ralston's language was a little strong nevertheless it is true that the effects of section 498A were not those which the government introducing it had hoped would follow. I would point out further to my hon. friend that the government introducing it itself expressed doubts as to whether section 498A would be effective, but they had the courage to attempt to find an answer. They were not afraid to try something. They introduced this legislation.

But now, when they are on the spot my hon. friends, whose party in 1935 expressed these derogatory opinions about the effectiveness of the legislation, are the ones who are wiggling; they are the ones who are now taking the opposite view and talking big and saying that section 498A is the complete answer to the practice of loss leadering.

I come now to another Liberal authority, a former minister of justice. I would ask the present Minister of Justice if he disagrees with the opinion expressed by one of his predecessors, a member of his own party. Here is what Mr. Ilsley had to say about the efficacy of this section, and I quote from page 3487 of Hansard as follows:

> To put the matter very briefly I should say it would be a mistake to pass subsection A of section 498, which is found in section 6 of the bill.

> Very little care has been exercised in the drafting of this section; apparently whoever drafted it had only a superficial view of the problem before him.

And again at page 3489:

> I do not know that I have very much more to say with regard to this section, but I consider it so far short of anything that is useful that I do not think this subsection should be passed.

I confront the Minister of Justice with the same question that he has just asked me—and which I have answered. I have said that I do not think section 498A is as efficacious as those who introduced it had hoped it would be. It has not worked and I do not think it will work. I point out that those who were introducing it at the time had the courage to say that they were not certain about this, that they had given it the best consideration they could, but they were not stating as a fact that it would work.

I ask the Minister of Justice whether he is dissenting from and condemning the opinions expressed by Colonel Ralston, an eminent lawyer, and by the Hon. Mr. Justice Ilsley, who was his predecessor but one in the office which he now holds? If not—and there is no answer—then we must rely upon the opinions of those two Liberal statesmen, one a former minister of justice of this government, and it becomes perfectly apparent that to eliminate the practice of price maintenance, as will be done by this legislation, will leave the retail merchant absolutely exposed and without any protection against the practice of loss leaders. I submit to you and to the house that nothing could more amply demonstrate the folly and unfairness of enacting this legislation without giving this problem adequate consideration.

And so I come back to what I referred to last night. The majority report of the committee says that if the elimination of price maintenance does affect the trade of the retail merchants the government will keep careful watch on it and then work out some other legislation. Against that I point out that Mr. McGregor says that we have never been able to design effective legislation in all our struggles with the problem.

It certainly seems an irresponsible, rash and unfair attitude on the part of the government that is administering the affairs of this country to say, "We are not certain what the results of this will be; but if the result of eliminating price maintenance is to expose the retailer to the effects of loss leaders, then we will enact some legislation to try to fix up the matter." I ask the Minister of Justice whether the government will undertake to restore the bankroll of the merchant who has gone bankrupt? Will he include that in his legislation? Will he restore the position of the merchant who has suffered in the meantime while the Minister of Justice is making this diagnosis to find out whether his own cure has killed the patient? If the government will say that they will take the responsibility of seeing that no merchant goes bankrupt as a result of having eliminated this protection, then perhaps one could support the position. But until the minister says that, until the minister is prepared to guarantee his medicine, in fact, to take his own medicine, I say the legislation should not be supported.

Mr. Fleming: Try it out on him first.

Mr. Fulton: And so we are left with the conclusion that there is no evidence to show that the legislation will benefit the consumer; but there is evidence that it will harm the retailer. I should like to refer now to the type of harm which will follow from the enactment of this bill. Because it is significant that certain of the large departmental stores are supporting this legislation, I think we should refer to some of the findings of the royal commission on price spreads with respect to the predominant position which these stores enjoy in the economy of Canada. On page 207 of the report of the royal commission, in the chapter on "Distribution" and under the heading, "Possibilities of Future Expansion", we find the following:

> The concentration of business in the hands of a few companies is far greater in Canada than in any other country for which information is available. In the United States in 1929 there were seventeen companies operating 2,400 department stores with sales of $1,500 million. The sales of these seventeen organizations, however, represented only 34 per cent of the total department store business in the United States whereas the three largest companies in Canada handle 80 per cent. The largest single department store and mail-order organization in the United States, Sears Roebuck and Company, had less than one per cent of the total resale business in that country, while in Canada the T. Eaton Company had more than 7 per cent.

More than 7 per cent of all retail business in Canada is done by one company alone, the T. Eaton Company. They go on to say:

> It is interesting to note that the largest retail organization in Canada is in the department store and mail order field, while in the United States the largest organization is in the grocery and meat chain field. But even this company, the Great Atlantic and Pacific Tea Company, with sales of approximately $1 billion in 1929, did not occupy as dominant a position in the United States as did the T. Eaton Company Limited in Canada.

The fact is, Mr. Speaker, that the elimination of resale price maintenance opens up again all the possibilities of loss leadering and unfair trade practices against which merchants have devised their own protection under the system of price maintenance, and exposes them to the increasing concentration of power in the hands of a few concerns. On this point the commission had this to say, as found at page 232, as to the concentration of power in a few hands:

> The concentration in retail distribution already achieved has had certain undesirable effects. Socially, it has meant that in approximately one-third of the retail business of this country, the personal factor has largely disappeared with the inevitable weakening of the ideals of service to the community, so long and honourably associated with the local independent store. That such a development has occurred in other phases of economic life makes it nonetheless to be regretted in the field of distribution.

Then they express this opinion which I think should be pondered well by the government and this house before we pass this legislation. They say:

> We would add, however, that monopoly or quasi-monopoly in the vitally important field of retail distribution, could not be regarded by any government with equanimity. A sound regard for the national interest could not permit two or three concerns to dictate the method of retail distribution in the country as a whole.

On that point I pause here to mention that the T. Eaton Company has very considerably expanded its business in Canada by the purchase recently of all the David Spencer Limited stores throughout British Columbia. Therefore we can see that Eaton's, which did 7 per cent of all retail business in Canada in 1929, is probably doing a considerably increased percentage today. Thus we have this position: it emerges that the result of this legislation may not be, in fact probably will not be, to preserve or promote competition in the retail field, but may in fact be, and probably will be, to increase the tendency towards monopoly of that field. In that respect I should like to quote the opinion of the National Council of Women who share the same views on this subject as we do ourselves. At page 5 of their brief the national council says that they do not agree with the MacQuarrie committee when that committee says that they do not think it imperative to make an immediate and hasty recommendation regarding loss leadering. Their brief goes on to say:

> Council believes that competition in free enterprise is a healthy state but it ought not to further loss leadering. In other words, what legislation is enacted ought to specifically penalize loss leadering.

May I point out today that our committee did give some thought to this matter. In about an hour and a half's session one morning we debated the problem of loss leadering. We had before us a recommendation designed by one of the members of the committee; but practically every member of the committee felt that, while his effort to deal with the problem of loss leadering was commendable, he nevertheless did not offer a practical solution of the problem, and indeed many members of the committee, including government members, expressed grave doubts as to whether loss leadering could be dealt with at all by legislation.

I should like to read the further opinion of the Trades and Labour Congress having to do with this subject. It is to be found at page 380 of the committee's proceedings. They had this to say:

> One possibility your committee should keep in mind, and, in the opinion of this congress, make every effort to guard against, in any amendments that may be suggested, is a swing of distributive business away from the smaller outlets and a concentration of such trade in a few very large establishments.

Further down on the same page they say:

> This raises two very important questions for consideration by your committee: (1) Does this indicate that resale price maintenance does not always lead to reduced competition? and (2) would the banning of resale price-fixing make it impossible for the large distributor to offer his own brands at his own fixed prices? If not, and it is difficult to see how such a law could be made to fit this type of situation, then it would appear that the large distributor would gain a tremendous advantage over the manufacturer without any apparent advantage having been gained by the ultimate consumer. Such a development would merely place more economic power in the hands of the larger distributors. It is hard to see where it would increase effective competition or efficiency. It is even more difficult to see where the public interest would be served.

In addition, as an authority on this point I want to refer to the evidence of Mr. George Hougham, who has the advantage, in addition to that of being an expert, that he comes from the province of British Columbia. Mr. Hougham's evidence is found at pages 766 and 767. Mr. Hougham is a man who has had very extensive experience in the retail trade, a man who was intimately associated with the whole of the Stevens and royal commission inquiries into price spreads, and who is recognized as an expert in his field. I want to read the following questions and answers from page 766, when Mr. Hougham was giving evidence:

> Q. In other words, three department stores did 80 per cent of all department store business, but one of them did 7 per cent of all the retail business in the country. Is that right?
> A. Yes, I think that is correct, but the report will correct me if I am wrong.
> Q. Was that company named?
> A. Yes, it was the T. Eaton Company.
> Q. Do you know whether that company has since acquired other large retail outlets?
> A. Oh, yes, it has.
> Q. Where?
> A. Notably in Vancouver, where they have taken over David Spencer.
> Q. They have taken over the David Spencer Limited business all throughout British Columbia, have they not?
> A. Yes.
> Q. You are aware, of course, of the fact that the T. Eaton Company has indicated to this committee that they are opposed to the practice of resale price maintenance?
> A. Yes.
> Q. And I think you have said already that in your view the elimination of that practice would tend to benefit mainly the large department store?
> A. I think that would be the inevitable tendency.
> Q. Do you see any connection between those two sets of facts, the T. Eaton Company's attitude and your opinion which you have just expressed?
> A. I do not care to impute motives or to make general inferences—I do not think this is amusing, Mr. Chairman—

These words were an aside by Mr. Hougham, who was suffering from the strong attitude of the chairman of the committee, from which we all suffered from time to time. Then I go on with the quotation:

> The Chairman: No, it is certainly not. It is so unusual we are gratified to have you make such a straight statement.
> The Witness: But I would think that perhaps—I know I should not be talking for the T. Eaton Company—but that is perhaps the reason they adopt that attitude, the traditional attitude that they do not want to have anybody tell them what to do.

What Mr. Hougham is expressing in those well chosen and reasonable words is that one of the reasons at the back of the mind of the T. Eaton Company in their opposition to price maintenance is probably the fact that it will improve their competitive condition vis-à-vis the small retail dealer. I am not saying that the T. Eaton Company, or any other company, in taking that attitude is doing anything illegal. It is perfectly legal, but I am stating it as a fact, which we have to reckon with, when we are considering the effects of this legislation and when we are considering what will be the position of the small independent retailer as a result of the legislation.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I would like to summarize as follows: We have no evidence that the practice of resale price maintenance is harmful at the present time with respect to its effect on prices; we have no evidence that its elimination will reduce the cost of living. My attitude in this regard is exactly the same as that of the Trades and Labour Congress, as expressed at page 379 of the committee proceedings. They say:

> Whatever the committee had in the way of information—

Here he is referring to the MacQuarrie committee. I say this expression of opinion applies to the MacQuarrie committee, the parliamentary committee, and it also is perfectly descriptive of the situation in which we find ourselves here in this house today. The Trades and Labour Congress in their brief say:

> Whatever the committee had in the way of information before it about the extent of the practice of resale price fixing, it certainly didn't present your committee or any other interested party with any concrete evidence on which to base a case either for or against resale price maintenance.

So we have no evidence in that regard. But we have much evidence that it will hurt the small independent retailer. This evidence is based upon the facts that we were presented with as the past practices in this field. We have evidence that it will bring about increasing concentration of power in a few hands, based upon the report of the royal commission on price spreads. We have evidence that the retailer has no other protection against the practice of loss leadering, except that to be found in the resale price maintenance system; and for those reasons the official opposition recommended that the proper report to be brought into the house by the parliamentary committee was a report along the following lines—and I am here reading the last three paragraphs of the report which was laid before the committee for its adoption, but which was rejected by the government majority on that committee. We suggested the committee report as follows, as shown on page 827 of the committee's proceedings:

> Your committee, having been much impressed by the very real concern felt by retail merchants over the danger to them from unfair competition and loss leadering practices by powerful chain and departmental stores if price maintenance is eliminated, is of the opinion that if any legislation is ever to be enacted against the one type of practice it must be accompanied by complementary legislation against the other.
> Your committee has been unable, in the time at its disposal, to study and work out legislation which it can confidently recommend as being constitutional and effective to meet the danger of loss leadering.
> Your committee therefore reports that it is not in possession of sufficient evidence on which to base legislation and recommends that further careful consideration be given to this whole subject, and particularly to the question of fair trade laws along the lines of those in force in the United States of America, as a proper and workable solution of the problem.

That recommendation which we placed before the parliamentary committee still represents the position of this party.

In the light of the considerations that I have laid before the house in analysing the proceedings of our committee and the factors which emerge from a study of this situation, we can see the folly and unfairness of enacting this legislation at this time and leaving the small man at the mercy of big business, with no certainty whatsoever of benefit to the consumer.

Just 16 years ago the country was shocked and alarmed at the revelations of the inroads that big powerful chain monopolies had been making into the distributive trade of Canada, at the expense of the small man, and to the detriment of the public generally. As Mr. Hougham said, "When the giants are contending, the little fellow gets trampled underfoot." Price maintenance became generally applied because, as we have seen, it is the only method yet devised by which the little fellow can get protection against the giants. It is all very well for Mr. Fred McGregor, or anyone else, to sneer at the little corner merchant and say he is uneconomic, and callously condemn his distinction—along with the veteran and all others who are just getting established, because they are weak—just for the sake of some economic theory. But responsible legislatures cannot, or should not, behave in that way.

Yet that is exactly what we are being asked to do in this bill—without sufficient evidence, without adequate consideration, without having given them a fair hearing.

It may be that there are valid objections to price maintenance being left exclusively in the hands of private individuals. But I emphasize the point that it is a protective device, to protect the small legitimate trader and operator against the unfair competition of the strong. As such, it is nonsense to condemn it out of hand as running counter to the private enterprise system. For many years now our efforts—the efforts of the combines act itself—have been to devise laws which will protect the individual and the public generally against the unfair practices of strong combines and monopolies. Restrictions on unfair competitive practices have been one feature of this process. Agricultural organizations, labour unions and others have all pressed for—and received—laws which enable them to organize to protect the weaker individual member against unfair competition from the strong, whether that competition comes from within or without. The retail merchant has done the same thing, not by laws, but by working out the price maintenance system.

And so we say it may be that some form of public protection should be substituted for the private system of price maintenance. The fair trade laws of the United States are an example which we think this house should study and consider, and so do the retailers. But do not take a theoretical position about price maintenance, unsupported by any factual evidence, and throw the retailers to the wolves of unfair competition by eliminating this protection without substituting any other. In the words of Mr. Hougham, at page 768 of the proceedings:

> Then I enter at this stage a most earnest plea to you as a committee and to this government, not to throw the baby out the window with the bath. If you are determined to get rid of this principle then at least give these people some protection against the thing which they fear most, and don't do one without the other.

It is because this bill would do one without the other that we urge the government now, as we did in the committee, to give the house and parliament time to look into the facts of this situation and to devise some effective means of protecting the small retailer. I therefore move seconded by the member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming):

> That this bill be not now read a second time, but that it be read a second time this day six months hence.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): I do not propose to join what but for the rules of the house would become a marathon, Mr. Speaker. I am not saying that in any disrespectful way of either the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) or the hon. member who has just taken his seat. Fortunately the rules of the house prevent all other members of this house from engaging in what might otherwise become a marathon. This problem is a difficult problem. It is a problem which has been investigated recently by a committee of this parliament, and it has been investigated over and over again in the United States. It has been the subject of a recent white paper in Great Britain, and is a problem which faces all the legislatures of our various democratic countries. We are no exception in having to face it now.

Resale price maintenance is, of course, a method by which prices are maintained irrespective of the conditions under which the articles are sold. A short time ago I was reading a work on distribution and resale by Professor Henry Smith, the vice-principal of Ruskin college, Oxford. His views have been summarized in a pamphlet published by the Fabian society in Great Britain. I think at the outset of my remarks I shall put a cogent paragraph from that pamphlet on the record. It reads:

> If all the shops in the trade, irrespective of their cost of doing business, charge the same protected price, then the price cutter may build up a fictitious reputation for cheapness on the strength of cutting the price of protected goods while he overcharges on others. But it is the system of price maintenance which creates the problem: abolish it and the piratical price cutter (if he is a pirate) will be disarmed.
> The evils of the system are twofold. When prices and margins are fixed by manufacturers in association with retailers the two may well be sharing an abnormally high level of profit. Even when this does not take place, the price which the village or suburban shopkeeper must obtain to cover his expenses is higher than the urban trader needs. Thus either the more favourably placed retailer makes more profit than is necessary, or too many shops come into operation in the centres of population, thus lowering the turnover, putting up the costs, and reducing the profit of others. Profits are reduced, but the consumer is not assisted and manpower is wasted.

I think in a few words Professor Smith places the problem in its proper perspective.

The legislation now before the house is the result of a report of a special committee established by this House of Commons in co-operation with the other place. The immediate cause of the establishment of that committee, as has been said both by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) and by the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) was of course the notification to this house by the government in the speech from the throne that an interim report of the MacQuarrie committee had been received. After studying the combines legislation that committee recommended that suppliers should be prohibited from requiring or inducing distributors to resell goods at fixed or minimum resale prices. In its report the MacQuarrie committee remarked that resale price maintenance had been noted on many occasions during investigations by the combines investigation commission, but usually those notations were made in conjunction with and incidental to investigations of other practices.

There was one investigation in 1927 in which this practice was the sole topic under discussion, and I believe that was an inquiry into the proprietary articles and trade association regulations. Hon. members will recollect that as a result of that inquiry the association was disbanded when the commissioner reported that the public interest was detrimentally affected by that association. May I say that this was also the conclusion reached in other investigations which dealt with certain aspects of the problem; tobacco in 1938; dental supplies in 1947; optical goods in 1948, and bread in western Canada. Consequently, the legislation comes before us as a result of a number of investigations and reports made under the Combines Investigation Act. In other words, it is not before us as a means of preventing increases in the already high cost of living. I do not think it will have a great effect on that. It may have a slight effect, but in any event it is rather an attempt by government and by parliament to deal with something which, from time to time, has been stated to be detrimental to the public interest. It is for that reason the legislation is before us.

Evidence concerning this practice was noted by the royal commission on prices in 1949. Hon. members will recall that commission was a continuance of an investigation started under a special committee of this parliament. This is what that commission stated at page 28 of volume 1 of its report:

> Resale price maintenance, like other forms of restrictive practices, does offer what appears to the manufacturer and distributor to be a happy relief from the unending struggle against the harsh correctives of the free market system.

In other words, if we are living under a free enterprise system there are supposed to be certain correctives inherent in that system—I do not always agree that they are there but they are said to be there, and this is an attempt to get around the correctives that are said to be inherent in the system of free enterprise, which my hon. friends all over the house allege from time to time that they support.

Mr. Brooks: Did you ever look for them?

Mr. Coldwell: We are living in North America, in an area where free competition and free enterprise are said to be the fundamental principles of our economic life—

Mr. Low: They should be, anyway.

Mr. Coldwell: —to the extent that when price controls by parliament and under the authority of this parliament or of the legislatures of the country were in effect, the same manufacturers and many but not all of the distributors protested and protested; and so successfully did they do so that finally the government—shall I put it this way, though perhaps some may think I should not do so—bowed to the insistent demands from my hon. friends of the Progressive Conservative party as well as of the manufacturers and some distributors that all control should be abolished. In other words, the enforcement of price control by public bodies was distasteful to those who today are making a protest against this bill which is designed to make illegal the practice of resale price maintenance or a form of price control by private manufacturers and distributors. I think we should keep this fact clearly in mind when we are discussing this problem.

But indeed it goes further than that. In the evidence before this committee and in the evidence before the commissioner under the Combines Investigation Act on many occasions, it has been shown that manufacturers have taken effective steps to enforce what is in effect a "code of law", a code of private law. It has established a private system of law which allows no appeal to any court of justice. I submit—and I think all hon. members will agree with me—that if we are to have in this country any code of law of any description, whether that code of law governs prices or otherwise, it should be enacted by legislation of this parliament or of the legislatures of the country, and should be enforced by some public authority.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Will the hon. gentleman permit a question on the matter of private law?

Mr. Coldwell: Yes.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Is it not true that what it really is is something in the nature of a contract and that in fact it has been questioned and litigated in the courts frequently?

Mr. Coldwell: In my opinion, it is a code.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): A code?

Mr. Coldwell: A code; it is a code of law. It is true that persons agree to abide by that code of law laid down by the manufacturers; but because they agree to observe that code does not make it any less a code of law, in effect; and there is no appeal to the courts.

Let me point out that quite recently, in relation to other private interests in this country, a regulatory body, the C.B.C., set up by and operated under a statute enacted by this parliament, was limited by the legislation that was passed as to what it might do since in that legislation we provided that the person regulated might appeal to the exchequer court for a decision.

Mr. Fleming: Only on questions of law.

Mr. Coldwell: Only on questions of law, yes. I say that what the manufacturers are enforcing is a private code of law. My hon. friend, if he likes, can discuss that point a little later.

Surely it follows, in any event, that this parliament cannot allow private manufacturers to establish a code of law from which there is no appeal either by the retailer or, what is more important, by the consumer. This, Mr. Speaker, seems to me to be the issue the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) put before us yesterday when he was referring to the principle upon which the MacQuarrie committee based its conclusion that resale price maintenance should be forbidden. As reported at page 2092 of Hansard he said this:

> That the practice of resale price maintenance establishes a private system of law under which the business of a non-conforming retailer or of a retailer who is merely believed to be non-conforming may be seriously prejudiced without that retailer having any recourse to the courts of justice.

I want to press that point just one step further and say that in reality that is the real issue in connection with this legislation now before us.

Combines Investigation Act

The recent hearings before the parliamentary committee had more than passing significance to the people of Canada. That is obvious from the manner in which the proceedings have been quoted. No one appearing on behalf of those opposed to this bill supported free enterprise which, under other circumstances, they so loudly acclaim. On the contrary, manufacturers demanded not only the right but the support of this parliament—because if we now did not do anything in regard to legislation, it would go all across the country that we were more or less in favour of resale price maintenance—for their own private controls over segments of the Canadian economy.

I want to say at once that I can understand the attitude of many of the retailers and the organizations representing them which appeared before the committee. They remember the disastrous experiences in the 1930's when business was stagnant and when price cutting was quite prevalent. They had—perhaps I should say "they have"—good reason to fear a similar situation; but it is certain that if a similar situation occurred, price maintenance by private interests could not be enforced. It could not be enforced in the 1930's. It could not be enforced under similar circumstances should they arrive again in 1954 or 1960. It seems to me that they advance an argument which is quite unsound. Indeed, rival manufacturers would do exactly as they did in the 1930's, namely, compete with each other for the small amount of business retail merchants were likely to give them.

Thus, in reality, price maintenance as a protection in such circumstances seems to me to be quite useless. It may be true that price maintenance does not affect a large range of retail goods, with the exception perhaps of druggists' supplies.

In this connection, may I say that at page 137 of the proceedings of the committee, Mr. J. W. Preston, secretary-manager of the Canadian Pharmaceutical Association, was examined by Mr. Phelan. Mr. Phelan quoted an item from the association publication, in its issue of November 1, which said this:

> From the time the speech from the throne was published and the newspaper stories started to appear, every druggist in Canada could see the disastrous results of any legislation for him: over 60 per cent of his volume is done on price-maintained products.

With that statement in this journal Mr. Preston substantially agreed. In his brief Mr. Preston gave some idea of how widespread the practice was. It was so widespread, indeed, that I think one might say that, as far as this particular type of business is concerned, the retail merchant is no longer an independent retail merchant but that he is merely an agent for certain manufacturers.

Mr. Drew: One o'clock.

Mr. Coldwell: Mr. Preston said this:

> It is our contention that the principle of resale price maintenance is so woven into the fabric of our economy that any move to declare the practice illegal should not be made hastily, nor without scientific investigation.

We have had a number of investigations. And what did Mr. Preston say—that the retailer was the principal consideration in this respect? No, as a matter of fact he said that the protection of the manufacturer was the basic purpose of price maintenance—not the retailer, but the manufacturer. Examples were given at page 139 of the official evidence that increased profit margins on certain proprietary medicines had been announced and had been put into effect. From the evidence on these pages it would appear that druggists, as I have already said, have become very largely the agents of manufacturers.

Now I want to say immediately that I can understand the position taken by many of the local druggists who have approached their members of parliament and asked them to oppose this legislation. I have no doubt all members of parliament have been approached by some of the retail druggists in the country. These druggists quite often operate in small local communities where they meet a real community need and perform a useful and desirable service. They are afraid that if resale price maintenance is made unlawful, they will not be able to compete with large organizations in the large centres who sell through catalogues or chain organizations, and who buy in large quantities. There is no question that this has prompted many of the representations made to members of parliament.

As I said when reference of this matter to the committee was under discussion in the house, the bill should contain some provisions to prevent unfair competition. The MacQuarrie report itself draws attention to the unfair practice of advertising what are sometimes known as loss leaders. My hon. friend from Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) referred to this at some length this morning. The MacQuarrie report states, in this connection:

> Resale price maintenance, by prohibiting any normal price reduction, affords an effective protection against loss leaders in the field of price-maintained goods. However, the committee does not think that to withdraw from the retailer the right to make any price reduction is a satisfactory way of preventing unfair and excessive price-cutting. We are of the opinion that more direct and desirable weapons can be found to curb loss leaders.

I shall not be able to finish what I have to say before the luncheon recess.

Mr. Adamson: I did not wish to interrupt the hon. member, but I would point out to him that resale price maintenance is appealable in the courts. There is a case in Montreal concerning a druggist who has lodged an appeal against the action of the Frosst Company. I believe that case is before the courts.

Mr. Coldwell: Yes, but it is not provided for by price maintenance.

Mr. Adamson: But that action may be taken.

Mr. Coldwell: The consumer has no recourse to the courts.

Mr. Sinclair: That is important.

Mr. Coldwell: The consumer has no recourse to the law; that is the point.

At one o'clock the house took recess.

The house resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Coldwell: Mr. Speaker, when the house rose for lunch I was saying that we regretted that the bill did not include some provision to give some protection to the retailer in regard to matters I was talking about, namely, price cutting, loss leadership and so on. According to the transcript of evidence of proceedings before the committee the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Croll) moved the following motion:

1. That no dealer shall sell or offer for sale directly or indirectly any commodity at a price less than 5 per cent above cost.

Then the motion provided exceptions in the case of sales of damaged goods, goods sold for charitable purposes or by relief agencies, perishable merchandise, goods sold in clearance sales or as bankrupt stock; and the cost was defined as the invoice cost to a bona fide dealer or the replacement cost; and so on. I am not at all sure that the 5 per cent is the percentage that should be included, but the idea behind that motion was one that I think deserved more consideration than it received and some such provision might well be included in this legislation.

As the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) said this morning, there is legislation concerning this practice in some 45 of the 48 states of the United States. Evidence in this regard may be found at page 688 where Mr. Phelan was examining Mr. Leach, as hon. members who were on the committee will remember. I quote from that page:

Q. Mr. Leach, you spoke about the fair trade law in the United States; would you be good enough, if you can, to outline to us what it is, how it works in the United States, and so on?

A. To the best of my knowledge, as I think I did explain earlier—I will try to be as brief as I can—the manufacturer submits his catalogue of prices to the state fair trade board, whatever it is called; that board approves of those prices if they feel they are right and then it issues a certificate and puts its O.K. on it and says that is your price. You will go to the retailer and he signs a contract that he will sell at that price.

After a little further explanation there is another question and answer as follows:

Q. Now, in the United States, does that eliminate the question of the loss leader? I take it it does.

A. In cases where the retailer actually signs.

Q. But here in Canada do you think this would be an effective answer to the threat of the loss leader?

A. Most effective.

Much depends on the intent and spirit of the legislation under which such a provision operates and the board under which it would operate. In some states the legislation and the personnel of the board are such that it has not as much effect as we would desire it to have under our legislation. I have been reading some articles dealing with this provision in the United States and they point out that in many states, particularly California, it has had an effect the opposite of that which was originally intended. As a rule the legislation provides purely for voluntary agreements; there are no compulsory features and no penalties. Our legislation should be a part of and in the spirit of the Combines Investigation Act. Otherwise the cure might indeed be worse than the disease. I think we should be most careful about what we do in that direction.

Another practice which should be scrutinized and as far as possible banned is the giving of different rates of discount to large and small retailers. Mr. McGregor in his evidence gave examples of how this operates obviously against the small merchant and the consumer. He pointed out that under resale price maintenance this might very well tend to keep prices up because inducements offered to buy in larger quantities were not to benefit the consumers but to maintain larger margins and bigger profits. That was the evidence placed before the committee.

I would point out that in connection with the marketing of wheat under the government board and our legislation it does not matter whether one buys a bushel or one million bushels, the price per unit is exactly the same. In my own province of Saskatchewan the same thing applies to the fur marketing board. A man who has a few pelts sends them down to the marketing agency and he gets exactly the same price per pelt for the same grade as the producer who sends in one thousand pelts. In other words, the unit cost to the retailer should be the same, instead of having these differentials which are brought about by means of discounts.

It was brought out in the evidence that the manufacturer did everything in his power to persuade merchants to maintain the agreed resale prices. This morning an hon. member raised the question of a lawsuit in Montreal. I have only a very hazy idea of that lawsuit, but my understanding is that an effort was made to obtain an injunction to prevent a large wholesale drug firm from refusing to supply a retail merchant. It had nothing to do with the community; it was purely a matter between a retailer and manufacturer. What was actually happening was that a druggist wished to again get supplies on the basis of maintaining the resale price. Consequently it has no bearing on the discussion that we are having at the present time nor does it take away in any respect from my argument that what is really happening in Canada is that the manufacturers are taking to themselves the power to impose their own code of law and their own penalties in connection with the enforcement of that code. On the contrary it reinforces it.

In its report the parliamentary committee stated that it did not think that under present conditions there was any likelihood of any powerful retailing interests engaging in a policy of selling goods at unreasonably low prices for the purpose of destroying the independent retailer.

As a matter of fact, as the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) pointed out yesterday, we have in section 498A of our Criminal Code a provision which, if vigorously enforced and if the evidence could be obtained, would prevent that kind of discrimination. This section has been placed on the record already by the minister and by the hon. member for Kamloops. Therefore since my time is limited I shall omit placing it on the record again. But this provision in the Criminal Code, 498A, does not meet the point made by the MacQuarrie committee with regard to loss leaders, nor does it obviate the necessity for a provision similar to that moved by the hon. member for Spadina or, as I have said, the kind of provision that in the light of our circumstances will provide the same public control as some legislatures attempted to institute in the interests of the consumers and failed to do in many of the states of the United States.

My criticism of the report of the committee therefore is that it did not recommend legislation of this description. I believe if the bill is passed the combines commissioner should be asked to draft a suitable clause for presentation to the house early in the next session of parliament. I believe that during the recess further consideration should be given to this matter. It is true, as the committee states, that there is not much present danger of loss leaders menacing the small merchant when the economy is as buoyant as it is at the present time and we are in a period of inflated price levels.

The hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) made much this morning of the representations made by Mr. Bengough on behalf of the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada, but what he actually did of course was to quote from their brief various paragraphs in which Mr. Bengough argued pro and con. But the meat of the brief, as usual of course, can be found in the recommendations contained therein which make a very material difference to my hon. friend's argument. Let me put on the record what the recommendations were. They are found at page 382. Perhaps I should read the preceding paragraphs, although it will be a little long. They read as follows:

> What we should all be concerned about at this time is how to protect the individual whether he be consumer or merchant, distributor or manufacturer, worker or employer in a free economy. At the same time we must remember that a free economy does not exist because of some law; it exists because of the private arrangements, agreements, alliances, organizations and the whole welter of checks and balances which serve to offset any possibility of one group dominating it completely.
> There are those who fear the domination of the economy by the state. Whatever grounds they may have for such alarm, it must be noted that the state already has a hand in the economy. Your committee is asked to consider what further hand the state shall take in the economy. What appears most important is not whether the state shall play a part in the economy or whether the economy will remain free if it does, but what part the state shall play; and whether the state shall play a negative and confusing role or a positive one.
> While we would not recommend the repeal of the Combines Investigation Act, we believe that the negative approach of this type of legislation and administrative practice is unlikely to ever have very substantial influences upon consumer prices or to provide very effective means for reducing the private alliances that restrict the free flow of goods and services in a free economy.

What he is saying there is that there are restrictive alliances that do prevent the operation of a free economy and that something else than preventive legislation should be undertaken. He goes on to say:

> We believe, on the other hand, that your committee should recommend positive measures for dealing with restrictive practices in our economy and in so doing provide parliament with suggestions for immediate action against inflation and rising consumer prices. Rather than say that a manufacturer may not make an arrangement to protect the price of his goods and thereby, presumably, his business, it would seem much more practical to suggest that the relationships between suppliers and distributors should be subject to broad social regulation thereby providing for the protection of both along with the consumer.

We suggest that your committee recommend the creation of a consumers price control board which will have power to deal with all aspects of this problem of resale price maintenance as well as with consumer prices generally. We make this recommendation to you because we believe that it would provide for a positive approach to the problem of restrictive practices in the economy and at the same time for a sensible and immediate attack on rising consumer prices in all lines.

Parliament has already granted the power to the government to deal with prices. Your committee, in our opinion should recommend that action be reserved along the negative lines of amending the Combines Investigation Act and rather that immediate positive action be taken through a consumers price control board to free the whole economy from restrictive price practices whether these arise as the result of agreements or arrangements or simply from the customs of the trade.

If you read that you see what Mr. Bengough was really asking for. He was really asking for some control of the economy and that that control should be exercised through powers given to a board representing the consumers of this country. That puts a very different light on the brief than the isolated quotations which my hon. friend put on the record this morning. We think this is a suggestion which is more worthy of consideration than any other, and much more indeed than the committee seemed to give it. Mention of the trades and labour congress reminds me that an argument sometimes used to support resale price maintenance is that farmers and labour maintain the prices of agricultural products and of wage levels. These of course are analogies which do not bear examination. Prices of farm goods are set not by any private arrangement but by public authority—

Mr. Fulton: They are in the case of B. C. apples.

Mr. Coldwell: —namely, this parliament, or under legislation passed by a legislature or through marketing boards established by our legislatures as in B. C. Marketing boards are established by legislation with powers granted to them by the legislatures. Prices and marketing conditions, when arrived at, are the result of public negotiation, and in connection with wheat are governed largely by international agreement among governmental bodies.

Mr. Fulton: Not with apples.

Mr. Coldwell: The same applies to labour. Boards of conciliation are established and the final decision may be made, as it was in the case of the railway workers just over a year ago, by this parliament, or, with respect to some other labour matters coming under provincial jurisdiction, by provincial authorities and legislatures. Neither farmers nor workers have the right to set their own rates and prices apart from methods and means laid down and supervised by the elected representatives of the people.

In the case of resale maintenance, however, manufacturers arrogate to themselves the right to establish a private code of law and, indeed, to enforce it. We do not believe that is good, and we shall vote of course against the motion to give the bill the six months hoist. The effect of that would be to kill the bill. It is a method of preventing further discussion and thereby defeating it.

Mr. Fulton: It could be brought up next session.

Mr. Coldwell: When that amendment is disposed of, as I imagine it will be, I shall take the opportunity to move in a very few words another amendment, namely, that Bill No. 36 be not now read a second time but that it be resolved that in the opinion of this house consideration should be given to the introduction of legislation providing that where regulation of resale price maintenance is in the public interest such regulation should be under public control instead of under private control. When the opportunity arises I propose to place our position on the record of the house in those words. I said if and when the amendment already moved has been dealt with, that is to say, if it is defeated. If it carries there will be no opportunity to move a further amendment. If our amendment carries we shall be very happy about it; but if it should not—and I hope it will carry—we shall support the bill at this stage because we believe that it is against the interests of the Canadian public, Canadian consumers, the Canadian people generally that any group should be allowed to arrogate to itself authority which should only be exercised by a body under parliamentary or legislative control. That is the principle in the bill. It is the principle of the bill which we support; and, if the Progressive Conservative amendment is defeated, after ours has been moved I hope it will carry. Should it not carry, then we shall support the bill because we think that no good purpose could be served by defeating a bill of this description at this time.

At the same time we urge that the suggestion made for the establishment of a public price control board be given consideration by the government, and that, in any event, whether it is favourably considered or not, the commissioner under the Combines Investigation Act be asked to submit to the government a draft amendment to this bill for consideration and submission to this house at the next session, prohibiting unfair trade practices such as the advertising of loss leaders and selling below cost, thus giving more adequate protection to the small retailer who of course, and I can understand it, is legitimately concerned at what may be, he thinks, the effect of this bill upon him. I think that is a legitimate concern which the retailer has, and I would just like to say this. I do not want the issue to be confused by anyone rising in his place in the house and saying: Well, of course the C.C.F. support this and have moved what we have moved because we are in favour of nationalization of all the distributive agencies of the country. We are not, and never have been. I should like to put these few words on the record. Again I am quoting from Professor Henry Smith. He says this:

> For the present, and indeed for a long time to come, nationalization of the distributive trades would be undesirable.

We have always said that; but we have also said this—and my hon. friends on the government side and on the opposition side probably will not agree with me in the words again of Professor Smith:

> The consumer can be protected against excessive overcharge by maximum price control, though this cannot be used as a major instrument to bring about efficiency in distribution. Consequently, all the time that purchasing power runs ahead of supplies and wherever monopoly exists, great care should be taken in relaxing price control.

Then he goes on:

> But let us be realists; no one knows quite what can be done in this field; till we know more let us hang on to price controls, which obviously save us from the worst, until authoritative experiment makes clear what should be done.

I should like to put this concluding paragraph on the record because it has a direct bearing, more so than what I have read, on the issue before us:

> Competition in the distributive trades appears to work somewhat wastefully, in that it often takes the form of bidding up cost, or the opening of superfluous shops. Licensing would not remedy the situation; the best way out seems to lie in improving the quality of competition, and increasing its intensity, particularly in the field of price competition. The institution of a public authority to advise the consumer on prices and qualities, the general development of education, and the abolition of resale price maintenance should also operate in this direction. In particular, the action of trade associations in operating "stop lists" in this connection, and the denial of supplies to co-operative societies, should be prohibited.

As I said the other day, I remember when the agricultural implement inquiry was on, the president of the International Harvester Company was asked if he would supply his line of machinery to co-operatives and he gave a reply which could only be interpreted as no, although it was hedged around with a few considerations, on the ground that a co-operative giving a patronage dividend would in effect be selling below the resale price at which the International Harvester Company expected its agents to sell. Then I go on and quote one more sentence:

> Consideration should be given to a possible measure placing producers under obligation to sell at their customary wholesale prices to anyone willing to buy under the normal wholesale purchase conditions regarding bulk and delivery.

Because of the attention we have given to this matter, Mr. Speaker, and the considerations which I have outlined, we shall oppose the amendment of the Progressive Conservatives, which would simply defeat the bill and set it aside. We shall try to get our view before the house and get it accepted by the house. If the house does not accept our amendment, then we shall vote for the bill.

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, at the outset I should like to review briefly some facts concerning the bill that is now before the house, and particularly the background which led up to the bill. In the first place, the government appointed the MacQuarrie committee in June, 1950, to undertake the study of existing combine legislation. In early September, 1951, the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) requested from the committee an early report on resale price maintenance. This report, while it was designated as interim, was such only in the sense that the entire report on the combines was not completed. I think the Minister of Justice has quite fully established this fact, and I take it therefore that as far as resale price maintenance is concerned the MacQuarrie committee report was final and complete.

The second fact is this. The MacQuarrie committee in its report dated October 1, 1951, recommended legislation designed to prohibit the practice of resale price maintenance. They also recommended that the legislation to make it an offence for manufacturers to refuse to supply retailers with goods on the ground that these retailers had cut prices be enacted. The third fact is as follows: It has been established quite amply, I suggest, that the government accepted the MacQuarrie committee's recommendation. The Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) announced in the speech from the throne at the opening of this present session that legislation to carry out the recommendation would be introduced during the present session. Later on it was announced by the government that a joint parliamentary committee would be set up to deal with the recommendation of the MacQuarrie committee.

The Minister of Justice gave as his reason for the committee the fact that representations had been received from manufacturers and retailers urging the government to hear their views before proceeding to have parliament enact any legislation. If there is any criticism on this point—and I think there is—it is that the government did not get the committee under way as soon as they could have done, and as soon as it was necessary. Had the committee been set up earlier in the session, then perhaps it would have been possible to hear a great deal more evidence than was heard in the comparatively short time that it sat. I think that 16 sittings of the committee to hear 42 briefs and to scan and consider a large volume of wires and letters would hardly be enough time to give the kind of consideration that ought to have been given to expect hon. members to reach sound conclusions as to the various arguments that were put forward on all sides. In my judgment neither was there time for the government and the supporters of the bill completely to justify the legislation which the government has decided to adopt.

The fourth fact is this. As a consequence of the committee's deliberations at least four facts have been established so far as my thinking is concerned. I would like to set them out briefly at this point. The first is: The MacQuarrie committee apparently did not accumulate statistical evidence that would establish that under resale price maintenance Canadian consumers were being harmed. As far as I can gather from the evidence—and I must say here that I was not a member of the committee—the approach seemed to be more from the standpoint of principle than from detailed evidence.

Now, the second of these four facts that were established by the committee's deliberations is this. None of the trade associations which appeared before the parliamentary committee could go beyond expressing their opinion on the subject. I stress that word "opinion." It is true that certain statistical information was presented but it was found impossible, on the basis of what was before the committee, to make a proper comparison between the resale prices on price-maintained goods and those of comparable non-price-maintained goods. The argument was frequently advanced during the sittings of the committee that, generally speaking, maintained prices were lower than non-maintained prices. This basis was, in fact, not proven because the committee did not take the time to accumulate information upon which a proper comparison could be made. I think the opposition has some legitimate criticism to make on this score, although the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) did present considerable evidence to show that at least in other countries the end price of price-maintained goods was somewhat higher than the end price of non-price-maintained goods. No real effort was made, however, to establish the facts of the situation right here in Canada, and I think that is regrettable.

The member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) has complained that the committee actually choked off attempts by the opposition members of the committee to gather information which would establish, one way or the other, what the effect of resale price maintenance really is. The hon. member now interpolates that it was the government that choked off those attempts. If the hon. member's statements are correct, then the government is to be severely criticized for not having taken the time or made the effort to establish the facts.

Fact No. 3, which has emerged as a result of the sittings of the committee, is that spokesmen of certain trade organizations argued that price maintenance was designed for the protection of the retailer; others were perfectly frank in asserting it was designed to protect the manufacturer. What studies I have been able to give this particular problem, together with the evidence submitted by the Minister of Justice in his submission last evening, has led me to the conclusion that the principal purpose of resale price maintenance has been to protect the manufacturer. I cannot escape that conclusion. I confess that I may be wrong, but thus far my studies have led me to that conclusion.

Fact No. 4 is that the percentage of price maintained goods found in any store varies a great deal. In a grocery store, for example, less than one per cent of the goods are price maintained. Sixty per cent or more of the goods in drugs stores are price maintained. Jewelry, silverware and watches which make up the bulk of the goods in any jewelry store are price maintained to approximately 90 per cent. Taking these facts into consideration, and adding to them the evidence of the Minister of Justice which I thought was well documented and well supported, I have concluded that if resale price maintenance were prohibited it would not unduly affect the retailers as a whole. I have concluded too, Mr. Speaker, that it would not affect very greatly the retailers whose percentage of price maintained goods is very low. In fact, I think it is self-evident that it would not.

It must be remembered, of course, that most retailers' establishments do handle a small volume of price maintained goods. On the other hand, if the bulk of the retailer's goods is price maintained, as long as that practice is continued I must conclude that the retailer is at the mercy of the manufacturer, who exercises the power to discontinue his supplies if he should cut prices by even the smallest amount. It is our opinion that no retailer should be submitted to a system of private law from which there is no appeal to any court in the land. If I recall correctly the British report on resale price maintenance did condemn the practice on that ground.

Those are the four facts which I believe did emerge crystal clear as a result of the deliberations of the committee. I should like to continue with my general comment. It was significant to me that most manufacturers did deny that there had been rigid enforcement of resale price maintenance. The jewelry people, for example, even went so far as to create the impression that there was no enforcement at all. If that is true, then one has to ask, Why do they display such concern over the abolition of the practice? Most manufacturers stressed the value to the public of branded goods. They argued during the sittings of the committee that the only way by which branded names and branded goods could be continued with assurance of quality was through the maintenance of price. Now, sir, I sought diligently for the facts which would establish the validity of that argument in my mind, but I must confess I could not find them. Consequently, I am forced to conclude that the manufacturers' contention in this regard is at least highly questionable.

I must admit that anyone would find it extremely difficult to establish beyond question that resale price maintenance is on the one hand good or, on the other, evil. At least, that is the way it appears to me on the basis of the evidence that is available. I cannot overlook, however, that it is a growing practice. Let me emphasize that, that it is a growing practice. It seemed to me the Minister of Justice established that fact beyond any question last night.

I should like to refer to the evidence of Mr. F. A. McGregor, the former combines commissioner. If I recall correctly, his evidence was heard on November 28, and I shall read a paragraph to emphasize the importance of that point I have just made, that the practice of resale price maintenance is growing. Mr. McGregor says, at page 390 of the committee's proceedings:

> The extension of the practice in recent years has been alarming. If it continues it will not be long before price control by manufacturers will become the rule in the distributive trade and price competition the exception, as far as branded goods are concerned. Indeed in some trades the practice has already become so general that practically none of these goods can be reduced in price without the authorization of the manufacturer. The development of such a system may be very enterprising on the part of the dealers and manufacturers, but it can hardly be described as "free enterprise" in the meaning of that term which used to be commonly accepted. Nor can it be said to have any rightful part in a competitive system, which has been recognized by parliament as a basic element in our whole economy. The undoubted right of the public to the safeguard afforded by price competition is being supplanted to this extent and in these broadening areas, by the questionable right of manufacturers and dealers to prevent price competition in the wholesale and retail selling of their particular products. If the vital element of price competition is removed from a competitive system, what you have left is not a competitive system at all, but a price-controlled system—with prices controlled by manufacturers. In the case of resale price maintenance it is control by the manufacturers with ready acquiescence and indeed urgent advocacy on the part of a very large proportion of the dealers, whose interests it is primarily designed to protect. The minority of dealers who would prefer to maintain their independence and determine their own selling prices have no alternative but to fall in line.

I do not believe we can disregard the evidence of a man of such broad experience as Mr. McGregor has had. It has already been argued that he is a theorist, and therefore should be discounted. Let me say this, Mr. Speaker: On many occasions in this house I have heard this man quoted as if he were the most practical man in the field of combine legislation, and that argument was not confined to the government side of the house.

It appears to us that, the more and more firms adopt the device of resale price maintenance, the evil, if it can be called an evil, is bound to become apparent as time goes on, and especially in the light of the fact that manufacturers are put in such a strong position the retailers will no longer be free to carry on in any capacity other than as agents of manufacturers. My own judgment tells me that is not good. Such a contingency as that would be very harmful, both to the retailers themselves and to consumers generally. In my judgment this important matter cannot be considered properly unless one takes a long-range view, and not just a short-range view. It is very largely on that long-range view of what this thing could become that we in this group take our position.

As a matter of principle, we cannot agree that manufacturers should be allowed to exercise a law of their own. They should never be in a position to put retailers out of business to suit their whims, nor to dictate resale prices, especially when the retailer or consumer who may be deprived of these goods through the action of the manufacturer cannot go to the courts to secure justice. We would have to oppose resale price maintenance on this ground, even if no other reasons existed at all.

Most manufacturers indicated some fear that the removal of resale price maintenance would immediately result in widespread use of the loss-leader practice. Much has been said about that matter already, and for that reason I do not intend to go into it at any length. The manufacturers assumed that branded goods would be the first affected; and they said that large stores would likely indulge in the practice in order to squeeze out weaker opposition. It is significant, Mr. Speaker—and I should like to mention this—that the large stores opposed resale price maintenance. That is a significant fact. However, I think the Minister of Justice, in his case last evening, fairly well disposed of any fears that the manufacturers have. He showed that predatory price-cutting tactics are not only against the public interest but are also contrary to section 498A of the Criminal Code. It appears to me that the federal government has authority to take action against the practice of loss leader if that practice begins, in any way, to endanger the legitimate competition that exists or should exist between retailers. I should caution the government, of course, at this time that they will have to be on their guard against predatory price cutting by large concerns especially if, in the days ahead, we slide into a buyer's market. We have not been in one for a good many years, but it is possible that we could get into a buyer's market. More settled conditions throughout the world could quickly bring us into such a market.

In my judgment the Criminal Code should be invoked wherever and whenever necessary to protect the small merchants. If I thought that this legislation would endanger the position of the small retailers throughout this country, I would do my best to hold the bill over until a full investigation of all the evidence could be made, or I would do my best to defeat it. I should like to see made crystal clear, one way or the other, exactly what effect it will have upon the small retailers. We are much concerned about keeping retail merchants everywhere in Canada in a strong and happy position. It seems to me that, in a house like this, nobody needs to emphasize, any more than has been done, the important place that the retail merchant holds in our economy; it is an exceedingly important place. Without strong and secure retail merchants in our country we could not carry on under what is called a free economy. That is one of the reasons why we spend so much time in trying to get the government to lay down policies under which Canada can be assured a balanced economy in which there will always be effective purchasing power in the pockets of consumers sufficient to enable them to buy all of the goods and services available for sale, if they want them.

Under the kind of balanced economy we Social Crediters advocate, we think the position of the retailers would constantly be a happy and prosperous one, especially if the practice of predatory price cutting is prosecuted with vigour under the Combines Investigation Act and the Criminal Code, and if conditions are established wherein fair competition can be assured. We in this parliament must be sure that the small merchants and druggists of this country are not adversely affected by this legislation or by anything that we do. If, by the time of the next session of parliament, it appears that there are or will be injustices to the independent merchants as a result of what we are doing—that is, through the application of the terms of this bill—then we must be ready to amend the act to remove the injustices or even to repeal the act.

We are thinking also of the consumer generally, Mr. Speaker. The consumer has, for too long, been the forgotten man; and it is high time that something was done for him. It is our opinion that the passing of this bill will help the consumers of Canada directly and perhaps also indirectly. But when I say that, I want it understood, Mr. Speaker, that we do not look upon the abolition of resale price maintenance as any substitute for a vigorous program of action by the government to bring down the high cost of living. I am of the opinion that the unusual circumstances surrounding the birth of this bill indicate that the government wants the people to think that it is really going out to do battle for a lower general consumer price level. We are not being fooled by that, by any means, if that really is what the government wants the people to believe. We shall continue in our efforts to press the government to take the earliest possible action to relieve the consuming public from the present unnecessarily high living costs.

I think that one of the strongest arguments put forward by the Minister of Justice in his case last night for the bill was that resale price maintenance has made it difficult to detect a manufacturers' combine that may be operating behind the practice. I think he referred to that matter at page 15 of his submission, if I remember correctly. It therefore seems to me that to get this out of the way ought to make possible more efficient, successful and vigorous administration of the Combines Investigation Act. In our judgment, this alone would be of great good to the consumers of Canada.

I should now like to say by way of conclusion, Mr. Speaker—I do not want to prolong the debate, by any means—that we find that we shall have to oppose the amendment. We think that it would be wise to pass the bill now, to give it a trial and to see what it can do; and then, in the light of the experience which we gain, when we come back here at the next session I think we could take whatever action would be necessary to see that justice is meted out to all sections of our society.

Mr. James Sinclair (Coast-Capilano): Mr. Speaker, in opening my remarks I think I should first felicitate my colleague, the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton), for the speech which he concluded this morning. As hon. members will recall, when he opened his remarks last night he chided the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) who, in presenting the government's case for the legislation, spoke for two hours and ten minutes. The hon. member himself then promptly proceeded to speak for two hours and twenty minutes.

Some hon. Members: Oh, no.

Mr. Sinclair: If he did not exceed that time, then all I can say, Mr. Speaker, is that it seemed longer to those who had to listen to him.

Mr. Fulton: Surely it is all right for me to try to talk on the bill.

Mr. Sinclair: My felicitations, Mr. Speaker, are not on the contribution that my hon. friend's speech made to this debate but rather to the debate we are going to have tomorrow on procedure, because his speech is the best argument I have ever heard for a further limitation on the time of speeches in the house.

I should like to start off by reminding hon. members that the principal purpose of this legislation now before the house is to further strengthen the Combines Investigation Act. We on this continent are all fairly familiar with the history and the story of combines legislation. With the great growth of industrial power in the United States, combines, trusts and cartels, formed by powerful groups of selfish people in order to exploit the consumer to the utmost, began to be established. President Teddy Roosevelt around the turn of the century established the first anti-combine legislation. The vicious practice of combines spread to this country and we were the second country in the world to establish, in 1925, under a Liberal government, anti-combine legislation. We have a good record with regard to the breaking up and the prosecution of these illegal combines, monopolies and cartels; in fact, we have a record second to no other nation in the world. It is true last spring there was a delay in the publication of the milling report, between the time of the report by the commissioner and the presentation in the house, because of a difference of opinion with the wartime prices and trade board, as to what undertakings they had given the millers under wartime price control.

But in all the records of the twenty-seven investigations of the combines investigators I would recall to the attention of hon. members that there are five reports which had never been published, five investigations made under the regime of the Bennett government. There was the combine in the manufacture of radio tubes in 1931, unpublished; the manufacturing of fruit baskets in Ontario in 1932, unpublished; the distribution of coal in eastern Canada, 1933, unpublished; the manufacture of rubber footwear in Canada, 1934, unpublished, and the sale of gasoline in Ontario, 1934, unpublished.

However, for fear anyone has any doubt about our record as against that of other nations in the world, let me say that our record is second to none in the world. This matter was shown by the debate on international cartels by the United Nations economic council last summer, at which I was present. The United States is first, we are second, and the next nation in the world having legislation anything like this is Sweden, and that country in 1946 passed legislation based on ours, then Britain in 1948, although as yet they have had no investigations under their act.

For fear I am being prejudiced, let us see what one of the great leaders in the Conservative party, the man said to have the finest and clearest mind in the party, Sir David Maxwell Fyfe, had to say. He published a book for the Tory party, on monopoly, in 1948, giving the British Conservative view on it, and especially referring to legislation that the Labour government was bringing forward against monopolies. He reviewed other countries' legislation on combines, and led off with the United States and then Canada. And at page 49 he said:

> Other British dominions have passed laws against trade restraints though none are as complete or effective as the Canadian law.

This is surely a real tribute to Canadian Liberal legislation. However, despite our good law and competent staff, there has been the great difficulty in connection with prosecuting combines because of securing proof. These powerful, selfish and ruthless interests who form combines to rob the consumer do not do their deeds in the public light. As Mr. McGregor said, these deeds are done by stealth, but with effective legislation and staff they can be brought to light; and he has certainly done that. However, from the start, throughout, inquiries into restrictive practices in connection with combines has run this thread of resale price maintenance, often the thread which held the whole evil web together.

The first inquiry was in 1926-27 into the druggists Proprietary Articles Trade Association, the P.A.T.A. At that time there were 167 drug manufacturers, 28 wholesale druggists and 2,734 retail druggists who got together to fix the price of all drug products. And that was done for the benefit of whom? Certainly it was not done for the benefit of the consumer! And it was Mr. McGregor who smashed that P.A.T.A. in 1927. But in most investigations since that time there has again run the thread of resale price maintenance. And if hon. members wish to read of the details then I would suggest that they read the evidence of Mr. McGregor at page 390, or the brief of the Canadian Congress of Labour at page 73. They will see how resale price maintenance was connected with these various combines. It was present in the drug combine in 1926, and the tobacco combine in 1927, as it is described at page 74. Then there was again in the dental supplies combine in 1947, and optical goods combine in 1948.

Then there was again in the bread-making combine in western Canada, when they even fixed the price of bread in 1948; and there was again in the match combine of 1950—and that was the worst of the lot.

Then, further evidence along this line was given, as has been pointed out by the Minister of Justice, in the report of the royal commission on prices who found the practice of price fixing increasingly affecting prices in Canada.

Then the MacQuarrie committee was established to study and recommend methods of strengthening the Combines Investigation Act. They drew specific attention to resale price maintenance as a restrictive business practice. And in this connection I would refer the house to the letter which they sent out to all manufacturers and trade associations which appears at page 250 of the proceedings of the committee, which drew special attention to the fact that they were going to make an investigation of resale price maintenance. Paragraph 6 of this letter states:

> You may recall that the royal commission on prices in their examination of restrictive business practices gave particular attention to the practice of resale price maintenance and recommended that careful study be given to this problem from the viewpoint of its effect on price competition amongst wholesalers and retailers. In view of this the committee invites comments on this particular problem as well as on the Combines Investigation Act generally. In particular, the committee would appreciate receiving extended comments on the tentative conclusion of the royal commission on prices as to the effects of the practice upon the public interest. The matter is dealt with in Vol. I, pages 27, 28 and 41, and Vol. II, pages 256 to 259 of the report of the royal commission on prices as published by the king's printer in 1949.

So those manufacturers who have said that they had no warning that the MacQuarrie committee were to deal with price fixing by manufacturers were certainly not speaking the truth.

The MacQuarrie committee made their interim report to the government on resale price maintenance. The government received it and accepted it and announced in the speech from the throne that it would have legislation to implement the recommendations of that committee.

There were many objections from manufacturers and retailers, who asked for further inquiry in a public forum. Then the government, as a consequence of these representations, set up the parliamentary committee to give these people an opportunity to state publicly their objections to this legislation which would do away with resale price maintenance.

Hon. members in this House of Commons will recall the attitude of the Tory party then. Their spokesman was the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker), and what he said can be found at page 667 of Hansard. Referring to the MacQuarrie committee he said:

> That committee, composed of outstanding men, called upon all those affected, including consumers and manufacturers, to send in their briefs. Has not that committee for a year and a half importuned either directly by letter or indirectly through the press asking interested parties to produce evidence regarding resale price maintenance, a subject of more than academic interest to the members of that committee?

And then in the next column on the same page:

> Is it to postpone action and procrastinate? . . . Why postpone and hold back the legislation? Why further delay?

And the very interesting thing about that speech was that it was a very powerful speech, when one listened to it. But when you read it the next morning in Hansard, away from the persuasive eloquence, you will find in it no indication whatever as to what his views are on resale price maintenance. If you remember that speech of the hon. member, you find in it nowhere any mention of where he stood in connection with price maintenance. In that respect it was similar to his speech on price control, where again he made a rousing speech but never even mentioned where he stood on price control.

Well, perhaps that is not so surprising, after all; because, after hearing the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) this morning declare—and after all, he was speaking for his party—"We are not taking a strong position either for or against resale price maintenance"—I say, one can understand the position of the official opposition.

Of course we in the House of Commons are used to this shilly-shallying by the Tories. They twist and they turn, and they sit on the fence. We remember that they twisted and turned and skated all round the manpower situation last session. We remember that they turned sideways, and turned this way and that way on price controls, talking for them but voting against the C.C.F. motion for price controls. Then, this time they say they are neutral. They are neutral—how? They are neutral like the Irish in the last war, who picked sides. In this issue the Tories are neutral, neutral against the hard-pressed consumer of Canada and neutral for the price-fixing manufacturer.

And then what is the position of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew)? This is what he says as reported at page 753 of Hansard:

> The government by its present action makes it clear that it does not intend to act upon the recommendations they bring forward.

Well, the legislation before us today shows that, as usual, he is wrong.

Now, when the committee was called I was elected chairman. And I wish to point this out again, in view of the comments of the hon. member for Kamloops this morning. I say I was unanimously elected chairman of the committee, and that the hon. member for Kamloops himself and the other Tories voted for me.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Sinclair: As chairman I had constantly in my mind the fact that the hon. member for Lake Centre had said, "This committee is to stall and delay and procrastinate a decision."

Mr. Fulton: Let me say—

Mr. Sinclair: And so I had, of course, to show the Tories that this was not so, and so as chairman I took especial pains to expedite the work of the committee in every possible way.

I was very glad to have the very effective assistance of a very able clerk in the person of Mr. Burgess who worked long hours overtime, and the assistance of the king's printer, whose men worked at night so that we could have the report of proceedings on the following day, just as we receive the Hansard report of proceedings in the house.

Mr. Fulton: May I ask a question? I would like to ask what about the regard of the hon. member as to unanimous voting?

Mr. Sinclair: If the hon. member will allow me, I say it was unanimous, if only because that on the record there is no "on division" which the Tories always bawl out when anything displeases them.

Mr. Fulton: I want to point out that there is no record of any vote whatsoever. The hon. member is drawing on his imagination.

Mr. Sinclair: The hon. member's memory is faulty, because he and all other members will recall that my election as chairman was carried unanimously. I remember because I was delighted to have his support. But though the member for Lake Centre said the government was stalling and delaying it was the hon. member and his friends who delayed and obstructed the proceedings of the committee, in calling for more and more repetitive evidence from provincial and local retailers. It was he who with a straight face suggested that the T. Eaton Company should come and produce all their records. I doubt whether even this large chamber would have held all those records, and it would have taken the members of the committee years to even thumb through them.

Finally, despite the fact that the hon. member for Lake Centre accused the government of stalling and delaying this legislation, we find it is the hon. member for Kamloops, on behalf of the Tory party, who now offers real delay by moving that this bill be postponed for six months. Today hon. members in this house can judge who is stalling and delaying.

When our committee convened, the clerk of the committee wrote to all those trade groups who had publicly stated that they had made representations before the MacQuarrie committee. He wrote to those who had written to the Minister of Justice asking for a further hearing. Through the press we gave an invitation to all groups interested to file briefs which would be studied by the committee. At first we said that we would print some of those briefs, but in the end we printed all the briefs, for the information of all members and the general public.

We decided as a matter of policy to hear further from certain groups who had raised points in their briefs requiring further explanation. We faced a problem which is faced by every committee of this house which sits on a matter of national concern, the fact that so many people want to come forward with briefs which are largely repetitious. So we decided that in the main we would hear national organizations, and would hear provincial or local organizations only when they dissented from the briefs submitted by their parent national organization. Because we did not want to be accused of stalling and delaying we gave first preference to those who had asked for the committee to express their views against this legislation, the Retail Federation of Canada, the Canadian Manufacturers Association, the electrical manufacturers, the druggists, the jewelers, the beauty equipment manufacturers and the hardware people.

The groups which were for the legislation, the consumers, the housewives, the farmers, organized labour, very generously forbore demanding to be heard. They said they would stand on their briefs and on the evidence of Fred McGregor. They said that they would rather have legislation than be a party to stalling and delaying it. Because of these circumstances the press was filled with the story of those who were opposed to the legislation and as a result many people became utterly bewildered. The term resale price maintenance does not mean much to the man on the street. That was made quite clear by the lawyer for the hardware dealers who appeared before the committee. He said that as soon as he was appointed he went around to a lot of his friends and asked them how they felt about resale price maintenance and most of them said that they did not know what it was. Then he asked them how they felt about private price-fixing by the manufacturer and they were all against it. I think that is the attitude of the great majority of the people of Canada.

What is resale price maintenance? Resale price maintenance is the practice by which a large manufacturer tells the retailers at what price they must sell his goods so that all goods are sold at the same price by all retailers, big and small, efficient and inefficient, whether they sell for cash or whether they sell for credit. If they do not do that, then sanctions in some form are applied to bring them in line.

There is one interesting thing as far as the Combines Investigation Act is concerned. If the manufacturers get together in a back room and decide that such a retail price shall be the official price, that is obviously an illegal combine and it would be up to our efficient combines branch to commence proceedings against them. If all the retailers organized together, that would also be a combine. Because there would be more of them, it would be that much easier for our combines branch to find out. But if each manufacturer tells all his retailers at what price they are to sell, then it is easy for those manufacturers to get together informally without agreement and agree on this fixed price to the consumer. The effect on the consumer is the same, there is artificial fixing of prices at too high a level. That is really the case against resale price maintenance.

That is the case which was made against it in the British house. That is the case that was made against the great drug combine over there. The British have had some experience in this as this practice has developed to a much greater degree over there because of lack of legislation than in this country. There in many industries all the retailers have got together in a price fixing association. It was cases of that kind that brought about Lloyd Jacob's report; then a debate in the house; then a white paper announcing government policy against price maintenance and then a final debate in the house. I think perhaps the best evidence was given in the House of Commons by Sir Hartley Shawcross, who was then president of the board of trade, who read a letter which had been handed to him by a Conservative member of parliament. The letter reads:

Dear Sir:

I am writing to ask your help and advice; what I want to know is, is it an offence to sell cheap? I bought some hand cream to retail at 1s. 4d. a tube. After a while the price rose to 1s. 8d. I did not raise my price. A woman bought a tube from me at 1s. 4d. She had been sent in by the P.A.T. Association who reported me for not raising the price to 1s. 8d. A man from the P.A.T.A. told me that unless I raised my price to 1s. 8d. I would have my name placed on the P.A.T.A. stoplist and supplies would be stopped. My husband is a diabetic and unable to run my business. He is an ex-service man, 1914-18. Our seven sons served in the last war and some were wounded.

Then follows a comment which Sir Hartley Shawcross rightly considered to be inconsequential.

Needless to tell you that my husband, myself, and seven sons, and one daughter voted for you.

That is, voted Conservative.

That is the type of thing that was happening in Britain under more developed price fixing. When there were infringements of their private rules they withdrew all goods from a particular store. That is what they did in the case of this woman and they left her bankrupt against which she had no recourse at law. They also have a system of fines, they have a private code of law for those who offend against their rules, the sort of thing to which the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) referred to in his speech a little earlier.

Even here in Canada we have had organizations similar to the British P.A.T.A. We need constant vigilance to see that these evil practices are not started again. Despite the fact that we broke up the Canadian P.A.T.A., I should like to refer hon. members to the evidence given in the committee when the representative of the Canadian Pharmaceutical Association was there. The committee counsel asked Mr. Preston, secretary-manager of the association, certain questions, and I should like to refer to pages 137 and on. Referring to what they called the board of commercial interests, Mr. Preston said that the function of that board was to teach the members how to fix up their shops, how to merchandise better and so on. Then Mr. Phelan asked these questions:

Q. I notice you have not mentioned in that survey any interest in matters of price. Have they any interest in matters of price?
A. No, they have not.
Q. No?
A. No.
Q. Have they taken any part in seeking higher margins for the dealers?
A. No, not as a board.

Then the roof fell in on Mr. Preston. Counsel went on to place on the record many instances where this board of commercial interests had done exactly that, by quoting from articles in druggists trade journals. The first case referred to is to be found on page 139. That had to do with increasing the profit margin on Minard's liniment and Bromo-Seltzer achieved by the board of commercial interests. The next item dealt with was again a retail drug firm which was selling direct at discount to physicians in Saskatchewan, and the board forced this druggist to sell at the full maintained price. Next there was the one case in which the board of commercial interests was unsuccessful. This had to do with Nestle's. They were unable to get Nestle's to price fix their goods. This company considered they were a free enterprise and could sell their goods on the open market to whoever wanted to buy it, and sell it at a fair price.

Then there was a case in British Columbia where the bureau of commercial interests were asking for a 40 per cent mark-up on all drugs instead of a 33⅓ mark-up—that is on selling price. 33⅓ really means a return of 50 per cent on the investment, but they wanted a 40 per cent mark-up which is 66⅔ per cent mark-up on cost. The next case had to do with Pablum. The makers of this widely known baby food had indicated that they wanted to sell it in grocery stores but the bureau of commercial interests moved in on their quarry and stated that if they sold it in food stores as well as in drug stores they would cut out their whole line from the drug stores; they would put them under the counter and on the back shelves. That is what this bureau of commercial interests which Mr. Preston flatly stated had no interest in prices or mark-up was really doing.

[Mr. Sinclair.]

Hon. members should read pages 139 to 142 of the evidence of the committee. The thousands of decent druggists in this country will have no reason to be proud of that witness. True, he was not under oath, but he certainly did not tell the truth.

Mr. Fleming: You ought to be ashamed to make a statement like that.

Mr. Sinclair: The statement is on the record, as the hon. member knows.

Mr. Fleming: You are simply taking advantage of your parliamentary privilege.

Mr. Sinclair: In this bureau of commercial interests we have P.A.T.A. all over again fixing prices and mark-ups. This witness first said the bureau had no interest in prices or mark-ups and then six instances were placed on the record to show that they had publicly boasted of a very great interest. Mr. Preston was the editor of the magazine in which those articles had occurred. Mr. McGregor said that this practice is growing. In the case of the beauty equipment manufacturers, in 1945 less than half their goods were price-maintained, but now it is over 90 per cent. In the case of the electrical appliances, it is up to 80 per cent; drugs, 60 per cent; jewelry, from nothing to 90 per cent depending on the store; hardware, the percentage is quite small, just under 8 per cent.

The Canadian Retail Federation, which represents nationally all the group of retail merchant associations, appeared before the committee at three sessions. They admitted that their views were not unanimous. As a matter of fact Mr. Harris, their representative, was asked if they represented all retailers and he said they did not. Part of the question and the answer given on page 266 was as follows:

Do those members who do not agree with your position fall into any group or any category of retailers?
A. No. They constitute both large and small retailers. I do not know them by name.
Q. Are they a particular type of retailer, such as a department store, or just retailers?
A. No, they are just quite free-wheeling retailers.

They are the sort of real free enterprisers who have made business grow in Canada. All hon. members no doubt have received letters from retailers in their own ridings on this subject. I at the beginning of this committee hearing received just eight; six from druggists, one from a grocer and one from a hardware merchant. I have sent them all the proceedings of our committee. I knew of course of these panic letters which had been sent out by trade associations who create alarm now and again to justify their existence, but I was surprised to receive only eight letters as a result. So I wrote confidential letters to quite a number of other retailers in my riding whom I knew very well, because these letters on account of the fear of reprisals have to be in confidence as were many of the letters submitted to our committee. I asked them if they had received these alarming trade association letters, and if so, why they had not written me in protest, as directed. The answers I received can be divided into about three groups. Some of the little retailers up the coast in my riding said they did not know what resale price maintenance was all about and so didn't bother writing me. The second group said they did not care, they were always getting these panicky letters but they sold their goods for the price they could get for them. However, the third and largest group—and this is a very interesting thing—wrote me and said that they did not bother writing because they did not believe that Louis St. Laurent and the Liberal party were going to sell the small man down the river.

The retail federation in their evidence expressed great fear that the little man was going to be squeezed out by banning manufacturer's price fixing. Yet the figures of the dominion bureau of statistics put on the record by the Minister of Justice show beyond question that the little man is the most efficient retailer in Canada. The large corporation has its large overhead, its inflexible regulations and its much heavier taxes, because the Liberal government has given the small man a break and encouraged him by lower taxes. Most little stores are not companies. The owner only pays his ordinary personal income tax. When they get larger they incorporate but even then they pay only 20 per cent corporation tax on profits up to $10,000, and personal income tax as well. But the big boys, the chain stores and department stores, pay over 51 per cent corporation taxes on their profits and then personal income tax as well when these profits are paid out as dividends. That is the break which this government and the Minister of Finance have given small enterprise in Canada.

Another interesting thing is that in most retail businesses only a fraction of their trade is resale price maintained. The best example is the grocery stores. Less than one per cent of the goods in the ordinary food store are price maintained, and where are there more little men in business than in the food stores? Where are there better merchandising techniques than in the modern food store, and where is the mark-up less? They are an example of what real free trade can mean. If the little retailers are more efficient why are they worried? The reason they are worried is because of the big discounts given by manufacturers to large retailers. Those manufacturers who came before our committee shedding crocodile tears over the little retailers have the solution right in their hands, the solution suggested by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar. Let them set prices not to the consumer but to the retailer. If they sell at the same price to the big man and the little man, as does the wheat board, for example, then the little man can make the most of his extra efficiency. The remedy is in their own hands.

Then of course there was fear expressed about loss leaders. It was very interesting that loss leaders were never exactly defined for the committee by any of the witnesses before us. They were variously defined as less than the laid-down cost, less than cost plus overhead, less than cost plus the full mark-up, but one thing was established, namely, that loss leaders are the product of resale price maintenance in the great bulk of the goods on the market. The jewelers' association spokesman came before the committee and slapped down twenty-five pages of bargains out of one issue of the Toronto Star to show that there was ample opportunity for competition in the field which is not resale price-maintained, a great argument to the consumers for free trade. It is only when a uniform manufacturers' fixed price across the country is dropped by one retailer that it suddenly appears because of its uniqueness as a very attractive bargain and so becomes a loss leader.

The head of the retail federation said it was not ethical to use the profits on the sale of other goods to hammer down the price of one particular price maintained product. The question arises of course: What is the reward for efficiency? With our retailers, as with everything else, we have very efficient retailers, retailers of average efficiency and some who are not so efficient. With fixed prices how can the efficient retailer pass on to his consumers the advantage of his efficiency? That question was asked of the representative of the Canadian Manufacturers Association, and his answer, to be found at page 577 of the proceedings of the committee, was as follows:

> If you are maintaining a price, as long as you do maintain that price, then the retailer can neither pass along to the consumer the benefits of his efficiency or the penalties of his inefficiency.

The hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Jutras) asked the same question of the head of the retail federation. He wanted to know how the efficient retailer can pass on to his consumers the benefits of his efficiency. The head of the retail federation answered in this fashion, as found at page 268 of the proceedings of the committee:

> Very easily indeed, on the items which are not price-maintained. He is going to give the people that benefit.

It is apparently unethical to take profits from other lines and lower prices on resale price maintained lines. That is loss leadering according to the retail federation. But it is apparently quite ethical to take the excess profits of the efficient merchant under resale price maintenance and then, according to the head of the retail federation, lower the prices of those goods which are competing openly on the market without price fixing. Very curious ethics!

There was an argument advanced by one C.C.F. member—and he did not speak for his party—and by the Tory members that resale price maintenance, price-fixing by manufacturers, is just the same thing as labour unions getting together and establishing a flat rate of wages, or the same as the farm support boards setting floor prices for agricultural products. I say on behalf of the Liberal party first of all that the Liberal party has never regarded labour as a commodity to be priced like a bag of sugar or a bag of potatoes. The second thing is that the labour employer, the buyer of the service, and the labour union, the seller of the service, come face to face under government legislation, approved either by parliament or by the legislatures where the public has an interest, and agree on the price which they are going to pay and receive for labour. If they cannot agree then we have, again through public legislation, the process of conciliation and arbitration. The same is true with farm boards where the government, whether it be the federal government or a provincial government, sets up the boards for the public, and on each of them the consumer has representation. But the manufacturer fixing prices in the back room gives the consumer no representation. If there is going to be any price fixing done, then, as the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar said, it should be done under public legislation by the government and not by the manufacturers in back rooms.

The next point raised was the rigidity of resale price maintenance. Of course the funny thing is that resale price maintenance, which is so important to some manufacturers, was shown to us to be certainly not rigid. Let me give you some evidence. The electrical manufacturers said there was no control on the value of trade-ins and therefore the retailer who wants to give a fictitiously high value for a trade-in can do so. Seventy-five per cent of the retail electrical trade accepts trade-ins and so by giving high trade-in values they effectively lower the manufacturer's fixed price to the consumer. At page 325 of the proceedings of the committee Mr. Longestaff of the electrical manufacturers said:

> If you went into any retailer and wanted to buy an appliance he would give you 10 per cent or 15 per cent off if you did not tell anybody.

Mr. Fleming: Don't forget he was a Liberal candidate in the last general election.

Mr. Sinclair: He was a representative of the electrical manufacturers when he was here. He was not speaking as a Liberal candidate.

Mr. Fleming: Nevertheless he was a Liberal candidate.

Mr. Sinclair: The manager of the Canadian Jewellers Association said the same thing. At page 682 of the proceedings of the committee he said:

> I think when a customer goes into a store the retailer will make his own arrangements with him; and if the customer says: "I want my cash discount," I think the average retailer would give it to him and not turn him away.

A little farther on he said:

> If you were my cash customer and you said: "I want my 6 per cent cash discount," I would say that as a retailer I would be terribly stupid if I did not give it to you in spite of price maintenance. The only harm in price cutting is in the advertising of it.

I want to speak on behalf of the ordinary Canadian purchaser. We have been reared not to barter like Arabs in eastern bazaars but to go to the store and pay the price which is shown. What advantage is it to that decent person to know that under this present system of price maintenance, less honourable people can go to a jeweler and haggle and get 10 or 15 per cent reduction on resale price-maintained goods or 5 or 6 per cent discount for cash "as long as nobody knows". I want to speak too for the honest merchant who, having a contract to fix prices with the manufacturer, does not chisel by giving discounts to demanding customers "as long as nobody knows about it". That leads us to this very interesting point about Eaton's brief. We had before the committee Mr. Hougham, whom the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) has well described as one of the ablest witnesses to appear before the committee. When asked why Eaton's had submitted such a brief he said, as recorded at page 767 of the proceedings of the committee:

> . . . I would think one of the reasons they are opposed to resale price maintenance is that it is not effective, it is not completely effective. In other words, in order that they might be protected themselves from price competition they would have to, and do, employ a very considerable shopping force to watch their competitors to see that their competitors' prices are comparable with theirs, and for that reason they do not want to be tied to a contract which binds them but does not effectively bind their competitors.

You could not go into these big stores and haggle over resale price maintenance and get a discount "provided nobody was looking." Yet these stores must compete against those who, while subscribing to price fixing, will do this, "provided nobody is looking."

The major effects of this legislation will be to strengthen the Combines Investigation Act. That is the opinion of both the past and present combines commissioners. There are two secondary effects—and I say they are secondary effects—on the cost of living. One is immediate. Free competition in this country will undoubtedly reduce some of these resale price-maintained prices, which are unduly high. It was defended of course in the committee on the ground that the resale price maintenance percentage mark-up is lower than on free trade goods. Of course one other thing was pointed out, namely, that on resale price-maintained goods the manufacturer does the advertising. In other goods the retailer has to do the advertising, and so obviously should get a bigger mark-up. But it is not percentage mark-ups that are important to the consumer; it is the price he pays. It was pointed out by many witnesses that accurate comparisons are difficult; in the vast field of consumer goods in Canada there are so many varying stores, varying conditions of sale and varying qualities. We have, however, three good comparisons. The first one is that of the United States. It was pointed out that in the United States of America there are three free trade states and forty-five states where price maintenance is the law and so identical goods are sold under both conditions. That has been dealt with already. A very fine article appeared in the American magazine Fortune, which is not the voice of big business, but it is certainly the mirror of big business in the United States. In the issue of January, 1949, which is in the library, there was a leading article entitled: "The Not-so-fair-trade-laws." It points out, as stated by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) that a comparison between Maryland and Washington, a free trade state and a non-free trade state, showed that of 117 branded drug items 35 per cent cost about one-third less in Washington than in Maryland; 38 about a quarter less; and 29 about one-seventh less. In the druggists' own brief at page 543 they compare price-fixed Kansas and free-trade Missouri. They show Phillips' milk of magnesia, 21 cents in Missouri, 49 cents in Kansas; Zonite, 59 cents in Missouri, 79 cents in Kansas; Murine, 34 cents in Missouri, 49 cents in Kansas; Bromo-Seltzer, 39 cents in Missouri, 57 cents in Kansas; Anacin, 89 cents in Missouri, 98 cents in Kansas. They point out that as a result of that the Kansas housewives, veterans and consumer organizations are on the march. Well they might be!

The second example is right here in Canada. The province of Newfoundland, before union, did not enjoy the blessing of resale price maintenance, but when they came into union they got it. And as the Newfoundland co-operative brief pointed out, the prices in every line except cars rose immediately when resale price maintenance was applied to Newfoundland and so they had a royal commission on this matter. The hon. member for Burin-Burgeo (Mr. Carter), and I hope the members of the Conservative party from St. John's as well, will speak further on this. Let me give you one example. The ordinary little ignition battery used by fishermen there before union cost the retailer 45½ cents landed, and he sold it for 60 cents. After union it cost him a cent more, 46½ cents, but resale price maintenance, this great benefit to the consumer, got the price up to 80 cents. That is quite a price to pay for resale price maintenance.

Mr. Fraser: There is a sales tax on there, too.

Mr. Sinclair: That is the landed price to the retailer including taxes. Then here in Canada I have a comparison between goods which are exactly comparable. Professor Fuller, an expert witness for the druggists, pointed out that because of our federal drugs act all drugs must meet the same standard and that Bayer's aspirin is the same thing as salicylic acid. On Bayer's aspirin the retailer gets a 22·68 per cent mark-up, but on the same article under a non-brand name he gets a 50 per cent mark-up. That is very good, but the only trouble is that Bayer's aspirin sells for 79 cents a hundred and the same thing in the non-resale price maintained goods sells for 19 cents a hundred. The consumer could save 60 cents on that, but the consumer never has a chance because the resale price maintained goods are the goods which are on the counter for the consumer and the others are under the counter.

Mr. Fleming: No evidence of that.

Mr. Sinclair: The second effect on the cost of living of course is the long range effect. If this legislation strengthens, as Mr. McGregor says it will, as Maxwell Fyfe says it will, as Mr. MacDonald our present combines commissioner says it will, if it strengthens the Combines Investigation Act by making the prosecution more effective, we will be able to stop the practice of those combines whose purpose is to get higher and higher prices from the consumer, preventing new techniques and new inventions which might destroy existing products.

On this question, the greatest authority in Canada on combines, the man who has beaten them, came before this committee and said that the abolition of resale price maintenance will do just that. That man of course is Mr. McGregor, who was combines commissioner for 25 years. He was requested by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) at page 670 of Hansard as follows:

> Let us bring in Mr. McGregor because I am sure that if his lips are unbridled, if he comes in unhobbled by any consideration other than to help the committee, he will make some revelations that will be most interesting and I am sure most helpful in suggesting effective amendments to the act.

A little later on he said:

> He is the number one man in this business if we want to get at the facts.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, for the purpose of the record I think it is proper that it should be pointed out that the quotation that has been read with its customary clarity related to the argument that this committee should be dealing with the whole question of the combines act and not with this limited subject.

Mr. Sinclair: The leader of the opposition as usual is wrong, because this quotation is taken from the earlier part of his remarks before he developed the theme about having a complete combines investigation. Having established this in the first part then he went into the theme about having a complete investigation.

Mr. Fulton: That was the whole point.

Mr. Sinclair: I hope you are taking note of the interruptions, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Hees: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member's time has almost expired.

Mr. Drew: There is lots of time.

Mr. Sinclair: Thank you.

Mr. Knowles: Let him know.

Mr. Sinclair: However, I want to turn—

Mr. Speaker: My point is that the hon. member for Broadview can ask a question only with the consent of the hon. member who has the floor.

Mr. Sinclair: I will give my consent at the end when there will be no argument about time. I will gladly say that he was the strongest member of the Progressive Conservative party, and in the committee he was most insistent that Mr. McGregor be called before the committee. Well, Mr. McGregor came before the committee. The hon. member for Broadview was the first questioner on my list when Mr. McGregor finished his evidence. I said: "All right, Mr. Hees, have you your questions ready?", and he passed. He said "I think Mr. McGregor has answered all my questions". But that night he got back amongst his Tory colleagues and they straightened him out on that and got him back to stall and delay. The following day he then did have some questions to ask.

Let me say that no members of this house should vote on this legislation without reading the evidence of Mr. McGregor because he is certainly, as the hon. member for Lake Centre said, the number one man, and his evidence, garnered not out of academic theories, but from 25 years of fighting these great combines on behalf of the people of Canada and fighting them successfully, warrants him the hearing he got.

In the experience of the oldest committee clerk in this house, the oldest reporters in this house and the oldest members of parliament who heard his evidence through, they say that never had a more objective and more powerful brief been presented to a parliamentary committee.

Let me in conclusion turn in summary to those who are supporting this legislation. On behalf of the consumer, the man who is almost completely forgotten in all the arguments put forward by the retailer and the manufacturer, first of all the two combines commissioners, Mr. McGregor for 25 years and Mr. MacDonald for 2 years, both in their briefs, both in examination before the committee, supported this legislation as being helpful in strengthening the Combines Investigation Act; the royal commission on prices; the MacQuarrie committee; organized labour in Canada, as represented by the four great labour congresses—the Trade and Labour Congress, the Canadian Congress of Labour, the Catholic unions of Quebec and the Railway Brotherhoods—their briefs are at pages 73, 377, 546 and 551 of the proceedings; the farmers of Canada through their great voice the Canadian Federation of Agriculture. Their brief pointed out that the farmers and the fishermen are caught twice by resale price maintenance, not only as consumers but as producers. The great industries in my riding, when they buy equipment, go direct to the manufacturer and escape price fixing; but the little producer, the farmer and the fisherman, the little fellow, goes to the retailer for his equipment to produce and the very goods he buys for his production, the tractor, the twine, the engine for his fishing boats, his nets, and so on, are sold under resale price maintenance. Yet the farmer and fisherman must sell in the open markets of the world where there is no resale price maintenance. The housewives of Canada are for this legislation through their representatives, the National Council of Women and through the able brief of the consumers association of Canada; and the housewives of Canada really know about prices. The great co-operatives of this country who have done so much for the farming and fishing communities are for this, as are also the Saskatchewan wheat pool. All these people are for this legislation. The majority of manufacturers in Canada who do not practise resale price maintenance, who are real free enterprisers, who go out on the open markets of the world selling their goods in the face of world competition, are not for this resale price maintenance. All they want is the right to suggest prices, and the right also to enforce maximum prices so retailers cannot gouge the public in times of scarcity as they have in the past.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member's time has expired.

Mr. Drew: I hope that ample time will be allowed members in this debate, because it is going to continue for a long time.

Mr. Knowles: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, if we give unanimous consent to one side we shall have to give it to the other. I do not think the hon. member should continue for more than a sentence or two.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Two minutes?

Mr. Sinclair: The Canadian Chamber of Commerce shows a diversity of opinion, because they are the ones who have been strongest against government price control and so realize they cannot advocate private price control. At their conference in Quebec, since they were against government price fixing they could not endorse manufacturers' price fixing. Many, many of the retailers of this country giving good service to their customers are also for this legislation, and the three political parties of the people, the Liberal party, the C.C.F. party and the Social Credit party, are with them against manufacturers price fixing.

Who are against this legislation? Some retailers who were frightened by the panicky letters they received from their trade associations crying havoc and ruin. Some retailers remember the terrible days under the Tories of 1930-35, and believe that resale price maintenance has saved them from that condition today. It is not resale price maintenance which has saved them from a return to those days, it is the great policies of the Liberal party since that time. These policies have caused every year since 1935 increasing employment, ever increasing social security, a better break in taxation for the little retailer and greatly increasing industrial expansion. Today as a consequence we find our currency is the second hardest in the world, the real acid test of any economy.

Who are those who are against it? A few reactionary manufacturers who have loudly proclaimed at endless board of trade meetings their allegiance to free enterprise, that is for everyone else, but who want iron-clad protection through fixed prices themselves, and that party which, since the days of the family compact, has been the historic friend of privilege, monopoly and reaction, the Tory party.

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the house has welcomed the relaxation provided by the matinee performance which has just been concluded. It was an extraordinary histrionic performance. It will not be hard for those who have any claim to open minds on this subject to realize, after the performance we have just witnessed, how utterly hopeless it was in that parliamentary committee to try to obtain a fair hearing for both sides of the question. We have had a great conglomeration of distorted references to evidence, abuse of witnesses, etc., all of which is in keeping with the sort of thing we witnessed in that committee day in and day out at the hands of the same hon. gentleman.

Now, sir, I wish to begin with the MacQuarrie committee report. I remind the house that that committee was appointed to study the whole Combines Investigation Act and its operations. It was not the committee's idea that it should be called upon to divorce one particular segment of the problem from the whole, and make an interim report on that. This was the government's idea. I invite hon. members to consider the circumstances under which that report was made. Let us recall that the government has been under strong attack for a long time over its failure to grapple with the problems rising in the wake of the high cost of living and inflation. Having done nothing in that direction, as a matter of fact having heaped fuel on the fires of inflation by their outrageous taxation policies, the government was looking about for some means of distracting public attention. Apparently one member of the government came up with what he was sure was a bright idea.

That hon. minister had need of a bright idea, particularly on this subject. After parliament had been summoned a hurry-up call was put through to the MacQuarrie committee asking that committee to bring in an interim report on this one particular subject, detached from the remainder of the considerations of the Combines Investigation Act, and so with great speed that committee wrote this report. The haste in the writing of the report is reflected in almost every line of it. It is reflected most of all, I think, in the clear departure contemplated by this report from the essential principle of the Combines Investigation Act, to which I hope to return later in my remarks. We see this report going forward to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) who, as I have said, had some special reason for wanting to come up with a bright idea about the Combines Investigation Act because of the way in which he himself in 1949 had committed a flagrant and outrageous breach of that act, which breach continued for a year or more and made him the No. 1 lawbreaker in Canada. It was not thought such a bad idea, apparently, for him to come up with some proposal that would make it appear as though he were going to do something constructive under the Combines Investigation Act. The stage was carefully set on the eve of the opening of parliament.

When we look at this report from the MacQuarrie committee we see, in the first place, that it is open to two very strong criticisms. No one can read that report without concluding that it is merely a catalogue of opinions. There is no evidence in that report, and that is the first obvious weakness. Mr. McGregor said the committee had before it no statistical evidence. We do not know what they had before them or what they had not, because in this report they have not told us what evidence they had before them.

The second great weakness of this report is that it simply sidesteps the problem of loss leaders. The MacQuarrie committee recognized the formidable nature of this problem of loss leaders, and in the concluding paragraph of the report they say:

> As to the "loss leader" device, the committee believes that it is a monopolistic practice which does not promote general welfare and therefore considers that it is not compatible with the public interest.

The MacQuarrie committee stopped there. They have brought forward no recommendations for coping with the formidable problem of the loss leader. They did not do so, sir, for the interesting reason which is to be found in the final sentence of the report:

> . . . and the committee, therefore, does not think it imperative to make an immediate and hasty recommendation regarding that practice.

If the MacQuarrie committee would have regarded it as hasty to try to formulate some recommendations for coping with the problem of loss leaders, then what is to be said of the way this report has been jammed through a parliamentary committee, and now the government is attempting to thrust it down our throats?

Apart from the lack of any policy to cope with this great problem of the loss leader, what weight is to be attached to this report? In cases of this kind one naturally looks with respect at the authors. One wishes to attribute to a report of this kind whatever measure of authority stands behind such individuals as compose the committee. As to the fact that one member of the committee was a judge, I think it is not unusual that the opinions of judges are subject to appeal; but when those opinions or judgments go before a court of appeal the conclusions are weighed in the light of the evidence. No member of this House of Commons can today form an intelligent judgment of the MacQuarrie committee's report because we do not know what evidence, if any, that committee had before it on which it based those conclusions.

As to the learned professors who composed the balance of the personnel of the committee, especially when hon. members like the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Croll) invited the committee to sit down and accept without question anything that fell from the lips or pens of these eminent gentlemen, I think it is only fair to observe that anybody working under the pressure that apparently this committee was obliged to, under the direction from the government of September 10, could easily make mistakes. There is not, I think, any of these gentlemen who can claim to be infallible. I think it is only fair to observe that men working under pressure, whether of time or of an importunate and ambitious minister of the crown, can easily make mistakes.

How practical is the report? The authority of the report depends to some extent on the experience of the authors, and I think it is only fair to observe in passing that if this report has to stand on the strength of the opinion of the authorities and has no evidence to support it, then we can only observe in all fairness that none of these worthy gentlemen has had any experience in merchandising; and certainly one of them was out of the country all last summer and was quite busy when he got back to Kingston in September, and I greatly doubt if he had much time to devote to the writing of this report.

I said in the committee, and I say it in the House of Commons, that given the evidence on this important question of resale price maintenance the members of the House of Commons, with their training, with the technique they have of applying their minds to political and economic questions, and with their experience, are just as capable of forming an intelligent conclusion on a question that has both economic and political aspects to it as are any members of any royal commission.

I therefore say to you, sir, that the House of Commons ought to have the evidence on this question. The House of Commons has not been given the evidence. There is not a member of this house who can claim, in making the decision which the government asks him to make, that he is making an informed decision in the light of evidence and facts. If he does so he is flying in the face of truth. The fact of the matter is—and it is crystal clear after what has happened in these recent days—that the government's minds were made up before this report was ever received. They were simply looking for an opportunity to buttress a recommendation that was being written into the throne speech. They might just as well have foregone the parliamentary committee because their minds were made up before that committee was ever appointed.

It is not unfair to comment, sir, that it was the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson), when he was meeting the people who were coming before him with complaints, problems and protests about what the government was doing, who cooed away in their ears and said to them; "You have nothing to fear from this. Coldwell is pushing us hard for price control and we must have something that we can hold out in front of the people. This is what we are going to do. It will not hurt you. You just be quiet, and this is what we will dangle out in front of the people." That is the sort of birth this ugly child has had.

Mr. Garson: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, may I say that neither my hon. friend nor any other human being is able to adduce any shred of evidence in support of these statements that he has just libellously attributed to me.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Coast-Capilano talked about evidence he had but which he did not dare bring out because of the fear of reprisals. That is the kind of evidence which I have just quoted here. I am not going to belabour the Minister of Justice because we know that he has a notoriously short memory. He forgot about a report for a whole year.

This MacQuarrie report has about it these aspects which invited the comment of the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada upon it in these words: it was a contrived argument to support a preconception.

What of the parliamentary committee? What of this joint committee of both houses of parliament? This was understood to be a response on the part of the government to the outcry of those who were condemned otherwise without trial; and so the offer of a trial was held out. It proved to be a pretence. The kind of hearing that was afforded to those interested, those who were condemned without trial otherwise, in that committee, I say to you, sir, would not do justice to and would not reflect credit on any parliamentary system. As a matter of fact, what is it that distinguishes our conceptions of parliamentary institutions or our ideas of justice from those currently in vogue in China or in Russia? Surely it is that we give people a fair hearing and try to arrive at a just decision. Both those features of justice were lacking in this case.

Those who came before the parliamentary committee received neither a fair hearing nor a just decision, as reflected in the report of the committee. I have been in this house long enough, sitting as an opposition member and facing a Liberal government, to know that a parliamentary committee is not like a court of law. You cannot expect the same kind of adherence to justice in a parliamentary committee dominated by a Liberal majority. Nevertheless, surely the public expects of parliamentary committees something better than the sham and travesty that was perpetrated in the name of justice and parliamentary institutions in this case in this committee, for a sham and a travesty it was.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Fleming: There are two people who to the end of time will bear the principal responsibility before the bar of history for making out of that committee a sham, a travesty, and a miscarriage of justice. The one is the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson); the other is the loquacious member for Coast-Capilano (Mr. Sinclair). If ever a question was prejudged before it saw the light of day or before it was referred to a parliamentary committee, it was this question. It is no better than communist procedure, surely, if the question is prejudged before the hearing even commences. The government prejudged this question, and the proceedings of this committee will ever remain a dark blot on the parliamentary processes of this country. Of all the parliamentary committees that it has been my privilege—

Mr. Garson: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, may I say that my hon. friend is making some extremely serious charges against the hon. member for Coast-Capilano and myself. I wonder if he will, before he takes his seat, quote any shred of evidence from the recorded proceedings of the committee in proof of those charges?

Mr. Fleming: I wonder if the Minister of Justice would like me to take up some more of my time in reading long extracts from the evidence? I shall be glad to furnish him or any other member of the house with ample extracts to prove and buttress every statement I am making here this afternoon. Of all the parliamentary committees on which I have sat in six years in this house, this one unquestionably was the worst, in terms of the way it was handled and in terms of the way procedure was wrenched and distorted in order to serve the political ends of the government.

Mr. Lesage: You were not there all the time.

Mr. Fleming: I was there every time the committee sat except when I had to leave in order to attend another committee that was sitting simultaneously; and I addressed myself to my duties on this committee with, I think, the same conscientiousness with which I have sought to address myself to my duties on all committees on which I have sat in this house. If the hon. member for Montmagny-L'Islet (Mr. Lesage) will be honest with himself and with me he will recognize that fact.

Mr. Lesage: I just said that the hon. member was not there all the time, and he agrees.

Mr. Fleming: I have just explained any short absence of mine from any meeting, and I have told the hon. member that I have made a point of closely following the evidence in this case. When I speak of the rotten injustices perpetrated in this committee—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Fleming: —by the chairman of that committee, I am speaking only of that which I saw with my own eyes, Mr. Speaker; make no mistake about that. This committee operated under the domination of the government. It was a complete sham.

Mr. Sinclair: As chairman of the committee, I think I owe a certain obligation to the other members who were on the committee. I will discharge that obligation by pointing out that even on those days when the hon. member was there he never at any time complained about these rotten injustices of which he is now complaining.

Mr. Fleming: There is not a fragment of truth in what the hon. member has said.

[Mr. Garson.]

Mr. Garson: On a question of privilege, I think my hon. friend should either withdraw that statement he has just made, or quote from the evidence of the committee to prove it. Either one of the two: Withdraw, or prove it.

Mr. Fleming: I will not withdraw one iota of what I said. I will make my speech as I want to make it, and the Minister of Justice is not going to reconstruct my speech for me.

Mr. Garson: If my hon. friend has no respect for his parliamentary duties, then he should have some respect for his integrity as a citizen and prove the libellous statements he makes.

Mr. Drew: May I suggest that the minister remain quiet and wait until he has his opportunity to reply.

Mr. Speaker: Doubtless a great deal of heat has been generated in this debate. I have allowed hon. members to express themselves freely. I did not understand the hon. member for Eglinton to accuse anybody of telling what is not true. He meant to say, I think, that it was not a fact. However, the hon. member realizes that he cannot accuse another hon. member of knowingly uttering an untruth. I did not think he did say that.

Mr. Fleming: I did not use the word "wilfully". The word "untrue" is quite parliamentary. I did not use the word "false".

Mr. Garson: My hon. friend said that two members in question were guilty of rotten injustices. I would like him to prove that from the evidence, or withdraw it.

Mr. Fleming: If the minister will be good enough to sit down, after speaking for two and a half hours yesterday, he will get enough evidence of the injustices that were perpetrated.

Mr. Speaker: I must not allow this to go on. As I say, a good deal of heat has been generated, and I did allow some expressions to go. However I suggest to the hon. member that "rotten injustices" is hardly parliamentary.

Mr. Fleming: If what I have said is unparliamentary I will withdraw it, and substitute the words "gross and unseemly and unpardonable injustice."

Now, I wish to make it clear that we members of the official opposition went into that committee with an open mind on the subject. We asked that Mr. McGregor be called. You would think that Mr. McGregor had suddenly become a saint today. Perhaps the government should be reminded that it was because of the cloud this government cast upon him that he tendered his resignation two years ago, because as a self-respecting citizen he would not submit any longer to the indignities cast upon him by this government. We of the official opposition wanted to have the evidence of Mr. McGregor, with his long experience. We make no apology for asking that he testify. Let those apologize rather who were responsible for refusing to hear other people who were entitled to appear before the parliamentary committee, and who thus prevented justice being done in the name of the Canadian people.

And, sir, the committee got under way. The prevailing idea at first was that we would preserve balance. The idea was that we would hear those in favour of resale price maintenance and also hear those against it. The hon. member for Kamloops and I sat in on the steering committee and it was decided that we would alternate the witnesses, first one opposed to price maintenance, then one favouring it, so that this committee would have a balanced presentation, and so that through the press the public would have a balanced report.

The first organization called was already on record as against resale price maintenance. I refer to the Canadian Congress of Labour. The alternating of witnesses in this manner was proceeded with for a few days, until there was a meeting of the steering committee after the first week or ten days. By that time it had become clear that we could not hope to conclude the work upon which we were embarked. The fact was clearly conceded by the representatives of the other parties present when the chairman, who was in a more responsible mood than today, said, "If we do not push this through to a conclusion at this session you fellows"—and he turned to my friend from Kamloops and myself—"will be criticizing us for not pushing it through." We said "No", that the committee could not be criticized if it did not fully accomplish what was an impossible task, at this session, although criticism could attach to the government for starting on something that had not been properly considered before it was begun, and it would have to take the responsibility and the criticism for that.

The chairman said he would talk with the minister about it, come back and make a report. That was at the end of one week. It must have been a hectic weekend in the Liberal party, because when the committee assembled at the first of the next week all was changed. We were told that this committee was going to report at this session. We were told that from that point on there would be no time to hear both sides of the question. We were told there would be no opportunity to appear afforded to those who had put in briefs in opposition to resale price maintenance. We were told that a deadline would be fixed for the conclusion of the hearing, and that it did not matter from that point on how much we protested—we, of the official opposition, those of us who wanted to hear both sides of the question and get all the facts—we were told it did not matter. Taking his instructions from the government, through the Minister of Justice, the chairman of the committee applied the guillotine. From that time on the chairman of the committee functioned as a guillotinist; and he did it under the direction of the Minister of Justice.

If that is justice, then we think we had better recast in this House of Commons, very soon, our idea of justice.

Mr. Garson: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, with respect to the statement that my hon. friend has just made, that I instructed the chairman of the committee as he has said: That is contrary to the fact, and I am asking him to withdraw it.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member must accept the minister's word.

Mr. Fleming: Very well. I will accept the minister's word; I will indeed. But it amazes me just how subtle governmental influence can be. It may be that the minister, as a member of the committee, thought it was good policy that he should not personally try to exert those subtle influences. Nevertheless those subtle influences were exerted. And it was very apparent, and very rapid indeed was the reaction of the chairman of the committee. No, the government could not have asked for a better chore boy to do their job, to do their political chores, than the chairman of this committee proved himself to be. And he certainly has laid this government under a debt of gratitude to him for the way he guillotined the proceedings of the committee.

What is the result with which we are faced here? What is the result of this abuse of parliamentary proceedings, in a desperate effort to improve the political fortunes of the government, and to retrieve the political fortunes of the Minister of Justice? First, the evidence, if any, before the MacQuarrie committee was withheld from the committee. Second those who were called before the committee were not sufficiently heard. Their time, as well as the time of the individual members of the committee, was rationed. In the third place, there were many who applied to be heard and who were refused permission. Many of them represented retail interests and associations in this country. They represented retail merchants, numbering thousands of people in the ranks. Then, in addition, there were those who did not appear before the committee and who did not apply for hearing because they realized the futility of it, in the light of the ruling which had been made.

Then there were the simple-minded people like myself who asked that representatives of the dominion bureau of statistics should be called before the committee so that we might have all available statistical evidence concerning this country. But that suggestion was pooh-poohed. There was not time, they said, to listen to the bureau of statistics, though we listened to the Minister of Justice yesterday reciting statistics from the bureau of statistics. Yet we were told in the committee these matters were so trivial that we should not listen to them at all.

Then there were many supporters of resale price maintenance who should have been called, but were not called. I think this house ought to know the reason we did not hear from these people supporting resale price maintenance.

We had the viewpoint of important consumer organizations, of the Canadian Congress of Labour and the Trades and Labour Congress. We could have had also representatives of some of the bigger interests in the merchandising field. The T. Eaton Company had made their position public at an early date, a position which must have given great comfort to the government. Why were not they called? We of the official opposition asked that Eaton's should be called to give their reasons. They undoubtedly would be informed reasons for supporting the proposed ban on retail price maintenance. But the committee sided with the government to apply the guillotine in order to prevent the committee from having the evidence of T. Eaton Company Limited, the largest departmental store in Canada. Our attempts in the opposition to make that committee really effective for the purpose of obtaining information were thwarted by the majority on the committee.

The hon. member for Coast-Capilano in one of his most fanciful flights today talked about obstruction on the committee. I submit that the greatest obstructionists that have ever been seen in the House of Commons were those submissive, obedient members of that committee who obeyed all the wishes of the government and obstructed the hearing by that committee of evidence bearing on this question such as any intelligent and conscientious member would want to have before being called upon to make his decision. Therefore, as far as I am concerned—

Mr. McIlraith: On a point of order, surely hon. members who were not on this committee do not have to hear—

Mr. Casselman: Go outside then.

[Mr. Fleming.]

Mr. McIlraith: Surely they do not have to hear a member who has become heated about this subject use terms which impute obstruction and dishonesty to his parliamentary colleagues in the House of Commons who happened to sit on the committee. He may differ as sharply as he wishes with what that committee did and with—

Mr. Fraser: Is this a question of privilege?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member is speaking on a point of order.

Mr. McIlraith: I am rising on a point of order, and I am adhering strictly to it. Surely the hon. member has not the right to impute dishonesty to his fellow colleagues. He has done that directly. I rise on a point of order to make that protest. I noted that the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) abused the rules a few minutes ago when he deliberately made a wrong reference in referring to another hon. member of this house. There are rules in this house, and surely they should be observed.

Mr. Fulton: Why should this dissertation be allowed to take place?

Mr. McIlraith: I am asking the Speaker to enforce the rules of the house, and I draw to his attention that there has been a charge of dishonesty on the part of the hon. member for Eglinton in connection with his fellow members on a committee of the House of Commons.

Mr. Fleming: I did not charge dishonesty.

Mr. Drew: I should like to point out that some of us may be a little surprised that the hon. member who has just spoken has taken it on himself to advise you as to your duty, Mr. Speaker. It is for you to say whether I have abused the rules or not. I think the remarks that have been made are sheer effrontery under the circumstances.

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. member for Eglinton has accused any hon. member of the house of dishonesty—I did not catch his expression—it would not be parliamentary and he would have to withdraw it.

Mr. Fleming: I can assure you that I did not impute dishonesty to any member of the house. I did impute a great deal of deliberate obstruction in the committee by the government majority on the committee.

Therefore, for these reasons I for one cannot accept the report of the MacQuarrie committee without evidence which would enable me to test the validity of its conclusions. I am not prepared to do anything to condone the gagging of this parliamentary committee and the suppression by the majority on that committee of necessary evidence. I recognize that this question of resale price maintenance is a very large and important question and therefore it should have careful and ample consideration. The course that has been followed here by the government in gagging the committee is calculated to prevent any fair assessment of the arguments that have been submitted.

When we are asked by hon. members, as we were by the hon. member for Coast-Capilano in his flight of oratory this afternoon, to picture resale price maintenance as being a vicious system today, I invite him to remember, because evidently his memory needs some jogging, that this practice has grown up and reached its present extent largely during the lifetime of the present government. It did so while a man was Prime Minister in this country who claimed to be the father of the Combines Investigation Act and who looked with no little favour and respect upon Mr. McGregor. I just ask hon. members of the house, before they get too far over the brink on this question, before they go too far in their denunciation of resale price maintenance, to recall that the practice grew up under the government of the late Mr. Mackenzie King, who manifested a great interest in combines. If the practice is as vicious as the hon. member for Coast-Capilano pictured it to be this afternoon, I wonder what has been going on in this house since 1935. Did we have to wait until the arrival of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) in the house to come up with the discovery of this problem in all its iniquity, as it was described to us today? Is he the only man who has recognized the problem at all? Is he the only man who has been able to diagnose it and see it in its true dark light? Is he the only man who is capable of conceiving a solution? Is he the only man that has been at all on his job? If so, why was not something done from 1935 to 1949, if the facts were as they have been put before us this afternoon; and I for one say that they are not.

In view of the way hon. members opposite have helped to exhaust my time by their interruptions I am simply going to make a few assertions as to the effect of the limited evidence that was received.

First, the practice of resale price maintenance has grown up as a defence of small retailers against the pressure of big interests. It is not a practice dictated or defended by so-called big interests. Mr. McGregor made it quite clear that the practice is wanted by the retailers, rather than the manufacturers. The Minister of Justice talks about the expensive establishment, on the one hand, and the plain cash and carry store, on the other. He got a little bit confused. Apparently the plain cash and carry stores are the chain stores, and undoubtedly they will take great comfort from what the Minister of Justice said yesterday.

Second, the principal danger against which resale price maintenance protects the small retailer is the practice of loss leaders. It is the branded, price-maintained articles that are found most suitable for exploitation as loss leaders.

Third, the loss leader is a thoroughly vicious practice. That has been made perfectly clear by a great number of authorities.

Fourth, there is no adequate alternative protection against the loss leader. That was made abundantly clear by Mr. McGregor in his evidence. It is made abundantly clear by the way the MacQuarrie committee spoke of it. It was made abundantly clear by the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Croll) when he submitted draft legislation on the subject which the committee did not accept as workable. Section 498A of the Criminal Code does not meet this problem of the loss leader, as Mr. Ralston and Mr. Ilsley said in their speeches on June 10, 1935.

Fifth, resale price maintenance has brought stability into the retail trades affected. In the house we have heard a great deal of talk about the necessity of orderly marketing for farmers. It would not be amiss to point out the value of orderly marketing in the retail trades.

Sixth, there is no proof that the consuming public has been hurt by resale price maintenance. On the contrary, the evidence shows that this practice has provided a guarantee of quality and has increased the number of outlets. In that way it has encouraged increased competition. Then the margin of profit is lower on branded than on non-branded articles. Moreover the margin of profit on branded articles has risen less than on the non-branded in the sellers' market of recent years. The manufacturer sets the margin with a view to making the purchase of his product attractive to the public.

Seventh, there is no proof that the consuming public will benefit from a ban on resale price maintenance. Under that point I cite these four circumstances:

(a) If loss leadering reduces prices of branded articles, the retailers tell us they would have to make up that loss by raising the prices on non-branded articles or go out of business, and in that way reduce competition.

(b) Elimination of retail outlets means less competition and less service to the public.

(c) Concentration of economic power in the hands of chains and big, powerful retail outlets will not benefit the consumer. Any immediate advantage will be of little benefit in view of the long-term disadvantage that he will suffer from growing monopoly in retail outlets.

(d) The manufacturer may be driven, we were told, to protect himself against the chains and big retailers by himself going into the retail business. This will not make for efficiency. In this connection I wish to deal with the reference by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) last night to Henry Ford and his system. Let me tell the Minister of Justice that Henry Ford is not an example of any ban on resale price maintenance. Henry Ford went into the retail business as well as the manufacturing business. The example was far-fetched. Then I come to my next point.

Eighth, there is no proof that the elimination of resale price maintenance will reduce the cost of living. The Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) said so when he spoke on this subject on October 15. He said it would make no material reduction in the cost of living. The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) said the same thing today. We know of course that the Minister of Justice said something different yesterday, and the hon. member for Coast-Capilano said the opposite this afternoon. I would just as soon take the view of the Prime Minister and the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar as I would the view of the Minister of Justice and the voluble member for Coast-Capilano. Before anybody becomes too hopeful of price reductions he would do well to read an editorial in the Canadian Unionist, the journal of the Canadian Congress of Labour, of December, 1951 in which I read the following:

> The enquiry—
> That is the one into resale price maintenance.
> —is continuing, and has stirred up considerable interest throughout Canada, but there is no reason to believe that, even if the legislation is passed, it will bring about any reduction in the cost of living.
> That is only sound common sense and fact.

An hon. Member: Who wrote it?

Mr. Fleming: I say to you, sir, that what we are witnessing here, particularly when we see the juxtaposition of paragraphs in the speech from the throne, where the government deals in the first paragraph on page 2 of Hansard with the subject of the rising cost of living and then in the very next paragraph goes on to talk about their proposal to bring in legislation to ban resale price maintenance, is an invitation to the Canadian people to submit themselves to being fooled and deluded into thinking this legislation is going to bring them a reduction in the cost of their living. That has since been exploded by the Prime Minister and others. In the way this legislation is now being pictured by its sponsors it becomes clear that this is just an attempt to perpetrate a great big hoax upon the hard-pressed consumer who has taken such a beating as the result of government policies, and chiefly from government taxation policy. It is perfectly evident as the result of the course the government has followed in this case that what they are trying to do is make a scapegoat of the small retailer. They do not care what huge inventory losses he is going to suffer.

The government obviously want to provoke price wars. They hope to provoke price wars as a result of loss leadering. They wish to get more advertising of price reductions, however misleading, and they want the people to believe that they have brought it about.

If the government really wishes to do something about the cost of living, let them abandon their iniquitous high taxation policies.

Mr. C. W. Carter (Burin-Burgeo): Mr. Speaker, as I was privileged to be a member of the joint parliamentary committee on combines legislation I feel I should make some attempt to explain to my constituents as best I can the reasons why I support this legislation. The great task and the great challenge that confronts this generation is to make democracy work. Democracy cannot work unless the people understand and play their full part. The word "people" includes every one of us. It includes producers, consumers, manufacturers, wholesalers, retailers, members of the learned professions and members of parliament. In a democracy such as ours the part of the people is just as important, perhaps even more so, than the part of government. It is obvious that the people cannot play their part and democracy cannot work unless we have an enlightened public opinion.

The enemies of democracy recognize this and spare no effort to confuse public opinion whenever the opportunity offers. The fact that some confusion of public opinion exists is shown by the tendency to make conflicting demands, demands which are contradictory to the point of being mutually exclusive. For example, we have the cry go up for a curb on inflation, and at the same time a demand for greater public expenditure. We get a demand for less taxation on the one hand and at the same time a cry for increased social benefit payments on the other. We get a demand for greater individual freedom and at the same time a demand for more government control. In the parliamentary committee on combines legislation we had a demand for more freedom of individual enterprise and at the same time a demand for less competition. It is obvious that we cannot have one without the other. Competition is the price that we must be prepared to pay for freedom of enterprise.

Parliament is a deliberative body, and we refer to it with pride as the highest court in the land. We should be very careful not to reduce parliament to the level of a sounding board. This is one place to which the people should be able to look with confidence that they will find the truth, and it is our job to see that they get the truth and the whole truth. To do that we must separate facts from opinions, suppositions and speculations, and see that we place the proper labels on each so the people will be able to give to each one its proper value and thus be able to perform their democratic function.

The present combines legislation makes it illegal for any person or corporation to make an agreement with another person or corporation for the purpose of controlling prices and eliminating competition. It does not, however, in its present form prevent any person or corporation from controlling prices and eliminating competition by means of a series of vertical agreements between the manufacturer and the distributor. The system whereby a dealer agrees to sell an article at a price fixed by the manufacturer is known as resale price maintenance. Some manufacturers have used this device to control prices and evade present legislation. The only solution to this problem is to strengthen the present law by the abolition of price maintenance.

Unfortunately we cannot discuss price maintenance without getting involved in some discussion of prices in general, price levels, profit margins, mark-ups, the cost of living, inflation and other related topics which are of intense public interest. But we should never lose sight of the fact that interesting though these topics are they are nevertheless only secondary considerations. The real purpose of this legislation is to prevent a person or corporation from evading the present law. The real purpose of this legislation is not to combat inflation, not to reduce the cost of living, but to prevent corporations from controlling prices and eliminating competition. And the primary question before this house is simply, shall we retain resale price maintenance and allow corporations to continue evading the law, or shall we abolish price maintenance and prevent them from doing so?

The position of the government on this matter is indicated by the stand they have taken on government price control in general. In the words of one of the witnesses, this government has resolutely set its face against the imposition of over-all government price control. It would be very inconsistent for the government to take that stand with regard to government control of prices and at the same time sanction a system of private control. Furthermore, the government made a commitment to the people of this nation to abolish price maintenance. When that commitment became known a great deal of organized opposition developed. The government decided to set up a committee so the opponents of this legislation would be afforded an opportunity to state their case in public and to make useful suggestions. I for one am grateful to the government for setting up this committee. Personally I think it was a very wise move; otherwise thousands of simple people like myself would never have had an opportunity of understanding the nature of this problem.

When the committee was set up, the government were charged with retreating from their position, of stalling and of foregoing their commitments. I must confess, Mr. Speaker, that I was very much surprised to find that the same people who accused the government of stalling, turned around in committee and accused them of steamrolling, of railroading the legislation, of making snap decisions without sufficient evidence and without sufficient study.

Although the committee was specifically charged with a study of the recommendations contained in the MacQuarrie report, it should be borne in mind that this was not the only evidence available to the government and to the committee on this subject. A wealth of information was available from many sources. To mention a few there was the royal commission on prices known as the Curtis report; the Lloyd Jacob report of Britain; the British white paper; the debate in the British House of Commons last June; the studies and reports of various United States federal and state organizations; the royal commission on the cost of living in Newfoundland, 1950, and the information and evidence arising from investigations and prosecutions of the federal combines commission.

In general all of this evidence, while admitting that price maintenance does afford some advantages, tends to the general conclusion that the disadvantages greatly outweigh the advantages, and that price maintenance should be abolished in the public interest.

In addition to all this evidence there were the large number of briefs which were presented to the committee, and which in many cases were supplemented by verbal evidence from witnesses who appeared before the committee. These witnesses were sharply divided into two main groups. The masses of the people as represented generally by the great labour organizations, the large consumer organizations and the co-operative unions, submitted briefs requesting that price maintenance be abolished. With the exception of a few large retail firms, manufacturers' organizations and associations of retailers and wholesalers submitted briefs requesting that price maintenance be retained.

The merits and demerits of price maintenance in itself and its effect on the cost of living are, as I have already said, secondary considerations and important only in so far as they relate to the primary question as to whether any person or corporation should be permitted to use this device to control prices and eliminate competition. However, since so much discussion has revolved around the topic of price maintenance in itself, perhaps it would be worth-while to list a few of the main arguments presented for and against this practice. Those opposed to the practice of price maintenance claim that it should be abolished because (1) it is a system of private law privately enforced without reference to any court of law; (2) it eliminates competition in distribution; (3) it fosters competition between manufacturers for the goodwill of retailers so that manufacturers outbid each other, offering higher margins, higher mark-ups and greater profits to the retailer and hence higher and higher prices; (4) it prevents the more efficient retailer from passing on the benefits of his efficiency to the consumer in the form of lower prices; (5) it multiplies retail outlets far beyond what is necessary and (6) resale price maintenance has increased greatly during the past 20 years and is still increasing at an alarming rate.

Those who wish to retain resale price maintenance claim that it should be retained because (1) it protects the small dealer from the predatory price cutting practices of larger and financially stronger firms; (2) it equalizes prices from one end of the country to the other; (3) it keeps prices lower because nationally advertised products are easier to sell and therefore require lower mark-ups; (4) it protects the rights of manufacturers who had built up a national demand for their products; (5) it protects the prestige enjoyed by branded products; (6) it stabilizes production and therefore the nation's economy; and (7) if resale price maintenance were abolished many smaller dealers would be forced out of business.

The bulk of the evidence given in support of the retention of resale price maintenance consisted mainly of opinions, suppositions and fears largely based on lack of faith in their fellow man. What few facts did emerge tended to refute their claims.

We are all sympathetic to the little man, whether he is a manufacturer, jobber or retailer. The evidence presented to the committee showed that the efficiency of a business did not increase with its size. Though larger firms secured larger discounts by means of mass buying, yet that advantage was largely offset by the lower overhead and lower operating costs of the little man; and as the hon. member for Coast-Capilano (Mr. Sinclair) has pointed out, also because the little man was largely exempt from corporation taxes. As a result small firms have been able to stay in business and compete with chain stores, large department stores and corporations. The prediction of casualties amongst dealers is not borne out by the evidence, nor by the experience in the grocery trade where competition is fierce and where less than 1 per cent of the goods sold is protected by price maintenance. It is possible that a number of firms will go out of business, because in many cases the number of retail outlets is far greater than the total turnover warrants. The tendency of resale price maintenance is to raise prices to a level where all can stay in business, regardless of the volume of the turnover and regardless of the efficiency of the individual firm.

A great deal of thought was also given to the practice of price cutting known as the loss leader. There is reason to believe that once the background of fixed prices has been removed, the loss leader will lose a great deal of its effectiveness. It was found that this practice assumed so many forms it was practically impossible of definition, and the general conclusion reached was that section 498A of the Criminal Code afforded as much protection as any legislation that can be devised until the problem has assumed more definite and concrete proportions.

The evidence also showed that, other factors being equal or comparable—factors such as geography, wealth, purchasing power, and so on—prices tended to be lower in those areas where price maintenance had been abolished. Last evening the minister pointed out the experience in the United States, where comparisons were possible between four states with price maintenance and four comparable states where price maintenance had been abolished.

In Canada the only comparison possible is in the province of Newfoundland. We Newfoundlanders can speak from personal experience, because we had the doubtful benefit of price maintenance thrust upon us almost overnight. Before confederation price maintenance was not practised in Newfoundland, and its full and sudden impact became apparent almost immediately after confederation. The hon. member for Coast-Capilano has referred to the example of the No. 6 dry cell ignition battery which is an important item for our fishermen. The reference to this item is contained in chapter 10 of the report of the royal commission on the cost of living in Newfoundland, 1950, and was brought to the attention of the committee in a brief submitted by the Newfoundland co-operative union.

As the hon. member for Coast-Capilano has said, before confederation when there was no price maintenance, a No. 6 dry cell ignition battery—

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): May I ask the hon. member a question? Is he quoting now from the royal commission report—

Mr. Carter: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): —or from a letter from the secretary of the co-operative union?

Mr. Carter: I am quoting now from chapter 10 of the report of the royal commission on the cost of living in Newfoundland.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): You have not that in your hand now.

Mr. Carter: On page 78 of the report of the royal commission it is shown that the landed cost of these dry cell batteries was 46½ cents, and the retail price was 60 cents. After confederation, when resale price maintenance came into effect, the landed cost went up only 1 cent to 47½ cents, but the retail price jumped to 80 cents. Even more striking is the example of the paint brushes. These paint brushes were imported from Canada before confederation and therefore had a tariff placed on them. After confederation there was no duty, so that landed cost was much lower.

Mr. Coldwell: Does the hon. member know the amount of the duty?

Mr. Carter: I do not know, but I do not think it has any relevance to this argument. Before confederation, and without price maintenance, the landed cost of these paint brushes—the quality being teal No. 2—was 68⅓ cents, and the retail price was 95 cents. After confederation, because there was no duty, the landed cost fell to 53⅓ cents, but because of resale price maintenance the retail price jumped up to $1.10.

Mr. Fraser: It was sales tax that jumped that up.

Mr. Fleming: And excise tax.

Mr. Garson: Overnight?

Mr. Fleming: Yes. Once you got the election over, you brought taxes into effect on July 1, 1949.

Mr. Carter: The royal commission points out on page 78 of its report:

> In several hardware lines in which there is resale price maintenance, the setting of prices has thus required dealers to take mark-ups definitely higher than those that had prevailed under more open competition. The dealers, doubtless, often had no serious objection to doing so.

On page 79 of the commission report, I find this:

> Resale price maintenance since confederation has had a marked effect. It has brought many prices in line with national prices. At the same time, it has tended to place prices of drugs, some women's and other clothing, and many hardware and electrical goods above the levels they might have reached if no resale prices had been suggested after confederation.

The witnesses who appeared before the committee laid a great deal of stress on the prestige enjoyed by branded products, which they maintained should be protected. The extent to which the consumer is forced to pay for the prestige of branded products is abundantly illustrated by the evidence concerning aspirin tablets, to which the hon. member for Coast-Capilano referred earlier. Bayer's aspirin tablets retail at 79 cents for 100, while unbranded tablets of the same chemical formula and conforming in every way with the requirements of the Food and Drugs Act retail at only 19 cents per 100 tablets. Naturally, it pays the druggist well to push the sale of Bayer's aspirin in preference to the unbranded tablet.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I should like to make one brief reference to a matter which concerned me, not only as a member of the committee but as a new Canadian. It relates to the number of witnesses representing manufacturers, wholesalers and retailers, who expressed fear, suspicion and mistrust in their fellow members in the organizations which they represented. If their fears were genuine, we are asked to believe that our leading businessmen, the managers of our most prominent firms, are extremely greedy and selfish individuals who are just waiting for an opportunity to resort to the law of the jungle, and who will stop at nothing to eliminate their weaker and less fortunate competitors. That there is some greed and selfishness we must admit. Otherwise there would be no need for any combines legislation at all. But I find it extremely difficult to believe that the majority of our businessmen are very different from the rest of us in that respect. It is obvious that we cannot make people honest, nor can we remove greed and selfishness, simply by passing a law. It is a moral problem rather than a legal or economic problem, and while legislation is necessary, a more positive approach is required.

The evidence that a more positive approach is possible and that a positive answer to this problem exists is contained in a book which I have lately read and which is entitled "World Rebuilt" by Peter Howard. This book is a record of events that are taking place at the present time and which are destined to change the course of history. I was impressed with the wealth of evidence that industry, business and management all over the free world are awakening to a new sense of morality and of responsibility for the nation and for the democratic way of life. "The old order changeth, yielding place to new." Whether we are prepared to admit it or not, a new order is coming into existence. A new world is being built, and the slogan "business as usual" has long been out of date.

Stalin, in a lecture to his communist leaders at Moscow, is reported to have said: If capitalism could adapt its production not to the getting of maximum profits but to the systematic improvement of the masses of the people, then there would be no crisis; but then capitalism would not be capitalism.

The stories of such eminent and internationally famous businessmen as Dr. Heinrich Kost, managing director of the Rheinprensen Company and chairman of the German coal board; of Robert Tilge, French industrialist and secretary of the employers federation of northern France; of Charles Redelé, large producer of foodstuffs in Holland; and many others as related by Peter Howard, all testify to the fact that capitalism is being gripped by a much greater idea than the mere accumulation of profits and that in industry, business, management and labour a new type of businessman is emerging to match the new era.

I strongly recommend this book to every member of parliament, to every businessman and to every labour leader in Canada if only for the purpose of reading the thrilling story of the National Airlines in the United States. This company was on the point of being dismembered and broken up because of bad relations between management and pilots. At that point the president, George Baker, began to apply this new thinking and this new positive approach to the problem, with the amazing result that within the space of a few months his balance sheet changed from a deficit to a profit of half a million dollars per month. I think that amply illustrates the soundness of this positive approach to business and management problems.

In a statement made in Washington, D.C., on May 1, 1951, Mr. D. W. Rentzel. chairman of the civil aeronautics board, said:

> To those familiar with the long history of bitter and acrimonious dispute, the transformation in the attitude of the parties from one of suspicion and hostility to an attitude of mutual co-operation and trust has been little short of miraculous.

That statement which I have quoted referred to the National Airlines.

We Canadians are richly blessed in that we have inherited the most favoured nation on the face of the earth. To a large extent the fate of this nation and of this people rests in the hands of our businessmen. Underproduction, through the selfish application of the economics of scarcity, can easily push our economy over the border from inflation to disastrous deflation.

Price determination is not a matter of government control nor of private law. It is simply a matter of manufacturer, wholesaler and retailer each honestly facing the facts and making a moral decision based on what is right having due regard for the interests of the consumer and the welfare of the nation, as well as for his own individual interest.

During world war II Canadian business astonished the world with its amazing achievements. I feel confident, Mr. Speaker, that when they realize the full extent of their national responsibilities Canadian businessmen will again prove equal to this even greater challenge which is the mark of our time.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I should like to ask the hon. member a question.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Just one?

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Will the hon. member tell me how much the cost of living went down as a result of the royal commission in Newfoundland on the cost of living?

Mr. Carter: One of the reasons the cost of living did not go down in Newfoundland, as we had expected, was that the practice of resale price maintenance offset the advantages which we expected to derive from the removal of duty.

Mr. Fleming: It did not offset the effect of the dominion government's taxes, either.

Mrs. Ellen L. Fairclough (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, after that last remark I think I should start out by saying that now I have heard everything. The hon. member for Burin-Burgeo (Mr. Carter) who has just taken his seat stated that all consumers were in favour of this legislation, and by listing the various people who were against it he made the implication that all business was against this legislation. I think I should not go on with the remarks I propose to make without drawing attention to this statement because it is so utterly opposed to what is actually the case. We sat in this committee for some time, and we heard businessmen both for and against. We had from businessmen briefs both for and against the legislation. We had briefs—most of them from the consumer angle, I grant you—either for or partly for the legislation. I would not say they were entirely in favour of the legislation.

I should like to start, Mr. Speaker, by trying to bring this question out of the realm of academic debate and down to a practical position, and to ask bluntly these questions: Who will benefit by this legislation? Who will suffer from it? Why is it being introduced? I do not think for a moment that anyone is under any misapprehension as to who will benefit. Certainly those merchandisers who are manufacturers of private brands, who are in the fortunate position of being at one and the same time the manufacturer and their own retailer, stand to benefit from this legislation.

Who will suffer? Well, the small businessman will suffer, and the consumer will suffer. I have been interested to hear the debate which has taken place thus far because at some place in almost every speech someone has said, "We love the small businessman, but—". I do not think the small businessman is under any misapprehension about the legislation at all. I do think that a great many consumers are misled.

I intend to deal with that at a later point, but I should like to go on now and ask this question: Why is this legislation being introduced? Is it being introduced to bring down the cost of living? I do not believe it is, because all the government members have been very careful to say that it will have no effect on the cost of living. The Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) himself early in the session said he did not expect that the introduction of this legislation would have any effect whatever on the cost of living.

I personally went to some pains to do a piece of research on this point. I took the cost of living index items and broke them down into those which were price controlled and those which were not price controlled. And I might say that a large part of those which are under a resale price maintenance policy are under a policy dictated by a government, either federal or provincial. Some of the other items are under other forms of price maintenance, such as transportation and communications. When you break it all down, it comes out to something like this: The food items make up 31 per cent of the cost of living index. Of that total, 1/15 of 1 per cent are under a rigid price maintenance policy. Then rentals make up 19 per cent; fuel and light, 6 per cent; clothing, 12 per cent; home furnishings, 9 per cent and miscellaneous, 23 per cent. When you take the various weights—I hope I have done it correctly—and take the number of items which are maintained and take the percentage that is of the total weight, it finally comes down to 6·3 per cent of the total.

As I said before, some of the items which are maintained will not be changed anyway. You will not change railway fares; you will not change doctors' fees; you will not change telephone bills; you will not change many other things. You will not change transportation costs, because these are things that cannot be changed by this legislation. Therefore if we took a wildly optimistic view of what this might do to the cost of living, and said that on the over-all basis the whole cost of living might drop on these items by 5 per cent, then we would have ·31 per cent of the cost of living.

I think I have been well repaid for the work I did on this, because it has shown me how foolish is any argument which would try to support the belief that this will have any effect at all on the cost of living. Yet I believe many consumers in this country are under the impression, rightly or wrongly, that this legislation is being brought down to remedy in some way the situation in which we find ourselves today because of the greatly increased cost of living. So perhaps the answer to the question as to why this legislation is being introduced is this: while it might not bring down the cost of living, it may very well be that it has been brought in as an answer to the pressure from an inflation-weary country. Undoubtedly this pressure has prompted the government to do something. Far from adopting a course which might have had some effect on combines legislation, this government has chosen to hide behind a smokescreen of resale price maintenance, to attempt by eliminating this practice to demonstrate to the people of Canada that it has taken action, at the same time pleasing those who have monopolistic tendencies by removing one of the impediments to the pursuit of certain trade practices.

This legislation is not going to help the consumer. It is not going to do a thing for the pensioners who are living on the same pensions but with a greatly increased cost of living. It is not going to help the elderly people one bit. It is not going to be of any service at all to the homemaker. The opening paragraph of the brief presented to the committee by the Canadian Congress of Labour, as it is set out at page 73 of the proceedings of the committee, states:

> The congress does not believe that either the Combines Investigation Act (with the related provisions of the Criminal Code) or the prohibition of resale price maintenance, will have any marked effect on the cost of living.

The minister in his remarks last night made reference to suggested prices. I take it I am correct in believing that he meant he had no personal axe to grind against those who were suggesting resale prices. I think there is a great deal of doubt in the minds of committee members and others as to what constitutes a maintained price and what constitutes a suggested price. We talked about this to some extent in the committee. Mr. McGregor had some things to say in this connection at page 614 of the evidence. I questioned him as follows:

> To what extent would you think control of suggested resale prices might go? To the extent of placing a price on a product? A. It might be, yes.
> Q. Would you think it would not be illegal under the proposed legislation to put a price on a label or a bottle or a shirt? A. No, under this particular proposal it does not seem that it would. This bill does not go the whole hog but it may be that it would prevent the enforced price. There is still a lot going on in suggested prices where really competition is not working and you might later, in a few years hence, find it is doing damage and have to deal with it.
> Q. You say that the next step may be the abolition of the suggested price? A. It may be that a situation will develop where competition is not working. Perhaps not, and if not I think it should be left free. As long as a man is free and does not have to adopt the suggestion of the manufacturer—

You will notice the witness says that a man does not have to adopt the suggestion of the manufacturer. That is a rather foolish statement because if it is not enforced, then he certainly does not have to adopt it. The answer continues:

> As long as a man is free and does not have to adopt the suggestion of the manufacturer, then I think probably it is better to have the form of the bill as it is here.

I submit here, as I did in the committee, that the number of strictly maintained lines is negligible. Most are suggested and preserved as such as long as business is continuing on an even tenor. This brings up two possibilities. The first is that this legislation will open the door for the destruction of business by encouraging an all-out attack on famous brands, those items which are maintained. We have seen what happens when a price war is started in connection with one or two articles. The whole business of the community is disrupted, on both maintained and non-maintained lines. If that does not happen, then there is the possibility that an even more sinister intent is present in the enforcement of this legislation and such regulations as may be made thereunder than appears at the moment.

I should like to refer for a few minutes to the evidence presented in the committee. First, I should like to call your attention to a phrase which occurs in the speech from the throne, "without impairing our free institutions". I think we all agree that freedom is something not easily defined. We have always claimed that one of the greatest products of freedom is our courts of justice. There is a saying abroad, I do not know how true it is in actual practice, that a man is innocent until he is proved guilty. This inquiry was in reverse. A charge was levelled against these people who operated, either at the manufacturing or retailing level, under a system of resale price maintenance. In effect the government said, "You are guilty; you prove that you are innocent". Far from the government proving that they were guilty, far from the government proving that the results of price maintenance worked to the disadvantage of the consumer, they simply made a bald statement.

I would remind hon. members that in the examination that followed the presentation of the brief by the Canadian Congress of Labour the witness stated that if they could be convinced that resale price maintenance worked to the advantage rather than the disadvantage of the consumer, they would support it. They were not convinced that it worked to the disadvantage of the consumer.

In the brief presented by the Trades and Labour Congress they said they were not quite satisfied that a case had been made out against resale price maintenance. In spite of that, statements are made repeatedly in this house that all consumers are against resale price maintenance. The fact is that the two largest groups representing consumers have both said they have had no proof that resale price maintenance is not to the advantage of the consumer.

Statement after statement was made and then the accused, if we can use that term for the businessman of Canada, was told to defend himself. When he proceeded to do so he was told that he had given no proof, that he had presented no figures. He then said he would bring figures. I refer hon. members to pages 489, 490 and 491 of the proceedings of the committee. While they do not set out the results of an exhaustive study, hon. members will find there a sample of the type of thing that could be and was produced. The gentleman who produced those figures stated quite bluntly that some were in favour of his argument and some were opposed to it. He took them as they came on a selected list of articles and presented what he had. That was the kind of evidence we should have had in a more exhaustive form from other people engaged in business. At times the committee proceedings took on the complexion of a criminal trial instead of an inquiry. I deplored the manner in which expert witnesses were abused and I might say almost insulted at times.

For a few minutes I should like to talk about the small businessman. I think of him first as being a distributor of needed goods. Within the last six or seven years we faced a situation in this country where many of the articles sorely needed by the consumer were in very short supply. Some articles were rationed, while others were distributed under a sort of voluntary rationing system. In some cases the manufacturer and the first distributor were called upon by the regulations of the wartime prices and trade board to distribute the product which was in short supply on a pro rata basis to their customers on the basis of the historical pattern of supply which showed on their books. It frequently happened that even at the wholesale level some fairly good-sized merchants got only half a case of certain tinned goods. That was particularly true of salmon, which was in very short supply. A case would go out to the retailer, who knew that he had to distribute it to all his customers. He had to use his own judgment as to who was going to get the goods. So he distributed his goods according to a similar historical pattern of trade. He knew that certain customers habitually bought certain articles, so he saved some for them. The same was true of other lines, such as soaps.

I am sure that there is not a housewife in this country who does not remember when she did one of two things. Either she stood in line for a long time in a store where she had heard there was a supply of goods and where the goods were distributed on an impersonal basis of first come first served. Maybe she got some and maybe she did not. Or if she had been in the habit of dealing with one store she knew she could depend on that storekeeper to see that she got her fair share.

Some peculiar statements have been made during the course of this debate. I look back on this pattern of distribution with which I was very familiar, and I find it very difficult to make it fit in with some of the statements that have been made. From my knowledge of the small businessman I find it difficult to understand how the minister could say that after all the small businessman does not pay any corporation tax. I know he does not pay any corporation tax. He pays his personal income tax at the personal rate on the total amount of money his business makes, whether he withdraws it or whether he does not, and he pays even on the profit he makes which he leaves in his business for expansion or for the purchase of new equipment. He does not benefit by the system which is in effect for corporations whereby he is permitted to withdraw his salary and then pay at the lower rate of corporation tax for small incorporated businesses. I am sure the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) will bear me out in that. I believe the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) was a little mistaken when he made that remark, and I am sure if he would investigate it he would wish to withdraw it.

Several things have not yet been touched in the course of this debate. I should like to build up for the house a picture of the type of thing that is likely to happen if the government persists in passing this legislation. We will undoubtedly have a raid on name brands. We will have a race for the lowest price. In the race for the lowest price, which will probably see keen competition between large outlets that can well afford it, the poor little fellow on the same street is going to see the crowds just running past his door, not in but past. The next step will be a demand on the manufacturer to supply a product to meet a price. By that I mean this. We will suppose that a dealer has a brand name shirt which he sells for $5. When this competition develops his competitor will start to sell it for $4.75. Then he will sell it for $4.50, and finally a demand will be made on the manufacturer for a shirt which will retail for $3.99.

Who is going to say whether two inches less material has been put into that shirt, whether a lower grade of button has been used and whether—which may be a very serious thing when you consider the wearing qualities of a garment—a lower grade of thread has been used. During the war there were many instances where garments literally fell apart because of the low grade of thread which was available. These low grades may be used from choice if we are going to get into an all-out price-cutting war. Therefore we are faced with deterioration of quality, and it is serious matter. The extra coat of enamel on the saucepan disappears, the extra inch of material in the garment disappears, the extra ounce of vegetables in the soup disappears, all to meet a demand for an article at a price which will be competitive with that of the price cutter.

There are a great many people in this country who are entirely dependent upon the small retailer for many things, for service, credit, advice and even for a personal interest in their families. They depend upon him to keep them in food when they are out of work for a while, and that is a serious thing today when this country is witnessing the largest unemployment it has known for many years. The little fellow supports these people, and sometimes he never collects from them. He is the backbone of our economy; yet he was accused before the committee. Even his representative, the one organization which is closest to the small independent retailer, was refused a hearing before the committee. I know perfectly well the committee took the stand that the parent body, which represents all retailers in the Dominion of Canada, had had a hearing; but the policy adopted by the committee was broken when they agreed to hear other members of that parent body. Nevertheless they refused to hear the retail merchants association of Canada which represents several thousands of small independent retailers right across the country.

Mr. Fraser: Shame.

Mrs. Fairclough: It reminds me of the situation which existed in the dark days. When a woman was accused of being a witch they took her out and threw her in the pond. If she swam she was a witch and they took her out and burned her. If she sank to the bottom she was innocent but of course by then she was drowned, so they just brushed their hands, walked home and said: "Well, we did our duty to the community; too bad, but we did our duty." It seems to me that the small retailer is in exactly that position today. He is being thrown into the pond. If he is a wizard and manages to crawl out then he will be suspect under this new legislation. If he sinks and drowns, too bad, but we have done our duty.

I do not want to leave the impression that I do not approve of some of these newer streamlined operations, because I think they have made a great contribution to distribution in Canada. I believe they have made a great contribution to our present conditions of living, but that does not mean they should entirely replace the independent retailer who to my mind is the very backbone of the Canadian economy.

I do not want my time to run out before I say a few words about the consumer. While we had, as I said before, some briefs for, some briefs against and some that were neutral, there was nothing neutral about the telegrams and letters that I received. I rather wish some members could have walked into my office a few days ago when these telegrams started to come. It was about as bad as the snowstorm we are having today. I made a summary of what I received and there are one or two I should like to read. From British Columbia there were 75, from Alberta 77, from Saskatchewan 14, from Manitoba 88, from Ontario 40, from Quebec 246, and from Nova Scotia 15. There were also another 5 which were letters and not telegrams. I received a total of 510 communications from women all signed, the majority of them with addresses attached. I also received a great number from retailers. I did not count them, but the ones to which I have referred were all from women from coast to coast. There were a few from the city of Montreal which were all the same message, but most were entirely different and quite apparently written individually by these women. Hon. members will understand in a moment why I have chosen this one to read first. It is from Russell, Manitoba, and reads as follows:

Believe me, Mrs. Fairclough, we are definitely against the government's bill restricting price maintenance at retail level. Please convey our stand to Stuart Garson. Thanks.

It is all yours.

Mr. Casselman: That is his home town.

Mr. Abbott: Merry Christmas.

Mrs. Fairclough: I have one from Magog, Quebec.

Mr. Abbott: A good part of the country.

Mrs. Fairclough: It reads as follows:

Consumers association views on price maintenance not truly representative of Canadian women. Urge you to continue battle against unwise legislation.

I have another one from Magog. This time it is from the board of trade. I am saying it is from the board because it is different from the others. They all have women's names on them. It reads:

Price maintenance brief by Canadian association of consumers must have been by big city person. In small towns we feel our local shops driven out of business and our shopping curtailed.

I have another one from Kelowna, British Columbia, which reads:

As a housewife I feel price maintenance should be upheld because it maintains orderly buying and quality and definite spending power.

The next one is from Montreal, which reads:

Not wish of women that quality guaranteeing price maintenance be abolished.

That one, Mr. Speaker, I think is a very well worded telegram: "quality guaranteeing price maintenance." I think we might all do well to let that sink in. I have not time to read all of these and some of the letters that would bear hearing, but I should like to read just one paragraph from a telegram received from the Vancouver manager of the pharmaceutical association of British Columbia. It reads:

> Young business men launched by rehabilitation and ex-service men's grants will not appreciate being forced out of business by effort of government to hoodwink the public that present price legislation can influence cost of living figures.

I thought I would have plenty of time, Mr. Speaker, to get through with what I would like to say, but I see that I am not going to have half enough time; therefore I shall have to skip ahead and make a few comments. I would like to suggest that every hon. member read this booklet which I am sure they have received entitled "One Hundred and Fifty Million Reasons for Fair Trade," and in particular page 3, the article entitled "Dedication". I wish I could put this on the record, but I have not time to read it. It is well worth anyone's reading. There is a good deal of information in the whole book which is well worth taking into consideration. I should like to read two items to which this gentleman felt attention should be drawn, two lessons which he claims ought to be drawn from experience:

> 1. Any economic force as powerful as brand names must be harnessed for the good of the greatest number.
> 2. To abuse this economic power is like playing with matches, and may result in burning the house down.

I contend that his legislation is a blind, Mr. Speaker. It is a shield to hide the ugly fact that this government's taxation and credit restriction policies have brought merchandising to a standstill in many lines, and have resulted in the largest number of unemployed for many years. On December 13 an article appeared in a Toronto paper headed "Unemployment increases sharply in many industries." It gave the figure for the province of Ontario as 77,837. In the ten largest cities in Canada there is a total unemployment of 82,400. I do not know how many times that figure of unemployment is across the country as a whole. Resale price maintenance, far from deserving the criticism which has been levelled at it, is the only anti-inflationary policy at work in Canada today, and I deplore the lack of information and lack of understanding which prompts the criticism.

I maintain, Mr. Speaker, that we have gone at this whole thing in much too fierce a manner. We have rushed through something which merited a great deal more consideration. We have been led up the primrose path by theorists and others with no practical knowledge of the workings of distribution in this country, and who say such and such a thing takes place and something else happens. True, it is all very well in theory, but the little businessmen on the corners, many of whom cannot add very well, can tell you much more about what actually happens in the movement of goods in a certain specific set of circumstances.

I have an open letter which came to me today, and I presume some other hon. members have it. I am not going to take time to read the whole thing. It is from a woman in Toronto who claims to have worked for one of the companies that presented a brief, but was not called upon by the committee to explain or amplify the brief or to answer questions. I should like to read just one paragraph of her letter. It says:

> I really can't understand why this legislation—which will be detrimental to Canadians in all walks of life—is being rushed through at such a terrific pace, why groups opposing the legislation are being "muzzled" and why it can't be investigated properly—not by a group of lawyers and economists who have never even sold a can of beans—but by those persons who understand retail operations, profit margins, retailers' costs, etc.

We have had too little time, Mr. Speaker; too little time for the preparation of briefs by these companies, too little time for the applications to be heard, too little time for the consideration of evidence, and too little time for the calling of additional witnesses which were requested by the committee. I feel that the government has been sadly misguided in presenting this legislation. It is like burning down the house to try to catch a mouse.

Mr. H. A. Hosking (Wellington South): Mr. Speaker, I did not have the pleasure of being a member of the committee to study this subject, but I have had some business experience, and it is with that thought in mind that I wish to take just a few moments of the time of this house. I cannot help but sum up the various stands taken by the four different parties that have taken part in this debate. I quite understand the Liberal position because they have always taken the attitude that it was necessary to do the greatest amount of good for the greatest number of people. In this particular topic we are supported by the C.C.F.—

Mr. Fleming: The kiss of death.

Mr. Hosking: —who generally support any platform that will get them the largest amount of popularity from the greatest number of people.

Mr. Hodgson: Are you not suspicious?

Mr. Hosking: We are opposed by the Tories, who, as everyone knows, are interested only in benefiting one, and only one, faction of the people, namely big business.

Mr. Fleming: This measure will benefit big business, and it will kill little business.

Mr. Hosking: In this particular case they are speaking in behalf of big business.

Mr. Cardiff: What do you call Eaton's?

Mr. Hosking: After I received a few telegrams from various business people in my riding I spent some time making inquiries to find out whether any of the small shopkeepers who operate their own individual businesses on the corners of my towns and cities had made any representations to have price maintenance brought into effect. I could not find an instance where one of the small shopkeepers had suggested that they wanted or had instigated price maintenance. Thus I must assume that although at the present time they are under the operation of price maintenance, it was not instigated at their request; and since it was not instigated at their request then I started to figure out who wants this thing. After listening to the very explicit and enlightening address by the member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming), I decided that the chain stores could buy a little cheaper in larger volume. If they could buy cheaper in larger volume and sell at maintained prices, they must make a much larger profit. After ascertaining that, I came to the conclusion that this price maintenance was something that was desired by big business.

For the moment I shall be honest and fair, and say that the small shopkeeper enjoys some benefits from this system; but what will happen to him eventually we are not prepared to say. Having had this brought to my attention, I did some research on it. I should like to give the house three situations showing various effects of taxes which, in some respects, answer the point raised by the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mrs. Fairclough). This situation is the result of the necessity for this country to defend itself. We on this side of the house do not like it, but this taxation is something which we have to endure. I should like to explain to the house just what the effects of taxation are on the small businessman and the large businessman who is incorporated. I do not say these arguments will convince the opposition, because they are not easy to convince when they do not want to be convinced. But perhaps my arguments will explain why the Minister of Justice asked the MacQuarrie committee to present a special report, and why this legislation was introduced at this session.

Shortly after the last budget it became apparent that there was a change in the operation of the retail trade. Price fixation became rampant. It was necessary that something be done to correct this. The figures I shall present will prove beyond any doubt that this is the case. As an example, I have taken the case of a shopkeeper, married and with two children, who had a net profit—including interest from his investment and the results of his labour—of $10,000. This gentleman who owns his own business will pay income taxes amounting to $1,950. He has a net return for his labour of $8,050. Let us assume that a stockholder in an incorporated chain store had no other source of income, but operated a chain store next door to this private shopkeeper. What would he have to get in net profit, after wages and everything else had been paid, in order to receive as a dividend the same amount of money the small shopkeeper received? We find that for him to receive the same amount of net income —the individual who operates his own store is not incorporated—he would have to receive $20,100 in profits. For the operation of this country and for the defence of this country, this chain store stockholder would pay $12,050 in income taxes as against the $1,950 that the small shopkeeper would pay. But that is not the usual situation in these chain stores.

The person who has money invested in these incorporated chain stores generally is not the type of man who just invests his money and sits idly by living on the interest. In most cases, fortunately for the Dominion of Canada, he happens to be an industrious individual. Let us assume he could work and earn as much as the private shopkeeper, so that he has a private income of $10,000 a year. He has money invested in the chain store which has to operate beside the private small shopkeeper. Under those conditions just what would this chain store have to produce in net profit, after paying wages, taxes and all the expenses of running the store, in order to return to the individual $8,050? We find that he has to get from that chain store $30,000 in profit in order to receive the same amount of money the small shopkeeper received for working in his store. In other words, through necessity—and I hope the day will come when this government will not be forced into a position where it has to tax at this most inhuman rate—

Mr. Fleming: They do not have to do so now.

Mr. Hosking: In this party we happen to believe in paying our debts. There are certain people who do not want to take the responsibility of paying for the war, but we happen to be in a position where we think it is wise to pay off that debt.

Mr. Fleming: Why not budget for it, then?

Mr. Hosking: We budgeted for contingencies, and because our country's financial position is a little better than we expected we are spending the extra money which has come to us in the proper way.

Mr. Knowles: Is an election a contingency?

Mr. Hosking: The stockholder who has money invested in this chain store has to pay $21,950 in taxes in order to receive the same amount of money as the small shopkeeper who pays $1,950. It is for that reason we are bringing in this legislation. There is only one reason for it, and it was necessary that it be introduced at this time.

I should like to make a few other observations. The opposition have always taken the stand that if they could get the government to do something bad they could defeat us. During the time I have been in this house I have watched the Tories trying to put us in a position where we would do something bad, and then they would be able to defeat us at the next election. It is for that reason we are having this stall proposition. It was evident all the way through the committee. Every member of this house knew the government wanted to get this bill into the house and passed. The Tories thought if they could hold up this measure, without taking sides, they would force us to do something bad. Fortunately our party is determined that we shall sit as long as the Tories wish; we shall give them every opportunity to stall, even until Christmas day, but when they are finished we shall give the people of this country good government. The Tories can stall as long as they wish, but we shall still be here to give the people of this country good government when the Tories have finished stalling.

Having said that, I should like to make one other observation.

Mr. Fleming: Do not stall.

Mr. Hosking: I shall not be speaking for forty minutes, you can be sure of that. Last spring I listened until I was tired to the Tories complaining about our credit restrictions. I listened to them trying to prevent us from giving good legislation until I was sick. It was most repulsive. We wanted to go ahead and do something about the cost of living. Let any person in that Tory government which sticks up for big business—

Mr. Hees: Tory government?

Mr. Hosking:—Tory opposition, say that they were not on the side of big business.

Mr. Fleming: You are for big business. You are trying to kill small business by means of this bill.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Hosking: I happen to be in a position to say that this legislation on credit restrictions came close to home. I know something about it, and I can tell hon. members of the opposition this as to the position we took last spring and against which they talked for hours and hours. We had to listen to it, the same as we do now, when they tried to put us in the position—

An hon. Member: Who is talking now?

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Hosking: —of making it appear that we would not do anything for the majority of the people or that we would not make the small people's lot better.

Mr. Fleming: Such as Eaton's and the chains.

Mr. Hosking: We eventually got the legislation through, and I would defy anybody in this house to say that since our credit restrictions went through, they cannot buy an automobile today for $100 to $400 less than they could before March 1. The same is true of washing machines and refrigerators.

Mr. Fleming: That must be on the black market.

Mr. Hosking: We have nothing to do with that. Your policy of price controls will produce that effect. Their hindering tactics were in operation then just as they are now. They said: Let us put the government into the position where they will not pass good legislation; then we will get the benefit of their mistakes at some later date. I say to you, Mr. Speaker, I am highly pleased that the government is going ahead with this legislation and that it will continue to do things for the small people—

An hon. Member: Like Eaton's.

Mr. Hosking: —the small shopkeepers.

Mr. Fleming: Like Eaton's and the chains.

Mr. Hosking: When the taxes were put on by the Minister of Finance, he put the main taxes on the large corporations that were able to pay. The small shopkeeper pays $1,950 against the incorporated large chain store's tax of $21,950. I submit that we have given these people the opportunity to compete and more than compete, namely to put the chain stores in a position where they want this price maintenance. The Tory party supports the big chain store group who want these chain stores to make a profit. They find it exceedingly difficult today to compete with the small corner store. They cannot compete if the small corner store operator wishes to cut his prices and is able to do so. They cannot compete and pay taxes of $21,950 as against $1,950.

At 6.15 p.m. the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. George H. Hees (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, during the past day and a half I have sensed a feeling of unreality in this chamber, due to the fact that I have heard Liberal speaker after Liberal speaker rise in his place and, in enunciating the principles of the Liberal party, say that anything to do with combines has always been very much looked down upon by the Liberal party and the Liberal government, and that such things have been ruthlessly prosecuted and stamped out.

Hearing this sort of thing time and again, I have had to pinch myself to make sure I was awake. Could this be the same Liberal party I was hearing about today that, only two short years ago, concealed for as long as ten months a report concerning an inquiry into an industry? That report came to light only because Mr. McGregor, who was then combines commissioner and about whom the government has so proudly boasted yesterday and today, became so revolted by the dishonesty of the course the government was pursuing in this connection that he resigned, and the whole thing then came to light.

I had to look over to the other side of the chamber to reassure myself that this was the same Liberal party, the same Liberal government these speakers were talking about, a government as they have said that has always been against combines, has stamped them out and done everything it could to make sure they did not exist. I looked over there and saw the same Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson), under whose department all this had happened, in protest against whose action the combines commissioner of that day had resigned. I looked a little further to his right and I saw the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), the man who had pulled the strings that caused the Minister of Justice to take that very regrettable action. And then, Mr. Speaker, I asked myself this question: Just how white can a party paint itself, when such a very short time ago it was so very, very black?

I should like to go on now to say a few things about the proceedings of the committee on which I was privileged to serve during the last month. I speak of course of the committee which dealt with the question of resale price maintenance. After sitting for only a very few days on the committee, three things became obvious. First of all it became obvious that the government did not intend to pay even the slightest attention to the views of the small retailers who came forward to present their case. Second, it became clear that the loss leader was a very real threat to the business life of the small shopkeeper. Third, it was clear that the fair trade laws of the United States have proved to be more satisfactory to the people of that country than the abolition of price maintenance.

I should like to deal with those three matters, and I turn first to the consideration given to the point of view of the retailers. From the very first it was obvious that the small retailer was condemned before he even began to defend himself. The lawyers who were hired by the government, and who were supposed to be present as impartial questioners, had obviously been instructed by the government to destroy the case of the small retailer at the very first opportunity.

Their approach to the witnesses was that of a prosecuting attorney who was bent on proving that by trying to obtain a fair and stable price for his goods, the small shopkeeper is in some way guilty of a crime. It was in this atmosphere that the hearings of the committee were conducted, with the result that instead of the committee making a serious study of the facts in the case, the hearings were, in fact, a complete farce.

Secondly I should like to deal with the loss leader. Literally every witness who appeared before the committee stated that the loss leader is a very real threat to the life of the small shopkeeper. Among those who stated this view was no less a person than Mr. Fred McGregor, the former combines commissioner who, although he opposed resale price maintenance in theory, said that it was highly desirable to try to define the loss leader and to work out practical legislation to outlaw its operation.

Despite the overwhelming evidence that practical and enforceable legislation against the loss leader is needed, if price maintenance is to be abolished, the government steadfastly refused to give this matter any further consideration. In effect the government said that the fate of the small retailer is no concern to them.

Finally I would draw the attention of the house to the fair trade laws of the United States. For a moment I should like to deal with the history of price maintenance and the growth of these fair trade laws in that country. Resale price maintenance was made illegal in the United States in the year 1900. I think it is very important to remember that date, because it was more than fifty years ago that that country did exactly what we are proposing to do today.

During the next thirty years, both consumers and retailers in the United States found that the conditions which this situation created were unsatisfactory. In 1931 the abolition of price maintenance was replaced by the first fair trade law, in the state of California. This law proved to be so satisfactory to both consumers and retailers that today forty-five out of the forty-eight states in the United States have replaced the abolition of price maintenance with fair trade laws.

I think it is obvious that the fair trade laws in the United States are just as satisfactory to consumers as they are to retailers, because there are more consumers than there are retailers, and consumers elect governments. If the fair trade laws had not proved to be more satisfactory to the consumers than the abolition of price maintenance, these forty-five governments would have been thrown out and the fair trade laws would have been thrown out with them.

The fact that the number of state governments that have introduced fair trade laws has increased from one to forty-five in the last twenty years demonstrates clearly, I believe, that the overwhelming majority of people in the United States are satisfied with the deal they get under the fair trade laws. It also demonstrates, I believe, that both the consumers and the retailers feel that they get a better deal under these laws than they got during that period when resale price maintenance was abolished.

I do not claim for a moment that laws which are satisfactory to the people of the United States are necessarily the best for Canada. However, I think we must remember that our economy and our buying habits are similar to those of the people of the United States. Therefore if we have any sense at all, and if we feel any responsibility to the people who elected us to this parliament, we should examine very carefully indeed their experience during the past half century before embarking on new legislation of our own. We are planning to take a step which they took more than fifty years ago, a step which has proved unsatisfactory to 150 million people just to the south of us, during that fifty-year trial period. Today the step which they took more than fifty years ago has been almost unanimously revoked by the people of the United States. If we are to follow the course which this Liberal government now plans to take, we are going to turn back the clock by fifty years.

I believe the committee on resale price maintenance should be reconvened, for three reasons: First, so the small retailer can be given full opportunity to state his case in an unbiased atmosphere; second, so a concerted attempt can be made to define the loss leader and work out practical and enforceable legislation to curtail its abuses; third, so a thorough study of the fair trade laws of the United States can be made to determine if those laws can be adapted to the Canadian economy. I, for one, feel very confident that they can, because, as I have said, our economy is practically identical with the economy of the United States.

Having sat on this committee for nearly a month, I believe this legislation is hasty and ill-considered, and is merely an attempt to draw a red herring across the trail of the ever-increasing cost of living, in an effort to take the people's minds off that very real problem. I believe that without a thorough and honest investigation of this whole problem, we are going to get legislation which 150 million people in the United States have tried and discarded after a trial lasting fifty years. Can we afford to ignore the lesson which has been learned by the most industrialized nation in the world today? I believe that the answer is an emphatic "no".

Mr. Roland Beaudry (St. James): Mr. Speaker, I want to record an amazing incident which happened yesterday and which has been repeated in spots today. That is the trip taken to the land of make-believe under the guidance or direction of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson), aided and abetted in part or in whole by some on either side of this house. Let me assure you that it is a somewhat startling experience to be jolted from the corner of St. Denis and St. Catherine streets in Montreal, where I was mentally lost in the contemplation of an appealing store window, and find oneself propelled to the Barbary coast. Yet that happened to me yesterday.

But not without avail, because, there, I was allowed to witness, in the fullest possible bloom, the triumph of the merchandising and bargaining rights of the genus homo, tradesman, producer or retailer.

There, hidden behind a wide expanse of broad black backs manning the oars valiantly, if somewhat reluctantly, I was given to see with my own eyes the processes of free competitive trade, operating without interference from either state or producer. I was allowed to witness the broad play of competition at its fullest height, resulting in the privilege for the consumer to shop and bargain at his fancy, provided that he or she could preferably afford a four-in-hand, and did not mind adventures into trading which entailed flitting through the mire of the local common from butcher to draper, from draper to candlestick maker, to the spice man, the supplier of man's habiliments, to the carriage maker and the apothecary.

There 'mid the groans of unwilling labour recruited at some expense of human life, but with little other cost or remuneration, I relived during some minutes the enthralling appeal of free trade, unhampered, untrammelled and unfettered by what a sadly repentant world has come to denounce—if nowhere else at least in Canada—as the damning and soul-searing practice of resale price maintenance.

Having in a previous incarnation shown some disinclination to agree that the letters "R.P.M." must be interpreted as the mene, mene, tekel, upharsin of the consumer, my trip in the land of ministerial make-believe did me infinite good. It made me realize that even the best intentioned of us at times become forgetful of the bounties of Providence; and that, since under the leadership of this government and this party, our country has achieved an unparallelled position in the world and for each of its citizens, it perhaps might be well to not disturb this order of things.

It has often been quoted in my own language that "Le mieux est l'ennemi du bien".

Upon my return from the gold coast and the Barbary coast, from my wanderings on the common of Boston, among the chandlers and tradespeople of New Amsterdam, and in the shadow of forts Lewis, Henry and George, it was with some degree of pleasure and with no inconsiderable feeling of pride in human achievement that my disillusioned eye roved over some of the gilded, becarpeted and luxuriously fronted emporia—even those without the further inducement of live models —which the minister of make-believe took some pains to delineate before this house yesterday.

Those of our colleagues, tradespeople, merchants, druggists, whom we had at first accepted as sound people and men well regarded in their communities since they seemed to command the respect of the majority, which as the minister himself pointed out yesterday still rules—these colleagues, sir, upon my return regained some of their temporarily lost stature.

Clad as they had been in the land of make-believe in what to the fastidious were the somewhat repulsive and repellent tatters of Simon Legree and his French counterpart, Harpagon; twirling under the consumers' noses the implement for which the English equivalent fails me but which in French is known as "le tonneau des Danaïdes", behind which lurked the Medusa of resale price maintenance—they hardly qualified as representatives of the consuming public.

May I tell you, sir, that it was most gratifying upon my return to solid ground to be able to conclude that they are more than fully entitled to the original respect and tribute which has been paid each of them in his community.

An hon. Member: The land of the stratosphere.

Mr. Beaudry: Having returned from the land of make-believe may I dive headlong into the mother-sea of fact, there not to be submerged, I trust, as the McGregor fears, but to be buoyed, I hope, upon the wave of concrete fact.

We are asked to legislate on resale price maintenance and to incorporate in our statutes an amendment to the Combines Investigation Act which will make it a criminal offence (a) to maintain or induce to maintain resale prices and (b) to refuse to supply goods as a consequence of refusal to maintain prices, each, I point out, being an offence in itself and quite independently to each other.

This measure has come as a considerable surprise in many quarters in view of recent Canadian history in the field of price investigations and in terms of the speech from the throne. In recent years we have had three definite and separate experiences of sorties into the field of prices. In 1948 the special committee on prices, consisting of members of this house, sat for almost four months. Its conclusions, after having delved deeply and at length into the question of prices and the causes for the then rise of prices, were that resale price maintenance, which might have been a small contributory factor, was certainly not such a factor as to warrant attention at any length.

If the prices committee did not at that time probe deeply into the question in spite of the length of the inquiry and in spite of the ample time at its disposal, may I submit to you, sir, that this was done principally on the McGregor's advice on this matter.

I refer the house to page 210 of minutes of proceedings and evidence, No. 5, of the special committee on prices, Tuesday, February 17, 1948 in which, in answer to a question by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis), the witness, the McGregor, stated:

. . .we had no complaints in recent months and we had made no investigations in recent months. One reason may very well be, and it is a fact, that competition is working in most of the fields which are indicated in the four or five pages to which we referred yesterday.

The hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) interjected the following:

Items in the cost of living index.

The witness answered, "yes".

At page 213 during the same examination the witness was asked if there were any monopolies in the distributive trades or the manufacturing trades over the last ten years, and the answer, as found at page 213, was, "I do not think there have been in the distributive trades." At page 221—and I shall come to this later because it has a very significant bearing—there is a question by the hon. member for Calgary East (Mr. Harkness) with respect to resale price maintenance. He said:

I would take it that you do not as a general rule look upon resale price maintenance as an inimical practice?

Further, and still as a question, he said:

I take it that from the fact that the situation exists you do not look on resale price maintenance as a bad practice as far as a large number of commodities are concerned. Is that correct?

The answer was:

I have taken a pretty strong attitude in this brief on the question of resale price maintenance. I realize that a case can be argued on the other side. If these issues were all capable of being referred to as black and white it would be a very much easier job of administration. Here is a case where I think you have to examine the particular commodity and the particular circumstances in every instance.

Later he said:

I would rather examine each case on its merits and then come to a conclusion.

I said there was some surprise at the terms of this legislation. May I refer hon. members to the speech from the throne in which the government suggested that it was about to introduce legislation "arising" out of the MacQuarrie report. I now submit that the bill before the house does not arise from the MacQuarrie report. It is a strict interpretation of and a rigid adherence to every single term and every single word of the conclusions of the MacQuarrie report.

Discussing the principle of the bill yesterday, the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) prefaced his remarks with the statement that he and his party took no strong attitude either for or against this measure. That, sir, was a statement which caused no great surprise on this side of the house or anywhere in the country. It is a statement which is very well in keeping with what is sometimes referred to with some levity as the Conservative philosophy.

Contrary to the hon. gentlemen I take a very strong view of this matter. I am in accord with the principle of legislation generally covered by the bill, but I am not fully in accord with its terms because the conclusions of the MacQuarrie report, now expressed in the terms of this bill, stem from premises which, in my humble opinion, have never been established.

The hon. gentlemen who were members of the special committee on combines realize that we have no evidence on the MacQuarrie investigation; but we do have evidence on one subject, namely the request made to industry when it was invited to appear before the MacQuarrie committee. I refer to page 663 et sequentia of Hansard of this year. The Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson), moving the motion to establish a joint committee to consider the interim report, quoted the letter which had been sent from Ottawa on July 7, 1950, to industry, and I quote part of this letter as follows:

To avoid any possible misunderstanding, I desire to emphasize that no suggestions of amendments are being made to the committee for its consideration.

And further:

For its assistance in this study the committee is anxious to receive as soon as possible from organizations, firms and individuals whatever views they may wish to express upon matters within its terms of reference.

And still further:

In view of this the committee invites comments on this particular problem . . . In particular, the committee would appreciate receiving extended comments on the tentative conclusion of the royal commission.

On the same page of Hansard a repetition to this effect:

The committee expresses a desire to secure as wide an expression of views as possible.

Later on, the minister went on to say at page 664:

The views that were submitted to the MacQuarrie committee were general views upon the subject of resale price maintenance.

And further: "This presentation of views", and so forth.

Now, sir, we do know that the committee had none of the evidence submitted to the MacQuarrie group before its eyes. But we also know this, and I bring it up in respect of the contention of the Minister of Justice, expressed many times during the committee's recent sittings but more particularly at pages 246, 252, 253 and 254 of our minutes, that the burden of proof to disprove the conclusions of the MacQuarrie committee rested on the shoulders of those who were appearing before the special house committee. I contend, sir, that a great deal rests on the interpretation of the word "views".

Following a price investigation by a special committee of this house in 1948, the conclusions of which did not in any way reach into resale price maintenance; following a royal commission subsequent to the report of this committee and extending into 1949, again with no definite conclusions as to objections to resale price maintenance; in 1950, without any action from a royal commission or a house committee; without any action for over twenty-five years by the commissioner of combines against resale price maintenance—and in spite of the fact that both the present and the former commissioners agree and admit that the present act would allow and justify prosecutions against resale price maintenance, on that very score and on that score alone—industry which had first been asked to submit to a third group, which has no judicial nor legislative capacity, its "views" on the matters, was now asked to destroy the conclusions of the MacQuarrie report.

I submit, sir, that industry, the merchant, the tradesman and the manufacturer, the butcher and the candlestick maker, must have submitted views; and my contention is supported no less by the fact that when the same people were again given the same invitation to submit their views before a committee of this house no less than a month and a half ago they again did so; but the Minister of Justice found it possible, found it necessary perhaps, in respect to his conscience or to his belief—and never would I contend that his conscience or his belief are not above reproach—and imperative, to state before the committee at every possible stage that the onus of proof to destroy the conclusions of the MacQuarrie committee was upon each and every one of the witnesses who appeared before us.

Now, sir, I have felt, and others in this house have felt, that perhaps their expressions of views should have been looked at and interpreted in the light of their general definition of life, not in the light of lawyers and legislators. Nothing perhaps substantiates this belief more than what one of the two largest labour groups in the country said at page 46 of our minutes on being asked whether they had appeared before the MacQuarrie committee, and what argumentation they had submitted to that committee. They, through the voice of their public relations adviser, Dr. Forsey, stated as a preamble to their appearance before the committee, in Dr. Forsey's words:

> Second, I want to make it very clear that the congress does not regard this legislation as of vast importance or likely to be of enormous effect upon the cost of living.

At one stage, sir, I waxed slightly curious and asked this question:

> In so far as your report to the MacQuarrie committee is concerned, short though it may have been, was it substantially different from the brief we have before us?

The answer was:

> It was very much shorter, and I think—in fact it simply contented itself with saying what our attitude was.
> As I recall we did not present any argument.

Then I laboured the point slightly, and at times I was very meticulous. My question was:

> Did your report to the MacQuarrie committee include any more substantial or concrete information than the brief which is before us this morning?

And the answer was:

> Most decidedly not.

Yet, Mr. Speaker, I find at page 8 of the printed copy of the MacQuarrie report, under the heading "Submissions received" that, in general, retail associations, manufacturers, wholesalers and retailers were favourable to resale price maintenance, while on the contrary co-operatives, labour unions, farmers and consumer associations expressed opposition to the practice. Now, sir, I have dealt with one labour union. May I go on to a second witness from the same group of labour, the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada, who appeared before us. In the early part of their statement they said, on page 371 of the proceedings of the committee:

> We would like to improve the standard of living; we are not interested in just going around seeking higher wages, and we are not sure whether amending the Combines Investigation Act would help that.

Further on they state:

> We think if you set up a law of that sort in a positive sense, with a consumers' price board where these arrangements can be considered and approved in whatever form they may necessarily take, that we would be moving in a direction which would uphold the principle of free economy.

Then the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) asked this question, as it appears on page 372 of the committee proceedings:

> Q. Have you examined the draft bill on page 34 of the proceedings of this committee?
> A. I have read the original draft.
> Q. You will recall it purports to propose blanket prohibition on resale prices. Would you think that is a proper and desirable way of going about this matter that we have blanket prohibition, or if we are going to have legislation on it should it be left to determine whether in the particular case the particular type of agreement is in the given circumstances harmful to the public interest or not?

Mr. Bengough: It would have to be flexible.

Mr. Fleming: You would not favour a general prohibition?

Mr. Bengough: No.

So the members of the committee and the members of this house are in this position today, that without having access to the evidence put before the MacQuarrie committee, this evidence being privileged, and having only the evidence submitted to the committee of this house on which to rely, we are asked to agree with conclusions reported by the MacQuarrie group, conclusions for which there is not the least vestige of a premise.

There were two groups who appeared before us, the protagonists and the antagonists. The protagonists claimed that resale price maintenance should be illegal because it deprives the consumer of his shopping rights, and it deprives the retailer of his full right to compete in prices. It is claimed that the alienation of this right is detrimental to the general interest—although no proof was submitted and proof to the contrary was admitted—in that the practice has led to higher prices.

The antagonists of this measure agree that resale price maintenance limits the consumer's bargaining power but not his right of discrimination between similar commodities. Rigidity of price has been claimed as one of the other factors in resale price maintenance. Price maintenance may be on only one, a few or many articles in a wide range. Variety, it has been contended and not disproved by the evidence in the record, assures price competition at all levels. A further contention was that prices are generally lower in the range of resale price-maintained goods, this being achieved through the phenomena of higher volume, more turnover, cheaper production cost, lesser margin and a lesser price.

Of course, sir, I was forgetting to bring into this discussion the evidence of one who has been termed by the hon. member for Coast-Capilano, and by others, as the "star witness" of the committee's investigation. This "star witness" made a series of pious statements, but he scrupulously avoided any reference to actual fact. From his slightly pursed lips cascaded an avalanche of "I believe", "I opine", "I think", "I hope", but never "I prove." I turn to page 388 of the record where the "star witness" said:

My very first major inquiry related to resale price maintenance. It was started in September, 1925...

Then he went on to describe his experience. This, sir, is in opposition to a very pertinent fact, because as you will see later the "star witness" for the protagonists held himself fully capable of discussing and determining the juridical portent of the bill now before us.

The "star witness", who had experience going as far back as 1925, declared in 1948—and I shall bring his evidence before this house in a moment—that after thinking over the point and discussing it with his associates during twenty-three years' experience, he was still unable to define or redefine the section of this act which would, in fairness to everyone, be the proper legislation against resale price maintenance.

At page 389 of the committee's proceedings our star witness stated:

If only a few of the manufacturers in any one field adopted the practice, and there were plenty others who did not, the damage to the consumer through such a limiting of price competition would not be devastating.

But, Mr. Speaker, nowhere in the 388 pages of evidence which precede this statement has it been proven that his contention was either true or untrue.

At page 390 the McGregor gives an "opinion", but this time he states it very clearly:

In my opinion, for the reasons I have indicated...

I should be deeply grateful, Mr. Speaker, to anyone in this house who would quote from this record what reasons have been indicated. The McGregor says:

In my opinion, for the reasons I have indicated, the combines act in its present form is not sufficient to prevent such action. The act needs amendment.

Further down on the same page he said:

The extension of the practice in recent years has been alarming. If it continues it will not be long before price control by manufacturers will become the rule in the distributive trade and price competition the exception . . .

But, gentlemen, you have all heard the pious reference, made in 1948, to the fact that over a period of years of the McGregor's experience, there was no lack of competition in the distributive trades. Now, of course, the extension of this practice "has been alarming". Indeed, so alarming has it become that later in his testimony the McGregor states that so far as he can ascertain—and again in his opinion I submit—over a period of almost thirty years, this practice, which at this stage has reached such "alarming" proportions, may have increased from 5 per cent of the volume of trade in 1925 to the alarming figure of perhaps 15 per cent in 1951. I submit to you, Mr. Speaker, that if we continue at this "alarming" rate almost three centuries would elapse before we were engulfed and thoroughly upset by this alarming phenomenon of resale price maintenance.

It is unfortunate, sir, that time prevents me from going through each of the opinions of our star witness, but here is one I should like to bring to your attention. It is another of the pious statements he made so frequently and with so little difficulty. Referring to the attitude of the "other fellow"—as he stated it—one wonders how many "peculiar" industries there are.

That word is in quotation marks even on the record, so there must have been a quotation either in his voice or in his script, although, Mr. Speaker, most members of this house and all members of the committee know that it is easier for me to refer to the record than to his printed brief, because his printed brief was submitted only after he had put his contentions verbally on the record.

But please give your attention for a moment to the connotation of: One wonders how many "peculiar" industries there are in Canada; because turning back to page 597 of the record —again the McGregor being on the witness stand—he was asked in reference to one statement made by a witness in the retail drug trade, who had stated that it would be very difficult and in his own words, very rough, he being a manufacturer, if the business he had taken thirty years to build up could be left to be destroyed overnight by the decision of an independent dealer; the McGregor is being asked:

> There is a case where a manufacturer says it is against his interest if retail price maintenance was not followed and he feels obviously very deeply about it. What would you say as to his argument?

Then the great, the ecstatic, the pious McGregor says:

> I think this particular group is one again you would classify as one of the "peculiar" industries.

I could go on, sir, ad infinitum and certainly much longer than this house would condescend to listen, going through these gems and pearls that came from the "star witness". I may say that at page 400, dealing with the question of loss leadership, the star witness emitted this pearl—

An hon. Member: Loss leadership?

An hon. Member: That is a Liberal.

Mr. Beaudry: Yes, I am a Liberal, if you are interested. He said:

> The big stores seldom resort to such a practice. When they do, there may or may not be economic justification for this action.

This, Mr. Speaker, from the man who for twenty-five years fought monopoly and who at this stage was the "star witness"; and this is not my description but that of those who not only would fight monopoly but who—I prefer to think, without perhaps deep enough thought—would cause serious permanent injury to a great many people in Canada.

Sir, on that and on much more evidence of this type both sides, the protagonists and the antagonists, rest. Of course, there was much discussion. In committee a great deal was said and a great deal was adduced in evidence, mostly through members—more so than through witnesses—to the effect that resale price maintenance in Great Britain and in the United States was in one case perhaps bad and in one case perhaps good; but that at any rate the proposed legislation in Great Britain was of great impact and it was something upon which we in this country could base our judgment.

Mr. Speaker, I call your attention to this fact. Yesterday, the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) while presenting his argument pointed out, for instance, that in Great Britain the increase in the retail drug trade had gone on at such a rapid pace that from 8,000 to 9,000 new stores a year were being opened, and that this constituted a great indictment against the practice of resale price maintenance. Let me say that we have in this country figures which do not necessitate that we should go to Great Britain. We have in this country figures which in this case were supplied to me by the counsel for our committee; and these figures indicate that the drug stores in this country which in 1930 numbered 3,267, in 1941 numbered 3,595, while evidence before us in 1951 brought up the figure to somewhere about 4,500. It would seem to indicate, sir, that perhaps we should remain in this country to discuss this argument and to get the full import of the mass of other arguments which have been brought forward.

Mr. Speaker, I feel that I have gone over my time, but if the house could be lenient with me for a short matter of minutes it would be a matter of privilege not only for me but a matter of privilege for the entire house because it would permit me, I assure the house, to avoid speaking on the amendment and being repetitious; and I must say that I dislike to be repetitious. Mr. Speaker, may I ask leave to speak for a few more minutes?

Mr. Speaker: Has the hon. member for St James leave?

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Mr. Knowles: I do not think it would be fair. We stopped the hon. member for Coast-Capilano (Mr. Sinclair); and others since he spoke have confined themselves to forty minutes.

Mr. Speaker: I think we gave one hon. member two minutes extra.

Mr. Knowles: All right, but only two minutes.

Mr. Speaker: If it is the unanimous wish of the house, the hon. member may continue.

An hon. Member: For two minutes.

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Beaudry: Mr. Speaker, it is disturbing that, here also, time prevents me from bringing forward the wealth of proof which is on the record; but I commend the record to the attention of each hon. member before he formulates a definite opinion as to whether he should be for or against this legislation.

There is just this I want to say in conclusion. Many people have wondered why I am taking the attitude I am taking against this legislation. Let me say this to them. I represent in this house probably a greater number of shopkeepers and tradespeople than any other hon. member. Anyone who is familiar with St. Catherine, St. Lawrence, St. Denis, Amherst, Rachel, Mount Royal, Craig, St. James, Notre Dame and St. Paul streets in my riding will appreciate what I mean. The number and the interests of these people make it easy to understand why at times I have been perhaps too strong in upholding what I believe to be their viewpoint.

In one respect their situation is like mine. They, and I with them, may be convinced that the present bill is not a piece of legislation which will stand out among the achievements of this government. Yet they, and I with them, would hesitate to condemn the government because among its vast number of brilliant brain children it had allowed one to creep in which did not exactly scintillate.

Frankly, when I compare this bill with any of the other legislation that has been brought into the house by the government since I have been here, the bill does not gain stature. Frankly I dislike the bill. I dislike it as it is presented, although the addition of a few words would make it highly palatable. I dislike it because I fear the far-reaching effects which are not necessarily noticeable to the naked eye. In this respect I find myself in league with the small merchants of the country whose fears, well-founded or not, were clearly expressed during the sittings of the committee. Yet the addition of a few words would make it palatable. I find myself now in the position of having to determine my conduct henceforth.

Some hon. Members: Time.

Mr. Beaudry: If I may be permitted to determine my conduct, I promise to be finished after that. Strangely enough this conduct was crystallized by me a few nights ago—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member has spoken more than his allotted time. Shall I allow him to continue?

Some hon. Members: No.

Some hon. Members: Go on.

Mr. Beaudry: Mr. Speaker, I have been careful in not taking up too much of the time of the house at this or any other session. I shall be most grateful for being allowed on this occasion to finish.

I was saying that, strangely enough, the course which I am now going to follow was crystallized for me a very few nights ago in the course of a conversation I had with one of our colleagues, with whom my association dates back twenty-five long years, to the days when both he and I were playing professional hockey. I refer to the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Conacher). While he went on to scale the heights of athletic glory, as one of the greatest players on some of the greatest teams, I remained a back-bencher there, also. Yet having undergone the same tribulations in our younger days; and having served under the same men in different circumstances and at different times, and having served under other men, we like to recall those experiences.

It was precisely during one of those talks that I realized that many a time we had had disagreements of opinion with managers or coaches in particular games and concerning particular plays. Yet it never would have occurred to either of us, or to any of our teammates, to deny the coach our confidence because of some isolated instance of disapproval respecting some particular play or game. We felt at that time, and we still feel, that so long as the coach was successful in the task entrusted to him he was entitled to our loyalty and support. And over the years neither he nor I have seen anything to warrant the altering of that concept.

I have a young son who celebrated his tenth birthday last week. One of the fondest memories he will treasure is that as one of his birthday presents—

Mr. Fair: I should like to get a word in, if I may.

Some hon. Members: Time.

Mr. Beaudry: —he had a chat with the Prime Minister of his country. To my son I shall impart this guidance, that as a member of the team he must follow the coach. And today my son's father finds himself in the position of determining for himself whether in the over-all pattern of this country's administration, an isolated event connected with a piece of legislation which he dislikes and fears, would justify his negation of confidence in the head of the team, or in the government as a whole.

Some hon. Members: Time.

Mr. Beaudry: What is the father's precept to the son will be the father's tenet.

Mr. Robert Fair (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, I shall not take long. I do not intend to speak for fifty minutes. I am in favour of the government's legislation and, in order to get home in time for Christmas, I am leaving tonight.

Mr. W. G. Blair (Lanark): Mr. Speaker, I feel I should say something with respect to this bill, because I was a member of the committee. It is true I became a member of it a week or ten days after it had begun its sittings. However, I was anxious to learn something about this matter because I entered the committee, as I stated in the committee itself, with an unbiased mind and without any idea of being an obstructionist so far as the legislation was concerned.

For the first few times I attended I listened with keen interest, because I wanted to find out something about the bill. It is not usual for a person to want to serve on a committee; but I went there for the purpose of learning. It is amazing to me to realize the number of people who do not know the definitions of the terms "resale price maintenance" or "loss leader". We have heard criticism of the committee this afternoon, and I should like to add my criticism of it.

This legislation was announced in the speech from the throne. There were three evenings during the session when, for want of work to do, we adjourned at five o'clock. If this legislation had been brought in earlier in the session and a reasonable chance given to study it, then I would feel that I would know enough about it either to reject or support the bill. But at the present time I must say frankly that from the information I have received I cannot support it.

During the time we were on the committee several things happened that changed an unbiased mind into a mind that was beginning to form an opinion about this matter. The first thing that struck me was the fact that one morning some thousands of retailers, through their counsel, wanted to be heard before the committee. The ruling was: "No, we will not hear you. We have heard some other parts of your brief from some parent organization." Then I felt that when we were inquiring into something as important as this, and when thousands of retailers could be turned away without a hearing the procedure of the committee was not democratic, and there was something wrong with it.

The next thing that bothered me a great deal was the attitude of the counsel to the committee. I have the greatest respect for the learned profession. I know they are criticized, as the members of my own profession are criticized. But while doctors develop a bedside manner, possibly lawyers develop a courtroom manner. I felt from the questioning of the counsel there one day that the witness was put in the position of a prisoner in the box who had committed a crime. In this instance the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Hees) and the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) protested vigorously about the attitude of the counsel to the committee. Next day it was much better. But I could not help feeling that a witness who came in to give his best opinion, whether for or against the legislation, should not be treated in that way.

Some of these things helped me to make up my mind, so far as the legislation is concerned. In fact the attitude of the committee brought one thing to my mind, and it was this: that as applied to the retailers it might have been suitable if they had been told, "Abandon hope, all ye retailers who enter here". That is what was absolutely wrong about this committee, in addition to the fact that it was brought into being too late.

There were certain things about which I wanted to get information. I wanted to find out certain things about matters in which those people were concerned. One of the things mentioned in their brief indicated that there was in their minds some question of price fixing or combines in connection with obtaining cement, and that the western people were concerned about the trouble in getting fertilizers and the position in which the agencies were placed. I could obtain no information on those things.

The problem facing every person in this country today is the high cost of living. It has been said half a dozen times this afternoon that this legislation was brought in to try to make the people believe this government was doing something about the cost of living. They have been bitterly criticized on that account, and the reaction of the people in five by-elections shows that they are very much interested in the high cost of living.

I feel that the committee did not have the time or opportunity to make a proper study of this legislation. The matter is too big and too important. If it is going to affect the small retailer as we believe it will, we should give further study to it and try to bring in a bill that will be the best possible for this country.

The hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Hees) referred this afternoon to the fair trade laws in the United States. Forty-five states have enacted these laws. In the United States the consumer, the retailer and the manufacturer all seem to be quite happy and satisfied. Something like that is worth studying before we hurriedly bring in a bill of this type in what I hope are the closing days of the session. It should receive more study instead of a heated debate for twenty-four hours in this chamber and then pushed through to a vote. As has been suggested this afternoon, we will be studying this matter later when we see its consequences upon the public.

I stated that very few people are really aware what resale price maintenance means. As authority for this I will take the report of the MacQuarrie committee. I find it stated in the interim report that resale price maintenance means the right of the manufacturer of a product to establish the price at which it will be sold. I think that should be placed in simple language before the people of this country. It is not an agreement between a manufacturer and his competitors to keep up prices. We should be clear on that matter. I was interested to note that in the committee certain things continually came into the discussion, rather than the broad picture of all commodities in which we would be interested. It was amazing to find that the one thing that was recurring was aspirin and the other was mixmasters. Then there was one other, the cost of dry cell batteries, and also paint brushes. I shall have something to say about aspirin and its effect on the pharmaceutical trade later on.

I come now to this matter of loss leaders. The minister sat opposite to me most of the time in the committee when we were talking about this matter of loss leaders. It is generally agreed that it is a vicious practice in merchandising. I went to the MacQuarrie committee report to obtain a definition of loss leader, and the following will be found on page 25:

> The second practice, called the "loss-leader" device, is an aggressive weapon designed to attract customers for a whole range of goods by a particular part of selective and excessive price-cutting. Usually a well-known brand is used as "loss-leader" and it is sold at a price which has no direct relation to cost and may even result in a net loss.

I remember that this matter of loss leader was under discussion in the committee one day and I made the remark that it was difficult to legislate against something that was hard to define. I am not going to repeat what has been said since this debate started, but I should like to refer again to the MacQuarrie report which admits that price maintenance prevents two possible forms of monopolistic practice which tend to produce unreasonable retail prices; first, the use of monopoly power at the retail level and, second, the loss leader device.

We all admit, and we found out in the committee, that the loss-leader type of merchandising is a vicious practice. The minister himself admitted that in the committee; I remember that he took my word that it is difficult to legislate against something which cannot be defined. I came upon a most amazing thing on the last page of the MacQuarrie report. This type of merchandising is a vicious practice, and I quote from the MacQuarrie report as follows:

> As to the "loss-leader" device, the committee believes that it is a monopolistic practice which does not promote general welfare and therefore considers that it is not compatible with the public interest.

That is true so far as it goes.

> However, we do not believe that it presents any immediate danger: extreme forms of price-cutting are not very likely in this period of inflation and relative scarcity. Moreover, we are convinced that there can be found other effective and more desirable methods of controlling the "loss-leader" than minimum resale price maintenance.

This last statement is important.

> Present circumstances afford time to make a careful study of such methods and the committee, therefore, does not think it imperative to make an immediate and hasty recommendation regarding that practice.

If the loss-leader device in merchandising is a vicious practice, why is something not being done about it now? If the answer is in the present legislation on combines, why has something not been done before this?

There are advantages in resale price maintenance. One has to admit that. In practising resale price maintenance the manufacturer places the small merchant in a better competitive position because the practice of resale price maintenance is against the loss-leader practice. The other people whom we must consider are the consumers. There is something to be said for resale price maintenance so far as the consumer is concerned. This creates a common price for the same article no matter where it is bought.

Another way in which resale price maintenance is valuable is that the consumer is ensured against high prices in times of scarcity. These things should be considered. We should not become prejudiced against something that will really do good in the end.

There is another matter. We have spoken a great many times about competition. I have always been interested in name brands. I have found it impossible to be an authority on every single commodity that I buy. I could not judge a watch, and I certainly am a poor judge of textiles. So many things enter into our life that we have come to look upon the name brand as a mark of quality. I certainly could not look into a watch and tell that that was the best movement I could find in keeping with my purse. Therefore I depend on certain established brand names, since I look on them as a mark of quality. I have found during my life that it is better to buy something that has a brand on it because you are sure of the type of commodity that you are buying, rather than to go adventuring in certain unnamed types of merchandise. I have found it a protection in so far as I am concerned because I could not afford to buy something that was useless and would not last. I have taken a watch as a comparison, but in the whole field of watches you can start with well known brands like Waltham and Elgin and go all the way down the list until you find a name brand that will fit your purse. Behind it there is a guarantee of quality by a reputable company.

There were some other things that bothered me so far as the deliberations of the committee were concerned. I wondered with respect to the legislation now being introduced whether it would be possible to enforce something like that. Could it possibly be done by law? I came to the conclusion that it would require more men than we have in the armed forces at the present time to enforce a law of this type. I am also very much concerned about the cost of living, and I came to the conclusion that this measure will have little or no effect in so far as the cost of living is concerned. When I had the opportunity I went into many stores, and I was certainly seeking for the truth. I found that very many things sold in the stores have nothing to do with resale price maintenance.

The first person I went to was a grocer, and altogether I visited several stores. By the word "grocer" I mean people who sell food, because I include them all; and the odd butcher shop carries a line of groceries. I could only find three or four items in the whole stock carried by stores engaged in selling groceries that were price-maintained, and they were mainly luxury items. I found that cocoa and some food products such as salad dressing and cream cheese are price-maintained, and that so far as all the rest are concerned very few products are price-maintained. Food is a very important commodity at the present time. Everybody is interested in the cost of food.

Then I made further inquiries as to such commodities as sugar, flour, suits of clothes, ladies dresses and wearing apparel; and very few were price-maintained with the possible exception of men's wear. A well known brand of hat or a certain type of shoe was price-maintained. However, there is nothing which compels the buyer to resort to articles which are price-maintained. He can purchase if he so desires certain articles that are not price-maintained in every kind of commodity.

I next visited people engaged in the tobacco trade, and there one finds a certain type of individual in small stores all throughout the country. I was amazed at the number of veterans, some of whom were pensionable, who had started little stores in an effort to re-establish themselves. You would find them running a service station and selling a little tobacco. I found widows and persons who are physically unfit running little stores in outlying parts of the town. They did not carry very much stock but one of the things they carried was tobacco. Then I ascertained the number of retail tobacco people in Canada, and I found there are 90,000 outlets. This matter was not put before the joint committee and I lacked information and still do so far as the tobacco trade is concerned.

Personally I am concerned about these little people who are running stores. Then I investigated the percentage of profit made by those with little stores and I found that those retailing tobacco make a gross profit of 10·48 per cent, which in these days is not exorbitant. The public are inclined to blame the tobacconists for high prices when they are not at all to blame, and the amazing thing is the fact that 60 per cent of the price of cigarettes goes to the government.

With reference to mixmasters, I remember the day in the house when we were discussing the budget and we appealed to the government not to put a further tax on essential household articles such as electric appliances. Additional government taxation and increased sales tax brings up the price of such commodities, and the public surely should not be led to believe that the increase in the prices of these commodities is due to the fact that their resale price is maintained. The government is making a lot of money out of it. The government takes most of the money in so far as their price is concerned.

I was amazed, and in this I make no appeal for sympathy, at the number of veterans who are conducting small stores trying to eke out a living. I am interested in the person with the small store. He should have a chance to live. When I found veterans running stores trying to eke out a living because of the size of their pensions or war veterans allowance, then I certainly felt that nothing should be done to prejudice their position. I then went to see people in the jewelry trade. I learned in the committee that practically no watches are manufactured in Canada. There is only one type of watch manufactured in this country, the Westclox, which with all due respect to the firm is a cheaper type of watch. All other watches that we have in Canada are made in Switzerland, although some of them are cased in this country.

That is one thing we found out in the committee but, as I said before, there is a measure of protection in the names of certain types of the better grades of watches. I went to a jeweler and said: "What do you think about this thing? How does it affect you?" He did not speak for a minute. He just looked at me, went to the window and took out two diamonds in cases. They were obviously engagement rings. He said: "You must remember that the small jeweler has not behind him a name like Ryrie-Birks; we have to depend on certain branded types of merchandise in order to be sure." When the average young man goes to purchase such a thing he is certainly in a jittery state and is no judge of diamonds. This jeweler showed me one name brand of diamond he sold and said, "I can guarantee this, and the customer will know what he is getting when he buys this brand." Then he showed me the other diamond that had no name and I said, "I do not know whether or not it is good". He said, "I just wanted to assure you that it is not. It is not worth half as much as the other but I can sell it for twice as much, and no young man will be aware of what is happening." Therefore so far as the jewelry trade is concerned, and I include in that silverware and certain other commodities, we come back to the point that the average buyer is no judge. One could not possibly be a judge of all commodities, and when we go to buy jewelry or anything in a jewelry store we have to depend on certain name products.

The next people concerned were the druggists. Of all retailers the druggists have certainly taken it on the jaw so far as criticism is concerned. Everybody seems to be after the druggists. I noticed that people generally seem to have adopted the attitude of the committee because when I asked certain people about the druggists—and again I honestly say I have made inquiries as to the public attitude—they always said to me, "What about aspirin?" Surely something more is sold in a drug store than aspirin. Let us go into this aspirin question, because I am sick and tired of people saying to me: "What about aspirin?" I am going to tell the story. Let us scotch this thing once and for all. About 40 years ago, or sometime later, when salicylic acid was discovered, one company put it out first under the trade name "aspirin", and the name was registered. But all other pharmaceutical houses sooner or later followed suit, and the peculiar thing was that they named their product "aspirin". I do not know why. They thought that the chemist who discovered it called it "aspirin" and they followed suit, and all the pharmaceutical houses throughout America, in fact, placed this product on the market under the name "aspirin". For thirty or forty years nothing was done about it; aspirin was the name. It became the name of the household commodity. The name was common, and owing to the advertising on the radio by one well-known company the name became very, very well known.

A short time ago the Bayer people clamped down and said: "This is our trade name. You cannot sell that product. If any drug store sells this product, or if any of you people or other pharmaceutical houses put it out with the name 'aspirin' on the bottle, then you are subject to a fine under the laws affecting trade marks". So all the other pharmaceutical houses had to hustle around and find new names. So they picked on the names like A.S.A., acetylsalicylic acid, cetasal, cetyloid, and all that sort of thing. But after 40 years it is pretty hard for the public to start learning these names. Therefore when you go into the drug store and ask for aspirin the druggist is legally compelled to give you Bayer's aspirin and nothing else. If any consumer knows that he can walk into a drug store and ask for acetylsalicylic acid, 5 grains or A.S.A. tablets, or cetasal, or cetyloid, or any of the names, then he can get it at about one-quarter of the price. There is no doubt about that. But that was, I was going to say, sharp practice so far as the firm was concerned. It certainly was pretty sharp business practice. I understand that the story is this. No other country in the world permits this law in regard to aspirin. The name has been accepted in Canada, and when you ask for aspirin you have to buy Bayer's. There is some reason behind that. I understand—I may be subject to correction—that when this matter came before the Supreme Court of Canada the pharmaceutical people thought there was nothing to it and they did not make an appearance and judgment was given in favour of the Bayer people.

I am very much concerned, Mr. Speaker, about the position of the druggists. As I said, they have been open to a great deal of criticism, criticism in the committee and criticism in this house. The public are being taught to believe that they are people who insist on tremendously high margins of profit in connection with the manufacturing pharmaceutical people themselves. But I want you to remember this when you talk about the druggists. They occupy a dual position. They are professional people, and they are merchants. Nobody can run a drug store unless he has had four years' training. This is demanded by the laws of the province. As I said, they have a dual position. Owing to the fact that they are professional men I think that some of the criticism is entirely unjustified. It may be that there are certain commodities which do cost a great deal, but I want you to remember that so far as the druggists and drugstore items are concerned, the people seem to have an idea that they should buy these items at the old prices. They are not taking into consideration either high costs or rising prices, and they have never considered the question of inflation.

One might put it this way. There was a time when the public generally thought that a box of pills was worth 50 cents, no matter what it contained, and they are still looking for a 50-cent box of pills. Conditions in the drug trade have absolutely changed. As I said in the committee, there was a time when they were apothecaries, and the doctors were inclined to write prescriptions with probably ten and twelve ingredients in them. The druggists had to make all the ointments themselves. They had to roll the pills and do all that sort of stuff, but conditions are quite different now. A lot of these commodities used by doctors are put out in a bottle, possibly with the prescription on the side of the bottle, showing the potency in unit strength. When a doctor, being interested in his patient, wishes to prescribe he naturally wants to get the best product possible. I do not mind bringing firms into this debate, because firms like Burroughs Wellcome, Parke-Davis, Eli Lilly and so forth, are people who cannot afford to put out a product which is lacking in potency or in unit strength; and doctors in prescribing sometimes specify products of a certain type of the company which will make a certain pill of a certain tincture, or a pharmaceutical.

That is very important. The public should understand that. I think it was shown in one of the briefs presented from England that there was an outgrowth of people who had sort of horned into this trade, particularly in the proprietary preparations, and in consideration of this one must remember and the public must be taught—and I find it in my own practice so often—that if you are going to get the best for a patient you must be careful what type of thing you prescribe.

[Mr. Blair.]

Let us assume, as I have used the heart case before, that you have a heart case requiring tincture of digitalis. Certainly if a man appears in my office with swollen legs and is puffy on exertion, and that sort of thing, and I want to prescribe digitalis I want the best tincture that is available. It is not sufficient just to say tinctura digitalis, because these things are not measured in potency in this country. That is true. It does not seem to be a matter of protecting the doctor or the public in the matter of rating the potent strength of these commodities, the unit strength. Therefore you give them the best possible thing you can buy, and sometimes it costs more.

I listed in the committee for the purpose of explanation a preparation like vitamin B complex. You will pay what you might consider a high price for that preparation, possibly $5 for a hundred tablets made by a highly reputable firm, who place their integrity on the prescription that is on the front of the bottle. But you can buy these from certain wholesale people without any prescription on the bottle for probably a quarter of the price. These people are always very cagey; they never put the prescription or the unit strength on the bottle, but to the public it is all the one thing. They are getting the one drug. These are matters that are worthy of consideration.

I cannot see where any change in the small percentage of resale price-maintained consumer goods that are sold in drug stores is going to be a factor in the cost of living, because it has the advantage of putting a ceiling above as well as a floor beneath, particularly on commodities like drugs. It is not a factor in the cost of living when you come to a bill like this and find that the per capita expenditure in all drug stores on items that are price marked or otherwise over the year 1950 was $16.50 for each person in Canada on drugs, and that includes all the commodities in a drug store. But again I say that if you do consider some of these things as being high in price, nobody is compelled to buy resale price-maintained goods.

The main conclusion in the MacQuarrie report about resale price maintenance certainly is not true so far as I am concerned. I heard the minister talking about cough syrup, back plasters and cough lozenges, but he did not mention Lydia Pinkham. Remember that these things are not prescribed by any doctor who has a reputation he wishes to protect. A reputable doctor in good standing certainly is not going to prescribe Smith Brothers cough lozenges. I ask how you are going to control prices of the so-called proprietary medicines. Naturally I do not hold that proprietary medicines serve a purpose; being a doctor I cannot feel that they do. But I do say that if the public want to buy them they have the right to do so. Let us take a commodity like Lydia Pinkham's vegetable compound which is marked at $2 and is price-maintained. Where are you going to arrive if you go back to find the value of the drugs in this commodity? These formulas are registered in Ottawa, and that would be easily ascertained. Again I say that I do not want to be put in the position of criticizing these goods, because when you criticize them it sometimes acts as a boost. After all, the public have the right to buy these things if they want to buy them.

I come back again to that matter of quality brands. This afternoon several speakers mentioned this aspect of the problem. There is no occupation where quality brands are more important than that of a druggist. There are two objectives in resale price maintenance. So far as drugs are concerned, the first is the prestige of the manufacturer and the high grade article he puts out. The other objective is the protection of the druggist by assuring him a proper margin. It protects the consumer because the prices are the same in all stores. If it were not for resale price maintenance the small merchant would be at the mercy of the chain drug store.

I have aproached this matter as conscientiously as any person ever could. If this were something that would cut down the cost of living, I would be in favour of it. I have not been convinced that it is going to accomplish that object. I do not believe it is going to make any impact on the cost of living, and the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) admits that. It is going to destroy the small businesses which are so important in all the towns throughout the country. It is going to kill the small druggist who is furnishing a service in the outlying districts. The larger businesses will probably absorb some of the small merchants. The chain stores and departmental stores will have a big advantage. If resale price maintenance is wrong in so far as the drug trade is concerned, then it has been wrong for a long time. It has taken forty-one years for this to come to the surface. If it is going to be of such tremendous advantage to the public, as a member of the opposition I will say it has taken the government a long time to find out that this practice is harmful to the Canadian consumer. Do not forget that pharmacists are professional men. They should have more protection than will be afforded in the legislation we have before us. Back of that is the question of the health of the Canadian people. In the committee Mr. McGregor almost made a statement—I accused him of saying it and he said the words were put in his mouth—about wiping out the small, inefficient stores. We cannot afford to wipe out the small, inefficient stores.

The druggists have been forced into the position of selling other commodities. Some of them have been forced to sell sandwiches, lunches and in the outlying districts, even groceries. These stores still furnish a service to the community. I have never found a druggist who would not get up at two or three o'clock in the morning to fill a prescription. I dislike the fact that this legislation seems to be aimed at the druggists. I am tired, Mr. Speaker, of hearing people say, "Well, what about aspirin?"

Mr. Wilfrid LaCroix (Quebec-Montmorency): Monsieur l'Orateur, je serai bref. Permettez-moi seulement de vous dire que je trouve étrange l'attitude des conservateurs en ce qui concerne le bill présentement à l'étude, et il n'est qu'un mot, à mon point de vue, qui puisse synthétiser la politique qu'ils défendent aujourd'hui, après en avoir défendu une différente il y a à peine quelques semaines: "Hypocrisie".

En effet, qui de nous ne se souvient des déclarations de l'honorable chef de l'Opposition (M. Drew), alors qu'il accusait le très honorable premier ministre (M. St-Laurent) d'adopter des procédés dilatoires, de manquer de courage et de céder devant la pression qu'exerçait la haute finance, en décidant de référer ce projet de loi à un comité de la Chambre. Monsieur l'Orateur, ils viennent enfin de montrer leur vrai visage de protecteurs des gros intérêts et de la haute finance.

Je comprends qu'un travail de coulisse considérable s'est effectué en vue d'empêcher l'adoption de ce bill. On prétend que le petit détaillant sera éliminé des affaires; c'est là un des principaux arguments que l'on invoque. Des incidents amusants se sont produits à ce sujet. Un petit marchand a écrit à son député pour lui demander de le protéger et, histoire de donner plus de saveur à son argumentation, il lui faisait parvenir, en même temps, une lettre du manufacturier, dans laquelle il demandait à son client d'écrire à son député, suivant ses indications.

Au contraire, je prétends qu'un petit marchand, dont les frais d'administration sont peu élevés, pourra plus facilement faire concurrence à qui que ce soit.

D'ailleurs, si un grand magasin à succursales tentait de vendre certains articles à perte ou suivant des procédés peu recommandables, on n'aurait qu'à appliquer avec rigueur l'article 498A du Code criminel, lequel prévoit ces cas.

On prétend que la nouvelle législation n'est pas nécessaire. Alors pourquoi le rapport MacQuarrie, et que dire de l'opinion d'un économiste aussi éminent que le principal de l'université Queen's et pourquoi aussi l'enquête Stevens? Tous se souviennent que M. Stevens a été mis à la porte du cabinet Bennett parce qu'il insistait pour qu'on suive la même politique à l'égard de ces grands monopolisateurs des prix et du coût de la vie.

De plus, pourquoi les manufacturiers et les distributeurs, qui s'opposent avec tant d'énergie à la régie des prix, en général, auraient-ils le privilège d'exercer une maîtrise spéciale, à leur profit, et seraient-ils même autorisés à punir les réfractaires, qui vendent à un prix inférieur à celui qui leur est indiqué par le manufacturier, en refusant de leur vendre toute marchandise?

Voici d'ailleurs ce qu'on lisait à ce sujet dans le journal l'Evénement de Québec, lundi le 10 décembre 1951:

> Fidèle à l'engagement qu'il avait pris, de suivre l'avis d'une commission parlementaire sur la fixation des prix par les manufacturiers ou les grossistes, le gouvernement propose une loi pour interdire ce contrôle non officiel. C'est un pas dans la bonne voie. L'opposition annonce qu'elle combattra cette mesure. Ainsi donc, après tant de discours de son chef en faveur d'une régie des prix et de la distribution équitable des vivres, le partie conservateur ne veut plus que l'autorité intervienne dans les affaires. C'est une contradiction à noter. Dans cette fausse position, les partisans du colonel Drew posent en champions de la liberté du commerce. Mais la liberté du commerce consiste, semble-t-il, à laisser aux marchands détaillants le soin de vendre leurs marchandises à leur convenance. L'opposition ne l'entend pas de cette façon. Elle perd donc le crédit de ses campagnes oratoires en faveur de la fixation des prix par le gouvernement. En effet, si le gouvernement décide enfin de protéger le consommateur par intervention législative, sa loi de contrôle s'appliquera à tous les producteurs de l'industrie ou de l'agriculture. Selon toute apparence, l'opposition approuverait alors le principe de cette mesure, à condition qu'elle ne s'appliquât point à la fixation des prix par les manufacturiers ou les grossistes. Quelle belle occasion pour le gouvernement de confondre ses adversaires, en donnant satisfaction au peuple qui compte sur lui pour obtenir protection contre tous les profiteurs. Pourquoi remettre à plus tard une action aussi nécessaire au bien-être des classes laborieuses!

Trois enquêtes ont démontré que le public était exploité honteusement par le privilège qu'avaient les grands manufacturiers de fixer le prix de vente au détail de leurs marchandises; et malgré cela, les conservateurs trouvent moyen de se faire les défenseurs de ces exploiteurs de la grande masse des consommateurs canadiens.

[Mr. LaCroix.]

Permettez-moi, monsieur l'Orateur, de leur dire bien en face qu'ils sont des farceurs; farceurs, en effet, lorsqu'ils présentent des motions à la Chambre, protestant contre l'augmentation du coût de la vie, pour ensuite s'opposer dès que l'occasion s'offre d'en abaisser le niveau; farceurs, lorsqu'ils préconisent la régie des prix et que, lorsqu'une occasion se présente de permettre au peuple de régir lui-même les prix en laissant à la libre entreprise et à la libre concurrence l'occasion et le privilège de s'exercer en toute liberté, ils s'y opposent; farceurs, en effet, lorsque le parti conservateur réclame la régie des prix par le Gouvernement et veut, en même temps, la laisser entre les mains des manufacturiers; farceurs, lorsqu'ils parlent d'inflation et s'opposent à l'adoption d'une mesure qui permettrait d'en diminuer l'ampleur; farceurs, lorsqu'ils parlent de protéger le public contre l'exploitation des gros intérêts et que, l'occasion se présentant de permettre à ce même public d'acheter les produits et les objets indispensables à l'existence à prix convenables, ils veulent l'empêcher de ce faire, comme nous en avons la démonstration dans ce débat.

Le parti conservateur a peut-être gagné des élections partielles jusqu'à maintenant, en prêchant contre la hausse du coût de la vie, mais, aujourd'hui même, il se montre au public canadien sous son vrai jour, et sonne le glas de son succès électoral.

Monsieur l'Orateur, qu'il me soit permis de féliciter le Gouvernement de l'attitude courageuse qu'il a adoptée, malgré l'influence de la haute finance. Il a démontré, une fois de plus, que le parti libéral, sans avoir atteint la perfection, est cependant de beaucoup plus près du peuple que les conservateurs.

Quant au parti conservateur, il vient de démontrer, une fois de plus, son incapacité à comprendre les vrais intérêts de la grande masse des consommateurs, que constitue la population de ce pays.

En outre, il prouve aujourd'hui comme toujours, qu'il a les yeux largement ouverts sur ceux qui alimentent sa vaisse électorale et fait seulement semblant d'avoir un oeil entr'ouvert sur le peuple canadien.

(Translation):

The wage-earner, the man with a set income and the farmer know how much they have to pay for medicine when, unfortunately, some illness strikes their family, or else for those items which are essential to the running of a farm or to the very life of the home. They are not likely, therefore, to forget this unfortunate attitude of the Tory party.

The people have been sufficiently exploited by the middleman, to the advantage of certain monopolies. It was time the government acted and I congratulate it on having done so.

(Text):

Mr. Speaker, may I repeat in English what I have already said in French. I will be brief. Allow me to say that I find the attitude of the Conservatives toward this bill rather strange, and that there comes to my mind but one word which can, from my point of view, adequately express the policy they advocate today after having advocated a different one a few short weeks ago. That word is "hypocrisy".

Is there anyone here who has forgotten the statements made by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) who was then charging the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) with adopting dilatory tactics, lacking courage and giving in to moneyed interests by deciding to refer this bill to a committee of the house? At last, Mr. Speaker, the Conservatives have shown their true colours as protectors of powerful interests and high finance.

I understand there has been considerable lobbying in an effort to block passage of this bill. One of the main arguments brought forward is that this will mean the end of the small retailer. Some amusing incidents have taken place in this respect. A small merchant wrote to his member of parliament to ask for his protection. To add flavour to his argument he sent him a letter he had received from the manufacturer, in which the latter asked him to write to his member of parliament according to his suggestions.

On the contrary, I suggest that a small shopkeeper whose overhead is not very high can more easily compete with anybody.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, in view of the rule you have followed on different occasions, I should like to ask whether the speech which is being read by the hon. member was prepared for the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Fulford).

Mr. Fulford: What would I have to do with it?

Mr. LaCroix: I myself do not even know the hon. member for Leeds.

Mr. Knowles: Pink pills.

Mr. LaCroix: Besides, if a large chain store were to attempt to use certain articles as loss leaders or to follow certain discriminatory practices, the only thing to do would be rigidly to enforce section 498A of the Criminal Code, which provides for such cases. Mr. Speaker, may I tell the leader of the opposition that I, like him, do not need anybody to prepare my speech.

Mr. Drew: The hon. member might deliver it without reading it.

An hon. Member: In both languages?

Mr. LaCroix: It is claimed that the new legislation is not necessary. What is the meaning, then, of the MacQuarrie report and of the opinion given by so eminent an economist as the principal of Queen's university; and also why the investigation by Stevens who was dismissed from the Bennett cabinet because he insisted on the pursuance of the same policy for these great monopolists of prices? In addition, why should those manufacturers and distributors who so strongly object to price control have the privilege of operating their own private system of controls, and even be authorized to punish, by refusing to sell them any goods, rebel merchants who sell at a price lower than that fixed by the manufacturer?

Mr. Drew: Ten o'clock.

Mr. LaCroix: As a matter of fact, this is what the Quebec newspaper L'Evénement had to say about the matter in its issue of Monday, December 10, 1951:

> In keeping with its undertaking to follow the recommendations of a parliamentary committee on price maintenance by manufacturers or wholesalers, the government is introducing a bill to outlaw this unofficial control. It is a step in the right direction. The opposition makes known its resolve to oppose that measure. Thus, after so many speeches from its leader on behalf of price control and a fair distribution of provisions, the Conservative party no longer wants the authorities to interfere with business. It is a contradiction to be noted. By taking this false stand, the supporters of Colonel Drew set themselves up as champions of the freedom of trade. But the freedom of trade apparently consists in letting retailers sell their goods as they please. The opposition does not see it that way. It therefore loses its credit for its oratorial campaigns on behalf of government price control. As a matter of fact, if the government finally decides to protect the consumer through legislation, its control legislation will apply to all industrial or agricultural producers. It would seem that the opposition would then approve the principle of this measure provided it did not apply to price maintenance by manufacturers and wholesalers. What a wonderful opportunity for the government to confound its opponents by satisfying the wish of the people who rely on it for protection against all profiteers. Why postpone a step so necessary to the welfare of the working class?

Three inquiries have shown that the public were being shamefully exploited by reason of the large manufacturers' privilege of resale price maintenance. Yet the Conservative party has managed to stand for those exploiters of the great bulk of Canadian consumers. Mr. Speaker, may I say to their faces in this house that they are humbugs—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. LaCroix: Humbugs!

Mr. Speaker: Order: It is ten o'clock.

Mr. LaCroix: Let me finish. I can do so in two minutes.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. LaCroix: —humbugs, when they introduce motions in this house protesting against the rising—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order. It is ten o'clock; and unless there is unanimous consent—

Mr. Casselman: The word "humbug" is not parliamentary.

Mr. Speaker: I do not think the hon. member applied the word "humbug" to any member in the house.

Mr. Casselman: Yes, he did.

Mr. LaCroix: I only applied it to their policy—humbug.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order. As it is ten o'clock, without unanimous consent I cannot allow the hon. member to continue.

Mr. Casselman: No.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Pouliot: Move the adjournment of the debate.

On motion of Mr. LaCroix the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Tomorrow we will continue consideration of this Bill No. 36; then the resolution of the Secretary of State for External Affairs to approve the accession of Greece and Turkey to the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. Then if possible we will proceed with all the remaining items on the order paper, but I am not in a position to say in which order.

Mr. Adamson: Is there any new legislation?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Not that I know of.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to the order of the house passed on November 2, 1951.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Wednesday, December 19, 1951

The house met at eleven o'clock.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

IDENTIFICATION FOR SOLDIERS ON LEAVE IN NATO COUNTRIES

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): I should like to supplement an answer I gave yesterday to the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) regarding the issue of passports to Canadian soldiers overseas. I find that the identification certificates which are issued to the soldiers are accepted by the countries concerned when they move in formation or on duty, but so far we have not succeeded in making arrangements for them to accept the identification cards when they are on leave. We are continuing to make efforts to secure that acceptance. They have agreed in principle but have not put it into effect.

The question of the charges for passports is being looked into. The number is quite small as I think only in the neighbourhood of fifty have been issued so far. They are issued by our consular staff in Germany.

Mr. Rodney Adamson (York West): Are the troops paid in United States scrip or sterling scrip?

Mr. Claxton: They are paid in scrip which can be used in Germany, but I could not say whether it is United States or sterling scrip. I shall have to look into it.

QUESTIONS

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—CONSTRUCTION OF LINE TO LYNN LAKE

Mr. Catherwood:

1. Is the construction of the Canadian National Railways line to the Lynn Lake area going ahead on schedule?
2. When will this construction be completed?
3. What is the total estimated cost of this line?

Mr. Benidickson: The Canadian National Railways advise as follows:

1. Yes.

2. Estimated date of completion is October 31, 1953.

3. Estimated cost mentioned in act of parliament as passed on June 20, 1951, was $14,725,000. Actual final cost will depend upon the trend of costs experienced in railway construction projects and the urgency of having the line completed before production at the mine is commenced in 1954.

NATIONAL REVENUE—TAX DIVISIONS—DISMISSAL OF EMPLOYEES

Mr. Diefenbaker:

1. How many (a) permanent employees; (b) temporary employees, have been dismissed for cause or removed from their positions in the income tax or corporation tax divisions of the Department of National Revenue in (i) Montreal; (ii) Toronto; (iii) Winnipeg, since January 1, 1950?
2. How many of such employees had (a) 15 years service or more; (b) 10 to 15 years service; (c) 7 to 10 years service; (d) 3 to 7 years service?

Mr. McCann:

		Montreal (i)	Toronto (ii)	Winnipeg (iii)
1.	(a) Permanent	174	42	19
	(b) Temporary	518	230	24
2.	(a) Permanent	1	Nil	Nil
	Temporary	Nil	Nil	Nil
	(b) Permanent	16	2	4
	Temporary	1	Nil	Nil
	(c) Permanent	53	19	12
	Temporary	18	2	4
	(d) Permanent	101	21	2
	Temporary	340	133	1

MOTOR VEHICLES SEIZED IN TRANSPORTATION OF SMUGGLED CIGARETTES

Mr. Nowlan:

How many motor vehicles have been seized and forfeited during each of the calendar months of 1951, for alleged use of such motor vehicles in the transportation of cigarettes in violation of the Customs Act?

Mr. McCann:

January, 7; February, 5; March, 7; April, 7; May, 5; June, 13; July, 12; August, 15; September, 13; October, 15; November, 17. Total 116.

LEGAL FEES IN PROSECUTION OF MR. WOOD

Mr. White (Middlesex East):

1. How much has been expended to date for legal fees and disbursements in (a) trial before a magistrate; (b) appeal to the county court; (c) appeal to the court of appeal, Manitoba, in the prosecution of Mr. Wood, for an alleged offence against the provisions of the Unemployment Insurance Act?
2. Are any further accounts due, or owing, for legal fees and disbursements? If so, what is the estimated amount due?
3. What is the amount allegedly due by Mr. Wood originally?

Questions

Mr. Cote (Verdun-La Salle):

1. (a) Legal fees and disbursements of unemployment insurance commission counsel, $66.20; costs of defence, nil; (b) Legal fees and disbursements of unemployment insurance commission counsel, $69.60; costs of defence, nil; (c) Legal fees and disbursements of unemployment insurance commission counsel, nil.

2. Legal fees and disbursements of unemployment insurance commission counsel, estimate not exceeding $250. Costs of defence counsel before all courts claimed at $150

3. The offence was that the accused had failed to comply with section 74 (3) of the Unemployment Insurance Act. No amount was mentioned in the charge.

The unemployment insurance commission explains as follows:

Mr. Wood, the defendant in the case, operates a real estate and tourist cabin business. Employment in that business is insurable under the Unemployment Insurance Act. The commission has experienced considerable difficulty in obtaining Mr. Wood's co-operation in the matter of making the requisite contributions to the U. I. fund, for and in respect of his employees.

Auditors of the commission have found it necessary to call on Mr. Wood several times and, on four such occasions, found him delinquent. In July, 1947 he was in default in the amount of $111.69; in August, 1948, $16.05; in August, 1949, $17.60; and in July, 1950, $5.76.

In addition to the calls made by the auditors, many letters have been written to him by the commission. Indeed, at the time of the 1949 audit he informed the auditor that he would not obtain insurance books for his employees or pay contributions in respect of an employee who was working as a carpenter. After a specific demand was made upon him to obtain books and insure the carpenter, he complied.

It is the duty of the commission to see that all contributions due to the fund are made. Default or delay in payment creates many problems, one of which is that the employees or former employees of the delinquent employer lose their rights, or part of them, when they become unemployed and seek unemployment insurance benefits. In other words, in such cases the records of the commission do not show all the entitlement of the worker; indeed, in some instances, the worker is unable to show right to any benefits because of the default of the employer. It will therefore be realized how important it is to insist upon and receive full compliance in the matter of payment of contributions.

[Mr. White (Middlesex East).]

GRANT FOR DEVELOPMENT OF INTERNATIONAL PEACE GARDEN

Mr. Knowles:

1. Has there been announced an intention not to renew in the 1952-53 estimates the grant of $15,000 in aid of the development of the international peace garden in Manitoba?

2. If so, by whom and when, and why is such grant to be discontinued?

3. Have protests against discontinuing this grant been received by the government at any time in 1951? If so, from whom?

4. Is consideration being given to these protests?

Mr. Winters:

1 and 2. In a letter dated December 13, 1950, the Minister of Resources and Development informed the Hon. D. G. McKenzie, president, International Peace Garden, that provision would be made for a grant of $15,000 in the 1951-52 estimates but that because of the government's heavy defence program and the resulting necessity to curtail other expenditures, it was most unlikely that a grant could be made for the fiscal year 1952-53. In a letter dated October 24, 1951, Mr. McKenzie asked that the grant again be extended, and in reply on November 6, 1951, the Minister of Resources and Development referred to his previous letter of December 13, 1950, and expressed his regrets that because of the reasons stated therein, it would be most difficult to recommend the grant for the fiscal year 1952-53.

3. Several members of parliament and other citizens have requested that provision again be made for the grant in the estimates for the fiscal year 1952-53.

4. Answered by Nos. 1 and 2.

CUSTOMS BUILDING, PEACE GARDEN GATES

Mr. Knowles:

1. Has the government received at any time since January 1, 1951, representations for the erection of a new customs building at the peace garden gates on the Manitoba-North Dakota boundary?

2. If so, is consideration being given to this request?

3. Has a favourable decision yet been reached?

Mr. Fournier (Hull):

1. Yes.

2. Yes.

3. Matter under consideration.

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

PRAIRIE FARM REHABILITATION—SASKATCHEWAN —EMPLOYEES

Mr. Argue:

1. What are the names of all persons employed under the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act in Saskatchewan during the first ten months of 1951?

2. What sum of money was paid to each of these persons as (a) salary or wages; (b) sustenance; (c) mileage; (d) other allowances?

INQUIRY FOR RETURN

ARMED FORCES—ENLISTMENTS—EXPENDITURES FOR RECRUITING AND PUBLICITY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): On November 12 a question of mine having to do with the number of recruits and the extent of recruiting was passed as an order for return, as indicated on page 903 of Hansard. I made inquiry about this before and I should like to ask that it be expedited so that it can be brought down before the end of the session.

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): That will certainly be done. I have seen a draft of the answer and I know that it is on the way.

KOREA

INQUIRY AS TO CANADIANS HELD BY COMMUNISTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gordon Graydon (Peel): I should like to ask the Minister of National Defence if he has any information in addition to that which has appeared in the press with respect to Canadian prisoners of war held by the communists in Korea?

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): I have not. There are five Canadian soldiers who unfortunately are missing but we do not know whether any of them are prisoners of war.

Mr. Graydon: I understand that one man from Hamilton is listed as a prisoner of war in the exchange of information.

Mr. Claxton: That is correct, but we have not had that information officially from Korea as yet. We do not know about any others.

PUBLIC SERVICE

PREVAILING RATES EMPLOYEES—INQUIRY AS TO PAY INCREASE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister arising out of his announcement on Friday last regarding pay increases for the civil service and other government employees. Is consideration being given to an immediate review of the position of prevailing rates employees such as might lead to an increase for them comparable to the increase which is being given to classified civil servants?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): My understanding is that these prevailing rates are reviewed yearly. I cannot say from memory when the last review took place but it is a continuing process and the effort is to keep the prevailing rates employees on a par with those in private employment doing the same kind of work.

Mr. Knowles: I wonder if the Prime Minister would permit me to express the hope that any changes that are made might be effective from the same date, namely, December 1, 1951.

CAPITAL COST ALLOWANCES

DEFERMENT—INQUIRY AS TO CUT-BACK IN CAPITAL EXPENDITURE

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): The hon. member for Greenwood asked me a series of questions on December 17 about the effect of various government measures upon capital expenditure in Canada. As I said at the time, he is really asking me to read the minds of our businessmen who have not done things they might have done. My answer can only be in the most general terms. In the first place, I do know from personal contact with businessmen that deferred capital cost allowances have influenced investment decisions in a number of cases. But, of course, one cannot make statistical calculations on the basis of that kind of evidence.

It should be borne in mind in trying to assess the effects of the deferment of depreciation that such deferment does not apply generally. There are a number of exemptions set forth in the regulations, and the Minister of Trade and Commerce is authorized to issue certificates entitling the taxpayer to current allowances where the properties are being acquired for carrying on certain basic industries listed in the regulations, and where the investment makes a direct contribution to the defence effort. In other words, the policy is selective in character and that is the way it is working.

As a means of getting some general impression of the way the policy is working, I asked the officers of my department to compare the estimates of 1951 capital expenditure with those for 1950. With the permission of the house I should like to put the table on Hansard. It is necessarily a very tentative analysis and is subject to revision when later and more up-to-date information is available. The table is as follows:

	Per cent change in the volume of investment, fall estimate 1951 over 1950
Total private and public investment	+ 7
Capital expenditures not subject to income tax	+ 3
Capital expenditures subject to income tax	+11
Capital expenditures eligible for capital cost allowances without certificate of eligibility	+ 2
Capital expenditures eligible for capital cost allowances subject to the issuance of a certificate of eligibility[1]	+83
Capital expenditures not eligible for capital cost allowances[1]	— 8

[1]These estimates were made before the recent amendment embodied in order in council P.C. 6384, which enables the Minister of Trade and Commerce to issue certificates for structures under construction as of April 10, 1951, and properties which the taxpayer was obligated to acquire at that date.

The table shows that where capital expenditures are assumed to be eligible for a certificate there is an increase of over 80 per cent in volume between 1950 and 1951, whereas in those cases where the taxpayer is likely to be subject to deferment of allowances, unless he had a commitment to purchase on April 10, 1951, or was in course of construction, there is a decrease of 8 per cent in volume.

I am not suggesting that deferred capital cost allowance, which has been in effect for only eight months, is the main or only reason for these results. That may be due also in part to other government measures to which the hon. member referred, or perhaps to factors which have nothing in particular to do with government policy. All that I can say with any certainty is that the various measures we have taken to curb inflationary pressures seem to be working in the right direction.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

REQUEST FOR ENGLISH "HANSARD" INDEX

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Jean François Pouliot (Temiscouata): Mr. Speaker, I do not want to be harping on any subject matter but as chairman of the debates committee I ask you, sir, to take the necessary steps so that the majority of my colleagues may receive as soon as possible the index for English Hansard of 1950 as well as the one for this session. If those who are supposed to have been working on it have not done a satisfactory job, please see to it in the interests of all that they are replaced at the earliest possible opportunity by competent people.

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, I think that kind of question should not be made the occasion of an inferential attack upon the efficiency of those charged with this work. I think every member who has contact with that office appreciates the competence of the debates staff and of those charged with the responsibility for preparing the index. It is a very great task. Apparently what is needed is assistance and not criticism of those already employed.

Mr. Pouliot: I am not allowed to discuss it, but my friend as usual is wrong.

Mr. Fleming: I am willing to be judged by the correctness of what I have just said.

Mr. Speaker: Order. We have had the views of both hon. members. I shall be pleased to look into the question and endeavour to have the index in the hands of members as soon as posible.

UNITED STATES SELECTIVE SERVICE

CANADIANS WORKING IN THE UNITED STATES—IMMIGRATION VISAS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. F. Brown (Essex West): I should like to address a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs or to such other member of the government as it may concern. I regret I have not given notice. Are Canadian citizens working in the United States to be subject to the United States draft law, as reported in the newspapers?

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): As it happens, I have some information on that subject.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): Mind reader.

Mr. Pearson: I anticipated a question of this kind.

Mr. Fleming: A crystal ball.

Mr. Pearson: Reports appearing in this morning's press incorrectly indicate that there has been a radical change in United States policy affecting Canadian citizens who reside in Canada but work in the United States. This is not the case. Since the introduction of the selective service act all male persons residing in the United States have been liable to call-up under the United States draft law. Up to June 19 of this year an alien residing in the United States might claim exemption on the ground that he was an alien and exemption would be granted to him under forfeiture of his right ever thereafter to become a citizen of the United States. By amendment to the selective service act on the date stated this privilege of exemption previously granted to aliens was rescinded.

The specific position with regard to Canadians living in Canada and working in the United States seems to centre about Detroit and Windsor. No person can be admitted to the United States for the purpose of engaging in paid employment in that country unless he is granted an immigration visa. It is not material to this issue where he may happen to sleep. All persons who are admitted to the United States for the purpose of engaging in paid employment are presumed to be "residing in the United States" for the purposes of the selective service act. Therefore there can be no question that under the terms of the United States selective service act Canadians who live in Windsor but work in Detroit under an immigration visa are liable to be called up under the United States selective service act in precisely the same way as United States citizens.

Mr. Coldwell: What was the effect of our selective service act during the war? Was it not done in consultation between the two governments?

Mr. Pearson: Yes, there was consultation during the war in regard to the application in either country of selective service laws of the other. The situation is not quite the same now.

Mr. Coldwell: There has been no consultation with respect to this matter between the two governments?

Mr. Pearson: I would have to look into that.

Mr. Coldwell: Since this seems to be a procedure taken unilaterally with regard to Canadian citizens, should not some representation be made to the United States government on the matter?

Mr. Pearson: I doubt whether this procedure was taken unilaterally regarding Canada. I am sure it applies to all living in the United States, and not only to Canadians. I am not sure whether we have or have not made representations on the subject, but I shall be glad to look into that.

Mr. Coldwell: I mean unilateral action on the part of the United States with respect to Canada and not with respect to other nations.

Mr. Rowe: I should like to ask the minister whether students and short-term employees cannot go to the United States unless they take out immigration papers. A number of students have taken positions in, we will say, Washington, and other places, in their university years. This has been temporary employment.

Mr. Pearson: The Canadians I have been talking about are those who are working in the United States on immigration visas. The situation would be different in regard to a great many of our students over there.

Mr. Graydon: I take it that my hon. friend from Windsor—

Mr. Brown (Essex West): Essex West.

Mr. Graydon: Yes, Essex West. His name is so well known that the name of his constituency is forgotten. In the case of temporary lay-offs in Windsor, where someone goes across for temporary employment in Detroit, would they be subject to the draft law?

Mr. Pearson: Only if they are in the United States on immigration visas. If they are in the United States on immigration visas they are subject to the United States selective service law. Normally, no one can go from Canada to work in the United States, except under immigration visas. There may be exceptions in the case of temporary employment. I am not sure, but I will look into it.

Mr. Adamson: Are those persons who are being recruited by the very large recruiting drive now going on by some of the American manufacturers required to have immigration visas before they can work? For instance, Ford is looking for five hundred mechanics in the Toronto area at this time. Do they have to have immigration visas?

Mr. Pearson: I understand they must have immigration visas if they are working in the United States.

Mr. Noseworthy: Mr. Speaker, some time ago it was reported that members of the cabinet had proceeded to Washington to negotiate with the Americans the terms under which Canadians could get work in the United States. Has the government any information as to what those terms are?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I can assure my hon. friend that no cabinet minister went to Washington for that purpose, and no official negotiations were taken to that end.

COMMUNICATIONS

TELEGRAPH AND RADIOTELEPHONE RATES—INQUIRY AS TO ADJUSTMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. J. Browne (St. John's West): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. I have not given him notice but I hope he will be as well prepared to answer as the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I should like to know if any consideration has been given to the question of adjusting telegraph and radiotelephone rates between the other provinces and Newfoundland to bring them in line with rates prevailing on this side of the Atlantic.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): That is hardly a question that could be answered without notice. As my hon. friend knows, telephone rates are under the jurisdiction of the board of transport commissioners. I would have to inquire whether or not an application to adjust them has been made to the board. In any event I will have to look into the matter and give an answer later.

EXTRADITION

SIGNING OF TREATY WITH THE UNITED STATES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Rodney Adamson (York West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Is the extradition treaty which has been so much discussed being signed, or is it in process of being negotiated at the present time?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I tabled the treaty after it was signed, and explained to the house that it was not the intention of the government to propose to the house a resolution for ratification until it had been ascertained whether or not it was going to be ratified by the Senate of the United States.

Mr. Adamson: But this house will have an opportunity to debate it?

Mr. St. Laurent: Yes; this house will have an opportunity to debate it. The document itself was laid on the table several weeks ago.

AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTS BOARD

TO PRESCRIBE THE CONSTITUTION AND POWERS OF THE BOARD, ETC.—CONCURRENCE IN SENATE AMENDMENT

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture) moved the second reading of and concurrence in an amendment made by the Senate to Bill No. 18, to provide for the establishment of an agricultural products board.

Mr. Charlton: May we see the amendment?

Mr. Gardiner: It is just that once a year we make a report to the house on what the activities of the board are.

Motion agreed to, amendment read the second time and concurred in.

[Mr. Browne (St. John's West).]

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT

AMENDMENT TO FORBID THE FIXING OF SPECIFIC OR MINIMUM RESALE PRICES

The house resumed, from Tuesday, December 18, consideration of the motion of Mr. Garson for the second reading of Bill No. 36, to amend the Combines Investigation Act, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Fulton.

Mr. Wilfrid LaCroix (Quebec-Montmorency): Mr. Speaker, I have only a few words to add to what I said yesterday. May I submit to you that, when speaking about the Tory party, in using the word "humbug" I am of course referring to their policy.

So may I say, humbugs, indeed—humbugs in their policy, indeed—when they introduce motions in this house protesting the rising cost of living, and yet object when an opportunity offers to have it brought down.

Mr. Fleming: Would the hon. member permit a question? May I ask him if he believes that the government ought to introduce direct price controls?

Mr. LaCroix: That will improve the situation, and maybe the present bill may well evade other necessary steps; because it is a right step in the direction of slowing down prices which are so much higher right now.

Mr. Fleming: Does the hon. member think that the government ought to introduce price controls, as he has said, and if, as the Prime Minister has said, this measure—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Fleming: —will not have any effect upon the cost of living—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Eglinton has the right to ask a question, if he has the consent of the hon. member who has the floor.

Mr. Fraser: He had the consent.

Mr. Fleming: I was asking if the hon. member believes, as he indicated, that the government ought to introduce—

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Fleming: —a system of direct price controls, does he not think it humbug to support a government which is not following that policy?

Mr. LaCroix: The government is taking a good step in the right direction; and I much prefer to evade price controls by the manufacturers themselves—who are defended by your party, right now.

Now, I was just saying: Humbugs in their attitude, indeed, when they introduce motions in this house protesting the rising cost of living and yet object when an opportunity offers to have it brought down.

Humbugs, in their policy, when they advocate price controls and yet object when an opportunity is given them to let people control prices themselves, by giving full scope to free enterprise and free competition.

Humbugs—

Mr. Fleming: Humbug!

Some hon. Members: Humbug!

Mr. LaCroix: Humbugs in their policy, indeed, when the Conservative party clamours for government price control but would leave it in the hands of manufacturers.

And, in answer to my hon. friend's question—

Mr. Fleming: Humbug!

Mr. Fraser: Humbug!

Mr. LaCroix: Humbugs, when they talk of inflation, yet oppose a measure that would check its growth.

Humbugs—

Some hon. Members: Humbug!

Mr. LaCroix: Humbugs, when they talk of protecting the people against exploitation by big interests, for when they have the occasion of enabling these people to purchase goods and products at reasonable prices, they try to prevent them from doing so, as they have demonstrated during this debate.

The Conservative party may have been able, thus far, to win by-elections, by preaching against the high cost of living. But today it has cut short all its chances of ever winning an election, by showing itself in its true light to the Canadian people.

May I be permitted, Mr. Speaker, to congratulate the government on its courageous attitude toward the moneyed interests. It has been shown once again that the Liberal party, although it has not yet reached perfection, is still much nearer the people than the Conservatives.

Mr. Fleming: Humbug.

Mr. LaCroix: As far as the Conservative party is concerned, it has demonstrated once again its inability to see where lie the true interests of the great mass of consumers that make up the population of this country.

Mr. Fleming: Humbug.

Mr. LaCroix: Moreover, it proves today that its eyes are wide open to those who feed its electoral fund, and only pretends to have one eye turned to the Canadian people.

Mr. Fleming: Humbug.

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I realize that it is perhaps on the face of it a little bold—

An hon. Member: Louder.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Thank you. I am glad you are listening.

I think it is perhaps a little odd for one who was not a member of the committee to step into this fight. Indeed, I do feel just a trifle like a camp follower. We had all the front-line troops in action yesterday, or at least some of them, and I hope we shall hear from more of them today. I hope we shall not merely have the speech of the member for Montreal St. James (Mr. Beaudry), who gave such a fine exhibition last night, but short of his vote. At any rate I am going to suggest that camp followers have their uses.

I had a recollection that the battle of Bannockburn was won by camp followers, and I have some evidence to that effect which I hope will be of interest. It is not very flattering to the English, but I hope this may be of interest to the men of Scottish descent and also, because of the ancient alliance, to those of French descent. In those days we all fought against the English. Briefly, this is a description of the outcome of the battle. The final impetus to the rout of the English was given by a historic charge of the gillies—that is the camp followers—who had been watching from the heights. They charged down the hill blowing horns, waving such weapons as they possessed and holding aloft improvised banners. Their cries of "slay", "slay", seemed to the weary English to betoken the advance of great reserves, and in a few minutes the whole English army broke and fled. I can hardly hope, Mr. Speaker, that I shall have such a dramatic effect on this assembly. At any rate, I put that forward with respect as an indication of the use a humble camp follower may have.

It is difficult to remember it perhaps, but this bill was introduced as a measure which would supposedly have some action on inflation, but that seems to have been left so far in the background now that we are dealing with it purely as it affects the Combines Investigation Act. Nevertheless, I think we should remind ourselves briefly of what was said in the speech from the throne. I quote from page 2 of Hansard for October 9, 1951:

> Every measure will be taken which my ministers believe will be effective in counteracting inflation without impairing our free institutions.

Later there is a reference to this particular measure. In spite of this fine introduction

I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that the bill has become a foundling. I understand a "foundling" is a child whose parents are unknown and cannot be discovered. While the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) sponsored the measure, through the speech from the throne, in dignified words, when he came to speak about it—I was going to say he blew hot and cold but that would not be correct because there was no hot, he really just blew cold on it. What he said was this, as recorded on page 41 of Hansard for October 15, 1951:

> . . . as regards immediate additional measures to curb inflation, while others may develop, the only one we are prepared to submit at this time is the one that will arise out of this report of the combines committee with respect to resale prices.

Then he said:

> I do not think that is going to have a very substantial effect on the index of the cost of living;...

Having been rejected by the Prime Minister, the bill found itself on the doorstep of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson). He seemed to have received very little help from his side of the house, except from the chairman of the committee to whose efforts I shall try to do full justice. The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), whom we all remember as the guide, philosopher and friend of the Minister of Justice from two years ago when he first became famous in this house, apparently has taken no interest in this matter. We may hope that before we are finished we may have some words from him.

I want to pause for a moment to comment on the fact that the primary objective of the bill was to bring down the cost of living; and, as I say, that seems to have been lost sight of. It is getting smaller and smaller. Everyone who has spoken about that aspect of it has pooh-poohed it to the point where now we almost forget that it was ever in the picture of all. I feel it is desirable—I know the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier) will be interested in this—to point out that this is the third and last of the special hopes that were held out to us in these last months for dealing with inflation. The first hope we had was economy. I am not going to take the time of the house to any greater extent than to remind you that that has gone down the drain. The parliamentary assistant, followed by the minister, has told us, not with sadness as I think they should but with the greatest equanimity, that apparently we must expect nothing from government economy. They prescribe economy for other people, but not for government.

The second great panacea or the second method of reducing prices was high taxes. We were told that they would be painful but they would have a very salutary effect. I want to admit that at one time that was the general belief. This belief has been exploded now because we have developed elements in the community who are so strongly organized that they are able to defeat the purpose of high taxes; that is to say they are able to augment their income enough to offset the taxes. This remedy, therefore, has really passed out of existence. I was interested in observing that no less a person than the president of the Bank of Montreal referred to that in his annual address, and gave his serious opinion that we will have to revise our thinking about the effects of high taxes.

Finally we have this last remedy, and indeed it would be flattering to describe it as even a damp squib so far as inflation is concerned. The best proof of that is that no one has seriously suggested it would be effective against inflation, not even the chairman of the committee. I say, therefore, that so far as anti-inflationary effect is concerned this measure has been weighed in the balance and found wanting. We can consider this bill purely as to its validity in dealing with the question of resale price maintenance, not expecting that it is going to have any considerable effect. The Prime Minister blew cold on it early in the session, and I think it was the chairman of the committee who suggested that there was only one per cent of the products in food stores that were price controlled. At that time he was making another argument, but I think the argument can fairly be used as showing that he does not think it will have much effect in reducing prices.

As I said, I was not a member of the committee so I propose to say very little on the argument which has been made so forcefully that the committee was conducted in an unsatisfactory manner. Anyone checking the high spots of what has taken place could have no doubt but what there was backing and filling, rather as if it were a peculiar shunting yard where the trains go up and down but hardly ever get out.

First of all there was the reference to the speech from the throne, and then the doubtful opinion of the Prime Minister a day or two later. Later still came the explanation by the Minister of Justice. That is extremely interesting because, in effect, he said that they had found there is such a thing as public opinion, that public opinion had begun to assert itself, that it had made an impression upon them, and therefore they had decided that they would have a committee.

When the committee was set up, it appeared to be constituted with the end of taking a wide view and of trying to deal with this problem on the basis of finding out the truth, even if it took some time. But there was another miscalculation and quite soon—in about a week, if I remember rightly—the committee was limited in its objective because it was found out by this time that this was a difficult matter, a matter of importance, and that really to get at the truth—which some of us feel is important—might take some little time. The operations of the committee were therefore limited and an attempt was made to take a middle course. I suggest that this course is one that would much better be called a muddled course than a middle course because I think what was done was calculated just to make the worst of both worlds.

The idea apparently was that the MacQuarrie report was to be taken as more or less gospel, but it was to be open to people to come along and prove—I think that was the word used by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson)—that it was wrong. I think the word "proved" was used. At any rate, that was the general intention, namely that people had to come along and knock the MacQuarrie report down.

That was, of course, something that was difficult to do because in the MacQuarrie report there were no facts; there were just opinions; and, after all, every man is entitled to his own opinion. The result of this negative method was rather odd because it really meant that, in order to save time, the committee were reduced to the position that they would in the main allow evidence only from those people who were against the report. The result of all that was that positive evidence for the views of the MacQuarrie report and for this measure we have before us was given to a strictly limited extent. Hence, when the Minister of Justice came to make his speech, the evidence he gave was scarcely, if at all, taken from the evidence of the committee but was largely the result of investigation made by his own research department. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that it is small wonder that the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) and others complained vehemently, as they are well entitled to do, against such a method of carrying on the committee.

The second reason that I find it easy to believe that the committee was conducted in an undesirable manner was the speech made yesterday by the chairman of the committee. Last Saturday the chairman of the committee was acting for the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) in guiding through the financial administration bill, and I thought he did a competent and orderly job. I can only wish that yesterday he had adopted the same tactics, because I regard this as a serious subject. I do not think this is a subject to be made the occasion for the kind of histrionic display that we had yesterday; and when I say that, I think it is the least critical thing that can be said about it. The temptation to play to the gallery was strong. I am sure that it is heady stuff—having the large majority, which we hear of so often, faithfully pounding their desks. I think I myself would enjoy it greatly.

Mr. Sinnott: Come on over here.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I can only hope that some element of caution would prevent me from going as far as the parliamentary assistant went yesterday.

To speak seriously, Mr. Speaker, I think we are entitled to have the chairman of a committee give a much more balanced report—and that is a conservative statement—than we had yesterday. I think I can remember a good many occasions on which chairmen of committees have tried to indicate the various views that prevailed; but really this committee seemed to me to get to the cloak and dagger stuff in the speech of yesterday; and I thought the parliamentary assistant unnecessarily went far out of his way to sneer at the business community.

I have noted one thing he said which I greatly regret, and I take it that that was the kind of thing that some of my colleagues here have objected to in the committee itself.

Mr. Fleming: Hear, hear.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I want to read this because, first of all, it contains a sneer; and then, second, it contains a suggestion as to utterly improper conduct on the part of the business community which, so far as I know and so far as my reading of the evidence goes, was not warranted in any way by the evidence which was given. I read from the speech of the chairman yesterday as reported at page 2147 of Hansard:

> If the manufacturers get together in a back room—

You see the idea, Mr. Speaker—the back room. The whole thing at once is shrouded in an atmosphere of criticism and suspicion. To my mind that is not the way in which this thing should be considered. I propose to read a report of the British committee on this subject. They had considerable difficulty. They had criticism to make of resale price maintenance, though on the whole they refused to recommend against it. But what struck me about their report was that they were trying to get at the truth. They were giving both sides. I admit that it was a report; it was not a speech in parliament; but I do not think that any speech in parliament by a responsible representative, least of all by a responsible person who has been head of an important committee, should descend to this kind of thing.

Mr. Fleming: Hear, hear; either in the house or as chairman of the committee.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I will read the quotation from the speech to which I have referred, starting again at the beginning:

> If the manufacturers get together in a back room and decide that such a retail price shall be the official price, that is obviously an illegal combine and it would be up to our efficient combines branch to commence proceedings against them. If all the retailers organized together, that would also be a combine.
> Because there would be more of them, it would be that much easier for our combines branch to find out. But if each manufacturer—

And here is the innuendo, Mr. Speaker.

> —tells all his retailers at what price they are to sell, then it is easy for these manufacturers to get together informally . . .

I repeat that so far as I know that was not suggested. It was left for the chairman of the committee, in his speech, to add this innuendo gratuitously. To continue:

> The effect on the consumer is the same, there is artificial fixing of prices . . . That is really the case against resale price maintenance.

I cannot help wondering if that last sentence is exactly what the chairman intended to say because, if I follow his reasoning correctly, he is saying that resale price maintenance includes this horizontal meeting of manufacturers which he has insinuated is the kind of thing that took place. I put forward that interpretation. If there is any escape from it, let us have it; but that is my understanding of it. I regret that that was said. It seems to me a great pity that it should be said by anyone in this house, but most of all that it should be said by a man who had the honourable position of presiding over this important committee and who heard the evidence.

Then there is another thing that the hon. member did which I think is gravely improper. The chairman was not content to give his own opinion; he was not content to give the opinion of other members of the house—which of course he is entitled to do—but he dragged in the civil servant who was acting as clerk of that committee and quoted him.

Mr. Fleming: Shame.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I suggest that that is utterly repugnant to our whole practice; that it is dragging in civil servants and making them adjuncts to a party. I suggest further that that is the kind of thing which we have quite often occasion to complain about in this house. It is not the first time it has happened, but I hope it will be the last. I suggest it can only happen when a government has come to the state of affairs of the French king who said "L'état, c'est moi"—I am the state. When you come to the point that you are the state, you are not merely a party in the state, you are not merely the governing party in the state, but you get somewhere beyond that so that even the civil service is a part of the governing party. I feel that is very, very improper. I feel that the clerk of that committee whose name was actually mentioned by the chairman has been put in a very improper and unfair position.

Mr. Sinclair: I want to make it quite clear that in mentioning the extra work done by the clerk of the committee and the king's printer I was not in any way attempting to involve them in the actual policy with respect to the matter being discussed by the committee. It was to show that, having been asked by myself to do everything they could to expedite the ordinary proceedings, the committee reports and the printing, they did all they could. I think all members of the committee were very grateful in having the daily proceedings the following day.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): The chairman of that committee is entirely wrong if he thinks that is what I am referring to. I did not even notice that, as a matter of fact. I would agree with that of course. What I am referring to is that the parliamentary committee stated the clerk of the committee, the Hansard reporters and I think he said other members of the party, stated that they had never heard such convincing evidence.

Mr. Fraser: Such a good witness.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Yes. I do not think there is any question about that. I ask the hon. member to look it up in his speech and he will see that he quoted these men as supporting the view, which would be expressing—

Mr. Sinclair: No.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): There is no question about that. If I am wrong I will be corrected. That is the way I read it. I am saying that in good faith and I do not think I am wrong.

Mr. Sinclair: If I conveyed that impression to the house, then I was doing an injustice to the people mentioned, although I did not mention them by name. What I intended to say, and what I believe I did say, was not whether they were for or against it —it did not matter—but to describe the actual impact on the committee and on the members of the committee who were there. That was the very phrase used by the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton). He said the same thing, that the brief had made a tremendous impact.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, the Hansard for yesterday is not available yet.

Mr. Maltais: Yes, it is.

Mr. Sinnott: Here it is, right here.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I am in the midst of making a speech, and I would like to get on with it. If the chairman of the committee finds that I have quoted him unfairly, all right, I will take it back; but that is not the way I read it. I saw his speech and that is the way I read it and I do not think I am wrong.

I suggest that this is a serious matter, Mr. Speaker, and we might try to look at it as serious men and not just toss it backwards and forwards as a political football. I hope I can do that. I am going to quote one or two views of people who are some distance removed from this assembly, and possibly thereby get a little more detachment of view. I am going to quote first of all a man whose name is well known. While business conditions may have changed a little since the days when he was active, I do not think they have changed much. I refer to Mr. Justice Brandeis. He was a well known liberal in the United States. The word is still respectable in the United States, because it has no connotation except the true dictionary meaning. I should like to read one or two things said by Mr. Brandeis because this thing has got so involved, as I say, in party dispute and there have been so many unpleasant suggestions of improper methods that we are in great danger of forgetting what we are really talking about, and Brandeis with his clarity of expression has outlined this matter rather well. Later I wish to go on, as I said a few minutes ago, and read from the British report which shows the pros and cons, which has critical things to say, which knows the decision is a difficult one, but which eventually reaches a decision. Brandeis, in the book called "The Brandeis Guide to the Modern World" by a man called Lief, published in 1941, at page 213 says:

> I think it important that we should develop the right of producers of trademarked articles, growers as well as manufacturers, to establish by contract the price at which their products shall be sold.

And then on the same page:

> The right to fix the retail selling price is not an injury but an aid to business, so far as the particular branch of business is competitive. The cry against retail price fixing is based upon a misconception.

Speaking of the evils of unlimited competition—and I would just like to interject here, Mr. Speaker, for a moment, our socialist friends twit us—and this is a very easy point to make—they say: "You are in favour of competition; all right. Why are you not in favour of all competition? Why are you for and against competition?" Well, that does not bother me terribly. There is such a thing as having too much of a good thing, as we all know, and Brandeis refers to it here, that competition can sometimes produce evils. We all know that. And as far as I can make out, from whatever experience I have had, it happens very often in life. If you take a good thing and press it too far it can do you harm. If you take a whole bottle of medicine when you should take only a spoonful it can do you harm.

I read again from Brandeis what he had to say about ruthless price cutting. He says at page 215:

> It is notorious that one of the methods employed by the Standard Oil Company and other trusts to create and maintain their monopolies has been to cut prices—

And so on. I shortened the quotation, but it is here for anyone to read. Then there is a further quotation which I think comes absolutely to the point; it is right on the target:

> If a dealer is selling unknown goods or goods under his own name, he alone should set the price; but when a dealer has to use somebody else's name or brand in order to sell goods, then the owner of that name or brand has an interest which should be respected.

Lest I forget to say it later, it seems to me there is a great disposition here to forget the most important distinction between the over-all combination in the restraint of trade, which I understand our legislation is directed against; that is to say, where I and fifty other people are manufacturing a certain article and we all get together and fix a price, and the case where I as one of the fifty manufacturers of that article want to sell my article. Now, it is open to me to open shops of my own. Nobody can quarrel with that, but if I do otherwise, if I use other shops to sell my articles, then I submit that at the very least any fair-minded man will say that that is entirely different from the other thing. We have certain objections to the over-all combination, and I shall read from the British report showing that they had other objections. They were forced to the conclusion that they would not recommend against it; in other words, not do what we are being asked to do now. You see, Mr. Speaker, the man who wrote that was trying to get at the truth. He was not trying to smear the business community. He was not putting the business community in the box and cross-examining it the way I am told it was done in this committee; and as I say, after listening to the speech yesterday of the hon. member for Coast-Capilano (Mr. Sinclair), if the conduct of the committee resembled in the faintest degree that speech he made yesterday, then I would say it was entirely and absolutely improperly conducted.

Mr. Fleming: It was.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I want to turn to this part of the British report. Mr. Speaker, I now have yesterday's Hansard, and I think I should put on the record the exact words of the hon. member for Coast-Capilano (Mr. Sinclair) so that there will be no doubt whatever as to the quotation that I gave. He was speaking of Mr. McGregor's evidence, and I quote from page 2152 of Hansard of December 18 as follows:

> In the experience of the oldest committee clerk in this house, the oldest reporters in this house and the oldest members of parliament who heard his evidence through, they say that never had a more objective and more powerful brief been presented to a parliamentary committee.

I think that bears out fully what I said and I shall not weary the house by repeating my comments on it. I think it is a most dangerous practice and I think it is one of the things which happen, unless they are carefully on their guard, to people who retain power a long time. There is a great danger of their coming to regard themselves as demi-gods. As far as I can make out, when you come to be a demi-god a lot of things happen. There are, of course, some people who do not give way to that kind of thing.

I should like to quote from the British report because, as I say, the impression you get from that report is that they are actually trying to find out the truth. Often that seems desirable. They tried to look at both sides of the case and I shall try to quote both sides and what they said. They did not pretend that it was open and shut and they found great difficulty in reaching their conclusions. First I should like to quote from page 4 of the report of the committee on resale price maintenance of June, 1944, as follows:

> 19. The representatives of the various women's organizations who gave evidence before us were, without exception, strongly in favour of branding. They found it convenient when shopping not to have to examine everything they bought in order to assess its quality; they had found that the containers in which branded goods are normally sold—

I am not reading all of that. It may be that there are other things which I should read, but my time is running out and I want to refer to the opposite side so that there will be no question. Another paragraph reads:

> 23. We have therefore assumed that manufacturers will continue increasingly to mark goods in such a way that the consumer may trace their original source. We have also assumed that, although there may be incidental disadvantages or abuses, the system by which manufacturers purposely differentiate their products from those of other manufacturers—

They do not seem to think that they are in the back room together.

> —and actively promote their sale by advertisement and other means, is not, generally speaking, in conflict with the public interest.

Then on page 11 is a section headed "opposition to resale price maintenance", and I quote:

> 51. Fixed prices for branded articles thus prevent certain advantages to manufacturers, distributors and consumers alike, and the arguments in favour of the system which we have reproduced above are based on years of experience. They are not, however, supported by all parties and the undesirability of variations in retail price is by no means universally acknowledged.

My time is running out and I shall have to shorten these quotations. On page 15 there is another section I should like to read as follows:

> 70. The extent to which fixed margins will operate adversely to the public interest must in our view largely depend upon the proportion of goods to which they apply and the rigour with which they are maintained.

Then there is a reference on page 17 to loss leaders, which they consider most seriously but which I shall not attempt to deal with. I come now to the recommendations to be found on page 33. Here again there are several sections which I shall not have time to read and which point out the difficulties. Do not let it be thought that I am suggesting that these people were wholeheartedly in favour of this. I have only time to read the two operative clauses, as follows:

> 163. We recommend that no action should be taken which would deprive an individual producer—

That is defined as including manufacturer, wholesaler, grower, importer, etc.

> —of the power to prescribe and enforce resale prices for goods bearing his name.
> 167. We therefore recommend that steps be taken to render illegal the application of sanctions which extend beyond the remedies open to an individual producer for any breach of resale price maintenance conditions.

As I understand it, they are against manufacturers getting together, but they approve of one man doing this. I should like to note what Mr. Henry Smith said, and this was referred to yesterday by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell). He was a member of the committee and he certainly had great reservations because he was troubled about it. In the first paragraph of his note he said:

I support the recommendations adopted by my colleagues, as I consider that they represent a marked advance from the present position.

That is to be found on page 34. He indicates that he was troubled.

Mr. Garson: I wonder if my hon. friend would read the first sentence of the next recommendation by Mr. Smith.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): It reads:

In my opinion the criticism of resale price maintenance which some of our witnesses presented, and which is set out in the report, is entirely convincing. Whether enforced by an individual manufacturer or by a trade association, it inevitably leads to retail prices being higher than they would otherwise be in areas and under conditions where distribution costs are low, and to an unnecessary proliferation of retail outlets. The recommendations of our report, if adopted, will lessen these evils; but will in my opinion only remove them if it proves impossible for resale price maintenance to be operated without the support of trade associations.

All I am saying is that this man who had all those difficulties nevertheless went along with this report, and he explains why he did it. He went along with that report in spite of his difficulties because he realized the situation that existed. I never suggested that there were not difficulties; I am only trying to get at the truth.

Mr. Garson: My hon. friend will realize that it did not prove possible for them to operate resale price maintenance without the assistance of the trade organizations.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I am perfectly content to let the record stand.

Mr. Garson: When the opportunity comes I shall add a little to it.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): The hon. member for St. James (Mr. Beaudry) made a most interesting speech last night when he had some interesting things to say about various matters. He seemed to think that there was a great deal of make-believe. He did an adequate job and I do not propose, as I had intended to, dealing with the McGregor evidence except for one thing. I should like to point out what Mr. McGregor said when referring to loss leaders, a matter which troubled the MacQuarrie committee but which they more or less swallowed. I quote Mr. McGregor's reply at page 412 as follows:

I do not think you can put through legislation that will prevent any dealer from selling below cost.

Then on page 413 we find a qualification of that because he seems to indicate that it is possible to devise legislation. There are the two conflicting statements.

We have suggested that this matter be not rushed through, but that has not been treated with very great sympathy. I think there is a great deal to be said for it. In the first place, I believe that there have been many converts to this view since this discussion began. There were a great many people who thought when it began it was simply a case of saying "resale price maintenance injures competition and therefore it should be done away with," but I think many people have abandoned that view. I suggest to the government it should not be afraid to let public opinion run its course, and that there is no need to rush this thing. Nobody in his sane senses can suggest it is going to produce any immediate result on inflation, and I for my part can see no reason whatever to rush it through, as is apparently proposed.

One thing is clear beyond everything else, that whatever else it will do it will injure a lot of small people. They believe it will injure them, and I suggest no adequate answer to their fears was given. As a matter of fact the only answer that I observed given was to the effect that after all perhaps there are too many retailers and maybe some of them have got to go to the wall. That was said.

All I am asking is that this measure be stood over and not passed now. In other words, I support the amendment. I say that no case has been made and that if the Minister of Justice had spoken for ten hours instead of two he could not satisfy us as to the propriety of passing a bill for which no adequate reason has been given.

Mr. J. S. Sinnott (Springfield): Mr. Speaker, what I have to say today will be brief, concise and to the point. I will not attempt to take up as much time as the hon. member for Greenwood.

An hon. Member: Stop now.

Mr. Sinnott: Having listened to him as long as I have, there is only one thing that is still obvious, namely, that he is still riding both sides of the fence.

Mr. McGregor: Which fence are you on?

Mr. Sinnott: I will take my seat if he will answer the question which I am about to ask him.

Mr. Hodgson: Who gave you the question?

Mr. Sinnott: Does he think that price fixing by the manufacturer is a bad thing for the public? If he does not wish to answer it now he can do so later. I will give him time to think about it. I have listened to all the big guns in the Conservative party.

Mr. Gibson: Popguns.

Mr. Sinnott: When the hon. member for Coast-Capilano (Mr. Sinclair), the very able parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance—

An hon. Member: A popgun.

Mr. Hodgson: Who told you to say that?

Mr. Hees: He must have written your speech.

Mr. Hodgson: I saw him talking to you.

Mr. Hees: Jimmy wrote this.

Mr. Sinnott: —mentioned the Bennett investigations I could see the jaw of the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mrs. Fairclough) drop every time he referred to them. I could also see the jaws of the big guns of the Conservative party drop because it had never been brought to light before now.

Mr. Hodgson: Are you sure it was not Hamilton East?

Mr. Sinnott: I am going to say a few words for the poor little consumer, myself, and the producer.

An hon. Member: Get out the crying towels.

Mr. Sinnott: If the big industrialists on the other side of the house will just contain themselves for a few moments I should like to put on the record what the consumers are looking for.

Mr. Hodgson: What Jimmy told you.

Mr. Sinnott: There have been four or five by-elections recently, and the Conservatives have a great story to tell the people of what they have done on the hustings.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Sinnott: But they are not doing anything to curtail the high cost of living, and when the Liberal party brings forward legislation suggested in the speech from the throne the Conservative party does everything in its power to prevent it.

An hon. Member: Put more punch in it.

Mr. Sinnott: When we come to the vote on second reading members of the Conservative party will have to stand up and be counted. We will see who is for and who is against. Not a single speech they have made has been for or against.

Mr. Sinclair: Sitting on the fence.

Mr. Sinnott: During the time that the special committee sat ample evidence was presented to it. Whether it sat for two years or two months it could not get a better sampling of evidence than was produced before it.

Mr. Hodgson: All aboard; get on the snow plow.

Mr. Sinnott: But the Conservative party has tried to keep the matter lingering and to keep the consumers in suspense longer because they think it will enhance their policy if they can go back on the hustings and say that the government is doing nothing. They have found out that, if parliament has to sit until after Christmas, the government is going to do something.

An hon. Member: It is about time it folded up.

Mr. Sinnott: I can say that this country—

Mr. Hodgson: Did Jimmy tell you that?

Mr. Sinnott: —should be very thankful that it has a Liberal leader with the courage to go ahead with this kind of legislation.

Mr. Hees: Can you not read Jimmy's words?

Mr. Sinnott: It is said by the opposition that nowhere in the world is there such legislation. I think we should take our hats off to the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and the government for their ingenuity and the fact that they are prepared to accept the responsibility of following out their convictions and doing what they can for the little consumers all across Canada.

Mr. Fraser: The Prime Minister said this measure would not help the cost of living.

Mr. Sinnott: The Liberal party has always been a middle of the road party. It has always been the little man's party.

Mr. Fleming: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Sinclair: No.

Mr. Sinnott: Why certainly.

An hon. Member: Now we know who wrote the speech.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Hees: That was not in the script.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Fleming: May I ask the hon. gentleman if he shares or disagrees with the view expressed by the Prime Minister in the house on October 15 that the enactment of this measure is not going to have any substantial effect on the index of the cost of living?

Mr. Rinfret: Do you?

Mr. Sinnott: I agree with the views expressed before the committee, and that is how I have to arrive at my decision.

Mr. Hees: Don't you agree with the Prime Minister? You don't agree with the Prime Minister, eh?

Mr. Fleming: Do you agree with the Prime Minister or not?

Mr. Sinnott: Further—

Mr. Fraser: Ask Jimmy for the answer.

Mr. Sinnott:—I should like to put a direct question to the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming), who is so able. I should like to ask him whether he is for or against this legislation and let him say just yes or no.

Mr. Fleming: I am delighted to accommodate my hon. friend. I think the Prime Minister was perfectly correct in saying the enactment of this measure would not have any effect on the cost of living. I think he was perfectly correct, and when the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) put forward a different view he was quite wrong. When the hon. member for Coast-Capilano (Mr. Sinclair) put forward a different view he was wrong too, and the Prime Minister was right.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Knowles: A typical lawyer's answer, no answer at all.

Mr. Sinnott: I am asking for a yes or no answer. Are you for or against the legislation?

Mr. Fleming: Against this bill?

Mr. Sinnott: Just a straight yes or no.

Mr. Fleming: You will see me vote against this bill.

Mr. Rinfret: That does not mean you are against it.

Mr. Fleming: If all Liberal members were free to vote as they would like to many of them would vote against it too.

Mr. Knowles: Where is the member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker)?

Mr. Sinnott: I will use the words of the parliamentary assistant. If those who are crying crocodile tears, the manufacturers—

Mr. Hees: He wrote it.

Mr. Sinnott:—want to give the little fellow an opportunity, all they have to do is to give him the same discount they give to the big fellow.

Mr. Hodgson: Jimmy has you whipped into line.

Mr. Hees: Jimmy's assistant.

Mr. Sinnott: If the manufacturers would follow the same practice with regard to the little fellow as the producers of oats and barley in the west the little fellows could all have the same opportunity. Your time is very short now if you want to get home for Christmas. You can say whether you are going to vote for or against.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): On a question of privilege, I think I should have a chance to answer the question of the hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Sinnott) who asked me if I approved of the manufacturers setting prices. I think I made myself perfectly clear. I entirely disapprove of combinations which are repugnant to the act. I pointed that out in what I said of the chairman of the committee. On the other hand I have read statements which satisfied me that, prima facie, there is a case for the manufacturer being able to make an agreement with those who sell his products.

An hon. Member: That is not an answer.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. J. L. Gibson (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I am glad I had the opportunity of listening to the masterly analysis of this legislation, as just propounded by the hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Sinnott). I can only say that I wish he had spoken longer, because he did not have enough time to convince me as to the entire merits of the government's case.

In this particular instance the government reminds me a good deal of the man who was about to be hanged. Just before he was hanged he stepped up to the group who were about to witness his execution, and said, "Boys, this is certainly going to be a great lesson to me." And I am just wondering if the government has learned a lesson from the procedure which was followed in this case. I would hope that next time they would really have made up their minds before they advise us, in the speech from the throne, that they are going to pass legislation of a controversial nature such as this.

I sincerely trust they will sound out their own members, next time, so that they will not subject them to the considerable amount of embarrassment to which this legislation has certainly brought them. I would think, too, they may come to the conclusion that it is not advisable to set a deadline on a committee's deliberations. Because, after all, I think the government agrees with me when I say that the committee did not have time to make a very exhaustive analysis of this complex problem. I would think the committee must have learned that matters connected with manufacturing and retailing are very complex indeed.

I do not think, myself, that any member of the House of Commons has had an opportunity to make up his mind on the legislation. After all, the combines branch has been aware of some of the evils and some of the good arising from resale price maintenance, and they have had that information for twenty-five years. They have sought to store it, as a goose egg, as it were, for that time.

Then, just at this particular session of parliament, when we knew we were going to be rushed, the government decided to bring forward this legislation. They must surely have considered—well, perhaps I should not say that; it may be that they are not so concerned about the political repercussions. I do not want to impute motives to them. But surely they must have considered in some way the political repercussions that might possibly flow from the introduction of this bill.

I believe anyone who has studied retailing, merchandising or manufacturing in Canada in the last five years must have realized that there has been a great scarcity of a number of consumer goods. New small manufacturers have started up, to try to fill in that gap. They have met the demand of some small retailers. I believe that actually in many fields of retailing in Canada there are probably more retail outlets than are really required.

But what I fear is that a number of these small businesses, which inevitably, without any interference from the government at all, were going to get into financial difficulties, are now going to say, "Those members of parliament might have done better if they had not passed this legislation that put me out of business".

I really do not believe this legislation will put an efficient merchandiser out of business. At the same time I feel the government might have let the trend go along, without pressing this legislation which for twenty-five years they have felt was not necessary.

I would say to the Liberal members of the committee that the passage of this legislation is a far greater tribute to their loyalty to their party than it is to their common sense. It is of interest, further, to notice the divergency of views among members of the C.C.F. party. I am always curious about that party. I must confess I used to have a great deal more curiosity about it when there were about thirty-five members from that party in the House of Commons.

However, it is still somewhat strange to me that they should have divided fifty-fifty on this, so far as the members on the committee were concerned.

Then, the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis), whose integrity I greatly admire, supports the government's legislation. It seems to me one must be as careful in this world of who one's friends are as of who one's enemies are. Of course, the hon. member for Vancouver East said that he had never employed a man, and that he certainly never intended to. Well, it is rather interesting to see that he has determined to associate himself with the government and the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) in this legislation, because I presume if there is any credit to be gained from any bill that is directed against employment in the retail industry, he will want to have full credit for his part in it.

Mr. Sinclair: That is very unfair.

Mr. Gibson: It could very well be true. The hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Thatcher), on the other hand, who is one of the few members of that party who have had considerable experience, did express very great concern over the probable fate of the small retailer, if this legislation goes through.

Mr. Sinnott: What did he say in the house?

Mr. Gibson: After all, he had not then had the opportunity of listening to the evidence in the committee. He said at the time the bill was first brought to the house that he intended to support the legislation. But after listening to the evidence presented before him—the same evidence other members of the committee heard—he, with his background of experience, decided that this was poor legislation. While he is not here to vote against it—and I cannot say whether he would have voted against it or not—I certainly gathered from the questions he asked in committee that he was opposed to it.

After all, he is a member who has had a great deal of experience in the retail field, much more experience in that field than the hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Sinnott).

Mr. Sinnott: He should have stayed here, if he is interested.

Mr. Gibson: I know the hon. member for Springfield is a man of many parts. But I think perhaps in this case the hon. member for Moose Jaw is better qualified to express an opinion.

Mr. Sinnott: Thank you very much. Possibly I am more interested, too.

Mr. Gibson: I was also interested to note that neither the Trades and Labour Congress nor the Canadian Congress of Labour were particularly interested in this legislation. They themselves were certainly not convinced that it would be of any great benefit to them. I think we have to recognize, too, that it was conceded in committee that the policy of resale price maintenance kept down the price of goods during a period of scarcity. There were some things about resale price maintenance, certain abuses which we all conceded were bad. But after all, you know, abuses of alcohol are very bad, too.

I am sorry that the ingenuity of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson), and the intelligence of his very able officials, were not equal to the task of presenting legislation which would have removed the abuses, and still would not have done the harm it is conceivable that this legislation will do.

My riding might be described as a rural riding. I know the local retailers there are the cornerstone of the whole economy of that riding. And as I happened to be a retailer for fourteen years, I might say to the hon. member for Springfield, I sold everything from a needle to an anchor and have had experience in these business matters.

Mr. Sinnott: Mostly anchors.

Mr. Gibson: No, mostly needles—for you. I do not think the government of Canada or the people generally have ever been aware of the tremendous contribution the small retailers of Canada—and I emphasize the word "small"—made to the welfare of Canada during the depression. I think that collectively the small retailers of Canada probably carried a greater load of credit, and carried more people on relief, than was done through the combined efforts of all the governments in Canada.

When we are considering this problem we must not forget how tremendously important the small retailer is. I realize that the small retailer must be a nuisance to the great merchandisers in Toronto, Montreal, Winnipeg and Vancouver. Those merchandisers would very gladly eliminate them, as is evidenced by the fact that they support this legislation. And I imagine they support it only because they feel it is in their interests to do so.

But what I certainly do know is that the small merchants around Port Alberni, Courtenay and Campbell River are the people who, so far as my constituency is concerned, carry the load. Sometimes a fire season comes along. People are unemployed perhaps for three months. At the higher levels we have the snow season, and the loggers cannot work during the wintertime. I emphasize that this is at the higher levels, around 3,000 or 4,000 feet. Incidentally, when there is a strike, it is the small local retailer who carries the boys. Every time we have a community chest campaign or we are seeking funds for the hospital or when the board of trade has a campaign for local improvement, it is these local retailers who give their support to these worth-while community efforts. They are the people who advertise in the small local newspapers which are an integral part of every community.

Speaking for the people I represent, I say that whatever is bad for these small retailers is bad for the ordinary people who live in these rural areas. Until I have had an opportunity to make a further study of this whole problem, which I realize is very complex and quite involved, I must say that I intend to support the Progressive Conservative amendment for a six months' delay.

Mr. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon): We have just had it drawn to our attention, Mr. Speaker, by my counterpart on the other side, the member for Springfield (Mr. Sinnott), that all the big guns of the official opposition have taken part in the debate.

Mr. Sinnott: I am sorry I missed you.

Mr. Dinsdale: I hardly think I can classify myself as one of the big guns of the party, but perhaps it is time that those who sit on the back benches said something about this important issue. I described the hon. member for Springfield as my counterpart on the other side, but with certain reservations. We are not the same in physical proportions, and we do not part our hair the same. I merely wanted to make the point that we do sit on the back benches on opposite sides.

Mr. Sinnott: Remember that grass cannot grow on a busy street.

Mr. Dinsdale: I remember my own father, who was somewhat of the proportions physically of the member for Springfield and also parted his hair the same, so there is hope that some day I shall be in a position to compare favourably in those respects. He used to hold his hands well out in front of him and say, "For a young man I have a great future before me".

I have been intrigued with the progress of this particular debate, because I had been informed that during the final days of the session there was a tremendous rush to get home. We have not seen any of that, and I think it is a healthy sign which gives evidence of the desire to debate the details of this controversial piece of legislation.

Mr. Sinnott: Are you for it or against it?

Mr. Dinsdale: I consider myself fortunate to have had the privilege of sitting in this house during this special session. I feel it has been a good session in which to be initiated into parliamentary procedure, because it has covered a tremendous amount of territory. I suppose we shall remember it as the inflation session. A great deal of the speech from the throne dealt with the problem of inflation and the high cost of living. I believe it was the member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) who described this session as the "inflation session". No doubt the emphasis on that problem made it necessary for the government to seek some reasonable solution or some explanation for the difficulty that, to date, has been considered as one of the important problems in our economy.

In looking around for a solution to problems there is a well known mechanism that we adopt as individuals; we use the scapegoat mechanism. We always try to blame the other fellow. It is rare to find an individual who will stand on his own feet and say, "It is my fault". We use the scapegoat technique and we blame somebody, something or some group which is not powerful enough to fight back. I have the feeling, as I have had ever since the legislation was first introduced, that the small retail merchant is being made the scapegoat in so far as the intent of this present legislation is concerned. As I proceed with my remarks, I want to speak on behalf of the small retail merchant.

Later on in the session we moved from inflation into the deflated period, when there was hardly enough business to keep parliament occupied for a few days. I was amazed because there were important matters of business on the order paper, and as a newcomer I felt we should be digging into those as hard as we could. As a result of the "deflated period" we are now faced with the ordeal of carrying on this important debate with Christmas pressing hard upon us. It is almost unfortunate to have to disturb the serenity of the pre-Christmas period with some of the verbal displays we have seen during the last two days. It seems to me that the final phase of this session is the deflation stage. We have moved from inflation to the deflated period, and now we are in the deflation stage, because from what I can gather by reading the reports and listening to the discussions it would seem that this measure is going to have a deflationary effect. The deflationary effect is going to be felt hardest by the small retail merchant.

I should like to read from a publication of the Canadian Association for Adult Education. On November 29 this group discussed the topic "Has big business too much power?" In dealing with the question before the house, the official pamphlet has this to say:

> In 1950, in a period of high prices, the government at Ottawa set up the MacQuarrie committee to study federal combines legislation and to find out if competition were operating freely in the public interest. The committee found that it was current business practice for a manufacturer to set a "minimum resale" price for his product—that is to force the retailer to sell his product at not less than a minimum price. The committee recommended that the government pass legislation to make this sort of action on the part of the manufacturer an offence. The purpose behind such legislation, of course, would be to bring down the price of goods in some lines and thus ease the high cost of living.

We have had that point answered by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent). Continuing to quote from the article, I read:

> Here we have an interesting situation. It is the big retail firms in Canada which stand to benefit from such action. As a matter of fact, one of our largest department stores has been a leader in urging the government to carry out the recommendation of the MacQuarrie committee.
> It is the corner store retailer, in the main, who would like to see the manufacturer go on holding the price line on his product. The small retailer welcomes the protection of "minimum resale" prices, or "fair trade" prices, as they are called, because they mean he can retain his margin of profit, and still give "service" to his customers. No one can undersell him past a point because the retail price of the product is not allowed to go below a definite figure. In this case, then it would seem that what the MacQuarrie committee thinks to be in the public interest fairly well coincides with the position of the big retailer.

That was an objective appraisal of the possible consequences of this legislation now before the house.

The legislation has had a rather devious course. That is quite evident. It was introduced early in the session and then sent back to a committee for discussion. Then the committee was cut off abruptly before the retail merchants association had a chance to give evidence. The Ottawa Citizen of November 2 had something to say on this rather unusual procedure:

> The delay is disappointing, and it considerably weakens the government's position in the current controversy over measures to check inflation. For in the throne speech, directly following a paragraph dealing with the cost of living, this passage appears:
> "The government has received an interim report from the committee studying the combines legislation recommending that suppliers of goods should be prohibited from requiring or inducing distributors to resell such goods at fixed or minimum resale prices. You will be asked to consider legislation arising out of the committee's interim report."

Then the Citizen says:

> But unless the new joint committee can perform a miracle, parliament will not be asked to consider anything of the sort—not at this session.

We are considering the legislation and the information that was revealed during the committee discussions. I can't agree, however, that a miracle has been performed. After listening to what the members of the opposition who served on that committee have had to say, I do not regard the work of that committee as miraculous. I would rather use the term "black magic" and say that "black magic" has been effected in making it possible to bring back this difficult and complex legislation into the house before the conclusion of this present session.

As we have moved along in the discussion thus far, I fear that sometimes more heat than light has been generated. Yesterday for a time I was reminded of some rather stimulating experiences I had while overseas. I used to spend Sunday afternoons listening to the orators at Hyde Park corner in London, which is an extremely interesting place. Then later on I went to Bughouse square in Chicago and listened to the orators there. Some of the oratory we have heard in this chamber reminded me greatly of the type of oratory that I have heard on those occasions to which I have referred; it is most stimulating in its emotional appeal, and most entertaining, but it is hardly the type of treatment that is required for the deliberations of this house and particularly for an objective and intelligent consideration of the present legislation.

I admit that everybody should be able to say his piece. I remember one occasion at Hyde Park corner when a speaker got on his soap box and was rather subversive in his remarks. He was attacking the royal family. An American soldier who was standing by, chewing gum, became greatly disturbed and rushed over to a policeman, or rather a bobby, and said: I say, officer, that man is attacking the royal family; he is trying to incite the people to rush down to Buckingham palace and to do some violence to the king and queen; but the bobby was quite nonchalant in his reply. He merely turned to the crowd and shouted: All for Buckingham palace, queue up here.

I think one of the important safety valves of our democratic way of life is the ability to say our piece, and to say it as we feel, without any inhibition of party or without any inhibition of pressurizing in any way, shape or form. Yesterday I was quite disturbed, after hearing some of these orations, to note the vociferous applause that came from government benches, because the appeal was emotional and political; it was not dealing with the basic issues of this legislation under consideration at the present time.

I do not want to review the discussion in detail, but I may say that at times we have become quite philosophical, and we have dealt with economic theory as we have moved through the debate. When I listened to the presentation of the Minister of Justice there were moments when I thought he might be advocating a return to the laissez-faire system of economics, or making a downright appeal for outright free enterprise. The illustration was given of Henry Ford's success in the economic field. Later on, however, the minister went on to point out that it is a fallacy to apply measures that are effective at one time to another situation that has changed remarkably as a result of the process of social change.

It is true that times have changed considerably since Henry Ford made his great fortune by manufacturing the model T, the tin-lizzy, by mass production, without any economic restrictions whatever. He did that under free enterprise or laissez-faire economics. The very fact of the successful introduction of the model T Ford is partly responsible for the changes that have come about; for as a result, we live in a mechanized society which has been put on wheels; and the mechanization of our society has brought about changes in the family, in the church and in government, as is only too evident as we attempt to deal with affairs of state at the present time.

For example, if I may I should like to give one illustration. Consider what the model T Ford did to our courting habits. It took the courting procedure out of the front parlour, under the watchful eyes of mother and father, and removed it to the lovers' lane, and so on in the model T or the modern equivalent of the model T, and this is something which has had serious effects on the stability of family life at the present time.

An hon. Member: Speak for yourself.

Mr. Dinsdale: I give that as an illustration of the effect.

Mr. Casselman: Don't get off the main highways.

Mr. Dinsdale: Let us pass on, then. As a result of these changes—if we want to get into the theory of the matter—we have what you might call state socialism today. I think the policies of the present government might be easily classified as state socialism. I think it has become evident that one of the great Liberal journals of this country, the Winnipeg Free Press, which developed tremendous influence under the inspired leadership of that great Liberal, the late J. W. Dafoe, has indicated the dilemma that the present government finds itself in; because that journal has extreme difficulty in applying the theories of Liberalism to the present meanderings of the government. Periodically it quotes from John Stuart Mill, a great Liberal theorist, attempting to reaffirm the faith. Periodically, too, it often goes off at a tangent concerning some of the policies that are being pursued by the so-called Liberal government at the moment. I think that is evidence of the fact that, as a result of these changes, as a result of the move towards socialism in government, any political group is having difficulty in making adaptation to the demands of the times. And when somebody accuses the Conservatives of meandering all over the lot, when somebody accuses the Conservatives of having no policy, because it too must meet the demands for a changed situation, then I think it is a case of the kettle calling the pot black. And if I may make an appraisal, perhaps the meanderings of the Conservative party are not as extreme as the meanderings of the party in power at the present time. At least we are being consistent and cohesive on this very fundamental point which is before us at the moment.

The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) put the issue nicely before us in his remarks. He accepts state socialism as being the solution—

Mr. Coldwell: Not state socialism.

Mr. Dinsdale: What would you call it?

Mr. Coldwell: Democratic socialism.

Mr. Fleming: A rose by any other name. It is state monopoly.

Mr. Hees: It has surely been sweetened up.

Mr. Dinsdale: He accepts democratic socialism as being the solution of the underlying social situation facing us at the present time.

Mr. Graydon: He is meandering, too.

Mr. Dinsdale: He and his party would tend to support complete state control or nationalization, and they are justified in having their views, but I merely pose the question—I am not going to pursue this argument—I merely pose the question: Is government control a good thing? Is increasing government control a good thing? Is statism a good thing? We must remind ourselves that the only institution in the state that can use force in working its will is government. It has armies and police forces behind it, and if it wants to control, if it wants to assume power, it can assume absolute power. The family, no coercion; the church, no coercion; the school, no coercion; but the government can back up its demands with physical force.

Mr. Coldwell: What about private economic power?

Mr. Dinsdale: Private economic power? You mean the combines and so forth?

Mr. Coldwell: Monopolies.

Mr. Dinsdale: Yes, monopolies are equally dangerous. Great monopolies are as dangerous as too much power in the hands of the state. There are institutions other than government, and as government power grows it seems to me that functions that belong to these other social institutions, the family, the small neighbourhood community, if you will, even education and the church are usurped by the government. I raise the question as to whether that is the thing we want; whether it is a desirable trend at this time, particularly from the standpoint of our democratic way of life. I believe that a healthy democracy is based on a healthy community life; and a healthy community life can only survive when we have an active, enthusiastic and dynamic local government. As I read the rural weeklies I notice that we have just passed through a period of local council and school board elections, and so forth. I am quite disturbed when I read in community after community that no one is willing to stand and accept the jobs. Councils are elected by acclamation, or the mayor is elected by acclamation because seemingly there is a lack of interest at this grass root level of our democratic way of life. There is a loss of feeling of responsibility in the community. I am going to point out, Mr. Speaker, I feel that the situation that confronts the small retail merchant, as we contemplate the import of this legislation, is only going to aggravate this basic problem of our democratic way of life.

In giving his evidence Mr. McGregor supported that point of view. He said that the small retail merchants will go to the wall. He said they are to be the scapegoats. They are to be the ones who must bear the impact of the deflationary spiral. They must be the victims of this smoke screen that the government is attempting to raise in order to pacify the demand for some comprehensive handling of the present problem of inflation.

There are two sides to this question. There has been pressure from the retail merchant; there has been pressure from the other groups; and the question has been thrown continually at the members of the official opposition: Which side do you stand on, or are you a mugwump sitting in the middle?

[Mr. Dinsdale.]

Well it is very difficult, in a matter as complex as this, to take a stand unless all the facts are before you. To me the original intent of putting the legislation back in the hands of the committee was to give an opportunity for conscious appraisal of this problem. I understand that one of the major protests, as I interpret it—and nobody has told me to interpret it this way—one of the major protests of the official opposition is the fact that important groups, in particular the retail merchants association, have been shut off and prevented from giving their evidence. For what reason? It may have been to fulfil a promise to make some attempt to solve the inflationary problem, or to introduce additional solutions to the inflationary problem, or it may be for some other reason.

At one o'clock the house took recess.

The house resumed at 2.30 p.m.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

ACKNOWLEDGMENT OF ADDRESS IN REPLY

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the house that I have received a message from His Excellency the Governor General, signed by his own hand, reading as follows:

Government House, Ottawa
17th December, 1951

Members of the House of Commons:

I have received with great pleasure the address that you have voted in reply to my speech at the opening of parliament. I thank you sincerely for this address.

Alexander of Tunis

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT

AMENDMENT TO FORBID THE FIXING OF SPECIFIC OR MINIMUM RESALE PRICES

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Garson for the second reading of Bill No. 36, to amend the Combines Investigation Act, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Fulton.

Mr. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon): Mr. Speaker, when the house recessed for lunch I was endeavouring to bring before hon. members the case of the small retail merchant in reference to the legislation before us. I feel the Minister of Justice should be able to understand my viewpoint because his own constituency of Marquette joins that of Brandon. You might say that we are neighbours, and good neighbours too. As a matter of fact my father-in-law and mother-in-law are residents of his constituency. I am not quite sure whether I have converted them as yet—whether they have seen the light. That is more important so far as my father-in-law is concerned for a son-in-law is not supposed to be too much concerned about the mother-in-law problem.

We have been accused of taking the side of big business. I have never had anything to do with big business and I am not quite sure what the accusation involves. Perhaps I could throw some light on the problem by reading excerpts from one or two letters and thus indicate the sort of big business I am sponsoring this afternoon. This first letter is from a combined druggist and medical doctor in the town of Pipestone, Manitoba, who has been serving that community in that dual capacity almost as long as I can remember. Here is what he says:

For 15 years during the price cutting spree my drug store in Pipestone was in the red every year and I was contemplating closing it, but people asked me not to, for every town and district needs a place like this to take care of emergencies.

Mr. Cannon: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I would ask the hon. member to table the letter he is reading. I think there is a rule that anything which a member reads or quotes from should be tabled.

Mr. Coldwell: Is there any rule that you must table a private document? A document from which a minister reads must be tabled on request.

Mr. Speaker: I think perhaps it will be sufficient to identify the source of the letter and it need not be tabled.

Mr. Dinsdale: I have already indicated the source. The letter continues:

I carry several thousand dollars' worth of drugs, chemicals, etc. which are used only occasionally, and has little or no profit. We depended on the daily sales of goods from our shelves to make a living. Since we induced the manufacturers to control their retail prices, my drug store has come out of the red, although the profits have been small, even less than those of grocery stores. If this should be outlawed, I'll be forced to close my drug store, like hundreds of others in small towns, for I could not go through it again, as I am getting to the age where I must slow down in my practice and work. This law would never decrease the cost of living for the profits are small.

That is the type of businessman on whose behalf I am speaking this afternoon. I have another letter from a departmental store merchant in Rivers, Manitoba, adjoining the constituency of Marquette, which reads:

Contrary to the opinion of many, it is my belief that the maintained price asked by the average manufacturer tends to hold the selling price down—rather than up. While the best example of this is in the drug and cosmetic lines I might refer you to that of another department. The maintained price of Tip Top suits allows a much smaller mark-up than that asked by the retailer on brands where the price is not maintained. It is of some satisfaction to the customer that he can purchase a Tip Top suit from the smallest country store at the same price as from the largest city store. He does not have to drive many miles to be able to purchase a packet of Gillette razor blades at a cut price because the Gillette company has tried for years to establish a fair resale price, the same in Halifax as it is in Vancouver.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member is not disclosing the source of the letter. He has informed the house that he has received letters from certain cities. It is customary to disclose to the house the author of letters which are read. If the hon. member intends to quote other letters I think he should disclose their source.

Mr. Graydon: Mr. Speaker, my understanding of the rule, subject to your much wider knowledge, is that the source of a letter being read, such as the hon. member is now reading, need not be disclosed so far as the origin of the letter is concerned provided the hon. member is prepared to take the responsibility for the facts and statements contained in the letter.

Mr. Speaker: I think it would be most difficult for an hon. member to assume complete responsibility unless he knew the facts in a letter were as stated. I think this was discussed at some length at a previous session when the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) proposed to read a letter. I think it was decided then that in fairness to all members the source of a letter should be disclosed.

Mr. Dinsdale: Thank you.

Mr. Speaker: I am not requiring the hon. member to disclose the source of the two letters he has just read. If that was to be done, I should have requested it earlier. However, if he intends to read other letters, he should disclose their source.

Mr. Knowles: The druggist in Pipestone is well disclosed because he is the only one.

Mr. Dinsdale: In referring to the two letters I have just read, Your Honour referred to Pipestone and Rivers as being cities. I am sure that the constituents in those two towns will be flattered at this elevation of status. That helps me to move to my next point, which is more specifically a western Manitoba problem. In conjunction with the trend toward government control which I have indicated, there has also been a trend toward urbanization, a trend toward bigness, which is seen so far as the prairie provinces are concerned in the loss, or relatively slow increase, of population. This is highlighted by statistics published with respect to the recent census. Taking Saskatchewan, for example, we find that that province is in danger of losing four of its spokesmen in the house as a result of the decline in population arising from continued rural-urban migration. Manitoba also is in danger of losing one representative. The three prairie provinces are rapidly becoming a minority group. Of course there are other implications. There is the problem of education, which has been discussed in the house on one or two occasions during this session. We educate our young people and carry at least a percentage of them to the high school level only to see them migrate to the central provinces where they make their contribution in industry, business and so on, while we with our very small population and with very little support from the federal government—no support at all at the present time—have had to bear the cost of educating these young citizens.

I am going to get myself into a little difficulty in my next statement with the members from Winnipeg, but in western Manitoba we face a double problem of centralization. Not only do we compete with eastern Canada but we also compete with Winnipeg where more than half the population of the province of Manitoba is concentrated in that small area. It stretches out like an octopus and devours everything in its sight. I can perhaps illustrate the point by giving the solution offered by the editor of the Brandon Sun in his well known column "Sun Gleams". Incidentally, Mr. Noakes is Canada's senior editor. He is in his eighties and is still going strong in his editorial capacity. Mr. Noakes recommended as a solution for our civil defence problem a sign on the top of the hill just north of Brandon in the form of an illuminated arrow pointing in the direction of Winnipeg. That indicates the underlying attitude.

Mr. Hosking: On a point of order, I wonder if these remarks have any bearing on price maintenance. The hon. member's speech is of the same type as those that were made in the debate on the address, and he is delaying the extension of the benefits of this legislation to the people of the country.

Mr. Cardiff: You took up our time and nobody stopped you.

An hon. Member: It is not price maintenance; it is debate maintenance.

Mr. Speaker: I think the hon. member has been relating his remarks to the principle of the bill. I am sure he does not intend to do otherwise.

Mr. Dinsdale: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. With the mail order houses concentrated in the larger urban centres, the small retail merchant faces a problem of increasing proportions if the legislation now before the house is passed. My time is almost up and I must come to a rapid conclusion. As I see it, the point of this legislation is a desire to do something about the high cost of living, and we have the statement of the Prime Minister that it will do nothing in that regard. Perhaps more than the mechanism of fair trade practice in the form of resale price maintenance, the factor that has contributed largely to present high prices is the process of getting set which resulted from the generous warning given by the government when Canada entered into this emergency period of planning, because it was then that our prices really began to skyrocket and soar.

I think the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) was quite justified when he suggested, on the occasion of referring this legislation to the committee, a wider approach to the problem in order to get at the big fellows who are responsible for the upward trend in prices and not make a scapegoat of the small retail merchant in an attempt to raise a smoke screen to obscure the major issue. I have been receiving little green slips from consumer organizations throughout Canada. Obviously it is an organized program to influence this discussion because the slips are mimeographed. They indicate that the consumer wants to have prices lowered. We have already had it demonstrated to us that this legislation will do nothing so far as that is concerned, and unfortunately will work a real hardship on the small retailer, particularly the small retail merchants to whom I have referred this afternoon who are faced with the double problem of centralization in the east and in the eastern part of the prairie provinces.

Those on this side of the house have been accused of trying to filibuster and prolong the debate on this measure when everybody wants to get home for Christmas. No one is more anxious to go home than I, but it is not the fault of the official opposition that the bringing down of this legislation was so long delayed. We expected it earlier in the session. I think I have indicated it is of sufficient importance to merit the full consideration of every member of the house. We have not had statistics or facts presented as to the merits or demerits. We have reason to believe that the small retail merchant will suffer. So far as the term "humbug" as applied to our policy is concerned, I should like to draw the illustration of the learned professor of biology who was presented with a synthetic bug that his students had concocted in an attempt to fool the old gentleman. They had wings from a fly, a body from a bee, legs from grasshoppers, and so forth. He looked at it under his microscope, paused momentarily, and finally said, "This is a humbug". That seems to aptly describe the nature of the legislation before us.

Mr. W. A. Boucher (Rosthern): Mr. Speaker, as one who had the opportunity of being a member of the committee on combines legislation I wish to make a few comments on some of the briefs presented to the committee. Representing a rural constituency, first of all I want to deal with the viewpoint of the farmers with respect to this proposed price maintenance legislation, and then I also want to deal with the viewpoint of the small merchant as I have had some experience in that line. The Canadian Federation of Agriculture made their views very clear in their brief, and I should like to quote certain passages. On page 1 they say:

> Our views on this matter are likely already known to this committee.
> In our brief presented to the special committee to study combines legislation, known as the MacQuarrie committee, in August of 1950, we recommended that "The Combines Investigation Act should be amended to provide that resale price maintenance shall be an illegal practice when resorted to by a single individual or corporation."

Then, on page 9 of the same brief, we find this:

> More than half of all the purchases made by farmers for productive purposes come directly under some form of private resale price fixing. This list would include the following tools and supplies:
> Farm machinery and parts
> Most items of general hardware such as small tools
> Many construction and building materials
> Fertilizer
> Truck and auto tires
> Gasoline and oil
> Milking machines and parts
> Milk coolers
> Electric motors
> All barn fixtures such as steel stanchions, water bowls, etc.
> Some brands of paint
> Woven wire, wire gates and barbed wire
> Veterinary supplies and drugs for livestock.

And the next is a very important paragraph which was quoted by the Minister of Justice, and which I repeat:

> In some of the above cases the entire sales come under private resale price fixing.

Then at page 15 of the same brief we find this paragraph:

> The production and sale of farm machinery is a typical example of the policy of an industry dominated by a few large producers and using privately administered price fixing as a means to maintain prices at the expense of production and employment in their own industry. This policy is in sharp contrast to the farming industry which, because of its nature, maintains total production at relatively stable levels and feels the full impact of changing demand for its products.

I have here a resolution passed by the annual meeting of delegates of the Saskatchewan wheat pool. It was my privilege to file with the committee this resolution which was passed by the 27th annual meeting of the delegates of the Saskatchewan wheat pool held in Regina, November 6 to 16, 1951. In their resolution they say:

That we commend the federal government for proposing to introduce legislation to stop the practice of resale price maintenance by manufacturers and business corporations and recommend that this meeting declare its unalterable opposition to any degree of retail price fixing, or the determining of resale minimum prices by manufacturers, processors and suppliers of all kinds; and deplore the action on the part of some business firms in withholding supplies from wholesale houses and retail merchants who, through patronage dividends or otherwise, have not conformed to this form of monopolistic price control; and urge the federal government to proceed with the legislation declaring the practice of resale price maintenance by manufacturers and business firms illegal, as originally proposed, and have this done as soon as possible during the present session of parliament.

This was carried unanimously by the annual meeting of the delegates of the Saskatchewan wheat pool.

In addition to organized agriculture, the proposals are supported by the following organizations or groups: The Canadian Congress of Labour; the Canadian and Catholic Confederation of Labour; the railway brotherhoods; the Co-operative Union of Canada, and all the constituent bodies. The last I am going to mention, but not the least, is the Canadian Association of Consumers. We have all this evidence of popular support from the consumers, the farmers and the workingmen. May I say here that Mr. F. A. McGregor, the former combines commissioner, said in his evidence that in his opinion the proposed legislation would reduce prices to consumers. As I said at the beginning, I have had some experience as a small retail merchant; and in my view the little merchant has nothing to fear because the figures show that he has been able to survive competition from big firms, particularly in those states of the United States where price maintenance is illegal.

So, as I said before, I am satisfied it will not hurt the small retailer who plays such an important and useful part in our community. I shall not detain the house longer, but in conclusion let me say that I feel this is good legislation. It is legislation that will be beneficial to a very large section of the Canadian people.

Mr. Rodney Adamson (York West): Mr. Speaker, I spoke on this matter in the House of Commons two months ago yesterday, immediately after reading the MacQuarrie committee report. I was opposed to the report then, and recommended the setting up of the committee to study the matter before legislation was introduced. This was done. This was before any letters or communications of any sort had begun to come in from the retailers on this matter.

I claim therefore that my position then, as it is now, was based purely on objective reasoning. The fascist behaviour of the government in the committee, first by denying witnesses a hearing and, secondly, in this house trying to shout down the opposition, is incipient fascism of the first—

Mr. Garson: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege: the word "fascist" is not parliamentary, and I demand that my hon. friend withdraw it.

Mr. Speaker: I do not think it is the sort of word that should be used in debate.

Mr. Adamson: I did not say that the government was fascist. But, as the word "humbug" was used as applied to policy, then I submit that if the word "humbug" could be used to designate the policy we are accused of following, then the word "fascist" could be used—

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): It is quite different.

Mr. Adamson:—to describe the policy or action which has taken place in committee. I say that, because witnesses were denied the right to be heard, which is the first point of fascism; and the second point is that an attempt in this house has been made to shout down and to deny the opposition its proper opportunity to present the case against this legislation.

Mr. Winters: That is nonsense.

Mr. Garson: Mr. Speaker, may I say one or two more words on this point of order? If the debates in the house are not going to descend into a scurrilous exchange of abuse from one side of the house to the other, I think we should discourage the practice, which has been adopted to quite an extent by the opposite side of the house, of using these adjectives. I suggest, and I think my friend will agree, that to accuse any person in a democratic country of being a fascist is one of the worst forms of insult it would be possible to imagine. I renew my demand that it be withdrawn.

Mr. Speaker: I believe I have intimated that the word should be withdrawn, and I understood that the member for York West (Mr. Adamson) was prepared to withdraw it. I should comment that I feel there has been strong language used by both sides of the house. It would be more in keeping with the traditions of this highest court in the land if we tried to express ourselves in a manner which we could all read with pride in the future.

Mr. Adamson: Thank you very much, Mr Speaker. I willingly withdraw. I thank you for your remarks, which I hope have restored to a great measure the democratic principles in which we all believe.

I opposed this legislation because it is just another bit of prohibition. I submit that the enforcement of it will be as difficult as the enforcement of the prohibition against the consumption of alcoholic beverages, now an unhappy memory. I say that, Mr. Speaker, because of the ramifications of the retail trade and, as a matter of fact, of the entire business of manufacturing, jobbing, wholesaling and retailing, to say nothing of the small drug stores, grocery stores, haberdashers and other small retailers. I hope to show later in my remarks that the enactment of this measure will dislocate the normal course of business in this country. I say that one of my reasons for opposing it is the fact that it is another prohibition. It will, in fact, create a species of grey markets, or if not grey markets at least grey agreements. It will be most difficult to completely police this measure.

On the very simple question of a manufacturer withholding goods from a retail outlet that has cut prices, it will be found that prosecution is extremely complex and evidence extraordinarily difficult to obtain. If there is a concentrated drive against this legislation by the small retailers, as there may well be, the policing of the measure may require a great number of people in the combines administration. As I have said, this legislation is obviously unpopular with a great number. Difficulty will be experienced in registering convictions through the ordinary process of a jury trial. I point that out as being one of the disadvantages of the enactment of this legislation, especially when there is obviously a great body of opinion opposed to it.

I also oppose this legislation, Mr. Speaker, because I believe it is unconstitutional. It restricts the freedom of contract which is a civil right, and restricts it in such a way that even fair and reasonable contracts are prohibited. Not being learned in the law I do not put myself up as a professional witness in this regard, but it seems to me that the freedom of contract is a basic and inalienable right under the British North America Act. If it does anything this legislation restrains the freedom of contract. This may in the government's opinion be desirable, but I do not agree that it is. I do not think it is constitutional, and I believe this legislation will run into considerable trouble on that issue alone.

What is the logical and almost immediate result of this legislation? It is going to concentrate an even greater volume of business in the main shopping centres. I happen to have some knowledge of the conditions in the city of Toronto, particularly concerning the main shopping artery, downtown Yonge street. I am informed by people whose duty it is to inform me that if this legislation goes through there will be an even greater flow of business from the small retail merchants to this main shopping artery. These are not small stores on Yonge street. Property on that street has a value of many, many thousands of dollars per foot, so they must be big businesses. The information given to me by people whose duty it is to give it to me is that there will be a greater concentration of business in this area. The same thing will apply to the main shopping areas in other urban centres. A concentration of trade will take place in your densely populated and highly concentrated areas.

Mr. Garson: Will my hon. friend permit a question?

Mr. Adamson: Yes.

Mr. Garson: In line with his present logic, can he explain why it is that a concentration does not take place, along the lines that he suggests, in the grocery trade and in the hardware trade where there is virtually no resale price maintenance?

Mr. Adamson: As a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, I am glad the minister has raised that point. Your grocery trade and your hardware trade do not have resale price maintenance; your hardware trade does, to a certain extent.

Mr. Garson: To a very small extent.

Mr. Adamson: Yes. Your grocery stores, with the one exception of Michie and Company, who had to leave downtown Toronto, do not centre in your high-rent areas. You have no concentration of your food industry in your downtown area. Those stores do not go there for a number of reasons. The first reason is that they require a great deal of space, and the volume per square foot in those trades is not sufficient to pay the high taxes and the high rent required in your downtown section. There are many other reasons for that. I think that point has reinforced my argument that your grocery remains in your suburb because it cannot and does not pay the high rent and the high taxes of your downtown district. There are other reasons.

There are the reasons that your downtown shopper is not a shopper for groceries. Your downtown shopper is a shopper who buys, for the most part, price-maintained goods. Your average housewife on an expedition to buy groceries does not go downtown or into your main shopping centres in order to buy those household supplies. I think that is and has been the pattern of marketing in Canada.

I mention this matter because I think it shows that this business of resale price maintenance affects only a small part of the family budget; as a matter of fact I think it was 6·3 per cent which was mentioned here the other day. But where you have a purchaser for brand-name goods, goods which are bought in downtown shops, with your concentration of business there, you will get your big volume downtown, to the detriment of your suburban and small town shops. I think that was the point I was trying to make.

Mr. Maltais: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Adamson: Yes.

Mr. Maltais: Is that 6·3 per cent the percentage of the total families?

Mr. Adamson: Of the budget; yes.

I want to go on to the recent result—and I think it is germane to this discussion—of price wars in the United States. There is here an example which I think we can regard as a reasonable sample of what we may expect. In the city of New York there was a violent price war put on by Gimbel's, Macy's and one or two of the other large department stores. Apart from the subsequent legal question of certain manufacturers suing the stores for selling their goods below the agreed-on price, the result has been that prices today, of the goods which were subject to that price war, and which were most intensively used as loss leaders, are now back again and judging by last week's New York press, are actually selling at a higher price than that at which they sold before the price war took place.

There price wars were, of course, conducted on a cash basis, and extremely drastic reductions took place for a short time. But the people they benefited, if they benefited anybody, were the comparatively minuscule group who happened to be at that moment in the market for the particular items which were subject to drastic price cutting. Those and those only benefited from the price war.

Mr. Speaker, I believe it would be interesting for the house to hear what the late Mr. Justice Louis D. Brandeis has to say on this subject, from the legal point of view. He said:

> Already the displacement of the small independent businessman . . . presents a grave danger to our democracy. The social loss is great; and there is no economic gain . . . Shall we, under the guise of protecting competition, further foster monopoly by creating immunity for the price-cutters?
> America should be under no illusions as to the value or effect of price-cutting. It has been a most potent weapon of monopoly—a means of killing the small rival to which the giant trusts have resorted most frequently. It is so simple, so effective. Farseeing organized capital secures by this means the co-operation of the short-sighted unorganized consumer to his own undoing. Thoughtless or weak, he yields to the temptation of trifling immediate gain and, selling his birthright for a mess of pottage, becomes himself an instrument of monopoly.

There, Mr. Speaker, is the opinion of a great liberal with a small "l" as to the result of this business of price war and price cutting. I submit in all seriousness that opinions like those should be considered, and considered seriously, entirely apart from the heat of this present debate. We are, as has been shown by the price wars in New York, liable to destroy the very small retailer, who is the very backbone and safeguard of our whole consumer system.

Mr. Garson: Would the hon. gentleman permit another question?

Mr. Adamson: I think my time is half up.

Mr. Garson: I will save it until the end, if I may.

Mr. Adamson: I now come to the general question of inflation, Mr. Speaker. This legislation has been introduced in the belief, or on the supposition, that it is anti-inflationary, despite the fact that the Prime Minister stated that it would have very little effect, despite the fact, as has been shown over and over again in this debate, that the amount of goods purchased through price maintenance is a small percentage of the average weekly budget, or the factors which go into the dominion bureau of statistics cost of living index. Despite that fact, as has been shown over and over again, the reason for this legislation keeps on being given as an anti-inflationary measure.

Let us show very simply what is inflation, Mr. Speaker. Inflation is now, has been in the past and always will be, caused by an increase in the supply of money, not equalled by an increase in the supply of goods. Nothing has altered that since the time of Diocletian, and this measure is in many ways similar to parts of the edict of Diocletian and parts of the Sumerian code, and parts of the laws put down at the time of the great inflation in France, and it will have basically the same economic effect; the only difference being that in the time of Robespierre the French government had the use of the tumbril and the guillotine. These economic prohibitions have always brought disaster to those who tried them. Therefore I say, Mr. Speaker, on the broad question whether this will aid in curbing inflation, by admission and by evidence already brought out in this debate the answer must be no.

Coming now to my own particular constituency of York West, I received a very great number of letters and telegrams; and during the time of the Ontario election, and afterwards, I made it my business to visit as large a number of my constituents as possible who had either written to me, sent me telegrams or in other ways communicated with me. In only one case did I find that the communication had been inspired or suggested by others. In the other cases—and I have some 65 telegrams in front of me—the actions were based on a genuine fear which the small druggist and the small retail merchant have as to what would happen to them should this legislation pass. I cannot neglect that body of opinion. I cannot believe that that body of opinion, expressed freely and without prompting or without coercion in any way, represents anything but a genuine fear and a true and honest opinion of the small retailer and the small merchant in my riding. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, having regard to this evidence, even if I wanted to, I could not possibly support this piece of legislation, based on the simple equation of the greatest good for the greatest number. There can be no question that these small retailers, the small druggists, the little general merchants and the specialty shops in a growing suburban district, are definitely afraid of what will happen should the trade that they are slowly building up in a new district be siphoned off by means of the loss leader to the main downtown stores.

Again, Mr. Speaker, there is no evidence, there is no suggestion that any action will be taken to cope with the loss leader device in this legislation. I submit, again on the evidence given in the price wars in New York, that the loss leader, to be effective, must maintain a reduction of probably 30 per cent to 35 per cent. Take a brand name product, cut it 35 per cent, 40 per cent or even 50 per cent and you create a magnet that will draw the people from the districts of any community to the central shopping section. You cannot help it. I know this because stores in the central part of Toronto have intimated it. It has proved to be so in New York. Even with transportation difficulties as they are, the opportunity of saving a large percentage will certainly attract the buyers.

I want now to say something about the construction industry. I have not talked about the retail merchants except as it affects them in my own particular community. But what about the construction business? I was interested in this, Mr. Speaker, because I have in my hand what is a normal construction catalogue of plumbers' supplies. It is typical of dozens and dozens of other industries which are supplying goods. Every item in these catalogues has a list price. Every single item has what is known as a list price. It is upon this basic pricing system that contracts are arrived at. Unless there is some such pricing device no contractor or house builder would be able to even remotely gauge the cost of a house or of the thousand and one other things which have to be built. All these things have a price.

There are different types of discounts, but these are the prices suggested by the manufacturer for the consumer. Sometimes the discount is great and sometimes it is small, but nevertheless these are the indicated prices to be paid by the consumer. Without a method such as is contained in this and other great catalogues which contain thousands and thousands of items the construction and building industry could not possibly arrive at any firm idea as to what should be charged for a contract.

Mr. Howe: Is it the big builder or the small builder who gets the big discount?

Mr. Adamson: If a builder is building ten houses he probably gets a larger discount than the builder who is building only one, but the builder who is building those ten houses is building for the small consumer and therefore it is the small man who gets the bigger discount under this system of pricing.

Mr. Howe: May I suggest to my hon. friend that it is inherent in all price maintenance plans that the big builder would get the big discount.

Mr. Adamson: Yes, but my point is that, without this system of pricing, the whole construction business would fall to the ground because it would have no yardstick with which to operate. These are price-controlled and price-maintained articles. If you are building a dam and require 100,000 bags of cement the price you would get from the cement company would naturally be much less than if you were buying only ten bags with which to put in a basement. The question of handling, of bagging, of invoicing and of bookkeeping would make it much cheaper in the case of the large order. My point is that this legislation is going to throw a monkey wrench into the construction industry and that is a condition which it will be difficult to overcome.

I come now to the automobile trade. Every automobile has an advertised list price. You might get a better turn-in value for your old car, but the whole industry is based upon the figure which the motorcar manufacturer uses as his list price. If that is destroyed by this legislation, as it obviously will be, upon what will you base the price of your motorcar? How is the automotive industry going to operate unless there is some target to be used as an end price?

Then there is the question of repairs. Every garage in Canada that sells a specific line of automotive products has a catalogue with the list prices of the manufacturer. Those are the suggested prices to the consumer. If that practice is outlawed how will the consumer who needs repairs be able to know that the price he is charged is a fair price? He will not know that he is even getting the genuine parts recommended by the manufacturer of his car. If no price is indicated he will have no idea what profit the garage is making. I consider that these factors are not only useful to the consumer, they are absolutely essential. The consumer should have some idea of the estimated cost of repairs to the motorcar he happens to be driving.

I oppose this bill because it will not reduce the cost of living. As I have said, only 6·3 per cent of the goods bought by the average family are price-controlled. It will only concentrate business in the main shopping centres, it will encourage the unfair device of the loss leader, it will dislocate the labour market in the retail trade, it will encourage monopoly in the hands of a few large retailers who are also manufacturers of their own branded products, and it will militate seriously against the small retail merchant.

Mr. Garson: Would my hon. friend not agree that the remarks of Mr. Brandeis to which he referred in connection with the 1951 price war in New York were actually uttered by Mr. Brandeis in 1913, some thirty-seven years ago?

Mr. Adamson: Yes, but they were similar to the remarks made by Mr. Justice Holmes and others. They are just as true today as they were then. I suggest that a great deal of the minister's evidence dates back to 1930 and 1935.

Mr. Fraser: 1921.

Mr. Adamson: The basic economics of this thing do not change. The serious results of price cutting years ago would be the same today. The effects would be just as evil today as they were in days gone by.

Mr. S. R. Balcom (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, may I suggest to you that now that we have been kept here so long it would be a most gracious act on the part of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) if he would arrange to provide air accommodation so that we may be able to get home in time for Christmas. As a matter of fact, before winter sets in I should like to fly over the area which we have picked out as the site for the new airport for the T.C.A. I understand that standing order No. 11 of Beauchesne's parliamentary rules provides that where a member has a direct pecuniary interest in any legislation such as this, he is not entitled to vote. With that I have no argument, but on the part of those who have taken part in this debate there were a few unintentional injustices that I should like to endeavour to correct before the debate ends. All members have received many communications from the druggists of this country, perhaps too many for their own good because it may be that some of them were ill-considered. Members received them, however, only because the druggists are perhaps a little better organized than many other retailers. As a matter of fact if they wish to exist they have to be organized.

At this point I wish to refer to Mr. Preston, the secretary-manager of the Canadian pharmaceutical association, who appeared before the committee and made a statement that was perhaps not altogether correct. As to one question he was asked I consider he would have been better off if he had not attempted to answer it. It was asked by Mr. Phelan, the learned counsel for the committee. In his remarks yesterday the hon. member for Coast-Capilano (Mr. Sinclair) stated at page 2148 of Hansard that Mr. Preston was not telling the truth. In today's copy of the Globe and Mail of Toronto they state that the hon. member accused Mr. Preston of lying. I contend there is a fine distinction between being accused of not telling the truth and an accusation of lying. With the Christmas season so close and everyone feeling more or less in the Christmas spirit, I would respectfully suggest that if the hon. member for Coast-Capilano were here he would only be too glad to withdraw such a statement.

The word "aspirin" was bandied around a great deal by members both in the committee and in the house. Aspirin is made by one of the most reliable and trusted firms in the country. The British Pharmacopoeia name for aspirin is acidum acetylsalicylicum and the synonym is aspirin. Acetylsalicylic acid is made by the action of acetic anhydride on salicylic acid. It contains not less than 99·5 per cent of $C_9H_8O_4$ which shows that it must be pretty well pure. The chemical formula $CH_3CO_2C_6H_4COOH$ is understood generally, and anyone with any knowledge of chemistry will realize what might happen if one of these symbols were out of order. You might wake up some morning with an atomic bomb. There is a difference between aspirin and acid acetylsalicylic which some members have recommended buying. They say you pay 79 cents for 100 aspirin and 19 cents for acid acetylsalicylic. The comparison is not altogether correct.

When you buy 100 aspirin you are buying a uniform product which will not vary once out of a million times, but if you buy acid acetylsalicylic in 5 grain tablets they are not fit to use unless made by a most reputable firm. They will not dissolve because they are too hard and they are not uniform in what they contain. I remember an episode in the first war when to save a few cents the government bought some such substitute. They were not doing the work and when examined were found to contain 1½ grains of aspirin. In the last war I had a great deal of experience along that line in the central maintenance stores at Ottawa. I had to do purchasing, and we found that in many cases we had been supplied with useless drugs after we had them all examined and tested. No druggist should buy any drug unless he is sure that it is pure. I am sure that all druggists who read the newspapers were very grateful to the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Blair) for the kind words he had to say yesterday on their behalf.

There is one more impression that I want to correct. From the debate in the house and the hearings of the committee I would infer that retailers all had formal contracts with these manufacturers. I am in the retail business and we deal with hundreds of firms and dealers all across this country and in England where they have had price maintenance. I must say that we have not one formal agreement with any firm.

Mr. F. E. Lennard (Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, I rise to support the amendment and to oppose the motion to make certain amendments to the Combines Investigation Act because I feel they are wrong. The small businessman thinks they are wrong and I agree with him. In that regard I should like to refer to an editorial that appeared in a paper in my own riding, the Hamilton Spectator. By the way, it is an independent paper and is sometimes on one side of an argument and sometimes on the other. I want to quote from the leading editorial of Tuesday, December 4. It is headed, "Anti-Fixers in a Fix". It reads as follows:

> If ever an Ottawa drama turned into a vaudeville ballyhoo it is that parliamentary committee's inquiry into resale price maintenance. Things are so mixed up now it will take a royal commission to straighten them out, and what started off as a bold bid to rescue the consumer from a dragon has developed into some excited clouting of an elusive mouse. The probe was all right in principle. It was supposed to throw light on and prevent a practice whereby a manufacturer or supplier tells the retailer the price at which his product will be sold to the public, and refuses to let him carry that brand unless he obeys the mandate. This, contend the critics, interferes with proper price competition and leads to soaking the householder in his purchase of everything from stoves to toothpaste.
> Now, who are the prosecutors? Why those same government trapeze artists who have, for one thing, a $200 million fund to keep food prices as high as is politically possible. It was their legerdemain that stored millions of pounds of butter to keep the price tag up while the consumer was forced to turn to margarine, and bitter political opposition had to be overcome to get even that relief. It was this talent that had potatoes plowed into the ground; gave away surplus fish and neatly filched $60 million—

I thought it was $65 million.

> —from the Canadian taxpayers to make good a poor "price-fix" with Great Britain on wheat.

Then, further on in the editorial:

> Then, who is the "little guy" who is to be helped by the government crusade? From the evidence so far the only people who want the practice made illegal are the mass buyers and sellers of merchandise. The "little guy" says he will go broke in the retail business if sudden big sales can sharply cut the price of items he carries in relatively small supply. And just to show how bright some people can be at the wrong time, in steps Spadina's David Croll to propose that it should be a criminal offence for a businessman to sell any commodity for less than five per cent above cost—to check the loss-leader practice. What an army of government detectives we may have yet!
> It would be absurd to suggest that resale price fixing is a simple problem; it is anything but. It would be more absurd to claim there are no valid arguments in favour of letting it stand as it is; certainly for protection of the smaller stores. The main challenge goes deeper. If there is proper competition at the manufacturing level then resale price maintenance seems a secondary issue, because prices could not be kept at an exorbitantly high level save by cartel or combine methods. If there is not unrestricted competition then that is the combine commission's job.

Some comment on that editorial came in this morning's mail. I have here editorial comment from the Kingston Whig-Standard.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. I waited until the hon. member had read the whole of the one editorial he wished to read before I interrupted him. I did not wish to interrupt in the middle of it. However, if he intends to continue to read a succession of editorials commenting on this question, then I think I should draw Your Honour's attention to the citations in this matter.

Citation 265 in Beauchesne's third edition says:

It is not in order to read articles in newspapers, letters or communications emanating from persons outside the house and referring to, or commenting on, or denying anything said by a member or expressing any opinion reflecting on proceedings within the house.

There is no question about it, that committees of the house are an extension of the house, and are included by the word "house". Then, may I draw Your Honour's attention to citation 266 which says:

On the 17th March, 1933, a member quoting a newspaper in debate—

And the hon. member for Wentworth has been bringing newspaper editorials into the debate.

—was ruled out of order by the Deputy Speaker—

And Your Honour will take note of that; it was the Deputy Speaker.

—who said: "The rule is quite clear, that the quoting of a newspaper, an author or a book which reflects upon debate before the house, either directly or indirectly, is entirely out of order, because members are here to give their own opinion and not to quote the opinion of others . . . Members may quote an article or a book stating facts, but a commentary on any proceeding or any discussion in the house, with the object of swinging an opinion to one side or the other, is out of order."

I suggest to the hon. member for Wentworth, in all fairness and with all respect, that we are more interested in his opinions on the question than we are in the opinions of the writers of editorials. I hope he will not take offence at the suggestion I have made. I have not suggested that he should refrain from speaking; but I would rather he would give us his own speech instead of the comments of editorial writers, particularly when the ruling to which I have referred is so clear.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, the point that has been made must of course be taken in relation to the context of the editorial.

I would point out to Your Honour, if the reading of editorials is to be regarded as being out of order, that the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) himself has been out of order on a number of occasions during this present session.

Mr. Rinfret: And the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew).

Mr. Drew: As has also the leader of the opposition, and as has the minister who has just spoken.

Mr. Rinfret: Not that I can recall.

[Mr. Knowles.]

Mr. Drew: I might point out that a great many members have found occasion to use editorials as indicating public reaction to certain matters that are under consideration.

The word that is used in the reference quoted is the word "reflects". I suggest to Your Honour that it has been regarded as meaning that no reflection—accepting the ordinary use of the word reflection—shall be cast upon a member by something that is read from a newspaper or from an editorial, for the very obvious reason that, if there is a reflection of that kind, then the member has no opportunity to deal with it until a later occasion.

The fact that editorials are constantly read here will be recalled by every member, because there is probably no single item that has come up so much before the orders of the day are called, on questions of privilege, as references to editorials or other comments hon. members have seen fit to read and to deal with.

In this particular case I suggest there is no reflection on the house, in the sense that that word is ordinarily used, and that the editorials under consideration are editorials which indicate an attitude toward a matter of very real public interest in different parts of this country.

I can only repeat that if there were to be a ruling that editorials are not to be read, then I would say with all courtesy—and I regret, in his absence—that the Prime Minister has chosen to follow this course on a number of occasions during the present session; and I am sure he has done so believing that it was most certainly not contrary to the practice of the house.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I understand that a certain latitude has been given in the quoting of editorials. However, I would ask the hon. member not to have his whole speech consist of the reading of editorials.

Mr. Knowles: Thank you; that was my point.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Citation 265 in Beauchesne's third edition says:

It is not in order to read articles in newspapers, letters or communications emanating from persons outside the house and referring to, or commenting on, or denying anything said by a member or expressing any opinion reflecting on proceedings within the house.

A certain amount of latitude has been given, but I hope the hon. member will not abuse the privilege.

Mr. Lennard: I appreciate Your Honour's ruling, and will abide by it. I might say I also understand why there is this more or less undue concern from the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) because I know he wants to get home for Christmas. He has been running around the house for the last day or two asking people not to talk so much, and all that sort of thing. I fully realize what has happened. But his wishes at this time are no concern of mine.

Mr. Knowles: I think the hon. member would like to get home for Christmas, too.

Mr. Lennard: I have not as far to go as you have.

Mr. Rowe: And he has not talked as much this session.

Mr. Lennard: I spoke for only three or four minutes about veterans affairs. That was the first time I had anything to say this session.

I shall not quote the editorial. I am prepared to stand by Your Honour's ruling, and shall not do more than say that it was an editorial in the Kingston Whig-Standard whose president is the Hon. W. Rupert Davies; and the publisher and general manager is his son. That paper has never been known to be anything but a supporter of the present government.

An hon. Member: A very weak one.

Mr. Lennard: In this case they are against this legislation.

I wish now to quote, not from an editorial but from an article which appeared in the New York Times of June 6, 1951, and which has not anything to do with this debate. It makes no reference whatever to the debate, but quotes Mayor Benjamin H. Namm, mayor of Brooklyn, as follows:

> If the price war now going on in New York city continues for long, it will result in the bankruptcy of many small merchants and widespread unemployment. If the war continues to spread to other cities, he contended, the entire price structure will be threatened and if it is extended to other industries, the entire economy will be upset during this critical period of national emergency.

As we know, Mr. Speaker, this committee was set up to consider the report of the MacQuarrie committee. I should like to know why representatives of the retail trade, wholesale trade, the consumers and the manufacturing industry did not have some place on that committee. Today two of the biggest items in the family budget are rent and food. Rents are not controlled by manufacturers. The other item, food, is produced and largely marketed by the farm industry. Articles of food are not, to any large extent, resale price-maintained by manufacturers. With one or two exceptions, food products are marketed by the so-called low cost distributor.

As other speakers have said that they have received many letters and communications, I do not propose to burden this house with any recitation of the many I have received. There is one, however, that seems rather pertinent, and which was sent to me by one of the leading retailers in the city of Hamilton. He said in part:

> In view of the fact that retailers who actually represent over half the entire business of Canada are so vitally interested in the above—

That is the legislation which was before the committee.

> —does it not seem the fair and democratic policy of your government to at least give this group the opportunity of expressing their views with a special committee of the house regarding the above legislation as it affects resale prices, etc., before it is presented to parliament.

In that connection I may say that the committee did hear from the Canadian retail federation, but refused to hear from the retail merchants association which has a membership in Canada of over 20,000. I think that is the one great oversight on the part of the committee which shows what a farce this whole business is.

I received four of these robin's egg blue slips which were sent out by the Canadian association of consumers. The only address shown is 1245 Wellington street, Ottawa. Many in this house have a fair idea who is behind this organization. However, I received four of these slips, and other members have received a similar or lesser number. In answer to that slip which requests me to protect the interests of the public in these times of high prices by voting to outlaw the present price-fixing practice of resale price maintenance, I wrote the following letter:

> I received your communication of recent date in respect to the government bill to prohibit resale price maintenance.
> I cannot support this bill because, in my opinion, it would be one more step towards monopoly. If we are denied the privilege of any form of price maintenance it means that the big stores can, and will, undersell and put out of business many small retailers throughout the country and then, a few years hence when they have cornered the market, up will go the prices . . . I regret not being able to meet your request and felt that the only honest course was for me to tell you so and give you my reasons.

I received a reply to that letter which reads as follows:

> Dear Mr. Lennard:
> Thank you very much for your immediate reply, and the information it contained. I had not considered that aspect of the matter, and am glad to have it drawn to my attention.

I am not saying anything in this house that I am not prepared to say in my own locality. As I said at the beginning, the small businessman thinks this is wrong and I agree with him. I am speaking for the small businessman in the town of Dundas, the adjoining city of Hamilton and the other towns and villages adjacent to them. I am speaking for the man who has his whole stake in the local community, the man who has been the backbone of that community. I am speaking for the man who belongs to the Kinsmen, the Lions, the Rotary and other service clubs; the man who has his all in his community—the small businessman. If the small businessman makes a profit he is apt to reinvest it in his business or in some local undertaking, and those profits do not go to Chicago or some other distant point.

Mr. Sinnott: What about the consumers?

Mr. Lennard: That is my problem, not yours. I have more consumers in my riding than you have in the whole province of Manitoba.

Mr. Sinnott: It is only in your mind. You do not care about them, anyway.

Mr. Lennard: I am speaking for the man who helped to carry the load during the depression. As the member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Gibson) said, when there is a strike it is the small local merchant who carries the load. In the last great depression the small merchant carried many families while the breadwinners were out of work.

I say to the Minister of Justice that these amendments of his are just one example of the things he and his colleagues have done this session that would not have been tolerated several years ago. In my opinion this government lacks the experience, guidance and political wisdom of a recent prime minister. In conclusion I protest against the amendments, and I do so on behalf of the people who, as I said before, are the backbone of every community, and especially on behalf of those small business people operating within the riding of Wentworth.

(Translation):

Mr. J. O. Gour (Russell): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to take part in this debate. First of all, I congratulate the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) and the members of the cabinet for having introduced a bill which will be passed, I hope, by a large majority.

I am speaking today on behalf of the electors of Russell and also as a small general merchant, as a small retailer with thirty-five years of experience, seven as manager of a store and twenty-eight as owner. I say, and truly so, that I am a general merchant since we sell drugs, groceries, hardware, dry goods, all kinds of building materials, feed, farm implements, trucks, tractors and jewelry, rings and watches. In other words we sell everything from pins to a truck, a tractor or bulldozer, goods worth from five cents to $25,000.

I can therefore claim a fair amount of familiarity with the retailer's problems. I must say that the position taken by our friends of the opposition does not surprise me in the least, because I have been following their policy for over twenty-five years. They have not changed. In fact I believe they are getting less and less serious; we all remember that they repeatedly stated, between 1945 and 1949, that we should do away with all controls. At that time, the Liberal government deemed it wise to remove controls gradually as the supply became sufficient to meet the consumers' demand. Yet since 1949, that same group has been asking the government to reimpose controls which they have themselves condemned.

During the last session, we have been criticized for doing nothing to check inflation. When legislation was introduced to curb the extravagant amount of credit granted on items, most of which were not essential to the population's well-being, this helpful legislation was again criticized, although it had greatly reduced the price of certain goods, especially automobiles, refrigerators as well as a large quantity of other goods. I think I know something about this since, in my store, I have a pretty complete line of goods for sale. I never fail to advise people not to go too deeply into debt because, as everyone knows, it is always the less well off that suffer most since their creditors force them to pay up, even though they might thereby lose all they have.

Right now we listen to the Conservatives upholding price maintenance in the name of the small retailer. Come, my friends, let us be more serious about this! You wish to protect the financier, the manufacturer, the wholesaler, the chain store operator. More than that, you want to turn one small group into the dictators of Canadian trade and make the small retailers their slaves. Should you succeed we would merely be the distributors for that group which would henceforth bend us to their will. Again the little people would be duped. In this way combines and trusts would grow more numerous and powerful and the retail trade of this country, in the very near future, would be controlled and directed by a few hundred individuals.

No, Mr. Speaker. I submit that the small retailer like myself, whether he is a general merchant or a grocer, is one of those who have done very great service to Canada. The small shopkeeper is his customer's friend. Always ready to serve him honestly, he lives with him and is at all times prepared to be of service. He helps his community in all its social assistance activities, does his very utmost to improve his town or city and works in the interests of both workers and farmers. His outlook being such, he therefore does not want to be compelled to make a higher profit than he thinks is fitting; he is capable of obeying the laws of the land but he is opposed to the dictatorship of certain sections of society.

Mr. Speaker, retail price maintenance is harmful to 95 per cent of the people of Canada, even to a great many of those who are in favour of it. It allows too large profits to be made. People are much more intelligent than our Conservative friends seem to think.

When the margin of profit is too wide, the buyer realizes it and cuts down his purchases. The manufacturer is unable to sell his goods: that is against the interests of the industrialists themselves since it leads to unemployment. The people who, due to circumstances, are compelled to buy those goods pay too much; they are taken advantage of and that leads to a rise in the cost of living.

The small merchant who is compelled to sell certain goods at fixed prices does not dare reduce his prices for fear of not being permitted to buy other supplies. On the other hand the large stores, due to their purchasing power, are much more independent; if the manufacturer refuses to sell them his products he risks losing a large customer and he knows quite well that this large store can buy elsewhere. Furthermore, the large retailers advertise much through the medium of catalogues, radio, newspapers, etc. They advertise other goods which draw the customers and are thus able to sell their wares at fixed prices. Customers are allowed discounts on certain goods when purchasing such and such an article sold at a set price. Most often these are items the customer could easily do without for the time being.

No, Mr. Speaker, the small retailer is not asking for any favours. All he wants is to be treated the same as others; he wants to do business unfettered. Why should the manufacturer treat him so unfairly. Why should he grant the large store discounts of 10, 15 and even 25 per cent more than is given the small retailer?

I would not mind an additional 2 to 5 per cent discount, since it does cost a little less to sell and deliver in large quantities, but there should never be more than a 5 per cent difference between the small retailer and the large retailer. From the information made available to us it is clear that the small retailer sells the greater part of the manufacturer's production and it is through him that both manufacturers and wholesalers make their profits.

The small retailer should be the one to be assured of reasonable protection on the part of manufacturers. If the latter continue to protect more and more chain stores of every description, department stores and all types of establishments with great purchasing power, they will soon find themselves at the mercy of the operators of these stores who will dictate to them the price which they are willing to pay, will make them produce at a loss, thus forcing them to cut their employees' salaries or close shop altogether. These large retailers will then have their own way with the manufacturers, the small retailers and the consumers of this country. They will thus tell us what to do, while continuing to exploit us.

I leave to our friends, the Tories, the task of defending their friends, these few millionaires who think only of increasing their profits but forget that Canadians are not so easily deceived.

Again, Mr. Speaker, I ask my government to continue, as in the past, to protect the interests of the less privileged people, who cannot defend themselves as well as others. I take this opportunity of inviting all Canadians to make a still greater effort to increase production of essential commodities, not only to meet the needs of every Canadian but also to enable us to help the people of less fortunate countries than our beautiful Canada. We will thus help fight inflation and assist people of countries less privileged than ours. This would draw upon us the gifts of divine Providence, permit us to check communism and contribute to increase the respect of other peoples for Canadians.

In conclusion, I say that we will not only prove that we have a dignified and great

Prime Minister, but that the whole Canadian people is following his example, and wants to see Canada prosperous, while helping to ensure prosperity in other countries.

(Text):

Mr. Arthur Laing (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, in this debate I have seen a number of lawyers and others metaphorically donning their gowns and getting in behind the counters. Because prior to coming here I had 25 years of business experience, I should like to give the house some of my impressions, gathered out of that experience, as to the effectiveness of this legislation. I was in a business where we acted as manufacturers, wholesalers and retailers, a rather unique position. We endeavoured to establish our retail prices by quite extensive advertising. We found that some retailers we supplied broke our retail prices. In all the years I was in business we did not do a single thing by way of reprisal against any of those people because in my mind—although I did not know it; I never inquired—I would have thought that it was against the law. I think we would be much safer in this country if we always have regard to this fact, that when a seller disposes of an article to a buyer the seller has severed his connection with that article; and when a person owns an article he has a perfect right to do with it as he sees fit.

I am supporting this legislation not because I think it is going to have any large-scale effect on the cost of living. I do not think it will roll back our inflationary trends very far, but I am supporting it because I think that security and not initiative has become the first consideration of too many business firms in this country for their own good. There has been a portrayal on the other side of the house that this is going to result in harsh and bitter times for retailers. I do not believe they can produce any evidence to that effect at all. I will tell you what I think it will do. Because I believe there are going to be cut prices in some lines, I think it is going to result in the greatest stimulation of sales in this country in the last year. That is what I think will happen.

Our state of business is not determined by legislation such as is involved in this bill. The state of business is determined by the fantastic ability of a public when aroused to do without. That is how it is arranged. So-called good times in business occur when a man says to himself: "I must buy this article today because I think it will cost more tomorrow." Recessions in business occur when a man says: "I will put off buying this today because I think it will be cheaper tomorrow". Buying patterns are the result of a great measure of mass psychology in people. You get great masses of people who say: "We had better wait a while and we will buy more cheaply." Those are the things that affect business and always will affect business.

One of the recent phenomena in business is the growth of business associations. I do not like to speak about conventions, because a great many of the conventions that are held today are the veritable parliaments of the industries concerned and they do a very great deal of good to industry; but almost everybody today is having a convention, and some of them in the most peculiar places, the farther away the better. I know where they grew up. They grew up in the good times we have had in the last ten years in this country, and many of them have developed because the instigators knew that first Ilsley and now Abbott would be paying for them. I feel there is this feeling on the part of some of those who are heading these conventions, that we are going to be able to be more secure in our business with possibly less effort than we have had in the past. In the old days you used to say that of every one hundred businesses that were formed, seventy-five were going to be out of business in five years. That is a thing which the businessman today is trying to avoid. He does not want to take any more risks than he has to.

There is a great demand in this country for individual security, and it is natural today. I think there is an attempt in the country to obtain business security and the security of corporations. I have this idea, that were that to be guaranteed by any means it would probably mean the denial of security to the individual. I believe that a number of the consequences and results that have flowed from any industrial associations constitute a most disquieting and indeed dangerous phenomenon in our recent industrial development. I am not going to say that the work of all industrial associations is wrong. I think the exchange of credit information, for instance, results in a social good so long as a blacklist is not compiled out of that exchange.

I have seen—and I must say I saw some evidence of it in the committee that sat here—the development of what I term a new aristocracy of business, and I do not think it is either a sound or a good thing. The businessman today, in his relations with his government, apparently does not want to come down to see government. He has intercessors here. They are a group of high-priced legal help, groups of high-priced accountants and professional advocates of special causes, and a number of them were before that committee. At the best they had nothing more than a superficial knowledge of what they were talking about. The best advocate for business I saw there was the old gentleman Hougham, who is now retired in the province of British Columbia, a man with a great deal of experience of his own in business. He was accorded by the group that brought him there some ten minutes, I think, but their lawyer who said he had intensively studied this subject for two weeks spent a day before the committee. Well, I think that business will do itself a great deal more credit if in its relations with government it sends practising businessmen to see governments instead of professional help such as these. I seem to read that there is some attempt here to assure profit without risk, without too much conflict and indeed without too much effort. That has not been the history of business on this continent. I think it is socially unsound for business to attempt to ensure profits upon that basis. I believe it has to be prepared to take risks, because it has built itself on that basis. Indeed, this continent has built itself on that basis. My friends of the C.C.F. opposite will not agree with me, as they do not think there is such a thing as free markets any more. I realize that today free markets are compromised by the situation that exists throughout the world, but the closer we keep to free markets the more secure we will be. I am quite certain it will be a better day for business if business returns to the free competitive market.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, this debate has already brought forward suggestions that might make it very difficult for anyone listening in the gallery, who was unaware of the previous events which brought this bill before parliament, to understand just why it is that we are discussing this bill if we accept the government's statement as to the reason for its being brought forward. Hon. members know that this legislation was indicated in the speech from the throne as a measure the government was prepared to adopt to deal with the inflation about which they had assured the people that they shared the public concern.

Perhaps there are those who might wonder why it is that only now, at this stage of the session, we are dealing with this very important legislation. That would be natural, unless they had been kept in touch with what has taken place. Anyone who asked the government why this legislation that is to deal with inflation has not yet been disposed of would doubtless receive the reply that the government thought it wise to appoint a committee made up of members of the House of Commons and of the Senate to consider this matter and make recommendations to the house. In form that answer might be justified; in reality it offers no explanation at all.

There is no hon. member of this house who does not know perfectly well that this bill was decided upon in its present form, and that the committee was only an intermediate step to give some appearance of bringing members of the house and of the Senate in contact with this problem before it was presented. The setting up of the committee was a sham. I am indebted to an hon. member who spoke last night, an hon. member who ordinarily supports the government, for coining the expression minister of make-believe. I hope I shall not be criticized if on this occasion I accept that very apt term which was applied by a Liberal member to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson), the minister of make-believe.

Mr. Studer: Why not get something original?

Mr. Drew: I could not help hearing the highly original words that came from my right rear, but I prefer to deal with the subject under discussion. The minister gave reasons why this important legislation should go before a committee. It went before that committee. It must be remembered that there was also placed before the committee an interim report—I emphasize the word "interim"—which had been sent forward by the MacQuarrie committee at the request of the Minister of Justice. It made certain arbitrary findings, and those were available to all members of the house before the house and Senate committee was appointed.

Not one word of evidence was appended to that report; not one single statement of fact interpreting the evidence before the MacQuarrie committee was made available. When an effort was made to bring before the committee of the house and the Senate the evidence which had been available to the MacQuarrie committee, that opportunity was denied. We had nothing but the statement of the MacQuarrie committee as to what they thought should be done. Therefore the committee of the house and the Senate had before it an incomplete report without supporting evidence. We as a house are now called upon to deal with the recommendations of a committee whose work was incomplete and which was not permitted to obtain evidence which would have placed this matter in some objective form before the House of Commons and the Senate.

Even if any member was predisposed to support in general principle the idea of making it illegal to enter into any arrangement in regard to the retail prices of goods of various kinds, I suggest that a sense of responsibility to the supreme authority of this House of Commons, this high court of parliament, would indicate to him that we should not take action of this kind, having such sweeping consequences, when we have had so little evidence, I might say no real evidence, before us upon which to act.

Others describe this as the high court of parliament. We are members of that high court of parliament. As members of that high court of parliament we have a duty to maintain its dignity and its traditions. We have a duty to maintain public respect for the procedure by which the laws of this country are enacted. No matter what emotional approach there may be to a subject of this kind; no matter what inclination there may be to simplify the manner in which we shall deal with this extremely important question of inflation, no member of this house should be prepared to cast his vote in support of something which will have a tremendous effect upon the whole established commercial structure of Canada without being able to say: I have heard the evidence and on that evidence I am convinced that this is what we should do. To hear some of the arguments that have been made—arguments, I repeat, unsupported by evidence—one would think that the passing of this bill into law is something of immense importance to the consumer. Yet within the past few minutes we have heard an hon. member, who referred to his long business experience and who said that he proposes to support the measure, tell us nevertheless that he is not supporting it because he thinks it will have much effect in reducing prices or lowering the cost of living but, if I understand what he said, in the belief that completely free competition is a better economic process than some measure of restraint such as has become established in the country over the years.

That is an understandable argument, but I would point out it is one that relates entirely to economics and trading practices, and that not one word the hon. member spoke suggested that in his mind there was anything in the nature of a criminal offence in trade arrangements of this kind. When the hon. member expressed his opinion as a businessman that the measure was not going to have any substantial effect on prices he was repeating exactly what the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) said earlier in this session. If we accept the opinion of the Prime Minister, if we accept the opinion of the hon. member who has just spoken and who bases his opinion upon his years of business training, then we are not discussing something which is going to have much effect in stemming the tide of inflation. Yet it was in that light that this measure was placed before us.

Hon. members will recall that when on more than one occasion during the course of this session the Prime Minister was urged to take some steps to deal with inflation and the cost of living, which is threatening the comfort, security and happiness of so many of our people, his answer was that the only measure contemplated during the course of this session to deal with that problem was the one now before us. Yet by his own statement, and from statements made by other members who support him, it is not anticipated that it is going to effect any substantial reduction in prices.

After all, there is statistical support for that view. One of the businesses which would be most affected by the complete abolition of agreements as to prices for various articles would be the drug business. That has been quite frankly admitted. The Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) and others have recognized it. Therefore it seems to me that certain figures should be before the house to indicate what has been happening in the drug business compared with other retail marketing, to show just how serious this is. The last figures available as to the increase in items sold in drug stores compared with the period of 1935-39, which is used as the base period for the cost of living index, are the figures for January 15, 1951. It may be that the bureau of statistics has later figures, and if so I would be very pleased if they were placed before the house, but these are the last figures I have been able to obtain.

They show that in relation to the base period of 1935-39 some 319 drug store items, taken as representing the broad basis of this business, had risen to 122·2 compared with the figure of 100 for the base period I have mentioned. The nearest figure I have as to the cost of living index is that for February 1, 1951, and that was 175·2 compared with the figure of 100 for the same base figure of 1935-39. Thus we see that while the cost of living index had risen by 75·2 points up to that time from the base period, the increase in the cost of 319 representative items sold in drug stores was 22·2 points.

Mr. Garson: Were they price-maintained or not price-maintained.

Mr. Drew: These are price-maintained. I point out that from these figures you will see that these things, which were sold under a system that is being put before the house as something evil and dangerous, rose in cost to the people who use them by substantially less than one-third of the extent that the requirements of our daily life, which are included in the cost of living index, rose during the same period. It seems to me that if the government really wants to tackle the cost of living, then no matter what they do on this measure they should be tackling it some place else. If the government want to tackle the cost of living they can tackle it in several other places. I think I heard the hon. member, whom I cannot identify by the sound of his voice, say "Where?" I will remind him of the place where I suggested many months ago they could make the first and most effective saving, and that was in the cost of government and the public business of this country. Recently we had some very conclusive evidence from the Auditor General that there were ways in which this government could save money. We have seen many ways in which the government could save money. Why, this government has itself discovered ways it can save money. Unless I am mistaken it has found that in handling transactions under the Veterans Land Act it is now very satitsfactory to have solicitors employed by the Department of Veterans Affairs do that work. Only a few days ago a return was tabled showing a figure of $345,000 paid to someone whose face is not yet unfamiliar to members of the House of Commons.

Mr. Rowe: It cost more than that, probably.

Mr. Drew: No doubt. And there were other substantial payments for this special kind of work which, strangely enough, seemed to be closely associated with interests of other than strictly legal minds, which are in common with the present government.

Mr. Mutch: That is hardly your best effort.

Mr. Rowe: It was not your legal employees' best effort, either.

Mr. Drew: I am quite prepared to let the hon. member who has spoken express either publicly or privately his opinion as to whether the government got its dollar's worth for the money it spent in that way.

In any event it has come to the conclusion that there are ways money can be saved in that type of transaction. The government has found other ways that money can be saved. But I am still hoping that at some time we will have the same kind of success we have already had, partially, in connection with defence expenditures, and that after continuing the argument we will get a committee or a commission to study the cost of the organization of government. I am not in any doubt as to what it will be found possible to do by way of savings at that time.

But, to answer still further the question of how this can be done, I would say that the place the government can best tackle this problem is in its taxation. This bill is not put before the house with any thought that it is going to reduce the cost of living substantially, or that it is going to halt inflation. The Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) has said so. The hon. member who spoke immediately before me said so. That is not the reason. There are other reasons to which I shall refer. If the government had any idea of trying to reduce the cost of living at this time it would have brought before the house a budget of some kind which would have made it possible to remove that 25 per cent increase in the sales tax that was unnecessarily introduced this spring, a tax which is directly inflationary in all its applications. It would also have removed those special excise taxes it introduced, and would have removed some of the credit restrictions it put into effect this spring—not all of them, but some of the severe credit restrictions that have had such a serious effect upon building, and upon housing, and upon other matters that are directly related to the comfort and housing of our people.

When I say that, let me point out that some measure of restraint on credit was highly desirable, and to the extent that it was desirable we would certainly commend it. But in case we have any of those very lightly-made remarks about the fact that we suggest something, and then say why it should not have been done, may I point out that the government itself has made it quite clear that it believes there is some maximum point beyond which taxation or restrictions cannot go without defeating its own purpose. That was the very argument made by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) when he introduced the budget last spring. At the time it was suggested that an additional tax be imposed on some articles that are already heavily taxed, he said that while it had been agreed that it was a good thing to tax those particular articles, there was a point beyond which you could not go.

What has happened since that time has amply demonstrated at least the correctness of the general observation made by the Minister of Finance at that time. We have seen in the case of cigarettes that there is certainly a point beyond which you cannot go in, on the one hand, collecting taxes and, on the other, continuing to have the respect of the public for the laws of the land. We have seen these taxes create smuggling on a scale never before known in this country. We have seen Canadian workmen deprived of work in the tobacco factories of this country because the excise taxes have gone so high that, with all the chances of penalties involved, it has now become profitable to smuggle cigarettes into the country and undersell the domestic product. We have had arguments in the house which have suggested that this does not meet with the entire disapproval of every member in the house. Nevertheless I believe most hon. members think it is desirable to retain respect for our laws; and if for no other reason it would have been wise to place before us a budget which would have made it possible to revise these taxes which are causing the situation I have described.

But, quite apart from that situation, the government could have taken anti-inflationary steps and could have tackled effectively the problem of the cost of living, if it had removed that 25 per cent increase in the sales tax, and removed some of the unnecessary excise taxes on things which most people find it necessary to buy.

No, there is some other reason for this bill. The bill is, in fact, just a red herring to try to distract attention from the fact that a government, which indicated that it was just as much concerned about inflation as was the general public, was really prepared to do nothing during this session. The measure, of course, may have some other purpose. A very interesting reason for the desire of the government to force this through without hearing what could be termed complete evidence is suggested in the Financial Post of December 15. Under the heading "Nice Timing," the editorial states:

> The government at Ottawa seems to have inherited some of the canniness for timing which the late Mr. King possessed.
> Rightly or wrongly, the banning of resale price maintenance will probably be law by Christmas. Anything which the parliamentary committee uncovered had no effect either in changing government plans or in dissuading it from acting hastily.
> January is usually the month for sales. This year with physical volume of retail sales probably below last year, there may be more than usual. The traditional price reductions should come at just about the same time as the banning of RPM takes effect. If there are price reductions, to which factor does the government expect the voters to give the credit, the normal after Christmas sales to clear out inventories or to the banning of r.p.m.? You guess.

I might say that the words "you guess" are included in the Financial Post article. I would not use such peremptory terms to you, Mr. Speaker, even following so suggestive an article as that. Those words appear in a very pithy article in a publication which I think is unanimously respected by all members of this house for its objective approach to public problems, even though they may not entirely agree with it at all times. The minister of make-believe—

Mr. Garson: Never made as good a thing as that.

Mr. Drew: No, but you are hoping to. The minister who has made such a colossal and fantastic failure of dealing with the Combines Investigation Act, which is now on the books, hopes to be able to make the public believe that what he is doing on this occasion really will have some effect. Instead of these being January sales, at least an attempt will be made to leave the impression with the public that, after all, the period of Santa Claus is past but these are Garson's sales. We do not know what costume will be adopted. The season of Santa Claus will be gone, but the season of the minister of make-believe will have come. As the minister has said, in the past he never thought up anything as good as that. It may be that someone else suggested it to him.

Mr. Garson: The Financial Post.

Mr. Drew: The fact is that everyone here knows there will be January sales. There have been for as long as I can remember, and I assume that there will be for some time to come. In the very nature of things goods that have been on sale at Christmas, and which are carried over, are not kept on the shelves. These goods are offered at lower prices to stimulate sales at a time when people's pockets are just a little empty, and when some inducement is regarded as desirable to persuade them to buy.

Perhaps the Financial Post had some reason for believing that this was correct. What reason is there? Why could not the joint committee have sat through in the ordinary way? Why should we not at this time be passing a resolution empowering that committee to continue sitting between sessions to hear evidence? It did not complete the hearing of evidence, and no one will seriously suggest that it did. Why are we being asked to rush this legislation through? First of all, because this is the only measure the government has offered to the public in answer to its demand that something be done about the cost of living. Moreover the government is well aware that, if further evidence were heard, a great deal would be put before the committee to raise a question as to whether or not this is the wisest course.

Reference has been made to an editorial in the Kingston Whig-Standard. I propose to put part of it on the record, because although some members may have received a copy of it, possibly all have not read it. I also am not forgetful of the fact that there are those outside of the house who read Hansard, and who may be interested in an analysis of this situation which in no way reflects upon any member of the house. It does indicate the opinion of a newspaper, in this case published by a prominent and highly respected Liberal who lives in Kingston. I shall quote the last two paragraphs of that editorial of December 12, 1951:

> It is significant, we think, that only one group so far, if we may judge from the evidence submitted to date to the parliamentary committee, is wholeheartedly in favour of outright abolition of resale price fixing. That group is composed of a number of mass buyers and sellers of merchandise—firms which may be described as the giants in Canadian merchandising. Their approval of abolition strongly suggests that the fears of the small merchandisers are well founded, and that the latter would be at least severely and unfairly handicapped by legislation which would permit huge rivals to sell at a fractional profit or even at a loss. Since the practice of using "loss leaders" or sharply cut prices to swell the number of visitors to stores is by no means uncommon, the position of the small merchant becomes apparent.
> The entire question of resale price fixing is definitely not a simple one, as we noted above. It is complex, and its very complexity should be sufficient to indicate that a simple solution like abolition will not solve the problem. For our part, we think the government could very well forget about resale price fixing for the moment, and concentrate upon the strengthening and rigid enforcement of the laws forbidding price-fixing by combines. If these are effective in assuring unrestricted competition, there would seem to be very little to be feared from resale price fixing as it is now practised.

Although I am reminded that this editorial has been sent to many of the members, it was quite evident to me that they had not all read it. In fact I find some of them reading it even at this moment.

Mr. Maltais: Did the hon. member read the editorial in the Globe and Mail?

Mr. Drew: I would be very happy to do so.

Mr. Maltais: Why does he not quote the first two lines of the second paragraph?

Mr. Drew: I shall be very happy to have the hon. member read into the record the whole of that editorial after I have finished speaking. May I say that the hon. member might be interested in seeing the editorials that have appeared generally, in addition to those which he is reading at the moment, which have suggested that regardless of the merits this is a subject which should be dealt with more carefully than it is being dealt with at this time. Right across this country there has been a general expression of opinion that we should not be suddenly tearing apart a commercial structure, which has been built up over the years, upon the basis of an incomplete report from the MacQuarrie committee, an incomplete report from the committee of the house and Senate, and incomplete reports from earlier times.

In that respect may I refer to something that was said in this house yesterday. The hon. member for Coast-Capilano (Mr. Sinclair) was speaking on this subject, and when he spoke I could not help thinking that he was trying to make the best he could of an extraordinarily unpalatable task. In fact I should like to know the real opinion of the hon. member for Coast-Capilano in regard to the complete and over-all banning of agreements of this kind. Of course, as will be recalled by hon. members who heard his speech yesterday, that was not what he was dealing with. He was dealing mostly with what he described as the Tory party. I must admit there probably was a certain measure of satisfaction in the applause he received from the Liberal members on his own side. They found something to applaud that was not related to this bill. Not many of them really applauded this bill, no matter how they vote. In this gathering which provides, for the exchange of ideas, opportunities that are not confined to the floor of this house, there are not many hon. members who do not know perfectly well that no matter what the vote may be, there is not applause for this bill on the part of a large percentage of the Liberal members. I for one greatly commend those Liberal members who have already spoken and who have expressed their opposition to this measure in terms which I have heard other Liberal members express in private conversation.

Mr. Sinnott: How many?

Mr. Fleming: Lots of them.

Mr. Sinnott: Name them.

Mr. Fleming: Lots of them.

Mr. Drew: However, the hon. member for Coast-Capilano really warmed up to his subject, and he had a good time. In this season of the year no one should be in any way displeased with the fact that he had a good time, no matter whether his remarks found complete approval by other members of the house; and of course, as I have already said, his speech provided the members on his side of the house an opportunity to do some applauding that was not in any way related to the bill itself. But in his exuberance and his enthusiasm for carrying out his self-appointed task of tracing certain imaginary history, which he had created, of the Conservative party, I must say that he wandered a little bit from reality on one or two occasions. In order to demonstrate the fact that Mr. McGregor had been called as a witness by a member of the Conservative party, that approval of Mr. McGregor had been expressed in this house and, apparently—though that was not said—that we must therefore of necessity accept anything he put forward, the hon. member for Coast-Capilano had this to say, and I am quoting from yesterday's Hansard at page 2152:

> On this question, the greatest authority in Canada on combines, the man who has beaten them, came before this committee and said that the abolition of resale price maintenance will do just that. That man of course is Mr. McGregor, who was combines commissioner for 25 years. He was requested by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker), at page 670 of Hansard as follows:
> "Let us bring in Mr. McGregor because I am sure that if his lips are unbridled, if he comes in unhobbled by any consideration other than to help the committee, he will make some revelations that will be most interesting and I am sure most helpful in suggesting effective amendments to the act."
> A little later on he said:
> "He is the number one man in this business if we want to get at the facts."

Then—and I am still quoting from Hansard—I made this remark:

> Mr. Speaker, for the purpose of the record I think it is proper that it should be pointed out that the quotation that has been read with its customary clarity related to the argument that this committee should be dealing with the whole question of the combines act and not with this limited subject.

Then the hon. member for Coast-Capilano is reported in Hansard as replying—and I might say that he replied with his customary courtesy—as follows:

> The leader of the opposition as usual is wrong, because this quotation is taken from the earlier part of his remarks before he developed the theme about having a complete combines investigation. Having established this in the first part then he went into the theme about having a complete investigation.

Mr. Speaker, I recognize the fact that the hon. member for Coast-Capilano was not reading the whole of Hansard; he probably was reading from a typed extract, and that might explain the situation. But the hon. member for Lake Centre had been emphasizing that day, as he has emphasized at other times during the course of this and other sessions prior to November 2, that we need a general revision of the Combines Investigation Act. Every hon. member who has followed the debates is well aware of that fact. During the whole of the time I have been in the house the hon. member for Lake Centre has been insisting that the Combines Investigation Act be amended so it will be an effective instrument to deal with those offences which it was intended to deal with.

In the speech on November 2 to which the hon. member for Coast-Capilano referred, the hon. member for Lake Centre several times repeated: Let us review the act. Is there anything unjust in that? And he went on to indicate that he thought there were many things that must be dealt with, that penalties must be imposed that would make this act effective, and that there must be provisions which would make it a truly effective act in every way. Those remarks were not covered by the reference that was before us. Those remarks would have had no meaning whatever if they had been confined simply to this limited reference.

Since the hon. member for Coast-Capilano saw fit to quote part of what the hon. member for Lake Centre said, I should like to quote a little bit more, because it explains why there must be a certain measure of amusement in the minds of most hon. members when they listen almost with awe to the minister of make-believe and note the atmosphere of sanctity with which he seeks to surround the figure of Mr. McGregor. I think a quotation from what the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) said at that time will indicate just what it was that he was referring to, and why there is some surprise at the extent to which the minister of make-believe is now prepared to follow unquestionably any recommendation that may be made. I am quoting from page 670 of Hansard, which was the page referred to by the hon. member for Coast-Capilano (Mr. Sinclair):

> Let us bring Mr. McGregor before the committee. We might even have the minister give evidence after his statement in Vancouver when he said that Mr. McGregor did not understand the finer things, did not understand the representations that had been made to the flour milling corporations. Let us have them both there and then we shall see who will be made a monkey of, then we shall see who will go on whose head. Let us bring in Mr. McGregor because I am sure that if his lips are unbridled, if he comes in unhobbled by any consideration other than to help the committee, he will make some revelations that will be most interesting and I am sure most helpful in suggesting effective amendments to the act.
> I am not going to continue further as my time is up. If this committee is to be set up let it be a committee of both houses with powers wider than the narrow and confined one comprised in the resolution. Let there be representatives of the producers and consumers, and Mr. McGregor. He is the number one man in this business if we want to get at the facts. If the government is anxious and desirous of doing something to mobilize the opinion of the House of Commons, then widen the ambit of the resolution. Let us not have the carefully restricted term of reference, the obviously carefully restricted one of the resolution. Let us have one wide enough to enable the committee to make recommendations concerning not only resale price maintenance but the entire field of combine and monopoly legislation.

These terms are clear enough, Mr. Speaker. And may I point out simply, so the record will be clear, that the words that were quoted by the hon. member for Coast-Capilano—

He is the number one man in this business if we want to get at the facts . . .

That was the point where I interpolated; and they did come after his very clear demand that there be a committee to cover the whole field.

Let me then come to something else that was said yesterday by the hon. member for Coast-Capilano when he was doing his special pleading on this subject. I am quoting from what he said at page 2144 of Hansard, and this was the time when he was really under a nice head of steam. This was at the time the hon. members, who had been sitting on their hands in a sense of frustration because so many of them had found this legislation unpalatable up to that time, began to find reasons for applauding when, to his own satisfaction at any rate, he whaled the stuffing out of the Conservative party.

Mr. Ward: And did a good job.

Mr. Drew: Of course not paying much attention to the bill itself. There is a point in what the hon. member had to say which should not be passed unnoticed, because I fancy he was given an incomplete brief on the subject. I quote from page 2144:

It is true—

I should like to go back a bit because the hon. member had this to say:

I should like to start off by reminding hon. members that the principal purpose of this legislation now before the house is to further strengthen the Combines Investigation Act.

Apparently at the time the speech from the throne was written that was not the view that was held, but this now seems to be the party line, at least. I continue:

We on this continent are all fairly familiar with the history and the story of combines legislation. With the great growth of industrial power in the United States, combines, trusts and cartels, formed by powerful groups of selfish people in order to exploit the consumer to the utmost, began to be established. President Teddy Roosevelt around the turn of the century established the first anti-combine legislation. The vicious practice of combines spread to this country and we were the second country in the world to establish, in 1925, under a Liberal government, anti-combine legislation. We have a good record with regard to the breaking up and the prosecution of these illegal combines, monopolies and cartels; in fact, we had a record second to no other nation in the world.

Might I point out how discreet and with what great caution the hon. member for Coast-Capilano said:

We had a record second to no other nation in the world.

That was before the flour milling report.

Mr. Sinclair: A typographical error.

Mr. Drew: Oh, no. I think this was one point where, perhaps inadvertently but nevertheless very wisely, the hon. member for Coast-Capilano showed appreciation of the importance of words, and he said in fact: "We had a record second to no other nation in the world". I will come back to that because I think perhaps we had a fairly good record up until the flour milling combine report. I continue to quote from Hansard:

It is true last spring there was a delay in the publication of the milling report—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Drew: That really is a masterpiece of understatement. I continue:

It is true last spring there was a delay in the publication of the milling report—

I am sure—

Mr. Sinnott: Eleven days, to be exact.

Mr. Drew: Oh, no; I hope the parliamentary assistant to the parliamentary assistant will obtain better information as to that.

Mr. Gibson: Why is he kept under a bushel?

Mr. Drew: I continue:

It is true last spring there was a delay in the publication of the milling report—

I think the hon. member for Coast-Capilano forgot that the delay had extended back to the previous December.

Some hon. Members: It was 1949.

Mr. Drew: Yes; December, 1949.

Mr. Hees: Just two years out.

Mr. Drew: I continue:

It is true last spring there was a delay in the publication of the milling report, between the time of the report by the commissioner and the presentation in the house, because of a difference of opinion with the wartime prices and trade board, as to what undertakings they had given the millers under wartime price control.

This was the point where the hon. member was really working well. He goes on:

But in all the records of the twenty-seven investigations of the combines investigators I would recall to the attention of hon. members that there are five reports which have never been published, five investigations made under the regime of the Bennett government. There was the combine in the manufacture of radio tubes in 1931, unpublished;—

Hansard does not record the applause at that point. I go on:

the manufacturing of fruit baskets in Ontario in 1932, unpublished; the distribution of coal in eastern Canada, 1933, unpublished; the manufacture of rubber footwear in Canada, 1934, unpublished. and the sale of gasoline in Ontario, 1934. unpublished.

If Hansard had recorded the applause, as the reports of speeches sometimes do, there would at this point be loud applause and desk thumping on the part of the Liberal members. But I can only conclude that the hon. member for Coast-Capilano, who was making this highly political speech at that time, a speech which may have hidden some of his own private thoughts about the advisability of complete banning of this long-established commercial practice, either forgot what the facts were or had been given an incomplete brief from which to work. Of course this is not in any way as simple as it seems. I think in this case the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) will recall the very substantial change that had taken place at a later date in regard to this act which was introduced, as has been pointed out, by the Liberal government and which remained substantially in that form until some years later.

Those reports that have been referred to by the hon. member for Coast-Capilano (Mr. Sinclair) were not commissioner's reports; they were not reports similar to the one to which he referred when he spoke about this matter as being slightly delayed. It is important to remember the great difference which has taken place in the act as it indicates the evolution that has occurred and why we regard it as being so important that there should be a general review at this time of the Combines Investigation Act to bring the evolution further still more in keeping with our changing commercial and trading practices in this country.

The act at the time the hon. member mentions called for an entirely different procedure. I might say that it was not 1925, as the hon. member stated, but 1923 when it was introduced. That act placed certain responsibilities upon the registrar, who was a permanent official and who was Mr. McGregor at the time. The procedure followed at the time the five reports he has mentioned were prepared was that the registrar would make a preliminary investigation. He then reported to the minister who examined the report. The report was made to the minister simply for the purpose of consideration. If it was regarded by the minister as justifying that course, the minister would appoint a commissioner or commissioners to conduct an investigation. When the commissioner or commissioners had made their report, then and then only would the provisions of section 28 of the act as it was apply as to publication. That provision was quite similar to the provision which has been carried forward and which applies at this time to the reports of the commissioner under the act.

The five reports that were tabled were not reports that called for publication. That was the act introduced in 1923. I simply mention that because an erroneous impression might be left on the record and someone reading Hansard might get the idea that the reports to which the hon. member has referred were similar to that one which, to use his terms, was slightly delayed last spring.

Mr. Sinclair: In view of the fact that the hon. gentleman has questioned the accuracy of my statement, I wonder if he will permit just one question? Is he aware that all the ten earlier investigations made under the Liberal party between 1925 and 1930 were published despite the fact that, as he says, the law did not demand publication, and that all the eleven reports made after the Liberals returned to power from 1935 on were also published? It was only the five reports on combines prepared under the Bennett regime which were not published. It is quite true that there was no law requiring publication at that time, but I point out that the Liberal government published all their reports while the five reports listed here under the Bennett regime were not published.

Mr. Drew: I am very happy to hear this plea on behalf of the Liberal party. The fact remains that the procedure was entirely different and it would be most improper to leave on the record the impression that these were reports which called for publication under the law as it then stood.

Mr. Sinclair: We published ours but you did not publish yours.

Mr. Drew: This government does a great many things of which we entirely disapprove. So far as that is concerned, may I suggest that there may have been excellent reasons for not publishing the reports when publication was not demanded. We believe, and I think most members of the government believe, that business should have some chance to be heard and be given an opportunity to state its case. The mechanism that is now provided approaches this problem with some idea of giving the business people of this country, as well as others, an opportunity to state their case.

Let us dispose of any suggestion that those other reports were withheld under circumstances in any way similar to those under which the flour milling combines report was withheld. I think the best statement to be found on this subject is contained in the memorandum of resignation of Mr. McGregor, presented to the minister to whom he was responsible on October 29, 1949. The minister will remember that memorandum because there was a great deal of discussion about it. In fact that memorandum had a good deal to do with smoking out that report. I should like to read the first three paragraphs and part of the fourth of that memorandum of resignation of Mr. McGregor, dated October 29, 1949, as follows:

> The principal circumstances which have led me to submit my resignation as commissioner of the Combines Investigation Act can be stated briefly.
> First and foremost is my deep concern about certain tendencies that have been apparent in recent months which in my opinion seriously threaten the usefulness of this legislation.
> One of the principal remedial measures provided by the Combines Investigation Act is the publication of reports of investigations.

May I emphasize the words that follow:

> The withholding for so many months of publication of a report which the act requires shall be made public as soon as possible after its receipt (this is the only instance of the kind in my experience) is one illustration of the tendencies I have in mind.
> Closely related to this are the differences of opinion on basic policy that have been revealed in our recent discussions relating to the flour investigation and report.
> I am not raising any question of your obvious right and the right of anyone to point out errors in any work I have done. The criticisms made, however, have not been directed particularly to any error of fact in my report but primarily to the policy that was followed. You have expressed the opinion that the inquiry should never have been started.

There is the reason Mr. McGregor resigned; that for the first time in his experience—he had been registrar long before the earlier date mentioned by the hon. member for Coast-Capilano until he became commissioner—there had been a withholding of a report of that kind.

I have mentioned this simply to clear the record which was placed before us yesterday. But, Mr. Speaker, I have also mentioned it for another reason. When we are told that this committee seriously attempted to examine this subject and that it was objective in its approach to this problem, then I would only add that anyone who makes that statement should read the speech made in the house yesterday by the hon. member for Coast-Capilano (Mr. Sinclair), a cheap, tawdry political speech by the member who had been chairman of the committee. Instead of coming here having in mind the responsibility he was called upon to accept as chairman of the committee, he came here and made a tub-thumping political speech which doubtless relieved his own feelings and appeared to bring a certain measure of satisfaction to members on the other side who are not too happy about this legislation anyway. But it was not a contribution in keeping with the consideration deserved by legislation that is going to affect, whether for good or for bad, thousands and thousands of small merchants across the country and those who deal with them.

Again may I say that the speech made last night by the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency (Mr. LaCroix) was another which suggested that perhaps the Financial Post was not so far wrong when it offered its explanation as to why this legislation was held back so long and then, having been held back so long, is now to be put through with such indecent haste. The hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency in his remarks last night was echoing those meaningless and very worn-out propaganda arguments that this was an example of the subservience of the Conservative party to big business. What a preposterous argument when you examine the measure we are considering and the circumstances that surround its presentation to the house.

As was pointed out in earlier speeches and in editorials in papers not unfriendly by any manner of means to this government, the only people who appeared to be anxious to have this legislation passed, so far as the committee was concerned at any rate, were those very big businesses which apparently would stand to gain by the abandonment of these long established practices. I am not going to engage in any exchange of pleasantries about big business or little business. I do say that the little businesses that are close to the people right across this country are the backbone of the commercial life of Canada, but I also say that as Canadians we should not condemn any business simply because of its size. I most earnestly suggest that we recognize that these big businesses have also advanced our commercial practices.

The fact is that we want businesses big and small competing fairly and properly and in the general interest of the public under laws that are in the best interests of the people of Canada. But if there is to be any division on the basis of big business and little business, then most certainly on this occasion the government has aligned itself with big business; and it comes with very bad grace for the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency to pull out these rusty darts and throw them around as loosely as he did last night without any regard to what the real target is and what it is we are really trying to do. If there is any alignment with big business look across the aisle from me now and see where that association lies. Big business? Why, I interpolated a remark last night when the hon.

member for Quebec-Montmorency was speaking in such unflattering terms and using phrases that might very well have been questioned if we had seen fit to do so, and asked if the speech which was being read had been prepared by one of the other hon. members; because I recognize that when it comes to big business there are experts on the government side who are able to speak about this very practice from their own knowledge over many years. I thought perhaps he had been seeking some expert advice and conceivably even had had a few choice phrases prepared which were the product of that long experience in this very activity.

We certainly are considering something that affects every Canadian today; and the consideration with which one should start every approach to this problem is the public interest. Is it in the public interest or is it not? If it is in the public interest then it should be supported. If it is not in the public interest then most certainly steps should be taken to deal with that subject. I have already pointed out that with the increases in the cost of living there have not been proportionate increases in drug prices. I think it will be realized by all hon. members that those things covered by agreements of this kind are not the things that are included in the cost of living index and are not the first things people have to buy to maintain their homes and the comfort and welfare of their families. I pointed out the difference in 319 drug store items compared with the general cost of living. I pointed out that whereas there had been an increase of 75·2 points in the general cost of living up to January of 1951 there had only been an increase of 22·2 points in these 319 representative items. I wish to correct an answer I made to the minister when he asked if these were all items under agreements. I did not have the note in front of me at the time containing the reference to that point. Of those 319 items, about 50 per cent are on the maintained price basis, and the others are articles of the other kind. But that in no way affects the general argument, because those are items which are in the general drug trade. And if there were any substantial increase it would be reflected in the over-all increase, and of course would be reflected in the general price of these representative items which I have mentioned.

Mr. Garson: May I ask the hon. member if the rate of increase is the same in each of the two parts?

Mr. Drew: I will be very happy to seek further information. But may I say, without unkindness at all, that I would have thought that in expounding such a vigorous argument in support of the legislation the minister would have sought, through the bureau of statistics, information in regard to this very subject. It was because I had not any such information that I did my best to obtain it.

Mr. Garson: I did not know about your 319 articles until about three-quarters of an hour ago.

Mr. Drew: Oh, Mr. Speaker, the minister has just given another very strong reason why we should not be dealing with the bill at this time. Although he tells us it is so important to pass this legislation, he admits that up until this was mentioned during my speech he did not know anything about the drug items, or what had happened to the cost.

Mr. Garson: No, no. My hon. friend cannot say that. He came into the house this afternoon and said that 319 articles in the drug trade, which he did not attempt to identify, were increased by 22 per cent over the 1935-39 figure. But he did not identify them. We have no means of checking them with any information we have. I am simply seeking information concerning a statement which was given wrongly in the first instance, and which the hon. member has now corrected. I am asking him again if he can tell us whether the increase is uniform in both components of his total figure. If he will get that information, then I say he had no need to pass any remarks about what we have done.

Mr. Drew: Oh, yes I had; because the minister is the one who is advocating the adoption of this measure. On the other hand we are strongly opposing it because the minister has not given us any facts to support his contention. Indeed, he admits he has not got the information. I have used figures, and he will have plenty of opportunity to deal with them later on. I assure him he will have plenty of opportunity.

Mr. Garson: Answer the question, that is all.

Mr. Drew: I am saying that just as in other trades representative items are chosen, there are 319 representative items chosen in the drug industry. And I have asked the minister a question, since he indicated that he had the information and did not give it to us, if he would now tell us what his information is in regard to the increase in drug store items. Would he like to give me the answer now?

Mr. Abbott: You answer, first.

Mr. Garson: Mr. Speaker, this is a very interesting exchange because, although I am on my feet, at the moment the leader of the opposition has the floor. He is making the speech.

Mr. Drew: I did not put you on your feet.

Mr. Garson: I have asked a question in relation to his speech, and he has given me an incorrect reply. Then I have asked a supplementary question, as to whether he will be good enough to oblige me with the figure he is using and the proper breakdown of it; then I would be more than delighted to deal with the whole subject matter to his satisfaction, I hope, when it is my turn to speak.

Mr. Drew: So far as giving any incorrect answer, I would point out that in response to a question across the floor, in an exchange of remarks, I gave an answer which I have now correctly placed before the house, and within the same speech. There is nothing incorrect on the record. What I have done is to use 319 representative items. And I suggest that if the minister was properly accepting his responsibility as the minister supporting this measure, and asking us to pass upon it, he should have given us some information which really showed that this was a matter, in this particular type of business, which should be dealt with by legislation of this kind.

Now, so far as this measure is concerned, there is one particular consideration which I have already suggested should always be in our minds. I refer to the public interest. The minister is well aware that in the Combines Investigation Act itself there is an attempt to measure any offence in connection with combines upon the basis of public interest. As he knows, where an offence is created in relation to a combine, there is a reservation in that respect. In that part of the act which defines a combine it makes reference to certain specific things such as:

(a) limiting facilities for transporting, producing, manufacturing, supplying, storing or dealing, or

(b) preventing, limiting or lessening manufacture or production, or

(c) fixing a common price or a resale price, or a common rental, or a common cost of storage or transportation, or

(d) enchancing the price, rental or cost of article, rental, storage or transportation, or

(e) preventing or lessening competition in, or substantially controlling within any particular area or district or generally, production, manufacture, purchase, barter, sale, storage, transportation, insurance or supply, or

(f) otherwise restraining or injuring trade or commerce,

All this comes under the word "combine". And then the section continues:

—or a merger, trust or monopoly, which combination, merger, trust or monopoly has operated or is likely to operate to the detriment or against the interest of the public, whether consumers, producers or others.

The interesting words there are "which . . . has operated or is likely to operate to the detriment or against the interest of the public".

Then we come to the Criminal Code, and we find there is a reservation, in somewhat similar language, where it says that it is an offence to "unduly prevent or lessen competition". And that word "unduly" means, and has been interpreted to mean, to an extent that is not reasonable in relation to the public interest. So the consideration has been the public interest. In all these matters that is the thing that has always been borne in mind.

In this particular case there is no such reservation. There is an absolute and complete banning of a system that has grown up over many years and which, with constant extensions, has been operating I should think during the lifetime of everyone in the house, at least to some extent. We all recognize that the practice has been increasing in recent years and has become so deeply embedded in our whole commercial system that, to say the least, we would be doing something that would have very far-reaching effects if we were to pass a measure having such wide powers as the measure before us.

The interesting thing is that in all the arguments put forward there has been an assumption, without any supporting evidence —and I repeat "without any supporting evidence"—that there are sound reasons why this practice should be abandoned. There has been no attempt to analyse and dispose of the arguments put forward as to why this practice should be continued.

One of the things, of course, which has been put forward, and which was mentioned by the minister in his remarks, was the fear that has been expressed by the small businessmen across this country who have been, to some extent at least, following this practice, that this would create a further centralization of commercial power in the hands of monopolies. One of the instruments they fear, and one of the devices to which they have referred in their arguments, is that which is known as the loss leader. The minister quoted a definition of a loss leader which had been given, and which I agree does not adequately define the loss leader, as he correctly pointed out. For the reason that we have not had before us an adequate definition of a loss leader, I want to put on the record what I believe is as clear a statement as to what a loss leader really is as I have yet seen. I wish to quote briefly from an article in the December edition of Cosmopolitan magazine under the heading "When is a bargain not a bargain?":

> Not so long ago a retailer advertised dollar bills for sale at ninety-five cents. Nice, crisp greenbacks fresh from the United States mint. Only one to a customer. No deliveries. No exchanges. No telephone orders. People flocked to the store. You might have been in the crowd yourself, because you certainly can recognize a bargain when you see one. You might also have wondered how dollar bills could be sold for ninety-five cents. Your good sense told you that fools go broke and that philanthropists practise charity strictly after business hours.
> That being the case, was there a catch in this curious sale? There was, of course. A very simple catch, as old as this country, but modernized and streamlined for superefficient hoodwinking.
> The retailer knew that people would be attracted to his store. He knew that most customers would also buy a lot of the merchandise displayed on counters and shelves. In the prices of these goods were hidden the retailer's handsome profits.
> The dollar bill sale, although it happened only once, symbolizes and dramatizes the extremes to which these come-ons go. Retailers offer something —called a "loss leader"—for nothing. They build their bait around national brand products whose value is as familiar to you as the worth of a dollar bill. They advertise these selected, honourable products at a cut price. Then competitors meet that price or slash below it so that they, too, can be regarded by the public as sterling champions of the consumer.
> The price cutting on these products goes on and on until it may become possible to buy merchandise at less than the cost of its container. Dazzled by the bargain, very few customers realize that the retailer is no more cutting prices than the magician on the TV screen is sawing a woman in half right before your eyes. What the retailer is doing is juggling prices.

Then I should like to quote from that same article the words of a great supporter of those ideas which most of us think contribute greatly to the general welfare of the people. I refer to Mr. Justice Brandeis.

Mr. Garson: I think that was quoted previously this afternoon.

Mr. Drew: Perhaps it was, but I prefer to quote part of it in the context of what I have to say. I am not quoting the whole of it, but he says:

> Shall we, under the guise of protecting competition, further foster monopoly by creating immunity for the price-cutters?

That, Mr. Speaker, I think is a question that should be answered effectively in the minds of every one of us before we are prepared to support a measure of this kind. We have sought to put before this house arguments that are directly related to this extremely important subject. I submit that no argument that has yet been presented from this side of the house has been directed to anything but the consideration of this subject. It is by all means the small purchaser, dealing with either the small or large store, who must be considered by the members of this house in passing legislation. Starting from that premise, however, we should not too lightly disturb a long-established commercial system whose whole existence is dependent upon the satisfaction of that small purchaser.

Why are these stores located all over this country today? Why are these small stores spreading into every community, that they have almost become part of the home life of our people? They are there because the people of this country are supporting them. If the people did not believe in the system that has been in practise they had other places to go. They have shown their support of the large store through their mail order business, and when they visited the larger cities. The larger stores had no reason to complain about lack of business, but under this system the small stores have been able to give that kind of service which means so much to all our people. Let us not destroy all the drug stores across this country with the suggestion this is the device by which they make so much money that all they can do is go ahead and put on fancy fronts, gilt and glitter instead of giving efficiency; that is what the minister said. If the members of this house think that, then they put a very low estimate upon the judgment of the people of this country.

Think of what happens in so many cities, towns and villages. The drug store is no further away from the home than the telephone. Most people who have a telephone can call a drug store and have the things they want delivered. They not only get what they want; they get something they know is going to be good. They get something that is produced by a manufacturer whose name has been before them as the manufacturer of quality articles. They know their families are going to be safe when that particular article is used. That is a consideration which should not be overlooked when we have presented to us such strong arguments on behalf of these small stores which are giving service to our people, and which are so much a part of the life of our people that even in difficult days they carried thousands of dollars in debts on their books rather than refuse goods to customers.

These merchants have played their part in the life of this country, and I believe the people of this country know that. I think they want these merchants to be able to continue to give service. Competition has not been disposed of. There is still competition between manufacturers, and there is competition in service between the stores themselves. Surely this government is not putting before us the suggestion that they are turning the clock back more than one hundred years to the one historic doctrine the Whig party ever had, the old Manchester doctrine of complete and unrestrained freedom of commerce. I cannot believe it. They certainly have never indicated their support of that belief in recent years. It should be remembered that the doctrine which can best be described as that of "the devil take the hindmost" is pure competition. If this argument is being based on pure competition, then I suggest that the history of all the agony that followed the acceptance of that principle be recalled when we are considering something that has to do with the method which recognizes that there has to be some balance between completely unrestrained competition and severely restricted competition.

What we want is competition under the rule of reason. We want competition which is in the interests of the people. It is within the powers of the government to do something about that matter. Other governments have done so. Because their commercial methods are so similar to ours, it is not inappropriate to recall—as has been recalled by other hon. members, including the minister—that forty-five of the forty-eight states in the United States have fair trade laws under which agreements of this kind, where they are not against the public interest, are approved and validated.

In this country an effort was made to introduce an act of that kind. It was a Conservative government that introduced a kind of law which I gather the C.C.F. party now believes in. That was a measure known as the Dominion Trade and Industry Commission Act. The Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) will remember that measure quite well because, as I recall it, he was counsel in the case that followed. I think that is correct, is it not, Mr. Prime Minister?

Mr. St. Laurent: Yes.

Mr. Drew: That was an act which followed this very practice. Section 14 of that act would have dealt with price and production agreements, and that act would have followed the general practice followed in forty-five of the forty-eight states in the United States. The minister has compared prices in the small states with prices in the adjoining states. What is interesting is that the forty-five states are showing no apparent reluctance to carry it along, and there has been no strong evidence that the consumers in those states are not happy about it.

Mr. Garson: Oh, oh.

Mr. Drew: Perhaps the minister has further evidence on the subject. When I said "the small states", I was referring to Maryland, which he mentioned as adjoining the capital area.

Mr. Garson: Would the hon. gentleman include Texas as a small state?

Mr. Drew: No. Texas is a large state. I was referring particularly to Maryland in relation to the capital state. But as is known by hon. members, section 14 was held to be ultra vires by the Supreme Court of Canada. In other words the court held that this matter did not come within the general trade and commerce provisions of the British North America Act, and that it did not come within the criminal provisions. I suggest that is a consideration that should be dealt with before this high court of parliament deals with this subject. Parliament should be quite sure that a subject which was regarded as being outside the jurisdiction of the parliament of Canada, where it was to be dealt with in a positive way, is within the jurisdiction of the parliament of Canada when it is to be dealt with in a negative way.

I think the amendment, now before the house, namely that this bill be not now read but that it be read some day six months hence, could be regarded as something more than merely a blocking motion. I suggest that it could be regarded as a motion which would give the government an opportunity to examine a number of things that have not yet been examined, if the evidence the government has in its possession has really been placed before the house. I express the opinion that there is a grave question as to whether the bill now before us is within the jurisdiction of this parliament. I should like the Minister of Justice to tell the house what independent opinions he has had as to the validity of this measure. I know that practice has been followed generally in the case of similar legislation in the past. Independent counsel of the highest standing have expressed their opinion, and that opinion has been presented to this high court of parliament before parliament was called upon to act.

I believe this measure deserves further consideration. We are putting this motion forward in what we believe to be the best interests of the people of Canada. We regard this measure simply as a red herring to distract attention from the failure of the government to act with regard to inflation. No matter what the purpose may be, however, having regard to the close relationship between the consumers of this country and the small stores I urge the government not to disregard the arguments that have been made, and to take further time to consider so important a step affecting the welfare of so many Canadians.

At 6.15 p.m. the house took recess.

Combines Investigation Act

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. J. W. Murphy (Lambton West): Mr. Speaker, in taking part in this debate at this late hour of the session I should like to say first that perhaps I can express an opinion that has not heretofore been voiced, and I want to be very fair in what I say. In the first place, I have had some experience in manufacturing a product which people today cannot buy for five cents, but which is not worth any more than five cents. In the second place, I have had considerable experience in wholesaling, or jobbing as some people call it. By virtue of this experience I did have an interest in the retailer. I will be frank and say my primary interest in him was his ability to pay his bills. I approach this argument from that standpoint on rather short notice, and, also, I must admit, after hearing what I think has been one of the finest debates hon. members have ever listened to in the house, to my knowledge. True, it was heated at times; but none of us can honestly say that we regretted that heat, because it did generate ideas and opinions that to my way of thinking, and I believe to most of us, should be taken into serious consideration.

Let me say first, Mr. Speaker, that I was not a member of the committee that had the privilege, if I may term it such, of reviewing some aspects of the MacQuarrie report. I say now that I have interest in this legislation as a consumer and for other reasons, as I have just stated. I went into the committee room for the purpose of hearing what was going on. Quite frankly, Mr. Speaker, I regret having to say this, but never before in my experience here—and I can also speak for hon. members who have served in this house much longer than I—was a committee engineered—and I use the term "engineered" advisedly—as this one was. They could have threshed old straw, but they were not even permitted to do that.

I have said to my friends that if I were to make up my own mind on this problem I would want to have an expression of opinion from those much more qualified than I am; and I was not prepared to adopt the ideas expressed by any member of that committee, nor will I be prepared to make up my mind and come to a sane conclusion on the merits of this proposed legislation, in view of my experience, without having before me the evidence of those most concerned. That would include the manufacturer, the jobber, the retailer and the consumer. When I found to my amazement, and I think to the amazement of this country, that this committee were in such a terrific hurry that they would not permit representations by the retailers who were so vitally concerned, I wondered, as did these people and those friends of each one of us in this house, what they would think.

I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, that the committee room was not big enough to accommodate representation from the ordinary consumer from every province of this country so they could watch what went on in the committee. It certainly would have been an eye-opener to each and every one of them. I hope—and I think I share the opinion of many in this house—that never again will a committee be set up that will be bridled as this one was. It might never have been set up, because it served no purpose except to express to the people of this country the conclusion that this government was determined to go through with the proposed legislation which, they tried to give the impression to the public, was going to benefit them.

That opinion has been shattered so far as the public is concerned, and the opinion of the government has been shattered, as we all know, by the last five by-elections, but the point I make is this. The committee was not permitted to hear evidence which was so vital to everyone. There is no one in this country more entitled to hear what may be said for or against price maintenance than the people vitally concerned. When I see a big company like Eaton's giving their stamp of approval to this type of legislation it makes me wonder—and I represent 45,000 or more people who I think share my convictions—what can be behind it. Mind you, I would not be taking up the time of the house if I thought for one moment that any member of this government had the slightest idea that this legislation would reduce the cost of living. We are all concerned about the cost of living, but I defy any member of the government to stand up tonight or any other time and say that this proposed legislation is going to reduce the cost of living. Not so long ago the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) stood up in this chamber and said—I do not propose to quote his words in detail—that this legislation would have little if any effect on the cost of living. When I see big business stepping into the picture and expressing their well-conceived ideas to the committee I begin to wonder as a common man just what it means.

I should like to give an illustration in order to substantiate what I have been saying. Some people in the house may not like what I am going to say, and some people in industry may not like it, but I do not care. I feel that the moment you take on the responsibility of being a member of the House of Commons you expose yourself to the bar of public opinion and you must be fair to your people regardless of whom you might hurt. That has been my attitude in the past and it will continue to be my attitude as long as I am in this house.

I am going to recite to you an experience I had with big business some twenty years ago when I was engaged in the jobbing business, mainly of tobacco. At that time we had at the head of the Imperial Tobacco Company a man who conceived the idea that he was going to have a monopoly in the tobacco business. I want to be fair and say that his successors did not share his views. I know that the present president of the Imperial Tobacco Company certainly does not have the same ideas that man expressed and intended to put into effect. They started a price war because they were the largest unit in the tobacco manufacturing industry in Canada. They also had some jobbing outlets in the various provinces. This particular president had the idea that they were going to get it all. At that time we had a margin of about 11 per cent on gross turnover. Let me be frank and say that was more or less by agreement between the jobbers and manufacturers. In addition to having jobbers in the various provinces this company had the United cigar stores as their retail outlets.

In order to have an almost complete monopoly in Canada they decided to cut prices and put the jobbers out of business. There is no denying that fact. They had practically control of the tobacco industry, and they had control by that time of the cigar manufacturing industry. There is no denying that, and I think some hon. members on the other side will agree. This particular individual decided that he wanted to control the tobacco industry from the production angle, and they decided to cut prices through their jobbers.

Every individual in business is entitled to a fair profit, but no more. I hold no brief for certain retailers who have been getting exorbitant profits. I think there are people in the retail business today who are not good merchandisers. I can say that from experience. Whether the retailers like it or not, I am going to say that there are some retailers in this country who enjoy a higher margin of profit than they should get or could get by with if they were smarter merchandisers.

In order to get control—I think this has to do with the principle of this particular bill—this company decided to give discounts through their wholesale outlets. Then they made the suggestion that they would be interested in buying out other wholesalers who were their competitors. You and I—I am speaking to the members of the house—believe in good sound competition; we do not believe in monopolies or cartels. I am going to relate what happens when some of these needed restrictions are released. They did not succeed in buying out many jobbers. The point I am trying to make is that if either a government or business pursues a policy whereby any individual or corporation can by means of an act of parliament or legislation of any other sort become a monopoly, or conduct their business in such a manner that there is really no competition, that is not good for any type of business nor is it good ultimately for the consumer. If a large corporation, such as Eaton's, want to get rid of a well-known brand, if they have little industries of their own making that particular product they will undersell the nationally-known brand for no other purpose than to enhance the sale of their own product with the ultimate object of putting out of business the little independent manufacturer producing the goods which were originally sold to all retailers. Let there be no mistake about that.

We must be on our guard today. I appreciate the views that have been expressed by hon. members on the other side, but we must be on our guard against any individual or corporation which is not just looking forward to tomorrow but to fifteen, twenty-five, or fifty years from tomorrow. The basis of our business system today is competition. I think everyone will agree that competition and the product itself are what govern the price.

I have something to say which I am sure will be of interest to hon. members, in view of the fact that the T. Eaton Company made certain representations to the committee on this proposed legislation. At about five o'clock yesterday or today, they withdrew from the Canadian retail federation. Members of the committee know what stand the retail federation took with respect to this matter.

An hon. Member: Go on, "Murph", Christmas is coming.

Mr. Murphy: I know it, and I am taking a train tonight. However, if you want to tantalize me I will go on for my full forty minutes.

Mr. Riley: Are you tantalizable?

Mr. Murphy: Another Irishman could tantalize me. That is right. You were very kind to me the other day so I should not tantalize the other part of Ireland.

Mr. Riley: Or this house.

Mr. Murphy: There is one other aspect on which I think there will not be any dispute by any hon. member of the house. We all live in cities or municipalities where in all probability there are chain stores. It may be the A & P, Loblaws or Dominion Stores. I am going to put on the record tonight something which I regret having to place there. We all know that the number of items under price maintenance in grocery stores is small compared with the number in other retail outlets. In my experience I have never found a big chain outlet that has built its own store. They come into a town or city and rent store space or have a store built to their specifications which they rent. I come from Sarnia, and we have Loblaws, Dominion Stores and the A & P. We all know the size of the chain stores in our various cities. There is an A & P store on the main street of the city of Sarnia. I have no idea what their annual turnover is, but they pay to the municipality the insignificant—I was going to use a word which might not be parliamentary—sum of $460 per year in taxes.

Mr. Gibson: What is the matter with the assessment?

Mr. Murphy: I am interrupted now by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Gibson). I wish to heaven he would get some constituency that would be easier to pronounce.

Mr. Gibson: I am simple, though.

Mr. Murphy: You had better run in Ottawa. I can pronounce Ottawa very easily. So many of us forget that after all is said and done these chain store operators do not pull their load. While some people may say it is the fault of the municipal assessment, I think you will find that situation pretty general throughout the country. Then we have a large Dominion store market. It is on a splendid location and is about 80 feet wide by 125 feet deep. I think hon. members will agree it is doing more business than fifteen, twenty or possibly thirty independent good retailers in the same business. It pays a little over $700 a year to the municipality. The point I want to suggest for consideration of the house with respect to chain stores and independent retailers is that in my locality, and I think it applies to all, it is certainly not the chain store operator who is on the city council or board of education, or is a member of a service club or leads community chest drives. You will find it is the independent retailer, regardless of what business he may be in, who is the leader in his community. Let us give that situation very serious consideration.

I have always believed that every individual has a moral right to enter into a social, business or legal agreement with his neighbour provided such agreements do not infringe on the rights of a third party. I would hate to see the day in this country when I could not make an agreement with anyone with whom I deal provided it did not do any injustice to a third party. I have the idea that some people have the opinion that this legislation is going to outlaw these agreements. I do not think it will, and I do not believe the business people think it will. I am satisfied from the hundreds of telegrams and letters received by members of the House of Commons that the consumer will not think for one moment that it will.

I share the opinion of the consumers of this country that this legislation is nothing but a hoax, an idea of the present government to give the people the impression that this is one way of curbing the cost of living.

An hon. Member: It is almost train time.

Mr. Murphy: There is certainly one way of curbing the high cost of living, and that is for the government to remove the excessive taxes imposed on the wage earners of Canada. There is no occasion for us to have a surplus of some $605 million for the first seven months of this year when it was not budgeted for. The point is that if we are going to budget for payment of the national debt, the budget should say so when it is brought down. Let us not go for eight, nine or ten months and then say we have a surplus which can be used to pay the national debt.

Mr. Gibson: On a point of order, how can the hon. member make these remarks relevant to the question of combines?

Mr. Speaker: I think the hon. member might address himself more directly to the principle of the bill.

Mr. Murphy: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The hon. member for Comox-Alberni gets up for the fun of it. He is trying to become a good Liberal and he objects every time I get up to speak.

Mr. Brown (Essex West): You mean he is a good Liberal.

Mr. Murphy: This legislation is proposed in the hope of reducing the cost of living. I say the government should reduce the cost of living by reducing taxes. That would be the effective way. No one in business or even out of business—

An hon. Member: 8.31.

Mr. Abbott: What time does the train go?

Mr. Murphy: —objects to honest competition, and I think we all agree that piracy in business went out of style a long time ago. There was a time in the retail business when probably they did get higher margins than they do today. I think that competition and the quality of a product determine pretty well what a consumer is going to be obliged to pay.

In common with all consumers, I am concerned about what we have to pay for what we have to buy. I believe that a reasonable and rational amount of resale price maintenance is not only a good thing for all concerned—and I am referring to the consumer —but it is definitely a good thing to ward off extensive price cutting, with all its attendant ills. When yesterday I heard the chairman of the committee refer to the prices of some particular products, the thought occurred to me that when a manufacturer produces a product he is also determined to get it to the consumer level and, to assure its resale, he must continue its quality. I believe that, in all fairness, the manufacturer is entitled to suggest a retail price for his product.

I am one who has been in business and who holds the view that if you have a good product, then it is essential that it must be advertised. There are some who have the idea that resale price maintenance is improper. I disagree with them. Some say it is wrong, but the mere fact that they make that statement does not make it wrong, especially when there are people who are ready to demonstrate that it is not necessarily so. Unfortunately in the committee which was set up those people were not afforded the opportunity that could have been provided for them to make a decision.

I have always felt, from the standpoint of the retailers, that no one in a successful business can offer his product to the public on a hit and miss price basis. True, there are different levels of overhead expense, and those various levels determine the price at which the product must be sold. I should like to refer to what has happened in the last few years in the grocery trade, where to a considerable extent they deal in tobacco. Just before the dinner recess I heard of an illustration in which the man's turnover on tobacco was 30 per cent. The margin to the retailer on that commodity today is only about 11·7 per cent. If there should be a price war—and some might be inclined to favour a price war in view of the present high prices paid for cigarettes—the margin would be even lower. The high price of cigarettes, of course, is due to the policy of the government, and the injury affects not only the consumer but the independent retailer.

I am sure no one will disagree when I say that 11·7 per cent is a very small margin for any retailer. When I hear of some businesses in which the turnover is about 30 per cent in tobacco lines I sometimes wonder how they manage to carry on without having to use the red ink.

It seems to me this legislation, which the government now deems so very important, could have been brought down years ago and not at this late hour in the session. It is nothing but a smoke screen. I have no hesitation in saying that this is being done by the government to cover up its inability to produce legislation to deal with the high cost of living.

I should like to place on the record, though it may have been done before, a statement by Mr. Justice Louis Brandeis, when he said:

> The Sherman law seeks to protect men in the right freely to compete, and to prevent practices which must result in compressing competition. It seeks to preserve to the individual both the opportunity and the incentive to create. It seeks to encourage individual effort. The right of an individual manufacturer in a competitive business to market his goods in his own way—by fixing, if he desires, the selling price to the consumer—is in entire harmony with the underlying principle of the Sherman law.

And it was John Ruskin who said:

> It's unwise to pay too much, but it's worse to pay too little.

And the people should remember this:

> When you pay too much, you lose a little money —that is all. When you pay too little, you sometimes lose everything, because the thing you bought was incapable of doing the thing it was bought to do. The common law of business balance prohibits paying a little and getting a lot—it can't be done. If you deal with the lowest bidder, it is well to add something for the risk you run. And if you do that, you will have enough to pay for something better.

Few people in Canada know the difference between vertical price cutting by a manufacturer to protect his brand name and goodwill and horizontal price agreements between manufacturers. Mr. Justice Holmes said:

> I cannot believe that in the long run the public will profit by this court permitting knaves to cut reasonable prices for some ulterior purpose of their own, and thus to impair, if not to destroy, the production and sale of articles which it is assumed to be desirable that the public should be able to get.

In conclusion I should like to make just one further statement, and I make it on behalf of the retailers and consumers not only in my own area but in many other areas of Canada where there are unemployed. This is one factor which has not been discussed to any extent in the house. I refer to the service given by independent retailers to the consuming public. Today when we see unemployment, not only in western Ontario, including Sarnia and Windsor—

Mr. Brown (Essex West): Speak for Sarnia.

Mr. Murphy: I am speaking for Windsor, too. Your trouble at the Ford motor plant is creating unemployment not only in Sarnia but throughout the province of Ontario. It is the independent retailer who today will be obliged to give credit to the unemployed in these various places in order that, at this Christmas season, they may have a bite to eat.

Mr. A. Earl Catherwood (Haldimand): Mr. Speaker, after listening with close attention to the very able address of the hon. member for Lambton West (Mr. Murphy), I feel that perhaps I can confine my remarks to ten or fifteen minutes.

It was not my privilege to serve as a member of the committee on resale price maintenance, but I did take the opportunity of attending a number of the sittings and listening to the discussions, as I felt this legislation was of great importance. I can assure the house I found them most interesting indeed.

There has been a desire on the part of hon. members who have taken part in the debate to discuss the matter seriously, and I believe that thus far the debate has been conducted along that line. It is true that there have been sharp clashes reflecting different points of view, but that is to be expected when we are dealing with legislation as important as this.

After listening carefully to a number of discussions in the committee on resale price maintenance I must admit I was somewhat puzzled as to the reason for bringing this legislation before the house now, without having further evidence to justify its support. I do feel that had the matter been given greater consideration following the report of the MacQuarrie committee, which I believe was based principally on theory and not on fact, the government would have refrained from taking what I consider such a drastic step. At the beginning everyone realized that this measure was undertaken by the government in good faith. Most of us believed it was an attempt to do something about the high cost of living, but since this debate has started that has been disproved. We can all agree that that is not the case. My opinion, sir, on the basis of the debates in the committee, would be that action against this resale price maintenance structure would not be in the interests of the consumer, as the sponsors of the bill would have us believe. Until more evidence is submitted I could not possibly support the bill before the house. When a measure as important as this, and of such far-reaching consequences, comes before this House of Commons I feel we should have sufficient time to debate and discuss every detail of it.

We were elected from 262 constituencies across the country for the purpose of giving thorough and earnest consideration to every bill that comes before the house. That is our responsibility. I feel that we would be derelict in our duty as members if we did not study this bill very carefully, despite the fact that it is close to Christmas and many of our members would like to catch a train tonight if they could. I should like to be among them. I do feel sincerely that we have to give careful consideration to this bill, because it has such far-reaching implications. Those who are urging the banning of resale price maintenance describe this measure as one which will protect the consumer from high prices, and which will ensure proper competition. We will all concede those are desirable and admirable objectives. We would all like to see that happen. It has become apparent, however, that this matter of resale price maintenance is not as simple as it seemed in the speech from the throne.

When this legislation was announced, the protests that were registered came chiefly from the small retailer across this country. His contention was that the huge retail organizations would undersell him, and would gradually force him from the sale of those lines of goods. As the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Blair) pointed out the other evening, many of our returned soldiers across this country have set up small businesses, and have become established under the present system. I, for one, could not support legislation that might interfere with the success of those enterprises. I feel that powerful retail establishments would be in a position to dictate prices on their own terms. There is not a member in this House of Commons who would want to see a monopoly in any kind of business. I have sufficient confidence in the members of all parties to believe that is so. But we would not want to see business controlled by large corporations of any kind. We have the Combines Investigation Act on the statute books of our country for the purpose of preventing such an occurrence. I feel that the banning of resale price maintenance could not help the situation, but would create the very condition the government and parliament are attempting to avoid.

Every member of this house knows full well that competition is maintained at the production level, and that any concern about it at the retail level is not warranted. Prices simply cannot be held at exorbitant levels, except under illegal combine, at the manufacturing end. I believe it is not the retail end of sales about which we should be concerned. It seems significant, Mr. Speaker, and this fact was mentioned by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) this afternoon, that the only group which submitted evidence to the parliamentary committee that was 100 per cent in favour of banning resale price maintenance was the group which comprises the huge organizations, and which is now increasing to the point where its members could be well described as giants in industry. This fact alone would indicate to me, and I take it to many members of this house, that we should not plunge into the banning of resale price maintenance without further study of this tremendously important step.

When the manufacturer sets the retail price of his article he knows he is setting that price in competition with other resale price-maintained goods and he is also setting that price in competition with goods not in that category or classification. As was pointed out in the committee, if the government would concentrate on ensuring the rigid enforcement of the law forbidding combines and cartels it would assure unrestricted competition, and I doubt very much if we would have any reason to fear resale price maintenance in the retail field.

During these long week ends when we Ontario members occasionally go home on Friday night and come back on Sunday evening, we have the opportunity of consulting with our constituents. During the last three or four week ends I have been conducting a sort of one man Gallup poll amongst the people of my constituency on this very matter. I will say that the people of Haldimand county are intelligent people. They study these matters carefully, and I found them fairly well informed about this legislation and the extent of the discussion that had taken place in this house. They are somewhat concerned about one or two matters in connection with this bill. They are concerned as to what the result will be when price maintenance is removed from price-maintained lines. I also found that they want to be able to buy everything they require at any store in the neighbourhood, particularly the little corner store near their residence; that is one thing which is very important to these people. They like to feel they can buy as cheaply in one store as they can in another, and receive what they consider is honest dollar for dollar value. They also want to retain the privilege of choosing between branded goods and other goods not price-maintained. I strongly urge the government to hold over this legislation for future consideration and study. I feel that the amendment moved by the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) is one that we should consider seriously because of the implications which this bill might contain.

Sir, if I may be allowed to do so, in support of some of the views I have expressed I should like to give you some references from the press; and I will do this briefly and will obey the rules of the house as far as they relate to quotations from the press across Canada, because I do not believe we should abuse this privilege we have of making some reference occasionally to their opinions on matters of importance, such as an issue like this.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Fulton: Some hon. members might carry on their private arguments outside the chamber.

Mr. Abbott: Why?

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Catherwood: I should like to make a few references to some of the newspapers that have expressed their views on this matter, and I will refer briefly to some of these quotations. One is from the Peterborough Examiner which the hon. member for Peterborough West (Mr. Fraser) knows well.

Mr. Fraser: I did.

Mr. Catherwood: The headline is "Confusion about Resale Price Maintenance". It states that the government would be wise to postpone action for the present, giving those who oppose and those who favour it more time to state their case. Then it goes on to say there is no reason why the Department of Justice should not increase its vigilance in dealing with price-fixing combines and put into effect laws which are now on the books dealing with loss leaders.

I might also quote from the Globe and Mail of December 14. The headline of the article is "Dangerous Half Measures". It points out the same thing. It says that the dominion government's chief accomplishment in dealing with the resale price maintenance issue has been to bring its own sincerity into question. It introduced the measure with the announced intention of pushing it through the various house stages as soon as possible. As we all know, it was rushed through the committee stage and brought back to the House of Commons. In all these deliberations not even one comma was changed when it was brought back to the House of Commons, so the committee apparently did not make any suggestions that were worth-while.

Then I should like to refer to a quotation from the London Free Press, which I may say has always taken a neutral attitude in this matter. I will just briefly refer to one or two points. I should like to read it all because it is extremely important; however, I will not do so. I quote:

> . . . Now the bill to ban price maintenance is going before the House of Commons in its original form it will almost certainly pass. But it is doubtful if the effect on the cost of living which has quietly continued to rise will be great . . .

That is just one extract from the London Free Press. This afternoon the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) referred to an article appearing in a leading financial newspaper. He made reference to the fact that the implementation of this act will work in conjunction with the January sales that will duly take place in the merchandising field. In support of this I could perhaps quote an article from the St. Catharines Standard, which is headlined, "Method in the Madness of Justice Minister in Forcing this Law Through Against Retail Price Maintenance Before the Christmas Adjournment."

Mr. Fulton: "Madness" is right.

Mr. Catherwood: It goes on to state that it is the practice of all merchandising firms to have their January sales, and the only thing we can say about this that might be creditable to the Minister of Justice is that his planning is certainly very good.

Mrs. Fairclough: Or bad for the merchant.

Mr. Catherwood: Or bad for the merchant, as the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mrs. Fairclough) has said. I also want to quote from the Financial Post, and again I will be brief. I will just quote three or four lines of an article in the issue of December 15, in which it is stated:

> It was a sorry spectacle last week to see the government applying the parliamentary steamroller to its special committee on resale price maintenance. This week the same tactics were being used in parliament to ram this legislation through before adjournment.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I do not think it is in order for the hon. member to read from a newspaper or a document published outside the house and reflecting on the proceedings in the house.

Mr. Catherwood: I accept your ruling, Mr. Speaker. But that was about the last quotation I had to make, sir, from the Financial Post.

Mr. Fulton: Just summarize it.

[Mr. Catherwood.]

Mrs. Fairclough: Just give the gist of it.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Catherwood: I might just refer in concluding to one from the Hamilton Spectator.

Mrs. Fairclough: That is a good paper.

Mr. Catherwood: I will not read the editorial; I will just comment on it. It begins:

> If ever an Ottawa drama turned into a vaudeville ballyhoo it is that parliamentary committee's inquiry into resale price maintenance.

Then it reports this way: It says things are so mixed up now that it would almost take a royal commission to straighten them out, and that what started out as a bid to rescue the consumer from a dragon has developed into some excited clouting of an elusive mouse.

With all this supporting evidence we have against the implementation of this bill I urge the government seriously to consider the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton). I feel that it is exceedingly important to the people of Canada, and that it is important to us as members of parliament that this amendment be considered very seriously. I know hon. members will not regret taking the action if they support that amendment.

Mr. J. A. MacLean (Queens): Mr. Speaker, I wish to speak briefly on this important subject.

An hon. Member: Briefly?

Mr. MacLean (Queens): Yes, briefly. I feel it is exceedingly important that we, as members of parliament who have the responsibility of representing the people of our constituencies as they think we should, look at this subject in a cool, unbiased and unprejudiced manner. After all, we are about to enact legislation which might indeed have a serious effect on our economy. It is our responsibility as members of parliament to be careful, to glean all the information and evidence we can to guide us intelligently before making that decision. I deplore the tendency which I have observed in this house, instead of appealing to reason, to attempt to appeal to emotion at this important time. I feel that we would be remiss in our responsibility if we allow ourselves to have our attention distracted from the main point at issue by tactics or methods of that sort. After all, the people of this country have the impression—I hope they are wrong but they have this impression —that there is a tendency on the part of the government to jump at conclusions from incomplete evidence,—

Mr. Sinnott: That is only wishful thinking on your part.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): —or what is even worse, to have perhaps invalid opinions as to what should be done and attempt to support those opinions by piecemeal evidence which does not show the complete picture. I think all hon. members will agree that any member of parliament who is worthy of the name wishes to see brought into effect legislation which will be of the maximum benefit to the greatest number of people. But there is no indication, or at any rate, no evidence, that this legislation falls within that category. I will therefore most wholeheartedly support the motion which was moved by the hon. member for Kamloops.

I have very little sympathy for hon. members who attempt to shore up a weak argument for any given hypothesis to support their own views and rush some very important legislation through this house in an incomplete way. I know there are many hon. members who wish to see this legislation rushed through, and I know some wish us to give it only a cursory glance, but that is not something of which any hon. member should be proud. After all, we have a responsibility here in this chamber to examine legislation very carefully and try to bring the spotlight on any flaws it may contain. Craftsmen, when they produce some work which is of a very high order, are not ashamed to have it exhibited to public view. They like to have it admired and examined by critics because they know it will stand up to thorough examination; but in this case the reverse seems to be true. I see an indication that the members of the government would like to see this legislation go through very rapidly.

I sincerely hope, Mr. Speaker, that this very important legislation was not introduced in this house almost on the eve of Christmas by design. I hope it was only mismanagement. I see, too, a very strong tendency on the part of some hon. members to find a scapegoat, someone to blame for the high cost of living. I believe this may have some connection with this legislation. After all, I think many members of this parliament who are not acquainted with the situation have now begun to realize that the cost of living in this country and inflation have become very serious. Now that their craft is almost going over the falls, they are desperately trying to clutch something that may save them. They are looking for a scapegoat, and a very convenient scapegoat they seem to have found. They think they have a scapegoat in the form of the manufacturers and the retail merchants in this country. These latter-day Aarons are going to pile on the head of this scapegoat the sins of the government, hoping that the merchants and the manufacturers of this country will disappear into the wilderness, like the original scapegoat, and never be seen again. But I am quite convinced that the retailers of this country will not go down without a fight.

Mr. Sinnott: What about the consumers?

Mr. MacLean (Queens): In their haste to blame the merchants of this country for the high cost of living, which they claim is brought about by resale price maintenance, many members of the house remind me a great deal of a certain character in one of Shakespeare's plays, "The Merchant of Venice". I refer to Shylock. Yesterday afternoon I was struck by the similarity. I had forgotten this, but when I heard the hon. member speak yesterday it brought it back vividly to my mind and I then looked it up. The similarity is very striking. You have Shylock saying in "The Merchant of Venice":

> We trifle time; I pray thee, pursue sentence.

That is exactly what I hear hon. members in this house say. Let us get on with this. Let us rush it through; let us not worry about the consequences. But the answer to this—

Mr. Fournier (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): Who said that?

Mr. MacLean (Queens): Shylock.

Mr. Fournier (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): Who said it?

Mr. MacLean (Queens): And you have the reply.

Mr. Fournier (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): Who said it?

Mr. MacLean (Queens): Shylock.

Mr. Sinnott: Name him.

Mr. Fulton: The hon. member for Coast-Capilano said it yesterday.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): Portia said:

> A pound of that same merchant's flesh is thine:
> The court awards it, and the law doth give it.
> Shylock: Most rightful judge!

That is very similar to the situation we have now.

Mr. Sinnott: What are you reading from?

Mr. Blair: You never heard of it.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): I think the consequences of this legislation, if it is brought into being, may be very far-reaching. I am not saying that, because I am not justified in saying that. There is no evidence. I am not saying that it is a bad thing.

Mr. Sinnott: Hear, hear.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): It is possible that it is a good thing, but if it is—

Mr. Sinnott: Both sides of the fence.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): It is not a case of being on both sides of the fence; it is a case of not knowing what the results will be. We have no evidence to indicate what the results will be. There is great danger—

Mr. Riley: Don't be a mugwump.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): There is a great danger that if this legislation is brought into existence it will have a disastrous effect on this country. In that connection, Mr. Speaker, I should like to point out that the small merchants in this country are a very important part of our economy.

Mr. Abbott: Hear, hear.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): They are also a very important segment of our citizenry. I feel, sir, that if the small businessman and the retailer are put into the position where their existence is in jeopardy it will militate against the well-being of many small communities across this country. I come from a province which is composed almost entirely of small communities, and it has the disadvantage, if you look at it in that way, of being a province where there are no headquarters of large chain organizations. Any profits which are drawn away from my province by large organizations and chain stores are gone forever, and the province does not even benefit from taxation. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, we should be extremely careful before skating on thin ice or plunging in, because there is a great danger that we will destroy a very important segment of our economy.

Mr. Abbott: Do both, skate on thin ice and plunge in.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): If you skate on thin ice too long you will plunge in.

Mr. Fraser: He has skated on it before.

Mr. Sinnott: He has not plunged in yet.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): In the province I come from there are many small centres which can barely support one drug store. If legislation of this sort is brought into being it may well be that many of the small businesses will be wiped out.

Mr. Riley: By what competition?

Mr. MacLean (Queens): By the competition of the mail order houses. They would be wiped out in this way. I see no safeguard against loss leaders.

Mr. Riley: There is no competition in a small town.

Mr. Fulton: There is, and you know it; there is the competition of the chain store.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): There is competition in my province.

Mr. Sinnott: You are on the wrong track.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): What I have been saying is for the most part my own opinion, which may or may not be worth much. But what this house needs is concrete, factual evidence to guide us in making a wise decision on this important subject. I support most heartily the amendment of the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton), so this house may have an opportunity to peruse the necessary facts and arrive at a valid conclusion as to what course of action the government should take on this very important matter.

Mr. W. J. Browne (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, I am well aware, just as well aware as hon. members on the other side of the house, that this is the week before Christmas. I am also well aware that we are discussing a very important matter.

An hon. Member: Another one of Tennyson's brooks.

Mr. Fulton: It is a pity they would not make their speeches on their feet.

An hon. Member: Get up yourself.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, I appeal to you to maintain order. Mr. Speaker, I should like you to maintain order while I speak.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I ask hon. members to allow the hon. member to continue with his speech.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I have heard hon. members opposite interrupting speakers on this side of the house, and I cannot understand why we are not allowed to speak on this subject.

An hon. Member: Sure you are.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I am glad to know we are going to be allowed to speak on a subject so important.

Mr. Fournier (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): Speak and give us your opinion, too.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I am afraid I shall have to start all over again. I did not think there was so much of the Christmas spirit abroad as there seems to be tonight. These interruptions remind me of the night I was called to the bar—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I should like to be permitted to recount this incident. It was twenty-nine years ago. The custom at Gray's Inn when members were being called to the bar was to have them get up and make a speech, but as you rose to make your speech you were interrupted by the senior members. There was an Irishman there who had previously been called to the Irish bar. He stood there for about ten minutes while he was being interrupted and then finally he said so they could hear him, "Oh, you need not think you are bothering me; I have been practising at the Irish bar and have become used to interruptions from the Irish judges."

Having that incident in mind I am prepared to stand here and listen to the interruptions by hon. members who have spoken already until they are prepared to listen to what I have to say. This subject is either important or it is not important. If it is important, it should be treated with the seriousness it deserves, and anyone who has a contribution to make should be allowed to make it.

The Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) spoke for two hours and a half and the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) nearly equalled that record when he spoke for two hours. Other hon. members have gone the full forty minutes. If this subject is so important as to warrant an opening speech of two hours and a half by the Minister of Justice, who served on the committee, are those of us who are just students and who listened to his wise remarks just supposed to sit here and vote without expressing our opinion on the matter at all? Even as bystanders we have some views upon this important matter. I do not know very much about it and I do not intend to make a long speech, but if I am aroused perhaps I might be encouraged to do so.

Mr. Abbott: What do you need to arouse you?

Mr. Fulton: A few more of your silly interruptions.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): As hon. members know, in the speech from the throne the government expressed its concern about the rising cost of living and said they were doing everything that could be done to alleviate that condition. Special reference was made to the measures introduced by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) which in my opinion had the effect of increasing the cost of living, as I predicted last spring would happen. Then it went on in the next paragraph, without connecting the two although the connection seemed obvious, to say that the government now had in its possession the interim report of the MacQuarrie committee which had been investigating the Combines Investigation Act.

That committee had been appointed over a year ago and nobody had heard a word from them until the Minister of Justice wrote and asked them for an interim report on resale price maintenance. I do not think we have been told why the Minister of Justice wrote to ask for a report on that particular phase of their investigation. The Combines Investigation Act had been in existence for many years, but it has not been in existence as long as resale price maintenance. I had not heard of anyone making any serious complaint about abuses through resale price maintenance. Therefore it is extraordinary in my opinion that the Minister of Justice should write to the committee and ask for an interim report.

As soon as the report was tabled I sent for a copy, and I think I was one of the first members in the house to read it. I was astonished at what a niggardly report it was on that subject. I had seen the report of the committee appointed by the British House of Commons to investigate the same matter. They went into it much more elaborately and had much more documentation for their findings.

This report was prepared in a hurry. As the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) pointed out, the chairman of the committee had been away all summer and then had to come back to carry on his duties as president of one of our great universities. The fall term was just beginning, and he had very little time to devote to the preparation of that report. The report had haste written all over it. When the minister is replying to the speeches that have been made from this side of the house I should like him to explain why he wrote to the committee and asked for an interim report on resale price maintenance.

I think I can say without qualification that yesterday the hon. member for St. James (Mr. Beaudry) delivered the best speech I have ever heard in the House of Commons. I know it was unpalatable to most hon. members on the other side, because he did not receive one handclap or one bit of applause when he sat down. Yet it was logical, it was coherent and it was, I would say, very compelling. We had to listen to him. His arguments were sound, and I think the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) is going to have a hard job to answer the arguments put forward by the hon. member for St. James. In the course of his remarks he recommended that every member of the house should read the proceedings of the committee. I have them here, and there are 872 pages. I would be willing to bet all the money I have in my pocket, which is not very much, that outside of members of the committee no other member of the house has read the complete report of the proceedings. I doubt if any member of the government has read it—

An hon. Member: You win.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): —yet members are prepared to vote on this legislation without having read the evidence, this volume of 872 pages. Who has had a chance to study it? Has any analysis been published for the benefit of the public so their reaction can be ascertained? Let the members who are silent over there interrupt now and tell me how many have read it. Has the hon. member for Saint John-Albert (Mr. Riley) read it? No. I could go right through the whole list of members over there and I am ready to bet that not one of them has read it.

An hon. Member: Ask the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott).

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I know the Minister of Finance is too busy for anyone to expect him to go into it, and besides he has too able a parliamentary assistant to make it necessary. According to the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) the parliamentary assistant has performed such a capable job as chairman of the committee that he can feel the work has been well done. There are 872 pages of evidence and I must confess that while I appreciate the advice of the hon. member for St. James, it has been impossible to read the report. Why? Because there were half a dozen committees sitting at the same time and most of the members of the house were on those committees. There were only twenty-five or thirty members in the house. Everyone else was attending some committee. Therefore the majority of members of the house have not read the evidence. The majority of members on the government side have not read the evidence with respect to this legislation. I say now that hon. members are not in a position to vote one way or the other concerning this subject.

Mr. Sinnott: You are not a judge now.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): The hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Sinnott) talks in such a peculiar way that I cannot understand what he says.

Mr. Sinnott: I say you are not a judge now.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Oh, yes, I am here as a judge. I am a judge of what the committee did. Why is the report of the committee brought before us if we are not to sit upon it in judgment? Theoretically the committee was appointed by the house and given certain duties to perform. According to the hon. member for Eglinton, who has been here for six years and whom I know from personal experience to be a very active member of any committee upon which he sits, he never saw such a travesty of justice as the way that committee performed its duties with the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance as chairman and the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) sitting by his side. That is the most serious charge I have heard in this house since I have been here.

Mr. Abbott: He is always making charges.

Mr. Fleming: All of them well founded, too.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): It has not been shown that he is incorrect, and we do not need any further evidence than his statement because we know this measure is being forced through the House of Commons at the present time under the greatest possible pressure the government can put upon us.

Mr. Fleming: Duress.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Only today we were informed that the house, which was expected to close some time this week, is going to adjourn over Christmas until the 27th of December, and members are going to be called back then to resume the consideration of legislation that has not been completed. This was a special session called ostensibly for the purpose of dealing with the question of old age pensions. Who is thinking of old age pensions now? That legislation went through without one dissenting voice.

Mr. Abbott: Some of us may qualify before you finish.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): The Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) may qualify before the session is finished. This session, which was called for the purpose of dealing with old age pensions, is now vitally concerned with resale price maintenance. What I have said so far is only introductory. I have not read the report of the proceedings of the committee any more than any other member. I have not had a chance to do so. I have heard it is a most interesting report. I have heard many criticisms of the McGregor, as he was called last night, the former combines investigation commissioner of whom I had such a high opinion two years ago when he resigned his position because of the treatment he had received. I have heard and read so many criticisms as to contradictions in his evidence indicating that it was composed largely of opinions and presumptions without being based upon facts that I should certainly like time to read it and form my own conclusions. Am I going to be given that time or not? Are other members going to be given that time?

Mr. Argue: You might have taken the forty minutes you are going to speak.

Mr. Abbott: You could have done that instead of making a speech.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): The hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue), who is not what we would call the most reticent member of the house and who speaks on many occasions—I am sure if Hansard were referred to it would be found that he talks far oftener than I do—suggests that I refrain from speaking now and study the report. I should like to ask him—

Mr. Abbott: Good idea.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): —and other hon. members who are interrupting and saying "hear, hear" how long it would take me to read this volume of 872 pages?

Mr. Abbott: How fast a reader are you?

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Was the committee serious when it sat down to perform its work? Is this report to be consigned to the library, put on a shelf in a dark room and left there to mould for centuries to come, or is it a valuable document that people are supposed to study seriously? Are members of the house supposed to read the evidence taken before one of their committees, or are they supposed to take the recommendation of the committee as presented to the house and have nothing more to say about it? I know what the government's answer is. They say "yes" because the majority of members on all committees are appointed by the government as Liberal representatives. They are Liberals when they sit on those committees, and every committee I have been on has been the same. The majority are Liberals. They bring in a Liberal report and the Liberal government does not even read it. It does not even read the evidence but puts it away and brings in its legislation. That is what is happening with regard to this matter. Is the public getting a square deal with respect to this subject?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I say this subject is one—

Mr. Abbott: Next page.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): —that might shake the foundations of Canadian society very seriously, like an earthquake.

Mr. Fulton: It is certainly shaking the foundations of the government.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I say to the Minister of Finance, who is smiling now, that he may well find it will have repercussions upon the government. He does not know, and I do not know if he cares, what the effects of this legislation are going to be. I do not see how he can because I do not think he has had enough time to reflect and give proper study and attention to what is going on. I am just as much concerned as any other member of the public about the increase in the cost of living, and I should like to see measures taken by the government to reduce the cost of living. But, sir, I cannot see that they have found the panacea in the legislation they are introducing here.

Mind you, I will confess that when this subject was first mentioned it seemed to me to be a very attractive thing. Often I would see in the shops Forsyth shirts at $5, right across the country. I would ask myself: Why should a manufacturer tell a retailer that he has to sell that shirt for $5? Why does he have to put a label on it before he sells it to the retailer? Why does he not let the retailer sell at his own price? I felt I should be able to go from one shop to another until I found the shirt at a lower price, and buy it at that price. But a little reflection and the arguments of hon. members on this side of the house have shown me clearly that that is not the right attitude to take in regard to this matter. There is a community of interest between the manufacturer and the retailer. They are in the same business of selling shirts. The manufacturer makes the shirt and sells it to the retailer. He is anxious to have the retailer sell as many of those shirts as possible. That is only common sense, is it not?

Every manufacturer wants to see his goods have a good showing. He wants to see them in the shop windows and wants to see them becoming popular. So he takes a pride in his product. The retailer is just as anxious as the manufacturer to sell as many shirts as possible. And those retailers are not like the persons described by the parliamentary assistant, I think it was, when he said they were gouging profits out of the consumer.

The retailer as you know him and as I know him, as hon. members on the other side of the house know him, and as the ministers know him, is an honest man. We take it for granted that men in business are honest. If they are not honest why is not the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) prosecuting them now for being dishonest? Why is this attack made upon the retailer?

Mr. Fleming: Why does he not prosecute the smugglers?

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): There is a community of interest there. It is a perfectly justifiable position. Many hon. members, especially those coming from the province of Quebec, know that this community of interest between retailers and manufacturers is called a vocational association. It is in vogue in other countries in Europe. It is in vogue in Portugal, especially.

Mr. Fournier (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): First time I have heard about that.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Then the hon. member's memory is not so good tonight. There is a community of interest there, and it is perfectly logical. I wish to tell you that this is not a new subject by any means. We are dealing with it as if it were new. It has been in effect in England for forty or fifty years. It has been in effect in the United States for a very long time. Forty-five of the forty-eight states are practising it. The Minister of Justice brought us a statement from the three states who had not been practising these fair trade laws, and I think the parliamentary assistant did the same thing. They held them up as objects to be admired. Why, do you not believe in democracy, the greatest good for the greatest number? Are the three states supposed to be the three wise men of the United States? Are they like the three wise men of the east? No, I think we ought to analyse the statement that forty-five of the forty-eight states in the United States practice these fair trade laws.

What I mean to do is go back a little way in my own experience. I happen to be familiar with the business of a small confectionery store operated by my mother for some years. Other hon. members may recall some of the matters about which I am going to speak. They will remember the five cent chocolate bar, the five cent bottle of pop, the ten cent package of cigarettes. Sales were made at these prices, not as a result of written agreements but by implied agreement between the manufacturers and the retailers to sell at these prices. When, during the first world war, prices of ingredients that went into chocolate bars went up, the manufacturers started to make the bars smaller so that they could still be sold at five cents. Then I remember particularly in connection with the five cent cigar there was an understanding between the manufacturer and the retailer that it would be sold at these special prices. And I suggest it never occurred to one member in the House of Commons that there was anything wrong in what the retailer was doing.

Where is any wrongdoing being discovered now? I have not heard anyone complaining about this resale price maintenance. I think it is largely a matter of imagination.

Mr. Fleming: The government's imagination.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Because of government propaganda people are now imagining that the retailer has been gouging profits out of us, the consumers. It has never occurred, at all. The Minister of Justice informed us in advance that the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo (Mr. Carter) would speak about the experience of Newfoundland. The hon. member for Coast-Capilano (Mr. Sinclair), at page 2151 of Hansard, made reference to the report of the royal commission, when he said:

> The second example is right here in Canada.

He was giving an example of the effect of resale price maintenance.

> The province of Newfoundland, before union, did not enjoy the blessing of resale price maintenance, but when they came into union they got it.

That was one of the blessings we got as a result of confederation.

> And as the Newfoundland co-operative brief pointed out, the prices in every line except cars rose immediately when resale price maintenance was applied to Newfoundland and so they had a royal commission on this matter.

That is an absurdity. The parliamentary assistant does not know what he is speaking about. Let me tell you something about that, because I happen to know about it. The premier of Newfoundland in pre-confederation days told the people of Newfoundland that the cost of living would go down 30 per cent after confederation. But instead of the cost of living going down, the cost of living has gone up. He had to have a commission to find out why it went up.

Mr. Fleming: They should have paged Doug. Abbott.

Mr. Abbott: The election is over in Newfoundland.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): But we have a by-election coming up.

An hon. Member: Hire a hall.

An hon. Member: An honest man.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): When the premier was forming the commission he went to a friend and said, "I would like to put you on that royal commission". His friend said,

"Look here, now, Joe, you know you are only fooling the people. It does not make much difference whether rolled oats sell for six cents in St. John's, Newfoundland, and seven cents in Labrador. There is nothing going to come out of it". "Oh", he replied "we have to let the people think we are doing something for them". And so the commission was appointed. And it brought in a report, I believe. Where they put that report, I do not know. We have never been able to get it. It is not in the parliamentary library.

An hon. Member: Perhaps the same place as the flour-milling report.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): No, I do not think it was as bad as that.

Mr. Fleming: Ask the Minister of Justice.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): But yesterday the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo, a gentleman for whom I have the highest respect, told us that the committee dealing with this subject had before it, among other documents, the report of that royal commission in Newfoundland which dealt with the question of the cost of living. Well, I inquired from the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) and he said no. I phoned the clerk of the committee and he said no, that he thought an extract was read from it, but it was not put before the committee.

Mr. Fulton: We never saw it.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Yesterday when the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo was reading from a manuscript in his hand as if it were from the report of the royal commission, I asked him if he was reading from the royal commission's report and he said yes. But obviously he was not. He was reading from a typescript he held in his hand. I do not believe there is a copy of the royal commission's report within these precincts. I have tried to get it.

I have here a letter I received from Mr. C. C. Janes, managing director of the Newfoundland co-operative union, asking me to support resale price maintenance. He outlined this very thing to which reference was made by the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo and the hon. member for Coast-Capilano, when they referred to the matter of batteries. It is said that the resale price of this article has risen from 60 cents to 80 cents, according to the finding of the royal commission in Newfoundland. In the first place, the landed cost of this battery was 46½ cents, that is before confederation, and the selling price was 60 cents. After confederation the landed cost rose to 47½ cents and the retail selling price was 80 cents. It was suggested that this was due to resale price maintenance. Now, sir, I have not seen the report of the commission and I am not in a position to accept or deny any statements that have been made in this respect. However, I have been associated for a long time with the co-operative movement in Newfoundland, and I know the managing director who has written this letter. He is an official of the government of Newfoundland. I imagine he has picked out this startling piece of evidence.

Yesterday I called the Canadian Tire Corporation and asked them what the price of the battery was here. They said it was 84 cents. I asked them whether the price had gone up in the past year, and they said that it had gone up about 15 cents. Everything else is going up; why should not the price of batteries go up as well?

Mr. Fraser: That is taxes.

Mr. Hees: That is income taxes and sales taxes.

Mr. Abbott: It is long sessions of parliament, long speeches and high costs.

Mr. Fulton: Especially long budget speeches and overtaxation.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): The Minister of Justice described to us the difference between horizontal price fixing and vertical price fixing.

Mr. Abbott: What is the difference?

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): The difference is that one is illegal. Horizontal price fixing is between the manufacturers. We will say that the manufacturers of flour agree between themselves to keep the price at a certain level. This is contrary to the Combines Investigation Act. As the commissioner pointed out, these manufacturers had committed an offence. Because there was a disagreement between the government and the wartime prices and trade board, these men were not prosecuted for a breach of the Combines Investigation Act. I hope the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) understands that.

Mr. Hees: You fellows remember that.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Unfortunately this report was concealed by the government for over twelve months and it was too late to prosecute the offenders. This report was overlooked by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) who is so deeply concerned about the independent retailer today, and especially about that homogeneous person, the consumer. Vertical price fixing, which as I say is quite a legitimate thing, is something which takes place between the manufacturer and the retailer. I submit, and I suggest to the Minister of Justice, that vertical price fixing is a legitimate and a natural development which has been going on ever since there was any trade. If the government is going to interfere with that, I point out that they are doing something that may have startling effects.

Mr. Abbott: Are you sure?

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Yes, I feel sure that it will have serious effects upon our economy. The government intends to prohibit resale price maintenance. It intends to prohibit any arrangement between a manufacturer and a retailer as to the price at which the manufacturer's products shall be sold. This leaves the door open to the loss leader practice. The loss leader practice is an abuse of trade, and it would have been far better if the Minister of Justice had asked the MacQuarrie committee to advise the government as to what they should do about this loss leader practice rather than about resale price maintenance.

An hon. Member: What is a loss leader?

An hon. Member: A leader of the opposition.

Mr. Riley: How many have they lost?

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Now, Mr. Speaker, if resale price maintenance is abolished, as the government intends to do, we shall come back to the question of the Forsyth shirt. Tomorrow or the next day, perhaps in the January sales that have been mentioned, the big departmental stores will advertise Forsyth shirts which formerly cost $5 for $3.98 or $2.98. All the members of the Liberal party can flock in and get their shirts $1.20 or so cheaper than before. The effect will be that the retailer who was doing a legitimate business will not be able to sell any more shirts of that type. I have only mentioned one article. If the practice is as widespread as the Minister of Justice wishes the house to believe, then that performance could be repeated in all the other different lines, and in all the different commodities in the drug business, as well as the hardware business.

Mr. Abbott: Give the next speaker a chance. He is waiting behind the curtain.

Mr. Fulton: If you would give this speaker a chance, he could finish his speech.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): When you consider the number of commodities that we have been told are affected by this resale price maintenance we can easily imagine that there are going to be chaotic conditions in trade as soon as this bill passes. We shall see a repetition of what we heard was happening down in New York when stores were advised that they could sell below the prices agreed upon. Then we had this panic buying in Macy's and other places.

An hon. Member: You are absolutely wrong.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Perhaps the hon. member who interrupted will explain where I am wrong. I am stating what I understand to be correct, and if I am wrong I am open to correction. I shall be only too grateful to the hon. member if he will correct me, because I am sure no member in this house wants to be left in the position of not stating what is right. If such a situation should occur in the city of Montreal or Toronto, is it not going to have a serious effect upon the small retailer who has been selling articles at resale price-maintained prices? I say it is going to have serious effects. No one can tell, not even our wise Minister of Finance who predicted a $20 million—

Mr. Abbott: No, $30 million.

Mr. Fraser: What is $10 million to you?

Mr. Riley: You did not read his budget speech.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Fulton: I wish the minister would always be as concerned about $10 million.

Mr. Abbott: Don't take so long to think those up. They are better when they are spontaneous.

Some hon. Members: Time.

Mr. Speaker: I must inform the hon. member that his time has expired.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): May I make one statement?

Some hon. Members: No, time.

Mr. Abbott: Let him finish.

Mr. Speaker: I gave one of the other members two minutes.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): The Minister of Justice read a letter from an official of the British drug trade. He apologized that the letter was a little bit out of date. It was dated 1937; it is only fourteen years out of date. They must have done a great deal of research to look up that letter of 1937 in which the writer said that in England the number of outlets for proprietary medicines and drugs was increasing by about 8,000 to 9,000 a year. They suggested there should be some limitation upon those who sell these proprietary medicines, and that there should be an agreement with the manufacturers for the chemists of England, as they are called, to sell them.

Some hon. Members: Time.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): The Minister of Justice then turned to us and said: Do we want that practice here? I say yes, Mr. Speaker. I think it would be a good practice that chemists or druggists only should be allowed to sell drugs and not the grocery store, the hardware store, the five and ten cent store, the chain store and all the other kinds of stores. Only drug stores should be allowed to sell drugs and medicines.

Mr. Herridge: I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. The hon. member for St. John's West mentioned the fact that his fellow member from Newfoundland—I cannot at the moment remember the name of the constituency—yesterday afternoon said he was reading from the report of the royal commission on the cost of living in Newfoundland, 1950. The hon. member for St. John's questioned the word of the hon. member who spoke yesterday afternoon.

I want to tell the house that I have in my hand a copy of chapter 10 of the report of the royal commission on the cost of living in Newfoundland, 1950, which deals with several aspects of distribution costs studied by the commission: (a) prices and resale price maintenance; (b) credit and instalment buying; (c) commission agents. The hon. member who made the statement yesterday afternoon kindly handed me the document. This is the document he read from and he handed it to me before he left, for my information. The hon. member was quite correct when he said he was reading from the report of the royal commission.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, I am just as interested in this matter as is the hon. member who has just taken his seat. I have tried to the best of my ability to get this document. I have here a copy of the letter which I wrote—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

An hon. Member: Withdraw.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West):—on December 4 to the managing director, Newfoundland Co-operative Union, St. John's Newfoundland, in part as follows:

> I have not seen the report of the royal commission on the cost of living. It is not in the library here. I wonder if you would be good enough to send me a copy. I would suggest, too, that even if you cannot send me a copy you should send one to the library of parliament here where it would be available to all the members.

Can an hon. member do any more than that?

An hon. Member: Apologize.

An hon. Member: He said he has it.

Mr. Fleming: He has not it.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, in view of the lateness of the hour and the feeling of the members of the house I wonder if Your Honour would agree to call it ten o'clock.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): No.

Mr. Abbott: No. Go on for five minutes. It is a pleasure to hear you.

Mr. Knowles: It is only nine o'clock in Winnipeg.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, I was reviewing the course of this session and I noticed that on October 9, when we commenced, the speech from the throne mentioned the fact that legislation would be brought down based on this report of the MacQuarrie committee. On October 15 the Prime Minister, in his remarks to the house as reported at page 41 of Hansard, said:

> . . . I can say that as regards immediate additional measures to curb inflation, while others may develop, the only one we are prepared to submit at this time is the one that will arise out of this report of the combines committee with respect to resale prices.
> I do not think that is going to have a very substantial effect on the index of the cost of living . . .

Following that, and much later, the committee was appointed to review the MacQuarrie committee report. Then we had the report of that committee submitted to this house. Finally on Monday, December 17, the bill was brought to our attention; and at that time an endurance contest commenced.

An hon. Member: And it is still going on.

Mr. Churchill: Having made my railway reservations and cancelled them about three times, I have now lost interest in returning to Winnipeg for Christmas and I am prepared to stay here as long as is necessary.

I have followed with interest the work of the committee of the house on combines legislation. I was named to that committee but was unable to attend it due to already having been named a member of the committee to investigate the railway situation. I therefore had to withdraw from this committee on combines legislation.

Mr. Fulton: And it was a great loss to the committee.

Mr. Churchill: I have, however, been able to read some of the evidence adduced at the meetings of that committee, and I have considered the matter of sufficient importance for me to take part at this time in the debate that is now in progress.

An hon. Member: Ten o'clock.

Mr. Abbott: One minute to ten.

Mr. Churchill: I think everything points to the fact that there is a serious weakness in this legislation. We had presented to this house earlier in this session some pieces of legislation which might be termed good.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Hees: But not the Public Works Act amendment.

An hon. Member: Ten o'clock.

Mr. Churchill: I move the adjournment of the debate.

On motion of Mr. Churchill the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Graydon: Before you leave the chair, Mr. Speaker, I take it that the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier) is going to announce the business program for tomorrow.

Mr. Rinfret: You ought to know.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I thought of consulting my hon. friend. We can go ahead with this bill tomorrow and any other legislation.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to the order of the house passed on November 2, 1951.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, December 20, 1951

The house met at eleven o'clock.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

MOTION TO SIT THIS DAY WITHOUT INTERMISSION OR ADJOURNMENT AT TEN O'CLOCK

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, under the heading of motions, by virtue of standing order 15 and citation 132 of Beauchesne's second edition, and on the basis also of standing order 45, I wish to move, seconded by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low):

That this day's sitting of the house continue without the usual intermission at one o'clock p.m. and at 6.15 o'clock p.m., and that the house shall not be adjourned at ten o'clock p.m. this day.

The purpose of this motion is to—

Mr. Drew: The purpose is clear.

Mr. Fraser: To allow Stanley Knowles to get home for Christmas.

Mr. Knowles: —provide an opportunity for members of the house, who feel that they have the right to be home with their families on Christmas day, to vote on the contentious issue that is now before parliament.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion? This motion is debatable.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Drew: I would simply commend the rather remarkable spirit of co-operation demonstrated by the C.C.F. with their friends across the house.

Mr. Chevrier: You are just driving them over here.

Mr. Coldwell: I rise to a point of order. I think the remark of the leader of the opposition was most uncalled-for. The motion does not signify anything of the sort. It simply signifies that we wish to go on with the business of the house and conclude it in order that everybody connected with the house, not only the members, may have an opportunity to enjoy Christmas.

Mr. St. Laurent: I think the leader of the opposition understood you to say, Mr. Speaker, that this motion was not debatable.

Mr. Speaker: No.

Mr. Fraser: It is debatable.

Mr. St. Laurent: I thought the leader of the opposition had understood that Mr. Speaker had said the motion was not debatable.

Mr. Drew: I did not say anything about it.

Mr. Speaker: I ruled that the motion is debatable, and the hon. member for Eglinton rose.

Mr. Drew: The Prime Minister misunderstood me. I made no comment about its being debatable.

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): I wish to say a brief word about this motion. In the first place it is rather amazing to have this particular type of motion coming from my hon. friend to the left, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), because every time that the question has arisen at the end of a session about carrying on without an intermission for lunch or dinner it has been the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre who has risen and pleaded the cause of the staff of the house.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): And the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell).

Mr. Fleming: And the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar. They have pointed out, and I think with reason and justice, that to expect the staff of the house to carry on without an intermission for lunch and dinner, or even to shorten the present two-hour intermissions, is very unfair to them. But consider what this motion proposes. It would eliminate the luncheon adjournment. It proposes to eliminate the dinner adjournment and to carry on indefinitely thereafter. I take it if the motion carries the house will not adjourn tonight without unanimous consent.

Mr. Abbott: Or tomorrow.

Mr. Fleming: Therefore what the motion involves is that the government with its big majority can have its members sit here in relays today while the staff of the house is worn to a frazzle; and the parties in the opposition, because their numbers are not so ample as those of this overgrown government majority, will not have the same opportunity of spreading out their forces to carry on a marathon session. This is in effect an attempt at applying closure.

Every hon. member of this house, if he faces up to the question, recognizes that we all would like to be home for Christmas. If members are not permitted to be home for Christmas, as they should be, the responsibility will lie with the government. That responsibility lies with the government because, in the first place, they have not arranged the business of the house with any regard for dispatch or the commitments of hon. members of the house or their family obligations and, in the second place, because they are trying to wield a big club over the heads of members with a view to jamming through the house something that ought to have proper consideration, and which cannot be given proper consideration unless many members are to forgo the opportunity of being at home with their families at Christmas.

The motion introduced by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) simply plays into the hands of the government—whether by design or not, only he knows. The fact of the matter is that nothing could better suit the purpose of the government than this motion which has been introduced by the C.C.F. whip and which undoubtedly is an attempt at applying closure in the house. If there is to be closure, let the government have the courage to try to apply it. That is a challenge to them!

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to debate this motion, but I do intend when the house is in session tomorrow, if the business has not been concluded, to give notice under the closure rule that it will be applied on Thursday, December 27.

As to this motion, I have no views about it. It is a matter which the house should decide on a free vote according to the views of each individual member. Personally I shall abstain from voting upon the motion.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. Drew: No. Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Coldwell: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. The leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) has spoken already.

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a word on this. If I understand the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) correctly, we are now facing closure when we come back on the 27th. Therefore, what the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) has said was a true prophecy as to what we are facing. That is a responsibility which the government can assume if they wish, but I do want to say that I was amazed beyond words at the origin of this present motion.

In addition to all that the hon. member for Eglinton has so truly said about the attitude taken in the past by the member who proposed this motion and the leader of the C.C.F. (Mr. Coldwell), I should like to point out that, if my memory does not entirely deceive me, they have taken the position that this was the worst and most tyrannical thing that could be done by a large majority, making it almost impossible for an opposition whose members are not as large as intelligent electors one day will make them, making it almost impossible for an opposition working under the difficulty of continuous sittings to do its proper work.

However, it is always possible for people to change their minds. I only wish to indicate my astonishment that those who have so well argued the other position could now so entirely change their views. It is not exactly convenient for me. I have to spend Christmas in Edmonton and as far as I can see I am going to have to walk there.

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I have some doubt whether under standing orders this motion is in order, but I leave that to Your Honour. I do not think it is myself. I do not think it can be described as being of a purely formal nature. I am inclined to think that under standing order 45 it is of a nature which would require at least some notice. I raise that point at the moment simply to leave it with Your Honour.

Questionable as I think the motion is with respect to its effect upon the proceedings and with respect to its propriety, it has served a most useful purpose already. It has made it very clear, abundantly clear, that it is the government's intention to ram through this legislation regardless of its merits and without permitting it that adequate discussion which legislation of this kind merits. This legislation at its very minimum affects directly at least 700,000 people in Canada, close to one million people, and it is to be rammed through the house after no more than five and a half days' discussion. On Monday we had the opportunity to debate it for rather less than half a day; then there was Tuesday, Wednesday and there will be Thursday and Friday. We now have notice that on Thursday, December 27, closure will be applied by the government.

Nothing could indicate more clearly the reluctance of the government to have the merits of this measure examined. Nothing could indicate more clearly its intention to assert the powers of a vast majority to force through legislation without an opportunity, so essential to the people of Canada, of examining the merits or demerits of the proposed measure.

We have seen in the motion appearing on the order paper under the name of the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), to which he has made reference already this morning, evidence of the fact that the government intends to hold a club over the heads of the opposition, over the head of anyone who might desire to speak on this legislation. I can only say that while we resented it, while we thought it was unfortunate, we were prepared to accept the necessity which was being imposed upon us by the government of sitting here today, on Friday, which meant that many hon. members would not be home for Christmas, and then coming back on Thursday, December 27. That means that hon. members from the more distant parts of Canada may not be able to be home for Christmas at all if they wish to be here on the 27th. We accepted that necessity, but I feel bound to say that I regard it as un-Christian.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I do not think the hon. member is now discussing the motion which is before the house at the present time.

Mr. Fulton: The Prime Minister has already referred to this other matter in the course of this debate for the purpose of indicating yet another threat, that of closure on the 27th. It seems to me that the Prime Minister's remarks make it essential to consider the two motions together. I am simply discussing the opportunities that are available to the house to debate this legislation. That question was most definitely raised by the motion now before the house. It becomes evident that the government, having done their best to throttle, and having succeeded in part in throttling, discussion in the committee, is now determined to throttle discussion in this house. The government has the majority. They control the procedure and if they determine to apply closure, while we might regret it, while it is our duty to point out to the people of Canada—

Mr. Speaker: I do not think the hon. member should discuss closure at this time.

Mr. Abbott: I do not think he ought to repeat his speech either.

Mr. Fulton: If you so rule, I can only point out—

Mr. Drew: I think the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) has put enough silly remarks on the record without continuing today.

Mr. Fulton: I can only say that I think it regrettable that the Prime Minister should have been allowed to intervene in the debate and utter the threat of closure, which must now be to the forefront of our minds in considering this whole question. If we are to be allowed the opportunity of replying—

Mr. Speaker: I felt that I gave the hon. member ample opportunity to reply to the few remarks that were made regarding closure. I want to be fair with him. I am doing my best to be fair. What I am bringing to his attention is that the motion before the house at the present time is the one moved by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

Mr. Fulton: Then, relating strictly, Your Honour, to the motion moved by the member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), I would point out that the effect of that motion is to thwart effective discussion, and to do so almost as effectively as the motion referred to by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent). I would now deal with the motion of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre on that basis. The point that is well known to the member for Winnipeg North Centre is that the opposition party, those who are left here as the member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) has pointed out, is limited in numbers. A motion of this sort to compel the continuation of discussion all day without a break simply places the opposition party at a disadvantage with respect to the government party, and it multiplies the disadvantage which this party already experiences as a result of that disparity in numbers.

I have simply this to say. While our efforts are aimed at discussing the merits of this legislation to bring out in full the disadvantages which will accrue to the consumers of Canada, if the government is going to join with the member for Winnipeg North Centre and the member for Peace River (Mr. Low) in thwarting discussion of this question, we have no alternative but to accept the inevitable. It is quite nonsensical for the Prime Minister at this stage, after there has already been this conclusive evidence of collusion between the government, the C.C.F. and the Social Credit party in this regard—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. There has been no collusion so far as this motion is concerned. It is my own idea.

Mr. Fleming: Shame.

Mr. Fulton: I say it is quite nonsensical for the Prime Minister to say, after the evidence we have had of the degree of co-operation that exists between the government, the C.C.F. and the Social Credit on this motion, that there may be a free vote of the house. Such a proposition simply begs common sense. However, the situation being as it is, we must accept it, since the C.C.F. and the Social Credit are now combining with the government majority to force this legislation through without adequate discussion.

I do ask the member for Winnipeg North Centre to bear in mind that in the future he can hardly expect that his plaintive cries with respect to the way the government majority abuses its powers and privileges will be received with any sympathy, in view of the fact that he has, by virtue of this arrangement which has all the appearance of being preconcerted with them, given them this splendid opportunity to abuse their powers in a way that the government has never done before in this house.

Mr. Knowles: May I just say a word on the point of order raised by the member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) during his remarks. I shall not reply further to the substance of his remarks. I have already denied categorically the charge he made, and that settles that. But he raised a question as to whether or not this motion was covered by standing order 45. May I draw to Your Honour's attention citation 65 of Beauchesne's third edition, which says:

> When the house intends to sit later than eleven o'clock, a motion may be made during the sitting, and without notice having been previously given, "that the house do not adjourn at eleven o'clock today." The reason why no notice is required is that standing order 45 which provides for notices to be given says that the rules shall not apply "to the times of meeting or adjournment of the house."

My motion includes not only sitting beyond the usual hour of adjournment, which is covered quite clearly by the citation I have just read, but it also includes sitting during the intermissions otherwise provided. On that point, may I draw Your Honour's attention, and the attention of the member for Kamloops as well as all members of his party, to page 1402 of Hansard, March 11, 1949. On that occasion we were in the midst of the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne. At the usual hour for supply the member for Springfield (Mr. Sinnott) had just finished speaking and the member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch) was seeking to get the floor so as to speak when the house resumed at 7.30 p.m. From page 1402 I read:

> Mr. Drew: Before we rise, Mr. Speaker, with the consent of the house I would move that we sit through the dinner hour, in view of the fact that the debate is to terminate this evening by reason of the motion of the government. That will make it possible for the debate definitely to conclude this evening.
> Mr. Howe: I would second the motion.
> Mr. Quelch: I move the adjournment of the debate.

[Mr. Fulton.]

> Mr. Speaker: Order. It is moved by Mr. Drew, seconded by Mr. Howe, that notwithstanding standing order No. 6, Mr. Speaker do not leave the chair at six o'clock, but that the debate be continued.

Now I ask all hon. members to note the person who wondered whether that procedure was in order.

Mr. Casselman: He used the words "with consent".

Mr. Knowles: The member for Grenville-Dundas (Mr. Casselman) is entering this argument, but he is on the record, too. The person who expressed amazement at that being in order was the member for Winnipeg North Centre. Hansard reads:

> Mr. Knowles: Does it not require unanimous consent for a motion of this kind to be made without notice?
> Mr. Casselman: He got consent.
> Mr. Knowles: Oh, no.

The next notation on Hansard records Mr. Speaker speaking to the point of order that I raised.

> Mr. Speaker: According to standing order 45 notice is not necessary for this motion. Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

So I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the position is quite clear. I have given the house a precedent involving no less a person than the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) himself for the present motion. I submit, therefore, the motion is in order on the basis of standing order 45.

Mr. Speaker: I thought probably I should dispose of the question of whether or not the motion is in order.

Mr. Fulton: May I say a word on that point before you rule? I accept the record of Hansard as read by the member for Winnipeg North Centre. I want to point out here that the motion referred only to sitting through meal hours, whereas—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Fulton: I do not know why hon. members opposite should find a simple statement of fact so amusing. They are easily amused so I suppose one must accept the idle laughter which occurs. May I point out to Your Honour that the motion before the house in 1949 concerned continuing the sitting during one meal hour and one meal hour only, whereas the motion now before the house would compel us to sit through meal hours as well as dispensing with the usual hour of adjournment tonight. In that case, I think I should ask Your Honour to consider the whole of standing order 45, together with the citations in Beauchesne's second edition referring thereto. Standing order 45 says:

> Forty-eight hours' notice shall be given of a motion for leave to present a bill, a resolution or address, for the appointment of any committee, or for placing a question on the order paper, but this rule shall not apply to bills after their introduction, or to private bills, or to the times of meeting or adjournment of the house.

Mr. Knowles: There it is.

Mr. Fulton: There is one citation in which this rule has been applied, as follows. Citation 357 reads:

As a general rule every motion proposed in the house requires notice unless it is of a formal or uncontentious character, or raises a question of privilege.

This motion could hardly be called purely formal, still less of an uncontentious character. This goes far beyond the other motion to which reference has been made. It provides for a continuous sitting during both meal hours and dispenses with the hour for adjournment. It goes on in citation 358:

Motions applying to the business or arrangements of the house as a rule require notice,—

Certainly this motion applies to the business or arrangements of the house in a most unusual manner. It completely upsets all the arrangements which have been made for the business of the house as they were to apply today. It goes on to say:

—but some are of such a purely formal nature that by general consent notice is not insisted upon.

The words themselves, Mr. Speaker, show the distinction between the type of motion for which notice is not required and the type of motion that we have before us for which, I submit, notice is required; because the citations make it clear that those for which notice is not required are those of a purely formal nature where, by general consent, notice is not insisted upon. In view of the citations which, I suggest, make it clear that the precedents in the past applying this rule have laid it down that only those which are of such a general, uncomplicated, slight or trifling nature that, by consent, notice may be dispensed with, can be proceeded with without notice having been given, but that this motion, which is of a highly contentious nature, and which completely disrupts and reverses the whole business of the house as outlined for the day, is of such a nature that notice must be given.

Mr. Speaker: On the question of order, may I say that I have listened to what has been said. As has been pointed out, other motions have been made in this house respecting the hours or times of sitting without previous notice having been given. In Beauchesne's second edition in citation 34, I observe the following:

No notice is required for a motion relating to "the times of meeting or adjournment of the house." (S.O. 45)

Standing order 45 has been referred to by a number of members. The citation goes on to say:

The word "times" is translated by "heures" in the French version of S.O. 45. It seems therefore that if a motion does not relate to the hour but to the day at which the house is to sit or adjourn, a notice must be given.

The motion before the house does not refer to a day. It relates to the hour.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, without interrupting you, may I make a comment on that point which you have raised?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Drew: I would point out, Mr. Speaker, that you have touched on the very point that is in issue on this motion. It is quite clear that if this motion goes through the house will not adjourn. For that reason I submit, on the very point you made, Mr. Speaker, this motion is not tenable under the reference which has been given.

Mr. Speaker: If the motion referred to days, I would agree with the leader of the opposition that it would not be in order. May I read the motion.

That this day's sitting of the house continue without the usual intermission at one o'clock p.m. and at 6.15 o'clock p.m., and that the house shall not be adjourned at ten o'clock p.m. this day.

It distinctly says that this motion refers to this day only. I am satisfied that this motion refers to time and not to days. Citation 34 in Beauchesne's second edition goes on to say:

See decision given by Speaker Rhodes on May 21, 1920.

I have sent for Hansard of that day and it has just arrived. The reference reads as follows:

Rt. Hon. Sir Robert Borden (Prime Minister): I beg to move the motion of which I gave notice yesterday:

"That when this house adjourns on Friday, the 21st instant, it do stand adjourned until Tuesday, the 25th instant."

Mr. Speaker: I must point out, as I did yesterday, that this motion requires two days' notice and only one day's notice has been given. It can therefore only be entertained by unanimous consent.

Sir Robert Borden: I do not know whether it is applicable or not, but my attention has been directed to the language of rule 40 which says that the rule requiring notice shall not apply to the times of meeting or adjournment of the house.

Mr. Speaker: I think the interpretation which has been given to the section under that rule is that it refers to the hour for meeting because in the French edition "heure" is used. That being so, as at present advised, I am still of the opinion that two days' notice would be required to be given.

I would agree with the decision given by Mr. Speaker Rhodes, and that if this motion referred to days it would not be in order. But as it refers to time, I would rule that the motion is in order.

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Fleming: May I ask a question of you, Mr. Speaker? It is somewhat difficult to follow the purport of that motion without having the text of it before us—

Some hon. Members: Order.

An hon. Member: The ruling has been made.

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. member wishes to ask a brief question, I will hear him.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Speaker, do you construe that motion as requiring that the house adjourn at midnight tonight or that the house will continue to sit through the night?

Mr. Speaker: Notice not having been given I would not construe this motion in such a way that it could interfere with tomorrow's sitting of the house. If debate continued until that time, I would adjourn the house in order that the sitting could be called for tomorrow at the hours prescribed by the rules.

Mr. Fleming: With respect, Mr. Speaker, may I say that what you have just said does not clear up the difficulty I am having as to the effect of the motion, without having the text of it before me. What happens at midnight tonight? Does the house, under the terms of that resolution, rise or is the session continuous until 11 o'clock tomorrow morning when tomorrow's session begins?

An hon. Member: Sure.

Mr. Speaker: I would think that the house could not continue to sit until tomorrow at 11 o'clock. I think I would have to adjourn it before 11 o'clock so that the house could commence another sitting. I could not allow this motion to interfere with the order calling for a sitting tomorrow.

Mr. Fleming: It is not my province to put questions to you, Mr. Speaker, let alone to question your ruling; but does not that have the effect of carrying this resolution to the point where it affects the days of sitting?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Fleming: If the motion is passed, it means that the house is not simply sitting today; the house will be sitting tomorrow from twelve o'clock midnight until eleven o'clock a.m. tomorrow.

Mr. Speaker: It might affect more than one calendar day but it does not interfere with the sitting days of this house.

Mr. Drew: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, I want to point out something that should be pointed out at this stage in order to correct the record. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) on an earlier occasion left the impression that, by my own request or by my own suggestion in this house, I supported the very principle he is putting forward. I am not in any way debating the decision that has been given, but I must confess my surprise that the hon. member, who prides himself on his correctness and his respect for the records of the house, should have sought to leave that impression, because this is what Hansard says at page 1402:

> Mr. Drew: Before we rise, Mr. Speaker, with the consent of the house, I would move that we sit through the dinner hour, in view of the fact that the debate is to terminate this evening by reason of the motion of the government. That will make it possible for the debate definitely to conclude this evening.

And on that occasion, as an evidence of the unusual measure of harmony which existed, the record says:

> Mr. Howe: I would second the motion.

Mr. McIlraith: Consent was refused.

Mr. Knowles: Consent was not given; I objected, and the record shows it.

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): I do not want to take very much time at this moment to discuss the motion before this house; I wish only to make it clear that I seconded the motion, and for a very good reason. In the first place, Mr. Speaker, let me say that there was no collusion whatever amongst the government, C.C.F., and Social Credit party on this. This suggestion was made to me; I thought it was a good one and I agreed to second it because I did think it had merit; that is all.

Mr. Fulton: What is the hon. member's definition of collusion?

Mr. Low: I know the hon. member for Kamloops must be very disappointed, and I sympathize with him—in his deep conviction he is likely to be a little intemperate. I can understand that. I have been in a similar position before. But I would just point out that I do not care what you call it, whether you call it collusion, conspiracy or what, the point is the suggestion was made, just as suggestions are often made in this house. I thought it was a good one, and I lent my support and seconded the motion. In that regard, let me say one other thing. I sympathize with any group in this house that has a deep conviction and desires to bring out the fullest possible measure of discussion in connection with any proposition put before hon. members. No matter what group it is, I think they should have ample opportunity for discussion. I have been in a position similar to that now occupied by the members of the Progressive Conservative party. I seem to recall that in 1945, when there were thirteen of us in this house, the Social Credit group put on a fairly strong battle against the Bretton Woods agreement in this house. We discussed it pro and con for several days. I remember, Mr. Speaker, there was a suggestion then that closure might be applied, but we did not let it go to the point where closure would be applied because we did not think that was wise. We brought before the house every argument we could; we did our level best to convince the members of the house, including the members of the Conservative party, that Bretton Woods was not in the best interests of Canada; that it should be defeated and not be allowed to pass. But after we saw that we had failed to convince the Progressive Conservative, the Liberal and the C.C.F. parties, and when it was suggested that perhaps closure ought to be applied, we thought then that in a democracy and in a parliament it was wise to let the matter come to a vote, to express our conviction by vote and then simply say to the government: "It is your responsibility. You have brought the matter in; you have failed to be convinced by our arguments, and from now on it is your baby and not ours." The same situation is true here, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: I interrupted the hon. member for Kamloops when he was discussing a possible motion for closure. I do not think I should give the hon. member for Peace River any further opportunity to discuss that motion.

Mr. Low: Thank you very much. I will simply confine myself to the motion before the house. Let me say this with respect to it. I think that ample discussion has been made possible on this bill now before us. I have no desire to close off anybody. As a matter of fact, my idea is to give those who wish to speak on this bill more opportunity to do so. May I point out that if this motion is carried hon. members—I am not going to mention any particular group—will have no less than thirty-two hours to discuss this bill. I would estimate that mathematically speaking there would be opportunity for at least forty 40-minute speeches. I am prepared to sit and listen to these forty speeches, and I will do so with an open mind. If they can convince me in the forty 40-minute speeches that it would be a good thing to vote against this bill, then I will vote against it. Therefore I say, Mr. Speaker, there would be greater opportunity for discussion on the bill if this motion passed, than otherwise.

The second reason that I suggest we pass the motion—I am thinking of two groups now—is this: I am thinking of the staff of this house. It is all right for the hon. member for Kamloops to laugh, but let us not forget that the members of the staff are anxious to have some Christmas holidays. I am not going to argue what the government should do or should not do. The government has taken a certain position at the moment. I am trying to put before you the reasons why I support this motion, Mr. Speaker. The members of the staff have a perfect right to at least a Christmas holiday, and I imagine that in order to get it they will be as prepared as I am to go straight through until the house rises sometime Friday evening, so that they will have an uninterrupted holiday. There are members of this house from the far west and from the far east who wish to get away in order to be home with their families at Christmas.

Mr. Cardiff: Nobody is stopping them.

Mr. Low: These people could not possibly get back here for the 27th—it is just impossible. I am thinking of them, too.

Mr. Fleming: Then why did the Prime Minister make such a motion?

Mr. Low: I have no axe to grind personally, because I live here, and I will be quite prepared to sit just as long as the house desires to sit in order to give full and fair consideration to everything that is before us; but in all fairness let me suggest this. There has been plenty of opportunity, and there will be plenty of opportunity, to discuss this bill. It is disappointing, I know, to people who have a deep conviction that it should not be passed, to find that they are not going to be able perhaps to carry on indefinitely and obstruct the passing of the bill. I appreciate that feeling, and I want the Progressive Conservatives to know that I appreciate it because I have been in their place on previous occasions. But the democratic thing to do when you fail to convince the house that your position is sound is to put it to a vote, vote against it, and your conscience is clear and the responsibility rests upon the government. That is why I am going to vote for the motion.

Mr. Fleming: Your last remarks will rise up some day to mock you. Mark my words!

Mr. G. C. Nowlan (Annapolis-Kings): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that everyone here has a very high appreciation of the qualities of the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low) and we are perfectly prepared to accept his statement—and of course the statement of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles)—that there was no collusion or anything of that kind in connection with this motion. I accept the statement unreservedly. But as the hon. member for Eglinton pointed out the day before yesterday, there is an amazing degree of mental telepathy which apparently functions in connection with these matters; and the cheers with which it was greeted on the other side of the house suggest—

Mr. Noseworthy: This is not the first time that you sided with the government.

Mr. Nowlan:—that there was someone on the government side dreaming of more than a white Christmas last evening.

I was particularly struck with the reference of the hon. member for Peace River to a debate which was carried on some years ago—I believe he said it was in 1945. In 1945, with thirteen members in the house, as I recall his statement, they debated a matter for three or four days. He pointed that out as an example of proper parliamentary tactics; but I would suggest that in this connection there are forty-six members in this group, and if the hon. member for Peace River feels that three days was at least not an exorbitant time for thirteen members to discuss a matter, this matter which is before the house at the present time—I do not refer to the motion, but the bill—has been discussed for less than three days.

Mr. Low: I point out to the hon. member that at the time we were discussing it we sat from three o'clock in the afternoon until six, and from eight to eleven.

Mr. Fleming: And no attempt was made to extend the night sitting, either.

Mr. Nowlan: I am simply suggesting that as an example used by the hon. member for Peace River himself, and that there would be at least, I think, a presumption that more time should be spent in the discussion of this subject than has been spent.

Mr. Low: That is what we are getting at.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Nowlan: The hon. member for Peace River has displayed a forensic style this session which many of us never recognized in him before. He has shown himself to have a humorous and classic style. One occasion in particular was when he suggested that the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) get his boys together, and then he went on to suggest that at bedtime he must sing "Where is my wandering boy tonight?"

Speeches such as that have shown him as a classic humorist, and I am sure his speeches will be recalled and read by the readers of Hansard generations hence. But when he refers to the fact, with a perfectly straight face—and if he ever played poker, I am sure he would have looked that way with a poor hand—that after all he was doing this for the benefit of the opposition, so that forty members might make 40-minute speeches, that, Mr. Speaker, was the height of his humour. No doubt he attained a dizzy eminence he will never forget, and never repeat. Because the hon. member, having had that experience—and I presume he was here then—must have realized the strain of those thirteen who talked for the three days.

But they were not facing such a monolithic monumental machine as we are facing today. The difficulty today is even greater. The hon. member has referred to the work required to be done by the staff at Christmastime. We all realize that the staff has to have Christmas. He referred to the difficulties of members. Well, the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton), who lives as far away from this house as anyone else, has expressed dissatisfaction with this amendment. And I might say that I live almost as far away in the other direction.

Those of us from the extreme parts of Canada want to see this matter debated. We want to see it debated reasonably, and we do not believe it can be done if this motion is adopted. It is true that there have been motions adopted before, as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) pointed out. But when you get the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) and the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) joining in a motion, then I suggest we see a degree of unanimity which is most unusual.

Nevertheless, although I have no doubt that this motion as submitted does not transgress the rules of the house, I do not think it is one which permits orderly debate. I do not think it is one which should be accepted by the house at the Christmas season. After all, some of us are looking forward to having a Christmas tree set up on the floor of the House of Commons on Christmas morning. We thought that our brilliant friend who spoke the night before last so ably (Mr. LaCroix) and the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) both had the dimensions requisite for the occasion. One might act as Santa Claus and the other as Santa Claus's assistant. But if we are going to have a motion like this, to spoil the Christmas spirit entirely, then I say we should not be asked to accept it.

Since this motion is debatable—and Your Honour has ruled it to be debatable—it is therefore amendable. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Hees):

That all the words after "That" be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

"the hours of sitting this day be from 11 o'clock a.m. to 1 p.m., from 2.30 to 6.30 p.m., and from 8 p.m. to 10 p.m.

An hon. Member: Those are the regular sitting hours.

Mr. Speaker: Mr. Nowlan has moved, seconded by Mr. Hees:

That all the words after the word "That" be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

"the hours of sitting this day be from 11 o'clock a.m. to 1 p.m., from 2.30 to 6.30 p.m. and from 8 p.m. to 10 p.m.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

An hon. Member: Now we know.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I am prepared on this occasion to wait indefinitely for the house to come to some semblance of order.

An hon. Member: The amendment is out of order.

An hon. Member: Easier to wait than to speak.

Mr. Speaker: Order, the leader of the opposition has the floor.

An hon. Member: Merry Christmas.

Mr. Drew: I propose to wait until there is order.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, the amendment now before the house is one which does extend the already unusually long sitting hours by another fifteen minutes, and it will also give an opportunity to place before the house views in regard to certain of the arguments which have been made, and which it seems to me should be in the minds of members who support this motion.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member may proceed.

Mr. Drew: I would not wish to deprive hon. members who are sitting in the house of the opportunity of hearing what is going to be said by myself or by others, because of the conferences which are being held behind the curtains outside the house. It is for that reason that, as a courtesy to the house, I propose to pause at any point where I feel that the members may not be able to hear what I have to say.

The motion before the house to which the present amendment has been moved is one which comes very strangely from the hon. member who made it and, may I say, from the party which in this case gives it its primary support. The secondary support, of course, is more important and more conspicuous. And it is more strange, because if there has been one party in the house, and if there has been one member in the house who has been insistent not only upon the observance of the ordinary practices but of other things, it has been the hon. member who has moved this motion. I would suggest that there is much more before the house than simply a motion to continue this day without interruption.

The Prime Minister made it quite clear why the government is supporting the motion. He made it quite clear also—

Mr. St. Laurent: I beg your pardon; I made it quite clear that the government was not supporting this motion, that the government was taking the position that members of the house should vote freely, according to each one's individual convictions, and that personally I would take no part in the vote upon the motion.

Mr. Drew: Then, in view of the Prime Minister's statement, let me put it this way, that we had a very clear indication of the way in which the Prime Minister wanted the house to vote on this, because he indicated quite clearly that, if as a result of a motion now on the order paper we should return next week, it was his intention to have on the order paper a closure motion which would dispose of any further effective debate of the matter now before us.

I would point out to hon. members who are seeking this indecent haste at this stage of the session that there are on the order paper a number of very important matters, in addition to the extremely important matter which is under consideration, or perhaps will be under consideration after the lunch hour. I would point out that we have on the order paper the orders that the house go into committee of supply and that the house go into committee of ways and means, which should not stand in the name of the Prime Minister but should stand in the name of the minister of make-believe because of course there is no intention of calling them, nor was there at the time they were put on the order paper. Then the next order of business is No. 3, the house in committee of the whole on Bill No. 15, an act to provide for privileges and immunities in respect of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. That stands in the name of the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I would think there is a great deal to be said about the North Atlantic Treaty Organization at this time, and particularly in view of the fact that the Secretary of State for External Affairs has returned recently from fairly extensive travels. It would provide an excellent opportunity for a full presentation to the house of the information he has gained and particularly any additional opinions he may have in regard to the subject matter of this debate. We have not yet had an opportunity for a discussion of these subjects or adequate comment by other members with respect to the very useful contribution the minister could make to debate on this subject at this time.

The next item on the order paper is the house in committee of the whole on Bill No. 23, an act to amend the Government Annuities Act. That is of course a very important matter, as has been indicated by the discussion that has already taken place and by the indication of the views of certain members with respect to what the bill should and should not contain. The measure affects many thousands of people in this country and is one which I feel sure hon. members will wish to have fully and adequately discussed.

The next item is resuming the adjourned debate on a motion of the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier) for the second reading of Bill No. 26, an act to amend the Public Works Act. A very useful debate took place on that bill when it was before the house a few days ago. If the members of the Conservative party in this house express some hope that the government is open to conviction on another measure that will be discussed after we proceed to orders of the day, it is because of the fact that extended debate did persuade the Minister of Public Works that it was wise to pay some attention to the argument put forward, and he therefore indicated that he proposed to make an amendment which would to some extent meet the views that had been expressed. We have not yet been informed as to what the amendment is so that it is impossible for us to express an opinion in advance. If it should be that the amendment was not in accordance with the views that have been expressed by the opposition then we would most certainly wish adequate time to debate a measure that has such far-reaching conclusions and would depart so greatly from that principle which the minister, in his usual genial manner, said that he wished to reassert before the house.

Mr. Knowles: I rise to a point of order. Surely the law of relevancy applies in this debate. Is it in order for the leader of the opposition, speaking to the amendment of the hon. member for Annapolis-Kings to my motion, to discuss all the other items on the order paper?

Mr. Fraser: Surely.

Mr. Knowles: I am asking the Speaker and not the hon. member for Peterborough West. Does the law of relevancy not apply to this debate?

Mr. Drew: If I might answer that, I would point out that I am seeking simply in the briefest manner possible to—

Mr. McIlraith: Seeking to take time.

Mr. Drew: —indicate to hon. members the significance of the items on the order paper and what we are still called upon to discuss and should be prepared to discuss in an orderly manner, subjects which go beyond the bill that is mainly in the minds of hon. members who have already spoken. I submit that unless I do so I am unable to emphasize how important it is that we should not accept a device which would in this way curtail the adequate discussion of other measures even if some hon. members may feel that we should rush through the bill which will be first on the orders of the day when we come to that point. I was referring to the act to amend the Public Works Act, and I think I have indicated—

Mr. McIlraith: You were debating it.

Mr. Drew: —that some persons have a considerable interest—

Mr. Robinson: What about a ruling on the point of order?

Mr. Drew: Of course I observe the Speaker's rulings at all times, but as the Speaker has not risen to make any ruling on the subject I am continuing my remarks. The next item—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) did raise a point of order and probably I should refer to it. He is correct when he says that the debate at this time must be relevant to the amendment before the house. I would ask hon. members so to direct their remarks that they are relevant to the amendment now before the house.

Mr. Drew: Yes, Mr. Speaker, that was exactly what I was seeking to do. There are only two more items, but I would suggest that hon. members recognize how important they are. The next one is resuming the adjourned debate on the motion of the Minister of Justice for the second reading of Bill No. 36, an act to amend the Combines Investigation Act, and on the proposed amendment thereto. That, as is known to all members, will be the first item called after we pass to orders of the day. Then the next item is a resolution standing in the name of the Minister of Agriculture that it is expedient to bring in a measure to amend the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, 1939, to exclude certain areas of land from the provisions of section 1 of chapter 47 of the statutes of 1950 and thus render such areas eligible for assistance. The motion now before us, to which an amendment has been moved, is one which would obviously carry the debate forward on Bill No. 36, but the last item to which I have referred is a subject which is still simply in the form of a motion. The bill is not even formally before the house. Therefore we must have due regard as to whether all the ordinary rules with respect to the availability of legislation and the procedure on legislation should be disregarded. I have mentioned these items on the order paper, to say nothing of other matters that are on here to which I do not intend to refer—

Mr. Sinnott: Mention the questions too.

Mr. Drew: Yesterday I thought the hon. member who has just interjected was acting as parliamentary assistant to the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance, but now he apparently has constituted himself in a new role as parliamentary assistant to the Speaker.

Mr. McIlraith: He gets your goat every time.

An hon. Member: Three-job John.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): We did not introduce this subject.

Mr. Drew: I suggest to any hon. members who indicate impatience on this subject that we did not introduce this motion—

Mr. McIlraith: Just the amendment.

Mr. Drew: —and that it really is the choice of other members that this subject is now under discussion. If the mover of the motion seeks the consent of the house for its withdrawal, of course the discussion will end immediately.

An hon. Member: You are now speaking on the amendment to the motion.

Mr. Sinnott: I do not think he knows what he is speaking on.

Mr. Drew: I do not intend to speak unless hon. members who remain in the house observe some measure of order. This is one occasion when I have quite clearly indicated that I am not going to interrupt hon. members who are interrupting me. That is the only reason that I pause on these occasions.

I come now to some of the remarks that have been made in support of the motion to which there is now an amendment. The leader of the Social Credit party referred to the desire that he had that there should be adequate Christmas holidays for the members of the staff. I assure the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low) that there is no member of this house, so far as I know, who is not anxious to assure adequate holidays for the members of the staff. But may I remind him that if there is any question raised about adequate holidays for the staff there is only one place where the responsibility for that situation rests, and that is with the government and completely with the government.

After all, why are we confronted with the necessity for this debate to crowd through important business during a period when no adequate supervision can be given? Why this indecent haste at this time? Of course, we accept the statement of the hon. member who has moved the motion that there was no previous discussion but that it just happened to be a meeting of minds that we saw so spontaneously displayed this morning. Even accepting that, may I point out that the reason there is this problem before this house at the moment is that we met in October to deal with certain matters that could have been most properly and most expeditiously dealt with if we had simply continued the session that was then under way, as we requested at that time. If that had been done there would have been no necessity for a new speech from the throne. We have seen evidence in the conduct of the government that there was no necessity.

We have seen the speech from the throne. It was nothing more than an agenda which was placed before this house and which could have been placed before the house without those formalities. What it did was to provide the opportunity for an extended debate which carried this session forward to the point where we are now within a few days of Christmas. This government must accept full responsibility. I am sure there has never been since 1867 a session of this parliament when there was so little planning of the business of the house, when there was so little apparent attempt to make use of the committees in the house in a way that would produce results. We had committee after committee held back until it was so late that it was impossible to perform the task for which it was appointed. For instance, we had the example of the committee on defence expenditures—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Probably the hon. member is getting a little beyond the amendment.

Mr. Drew: I was trying to reassure the hon. member for Peace River that if he is so concerned about the Christmas holidays it would be advisable to indicate to the government that there is a way in which all these things can be dealt with in an orderly manner and that is to recognize the importance of what we now have on the order paper and to seek to persuade the government to adjourn this session and to come back with adequate time to deal with the business before us.

I suggest that this motion, to which an amendment has now been moved, goes far beyond any question of simply seeking to expedite the debate on Bill No. 36. This motion was placed in its true perspective when the Prime Minister indicated that in addition to the, shall we say, veiled threat contained in the notice of motion, if we did not terminate all discussion by tomorrow night we would follow the unusual practice of interfering with the holidays of the staff to whom the hon. member for Peace River has referred by coming back here on the 27th.

Then just to buttress the thing, just to remove any doubt that the notice of motion was intended as a club, a legitimate club of course, if the government seeks to use it, the Prime Minister pointed out this morning that there would be a notice of closure on the order paper if we did follow this unusual procedure of coming back next week. The members of the party which I have the honour to lead are quite prepared to come back whenever it is decided by this house that they should come back. We are quite prepared to do the business of the house.

We have been asking the government for a long time to place the business of this house before the members so that we would have adequate opportunity to discuss this extremely important measure and others. If there is any doubt about adequate Christmas holidays, those doubts have been raised by the fact that Bill No. 36 along with the others has been held back so that under pressure of the Christmas holidays hon. members might be persuaded to restrict their remarks on a subject which otherwise they would have regarded as being a matter of very considerable importance and calling for extensive debate.

If hon. members of this house submit to the double threat, first, that they follow the unusual course of coming back between Christmas and New Year's when orderly business would suggest an adjournment until a later date, and, second, of closure if we do not submit to the government's first threat, then I suggest that this house surrender its authority to the government and cease to avail itself of the rights under the rules of assuring that there will be adequate time for discussion of public business in this house.

If this motion goes through it will be more than a motion with respect to the business of today. It is an acceptance by every member who votes for the motion of the proposition that if the government does not want any subject adequately debated it will be only necessary for it to carry on business in a sufficiently disorderly way up to the closing days of a session so that members under the natural pressure of a desire to get home for customary holidays will submit to threats such as are placed before us and will regard their own convenience—I repeat, will regard their own convenience—as being above the business of this country.

After all, why is the press gallery at the end of this chamber? That press gallery is at the end of this chamber for a reason that is of importance to every Canadian and everyone who believes in democracy.

An hon. Member: That is what you are playing up to.

Mr. Drew: That press gallery is an integral part of this house.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Sinnott: There will be headlines tonight.

Mr. Drew: The press gallery is an integral part of this house for the purpose of making available to the people of Canada information about the debates which take place in this house. There is a limit beyond which the press gallery and the newspapers of this country cannot go in adequately informing the people of this country about their own business. If, through the device of continuous sittings, we crowd so much business together, there will not be adequate space under any circumstances for even a most condensed account of what the government may put forward as reasons for the legislation they are asking the members to support. After all, Mr. Speaker, I think that, no matter to what party we may belong, every member of this house should do everything within his power to make sure that the views of the government concerning the legislation which is put before us for consideration shall be adequately and effectively reported, within the normal limits of the press space available, and within the availability of the wire space of the members of the press gallery who must send their messages throughout the whole country. I have noticed, Mr. Speaker, that in the discussions that have already taken place there has been reference to the word "obstruction", and that it has been suggested the members of this party are obstructing the business of the house.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I do not think that has come up during the debate on this motion.

Mr. Drew: I shall be very happy to send Your Honour a copy of Hansard which will indicate that the word was used. I took it down at the time it was used. In any event, I can dispose of it because I would simply point out that the discussion of this motion, and the amendment that has been moved to it, is something that relates to the fundamental question of whether we are going to insist upon an orderly method of conducting the business of the house, or whether we are going to see the same pattern repeated year after year. At the end of each session we have seen the necessity for motions to crowd the work in the closing days. It is utterly impossible to avoid the conclusion that this is done for the deliberate purpose of preventing adequate discussion of extremely important matters. There is one way, and one way only, of making sure that no such impression can be conveyed to the people of this country, and that is for the government to indicate that it will adjourn until a date in January when the business of this house that is still before us can be adequately discussed.

It would be a reflection on the sense of responsibility of this house if, with the important measures that are still on the order paper, we hastened through these matters now, abrogating the ordinary rules in regard to the time at which the various stages shall be dealt with, and also avoiding the possibility of any adequate consideration being given to them. I would strongly urge the member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) to reconsider the motion he has placed before this house, and to recognize he is establishing a precedent. He is also establishing as acceptable practice the delaying of business until the closing days, and the willingness of members to deny themselves any opportunity for orderly and regular debate, and submitting to the government demand that we carry forward the business without further consideration.

I have taken the time I have to discuss this motion, Mr. Speaker, because I think that the amendment is an amendment which only slightly extends the time for debate, I admit, but nevertheless if the amendment is accepted then it will be an assertion by this house that, while we are willing to sit somewhat longer we are not willing to completely abandon the opportunity that members should have to be in the chamber while any important business is under discussion. I can only repeat my expression of surprise that the member for Winnipeg North Centre should seek to deny to any member the opportunity that he should have to be here continuously if he so desires, at a time when extremely important measures are under consideration. It is not enough to say that there will be different shifts moving back and forward between the dining room and this chamber to an extent that will maintain a quorum; that is not enough. It may be that those who are called upon to take the meal shift might want to hear something that is being said at that particular time. The ordinary rules of this house are designed to assure that an opportunity of that kind will, at all times, be presented.

In this house we have never accepted as a regular practice the idea of continuous sittings, for the quite sound reason that where important measures are before this house no member should find it necessary to miss some discussion which he regards as of importance simply to meet the ordinary demands of sustenance. I strongly urge the members to support the amendment that has been put forward, and I would urge those of the party presenting this motion to support that amendment to preserve the principle that we are not going to be hurried into a consideration of public business simply because the government held back the business until these late days. We could do exactly what we have done before, adjourn until January and then when we meet in January deal with these things in an orderly way when there will be no suggestion that anyone is accusing the other of obstructing or delaying the work. I assure you, Mr. Speaker, that the debate would be much shorter if we met in January when there would be no threat being held over the members of this house, because I have no hesitation in saying that it is in recognition of those threats that I have taken as long as I have to discuss the amendment that is now before us.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): What is it my hon. friends are anxious to do when they say they are anxious to debate resale price maintenance? For an hour and a half we have been discussing a procedural motion.

Mr. Drew: We did not introduce the motion.

Mr. Coldwell: I am suggesting, Mr. Speaker, that if hon. members are so anxious to debate the bill, then we should settle the procedural matter now by taking a vote.

Mr. Fleming: And destroy the rights of minorities in parliament by doing so.

Mr. Coldwell: With regard to the rights of minorities, I know of no other parliament in the British commonwealth where a prolonged debate of this description could continue.

Mr. Drew: I know of no other parliament where we find business conducted in this way.

Mr. Coldwell: I am not defending the government's manner of bringing in the business in this session.

Mr. Fulton: You are making it possible for them to carry on.

Mr. Coldwell: I believe that every aspect of resale price maintenance has been debated already, and that anything that is said further by me or by anybody else will be repetitious.

Mr. Fraser: You are biased.

Mr. Coldwell: May I say that, to be perfectly in order, in a democratic parliament I think the house should make the decision. The procedure has been debated. Let us take the vote.

Mr. Howard Meeker (Waterloo South): Mr. Speaker—

An hon. Member: Another filibuster.

Mr. Meeker: —I am rather surprised at the motion made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles).

An hon. Member: What are you reading from?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member must be given an opportunity to be heard.

Mr. Meeker: As I say, Mr. Speaker, I was rather surprised at the motion moved by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. Along with the rest of the members of this house I recognize the inconvenience that the continuance of this debate is causing for hon. members. But I should also like to remind the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre that at the present time there are, in Korea and in Europe, thousands of our Canadian soldiers who are just as anxious as we are here to be home with their families for Christmas. It may be said that they joined the Canadian army of their own free will, that what they are doing is their duty and they are doing their duty. I do not think any of us are forced to be here. I think we are all here in Ottawa of our own free will.

Mr. Sinnott: Where has he been all winter?

Mr. Drew: He was overseas during the war.

Mr. Sinnott: Where has he been all winter? That is what I want to know.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Meeker: I was also surprised at the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low) for seconding this motion to continue this sitting without further interruption in the debate. Inexperienced as I am in parliamentary matters, even I recognize what they are trying to do. As I have been sitting here this morning, the thought struck me as to something that I wish had been done years ago. There are sitting here this morning, I am quite sure, members who were sitting here in 1945, and they are expressing their opinions and trying in every way possible to get themselves home for Christmas. I only wish that in 1945 those same members had tried as hard to get the Canadian soldier who was left stranded in Europe home for Christmas—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Fraser: You do not like it.

Mr. Meeker: —as they today are trying to get themselves home.

Mr. McIlraith: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. The hon. member who has just resumed his seat has made a remark reflecting on the integrity of all hon. members of this house—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. McIlraith: —prior to the 1945 general election, and who have been twice re-elected and sent back by their constituents. I suggest, and I ask for your ruling on it, that that reflection and his remarks about those hon. members be withdrawn.

Mr. Fleming: Why are you so sensitive about criticism?

Mr. McIlraith: The electors of this country passed judgment on those people and their fitness to sit here twice since that time. That does not apply to all hon. members but only to those who were here prior to the 1945 general election.

Mr. Drew: What the hon. member has said is an expression of opinion. What he said was that he wished the members who were here at that time had indicated the same effort and the same desire to get the young men in uniform home for Christmas as is now being indicated on this occasion to get themselves home. That, after all, is an expression of opinion. I would, however, suggest that it was prompted by an interruption by an hon. member on the other side of the house who interjected: Where have you been? I would recall that the young member who has just spoken was for some years overseas serving his country.

An hon. Member: He was not the only one.

Mr. Drew: No, he was not by any manner of means the only one, and he would be the last to suggest it; and he would be the last to suggest that there were not many hon. members on the government side who served their country in as gallant and as complete a way as was possible. But I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. member who has just raised the objection is showing an extremely sensitive attitude on this subject at a time when he apparently did not feel nearly so sensitive about the earlier interjection which had been made. I would suggest, Mr. Speaker, that the expression of opinion is not one which should call for any ruling by you at this time.

Mr. Sinnott: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Sinnott: I am the member who raised that point. I want to tell the house that the young member who is here had ample time to discuss this price maintenance issue had he been here during this session.

Mr. Fulton: He has been here during this debate.

Mr. Fleming: You are cutting him off and preventing him from speaking if he wants to.

Mr. Sinnott: Nonsense.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. McIlraith) has raised the point of order. I am sure the hon. member for Waterloo South (Mr. Meeker) did not intend to reflect on any hon. members in this house.

Mr. Meeker: Of course not, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Under the circumstances, I will allow the debate to continue.

Mr. George H. Hees (Broadview): Mr. Speaker,—

An hon. Member: More filibuster.

Mr. Hees: —I should like to note that the hon. member who made the original motion today was the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), for whom I have the highest regard.

Som hon. Members: Question.

An hon. Member: Shush.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Cleaver: If the hon. member does not want the floor, Mr. Speaker, I should like to have it.

Mr. Hees: I should like to have just a little bit of order, coupled with the floor.

Mr. Brown (Essex West): What is your argument?

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, in the past the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has commendably made pleas on behalf of the House of Commons staff when it was proposed that we should discontinue the pause for lunch hour and dinner hour and should work continuously right through. He seems now, however, to have forgotten about the inconvenience that these members of the staff would be put to. Instead of just waiving the luncheon interval and the dinner interval, he now wants them to work perhaps, if necessary, right through the night. To me, that course seems rather extraordinary in view of his former protests on behalf of the convenience of the staff. If we work in an orderly fashion from now until Friday night, as this party is quite willing and anxious to do, in order to get through the exceedingly important business which is before this house, the staff will work normal days. Then we will all go home for Christmas. The staff do not have to travel. They live here in Ottawa. If necessary, we will come back the following Thursday, work two days and have our week end and return again. I do not see that that is going to cause any great inconvenience to the staff of the House of Commons.

Mr. Brown (Essex West): We will be adjourned then.

Mr. Hees: I believe that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, and his party, who sponsored this motion, are far more concerned with their own convenience than any imagined inconvenience of the staff. To put this motion up as a pretext for being worried about the inconvenience of the staff of the House of Commons leaves something to be desired, so far as I am concerned. It is unthinkable that the vitally important matters which still remain to be considered by this house should be considered under conditions of exhaustion, which the passing of this motion would ensure. We are all human beings. We are tired at the end of a reasonably strenuous session. If we go through today without a luncheon interval and without a dinner interval, and work the night, hon. members know that they will not, because of physical limitations, be able to give this vitally important legislation now before us for consideration anything like the attention that it deserves. If we vote for this motion it will make this House of Commons a sham and a farce. It will be doing a tremendous disservice to the people who elected us to come here to protect their interests and to pass legislation, not ill-considered and hasty, but properly considered and well thought out.

At the present time we have before us three important bills. One is the annuities bill, which is of tremendous importance to all of those who sell and buy life insurance or annuities in this country. We have the Public Works Act. That is a bill which is also of vital importance to the conduct of business throughout this country; the handling of contracts, to the extent of billions of dollars, by this government, and which they propose, as they did last Friday, to do on a non-tender basis. The third is of course the bill dealing with resale price maintenance, which is of vital importance to a tremendous number of merchants throughout this country.

What this motion proposes to do is simply to throw them all in together and hope that everybody gets so exhausted that they cannot think; that we simply get too tired to think and everything goes through, and that is the kind of legislation this country would get. To propose to do that sort of thing in this house is nothing short of a national disgrace, and I would be very much ashamed to be a member of this House of Commons if I agreed to that kind of procedure. That is not the kind of thing that I was sent here to do by the electors of Broadview riding, and I do not intend to conduct their affairs in that way.

Some hon. Members: What about the filibuster?

Mr. Hees: We have, through the mismanagement of this government, had far too—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the hon. member should direct his remarks to the motion before the house.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, I was explaining that the reason we are confronted with this position today is the fact that on several days during this session the house was not provided with sufficient work to go on with, and had to adjourn. Because of that mismanagement on the government's part, it is suggested that we jam all this legislation together, ill consider it and, as the government hopes, pass it through as they want it. To me that is not the kind of thing parliament is elected to do, and I sincerely hope that we will not pass this motion, which I think is designed only to cater to the convenience of hon. members.

As the hon. member for Waterloo South (Mr. Meeker) said, there are a great many men at the present time fighting for this country who are only too willing to carry on their business over the Christmas season. They would like to be home, but they feel they have a responsibility toward their country. We have an equally great responsibility toward the country, to make sure that the legislation that this parliament passes is considered legislation, the kind of legislation which will be best for all the people of this country. I say the least we can do, especially in view of what those soldiers are doing in Korea today, is that, if necessary, we come back here after the Christmas recess and continue, in an orderly fashion, the business of this house, and that between now and Friday we continue in an orderly fashion during the hours that we originally set for this house—and, Mr. Speaker, they were set by hon. members and they were set for a specific reason. You cannot work longer than about two and a half to three hours without needing a rest. You must have that kind of rest. The legislation that is before us is of a vital nature and merits that kind of consideration. To give it any less is simply unthinkable. In view of that, Mr. Speaker, I hope that every hon. member will have the good sense and the good taste to vote against a motion of this kind, and that we agree to sit here in an orderly fashion to conduct the matters before the house as they were intended to be conducted, and give all these matters careful consideration so that the legislation that we produce at the end of this session—whenever it may be—may be such that we as members of this parliament may feel proud of it.

Mr. Hughes Cleaver (Halton): I am simply entering this debate to make a short five-minute plea for a return to sanity on the part of hon. members.

Mr. Fleming: On the part of the government, the C.C.F. and the Social Credit parties.

Mr. Cleaver: When feelings run high and men lose their tempers they often say and do things which they regret afterwards. Mr. Speaker, as one of the older members of the house—I hope the house will bear with me; I do not intend to say anything to offend anyone—may I say that under our rules every minority group has an ample opportunity fully to present all of their views and all of their arguments. But when the time has arrived that they have had that opportunity, and they have presented all their views, then our rules also provide that the will of the majority must prevail. After all, it would be a very strange thing if a small minority group would have the right and the power to push the majority around and do as they wish. Anyone who listened ad nauseam to the speeches that we had yesterday, Mr. Speaker, could not help but admit that the speakers were running short of any arguments of any consequence to support their views. That was especially true when we listened to the interesting discussion of the battle of Bannockburn and that sort of thing. That was an indication that they had run out of arguments. The opposition have exhausted every possible argument that they could have against this measure—not the motion before us.

Now, let us see what the motion before us does. If there is still any member of the opposition burning with the desire to present further arguments to support his views against Bill No. 36, the motion before the house—we are now discussing the amendment to the motion—gives those members an extra sixteen hours in which to present their views. We could have twenty more 40-minute speeches in the extra time which this motion will give to hon. members. The house has been frankly told that we are facing closure on the 27th. Here is a motion which will give members of the opposition, if they have any honest desire to present any particular—

Mr. Drew: No, no.

Mr. Cleaver: —which will give them an extra sixteen hours.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: I do not think the hon. member should refer to a debate that has taken place.

Mr. Cleaver: Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Casselman: Withdraw!

Mr. Drew: Withdraw!

Mr. Cleaver: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Drew: No, Mr. Speaker; the hon. member has no right to question the honesty of purpose of members of the House of Commons in debate.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Some hon. Members: Withdraw.

Mr. Cleaver: I simply said that if there is any—

Mr. Drew: I ask for a ruling.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I did not understand the hon. member to question the honesty of anyone.

Mr. Fleming: He used the word "honesty".

Mr. Speaker: I do not think his words could be taken to apply to the extent suggested. There has been other strong language used, also. However, I would rule that if the hon. member has used improper language, he must necessarily withdraw it.

Mr. Cleaver: If I have said anything that offends any member of the opposition—and I mean this—then I at once withdraw it. I did not get up with the intention of being offensive.

Mr. Drew: Hear, hear.

Mr. Cleaver: I did not get up with the intention of offending anyone's feelings. But I did want to demonstrate, if I can, the very absurd position the opposition are taking. If any of them has a burning desire to express any further additional argument against Bill No. 36, then the motion moved this morning gives them an extra sixteen hours in which to do so. And I do urge members today to do nothing they will regret the day after tomorrow.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, I, for one, have no doubt that the sitting of this house this day will prove to be an historic sitting. There are questions raised by the motion introduced by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), and by the attitude which has been displayed in reference to that motion, which raise issues of fundamental importance to the future of parliamentary institutions, and our system of responsible government.

Let no member mistake the importance of what is involved here today. What is the background of this situation with which we are now confronted? The circumstances are simply these, that we have reached Thursday of the week prior to Christmas, and it is only natural that members of the house should wish to be home with their families. That is a wish which I am sure is shared by all members of the house, and it is a perfectly proper and natural feeling. And I am sure it is the desire of their families; we are conscious of that.

In the face of that situation, and in the face of the fact that there are on the order paper some half-dozen measures of very high importance, what did we see within the past several days developing, by way of urge and intent on the part of the government, with full knowledge of this natural feeling and wish on the part of members? Was there what one would have expected on the part of a government with some sense of responsibility for the discharge of business of the house?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I know the hon. member wishes to comply with the rules, but I must remind him that the debate at the present time is on an amendment regarding the hours of sitting. I hope he will relate his remarks directly to the motion before the house.

Mr. Fleming: Yes. What we are confronted with is a proposal to extend these hours throughout the entire day, without any interruption, and throughout the entire night.

Mr. Gardiner: No.

Mr. Fleming: And I say—

Mr. Gardiner: On a point of order—

Mr. Fleming: It is not a responsible way for members of the house to discharge their duties.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Gardiner: The hon. member now speaking has already spoken on what he says is now before the house, namely the main motion.

An hon. Member: This is the amendment.

Mr. Gardiner: The only matter before the house is whether we should add fifteen minutes to the time already provided under the rules. That is all he can talk about. He has already spoken on the main motion.

Mr. Speaker: According to the strict interpretation of the rules, I think the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) is right. The debate at the moment is not on the original motion, but on the amendment. The remarks of the hon. member should be related directly to the amendment. Perhaps I have not been enforcing the rule as strictly as I should have; but that is the question now before the house. I will read the question. It says:

> That the hours of sitting this day be from 11 a.m. to 1 p.m. and 2.30 p.m. to 6.30 p.m. and 8 p.m. to 10 p.m.

That is the question before the house, and which hon. members should debate at this time.

Mr. Fleming: Quite so. And what I am seeking to do is to indicate that if that amendment is carried, it holds forth a hope of conducting the business of the house in an orderly and proper fashion—which is not going to be done if the amendment does not carry. That is the whole purpose of my remarks at this time.

Mr. Speaker: If the amendment does not carry, there is no assurance that the motion will carry. There is just one question before the house at the present time, and that is the amendment.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Speaker, perhaps I have a greater feeling of apprehension about the fate of the main motion—

Mr. Fournier (Hull): You have spoken on it. You have already spoken.

Mr. Fleming: —than you have. And I say I am quite within my rights—and I say this with great respect, as I am sure Your Honour realizes—in saying that in the issues with which we are confronted now in this debate, looking at the realities of the situation, that if parliament is going to carry on its business in an orderly and fair way—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Fleming: —and if the fundamental privileges of parliament are going to be preserved, this amendment should be adopted. And if that amendment is not adopted, then I say to you, sir,—

Mr. Brown (Essex West): Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Fleming: Yes.

Mr. Brown (Essex West): One of his political friends has attempted a form of intimidation upon me.

Mr. Fleming: What is the question?

Mr. Brown (Essex West): I am coming to it.

Mr. Casselman: What is the question?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has allowed the question.

Mr. Brown (Essex West): He has said that I will be watched when I stand up to be counted. Does the hon. member think that when I stand up to be counted—

Mr. Fleming: I fail utterly to grasp this question.

Mr. Brown (Essex West): Will you permit us to be counted?

Mr. Fleming: Yes.

Mr. Brown (Essex West): I am in favour of this motion, and I would like that opportunity.

Mr. Drew: One o'clock.

Mr. Fleming: At the proper time I hope the hon. member will stand up and that he will be counted. I believe if he feels so sincerely in the matter he will not hesitate to express his view, and I hope he will not yield to the kind of intimidation that has been held out under various motions on the order paper, including the one of the Prime Minister—

Some hon. Members: One o'clock.

Mr. Fleming: —which has been added to this morning by his oral threat of the application of closure on Thursday next.

So I commend the hon. member for his concern over these intimidations which are being applied to the house, not very subtly, by the government. I commend him. And when he refers—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Casselman: One o'clock.

Mr. Drew: Move the adjournment.

An hon. Member: Look at their faces now.

At one o'clock the house took recess.

The house resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Speaker, there are two very obvious reasons why we regret the introduction of the motion of the hon. member for Lake Centre—

Mr. Knowles: The hon. member for Lake Centre has gone west.

Mr. Fleming: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre—which has necessitated the introduction of this corrective amendment. The first reason is the one I was dealing with and on which I should like to say something further because I think it strikes at the roots of the freedom of parliament and the rights of minorities in the house. The other reason is a procedural one which may not be so far-reaching for future occasions but which is one that affects us very directly now at this stage of the session when time is very precious. We of the official opposition regret that the motion was introduced and has taken up valuable time that we had hoped to see devoted to the discussion of the important and urgent business on the order paper.

At the end of a session it is not at all unusual for the house to be willing to sit longer hours and to agree to any reasonable extension of time, but that is not what is proposed. The house has been holding three sittings a day, morning, afternoon and night, for the past ten days, and this motion does not come before us as a proposal to add an hour or two to the sittings of the day or the remainder of the session. It comes before us as a proposal to take the house by the scruff of the neck and make the house sit continuously all night.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the hon. member should address his remarks to the amendment. It is customary in the debates on the throne speech and the budget to give members great leeway, and I do not require them to address their remarks to either the motion or amendments. There is wide latitude allowed, but in other debates that is not customary.

Mr. Fleming: Sir, I was speaking about the willingness of the house to agree to any reasonable extension of the hours of sitting. The amendment proposes a short extension, and that is not necessarily the last word that we of the official opposition are prepared to say on the subject. We are prepared to be reasonable on the subject of hours of sitting, and we have never said anything at variance with that co-operative point of view. I want to make that abundantly clear, and in this I am authorized to speak for the leader of the opposition and the members of the official opposition. We would be quite prepared to be reasonable in this matter, as we always have been. If the house wants to lengthen the evening sitting tonight for an hour or even two hours we are not prepared to cavil about that. We are prepared to co-operate with the other parties in the house in expediting the business of the house, but we do not believe we are doing our duty by the business of the house nor by the fundamental principles of parliamentary responsibility if we simply allow the business of the house and the rights of minorities to be overridden, as will be the case unless the amendment is carried or a more reasonable frame of mind prevails than has been indicated either on the part of those who have spoken in support of the motion or those who have indicated their views in noisier fashion. I think that is showing a fair, reasonable and co-operative attitude on the part of the official opposition. I hope that that reasonable attitude will be emulated by other parties in the house. We have just as much desire as any party to see the business of the house expedited and, above all things, to see it carried on in an orderly fashion.

I have dealt with the second of the two aspects of the matter under discussion, the immediate procedural question. I turn to the other aspect, which is much more far-reaching in its implications as to what I think will clearly follow from what has been indicated during the course of the session unless the amendment is carried or, as I have said, some reasonable and co-operative attitude is shown by other parties along the lines I have proposed on behalf of the official opposition. We believe that the freedom of parliament is inseparable from, and as a matter of fact in many respects is embodied in, the rights of minorities in the House of Commons. You cannot talk any longer about the freedom of parliament if the rights of minorities are to be abridged. There are no rights more important to minorities in the house than those rights that are guaranteed them by the rules. Take away the rules, manhandle the rules and you will not be able to talk very long about the freedom of parliament because the rights of minorities will not last very long if the rules are tampered with.

In preserving the freedom of parliament and the rights of minorities in the house nothing is more important than that the rules in regard to hours of sitting should be observed. Parliament normally treats these rules with great respect, and when it comes to a matter of extending the evening sittings, as we often do at the end of a session, care is taken to initiate these matters by discussion so that we may approach such questions in a reasonable manner with a view to achieving unanimity among the parties in the house. That has not been done on this occasion. If it had been there would have been no occasion for this long discussion today with respect to the motion and the necessary amendment which has had to be introduced to meet it. I recall the remarks in the discussion on the amendment made by the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Cleaver). He said something, which was echoed in the remarks made by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) in discussing the amendment, that I think raises very far-reaching questions, questions whose implications I do not think were fully appreciated by those who made the remarks. The hon. member for Halton said that as the result of the debate which has been proceeding for the last couple of days members were running out of arguments. That may be his opinion, but what right has he to force his opinion on the house?

Mr. Speaker: I am allowing the hon. member to reply briefly, but I would point out that I stopped the hon. member for Halton when he attempted to speak along those lines.

Mr. Fleming: I was not going to go into the debate that has been proceeding; I simply wished to draw attention to one sentence in which he made a general observation about the position at which we had arrived.

Mr. Speaker: I shall permit it.

Mr. Fleming: The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), speaking on the amendment and referring to the position we had reached, said that everything had been said that could usefully be said. That again is his opinion. Has any member of this house the right to impose an opinion of that kind upon other members of the house who are waiting to be heard in the debate, who are anxious to enjoy the privilege that has been enjoyed by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar who has spoken in the debate? Why should their right be taken away? They are here to do their duty. They believe their duty calls upon them to state their position on the bill in the course of the debate. I say that no member of the house has a right to deprive them of the right to speak in this house, a right which they were sent here to exercise.

If motions of this type are to be moved, if the amendment that has been introduced or something like it is not adopted by the house, I say that a precedent will have been created today the last application of which has not yet been foreseen by any member of this house. It will have implications which no member can foresee at this moment. Some things have been said in the course of this debate, particularly by members of minority groups in the house, which I have no doubt will rise up to mock them in days to come.

If governments in office do not scrupulously respect the rights of minority groups and individual and private members of this house who are trying to do the business of the house in an orderly way, the freedom of parliament is ended. Let me suggest that no contribution will be made to the orderly disposal of the business of the house by a proposal that we should be compelled to go on and sit into all hours of the night. The amendment proposes to assert that the house shall not sit all night and until eleven o'clock tomorrow morning as does the main motion. We say that that is not the way to conduct the business of the house.

I wish the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar were in his seat right now because I should like to remind him that no one has suggested more often in this house than he, when it has been intended to prolong the evening sitting for an hour or so late in the session, that that is not the way to carry on the business of the house. That has been his attitude even when suggestions have been made to extend the sitting for only an hour or so.

I was interested in the remarks of the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low) because I remember the filibuster carried on by Social Credit members in 1945 in connection with the Bretton Woods agreement. I was interested in looking up what was said at that time. The discussion had continued for some days and I should like to refer to the attitude taken by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar on December 10, 1945. It was obvious then that we were in the last days of the session or at least approaching the end. This happened on December 10, and incidentally that session ran until December 18. Therefore the position is not unlike that in which we find ourselves today on December 20, 1951.

The suggestion was made that night when eleven o'clock was reached that the house should sit for another hour to carry on the discussion. The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar was asked by the late Mr. Mackenzie King if he had any objection to extending the sitting after eleven o'clock and he replied, as reported on page 3277 of Hansard of December 10, 1945:

> I have no objection to extending the sittings of the house, provided that we can get through tonight.
> Mr. Mackenzie King: That would be the understanding.
> Mr. Coldwell: But if we are not going to get through tonight I see no object in sitting any longer. If there are just a few more questions that have to be asked and we can finish in half an hour or so I would be quite agreeable, but if we cannot get that understanding I am going to say no to the suggestion.

What a difference from his attitude today! That is not an isolated instance. As hon. members know, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar has at times objected strenuously to sitting past the normal hour of adjournment. He has said on such occasions that that was not the way to conduct the business of the house. Within reasonable limits, that is a sound principle. Reasonable limits would allow for what most hon. members would agree was some extension of the night sittings.

I have indicated that we of the official opposition are quite agreeable to extending the evening sitting of this house tonight for an hour or even two hours. But that is the very most. That would carry the sitting through until eleven o'clock or, at the very latest, midnight. We think in offering that suggestion that we are acting in a constructive and co-operative spirit. We hope that that spirit will be shared by all parties in the house.

But we do not propose to submit to any bludgeoning. We do not propose to have the rights of minorities in this house overridden. We are acting reasonably as a minority; we are acting co-operatively, and we make that suggestion in the hope that it will evoke corresponding co-operation from all parts of the house. But we are not going to be bludgeoned.

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a few words on this. It is manifest that the words used by the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) in characterizing what is now before us are correct. It is perfectly clear from the words of the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low), who spoke jocularly about thirty-two hours, that what is happening is nothing less than what the hon. member for Eglinton has described.

I should like to refer for a moment to the suggestion which he made. I should like to repeat what he said, that we are accustomed to extra hours of sitting toward the end of a session. He has indicated that we are prepared to show what we always think we show, a reasonable readiness to co-operate. But it is one thing to sit until twelve o'clock, it is another thing to sit through the night until eleven o'clock the following morning. The one is reasonable in an emergency, the other is unreasonable and is manifestly nothing less than an attempt to destroy the rights of the minority. It would clearly make it impossible for that minority to function reasonably.

I have always been deeply impressed with the wisdom of our ancestors in protecting the rights of minorities as they have. I have often had occasion when I talk to people about parliament, when I talk to ordinary citizens whom I might be trying to interest in parliament, to say, "Why do we, after an election, after the pieces of paper have been put in the ballot boxes, accept the verdict and obey the people who have elected the majority?" Often the result is most unsatisfactory. I have been very dissatisfied with the results for years. Why do we obey? I suggest that one of the basic reasons is, first of all, that we are sporting people, or would like to think we are. We have been in a fight, we feel, and have been defeated, but next time we may win. Second, and more important we know that the rights of minorities will be protected and we will be able to express our views and try to win public opinion to accepting those views.

The rights of parliament undoubtedly are devised to that end. But here we have a situation where in effect what is being done is to make that virtually impossible. I should like to draw attention to one or two authoritative statements on the rights of minorities. As I say, I think that is absolutely basic to our whole system. The greatest surprise, to me, as it was to the member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming), was the source from which this resolution has come.

As to the comments of the member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), I can remember so well the occasions upon which he has questioned these additional hours. He has said it makes it so difficult for the members of the opposition to discharge their duty, because no time is given to prepare. I can remember his being so eloquent on that subject.

I should like to draw to the attention of the house one of the most authoritative statements on this subject, because I do state with great earnestness that what the member for Eglinton has said is not a form of words; it is not rhetoric, but is a balanced statement. What is being done today is not merely the extension of time by a few minutes or two or three hours. What is being done today, basically, is to say to the opposition, you shall not be allowed to perform the duties with which, by long tradition of this house, you have been charged.

I want to read, as I say, very briefly, from Jennings' work on parliament. It refers, Mr. Speaker, to what we all recognize, that this system which we have inherited and made our own would never work without a certain amount of what may be described as team play, a certain amount of the sense of fair play and co-operation between the government and opposition. We see it continually. It is continually in existence in this house, and I am only sorry that today, not on the motion of the government but on the motion of those we usually expect to take a very different view, it is called into question. One of the things we remember is that it is only by good sense and good judgment that minorities can discharge their duties. We have the right of closure in this house, but it has not been used for many years. It is a proper right. If and when it is used, the government takes the responsibility for using it, and no one could cavil at that.

As I say, I want to read briefly from this book. On page 506 it says:

> Legal devices are not and cannot be enough.

On the next page it says:

> The whole constitutional machine, is, however, impregnated with the principles of democratic parliamentary government. At the peak stands His Majesty's opposition—

I think that what the writer means by that is merely that His Majesty's opposition is representative of minority rights and the protection of minorities, I take it, is the great crowning glory of our system of government.

> At the peak stands His Majesty's opposition, ready and able to pounce upon injustice and oppression even more readily than upon defects of policy. In that it does not stand alone, for the government not only does not dare but does not want to act oppressively.

There is a statement as to what parliament has as its basis. We can say quite frankly that in general that is true. We can also say very frankly that when we think it is forgotten it is our duty, as well as our privilege, to object.

Then later on the same page the writer says:

> There is nothing whatever in the constitutional machinery that prevents an opposition from being suppressed.

In other words, a majority is a majority. There is closure in the house, and they can suppress. We know that is not the practice. Ordinarily the practice is that these ample powers given to us under the rules are respected.

[Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood).]

I continue my quotation:

> Nor is there anything effective to prevent the power of the opposition from being completely destroyed by the destruction of free elections.

That statement is no doubt true, but we never think about that possibility.

> The opposition cannot outvote the majority. It can only carry out Canning's threat to defy it and appeal to the people.

Then again the writer says:

> The checks and balances are mutually interdependent. One alone cannot be overthrown, and so long as they remain, it is the function of the opposition not only to see that they operate but also to prevent gradual and insidious encroachments.

I suggest to any fair-minded man in this house that what is employed in the motion made here is a gradual—it is not so gradual, either—and insidious encroachment.

Again I quote from Jennings' book:

> For, in truth, the whole system is a free system, impregnated with ideas which are the product of centuries of constitutional development, and dependent in the last analysis on the will of the people to be free.

I should like to add a word or two and to ask why, after many occasions—let us state very frankly many occasions when the government has been fully playing the game with this constitutional principle upon which we base our way of life—is this time being selected as the time when the opposition is accused of being unreasonable? It has already been pointed out in answer to the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low), and judging by a simple test of arithmetic, that we have not taken a fraction of the time, in proportion to the representation in the house, as was taken by the Social Credit group in a courageous manner years ago. What is there that has happened that this matter needs to be dealt with in this way? Why can we not proceed in an orderly manner? Is this measure so vital, so important, so urgent that it is a matter of life and death? Nobody states that.

I am not going to go over the ground which has been adequately covered, but I do want to point out what was said in this house last night by the member for St. John's West (Mr. Browne). He challenged the members of the government, challenged the whole house in fact, by asking whether we could stand cross examination or any kind of examination of the evidence which was given before the combines committee. The criticisms which have been made of the committee I share. I was reading the proceedings again last night, and I was astonished at many of the things I found.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I just wish to say again that the motion made this morning seems to me to be, in spite of its innocent appearance of merely referring to the times of meeting and times of adjourning, in contradiction to the very basic rights that we have. It is for that reason I shall have to vote for the amendment.

Mr. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg North Centre): We have had two propositions put before us. There is a motion by the member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) that the house shall sit continuously, and an amendment on the part of the official opposition that instead of sitting continuously the time might be extended for this day. The hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) has indicated that so far as the official opposition is concerned any reasonable extension of the hours of sitting for this day would be considered. But to suggest that the house must sit without intermission is astounding. It might be defended in a case of national emergency, but there is no national emergency facing us at the present time. It might be defended on some other grounds, but we have had no adequate reason presented to us for indefinitely prolonging the hours of sitting.

We have had suggestions put forward that in the interests of the staff of this institution the matter should be brought to a conclusion. Yet at the same time the suggestion is made to indefinitely extend the hours of sitting which would impose a serious extra burden upon the staff. That does not make sense. Several times in the course of the last few days it has been suggested to us that the Christmas season is approaching and the business of the house should be wound up quickly. It would be pleasant and interesting to have a normal Christmas; but obviously those who live at a distance from this city will be seriously inconvenienced this year. We have had held in the background over our heads the suggestion that we may have to reassemble immediately after Christmas, an event which means that people living at a distance from Ottawa will have to leave their homes on Christmas day or before Christmas day. I confess to surprise that there should be such a complete disregard of the interests of the people west and east of this city. As a matter of fact, I am prepared to leave on Christmas evening and come back here, if that is the determination of this house, or I am prepared to miss Christmas entirely. It will not be the first time in my life that I have not had Christmas at home. But I think such a course of action should be founded upon some greater reason than we have had presented to us here.

Why the haste? Why try to rush through the business of this house in a short interval? Why has there not been a more orderly arrangement of the business of the house? These are thoughts that go through a person's mind when he considers the possibilities that are ahead of us. As a representative of the people and as a student of the parliamentary system for a period of years, I think that this is a rather unfortunate example of the disregard of the prestige of parliament and of the rights of minorities within parliament. In the history of a parliamentary institution there may be occasions when extreme measures must be taken to force legislation through. There have been examples in the past when apparently merely obstructionist methods have been followed and it has been essential for the government to impose closure in order to force its measure through the house. But on this particular occasion we are not faced with that situation. We have been having a reasonable debate on the various issues presented to us. We have still facing us a heavy order paper containing matters which require careful and serious consideration. We should be given an opportunity to debate those matters carefully and with the attention they deserve. The thing that I find regrettable is the fact that some of the most important and most contentious measures facing the house this session should be brought to our attention at so late a stage, and should then be put before us with the suggestion: If you want to be home for Christmas, let us pass this legislation; be a rubber stamp; let it go through; fold up and go home.

I am happy to see that the opposition is properly standing its ground on this occasion and is asserting the rights of free men in a free society, namely that their voice may be heard and that the opinions of the people they represent may be presented here on the floor of the House of Commons.

If this amendment which has been put forward by the official opposition is not carried and if the motion which the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) has presented to us is carried by the house, we will then apparently be in continuous session. I was interested in an opinion that was expressed by Your Honour this morning, to the effect that if this particular sitting ran over into tomorrow you would, prior to eleven o'clock in the morning, adjourn the house and that it would then reassemble for the next sitting at eleven. I should be pleased to be informed as to how that can be done. I have not sufficient experience on some of these matters, but I have been looking into the rules of the house and consulting the rules of the British House of Commons. I find that, according to our rules, the Speaker of the house here is entitled to adjourn the house at six o'clock on a Wednesday and at eleven o'clock on other days, without question put. But if the sitting day runs beyond eleven o'clock, would it not be essential, prior to bringing that sitting to a close sometime tomorrow, that a motion be made for adjournment of the house? Would such a motion not be required?

According to the British practice, as given in the latest edition of Erskine May, 1950, at page 308, I notice that if a sitting on any day should be prolonged beyond the hour of meeting on the following day—that is, if the sitting of this house should go on beyond eleven o'clock tomorrow morning—no independent sitting can take place on that day, and the house rises when it has disposed of the business of the sitting prolonged from the previous day. Erskine May gives some examples. He says that the house was prevented from meeting on Wednesday, July 20, 1904; and he gives subsequent examples, the latest being July 23, 1937.

I am not sure, Mr. Speaker, whether a similar situation would arise here in this house, but I should be pleased to be informed on the subject. If it should be that the practice of this house would follow that British practice, and if we should be in continuous session throughout today, this evening, during the night and tomorrow morning, it seems to me that we would go on indefinitely unless someone moved the adjournment of the house, which might then prevent the proper sitting of the house on Friday. That is a matter on which you, sir, might be able to enlighten hon. members of the house.

Mr. Knowles: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Churchill: Yes.

Mr. Knowles: Just for the purpose of giving a bit of information, I wonder if the hon. member is aware of the fact that in this house in 1896, when the house was debating the Manitoba school issue, the sitting which began at three o'clock one Monday afternoon did not conclude until two a.m. the following Friday, according to the record. Yes, it went from three o'clock Monday until two a.m. the following Friday, and according to the records—both the Journals and Hansard—it was counted as one day's sitting. The point I am trying to convey to the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Churchill) is that if the continuation of one day's sitting interfered with a formal new sitting of the house on those subsequent calendar days, the right to discuss the matter at hand was not interfered with at all. The house continued to sit night and day.

Mr. Churchill: I am grateful to my hon. friend and neighbour for enlightening me on this matter. That is just what I fear, namely that we may be in continuous session from now until we reach the conclusion of the matters on the order paper. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), for whom I have the greatest admiration, and who is recognized in our part of the country as an experienced authority on parliamentary procedure, has, I confess, disappointed me on this occasion, because I have always looked upon him as a stout defender of the rights of minority groups and of the opposition in this house. I was hoping that in another issue which may confront us shortly I would find some of his stalwart support behind me in a matter on which I feel very keenly. This is perhaps only one single solitary lapse from grace, and I am not going to condemn him outright on this occasion, because his reputation as a defender of the rights of minorities has been pretty thoroughly established, and I feel sure that once we get over the Christmas season he will be back on the side of right again.

You see what is ahead of us. If my hon. friend's motion should carry and our amendment is not found satisfactory we will sit here continuously until, I presume, we complete all the matters on the order paper, and that will be a good test of endurance. I do not mind a test of endurance. I think there are other hon. members here who are quite equal to facing up to it. But will our journey be really necessary through the long hours of the night? It seems to me that this incident here in the House of Commons points out very clearly the crisis that is showing up in our parliamentary life. We have been faced here with a tremendous majority on the government benches and a small number on the opposition side. Under these circumstances there is always the danger that the majority will on occasion become rather impatient with the small number facing them, and wish to hurry along with the business. But in the long course of the history of our parliaments there have been occasions when those who have been on the side of the Speaker have, in course of time, found themselves on the other side, and then they looked to the rules and the procedure and the established forms in the House of Commons to protect their interests. That is the reason why the rules, established over the centuries with regard to parliament, have gained such respect and have been held in such high esteem by all parties. Each party realized that at some time in the course of its existence it is going to be faced with the necessity of being on the opposition benches. The rules have been devised not only to facilitate progress of important matters through the house and to facilitate the conduct of public business, but to protect the rights of minorities.

Unless they have complete freedom of debate and of speech, without being subjected to tremendous pressure, physical pressure of lack of rest and so on, unless they have complete freedom how can minorities present, as they should be presented, the issues that confront us today?

I join with the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) in urging that the suggestion he has made that some compromise be arrived at be seriously considered.

The opposition is prepared to extend the hours of sitting, but is naturally opposed to a continuous sitting of the house. I have pointed out the dangers that might result from that. That is the situation and that is why I hope all hon. members will support the amendment which has been put forward. It does make an extension of time and will keep us within the normal practice of this house, and will give people an opportunity to continue debates without being compelled by pressure of time to give inattention to those subjects that are of such great importance to our country.

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I wish to speak to the amendment now before the house, but before doing so, may I say that while I do not wish to lose the right to speak to the amendment, if that should be necessary, nevertheless I do wish to indicate that I am willing to resume my seat immediately I have an indication from those who have so far taken the other side that they are prepared to consider or would like to pursue the idea of the compromise suggestion that has been made. I would like to repeat that suggestion at the moment. It is that rather than each of the opposing sides in this discussion taking irrevocable and irreconcilable positions, with the result that this discussion on procedure would undoubtedly be extensively prolonged to the prejudice of the discussion on the merits of the legislation, which I know we all want to get at, we consider whether it is not possible to reach an agreement on some reasonable extension of the sitting time today. A suggestion has been made that it might be one or even two hours this evening, which would bring it up to midnight tonight. I would imagine that with good will on both sides and with a genuine desire to discuss the merits of the legislation, rather than prolong the discussion of the procedural question, the merits of the legislation would be considered and that the business of the house would be expedited instead of prolonging the discussion of positions which at the moment are irreconcilable. If there is any indication at all that it is the desire at the moment to pursue that subject I shall be glad to yield my position. If not, I shall continue and speak on the amendment which is now before the house. I see that no one is anxious to take the floor which I have offered to yield.

Mr. Casselman: To whom are you referring?

Mr. Fulton: To the mover and seconder of the motion particularly, but if of course it is desired by them to discuss it further with anybody in any other part of the house, a private member or a minister, whether it be the hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Sinnott) or the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration (Mr. Harris) or other members of their own party, or whoever it may be, all they have to do is to say so and we shall be glad to facilitate that discussion. In the meantime I will carry on speaking to the amendment, but I shall yield my place at any time that I have any indication from anybody in any quarter of the house that there is a disposition to follow up this offer of a reasonable compromise.

In the absence of such indication I do have certain views that I wish to express on the amendment now before the house. Summarized briefly, the purpose of the amendment is to limit the discussion to the hours of sitting, which have been agreed to and laid down as the most effective for conducting in an orderly fashion the business of the house. In that respect, I should like to point out, it has been quite possible in the past to conclude even lengthy discussions, often under pressure, within the ordinary hours which apply at the end of a session.

Our amendment, if adopted, would extend the ordinary hours by fifteen minutes. As I have said, we are prepared to consider a compromise by which they may be extended by two hours. But I point out, particularly to the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low), that it has been the case in the past that matters upon which his party has been vitally interested, upon which they have carried on concerted and vigorous attack, have been capable of disposition within ordinary sitting hours.

I am somewhat surprised that the memory of the hon. member for Peace River should have been so defective in this regard as to have allowed him not only to second the motion we have before us but also to make very inaccurate statements with respect to the previous occasion he had in mind. Because when the hon. member for Annapolis-Kings (Mr. Nowlan) was speaking, upon the occasion of his moving the amendment this morning, he referred to the previous filibuster carried on by the hon. member and his party in 1945. The hon. member for Annapolis-Kings pointed out that thirteen members prolonged the debate on the Bretton Woods agreeement for six days.

Mr. Low: That is not true.

Mr. Fulton: The debate on the Bretton Woods agreement occupied six days, and it was the party of the hon. member for Peace River who occupied the greater part of that time. If they had not wished to prolong the debate I imagine—and I was here on the occasion— it would not have lasted for more than two days.

Mr. Low: Your memory is very short.

Mr. Fulton: I have consulted Hansard in this regard.

Mr. Low: So have I.

Mr. Fulton: Just before saying what I have found, I wish to point out that this morning the hon. member for Peace River interrupted the hon. member for Annapolis-Kings by stating that the house was then sitting only from three o'clock in the afternoon until eleven at night. But that is not the case. During every one of those days, when that prolongation of debate was taking place, we were sitting from eleven o'clock in the morning until eleven at night. The debate took place on these days: December 6, 7, 8, 10, 11 and 14, 1945.

Mr. Low: Only part of each day.

Mr. Fulton: If the hon. member for Peace River feels that it was appropriate for only thirteen members to prolong the debate for six days—

Mr. Lesage: On a point of order, I am wondering to what extent the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) is in order when he revives the debate of 1945, when we are discussing an amendment the effect of which would be to prolong the hours of sitting for today only for fifteen minutes.

Mr. Speaker: This point has been mentioned by the hon. member for Peace River. I would ask the hon. member for Kamloops to reply as briefly as possible.

[Mr. Fulton.]

Mr. Fulton: The point I am trying to make is related definitely to the amendment we have moved. My point is that in 1945, when this prolongation of debate took place, we were able to dispose of it within the normal hours of sitting at the end of a session. Our amendment moved by the hon. member for Annapolis-Kings would restrict the hours of sitting to those normally applicable at the end of this session, with the exception of fifteen minutes.

What I am pointing out is that, on the basis of the best precedent, it is perfectly possible to conclude this debate within the normal hours of sitting. That is why I am defending this proposal in support of the amendment of the hon. member for Annapolis-Kings.

As I say to the hon. member for Peace River, in all fairness and with all pleasantness—and I have no desire to be unpleasant—I do not ask him to bear in mind that if his party of thirteen felt it appropriate to prolong the debate over six days in 1945—and I am not suggesting that they took every hour or every minute of that time—then I cannot quite see that he is being consistent and fair when he criticizes us because forty-six members of this party wish to have an opportunity for full debate, and thus far have continued the debate for only two and a half days. Forty-six members, two and a half days: thirteen members, six days.

I appeal to the hon. member's sense of fairness. In that regard I wish also to point out what was emphasized a short time ago by the hon. member for Eglinton, that this debate has not been monopolized by members of the official opposition. Fifteen speakers have taken part in it. Then, other parties have also had fifteen members taking part, divided as follows: Eleven Liberals, one C.C.F., two Social Credit and one Independent.

I submit therefore that a comparison of the two situations, those of 1945 and of today, is entirely in our favour. I appeal to the logic of the hon. member for Peace River. In the light of what they did in 1945 I submit that, if he wishes to be fair, he will agree that we have not by any means exceeded the bounds of propriety. We have not in any sense been unfair nor have we abused our rights, or our responsibilities to the house. Only one-half of the members occupying the time in the debate thus far have been from this party, and the debate has lasted only two and one-half days.

I would point out that in 1945 there was no suggestion at any time, particularly from the official opposition, that the debate on the Bretton Woods agreement should be choked off. There may have been exclamations of impatience, as there always are; but it was confined to that. There was never at any time a suggestion from this side of the house that the debate should be unfairly limited, or that members of the Social Credit party should be placed under the undue, unfair and exhausting pressure the hon. member for Peace River is seeking to apply at this time.

It is said that after all there is no good purpose in our amendment, which seeks to limit the debate to normal sitting hours with, as I have said, the addition of an extra fifteen minutes. It is said that there is no purpose in the amendment, because if we are really interested in discussing this matter fully we should be willing to sit in perpetuity, as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has just said might be the effect of his motion. Because then we can speak to our heart's content.

Well, that was slightly amusing when it was first said. But it has ceased to be amusing now, because the repetition of the statement has demonstrated perhaps more clearly than anything else that its sole purpose is, in effect, to shorten the session.

Mr. Lesage: On a point of order—

Mr. Fulton: The purpose of the amendment this afternoon—

Mr. Lesage: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Fulton: Oh, very well.

Mr. Lesage: The hon. member for Kamloops has already spoken to the main motion of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. I do not believe he should be entitled to discuss the effect of the main motion. He should stick to the amendment.

Mr. Fulton: I will, if you give me a chance.

Mr. Lesage: The hon. member was talking about the effect of the acceptance of the main motion.

Mr. Fulton: I have been discussing the effect of the amendment, explaining that its purpose is to limit the debate to the confines of normal sitting hours at the end of a session.

Mr. Speaker: On the point of order raised by the hon. member for Montmagny-L'Islet (Mr. Lesage), it is correct, as I pointed out earlier, that the discussion should be directed to the amendment, and not to the main motion. I have not held hon. members too strictly to that ruling; but the debate has now been going on for some time, and I think probably we had better get back to the amendment.

Mr. Fulton: I agree with Your Honour entirely; the debate should be confined to the amendment before the house. I am sorry we are not in agreement as to the method by which it can be confined. I thought I was directing my remarks to the amendment—at least, that was my intention. If I have been transgressing, then I shall try to follow the ruling. But I do wish to say that the purpose of my remarks at this stage is to demonstrate that if our amendment is carried it will not necessarily have the effect of prolonging the sitting days of this session. Because other debates, on subjects just as hotly contested, debates to which the term "filibuster" has been applied, have been carried on and concluded at the end of the session, under pressure of the desire to get home. This happened late in December of 1945, with normal sitting hours.

Our amendment seeks to confine the discussion on this hotly contested subject to very nearly normal sitting hours, only fifteen minutes longer than normal, instead of the motion under which it is proposed to allow it to proceed all night, all the next day, all the next night and so on ad infinitum until by sheer exhaustion all subjects on the order paper are disposed of.

What I am trying to do is to set out the purpose of the amendment and to show the hon. member for Montmagny-L'Islet amongst others that it will not necessarily prolong the session but that in fact it will probably have the effect of shortening it if our amendment is accepted instead of the improper motion that has been placed before the house. On the question of how best we are going to shorten the session, I am as anxious as any other member for reasons which will be obvious, namely, that my home is in British Columbia and it is very questionable whether I am going to be able to get home in time for Christmas even now, that it may be possible for members to get home for Christmas. I think the debate can be concluded and members allowed to leave here just as quickly if the amendment proposed is accepted as will be the case if the motion carries.

I point out in that regard, however, that with respect to the question of the length of the session I find it a little unseemly that there should be this desire to shorten it. After all, when we came here in October we were given to understand, and the people of Canada were given to understand, that we were coming for a full normal session. I point out to you, Mr. Speaker, and to hon. members opposite that by no stretch of the imagination can we be said as yet to have had a full normal session of parliament. Under these circumstances, bearing in mind the responsibility we owe to the people of Canada who have sent us here expecting us to discharge our duty, I find it amazing and highly irresponsible on the part of members of the C.C.F. and Social Credit parties and the government, who support them in this move, to seek to cut short the work of parliament before a proper normal session has been allowed to come to its usual ending. We of this party wish to make it clear once and for all that we believe the work of parliament must be carried out and completed in an orderly fashion and that legislation of public importance should be attended to by members of the house even if it is necessary for them to curtail their own holidays in order to do so. That is the purpose of the amendment which has been moved and which I support.

Mr. Gardiner: I was paired with the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Ross). Had I voted, I would have voted against the amendment.

(Translation):

Mr. Gagnon: Mr. Speaker, I was paired with the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot). That is the reason why I have not voted.

(Text):

Mrs. Fairclough: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Noseworthy: Mr. Speaker—

Mrs. Fairclough: Is the hon. member announcing a pair?

Some hon. Members: Go on.

Mrs. Fairclough: Mr. Speaker, unless hon. members are announcing pairs I propose to speak on the motion now before the house.

Mr. James Sinclair (Coast-Capilano): I move, seconded by the hon. member for Montmagny-L'Islet (Mr. Lesage):

That the hon. member for York South (Mr. Noseworthy) be now heard.

Mrs. Fairclough: I was quite willing to extend the courtesy to hon. members who wished to announce pairs, but I claim the privilege to speak on this motion.

Mr. Speaker: There has been a motion by the hon. member for Coast-Capilano, seconded by the hon. member for Montmagny-L'Islet, that the hon. member for York South be now heard.

Mrs. Fairclough: I think I have the right to be heard. There was some confusion in the house due to some hon. members announcing their pairs.

Mr. Speaker: I refer hon. members to standing order 35, which reads:

When two or more members rise to speak, Mr. Speaker calls upon the member who first rose in his place; but a motion may be made that any member who has risen "be now heard," or "do now speak" which motion shall be forthwith put without debate.

Mr. Noseworthy: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I should like the member for Coast-Capilano (Mr. Sinclair) to withdraw the motion.

Mr. Sinclair: I shall be happy to withdraw. The only reason I made it was that the hon. member was obviously on his feet, and you were not looking in his direction.

Mr. Speaker: The motion has been withdrawn, and I call upon the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mrs. Fairclough).

Mrs. Ellen L. Fairclough (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, first of all may I thank the member for Coast-Capilano (Mr. Sinclair) for withdrawing his motion, and also the member for York South (Mr. Noseworthy) for requesting that the motion be withdrawn. I realize that in the confusion of the voting and the subsequent announcing of pairs there was some doubt who had first claimed the attention of the Speaker. I do thank these gentlemen most sincerely for giving me this opportunity.

I should like to speak now to the motion which is before the house concerning the extension of hours. Much has been said already this day concerning the consideration of matters which are now before this house. Inasmuch as several members have already announced personal reasons for voting for or against this particular motion, I think I might also state the position in which I find myself as an individual member of this house.

I happen to be one of those who, during the past month, have been sitting continuously on committees, on two committees at one time. On more than one occasion this has been the cause of some embarrassment to me because I felt that my place was in both committees. Both of these committees were considering matters which were of great interest to me, and upon which I wished to make representations. We were sitting from 9.30 in the morning, adjourning at 10.30 to go to the second committee, and sitting there until one o'clock. Then we would come into the house at two or 2.30, as the case might be, leaving the house again at three or 3.30 to return to the committee. We would sit there until six o'clock or later, and then often be called upon for some duties after that. We were still expected by our constituents to answer their letters, to look after matters which they had asked us to look after for them.

Personally I am quite willing to work all night. It would not be the first time I have done it. I have been doing it all my life, and I have managed to live through it. But there is a limit to the hours during which you can transact business in the departments of this government; there is a limit to the hours during which you can receive secretarial assistance. It is a physical impossibility to sit in committees for those hours, and still attend to the work which a member is required to do outside this house. So far as I am concerned personally, if this house decides to sit all night I shall be here. It will be very interesting to see just how many members of this house will be here. There are certain considerations, of course. I wonder what plans are going to be made for restaurant services, because you cannot sit all night long without food.

I have sat in committee meetings until the small hours of the morning, both in organization work and in municipal councils. I have full knowledge of the type of thinking that is done in the small hours of the morning. Tempers are frayed and judgment is poor. Here, in the highest tribunal in this country, we are asked to pass upon some of the most important legislation that has come before this house for some time, and to do so at a time of the day or night when human vitality is at its lowest ebb. I claim, Mr. Speaker, that is absolutely contrary to the best judgment of the members of this house. I do not think any man or woman in this country would want his personal affairs decided by a group of people who had been considering a matter for twenty-four hours. I would not want anyone making any decision on any matter affecting my personal affairs after they had been considering them for twenty hours. I would doubt very much the wisdom and judgment of the wisest man in the land after the expiration of that period of time. I feel, Mr. Speaker, that if this house persists in sitting all night long tonight, they are sabotaging the people of this nation who depend upon them to use wise and considered judgment in the matters which are before this house.

I cannot feel that the members of this house are really serious in pursuing this course. I know that within the last few hours we have debated at some length, and at times with some heat, on this question. But I would ask the members to reconsider, and in order to give them an opportunity for reconsideration I propose to move, seconded by the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Blair):

> That the motion be amended by striking out all the words after "That" to the end of the question and substituting the following:
> "for this day's sitting the house shall after the dinner recess sit from 8 p.m. to 12 p.m.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the motion that has just been put offers to the house an opportunity to express itself in regard to the proposal that was made, that the time of sitting be extended tonight until midnight, and that this added opportunity be given for the consideration of the measures that are before us. Having regard to the fact that we have already been sitting much longer hours than usual, and that most of the members of this house have been sitting on committees as well during these longer hours of the house, I submit that what the hon. member has said in support of this motion is amply demonstrated by the fact that so many of the members already have shown their inability to continue to sit the present hours, without extending them into an all-night session.

I believe the proposal which has been made is reasonable in every way. I think twelve o'clock midnight is the very latest the members of this house should be asked to sit to consider extremely important business affecting not merely thousands or hundreds of thousands but millions of Canadians in their daily lives.

When the vote was taken on the amendment it was perfectly clear that no matter to what extent the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) might indicate that, as head of the government, he was not asking his followers to follow a particular course, there was no doubt about what course was being followed by the members; and that course was consistent with the warning he gave as to what would be done unless the house carried through with this resolution.

I do not intend to enlarge upon the remarks which might justifiably be made and which will be made in regard to what this really means unless the government is prepared to accept a reasonable offer to extend the sitting hours tonight. I can only repeat to the leader of the house, who is in his place, that there is before us legislation of the utmost importance. Let me refer to simply one measure which calls for extensive discussion. I refer to Bill No. 23, to amend the Government Annuities Act. That is an act of vital importance to scores of thousands of Canadian workers. Right at this time agreements are under negotiation which depend upon certain features of this measure. It should be recalled, however, that this measure contains a section as to cash surrender provisions which has been opposed by the members of the Conservative party in the committee because of the effect these would have, quite apart from the provision of annuities. In fact, the opinion has been expressed that the inclusion of that section actually defeats the basic purpose for which this act was introduced. That alone is a subject which calls for extensive discussion and consideration. I have mentioned the others that are before us.

I suggest that the leader of the house indicate that he is prepared to support this amendment. If he gives that indication, I know perfectly well there will not be much doubt about the way the members of the party opposite will vote. Still better, I would hope that following the discussion that has taken place, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) would seek the concurrence of the house either in support of this amendment or in the withdrawal of the motion itself. I ask the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, who has been one of the most assiduous students of the rules, traditions and procedure of this house, to recognize what really was the effect of the Prime Minister's statement when he referred to this matter this morning. I suggest to him that he consider this motion not alone in the light of the way it originally stood but in the light of the statement made by the Prime Minister this morning. I took down what the Prime Minister said in the discussion of this subject. He said:

> Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to debate this motion, but I do intend when the house is in session tomorrow, if the business has not been concluded, to give notice under the closure rule that it will be applied on Thursday, December 27.

I hope the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre will recall that there was no break, and that that was one sentence. In other words the Prime Minister is going to take no part in this debate, but he wants to know that if we do not submit and simply let everything go through tomorrow, he is going to introduce closure on Thursday, December 27. I would ask the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, who has been so greatly concerned about the freedom of the members of this house to express themselves, to recognize the fact that what we are discussing now is not a question of when we close but of whether this parliament is still the supreme authority or whether we are going to have the whip cracked over our heads by the Prime Minister of Canada in this way.

Mr. Knowles: Will the leader of the opposition permit a question?

Mr. Drew: Certainly.

Mr. Warren: He does not know it is Christmas.

Mr. Knowles: I wonder if the leader of the opposition realizes that, as a result of the announcement made by the Prime Minister this morning, it becomes even more imperative that my motion pass so that members of the house can get all the time they feel they need to discuss the business before us.

We have been informed by the Prime Minister that this session will come to an end at two o'clock on Friday morning, December 28. That is the effect of his closure announcement. It is up to us as to how many hours between now and then we are to debate the measures before us. If my motion does not carry, or if the amendment of the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mrs. Fairclough) carries, we limit ourselves to a few hours today, to the hours laid down for tomorrow and to the time on Thursday, December 27, from eleven a.m. to two a.m. the following morning. But my motion would add to that period of time whatever number of hours we want to take between now and 10.59 tomorrow morning.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I greatly regret—

Mr. Warren: Scrooge.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, may I suggest that the hon member who has just interrupted might, with more profit to the house and to himself, join in the Christmas carols that were being sung a short time ago outside of this chamber. We are trying to discuss a serious subject, and I regard it as an extremely serious subject indeed. I do regret very much that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre should find himself in the position of presenting arguments such as he has made. Whether I agree with his political views or whether I agree with the arguments he sometimes puts forward, I think he has had evidence of the fact that I have respected his efforts to enlighten this house in regard to matters affecting rules of procedure. I regret very much to find him employing such a specious argument as that which he has now used. I would have thought the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, if he was convinced that we were being deprived of our rights, would rise and say: We join you in this fight to preserve the rights of parliament. That I think would be in keeping with the stand he has taken here in the past.

Mr. Knowles: Once the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), or any minister of the government, has announced closure under standing order 39, I think it is, is there anything parliament can do about it?

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): That is their responsibility.

Mr. Knowles: He has announced that, though I did not know the Prime Minister was going to make that announcement when I made my motion this morning. I submit the fact that he has announced it puts a different complexion upon my motion. As a matter of fact my motion is a godsend to the Tories if they only realized it.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, really we are getting the most convincing evidence as to why this amendment should be adopted. It is perfectly obvious that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is already so tired that he cannot think now let alone later tonight. I say that of an hon. member who ordinarily is so clear.

Mr. Knowles: I shall be ready to speak at four o'clock tomorrow morning.

Mr. Drew: When he says this has already been done I would point out that the Prime Minister has not yet put any motion in regard to closure. The Prime Minister has said: Unless you submit, we are going to do it. Let me read his words again. I hope these words will not only be borne in mind by hon. members of this house but that there will be an opportunity for the people of Canada to know exactly what happened here today. I recall this one sentence, Mr. Speaker. I am quoting the Prime Minister now:

> Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to debate this motion, but I do intend when the house is in session tomorrow, if the business has not been concluded, to give notice under the closure rule that it will be applied on Thursday, December 27.

Oh, there was a time when the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre would have been the very one to rise and tell the Prime Minister: No matter whether you agree with what we are doing or not, do not ask us to submit to a threat of that kind. Let us rather preserve the rights of parliament and the rights of hon. members to proceed with their debate in the ordinary way.

Mr. Gardiner: May I ask the leader of the opposition to read the statement that was made with regard to the same matter by the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming)?

Mr. Knowles: Hear, hear.

Mr. Gardiner: Just before the Prime Minister answered him.

Mr. Knowles: He dared him to do it.

Mr. Drew: I am reading the quotation from the Prime Minister. The Minister of Agriculture is only too well aware that, though we might like our advice to be taken, we are not yet in the position where our statements as to what should be done are observed with regularity by the Liberal members in this house—and I am using the capital "L" in this case.

Mr. Gardiner: May I just say to the leader of the opposition that my memory of what happened is that the hon. member for Eglinton challenged the Prime Minister to move closure and even suggested the opposition could not logically object to his doing so.

Mr. Knowles: Dared him.

Mr. Drew: I assume that the Minister of Agriculture, who is such a careful student of the press, read in the press this morning that the government was contemplating introducing the closure motion. And it certainly would not be surprising if any member had indicated that it would be an amazing thing if such a course should be followed in regard to a matter of this kind.

Mr. Gardiner: What I really did read in the press this morning, and in the Conservative press, was that the press is now convinced that the opposition are carrying on a filibuster in connection with this measure.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Drew: I am very pleased to know that the Minister of Agriculture has improved his reading habits—

Mr. Gardiner: I always read the Conservative press.

Mr. Drew: He now accepts as authoritative the statements in some of these papers which he took to task so severely in this house only a few months ago. But may I say—

Mr. Gardiner: I did not know they were in agreement with the Gazette.

Mr. Drew: May I say so far as the procedure in this house is concerned, that we are quite prepared to state our own position; and only the statements we make can be accepted as interpreting our position in this debate. The discussion that has taken place on this motion is simply an attempt to persuade the government to recognize the rights and duties of members of parliament, I repeat the sugestion I have made, namely that either the mover, with the concurrence of the seconder, seek the consent of the house to withdraw the motion or that the Minister of Agriculture, as the only minister now in the house, give his indication on behalf of the Liberal party that they will support the amendment. If he will do that, then we will have disposed of this and we can get on with the business of this house as expeditiously as possible, sitting through until midnight, which is the very latest we should sit. I ask the Minister of Agriculture whether he will not give that assurance. If he will, then we shall be able to get on with the business.

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I was very interested in the turn the debate took just a moment ago when the Minister of Agriculture stepped in with a reference to what my colleague the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) said this morning. I did not understand the hon. member for Eglinton to say exactly what the Minister of Agriculture suggests. What I understood him to say was that the original motion was in effect something in the nature of closure, but I do not propose to haggle about that, because I do not imagine the Minister of Agriculture is asking us to believe that even if he is right in suggesting that the hon. member for Eglinton issued a challenge, the Prime Minister made up his mind then and there as to closure. I took the statement of the Prime Minister to refer to something which had been decided, and therefore it does not seem to me it is very relevant to attempt—if the Minister of Agriculture was doing that—to throw part of the responsibility on the hon. member for Eglinton. I am not so sure that the minister would object; nevertheless one would like to believe—and until I am forced to take a different view I will believe—that an important decision of this kind, which I think is of tremendous importance, was not made in that offhand manner.

Now that I am on my feet I should like to say a little more about the situation that faces us. I feel that the amendment moved by the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mrs. Fairclough) is a sensible and co-operative one. It is an amendment which shows that we do wish to go half-way or a good deal more than half-way from our point of view. The fact is that neither the mover and seconder nor the government have made any observation on this offer, but gentlemen opposite have said no with much more alacrity than the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. I have been looking at the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), nearly all of whose utterances in this house I regard with great respect, and I have been allowing myself to believe—although I am not a mind reader—that perhaps if he had all this to do over again, he would not do it. But be that as it may.

At the present time the situation is that we have made a suggestion to extend the time for two hours, and that suggestion apparently is going to be rejected. There is another point I should like to refer to. I was interested when the minister for Winnipeg North Centre—

Mr. Knowles: Member.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I am sorry—"member"—said, "You must now accept this situation because of what the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) has said, and because of the threat which you now know you face." Apparently the argument is that with this threat before us—and I shall come back to that in a moment—we must just run away in panic, and do what we are told.

It is quite true that the government will have the power, if I understand correctly the procedure of closure, when we come back next Thursday to cut us off, as the hon. member has indicated, at two o'clock next morning. I do not know if that is actually in the rules—

Mr. Knowles: Standing order 39.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Then that gives even more significance to the threat of closure; and of course I accept the knowledge of the hon. member on that point. Nevertheless it is hard for me not to believe that the government, with the considerable influence it has in the house, if it wanted to go a little longer than two o'clock next morning, could not do so. As we have reason to know, the government has very considerable mastery over the house. At any rate I shall not match my views with those of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre on that point, because it is not necessary to tie myself to any view in the matter.

My feeling is that for us to be driven into panic by the threat which has been made would be in the highest degree foolish. As I said before, it is in my opinion an utterly unwarrantable tampering with the rights of the minority. For many years there has been nothing of that kind. There was a time when this house, I believe, did sit all night, or at any rate until the very small hours of the morning. Of course there were facilities in the house at that time which are not available today. Perhaps the men of those days were giants in more ways than one. But I gather they did not have to rely wholly upon nature unassisted. I think the remarks of the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mrs. Fairclough) as to the barrenness of the land, in respect of refreshments—if we have to stay here the whole night—are worthy of consideration.

It may be said that, after all, we are merely doing what is done in the British House of Commons. I believe they do sit long hours on occasion; but I submit the situation there is very different. They have something like 650 members, and no doubt they are able to spell each other in a way we are not able to do.

We have tried to behave like sensible men. I wish to point out again that no reason has been given for this haste. We have already spent four hours rather unprofitably, I think. It may be that we would have been on our way home by now, with all the bills passed—no one can prove that is not so—had it not been for this unfortunate step taken by the gentleman sitting to my left. No reason has been given, no effective suggestion has been made, no argument worthy of the name has been offered for taking this step. The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) greatly to my surprise—immensely to my surprise, because usually I regard him as one of the men in the house most devoted to its rights and privileges—has taken an opposite view. When I heard what he said this morning I could scarcely believe my ears. What he said was that everything that should be said in this debate in connection with resale price maintenance had been said. I submit there is only one person who can say that—and He is not in the house. I refer to a higher power than ours. How is anyone in the house, the Prime Minister or anyone else, to say when everything has been said that should be said? That makes a fool of the whole business. We have rules in the house. As I have said, the government has the right of closure. They can come along and say, "We will move closure", and the effects will be as have been stated.

I presume we will not have the Prime Minister undertaking to play the part of the Almighty and say, when the motion for closure is made, that he is making it because everything that needs to be said has been said. I presume he would just make it with the power of his government and his majority behind him. But to me it does show how utterly wrong-headed some of us have become in the matter.

I do not know what has happened to my friends to the left. I have been for some time in the habit of following them, but I certainly will have to be more careful in future about doing so, because today they seem to have been false guides to an extent I would not have believed possible.

Mr. Knowles: You do not mean the blind leading the blind?

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I was thinking of that but I left it out, because I did not want to insult you or myself. But I come back seriously to say this, that we have had a debate on this important question. So far as I am concerned, I confess I have not been able to my own satisfaction to read the proceedings of the committee, of which I was not a member. But I should be permitted to study those proceedings if I am to come to a satisfactory conclusion on this subject. I must say my reading to date of the proceedings indicates to me that its work was not completed, that we have not the evidence we need.

The speech of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) confirmed that view; because, to the best of my recollection, nearly all the evidence he gave did not come from the committee proceedings but from other, independent sources. I am not quarrelling about that; I am only saying that is an indication that we were perfectly within our rights—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member is far from the subject matter, I suggest.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I respect your ruling, Mr. Speaker, and shall try to remain closely within the confines of the subject matter. I am complaining about the fact that we are being asked to have an all-night session. The hon. member for Hamilton West has pointed out with great clarity some of the things people do at all-night sessions of various kinds. We know that at social all-night sessions things happen of which there is not universal approval. And even at serious all-night sessions, which ours no doubt would be, the hon. member for Hamilton West has indicated just how fallible judgments can be. Indeed if judgments can be so fallible at four o'clock in the afternoon, what will they be like at four o'clock in the morning.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has promised us that he will make a speech at four o'clock in the morning. If he does, I shall no doubt be here and have to listen to it. But I do not believe it will be one of his best efforts. It will not get into his biography, when it comes to be written.

Again I feel that no adequate reason has been given, and no attempt has been made to give a reason. Now that we have two such reasonable men—usually—as the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier) and the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) occupying the front benches, I suggest we have placed before them a proposal which would commend itself to any man of common sense. I trust that common sense will assert itself.

Mr. Rodney Adamson (York West): Mr. Speaker, in starting may I say I think this dog fight will do a great deal of good for the reason that perhaps it will emphasize the inadequacy of the rules of the house.

Mr. Fulton: The inadequacy of the government.

Mr. Adamson: I was a member of one of the rules committees and I made some suggestions—

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Mr. Speaker, we have on the order paper a motion concerning the rules of the house. I think the hon. member will admit that would be the proper time to discuss the rules, but on the amendment to sit until twelve o'clock I do not think the hon. member should enter into that particular subject.

[Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood).]

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Can anyone else speak on this point of order? What we are dealing with now is a question of the hours.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Under the rules.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Surely reference can be made to the rules which are going to be brought in affecting hours.

Mr. Adamson: Perhaps we should say "conduct". The amendment deals with the conduct of the session as does the motion to sit continuously in order to push through the remaining business.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is now discussing the main motion, and I think the discussion should be limited to the amendment.

Mr. Adamson: I am discussing the amendment to the main motion. The amendment in many ways supplements and complements the main motion.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Mr. Speaker, I take objection to that. It destroys the main motion.

Mr. Adamson: That of course is the minister's opinion.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member should refer to the particular amendment. I ask the hon. member to confine his remarks to the amendment.

Mr. Graydon: Put them both up for tender.

Mr. Adamson: The amendment extends the hours of sitting of the house this day. It has been brought about because of the delay in bringing forward legislation of vital importance to the house and the country. Sessions are unnecessarily prolonged causing such amendments to be necessary and desirable. It is a good thing that we are having this debate today.

An hon. Member: A wonderful thing.

Mr. Adamson: It brings out with crystal clarity, as several hon. members have said, the necessity for a change in the rules governing the conduct of legislation passing through the house. By this motion we are extending the hours of sitting. We are doing so for the reason that we are approaching the deadline of the Christmas festival, and it is desirable and necessary for hon. members to take part with their families in this supreme religious function of the year. If it were not for this deadline, if it were not what I shall term this squeeze play against Santa Claus, perhaps this whole business would not have come up and the debate would not have proceeded on its present terms. The reason we are in this situation is that legislation was not brought into the house and proceeded with from the very commencement of the session. Legislation was indicated in the speech from the throne and it has been delayed, with the result that we have amendments to lengthen the hours of sitting of the house.

I think an increase in the hours of sitting at this time is very desirable. I had hoped that this morning the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) might move an extension of the hours to midnight and possibly the abolition of one of the meal periods, because I felt that would give us sufficient time to debate the legislation we were considering and the other bills without having to do so in an exhausted state. There is a limit, Mr. Speaker, as you must know, and as all hon. members must know, beyond which the brain of the average man will not function coherently and intelligently.

An hon. Member: That is evident.

Mr. Adamson: If the hours of sitting go past a certain point the attention given to very important legislation before us is likely to be warped, and in my opinion the amendment that has been proposed provides exactly the length of sitting necessary without introducing the exhaustion factor which is so dangerous in passing any legislation. I say that one of the most dangerous things we have to face is legislation by exhaustion. I had hoped that a motion would be introduced by the Prime Minister so the hours could be extended and we would have an opportunity to continue the important debate in which the house has been engaged. It was suggested if the amendment was acceptable to the mover of what I shall call the exhaustion motion then we would agree, and as a matter of fact we made the suggestion that the hours spent so far in debating this whole question could be made up in other ways. That was not acceptable. Therefore I must emphasize, so far as this most important question is concerned, the danger inherent in our procedural practice.

At the commencement of every session there are long debates, the time spent on which could be more advantageously used if it were possible to set some dates on which various items of legislation would pass through the house. We would not find ourselves, as has been the case in other sessions since I joined the house, faced in the last week or two with some of the most important legislation. With time running out, faced with much that cannot be done, with many contentious bills before us, with frayed tempers, with all the other conditions which destroy the judgment of hon. members, fighting against a deadline as we are now fighting against the deadline of Christmas, we are asked to pass important legislation.

I think the suggestion that has been made is reasonable. It will assist in every way a reasoned approach to a most contentious bit of legislation. I think it ill becomes the C.C.F. to suggest the exhaustion which this motion would impose and to which this amendment has been moved. I can remember that the last time this house sat through to the morning hours members of the C.C.F. made an ostentatious show of protest by bringing sandwiches into the chamber.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): And milk.

Mr. Adamson: And milk. I think such things lower the dignity of this honourable house. Either from bravado or from ostentation they took that form of registering their protest. Now they bring forward this motion, to which an amendment has been moved on which I am speaking, which would impose exhaustion. They have indicated by their previous actions that this is the sort of motion they would ordinarily protest against. This debate has not been a waste of time. It has been an interesting debate, though annoying to a lot of members.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): On both sides.

Mr. Adamson: On both sides. The fact that it has been annoying is a good thing because out of this annoyance may come a better understanding and a better processing of legislation through the house, at proper stages and at proper times during the session. If it does nothing else than that it will have been worth while. The more annoying it is, the more exasperating it is, the more we realize that Christmas is nearer and nearer and Santa Claus is stuck in the chamber—

Mr. Fournier (Hull): The best speech the hon. member ever made.

Mr. Adamson: The irritation which has been engendered may prove a lesson to the government so that in the sessions to come we may have an orderly progress of business through the house. Therefore this debate has been most important on that score.

There is another danger in this type of pressure that is being applied. Instead of coming here as an individual to represent his constituency, as a member of a profession, as one having a knowledge of certain business, as one ready to add to the collective wisdom so that he may become part of the voice of the Canadian people, a member is becoming part of a professional assembly. Members of parliament are becoming members of parliament first and citizens second.

Mr. Mutch: Speak for yourself.

Mr. Adamson: I still have a profession.

Mr. Mutch: You may need it.

Mr. Adamson: Not as much as you will. Hon. members coming down here expecting to be able to look at legislation objectively—

Mr. Knowles: Would the hon. member be good enough to indicate the relevancy of what he is now saying to an amendment to extend the sitting from ten to twelve o'clock?

Mr. Mutch: You must still believe in miracles.

Mr. Knowles: I submit the hon. member is going far beyond the bounds of the amendment on which he is supposed to be speaking.

Mr. Adamson: I am speaking to an amendment which has the purpose of lengthening the hours of sitting today. I am simply pointing out that if we are required to sit extra hours it is because the business of the house had not been handled efficiently. One reason that has not been done is that many hon. members have become members of parliament first. They have allowed their judgment to be based solely upon what is politically desirable rather than upon what is economically or socially right.

This is one of the most important principles in all the parliaments of the free peoples. Just as soon as members of parliament base their judgment on what is politically desirable rather than what is right you will have a decay and degeneration of the whole political system. This very amendment to which I am speaking, in fact this whole debate, is a protest against the professional parliamentarian who makes a business of politics and comes here with that in view. It is a protest against a trend which is deplorable, which is dangerous. If this debate has not done anything else, it has brought out that.

I want to mention the filibuster, and it was a filibuster, which the Social Credit party put on on the Bretton Woods agreement.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I do not think the Bretton Woods agreement can be mentioned in discussing this amendment.

Mr. Adamson: I shall have to deal with that at another time.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Next session.

Mr. Adamson: Next sitting, or next session, whatever it is. I am reminded, Mr. Speaker, of a happy practice that took place long ago when we had all-night sittings. Hon. members on one side of the house threw a baseball across the floor to members on the other side so they would keep awake. I think it was a salutary practice. Mr. Speaker, I support this amendment—

An hon. Member: With conviction?

Mr. Adamson: Yes, with conviction, and for the reasons I have stated. I protest now, as I have protested before, against legislation being passed by the squeeze play.

An hon. Member: By a majority.

Mr. Adamson: By a majority, that is correct, but this legislating by exhaustion, by the squeeze play is a dangerous thing. If we are to have closure—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Adamson: This subject has been debated.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): It is out of order just the same, even if it has been debated.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): It is in order by custom.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Mr. Speaker has decided it is not debatable on this amendment.

Mr. Adamson: That is something else I shall have to speak about, because I propose to speak on closure. Then, Mr. Speaker, in this amendment we are faced with the suggestion that we sit for two extra hours today. I am sure they will be used profitably for the continuation of the debate on the important matters before the house. I say that, Mr. Speaker, because it is of great importance that there be sufficient time for hon. members to have an objective approach, rather than a frustrated approach or an approach caused by annoyance and exhaustion. I believe the two extra hours we have suggested are the optimum of time this house can profitably use. I thank you, Mr. Speaker, and the members of the house for your courtesy in listening to me for these few minutes.

Mr. W. J. Browne (St. John's West): I was not here this morning when the motion was made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) that the house should sit continuously, which means that it could sit until nearly eleven o'clock tomorrow morning. The hon. member for Hamilton West (Mrs. Fairclough) has proposed an amendment that instead of sitting from now until eleven o'clock tomorrow morning we should sit from eight o'clock until twelve o'clock this evening. This results in an extension of two hours beyond the normal hours we have been following for the last few days. If this motion to sit all night is carried it will be quite clear, as the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Hees) has said, that the members will be physically exhausted. They will not be able to give proper attention to the legislation of the house.

There are seven items on the order paper. I do not think the house leader will say that any one of them is less important than the others, and they all deserve serious consideration. Since they deserve serious consideration, members ought to be in good condition when these measures are considered. How can members be in good condition if they are going to sit all night? As the hon. member for Broadview has said, that legislation will not receive the attention it deserves, and it may have some serious defects which would be prejudicial to the interests of the people of this country. The amendment, therefore, is a reasonable one. We should prolong the sitting this evening by two hours, but any extension beyond that will have the same result as if the motion were adopted.

I quite understand the eagerness of the member for Winnipeg North Centre, and other hon. members, to get home for Christmas. It is a natural reason, and a good many members have gone. I counted the number of Liberals in the house today and I believe there are 91, so it looks as if half of them have gone home.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): How many Conservatives?

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): There are 27 out of 45 here. In any case, it shows that most of the members of the house have gone home and the legislation could not receive the attention it deserves. Why is it that the government does not adjourn the house to a reasonable time in January? I am mindful of the editorial that appeared in the Globe and Mail this morning, which suggested that most members were anxious to have their income tax shared between 1951 and 1952. I never heard anyone express that opinion until I read it in the Globe and Mail.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member should speak to the amendment.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I am speaking to the amendment.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): You are out of order.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): It is relevant to the amendment that we should have some reasonable solution to the impasse that we seem to have reached. The legislation before the house deserves proper consideration and I say, sir, that it is not going to receive proper consideration. I say that is a habit of this government in every session. When we reach the end of the session, legislation does not receive proper consideration. At the beginning of this session members were encouraged to speak as long as they liked on the address in reply to the speech from the throne so the time of the house would be taken up. On several occasions the house had to be adjourned at five o'clock in the afternoon because there was no business before it. Now when there is a lot of important business to be done, we are faced with two positions; either we sit here all night or we come back on the 27th and pass the legislation without having any discussion on it at all.

I am sure this must be a new situation, even to the majority of the members of this house. I am quite sure the majority of the members on the Liberal side have never been faced with that position before. How many members on that side have sat through an all-night session? I suppose the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) and the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier), who are old hands and have been here a long time, may have sat here that long forty years ago. But I do not think there has been any occasion in the last number of years when anybody has had to sit that long.

Mr. Knowles: They may be old hands, but they are not that old.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): They therefore do not realize what they are up against. If we are faced with closure, that means the government will put through legislation—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Mr. Speaker has decided that the closure matter is not debatable on this amendment.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, I was only pointing out the two positions that we are faced with, and that the amendment which has been brought in by the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mrs. Fairclough), namely that we prolong the sitting for two hours this evening, was reasonable. I presume, sir, it is in order to speak of what the alternative would be if the reasonable amendment which has been proposed is not adopted. The alternative is that we sit all night, and that if we have not dealt with all the legislation by tomorrow morning at eleven o'clock, we will come back here next week.

Mr. Knowles: Oh, no.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): That seems to be an apt illustration of the question that was asked by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), I think it was last session, when he said: "If we want to do something, who is going to stop us?". The government have a majority and they are going ahead with the legislation. They are going to have the house hours of sitting as they see fit, when there is no particular occasion for such pressure at all. I have not heard yet from the government side of the house any special reason why we should have all this pressure at the present time. What is the reason for it? Is there any hurry for this particular legislation that is on the order paper, or any reason that it should be put through in any special hurry? What is the reason for it? Why does not some member of the government tell the members of this house and tell the public?

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): They cannot get a chance.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I am quite sure the members of this house would welcome the remarks of any members of the government if they wish to speak this afternoon. I am quite sure they would be glad to hear from the hon. member who has just interrupted.

As I said at the beginning, I think the amendment is reasonable, and that we should not be expected to sit up here all night. If we do, we will all be wrecks in the morning. The only time people should be expected to sit up all night is when they are sitting up with a sick person or sitting up at a wake. But I do not think we want this house to look like a wake house, as it would look tomorrow morning. Hon. members on the other side of the house are smiling now, but I do not expect to see any smiles on their faces after they have been sitting up here all night.

Mr. Fraser: Three o'clock in the morning.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): For these reasons, Mr. Speaker, I support the amendment. I hope other hon. members will give the matter serious consideration and support it also.

Mr. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon): Mr. Speaker—

An hon. Member: Filibuster.

Mr. Dinsdale: —I have been listening with a great deal of interest to the discussion that has arisen suddenly out of today's proceedings. Not only have I been listening with interest to the arguments that are being presented in a more or less orthodox fashion by the members of this house but also to the catcalls that are coming from behind the curtains and various places in this house.

Mr. Fraser: On the government side.

Mr. Dinsdale: Yes, on the government side.

An hon. Member: Today or yesterday?

Mr. Dinsdale: I think a rather significant fact is emerging out of this discussion. I might sum it up by saying that the discussion is indicative of the fact that the opposition is at last taking a formal stand in the chamber against tactics that we might call autocratic, which have been becoming all to obvious.

I remember reading an editorial back last May, I think it was, to the effect that all opposition in Canada had collapsed; and it went on to explain that the present government had developed the technique of moving so far to the right and so far to the left that it had pushed off the C.C.F. on the one side and the Progressive Conservatives on the other. Today, however, we find members of the official opposition taking a stand against this political expediency for the sake of holding power. It may be that the gesture that has been made in this chamber today is rather futile because, inevitably, amendments will be voted down by a government majority. Nonetheless there is a principle at stake here. I feel that, on this extremely important occasion, anything that can be said should be said to protect the rights of the minority groups in this house.

The attempt that is being made by members of the opposition to get a fair hearing for the legislation still remaining on the order paper will inevitably be voted down unless we can persuade certain members of the government to think differently and come to our support. While that may be a forlorn hope, there is always the possibility. While that gesture can be voted down in the house, it is not the first time this stand has been taken. My very presence in this chamber is the result of a stand we took along similar lines against autocratic tendencies. On that occasion we did not depend upon the verdict of a limited number in this chamber. We depended upon the verdict of the public, the citizens of Canada, and they responded to the challenge in the affirmative. I feel that if we could put this question facing us today to the broader public, we would get the same affirmative response.

We are faced with some extremely difficult pieces of legislation. As I pointed out in my remarks on this subject previously, as a new member of the house I was quite amazed that we were not proceeding to a discussion of the more important legislation at an earlier stage in the session. I was amazed at the devious treatment of this legislation on resale price maintenance.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member. I think he should confine his remarks to the matter under discussion.

Mr. Dinsdale: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I shall try to stick as closely as possible to the point.

We have been led to the present impasse because of the delay to which I have referred which has necessitated the debate this afternoon and the amendment to which I am speaking at the present moment. I am told the impasse that has resulted from the delay is not a new situation, but that it recurs repeatedly session after session. I am rather proud to be a member of this house at this time, particularly a member of the official opposition taking a stand against these tactics. With regard to the amendment, it seems a reasonable approach to the problem. We have been forced into the situation where we are gradually being prevented from debating adequately the remaining legislation because of the lack of time and because of the pressure of the approaching Christmas season. Along with other members of the official opposition, I am disappointed that we have not the support of the other minority groups in the house, the C.C.F. and the Social Credit parties, at this time because a fundamental principle is at stake here. Being a small number of members, we are faced with an almost impossible situation. It looks as if we are going to be down to something like thirty to carry on this debate, on the important legislation before us, in a continuous marathon without any opportunity for rest or respite. As has been pointed out, it seems hardly a logical and reasonable approach to the problem.

A suggestion has been put forward that we should delay consideration of the legislation perhaps until the next session, when the whole matter could be discussed intelligently and reasonably. Then we have the alternative in the amendment before the house, and I think it is a reasonable one. The very fact that we have been sitting continuously and have had morning sittings all this week and for a part of last week has reduced a good many of the members to the point of exhaustion. Some have already left the struggle and gone home. I, as a member who has to go some considerable distance to get back for Christmas, can appreciate their desire to get away; but I considered it of sufficient importance to remain behind and take a stand on these issues that I have endeavoured to outline in these few remarks this afternoon. The opposition has not collapsed. I say that the opposition, in its stand during this debate, has contributed something to good government in this country and to the preservation of democratic parliamentary procedure. It has pointed the way to the time when there will be an alternative to the present administration.

(Translation):

Mr. Henri Courtemanche (Labelle): Mr. Speaker, I wish to add a few words in support of the amendment before the house.

I am wondering if the opposition should be criticized for its present stand. Our duty is to consider and to discuss legislation freely. Is it the opposition's fault if the government is asking us, at the very last moment, to agree to a bill of prime importance? And yet on certain days we have had to adjourn a little earlier than the limit set by standing orders because of lack of work. Today, on the eve of the Christmas holidays, I understand that certain members who have not the chance or the privilege to live as close to parliament as some others, should like to leave immediately for their home. I understand all that. But that is no reason to jam through the house a bill that requires serious consideration.

The standing orders have been approved after serious consideration. We have set reasonable hours of sitting. We are now asked to sit until disgraceful hours. Why should members of this house, regardless of party, have to put in longer hours than anyone else? With our backs to the wall we are being forced, by a majority, to approve this legislation against resale price maintenance, without proper time to discuss it. What does it mean?

Mr. Lesage: On a point of order. I would like to know what bearing the hon. member's remarks have on the motion to extend sitting hours from ten to twelve tonight? We are now debating the amendment moved by the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mrs. Fairclough). The debate has nothing to do with the motion moved by the member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) or with resale price legislation.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I thought the hon. member was just expressing his opening remarks; I would ask him to return to the matter at hand as soon as possible.

Mr. Courtemanche: Thank you, Mr. Speaker; we are just now faced with a situation where we are asked—

Mr Lesage: To prolong the debate.

Mr. Courtemanche: Where we are asked to express our ideas about anything—

Mr. Lesage: This is childishness.

Mr. Courtemanche: I wonder which side is being the most childish.

Mr. Lesage: Listen to yourself and you will see.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Courtemanche: I believe it is the duty of every member to try to find in a bill everything he is entitled to expect from it and that it is also his duty to express his opinion. Why, then, should we not be permitted to express our views now? Why does the government want to finish the session this week? We have a mandate to fulfil and we would certainly not give the impression of being responsible people if we were to pass so important a bill in such haste. Just to prove to my hon. friend for Montmagny-L'Islet (Mr. Lesage) that I am more responsible than he would care to believe, I am asking him to discuss this motion more thoroughly with his friends and see if he cannot find a way to reach an understanding. We would thus be proving we are not here to waste the time of the house but rather to deal with the measures brought before the house with the necessary sense of responsibility.

I also ask that the amendment be reconsidered in order that this debate should not be unnecessarily drawn out. In that way the people would not be left under the impression that an attempt is being made to force the opposition into a strait-jacket.

(Text):

Mr. G. K. Fraser (Peterborough West): Mr. Speaker, I rise at this moment to support the amendment moved by the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mrs. Fairclough). I do so because I personally feel that twelve o'clock tonight is late enough for anyone to sit. Some hon. members have mentioned the fact that they sit all night in meetings. That is perfectly all right, but there would have been absolutely no necessity for members to sit all night long if the government had brought in the legislation at the proper time.

As has also been said, this legislation, if it is absolutely necessary, could have been brought in at the last session.

During this session on more than one occasion the house has adjourned early in the day owing to the fact that there was no business before the house for the members to proceed with. We have in the house at the present time just a handful of members. A few minutes ago there was only one minister in his seat. I dare say the other two who are in here now were taking a nap to prepare themselves for the all-night session.

Mr. Hosking: Oh, oh.

Mr. Fraser: And if the hon. member on the government side would come from behind the curtain, perhaps it would be more in line with proper procedure.

Mr. Cote (Verdun-La Salle): There are quite a few of your own behind the curtain.

Mr. Fraser: As the hon. member has just mentioned, some members on this side are behind the curtain. But let me add that they are not interrupting.

An hon. Member: They are asleep.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): They are speaking all the time.

Mr. Fraser: The Minister of Public Works has said that they are speaking all the time. Let me say to him that I have not spoken very often this session.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I apologize.

Mr. Fulton: He would deny you the right to speak at once, if he had his way.

Mr. Cote (Verdun-La Salle): Make it short.

Mr. Fraser: I will make it as short as possible.

Mr. Fulton: Under the circumstances.

Mr. Fraser: But I feel sure the hon. member would like me to continue as long as possible.

Mr. Fulton: Hear, hear; we are all interested.

Mr. Fraser: Because I know very well he is one who is going to support the motion of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre to sit all night. I am just waiting for him to go out and take his nap so as to prepare himself for his all-night sitting.

Mr. Cote (Verdun-La Salle): It would be safer here than anywhere else.

Mr. Fraser: Perhaps the hon. member is safer here than anywhere else, because there is a terrible storm outside.

Mr. Gardiner: Since the hon. member has referred to the fact that I was here alone a little while ago, I might give him this much information; that during the period hon. members on the other side of the house have been taking up the time of the house, the government was able to hold a full-size council meeting and do a lot of things for the good of the country.

Mr. Fraser: Mr. Speaker, I feel sure, then, that the cabinet owes a great debt of gratitude to the opposition for giving them that opportunity. It is about time they did hold a full cabinet meeting to decide just what kind of business they are going to carry out.

Mr. Drew: It is the first time they have had a chance for a full cabinet meeting for some time.

Mr. Fraser: Yes, it is the first time they have had a chance to have a full cabinet meeting because—

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): Out of order.

Mr. Fraser: Well, if the hon. member would look up from his book when he speaks, we might recognize him.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): My book is far more interesting that your speech.

Mr. Fraser: I do not doubt that at all. I was saying that this is perhaps the one chance the cabinet has had to get together, because cabinet members—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Fulton: Who started this?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Would the hon. member come back to the amendment?

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, may I point out that the subject of the cabinet sitting this afternoon was raised by the Minister of Agriculture. I suggest to him that if he wants to stop the discussion of this motion a very clear way is indicated to him; because we are ready to sit tonight and get on with the business of the house, but we are not prepared to submit to the big stick.

Mr. Gardiner: It was not I who raised the question. The hon. member for Peterborough West (Mr. Fraser) suggested that the cabinet ministers had been having a nap, so I indicated to him that they were having a council meeting.

Mr. Fulton: The same thing.

Mr. Fraser: Then they have been napping for a long time; otherwise this business would have been brought up earlier.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I must ask the hon. member to revert to the amendment.

Mr. Fraser: Yes. As I said, when I stood up first—

Mr. Pearson: For the third time.

Mr. Fraser: —I wish to support the amendment of the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mrs. Fairclough).

Mr. Fournier (Hull): We never doubted that.

Mr. Fraser: I think it is a very fair amendment. We are meeting half-way the wishes of the government and those of the hon. member who put the motion. I think it would be only fair for the government and others to support the amendment. Then we could get on with the business of the house.

An hon. Member: Give us a chance to support it.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. L. E. Cardiff (Huron North): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Sinnott: You are hard up now.

Mr. Cardiff: Mr. Speaker, I have risen to support the amendment, because we have been sitting all day for absolutely nothing. I was never in my life connected with any institution that had so very little respect for the value of time; and I would like that to sink in. If in private life we conducted our business in the same way business is conducted in the House of Commons, we would all go broke.

Mr. Sinnott: You should know.

Mr. Cardiff: The Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) has made an interjection. I would like to tell him that if he had brought this to the house in an orderly way after the matter was first mentioned on October 9, he would not be saddled with this kind of performance now.

Mr. Coldwell: "Performance" is right.

Mr. Cardiff: The fact of the matter is that many days during this session we sat waiting for some direction from the government to carry on.

Mr. Sinnott: Who are "we"?

Mr. Cardiff: They had nothing to offer us until the 65-day period, which is necessary for a session of parliament, was reached. No one was in a hurry.

An. hon. Member: Order.

Mr. Cardiff: What is wrong with that?

Mr. Fulton: They don't like it.

Mr. Hosking: It has nothing to do with the hours of sitting.

Mr. Riley: Would you like some old copies of Hansard to read?

Mr. Cardiff: According to the constitution it appears to be necessary to put in 65 days before we can collect our indemnity. In my opinion this session should never have been called at all. It is the second session in one year.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but it seems to me that he has drifted far from the principle of the amendment.

Mr. Cardiff: Well, I certainly want to abide by the rules, and I do not want to say anything that is not in conformity with the amendment before the house. But the fact of the matter is that because we waste so much time, surely it is in order—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Cardiff: Surely it is in order to say that I agree with the amendment that we sit tonight until twelve o'clock. This is not the first day's performance that has gone on in the house, and to no advantage. We have wasted more than one day.

Mr. Lesage: You have.

Mr. Cardiff: No, I have not. If the government had brought down its legislation in an orderly way, if it had brought down the important legislation when it should have been brought down, there would have been plenty of time to discuss and dispose of it. But because they brought it in at an hour when they thought the opposition would be weakened sufficiently—

Mr. Garson: The proceedings speak for themselves on that point.

Mr. Cardiff: They thought the opposition in the dying hours of the session would be weak, that it would fold up, and that the bill would be passed without any argument. Now they are finding the opposition is just a little stiffer than they expected. I do not wish to detain the house at length. I think perhaps this will be a good lesson to the government to not try this kind of performance on the opposition again because the opposition, apart from numbers, are just a little stronger than the government think they are. I should like to warn the government to adjust their program of business for the next session of parliament and bring in their more important measures at the commencement of the session, not toward the end. If they do so perhaps they will get more co-operation, and it will be a lot better for the country at large.

[Mr. Hosking.]

Mr. George H. Hees (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I should like to hear some of the members on the government side, especially the cabinet ministers—

Mr. Fournier (Hull): You don't say!

Mr. Hees: I would be very glad to sit down if one of the cabinet ministers would get up and express an opinion about this matter, because I think it is very important. Here we have a proposition before us that we should pass all the legislation the house still has to deal with in an all-night marathon session. Every member of the house who has stayed up all night at one time or another knows the state one's mind gets in around two, three or four o'clock in the morning. He knows perfectly well that the kind of consideration any hon. member could give legislation of any nature, let alone vitally important legislation of the type that is still to come before the house, is not the kind of consideration such legislation merits. I feel confident that when the motion comes to a vote all members of the cabinet will stand up and vote for it.

An hon. Member: All the Liberal members too.

Mr. Hees: They of course will vote for it, but I would be very distressed as a member of the house, whether in the opposition or on the government side, to see the cabinet, who are responsible for the conduct of affairs in the house, stand up and vote for a measure that will just make this House of Commons a shame and a farce, that will put legislation on the statute books for which we will be able to feel nothing but shame. It will not be the kind of legislation the people who sent us here expect us to pass.

I should like to hear some of the members of the cabinet express an opinion on this matter. Do they feel that jamming all this important legislation through in an all-night marathon exhaustion session is the way the business of the house should be conducted? I think the house deserves some leadership from the cabinet. I believe we would like to hear them express an opinion on this question, and say whether there are good reasons for passing legislation in this way. If they feel it is the right way to conduct the business of the country I for one would be very interested to hear such views expressed.

Mr. Fournier (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): In your hearing.

Mr. Hees: I should like to hear the members of the cabinet express their opinion.

Mr. Fournier (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): Just wait and see.

Mr. Hees: I would be very glad to wait for any length of time if I thought an opinion would be forthcoming, but I am afraid it will not be. I earnestly request the members of the government to let the house know what they think about this motion and whether they believe it is the right way to pass legislation. I hope before the motion is voted on we will hear that kind of expression of opinion.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to get back into this debate. After all, the purpose of the motion I moved this morning was to expedite dealing with the business before the house, not that we should spend the whole day deciding whether or not we are going to sit.

Mr. Fraser: That put the monkey wrench in it.

Mr. Knowles: There is before the house now an amendment to my motion which would have us take the usual supper adjournment and then sit tonight from eight until twelve o'clock. That has been put forward by those who support it as a reasonable proposition. All I want to say is that if I thought it was a reasonable proposition I would not hesitate a moment to withdraw my motion, if the house would give me consent, in favour of that proposition; but I do not see that it is reasonable. We have before us quite a few items of business to be dealt with and decided upon before this session ends. I do not see any possibility of the house giving these items adequate discussion in four hours tonight, in the eight hours that we sit tomorrow and in the few hours we would have on Thursday, December 27, in the light of the Prime Minister's announcement that closure is to be applied.

Therefore it seems to me that to pass an amendment which would lay down in ironclad fashion that we must adjourn at twelve o'clock tonight would be to deny the house the time it might wish to have to deal with the measures that are before us. Most of those who have spoken in support of the amendment and in opposition to my motion characterize my motion as necessarily calling for an all-night sitting, for a sitting until ten or eleven o'clock tomorrow morning. That is not so. It depends upon the house whether my motion results in an all-night sitting or a very short sitting. My motion does not fix a time for adjournment. The amendment of the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mrs. Fairclough) does fix a time for adjournment. My motion leaves it open to the house to take a short space of time, to take until twelve o'clock if we wish, or to take longer if we wish to conclude more of the business on the order paper.

I suggest if my motion were accepted by the house the result would be that some time tonight the house would be satisfied that it had done sufficient business for the day, and when that point was reached a motion to adjourn the house would probably carry. I want to be perfectly fair. I doubt if a motion to adjourn the house would carry until sufficient business had been done, including disposition of the contentious matter that was before us and perhaps three or four other items on the order paper. But to lay it down as a hard and fast decision that we must adjourn at twelve o'clock tonight after spending the whole day discussing whether or not we are going to sit is denying—

Mr. Fulton: You could have accepted the amendment immediately after lunch.

Mr. Knowles: The offer the hon. member for Kamloops made on the floor of the house had coupled with it a threat. The threat was that if I was not prepared to accept his offer they would continue debating at length the procedural question now before us. Would the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) in all seriousness expect me to treat that as on olive branch, or that it was a reasonable offer in any sense of the term? I cannot see that it was. Frankly I feel that those of us who would like to get home for Christmas have a right to cast our vote on the various propositions connected with the contentious matter before us. I think I have a right to vote on the amendment moved by the hon. member for Kamloops to the Combines Investigation Act. I think I have a right to vote on any other amendment that might be moved on the motion for second reading, and I think I have a right to vote on the motion for second reading itself. If there are only a few hours between now and the time we go home tomorrow night and if only a few hours will be available next Thursday, it raises the question of whether it is worth while for some of us to come all the way back for one day. We are in effect being denied our parliamentary right—

Mr. Fleming: By the Prime Minister's motion.

Mr. Knowles: —to render our decision on the price maintenance question as well as on the other questions that are still before us. Therefore I submit the reasonable thing for the house to do is to accept my motion. That does not mean we necessarily sit all night. The net result might very well be the hour of adjournment suggested by the hon. member for Hamilton West in her amendment. It might very well follow as a result of my motion being adopted that by twelve o'clock tonight we would have completed the business of the house and the house would decide to adjourn, but if we pass an amendment saying that we have to adjourn at twelve o'clock, where are we if we have not got rid of today's business?

Mr. Fraser: In bed by twelve-thirty.

Mr. Knowles: I submit that the house should come to a decision on this matter.

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I can assure the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) that the house would have come to a decision on other important matters in which he is anxious to have a decision if he had not thrown a monkey wrench into the works, if he had not done that with all the appearance of doing it deliberately so that he himself could obstruct the procedure of this house and deliver more sententious speeches. He himself is responsible for prolonging and delaying the procedure of this house.

The hon. member has just said he feels that he should have the right to vote on the legislative matters before the house; that he should have the right to vote on second reading; that he should have the right to vote on this amendment. The hon. member will have a right to vote. Nobody is going to take away his right to vote. What the hon. member means is that after the government has deliberately delayed the introduction of this legislation until the dying days of this session we should allow ourselves to submit to the compulsion of that tactic and refrain from adequate debate. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is saying, "I think all that can or should be said in this debate has been said, and I want to vote." In other words he is saying, "I do not want to hear any other member speak on this matter; I think we should have a vote now."

Mr. Knowles: Don't you?

Mr. Fulton: The hon. member's attitude is far more domineering and hectoring than that of the government. If it does indicate anything, it indicates the folly of electing a C.C.F. government.

Mr. Knowles: Will the hon. member permit a question? I am not going to worry about the remark he has just made. My question relates to the point he made just a moment ago. Will he reconcile for me his offer that we should have a vote soon on the amendment before the house with his suggestion that there should be still further debate on the question? You cannot have it both ways.

[Mr. Knowles.]

Mr. Fulton: I was going to come to that eventually, and I might as well come to it now. The offer made to the C.C.F. this afternoon, as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre knows very well, was made on the basis that this threat of compulsion should be withdrawn. I point out to you that the offer was made immediately after lunch, just after 2.30 when the house met again this afternoon, and it was repeated by two speakers on this side who each offered to give up his place, to resume his seat immediately, if there was any indication from the C.C.F., the government and the Social Credit party, all of whom are in collusion on this motion—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Coldwell: I submit that the charge of collusion is unfounded and the word should be withdrawn.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Coldwell: On a question of privilege—

Mr. Fulton: The hon. member did not say he was speaking on a question of privilege.

Mr. Coldwell: Mr. Speaker, I submit that the charge which has just been made is unjustified and that the word "collusion" is unparliamentary and should be withdrawn.

Some hon. Members: Withdraw.

Mr. Coldwell: The hon. member spoke of conspiracy among—

Mr. Fulton: I did not say anything about conspiracy.

Mr. Coldwell: Collusion, which is akin to it.

Some hon. Members: Withdraw.

Mr. Fulton: The hon. member has made his question of privilege. I submit there is nothing unparliamentary in the word "collusion". I might as well tell the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar—

Some hon. Members: Withdraw.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) has objected to the use of the word "collusion" as between different parties.

Mr. Coldwell: The hon. member made the charge that there was collusion among the government, the C.C.F. and the Social Credit members of this house.

Mr. Fulton: There is at the present time, in that you are all supporting it.

Mr. Speaker: The leader of the C.C.F. party has said that there is no collusion between his party and any other party in the house regarding the question which is now before the house, and the hon. member for Kamloops must take his word for it.

Mr. Low: Earlier in the day I said the same thing with respect to this group, that there was no collusion among the three of us.

Mr. Speaker: Under the circumstances I would ask the hon. member for Kamloops to accept the word of these two leaders.

Some hon. Members: Withdraw.

Mr. Fulton: I accept the assurance of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) and of the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low) that there is no collusion. In that event I think it is desirable that we define our terms. Since apparently we are not in agreement as to the definition of the word "collusion", I will say that there is co-operation among those three parties on the motion before the house. The hon. members who are concerned tell me that there is no collusion among them, and I accept that statement. But I tell them that they will have to face the fact, that they will have to deal with the rumours that are going around the corridors of this building that there was a consultation between their parties and members of the government on the advisability of presenting such a motion. I am reporting that as a fact. It seems to me that if they do not want to explain that, it is for them to decide.

Mr. Coldwell: May I rise again on a question of privilege? The dictionary defines the word "collusion" as meaning a fraudulent and secret understanding between ostensible opponents in a lawsuit, and of course in any other way. If there is fraudulent and secret understanding charged against members, I submit that the word is unparliamentary and should be withdrawn.

Mr. Fulton: I withdraw the imputation on any broad line, but it certainly seems to me that there has been a secret understanding which has now come out into the open. I withdraw any imputation. I am glad to do so. I did not look it up before using the word, but I have already substituted the word "co-operation".

Mr. Coldwell: That is open and aboveboard and quite different from the other word.

Mr. Fulton: The hon. member can draw his own conclusion. I have stated it as a fact and he will have to deal with or ignore the rumours which are circulating through this building that there was a prior consultation.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has endeavoured to set himself up as arbiter of whether or not all the debate that could usefully take place has in fact taken place. I was pointing out that for him to do so is to go far beyond any arbitrary position he has ever accused this government of taking. It shows the folly and the danger to which we would expose this parliament and this country if at any time the C.C.F. should be elected to power.

The hon. member must have known this motion would be bound to give rise to a considerable debate. Had it been introduced by any other party or by the government with respect to a measure in which his party was vitally interested it would have given rise not to one day's debate but to a debate of two, three, four or five days.

Mr. Lesage: I rise on a point of order. The hon. member for Kamloops, in spite of the indications that have been given to him by you, Mr. Speaker, and by Mr. Deputy Speaker, is still speaking on the main motion moved by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). He is not dealing at all with the amendment before the house. Before you came into the house Mr. Deputy Speaker warned hon. members that they should abide strictly by the rules, that they should speak to the amendment which is before the house at this time and not to the main motion.

Mr. Speaker: I agree with what has been said, but it is difficult to speak on the amendment without making some reference to the main motion.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: Hon. members of the opposition say "hear, hear." I am going to try to enforce the rule that the debate should be relevant, in spite of the difficulty. The member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) during the course of his remarks referred quite fully to the main motion, and to the result of adopting that motion. It is, therefore, not fair for me to tell the hon member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) that he cannot say anything about it. I will ask the member for Kamloops to make his remarks as brief as possible and reply to what was said by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. After that has been done will hon. members kindly address their remarks to the amendment and not to the main motion.

Mr. Fulton: I thought I should like, if I may, to answer a question which the member for Winnipeg North Centre asked me in the course of his remarks this afternoon. I am glad you pointed out to the member for Montmagny-L'Islet (Mr. Lesage) that I was in fact dealing, at the time of his interruption, with the remarks of the member for Winnipeg North Centre. As I said earlier,

I will go back for a few minutes to the question he asked of me regarding the offer which was made this afternoon. The offer was in the same terms as the amendment which we are now debating, namely that we would try to reach a compromise on the suggestion that the house sit beyond its usual hours, or until twelve o'clock tonight. The member for Winnipeg North Centre knows quite well that offer was made unconditionally when it was first expressed by the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming). There were no threats attached to it, and when I repeated the offer I did not attach a threat to it. I simply said I had some remarks to make on the motion before the house, but that I would gladly resume my seat immediately if there was any indication from any of those in other parties of a desire to discuss this compromise. If there was no such indication then I must be forgiven for not sitting down, because if I sat down I would lose my right to continue speaking. If there was to be no discussion of the compromise, I desired to say a few words on the amendment; that was the substance of my remarks earlier.

Mr. Knowles: The hon. member went farther than that.

Mr. Fulton: How the hon. member can read any threat into it, I do not know. If he cares to take the attitude that anyone who interferes with or opposes his motion is threatening him, then of course he can draw that conclusion. I think neither the hon. members in the house nor the people in Canada generally will go along with him in his assumption that what he suggests to the house should be accepted without discussion, without delay, and in all due humility. If the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre expects that result to follow, I can assure him he is bound to be disappointed.

I stress the folly of this procedure and the unwisdom of the refusal to accept a reasonable offer, which I point out was made as early as 2.30 this afternoon. It is all very well for hon. members to say we are being unreasonable in asking them to accept it when there would be only four hours left until twelve. I repeat that the offer was first made at 2.30 this afternoon when there would have been about seven and one-half hours, and the member for Winnipeg North Centre is well aware of the fact that the amendment his party has indicated they wish to submit to Bill No. 36 would have been discussed.

Mr. Speaker: I think we should try to keep away from the bill and discuss the amendment.

Mr. Fulton: Very well; I shall try to do so. The purpose of my remarks at that time was to refute the suggestion of the member for Winnipeg North Centre that it was unreasonable for us to make this offer because there would be only four hours left. There would have been seven and one-half hours, and he knew there would have been time for his party to discuss the amendment which they had in mind. We can see, therefore, just how unreasonable he and his party are in rejecting an offer when they say they wanted to discuss the amendment. They have rejected a reasonable compromise which would have cleared the way for them to discuss that all this afternoon and this evening. Mr. Speaker, I feel that there was never a clearer example of double talk than that in which the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has just indulged.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The words "double talk" are not allowed.

Some hon. Members: Withdraw.

Mr. Fulton: If you say the words "double talk" are not allowed, Mr. Speaker, I shall withdraw and say there has never been a clearer example of saying one thing and meaning another.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order. That is a definitely unparliamentary statement to make about another hon. member.

Mr. Fulton: I think probably the member for Winnipeg North Centre knows what I mean, and if you say the expression is unparliamentary I shall not repeat it—

Some hon. Members: Withdraw.

Mr. Fulton: —and I shall withdraw. As I was saying, the unwisdom of the refusal to accept this motion was demonstrated when the member for Winnipeg North Centre said he could not accept it because there would not have been time to discuss the amendment which his party offers, and in which he is interested. I believe the straits in which the hon. member finds himself in his attempt to justify his rejection of this offer, and the situation in which the house finds itself, follow the attempt to apply the big stick, either by way of the motion offered this morning or in the threat uttered by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) himself. I trust the house will accept the reasonable suggestion we have put forward in our amendment and reject the motion of the member for Winnipeg North Centre.

Mr. F. E. Lennard (Wentworth): I rise to speak for a moment on this amendment, and I do so merely for the purpose of pointing out that I do not think due consideration has been given to the Hansard reporters. There are seven regular Hansard reporters, but for several weeks they have been operating with one short. There is no available relief. I feel that is one thing that should be taken into serious consideration. In speaking to the amendment I might say that it would fix the time at which we would close at twelve o'clock tonight, and this would give these Hansard reporters some relief. If they have to work all night it is humanly impossible for them to do a good job. In that connection I wonder if any consideration has been given to the members of the press gallery.

Mr. Fournier (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): Take good care of them. You need them.

Mr. Lennard: I am not saying anything about the insinuation that has been offered. I am not making these observations for that purpose at all. I do feel we should consider these people who have to sit here hour after hour listening to the discussions that take place in this chamber. I do want to make this appeal, Mr. Speaker, for the members of the Hansard staff. As I say, they have been operating at a disadvantage having one of their members away. How they can carry on—

An hon. Member: You have said that three times.

Mr. Lennard: —if the amendment is not approved and if the motion is passed, I cannot understand.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, I must confess to a sense of keen disappointment at what has happened here this afternoon.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Rinfret: What a sense of humour!

Mr. Fraser: The Liberals agree with him.

Mr. Fleming: I was speaking just before the recess at one o'clock. Had I continued to speak at that time I would have said many things that were in my heart to say and that I think should have been said in the house. However, when the house resumed at 2.30 this afternoon, I came into the house with a mandate given to me by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) and the official opposition which I laid before the house in a spirit of conciliation and co-operation.

I said at that time that it was not unusual for there to be concerted at a late stage of the session proposals for extending the hours of the evening sitting. I said that we of the official opposition were quite prepared to be reasonable about this matter, and that we were not taking any stiff-necked attitude about it. With that authority I made to the house and to all three parties represented here outside of the official opposition the proposal that we should agree to extend the evening sitting. I said that we would be prepared to go as far as two hours. That would take the sitting up to midnight. As I indicated at that time, I felt that was a generous offer of co-operation put forward in a constructive spirit, in a spirit indicative of our wish to see the business of the house conducted in an orderly fashion, and also—and I said this—to expedite the essential business of the house.

I had hoped there would be enough leadership in the government that we might at that moment expect the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) or the leader of the house, the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier), to rise and say that proposal was accepted in the spirit in which it was put forward. I fully expected that acceptance. Had that offer been accepted, the business that was to come before the house today, as announced last night at adjournment, would have had already this afternoon three and a half hours of debate and tonight would have been assured of four of debate. Including what remains of this afternoon's sitting, that is a total of seven and three-quarter hours of debate. When I took my seat there was not a move on the other side; there was not a gesture from the government that they were the least bit interested in the generous, fair and co-operative proposal I had made. One therefore can only conclude that the government does not want co-operation in this house. Apparently they prefer to proceed by the—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member referred to an offer which was made earlier in the day but which apparently was not accepted by the house or was not acted upon. There is now a new amendment before the house. I think the hon. member should now direct his remarks to that amendment. I allowed the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) to speak at some length on the subject because the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) had done so. I think those speeches balance each other, and that we should now come back to the amendment before the house.

Mr. Fleming: May I respectfully remind you, Mr. Speaker, that the present motion embodies the offer which I then made.

Mr. Speaker: That is correct; and I have suggested to the hon. member that he should discuss the amendment which embodies this proposal.

Mr. Fleming: With respect, Mr. Speaker, may I say that is the basis upon which I was approaching this question, namely that the amendment now before the house embodies the offer then made, and it only became necessary to make this amendment because, under the circumstances I have just related, there was from the government or from the mover of the original motion no indication that they were or he was the least bit interested in the offer that was then made in good faith and in the spirit of co-operation.

An hon. Member: Let us vote.

Mr. Fleming: The amendment proposes that the evening sitting today be extended by two hours, from 10 o'clock to 12 o'clock.

An hon. Member: We all know that.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Fleming: In view of the delay this afternoon for which the government is responsible, the amendment will not now offer the house as much opportunity to proceed with the business of the day as it would have offered if it had been readily taken up and accepted when it was introduced. I think that delay is regrettable, particularly at this late stage of the session when time means much to us all. The responsibility, sir, will rest upon the government for this delay.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

An hon. Member: Well said.

Mr. Fleming: In case I did not make myself fully heard or understood, I repeat that the responsibility rests upon the government.

Mr. Arsenault: You will find out in the next general election.

An hon. Member: Time will tell.

Mr. Fleming: Yes, time will tell. With the government, responsibility will be shared by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, who had an opportunity to rise at any time during the course of this debate on the amendment and say: "That is a fair proposal. I will accept it. I will ask the house for permission to withdraw my motion".

We heard the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre undertake to make some comparisons between the amendment and the motion. His suggestion was that the amendment had the effect of imposing upon the house an iron-clad hour of adjournment. It is no more true to say that than it is to say that the rules of the house in laying down the hour of adjournment, or any other motions except one that leaves the hour of adjournment open, impose an iron-clad hour of adjournment. I do not think that is a fair and accurate description of the effect.

If the business of the house had progressed to the point where we were within sight of a goal acceptable to the house, then it would be possible for the house to deal with the situation then emerging. But what is the alternative, Mr. Speaker? The alternative is an indefinite session. That is the situation. That is the choice that confronts the house. Will there be, as is proposed in the amendment, an extension of two hours in the sitting tonight, with adjournment at the hour of midnight; or will we have an indefinite session which will not contribute to the effective discharge of the duties of the members of this house? We know from experience that this house does not do good work when it sits late at night. People become weary; nerves become frayed. Experience has surely taught us that we do not do good and effective work in these late hours. We made an offer in good faith, an offer that is now embodied in the amendment.

Mr. Cleaver: Let us vote on the amendment. You have held it up all afternoon.

Mr. Sinnott: Sit down and let us vote.

Mr. Fleming: I have been waiting hopefully for some indication from the Prime Minister or someone speaking on behalf of the government that the proposal, the fair offer that is embodied in this amendment, would be accepted by the government.

Mr. McIlraith: Let us vote on it and we will find out.

Mr. Fleming: It is no use for the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) to say he is not satisfied with it. The decision, in the last analysis, will be taken by the government majority in this house. The government majority will certainly vote as the Prime Minister or some minister speaking on behalf of the government, with the authority of the government, invites them to. Is there enough leadership in the government, Mr. Speaker, in the face of this situation, so that we may expect the Prime Minister to say on behalf of the majority in this house who support him that the proposal is acceptable, and that the government majority will support this amendment? If the Prime Minister will say that we will ask no more; we will accept his statement and the matter can be disposed of.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, who along with his leader took strong objection to suggestions that there was something of an understanding between the government and the C.C.F. in this matter, obviously is not going to be permitted in these circumstances to pledge the government or the action of the government majority on this matter. It would be extraordinary if at this stage, in view of what has been said, he undertook to do that. But will the Prime Minister, or will the government, just give us that simple assurance? Then it is quite obvious the amendment could be adopted and the house would be free to pursue the business of the day. How can the house, short of an undertaking of that kind from the Prime Minister or someone speaking with the authority of the government and on behalf of the government majority in this house, submit to a course which has within it the means of destroying fundamental rights of minorities in this house?

Mr. Fournier (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): Do you believe that?

Mr. Fleming: The Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) finds merriment in the suggestion that there are fundamental rights of the minorities in this house that ought to be protected.

Mr. Cleaver: You have exercised them all day today.

Mr. Garson: What are you doing now?

Mr. Fleming: I suppose it is the same kind of laugh in which the Minister of Justice indulged in this house several weeks ago when an hon. member was detailing smuggling operations in which he indicated he had had a hand. There was the same kind of laughter from the—

Mr. Sinnott: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Fleming: —from the Minister of Justice.

Mr. Sinnott: What the hon. member is referring to has nothing to do with the amendment before the house.

Mr. Speaker: I doubt whether the reference is proper. In any event it refers to something which took place during some other debate. I do not think it is a proper reference.

Mr. Fleming: I will not pursue that aspect of my discussion of the Minister of Justice, sir.

Some hon. Members: Six fifteen.

Mr. Fleming: Six fifteen, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Cleaver: Go on.

Mr. Speaker: Is the house ready to continue this debate?

Mr. Fleming: Six fifteen.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Fleming: I have not finished, and it is 6.15.

Some hon. Members: Six fifteen.

94699—146½

Mr. Abbott: Merry Christmas to one and all.

At 6.15 p.m. the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the house that I have received the following communication:

Government House
December 20, 1951

Sir:

I have the honour to inform you that the Right Honourable Thibaudeau Rinfret, Chief Justice of Canada, acting as Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General, will proceed to the Senate chamber tomorrow, Friday, the 21st December, at 12.30 p.m., for the purpose of giving the royal assent to certain bills.

I have the honour to be,
sir,
Your obedient servant,
J. F. Delaute
Assistant Secretary to the Governor General

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

MOTION TO SIT THIS DAY WITHOUT INTERMISSION OR ADJOURNMENT AT TEN O'CLOCK

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Knowles:

That this day's sitting of the house continue without the usual intermission at one o'clock p.m. and at 6.15 o'clock p.m., and that the house shall not be adjourned at ten o'clock p.m. this day.

And the amendment thereto of Mrs. Fairclough.

Mr. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to deal with one or two remarks that emerged during the course of the debate this afternoon. During that discussion we at times were discussing both the motion and the amendment, and you urged hon. members to restrict their remarks solely to the amendment. I now ask for your advice in the matter. I have been making a serious attempt to follow the course of procedure in the house. I have listened attentively to the rulings Your Honour has given on the various points of order that have arisen. I do not wish to be ruled out of order, and it is for that reason I now ask your advice.

My understanding of amendments is that there are three kinds, the first of which adds words, the second of which strikes out words and substitutes others, and the third of which strikes out the original motion and substitutes something entirely different. That is the type of amendment we now have before us.

I have always understood that under those circumstances the house was privileged to consider the motion and the amendment as alternative propositions. Paragraph 338 in Beauchesne's third edition states:

> The object of an amendment may be to effect such an alteration in a question as will obtain the support of those who, without such alteration, must either vote against it or abstain from voting thereon, or to present to the house an alternative proposition either wholly or partially opposed to the original question. This may be effected by moving to omit all the words of the question after the first word, "That", and to substitute in their place other words of a different import. In that case the debate that follows is not restricted to the amendment, but includes the motives of the amendment and of the motion, both matters being under the consideration of the house as alternative propositions.

Then I find in Sir Erskine May's Parliamentary Practice, fifteenth edition, at page 398 a paragraph headed "Object of an Amendment and Effect on Debate". The paragraph is as follows:

> The object of an amendment may be either to modify a question in such a way as to increase its acceptability, or to present to the house a different proposition as an alternative to the original question.
> The latter purpose may be effected by moving to omit all the words of the question after the first word, "that" and to substitute in their place other words of a different import. In that case debate that follows is not restricted to the amendment but includes the purpose both of the amendment and of the motion, both matters being under the consideration of the house as alternative propositions.

My question is this: Is not the motion of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) one proposition which is held before us of a continuous sitting, and the amendment which has been presented an alternative proposition of a sitting up to midnight of this day? Consequently in debate, in order to show the reasons in favour of adopting the amendment, it is essential to point out the weaknesses of the original motion and the strength of the amendment. Alternatively a person supporting the motion would wish to show the strength of that motion and the weaknesses of the amendment. There you have alternative propositions for the consideration of the house. Restricting the debate solely to the amendment seems to me to limit debate on the matter, because it is difficult to advance all the reasons in favour of the amendment without at the same time pointing out the way in which the amendment is superior to the main motion. I ask this question in order that the debate may proceed in an orderly fashion. For my own guidance I should like your comment, because if I am permitted to discuss the points that have been raised on the main motion and point out that the alternative amendment is a better proposition, then I should like to comment on some remarks that were made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). May I have your comments, sir, before proceeding?

[Mr. Churchill.]

Mr. Speaker: The question the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Churchill) has raised is quite important. As I said during the debate, it is very difficult to debate the amendment without some reference to the main motion. Those may not have been my words but that is the import of what I said. During the debate the hon. member for Montmagny-L'Islet (Mr. Lesage) called my attention to the fact that hon. members were debating the main motion. At that time I pointed out it was not proper to debate the main motion. I have not objected to a reference to the main motion, but so often during the course of this debate hon. members have forgotten the amendment and have been debating the main motion. The main motion was debated at some length before the amendments were moved, and hon. members in debating the amendments were setting forth reasons not why the amendments should be carried but why the main motion should not be carried.

Hon. members should address themselves at this time to the amendment under consideration. I will not object to a reference to the main motion in order to establish why the amendment should be carried. The house must not lose sight of the fact that at the present time it is the amendment which the house must consider accepting or rejecting, not the main motion.

Mr. Churchill: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I suggest that the amendment putting forward the proposition that the sitting should be extended two hours tonight is the course that should be followed by the house. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, whose name will be forever linked with the course of this debate today, suggested that if we sat during part of the night we might perchance finish our work without too much delay. In other words, I gained the impression that he meant that perhaps if we continued from ten until two or from ten until four we might find we had completed the work on the order paper. I suggest that to sit from ten to twelve tonight plus the normal sitting hours tomorrow would accomplish the same purpose in a much more orderly fashion. That is why the amendment has been put forward and supported by so many members on this side. We are anxious to deal with the items on the order paper after at least a certain amount of rest during the night, and we are quite content to add two hours to the deliberations today.

There was one other point I had in connection with this debate, but perhaps Your Honour may not feel that I am in order in raising it. What disturbed me also was that in the course of the debate, although the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) indicated that he had no intention of taking part, nevertheless he made a statement—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Churchill: —and it is in that regard that I should like some direction as to what course the debate should now take. If statements are made—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Churchill: I am asking this in all seriousness and in order to gain instruction. If during the course of the debate hon. members make statements of any sort—

Mr. Robinson: Order.

Mr. Churchill: —that may be interpreted as having an influence on the course—

Mr. Robinson: I must rise to a point of order. Is this relevant to the discussion now before the house?

Mr. Speaker: I do not know yet what the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre proposes to say. He has referred to something that was said earlier in the day. Certainly he would have to relate it to the amendment for it to be in order.

Mr. Churchill: I was just coming to the conclusion of that question. My point is simply that if statements are made by any hon. member in the course of the debate that have a bearing on the motion or amendment, which relate to the hours of sitting, and if that statement indicates that if the sitting is not prolonged something else is going to happen, then my question is whether we may not debate that particular statement. The statement, of course, was the reference to closure.

Mr. Speaker: I will not allow a debate on closure at this time.

Mr. Churchill: I am grateful for the direction, because that was the point I was not sure about. I shall conclude my remarks now by asking the house to support the amendment extending the hours of sitting by two hours tonight so we can come to grips with the problems ahead of us and then resume the normal procedure tomorrow after a proper night's rest, when we will be fresh and able to deal with these important matters.

Mr. H. O. White (Middlesex East): Mr. Speaker, never in the past have I taken any part in procedural arguments in the house.

Mr. Winters: This is different.

An hon. Member: Why start now?

Mr. White (Middlesex East): Do not be in a hurry. We have all winter to debate this matter if you like. Today we have seen something happen that has never occurred before in my experience.

An hon. Member: Quite true.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Fulton: An unofficial attempt at closure by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles); that is what we have seen today.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): On many occasions we have seen the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre get up and debate procedure and defend the rights of minorities. He has taken as much time as any member in the house, and in fact I would say the time of scores of members added together. But today, when all had been said that his party wanted to say, he was quite prepared to do away with the time of all the rest of the members. That is but an indication of the line of thought of socialists throughout the world. Once they come to power by democratic means it is not very long before they throw their weight around in an autocratic manner just as we have seen today, when they thought they had a chance of grasping power and immediately proceeded to attempt it. So I support the amendment moved by the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mrs. Fairclough). I think we should get on with our work.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): I do not propose to be pushed into it by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) or anyone else.

Mr. J. A. Charlton (Brant-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, like the hon. member for Middlesex East (Mr. White), never before have I taken part in a procedural debate during the short time I have been a member of this House of Commons. I think hon. members will admit that I have taken up very little time in this house, but I can stand here all night if necessary. We have seen today a most peculiar set of circumstances, the most peculiar I have seen since coming to this house. At eleven o'clock this morning a motion was moved by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) in co-operation, we will say, with others. At 2.30 this afternoon they had all the opportunity in the world to make any speeches they wanted to make because at that time the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) got up and made a proposition—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Charlton: I understand there is only one Speaker in the House of Commons. The hon. member, who had the backing of this party, suggested that we should go through until twelve o'clock tonight if the hon. member was willing to withdraw his motion. Nothing was said by members of the C.C.F. or the Social Credit or by those on the government benches. Nobody made any attempt to accept that offer. C.C.F. members now say they wanted to speak, but if they had really wanted to they could have accepted the offer that was made at 2.30 this afternoon. I am ready to sit down if they want to take advantage of that opportunity. Apparently they are not willing to do so. After the hon. member for Eglinton spoke this morning the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) threatened us with closure.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Charlton: I have not spoken in this debate before and I am not threatening anybody.

Mr. Sinnott: It might be just as well.

Mr. Speaker: It might be just as well if the hon. member would leave it to the Speaker.

Mr. Charlton: If some of the hon. members behind the curtains or on the back benches would get on their feet and say what they thought, we might get along better.

An hon. Member: It would be unparliamentary.

Mr. Charlton: If the Prime Minister had not made that statement this morning I think the situation would have been less heated today. The very fact that we are not allowing ourselves to be pushed around is one reason I am on my feet. If the big stick is to be wielded by the government, the only thing left for an opposition minority is to carry on the fight for its rights by any means left at its disposal.

Mr. Robinson: Mr. Speaker, I must rise again on a point of order. I want a definite ruling on the relevancy of what the hon. member is saying or I request leave to retire from the chamber.

Mr. Fraser: We will let you go.

Mr. Charlton: The interruptions are helping us out.

Mr. Gardiner: You are only killing time anyway.

Mr. Charlton: It is the principle we object to. It is that principle we are willing to fight for if we have to stay here until Christmas. If that principle were to be accepted, then I suggest seriously that any private member or any member on the government side could get up and move a similar motion and quash opposition in this House of Commons.

Mr. Speaker: Is the hon. member referring to the motion?

An hon. Member: He does not know.

Mr. Speaker: I am not clear just what the hon. member is referring to, but I would point out to him that he should direct his remarks not to the main motion or some other motion but to the amendment.

Mr. Charlton: I will admit, Mr. Speaker, that I was referring to the main motion. I am sorry; I was out of order. For the last week we have commenced our sittings each day at eleven in the morning and they have continued until one o'clock; then in the afternoon we have started at two-thirty for four days a week and continued until six fifteen, with evening sittings from eight until ten o'clock.

An hon. Member: We all know that.

An hon. Member: If you did not know it you would not be here.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Charlton: Those members who do not have to do very much in the house find those hours comparatively easy. They are not called upon to make a study of the various bills that are before the house.

An hon. Member: Oh, oh.

Mr. Charlton: I repeat that statement.

Mr. Speaker: What that has to do with the motion, I do not know.

An hon. Member: Nobody knows.

Mr. Speaker: Either the motion or the amendment. May I ask the hon. member again to direct his remarks to the amendment.

Mr. Charlton: I think my reference to the fact that we sit from eleven o'clock in the morning until ten o'clock at night has a great deal to do with the amendment. We suggest that it would be better to have gone through until twelve o'clock tonight and thus be in a half decent condition to go ahead with legislation tomorrow. That would be much better than having to stay up all night and then continue tomorrow in a very tired state, with frayed nerves and probably frayed tempers.

With their huge majority members on the government side can have a two-hour nap at times and still have a fair number of members in the house, enough to carry on if we were to sit after twelve o'clock through to 10.30 in the morning. They are in a much better position than we are.

An hon. Member: Speak to the amendment.

Mr. Charlton: I am speaking to the amendment.

Mr. Speaker: I am not so sure.

Mr. Charlton: I appreciate your uncertainty because you probably cannot hear what I am saying.

Mr. Sinnott: We cannot understand what you are saying.

Mr. Charlton: Some hon. members would not understand it in any case. I still say that we would be in better shape to carry on the business of the house tomorrow if we were to close down at twelve o'clock tonight rather than carry on all night.

Mr. Winters: This is a demonstration of it.

Mr. Charlton: I can stand it if you can. If we do have to sit all night, I should like to see the same proportion of government members here as there is now. I intend to vote for the amendment.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. G. C. Nowlan (Annapolis-Kings): This is hardly the time for the question. There was an opportunity for the question to be put on this matter early in the afternoon.

An hon. Member: When?

Mr. Nowlan: At 2.30 in the afternoon when the hon. member for Eglinton spoke. That is when there was an opportunity to settle the matter. The opportunity has been present since that time, and now I presume it is hoped the opposition may withdraw the amendment or that something else may happen. Possibly when it comes close to ten o'clock this amendment will be accepted by the house. I do not know, but perhaps then we would sit until twelve o'clock. The unfortunate thing about all this is that this time could have been saved, and the matter could have been dealt with more expeditiously earlier in the afternoon. When this motion appeared so suddenly this morning from the blue no one knew—

Mr. Knowles: I am not blue.

Mr. Adamson: From the red.

Mr. Nowlan: My hon. friend I am sure would object if I said "red", but it appeared out of the blue—

Mr. Knowles: My hon. friend's face is red.

Mr. Nowlan: I am not referring to political complexions. It is possible that there was some misunderstanding as to what was involved this morning and I think, Mr. Speaker, that suggests that possibly some consideration should be given to these rules which, as Your Honour properly ruled this morning, permit such motions without notice. Nevertheless, some consideration should be given in the future to making motions affecting hours of sitting the subject of notice, so members would know what they had to face when they came into the house. If we had known this morning all the circumstances involved in the motion, perhaps we would not have had this debate today.

An hon. Member: You have made a mistake.

Mr. Nowlan: No, there is no mistake whatever. I feel that this day will be recognized in parliamentary annals as a time when the opposition stood and insisted upon having certain rights preserved for opposition parties. In this case it is the official opposition, but it might just as easily be any of the opposition groups; and before too long it will be the present government that is sitting on this side of the house.

After all, Mr. Speaker, an extension of two hours is reasonable. I must say I think it is a tribute to members on all sides of the house that, considering the many hours of debate which have preceded this amendment, the pressure of the holiday season and so on, bad tempers have been restrained as well as they have. You, sir, have presided over this chamber for so many hours during what I know has been a long and boring debate. No matter how long or how boring it may be in detail it is important in substance, because we are preserving something here by this action which I think Speakers in the future, who occupy the chair which you now occupy, will recognize as a tribute to our parliamentary system in so far as the establishment of the rights of minorities is concerned, of whatever political complexion they may be.

You have pointed out, sir, that it is very difficult to debate the amendment as such without also trespassing upon the main resolution; the two are so interwoven. You have a motion that the hours be extended indefinitely, and an amendment which extends the hours for a certain definite period. I think even a Philadelphia or a sea lawyer would find it very hard to establish the dividing line between the two. It is difficult to discuss the amendment without in some way infringing upon the main motion.

That, of course, has been recognized by you in the rulings you have given today permitting some latitude in this debate, and in maintaining the highest possible traditions of the Speaker's office. It is something which reflects credit upon Your Honour, and also upon the House of Commons as a whole.

There can be no question of imputing motives. There may have been at one time a misunderstanding, but the whole purpose of this debate has been to preserve certain rights.

Mr. Noseworthy: The right to go to bed early.

Mr. Nowlan: Yes; as one gets older one does think about that. Certainly, as was pointed out this afternoon, it is impossible to conduct business efficiently and deal with matters of importance, not only this one bill which is before us but other important measures, in the early hours of the morning. If this amendment is lost and another amendment is adopted by the house before ten o'clock, all of which are contingencies, it is quite possible that this house will be dealing with matters of importance to the nation; and certainly that cannot be done at three o'clock, four o'clock or five o'clock in the morning. That is why I suggest that the amendment not only preserves the rights of minorities or opposition groups; it goes further and assures that there shall be ample opportunity for intelligent discussion of measures which must be dealt with by this parliament before it ultimately prorogues.

The purpose of the first amendment, which was dealt with, was to establish the rights of minorities and the opposition in the face of what seemed like an attempt to steamroller this house. The amendment which is now before us accomplishes two purposes, not only assuring the rights of minority groups but also preserving the right of debate on those matters which may come before us. As has been said, the house has been sitting for a long time. I doubt, Mr. Speaker, even when you search parliamentary records, if you will find that a motion such as this amendment is attempting to avoid was adopted when there were still so many items on the order paper. We have all sat in parliaments which have sat through a night or a night and a day to clean up the business at the end of a session when there were only certain formal matters to be discussed. But that is not the situation here. Various matters of great importance have to be dealt with, and they cannot be dealt with in the manner suggested by the motion of the member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles).

I should like to urge again, although I believe this amendment should have been adopted earlier in the afternoon when the opportunity was given, that there is still an opportunity to proceed in an orderly way with the discussion until midnight. Then we could adjourn and go on with other matters tomorrow. If the house does not see fit to adopt this amendment, then I suggest that opposition groups will have to preserve their rights, and something must be done to do that. I shall not trespass longer on the time of the house, sir, except to reiterate that there is still an opportunity to accept the principle which is involved in the amendment.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. J. A. MacLean (Queens): Mr. Speaker, I should like to speak on this matter for a few moments because I feel that an extremely important principle is at stake. I feel that we in the opposition have a responsibility to the people whom we represent, and that it is at least as great as that of members who sit on the government benches. All we desire is to have the business of this house conducted in such a manner that we shall have ample opportunity to discuss the questions which are brought before us—and they are important ones at the present time—in a calm and reasoned fashion, under circumstances which will permit us to give them our intelligent, reasoned and unhurried attention. If that principle were recognized I feel that the business of this house would be expedited.

This afternoon I read with great interest a debate on this subject which took place in this house on March 18, 1926, when the present rules of the house were adopted. It was pointed out by many experienced politicians and statesmen of that time, including the late Mr. Lapointe, that we as a house should not sit on any occasion beyond the hour of eleven o'clock, in order that we should be in a position to give clear consideration to the important matters coming before us.

At this time, Mr. Speaker, there is still before us legislation which is of paramount importance to many people in this country. It is of great importance that the legislation about to be discussed should receive the best consideration we can give it.

We have certain responsibilities. I feel that we should not let the Christmas holidays interfere with the carrying out of our duties. I feel that we have a clear-cut duty to the people whom we represent, and that we should be willing to allow ourselves to be inconvenienced, if that is necessary, in order that the people whom we represent should be represented to the best of our ability. I maintain that we cannot accomplish this purpose at five o'clock and six o'clock in the morning, after having sat all day. I feel that this house should not, under any circumstances, sit beyond midnight.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Speaker: Is the house ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Speaker: The question is on the amendment. Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the amendment?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Fournier (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): Every one of the opposition said "no", Mr. Speaker. We all agree.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Does the house wish me to declare the amendment lost?

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Some hon. Members: No.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Speaker: Call in the members.

Mr. Fournier (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): They said no, but they will vote yes.

The house divided on the amendment (Mrs. Fairclough) which was negatived on the following division:

Mr. Cardiff: Mr. Speaker, I was paired. Had I voted, I would have voted for the amendment.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): I was paired with the hon. member for Middlesex West (Mr. McCubbin). Had I voted, I would have voted for the amendment.

On a question of privilege, I want to say that in a previous vote this day I voted on the understanding that the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) had declared that members were free to vote as they pleased. I did not feel that that statement applied to subsequent amendments, and so tonight I have announced my pair.

Mr. Catherwood: I was paired with the hon. member for Kent, Ont. (Mr. Huffman). Had I voted, I would have voted for the amendment.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, before the debate proceeds I would ask you to rule as to whether the motion before you is now in order. If you consider the motion you will see that it is no longer operative in relation to the statement contained in it.

Mr. Speaker: The leader of the opposition has asked me to rule on whether the motion is now in order, because some time has elapsed since it was introduced. He says it is inoperative. It is not wholly inoperative. I think that is the point. The hon. member will recall that the motion was allowed to stand after the noon recess, when part of it was inoperative. Now, because still another part is inoperative I do not think I should rule it out of order. I will allow the motion to stand.

Business of the House

Mr. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I think it is essential to consider what stage we are at in this procedure today. We have had presented to us in the main motion a suggestion that the house continue in continuous sitting until the order paper has been cleared, and then the suggestion that if the order paper is not cleared by Friday night the house shall reassemble on December 27 for the conclusion of business.

I have already protested against the situation that will prevail under those circumstances, whereby hon. members from more distant regions of Canada, if they perform their parliamentary duties, will be compelled to return to this place if the business is not completed on Friday, and either miss entirely that assembly at home that has become established in the customs of our country, the family gathering at Christmastime, or else, sir, have to leave on Christmas day to return to this city. I think if that proposal is carried out a really grave injustice will have been done.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member I think is addressing himself to the motion on the order paper, which is not now before the house.

Mr. Churchill: Well, there is a close linkage between the motion of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) and the statements made in the course of the debate on that motion.

Mr. Speaker: I cannot allow debate on a question which is on the order paper for tomorrow regarding the adjournment of the house.

Mr. Churchill: The motion as it stands is aimed at keeping this house in continuous session until the completion of business. We have pointed out that in our opinion this is a rather harsh treatment of the minority groups in the house. It compels them to continue without rest or relaxation, and suggests that matters which have not yet been debated will have to be considered on very short notice and under rather difficult conditions.

I believe an unusual record has been established at this session of parliament in extending it already beyond December 18, which has been normally the time for discontinuance on other occasions when parliament has assembled in the fall of the year. Looking at the various journals of the house I have noticed throughout that on occasions when parliament did meet in the fall the 18th or at the latest the 19th of December was the time when members were permitted to return to their homes.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Now, after strenuous days of sitting, either in committee or here in the house, mornings, afternoons and evenings, we are called upon by the motion to continue throughout the night. There have been occasions in the past when that procedure met with approval. I think a more orderly arrangement of business is desirable, and that it should be possible to complete the normal business of parliament without having to resort to all-night sessions. If some catastrophe occurred in this country, or if a state of national emergency existed, I would be the last one to object. But under present circumstances I find I cannot support this motion at all.

The hon. member who has moved the motion suggests we would have ample opportunity to discuss any of the matters brought before us. But I suggest that under those circumstances, on any occasion when parliament is in session, someone could come forward with a similar motion and say, "Let us keep on without ceasing, and we might be able to conclude the business of the session in about seven days." The holding of night sittings is one recognized way of wearing down an opposition. It may have been the hope of some hon. members in the house that the opposition would be worn down on this occasion, and that various measures would be passed through without debate.

I think surely for the first time in Canada's history we have had placed before us the suggestion that in order to get home for Christmas we must have all-night sittings of the house to wind up the business, and the suggestion put before hon. members that if that is not done they will not enjoy the Christmas season with their families. I confess that I have been seriously disappointed on this occasion. I anticipated being home long ere this, and having the opportunity to make preparations for the Christmas season. It has been a disappointment to me and to many other hon. members that this has not been possible. But when there is a principle at stake, as there is in this instance, members of the official opposition are prepared to stand their ground and establish the right of members on the opposition side of the house to speak their minds and discuss to the full measures before the house, presenting in this fashion the opinions of their constituents.

This is the only place that can be done. The hon. member for Waterloo South (Mr. Meeker) remarked to me this afternoon that, despite this long and drawn-out debate, despite the peculiar conditions that have prevailed during the last day or two, it really is a remarkable and very fine thing that in this country we can speak our minds with freedom. It is a privilege well worth maintaining.

During the course of my life I have had a profound respect for the institution of parliament. That is why, although new to this chamber, I have taken some part in the deliberations on this particular point. In any instance where there appears to me to be a limitation of the rights of private members, I hope I will be able to say something about it. The institution of parliament is too important to our country and to the British commonwealth to be lightly regarded.

On this particular occasion it has appeared to us—certainly it has to me—that some of the rights and privileges of private members have been in danger of being curtailed. I would much prefer that the well established rules of procedure of the House of Commons be followed without any such serious alterations as that suggested by the motion before us. This is an institution which at times has come in for considerable criticism by people outside. Alternative methods of government have been proposed elsewhere in the world. They have attracted the attention of some people, but I for one am thankful that I can hold fast to the parliamentary institution we have devised, with the rights of private members, and maintain unimpaired the privileges of members of parliament. If it were not for the fact that the privileges of members of parliament are in danger now of being curtailed I would not be participating in this debate. If this is to become a precedent for the future I think the time to oppose it is right now.

We had a first class suggestion that any similar attempt to alter the rules of the house should require adequate notice. If we had been given adequate notice of this particular proposal perhaps some compromise could have been worked out, or saner counsel might have prevailed. When from time to time the rules of the house are under consideration for alteration or change that is one thing that certainly should be taken into account. In view of the fact that the amendment which was proposed earlier was not acceptable to the house, and in view of the lateness of the hour, I propose the following amendment. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Middlesex East (Mr. White):

That the motion be amended by striking out all the words after "That" and substituting the following:

"for this day's sitting the house shall after the dinner recess sit from 8 p.m. to 10.30 p.m."

Mr. McIlraith: How ridiculous can you get?

Mr. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon): Mr. Speaker, like the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Churchill) who has just spoken, I am very thankful at this hour of the day and under these circumstances for the protection of the rules of the house.

Mr. McIlraith: Protection of the rules?

Mr. Pearson: Abuse of the rules.

Mr. Dinsdale: I am thankful to have the privilege of living in a democracy, because judging from the comments coming from members on the opposite side of the house just at about this stage of the proceedings we on this side would be eaten alive if it were not for the protection which is provided.

Mr. Mutch: Pretty indigestible.

Mr. Pearson: Tough.

Mr. Dinsdale: I admit it would be a bad case of indigestion.

Mr. Mutch: The word is "licence".

Mr. Dinsdale: Obviously the grand strategy of leaving several important pieces of legislation until the final week of the session, which has led up to the situation we face, was devised with the intention of avoiding the necessity of detailed debate. I imagine it was anticipated that members of the opposition would fold their tents like the Arabs and silently steal away. It must be a considerable disappointment to government members who hoped to deal with this legislation without having it given the attention it deserves. It seems to me that we might just as well have government by order in council if we are not going to be allowed full opportunity—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I do not like to interrupt the hon. member, but now that we have an amendment his remarks must relate to it and not to the main motion. There is an amendment before the house, and for the hon. member to be in order he must relate his remarks only to the amendment.

Mr. Sinnott: He wouldn't know. He is too young.

Mr. Dinsdale: I apologize if I have wandered from the amendment, but I was under the impression that in order to discuss the amendment it was necessary to deal with the major motion before us.

An hon. Member: You will know better now.

Mr. Dinsdale: We shall proceed to the discussion of the amendment that has just been introduced by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Churchill). He has proposed that we extend the sitting for the present day to the hour of 10.30 p.m. In view of the nature of today's discussion and the attempt to rush proceedings in order to meet the Christmas deadline, I heartily concur in the amendment. I do so because, as I have said previously in the discussion, there is a principle at stake. The only opportunity the minority has to indicate its wishes, intentions and desires is through the right of parliamentary discussion. I think the only solution for the present situation is to accept the amendment submitted by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre. Therefore I intend to vote for the amendment in the hope of thus being able to register a protest against the tactics that have been pursued in the house. This is the first time I have experienced them, but I understand they have been pursued on other occasions. In thus registering my protest I trust it will end once and for all the practice of railroading legislation, the practice of steamrollering legislation, and will provide for the logical and reasonable discussion required on the very important matters still remaining on the agenda.

Mr. Lesage: Mr. Speaker, I wish to draw your attention to citation 405 in Beauchesne's second edition, which reads as follows:

> The Speaker may refuse to propose an amendment which is in his opinion frivolous.

The amendment proposed by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre—

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, may I ask what the hon. member is—

Some hon. Members: He is on a point of order.

Mr. Lesage: The amendment proposed by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre was presented at ten minutes past nine. The normal closing hour is ten o'clock. After the childish delaying tactics that have been used by the opposition all day it is obvious that the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre not only is frivolous but has as its only aim to have us waste our time and the money of the people of Canada.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, this is a very late hour in the day for the hon. member to have discovered that the people of Canada are losing money because of the action of this government and those who support it. I would point out that we did not introduce the original motion.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I would ask the hon. member to speak on the point of order.

Mr. Drew: I am speaking to the point raised by the member who has just sat down. That hon. member raised a question to which Your Honour took no exception, that you should bear in mind that public money was being wasted. I propose to direct my attention to that remark for a few minutes. You have not ruled him out of order so I submit that that stands as a matter before the house and I propose to deal with it.

Mr. Lesage: On a question of privilege, I withdraw my remark that the opposition has been wasting the money of the public.

Mr. Drew: I am speaking on the point of order. I have this much respect for the views of the hon. member; I assumed that he was being serious. Perhaps I was wrong, but I assumed he was being serious and, therefore, that when he spoke of money that had been wasted by the discussion here he was placing that before you in support of his contention that this motion was frivolous. Otherwise it was a most frivolous comment and one that was entirely inexcusable under the circumstances.

The hon. member has raised the question of the waste of public money. May I remind you that the motion that caused this debate was introduced not by us but by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. It was received with immediate and solid acclaim by the members of the Liberal party. In spite of the opportunities which have been presented to proceed with the business of the house—

Mr. McIlraith: Let us vote.

Mr. Drew: I wish you would hear what I am saying, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I hear you very well.

Mr. Drew: I do not wish you to be in any difficulty in that respect, and for that reason I shall pause if I feel there may be any difficulty in your hearing. The situation is simply that we urged early in the day that this motion be abandoned so we could get ahead with the business of the house which dealt with the money of the people of Canada—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Drew: —which dealt with the money and the general interests of the people of this country. Later, so there could be no doubt about our position, we stated clearly that we wished the house to sit until twelve o'clock. Had that proposal been accepted—

Mr. Garson: On a point of order, I wonder if the leader of the opposition would inform us whether he is speaking to the point of order or in the debate.

An hon. Member: Filibuster.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, the minister of make-believe knows—

Mr. Garson: I think what my hon. friend is doing is leading his party into another Newfoundland fiasco.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is very difficult for me because there are two points of order before the house. Am I to understand that the leader of the opposition is speaking on the first point of order?

Mr. Drew: In view of the fact that the minister of make-believe was—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Garson: I rise to a point of order and suggest that when my hon. friend refers to the minister of make-believe he is not using a proper parliamentary term and should withdraw.

Some hon. Members: Withdraw.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I think that was one of the most generous expressions that have been used. May I point out that it was used by one of the members of the Liberal party. I would point out that the Minister of Justice took no—

Mr. Garson: I would like a ruling on the point of order.

Mr. Drew: I shall not give way until I have finished the sentence at any rate.

Some hon. Members: Withdraw.

Mr. Drew: I would point out—

An hon. Member: Name him.

An hon. Member: Who is running the house?

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I hope you heard the suggestion that you should name me. Not only do they want to wield a club over our procedure, they want to deny speech to hon. members of this house. I would point out that the term I employed was a term which I understood to be one of affection used by one of the Liberal members. I must say that it is an infinitely more generous term than could have been used in reference to a minister who broke the law which he is now seeking to have amended in this house. I return to the subject I was discussing when he interrupted.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): I believe the statement made by the leader of the opposition should be withdrawn, and it should be withdrawn now without any more discussion.

Mr. Fulton: On the point of order, may I point out that the expression—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: We have two points of order before the house.

Mr. Fulton: I was intending to deal with the most recently raised point. Am I correct in doing so?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The first one.

Mr. Fulton: As to whether or not the motion is in order.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It seems to me that the expression used by the leader of the opposition is not very courteous. I think it would be better not to use those expressions.

Mr. Drew: I am proceeding now to deal with the statement that was made in regard to money that had been wasted. In dealing with that—

Some hon. Members: Withdraw.

Mr. Sinclair: I also would like to rise on this point of order. The expression "minister of make-believe" is almost as offensive as though I were to call the leader of the opposition "a pompous jackass leading a bunch of filibusters." It is obviously true, nevertheless I would not use an expression like that about him in this house no matter what I thought about it. I think in fairness to the house the hon. member should withdraw his offensive expression "the minister of make-believe".

Mr. Drew: Had that remark come from anyone else but the member for Coast-Capilano I might have taken some notice, but in view of the fact that it came from a member who has so completely discredited himself in this debate I will not even bother paying any attention to it at this time. I was dealing with the subject of the cost of the proceedings to the taxpayer, and the point raised by the hon. member who spoke on that subject.

Mr. Garson: On the point of order; if I am not mistaken, what is now before the house is the point of order raised by the hon. member for Montmagny-L'Islet to the effect that the amendment now before the house is frivolous. That is the matter now before the house; and if the leader of the opposition is talking intelligently about anything at all he must be addressing himself to that point of order.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I do not expect the minister to whom I have referred to follow the debate closely because he never does. I am dealing with the point that was raised by the member who spoke about the amount of money that was being wasted. I was pointing out, when I was interrupted from several quarters, that the motion before the house is one that was introduced by the member for Winnipeg North Centre.

Mr. Garson: I must again rise on the point of order. I submit that the matter which is before the house at the present time is the point of order that the amendment is frivolous. I think we are entitled to have that ruled upon before we proceed to the next matter.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The point of order raised by the member for Montmagny-L'islet (Mr. Lesage) is that the amendment before the house is a frivolous one. I am ready to hear the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) on that point.

Mr. Drew: You see, Mr. Speaker, it would help a great deal if I were able to finish a single sentence, because that is exactly what I am dealing with. I was assuming, and perhaps wrongly, that the hon. member who raised the question about public money being wasted was speaking seriously, and was raising that in relation to his point of order that this was a frivolous motion. There was, of course, no other possible reason for him to raise it. If he will permit me to continue, and will follow the sequence, I would point out—

Mr. Warren: You cannot continue all night.

Mr. Drew: I was simply pointing out that the motion introduced by the member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), and which has been before us all day, is one that could have been disposed of long ago.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Drew: I do want you to hear me, Mr. Speaker. We have been dealing not simply with a question as to whether we would discuss one measure or another, but whether or not this house was going to sit all night and consequently not only be unable to do a job tonight but unable to do the work of this house tomorrow. That has been the real issue before the members of this house.

Mr. Warren: Why?

Mr. Drew: May I in courtesy answer the question of the hon. member? I shall explain to the hon. member, since he asked me, that the reason is that there was a motion introduced by the member for Winnipeg North Centre this morning, and there was an amendment introduced in relation to that motion. The motion was under discussion until early this afternoon—

Mr. Warren: Yes, all day.

Mr. Drew: I wish to explain to the hon. member, and give him an answer to his question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I will hear the leader of the opposition on the point of order.

Mr. Drew: I should like to finish my explanation to the hon. member in answer to his question. I shall just finish by saying that this afternoon, at a time when the hon. member was not here, there was another amendment introduced upon which a vote has recently been taken. That brings him up to date, except that the motion which has just been made introduced a further amendment.

Mr. Warren: I was here.

Mr. Drew: I am very happy to know that. Therefore we have brought the hon. member up to date on the proceedings.

When we come to the question of whether or not the motion is frivolous, may I suggest that this is a very late hour in the day to suggest that this amendment is frivolous.

Mr. Warren: It is not late.

Mr. Drew: I do regret that you are having so much difficulty in hearing this discussion. I shall wait until you are able to hear me without interruption. We have all day been discussing the original motion, and motions by way of amendment, which had to do with the time during which this house should sit today. Unless all the motions by way of amendment were frivolous, and that point has not been raised up to this time, then this motion must certainly not be frivolous. I say that because the substance of the motion is precisely the same, and there is simply a difference in time. The opposition is making an effort to co-operate with the government and find an hour that is agreeable to them. We are making that effort by a process of trial and error, or shall we say trial and refusal.

We now have before the house a suggestion that we should not, in view of the fact that we are approaching so close to the hour of ten o'clock, close off sharply at ten o'clock, but we should extend the time for another half hour. If members will accept this motion now, then they will have an opportunity to pave the way for an orderly discussion of the business which is coming before the house tomorrow. I suggest that unless any motion by way of amendment to set a time for the sitting of this house is regarded as frivolous, then this cannot be frivolous because the only difference between this and any other motion is that we have in our constant efforts to meet the wishes of the government—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Drew: —introduced a new time in the motion, in the hope that the members would give it their approval.

Mr. Garson: Mr. Speaker, if I may address just a few words to this point of order, I would point out that there was an amendment to the motion moved by the member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) to the effect that this house should sit until 10.15. After debate on it at great length by a number of speakers from the official opposition, it was voted upon and defeated. The motion is now moved to add another fifteen minutes to the time which has already been defeated, and I suggest that under those circumstances this amendment is frivolous.

Mr. Knowles: Perhaps the Minister of Justice will not mind if I say a word to correct what he said about the amendment moved by the member for Annapolis-Kings (Mr. Nowlan). The minister was right as to the total number of minutes that amendment added to the normal day's sitting, but that amendment proposed to add fifteen minutes at 6.15 rather than at ten o'clock at night.

The Minister of Justice has drawn attention to the real point of this amendment, namely that it proposes something which, in principle, the house has already turned down; that is, a short extension of today's sitting. I draw your attention not only to citation 405 which the member for Montmagny-L'Islet quoted, but to citation 413 which reads:

> No amendment shall call in question a principle on which the house has given a decision by a vote on a former amendment.

By its vote earlier today the house turned down the usefulness of a fifteen-minute extension. The house has also turned down the usefulness of a two-hour extension. To come along now and propose an extension by half an hour seems to me, whether it is frivolous or not, certainly to call in question a principle upon which the house has already given a decision.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I shall give a ruling on the point of order. I must say that many things came before the house which, in my opinion, were fairly frivolous. In my view the amendment is not any worse than many of the other things that came before the house. At this stage of the debate I think it is preferable to allow the amendment to stay before the house.

Mr. Fulton: What was your ruling, Mr. Speaker? We could not hear it.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The amendment stays before the house.

Mr. Fulton: You mean that it is in order? Thank you.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I was dealing with the question of the motion before the house. While this extension may not be as great as some hon. members would wish, I would point out that if there is any indication from the government—and of course I am dealing with this as a government motion because we know that it is—that they are prepared to support this motion, then we will have three-quarters of an hour in which to dispose of certain details.

Mr. Cleaver: After wasting the whole day.

Mr. Lesage: That shows how serious you are.

Mr. McIlraith: Keep your tongue out of your cheek when you talk in that way.

Some hon. Members: Steamroller.

Mr. Fulton: How about some of these unparliamentary expressions, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): To make it possible to carry on until 10.30 would this motion have to be voted on before ten o'clock?

Mr. Drew: Yes. To answer that question, I have indicated that if the leader of the house will say that he is prepared to support this amendment, then of course we can proceed with the business of the house until 10.30.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): He cannot speak for all the house.

Mr. Maltais: He cannot speak for me.

Mr. Fournier (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): He can speak for himself but not for me.

Mr. Drew: At this hour of the night and at this stage of the session—

Mr. Warren: What is wrong with this hour of the night?

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I wish to answer the hon. member's question. There is nothing wrong with this hour of the night. As a matter of fact it is a splendid hour of the night. We have been trying to suggest all day that this is a good hour of the night.

Mr. Warren: Yes; that is right.

Mr. Drew: We have been trying to suggest that we would do our business much better if we recognized that fact.

Mr. Warren: We do.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, at this hour of the night I am glad I have found one convert. I am at least pleased that my arguments have borne that much fruit anyway.

Some hon. Members: Question.

An hon. Member: Louder.

Mr. Warren: Question.

Mr. Drew: Oh, no. I wish the Speaker to have an opportunity to hear what is being said.

Mr. Warren: Time.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I was just pointing out to the hon. member who has come to the same conclusion that we have—

Mr. Fournier (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): You know why.

Mr. Drew: Yes, I know why.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): Quite a success. That is a victory.

Mr. Drew: As a result of the extended deliberations of the committee which was set up to consider the hours of business of this house, it was agreed by the members that ten o'clock was the time at which this house could best conclude its activities in the interests of the public business and in the interests of the members themselves. This matter of late sittings is no new subject. I should therefore like to recall that this subject has been under discussion in this house on a great many occasions in the past.

Mr. Warren: Do not bother. We know that.

Mr. Sinclair: There is your convert.

Mr. Drew: My hon. friend should realize that he is so completely converted that he needs no more assistance.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Warren: Don't bother about that.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I am seeking further converts now. I wish to read into the record what was said in this house on June 1, 1926, in regard to this question of late sittings, by the then hon. member for Macleod. It is recorded at page 3918 of Hansard of that year. He had this to say:

> I see no reason why a body of sensible and reasonable men could not devise rules under which we would not need to sit both night and day.
> I have read lately with much interest a speech which was delivered in this house in the year 1907. I would like to present to the house, and I will guarantee not to take more than a few minutes, a few of the statements made on that occasion by Mr. Wright, the then member for South Renfrew—

Not North Renfrew.

> —because they deal with this particular question and they seem to me to be very pertinent.
> Mr. Wright on that occasion called attention to the long hours that had to be put in and the arduous work that a private member had to do if he took his duties seriously, as I think every member of parliament should. I know personally of one member of this house, who was at work yesterday morning at twenty minutes to nine. That member was still here last night at midnight, and was then asked to vote on a motion to adjourn the debate. Any member who voted against that motion was liable to the censure of a large number of the members of this house. That member had to be here again this morning to attend to his correspondence, then he had to attend a certain committee at 10.30, stay there until one o'clock, then rush out and get his lunch, and get back to this chamber at three o'clock this afternoon, and possibly he will be required to stay here until midnight again tonight. I ask the house and the government if that is a sensible way to carry on the business of this country. If these remarks apply to the private member, they apply with even greater force to the Prime Minister and to the members of the government. What chance have these men to get a decent night's sleep under such conditions?

Mr. Speaker, that question has been asked over and over again. What chance has anyone to get a decent night's sleep if irregular hours are called for, and what chance has any member to do the business of this house the following day in a manner which indicates that he is able to devote to that subject the attention which it deserves?

This again is a subject which has been dealt with at Westminster as well. In an excellent publication which has just appeared within the past few weeks, entitled "The House of Commons at Work" by Eric Taylor, I find this reference to long hours of siting:

> It used to be the case—

Mr. Cleaver: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Might I ask your ruling as to whether the leader of the opposition is speaking to the amendment?

Mr. Fraser: Certainly he is speaking to the amendment.

Mr. Speaker: I must admit I have not heard all that has been said by the leader of the opposition, as I just came to the chair a couple of minutes ago. From what I heard it did occur to me that he is speaking more on hours generally. He is referring to late sittings, and the amendment before the house is merely for an additional half hour. Under the circumstances I do not think that could be considered a late sitting.

Mr. Drew: That is exactly the point, Mr. Speaker. I am supporting my argument that it is not wise to go beyond 10.30, in view of the position this debate has now reached, and I am calling to my support arguments that have been made in regard to that very matter.

Mr. Cleaver: On the point of order, Mr. Speaker, I understood the leader of the opposition to say that he was talking against and citing references and authorities in opposition to the main motion. The amendment he is supporting is that we should adjourn at 10.30.

Mr. Drew: That is quite right. We have been pointing out that it does relate to 10.30, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact that our earlier efforts to find an hour that was suitable to the government did not meet with success, we are putting forward an hour that perhaps might meet with greater success, and I am bringing to my support responsible writers on parliamentary procedure to indicate that perhaps it is better to fix the maximum hour as 10.30 in the hope that the government, since they would not accept our earlier amendment, may accept this one.

Mr. Cleaver: Let us vote and find out.

Mr. Drew: I will read this:

> It used to be the case, until 1888, that the house sat on until members were too tired to talk any more.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Drew: I continue:

> There was always a danger of some grossly healthy individuals arriving as fresh as paint about 10 o'clock, and keeping other members who had borne the burden and heat of the day out of bed until the small hours. Many a man has found his constitution seriously impaired by the strain of assiduous attendance until late hours. "Here I am again," writes Macaulay to his sister in 1831, "sitting up in the House of Commons until three o'clock five days in the week, and getting indigestion at great dinners the remaining two." Some famous statesmen seemed to be especially constituted for this sort of life: Palmerston, for instance, who was quite as fresh at three o'clock in the morning as at three o'clock in the afternoon; Sir Robert Peel, whose capacity for endurance must have been prodigious, and Gladstone, whose habit of keeping the house into the early hours of the morning roused members to constant fury.

Then there is a further discussion of certain of the rules. If I may, I should like to read one sentence more:

> The survivors were limp and sleepy, and even the higher officials seemed in a state of abject misery.

Mr. Speaker: May I just comment on the point made. I do think that the extract the leader of the opposition read refers more to the main motion than to the amendment, as a reason why the main motion should not be adopted. May I ask him to direct his remarks to the amendment and endeavour to establish why the amendment should be adopted.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I have put on record certain views which it seemed to me were indicative of reasons why the amendment is necessary; and after all, in order to demonstrate why an amendment which would prevent our sitting all night is necessary, it does seem to be desirable to bring forward arguments which support that proposition. The reason this amendment is before the house is that we have not yet succeeded in our earlier attempts at finding an hour that was satisfactory to the government.

Mr. Cleaver: You are only fooling yourself when you talk that way.

Mr. Lesage: That is easy.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Drew: I prefer to accept statements of a minister of the crown as to what the position of the government is in regard to this matter, and I had been hoping that perhaps the leader of the house might have indicated some willingness to deal with it.

Mr. Gardiner: He has not had a chance.

Mr. Drew: However, he has not done so. I am afraid my time is limited to put forward all the views that I should have liked to mention on this amendment.

Mr. Cleaver: Read some more magazines.

Mr. Drew: But I do want to say this, Mr. Speaker. No amendment that has been put forward today, and certainly not this motion by way of amendment, has been put forward in any frivolous manner.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Drew: If I have met—

Mr. Garson: To what a level the grand old Tory party has sunk.

Mr. Drew: If I have met laughter with laughter it is simply because it seemed desirable to treat the levity of the government in that way instead of treating it with the anger that those who believe in the responsibilities of parliament should express in regard to conduct of this kind. What this amendment was directed to was to attempt to destroy the opportunity for debate by forcing hon. members to sit all night and until tomorrow, at a time when there is important business before the house.

Mr. Knowles: It is entirely against the rules of order to impute motives other than those stated by the person concerned. That was not the motive of the motion I moved at eleven o'clock this morning.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, —

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): Ten o'clock.

Some hon. Members: Ten o'clock.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am able to see the o'clock.

Mr. Drew: After all, Mr. Speaker, I am simply indicating quite clearly what the obvious effect of the motion is, and I hope what has happened today will convince this government that the opposition has rights and that they are not going to submit to the big stick. However, I ask you to call it ten o'clock.

Mr. Speaker: Order. It being ten o'clock I propose to adjourn this house.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I do not think this would be the time to come to some agreement, so I had better announce the business of the house for tomorrow. I hope that tomorrow everybody will be in a very good mood and we can proceed with the business of the house.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): We will.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I know the hon. gentlemen will co-operate tomorrow perhaps more than today. There are two government notices of motion: one by the Secretary of State for External Affairs and one by the Prime Minister. We will not proceed with the motion in the name of the Secretary of State for External Affairs before dealing with Bill No. 36 to amend the Combines Investigation Act, but after that tomorrow we will take up that resolution, and then we will take up Bill No. 15, also concerning external affairs, and Bill No. 23, to amend the Government Annuities Act; the resolution in the name of the Minister of Agriculture; and if time were left, we would take up the amendment to the Public Works Act. I have not said a word during the debate today because I did not see that I could be of any help, but tomorrow anything I can do to help the house come to some agreement to pass legislation—well, I am at your disposal.

Mr. Adamson: Talk to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles).

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to the order of the house passed on November 2, 1951.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, December 21, 1951

The house met at eleven o'clock.

PRIVILEGE

REFERENCE TO REMARK IN DEBATE OF LEADER OF THE OPPOSITION

Mr. J. M. Dechene (Athabaska): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I do not very often take up the time of the house. May I remind hon. members that I have not taken one minute during this session. Yesterday afternoon perhaps I was somewhat out of order when, good-naturedly and in the spirit of Christmas at this time of the year when we are again preparing to celebrate the anniversary of the Prince of Peace, I interjected, when the leader of the opposition was speaking, the words "Merry Christmas". If I did wrong I am willing to apologize but I do not think I did, and I do not think I deserved the answer made by the hon. gentleman. I have last night's Ottawa Journal which carries this report as to what the leader of the opposition replied:

> "I am glad to see one of the members has anticipated the season," said Mr. Drew.

Such an insinuation was not deserved by me from that or any other corner of the house. I remind the hon. gentleman that those who live in glass houses should not throw stones. But this matter goes further.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Dechene: I wish to take just a few minutes, Mr. Speaker. The hon. members who are calling order have wasted hours and hours during this session and I have not. I am getting to be an aged man. I have been in public life for fifty years. I was elected a member of the Alberta legislature over thirty years ago, and I can boast that the reputation I left there is a good one. So far as the electors of the constituency of Athabaska are concerned, an unjust, unfair and uncalled-for insinuation of that kind will not do me any harm because I am too well known. It will only mean that the hon. gentleman's party will lose the few votes they had in that constituency. I am entitled to say that. I have some justice coming to me in this house as well as the hon. gentleman. I can trace my ancestry back to 1764.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker,—

Mr. Fraser: There is a limit.

Mr. Speaker: Probably the hon. member has gone far enough.

Mr. Dechene: I have a family to defend and a reputation to protect.

Mr. Speaker: I do not think the hon. member's reputation has been attacked in this house. I have given him considerable latitude. Probably he might conclude with a few remarks.

Mr. Dechene: I was only going to make a few more remarks. Ever since 1774 and the passing of the Quebec Act both sides of my family have been represented in the House of Commons or in the legislature either of Quebec or of Alberta. I am proud of that; and we will not stop there. That is why I felt I had to raise this matter and deny the insinuation.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I must confess that I am wholly unable to understand what the hon. member for Athabaska is speaking about. It will be recalled that during the debate yesterday, at a time when I was speaking and when we were discussing matters before the house, there was a very loud and clear interjection, "Merry Christmas, Merry Christmas". I said I was very pleased to note that one hon. member was anticipating the season. I think a great many hon. members have indicated clearly that they are anticipating it. It was in that sense I meant my remark, and if the hon. member has taken any other meaning I am sure he has taken a meaning that was not the proper or correct interpretation of the words.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, today is another day, and I am sure we were all glad this morning when we got up to see that the blustery weather of yesterday had subsided. I thank the leader of the opposition for the remarks he has made about the hon. member who raised a question of privilege. I am sure all hon. members understood the remark of the leader of the opposition in the sense he has indicated and not as disparaging in any way, because I know that all members hold the hon. member for Athabaska in high regard and recognize that he deserves our respect and friendship.

Business of the House

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

MOTION FOR ADJOURNMENT UNTIL THURSDAY, DECEMBER 27

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, yesterday I indicated in reply to an observation from the other side of the house that if it should prove necessary for hon. members to return after Christmas to complete the business of the session I would give notice today that the government would move to apply closure in respect of the second reading of Bill No. 36. That statement was made on the assumption that both yesterday and today would have been taken up with the debate on second reading of that bill, and it would have been made rather clear that repetitious debate might go on indefinitely under the ordinary rules. As a matter of fact the bill was not debated yesterday, and the government wishes it to be abundantly clear that no member is to be deprived of his right to make his position quite clear on that bill. I will therefore not give any such notice today, and I hope that the progress that may be made under the ordinary rules will be such that it will not be appropriate to give that notice at any time.

With respect to the notice of motion that has been on the order paper, that was not put on in any arbitrary spirit but merely because I felt that, if it should become clear that we could not finish the business of the house before Christmas, hon. members would wish to have at least a long week end for Christmas, and that would require a derogation from the orders that have been made. When notices of motion are called, if it were satisfactory to the house, I would ask to have this motion stand until some time later today so that we could see then whether or not it will be appropriate to have it discussed. If, on the other hand, members prefer to have it dealt with immediately, I would of course move it in its regular order. But if it could stand until some time later today, it may be that we shall then see what would best suit the convenience of hon. members, because it is not the wish of the government to be arbitrary in this respect.

On the order:

Government notice of motion—The Prime Minister —Resolved, that notwithstanding any other previous order of this house, when this house adjourns on Friday, December 21, 1951, unless it be otherwise ordered at that time, it stand adjourned until Thursday, December 27, 1951, at eleven o'clock a.m.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Stand until later this day, if that is agreeable.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Mr. St. Laurent.]

TRADE

DUMPING OF TEXTILES ON CANADIAN MARKET

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. A. Charlton (Brant-Wentworth): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Is the minister aware that nylons and textiles are being dumped on the Canadian market to the detriment of thousands of Canadian workers? Are any effective measures being taken to relieve this serious unemployment situation.

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): If it is true, Mr. Speaker, that textiles are being dumped, the recourse is to the Department of National Revenue who have remedial legislation for that situation. Of course, it has to be proven that dumping is taking place. It is not a matter for the Department of Trade and Commerce, but whoever feels injured should take up the matter with the Department of National Revenue.

Mr. Charlton: May I ask the Minister of National Revenue if he has had any representations on this subject?

Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue): I think there is a misconception in the minds of a great number of members of parliament, and the public, as to what constitutes dumping according to the law. Dumping occurs when goods from a foreign country are imported into this country at a price lower than that at which they are sold to the jobber, wholesaler or consumer in the country of origin. This is a matter which is under careful consideration every day, and the record shows that we have not evidence that dumping is actually taking place with regard to textiles.

There has been some dumping, and when it has occurred the dumping duty has been applied. This means that the invoice has been raised to a price comparable to that at which the goods are sold in the country of origin and both tariff and sales taxes are applied upon that new invoice price. As I have said, the situation is carefully reviewed continuously, and if there are occasions on which the dumping duty can be rightfully applied it will be and has been applied.

FISHERIES

STORMS IN NOVA SCOTIA—DAMAGE TO FISHERMEN'S EQUIPMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. A. M. Kirk (Digby-Yarmouth): Is the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Fisheries aware of the loss and damage that has been occasioned fishing gear and equipment in southwest Nova Scotia owing to the severe storms that took place this week, with winds reported as high as eighty miles an hour lashing the coast? If he is aware, is he prepared to order an immediate investigation by officials of his department to ascertain the extent of this damage, and consider what means may be adopted to assist the fishermen who have had such severe financial losses?

Mr. J. Watson MacNaught (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Fisheries): I thank the hon. gentleman for giving me notice of his question. The Department of Fisheries is aware that there were severe storms in southwest Nova Scotia, but no reports have been received concerning the extent of damage that may have been done.

INTERNATIONAL PEACE GARDEN

GRANT FOR DEVELOPMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): My question to the Minister of Resources and Development arises out of an answer which he gave to a question of mine appearing in Hansard for Wednesday, December 19, 1951, at page 2190. Will reconsideration be given to the matter of continuing the $15,000 grant to the international peace garden? I should like to ask the minister if it is not possible, in view of the large sums we are spending on defence, to continue paying these few dollars in support of a project dedicated to peace.

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Resources and Development): Mr. Speaker, I think the answer in Hansard was as full as one could give. These matters always receive the consideration of the government when consideration is required.

[Later:]

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. As reported in Hansard of December 19 at page 2190, in reply to a question by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) concerning this peace garden project to which there has been some reference this morning, the Minister of Resources and Development intimated that certain members of the house had already made representation. I should like to indicate that, along with the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Ross), some weeks ago I approached the minister on this matter. As is well known to the members of this house, the peace garden project was one of the major interests of my predecessor in this house, the late Mr. J. E. Matthews.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: This matter is not one of privilege. Unless the hon. member is allowed to make a brief statement—

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: Then I am afraid I cannot allow the hon. member to continue.

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Resources and Development): As to that particular question, Mr. Speaker, I think it only fair to say that I was also approached by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson), by our party whip, the hon. member for Portage-Neepawa (Mr. Weir), by the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Ward) and by the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Winkler).

Mr. Mutch: Look around this way too.

Mr. Winters: In fact, I think it is safe to say that I have been approached by virtually every member from the province of Manitoba.

NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY

QUESTION AS TO SUPPLYING FREE WHEAT AND ALUMINUM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): In view of the stage of the session which we have reached, I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs in relation to an article which appears in the December 22 issue of the Financial Post. This very responsible publication makes the positive statement that requests by NATO nations that Canada supply them with economic aid in the form of free Canadian wheat and aluminum promise to become a highly controversial issue. Then it goes on to say that thus far Canada has given a flat rejection.

I should like to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs if he is in a position to inform the house concerning this matter, especially in view of the fact that other governments have already dealt with subjects arising out of the discussions relating to this very problem. It would seem that we should have some information about our position before we terminate this session.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): In regard to that matter I can only say this at this time: No report has yet been received by the government from the temporary committee of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, that is the twelve members who have been charged with the responsibility of going into this whole question of resources and requirements. What has happened is that an executive board of that committee consisting of three members has drafted a report to the committee of twelve, and that committee of twelve is still considering that report. The consideration has not yet been completed and may not be completed for a fortnight or so. Until a report comes from the committee of twelve, and not merely the committee of three, it would be obviously inappropriate for me to make any comment on this matter.

Mr. Graydon: There is a good supply of committees, anyway.

IMMIGRATION

IMMIGRANTS FROM UNITED KINGDOM—AVAILABILITY OF EMPLOYMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. K. Fraser (Peterborough West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration (Mr. Harris), as I have had cases of immigrants from the United Kingdom who have been stranded in my own district owing to the fact that they have not been able to secure work. Will the minister say what is being done to look after those people who cannot find work in Canada at the present time?

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): As the hon. member knows, Mr. Speaker, immigrants from the United Kingdom are, by our laws, free to come here whether there is assured employment for them or not. Nevertheless the government attempts to find employment for those people both through the settlement service of the Department of Citizenship and Immigration and also through the good offices of the national employment service of the Department of Labour. If my hon. friend has any particular persons in mind and will let us know about them, we will do our best to place them. Nevertheless, we do not necessarily accept full responsibility for those who may be free to come here without assured employment.

Mr. Fraser: Mr. Speaker, I may say to the minister that these people were assured of employment before they came over.

UNITED STATES SELECTIVE SERVICE

CANADIANS WORKING IN THE UNITED STATES—IMMIGRATION VISAS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson). On December 19 certain questions were asked of the minister with regard to the United States selective service act as it affects Canadian citizens. I asked the minister if there was any consultation between the two governments and the minister replied:

I would have to look into that.

I wonder if the minister has looked into the matter and if he can tell us whether there has been consultation or if our government has made any representations with regard to this matter, since it affects Canadian citizens in the United States?

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I have some additional information on this matter which deals with the question which has just been raised by my hon. friend. The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar asked the other day if the action of the United States in this matter of the application of the United States selective service act to Canadians was unilateral with respect to Canada and not to other nations. That was one of his questions. The reply to that is that the United States law is applicable to all aliens "residing in the United States" except those who are nationals of a country with which there is in effect a treaty or international agreement exempting the nationals of that country from military service while they are within the United States. No treaty or agreement of this nature exists between Canada and the United States.

In reply to the other part of the question which the hon. member asked me, I may say that no representations have been made to the United States government except in a number of individual cases in which it seemed that there had been an incorrect application of the law by local authorities. In such cases representations were made.

The hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe) and the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) inquired about the position of students and temporary employees. The regulations are somewhat complex in this matter, but ordinarily bona fide students receive specific student visas and are not required to register in the United States under the selective service act. Persons temporarily employed in the United States for periods of less than six months similarly are not required to register and in consequence do not come within the provisions of the act unless their period of employment exceeds six months.

Mr. Coldwell: Would it not be well to endeavour to negotiate with the United States a treaty similar to that which exists between the United States and certain other countries whose nationals are not treated as Canadian nationals are being treated under the selective service act of the United States?

Mr. Pearson: We can give consideration to this; but I am not sure that there is any such treaty between the United States and other countries covering this matter.

Mr. Coldwell: I took it from what was said that there were such treaties.

Mr. Pearson: I said if there was such a treaty; whether there are any treaties or not, I do not know. Whether Canada should have such a treaty is another matter, and we can look into it.

CHINA

EXPORT OF CANADIAN FUNDS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. K. Fraser (Peterborough West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson). As the United States have put into force the trading with the enemy act with regard to funds going to communist China, has the Department of Justice considered putting into force the defence of the realm act with regard to Canadian funds going to communist China?

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): Not as yet.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

IMPORTATION OF REFRIGERATORS—LAY-OFFS IN CANADIAN PLANTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. W. Hodgson (Victoria, Ont.): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) or to the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann), or probably both, in view of the fact that I have had representations from some labour men in my riding who are employed making parts for refrigerators. They claim that last year less than 500 refrigerators came from the United States whereas this year the number is 98,000, and that they are affected by having lay-offs in the plant owing to this fact. I was wondering whether the minister has had any similar representations from any other sections of the country.

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I have had representations; but I think the facts are that resale price maintenance has had more to do with the situation than has dumping.

Mr. Fraser: The 15 per cent excise tax.

Mr. Howe: The 15 per cent excise tax applies on imports as well as on home manufactures.

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT

AMENDMENT TO FORBID THE FIXING OF SPECIFIC OR MINIMUM RESALE PRICES

The house resumed, from Wednesday, December 19, consideration of the motion of Mr. Garson for the second reading of Bill No. 36, to amend the Combines Investigation Act, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Fulton.

Mr. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, on the evening just before the big storm I was on my feet addressing the house on the question of this particular bill. This morning I propose to curtail my remarks materially in order that the business may be proceeded with. What I have to say will redirect the attention of the house to the legislation that has been before us.

To recapitulate briefly what I said the other evening, I had drawn attention to the fact that, on October 9, an indication had been given that legislation would be brought down dealing with this particular subject and that it was not until December 17 that the bill appeared before the house. I was going on from that point to indicate that there was a serious weakness in this legislation. I had intended making a comparison between legislation which has in it good features and meets with general approval and legislation which does not meet with general approval and which therefore must, on the face of it, be considered to be unsound.

Resuming my remarks at that point, I would say that we have had evidence in this session that legislation that has met with general approval has passed through this house without great delay. There has been full debate and discussion, but no great delay. An example of that is the legislation dealing with pensions for disabled veterans. But I point out to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) that there are many examples to show that this legislation does not meet with general approval. The lengthy debate that has ensued upon it is one bit of evidence. The fact that supporters of the government side have risen to express their lack of approval of this legislation is another indication, and the general public reaction, showing a divided opinion throughout the country, indicates that this is definitely contentious legislation, and contentious legislation normally gets a rough passage through the House of Commons, as is quite proper.

Along with many members of the public, I was not very well informed with regard to the subject of resale price maintenance, until this debate was entered upon in this house and the committee held its varying sittings. My first reaction to the subject must have been the reaction of many people. I thought that something should be done about it. Then I discovered that resale price maintenance affected only a small part of the retail business, and I modified my opinion. I noticed from the report that in the early stages Mr. McGregor said, when asked a question as to how extensive was this practice, that he had heard the figure of 5 per cent, 10 per cent, 15 per cent and perhaps 30 per cent. That changes the picture for one who is looking at it for the first time. Subsequently, figures were produced showing that it was in the drug business that resale price maintenance was more extensive than say in the grocery business. Then I discovered that this practice had been in existence for a great many years, and I wondered why no action had been taken before. Why was this particular moment of time selected for action on resale price maintenance?

During the course of the sittings of the committee hearing and from members who were on it and subsequently in debate in the house here I discovered that not all the evidence was heard by the committee and not all the submissions that were to be presented to that committee were considered or heard. That raised a doubt in my mind as to the effectiveness of the work of the committee, and of the value of the legislation that was proposed. I read with the greatest interest Mr. McGregor's submission to the committee. I naturally, as members of the public do, respect his judgment in matters of this kind because of his lengthy experience; but I did notice that Mr. McGregor, after 25 years' experience with combines investigations, with knowledge of resale price maintenance, was not aware of the extent of the practice. At page 607 of the committee's evidence, at the top of the page, in reply to a question put to Mr. McGregor, asking him about the effect the proposed legislation would have on the cost of living, he made this answer:

> Mr. St. Laurent had in mind, I presume, that a very inconsiderable number of items that are included in the cost of living index are in the price maintained area. After all, resale price maintenance does affect only one segment of all retail selling.
> Q. What percentage? A. I have heard estimates from 10 to 15 to 30 per cent.
> Q. You don't know definitely? A. No, I don't.

If Mr. McGregor does not know I certainly do not know, and I imagine the general public does not know, and it did occur to me that surely a committee investigating this matter should have been able to bring out the evidence to indicate the extent of this practice. Reading Mr. McGregor's evidence I noticed he was of the opinion that there were too many outlets which, again in his opinion, were sustained by resale price maintenance. That is, he intimated that there were some stores operating in the country whose existence perhaps could be maintained only because of the advantage the storekeeper gained by having on his shelves articles sustained in price by resale price maintenance. Well, that I judged was an opinion, and perhaps the opinion of other people would be just as valuable or of some value in offsetting Mr. McGregor's opinion. If there has been an increase in the number of outlets, the number of retail stores, you would have to consider in connection with that the increase in the population. You cannot just take a figure and say, well, there are several hundred or a thousand more stores than there were a few years ago, without at the same time deciding on what has been the extent of the increase in the population. So it seemed to me that that was not a particularly weighty opinion, and I was a bit disturbed—I do not want to do any injustice to Mr. McGregor—at what appears from the evidence as perhaps a lack of concern on his part as to whether some of these outlets, as they were called, should be discontinued. Then again I began to consider in my mind the possible effects of this legislation, and I looked to see what Mr. McGregor would say with regard to that. I found that he said it might have a pretty disturbing effect for the time being. Well, that means that conditions, if they would not be chaotic—perhaps that is too wide a term to use—nevertheless if rather upsetting conditions would prevail for a considerable period of time among the retail merchants, that, I think, is a bit unsettling to everybody who is concerned with stability within our society.

I do not think any great benefit would result to our country if pretty disturbing effects are felt by the passage of this legislation and the abolition of resale price maintenance. It is for that reason I would suggest that certain delay might very well be considered until all the implications of the possible effects of this legislation have been considered. The small retail merchant, I know, from lengthy experience in small towns and in cities, is a person whose position deserves consideration and a certain amount of protection. The retail merchant, as has been pointed out—I do not want to repeat all the things that have been said before—in most of our cities and towns occupies a commanding position. Certainly in any town in which I have lived the retail merchant is a solid citizen. He has land and owns property in the business section of the town. He owns residential property, and is interested in the future of the community in which he lives. He takes a keen interest in the development of that community, and frequently is to be found on municipal councils and school boards.

If there is some advantage to be gained by the retail merchant through resale price maintenance, an advantage that has cost the consumer something extra—and this has not yet been proved to my satisfaction—but if that should be so, is it not a just and reasonable price to pay for a very effective and useful community service?

Those are some of the thoughts that have passed through my mind with regard to the retail merchant. I would not like to see his position disturbed. In the constituency I have the honour to represent there exists one of the greatest shopping centres in Canada. I refer to the celebrated Portage avenue, which extends from Main street, westward to the city limits for a very considerable distance, and for most of that distance has on either side of it business establishments.

We have the large departmental stores, chain stores and all manner of smaller retail stores. Within that area there is a difference of opinion with regard to this particular matter. My understanding, from the evidence given to the committee and statements made here in the house, is that the large retail stores are not particularly concerned about the legislation and are not opposing it, whereas the smaller retail merchant is offering vigorous opposition. There is a conflict of interest there.

I have been hearing from my constituents on this matter. I have had more than thirty communications on the mimeographed form to which attention has been drawn earlier this session, and I have had between fifteen and twenty telegrams from businessmen who are seriously concerned with this problem. And the consumers, certainly with no more information than I had when I first came to this session, as well as information that emerged from the investigation by the committee of the house, and of course interested in a reduction in the cost of living, and being influenced by statements in the speech from the throne and other remarks earlier in the session, have naturally sent communications to me concerning this matter. They have hoped that this would be one way in which the cost of living would be reduced.

Retail merchants, with a greater knowledge of the facts, have sent telegrams and letters to me suggesting that it would not be a good thing, and that it should be opposed.

Again I suggest to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) that there is a distinct conflict of opinion in the constituency I represent, and that that should be taken into account.

I shall conclude with just these few remarks. My consideration of the problem indicates that a very small segment of the problem of the retail merchant is concerned. The figure of 15 per cent has been suggested as one which might be acceptable. I have come to the conclusion that no effect will be felt by way of a reduction in the cost of living. I have reached the conclusion that the retail merchants would desire some protection against the loss-leader practice, if this legislation goes through. I have reached the further conclusion that the small retail merchant is in danger.

Consequently I suggest that in view of this divided opinion in the house and in the committee, and in the community at large, legislation such as this should be postponed for more complete investigation. If it is the determination of the government to pass it there should be more than just a verbal assurance that the small merchant will be protected. Something should be included in the measure to give him that protection.

In any case I think delay would be a sensible procedure, until the full implications of this proposed legislation are considered. So far as I am concerned, I say that three conditions should be satisfied before the legislation is passed:

The first condition I have laid down is this, to establish convincing evidence that resale price maintenance is detrimental to the public interest.

Secondly, produce evidence that the abolition of resale price maintenance will result in a decrease in the cost of living of the consumer.

Third, produce evidence that the abolition of resale price maintenance will not harm the smaller retailer.

Mr. J. A. Charlton (Brant-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, notwithstanding the suggestion made in the house recently by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) and also the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Cleaver) that no purpose would be served by further debate on this measure, I wish to make one suggestion to hon. members that I believe warrants their consideration as to how far this house should go in approving the measure now before us.

This whole price discussion started in 1948 with a committee of the house set aside to debate it. From that, a royal commission was set up. Then the MacQuarrie committee was established to study, supposedly, the findings of the royal commission, and to carry forward the study of the Combines Investigation Act.

Then, this fall, just before the beginning of the session, apparently the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) was very anxious to get a report from the MacQuarrie committee, and asked that committee to give him an interim report with respect to combines legislation or, more particularly, price maintenance practices.

During the debate in reply to the speech from the throne the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) made this very clear statement on October 15, as reported at page 42 of Hansard:

> I do not think that is going to have a very substantial effect on the index of the cost of living.

That was very plain. It was a plain statement by the Prime Minister to the effect that, although the government was bringing forward this legislation, he did not believe it would have any great effect on the cost of living.

However, instead of bringing down the legislation earlier in the session the government set up another committee of the House and the Senate to study further, at tremendous cost to the country, this proposition. What did this committee accomplish? It served only to confuse the issue and failed to make any material contribution or provide any enlightenment on the question. What happened yesterday can be described only as a club being held over the heads of members of our party.

Being a farmer I was interested in the brief presented by the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, as was the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Boucher), but not quite from the same angle. I cannot understand the attitude taken by the Canadian Federation of Agriculture in connection with this particular matter. I should like to quote what I think is a very significant statement which appears in the brief, as follows.

> The government of Canada for many years has recognized that modern industry has produced a set of conditions which are radically different from, let us say, a hundred years ago, when economic activity was based largely on relatively small industrial units in active competition with one another. The steady growth of large scale business concerns has tended to create concentrations of economic power which fosters the growth of monopolistic competition or imperfect competition rather than the simple competition of classical economic theory.

I think you, sir, and other members of this house, will agree with that old saying that it is the little things that count. The very foundation of our country and of democracy is the little things. They are the backbone of any nation. The little farmers, the little businesses, the little industries, the little communities; they are the things that count. What has happened? In the last few years big farmers have been buying up little farmers; big business has been absorbing little businesses; big industries are buying up little industries; big communities are swallowing up little communities.

The normal business practice over the past one hundred years— it will probably be the same in the future—has been to eliminate opposition. This process has been speeded up considerably in the last few years, apparently with the blessing of this government. Is it that the government are not satisfied, and we are now being asked to add legislation to the statute books in this hasty manner which obviously will accelerate that procedure and centralize to the extreme?

This in effect is nothing more than "mail-order catalogue legislation" brought in by the now tabulated minister of make-believe to quiet down public concern over the increasing cost of living. The Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and one other member that I know of—I heard him say it—have indicated that it will have very little effect on the cost of living.

The federation of agriculture has always tried to get more stable markets for agricultural products by fixing the prices of various commodities. That has been the policy of our farm organizations for years, and I agree with it. But what has been sauce for the goose should be sauce for the gander. We cannot make fish of the one and flesh of the other. It is significant that at a time when we are moving toward the acceptance of policies designed to give price stability in the field of agricultural products a measure should come before this parliament that would outlaw such practices in another field.

Agricultural price legislation was brought into being after many years of study, a more detailed study than has been given to this measure having to do with the field of retail prices. The agricultural price legislation was given the closest study by agricultural groups from British Columbia to the maritimes, and by government officials, provincial and federal, all across the country. In some cases it has resulted in legislation which serves to establish even the retail price to the consumer. If it is right and lawful in the one field, why is it not so in the other?

I submit that if such a large group of people in Canada have come to this conclusion after a very detailed study, more detailed than has been given to this measure, then we should tread lightly in destroying a similar practice in the general merchandising field in this country. I know the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) is quite familiar with this trend in the marketing of agricultural products.

I am sure that this house will await with interest an explanation from him as to how this practice can be so good in one case and so detrimental in another, as his colleague, the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson), would have us believe.

In closing I should like to give one note of warning to hon. members who may be still inclined to support this measure. If the government persists in placing this ill-considered, hasty and far-reaching legislation on the statute books of this country they will by their action sow the seeds that will eventually destroy the whole basis upon which the marketing of agricultural products and the stability of agricultural prices are presently being maintained.

Mr. Gardiner: I was paired with the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Ross). Had I voted, I would have voted against the amendment.

Mr. Gibson: I was paired with the hon. member for Essex West (Mr. Brown). Had I voted, I would have voted for the amendment.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): I was paired with the hon. member for Middlesex West (Mr. McCubbin). Had I voted, I would have voted for the amendment.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I was paired with the hon. member for Yukon-Mackenzie River (Mr. Simmons). Had I voted, I would have voted for the amendment.

Mr. Catherwood: I was paired with the hon. member for Kent (Mr. Huffman). Had I voted, I certainly would have voted for the amendment.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): I realize, Mr. Speaker, that we are to attend at the other place for royal assent to certain bills, but I believe I shall be able to finish what I have to say before we leave this chamber. The debate on this particular matter really began on November 2, and was continued on November 6. At that stage there were twenty-six speeches. The problem went to a special committee of the house which heard eight hundred pages of evidence. Finally, a report was made to this house on December 7. The debate on the bill which came to us as a result of the committee's deliberations began on December 17, continued on the 18th and 19th. There were twenty-nine speeches, three of them over two hours in length. Yesterday, of course, we had a debate on procedure when thirty-six speeches were made, and an inferential debate continued on the measure still under discussion. Consequently, Mr. Speaker, I do not feel there is very much need for me to say a great deal about the amendment I propose to move at this stage. I feel that all possible considerations, both for and against the bill, have been placed before the house, and that the amendment I am about to move I explained quite fully in my speech on December 17. Consequently, as I say, I do not propose to say much about it today. I think that we should avoid endless repetition.

This measure has received widespread support throughout the country. The federation of agriculture has placed its support behind this measure, as have the Canadian Congress of Labour, the Co-operative Union of Canada and the Canadian Association of Consumers. Consequently, I take it that the measure is, in the main, reasonably satisfactory to very large groups of people in this country who have spoken through their various organizations, as is their democratic right. I am sorry, however, that the bill does not contain certain provisions. I have to move that the bill be not now read a second time, because that is the only form that one can use. But I hope that the house will accept the amendment that I propose to move, and that the bill may be strengthened in regard to the matters I have already mentioned. Even if that were not the case, I think the bill as it stands is preferable to leaving the matter as it has been. We have had a number of investigations into price maintenance, either directly in a few cases or indirectly in a number of cases, by the combines investigation commissioner. I do not need to enumerate them. I regret that the bill does not give some protection, which I think many retailers have quite legitimately requested, against price cutting and the advertising of loss leaders. As I said on Monday, I think the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Croll), when he made a motion before the special committee, moved something that was worthy of more consideration than it received. I also think some steps should be taken to prevent the discrimination that exists as between big dealers and small dealers.

Manufacturers give substantial discounts to dealers who buy large quantities of goods. This makes it more difficult for the individual small retailer to compete with these large organizations. I should have liked to have seen something in the bill to regulate this. I said the other afternoon, and I repeat, that certain of our farm commodities such as wheat are sold at the same unit price per bushel whether an individual buys fifty bushels, a hundred bushels or a million bushels. I think something might be done along those lines. I will not say that you could completely overcome inducements to buy in large quantities. I think we could enact legislation that would at least regulate this factor.

[Mr. Coldwell.]

As I said the other day, my amendment is in line with what I believe the Trades and Labour Congress recommended to the committee, and I thought that organization struck a note that this house should seriously consider, that is if we are to have regulation, and apparently there must be some regulation.

My hon. friends of the Progressive Conservative party, who have opposed price control by publicly appointed bodies or bodies appointed by this parliament, have been urging that manufacturers' private interests should be allowed to exercise a very large measure of control over retail prices; that is not good. But I do think that the public has some right to have some control over price levels in the interests of the consumer and of the individual who handles goods on the way to the consumer. As I stated, I believe that on Monday I said all that I need to say regarding this matter. It has been so well debated and at such length in this house that I feel it would be repetitious to say anything more than I have said. I am going to move, Mr. Speaker, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

> That Bill No. 36 be not now read a second time but that it be resolved that in the opinion of this house consideration should be given to the introduction of legislation providing that where regulation of resale prices is in the public interest such regulation should be under public control instead of under private control.

If this amendment should be approved by the house, we shall be delighted. If, on the other hand, it is not approved by the house at this stage, I hope the government will give some attention to these matters during the recess and ask the combines commissioner to consider the matter and make some recommendations, so that we may round out the bill now before us in such a manner that it will be satisfactory to the consumer and at the same time give those retailers in the smaller places more protection than they otherwise would have.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I might be allowed to say just a word about the position of the government with respect to this amendment. The adoption of this amendment would, of course, mean that there would be no legislation at this session. In spite of the hope expressed by the hon. member that it would be accepted, I think that he will be content with the second hope that consideration between now and the next session will be given to other problems that may arise in connection with the regulation of prices.

I might say that, on this second part of the report of the joint committee on combines legislation, the part that deals with the danger of the loss leader being resorted to, the position of the government is that we recognize that there are in this house on both sides members who honestly fear that the consequence of prohibiting resale price maintenance will, in the words of the committee,

> . . . be to enable large and powerful retailing interests to engage in a policy of selling goods at unreasonably low prices for the purpose of destroying the independent retailer.

The government agrees with the committee that under present conditions there does not seem to be any substantial likelihood of such policies being engaged in. We feel, moreover, that unless circumstances arise in the meantime which are not now foreseen, we should await the final report of the MacQuarrie committee before considering any legislation on the subject that the committee is now considering. The government is, however, quite prepared to co-operate to the fullest possible extent with the law enforcement officers, both of the federal government and of the provinces, in the vigorous enforcement of section 498A of the Criminal Code whenever it may appear that the practices forbidden by that section are being engaged in.

Moreover, the government wishes to give close and constant attention to the effects of the legislation now being considered by the house, if it is adopted, and to any practices which may develop either as a result of that legislation or independently of it which would be contrary to the public interest. In the event of any such development which cannot be dealt with under existing legislation, the government will give serious consideration to what other legislative action it may be appropriate to recommend to parliament.

Mr. Coldwell: Mr. Speaker, may I say one word in view of what the Prime Minister has said?

Mr. Speaker: With the consent of the house.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Coldwell: I carefully followed what the Prime Minister has said. He has not, of course, dealt with the point I have made in the amendment with regard to a public board to do some regulation in connection with prices, but I would say this. If the government is giving consideration to these matters, while I think hon. members should express their views on this amendment I would be prepared to say that, after they have done so, I would not divide the house on this question at this time since I realize the validity of the point made by the Prime Minister, namely that it would be difficult to introduce legislation at this session.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, without its being regarded as a speech on this amendment, may I ask a question? I am not clear as to the meaning of this amendment. It speaks of "regulation of resale prices" and it says:

> . . . where regulation of resale prices is in the public interest such regulation should be under public control instead of under private control.

The hon. member has not explained in a manner that I can understand just what is meant by that phraseology. I am asking the question as related to the general practice that has grown up in the United States on fair trade practices, with boards administering them; and I am interested to know whether he has in mind that sort of thing or some other system of price control.

Mr. Coldwell: I would say this, Mr. Speaker. Where it is desirable in the public interest to regulate resale prices, it should be done by representations to a public board set up under the authority of parliament.

Mr. Drew: May I extend the question? What I am trying to clarify is this. I should like to know whether the hon. member is proposing a board similar to the fair trade boards in the United States, where a general program of prices is approved, but where the actual fixing of prices is not done by the board, or is he actually suggesting that this board should fix prices?

Mr. Coldwell: I am suggesting that this board should hear representations and then make decisions as to what fair prices will be.

Mr. J. W. Noseworthy (York South): Mr. Speaker, for a week I have had in readiness a forty-minute speech in support of this amendment, waiting for an opportunity to speak to it. I do not know whether I can reduce that speech and give it in less than forty minutes, much as I desire to facilitate the business of the house.

An hon. Member: Try.

Mr. Noseworthy: I shall try hard.

When I was speaking on the resolution which preceded this bill, on November 6, I took occasion to say that in my opinion this legislation was being introduced for political purposes chiefly; that when parliament assembled early in the fall there was a great public demand for some control over inflation and that that demand was taking the specific form of a demand for price control; and that the government, unwilling to introduce price control, offered this as a sop to the public to allay their demand, or to take the heat off, as it were, the demand for price control.

I am still convinced that this is the main purpose the government had and still has in mind in getting this bill through parliament this session. During this debate the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) called attention to the fact that January is a month of sales in the stores of Canada. There is no question that, during the coming month of January, we shall see more of those sales than usual. As a result of the government's fiscal policy, as a result of having drained off unnecessary taxation from the people, as a result of their credit restrictions, as a result of the unemployment and part employment that has developed, stores across this country find their shelves loaded with goods that they have been unable to sell. There is no doubt that those shelves will be unloaded following the Christmas business, and I suspect that the government hopes to glean some measure of credit for this bill when those sales take place. The Minister of Justice can say to the Canadian public: Look, I told you so. We passed the price maintenance legislation at the end of the year and already prices are reduced throughout the country—prices, I may say, that would have been reduced in all probability, entirely regardless of what happened to this bill.

To give credit to the MacQuarrie committee, they did not suggest that this proposed legislation would have any effect upon the cost of living. They say on page 21 of their report:

> The committee has studied resale price maintenance in the light of the two standards of judgment originally set up, namely, the desirability of a free economy and the need for economic efficiency.

The MacQuarrie committee, in their recommendation that price maintenance should be made illegal, were not thinking particularly of the cost of living, were not thinking particularly of the small retailer or merchant. It is the government that is thinking of them from a political standpoint. They were concerned only with preserving our free economy; and in the words of the report:

> This study has led the committee to the general conclusion that resale price maintenance, on the growing scale now practised, is not justified by either of these standards. It represents a real and undesirable restriction on competition by private agreement or "law" and its general tendency is to discourage economic efficiency.

It becomes quite clear from the report that the MacQuarrie committee was concerned with the preservation of a free economy. I have no doubt that the government is also interested in the preservation of a free economy, and of course the official opposition is likewise interested in the preservation of a free economy.

What is true of course is that this bill is a culmination of a controversy that has developed among the supporters of the free economy system. On the one hand we have the Liberals and the T. Eaton Company of Canada supporting what they call free and open competition. I presume it is the kind of competition that Adam Smith recommended.

[Mr. Noseworthy.]

It may well be that the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) has not studied much economics since he took some lectures on Adam Smith during his university days. I suggest that if he supplements what he learned about laissez-faire economy during his university days with something a little more up to date he will know that free competition within our free enterprise system as he visualizes it does not and cannot exist under present-day conditions.

The Conservatives, supported by the mass of the independent retailers throughout the country and by other groups, believe that we should have regulated and controlled competition within our free economic system. I use the phraseology "regulated and controlled competition" because that is the phrase which the pharmaceutical association, in their brief to the joint committee, used in connection with the practice of price maintenance. The financial expert of the official opposition, the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell), made it quite clear to us in his speech that he did not believe in free and open competition. Evidently they believe that under conditions existing today there must be some regulation and some control.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

A message was delivered by Major C. R. Lamoureux, Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, as follows:

> Mr. Speaker, the Right Honourable the Deputy Governor General desires the immediate attendance of this honourable house in the chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly, Mr. Speaker with the house went up to the Senate chamber.

And being returned:

Mr. Speaker informed the house that the Deputy Governor General had been pleased to give, in His Majesty's name, the royal assent to the following bills:

An act to implement the international convention for the regulation of whaling.

An act to implement the agreement between the parties to the North Atlantic treaty regarding the status of their forces, signed on the nineteenth day of June, 1951.

An act respecting the surveys of public lands of Canada.

An act to amend the Bills of Exchange Act.

An act to approve the financial agreement between Canada and the United Kingdom, signed on the twenty-ninth day of June, 1951.

An act to amend the Judges Act, 1946.

An act to provide for old age security.

An act to amend the Pension Act.

An Act to amend the Canadian National-Canadian Pacific Act, 1933.

An act to amend the Maritime Freight Rates Act.

An act to amend the Canada-United States of America Tax Convention Act, 1943, and the Canada-United States of America Tax Convention Act, 1944.

An act to amend the Supreme Court Act.

An act to amend the Exchequer Court Act.

An act to amend an act respecting the Revised Statutes of Canada.

An act to amend the Public Printing and Stationery Act.

An act respecting the Canadian forces.

An act respecting the general synod of the Church of England in Canada.

An act respecting the general synod of the Church of England in Canada and the missionary society of the Church of England in Canada.

An act to incorporate the Evangelical Mennonite Brethren of Canada.

An act to incorporate the Sisters of Charity of the House of Providence.

An act respecting the Toronto harbour commissioners.

An act to amend the Railway Act.

An act respecting construction of works for the generation of electrical power in the international rapids section of the St. Lawrence river.

An act to establish the St. Lawrence seaway authority.

An act to amend the North Fraser Harbour Commissioners Act.

An act to provide for the financial administration of the government of Canada, the audit of the public accounts and the financial control of crown corporations.

An act to amend the Dominion Elections Act, 1938, and to change its title to the Canada Elections Act.

An act respecting the National Gallery of Canada.

An act to amend the Civil Service Act.

An act to provide for short-term credit to grain producers in the prairie provinces to meet temporary financial difficulties arising from inability to complete harvesting operations or to make delivery of grain.

An act to authorize the provision of moneys to meet certain commitments for new equipment incurred by the Canadian National Railways system during the calendar year 1951, and to authorize the guarantee by His Majesty of certain securities to be issued by the Canadian National Railway Company.

An act to amend the Canadian Broadcasting Act, 1936.

An act to provide for the establishment of an agricultural products board.

At one o'clock the house took recess.

The house resumed at two o'clock.

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT

AMENDMENT TO FORBID THE FIXING OF SPECIFIC OR MINIMUM RESALE PRICES

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Garson for the second reading of Bill No. 36, to amend the Combines Investigation Act, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Coldwell.

Mr. Noseworthy: Mr. Speaker, when we were called to the other place I was about to show that the bill before us is the culmination of a controversy that exists within the free enterprise system as to how much competition should be permitted within that system. I pointed out that the Liberals on the one hand support free and open competition as provided for in the bill, but the Conservatives favour regulated and controlled competition, that the Liberals are supported by the mass buyers and distributors of merchandise while the Conservatives are supported by the manufacturers and, I would say, by the independent retailers throughout the country. I think we can draw from that the conclusion that today there is just no place in the merchandising of goods for free and open competition such as the government visualizes. The view is expressed by the pharmaceutical association in their brief when they call attention on page 42 to the factors which in modern times have entered our free economy. They say:

> Adam Smith's economics knew nothing of the baffling problems that our machines have created. The early pioneer had only a few rather simple problems to solve; but today's interdependence of men, of classes of men—pounding engines and whirling wheels—corporations, holding companies, and industrial empires have created problems that Adam Smith never dreamed of happening.

Granted then that there just is no place in our present system of merchandising goods for that free and open competition which the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) visualizes in the bill, and accepting the fact that such competition as we have must be regulated and controlled, as admitted by business, by the pharmaceutical association and by those who put forward the Conservative point of view, the question arises as to who shall do that regulating and controlling. After all, the present system of price maintenance, a device which has been practised now for twenty-five years, a system that has been worked out by the manufacturers and retail merchants whereby the manufacturer is able to fix the retail price at which the goods he manufactures shall be sold in every store across the country, appears to be giving satisfaction to the manufacturers. They are quite satisfied with the system.

The retailer finds it much more convenient to have the manufacturer fix the price at which the article shall be sold than to have to go through the difficulty of figuring the individual mark-up on every article he places on his shelves. But there are others besides the manufacturers and the retailers to be considered. In this fight between the two groups of giants within the free enterprise system, the mass purchasers and distributors of goods such as the T. Eaton Company on the one hand and the manufacturers on the other, there are a few million consumers who should be given some consideration. If it is necessary in order to maintain the private enterprise system and prevent the growth of monopolies within the distributive branch of business, then in our opinion the authority to control and regulate price maintenance, or whatever degree of price maintenance is in the public interest, should be in the hands of an authority that is subject to parliament.

We feel it is not fair to the consumer to leave the manufacturer with a free hand to fix the price of his goods to the retailer. The Conservatives of course will argue that it provides for competition and that that competition prevents the manufacturer from fixing his price too high. They would probably tell us that the consumer's interest is safeguarded under the present price maintenance system. If manufacturers as a class are to be given the right to fix the prices of their goods, and if that system is spreading and becoming more general with larger and larger sections of our economy being affected by the practice of price maintenance, I do not think any of us are naive enough to believe that the consumer's interest is going to be adequately protected under that system. It is for that reason we suggest, as did the trades and labour congress in their brief to the committee, that control should be exercised by means of a board subject to the authority of parliament.

As a matter of fact, in their brief the retail druggists of Ontario point out that in recent years prices of wheat, milk and the wages of employees have been regulated by law. We maintain that if it is necessary, as I believe it is, that prices should be maintained in certain spheres for the protection of the small storekeeper, that protection should be such as will afford protection to the consumer as well as to the manufacturer and to the retailer. There is nothing unfair in suggesting that. It is a procedure to which every trade union in the country is being subjected. It is a procedure by which the farmers of this country sell their wheat. It is the procedure by which milk prices are regulated in the larger communities. It is a procedure that can be fair to the manufacturer, that can be fair to the retailer and can take the interests of the consumer into account.

I point out, Mr. Speaker, that the legislation before us is incomplete. It is unfortunate that the government should be introducing this legislation so late in the session. They now feel that to accept our amendment will mean that they will not be able to bring in any legislation regarding price maintenance this session. I would merely like to point out that I fail to understand what the government expects to gain or just how they expect to serve the public interest by rushing through legislation that is incomplete, and will probably have to be reconsidered as soon as its effects upon our economy are observed. I do not think we need any combines investigation, I do not think we need any stacks of statistics, to know that without some degree of protection firms such as the T. Eaton Company and the chain stores will eventually push the small businessman to the wall. I believe most of us in this house are old enough to have observed during our lifetime what happens under those circumstances. It is, therefore, in the interests of the retailer, in the interests of the manufacturers and consumers of this country, that we propose that this bill be reconsidered; that it be not now read a second time, but that consideration be given to means whereby these various sections of our economy may be protected.

I might point out that the interim report of the MacQuarrie committee recognized that it had not given complete study to this problem. There was the question of loss leaders for which, at that time, the committee had no remedy to offer. It is true they point out that under present conditions there is not much of that being done, and there may be ample time to devise some legislation that will protect the small dealers against loss leaders. The minister went to great lengths to try to assure the retail trade that they would not suffer by reason of this legislation. I prefer, Mr. Speaker, to accept the opinion of the retailers of this country as against the judgment of the minister. I take it that they know their business better even than does the learned Minister of Justice.

I take it that these retailers are not protesting purely on grounds of selfish interests. I refuse to accept the explanation that these retailers are being pressured into their protest by the larger manufacturers. I believe they have a real cause for protest; and, as the leader of this group says, we sympathize with them in the dilemma in which they find themselves with this legislation facing them. I would again urge the government to give consideration to the recommendation put before the committee by the trades and labour congress, that where protection is needed for the retailers it be given on exactly the same terms and in exactly the same way as trade unions and others are protected, by a board which is directly responsible to this parliament.

Mrs. Ellen L. Fairclough (Hamilton West): The amendment which has been moved by the member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) has not appeared in quite the form in which I had expected it. I am, therefore, led to guess as to its complete meaning. But I believe, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. member meant it to apply somewhat to fair trade laws which could be passed. With this in mind, I should like to compliment him upon evolving an alternative to a bill which, in my estimation, would work definite harm upon the Canadian economy.

In the short time which is permitted for debate on this and other matters, it was not possible, when I spoke on the original amendment the other day, to go into the matter of fair trade. I have in my hand a booklet to which I referred the other day. At that time I was under the impression that every member of this house had received a copy. Since then I have found that they were not distributed generally. There is some pertinent information in it which I believe should be on the record.

Mr. Coldwell: Would the hon. member identify the pamphlet so that we may obtain copies?

Mrs. Fairclough: Yes. At the suggestion of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar I should like to say that the title of the pamphlet is "One Hundred and Fifty Million Reasons for Fair Trade". Undoubtedly the one hundred and fifty million refers to the population of the United States. It is a booklet by W. W. Wachtel, President of Calvert Distillers Corporation. He deals with fair trade practices in a fairly general way, and the arguments which he puts out in this booklet are extremely interesting. On the very first page he has what he calls "Dedication", which reads as follows:

> This booklet is dedicated to the 1,800,000 retailers in the United States in all lines of business, especially the 91 per cent of the smaller stores which do 70 per cent of the total business. They bolster the free enterprise system which has brought to this country the highest living standards enjoyed by the people of any nation in the history of the world.
> The elimination of the small retailer from our system of mass production and distribution can precipitate the end of free enterprise.
>
> Without small business, the individual's right to go into business for himself would be lost. When that time comes . . . when everyone is consigned to a future of working for someone else, the average man may then decide that it would be better to have the government as the only boss. Most Americans fervently hope this never happens here.
> If small merchants as a class were wiped out, the middle class in our economy would be on the way out. Then we will have a few big monopolies and 150 million proletarians. That was what Karl Marx predicted would happen to capitalism just before it collapsed.
>
> About 300,000 retailers have been added to the national economy in the past twenty years since the first fair trade law was enacted, indicating that fair trade has promoted competition rather than monopoly and strengthened our merchant class upon which free enterprise depends. Moreover, fair trade is not price fixing and does not increase prices.
> Every American who values highly the welfare of his country should support fair trade, because by preserving small business we may prevent transforming America into an alien and perilous two-class system.

I think there is a great deal of truth in that dedication and it can be applied to this country just as well as to the United States of America because we live in a similar economy. While, of course, our numbers are much less than theirs, nevertheless many of the same rules apply and are interchangeable.

In this booklet Mr. Wachtel goes on to deal with the various phases of fair trade and how they affect the various classes of people in a country such as his—and as ours too. In chapter 2 he has something to say about the producer and fair trade. I do not intend to read all of this chapter. I should just like to make a couple of comments. He picks up again a phrase which he used in the dedication and says "Fair trade is not price fixing." He quotes Governor Herbert H. Lehman as saying:

> Fair trade is in no sense price fixing. It does not sanction monopoly, monopoly prices or combinations in restraint of free competition with commodities.

But he goes on to say that not all producers need fair trade laws, as not all have brand names to protect. A manufacturer who has control of the distribution of his product finds fair trade laws unnecessary. But then he goes on to show that the manufacturers who do not control the distribution to the ultimate retailer need the benefit of fair trade laws.

In his next paragraph or chapter he deals with the subject of how fair trade protects the consumer, and he elaborates on what he calls two broad ways that the consumer is protected, the first of which is by preventing the employment of predatory loss leadering which uses brand names to build up store traffic to increase the sale of non-fair trade goods. He elaborates that theme. Then his second way is as follows:

> The consumer is also protected by fair trade against a loss in quality of brand names. Brand names represent the reputation and integrity of the producer who spends millions to advertise the product. The product achieves wide sale to become a standard brand only because it has been tested widely in the market place, proving that it is of top quality and good value in every respect. However, if price cutting continues on the brand, the producer (in self defence to prevent loss of markets) must eventually reduce the price to the dealer. To continue to sell at a lower price, the manufacturer is soon compelled to lower the quality of the product. The consumer can only get what he pays for.
> It narrows down to what Herbert Hoover said: "Honest merchants do not cajole their customers that a dollar's worth of mechandise can be sold for 69 cents."

He goes on to say:

> Under fair trade, merchants may not use brand names as bait to get business. If quality is to be maintained, the consumer must pay a dollar for a dollar's worth of goods.

I said something the same in my remarks the other day on the first amendment. It was not until later that I read this article of Mr. Wachtel. I think it is significant that when you get into the discussion on resale price maintenance and fair trade laws you just naturally follow certain channels of thought. I do not think they could be expressed more lucidly than this gentleman has expressed them in this extremely interesting booklet.

When you start to consider fair trade laws, you are confronted with the difficulty of making laws which can be enforced. I feel that it would be preferable if we were not faced with the necessity of making fair trade laws. We would not be faced with the necessity if it were not evident that the government intends to put through this legislation abolishing resale price maintenance. If that legislation goes through, we feel that we must heed the advice of one of the witnesses who appeared before the committee when he pleaded with the committee not to throw out the baby with the bath water. We must consider what is the next step if this legislation is to go through against all the protests of the people in this house and in the country. If the government is determined to put it through, what then must we do to protect our economy?

In the system which has been followed in this country, we have at the present time, in my opinion, the best basis for fair trading and the best protection against loss leadering. We are now faced with the possibility that that system is going to be declared illegal. Therefore, when it becomes illegal we must proceed to build up other laws to take the place of the natural process under which we have operated for some time.

I have been interested in the evidence given before the subcommittee on study of monopoly power of the committee on the judiciary of the House of Representatives in the United States. On page 20 of serial No. 1, part 5, evidence is given by Stephen J. Spingarn, the federal trade commissioner. He was speaking on the difficulty experienced in registering convictions. He was speaking after a case had gone to the supreme court, I believe the case of the Standard Oil Company v. the Federal Trade Commission, in January of this year. He said:

> Now, the issue in that case was whether when the federal trade commission brings charges of unlawful price discrimination, and further makes a showing that those price discriminations have resulted or will probably result or may even certainly result or may in fact have already resulted in substantial injury, serious injury, to competition or even destruction of competition, that it is nevertheless a complete defence to those charges for the seller to make a showing that he was meeting competition in good faith.

That paragraph alone, Mr. Speaker, shows how a simple thing can be used as a defence to a very serious charge. There is some further discussion, all of which I do not propose to read, but Mr. Spingarn finally says that prosecution can really be successful only after it has been proved that the monopoly has actually been created. Then he goes on to say:

> You would be locking the barn after the horse was stolen.

That is precisely one of the things that we fear. We fear that by the time legislation is worked out for the protection of business people in this country the horse will already have been stolen; that they will have faced economic disaster, have been defeated, and you cannot build up what has once been torn down.

There has been quite a bit of comment about section 498A of the Criminal Code, and the fact that it provides the means whereby businessmen can be protected. The section which is most frequently quoted sets out that penalties may be levied against any person or corporation who—and this is the part that I should like to quote:

> (a) is a party or privy to, or assists in, any transaction of sale which discriminates, to his knowledge, against competitors of the purchaser in that any discount, rebate or allowance is granted to the purchaser over and above any discount, rebate or allowance available at the time of such transaction to the aforesaid competitors in respect of a sale of goods of like quality and quantity;

I believe this section has been in the act since 1927. I think I am correct in saying that never has any charge been laid under it. If the enforcement of that section could protect those who have suffered by reason of discriminatory practices, then why has it not been enforced before now? Cases have been brought before the courts under which certain corporations have been convicted and have been dealt with under the Combines Investigation Act, but at no time has any charge ever been laid under this section. I do not wish to express an opinion myself, because I am not a lawyer, I am not learned in the ways of the courts; but I know that among business people there has been comment to the effect that some of these investigations might well have produced circumstances in which charges could have been laid under this section.

It has become increasingly apparent that it is impossible to write laws which can be enforced against loss leaders. The most effective means heretofore, as I said before, has been the practice which is now followed, namely, the establishment of a reasonable resale price which protects the consumer and the merchant alike. If we wipe that out and we proceed to introduce, let us say, something in the nature of fair trade laws, we will go right back to the old system which was in vogue and which has since been discarded by the tobacco companies for one, and by Gillette's for another, under which the manufacturer merely made a contract with his end dealer by which that dealer became his distributor. It seems to me that we are going backward instead of forward if we wipe out the practice which makes that almost mandatory, if we are to protect the economy of the country.

Mr. Coldwell: How does the consumer benefit under this system?

Mrs. Fairclough: A consumer, as I pointed out the other day, Mr. Speaker, and as I said a few moments ago, benefits because of the fact that when you establish a reasonable retail price the quality of the article which he purchases is assured and protected. I did not read the whole of Mr. Wachtel's article on the consumer and fair trade. I would suggest that hon. members secure that booklet and read it. I feel that the big difficulty in this whole discussion, and in all of the investigations in committee and in this House of Commons, has been that we have proceeded with such speed that we have not had an opportunity adequately to consider the effect of the steps which we are taking.

There is one part of the amendment of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) with which I am in wholehearted agreement. That is the part in which he says that the bill be not now read a second time. I am in agreement with his whole resolution if what he means by it is the establishment of fair trade practice laws which will protect the distributors and the consumers of this country.

In August, 1951, the chairman of the federal trade commission, James M. Mead, issued a statement following a conference among officials of his commission. They were concerned over the effect on the small retailers of the price wars that had developed in New York and other cities after the supreme court's decision invalidating in interstate commerce the non-signer provisions of state fair trade laws. In part he said:

> While the FTC is "keenly aware of the importance of low prices to consumers," one of the "prime objectives of our competitive system" Mr. Mead said, it is also "keenly aware of the fact that if price discrimination and predatory price-cutting result in the destruction of the small independent businessmen who constitute the backbone of that competitive system, then the consumer will suffer a long-term loss far overshadowing his apparent immediate gain. The effects of such a tragedy would quickly shatter the illusion that the consumer benefits from pricing practices which are in effect unfair."
> Mr. Mead also said that the commission is presently investigating whether or not certain large concerns are inducing and receiving "unlawfully discriminatory prices" in the form of discounts, advertising allowances, or other concessions.

As I said a moment ago, we have provision for just such investigation in our own Criminal Code. There is presently under consideration by our neighbour to the south what has been described as a 22-point program on fair trade. I have found it impossible to secure a copy of this program, because I believe it is still in the committee stage there. Quite frankly I do not know whether it is being handled by the federal trade commission or by the department of commerce. I ran into a blank wall when I tried to get a copy of the program. But the very fact that such a program is under consideration at the present time is evident proof that all is not rosy in the field of price maintenance.

The evolution of fair-trade laws in the United States was described in the evidence submitted to the committee in the brief of the retail hardware association. I think it is pertinent to this discussion, and I would like to read a small portion of it because it shows how we progress from one step to another. If we take this step, which was taken in the United States over fifty years ago, we can see what may happen to us in the field of supplementary legislation required to protect the economy.

This brief reads in part as follows:

> It is to be noted that resale price maintenance is an entirely lawful marketing practice under the common law. Only in the United States of America was the practice found to be illegal and there only by virtue of the unique provisions of the Sherman Anti-Trust Act of 1890, under the provisions of which the courts held that neither a patent nor a copyright nor a trade-mark gave a product a proprietory right which the manufacturer could enjoy when his manufactured product had reached the hands of a retailer. An epidemic of "cut-throat" competition in that growing country at the turn of the century produced a demand throughout the entire United States for legislative action to permit resale price maintenance on a vertical basis where branded or trade-marked merchandise was involved as the economists and subsequently the legislators of that country soon found that a highly reputable brand of merchandise, developed often at great expense and with great expenditure of technical skill and scientific experiments, a brand of merchandise which had great consumer acceptance and which was being marketed at a price highly desirable from the viewpoint of the consumer, could be destroyed in a comparatively short period of time by ruthless deep-cutting of prices by certain large scale retail organizations, notably chain and department stores. This price cutting, it was found, developed, first of all, a state of complete chaos in the market for the products, and, at the secondary stage, a point where the consumer's faith in the product has been shattered and in the result, the product disappeared from the market, in many cases, to the great loss of the consuming public. The instance of that well-known product, the Ingersoll watch, was in fact largely instrumental in the aroused demand for fair trade legislation in the United States. Since that time legislation in forty-five of the United States and in inter-state trade has provided a legal framework for resale price maintenance and has, in effect, restored the ancient common law position under which resale price maintenance was a lawful, economically sound, marketing practice.

There we have it. We are proceeding to destroy what has been acceptable practice under common law. So that we face a period of time in which it will become increasingly evident that to replace that practice we must evolve a complicated framework of legal structure which will permit the very thing which we abolished.

It seems to me this is a very foolish procedure. I cannot let that belief stand in the way of the practical knowledge that quite apparently the house intends to proceed with this legislation abolishing resale price maintenance. I must admit I am a little concerned over the phraseology of the amendment now before us, because to my mind it creates some ambiguity. I do not believe it is absolutely clear that what is intended is the establishment of a provision whereby legislation may be studied which will introduce what is commonly known in this country and in the United States as fair trade laws.

Because I wish to be absolutely sure about what we are voting on, and because I do not wish to lay myself open to supporting something which may turn out entirely different from what I had thought it meant, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton):

That the amendment be amended by deleting all the words after the word "providing" and substituting the following: "for the establishment of a fair trade commission."

Mr. George H. Hees (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I was very much interested to hear what the hon. member for York South (Mr. Noseworthy) had to say on this matter a few moments ago. It was very refreshing indeed to hear his viewpoint, because it was so diametrically opposed to that expressed by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) in the committee on resale price maintenance, on which I had the honour to serve. The hon. member for Vancouver East was one of the two C.C.F. representatives on the committee, and expressed himself as being quite satisfied with the legislation. His only desire was to have it put through immediately, without any change whatsoever.

It would seem now, as evidenced by the opinions expressed by the hon. member for York South, that the C.C.F. party is perhaps realizing that this legislation is a great threat to the business life of the small retailer. I hope his views are now those generally accepted by the C.C.F.

The hon. member for Hamilton West (Mrs. Fairclough) has just said that we should give careful consideration to the fair trade laws which are now the accepted practice in the United States. With that I agree. It is most important that we examine carefully the experience of the United States. I am going to go over some of the ground which I went over a few nights ago, and express some further opinions on the United States fair trade laws. I shall say something about the experience of that country in the past fifty years.

In 1900 the United States made resale price maintenance illegal. During the next thirty years, both consumers and retailers found that the condition which this abolition of resale price maintenance created was most unsatisfactory, and 1931 saw the appearance of the first fair trade law in California. This law proved to be so satisfactory to both consumers and retailers that today, in 45 of the 48 states, the abolition of resale price maintenance has been replaced by fair trade laws.

It is obvious from this that the fair trade laws of the United States are just as satisfactory to consumers as they are to retailers, because there are more consumers than there are retailers, and the consumers elect governments. If these fair trade laws had not proved to be more satisfactory to the consumers of the United States than the abolition of price maintenance, these 45 state governments would have been thrown out, and the fair trade laws would have been thrown out with them.

The fact that the number of state governments which have introduced fair trade laws has increased from one to forty-five in the past twenty years I believe demonstrates clearly that the overwhelming majority of the people in the United States are satisfied with the deal they get under fair trade laws. It demonstrates also, I submit, that both consumers and retailers feel that they get a better deal under these fair trade laws than they got during the period when resale price maintenance was abolished.

I do not claim for one moment that just because laws are satisfactory to the people of the United States they are necessarily the best for this country. But I do think it is important for us to remember that their economy and buying habits are very similar to ours. Therefore, I think we should examine most carefully their experience during the past half century, before embarking on any new legislation of our own. We are planning to take a step which they took fifty years ago, and which has proved to be unsatisfactory; so much so, in fact, that that step has been almost unanimously revoked by the people of the United States.

If we are to follow the course which the government now plans to follow in abolishing resale price maintenance, we are going to turn the clock back fifty years. I believe that the committee which was set up to study resale price maintenance should be reconvened, and should give a thorough study to the fair trade laws of the United States to see if they could not be adapted to conditions here in Canada.

Having sat on the committee for approximately one month, it is my firm conviction that the legislation which the government now proposes is both hasty and ill-considered. I do not think any serious consideration was given to the views of those who opposed the abolition of price maintenance. I think it was obvious from the start that those who appeared before the committee opposing this present legislation were there only on sufferance. It was just eyewash that they were even permitted to attend, and it was obvious that whatever they had to say was not going to be taken seriously.

If we do not give this matter thorough investigation, we are going to get legislation which 150 million people in the United States have tried and discarded during a fifty-year trial period. Can we afford to ignore a lesson which has been learned by the most industrialized nation in the world today? I think the answer is an obvious and emphatic "no." Before embarking on this legislation, which I believe would be disastrous to the small shopkeeper, and which would not make any appreciable difference in the cost of living, as the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) has stated, we should give a thorough study to the United States fair trade laws which I believe are the answer to the problem facing us today.

They give the consumer and the retailer a better deal than they got under the abolition of resale price maintenance, and this has been proved by 150 million people in the United States. I would remind hon. members that the people of the United States are the same kind of people as we are. There is no appreciable difference between us; we like the same things; we buy the same things; we trade in the same way; we make our living in the same way; we enjoy ourselves in the same way.

If this government is going to refuse to give this matter a thorough study, it will simply be admitting that the legislation it is introducing is brought in for the political purpose of deluding the people of this country into thinking that the government is doing something to bring down the cost of living. It will be doing something to take the people's minds off the steadily rising cost of living, about which the government has done nothing to date. I think that that kind of motive will not make the people of this country think very highly of what we do in this parliament.

I recommend to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) that before proceeding with this legislation, he reconvene the committee so that a thorough study can be made of the practices and the experience of the United States in connection with this matter during a period of fifty years. After that is done the government can decide what action, if any, is justified in this matter.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, since a subamendment has been moved perhaps if I should say a word at this stage it might shorten the discussion. I want to say immediately that what we were suggesting was not a fair trade law such as is in effect in several states of the union, but the setting up of a public board somewhat similar to the tariff board to which anyone could apply, retailer, manufacturer or consumer, to have his interest considered in public and if necessary protected. As the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mrs. Fairclough) has indicated, the fair trade law in the United States is really governed by agreements between manufacturers and retailers. The consumer's interest does not appear and is in no way protected other than in the manner in which she has indicated.

There is a great deal of dissatisfaction in the United States with their fair trade laws. I think it was Senator Tydings of Maryland who introduced a bill in the United States Senate to make this a federal matter. Sometime before he died, President Roosevelt denounced it in no uncertain terms, stating that it had operated against the consumer's interest and entirely in favour of the manufacturer.

There is one thing I want to say with regard to what the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Hees) said a few minutes ago. He complimented the hon. member for York South (Mr. Noseworthy) and said that the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) had pressed for this legislation in the committee. I expect that is so. May I say that what I have moved is entirely in line with what my friend, the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis), suggested, and I may say that before he left he saw the amendment, knew what we were doing, and approved of it. My hon. friend said that we have changed our position. I would point out to him that on November 6, the day on which I spoke in connection with the reference of this matter to the committee, I made our position very clear. I spoke for our entire group when I made the statement that is to be found at page 782 of Hansard. After discussing the effect of resale price maintenance and the reference to the MacQuarrie committee I said:

> When we do legislate against resale price maintenance I believe the law should be strengthened in another particular, too. For I am equally afraid of the monopolies in the distributive field that are growing up in our country which may take advantage of what is called the "loss leader." That is also an unfair trade practice that should be dealt with according to the law equally with an unfair trade practice in relation to retail price maintenance mainly for the benefit perhaps of the manufacturer.

A little later I said:

> I think that is as much an offence on the one hand as resale price maintenance is on the other. If this goes to a committee—

We were then discussing reference to the committee.

> —and the legislation is enlarged in any respect, consideration should be given to that particular phase of retail merchandising, because I think none of us wants to play into the hands of powerful distributive monopolies in this country.

I said that on November 6. The position I have taken today is entirely in conformity with the position we took then, and indeed the reason we take the position we are taking today is that we took that position on November 6. We believe the evidence before the committee has confirmed that we were right in that particular. On the other hand, if our suggested amendment is not approved by the house I think it would be a mistake to refuse to accept the bill as it now stands because I think all agree that resale price maintenance as it operates at the present time is in effect a private system of price control operated by manufacturers and those not under control of the public in any respect, and consequently is against the public interest and should therefore be discontinued now. That is why we support the bill. We think it is defective in the particulars I have named, but I wanted to rise immediately to put my hon. friends right. We are not advocating the enactment of a fair trade law such as they have, I believe, in forty-five states of the United States. And we are not changing our position. It is the position that we took on November 6.

Mr. Hees: In order to explain my own position, Mr. Speaker, I was not claiming that the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) had changed his attitude. I was saying how nice it was to hear the change in the presentation made by the hon. member for York South (Mr. Noseworthy) this afternoon. We heard the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) speak a number of time in the committee on which I sat, and there has been quite a change, as anyone who was a member of the committee will tell you. I did not imply that the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar had made any change. I wonder—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member has already spoken in this debate.

Mr. Hees: —if the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar would permit a question?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With the unanimous consent of the house.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Put your question.

Mr. Hees: The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar said that in his opinion the people of the United States considered these fair trade laws were unsatisfactory. How then can he explain the fact that the number of state governments that have put them into effect has increased from one to forty-five over a twenty-year period? He must realize there are far more consumers than retailers, and I should like to know in what way these fair trade laws are unsatisfactory to the consumers of the United States.

Mr. Coldwell: I cannot explain why forty-five states have them in effect, but I do know that the forty-five states enacted them one after another with great rapidity some years ago. I also know that President Roosevelt stated that this was one of the factors operating against the consuming interests of the country. Knowing something about the manner in which United States legislatures operate—well, I will refrain from expressing an opinion but we are not lobbied to the same extent.

Mr. Rodney Adamson (York West): Mr. Speaker, I want to make one suggestion with regard to this question of fair trade practices. I think the legislation has boiled down to this, that the one great fear of the small retailer is that the loss leader device will be used by his large volume competitors in order to depress the prices of certain goods and to draw trade away from the small retail outlet. I think that has been the main objection. Certainly it is the thing in my mind which worries me most about the government's legislation. It is the one thing I think we have to fear, and from all indications it appears to be the one thing that really worries the small retailer. It worries not only those in the drug line but also people dealing with a great many other lines of commodities which are sold to small retail and specialty shops.

It would seem to me that if some device could be evolved whereby the loss leader could be either curbed or prevented, a great deal of the genuine fear in the minds of the people who are protesting the legislation would be removed. The fair trade board or fair trade device with which our amendment deals goes a long way toward assuaging the fear of the little man because it would, by regulation, agreement or various other devices, establish a price which would be a fair one to the consumer, and which would allow both the retailer and the wholesaler a reasonable profit. We must remember that the retailer and the wholesaler must have a profit. If that is done, then you not only have a fair price for the consumer but you have reasonable security for a tremendous segment of the Canadian population. I feel that in all fairness we cannot jeopardize the security of this very large segment of the Canadian economy. If a fair trade regulation were established it would, in my opinion, go a long way toward overcoming this fear. I am not going into the Miller-Tydings act, and the proposals in the United States congress. Neither am I going to discuss the Schwergman case or the other case which is known as the Wentling case, which were the two cases recently decided, one by the Supreme Court of the United States and the other by the federal court in Philadelphia under the fair trade practice laws. I merely want to say that there is to be another bill presented to the congress on fair trade practices, which has as its aim the making of fair trade a national and federal matter. I must say, Mr. Speaker, that despite what we may think of what goes on in the United States, nevertheless that country is governed by the law of the majority. The fact that these fair trade practices have received such an overwhelming endorsation by the various legislatures of that country is, I believe, something to which we must give serious consideration.

There is one more thing I want to say about this matter of prices, and that is that unless a manufacturer can get a large volume for his product he cannot profitably continue to manufacture. Therefore, it is obviously the first law of economics that a manufacturer must endeavour to get as high a volume for his products as he possibly can. He must price his goods so that they are acceptable to the large majority of his people. In other words, he must put them in a price range which enables him to secure volume. If he wants to stay in business he does not make his price to the consumer an artificially high price. He cannot do that, because he would go bankrupt. The questions of volume and price are interdependent, and as the price goes down the volume goes up in almost inverse ratio. There are different graphs and different patterns for different trades, but as a general principle it has been the reduction of price which has made the goods manufactured in America—I include Canada in that—so acceptable throughout the world. This low manufactured price has been a drawing card which has obtained universal acceptance for goods manufactured on this continent. Nowhere do you find such universal acceptance of the goods of any one continent as you do the goods from North America. The basis of that acceptance is the economic rule to which I have just referred. Goods which are individually and exquisitely made in Europe are sold in a limited market because they are unable to overcome the challenge of the volume price relationship.

I have here, Mr. Speaker, a code which I propose to read because I think it is of interest to the house in this debate. It is the code of the national retail dry goods association of the United States and contains eight clauses. I am quoting from a publication issued by the fair trade association of the United States. It says:

> Eight principles have been recommended for "effective manufacturer-retailer fair trade arrangements" by the vendor relations committee of the National Retail Dry Goods Association. While noting that NRDGA has taken no official position on fair trade, Irwin D. Wolf, committee chairman and vice-president of Kaufmann Department Stores in Pittsburgh, said the principles were designed to do the following: "make an important contribution toward effectuating the purpose and intent of the several fair trade state acts and the Miller-Tydings amendment to the federal anti-trust act."
> Cautioning that any action under fair trade agreements must be individual and independent, the NRGDA group proposes that:
> 1. A vendor should provide a fair and equitable mark-up for retailers and continue historic discounts and other allowances;
> 2. Retailers should be required by a vendor to agree in writing not to resell fair-traded goods at less than the stipulated fair trade price. Wholesalers should be required by a vendor not to resell to retailers unless the latter agree in writing to maintain fair trade prices.
>
> 3. Vendors should guarantee to take all necessary action to protect all retailers signing fair trade agreements from price cutting or other predatory practices on the goods covered in the agreement. If the vendor fails to take such action at once, after written notice from the retailer, the latter may cancel the agreement.
>
> 4. Any fair trade agreement required of one retailer should be required in identical form from all competing retailers and any benefits should be equally extended to all dealers.
>
> 5. All fair trade agreements should provide for termination on notice by either party to the agreement. A vendor should have a 10-day option on buying back a retailer's inventory if the latter wishes to cancel. After 10 days, a cancelling retailer's obligations would be automatically void with respect to the fair trade agreement.
> 6. On fair-traded seasonable goods, retailers should be permitted, by agreement, to clear stock for a specific period at season's end, provided that trade marks or other brand identifications are removed. A vendor should also have the option of repurchasing such goods.

7. In any fair trade agreement, a vendor should have the right to adjust prices at any time, on a minimum of 10 days' notice. If this requires repackaging or other changes in the retailer's inventory, the vendor should supply the materials without cost at 10 days before the effective date of the price change.

8. Where a retailer has a regular policy of employee discounts, they should be permitted on bona fide employee sales.

I merely mention that report to indicate the sort of agreement which is being considered now in the United States. I do not say that, in all its proposals, that is desirable; but it gives an idea of the general basis for fair trade practices. I have said before, Mr. Speaker, that with this safeguard of fair trade regulation the fears, as the brief says, of predatory raids by large retailer outfits are practically overcome.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I wish to lay these suggestions before the house because I recognize the desire to have a fair price to the consumer. Actually, without a fair price to the consumer nothing would be sold. As I said, the whole basis upon which our prosperity has been built has been the build-up of the price-volume-cycle of growth or the price-volume-equation of goods. If we are not to be allowed to have some safeguard against the loss leader, I believe we should not jeopardize the retailer by abolishing what, to him, is his one great safeguard for orderly, reasoned and competitive marketing.

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a few words in support of this amendment which has been moved by the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mrs. Fairclough) and which I have had the honour of seconding. We have reached the stage where I think it has become perfectly obvious that the government intends to put this legislation through the house. I am not going to go any further than that. I believe that is a fair statement, namely that it is obvious that the government is determined that this legislation is to pass, sooner or later.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): You never doubted that.

Mr. Fulton: Perhaps the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier) is right that I may never have doubted it. I never doubted that they had the intention to pass it; but at one stage I hoped that they were open to conviction, that they had an open mind on the matter, and that it would be possible to convince them by the reasonable and solid arguments which were brought forward in support of the proposition that the legislation should not pass in its present form.

[Mr. Adamson.]

Mr. Fournier (Hull): You have not spoken long enough.

Mr. Fulton: What I am saying, Mr. Speaker, is that it has become obvious that they do not agree that the legislation should not be passed and that they are insisting on putting it through in its present form. If they will not adopt our suggestion that the legislation should not be proceeded with at the present time while further consideration is given to the actual form and effect of the bill before us, I feel that we are justified in urging that they should give consideration to the enactment of concurrent legislation which will protect the retailer against the danger which is bound to arise and to which he is bound to be exposed if the legislation goes through in its present form.

I was therefore greatly interested in the amendment proposed by the leader of the C.C.F. party this morning. As a matter of fact, I have been awaiting that amendment with interest ever since he announced that he intended to present it; because one of the things that we ourselves urged in the committee, and again in the house here, was that consideration should be given to the desirability of passing some form of fair trade practice legislation, and that time should be allowed for such consideration. When the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) announced on Tuesday his intention to introduce an amendment, from what he then said I thought he had in mind the urging of consideration of some form of legislation similar to the fair trade laws of the United States. But from the form of his amendment and from the statement which he himself made after he had actually presented it today, it becomes apparent that the type of legislation which he is advocating is not legislation similar to the fair trade laws of the United States.

Mr. Coldwell: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Fulton: Yes.

Mr. Coldwell: The hon. member has read what I said in the debate of November 6. The words I used in the suggested amendment and the words I used today in the amendment are the same.

Mr. Fulton: Yes. If the hon. member has taken from what I have just said any indication that I am saying he has reversed his position, I apologize. That was not my intention.

Mr. Coldwell: Oh, no.

Mr. Fulton: I am simply saying that, based on what he said on Tuesday, I had thought that his amendment might suggest something similar to the fair trade laws in the United States; but it does not.

We were interested in this amendment moved by the C.C.F. party particularly for two reasons; and I am saying this admitting the full force and effect of what the hon. member has said, namely that if his amendment is defeated he still proposes to vote for the bill. Nevertheless it is obvious from reading his amendment, and I think it is obvious from what he has said himself, that he believes the bill should not be proceeded with until this concurrent legislation can be considered. But he has said that if the government rejects this suggestion of his, then he will support the bill. Therefore I think it is fair to say that the C.C.F. party agrees with us that the legislation should not be put through without an opportunity for further consideration; and particularly, from their point of view, without an opportunity of studying and considering the type of legislation that he and his party have in mind. And of course from our point of view we would like to study and consider the type of legislation which we have in mind as one answer to this problem. Therefore we both agree on the desirability of delay and further study and consideration of some alternative answer to the problem which has been considered.

Their amendment is, I believe, significant secondly because it indicates that the C.C.F. party also feel that the retailer is entitled to some form of protection, in that there is grave danger that he may be seriously prejudiced—I would go so far as to say irreparably damaged—by the legislation now before the house, if it is passed in its present form without any concurrent legislation. Therefore I believe I am right in saying that to the extent of the two points I have just mentioned, the C.C.F. party and ourselves are in agreement. But as the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mrs. Fairclough) has said, we cannot ourselves subscribe to a proposal which would involve the proposition of a system of price control, or of government control of retail or resale prices. It was because we saw in the amendment of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar the very definite indication that this interpretation would be correct that we felt we should make our own position clear by moving a further amendment to the amendment offered by the C.C.F. party. Our amendment preserves that portion of the C.C.F. amendment which says the bill should not now be proceeded with. I should like to make our amendment clear by reading what would be the whole motion if the original amendment of the C.C.F. party were amended as we have suggested. If our amendment were adopted the amendment would then read as follows:

> That Bill No. 36 be not now read a second time but that it be resolved that in the opinion of this house consideration should be given to the introduction of legislation providing for the establishment of a fair trade commission.

If the proposition is as I stated earlier, that the C.C.F. party is in agreement with us firstly that this legislation should not be put through without further consideration and, secondly, that the retailer is entitled to some protection, I am hopeful they will find it possible to support our amendment.

I should like to refer to some figures which were placed on the record this morning by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar as to the course and progress of this debate. He referred to the number of speakers in the debate and the length of time occupied. Well, I made my own calculation of this matter and I think, as a matter of fact, I make it slightly higher than he did. He said there were 26 speakers on the motion for the setting up of the committee. My calculation makes it 27, but I am not going to quarrel with him over one more or less. He said there were 29 speakers so far in this debate on the proposed legislation itself on Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday. I make it 30; but again I am not going to quarrel with him over one more or less.

Mr. Knowles: There have been two or three since.

Mr. Fulton: I am referring to the speakers up to the time the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar spoke. I would like to point out that actually the debate we should consider first is the debate now taking place on the bill, because although we did discuss the proposal to refer the MacQuarrie committee's report to the committee, we did not know what the legislation would be, did not know the form of it. I do not think it is quite fair to say there have been 30 plus 27 speakers taking part in this debate. I think it is more correct to say that there have been only 30 speakers taking part in this debate up until today. But even taking the two figures I should like to point out to you, sir, that during this session we debated the speech from the throne on 21 days. There were 187 speakers. During the course of the debate there were seven amendments and ten divisions.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I hesitate to interrupt the hon. member, but I do not see how that can have any relationship to the bill or to the subamendment.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, with respect, may I draw Your Honour's attention to the fact that in the course of his remarks this morning the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar referred to the length of this debate and the number of speakers who have taken part in it. I am not suggesting that the number of people who took part in the debate on the speech from the throne is relevant to this bill. I will be very brief. I am just dealing with what I thought was an inference of the hon. member, or the suggestion which emerges from the remarks of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, that this matter had been really pretty adequately debated already. The point of my remarks and of the comparison I have just completed was that in view of the length of time devoted to the speech from the throne and the number of speakers who took part and the number of amendments and divisions, there having been no suggestion at any time that that debate was unduly protracted or the subjects there discussed at too great length, I hardly think the suggestion, if such was contained in his remarks this morning, should properly apply to the debate on this measure, which in my view is the most important to come before the house in a very long time.

In the course of consideration of this bill and these amendments I think it is important for us to bear in mind the question of the interest of those affected. This morning the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar mentioned some of the organizations which submitted opinions opposed to the present practice of resale price maintenance, and therefore he said favouring this legislation. I point out that none of the briefs presented was favourable to the government legislation because none of them knew what the form of the legislation was going to be. I think it correct, however, to say that the briefs did indicate they were opposed to the present practice of resale price maintenance. But, Mr. Speaker, I believe it is also correct to say that every one of the briefs, even those opposed to the practice, did make it abundantly clear that in their view it was urgent that there should be some protection for the retail merchants against the dangers of loss leaders and unfair competition to which they would probably be exposed, if the price maintenance practice was eliminated.

I make one exception there which I think I should make, in the interests of accuracy, and that is the brief submitted by the Canadian Congress of Labour. In his evidence, as set out in that brief, Dr. Forsey said he did not regard the matter as one of urgency, because in his view and in the view of his congress the likelihood of harm resulting from the abolition of resale price maintenance was not very imminent. But I think that is the only exception to the statement I have made that the briefs submitted, even on the part of those opposed to the practice, made it clear that they felt it was urgent and vital that if resale price maintenance was to be eliminated, then the retailer should be protected.

I should like particularly again to emphasize the brief submitted by the trades and labour congress, and also the evidence given by Mr. Bengough when he appeared before the committee. In answer to a question as to whether he thought if we outlaw price maintenance we should provide for protection against loss leadering Mr. Bengough said, as reported at page 372:

> I think it would be vital it should be done.

I wish also to emphasize that the trades and labour congress in a most responsible brief, a brief which contained measured and well-considered language, indicated that although on the whole they felt that the system of price maintenance as at present practised should not be continued, they made it abundantly clear that they felt it should not be eliminated carte blanche without any other protection to the merchant. They felt it should not be eliminated until some other form of protection for the retail trade had been fixed. As I say, while they say that on balance they are not in agreement with the system of price maintenance, they make no wholesale condemnation of it. They said, in effect: We recognize the necessity for it. We recognize the necessity for protection. We recognize the steps by which this practice has grown up. We recognize it has grown up simply as a protective device worked out by retail merchants themselves.

May I draw your attention particularly to that part of the brief of the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada, where, at page 382, they say:

> Working people learned very early in the industrial period that, despite the law and the attitude of the state, it was necessary to combine to protect themselves, their families and their interest. Perhaps, from the employers' point of view, some combination is necessary for their protection regardless of the attitude of the state. While we may all agree that private arrangements such as resale price fixing which restrict a free economy and the competitive flow of prices and goods are undesirable, it may still be true that economic necessity, as that is experienced by the person, or organization directly involved, may dictate that some such arrangement is imperative. Under such conditions it would seem readily apparent, that failing provision of some social control facilities by the state, private groups and organizations within the economy will at all times act for their own protection and self-preservation.

Mr. Speaker, nothing I think could put the matter more clearly than those well-considered words of the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada. They recognize the fact that this system of price maintenance has grown up and has been designed by merchants and retailers simply as a method of self-protection against unfair competitive practices and enormous power in the hands of giants in the distributive trade, against which they have found themselves individually powerless to protect their position, but against which they found an effective answer, and the only effective answer, in the practice of resale price maintenance.

That being the case, I submit it is a reversal of history, a turning back of the clock, a retrograde step to the laws of the jungle to take away the protection of resale price maintenance and throw open the doors —and do not let us be prisoners of words— not to free competition, in the assumption that this must always be a benevolent process, but to throw open the doors to cut-throat competition, to unfair trade practices—

Mr. Coldwell: That is capitalism.

Mr. Fulton: Do not talk nonsense. It is not capitalism, and you know that well—which we would be doing by eliminating resale price maintenance, without providing some alternative form of practice. May I point out that there is a vast difference between private enterprise and laissez-faire, unrestricted, unfair competitive practices.

Mr. Noseworthy: What kind of enterprise is that?

Mr. Fulton: The whole course of our laws under the capitalist system over the last fifty or one hundred years has been, in this field, in the direction of eliminating unfair competitive practices. The whole purpose of combines legislation, which has been supported by all parties in the house, under the capitalist system is to prevent the abuse of power. We in this party are opposed to the abuse of power, whether it be by private individuals or by the state. We are always in support of those laws which will set limits to the abuse of power and make possible the exercise of freedom by the small man, while at the same time preventing the large man from finding it possible, in the pursuit of his livelihood under a so-called free competitive system, to crush the small man out of existence.

As I say, that has been the trend in our laws in this field for the last fifty or one hundred years. It has been the trend of the marketing laws, both federal and provincial, which we have devised. Those marketing laws are designed not only to provide for orderly marketing, in the literal sense of the term, but I think it must be admitted that they are designed to protect the weak against the strong. They recognize the fact that the individual farmer, with his limited economic power—that is, the small farmer—is unable to stand up against the large or unlimited economic power in the hands of other farmers as well as in the hands of industrial concerns.

Recognizing that the farmer cannot survive in all cases by himself, our marketing laws have been designed to enable the weak to survive against the strong, and also to prevent to some extent what might be described as natural forces from operating to the extinction of the individual.

I do not intend to pursue at greater length what might be described as the theoretical line of argument. I do believe, however, that it is important to recognize the fact that this has been the trend in our marketing laws and in our combines legislation. That has been its design and purpose. And in the light of those facts, to talk of this system of price maintenance as something that flies in the face of our competitive system, to hold it up as something designed to increase the power of some people in the state rather than something designed to protect the small man, is simply to beg common sense.

It is true that what we have done by legislation in the field of agricultural marketing, and what we have done by legislation in the field of labour unions, the retail merchants have done in their own field by their own system of resale price maintenance. But as the hon. member for Brant-Wentworth (Mr. Charlton) pointed out this morning, to eliminate resale price maintenance without substituting something else is to turn back the whole course of history and give rise to the very serious probability that we will also be opening the door to giving powerful commercial firms the protection the farmer now has, by inviting the powerful commercial packing firms to ask that the protection the farmer now has under our marketing legislation should be eliminated so that the farmer, too, may be exposed to the threat of powerful big interests in this country. That situation is, I submit, one which the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and every responsible minister and member of this house must look upon with most serious misgivings. In my view, if nothing else were required that alone would justify us in pleading with this government not to push through this legislation before they have provided some alternative protection for the small man, before they have provided something to which he can turn so he will not be left at the mercy of powerful big interests in this country who are so solidly behind the present legislation.

When the Prime Minister spoke on this subject this morning he repeated the arguments which have been made before, namely that the answer to the arguments of those in both the C.C.F. party and the official opposition who say that you should not eliminate price maintenance without giving some other protection to the small merchant is to be found in section 498A of the Criminal Code. I am not at this stage going to repeat the references I made earlier to the opinions of highly qualified Liberal authorities with respect to the efficacy of section 498A. But I do want to emphasize that those authorities, a former minister of justice and Colonel Ralston, a prominent Liberal lawyer, stated in most categorical terms that the section would not provide the protection which it was hoped it would.

I want to emphasize the opinion of one who it must be admitted has had more practical experience in the field of anti-combines legislation than anyone else. Mr. Fred McGregor said that it had not been possible in the course of all their struggles with the problem to devise effective legislative protection against loss-leadering practices. At no stage in the course of all his evidence before the committee, either in the reading of his brief or in the answers he made to searching and exhaustive questions which were directed to him as to the dangers of loss leaders, did Mr. McGregor say that section 498A was the answer. Nor did Mr. McGregor at any stage say that prosecutions had been instituted under section 498A, because in fact no prosecution has ever been brought under that section.

It seems to me that the experience as well as the opinion of these highly qualified observers and experts in this field indicate that section 498A is not going to be the answer tomorrow, any more than it was the answer yesterday; and that the only protection the retail merchant now has against the practice of loss leadering and against the power of the big monopoly interests is his own system which he has worked out of resale price maintenance.

We are prepared to recognize that there are questions of policy as well as questions having a practical effect which make it questionable whether it is desirable to leave the protection of resale price maintenance in the hands of private individuals. We sat in the committee and moved a resolution that consideration should be given to enacting legislation along the lines of the fair trade laws in the United States as one answer to this problem. We repeat that here.

We are not quite able to agree with the amendment put forward by the C.C.F. party because it looks to us a little too much like a system of government price control, but I think I would be correct in saying that we do appreciate their thought that there must be some other form of protection for the merchant if this form of protection is removed.

Since this matter is now before the house we in no way modify our position that the legislation is being proceeded with with undue haste and after insufficient investigation. We in no way modify our statement that it is suspicious that the legislation should be pressed for and urged by the most powerful interests in the retail field in Canada and opposed by every one among the thousands of independent retail merchants. We do not modify either of those positions. We do say that if the legislation goes through in its present form without any other form of protection having been provided, the government will be playing into the hands of big business.

We again entreat the government to delay for a short while the enactment of this measure while they look into the possibilities of providing a form of public protection or protection through public laws which the merchant now finds exclusively under the private system of resale price maintenance. For that reason we ask that the legislation be not now read a second time but that it be resolved that in the opinion of this house consideration should be given to the introduction of legislation providing for a fair trade commission.

If the government has at heart the interests of the small men, or I will put it this way: Unless they are prepared to say that every opinion expressed by independent merchants is not worthy of consideration or is not an accurate expression of the views which they put forth, then I say they cannot in good conscience reject those pleas and proceed with hardened minds and hearts down a road which will result in the enactment of the bill in its present form.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the motion now before the house as amended would give an opportunity to all hon. members to express their opinion as to whether time should be given for the consideration of this problem, without fixing any definite time limit, and also whether consideration should be given to the setting up of a fair trade commission. It will be recalled that when the leader of the C.C.F. party introduced his amendment this morning I asked certain questions which were intended to clarify the real intention of that amendment. It was not particularly clear in my mind even after he had answered as to what was intended. However, this afternoon he has cleared up what is the thought behind this basic amendment. He has told us since the subamendment was moved that he is not advocating a fair trade law and fair trade practices—

Mr. Coldwell: As in the United States.

Mr. Drew: —as in the United States and as contemplated here in legislation actually introduced into and passed by this parliament on earlier occasions. He is urging the setting up of a board which would take the responsibility of establishing prices at which goods are to be sold. That is quite contrary to the well-established and well-tested fair trade practices which have been developed over the years in the United States and which we have tried to put into effect here.

I do not think we should apologize at any time for examining what they do in the United States, because in so far as trade practices are concerned their whole system is so similar to ours, or shall we say that ours in many ways has become related to theirs, that the methods they find desirable may well be found very desirable here also. In that regard I wish to interject the comment that I am not suggesting now, and I do not believe I ever shall suggest, that we should simply follow the United States in the things they do because of their size or wealth, but rather we should recognize what they do in dealing with problems similar to our own with an acceptance of the inescapable fact that in this stage of the world's development their trade and commerce exceeds that of any other country in the world.

What we are doing is placing before the house a subamendment which would ask hon. members to support the suggestion that consideration be given to the setting up of a fair trade commission. We do not attempt to draft the bill. That is not our responsibility; but may I also say we do not believe the government is in a position to draft such a bill at the present time. We are not asking that the drafting of this bill conform to the views of any particular group in the community. What we do say is that the bill should be drafted with a full recognition of the general welfare of the people of Canada, and most of all of those who in their day by day activities are bound to deal with the small merchants throughout the country who give that intimate daily service which has become very much a part of the life of our people.

I had hoped that the subamendment actually interpreted the views of the C.C.F. party, since we had not been able to interpret their own explanation; but as it does not then we certainly hope that, inasmuch as we are only asking for consideration of a fair trade commission, and since one of the spokesmen for the C.C.F. party has made it clear that he does not think this measure should pass—in fact the leader of their party has made that clear—we hope they will support the subamendment. I notice that the leader of the C.C.F. party, without actually raising any question, indicates that he does not approve of what I have said as to his being concerned about its being passed at this stage. It would be a strange thing for him to introduce an amendment which says that the bill should stand for further consideration, and at the same time tell us that it should pass.

Mr. Coldwell: May I just state that the only way the amendment could be drawn was that the bill should "not be read a second time now."

Mr. Drew: I had hoped it meant actually what it said, that further consideration should be given. I would point out to the leader of the C.C.F. party that the purpose of the amendment he put forward cannot be carried into effect unless there is time for further consideration, because he is proposing certain measures which obviously have not been dealt with yet in the house. However, I am not seeking to put words in his mouth, and if it is a fact that he thinks it is quite proper to deal with this legislation I accept that. But I would point out that the hon. member for York South (Mr. Noseworthy) does not hold that opinion.

Mr. Coldwell: Oh, yes.

Mr. Drew: The hon. member for York South said: "I do not know what the government is doing, rushing this legislation through." That is what we are saying. We just cannot understand it. We have not heard any evidence yet which supports the haste that is indicated. We have not heard one word uttered in this house suggesting a single reason why the legislation could not stand over until the next regular session of parliament so that an adequate opportunity might be given to consider it. I would point out further that the hon. member for York South made an extremely interesting statement which I wish the C.C.F. members would bear in mind when they vote on the subamendment as well as their own amendment. He said—and I believe I am using almost his exact words, but in any event I believe I am accurately paraphrasing what he said—it is general knowledge that large businesses and chain stores will drive small retailers to the wall unless measures are taken to prevent that being done. That is exactly what we say.

We say that the bill simply prohibits, without any consideration with respect to public necessity, any agreements as to maintained prices, and that that is a dangerous thing. We say it is an improper thing, and we say there should be some way by which the possibility of smaller businessmen being driven to the wall can be obviated in any legislation that is put before us. In that respect I am not forgetting at all that there was a recommendation by the committee that if, as a result of the passing of this measure, abuses followed in the form of loss-leader activities or improper price cutting the government should vigorously enforce section 498A of the Criminal Code. I would have liked to hear more about the reason for the inclusion of that recommendation. It is a recommendation that the government do something it should be doing anyway.

This government should not require advice that it should enforce the criminal law or any section thereof. Of course we must remember that the committee was doubtless aware of the fact that the minister now in charge of enforcement had failed to deal with the requirements of the Combines Investigation Act which we now have under consideration. Doubtless they were somewhat worried that his sympathy with big business on that occasion would be reflected in his attitude toward big business in the future, and that he would not likely do anything that would interfere with big business inasmuch as he protected the flour milling combine by actually withholding publication of the report to the stage where prosecution became impossible. Perhaps that is the explanation of that recommendation.

Mr. Fulton: It is the only reason.

Mr. Drew: I should think it is the only reason that is discernible. But surely that is rather blissful optimism on the part of the committee or anyone else—and of course when I say the committee I mean the directed majority which really put forward the report, because it was not unanimous—when we remember the length of time section 498A has been in the Criminal Code, and that there has not been a single prosecution by this government thereunder. Are we to believe that never in all these years has there been a single case where loss-leader practices, unfair price cutting or any of the things covered by section 498A has occurred? If business transactions in this country are being conducted on a basis as pure as that, why then are we being asked to take an axe to the whole commercial structure that has been built up? In effect we are told on the one hand that Canadian trade practices are so good that there has been no need to employ section 498A, and on the other hand we are told that we simply must ban this practice which has become so much a part of our commercial structure. Granted they are not related to the same thing, but they are two parts of the same problem. No; it would certainly be a great optimist who would think that at this stage we could suddenly hope for great results from section 498A under this government. I am satisfied that section 498A has all the power necessary to deal with this problem if there is abuse of the public interest. I am satisfied that section 498A could have been used with great benefit in many cases where it has not been employed. But there again we have evidence that this government has obviously no faith in its use.

There is another aspect of section 498A which I would point out. In that section there is no unqualified provision that certain things cannot be done, of the nature contemplated in the legislation now before us. It would seem to me that part of section 498 which precedes 498A provides that nothing shall be done to unduly prevent or lessen competition in the production, manufacture, purchase, barter, sale, transportation or supply of any such article or commodity or in the price of insurance upon a person or property. Those are related sections. On the one hand there is a section that prohibits certain practices, and on the other hand the section dealing with price discrimination. Surely between section 498 and 498A there was ample power to deal with any arrangement under which there would be price discrimination or agreement in regard to price that would be injurious to the public.

In any event the fact remains that section 498A, which is the section concerning price discrimination, has never been enforced at any time by this government. Consequently it cannot, by itself, be regarded as an adequate safeguard for the small merchant who would be affected by the legislation now before us. This is simply a bald statement that practices which have been in vogue for fifty years or more shall be discontinued, and that failure to discontinue those practices shall, in itself, constitute an offence punishable by the courts. If some dangerous growth threatens the human body there is always one simple way the doctor can end the threat that the offending growth will extend to other areas; he can shoot the patient.

Mr. McCann: That is not common practice.

Mr. Drew: That will cure it for all time. As the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann) has said, that is not common practice. It is usually regarded as unethical for the doctor to take such a drastic course to end the threat of an offending growth in the body. On the contrary the established practice, as the Minister of National Revenue so well knows from his own experience, is to use medical experience and surgical skill to remove the growth which is causing concern. I suggest that what is being done here is an attempt to cure a growth, to which there is certainly objection if it is injuring the body of our national life; but the answer is not to shoot the patient, which is what is recommended in this bill.

We are suggesting that the more commonly accepted practice be employed, and that there be an opportunity to examine this problem from the point of view of the general welfare of our people. I know it will be said that there was a commission on this subject some years ago, and there was a committee. It will be pointed out that we now have the MacQuarrie committee, and also that a committee of the house was appointed to examine the report of that MacQuarrie committee. All the results of these investigations are before us, and we have the advantage of their recommendation. I hope that, at this stage of the session and at this stage of the discussion, no hon. member of this house including the minister who is putting this measure forward will suggest that there has been complete, adequate and impartial inquiry into the facts. In his brief remarks today concerning this measure the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) said he thought we should await a further report of the MacQuarrie committee before adopting other legislation, but that in the meantime section 498A could be employed to deal with any abuses that might occur.

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that what the Prime Minister has pointed out is that there was only an interim report, and that the interim report was examined by a hobbled committee. The hobbled committee brought in the report which it was directed to bring in, and we have before us now no real evidence on which to form an opinion as to what should be done in the interests of the people of Canada. It is the people of Canada whose welfare is under consideration in this case. We have been urging that this measure should stand. We introduced a motion that would call for six months' delay in the consideration of this measure. I am still convinced that would be the wisest course, and I am satisfied there are a great many hon. members on the other side of the house who are satisfied that would be the wisest course. I would point out that we have had speeches by Liberal members, and that three of those speeches indicated real opposition to the provisions in this bill. I grant that there have not been as many speeches from the Liberal ranks as might have appeared appropriate in relation to a measure as important as this.

I heard some discussion about the number of speeches that had been made, as though there was some ground for criticism in that fact. Some emphasis was placed upon the number of Conservative members who have spoken in this debate. Mr. Speaker, this is parliament. The word itself indicates what this is supposed to be. The word is derived from the French parler, to speak. This is a place where members are supposed to express their opinions in the hope that others might be persuaded to change their views, and to come to a conclusion which will be related to a genuine exchange of ideas. The moment it becomes an accepted proposition that opinions are not changed by arguments in this house we might just as well stop having members come here; simply put a dummy in each chair, with a particular colour to identify the party to which he belongs; then just have one person, representative of each party, who on each particular occasion will indicate how the dummies will be called upon to express their votes in relation to any measure that is before the house. That is, in effect, what we say the moment it is even suggested that speeches are not desirable in this house and that no opinions are changed by the speeches that are made.

This is not intended to be a chamber of silence. This is intended to be a place where the business of the country is done by informal and free debate about the merits of the various measures that are introduced. It would be a great deal better if we had heard from most of the Liberal members, because this is something that affects every community; it affects every part of this vast country. But I would point out that by far the most effective speeches made by the Liberal members, including that of the minister who introduced the measure, were the three speeches made in opposition to this bill. There was the speech of the hon. member for St. James (Mr. Beaudry) who coined an expression which on this day, getting close to Christmas, I shall not repeat —at least not today. Then there was that of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Gibson) and that of the junior member for Halifax (Mr. Balcom) who indicated quite clearly why he did not think this was a good measure. But there have been only a few speeches from other Liberal members in regard to this subject. However, Mr. Speaker, those speeches which were made—that is, those in support of the measure other than that by the minister who introduced it and that by the chairman of the committee, which were simply stating formal ideas in support of the bill—were useful speeches. One of those speeches was by the hon. member for Wellington South (Mr. Hosking); and I think it was an extremely useful speech. He indicated why it is so important that this measure should be delayed and the members should have a chance to consult their constituents before they vote on it. On December 18 the hon. member for Wellington South had this to say, as reported at page 2170 of Hansard:

> After I received a few telegrams from various business people in my riding I spent some time making inquiries to find out whether any of the small shopkeepers who operate their own individual businesses on the corners of my towns and cities had made any representations to have price maintenance brought into effect. I could not find an instance where one of the small shopkeepers had suggested that they wanted or had instigated price maintenance. Thus I must assume that although at the present time they are under the operation of price maintenance, it was not instigated at their request; and since it was not instigated at their request I started to figure out who wants this thing.

You will recall, Mr. Speaker, that he said he had explored the situation, that he had made inquiries from small shopkeepers and had not found any of them who really wanted price maintenance. I have mentioned that matter because it was a most definite statement by a member of the Liberal party that he had actually consulted his own constituents and his own small retail merchants in order to find out whether or not they liked this legislation. Many of the members in this house might well have been affected in their thinking about this subject by that strongly stated opinion. I therefore think that it is of importance that the members should know how greatly at variance that statement was with what the shopkeepers in Guelph thought. I have here a telegram, and I am glad to see that the hon. member for Wellington South has entered the house and will hear me read it. This is a telegram from the Guelph Retail Druggists Association, signed by F. E. Wagner, president. It is dated Guelph, Ontario, December 20, and reads as follows:

> We resent statement by Henry Hosking that "he had made a survey of the retailers in his own constituency and found that none of the small retailers had complained about the government's bill on retail price fixing." This is deliberately misleading. Telegrams protesting the Garson legislation were sent to him by many Guelph retailers on October 16—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I doubt if a statement from outside the house is allowed to be read contradicting what a member has said in the house. See Beauchesne's third edition, paragraph 259.

[Mr. Drew.]

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, if there is any objection taken to it I shall of course abide by your decision.

Mr. Hosking: Let him read it.

Mr. Drew: As the hon. member for Wellington South has indicated that he wants me to read it, perhaps you will allow me to continue, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I do not think the hon. member would want to be out of order.

Mr. Drew: Oh, no. But I would be happy to comply with the wishes of the hon. member for Wellington South.

Mr. Speaker: I can only allow this procedure with the unanimous consent of the house. Is there unanimous consent?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): No. I do not know that, just to meet the wishes of the hon. member, the hon. gentleman should be allowed to be out of order. I know he would not want that himself.

Mr. Drew: Since this is a telegram of which I would assume the hon. member for Wellington South probably has a copy or has a general interpretation by another telegram, I would have thought that perhaps it might be put on Hansard, since he is in the house and can challenge its accuracy if it in any way misinterprets what has been put forward.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): No. If the hon. gentleman has a copy of the telegram he does not need to have it read in the house. He knows what is in it.

Mr. Hees: We should like to hear it.

Mr. Speaker: I do not think I should allow a controversy between people who are outside of the house and those who are in the house.

Mr. Drew: May I say that from several telegrams I have received from merchants in Guelph and in Wellington South it is quite clear that the statement made by the hon. member for Wellington South clearly failed to indicate what is the real attitude of the retail merchants in that constituency. I am raising this point now simply to indicate how desirable it is that the members have an opportunity to consult their constituents and meet the retail merchants in their home communities. I am hopeful that when they are given that opportunity after this house adjourns, whenever that may be, they will find ample occasion to meet them and find out just what they really think about this measure. That procedure will help many hon. members in forming their opinions when they are called upon, at some date in the future, to vote upon this bill.

Mr. Hosking: I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. Since I have come under discussion, and since I allowed to stand in Hansard one word which I should have had deleted, namely the word "wanted", I should like for the information of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew)—and I imagine he is not trying to be facetious—

Mr. Drew: Oh, no.

Mr. Hosking: —to state that I said—and most of the hon. members in the house realize that is what I meant—I had received some few telegrams objecting to this legislation. That was my inference in the first instance. I then said that I had inquired from many small shopkeepers who were enjoying some form of price maintenance in the products they sell at the present time whether they had instigated the practice of price maintenance; and in every case they said they had had nothing whatever to do with its instigation. It was therefore something that was thrust on them. Perhaps at the present moment they are enjoying some benefits, but as time went on they would reap the disadvantages which must necessarily come from it. While that is going on all the purchasers of course would suffer at the same time.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Wellington South has indicated he feels that perhaps he would have wished to slightly vary the statement he made at that time; but the fact remains—

Mr. Hosking: Just delete one word.

Mr. Drew:—it was in relation to the statement he did make, as reported, that these objections were taken. In any event I hope the hon. member will have ample opportunity to meet the retail merchants in Guelph when he returns. I do hope he will be able to return for Christmas day, and on that occasion he will be able to find out just exactly what they do think about this matter. I also think that it will be extremely helpful if other hon. members have that opportunity. That is why I so strongly hope that even at this stage of the session the government will decide to withdraw this measure and hold it over until the next session. By doing that they could still use whatever time remains while we are here on this occasion to deal with other very important matters that are still on the order paper.

I do want to assure the members of the government and the members of this house that we are opposing this measure in the belief that it will do great injury to the people of Canada if it becomes law. In this we are fighting what we believe to be the cause of the people of Canada. We believe we are fighting against monopolies which would be created by this legislation now before us.

A suggestion has been made that opposition to this measure indicates the support of big business. What a travesty; what a complete perversion of the facts. The fact is, as the hon. member for York South pointed out, there is no doubt that if this measure becomes law, without the most adequate safeguards against loss-leader transactions and unfair price cutting, the small merchant will go to the wall. That is what he said. That is what many of us believe. We have pointed out that the only safeguard that remains is the dusty weapon which has never been taken off the shelf by this government. They are prepared to shoot the patient with another weapon, but they are not prepared to use the weapon that already exists, and which could keep away the offender who might really do some harm to the Canadian people if there were any wrongdoing of this kind.

It is so easy to suggest that big business would be opposed to this measure. Well, we saw what big business thought about this. We saw what the biggest business in Canada thought about it. I wish to qualify that remark by statements I have made before. I for one do not believe that bigness of itself is any cause for criticism. I think we would simply be hiding from our eyes the great advances that have taken place in merchandising if we did not recognize that the big stores in this country have played their full part in developing the efficiency of merchandising generally. The big stores have their place, and the small stores have their place. We do point out, however, that the small merchants are closer to the people; that the small merchants throughout Canada generally are those upon whom people rely from day to day. Neither should we on the one hand disregard the rights of the big businesses to do their business legitimately, nor on the other should we under any circumstances do something that will almost automatically remove any safeguard for the small merchants who would be affected in this way. Once again I remind the house that it is not only the members of this party who have stated the dangers that exist, but others as well have pointed out that the small merchant will go to the wall if he has no basis of legitimate protection against practices which he could not possibly contend with.

Then again let us consider what would happen if this legislation were delayed until next session. It would not become law perhaps until March or April. What difference would that make? The Prime Minister has indicated that he does not think it is going to have much effect on retail prices. He does not think it is going to have much effect on the cost of living. Others have said the same thing. If that is so, what single reason is there before this house today, what single reason has been presented by the government that the members of this house should accept the responsibility of upsetting the commercial and trade practices which have been in force in this country ever since the turn of the century? I do suggest in all seriousness that hon. members consider the practical aspects of this problem. It is easy enough to say we must not permit anything that would restrict competition; it is easy enough to say that these prices are fixed by manufacturers; it is easy enough to say that if prices are to be fixed it should be done by the government; but let us remember this. All the evidence we have is to the effect that it is the merchants themselves who want this price fixing, or rather this price agreement established, rather than the manufacturers, because the manufacturers could probably sell their goods in any event.

The evidence before the committee, limited though it was, made it reasonably clear to anyone that it was the merchants who seek agreements of this kind. Yes, by all means let hon. members explore the possibility of preventing abuses; by all means let hon. members seek to enact laws which will protect the Canadian purchaser from practices which are contrary to his interest; by all means let hon. members pass laws which will prohibit anything that is clearly anti-social. But that should be the test, and we should be able to say that it is anti-social, that it is contrary to the public interest, that it is actually doing some harm before we, with our responsibility as members of the high court of parliament, should pass judgment and say that something is a criminal offence which has never been a criminal offence before. That is what we are being asked to do.

Now, Mr. Speaker, unless there are reasons which have not been disclosed, unless there are reasons stronger than any that have been suggested, let every hon. member in his own mind ask himself: why should this bill not stand until the next regular session of parliament so a real inquiry could be made, so all the organizations affected could be really heard; and they were not heard. In that way the members themselves would have the advantage of the advice they would receive in regard to this subject.

If this bill should pass as it stands, it is not easy for anyone to predict exactly what will happen in any particular case. One cannot tell, for instance, whether in this instance the minister would be any more likely to enforce this measure than he has enforced section 498A. That of course is something we must bear in mind. It is perfectly true that the minister might take just as little action under this as was taken under section 498A, and of course that was exactly zero. But assuming for the sake of argument that it would be the intention of the government and of the minister responsible to enforce the act when it became law, then let us see some of the things that would happen which would have to be balanced fairly against whatever advantages are claimed; and those advantages are still very vague and uncertain in so far as any evidence we have had placed before us is concerned.

First of all, this would happen. If there is not to be agreement as to prices in regard to nationally-advertised products such as automobiles, refrigerators, washing machines, drugs or, shall we say, oil and gasoline, or anything of that nature, then of course there is no established price level. Then let us see what happens to the small merchants. Most small merchants deal with banks, and have certain credit at those banks. They depend upon that credit to a very large extent to carry on their daily operations. Most cautious bank managers would call in a small merchant and say to him, "I regret very much to point out to you that since I no longer know what your inventory is worth, I must ask you immediately to reduce your credit to a very substantial degree." The man would probably say, "Well, as a result of the order of Mr. Graham Towers last spring, something with which parliament had nothing to do, my credit has been already very severely restricted this year. I do not know that within the same year I am going to be able still further to pay off debts which I carry as an ordinary line of credit."

I do not need to suggest what the alternative would be. The alternative would be that a merchant who was not able to pay off the amount required would have no choice but to sell what he had at any price, to realize the amount necessary to secure the amount of the debts for which payment was being demanded.

I can imagine some people saying that it would be a very nice thing to get some of these things cheaply. Naturally we would all like to get them cheaply. Naturally we are all anxious to see things a lot cheaper than they are. For instance, we have pointed out that it would be a good thing if they could be cheaper today through the simple and easy process of the government removing the unnecessary sales tax which they increased earlier this year, and the unnecessary excise and other special taxes they put on. That would be one way to reduce prices and to satisfy the public very quickly and very easily. But that was not done. However, in this case, in the end it would be the consumer who would suffer; because after all the consumer is not only a person who goes about looking for things he may buy cheaply; he is a person who wants to be able to get something he needs at a place he can reach within a reasonable time, when he needs it. He wants some local merchant within easy range who can afford to carry sufficiently varied lines so that the requirements of the ordinary community in the country, anywhere from the Atlantic to the Pacific, can be met by the inventory on hand. Therefore it is the consumer, the ordinary consumer, the purchaser, who is greatly interested in the merchant being able to maintain that line of credit which will permit him to operate.

But what happens if he is not able to operate? We all know what happens. It was the hon. member for York South who pointed out what would happen. The larger business would be able to gobble up the smaller ones. This bill would assist monopoly, as this government has assisted monopoly over and over again. If ever there was a government that has advanced and created monopoly it is the government now in power.

This would simply be one further step to create and extend vast monopolies. There is no one who has had practical experience in matters of this kind who does not know that there are many ways in which it would be possible to organize business in a manner that would make the enforcement of this measure very difficult. The simplest device would be for great drug-trading organizations, for instance, to buy out small merchants, or to buy part interests in those stores, and in this way create huge monopolies where there would be no question of price-fixing, because it would be one organization establishing its own prices.

I am surprised that members of the C.C.F. have displayed so little awareness of this very real danger which would be created by the measure before us. That is a danger—and I might suggest that the hon. member for York South pointed it out very clearly.

Of course in fairness to him I must say he made the reservation that there should be adequate safeguards. However, I am pointing out that the only safeguard that exists has never been used. It has got pretty rusty after all these years it has been lying unused, during which it has not been employed by this government.

When we talk about the manufacturer, let us remember that in every one of the lines we have been discussing there are a number of manufacturers, and that either there is competition among those manufacturers or there is not. If there are agreements among manufacturers of similar lines of products that prevent real competition, then the minister now presenting this measure has it within his power to deal with that matter under the Combines Investigation Act. There is no question about it. If there exist combines which prohibit real competition among manufacturers making the same lines, then it is the duty of the commissioner under the Combines Investigation Act to investigate the situation, and it is the duty of the minister to prosecute them. If there is real competition, then no single manufacturer can set a list of prices which are unreasonable and which are beyond the desire of the public to pay, for the simple reason that another manufacturer will undersell the first one by offering the same or a similar article. Then the laws of competition will still operate on the prices of the goods sold.

If this measure passes, then certainly it will be possible to encourage monopolies which might destroy that measure of competition which still remains as a safeguard.

At some later date, when the bill is in committee, it will be possible to direct a number of questions to the minister who has presented the measure to the house. On that occasion it will be my intention, as it will be the intention of others, to direct most searching questions to the minister as to the evidence he really has to support legislation of this kind, and why it is necessary that we proceed in this way. I say again that we are being asked to pass legislation that affects not only thousands of retail merchants but hundreds of thousands and perhaps millions of our people who depend upon them for their daily requirements. We are being asked to pass legislation which will change our established mercantile system to a very considerable extent. We are being asked to do that without any evidence to support the course that is proposed and, above all, without any evidence as to why this sloppy and incomplete legislation should be adopted by this high court of parliament in this indecent haste.

There is an alternative presented in the amendment as amended by the subamendment: withhold the legislation and conduct an inquiry. In conducting that inquiry, also explore the advisability of having a fair trade commission. I would point out that in putting forward this recommendation I am simply following the stated view of the Conservative party which has been a matter of legislative as well as other record for a great many years. I am not going to take serious issue with the statements that have been made by certain members who apparently gained some measure of personal satisfaction when they said the Conservative party was being inconsistent. The statements were loose, and I recognize that they were made without care or any attempt to examine the facts.

I would point out that in 1935 the Conservative party introduced a measure which was passed by the House of Commons and the parliament of Canada. I believe that in any examination of this subject it would be well to consider what was done at that time. I urge hon. members to examine that legislation and also what took place afterward. If they do they will see why great caution should be exercised in proceeding with this measure at this time. In 1935 the parliament of Canada passed the Dominion Trade and Industry Commission Act which carried into legislative form many of the ideas incorporated in the fair trade laws of the United States. It was intended to set up a commission to administer the Combines Investigation Act as well as the Dominion Trade and Industry Commission Act. The section of that act which is of particular significance to the discussion now taking place is section 14. In order that hon. members may know what was done and what the position of the Conservative party was at that time, I should like to place on the record that section, which is headed "Price and Production Agreements" and reads:

14. (1) In any case where the commission, after full investigation under the Combines Investigation Act, is unanimously of opinion that wasteful or demoralizing competition exists in any specific industry, and that agreements between the persons engaged in the industry to modify such competition by controlling and regulating prices or production would not result in injury to or undue restraint of trade or be detrimental to or against the interest of the public, or where such agreements exist and in the unanimous opinion of the commission but for their existence wasteful or demoralizing competition would exist in any specific industry, the commission may so advise the governor in council and recommend that certain agreements be approved.

(2) The governor in council may, if of opinion that the conclusions of the commission are well founded, approve of any such agreement, and shall make regulations requiring the commission to determine from time to time whether the agreement is resulting in injury to or undue restraint of trade or is detrimental to the public interest.

(3) The commission shall require persons engaged in the industry to furnish full information relating to operations within the industry under the agreement and may at any time, of its own motion and in its absolute discretion, advise the governor in council to rescind the approval of the agreement and the governor in council may rescind the approval accordingly.

(4) In any case where the governor in council has approved an agreement under this section, no prosecution of a party to such agreement shall be instituted under the Combines Investigation Act or under sections four hundred and ninety-eight and four hundred and ninety-eight A or any other relevant section of the Criminal Code for an offence arising in the performance of such agreement, except with the consent of the commission.

That section indicated an attempt to bring this type of mercantile practice under supervision and at the same time permit agreements which are described as price-fixing agreements to be brought into effect where it was established that they were not contrary to the public interest. I submit that any agreement which is not contrary to the public interest should be allowed in any event. That should be the one test of the measure now before us as far as safeguarding practices which are actually shown to be in the public interest is concerned. Anyone who is following a practice which is in the public interest should be able to continue that practice.

I assume all hon. members know that section 14 was declared ultra vires by the Supreme Court of Canada. The other sections of the act were declared to be intra vires of the parliament of Canada, but they never became operative because section 14 was really the key section. I think there were other sections that might have been employed to some advantage, but the fact is the act has been inoperative.

It is important for us to remember that, when this section was enacted, an attempt was made to put into effect in Canada what are described as fair trade practices. An attempt was made to set up in Canada a commission which would permit agreements of this kind to operate where it was demonstrated that they were not contrary to the public interest. The fact that the courts held that this subject matter was not within the authority of the parliament of Canada is one reason I have suggested that, in addition to the caution which members should show in passing the bill, there should be additional caution on the part of the government to make sure beyond any possible doubt that the measure itself is within the powers of parliament. The amendment before the house with the subamendment makes it possible for the government as well as others to examine this question, because they will be able to obtain legal advice, and they will also be able to consult the provincial authorities. Then if it is decided there are constitutional problems involved, as I most certainly think there are, it will be possible for them to lay the foundation for some other procedure which would bring about the kind of result that has been obtained in other cases where it has been found that some subject of general interest to the people of Canada, but which is nevertheless exclusively within provincial jurisdiction under our constitution, can be brought into general operation.

I think as Canadians we should be very proud of the fact that over the years under different governments, Liberal and Conservative—and of course those are the only governments we have ever had in Canada—

An hon. Member: Or likely ever will have.

Mr. Drew: As someone has said, or likely ever will have—we have seen a real attempt to deal with the problems which are national in scope but which nevertheless are within the exclusive jurisdiction of the provinces. I think we can compliment ourselves on the good will and spirit of co-operation that have been displayed in Canada so that over many long years agreement has been reached as to ways in which all doubts could be removed and the jurisdiction of both dominion and provincial governments exercised on behalf of the people by legislation covering both the dominion and the provincial fields. Without extending the legal argument at this time, I do suggest that it would be well for caution to be exercised with regard to this bill, and that most certainly before a measure of such sweeping powers comes into effect, with its impact upon the whole mercantile and commercial life of Canada, every last possibility that it may not be within the jurisdiction of this parliament should be removed.

It would be a most unfortunate thing if legislation were passed which greatly disturbed our whole mercantile and commercial system and it was then found that the act was ultra vires; because then we would have a great deal of difficulty in unscrambling the egg which we had scrambled so effectively. I think the whole tendency on this continent for many long years has been to recognize that unrestrained and unbridled competition in the end injures the consumer more than any other person in the community. When arguments are made by the government that they are so concerned with the welfare of the consumer, let it be remembered that unrestrained and unbridled competition has been harmful to the consumer, and that because of that recognized fact it has been the consumer most of all under our democratic system who has insisted that there be some appropriate restraints on competition which could have a damaging effect upon the economic and commercial life of this or any other country.

The idea of absolutely pure and unrestrained competition is of course an idea that gained some favour more than a hundred years ago and resulted in the most shocking working conditions, the most shocking employment of young people and the most shameful abuse of the power of money. It was that situation which led to the introduction of many of the laws which over the years have brought us step by step to this day when it can be safely said that there is a consciousness at all times in the minds of the members of our parliament and our legislatures that it is the welfare of our people generally, and of those people least able to look after their own safety and security, that should at all times be the first concern of parliament and of the laws we pass.

Hard competition, as it may be described, is no longer supported in theory by any people who have studied the history of that period. But let us make no mistake; this bill is a return to hard competition. It is an assertion of the doctrine of the Manchester school of more than one hundred years ago. The bill simply throws to the wolves those who cannot stand the strain imposed by the wealth of the larger businesses. That was the point put forward by the hon. member for York South (Mr. Noseworthy), and in this case I have no hesitation in accepting the validity of his contention. There is of course the other type of competition which has come to be described as soft competition. That is competition where there is no real effort to compete, where there is a blanket over everything, where the state says what will be done and everybody conforms to regulations.

One of the problems that presents itself to my mind today is to know just which of these two doctrines the members of the C.C.F. party are really supporting at this time, because I was under the impression—of course I may be wrong—that the C.C.F. party was committed to the idea of soft competition. I thought the C.C.F. party was committed to the idea that the government should decide what the basis should be, and in fact unless I have wholly misinterpreted the statement of the leader of that party that is what he is recommending in this case.

Mr. Coldwell: That is correct.

Mr. Drew: I am glad to have my mind cleared on that. That is what is known as soft competition. That is known as the parasol type of trading.

Mr. Noseworthy: What school is that?

Mr. Drew: That is the C.C.F. school. That is the school where the government creates a parasol. Underneath the parasol are little figures which the ordinary trader is supposed to read. They will tell him exactly what he must do, and if he does that he will keep out of the rain, the rain in this case being the punitive forces which would insist upon recognition of that parasol. That is soft trading, soft competition.

I must say that I really was greatly encouraged when I heard the hon. member for York South giving what I understood to be a clear exposition of the middle road in trade, what we might regard as sound competition. I understood him to advocate that type of competition which on the one hand recognizes the dangers of unrestrained and unbridled competition, and on the other hand the weakening effects of complete control of prices and details of that kind by government agencies.

Mr. Herridge: The member for York South was supporting our amendment.

Mr. Drew: That is exactly the difficulty which was presented in my mind, because I thought the member for York South had put forth a sound argument in favour of that type of competition which on the one hand recognizes the dangers of unbridled and unlimited competition, and on the other hand recognizes the dangers of the parasol regimented type of competition, call it what you will. Most certainly he did recognize the dangers of the situation which would be created by this measure. Because of that I find it difficult to understand how he is going to vote for this measure when that time ultimately does come.

I have sought to emphasize, in every way I can, the fact that a great deal more attention should be paid to this subject and there should be an opportunity for further consideration. May I express the most earnest hope that when the members go home for Christmas, even if it is only for one day, the merchants in their communities seek them out and indicate exactly what they think of a measure of this kind. It will be most helpful to the members of this house if all the merchants of this country will make sure that, on that single day when members are home, they take the opportunity to tell the members exactly what they do think about this legislation. I feel quite sure a number of the merchants in Guelph are going to call upon the hon. member for Wellington South (Mr. Hosking) when he gets home. After all, that is democracy in operation. I am most hopeful that after that expression of opinion has been registered, many of the members will change their opinions on this subject.

Having said that, may I emphasize my own belief that this is a most difficult subject. It is one of the most complicated problems with which this or any other government will be called upon to deal. The balance between what is desirable in the way of preventing abuses and what would be undesirable in preventing legitimate and desirable practices is difficult to achieve. I do not think the measure before us provides any such balance. This measure is simply adopting the device of shooting the patient. This method cures the ailment, it is true, but then we have to wait for the grief that will follow that rather drastic method of dealing with certain abuses which may exist and which certainly should be dealt with under some effective device where they do exist. I assure hon. members that in taking the time we have—and we have not hesitated to take that time—we have done so in the hope that the government may come to the conclusion that it will be desirable to withdraw this measure for the time being to obtain further information. Then, on the basis of that further information, a measure could be drafted which would give us the best type of fair trade practices, in accordance with our own extensive experience and designed particularly for the Canadian economy, but nevertheless taking full advantage of the experience in other countries. This would ensure that when our legislation was passed into law each one of us would be convinced that it represented the best possible judgment of the high court of parliament.

Surely that is a worthy objective. Surely that is not something anybody can criticize. I assure hon. members that in the objections we have raised and the arguments we have put forward we have availed ourselves of the opportunity open to the opposition to express opinions which may at some point convince the government.

I say quite frankly that one of the advantages of the deliberate extension of a debate is that it is possible for the people themselves to learn what is taking place in parliament, and as a result of that knowledge communicate their views to the members of parliament. In the arguments we have made we have not hesitated to cover all the points that seemed to us to be related to this problem, with the idea that perhaps the government and its supporters may change their opinion and also that perhaps the people affected by this legislation, the consumer and the small merchant, might help to change the government's opinion. For that reason I am earnestly hoping that members in this house may have an opportunity to meet those they represent, and that all the merchants in the various communities will seek out their members and make sure those members do know what they are thinking. I hope also that as many of the real consumers as possible, not just those who describe themselves as such, will seek out the members and explain to them at some length just what they really think of legislation of this type.

Then of course the members will come back with better information. Perhaps they might even come back—and I hope they may do so—with the suggestion that this legislation stand over until the next regular session of parliament. That brings me back to the suggestion that, since it is apparent that this debate is not going to end quickly, it might be well to let this bill stand at this point, to proceed with other measures that are before the house, to dispose of any that can be disposed of, and then to consider carefully whether this measure should be returned at all. I hope the decision might be in accordance with the recommendation I have made, namely that this measure would not be returned at this time but that steps would be taken to have adequate inquiry, and that the measure would be dealt with carefully and in the best possible way when the next session meets.

The Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) is in his place. I can only express to him again my hope that, whether or not we are in disagreement on this matter, he will recognize the fact that we feel strongly on this subject and that we are simply expressing the conviction that this is most dangerous legislation when we present our arguments which, I might say, as they apply to other aspects of this problem, will be continued as this measure is under discussion. I feel that if it were possible to let this measure stand so hon. members might obtain more information from their personal contacts, we might perhaps be able to deal more expeditiously with some of the other measures that still remain on the order paper.

Mr. Low: Mr. Speaker, if I may be allowed to do so I should like to get some information from the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) on one point. Even if the fair trade commission he suggests were set up, does he not think it would also be necessary to abolish the vertical type of price maintenance we now have, in order to make it possible for this commission to function?

Mr. Drew: I should like to answer that question, Mr. Speaker, if I may be permitted to do so. Perhaps I was not sufficiently clear on that point. In introducing the subamendment and simply stating that we were asking that consideration be given to the setting up of a fair trade commission, we recognize the fact that there must be a much broader examination of this subject than has yet taken place. We recognize the fact that there are practices which should be under restraint. We recognize the fact—as it has been recognized in earlier attempts which have been made in this house to pass legislation—that there are practices which should be stopped. But it is also recognized that there are trade practices along those lines that are in the interests of the public. What I said was that I did not think at this stage we should seek to draft the bill, but rather that we should assert as a principle that we want this measure held back so there might be further inquiry, and so the advisability of having a fair trade commission, under which the most desirable type of trade practice could be set up, should be carefully examined by the government and by parliament.

Mr. Noseworthy: May I ask the hon. member a question, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With the consent of the hon. member.

Mr. Noseworthy: Under the commission the hon. member suggests or visualizes in his party's amendment, would the manufacturer or a commission appointed by the government have the final say in what the price should be? That is the point, I think. If I understand the leader of the opposition correctly, he is advocating some form of commission under which the manufacturer will still be free to set his price. We were suggesting a body responsible to this parliament where that price would be determined and regulated.

Mr. Drew: Yes, Mr. Speaker; that is what I understood. I for one certainly do not support the idea that those who are not themselves in a particular business are better able to decide what a business can do than are those engaged in it. I believe that a commission can be set up which will supervise practices of this kind. Without in any way seeking to evade the question, may I point out, as I did in the answer I just gave to the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low), that we are not putting forward a bill, and that we are not attempting to cross the "t's" and to dot the "i's".

Mr. Noseworthy: You never do.

An hon. Member: Neither does the C.C.F.

Mr. Drew: Let me answer that comment by saying that we do, to this extent. The Conservative party, not the C.C.F., has had the responsibility of government in this country for about half the time since confederation, and they were definite enough about it to pass, in 1935, a bill which the courts unfortunately held to be ultra vires. The general purpose that was intended, with the advances that have taken place, is the general purpose of our party today, namely to have the best legislation in the interests of the consumers of this country, which will at the same time protect the independence of our people from officialdom and from the rigid type of prices which seem to be so affectionately regarded by some of the members of the C.C.F. party.

Mr. St. Laurent: May I move the adjournment of this debate until later this day, not for the purpose of complying with the suggestion of the leader of the opposition but for the purpose of reverting for a few moments, as was agreed this morning, to the notice of motion with respect to the date to which adjournment should be taken when the house adjourns this day.

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

On motion of Mr. St. Laurent the debate was adjourned until later this day.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

MOTION FOR ADJOURNMENT UNTIL THURSDAY, DECEMBER 27

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister) moved:

That, notwithstanding any other previous order of this house, when this house adjourns on Friday, December 21, 1951, unless it be otherwise ordered at that time, it stand adjourned until Thursday, December 27, 1951, at 11 o'clock a.m.

He said: Mr. Speaker, it has, I think, become evident that it is not reasonable to expect that, either today or tomorrow, the business of the house could be completed with the care that should be given to matters of that importance, and that it will be necessary to have some further time than that which would remain this day and tomorrow. That being the case, unless an order is made, the house would be required, under the existing orders, to sit tomorrow, Monday and even Christmas day. I do not think that would be the desire of hon. members. I am suggesting that, when we reach the hour of adjournment today, the adjournment be to Thursday morning at 11 o'clock. At that time I would hope we would be able to give to the matters that are still to be dealt with such further consideration as may be required, and that they can be disposed of in an orderly and proper manner. I would like to submit this motion so hon. members would know at this time that they would not be required to be here tomorrow, nor the day before Christmas, nor Christmas day, nor even the day after Christmas, but only on the following day.

[Mr. Drew.]

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): There are just one or two comments I should like to make. There was one point on which I was not clear. The Prime Minister said the house will adjourn today at what hour?

Mr. St. Laurent: The order that is in existence provides that the house shall adjourn, without question put, at ten o'clock. That is the order that is in effect at the present time.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I certainly am not going to raise any objection to the time of adjournment today, but I do raise the question as to whether it is desirable that the time at which we should meet on Thursday next should be at eleven o'clock in the morning, in view of the fact that a number of the trains and planes on which hon. members will be coming in that day will not bring them in by that time. It is generally recognized that the afternoon sitting permits hon. members to arrive here in time to attend. I am simply putting this forward. As will be recognized, it does not affect me personally, but there are a number of hon. members who might be affected by that hour. The other point that I wish to make is this. We still have a very large amount of important business on the order paper in addition to the measure now under consideration. We of course have not had the advantage of seeing the amendment to the Public Works Act, but I can assure hon. members that unless the amendment very substantially varies the bill that is before us, that debate will not be short.

There are other measures of considerable importance. I do think, in making a decision as to the time we should meet, that full regard should be had to what course will be followed. Do we again adjourn for New Year's day? Of course if it is not intended to adjourn for New Year's day no problem arises in that respect. But I would merely put forward the suggestion to the Prime Minister that perhaps he might consider even at this moment just what the proposal would be in that respect, because if there were any thought of making any break for New Year's day then perhaps consideration might be given to the advantage of adjourning until a date in January, somewhere about the middle of that month.

I have no thought of making any amendment or of opposing the resolution. I will accept whatever resolution is put forward in regard to the carrying on of the business of this house as rapidly as possible, consistent with the traditional rights of parliament. But I just put this forward for consideration. In January the greatest living statesman is going to visit Ottawa. The greatest parliamentarian under our parliamentary system will be here; and if the adjournment is going to carry us into the month of January I would suggest that consideration might be given to the fact that many hon. members might like to know whether the house will be sitting when Mr. Churchill will be here, so this great exponent of our parliamentary system might be heard on the floor of this house, and when the people of Canada hear what he has to say they would know it was being said from a background similar in every way to that background with which he has so constantly been associated throughout his mature years. I merely put the suggestion forward. Its consideration will of course be related to the expectation of the Prime Minister as to when our business will be completed. And might I add, the time our business will be completed will be very largely governed by whether the government decides to carry forward this bill or to let it stand over until the next regular session of parliament.

Mr. Speaker: If the Prime Minister speaks now he will close the debate.

Mr. St. Laurent: I just wish to add a word to make it quite clear that there is not, nor is there likely to be, any intention on the part of the government not to proceed with this bill before parliament prorogues.

Motion agreed to.

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT

AMENDMENT TO FORBID THE FIXING OF SPECIFIC OR MINIMUM RESALE PRICES

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Garson for the second reading of Bill No. 36, to amend the Combines Investigation Act, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Coldwell, and the amendment to the amendment of Mrs. Fairclough.

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I should like first of all to say a word about the last comment made by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew), namely that when members are home, even though for a somewhat limited holiday, they might try to inform themselves as to the state of public opinion in their respective constituencies. I think it is fair to say that as far as evidence has come before the committee as yet, certainly from the experience on this side, so far as expressions of opinion from citizens are concerned, there have been many, many times as many opinions against the bill as in favour of it. I am not overlooking the fact that a good many of these opinions came from interested parties. But on the other hand I think it is fair to say that as time goes on there is more and more evidence from people who are interested not as merchants but as consumers. I think there is considerable evidence—evidence which encourages me greatly in the view which we are putting forward—that the consumers are beginning to take a hand in this, and I suggest that the leader of the opposition was very wise in making the suggestion he did.

Like him, I was interested to hear what the hon. member for York South (Mr. Noseworthy) had to say. I wish to make one comment particularly on only one line of his thought. He used quite strong words in suggesting that we might still stop, look and listen. These are not his words but mine: that we might still have time to take another look at this measure. Certainly I agree with him there, and I wish to make a few comments along that line. I echo just briefly what the leader of the opposition said. What is the urgency? Is it a matter of life or death? Well, the only suggestion of life or death is from many people who think it may be a matter of life or death for them if this is passed. But I have not heard a suggestion from any quarter that it would be a matter of life or death if it should wait for a few weeks. No one has suggested that. I do not think the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) will suggest it, and the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) certainly did not suggest it.

Therefore it seems to me we have no real reason except—well, what shall I say—the unregenerate political pride of the government. We have no reason except the prestige, fancied or otherwise, of the government; and of course that is a treasure which they must guard for themselves, and the nature of which the rest of us must leave to them to determine. But I just make the point again, that there is no urgency shown or suggested. I believe I am correct when I say that. If I am wrong, then I am ready to be shown that I am wrong; but I have no recollection of it.

I wish now to come to a few points which have been borne in on my mind, now that I have had a better opportunity to read the evidence. I believe it was the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Browne) who the other evening raised the question as to how many at that time had read the evidence. I have taken all the time I could, consisting of a fair number of hours, but certainly I would not suggest I have mastered it yet. However, there are two or three things I wish to bring to the attention of the house, because they seem to deal with matters which are very relevant to what we are considering now. First of all there is the question which has been raised at some length in the house as to the manner in which the committee was conducted, and as to the whole background of its proceedings.

In that connection I wish to read one or two paragraphs from the remarks of the Minister of Justice, who was present during the sittings of the committee. And I shall read also a few remarks of Senator Lambert, a man known to all of us. I would read particularly with regard to the setting up of the committee and its relationship to the MacQuarrie committee report.

It seemed to me that at times the language used by the Minister of Justice was such as to indicate that it was the MacQuarrie report against the world, and that the only purpose for holding this committee at all was to permit people to come in—and here the language surprises me—to permit the people to come in and, as suggested at page 247, show that the report is "not in order." Then the next line speaks about the "validity of the report." I find those phrases—and I will read more of them—rather puzzling. It sounds like finding whether a motorcar is working, or whether an arithmetic question is right or wrong. This was a matter of opinion on a difficult and elusive subject. It seemed to me, from the words used by the minister, that they indicated an unwise attitude toward the proceedings of the committee.

Let me read at greater length from the minister's words as they are reported at page 246 of the proceedings:

Now, while there may be differences of opinion as to the competence of the MacQuarrie committee we have never had any other view from the time we appointed it but that it was a thoroughly competent committee, and that it has done a thoroughly complete job. It has taken a long time to do it and has gone very thoroughly into the whole matter. It did receive extensive briefs, and had long discussions. It did not curtail discussions in any way and it has done a job which if this committee were to do it would take from now until at least next summer—

That calculation, I thought, was a generous one. I do not know why the minister said "summer" rather than "spring" or, for that matter, "autumn." But that was the word he used. And he continues:

—and we thus could never contemplate any legislation in the main session of parliament.

Then in the next paragraph he referred to the officials of the combines investigation branch, and went on to say:

With the advantage of their views in the matter, we fully accepted the report.

That is the MacQuarrie report.

As some of the speakers who have just spoken in this committee have indicated, we, in the speech from the throne and in the debate in the House of Commons, committed ourselves to the acceptance of the report and to the introduction of legislation based upon it.

"Committed ourselves" he says, "to the acceptance of the report". I do not wish to discuss the language used, but it seems to me that must have been a little discouraging to the committee, because it almost seemed to suggest that the door was pretty well banged, barred and bolted; that they might go through the motions of considering the report, and could have a lot of good fun out of it, but what they said could not amount to much.

I want to read again from page 247, where the minister said:

If, as Mr. Carroll said a moment ago, it appeared, during the course of the representations which they made as the hearings went on, that they—

And I think "they" refers to the people who are opposed.

—were able to discharge the onus which is upon them of showing that the report is not in order, and made it appear there was some doubt about the validity of the report, then I think this committee would be warranted in digging into all the same matters the MacQuarrie committee had considered. But if we get from the representations that are made before us no argument that convinces us that there is anything wrong with the report I cannot see where we have any conscientious duty to go over the whole field that has already been covered very thoroughly by the MacQuarrie committee.

Now, that is a point of view. But I suggest again that the committee, when they heard that said, must have felt, "Well, what does all this amount to? Are we going through a lot of waste motion?" It is for that reason I want to go on to some further quotations. On the next page I read what Senator Lambert said. I know Senator Lambert is not a partisan of any kind; certainly I do not think he is a partisan for the Conservative party. I quote him as a man of independence, and I am interested in what he says. These are his words at page 248 of the proceedings:

I think it is very important in considering this matter now to associate the MacQuarrie report and the inquiry which we are making into the MacQuarrie report with the beginnings of this whole undertaking, which is the Curtis commission's prices inquiry. Now, the essential instruction in connection with the price inquiry by the Curtis commission, the essential instruction given by the prime minister of that day was that it should bring to bear upon the situation the whole moral effect of public opinion in this country—

You see that is exactly what the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) has been suggesting should be done, that we should have the benefit of public opinion in this country. And it is interesting to note that that is exactly what Senator Lambert thought should be done.

Then I go on from there to read:

—and that it was not intended to legislate particularly or to witch hunt for particular factors or situations.

We all agree with that. The only difference of opinion would be: When is a witch hunt not a witch hunt? Then I go on:

It was, rather, an investigation of the economic situation which brought about the suggested complaints about prices, and I submit now—

And this is the important part of it.

—as I did in the beginning here, that it is a mistake to set down a deadline or attempt to set down a deadline in connection with this inquiry. I do not suggest that this committee should undertake as wide and as detailed an inquiry as the Curtis commission did, but I do submit that the MacQuarrie report does not begin to approach, and I do not think their investigation has begun to approach, from the public point of view, and from the point of view of a democratic interest in this whole subject, the work that was done by the Curtis commission. The MacQuarrie report is a very well stated summary; someone has compared it to an obiter dictum of the supreme court on arguments, and I think that is what it is. There is not a word of evidence given in it.

And may I say that I think the authors of the MacQuarrie report were, perhaps by accident, put in a very unfortunate position. It seems now that the short time they were given in which to make this sort of preliminary or partial report put them in a position which perhaps it might have been wiser to have avoided. Perhaps they tried to avoid it, for all I know. I continue.

There is not a word of evidence given in it. There is a summary of arguments, pro and con, on this subject, but, to my way of thinking, it is something that invites me, as a member of parliament—

I was interested in reading that phrase because I suppose in my ignorance I had forgotten that it fits a senator. I continue:

—it is something that invites me, as a member of parliament, to reflect back to the people of this country public opinion, to which I am responsible, some degree of evidence to support the conclusions of the MacQuarrie report. That is the only point I should like to bring out.

I should like now to refer to another quarter, certainly one not associated with our party, and to quote the remarks of the hon. member for St. James (Mr. Beaudry) as reported on page 249. We were delighted to hear the hon. member speak the other night. He has explained twice on questions of privilege that in spite of the views he holds, which are diametrically opposed to those of his party, apparently he is going to go along with them. He reminded me of a statement I saw in some work on the British parliament which referred to people who made speeches to satisfy their consciences and then voted to satisfy the whips. I think that is what the hon. member for St. James has done. The hon. member stated in the committee:

I am quite in sympathy with Senator Lambert's remarks and in order to expedite matters, since we have very little in the way of concrete evidence so far before us—

That is really an echo of what Senator Lambert said.

—and since it is a laborious task to elicit it from witnesses, I would like to know whether we could not get from official sources a definite set of figures that we would otherwise have to draw from every witness. If I may I would like to suggest some that could incorporate in the record, to which we could refer without asking witnesses for it. We should obtain information, for instance, as to the number of independent stores and independent businesses by provinces and by classification, let us say, in 1930, 1935, 1940 and 1950, and information as to the aggregate volume of business per classification. We could have the same information filed for chain and departmental stores, the volume of mail order business done in Canada in these different years, the number of bankruptcies since 1930, again by classification.

I shall not read the rest of that paragraph as I do not want to weary the house. I point out that here are two men who do not belong to this party making the same complaint we have made, that we are being asked to act on opinion. This committee was not allowed to have original facts but was asked to act on opinion. I consider that an unfortunate and indeed improper way to carry on the work of the committee. I think those in the committee and those in this house who criticized the manner in which that work was carried on were only too well justified in what they said.

Here again I should like to underline that this afternoon the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew), when speaking on this matter and asking for further consideration, was merely reaching the only conclusion that could be reached from the remarks I have read of the minister, of Senator Lambert and of the hon. member for St. James. So much for that.

I wish now to turn to another aspect of the proceedings which I think are most important and to me very interesting. I think if I had been asked before any evidence was given what I thought would be the attitude of labour I would have been inclined to guess that they would be for the legislation. In the questions that were asked representatives of labour they were given every chance to say the opposite of what they did say. They were very cautious in their view. They wanted to do exactly what we want to have done, have the facts. They refused to jump to conclusions. I now propose to read briefly from the evidence given by Mr. L. E. Wismer, director of public relations and research, Trades and Labour Congress of Canada, who appeared with Mr. Percy R. Bengough, the president of that organization. Mr. Wismer made an opening statement which I think was rather a model statement.

I was very interested in it because it seemed to me that he indicated a course which I think might wisely be followed. He said:

Mr. Chairman, I think I could say, on behalf of president Bengough, that we listened with a great deal of interest to your debate this morning because to some extent it indicated the same difficulties in the minds of the members of the committee that we have, and that is whether or not we should be in favour of the interim report as to whether or not resale price maintenance is a bad thing or a good thing, and in saying that to you I think we should lay our cards on the table. We are speaking for the largest organized group of consumers in this country. There are at least 500,000 paid member of our organization and they have in many cases wives, families, relatives and so on, and they represent a very large proportion of the consuming public. It is important, in our point of view, that we should try to know, before we make up our minds, whether the practice of resale price maintenance grows up as a normal human protection in an economy, or whether it grows up as a predatory practice. In the case of working people, wage earners and their representatives, the combining of men in a trade union grows up from necessity; it grows up as a human practice to protect yourselves, not to hurt anybody, not as a predatory thing but as a protection to the people involved.

That seems to be a very sensible approach to the subject. They do not prejudge it. They want to know about it. They did not want to know the views of somebody else, they wanted to make up their own minds with the facts before them. They did not want just the facts provided by those who were against or those who were for, they wanted all the facts from the most responsible sources. I continue:

Now, we are not employers and we are not the representatives of employers, so we do not know if employers have the same problems or not.

You will observe that they are open-minded; they are ready to believe that they may have.

We know what our problems are like. We know we have to chase a continually rising price level with wages, and we have never yet found a way in which we can do it successfully.

Then I come to the next paragraph:

This is the point we tried to make in the brief. We are very sure in our own minds that over the years gradually trade unions were recognized in law as legitimate associations of people capable of making a bargain under law with their employers. If it is necessary that some sort of similar bargains should be made by the employers for the maintenance of their business and their interests, it also should be done under the law. In other words, we favour whatever price fixing has to be done, whether it be done by trade unions and their employers, by lawyers or doctors or any other association of people, and that it be done under the law. We think if you set up a law of that sort in a positive sense, with a consumers' price board where these arrangements can be considered and approved in whatever form they may necessarily take, that we would be moving in a direction which would uphold the principle of free economy.

He says that, but you will observe that he keeps an open mind and wants to know the facts. Then he is examined by the minister, and I should like to read the following:

By Hon. Mr. Garson:

Q. Supposing a number of members of your union were working for a certain manufacturing plant, would you like the idea that the manufacturer should have the sole right to fix wages by himself?

A. Definitely not.

Q. At the present time he has the sole right to fix your prices, his own mark-up of them and the retailer's mark-up on them and all the rest. Do you like that?

A. Has he got that, Mr. Garson?

Q. Did you not know that?

A. What bludgeon does he use on the retailer to force him into that?

Q. Under resale price maintenance he does fix your price. I put this question to you, are you not as anxious to get out from under the manufacturers' power to fix the prices you have to pay with your wages as you are to have some say in the fixing of your own wages?

Mr. Bengough then interrupts and says:

It applies in some instances but there are, shall I say, many variations of that.

I want to digress for a moment because the minister undertook there to make a categorical statement which I think is not warranted. He speaks of the manufacturer as having the sole right to fix prices. The hon. member for York West (Mr. Adamson) had some comments to make on that this afternoon which were absolutely to the point. The idea that the manufacturer sits in an ivory tower and fixes the prices that everyone is going to pay is just a shibboleth. It is something I am sure the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) knows does not exist, and he should not say it exists. What manufacturers have to do day by day and month by month is to use their best wits and efforts to find out what prices can be paid by the consumers and, as I said a moment ago, the idea that the manufacturer sits in an ivory tower and fixes prices exists only in theory. I am glad to know and to be able to quote the fact that Mr. Bengough stepped on that and qualified it. Then the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) questioned Mr. Bengough, or I should say Mr. Wismer. Apparently sometimes Mr. Bengough steps in when questions are asked of Mr. Wismer. The hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) asked the following:

Q. May I ask Mr. Wismer if he feels that this so-called practice of price maintenance is a detriment to or perhaps in harmony with public interest?

A. I think we can say this, in so far as the deal is made privately and enforced privately we would have to say no, but where it is a general practice I think we would have to have a lot more information.

Again, Mr. Speaker, I suggest that here is a sensible man who is not ready to make a lot of positive statements without information, which is what we are being asked to do in this legislation.

An hon. Member: Go and do what I did; go and consult your merchant.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Then there is this question by the hon. member for Eglinton, with reference to the draft bill:

Q. You will recall it purports to propose blanket prohibition on resale prices. Would you think that is a proper and desirable way of going about this matter, that we have blanket prohibition, or if we are going to have legislation on it should it be left to determine whether in the particular case the particular type of agreement is in the given circumstances harmful to the public interest or not?

Mr. Bengough makes what I think is a very sensible answer. He said, "It would have to be flexible". Then the hon. member for Eglinton said, "You wouldn't favour a general prohibition", and Mr. Bengough's answer was "no". I bring this to your attention, Mr. Speaker, and I only hope that possibly members of the house will pay some attention to it. Here are sensible men occupying positions of high trust and responsibility, representing literally hundreds of thousands of their fellow citizens, and who I am bound to say seem to me to approach this thing in a very sensible manner. They say: Let us have a look at the facts, and they are very shy about answering a lot of general and doctrinaire questions which are based on certain assumptions that not only have not been proved but concerning which apparently the government does not desire time to be given so we may find out whether or not they are capable of proof.

I have gone into that point at some length because I think, as the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) has said, that this is a matter of great importance; and when you have a matter of great importance you also often have a matter of great urgency. No one has suggested there is any urgency here. We do have a matter of importance, one that we think may have a very profound effect. Why the sensible and practical suggestion that we should stop, look and listen cannot be adopted is beyond my understanding.

I want to go back to the evidence of one of the witnesses heard fairly early in the sittings of the committee. I think it was before what you might call closure or quasi-closure had been clamped down on the committee. I am going to read part of the evidence of Mr. Harris. It would appear that at that time the committee was a little more open to receiving suggestions. I think it was before those emanations, those telepathic waves, began to pass between the minister and the chairman of the committee. The chairman of the committee has told us there was no communication, but it may have been in the air, and at any rate we know that the clamp, closure, gag or whatever you may like to call it came down. Before it came down fully Mr. Harris gave some evidence at pages 257 and 258. He was speaking on behalf of the Canadian retail federation, and I want to read some statements he made.

Before doing so I should like to remind the house that a good many of these statements can be borne out by statements from responsible quarters and reported in the British pamphlet I read the other day. The minister will remember the name of it. In passing let me say there was a memorandum from another quarter which quoted at some length from a British white paper. I think that is some time later than the report from which I quoted the other day. All I can say is that in this British white paper they succeeded in ignoring some of the sober and serious statements made in the report after evidence had been given. If I may say so with respect to so august a body as the British government, it seemed to me they acted somewhat like our government. They were perfectly prepared to act on the basis of the things they liked to believe were facts.

For instance, I remember reading and Hansard will show that I read the other day a surprisingly strong statement, I thought, on behalf of the women purchasers. They spoke very strongly in favour of price maintenance saying they found it a great advantage to be able to know what they were getting, to have quality and not to have that most irritating feeling—and it is an irritating feeling —of buying something and then finding you could have bought it cheaper somewhere else. It is particularly irritating to the man with a name like mine, and I think the mental wear and tear that goes with that sort of thing is very serious indeed. I can understand these housewives.

Mr. Garson: It is kind of hard on us Scots.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): They want to be relieved from that form of nervous exhaustion. At any rate that was what they said, and in passing I could not help convey my considerable surprise that according to the quotation from the summary of the white paper the British government indicated that they did not think that was reasonable. They said it was not reasonable for women to believe that way, and therefore they could not have believed that way. I am not going to discuss the reasonableness of women. There are different views on that. Some people think women are more reasonable than other people believe them to be. I would say that as purchasers the opinion of women would rank very high; and when you have the consumers' league in Britain, a very responsible body, expressing the views they did they are not to be laughed off, not by a socialist government.

Having said that, I want to read some of the remarks made by Mr. Harris. I believe they are relevant. After all, as my leader said, parliament could not exist except on the assumption that you believe it is possible the things you are saying may have some effect upon the minds of some of the people opposite. You may go on and on being more and more discouraged, but if you came to the point where you believed it was impossible to change the opinion of members opposite it seems to me parliament would have to end. I am sure the minister would agree with that. Therefore I continue to make these arguments. My hopes are not high, but I comfort myself often with the remark made by a wise old friend. He was not talking about the opposition, but I believe his remarks could be applied to them. He said that when you break a stone with the hundredth tap of the hammer, that does not mean the first ninety-nine did nothing. We feel that we are somewhere around the ninetieth or ninety-first tap.

I should like to read from the evidence of Mr. Harris at page—

An hon. Member: You need it, sir.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I am all right as long as I am reading. The great problem is how long one has to go on to convince other people. Of course, the difficulty, and one of the tantalizing things here, is that we have a profound conviction we have convinced a lot of other people but they won't say so.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): It is a secret.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): The Minister of Public Works, on the other hand, is a very different cup of tea, because last Saturday afternoon we had a fine debate in this chamber. At the end he did not say he was convinced, but his actions certainly indicated that he was.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): On this bill?

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): No, on public works, the thing you know most about. We came away from that debate feeling we had really accomplished something. I apologize for all these digressions, Mr. Speaker, but may I call it 6:15.

At 6:15 p.m. the house took recess.

[Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood).]

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, before I continue may I say that a suggestion has been made to me, from a source I respect, that after all the long hours we have had we might perhaps let the page boys off this evening. I hope I am not rocking the boat, Mr. Speaker. I have not done this kind of thing before, and maybe one should not interfere with the routine at all. I have raised this matter because these boys are not as old as we are, and they have had quite a hard time. I think I am one of those who put them to the most work, and I would be ready to do my own chores this evening.

Mr. Speaker: I am not sure whether the House of Commons would be able to function without the page boys. They are extremely important.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Now that you have referred to them in that way, Mr. Speaker, I am sure that they would much prefer to stay on. Perhaps I had better withdraw my request.

Mr. Speaker: I shall be glad to take the matter up with the chief page and see if he thinks it is possible for us to get along without them. I thank the hon. member for having brought the matter to my attention.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Thank you, Mr. Speaker; I had hesitated to do so.

When we took recess I had been arguing, first of all, that there was no breathless haste here. I had suggested that there was involved no matter of life and death, except possibly to the people who believed they might be grievously injured by the passing of this measure; that nobody was going to suffer immediate damage by the delay in passing it and that, therefore, if there was any question of life and death the argument was for delay and not for immediate action.

I had then gone on to quote at some length from some of the labour men who came before the committee. I had pointed out that they seemed to me to be wise inasmuch as, in answer to questions, they had frequently said: We are not sure about that; there are views on both sides of the case; things must be flexible and not too rigid. I think I would be fair in saying that, by their attitude, they certainly had not indicated a desire to press on, regardless. I also had endeavoured, by reading quotations from the minister himself and from Mr. Lambert, to stress the argument that I thought more could have been done to allow the committee and, through the committee, ourselves to judge this matter not by the opinions of other men, which in effect is what we are being asked to do, but by evidence we would get ourselves.

We in this party have often suggested in this house in other matters that we want access to the facts; and indeed, we have made some progress in that direction. We have stressed the fact that no responsible person is entitled to reach a conclusion without it being his own conclusion. My understanding of the law of trustees is that the one thing a trustee may not do is say that he did not exercise his own discretion. It may be an exceedingly bad discretion—and of course there are various views as to the discretion of the people in this chamber—but as I understand it, provided he exercises an honest discretion a trustee is fairly sure to come off scot-free if his actions are ever attacked. I suggest that we are trustees in the general sense of that term, although of course not in any legal sense; and I suggest that we are being prevented from doing what a trustee is called upon to do by law—and by that I mean a legal trustee—namely, to exercise his own discretion, which presupposes that he has the facts.

At 6.15 I was going on to read some comments made by a man who came on in the early days of the committee proceedings, and who represented some of the people whom we think should have been represented more widely and should not have been turned back as some of them were. I now propose to read briefly from some of the comments made by Mr. Harris. I read them with particular pleasure because they bear on some of the remarks which have been made categorically and, I think without warrant, suggesting that really a manufacturer just dwells in an ivory tower and he dictates his prices to the rest of the community.

Mr. Adamson: Which, of course, is nonsense.

Mr. Howe: Is that so? I will give you some examples.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I wish it were possible to have the evidence of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) on this matter. I am sure it would be extremely interesting, and that we could get much further if only we had had him on the witness stand.

Mr. Harris had something to say about the matter. He was given an opportunity to express his views and, as reported at page 258 of the proceedings of the committee, he said:

> Our brief brings out these points: first, that resale price maintenance is a stabilizing influence on our economy.

I might remind you, Mr. Speaker, that before the dinner recess I mentioned the case of the women purchasers in Britain who brought out this particular point, namely that it was a good thing, first of all, to have a guarantee as to quality and, second, not to have that agony which besets a certain kind of person when he finds that he has bought at one shop something he could have bought much more cheaply elsewhere. They evidently like the stability or the uniformity of price; although there one must throw in a caveat, too, because it was brought out in other cases that there could not be a rigid uniformity, and that sensible manufacturers do not try to pursue the man who, through the exigencies of his business and through the necessity for ready money, was selling perhaps below the stipulated price. Mr. Harris goes on to say:

> Secondly, the public has protection in the brand name and an assurance of quality.

I think we all agree with that statement. He continues:

> Thirdly, minimum resale prices tend to become maximum. Fourthly, price maintenance limits the retailers' margin of gross profit.

Later on Mr. Harris has something further to say about that question of limitation. He continues:

> Our next point is: Price maintenance does not lead to high prices; and again, price maintenance tends to stabilize production.
>
> Now, in opposition to the findings of the MacQuarrie commission, we submit first that price maintenance does not restrict competition unduly.
> Secondly, we maintain that price maintenance tends to equalize prices across Canada; that is, in British Columbia and the maritime provinces—

He appears to include them in Canada, Mr. Speaker. I do not know why he should have any doubt about that.

Mr. Gibson: The Railway Act does that.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I continue:

> They have always suffered from the disparity in freight rates.

He goes right on to the point made by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Gibson). I am glad to have him with me in this. I continue:

> So with price maintained items the prices tend to be the same throughout Canada as a whole. That, in turn, helps to equalize the cost of living throughout the country.
>
> We further submit—and I say this, gentlemen, with bated breath—that the consumer is not an expert in the value of merchandise, except in use, and the brand protects her and the price protects the brand.

Mr. Harris evidently knows his stuff. He knows who the purchaser really is. I go on:

> We further believe that price maintenance helps retail advertising, or rather enables national advertising which means greater advertising economy and more economical distribution to the consumer.
> We further submit—

And I commend this particularly to the Minister of Justice whose questions were asked in an entirely opposite sense:

We further submit that price maintenance does not mean fixed prices because they fluctuate up and down.

I had hoped to be able to give figures on that point, but I do not have them. I am sure they are available. I tried to get them today but I have not had time. We have had a rather busy day today. I hope to be able to get these figures. If we have the opportunity to discuss this on a future occasion I hope to be able to prove this, and I hope the opposite impression which does exist here may be done away with. I want to go on and read something further that Mr. Harris said on page 260. He was questioned by Mr. Boucher, who I think was one of the counsel who were good enough to come and assist the committee out of the goodness of their hearts:

Q. On page 1, point 1 of your brief, you say that resale price maintenance is a stabilizing factor in our economy. What does your group mean by the statement that resale price maintenance is a stabilizing factor?

A. We mean that prices, as you know, are always in movement; they are always fluctuating. Now, let us take an example of one town or one city, and one retailer in it who cuts the price. It may be that the bank is pressing him, or he may have some other reason; but the price structure immediately is broken in that particular community.

Where price maintenance does not exist there is a strong inclination for other retailers immediately to follow, and their prices will drop. Their prices cannot remain permanently down, because it would be unsound price cutting, and their businesses could not live at such a level of prices. But, because we are human and extremely competitively inclined, a great many retailers would undoubtedly cut their prices down to the level of the first retailer, and in that way the price structure of the community would be fluctuating up and down so that the consumer does not know what the proper value is.

I commend that again, Mr. Speaker. There is the statement of a man who is in close touch with marketing. I believe the description he has given is correct. I think when we try to speak inflexibly about these matters we immediately run into exceptions of this kind which he has just mentioned. Mr. Boucher questioned him again as follows:

Q. Would not, in many cases, resale price maintenance retain nominal profit margins to the detriment of profit volume?

That is a very important question, because it is suggested that resale price maintenance might have the effect of restricting consumption, thereby restricting production and thereby injuring the activity of manufacturers. This was the answer:

A. I would like to answer that a little more fully, if I may. I am very glad you asked that question. I checked with the buyers in our own business to get their views on price maintenance and some of them said "we are against it" and I said "why" and they said "because it does not give us a sufficiently wide margin of profit." There is a very decided tendency, and it is generally recognized in the retail trade that on price-maintained items you do not get the same margin of gross profit that you do on those items which are not price maintained. It is the constant search of every buyer to find other than price maintained items to keep his maintained mark-up, as we call it, at a level which allows his department or his store to show a profit.

[Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood).]

I was interested in that because, as far as it goes, it would appear to indicate the opposite of what is being suggested often without figures to back it up, namely that price-maintained articles are steadily and generally at a higher level than others. I have here some figures from a responsible source. They are a lot of drug items. I am not going to read them in great detail. It is a list of 216 altogether. Most of them, if not all, except 17 items of household drugs are price-maintained. I will read some of the increases. This is based on 1935-39. Bear in mind that this compares with the rise in the general cost of living of something like—

Mr. Garson: May I ask the hon. member the source of the figures he is using?

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I think the minister will have to take my word for it. It is a very responsible businessman who deals in this kind of thing. I am satisfied myself that it is reliable. If the minister finds figures that seem to disprove these I will have to back my champion. I do not mention people's names without their permission, and I did not ask permission to mention the name; therefore I shall just have to ask the minister to believe that I believe these.

Mr. Garson: He is a druggist, though?

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): He is in the drug business, yes.

Mr. Garson: Quite.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I propose to read perhaps half a dozen of these, which I am assured are price-protected: antiseptics and disinfectants are listed there as 117·6, that is, in relation to 100 on the 1935-39 base; baby products, 121; effervescent salts, 113; insecticides, 117·7; ointments and salves are higher, 119. Against these I have read there is a list of 17 household products which are without price protection, and in that case the figure is very much higher, 154·9. That seems to tie right into what Mr. Harris has said in the evidence that I have just read:

It is the constant search of every buyer to find other than price-maintained items to keep his maintained mark-up, as we call it, at a level which allows his department or his store to show a profit.

The minister gave some figures the other day, and I may say that I checked up and I found they were correct; at least they were confirmed by this same source.

Mr. Garson: You really did not suspect they would be otherwise?

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Well, we all make mistakes. I have actually made mistakes myself. I was very surprised about these figures. I hoped to find there was some misunderstanding with regard to them; but with regard to those items I was assured it was not so, so I was glad to see these others which seemed to give a very different picture. I say I have been interested in Mr. Harris' evidence, because we have all been arguing that the people who should be listened to are the people who are in the business and who actually do buy and sell. We all recognize that they have a firm approach to the matter. They may have a limited view, but at any rate their views are based on that greatest of all realities, the red and black figures in a balance sheet. There is nothing in the world like that to give reality to a man's thinking.

Mr. Studer: About time to change the record.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I am sorry the hon. member is suffering as much pain as he evidently is.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member's time has expired.

Mr. A. W. Stuart (Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, I realize this statement is made on many occasions, but I can assure the house that I had no intention at all of having anything to say in this debate, until it became evident that we would not finish tonight. So, as I sat on the committee and listened to the evidence produced there by those in support of resale price maintenance and those who were opposed to that practice, I felt that I might express my views for a few moments.

As I have said, groups representing manufacturers, wholesalers and retailers appeared before the committee. In many cases they had helping them present their case the very best that could be found from the legal profession. We had with us also those who represented labour, co-operatives, the federation of agriculture, and other groups. I believe if we had the figures they would show that those representatives spoke for millions of people in Canada.

For this reason I have been firmly convinced since the time the committee was set up that at least 85 per cent of the people of Canada are in favour of the legislation the government has now placed before the house. In summing up the evidence presented before the committee I am firmly convinced that the cost of trading or of retailing, whichever you wish to call it, varies considerably. One store may carry a huge stock and operate an expensive delivery service. They may give credit terms that the small dealers are not able to give. The small dealer, the person who in my opinion will be benefited rather than hurt by this legislation, concentrates on the quick-selling lines, and he trades in a cash and carry fashion.

In other words, one consumer purchases over the telephone while the other takes a shopping basket and walks a long distance to save a few dimes here or twenty-five cents there or fifty cents somewhere else. But resale price maintenance provides exactly the same profit to both merchants, regardless of this fact. And although different services are provided, the people who do not wish to pay for this de luxe service are obliged to do so under the practices of resale price maintenance.

Mr. Sinclair: That is true.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): I noted tonight before six o'clock that when the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) was speaking he mentioned that he had not been able to read all the evidence produced before the combines committee, and that he did not feel he was in a position to make up his mind as to what he should do in this regard until he had found time to read those proceedings. When he said that I thought to myself that when the house is in session and there are at the same time ten or twelve committees sitting, the evidence before some of which may be very long, he is a very fine parliamentarian indeed who reads all that evidence before deciding how he can vote.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I did not say I was going to read it all.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): I thought from the hon. member's statement that he was expecting to read it all before he would know how to act in connection with this legislation. I am saying that any member who decides that he must read all the evidence taken before committees of the house, and all the briefs presented before them, and that he must absorb all of it before he can make up his mind as to how he will vote, will be a long time making that decision.

Another point that was noticeable in the remarks of the hon. member was that he singled out statements in different parts of the evidence. Sometimes that is very confusing, because reading only part of a statement may give the wrong impression. If the hon. member had read the whole statement it would have given a different impression altogether. One leaves a wrong impression when he quotes only a short statement.

As an example I would refer to a witness who appeared before the committee on behalf of the Ontario hardware dealers. I believe hon. members will agree that he was a brilliant witness, and that he gave evidence in support of resale price maintenance. However, toward the end of his testimony he was asked why the T. Eaton Company support this legislation. After making two or three different answers he came out with the statement that he thought perhaps the T. Eaton Company would rather run their own business than have someone else run it for them. In my opinion that is the very thing resale price maintenance is doing in this country today. It is running the businesses of people who would like to run their own business.

Mr. Sinclair: Hear, hear.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): Let me say that I have received from my county two letters asking me not to support this legislation. One of those letters came from a hardware dealer and the other came from a druggist. Those were the only two I received. On the other hand I have received several asking me to support the legislation. I realize that what I am saying is going on record, and that the people down there will know exactly the interest that was taken, so far as this legislation is concerned, from the standpoint of the retailer.

There were long discussions in the committee with regard to what are known as loss leaders. If one had time to read all the evidence he would find that every witness who appeared before the committee representing manufacturers, wholesalers or retailers was asked for his definition of a loss leader.

An hon. Member: The leader of the opposition.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): We are just as far away from the definition today as we were the day the committee was set up. One cannot find two people who are of the same opinion. Not more than one or two would voice any opinion at all.

Mr. Balcom: Has the hon. member a definition of loss leader?

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): I am glad the hon. member asked that, because I have. A loss leader is the finest thing that was ever put on sale in any branch of retail business, for the benefit of the consumer. That is my definition of it.

Mrs. Fairclough: In the United States or in Canada?

[Mr. Stuart (Charlotte).]

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): In the final analysis the consumer reaps the benefit. He gets the bargain, and there are very few in the world today.

I believe resale price maintenance is a procedure obviously designed to prevent and which does prevent the lowering of prices. There is no question in my mind about that. The very words that describe the practice, "resale price maintenance", convince me that it is not for the benefit of the consumer. It is certainly for the benefit of the retailer or the wholesaler, whoever wishes to apply it. The consumer can never derive any benefit from it.

When we look back over the record to the time the trouble started in Korea we must all realize, although some may not admit it, that big business in this country began to stockpile. There is no question about that. They were of the opinion that if a war broke out many things would be in short supply and perhaps impossible to get at all. I could name plenty in business, if I wanted to, who did some stockpiling. But I will say they are the fellows who are worrying today. It is not the small merchant the opposition is worrying about; it is the big fellow who has stockpiled, and he is scared blue for fear this legislation may force him to take a loss. The little guy has not these stockpiles; it is the big guy who has them. I know one gentleman who sits in this house who is in business in a rather big way and he told me that he had 150 refrigerators in his basement. It is not the fellow with the pound of coffee, a few pounds of tea and some lard and sugar who is worrying; the fellow who is doing the worrying is the big fellow, and he is the man who is putting the pressure on so far as this legislation is concerned. It is not the little fellow in the corner store on whom so much emphasis has been placed in this debate.

The leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) spoke yesterday, and I believe if he had kept on a little longer he would have convinced himself that this legislation was good legislation. I say that in all sincerity. One thing he mentioned, in fact he emphasized it to some extent, was the wonderful service the drug stores of this country are giving to the public today. I see some of my druggist friends in the house. I do not think one member in this house will argue with that statement. Many drug stores in this city have little trucks and cars and will deliver anything you want from a nipple for a baby's bottle—

An hon. Member: Coca-cola.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): If people want to pay for that service, I do not quarrel with them. They have a perfect right to pay for that if they want to. But the man with a small salary may not want to pay for such service and he should not be forced to. That is exactly what resale price maintenance does. I should like to give just one more example. Some hon. members are able to stay at the Chateau Laurier hotel while others are not. If an hon. member staying there decides tomorrow morning that he wants to send out some laundry, he calls a bell boy, it is picked up and returned that night. But he pays about 30 cents a shirt for that service.

Mr. Mutch: Twenty-eight cents.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): But there are some of us poor fellows who pack our laundry and take it up the street and leave it at a laundry, and we get our shirts done for two for a quarter. I do not quarrel with those who want to pay for the service given at the Chateau, but if there are others who do not want to pay for that kind of service they should not be obliged or forced to.

You could talk here for the next six months, and you could not convince me that resale price maintenance is good for the little man, that it is good for the consumers of this country. I believe most people are of the same opinion as myself. We should not forget the housewife whose husband is perhaps earning only a small income. We should not deny her the privilege of taking her shopping basket and buying the things for which she is willing to pay cash and carry them home. She does not want all this de luxe service that has been mentioned time after time. She does not want to pay for that; she is willing to carry her own purchases. But under this system she would not be able to do that. She does not want to use and pay for all that service, but that is exactly what resale price maintenance will force her to do.

There is one other thing I should like to refer to briefly. If I may I should like to place on the record a brief that was sent to the committee, which I feel tells the story much better than anything I have been able to read or any explanation I could ever hope to make. I think most hon. members will agree that when a manufacturer sets the price the retailer becomes his agent. There might be some quarrel with that statement, but everyone knows the position of the automobile dealer. He is not considered to be a retailer; he is the agent of General Motors or Ford Motor Company. When you have resale price maintenance you have the same thing applying to the whole retail trade. The retailers are not retailers any more; they are agents of the manufacturer. There is no incentive for them to try to buy a little cheaper for the consumers. They are simply the agents of the wholesaler or manufacturer. There is no other description for them. The price is set for them and there is no encouragement to buy an article that they can sell a little cheaper. That situation applies anywhere that resale price maintenance is adopted.

I believe that the retailers in Canada are good citizens and are doing a job for the community. I believe the retailers of Charlotte county are trying to buy the best goods obtainable at the lowest price. In order to do that the retailer shops around among the manufacturers to get the best goods he can at the cheapest price possible. He tries to improve the efficiency of his shop, and to bring the best goods to his friends at the lowest price.

That type of retailer is the purchasing agent of the consumer. Is a retailer to be a selling agent for the manufacturer, selling at a price fixed by the manufacturer, or is he to be the purchasing agent of the consumer, buying the best goods obtainable and selling them to the consumer and his friends at the lowest possible price? Who is the better merchant? I leave it to the members to judge.

In substantiation of what I have said I should like to read a brief which I believe is indicative of the attitude of retailers from Newfoundland to British Columbia. This brief is addressed to James Sinclair, Esquire, M.P., chairman, special committee on resale price maintenance, and it comes from Woodward Stores Limited of Vancouver, B.C. This is not a brief from New Brunswick, it is one from British Columbia that I have chosen.

Mr. Fulton: Do you know how big Woodward stores are?

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): I know how big they were at one time.

Mr. Sinnott: We know how small you are.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): One of the hon. members from British Columbia told me his mother had told him she could remember when the proprietor swept out the store himself. This brief is—

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order.

Mr. Howe: There is no point of order.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I have a point of order.

An hon. Member: Sit down.

An hon. Member: Give him a chance.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I rise on a point of order. The hon. member is quoting from a brief which was submitted to the chairman of the committee and I should like to ask if that brief was published.

Mr. Speaker: Is the hon. member asking a question of the hon. member who has the floor?

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I was asking the hon. member if it is published in the report and, if so, at what page I can find it.

Mr. Sinclair: Apparently the hon. member has not bothered to read the proceedings of the committee. This brief was submitted to the chairman of the committee, and, like every other brief submitted to the chairman, was printed in the proceedings of the committee and is a matter of public record.

Mr. Fulton: All the hon. member is asking for is the page number.

Mr. Sinclair: It is in the last or the second last of the day's proceedings.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): Page 818.

Mr. Speaker: Is there another point of order?

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Can we not even ask questions?

Mr. Knowles: Merry Christmas.

Mr. Sinclair: You could not find a royal commission report in your own province, so how can you find anything else?

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I suggest the hon. member address the chair.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Hon. members apparently have decided the point amongst themselves.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): If I may continue now, I should like to read from the brief of the Woodward organization, to be found at page 818 of the proceedings of the committee. It reads as follows:

> For many years the Woodward organization has sought by every means in its power so to conduct its business that it can offer the best merchandise to customers at the lowest possible prices. This we believe to be the major purpose of the merchandising profession. Price maintenance however has made it impossible for the merchant to reduce his prices below an arbitrarily fixed minimum, and has nullified his constant search for new techniques which will enable him to sell for less. We wish therefore wholeheartedly to endorse the recommendation of the MacQuarrie committee against resale price maintenance.

[Mr. Browne (St. John's West).]

I want hon. members to listen to this part carefully.

> Experience has taught us that business interests are best served by placing first and foremost the interests of the public.

Truer words were never spoken.

Mr. Fulton: Every little retailer said the same.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): It continues:

> It is possible that certain manufacturers may benefit by their ability to command a predetermined price for their product, whatever its quality may be. It is possible that certain retailers may derive advantage from the restriction of effective competition. But it is also sure that the consumer is frequently denied savings he might have enjoyed through the efficiency which only competition can promote.

True again, Mr. Speaker.

> The use of competitive methods in bringing merchandise to the public is a powerful weapon against inflation.

Mr. Fulton: May I ask the hon. gentleman a question?

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): Not until I am through. These people would really have us worrying about the introduction of this bill.

Mr. Sinclair: He has spent two and a half hours already boring us.

Mr. Fulton: I just wanted to ask a question. If the hon. member does not want to answer it he does not have to.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): The Progressive Conservative group has emphasized the fact that the government is doing nothing to fight inflation, but they have fought tooth and nail the very first measure introduced that might help the situation.

Mr. Fulton: Does Eaton's support the same views as Woodward's?

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): It continues:

> Many forms of retail outlet are to be found in Canada. There are stores where customers serve themselves in order to save, and stores where they may receive exclusive individual attention.

Our drug stores are an example.

Mr. Fulton: Or Eaton's or Woodward's.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): It continues:

> There are stores where they may order by telephone, have delivery, purchase at the same price for credit as for cash, and there are stores where none of these advantages are offered.

Mr. Fulton: Like Eaton's and Woodward's.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): Continuing:

> Is it reasonable to compel them all, irrespective of the amount of service they offer and irrespective of their widely different operating costs, to sell their product at the same price—and that price the highest the market will bear?

Mr. Fulton: Like Eaton's and Woodward's.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): I do not believe I interrupted the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) when he spoke, and he spoke for over two hours. I have not said a word yet in this debate.

Mr. Howe: He is just being tiresome. Don't pay any attention.

Mr. Speaker: I think it is only fair that the hon. member for Charlotte (Mr. Stuart) should be allowed to continue.

Mr. Sinclair: These are not matters we learned at either of his alma maters; I can assure you of that.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): It goes on:

The whole of our Canadian economy is geared to a free enterprise system.

That must sound good to the people to the left.

It is the basis of our political creed.

Again it sounds great.

The man in the street has faith in it. He believes that sooner or later unfettered competition and the laws of supply and demand will defeat the bogey of inflation. The freezing of competitive selling is the very antithesis of free enterprise. For these reasons we oppose and have opposed it in principle and practice for sixty years. We strive to sell merchandise in an efficient manner and at minimum margins consistent with good business. This too is the aim of many manufacturers with whom we do business and who have built up for their products an enviable reputation respected by retailers and consumers alike. It is no more to the interest of the retailer than of the manufacturer to sell acceptable merchandise unprofitably. In free competition with other lines a product invariably finds its own level, and the manufacturer who has earned a good name will continue to enjoy the patronage of the consuming public.

I believe that proves he will receive that patronage whether or not what he sells is price-maintained.

Mr. Sinclair: That is why the Tories have had no patronage for the last twenty years, because they have not a good name.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): I continue:

Many products that have no resale price set by their manufacturers have sold successfully and profitably over a long period. There is no reason why the merchandise sold at maintained prices today—

Mr. Casselman: The first smile in four days.

Mr. Riley: Be careful, Jimmy; the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) is leering at you.

Mr. Drew: I am enjoying it.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): It reads:

There is no reason why the merchandise sold at maintained prices today would not enjoy a similar success when freed from resale restrictions. Much of our merchandise is not price controlled; yet the practice is growing and as it grows, so surely is the stimulus of competition eliminated. So too grows the prevalence of excessive trade-in allowances, of premiums and prizes offered with major purchases to present an illusion of extra value. Sound business ethics demand that savings effected by competent merchandising be passed directly to the public.

That is the brief that was presented by Woodward Stores Limited of British Columbia. I am informed by a British Columbia member that the manager of that store today at one time swept the floors of a store that belonged to somebody else. That is the way they have built up the enormous business they have today, which I understand is one of the biggest retail outlets in British Columbia.

Mr. Fulton: One of the biggest.

Mr. Sinclair: This is a free enterpriser speaking, and not a socialist.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): They have built up that business not as selling agents for manufacturers but as purchasing agents for consumers. They have done so in spite of pressure that may have been brought to bear on them by manufacturers in central Canada, and there has been plenty of it. This is the creed of a real Canadian, a free enterpriser, and Canada is still a place for many of them.

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a brief word or two with respect to the subamendment moved this afternoon. When I spoke on the motion for the second reading of Bill No. 36 on Tuesday last I gave the reasons why I was convinced that the legislation proposed was necessary and good legislation. At the same time I cautioned the government that they would have to be on their guard against predatory price cutting by large concerns, especially if in the future we get back into a buyers' market when prices may become something like chaotic. I also stated at that time that I believed more settled conditions throughout the country would doubtless bring us into a period that could be called a buyers' market.

I also stated my conviction that everything possible ought to be done to protect small retailers throughout the country. I said if I were convinced that the bill would endanger the position of the small retailers I would do my very best to have it held over or to defeat it. I should like to say something tonight by way of extension of my remarks in connection with these two phases of the problem before us.

When I read the amendment that was moved by the charming lady member for Hamilton West (Mrs. Fairclough), I saw in it some things that interested me a great deal. I believe it contains a suggestion which parallels to some extent what we tried to do in the province of Alberta about 1936, when our Social Credit party was successful in forming a government in that province. We found, of course, the general economy in a depressed state. There was a condition of stagnation, and prices were chaotic. For several years prior to the time we took over in 1935 that had been the condition; but in 1936 we did make an effort to do something about what was then called the loss-leader practice. That was one of the means by which the price situation was thrown into a chaotic state. We decided that one of the best ways of dealing with the problem was to get the retail merchants throughout the province to unite in asking the department of trade and industry to establish what later became known as retail codes.

These codes were drafted with the help of the retail merchants and under the guidance of the department of trade and industry. Certain boards were set up for the purpose of assisting retailers throughout the province to establish once more some orderly system of pricing. In a large measure it was successful, right up until the time goods became scarce after the outbreak of war. The retailers and government board did succeed in fairly well eliminating from the whole province of Alberta the loss-leader practice, and it was done in the democratic manner which I think is envisaged in the subamendment which the member for Hamilton West has moved.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, it could be said with truth that what we did in Alberta was merely a horizontal price regulation; that is, it dealt only with retail prices through all the retail outlets. But I see no reason why the principle cannot be applied in a vertical fashion as well, from the manufacturer to the wholesaler and the retailer. I know, from our experience in Alberta during the thirties, that any time the public felt they should be heard, and quite rightly so, it was the policy of the board under the department of trade and industry to listen to their protests. As a result of some of the conferences that were held, price adjustments were agreed to; but it was more a matter of bringing the retailers and consumers together and helping them reach some sort of democratic agreement. It worked out, I thought, extremely well, until it became unnecessary to use it because loss leaders did disappear from trade practice in this country with the outbreak of war or shortly afterward.

In a measure the same principle is being applied today in our province with respect to the pricing of milk, and through the public utilities commission the pricing of gas. The gas companies do not just set prices anywhere they wish. The price has to be set after very careful consultation with the board of public utilities commissioners. The same thing is true with respect to rents. We have in the province of Alberta a very interesting board that was appointed as a result of the abolition of rent controls in Canada. This board attempts to bring the tenant and landlord together to help them reach an agreement on the amount of rental that shall be charged. I am told that of all the cases that have come before that board, over 90 per cent are concluded by way of agreement between the two parties, without any dictation by the board. In the other small percentage the board listens to both sides very carefully, and if the parties cannot reach an agreement the board sets a rental which is fair. We think that is the democratic way of proceeding. It has succeeded very well in those fields. I see in the amendment moved by the member for Hamilton West the same principle. I do not see why it could not be applied in an orderly fashion throughout Canada.

This afternoon the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) produced some evidence to the effect that perhaps such an arrangement as I have suggested might not be intra vires of the federal government. It seems to me that, through agreement with the provinces, some sort of permissive legislation could be passed by this parliament which would govern interprovincial arrangements and trade agreements, and that under that permissive legislation passed by this house provincial legislation could be passed which would set up provincial boards or commissions to deal with matters that are entirely provincial in their character. I believe something of the sort was suggested in the amendment moved by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), if I interpret it correctly. But in connection with this subamendment, Mr. Speaker, I see in it a proposal that in my judgment is reasonable and quite sound. It would bring about orderly pricing in times of depressed trade conditions in the country. I would urge the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) and the government to give careful consideration to that proposal as a means of ensuring fair treatment to all our small merchants throughout Canada, and of preventing chaotic price cutting or what the Minister of Justice described the other day as predatory price cutting. The other day I said I feared that with the coming of more settled world conditions we could easily slide into a period of depression or at least business recession. It is during periods of recession that we have these difficulties. I suggest in all seriousness that the minister take this matter under careful consideration, because I think he is going to need something to protect merchants when this bill is passed.

I welcome the opportunity of expressing an opinion on this amendment, because it contains the very things which we have been trying to practise in a provincial way within the province of Alberta. Because I believe there is merit in the suggestion I propose to support the amendment. If that does not pass, then of course I still propose to vote for the bill.

Mr. Adamson: Will the member for Peace River (Mr. Low) permit a question? When he mentioned gas he was referring to natural gas, I assume, and not gasoline?

Mr. Low: Yes. I am sorry I did not make that clear. It is natural gas, not gasoline.

Mr. Adamson: I asked that question, Mr. Speaker, because it is exactly the same sort of regulation which controls the sale of natural and manufactured gas in Toronto through the Consumers Gas Company.

Mr. Low: Yes, because we looked upon it as a public utility. I think it has been declared as such practically everywhere, and as a public utility it becomes subject to regulation of the kind I suggested.

Mr. Adamson: Is it working out well in Alberta?

Mr. Low: Yes; very well.

Mr. Coldwell: May I ask the hon. gentleman a question?

Mr. Low: Yes.

Mr. Coldwell: What you have proposed differs fundamentally from the fair price idea in the United States, does it not?

Mr. Low: I am afraid that I am not too well acquainted with the fair price arrangements in the United States, I must confess. But whatever the fair price arrangement may be there, I read into the subamendment pretty much the thing we have today in the province of Alberta, and it has worked out fairly successfully as far as it has been applied.

Mr. W. J. Browne (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, I think we should all recognize that this is a big subject, and one that is not at all new. I have here a book which I found in the library entitled "Price Control under Fair Trade Legislation in the United States". It was published in 1939. It deals with the practices then prevailing—that was twelve years ago—in 41 of the 48 states of the United States. It also refers to the fact that this practice of maintaining prices has been in vogue in Great Britain and in Germany since the last century, and had been introduced in the United States about the beginning of this century. Although we hear of it perhaps for the first time, it is a well-established practice and hon. members should really have time to study it in order to make up their minds properly upon so vast and comprehensive a subject.

I listened with great interest, as well as I could, to the hon. member for Charlotte (Mr. Stuart); because, Mr. Speaker, it is extremely difficult to hear down at this end of the chamber owing to the poor acoustics, for which the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier) is responsible, because he has not introduced the system which was approved last session.

Mr. Gardiner: It is a Victorian system.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): The Minister of Public Works cannot even hear me across the floor. I am doing my best to make him hear. I could not hear all that the hon. member for Charlotte said. I heard his beginning, however, in which he stated that there had been large groups represented before the committee on combines legislation, and that he believed about 85 per cent of the people of Canada were represented there. Does he for a moment imagine that all those people were absolutely unanimously behind this project? How can he think that?

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I certainly did not say that 85 per cent of the people were represented there. What I did say was that 85 per cent of the people of this country were supporting the legislation that is before the house at the present time. That is exactly what I said.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I probably misquoted the hon. gentleman, but not intentionally. I have here a note of what he said. He said 85 per cent of the people at least were in favour of that legislation. I think he will admit that.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): I said "the people of Canada".

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I know the hon. gentleman has not had the opportunity of taking a Gallup poll. He has not had any better opportunity of testing the opinions of the people of this country than we have had.

Mr. Ward: Have you?

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): No. But I say he has had no better opportunity than we have had, and he has no greater knowledge than we have. We are just as much interested in getting the support of 85 per cent of the people as are those on the other side of the house. We do not think what he has stated represents the fact or even approaches the fact. I suggest to the hon. gentleman that at this busy season of the year it is extremely difficult for people to give consideration to a question like this, when we who are here sitting in the house have found it so difficult. Half the members are away. I think the hon. member for Coast-Capilano cast a reflection or an aspersion on some of the members who had not read the proceedings. The hon. member for Charlotte pointed out, however, that it was impossible for members to read the various reports of the committees, with half a dozen sitting at the one time, all of them with voluminous documentary evidence. I certainly agree with him. What he said is perfectly true.

Mr. Gardiner: Have you no knowledge other than what you read?

Mr. Drew: It is a great advantage to have read something.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I do not know whether the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) is serious in asking that question. He certainly does not indicate a high appreciation of any knowledge or ability that I might possess.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I will not suggest that he is out of order in saying that because I confess to having little knowledge of this subject, but I am anxious to find out; and between this date and the 27th I can certainly promise the minister that I am going to make an attempt to read as much of the evidence as possible. I do not know whether it can be called evidence. Most of it consists of briefs such as that read by the hon. member for Charlotte; but what is contained in that huge book, running to 872 pages, I am going to attempt to read. I hope to read as much of that as I can in the next week before December 27, when we resume.

Mr. Gardiner: A good deal of it will be interested pleading.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I have read some of it already and I think it is interesting. I think it is a most interesting study. I endorse the suggestion made by the hon. member for St. James (Mr. Beaudry) that we should all read it. He commended it to us, and I suggest that we read it. I suggest that we try to get an extra copy, and give it to our wives to read during the Christmas season.

Mr. Rinfret: As a Christmas present.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): It might be appreciated. The hon. member for Charlotte is an extremely pleasing speaker. He certainly pleased all the members on his side of the house. He is a convincing speaker; I will grant that much. He talks plausibly. He spoke about the freedom of the housewife to take her shopping basket and go around to the stores saving a few cents here and a few cents there; he mentioned ten cents here and ten cents there. That is what he spoke about. He must be aware of the fact that generally when the lady goes out with her shopping basket it is to get groceries; and those are the items which are least affected by this particular subject of resale price maintenance. I do not know what causes the hilarity of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson). He sometimes laughs without reason.

An hon. Member: Just nervousness.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I do not know why he is laughing at the present time.

Mr. Garson: I do not mind telling my hon. hon. friend. It is too good to keep to myself.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): What is it?

Mr. Garson: The hon. member for Charlotte (Mr. Stuart) inferred from your remarks that you were suggesting that the ladies did not wear clothes because they shopped only for groceries.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Hees: Shame.

Mr. Adamson: The government is advocating nudism laws now.

Mr. Rinfret: Are you against it?

Mr. Adamson: I am opposed.

Mr. Fulton: If the government stay in power very long, the ladies will not be able to buy clothes. Prices will be too high.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I think what the hon. gentleman meant was that when the ladies went out with a shopping basket it was to get groceries.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): I meant exactly what I said. A lady could go out with a shopping basket without buying groceries. She could be buying clothing, she could be buying drugs. I did not mention groceries. You are not going to put those words into my mouth. You look the record over tomorrow and you will find that groceries were not mentioned.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): The hon. member did not mention that word.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): I did not insinuate that; why did you?

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): That is, of course, the usual thing for a lady to buy when she goes out with a shopping basket.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): She could buy lots of other things such as clothing or drugs.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Yes. I have as much knowledge of what a woman uses a shopping basket for as you have.

Mr. Fulton: He takes it for smuggling.

Mr. Hees: He takes it across the bridge.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I therefore suggest that when the lady of the house takes up her shopping basket, it is to buy groceries; and it has been stated that only 1 per cent of the lines in the grocery stores are covered by resale price maintenance.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. I did not suggest that she bought groceries. There is nothing in any remark I made that would suggest that she would be buying groceries. I admit that there are few groceries themselves which are covered by resale price maintenance. I spoke of her shopping basket. My wife does not go out to buy groceries only when she takes her shopping basket. She buys clothes. She has to have them. I suppose others do the same. There is not a word about buying groceries.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I will come to that matter in a moment, but I am dealing with groceries at the present time because that is something she has to get almost every day. Every housewife throughout the country has to get groceries almost every day.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): If you go into an A. & P. store you will see them there with huge baskets of groceries. Some people can arrange to buy a whole week's groceries at the one time, but certainly the commonest thing you will see is a lady bringing in her shopping basket for groceries. Let us say for argument's sake that she is going to buy other things. The hon. gentleman is very confident in his argument.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): What are you in yours?

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): And he thinks so confidently of his. One would think that there is no other side to the thing at all.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): We have listened to the other side for about two weeks.

An hon. Member: We have not heard any other side yet.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): The hon. gentleman may not be in the mood to hear the other side, but I am going to give an illustration that was brought to my attention yesterday. We will suppose that the housewife is not going out for groceries. She is going out to do her Christmas shopping.

An hon. Member: To get a bottle of aspirin.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): And she is going to get presents. She is going to get a scarf for one son and a pair of gloves for another. This happened yesterday right here in Ottawa. It is an absolute fact. I went into a shop yesterday.

Mr. Knowles: Don't you usually recite facts?

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): No.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Neither does the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, because the hon. member usually deals with theories, but we speak—

Mr. Knowles: The hon. member fell into his own trap and he can't get out of it.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): No, I did not fall into any trap; I am perfectly aware of what I am talking about. There are other things in the world besides facts. There are ideas too, you know. Yesterday I went out to do my Christmas shopping and I looked at some gloves.

Mr. Herridge: You were not away long.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): No, I had to do the business quickly and get back to the house. I looked at men's scarves, and I saw one there with a brand name on it.

Mr. Knowles: The hon. member should do his shopping in Newfoundland.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): There was a well known name on the scarf and the price marked on it.

Mr. Fulton: I suppose you did yours in Winnipeg.

Mr. Knowles: I hope to be there tomorrow.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I know this scarf is the same price across the country from St. John's to Vancouver, and anyone else who knows this subject of resale price maintenance knows that as a standard brand it is being sold at the same price from St. John's to Vancouver, so I bought it. Then I went to look at some gloves, and I was shown a pair of gloves for $4.25, but on Saturday last I saw the same gloves in another part of Ottawa for $3.90.

Mr. Herridge: You were late.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): No, I was not late at all. This is a serious point, Mr. Speaker. They sold in one store for $4.25 and in another store for $3.90.

Mr. Sinnott: That is free enterprise.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): The Minister of Justice will say if you shop around you will be able to get a cheaper pair; but do you not see that the people who do not know the store that is selling them cheaper have to pay the higher price in this other store, and it works both ways. You might pay a higher price in one store and a lower price in the other. Is that not the common experience all the way through, and that our wives sometimes get taken in when they pay too much in one store?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Knowles: Let the hon. member speak of his own wife.

Mr. Garson: Will the hon. gentleman permit a question?

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Yes.

Mr. Garson: Is the hon. member's solution to that to pass a law compelling them to charge the higher price?

Mr. Hees: The lower price.

Mr. Fulton: The lower price, obviously.

Mr. Hees: We are for the consumer.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): What I am saying is that they have no fixed price on the article and the people in the outlying parts, especially in isolated communities where there is no competition, can put up the price and nobody knows the difference; whereas with the standard price you can pick up the paper today and you see certain brands of scarves, shirts, socks and ties each with its fixed price. I was studying that yesterday in the newspapers, and I found it was the same price in each store in Ottawa. That saves a lot of time for busy men such as members of the House of Commons. They have not time to go around with shopping baskets to save ten cents here and ten cents there. Who wants to spend all his time going around looking for bargains of ten cents here and ten cents there? The hon. member for Charlotte may be looking for bargains.

Mr. Hees: He gets them over the river.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): I never got a judge's salary.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): No; you do not have to when you can save otherwise.

Mr. Hees: Over the river, Wes.

[Mr. Herridge.]

Mr. Rinfret: That is pretty cheap.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): The hon. member for Charlotte approves of the evidence given by a hardware merchant or a hardware expert who was asked why the T. Eaton Company did not favour resale price maintenance, and he said: "Because they want to run the business themselves".

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): Correct.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Later on during his talk he read us a letter which had been addressed by a store in British Columbia to the chairman of this committee. I intend to make a reference to that in a moment, but first of all I will deal with the largest retail store in Canada which itself does over 7 per cent of the retail business. One store does over 7 per cent of the retail business in Canada. It wants to run its business itself, and I do not suppose it would mind if it ruined the businesses of other people.

The hon. gentleman must be reasonable. He must admit that if this resale price maintenance policy is abolished, and it is taken off these lines, there will be nothing to prevent the huge departmental stores advertising the day after this bill becomes law that they will sell articles which were formerly priced at $5 for $3.95, $3.50, $3, or any other price.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): Who would benefit by that?

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): In order to attract people to the store.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): Who would benefit by the lower prices?

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I will answer the hon. gentleman if he will give me time. The persons who would go there would benefit if they bought only that particular item.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): That would be the person with the shopping basket.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I am going to deal with the question of the loss leader which the hon. gentleman for Charlotte maintained was such a wonderful thing for the people of Canada. I am going to deal with that in a moment. The hon. gentleman is not in accord with the Minister of Justice, and he is certainly very far away from—

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): We are never whipped into line on this side of the house. We all have our own opinions.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): It has not been shown during this debate.

Mr. Hees: That is a good one.

Mr. Sinnott: We saw that going on over there yesterday.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): The hon. gentleman says they do not want any interference, but the hon. gentleman was very superficial in his summing up of Eaton's attitude, because there is a great deal of interference with businesses of every kind; all sorts of controls have been passed in this house during the past number of years. As the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) pointed out today, the world is a long way removed from the days of laissez-faire. It looks as if it is the intention of the government to go back to the days of unfettered and unbridled competition, when we shall have price wars such as they had the other day down in New York, as I mentioned last night when somebody interrupted me and said: "You are absolutely wrong." I have not heard that voice explain since where I was wrong in any particular in my reference to it. There are all sorts of regulations covering every—

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): May I ask a question?

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): You may ask a dozen if you like.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): After the price war was over, Macy's were still in business and the customers got the break. Do you criticize that?

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): The hon. member for Coast-Capilano (Mr. Sinclair) applauds the interjection. The customers did get the break if they bought only the particular loss-leader items. What is the purpose of a loss leader? The hon. gentleman surely—

Mr. Sinnott: You did not answer the question.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): The hon. member for Charlotte could not give the regular definition; he prepared a definition of the loss leader, and I tried to take it down. "A loss leader is the finest thing ever put into effect in Canada" or words to that effect.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): "For the benefit of the consumer."

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): "The finest thing ever put into effect; a bargain."

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): Just a minute now; on a question of privilege. I said "for the benefit of the consumer."

Mr. Fulton: You said "The loss leader is the finest thing ever put into effect in Canada."

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): For the consumer.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): He said "for the consumer"; I will concede that.

Mr. Fulton: Don't be jealous.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): After the hon. member for Coast-Capilano spoke so long, I think we ought to be allowed to have as much time as he had. Now, listen to what the MacQuarrie report says about the loss leader, and compare it with what was said by the hon. member for Charlotte. The MacQuarrie report says:

> The second practice, called the loss-leader device, is an aggressive weapon—

Now, sit down and listen to it. This is important.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): I cannot sit here all night.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Don't run away. Sit down and take it.

Mr. Adamson: This is a bear-garden.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I did not interrupt the hon. member, except to ask the page in the report from which he was reading. I am prepared to answer questions any time I am given a chance to answer them. The MacQuarrie report says:

> The second practice, called the loss leader device, is an aggressive weapon—

Mr. Fulton: He can't take it.

Mr. Hees: Don't run away, Wes.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): Wes doesn't run away.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): If the hon. member will not stay, then I will go ahead and read it just the same, and he can read it tomorrow.

Mr. Hees: You chased him out.

Mr. Fulton: And the hon. member for Coast-Capilano with him.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): It says:

> The second practice, called the loss leader device, is an aggressive weapon designed to attract customers for a whole range of goods by a particular type of selective and excessive price cutting.

Mark the words "excessive price cutting".

> Usually a well-known brand is used as a loss leader and it is sold at a price which has no direct relation to cost and may even result in a net loss.

That is the definition given by the MacQuarrie committee. I would ask hon. members on the other side of the house to contrast that definition with the definition given by the hon. member for Charlotte. If they have confidence in the MacQuarrie report, and if they have confidence in the committee which prepared the MacQuarrie report, then what do they think of the opinion of the hon. member for Charlotte when he says the loss leader is the finest thing ever put into effect in Canada for the benefit of the consumer?

Mr. Hees: Well said. Hear, hear.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): It is a good many years since I had occasion to study this question of the loss leader. However, about fifteen years ago I was very much interested in the co-operative movement in Newfoundland. One of the things which the co-operative movement had to fight was this loss leader. I remember very well reading a book by Professor Henry Smith, who was quoted with approval the other day by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell). Henry Smith said that the idea of a co-operative store was to establish a just price. Is that not what we should all want to see, a just price? That would not be the lowest possible price, not a price at which the shopkeepers are losing money, but a just price for every article. Is that not a fair way to look at things? I am sure hon. members opposite would say the same thing.

An hon. Member: Who establishes the fair price?

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I think this subamendment would provide a fair trade commission which would see to it that fair trade prices were established.

Mr. Howe: Do you take the socialist proposition here?

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): No, it is not quite the same thing. As I understand the C.C.F. intention, it is that all prices should be regulated.

Mr. Howe: Has the federal government any authority to do that?

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): No, but you are taking the authority to interfere between manufacturer and retailer; and I am sure the Minister of Trade and Commerce in his heart does not agree with this legislation at all.

Mr. Howe: Mr. Speaker, I might say that I would like to bring a file of letters, of complaints I have heard about the working of resale price maintenance, people going broke because they did not dare to cut the price of inventories. They were out of business in either case. If they kept the inventories, they went broke; if they disposed of them they got no more merchandise. That is the sort of letter I have. In other letters they were ordered to raise prices. They did not want to raise them; they were satisfied with the old profit margin. Nevertheless they were ordered to raise prices or they would get no more merchandise.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I will not deny that there might be abuses in resale price maintenance.

Mr. Howe: Thank you very much.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): But I think these things can be regulated, and it is the duty of the government to regulate them.

Mr. Sinnott: Vote for the bill, then.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): This does not regulate them. This abolishes them. That is the purpose of it, to abolish resale price maintenance. I said the other evening—

Mr. Herridge: Is that not the purpose of the C.C.F. amendment, to regulate prices?

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): No. As I understood the answer given by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr Coldwell) the other day—I am not sure if it was to someone on the other side of the house—I understood him to say that it would be the duty of the state to regulate all prices.

Mr. Herridge: He said nothing of the sort.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I may have misunderstood him but that is the impression I got. You have been advocating it.

Mr. Herridge: Where necessary.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): The hon. member says "Very necessary". Which answer am I to take?

Mr. Adamson: Necessary when necessary, but not necessary when necessary.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): In connection with this question of the loss leader, I am sure the Minister of Trade and Commerce recognizes that that could easily put people out of business. He must know, because he comes from the United States, that in that country there have been many price wars of the kind that occurred the other day in New York, when people were forced out of business. I know that in reading the history of the co-operative movement—

Mr. Howe: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the hon. member would give me the names of those who were forced out of business in recent price wars.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I have not that information in my mind at the present time.

Mr. Drew: Well, it might be helpful if the Minister of Trade and Commerce would give us the names of the people who wrote the letters from which he has just quoted.

Mr. Howe: I will bring them on Thursday.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for St. John's West has the floor and must not be interrupted.

Mr. Studer: May I ask a question? In every community there are a number of drug stores; roughly I believe they are apportioned at the rate of about one for every thousand of population. There are the Rexall stores and the Nyal stores. Those stores each year have one cent sales. They sell the same articles at the rate of two for one. I object to that kind of price maintenance. Are they not conducting loss leaders among themselves in their own community?

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is very far astray in his statement about the number of drug stores.

Mr. Studer: My other facts are correct.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I see another hon. member supports him. Well, I took the trouble during the week to look up the number of drug stores in Great Britain and in the United States. I do not know the exact number in Canada, but I could give a very close guess, because I guessed the correct number in Great Britain when I looked into it first. There are between 14,000 and 15,000 in Great Britain, with a population of 50 million.

Mr. Sinnott: How many in Canada?

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I would say on the same basis there would be about 4,500. Of course I am only guessing at that, but that would be the rough figure I would give. In the United States with a population of 150 million there are about 55,000 drug stores, and the number has declined between 1938 and 1949 by about 3,000. So on that basis I would say there are between 4,000 and 5,000 drug stores in Canada. But that is a different proposition from what the hon. member has said.

Mr. Studer: I was referring to western Canada.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I did not catch the hon. member's question. Would he repeat it?

Mr. Studer: I was referring to our country out west when I made the statement that in the average town there is about one drug store for every thousand of population. I find that in a town of 5,000 population there are about four drug stores. One will be a Rexall store and the other a Nyal store. Once a year there will be a one-cent sale in the town. We have had comments from the drug trade against this legislation. They have sent the loss leader right into the towns, with no opposition from the other drug stores.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I agree with the hon. member that these things happen in Ottawa. You need only to go down to the corner of Sparks and Metcalfe streets and you will see a two for one sale. But I think he is wrong about the number of drug stores. I estimated that the number of druggists would be between four or five thousand but I am now informed that there are 4,200 members of the Canadian Pharmaceutical Association. I did not make too bad a guess.

Mr. Adamson: There are 4,308 drug stores in Canada.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): The same proportion applies to the United States, the United Kingdom and Canada. The hon. gentleman referred to these two for one sales, but the fact is that those sales do not take place in connection with resale price maintained articles; they take place in connection with articles which are not governed by resale price maintenance. If anyone with discretion goes into those stores he will be wise not to buy articles that are marked two for one. When the hon. gentleman goes into those stores he will find that the articles which do not sell rapidly are the ones that are being put up like that to catch the gulls who go in. Now, here is the recommendation of the committee in regard to loss leaders. I am sorry the hon. member for Charlotte (Mr. Stuart) is not here to hear me read this recommendation. If I did not read all of the 872 pages of evidence I am sure that the hon. gentleman did not read this report, or he would not have made the statement he did about loss leaders. They state that the loss leader device is a practice which does not promote the general welfare.

Hon. members applauded the hon. member for Charlotte when he read statements from the Woodward brief. What is their view now? Do they approve of the MacQuarrie report or do they approve of the opinion of the hon. member for Charlotte. I approve of certain things they say and I approve of that, but I do not approve of the opinion of the hon. member for Charlotte. I should like to know if the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson), with whom he was sitting cheek by jowl a few moments ago, approves of the opinion of the hon. member for Charlotte. We ought to have some logic in the debates in this chamber.

Some hon. Members: Oh. oh.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I submit that what I am saying is logical. I ask the Minister of Justice, when he makes his reply, especially to tell us what he thinks of the opinion of the hon. member for Charlotte, not only on that but on other practices he has recommended. The committee went on to state that it considered it was not compatible to the public interest. What do hon. members think of that opinion of the committee as compared with the opinion of the hon. member for Charlotte, that it was the best thing ever put into effect in Canada for the benefit of the consumer? When a member of the Liberal party gets up in this house he gets applause from the other side, but if a member of the Conservative party gets up he will not get any applause even though he is reading from the committee report.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Sinnott: Do you feel better now?

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Hon. members are applauding, but I do not think they realize what they are applauding.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): The hon. member for Charlotte made a very superficial speech which seemed to please hon. members on the other side. He was endorsing in general what the government is trying to do, but I submit that he has not any conception of what is at stake in this matter. He has no realization of what is contained in the report he was supposed to have been studying while a member of the committee. I do not know what he was doing on that committee.

Mr. Fulton: He was doing what the chairman told him to do.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): He does not even approve of this report. The hon. gentleman said it was the big guy that was worrying, not the little fellow. Then he went on to read with approval a letter written by the big guy, Woodward Stores Limited, to the chairman of the committee. Let us be logical about this thing. Are Woodward stores worrying? Yes; they are worrying lest this thing does not go through. That is what they are worrying about. Let us listen to what the big guy has to say and let us then hear what the Liberals have to say about it. I dismiss the opinions of the hon. member for Charlotte because they are not worth considering.

Mr. Sinnott: Go ahead and hang yourself.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I commend to the attention of my hon. friends over there what was read with such great approval by the hon. member for Charlotte, and I quote:

> The whole of our Canadian economy is geared—

An hon. Member: You are on the wrong page.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Is the hon. member asking a question?

Mr. Hodgson: He cannot read himself.

[Mr. Browne (St. John's West).]

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Here is what was read by the hon. member for Charlotte.

An hon. Member: What page?

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I beg your pardon, page 819. I am reading from the letter which was read with such approval by the hon. member for Charlotte.

Mr. Sinnott: What book?

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): The proceedings of the combines legislation committee. I suppose the hon. gentleman has not heard of it and he should be interested. If I may proceed.

Mr. Sinnott: I read that every night before I went to sleep.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): The hon. member for Springfield has no idea what is going on.

Mr. Sinnott: I read that book from cover to cover.

Mr. Fulton: You still would not know.

Mr. Sinnott: Another smart crack from you.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): This reads:

> The whole of our Canadian economy is geared to a free enterprise system. It is the basis of our political creed. The man in the street has faith in it.

Listen to this:

> He believes that sooner or later unfettered competition—

What does that mean?

> —and the laws of supply and demand will defeat the bogey of inflation.

Do hon. members on the other side, does the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson), does the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) approve of unfettered competition?

Mr. Sinnott: I should like to ask the hon. gentleman a question.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): No, I do not want any questions from you.

Mr. Sinnott: You are afraid of the question.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): There is not a member on that side of the house, there is not a member of the government who realizes what unfettered competition means, who will approve of it. The hon. member for Charlotte was applauded when he read that letter, and especially by the hon. member for Coast-Capilano (Mr. Sinclair).

Mr. Sinnott: Mr. Chairman—

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Sinnott: On a question of privilege, I should like to ask the hon. member who is speaking a fair question—

An hon. Member: That is not a question of privilege.

An hon. Member: Sit down.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Sinnott: Mr. Speaker—

An hon. Member: Sit down.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I do not think there is any question of privilege.

Mr. Sinnott: He is afraid he cannot answer the question.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Let us consider for a moment—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I would ask hon. members on both sides of the house to observe decorum in the house.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, I take it you have good intentions. I would ask hon. members to consider for a moment what is meant by unfettered competition, unbridled competition, no restraint upon business at all, the law of supply and demand working to its utmost capacity. What does it mean? It means that all the rich men go into the market and collar everything. Despite what the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) may say, they corner the wheat, they corner the butter, they corner the eggs and sell them for as high a price as they can get. That is what is meant by unfettered competition. That is what is meant by the law of supply and demand being allowed to work. The government has to step in to protect the wheat grower. It has to protect the butter producer, the egg producer, the fish producer. Everybody in the community is protected against the working of the law of supply and demand.

In connection with resale price maintenance, how does it work? Take the manufacturer. He has his capital investment upon which he has to pay a dividend if he is to remain in business. Above all he has to pay his workmen. How does he pay his workmen? Generally they are unionized, and he has to pay a fixed price sometimes set by collective bargaining or through some agency of the government. Nevertheless it has been the practice for many years now for manufacturers to pay the wages demanded of them, and that is done by fixation of some kind. Is it so absurd that manufacturers, who have to pay a fixed price for a part of the cost of the products they produce, should make an agreement with retailers as to what the ultimate product shall be sold for? It is only reasonable that the manufacturer should be able to sell at a fixed price, and it is not unreasonable that he should talk with the retailer about what a reasonable profit would be.

Getting back to that unfettered competition that is so approved of, we are all familiar, although perhaps not so familiar as we might be, with the beginning of the industrial revolution in England when machinery was first invented. The leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) referred to what occurred in the days so highly approved of by Adam Smith when men, women and children were crowded into ugly tenements close to the factories and children of the smallest size were put to work at the machines. That was unfettered competition. We have got a long way from that. Does the hon. member for Charlotte (Mr. Stuart) want us to go back to that sort of thing? That is what unfettered competition means if he wants to go back to it, the law of supply and demand.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) and the Minister of Agriculture are continuously being haggled in the house about what they are doing for the wheat growers or farmers in various lines. Suppose some of the big packing houses of Canada were allowed to store huge quantities of produce and sell them at any prices they felt like. There have been complaints that that has happened. Suppose they bought eggs at 20 cents a dozen and sold them for 65 cents. Suppose they bought butter for 30 or 40 cents a pound and sold it for 60 cents a pound. Would there not be complaints from my hon. friends to the left who represent farming communities? Surely there would, and the same thing applies to any industry. We have to have regulation of business, it is true.

An hon. Member: Ask the hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Sinnott).

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): All sorts of labour laws, laws regulating workmen and laws regulating the sale of produce have been put on the statute books of different countries in the last one hundred and fifty years. Certainly there is no doubt that unfettered competition is dead, but in this particular case it will be revived if the bill goes through. Therefore I suggest to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) that he should give consideration to the subamendment that has been brought before the house.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member has exhausted his time.

Mr. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon): Mr. Speaker, I am encouraged by the atmosphere of growing warmth towards participants in this debate to say a few further words. It seems to me that as we approach closer to the Christmas season the good spirit of charity is at last beginning to prevail in this chamber. We have listened to speeches mostly from this side of the house. Unfortunately we have not heard many of the private members opposite contribute to this debate. I can understand the reason for that, because in listening to the discussion it has become quite evident that the main conclusion evolving therefrom is that the bill is suspect. There is a great deal of suspicion arising from the contemplation of the proposed legislation, mainly because sufficient evidence has not been produced as to its merits or demerits.

I say it is obvious. That opinion has been expressed on this side of the house. I was not privileged to participate in the activities of the special committee, but it is unfortunate that its deliberations were cut off before the retail merchants association had a chance to make their representations. I say that because our discussion seems to be boiling down to the respective merits of the retail merchants' case and the case for the large chain stores. We might have avoided all the confusion in discussing this topic if there had been ample opportunity for presentation of the retail merchants' viewpoint at the committee level. We on this side of the house have stated our attitude toward the bill. What about the other side? I have here the Winnipeg Tribune of December 18, and I should like to read a paragraph from the column "Ottawa Notebook" written by Mr. Arthur Blakely to indicate that there is a good deal of suspicion amongst members on the other side of the house if only it had been allowed utterance. Here is what the writer of the column has to say:

> There are mutterings within the Liberal ranks too—

That is quite obvious. I can hear them now in this chamber.

> —over the proposed ban on price maintenance. One night this week four or five Liberal M.P.'s buttonholed Justice Minister Garson in the Liberal lobby and insisted that he justify the legislation. Within minutes the group surrounding the minister numbered an even dozen. Before it ended his audience numbered close to thirty—almost all of them backbenchers. Questioning was hot and heavy before Garson satisfied the last skeptic and made good his escape.

These mutterings and ominous rumblings or grumblings from the government side, as the newspapers have described them, have obviously continued and would indicate that there is considerable suspicion regarding the legislation before the house. In the previous remarks I made on this subject I dealt with the dangers of centralization. I am very interested in the problem of centralization, the tendency toward bigness, because I represent a riding that has suffered considerably economically, politically and educationally from the effects of the increasing trend toward centralization. I pointed out, for example, that there is this tendency toward bigness in government. I based a question on that, as to whether it was a desirable or good thing to have government assume more and more control over the lives of individuals. Then, of course, a concomitant situation to the centralization trend is the tendency for population to concentrate in huge metropolitan areas, which generates the social problems of which we are only too keenly aware in our larger cities.

Now in Manitoba generally, and particularly that part of the province from which I come, we have been making progress against this trend toward centralization. I might be pardoned for labouring the viewpoint of my constituency—

Mr. Knowles: I wonder if I might rise to a point of order? I do so with great respect for the hon. member who is now speaking, but it seems to me we have now reached a point in this debate where the rules of debate might be complied with by all of us a little more closely than is sometimes the case. I thought the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Churchill) did a service last evening when he drew attention to citation 338 in Beauchesne's third edition. If I might presume to say so, I thought Your Honour made an excellent ruling on the point. Citation 338 deals with the situation when there is an amendment to a motion. I need not go over all the ground that the member for Winnipeg South Centre dealt with, but may I just quote the last sentence of that important citation:

> In that case the debate that follows is not restricted to the amendment, but includes the motives of the amendment and of the motion, both matters being under the consideration of the house as alternative propositions.

Your Honour ruled, and I thought quite fairly on the point raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre, that when there was a motion and an amendment before the house as alternative propositions it was possible and perhaps desirable, that they should be discussed in relation to each other. But what about the situation when we have a subamendment? There is now before the house a subamendment to the amendment. I admit that the terms of the subamendment are by way of alternative to the amendment, but I would say that although it is possible in discussing the subamendment to discuss its terms in relation to the terms of the amendment, it should not be possible at this stage of the debate to go behind the amendment to discuss not only the main motion itself but to discuss things which may not even be related to the main motion.

I submit that the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Dinsdale) at the moment is a long way from what is before the house, namely, the relationship between two alternatives, that of the amendment of my leader and that of the subamendment moved by the Progressive Conservative group. The point of order I raise is this: should not the debate at this time be confined at least to the relative merits of the amendment and the subamendment?

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I think the point the hon. member has overlooked is the fact that, at the moment, we are dealing with the amendment as amended by the subamendment. We are not dealing with alternatives, but we are dealing with the amendment as amended.

Mr. Knowles: It has not been amended yet.

Mr. Drew: The subamendment is before the house, and the subamendment places before the house the proposal that this bill should not be dealt with now. I would point out that this is the proposal put forward by the leader of the C.C.F. party. Then, the subamendment suggests the desirability of considering the wisdom of having a fair trade commission. In considering that, it seems obvious that the whole field affected by this bill must be discussed if we are to know how desirable it is that a fair trade commission should be considered, and how desirable it is also that there should be ample time to consider the details of this bill and its impact upon business generally. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that the very nature of this motion by way of subamendment makes very relevant every possible aspect of this problem to which the bill relates.

Mr. Speaker: The difficulty is that the debate has been continuing for some time, and I think all members have been discussing the main motion, the amendment and the subamendment. It is extremely difficult at this late date to say that in future members cannot have as wide a latitude in discussion as members who have already spoken. I am glad the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) brought this matter to my attention. Probably if the matter should arise on another occasion I should give further consideration to his point of order. (See Beauchesne's second edition, citation 414). But in view of the fact that the debate has gone on for so long in the manner in which it has, I doubt if it would be fair to interrupt it at this time.

I see that it is now ten o'clock.

On motion of Mr. Dinsdale the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): May I make this remark. If it be true that we have been discussing the principle of the bill, the amendment and the subamendment would it not be logical that we vote on those three things at the same time? Before announcing the business of the house for December 27, I want to extend to every member my best wishes for a merry Christmas and a safe return to Bill No. 36, an act to amend the Combines Investigation Act, which will be the first item of business on that day. Then, if it is disposed of, we shall take up the government notice of motion in the name of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, and then all the other bills remaining on the order paper.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, first of all may I reciprocate by joining in the good wishes for Christmas, and hoping that everyone has an extremely happy new year. That brings me to a question that perhaps the house leader could answer. Is it intended to sit on New Year's day?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I am quite convinced that when we reach that bridge we shall find a way of crossing it—

Mr. Drew: It is only, of course, that it would be desirable for some of the members to know what arrangements they should make. I can only hope that after the government and the members of the house have enjoyed a merry Christmas, the suggestion that has been made will be followed and we shall not be dealing with Bill No. 36 but with other items of business, in which case I am sure we would proceed with expedition.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): So no doubt will remain in the minds of hon. members, the government and the house will proceed with this bill on the 27th.

Mr. Speaker: On behalf of each hon. member I extend to all the members of this house a wish for a very merry Christmas.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, until Thursday, December 27, at eleven o'clock a.m., pursuant to the order of the house passed on December 21, 1951.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, December 27, 1951

The house met at eleven o'clock.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

INQUIRY AS TO REPORTS FROM MINISTERS RETURNING FROM ABROAD

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I think perhaps the best time for me to raise this question is at this point. Having regard to the fact that we now meet in this rather unusual period of the year for a session of parliament, I should like to ask the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) when we may expect reports from those ministers who have been abroad for the past three months on various important matters of government business. I believe that before this session ends we should have a report from each of those ministers on the subject matter that was under discussion at the time they were abroad.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): It is necessary for some of those ministers who have been abroad to return there, and I understand that the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) left this morning for Korea. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) is to leave on January 12 or 13 for a continuation of the meetings in London, and I do not know whether there will be an opportunity for the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) to make a report on what took place at the conference in Rome. The Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) is not here this morning, and I understand he is otherwise engaged on matters that are not of international importance. As soon as he returns there may be an opportunity for a report in addition to that which he has already made in the house.

Of course, these matters are of great interest but for the last few sittings of the house we have been dealing with a matter of domestic concern which is also of great interest, and which is to be the topic of further discussion in the house this morning. I would hope that we could go on with that domestic matter without in any way slighting the international negotiations on which my colleagues have recently been engaged.

Mr. Drew: Without extending the discussion of this subject unduly, I would point out that while it is true we have before us a matter of extremely important domestic concern, the practice has been established of informing the house, prior to the orders of the day, about matters directly affecting particular departments where the minister has some report to make to the house, and through the house to the press and people of Canada. It does seem to me that the very fact that the Minister of National Defence left this morning suggests reasons why it would be desirable to give the house some assurance that we shall have reports from these ministers concerning the extremely important subjects they were discussing while abroad. Naturally, all of us will be pleased that the Minister of National Defence will be visiting the Canadian troops in Korea. I would point out, however, that it is a year and a half since that military operation began, and a matter of a few days might not substantially change the importance of the visit. I would have hoped that he would give us a report relating to the discussion on NATO which will be before us, and it was for that reason I asked that information be given.

Without asking for any further commitment from the Prime Minister, I would ask that consideration be given to setting aside some time which would not affect the discussion of domestic matters, when reports from these ministers could be received.

Mr. St. Laurent: Without making any further commitment I shall repeat the commitment I have always made, that any decision arrived at will be immediately communicated to the house.

NEW MEMBER

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the house that the Clerk of the House has received from the chief electoral officer certificate of the election and return of the following member:

Of Carl Olof Nickle, Esquire, for the electoral district of Calgary West.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

UNEMPLOYMENT IN THE TEXTILE INDUSTRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. G. Blair (Lanark): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. Is the government aware of the serious unemployment situation in the textile industry? If so, what measures are being taken to counteract this situation?

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Labour): To reply to the first part of the question, the government is aware of the unemployment situation referred to. Just before Christmas I met a delegation dealing with this matter. As to the second part of the question, the situation will be considered by the government, and any decision reached will be announced in due course.

(Translation):

FERRY SERVICE

ACCIDENT AT TADOUSSAC, QUE.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Auguste Maltais (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) in connection with the unfortunate accident that happened at Tadoussac on December 23 last. Has the hon. minister been requested to improve the ferry service following that accident and does his department intend to investigate the circumstances of that accident?

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): The hon. member kindly sent me a copy of his question but, unfortunately, I received it only a few minutes before coming into the chamber. However, after reading it, I am inclined to believe that the federal government has no responsibility, direct or indirect, in the operation of the ferry between Baie Ste. Catherine and Tadoussac.

As far as the Department of Transport is concerned—and I say this only from memory—it provides no grant either through the maritime commission or any other division for the maintenance of the wharf. Therefore we would not be prepared to hold an investigation. I give this answer without having secured the necessary information. I am rather inclined to believe that this ferry is not under federal jurisdiction.

(Text):

KOREA

REQUEST FOR INFORMATION ON CEASE-FIRE NEGOTIATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson), I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent). Is he able to inform us as to the developments in connection with the cease-fire negotiations in Korea, which terminated at ten o'clock this morning, our time, unless any further arrangements have been made?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I will have inquiries made at the Department of External Affairs. I have not personally received any information as to what took place at the appointed hour for the expiry of the delay which had been set.

CHINA

CANADIAN MISSIONARIES—POLICY AS TO REPATRIATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. J. Browne (St. John's West): In the absence of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Has the government any idea of the number of Canadian missionaries remaining in China, and has it any special policy with regard to their repatriation? In The Ensign for December 29 there is a story about Bishop Kenneth Turner and three priests, one of whom comes from Newfoundland, and three sisters who have been reported as being held in severe captivity at the present time.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I will inquire as to what is the latest information we have officially in that regard. I can only add that we all share the concern and the anxiety of the hon. member over the fate of those who went to the Far East to give their lives in the service of their fellow men and who seem to be exposed to such serious difficulties at the present time.

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT

AMENDMENT TO FORBID THE FIXING OF SPECIFIC OR MINIMUM RESALE PRICES

The house resumed, from Friday, December 21, consideration of the motion of Mr. Garson for the second reading of Bill No. 36, to amend the Combines Investigation Act, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Coldwell, and the amendment to the amendment of Mrs. Fairclough.

Mr. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon): Mr. Speaker, when the house adjourned on Friday evening I was making a few observations particularly in reference to the amendment submitted by the members of this party. Since that time we have, of course, had the opportunity of spending a few days at home and have come in contact, to a greater or lesser extent, with certain parts of the constituencies which we represent. On Monday I took advantage of the opportunity to do some Christmas shopping, but I am afraid that I was not too successful in this regard because it seems that the discussion which took place just prior to the adjournment of the house—

Mr. Casselman: Order, order.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Dinsdale: It seems that the discussion just prior to the adjournment of this house on the bill now before us has stirred up a lively interest in its subject matter and its import. In every store I entered to do business, the storekeeper wanted to discuss the lights and shades of this extremely contentious piece of legislation.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Casselman: Hold the cabinet meeting outside the chamber.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I would think that it is almost impossible for Hansard to hear what the hon. member is saying, and would therefore ask hon. members not to converse in the chamber.

Mr. Dinsdale: Obviously—and this is the point that we have been endeavouring to bring out amidst a rather difficult atmosphere for debating; and it is even more difficult this morning, unfortunately—the interest of the retail merchant in this bill is great. My direct contact with a cross section of the merchants of the city of Brandon would indicate that they are greatly disturbed over the legislation. This matter is something that crosses political barriers. Even some of the most ardent supporters of the government at the present time have been disturbed, first, at the ruthlessness in presenting the bill and, second, at the possible implications of the bill with respect to the present methods of marketing and trading that have been established by the retail merchants.

In a previous contribution I made to this debate I mentioned the fact that these people occupied an important place in the community. To give just one example, there is in my community a retail merchant who has served on the council and on the college board, who has been the president of the chamber of commerce for several terms, and whose wife has been active on the school board. He was loudest in his protest at the method of approach to the bill, having regard to the fact that it had been left to the dying moments of the session, that it had been subjected to the disturbing conditions of debate that I have already mentioned when it was difficult to get a hearing, and—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Probably I should now bring to the attention of the house the fact that hon. members should not express in this house opinions of individuals outside the house on the subject of the present debate. Hon. members should express their own views on this subject. It is highly irregular to express the views of others who are not in the house on the question that is being discussed in the house at the present time.

Mr. Dinsdale: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I will conform to the ruling.

I am not going to prolong my observations this morning; I have presented them previously. I want to support emphatically the amendment that has come from the members of the official opposition because I feel that if this bill is to go through at the present time, under the present circumstances, it is only fair that the amendment we now have before us, which purports to set up some fair trade laws and practices, should also be included and implemented for the protection of the small retail merchant who is such an important citizen, particularly in the constituency which I have the honour to represent.

Just before concluding, may I say I also discovered the typical merchant feels that the type of service he is providing for the community is on a fair and equitable business basis. In fact, there was much evidence to indicate that the type of marketing carried on under the present practice of resale price maintenance has produced a situation of lower prices than had that type of marketing been exposed to the sort of laissez-faire free enterprise techniques that seemingly have been advocated from the government benches. This has been particularly true since the price index began to rise so alarmingly within the last year. Therefore they feel they have been giving a fair deal to the consumer. If there is any suspicion that there has been exploitation, that there has been a tendency towards unfair monopolies and combines, I am sure the type of commission which members of the official opposition have recommended to maintain fair trade laws should be adequate to deal with exploitation and monopoly interests wherever they arise. Therefore I heartily support the amendment before the house, and I do so for the reasons I have given.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I hope the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Dinsdale) will feel that I am dealing sufficiently with the arguments he has put forward in the general remarks I have to make about the amendment submitted by the hon. lady who represents Hamilton West (Mrs. Fairclough). I am rising at this time to state that the amendment to the amendment put forward by the hon. lady is not acceptable to the government because it would mean in fact, as I think I will be able to show to her own satisfaction, that nothing at all would be done about the problem concerning which the government feels that something is required at this time.

The effect of her amendment is to have stand the first part of the amendment moved by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell):

That Bill No. 36 be not now read a second time but that it be resolved that in the opinion of this house consideration should be given to the introduction of legislation providing—

Her amendment proposes to strike out the words in the original amendment——that where regulation of resale price is in the public interest such regulation should be under public control instead of under private control.

And to substitute something which the hon. lady thinks is more precise, as follows:

for the establishment of a fair trade commission.

That means that this bill would not now be read a second time, but that consideration would be given to some other form of legislation, and that other form would be the establishment of a fair trade commission.

I am sure the hon. member knows, as was quite clearly demonstrated by her leader in his speech on Friday in that connection, that this was attempted in 1935. The leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) quoted the paragraph of the Dominion Trade and Industry Commission Act, and stated that if hon. members would refer to what had taken place at that time they would see why great caution should be exercised in proceeding with this measure at this time. He said, as reported at page 2350 of Hansard:

In 1935 the parliament of Canada passed the Dominion Trade and Industry Commission Act which carried into legislative form many of the ideas incorporated in the fair trade laws of the United States.

The hon. member went on to say:

I assume all hon. members know that section 14—

The section which provided for this matter.

—was declared ultra vires by the Supreme Court of Canada.

He went on:

It is important for us to remember that, when this section was enacted, an attempt was made to put into effect in Canada what are described as fair trade practices.

[Mr. St. Laurent.]

Further down he said:

Further on he said that if this amendment was passed all hon. members would have the opportunity of getting legal advice upon it, and he went on:

Then if it is decided there are constitutional problems involved, as I most certainly think there are, it will be possible for them to lay the foundation for some other procedure which would bring about the kind of result that has been obtained in other cases where it has been found that some subject of general interest to the people of Canada, but which is nevertheless exclusively within provincial jurisdiction under our constitution, can be brought into general operation.

Well, the method that has been found for doing that in the cases where it was necessary has been by amendments to the constitution; but I do not think any hon. member would feel that if there is a problem to be dealt with at this time the way to do it would be to try to get an amendment to the constitution which would allow fair trade legislation to be enacted by this parliament, because of course in these cases it was decided that under its ordinary jurisdiction parliament can forbid the doing of things which parliament feels are contrary to the public interest, but cannot regulate property and civil rights. And that it is only when that is required as an incident of national defence that the exclusive jurisdiction of the provinces can be ousted and parliament can assert as its overriding right to provide for the proper defence of the country measures which would normally be within provincial jurisdiction.

I am rising at this time because a persistent effort has been made by the official opposition in the house, and by some of its supporters in the press outside the house, to suggest that the government is halfhearted about this bill; that we do not think it is a bill of much importance. That was referred to, in I think rather typical form, by the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell), when he said at page 2196 of Hansard:

I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that the bill has become a foundling. I understand a "foundling" is a child whose parents are unknown and cannot be discovered. While the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) sponsored the measure, through the speech from the throne, in dignified words, when he came to speak about it—I was going to say he blew hot and cold, but that would not be correct because there was no hot, he really just blew cold on it. What he said was this, as recorded at page 41 of Hansard for October 15, 1951:

". . . as regards immediate additional measures to curb inflation, while others may develop, the only one we are prepared to submit at this time is the one that will arise out of this report of the combines committee with respect to resale prices."

Then he said:

"I do not think that is going to have a very substantial effect on the index of the cost of living."

He went on:

> Having been rejected by the Prime Minister, the bill found itself on the doorstep of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson).

Well, the bill has not been rejected by the Prime Minister, nor by any of his colleagues. The bill is the government's recommendation to parliament to deal with a problem which is recognized even by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) himself, in his speech on Friday. We see this at page 2353 of Hansard:

> We recognize the fact that there are practices which should be under restraint. We recognize the fact—as it has been recognized in earlier attempts which have been made in this house to pass legislation—that there are practices which should be stopped.

That is also recognized by the government, and was recognized by the committee. The measure we are putting forward before the house is a government recommendation to put under restraint these practices which should be under restraint, and to deal with practices that should be stopped by stopping them. Then the leader of the opposition went on to say:

> What I said was that I did not think at this stage we should seek to draft the bill, but rather that we should assert as a principle that we want this measure held back so there might be further inquiry, and so the advisability of having a fair trade commission—

And so on. And when the question was put to him by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low), he said:

> Without in any way seeking to evade the question, may I point out, as I did in the answer I just gave to the hon. member for Peace River, that we are not putting forward a bill, and that we are not attempting to cross the "t's" and to dot the "i's."

Well, we are attempting, in putting forward a bill, to cross the "t's" and to dot the "i's". This subamendment is a proposal to prevent that from being done, and instead to give consideration to something which the hon. member himself and his party realize and have stated frankly is, under present conditions, within the jurisdiction of provincial legislatures. It was held in 1935 that the prohibitive portions of section 498A of the Criminal Code were within federal jurisdiction, and constituted valid legislation.

If, as I trust this house will find, and this parliament will find, there are resale price maintenance practices which should be under restraint, practices which should be stopped, the only way I know of to stop them under federal jurisdiction is the way which is proposed in this bill. And, after all, what does the bill provide? Merely that there shall not be a system of price controls organized by private agreement and enforced without responsibility to this parliament, without responsibility to the government, and without responsibility to the House of Commons, by such coercive measures as those who provide the product, the resale price of which is fixed, choose to exercise themselves.

We think that is not good practice. We think that under present conditions there would be no warrant for attempting to interfere otherwise with the economy of the Canadian nation than by prohibiting the things that are wrong.

There has been much debate in the house about the possible effect on some 700,000 retail traders, and of the right this would give them to take, as they should, the responsibility for prices they ask their customers to pay for the merchandise they buy from them.

On the other hand it is suggested that this is not going to have much effect on the cost of living index. I still do not think it will have very much effect on the cost of living index; but I do feel that any effect it is going to have is going to be toward a reduction of some of those prices, and toward the prevention of an upward surge of prices. And that is a fact which will be appreciated by the whole of the Canadian consuming public.

When it is suggested that it will not have much effect on prices for the consumers, and in the same breath suggested that it will destroy 700,000 retail merchants, then I think one argument cancels out the other.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I would point out that in his enthusiasm I do not think the Prime Minister should introduce a statement that has not been made. There is no suggestion that it would destroy 700,000, but that it will threaten a lot of the smaller merchants in this country.

Mr. St. Laurent: I think the record of the speeches made by the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) and the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) speaks for itself; and they can be interpreted by anyone who chooses to look at the record. It was not the view of the MacQuarrie committee, and it was not the view of the committee of the house, and it is not the view of the government that, under present conditions, there is any likelihood of this injury to any substantial number of small retailers.

I made the statement the other day, and I repeat it, that if as a result of this legislation or as a result of any other condition there develops a contrary abuse, the government will consider what recommendation it should make to parliament to deal with that contrary abuse. Because that is the only jurisdiction parliament has over these matters.

Here it is recognized that there are practices that should be under restraint, and that there are practices which should be stopped. Well, let us put them under restraint; let us stop them. Let us stop them now, and not have this resolution, which proposes that the jurisdiction of parliament be not exercised but that consideration should be given to something over which parliament has no jurisdiction.

It may be that we have underestimated the effect that this legislation will have on the reduction of prices. If it has any substantial effect in bringing down prices, no one will be harmed by it. Well, why, then, all this opposition against it—if no one will be harmed by it? It is apparent, not from anything I have heard outside but from what I have seen from the evidence before the committee of this house, that such important bodies as the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada and the Canadian Association of Consumers expect that those who belong to those bodies will derive some benefit from this greater freedom in the retailing trade of this country.

It has been suggested for some years now that the Conservative party was the only true liberal party, the only one that wanted to free the Canadian economy from these shackles. Here we bring forward one measure, one concrete measure, to free the retail trade of Canada from the shackles imposed upon them, not by parliament, not by a public authority, but by small groups of producers of the commodities they handle. The attitude taken in face of the proposal to free these retailers from these shackles is that which we have met since the second reading of this bill was proposed.

It seems to me that the partisans of free enterprise, of that freedom of trade which is possible under world conditions, should feel that it is proper for the retail merchant, who is the merchant with whom the consumers by and large have their dealings, should take the responsibility toward the individual purchaser of the price he asks him to pay. It may be that that price will still be the price suggested by the producer of the goods, but it will be the responsibility taken by the retail vendor and not by the producer of the goods to demand it from the consumer.

There is nothing proposed in this legislation which will prevent the suggestion of what would be a fair price. One would imagine that if the price suggested is fair it is apt to be adhered to. There is nothing in this bill which would prevent a producer fixing the maximum price at which his goods could be sold. But there will be in the bill a responsibility placed upon the dealer, whoever he is, for the price which he asks his customer, the one with whom he makes his contract, to pay for the article the purchaser wishes to acquire.

If it be true, as I think a large body of consumers in Canada feel it is at the present time, that there are practices prevalent which should be under restraint, that there are practices prevalent which should be stopped, let us deal with those at the present time. It has been suggested that there may arise other problems; but the MacQuarrie committee, the joint committee of the House of Commons and the Senate, and we on this side feel that that is not apt to happen. If it does happen, it will be time to deal with it when it does happen and in the form in which it does happen.

That is the proposal that is before the house. That is why the subamendment which the hon. lady from Hamilton West has moved cannot be accepted as an adequate solution of the problem which exists at the present time. I spoke on the amendment moved by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar and I shall not add anything on that score.

I am not in any way complaining of full discussion and deliberation in connection with this proposal. I particularly welcomed the contribution which the leader of the opposition made on Friday because, had he not done so, I would have felt that it was my duty to point out that the attempt made to deal with perhaps the obverse problem by fair trade legislation had been made and that all that survived was the prohibitory provision which became section 498A of the Criminal Code.

It is because both the Criminal Code and the Combines Investigation Act have been under fire before the courts and have both been found to be a valid exercise of the jurisdiction of this parliament that, when we came to the conclusion that in addition to the other measures we had adopted or had recommended to parliament for adoption to curb inflation there might be this further attempt, it was put in the form which it has taken in this bill.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Tell us about closure when you have said that you welcomed the contribution of the leader of the opposition.

An hon. Member: You were out west.

Mr. St. Laurent: The hon. gentleman and I are both lawyers and I think as reasonable human beings we feel that under normal conditions closure is something that should not be resorted to, that it is only when it becomes quite obvious, as it seemed to be becoming before Thursday last, that there was being a futile repetition, that any thought can be given to closure.

So long as there is debate of the kind that took place in this house on Friday—I think that that debate was illuminating and instructive—no one should resent the time it took to have it take place. I hope that the debate will not get back to a plane where it will appear to be indefinitely repetitious for the sake of consuming time.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, perhaps in view of the explanatory remarks that the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) has made he would agree to answer a question which has not yet been answered. What is the reason for the urgency that makes it unwise and undesirable to let this bill stand until the next session? I would point out that we have had no real reason as yet.

Mr. St. Laurent: I think the reason was given by the hon. member himself when he stated that it was recognized that there are practices that should be under restraint and that there are practices that should be stopped. That being the case, we feel that that should be done as soon as the evil manifests itself and produces consequences for the public that the public should not have to endure.

Mr. Drew: In that respect I would point out that I said that I did not think it was desirable to shoot the patient in order to cure a single complaint.

Mr. St. Laurent: I hope that we will not have the kind of debate that would revolve around the shooting of the patient. That is not the kind of debate that I had in mind when answering the hon. member for Lake Centre.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am glad the Prime Minister has changed his views.

Mr. Cleaver: Mr. Speaker, I was paired with the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Johnston). Had I voted, I would have voted against the subamendment.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, I was paired with the hon. member for Yukon-Mackenzie River (Mr. Simmons). Had I voted, I would have voted for the subamendment.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): On a matter of privilege, Mr. Speaker, on Friday when I spoke I thought the debate was about to end, and I said we would not delay the proceedings by dividing the house. The sub-amendment was subsequently moved, so I feel that we should call for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

Mr. Speaker: Is the house ready for the question on the amendment?

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): No, Mr. Speaker, I propose to avail myself of the privilege of speaking on the amendment which has been presented because it does raise another proposal which we indicated in our statements on Friday did not really conform with the general trend towards fair trade practices which has been developing for some considerable time on this continent, and in some measure in Great Britain as well. I want to speak on some of the points which were raised by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) this morning concerning the reasons for pressing this bill forward at this time.

The Prime Minister referred to the fact that on Friday I pointed out that we were asking for consideration of the setting up of a fair trade commission, and that in doing so I had said that it was not our intention to draft a bill or cross the "t's" and dot the "i's". He said quite properly that this was the responsibility of the government, and that the government accepted that responsibility. The drafting of a bill of this nature is, of course, the responsibility of the government, and that is exactly what I was pointing out. The drafting of a bill of this kind is the responsibility of the government, and it is not sufficient for the government to say that if we find this bill does great damage to the small merchants throughout this country, then we are prepared, after the damage has been done, to introduce further legislation which will seek to rectify that damage.

Mr. Croll: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Drew: Yes.

Mr. Croll: If that happens does it not enhance your political position?

Mr. Drew: That comment is not worthy of the member for Spadina (Mr. Croll). It would suggest that the only thought that is actuating the member for Spadina is a political one, and I would regret to make that suggestion in this chamber. We are not dealing with something that affects only a limited number of people. I wish to emphasize, what we have sought to emphasize from the beginning, that we are concerned with the effect of this legislation upon the Canadian consumer. We believe that the Canadian consumer is the person who is going to suffer if our whole commercial and mercantile structure, built up over many years of trial and error, is upset by ill-considered legislation which has not been given that measure of examination which it should have been given, and which was indicated at the time that a joint committee of the House of Commons and the Senate of Canada was set up some time during the course of this present session.

It is the Canadian consumer who is going to suffer if, as a result of legislation which has no qualifying clause, those merchants who provide for their daily requirements are either forced to the wall, as was predicted by the hon. member for York South (Mr. Noseworthy), or find that they are unable to maintain that measure of service which has become part of our whole social practice in this country. Throughout Canada today the small merchant provides services which are very much a part of the daily life of our society and of the way in which the ordinary household throughout this country is operated.

The Prime Minister, correctly and in generous terms, has commented on what I said in this house on Friday about the nature of this problem. I must express my appreciation of his statement that he welcomed what I said about the nature of this problem as a whole. He referred to my statement that it is recognized that, under a system of agreed or maintained prices, abuses may creep in. I asserted that proposition in supporting the suggestion that consideration should be given to the setting up of a fair trade commission. What I said, however, did not go so far as to suggest support of the proposal now before us in this amendment which I find rather difficult to understand in view of the conflicting statements made by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) and the hon. member for York South.

The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar naturally spoke in support of the amendment but indicated that he saw no dangers which would preclude his voting for the bill if his amendment was not supported. I wish to refer once again to the clear and unqualified statement of the hon. member for York South that the government had given us no reasons for the haste in pressing this measure forward and that it must be recognized that, if price maintenance was prohibited in this way, the small merchant would be driven to the wall by the big businesses and the chain stores. That, at any rate, is the opinion of the hon. member for York South and it is one which has been expressed across this country.

What I sought to emphasize on Saturday and what I seek to emphasize again today, in view of the fact that the Prime Minister has referred to those remarks in explaining the position of the government in relation to the subamendment on which the vote was just taken, is that price cutting may appear to give to the consumer a temporary advantage which may prove illusory when the full impact of unrestrained price cutting is felt. The experience in this country as well as in the United States, whose economy is so similar to our own, and in Great Britain, has been that cut-throat competition, absolutely unrestrained price cutting, gives only a temporary advantage to the people who benefit from the sacrifice prices but that, in the end, it is the consumer who suffers when the small merchant goes under and great trusts and cartels are formed which take advantage of their increasing monopolies that result from legislation of this kind.

As has been pointed out by the hon. member for York South—and I hope he will forgive me if I refer on a number of occasions to what he said—if his prediction is correct what would result from this measure, which the leader of the C.C.F. party has said he is prepared to support if the amendment is defeated, is that the small merchant will go to the wall under the pressure of the big businesses and the chain stores. What we have been suggesting to this house is that any advantage that might come from that result would not be a long-term advantage and that it would be the consumers themselves who would in the end suffer from the closing down of many of the stores which now give them service and from the formation of still greater monopolies and cartels which would have even more effective control over prices than anything which has emerged so far.

As the Prime Minister has pointed out, on Friday I said that abuses can develop under agreements of this kind. For that very reason the test should be this: Are the agreements in the public interest or are they not? That should be the test. After all, our responsibility in this house, as I understand it, regardless of party, is to find what is anti-social and what is not. We may have different ways of seeking to solve the problems that arise. We may have different ways of seeking to prevent anti-social conduct. Nevertheless, I think it may fairly be said that the members of this House of Commons throughout the years have generally given the people of Canada reason for some measure of pride in the fact that the thing which has guided their efforts has been that question: Is it anti-social? Is it contrary to the public interest? If it is, let us deal with it. But if it is not, let us be sure that we are not simply carried away by arguments which have an appealing sound but which may have many weak spots which have not been fully explored.

In this case we are not dealing with something that is new; in this case we are not asked to approach this problem without the experience of many years for our assistance and guidance. We know that over the years efforts have been made to prevent anti-social activities under any agreements that would be contrary to the public interest. That very principle was fully recognized when an earlier Liberal government introduced the combines investigation legislation in 1923. In that legislation there was a clear reservation that a combine or an association of businesses to fix prices, or to affect prices generally, would be regarded as an offence under the act if it was contrary to the public interest. There was no qualification. It must be contrary to the public interest; it must be anti-social. Why is that provision not included in the measure now before us? An earlier Liberal government felt it was important to recognize that where there were abuses there might also be agreements or understandings that would actually be in the public interest. This government has recognized that principle, because it has not introduced an amendment to the Combines Investigation Act to remove that condition from the present act. If that principle is unsound in relation to the amendment now before us, it is equally unsound in regard to these larger combines which could have so much greater effect on the life and on the welfare and on the living conditions of our people.

If it is not wise to put in the reservation that it must be contrary to the public interest, that it must be anti-social, if it is not wise to introduce this prohibition into any agreement of any kind in regard to prices, then, in the light of the experience in the milling combine investigation, why was there not an amendment introduced at the same time to withdraw that reservation that now is contained in the definition of a combine which creates an offence? Perhaps the minister might have had an argument there, because he might even have suggested that that was an explanation for his failing to act in that particular case which had been brought to his attention by the commissioner under the Combines Investigation Act. No; there is no suggestion that in regard to these great horizontal combines there should be any withdrawal of the reservation that it must be anti-social and contrary to the public interest. But when it comes to the merchant dealing with the public, the merchant who day by day is giving some measure of service to the public not included in any of the prices that are being fixed or that are settled by these agreements that I referred to, the government says: "Oh, no. It is admitted that there may be wrongdoing under agreements of this kind, and that being so we will make it impossible for anyone to have any kind of agreement, whether it is good for the public or not." That is exactly what we object to. We say: It is no new discovery of this government that there can be anti-social results of the agreements where the agreements disregard the public interest. We know that, and we have pointed out that the Conservative party took its stand on this subject some years ago, and has not varied from that position. I pointed out on Friday that the Conservative party introduced in 1935 a measure which was based on the proposition that there could be abuses, and also that there could be agreements which are in the public interest. It has been pointed out by the minister who has introduced this measure that there is a large spread in certain cases between the price charged by the manufacturer and the price charged by the merchant. I have no doubt that the figures he has given are figures taken from evidence that has been placed on record. But, Mr. Speaker, the evidence in regard to action of that kind does not end there. I have no doubt that there are cases that should be dealt with, and we should have some mechanism to deal with them, without simply having an all-embracing prohibition of the kind contemplated by this legislation, and in no way improved by the amendment now before us.

I would point out that if the minister is anxious to deal with this subject effectively, what he should do, even at this time, is to ask the government to agree with him that the measure be withdrawn and that there be a general examination of the Combines Investigation Act and general amendments that will deal with this whole problem. I point out to him something that a great many Canadians learned during the season which has just passed, and which many of us might not have regarded as being completely past if the delay in bringing down this important legislation had not brought us back here at this time. Many Canadians discovered that it is not only under agreements of the kind mentioned that there can be a great increase in prices. I imagine that many people who were shopping during the weeks that preceded Christmas and saw some particular article that they wanted to buy for some member of their family or some friend were very much impressed by the fact that things which they saw advertised in New York, Buffalo, Detroit or Chicago newspapers, or other newspapers in the United States, were in a number of cases selling for more than twice as much here as they would have sold for in the United States. That is not accounted for by tariff. That is not accounted for by any ordinary arrangements, and it certainly is not accounted for by the agreements which are regarded as the big bad wolf by the minister who is putting forward this particular legislation. These are cases where we might well regard the advisability of some supervising authority who may make inquiries and find out just why it is that articles, which perhaps gain their popularity by advertising, printed in the United States and coming into this country, are sold at the prices which they are able to command here under the heavy pressure of Christmas buying.

No, Mr. Speaker, the Combines Investigation Act should be regarded as one document, as one piece of legislation. What is sauce for the goose should be sauce for the gander. If it is wise that the public interest should be the test in the case of horizontal combines or horizontal agreements, then the public interest should be the test in the case of vertical agreements as well.

And that is the situation we have before us. The minister leaves the reservation in the case of the great horizontal combines, but in the case of the vertical combines or the vertical agreements, sought by the merchants themselves—according to the evidence given to the committee, while it was permitted to sit—the merchants wanted an arrangement of this kind, and they wanted some measure of price arrangement which would make it possible to have orderly marketing.

This is something that goes back into the memory of anyone now sitting in the chamber. Just a few days ago I saw reprinted some very interesting advertisements of nearly a hundred years ago. They were printed for the purpose of showing the difference in dollar prices of similar things at that time and today. I noticed that the prices were advertised by the manufacturer away back a hundred years ago, and presumbly those were the prices at which people expected to buy those things in the stores.

The Prime Minister has said, "It is quite possible that merchants may take the suggestion of the manufacturers". Oh, that opens up interesting possibilities. There are more ways than one of skinning a cat. And the Prime Minister says, "Even if this measure is passed, it is quite possible that the suggestion of the manufacturer, who is the source of supply, may be taken by the merchant—even with the act in force."

Does the government believe that, or not? If the government believes that, then this measure is a hoax. If the government believes that, then this measure is a fraud on the people of Canada. If the government believes that, then I think we can only come to the conclusion that the Financial Post was right, and that the reason this bill is being pressed forward is so that when the January sales are announced the people will think they are the result of this half-baked bill.

Mr. Rowe: The cat is out of the bag now.

Mr. Drew: No other reason has been given to the house. No other sound reason has been given. I suggested to the Prime Minister that, in the absence of any explanation from the minister who introduced the bill, we should have some explanation now as to why this bill cannot well stand over until the next regular session of parliament. The Prime Minister said—and while I may not quote his exact words, I hope he will agree that I properly interpret the text of his remarks in this connection—"it would mean that nothing effective would be done in relation to something which the government thinks should be dealt with now."

Well, how effective is it? The Prime Minister has told us—and in this I certainly am not interpreting his remarks inaccurately—"I do not think it is going to have much effect on the cost of living". If it is not going to have much effect on the cost of living, just what is the urgency? If this is a measure to deal with inflation, which we have been urging should be dealt with since the house met in special session in August 1950, after the outbreak of hostilities in Korea—I say if this is a measure to deal with inflation, then this measure is too little and too late.

Nothing the Prime Minister said this morning, and nothing the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) has said or will say, offered any sound foundation for the belief that this is in fact a measure designed to attack the vitally important problem of inflation and the cost of living. And yet this is the only measure, according to the Prime Minister himself, that this government proposes to bring forward during the course of this session to deal with the problem of inflation. The Prime Minister said this morning: If there are these evil practices to which I have referred, then, to use his words—and I hope, again, that I interpret correctly the context of them—let us stop them, and let us stop them now.

An hon. Member: Hear, hear.

Mr. Drew: I hear from one of the Liberal members, "hear, hear".

Mr. Croll: All of us.

Mr. Drew: Spadina is heard from again. I hear, "From all of us, hear, hear." Well, if that is so, then let us have before us a bill that stops those who are guilty of wrongdoing but does not stop those who have agreements that can be shown to be in the public interest.

Let us be sure that in stopping wrongdoing we do not prevent a service to the people, a service which has been given by many small merchants of this country, and given in a manner which has not at any time sought to prejudice the real welfare of consumers throughout this country.

The Prime Minister has also said that parliament can forbid the doing of those things which it thinks should not be done. I believe there would be a better opportunity to deal in more detail with that particular aspect of the matter at a later stage in the debate. However, I would point out that the whole idea or, shall I say, the basic consideration in the minds of hon. members in dealing with legislation which is in the realm of criminal law should be whether or not there is in fact some anti-social or criminal act with which we are dealing.

At no point in the arguments made in support of this bill has there been the slightest suggestion that there is any criminal offence in this instance. It is simply suggested that this is a commercial operation which should not be permitted. It has simply been suggested, without any real evidence to support the argument, that the consumer will benefit in some way if he is able to go into a store and know in advance the price he will have to pay for the article he wants.

Nowhere has there been a single argument put forward that could be taken reasonably as supporting evidence for the enactment of something that, in effect, is criminal law. Nowhere in the statements that have been made is there any evidence that could be received by this high court of parliament on which they could pass judgment that we are dealing with something in the nature of a criminal offence. The measure now before us is making any agreement that seeks to establish uniform and known price levels a criminal offence, whether in the public interest or not.

If this measure were enforced—of course we all have to admit that that is something which will remain to be seen because we still require evidence that the minister will enforce one part of the Combines Investigation Act any more than another—if this act is enforced, when it is made law—the uncertainty as to what might happen was indicated in the report itself when it reminded the Minister of Justice that section 498A was in the Criminal Code and that it should be enforced when there were infractions—we are going to get back to practices that a lot of Canadian consumers do not want. They would have to go into a store, ask the merchant the price of a particular article, and then the merchant might name one price and we would get back to the type of trading which the people of this country decided a long time ago they did not like, that is, haggling over prices and not being sure that they were getting as good a deal as somebody else.

We are simply turning back the clock one hundred years in this country if we prevent an arrangement which will assure that every Canadian consumer who goes into a particular store is going to get the particular article he or she wants without setting aside a substantial amount of time in which to haggle over the price. I am convinced that most if not all the small merchants of this country are not anxious to see a return of practices of that kind.

Nevertheless, once we get to the point where there can be no settled prices, then we must certainly get back to the point where the determination to do business on that basis may be too great to resist. We would certainly get to the point where merchants would not be able to settle their prices or do it with any measure of certainty because the prices would be sufficiently fluid that they would require to be adjusted.

May I emphasize the fact that we have indicated that there are immense advantages in competition. I must confess that I was interested to see the extent to which the members of the party immediately to our left seem to have accepted the same views that we have held for a long time on this subject. Nevertheless there are no absolute rules in any case of this kind. The fact that there can be a limit to the type of competition that is to the advantage of the public has been demonstrated by the extent to which this country, the United States and Great Britain have gone in trying to find some balance between unrestrained cut-throat competition and that rigidity of prices which would deny any of the advantages of competition.

I would remind the house that every argument we have put forward is premised on our belief that the Combines Investigation Act should be strengthened so that it will be a really effective instrument for dealing either with horizontal or with vertical combines which are contrary to the public interest. We have asserted, and we reassert, the proposition that it is the welfare of the Canadian consumer which must be the one and overriding test, and that in any act of this kind there should be a reservation that the thing which we are prohibiting must be something that is anti-social and contrary to the public interest. We must certainly not find ourselves in the position of doing something that is contrary to the public interest in an effort to cure abuses by undue haste in introducing legislation to deal with abuses which we recognize can take place under agreements where prices are fixed either by the government, by individuals or by corporations in this country.

I suggest that the Prime Minister has given the strongest reasons why this legislation should stand over until next session; why this legislation should be given further consideration; why a committee of both houses should be set up which will really be permitted to inquire and to report upon evidence that is comprehensive and inclusive and not simply be a sham, as was the committee which met during the course of this session.

Those reasons are contained in the statement of the Prime Minister that he does not believe that this measure can have much effect on the cost of living. I wish to add to that the remark he did make that possibly it might have more effect than the government thinks it is going to have. That indeed would be a surprising way to act, to introduce legislation and to draw up a bill they did not think was going to have the desired effect, then introduce it and pass it just on the possibility that it may not do too much harm and may do more good than they themselves think it is going to do at this particular time. That would be a new process of legislating, and a very dangerous one indeed. If it is possible that it is going to do more good than they think, it is equally possible that it is going to do a great deal more harm.

It does of course introduce a certain excitement into life that has not ordinarily been the anticipated purpose of legislation put forward seriously by the government to this high court of parliament. The very fact that the Prime Minister, on the one hand, has said that he does not think it is going to have much effect on the cost of living and, on the other hand, that it may have more effect than they think it is going to have, suggests added reasons why in the interests of the Canadian consumer our general mercantile system should not be taken by the scruff of the neck and told that they must abandon practices that have been built up over the years without the slightest opportunity to demonstrate that what they are doing is actually in the public interest and to the benefit of the consumer.

What has been said this morning is an added reason why this legislation should stand over until the next session of parliament so that there may be a full and comprehensive inquiry, and so that when the government does present the bill to amend the Combines Investigation Act it will be able to do what it cannot do this morning, to say that this is what we think the result will be and we give you the evidence why it will actually help Canadian consumers.

Hon. W. Earl Rowe (Dufferin-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Howe: The voice of little business.

Mr. Rowe: I hear somebody speaking about big business. I might say—

Mr. Howe: I said "little business".

Mr. Rowe: —that so far as the modern economy we have today and the democracy we are trying to save are concerned, the big business people are not destroying them half as much as little politicians.

An hon. Member: You ought to know.

Mr. Rowe: I think the more business is interfered with in various ways the more our economy and democratic system are endangered. Like every other hon. member of this house, I have a great responsibility, and I think I represent as many little interests as anyone else. Besides the people of my constituency there are several thousand little interests that are big interests at Christmas time. I refer to the labouring man's family and his standard of living. I take second place to no one in this house in my interest in his welfare as well as the welfare of this country. But, Mr. Speaker, this is a strange spectacle when we are called back to parliament at this time.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Rowe: I hear some hon. members laugh, but it is not a laughing matter to thousands of people, thousands of little men in this dominion. We have an economy of which we are proud. We have a free enterprise system that has even endured the socialistic tendencies of modern Liberalism. We have in this country a state of affairs that we are proud to show to the world. We have had such a development in the last number of years that with some pride the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) can shove his chest out occasionally and say that despite the strange type of trade philosophy of those who sit behind him in parliament he has at least been responsible to a great extent for encouraging a period of great expansion.

A few days ago, as the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) has said today, the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) made a certain suggestion. I think he probably did so in the hectic days of the Christmas rush because he, like me, is a proud grandfather and wanted to get home to see that Santa Claus played fair with his delightful grandchildren. He suggested that if there were no other way of handling the situation he would, with the great and powerful majority behind him—and you know, Mr. Speaker, how power corrupts; some it corrupts almost completely—introduce closure. But now he comes back and in the Christmas spirit suggests that after being home for Christmas he now takes a different view of the situation entirely.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That was a strategic retreat.

Mr. Rowe: The hon. member says it was a strategic retreat. I remember an ex-minister of agriculture, whom the present Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) will recall very well, who would have called that recantation No. 1. I refer to the late and popular Mr. Motherwell. However, I am glad, even though we are now interrupting the Christmas holidays for the first time I believe in the history of this parliament, that we are now to have the right to discuss the matter fully. It is rather inspiring that we have that right now because neither the MacQuarrie committee nor the so-called investigating committee of the house took time to look into the question properly. While they did not take time enough to look the matter squarely in the face and see all the intricate problems involved, it is a good thing, even though Christmas is over, that in the spirit of Christmas cheer we can take all the time we wish.

An hon. Member: You should know about Christmas cheer.

Mr. Rowe: I think my hon. friend does not really understand true Christmas cheer any more than he understands this issue. I have said we have an economy of which we are very proud. Even though the country has endured a great deal from the present government, I am not going to say that some of its members have not a pretty sound economic philosophy. In fact we must all agree that our development in the last number of years has been spectacular and something for pride on the part of everyone who calls himself or herself a Canadian. Nevertheless it has been the type of economy that has brought about new problems and, as the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) has emphasized so clearly, we cannot turn the clock of progress back.

I was very proud to hear my leader express the views he has. I know that they must be somewhat disturbing even to the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Croll). He sees the clear-cut political significance of the fact that the one man in Canada today who is giving more leadership than any other is the leader of the opposition in this house. When that type of popularity comes to the leader of His Majesty's loyal opposition it is called politics by those who sit to your right, Mr. Speaker; but whenever it comes—and it rarely does—from the other side of the house it is called statesmanship. We hear a lot of talk about loss leaders, but I know something about that.

Mr. Fournier (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): You should know something about it.

Mr. Rowe: Loss leaders are not as conspicuous at the present time as leaders who seem to be lost.

An hon. Member: Oh, yes.

Mr. Rowe: There are fair trade practices, and in fact free trade practices, to which the Liberal party at one time adhered.

At one o'clock the house took recess.

The house resumed at 2:30 p.m.

Mr. Rowe: When the house adjourned at noon, Mr. Speaker, I was speaking about the fair trade practices that have been developing in this country and the United States in a rapidly changing economy. These are changes which we cannot ignore. I can recall, and I am sure you can too, Mr. Speaker, the early days when competition between retailers, and indeed all classes of society, was rampant, and there was little interference by government. The burning question today is the cost of living itself, and I am sure every hon. member in this house realizes that there is no one worthy of being in this house who will not do what he can, and what he believes would be wise, to reduce the cost of living. There is no one here who has not sympathy for the man with a large family who, no matter what his wages may be, is still unable to meet his requirements because of the heavy taxation of the government plus the high cost of the commodities which his family needs. I am sure every hon. member to your right recognizes that that is why their party has suffered defeat in the last five by-elections. People are dissatisfied with the high cost of living and the heavy burden of taxation, especially when the government is showing such a large surplus.

People are wondering why they have to pay these exorbitant taxes, unless it is to prepare a campaign plan for the next election, because if the government is overtaxing the people now they can reduce taxes before an election. When one considers how much the government has interfered with business in this country, it is a rather spectacular change to find the government taking this attitude about what you might call fair trade practices. These practices have grown up over many years, for almost half a century in this country and longer in the United States. This morning the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) indicated that something must be done. The government is prepared to cross the "t's" and dot the "i's". They are prepared to restrict and restrain; they are prepared to control our economy so that every voter will have a square deal.

It seems to me that the haste with which this measure has been introduced is rather phenomenal. As the leader of His Majesty's loyal opposition very well said this morning, surely we should take time to consider an issue that may well disturb our whole economy. As he has pointed out, I do not believe anyone has said that it is going to put 700,000 retailers out of business.

Mr. Sinnott: You were not here to hear him.

Mr. Fournier (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): No one believed him.

Mr. Rowe: However, Mr. Speaker, if I was no more use here than some of the hon. members who stay here all the time, my absence would not be so conspicuous.

Mr. Fournier (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): He admits it.

Mr. Rowe: The hon. member who is interrupting sits so close to me that I am not sure whether he is laughing with me or at me, or whether he is supporting us or the members to the right. I do not say that he is not a loyal supporter of the government, because the rump of this government is more important than the head. I do feel, Mr. Speaker, that this is a very important issue. I hope the government realizes that this is not an attempt at killing time—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Rowe: No, Mr. Speaker; I know that the Prime Minister said that he is not going to put on closure unless, in his judgment, closure is necessary. If the hon. member for

Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) or some other member needles this government or makes a speech that will embarrass the government, then the government may reconsider closure if the opposition reverts to the same type of debate—

Mr. Fournier (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): It should be applied right now.

Mr. Rowe: No doubt you have been saying that in your caucus.

Mr. Fournier (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): We have not had any caucus.

Mr. Rowe: Oh, you did not? Thank you for the information.

Mr. Fournier (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): We know you have had plenty of them.

Mr. Rowe: Yes, we have caucuses because we have a leader who gets a decision from his whole group before he acts. We have the most democratic leader in this house. The public now knows that he is leading a Conservative group in which every member of this party is 100 per cent behind him. Let my hon. friends who are interrupting go out and tell the retailers of this country the same story; let them tell it to the little man on the back concession who gets up at three o'clock in the morning to get syrup for some mother's baby after the mother has walked through two feet of snow to get there. It is all very well to laugh, but I know as much about the rural parts of this country as any hon. member here. In fact, this cold I have was caused by digging my car out of the snow on a back concession last week. I know how the people in the rural parts of the province of Ontario live, as well as those in western Canada where they have not got an automobile. Those people walk to the corner store and get the storekeeper up at night to obtain some medicine, probably a standard brand at a standard price. This is not a laughing matter. The heart and soul of free enterprise in this country is the middle class, the little storekeeper or the druggist who is struggling along.

I can recall very well that the small retailer who went out of business between the twenties and the thirties. During those years the large corporation and the big chain stores took the place of the little retailer.

Mr. Fournier (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): Humbug time. You were a minister then.

Mr. Rowe: Mr. Speaker, no hon. member is a better judge of humbug than is the one who sits at my right.

Mr. Speaker: With so many interruptions it is extremely difficult for the hon. member who has the floor to make his remarks relevant to the subject under discussion. I would therefore ask hon. members to refrain from making interruptions. The hon. member seems to enjoy it, but I think we might make better progress if there were not so many interruptions.

Mr. Rowe: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I probably do not enjoy it as much as you might think; but I trust that my remarks are more relevant to the issue than are the interruptions which have been disturbing you. But may I say this, Mr. Speaker; I have watched the situation and I have seen what has taken place under the guise of national defence. We are all greatly concerned about our defence of this country, about the high cost of living and of those things which are vital to the people who cannot afford them as well as can those of us who are sitting here today. But, Mr. Speaker, I am disturbed and alarmed at how we hide behind national defence, and at how our government wants to dot the "i's" and cross the "t's" and control the economy of this country under the guise of national defence. Mr. Speaker, we have an all-powerful government—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I doubt if the hon. member's remarks now are relevant to the issue before the house.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Fournier (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, might I say that it might be useful to everybody, and especially to my hon. friend at my left, for the Speaker to inform us exactly as to what is the point we are discussing now.

Mr. Rowe: No, Mr. Speaker; I am not going to be distracted from what I have to say by the failure to understand on the part of some of my colleagues who sit so close to me. After a lengthy debate I hope that he will understand why this is an issue that the people are concerned about. It is not a case of repartee or wisecracks. It is something that affects the economy of this country and disturbs a practice that has been carried on for well-nigh half a century.

I have mentioned that the small retailer who is affected by this measure is the heart and soul of free enterprise in this country. I have mentioned that hon. members who were here between 1921 and 1930—and there are not so many of them—will recall how the small storekeepers' signs which bore their family name, and which had been on the store windows for fifty years, disappeared through the onrush of the larger merchants such as A & P and other big stores. We need those big stores in the big centres; we need them in an expanding economy. Again I say that this is a big country; it is a wide and expansive one, and covers a large area. There are thousands of grand families living on the outskirts of these big centres.

We have heard a great deal about unfair competition. I can well remember, Mr. Speaker, how those who sit to your right today in the old days would talk about fair trade, about cut-throat competition. How they have despised cut-throat competition! Now the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson), one of these new apostles of a new type of western Liberalism, comes down and tells us that we must have a different competition. He says it is not going to hurt many, that if they are efficient, the little storekeeper could still live despite what he is doing to him. Despite all the brilliance of the present Minister of Justice, can you imagine for a moment that he knows more about merchandising than do the people who have been practising it for half a century? Can anybody imagine that these little champions of a new form of Liberalism do? The Minister of Agriculture has fixed the price of wheat. He has established and tried to support agricultural marketing boards. He has confused the whole wheat market and he is now trying to ruin the butter and egg business. The Minister of Justice, another one with another type of philosophy, now comes down and tells us: My colleague has fixed the price of the farmers' products to the consumer through the milk boards and so on. I am going to let the devil take the hindmost. I am going to leave it to rugged individualism. I have a new brand of social philosophy for the Liberal party and I am going to stop the retailer. I am not sure what I will do about loss leaders.

Mr. Gardiner: It is the Tory government in Ontario that runs the milk board.

Mr. Rowe: Yes, but are you sure that this will not upset your whole agricultural market philosophy if you follow the philosophy of the Minister of Justice? You cannot blow hot and cold. It is no wonder that the Prime Minister blew lukewarm this morning, with so many of those around him blowing hot and cold. Mr. Speaker, you can fool all of the people some of the time and you can fool some of the people all of the time, but you cannot fool all of the people all of the time. You probably know that this is a shot-gun prescription, Mr. Speaker. The Prime Minister is playing with it like a little boy with a loaded shotgun. He does not know what is in it. He does not know whether or not it will go off; and if it does go off, he does not know what it is going to do. He does not know whether it is going to lower prices. He says it might lower them but he says he does not believe it will lower them much. But if the retailer is a really good friend of the Prime Minister, in a riding that might be doubtful, he should lower them in January anyway, to make it look popular, because the Prime Minister does not know what is going to happen.

Mr. Fournier (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): Not clever but wise.

Mr. Rowe: The Prime Minister says that the gun might go off but that he is not just sure of what will take place. He criticized the leader of the opposition for saying that the prescription might kill the patient. He does not know whether it will kill the patient or resuscitate him. He cannot cure the patient because he has not diagnosed the disease. The Minister of Justice cannot tell us. Neither could the MacQuarrie committee tell us what a loss leader was, really. If you cannot diagnose the case, I will leave it to any doctor to find what prescription he would use.

Then, Mr. Speaker, why the emergency right in the midst of our Christmas holidays? You would think that war had broken out this year. The minister says: This peril is here and we have got to legislate to restrict resale price maintenance. We have got to cross the "t's" and dot the "i's" now when it is necessary. There is a great peril threatening the economy of this country. You would imagine that this whole thing was going to collapse around our heads. In all the years of fair trade practices we now have 15 per cent of the great volume of trade in this country under resale price maintenance. In fifty years this practice has absorbed 15 per cent of the great volume of trade in this country! Now in the Christmas season, between Christmas and New Year's, we must rush back to parliament and solve this immediately before it overtakes the whole country. In fifty years it has absorbed 15 per cent. I will leave it to you, with your mathematics, Mr. Speaker—you have more time at present than I have—to figure out how many years it will take to absorb all of our economy. Yet we have to take action here before the 1st of January. Yes, it smacks to me of the January sales. If the Prime Minister knows half as much about economics as he does about corporation law, he knows that in January the sales generally take place anyway, and prices will fall anyway.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Rowe: Yes, they will fall anyway. Even the hon. member who interrupts on the back benches knows that. I did not know that he did.

An hon. Member: That cat is out of the bag.

Mr. Rowe: Yes, Mr. Speaker; as somebody says, the cat is out of the bag. It came out this morning. It looked like one of those with a Christmas ribbon tied around its neck because it was then showing exactly what this government is trying to do. Mr. Speaker, this government cannot tell the consumers today that, because they are going to stop the imposition of resale price maintenance on 15 per cent of the volume of standard brands, that is going to lower the cost of living. The Prime Minister himself this morning said that he did not see that it might lower prices very much, but he thought that the retailers might lower the prices. He thought that. But if the retailers lower prices, what guarantee has the man in the back concession—the man that some hon. members were laughing at a few moments ago—will not have to pay more money at the corner grocery store? What guarantee have you that as to the standard brands that have been under the practices of the trade or manufacturers indicating the prices that should be charged, the prices will not be tampered with so that you could sell those standard brands at 30 per cent less than I can sell them?

Mr. Cannon: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Rowe: Yes.

Mr. Cannon: The manufacturer can still impose a maximum price. There is no danger of the retailer increasing the prices.

Mr. Rowe: I am not just sure what that has contributed to the issue, but in view of the fact that I am trying to be relevant in my discussion of the issue I shall try to help the hon. member to be relevant. The manufacturer stops manufacturing when he cannot make a profit.

Mr. Garson: It just happens to be the point that the hon. member is discussing.

Mr. Rowe: I am glad to get some help, because this is the first time that I have ever had any help from that side of the house.

Mr. Cannon: If you will permit me, the point I was making is that if this legislation is passed the manufacturer will still be able to impose maximum prices.

Some hon. Members: So what?

Mr. Rowe: I think everybody knows that that is true. In fact, the maximum price can become the minimum price. As one who knows something about manufacturing I may say that because of the high cost of wages and of manufacturing you do not usually manufacture at a loss. But I do know this, and it came out in the MacQuarrie committee report and in other investigations in 1948, and so forth, that on the 15 per cent that is controlled by resale price maintenance policies from the manufacturer to the retailer, on that range of goods, the prices, percentage-wise, have increased less than on the other 85 per cent. You ask why.

Mr. Mutch: Nobody said a word.

Mr. Rowe: I will tell you why. The reason is that the volume of business usually increases because of the stability and prestige of the product and the confidence that the public hold in the product, knowing that it sells at the same price across the board. They know that in the manufacture of the standard brands quality is not tampered with; they know that the small fellow in the outlying districts, where there is no competition, is not going to charge 50 per cent more than the article is worth. They know that somebody else is not going to put out the standard brands as a loss leader so that they will get you in and sell you ten times as much at higher prices.

I have grave misgivings of any part this government proposes to play in the economy of this country. I have watched what has happened when they have dabbled in the markets. I say again, and in all seriousness, that it is a strange spectacle we see today. Here is a practice that has gone on in my memory for over a quarter of a century, and which was not questioned once by the commissioner of combines. Now we are here between Christmas and New Year's in order to get it settled before the January sales.

The effect of fair trade practices has not been disproved, Mr. Speaker. I cannot remember when fair trade practices have not meant a better deal for the consumer. I take the view opposite to that of the Prime Minister of this country when I say that this legislation will cost the consumer money instead of saving him money. It will destroy the protection of standard brands; it is unnecessary, unsound and uneconomical; it deals with no emergency at all in any sense of the word. The Prime Minister answered that himself when he said he did not believe it would have any particular effect on the cost of living. Therefore there is no peril except after fifty years resale price maintenance has developed to the extent of 15 per cent. This is a practice that has been in force for over half a century, but the Prime Minister now informs us that it has grown so fast that it must be stopped before New Year's day.

Mr. Pouliot: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Rowe: Yes.

Mr. Pouliot: I have been following him very closely and I wonder whether he is not repeating the same speech that he made sixteen years ago in defence of the Natural Products Marketing Act of the Bennett government which was declared illegal by the privy council?

Mr. Rowe: Well, Mr. Speaker, I do not remember the speech I made sixteen years ago, but I am delighted that my—

Mr. McCann: Nor anything else.

Mr. Rowe: You do not; you were not here. I am delighted that my genial friend, the hon. member for Temiscouata, was so impressed by it sixteen years ago that he has never forgotten it.

Mr. Pouliot: I do not suffer from amnesia.

Mr. Rowe: I have a great regard for the hon. member for Temiscouata, and I do not believe that I have ever suffered as much in listening to his speeches as he has suffered in listening to mine.

Mr. Pouliot: I am not suffering; I am enjoying it.

Mr. Rowe: Thank you.

Mr. Pouliot: I regret that my hon. friend is not wiser, because he is the only privy councillor of the Bennett government in this house. He was as impressive then as was his leader of the time.

Mr. Rowe: I must thank the hon. member for Temiscouata. I think his compliments are more attributable to our personal friendship than any credit that I deserve for being impressive. I have always had great admiration for the hon. member, despite some of the speeches he has made. I have great personal admiration for the hon. member for Temiscouata.

Mr. Pouliot: Hear, hear.

Mr. Rowe: I know that the hon. member for Temiscouata will recall that on several occasions I have urged assistance to farmers, because I was a farmer, and I am still a farmer. Some hon. members may not think that I do much farming, but if you saw my farm you would know that there is plenty left to do. I know that many have posed as farmers in this house over the years, but I think I still farm more land than some of these hon. gentlemen who are interrupting me. However, I am not going to brag about how well I do it.

Mr. Fournier (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): It would be better for you not to.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

[Mr. Pouliot.]

Mr. Rowe: As the hon. member for Temiscouata has said, I urged that assistance—

Mr. Pouliot: I ask the hon. member to leave my leader alone.

Mr. Rowe: That is good politics. Every party needs a buffer. I do not care how much you attack my leader, because he is capable of looking after himself.

I have on different occasions, Mr. Speaker, urged that we should have some more regulations on the sale of farm products. I know the hon. member will recall that I have urged —in fact I have heard him urge—that we should develop home markets, and a reasonable degree of protection for the farmers. That has been the trend of both parties in this house for many years. But today the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) and his party have gone one better. They have fixed the resale price; they have resale price maintenance on wheat.

Mr. Gardiner: I do not handle wheat.

Mr. Rowe: No, you do not handle wheat, but I remember so well that when you were getting handlers to handle it you certainly mishandled the issue to the extent of half a billion dollars of cost to the farmers of Canada. I can well recall—

Mr. Pouliot: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Pouliot: I rise to a point of order. Now that the hon. gentleman has paid such a nice tribute to me in my humble capacity I want to rise to a point of order.

Mr. Speaker: Order. If I may be permitted to rise to a point of order, I will hear the hon. member for Temiscouata afterwards.

Mr. Pouliot: Thank you.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member who has the floor is not speaking directly to the bill at the moment, but I do not think we can blame him entirely for that. Hon. members have asked questions which he has been constrained to answer. I would think the hon. member would have less difficulty in discussing the bill if there were not so many interruptions.

Mr. Pouliot: Mr. Speaker, according to the order paper the question before the house is:

Resuming the adjourned debate on the motion of the Minister of Justice for the second reading of Bill No. 36, an act to amend the Combines Investigation Act, and on the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Coldwell, and on the amendment to the amendment of Mrs. Fairclough.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Probably the hon. member can raise the point of order after the hon. member who has the floor has finished his speech. It hardly seems fair to interrupt at this time.

Mr. Pouliot: I was explaining the point of order, Mr. Speaker. The point of order is that we must discuss the suggestion of our hon. lady friend.

Mr. Drew: That has been disposed of.

Mr. Speaker: I might inform the hon. member that a number of hon. members were late in their arrival today because the trains have not been running on time. I would say to him however that this morning we disposed of the amendment of the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mrs. Fairclough).

Mr. Pouliot: I am very glad. That is progress.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe) may proceed.

Mr. Rowe: Mr. Speaker, I am glad the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) observes progress made in his absence. I certainly feel complimented by the hon. member and by others in the house because at this late date in the debate, at a time when the Prime Minister fears that the debate may go back to one that is not quite relevant to the issue, whether or not my remarks are relevant it would appear that at least they seem to attract the attention and the interest of experienced members such as the hon. member for Temiscouata.

However, I see the time at my disposal has almost expired, and I do not propose to detain the house at greater length. If the interruptions were counted, I am not sure whether I have spoken my full time. Then it may be that the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Croll) who, I believe, is to follow me, would rather listen to me than say what he is going to say.

I feel this issue is far more important than many hon. members think it is. There is no emergency. I say positively there is no emergency. There is no member sitting to your right, Mr. Speaker, including the Prime Minister, the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) and the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson), who can make people believe that this is a national emergency which must be settled before the new year. There are other matters on the order paper far more important than this one.

Mr. Martin: Have you read Mr. Hannam's letter?

Mr. Rowe: I have read Mr. Hannam's letter. But in view of the fact that this morning Mr. Speaker ruled that one must not mention in the house something that has happened outside the house, I think perhaps I am not free to refer to the letter. However, since the minister has made the interjection, I think I should be permitted to reply.

Mr. Speaker: I have no objection to the hon. member replying to the interjection by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin), but I hope he does not propose to read any letter that may have been received.

Mr. Rowe: No, I certainly would not impose anything like that on the house. I think his letter was unsound—and I say this to those whom he supports so diligently. I say it because I represent as large a rural riding as any member. I know the farmers, and I do not think what Mr. Hannam has written represents the viewpoint of the majority of farmers in Canada, when he says that while resale price maintenance is not good for the little storekeeper on the corner it is good for the farmer in the sale of wheat and other foodstuffs.

I do not think he is consistent. But I have noticed that he blows both hot and cold, so long as the air goes toward the support of the Liberal party.

Mr. Martin: The farmers won't like that.

Mr. Rowe: Your farmers may not, but I will speak for my farmers. As my leader said this morning, what is sauce for the goose is sauce for the gander; and if it is sauce for the farmers in the country it is sauce for the little storekeeper at the corner store.

An hon. Member: What about the consumer?

Mr. Rowe: What about the consumer? I think I have explained that it is just as likely to raise the price to the consumer—even if the Prime Minister does not know what it will do. So if you know all the retailers are going to lower their prices, you can tell Mr. Hannam that. I cannot tell my people that prices will go up—I cannot tell them what they are going to do. But I know that, in connection with the standard brands involved, this will not bring stability to the drug trade and to the small retail stores. It will not bring confidence to the consumer—it will not do anything for him. It will not give any assurance at all to the manufacturer. It will stand as a threat by way of higher prices, and it will upset trade—just the same as the Minister of Agriculture upset trade in the butter and egg business, and in almost everything he has touched where there has been government interference.

The hour has struck in this country when you should give business back to the businessman. As I said at the outset, the big businessmen of this country are not as great a threat to our economy and our democratic way of enterprise as are the little politicians. Let the shoemaker stick to his last. It has been said that he governs best who governs least.

The more we have of government interference, the worse it is. The hon. member for Temiscouata, and others who have sat in the house for a quarter of a century, know very well that every time you meddle with business you confuse it. As I said at the outset today, we are in a time of great prosperity in this country, although there is another war being waged now—whether it is hot or cold; and it is hot enough for some of our boys.

But I say that, with three wars inside of half a century, we know the effects of artificial sustenance of the economy. There are certain companies, certain industries and certain people making money. Our labouring men are receiving more wages than ever before; but at the same time they are paying a terrific cost to live. They are worried about what is waiting around the corner. We have seen a depression before, and we know what happened to the little retail store keeper. From my own personal experience I know that those storekeepers carried the accounts of poor families at a time when the large stores in Toronto, Montreal and Quebec city would not carry them.

These are community people. They help the Red Cross, the Roman Catholic church charities, the Protestant church charities, the societies. They have been the leaders in their communities. I am concerned today about the thousands of small retailers who make up a great volume of the middle class people—more concerned about them that I am about the big chain stores which are doing well, and will continue to do well. It is not in the interests of either of these groups that they be disturbed in this way. It is not to their interest to disturb experienced business that has operated successfully for half a century.

I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, if I have exceeded my time, but perhaps the extra time would be accounted for by the interruptions.

Mr. David A. Croll (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, I was not privileged, as was the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) some sixteen years ago, to hear the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe) make that memorable speech. I thought the hon. member carried it too far today when he started to deliver us a lecture on closure. I think probably he is the only man sitting in the House of Commons today who voted in favour of closure at that time. So my hon. friend speaks with more expertness than I would. If he is not a great expert as a farmer, he is certainly an expert on closure.

My hon. friend started out by saying that the government had dabbled with farm markets and upset the trade of the country. I saw a press report this morning which indicated that farm income for the first nine months of this year was up 25 per cent over what it was last year. And when my hon. friend tells us that Mr. Hannam, the president of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, does not speak for the farmers of this country, then I say to him that he had better change his own description in the Parliamentary Guide because it is indicated that, in addition to being a manufacturer he is also a farmer. If my hon. friend is described as a farmer he must know who Mr. Hannam is.

Mr. Fournier (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): You must mean the stud book.

Mr. Rowe: I never dabble with Hansard.

Mr. Croll: I for one welcome this legislation.

Mr. Casselman: Tell us about the purple gang. You know what I mean.

Mr. Croll: I do not know what you mean.

Mr. Rowe: Go ahead.

Mr. Croll: You must be out of your mind.

Mr. Casselman: You must have been then.

Mr. Croll: I do not know what the hon. member is saying.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Croll: I welcome this legislation because it is in the best Liberal tradition. Historically and traditionally we have been opposed to trusts, cartels and combines. Today we are considering the kind of legislation we ought to be considering. I point out to the government that never was the line of demarcation between political parties so well drawn as it is at the present time. As a matter of fact, we should emphasize and re-emphasize to the country just exactly what is our position and what is the position of the official opposition.

I should like to say a word about the committee. Some harsh things have been said in this house about the chairman of the committee. This house has already had an example of delay, filibustering and obstructionist tactics. The committee was faced with the same tactics from the beginning.

There was stalling and delay on points of order and questions of privilege. There was constant repetition almost from the beginning.

The chairman had a little greater scope than the Speaker in this house and, being able to make some of his own rules as he went along, he pleaded with the members of the committee, he cajoled, compromised and did everything possible in order to get on with the hearings. All I can say about that committee is that it was a most interesting and important committee, but if I had had an ulcer it would have been aggravated at the end of the sittings.

So far as I am concerned, I do not think it would be wise to apply closure. Let them talk; let them continue to talk, because one thing is becoming very clear: the people of this country are beginning to be aware that there is a great issue at stake. During the week end when I was at home for a few days I found that this was an important topic of discussion. The consumer is becoming aware that we are trying to do something for him, to do something for his benefit, while the Tories are stopping us from doing it. He is not very clear as to what we are trying to do, but there is very little clarity across the way in the opposition benches. I give my hon. friends some gratuitous advice. They are not only not making friends, they are not influencing people.

The hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low) gave some advice to the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) who did not take it. The hon. member said that when they had made their point, as they had in dealing with Bretton Woods, a vote should take place. He told the house they had continued until they had made their point. As it turns out, he and his party were right as far as Bretton Woods was concerned and I think the rest of us were wrong. I am speaking now only for myself. If there had been any political benefit, they would have received it. The trouble was that nobody in the country understood what Bretton Woods was about. I must confess that I did not understand clearly what it was all about. I am not going to ask the hon. member to explain it at this time. Some day when we have more leisure I am going to ask the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) to do that.

Mr. Low: I would be about as much in order as other hon. members have been.

Mr. Croll: My own thought is that when we come back after New Year's the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) should make an issue of this bill. At that particular time he should also bring down a budget. There is nothing I would like better than to go to the country on this particular issue. The leader of the opposition smiles, but let me tell him that this is the first clear issue I have seen in years. The Tories would not return enough members to occupy a telephone booth.

Neither in the speech from the throne nor subsequently in this house did the Prime Minister promise to pull a rabbit out of a hat for the consumers of this country. What he did say, or what he implied was—

An hon. Member: Be careful now.

Mr. Croll: —that big business and business would not be allowed to gang up on the consumer. I think I know as much about the cost of living as any other member and I feel that with the measures that we have already taken this measure will at least take the zip out of the zooming high cost of living. I was not here to hear the leader of the opposition tell the house about the possibility that we of the Liberal party—we are glad to share it with the C.C.F. and the Social Credit, as there is enough glory for all—will get the political benefit if the cost of living falls in January and February.

It is normal in this country to have bargain sales in January and February, at which time the merchants dispose of old stock they were not able to sell in December. That is the most normal thing that could possibly happen. This egislation was not forecast at Christmastime; it was forecast on October 9 and it could have been passed in the early part of November. It was not planned to have it go into effect at this particular period.

What is worrying the leader of the opposition is that there has been a certain amount of buyer resistance in the country. There has been a certain amount of anticipation over what will happen when we abolish price maintenance. The natural thing that will happen is that people will dispose of their stocks as quickly as possible and prices will fall. There is not any question about that at all.

It seems to me that with the measures we have already taken it is inevitable that the cost of living must come down. January and February are the usual months when we have sales. What I think is worrying him is that the cost of living may continue to drop in March as it may well do because business knows that there will be a budget in April and that it is inevitable there will be reductions in taxes, including excise tax, as has already been predicted on many occasions. By that time people who are planning for April, May and June will be cutting their prices once again.

There are actually three schools of thought today throughout the world on the question of the cost of living. There is the British school of thought which believes in direct controls, subsidies and rationing.

An hon. Member: Bankruptcy.

Mr. Croll: That is their method of approach. The United States on the other hand have a mixed system. They have adopted the British idea of partial controls, and they have also gone in for credit controls. The result is that their best friends tell them they have messed it up. They have grey and black markets that are larger than the normal market. On the other hand we in this country have taken an entirely different course, that of credit restrictions and the imposition of taxes for the purpose of taking money out of circulation in order to control the cost of living. We have used every conceivable method of trying to bring down the cost of living, and the measure before the house is just another one. How much good it will do one cannot foretell at the present time, but it may be it is the straw that is now necessary. It may do a great deal more than we anticipate, or we would not have the kind of opposition that is being put forward against this bill. There is a great deal of worry across the way.

Mr. Fraser: Because everything the government has done so far has put up the cost of living.

Mr. Croll: Last month the cost of living rose ·8 per cent.

Mr. Sinclair: It rose ·8 points.

Mr. Croll: It is anticipated that within a very short time, perhaps even this month, we will be able to both halt and hold the rise in the cost of living. If we are able to do so we will be the first ones in the western world to be successful. If we are able to hold it for two or three months the people of this country will come to realize that the government knows what it is doing and they will have the kind of confidence that will bring down the cost of living even more rapidly than before. For the first six months of this year I think business will be large in volume. Perhaps profits will not be as great as formerly but I think the time has come for us to tell business that it must stop acting as if it had been born with a silver spoon in its mouth and must forever be reaching for an even larger ladle.

The leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) was very much concerned about what the bill will do. Will it bring the reductions that we anticipate? I should like to ask him what he is worrying about. If it does not bring reductions it helps him politically and he ought to welcome anything that helps him politically. On the other hand, if it is a good measure then it will redound to our credit. He made a statement later in reply to a question I asked, which left the inference that I was a mere politician and he was a statesman, although he did not say he was a statesman. I remember the answer Mitch Hepburn made one time in the legislature of Ontario when faced with a similar situation. He said, "The politician gets elected".

Mr. Drew: Just so that we may keep the chronology clear and know what measure of respect the hon. member had for Mr. Hepburn's views at that time, was that before or after Mr. Hepburn dismissed him as a minister in his cabinet?

Mr. Croll: Let me tell the hon. member that Mr. Hepburn never dismissed me.

Mr. Drew: Oh yes, he did.

Mr. Croll: I resigned from his cabinet, as my hon. friend well knows. It is a matter of record. I am sorry that the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe) is not in the house because in his speech today he said that he welcomed criticism of the leader of the opposition. No man in the province of Ontario criticized the leader of the opposition more than the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe. I remind the leader of the opposition that when he was organizer for the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe, who was leading the Conservatives in Ontario the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe found one day that he was not the leader of the party. He found that the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) was the leader and he was out in the cold. Let us get back to the bill.

Mr. Drew: I can understand why Hepburn got rid of the hon. member.

Mr. Croll: This measure is one that should have been introduced a long time ago. I think it writes new basic freedoms into the law of the land. It gives the consumer the right of choice and freedom of prices. It gives the retailer freedom of prices and of services. So far as the manufacturer is concerned, we withdraw from him freedom of control which carries with it some freedom to exploit. By passing this legislation we solve one problem but we must not deny the fact that we create another problem. It is one that has been referred to in the house on many occasions. We have got to meet it now or later. We open the door to abuses on the part of corporations with long pockets and short memories. We open the door to anti-social predatory groups who can slash, cut, juggle, unload, and take over smaller businesses.

The group, consisting of Eaton's, Morgan's, the Hudson's Bay Company and others, endorse this legislation. Frankly we were embarrassed by their endorsement. Anyone who has heard the speeches made in the house will realize that the name of Eaton's has been tossed around like a hot potato. Nobody wants any part of them. Even the Tories are trying to divorce themselves from having anything to do with the organization. The Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) said that the situation with respect to such practices would be watched closely and would be under constant review. I am going to be more blunt and firm than becomes a middle bencher and say to people contemplating cut-throat competition: Don't do it. I will give them the very best political, common-sense and economic reason why they should not do it. If the large retail and chain stores have any intention of stepping out of line once the legislation is passed, cutting, slashing prices and taking over small businesses, let them think again. I will tell them why in the most practical way I can, and in a way which I think they should understand.

The druggist in my community and in every other community belongs to my lodge and my luncheon club. I see him regularly. The grocer in my community belongs to the Legion and the community association, and we worship together. The jeweler and electrical dealer sit down with me and play a game of cards, perhaps poker, once a month.

An hon. Member: Canasta.

Mr. Croll: My friend insists it is canasta. The hardware merchant, the clothier and I sometimes fish and play golf together. Some of these people belong to my Liberal organization, attend my meetings and are my supporters. Before starting out on their new adventure, these large organizations should keep in mind that they are just institutions. They are impersonal, cold, aloof and suspect. If they deal unfairly with our friends and our neighbours, we in this house shall see that a proper remedy is applied.

An hon. Member: Why wait for that?

Mr. Croll: We wait for it, because I do not think they will do it. I do not think they are silly enough to try it, but they may. Until such time as the situation arises, I am prepared to go along with this measure. I did attempt to introduce a measure to deal with the loss leader but it was thought that we should not deal with it for the moment in other than this fashion. I am prepared to go along with that. I believe we shall have ample time to deal with the problem, because the house will only be out of session about two months at the most.

What I am saying is that I hope it is clearly understood that if these large predatory interests damage our merchants unfairly, we in this house do not intend to stand by and see our neighbours impoverished. My suggestion to these corporations is to live and let live. They will live longer and be a great deal happier. Let me say another word to these people if they have such thoughts. There comes a time when profits cannot be so important. As a matter of fact, I have never seen an Eaton's statement in my life. I do not think they publish them. Now and then I read a Hudson's Bay statement. If I had stock in the company it would give me a great deal of pleasure—it does anyway—to see the company making progress. Surely, there comes a time when the business reputation of the company is worth far more than the profits that could be obtained through acquiring another store or another outlet. If we find that these predatory interests, these anti-social interests, are attempting to exercise a power which may be unfair under the new act, then we can only come to the conclusion that they are fighting for power. That is the point I want to make. I want to say to them, and I think it can be fairly said on behalf of this side of the house, that no matter how fine their characters, no matter how high their motives, no matter how excellent their ethics, and no matter how air-conditioned their offices or how elegant the appointments of those offices, power which affects the economic health of the people belongs, not in some skyscraper, penthouse or board room, but in this chamber and must be exercised from this chamber. If these people who have these anti-social views want to be labelled public enemy No. 1, they know how they can do so. They are not too popular in this country today. It may be that they will not try to become less popular.

May I say a word to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson)? I have heard some stories, and I do not feel happy about them. They are concerned with the glass and match prosecutions. The government did a good job in prosecuting and fining these combines, but I have reason to believe that the story I have been told is a correct one. It has been said that immediately after being fined the match people raised their prices, as did the glass people; that the raises were uniform and identical, and the consumers of Canada are paying the fine without the loss of a dime to those companies. I believe the penalties under this act are not adequate. There are too many striped-pants directors who ought to be provided with striped coats and a number in addition at government expense. In that way the act could be enforced.

I am not going to say any more, except this. My friends across the way are making a great to-do about the little retailer. One would think that the little retailer was looking to them for friendship, comfort and help. I want to remind them, and I shall remind the little retailer too, that the best days these retailers experienced were the last sixteen years under a Liberal regime. This country grew and grew in those years. As for the Tories, they were in power from 1930 to 1935, and the little retailer knows exactly what happened to him during that period. In everything we have done we have attempted to build up the middle class in this country. We have attempted to tax in such a manner that the middle class has a definite position in the community. We have attempted to make opportunities available to the middle class retailer. In the last sixteen years he has grown by leaps and bounds. There was never any intention, now or at any time in the future, of this government abandoning these retailers who, we think, are the salt of the earth and the backbone of the community. In the past we have given them every opportunity, and we shall continue to protect them in the future. To have my friends opposite come forward as the champions of this class is as phony as the statement they made that they are not really opposed to the bill, but merely want more information about the problem. With all the delaying tactics, the filibustering and obstructionism, I find that the position of the Tory party on this bill may be summed up in these words appearing on page 2110 of Hansard for December 17, 1951:

> . . . I wish to emphasize that we are not taking a strong position either for or against the merits of the price maintenance system as presently practised.

All I am saying to the house is, think what could have happened if they had taken a strong position and told us where they stand on the bill.

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I imagine we have all listened, as I have, with considerable interest to what the member for Spadina (Mr. Croll) has said. I do not understand that the word "demagogue" is an unparliamentary word. I believe it just means a certain type of argument, and I would say that the member for Spadina was in one of his demagogic moods. I should like to take up two or three of the things he said.

First of all, we heard that old phrase which is so familiar. He commended the bill by saying it was in the "best Liberal tradition." I always pass that up because it is one of those phrases people do get used to, and they use it often. I suppose that sometimes it has a meaning to them, but I am not going to waste the time of the house on that. Then, the hon. member put in a plug for the chairman of the committee, and I was interested when he said that the chairman of the committee was handy at "making his rules". I think perhaps he said his own rules. It seems to me that confirms better than any of us could have wished the complaints which have been made about the conduct of the committee. The chairman was handy at making his own rules as he went along. The hon. member also used the word "cajole". I do not press that unduly. I suppose it means to wheedle or persuade people by various means, but falling short of anything improper or false. I might describe it by saying it is an attempt to weave his way through. Perhaps the most interesting part of his speech to me was when he dealt with the matter which obviously embarrassed him a good deal. What I mean is this. We had all the old stuff which is so familiar, in the best manner, about our party —that is, the party to which I belong—being the friend of big business. I think one of the most interesting impostures—and it has not always been unsuccessful—is for the Liberal party in all these years to have held itself out as the big brother of the poor whereas anyone who knew his onions, Mr. Speaker, has known all these years that they were the little brother of the rich, right along. There never was a more barefaced attempt at making the worse appear to be the better reason. But he is embarrassed—

An hon. Member: Quit kidding yourself.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Thank you. I know you are a real help and you say that sincerely. But he was embarrassed, and he was embarrassed by some of his friends. We are often embarrassed by our friends even more than by our enemies. He realizes that this legislation, while it has met the criticism of small business on the whole—I think one might say almost wholly of small business and some substantial amount of bigger and ever bigger business—still there are some of the colossuses, if that is the proper plural, of business which approve of this legislation, and the hon. member for Spadina was a little bit embarrassed by that fact.

An hon. Member: Colossuses?

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I am ready to be corrected as to that plural by any hon.

member competent to do so. As I say, the hon. member was embarrassed by this and he resorted to a technique which interested me greatly. He delivered some remarks which seemed to me to be a kind of cross between a sort of sermon and a threat.

Mr. Diefenbaker: A homily.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Yes, a homily. That is the word. He spent some time on that. He warned them of the dreadful things which would happen if they took advantage of their strong position. He did not say what those dreadful things were; but I suppose when you are in the "best Liberal tradition" you do not have to say those things; you just know that somehow or other they will happen. But he was obviously embarrassed. Then, he got away from vague threats to business and he came to a definite threat to us. He tried to make us shake in our shoes. He tried to reduce us to a kind of dithering state by threatening us with an election. We are going to have an election; that is what he threatened us with.

An hon. Member: You know what happened to you last time.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I am interested in that remark, coming as it does from an hon. member who, I think, knows a good deal about elections. I am sure we feel that it is not a matter which should be wholly neglected. But at any rate he held that threat out to us and we were supposed to be duly terrified by it. I am reminded that perhaps we should not be as worried as he thinks we ought to be because in the last year we have had a good deal of indication that the electors are not entirely averse to us or to the things which in our small way we have tried to stand for.

I have referred to the remarks of the hon. member for Spadina. I do not think he would want me to say any more about them, and I do not intend to do so. I would have been embarrassed in speaking at all today if it had not been for what the Prime Minister said this morning. On Thursday last I had an idea that the Prime Minister, when he mentioned that word "closure", had reached the stage which apparently the hon. member for Spadina has now reached. The hon. member for Spadina told us that we were guilty of filibuster and obstruction and all kinds of terrible things. I was interested to note what the Prime Minister said this morning. I suppose the Prime Minister still speaks for his party when he stands up. It appears that he does. Therefore, on the whole, I am prepared to accept what the Prime Minister says in preference to what the hon. member for Spadina says. What the Prime Minister said this morning was to the effect that the discussion on Friday had been fruitful; I think that is what he said. I felt pleased about that remark, because I contributed my own half pint to that discussion. When the Prime Minister spoke well of it and said that it had been fruitful, I felt encouraged. I must point out, however, that even the Prime Minister is not wholly free from inconsistency because it would look as if we were not reasonable on Wednesday or Thursday but that on Friday we became reasonable. It would appear that on Thursday when the Prime Minister spoke about closure, he must have felt that we were perhaps not being wholly reasonable; because as you will recall, Mr. Speaker, this morning he used this phrase "reasonable human beings under normal conditions", and when he used that phrase I thought the implication or the innuendo was that there was danger that we might not qualify for that description; in other words, that we were becoming unreasonable and that we were not under normal conditions. I was therefore glad when the Prime Minister came out flatfootedly and said that the debate had been useful. So for my own purpose—and the hon. member for Spadina will perhaps forgive me—I am going to dismiss what he said about obstruction and filibuster as just a lot of—I do not want to use a rough word, so I will just call it—hooey, and I hope he will not mind.

I am going to ask a question which has been asked here many times. It is this. Why are we here today? Some people will say: We are here because you in the opposition have been unreasonable and you brought us here.

Some hon. Members: Quite true.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I accept that view from those who express it, making the necessary qualification for the source from which it comes. But, speaking for myself, I want to say that I think we are here in a real sense to protect the rights of the minority. I think it is perfectly clear that whatever else we have or have not done, we have done a bit of a job on that score; because it is perfectly clear that the attitude towards closure today is entirely different from what it was a week ago today. I suppose that change is partly because of the Christmas spirit; as the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe) has said, partly because the Prime Minister, like the rest of us, has been at home and the world perhaps looks a little bit different after Christmas. However that may be, closure was certainly threatened last Thursday, and we had every right to govern ourselves accordingly. I can only repeat that I am glad of what the Prime Minister said about the debate on Friday.

A good deal has been said about urgency. I think it is relevant, and I want to say a word or two about it, because we are not here for fun. None of us wanted to come back here today. The only reasons that could possibly bring us here would be if there was urgency. I listened with care to the Prime Minister when he spoke this morning—I am sorry I have not had the chance to read his speech since then—but I do not think he made much of a case for urgency. It seems to me that he could not make much of a case for urgency when all that he could find to say about this measure which we are here to pass was that he thought it might do a bit of good; and if it was able to do any good, we ought to have it. I am not so sure that I would not agree with that remark up to a point and before I sit down I want to try to say something on that score. I hope at any rate I will make people believe that I am sincere when I say that if anyone were able to make me believe that this bill would bring down the cost of living, I would vote for it and advocate it. But as I say—and I shall try to say a little bit more about this in a minute—nothing that happened in that committee provides any evidence to that end. As a matter of fact, while the committee was not allowed to have enough evidence as distinct from opinion in order to reach a conclusion on anything, I would say that the balance of evidence was in favour of the argument that resale price maintenance actually kept costs down. Let me say this in passing because really there is a suggestion—I am sorry to say the Prime Minister used the word this morning—of wrongdoing. I will come to that matter a little bit later on. We are getting very near the stage, as the hon. member for St. James (Mr. Beaudry) pointed out the other night, where we are arraigning, we are putting in the dock —some of us are—a whole group of people, and really charging them with being a lot of profiteers, without a word of evidence. I will come back to that a little later too.

On this question of urgency I want to read a word or two. I read it the other day, but I want to bring it back here today because it is relevant and it is important, and it has never been answered. These are the words of Senator Lambert, in which he said in effect that the committee was not being allowed to do what it was set up to do. I will read his own words so there will be no danger of a wrong paraphrase. At page 248 he said:

> I do not suggest that this committee should undertake as wide and as detailed an inquiry as the Curtis commission did, but I do submit that the MacQuarrie report does not begin to approach, and I do not think their investigation has begun to approach, from the public point of view, and from the point of view of a democratic interest in this whole subject, the work that was done by the Curtis commission. The MacQuarrie report is a very well stated summary; someone has compared it to an obiter dictum of the supreme court on arguments, and I think that is what it is. There is not a word of evidence given in it. There is a summary of arguments, pro and con, on this subject, but, to my way of thinking, it is something that invites me, as a member of parliament, to reflect back to the people of this country public opinion, to which I am responsible, some degree of evidence to support the conclusions of the MacQuarrie report.

Here we are, Mr. Speaker, being asked to act without evidence, as the hon. senator says, who was once a high official in the Liberal party, and who is respected quite apart from that—I will not say in spite of that—and his statement has not been answered, and I submit it cannot be answered successfully. Yet, the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Croll) says that we are guilty of obstruction because we say: Let us have the evidence. We are going to create a crime; we are going to establish a new crime, which is going to turn a lot of people into criminals unless they alter their way of doing business. We are doing that without having the evidence. How a great lawyer like the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) can reconcile that with his background, I do not know.

What is the urgency? There has been no real suggestion of urgency. The only urgency which we all feel—and I imagine it is not confined to our side of the house, though it is only on this side of the house that it will be expressed—the real urgency is the need of the government to meet the indignation and rising disturbance of mind about the high cost of living. The government is terribly anxious to do something, or to look like doing something, and of course they will be clever in making it appear they have done something. No one denies their cleverness. Indeed they will be clever at making it look as if it is going to be of great help to the consumer; and if—as we all hope and expect, or at any rate all hope—there is a little let-down in prices, why of course we will have the propaganda machine up and down the country saying that this is what did it. Whether anyone believes it or not, that is another matter.

Let us look for a little while at the merits of this measure. It was first of all put forward as a measure against inflation; but I submit that that has been practically forgotten. The Prime Minister again stated his view on that this morning, and I shall not take the time of the house to go over it. But, as the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe) has already said, no one could describe it as warmer than lukewarm. The Prime Minister was very frank and fair in what he said—I mean as to the great merits, to put it mildly, of any expectation he had. Indeed, he went further than that and he practically said: We do not know what will happen; we will try, and hope for the best.

What about the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson)? I have gone through the minister's speech. I will not pretend I read every word because it was a long speech, but I have not been able to find in there any serious argument in favour of this bill as an anti-inflation measure. I hesitate to say there is no reference to it, but I have found practically nothing. Certainly, there is no serious attempt to make the suggestion that this is going to affect the cost of living, which is what it was set up for. There will of course be every effort to try to put that across to the people.

Now, what about the merits of this thing? We have to get away from the inflation side and we have to regard it purely on its merits as a reform which is to be brought into the conduct of business. We are in a rather unusual position here. I hope I shall not be saying anything improper because the Prime Minister after all has spoken on this. I hope I will not be saying anything improper if I say that I think that much the most effective speeches made outside the ranks of this party in opposing this measure were made by the hon. member for St. James and the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Gibson). Now, I would be ready to take a chance if, for example, this matter had to be referred let us say to the supreme court—I would be almost prepared to take a chance on letting it go on the speeches pro and con made within the four corners of the Liberal party. When I say "the four corners of the Liberal party" I am including the hon. member for Comox-Alberni within them for the moment. Perhaps I do him an injustice, but at any rate I think I have made my point clear.

I come to the Prime Minister because he used one or two phrases this morning that astonished me. They would have astonished me in any event, but they astonished me as coming from a great lawyer accustomed to weighing his words and accustomed to the accurate use of language. He said something like this. He referred to "recognized practices which should be under restraint". I think these were the words: "recognized practices which should be under restraint." I ask, what evidence is there of that? Let us look at the people who have taken a part in this. First of all I want to look at what one might call the principle of the thing, and I am going to read again briefly from what was said by Mr. Justice Brandeis, because he was a great judge, who looked at this thing from the point of view not only of common sense but of law.

As I hear some of the things that are said I wonder whether the people are bearing in mind, when they use these critical words, that they are speaking about practices which have been legal and valid and regarded as not only legal but morally right. I wonder whether they are bearing in mind that they are speaking of practices which have the sanction of law, the specific sanction of statute law, in 45 out of the 48 states. I wonder whether they are bearing in mind that there is a report, and a very able report, from Britain, a report of the committee on resale price maintenance. Again, without reading at length from it I do want to read one or two things, because I say you would have thought that the consumer was the subject of a virtual conspiracy; that he was being rooked right and left; that this was clear and recognized, and that the only thing that remained to be done was to right a great wrong. Let me read briefly, Mr. Speaker, from this report composed by able men after long investigation. I shall read from page 4. They say:

> The representatives—

I read this particularly because no one who is entitled to be out of an asylum would hesitate for one minute to vote for this if he believed it was going to have a major effect on the cost of living, if he believed it was going to right wrongs which are clearly evident. Therefore it is wise to remind ourselves that it is not merely the retailers, not merely the people who are making their living by selling, who are interested in this thing. The consumers have spoken out in no uncertain way. Let me read this from page 4, section 19:

> The representatives of the various women's organizations who gave evidence before us were without exception strongly in favour of branding.

"Without exception". Does that sound as if the consumers were having a gigantic fraud or a gigantic piracy practised against them? Then I go on:

> They found it convenient when shopping not to have to examine everything they bought in order to assess its quality; they had found that the containers in which branded goods are normally sold helped to keep the article in a satisfactory condition.

I could read at length from this report showing similar opinions. As I said the other day, even Mr. Henry Smith, who puts in a strong reservation, nevertheless goes along with this report which says:

> We recommend that no action should be taken which would deprive an individual producer of the power to prescribe and enforce resale prices for goods bearing his brand.

I wish to read briefly, as I said a moment ago, from page 2199 of Hansard, where I quoted Brandeis in the book called "The Brandeis Guide to the Modern World". At page 213 of that book he says:

> I think it is important that we should develop the right of producers of trademarked articles, growers as well as manufacturers, to establish by contract the price at which their products shall be sold.

And then on the same page:

> The right to fix the retail selling price is not an injury but an aid to business, so far as the particular branch of business is competitive. The cry against retail price fixing is based uopn a misconception.

There is a statement of one of the ablest and most broad-minded leaders of American legal and social thought in the last quarter century. No one will deny that.

I now come to the railwaymen. I was amazed that this morning the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) appeared to include the Trades and Labour Congress as in favour of this measure. I wish therefore to read from the evidence of Mr. Bengough who, I presume, speaks for the Trades and Labour Congress, and who was anything but sold on this. Mr. Bengough is a man who looks at things in a judgmatical way, and who tries to arrive at a conclusion after, not before, he knows the facts. That is what we are being asked to do today, and I think it is desirable that we should remember that. We are being asked to create a new crime without having evidence, to create a set of potential criminals without having evidence.

Here is what Mr. Wismer said, in reply to questioning by the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming):

> Q. May I ask Mr. Wismer if he feels that this so-called practice of price maintenance is a detriment to or perhaps in harmony with public interest?
> A. I think we can say this, in so far as the deal is made privately and enforced privately we would have to say No, but where it is a general practice I think we would have to have a lot more information.

Well, does this support this legislation? Does that sound as if the Trades and Labour Congress were supporting this legislation? They have the sense to stop, look and listen. They have the sense to say, "Let us have the facts from sound, hard-headed businessmen." Labour men approach this matter in what I think is the proper manner, whereas some skilled legislators do not.

Then I should like to read from the questioning of Mr. Bengough by the hon. member for Eglinton, as follows:

> You will recall it purports to propose blanket prohibition on resale prices. Would you think that is a proper and desirable way of going about this matter, that we have blanket prohibition, or if we are going to have legislation on it should it be left to determine whether in the particular case the particular type of agreement is in the given circumstances harmful to the public interest or not?

Mr. Bengough answered, first of all, "It would have to be flexible." Then the hon. member for Eglinton said, "You wouldn't favour a general prohibition," and Mr. Bengough's answer was "No".

So much for Mr. Bengough. Let us see what the hon. member for St. James (Mr. Beaudry) says. The hon. member made a fairly stiff attack on the government. He has something to say too. I must say the hon. member is an interesting study. He made an able speech. One might say that he has a good drive but very little follow through. He announced that he was going to vote with his party, although he was not in favour of the legislation. Well, I suppose one must admire the iron-clad discipline, the Prussian discipline, this indicates. I suppose it has its advantages. But it would be such a relief, such excitement, if one of the hon. members on the other side of the house would not only express his views but act upon them. However, I am not the keeper of the conscience of the hon. member for St. James, and perhaps he would not want me to be.

Mr. Fournier (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): You can be sure of that.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): You speak as an expert, I am sure. At any rate, let me speak for myself. I will not undertake to be the keeper of his conscience.

He has a feeling for the businessmen, because his constituency is full of them. He says:

> Those of our colleagues, trades-people, merchants, druggists, whom we had at first accepted as sound people and men well regarded in their communities since they seem to command the respect of the majority, which as the minister himself pointed out yesterday still rules—these colleagues, sir, upon my return regained some of their temporarily lost stature.

The hon. member spoke in a slightly allegorical vein. Nevertheless he makes clear his conviction that he does not think much of the idea. Then he goes on to say:

> Clad as they had been in the land of make-believe in what to the fastidious were the somewhat repulsive and repellent tatters of Simon Legree and his French counterpart, Harpagon . . .

And then he goes on to say:

> May I tell you, sir, that it was most gratifying upon my return to solid ground to be able to conclude that they were more than fully entitled to the original respect and tribute which has been paid each of them in his community.

As I said a moment ago, and I now repeat, in this legislation there is a proposal to create new crimes. As I indicated, no less a person than Senator Lambert said that this conclusion was reached without evidence. I wish to add a word to stress what I said a moment ago about the fact that this practice of branded goods has been accepted by enabling legislation in forty-five out of the forty-eight states. The hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Hees) pointed that out most effectively the other day. There seemed to be the suggestion that the law which prevails in forty-five of the forty-eight states had been imposed upon the people while they were not looking, that it was not democratic and that, somehow or another, it was not what they wanted.

Indeed, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar made some rather satirical references to the way in which American legislatures and governors are sometimes elected. However that may be, if the fact was that perhaps three out of the forty-eight states had passed this legislation that argument might have some weight. But when forty-five out of the forty-eight states have passed this legislation, when it is practically unanimous, it is pretty hard to believe that in a considerable number of those forty-five states these fair trade laws do not represent what the people want, what they approve of and what they have found to be to their advantage.

As I said a moment ago, I think there is only one thing which could have justified dragging us back here and passing this legislation under the myth or the plea that it is a matter of urgency; that is evidence which would indicate, I say "evidence" advisedly, that it was going to perform—I will not say miracles because, heaven knows, the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) did not suggest miracles—but that it was going to be effective.

Anyone who will read this mass of evidence must agree that not only is there no adequate evidence to support the view on which this bill is based, but that actually the balance of evidence which was allowed to come before the committee indicated quite the contrary, that the passing of the legislation would in all probability cause injury. I am not going to use alarmist figures about thousands and tens of thousands of retailers being destroyed, because I do not think it is necessary to do that in order to maintain the argument; but no serious person in this house can doubt that there are tens of thousands of these people who feel that they are going to be injured. Anyone looking at the situation and reading such evidence as has been given knows that there will be a set-up for price-cutting. Whether it is fair to say that the government wants to precipitate that, I do not know.

No one doubts that a day is coming when prices will tend to go downward. One of the things I object to most strongly is something which has been said before in this house. I indicated the other day that no less a person than the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) seemed to picture the manufacturers as sitting in their ivory towers setting prices which the consumer had to accept. It is not merely a classroom statement, it is not merely a statement by economists, to say that in a very real sense it is the consumer who fixes the price. Anyone who knows business knows that manufacturers do not fix prices and then go off and forget about them for months. They are studying the market from day to day. They know that if the price is at level A they will sell so much. They know that if they can bring it down a little they will sell more. Of course it is in their interest, it is only common sense to be constantly trying to find a price at which they can sell the most. Is not that in the interests of the consumer? They would not live if they were not trying to serve the interests of the consumer. I am not suggesting that they do that in a sentimental or altruistic frame of mind; it is simply hard-headed common-sense business.

We are all consumers. We are all interested in prices. I do not suppose anyone imagines that when you cross this gangway the interest of the consumer is any less on this side than it is on the other. All we are asking is that we proceed with this thing in an orderly manner. We know from our own experience that it is not just a lot of theory when you talk about ruthless and destructive competition. It is within the memory of many people when the Standard Oil Company was considered to be a monopoly which had knocked out many smaller people. As a matter of fact, going back to the fears of the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Croll), despite all his great threats, despite all his assurances that we on this side of the house were unfortunate in not being able to keep in touch with public opinion, he did seem to be a little worried because he knew how things were going. He knew there will be this loss-leader business, that there will be attempts made by the huge distributors to impose their own brands. It will not be only the small business people who will suffer; it will be people of considerable size as well as what is ordinarily called the little people.

I shall pause here to sum up what I have said. We are asked to pass this legislation, I was going to say under pressure but the sense of applying pressure does not seem to be so strong today. It is true the hon. member for Spadina has used some rough words which the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier) would never use, but on the other hand the Prime Minister was much softer this morning and it may be that we are not going to have closure applied.

I want to say what I said in the beginning, that I believe we in the opposition have a duty to perform. I am sure there have been many cases where oppositions have held out and the public has had time to learn. The hon. member for Spadina is ready to certify to us that the public is learning and that that is going to be injurious to us. We will have to take that chance. So far as the opposition is concerned we have a duty to perform, and I hope we will not be terrified by the hon. member for Spadina or by any other person, more or less formidable.

I should just like to repeat what I said before, that no real evidence has been given to us of any reason why this matter cannot be left over and the evidence obtained which Senator Lambert said had been denied, and which no single man would say was not necessary before legislation of this kind could be passed. There has not been a scintilla of a reason given as to why that cannot happen.

Secondly, there is no evidence, and I mean no evidence on balance, that this law will bring down prices. The balance of evidence is that it will tend to raise prices. To ask us to agree that this measure shall be passed when there are so many reasons against it, and when none as yet has been given for it that can bear the slightest examination, is something that should not be done. I consider that we are merely doing our plain duty in asking delay in this legislation. Important as it may be, it is not of such importance that it should be hurried through. No one can suggest that anyone is going to be injured if it is left for two, three or four weeks until we meet again. On the other hand there is every reason to believe that if it is hurried through it will injure large numbers of our fellow citizens who have never had a proper chance to state their case before the committee.

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, it was not my privilege to be here last week, by reason of a prior engagement which made it necessary for me to be absent. However, I had made myself clear with reference to this legislation when speaking in the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne. At that time I took a stand in opposition to it, and that stand has not been altered as a result of the evidence taken before the committee or by anything that has been said in this house, all of which I have read.

The reason I took the stand I did was that, in my opinion, this measure in its present form could not but be injurious to the consumer, although possibly of temporary benefit for a matter of a month or two until such time as small business found itself under the domination of big competing business. This legislation contains no defence against loss leaders, and it should. I think the stand taken by the opposition will end once and for all in this country the iniquitous practice of the government putting off contentious business to the end of the session so that, with the desire of hon. members to conclude the session, legislation however harmful can be forced through. We had an example of that last year in the dairy products act which was passed in the dying days of the session. It was condemned by every outstanding farm magazine in Canada as a dangerous piece of legislation, and the opposition received condemnation for not giving it the meticulous examination that all legislation should receive.

I was very interested to hear the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) today. Gone was the attitude of a few days ago, an attitude quite out of keeping with what one might have expected from the Prime Minister. At that time he threatened. Parliament consists of more than the government, even though at the moment it has allies in other parts of the house. Members of the House of Commons have a responsibility. The Prime Minister, without any justification whatsoever, made the threat that closure would be applied.

Mr. Fulford: He was dared to do it by the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming).

Mr. Diefenbaker: My hon. friend by that interruption indicates how easy it is to provoke the Prime Minister, if one member can arouse him to the point where he would deny free speech in parliament. I do not want to say any more about that, but one should never allow himself to become annoyed and in a moment of pique and annoyance make threats which strategic retreats afterward can never cover up. These are the words he used in the debate on December 20.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. May I say to the hon. member it has already been decided that discussion of the matter of closure is out of order.

Mr. Diefenbaker: To discuss the question of a decision made by the government is out of order in the debate? Surely, with the greatest deference, Mr. Speaker, you are not ruling that not only are we to be threatened with being shut up but we are also to be shut up now by the Speaker so far as referring to such a matter is concerned.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I did not make the decision. It was made by the Speaker.

Mr. Gardiner: Closure is a Tory measure anyway.

Mr. Hellyer: One should never allow himself to be frustrated.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I wish my hon. friend would make his contribution in this debate and voice the views of the people of his constituency rather than interrupt. I was referring to what the Prime Minister said, and I certainly know of no ruling that one could not refer to the closure that was threatened the other day. The Prime Minister said, "I do not intend"—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The decision was it could not be discussed on the amendment.

Mr. Fraser: This is not the amendment.

An hon. Member: Sure it is.

Mr. Drew: May I ask for the reference to any ruling of that nature?

Mr. Ross (Souris): Where was the ruling?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Does Your Honour rule—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The ruling was made by the Speaker himself. I will consult Hansard on the point.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I will not say more if you so rule, but I must say I would have to appeal against a ruling that I cannot discuss in the House of Commons the actions of the Prime Minister who tries to muzzle the opposition by a threat, even if it does not succeed.

Mr. Fournier (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): If he had tried it would have been done, you know.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It would be in order on the motion for closure, but there is no motion for closure before the house.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I bow to your ruling. I want to say to my hon. friend who interrupted me a moment ago and said that if they had wanted to do it, it would have been done—

Mr. Langlois (Gaspe): The Tories did it three times.

Mr. Diefenbaker: —that such a remark is not in keeping with my hon. friend's usual debonair attitude in parliament.

Mr. Gardiner: The only reason it could be done is because the Conservatives put it on the statute books.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Does Your Honour rule I cannot discuss the words of the Prime Minister in the house on December 20 as found at page 2254 of Hansard?

Mr. Hodgson: It was referred to again this morning.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The Prime Minister of course made reference to it this morning. If Your Honour so rules, ordinarily I would feel like appealing—

Mr. Coldwell: May I rise and say I have always understood that what is said in a debate may be commented upon by a subsequent speaker. I think a ruling to any other effect would be wrong and would certainly create a precedent which I think would be equally wrong. That is my understanding of the manner in which debate is carried on.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I was not in the house this morning. If reference was made to it by the Prime Minister the hon. member may answer.

Mr. Diefenbaker: We have been at cross purposes, Mr. Speaker. Before the Prime Minister came in just now, I was mentioning that on Thursday, December 20, he made a very definite statement, and I should like to refer to it because after all the debate had gone on then for a matter of only two or three days. The Prime Minister used these words which were definite, left no qualification and were subject to no possible misinterpretation. He said:

> I do not intend to debate this motion—

He was referring to the motion of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles).

> —but I do intend when the house is in session tomorrow, if the business has not been concluded, to give notice under the closure rule that it will be applied on Thursday, December 27. As to this motion, I have no views about it. It is a matter which the house should decide on a free vote according to the views of each individual member.

That was a threat.

Mr. St. Laurent: If my hon. friend will permit me, I do not think he was in the house last Thursday. My remarks followed a remark by the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) that the motion which had been submitted not to adjourn at ten o'clock constituted an indirect closure, and that if there had to be closure the government should take the responsibility for sponsoring it. I was saying that I was not expressing any views on that motion but that if debate continued on Thursday and Friday in the terms in which it had been carried on up to that time, I would consider giving notice that closure would be imposed. Next morning the atmosphere had somewhat cleared. I said then that there had not been an opportunity for debate on this measure on Thursday and I would not, therefore, do as I had intimated the day before and give notice on Friday for closure today. It was not intended as a threat. It was intended as a response to the challenge—I believe the word "challenge" was used by the member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming)—that if there was to be closure it should not be by any indirect method but by the method provided for in the rules.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That adds confusion to the confusion already existing. I read the Prime Minister's words, and I know that he may have been piqued—

Mr. Gardiner: On a point of order, the hon. member would be quoting from a previous debate which was already decided. He is not quoting from this debate at all.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: That debate was on the motion for adjournment, and not on the present measure.

Mr. St. Laurent: If you will allow me, I think it is probably of advantage to everyone that this point be cleared up, and that the events as they occurred be correctly stated. Had the hon. member been here he would appreciate what the atmosphere was at that time and the difference in the atmosphere the next morning, as well as what I hope is the difference in the atmosphere today.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I welcome the opportunity of having the matter cleared up. But I would say that playing fast and loose with the rights of the opposition should not depend upon the atmosphere of the house. That is a very dangerous method of determining what should be done. What the Prime Minister said is as definite as can be. It is a dangerous thing to apply closure. The threat of closure—and that was the threat—would deny discussion by the opposition, particularly after the legislation was brought forward in the dying days of the session, apparently in an endeavour to push it through before the Christmas recess. I hope that out of what has taken place in recent days will come an end to the practice of legislation important to the welfare of millions of consumers in the country being introduced in the last days of the session, apparently in a desire to force it through regardless of any representations that might be made against it if time and opportunity were given.

I was not a member of the committee, but I have had representations made as to unfairness shown to various organizations in this country. I refer to the retail merchants of Saskatchewan, the largest organization of retail merchants in the Dominion of Canada, and allied with no other organization. The 2,400 members of this organization sent in a brief and requested the privilege of explaining it before the committee. The chairman denied them that opportunity upon the excuse that another organization had spoken for them. I find strong opposition to the manner in which the committee was conducted. Apparently it was conducted upon the basis that only the evidence of those who might be considered favourable toward the legislation would be heard, and those who would present any evidence to the contrary were denied the full opportunity of doing so.

I listened with a great deal of interest today to the words of the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Croll). The hon. member, who has a knowledge of business and a full realization of the dangers of this legislation, asked the committee to accept an amendment that would put a stop to loss leaders. He pointed out from the experience of the past the danger of loss leaders. To begin with they may be beneficial to the consumer, but later become detrimental to the consumer as well as the small businessman. The amendment moved by the hon. member for Spadina was turned down. Had it been accepted it would have gone a long way toward removing many of the objections taken to this legislation. Today the hon. member expressed the hope that if things turn out badly under this legislation, at the next session the government will take action. Was there any reason for the rush, the unseemly haste in connection with this legislation? If the conditions referred to by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) are in fact true, why has this government waited for sixteen years to remedy them? If conditions are as described by my hon. friends opposite, why the unseemly haste in endeavouring to cram this legislation through in the last days of the session? No one has explained that as yet.

I took the trouble to read the judgments of the United States supreme court on the subject, and in particular the judgments of one of the most anti-trust jurists the United States ever produced, one of the great philosophers on the United States supreme court, the late Mr. Justice Brandeis. He referred to this practice in these words:

The Sherman law—

That is the law against trusts.

—seeks to protect men in the right freely to compete and to prevent practices which must result in suppressing competition. It seeks to preserve to the individual both the opportunity and the incentive to create. It seeks to encourage the individual effort. The right of an individual manufacturer in a competitive business to market his goods in his own way, by fixing, if he desires, the selling price to the consumer—is in entire harmony with the underlying principle of the Sherman law.

Then Mr. Justice Brandeis said this in another judgment:

Americans should be under no illusions as to the values or effect of price cutting. It has been the most potent weapon of monopoly—a means of killing the small rival to which the great trusts have resorted most frequently. It is so simple, so effective. Farseeing organized capital secures by this means the co-operation of the shortsighted unorganized consumer to his own undoing. Thoughtless or weak, he yields to the temptation of trifling immediate gain, and, selling his birthright for a mess of pottage, becomes himself an instrument of monopoly.

Over and over again, Mr. Justice Brandeis dealt with that phase, the need to protect the consumer against the rapacity of these great businesses that, in their desire to destroy competition, resort to price cutting through loss leaders. Having resorted to price cutting and thereby eliminated competition, they then restore the prices—

Mr. Coldwell: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Yes.

Mr. Coldwell: Could he give us the dates of those judgments?

Mr. Diefenbaker: 1926.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Diefenbaker: My hon. friends will find that judgment quoted with approval in 1949 and 1950. When the matter of fair trade practices came before the United States supreme court in 1951 the principles in that judgment were accepted by that court as the epitome of good business practice to preserve private enterprise while assuring protection of the consumer. Price cutting by loss leaders shamelessly hoodwinks the consumer. Price jugglers, to use the expression of my hon. friend, the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Croll), utilize this means to destroy competition. Then prices will go down, somebody will say: Is there not an immediate advantage? There is. The consumer sees the price come down on that particular commodity, but there is one thing he does not realize, and that is that when the price goes down and a loss is sustained by big business, when the competitors are wiped out or competition is reduced, the price goes up in order to make up for the loss sustained through the loss leader.

My hon. friend made that fact very clear this afternoon, and I thought he made an admirable speech until, realizing how emasculated this legislation will be without something to control loss leaders, he made an appeal to business or rather that segment of it that is unfair and dishonest, that seems to regard excessive profits as just and fair. Then in effect, he said: I call upon you, I ask you, I implore you, do not take advantage; because if you do the Minister of Justice will call on parliament to punish you, and punishment will come some time. Mr. Speaker, if punishment comes at that time in the future that it came to the great milling companies in this country, those rapacious, predatory interests to which the hon. member for Spadina referred may sleep without fear. This legislation may cut prices on individual commodities—and no one will argue that—for a short time. But nowhere has evidence ever been given—and I read the evidence given in the United States and in Great Britain—that when loss leaders are used, it is not the consumer who ultimately pays. The loss leader has achieved the purpose for which it is intended when it attracts the consumer into the business and, being brought in, the dishonest business can take from him prices unjust and unfair in other commodities.

I took the trouble to ascertain whether or not there had been a jump in the prices of fair-traded drug products in the United States. We have no statistics in Canada. Nothing but surmise, suspicion, and sometimes sentiment appears in the evidence given in this regard in the committee. The United States bureau of labour statistics has found that the prices of products in the United States jumped, from the year 1939, an average of 87 per cent; that is, the commodities sold in those businesses that deal in part in commodities the prices of which are controlled, while prices on fair-traded drug products rose only by 10·5 per cent during the same period. There is no evidence to the contrary in this country. The committee sat; it heard evidence. But when there was evidence to be heard such as that which the retail merchants of Saskatchewan, 2,400 strong, wanted to place before that committee by word of mouth in addition to the written brief, they were denied the opportunity to present it. The hon. member for Spadina stated that the cost of living had gone up during the last available month by ·8 per cent. The cost of living index of our country has been challenged as not properly setting forth the actual cost of living because it does not include the impact of taxation, a most important matter in determining the cost of living. Yet, without taking taxes into consideration, that increase of ·8 per cent meant a loss of $48 million a year in real earnings to the wage and salary workers of Canada during that month. What the opposition has been trying to do in this debate has been to take a stand on behalf of the consumers of Canada in the long run rather than to have in mind the advantage to the government in the short run. Law is just as strong as the degree to which it is enforced. When I read these speeches by the Minister of Justice in which, as a St. George, he goes forth to slay the dragon of unjust monopoly, I feel that the dragon of big business is in the same danger as was the dragon in the past. Danger? What about the combines reports of 1946?

An hon. Member: They are hidden.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. McGregor made the reports. What about the international combines in glass, tools, electrical elements and radio tubes? Have there been any prosecutions? Until 1948 there could not be any prosecutions without the consent of the Attorney General of Canada or of the attorneys general of the provinces. In 1948 I moved an amendment that permitted any individual to take prosecutions. Radios brought into Canada, according to one of the reports, were written up 113 per cent by agreement. The hon. member for Spadina mentioned the prosecutions of the glass combine; and I am glad to have his support for a proposition I advanced some weeks ago, to the effect that the maximum penalty of $25,000 is as nothing compared with the amount that can be secured illicitly by breaking the law. The hon. member made a statement today that will challenge the ingenuity of the Minister of Justice, when he pointed out that two combines that had been fined immediately thereafter raised their prices uniformly, the significance of his statement being that the fine would ultimately be paid by the people of Canada. What a record is the annual report of 1950-51! I would commend this report to you, Mr. Speaker. It is dated July 30, 1951. As the custodian of justice the minister has the power to set the judicial machinery in motion and proceed against illegal combines. Did he himself do so during the year? The answer is given on pages 2 and 3 of this report:

> No investigations were commenced as a result of ministerial direction or formal application during the past year.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

Here is the record:

> Number of directions from the minister for inquiries—0.

Yet they tell us now, Mr. Speaker, that under price maintenance the people are being and have been gouged. The government contends that there is no need of any further legislation to meet the problem of loss leaders; the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) pointed out what had been said by the late Colonel Ralston and the present Chief Justice Ilsley regarding the section of the Criminal Code that is stated to be sufficient for that purpose. If the law is there and injustice has been done, as my hon. friends on the side of the government would have us believe, why have there been no prosecutions since 1936 under the section that they contend will preserve and protect the Canadian people against loss leader practices?

The report continues: "How many formal applications were there for inquiries? None." The number of formal investigations in process at the end of the year 1950-51 was three and not one was started between January 1, 1950 and March 31, 1951, while the present minister has been in charge of the machinery. Those three had been commenced before he became minister.

Mr. Rowe: No wonder there is a Christmas rush.

Mr. Diefenbaker: They talk of enforcing the law. Is the enforcement going to be increased? Is the will to enforce the law going to be stronger? I must be fair, though. The report continues:

> Number of informal complaints or inquiries of the nature of complaints received and examined, 70.

When my hon. friend the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) spoke on the radio in stentorian tones he pointed out how the department had proceeded to investigate seventy of them. Let us see how they did it. I turn to page 2 of the report which deals with informal complaints, and I read:

> A considerable number of informal complaints and inquiries were received in the course of the fiscal year 1950-51 as in other fiscal years. Some of these complaints were based upon misapprehension as to the provisions of the act,—

They do not tell how many were under a misapprehension. I continue:

> —as for example the complaint of the type that a certain manufacturer, not occupying a monopoly position, was, as a matter of independent and individual policy, confining his distribution to a number of selected outlets in each district and, incidentally to such policy, refusing to extend wholesalers' prices to the complainant. A complaint of this nature is ordinarily disposed of by an exchange of letters with the complainant.

Letters exchanged with the complainant are no great deterrent to the commission of wrongdoing, Mr. Speaker. I continue to read from the report.

Another class of complaint alleges a situation to which, if it existed, the act would apply, but fails to disclose sufficient facts to raise even a reasonable suspicion.

These are those included in the seventy cases that were investigated. I continue:

Other complaints are sufficiently precise to put the commission upon inquiry, in which case the matter is carried to a stage where it is apparent that further inquiry is unwarranted, whereupon it is discontinued, or else it develops into a formal investigation.

There were no formal investigations in the fifteen months between January 1, 1950 and March 31, 1951, under the present Minister of Justice. Now, sir, if the wrongs that we hear of in price fixing have been so continuous and continuing and are the result of monopoly agreement and arrangements, why is it that during a period of fifteen months, while the cost of living continued to rise, the Minister of Justice and the government of this country never proceeded with one new investigation?

The hon. member for Coast-Capilano (Mr. Sinclair) said that I referred to Mr. McGregor as the man who could give evidence; and I did. I suggested that Mr. McGregor be brought before the committee in order to advise what general changes should take place, and what alterations should be made in the combines act. I asked that the act be revamped; for certainly as it now stands it offers no protection against those who would take advantage of the public. A fine of $10,000 or $25,000 is a drop in the bucket compared with the millions that may be made, and apparently have been made, by certain combines according to the combines reports. I asked that the act be revamped; I asked that Mr. McGregor be brought before the committee for the purpose of explaining why the act had not been enforced, and also for the purpose of replying to a statement of my hon. friend the Minister of Justice who, when speaking in Vancouver regarding Mr. McGregor, said in effect that he did not understand some things connected with the flour milling industry. If he had understood these things he would not have reported as he did, and would not have resigned.

Did Mr. McGregor get an opportunity before the committee to make recommendations regarding a complete revamping of the act? Did Mr. McGregor have an opportunity to tell his story as to why he had to resign, because he received no support whatsoever from the government in the enforcement of the law against the flour milling industry? No; Mr. McGregor was brought in for one purpose, to deal with retail price maintenance. He had to admit that unless something was done to meet the question of loss leaders the legislation being introduced would be almost ineffectual, or certainly far from as effectual as it should be. Therefore I asked myself, why is it that this government does not bring in legislation to stop loss leader practices that have been proven so dangerous? Why is small business in this country to be placed in a position of jeopardy? Why is the consumer going to be placed in a position where, while enjoying a temporary advantage in prices, once competition has been removed he will ultimately be required to pay more for other products as well as the product upon which the cut is taking place? Again I make this suggestion, that we in this house redraft the combines act and make it an instrument to preserve the consumer from exploitation, while assuring to business a fair and reasonable profit. The profit line has become the danger line, the strife line. It is time some people in our country realize that unless there is a profit in business there cannot be wages for labour, nor fair prices to the primary producer. Fair and reasonable prices which ensure a fair and proper return in profits and permit an available reserve being plowed back into business in order to assure further jobs are the foundation of economic prosperity.

To sum up, in my opinion the effect of this legislation will be: First, in our desire to protect consumers we will in fact ultimately be harming them unless legislation is brought in to meet the loss-leader problem. Second, I think of many products that are the same price in Ottawa as in Saskatoon and Vancouver. That will end, under this legislation. We on the prairies and the people in the maritime provinces, who now have the advantage of having the same prices on these commodities as do the people in Ontario and Quebec, will find ourselves penalized by the discriminatory freight rates which will have to be added to the price of each commodity. And instead of the removal of price fixing on many products being advantageous to the consumer it will mean that those of us in distant parts of Canada will have to make up an amount that up to now has been included in a fixed price made applicable everywhere in our country.

This legislation as it now stands cannot carry out the will of parliament, if that be to assure a reduction in the cost of living. When I see the government playing around with a matter such as this, with prices going up at all times, I ask myself this question: Why is it that something is not being done; why is it that something was not done at this session to remove the sales tax on necessities?

The consumers league, represented by Mrs. Walton, the president of that league, are quoted with respect at all times. It presented a brief to the government last fall in which it asked for the removal of the sales tax on necessities, and named those necessities. Why was something like that not done?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member has exhausted his time.

Mr. Diefenbaker: All right.

Some hon. Members: Go on.

Mr. Diefenbaker: No, I shall not do that. I shall have an opportunity to conclude in another debate. I thank the house, however, for giving me that consideration.

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I think we can all agree that the debate has taken a very great turn for the better today, and that to no member who has taken part in it are we more indebted for this fact than the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker), who has just taken his seat.

After having spoken at such great length concerning this matter I thought perhaps, out of some consideration for my fellow members, I should not take any further part in the debate. However, the hon. member has raised certain points which I think require a reply, which I shall now endeavour to give.

The hon. member is always particularly effective when speaking before an audience which is not too well informed about the subject matter of his remarks. I wonder sometimes if he does not somewhat underestimate the intelligence of members in this chamber, because some of the remarks he made today are of the type one would expect to hear from him, and in a most effective manner, on the hustings where there is less likelihood of his hearers being able to check on his statements of fact and of law.

My hon. friend has undertaken to criticize the administration of the Combines Investigation Act, and this is not the first occasion upon which he has done so. I can remember that in one of the early speeches I had the honour to deliver in the House of Commons, at a time when certainly I did not have any great amount of responsibility for the administration of the Combines Investigation Act—as I was a new minister who had just come in—I undertook to defend the administration of that act over the years against the spirited attack which had been made against it by the hon. member for Lake Centre.

A man who is in public life and who administers legislation of this kind can pretty well reconcile himself from the start to having some rather strong criticism made against him; some warranted, perhaps, but much of which I suggest is not warranted. But the civil servants who administer this act and who under legislation of this kind have very great powers—powers equalling those of the minister himself—are not able to defend themselves in the house. Therefore I think I ought to say a word or two concerning the administration of the Combines Investigation Act generally; that is to say, not only at the present time, but in the era when Mr. McGregor was in charge of the work, from the time it was first created by the Liberal party in the middle twenties.

In doing this I do not want to repeat what I said on a previous occasion. I do not wish to go one by one through the cases the combines investigation administration has prosecuted and refute case by case the libels, if that is not an improper word, made upon the effectiveness of the administration by the hon. member for Lake Centre. Because if I were to do that I would be merely repeating a speech I made in the house in the fall of 1949, I believe it was, and there would be no purpose in my indulging in that repetition.

But I think perhaps I can go to a more impartial source for a very objective appraisal of the Canadian combines investigation administration, a source which I am sure the hon. member for Lake Centre would be, or should be, the last to question. It is a source which would compare not unfavourably with himself in political partisanship because, like himself, this gentleman was a leading member of the Conservative party, not in this country but in the United Kingdom where perhaps, as this debate would indicate, they were a little less partisan and a little more objective in their approach to this question than we are accustomed to find them here. This is what the hon. gentleman, Mr. Leathers, said in a debate in the British House of Commons; and by the way he is one of the leading lights of the Conservative party over there and, incidentally, is Canadian by birth.

My right hon. and learned friend the member for Liverpool, West Derby (Sir D. Maxwell Fyfe)—

He has been described as one of the brightest minds in the Conservative party in that country.

—wrote an excellent book on this subject about two years ago.

The subject was that of monopolies, generally.

One thing he said which struck me as eminent good sense, as is everything which the right hon. and learned gentleman says, was: "Other British dominions have passed laws against trade restraints though none are as complete or effective as the Canadian law."

And Mr. Leather's remarks continue:

I am sorry to see that my cousins in the states are being held up as paragons all the time. The Combines Investigation Act in Canada has worked extremely well. I know that my legal friends can ridicule prosecutions under the anti-trust acts of the U.S.A., and that it is easy to get up and point out anomalies and loopholes, but I do not think that is relevant. It is easy to attack monopolies in general, but it is even worse to defend them in particular. That is precisely what has been happening for many years.

And listen to this description by a Conservative in the British parliament of an attitude in this matter which has not been entirely absent from this debate.

Everybody says "It is a very bad thing, but when you come to my industry that is different."

I do not believe that it is different . . . Reference to this has been made in Lewis Ord's book "Politics and Poverty" and I will give an extract from it. He gives statistics which I think are of great interest. He points out that in 1815, which is a good starting date as being the end of the Napoleonic wars and when the industrial revolution was getting underway, that the real wage standard of living on both sides of the Atlantic was precisely equal. By 1890 it was still precisely equal, but we had progressed on both sides by 300 per cent. When we look at the graph from 1890 onwards, the thing goes wrong. In 1914, the North American real wage standard had increased to 600 per cent and ours to only 400 per cent. By 1939, it had increased to 1,200 per cent and ours was only 800 per cent. Ever since they have continued to advance at ever-increasing rates. If we look at the graph as it is at present we see that the American real wage standard is nearly double ours. The critical date on the graph is 1890.

And again:

What happened is perfectly simple. In the 1890's Canada and the U.S.A. made their first halting steps towards making competition the law of the land. It was precisely at the same time that the managements, trade unions and politicians in this country started to preach collectivism and started to get together to curtail competition. I suggest that the two things are clearly relevant and must have some close connection. Therefore, when we are considering on both sides of industry productivity and real wage standards of living, I suggest that it is relevant to consider restrictive outlooks and collective outlooks in industry as part of that picture . . . We do not need any more experience to enable us to prove precisely what trade practices restrict output and keep up prices. Everybody knows what they are.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What date was that?

Mr. Garson: June, 1951.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What page?

Mr. Garson: Column 2735 and previous. I suggest that the fundamental, basic issue is whether any nation which professes to believe in free enterprise is going to continue under competitive enterprise or whether we are going to struggle along under restrictive practices, either private, which are more objectionable or—I am sure our friends of the C.C.F. party will forgive us—public, which we might regard as being somewhat less objectionable.

My hon. friend says that price cutting will follow from the absence of resale price maintenance. I think he put forward the suggestion that if this legislation goes through, or to be more realistic, I should say when it goes through, there would be the frightening prospect for the independent retailer that the predatory price-cutting big interests will drive all the little fellows in the retail trade out of business.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I did not say all.

Mr. Garson: A substantial number, because if the number was not substantial there would be no substance to my hon. friend's argument.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Have not representations to that effect been made to the minister by small business?

Mr. Garson: Oh, yes, indeed. In considering those representations we have looked at some facts which are notorious and which I recommend to the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker). The hon. member should be more realistic and have a little common sense and have a look at these other facts. If the doing away with resale price maintenance in those fields in which it now prevails is going to expose those fields to predatory price cutting, then we should expect to see predatory price cutting in those fields where there has been no resale price maintenance. They are quite extensive. On the hon. member's own representations, they represent 85 per cent of retailing in Canada because if I understood him correctly he said that 15 per cent was resale price maintained.

Do we find in the 85 per cent of retailing in which there is no price maintenance that the little fellow is being driven out of business by predatory price cutting? Take the grocery trade, in which I think the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mrs. Fairclough) said there was less than one per cent resale price-maintained, or the hardware trade in which the trade representative before the joint committee said there was less than 8 per cent. I submit that every reasonable person with ordinary horse sense who takes a realistic approach to the plain facts of life will realize that if we do not have wholesale bankruptcies and chaos and predatory price cutting in the field in which resale price maintenance does not exist to any significant degree at the present time, then by the most ordinary logic we should be able to assume that if resale price maintenance is abolished in those areas which it now covers there will be no more reason to suppose that as long as economic conditions remain as they are at the present time such chaotic conditions will follow. That is the reason, as I understand it, that the members of the parliamentary committee stated in their report, of which I certainly approve, this proposition:

> Your committee is of the view that if other types of predatory price cutting, the possibility and the nature of which cannot at the present time be foreseen, take place, the government should then consider placing before parliament further amendments of the Combines Investigation Act or the Criminal Code prohibiting such other types of predatory price cutting and providing adequate penalties for them.

The preceding paragraph of the report reads:

> Certain groups appearing before the committee have expressed the view that one of the consequences of prohibiting resale price maintenance will be to enable large and powerful retailing interests to engage in a policy of selling goods at unreasonably low prices for the purpose of destroying the independent retailer. This committee does not think that under present conditions there is any substantial likelihood of such policies being engaged in but would recommend to the government—

I recommend this next phrase particularly to the leader of the opposition.

> —in the event of such policies being practised, the vigorous enforcement of section 498A of the Criminal Code.

The main reason why we have not had occasion to vigorously enforce section 498A of the Criminal Code is that under the economic policies which have prevailed in this country during the last fifteen years, and under prevailing world conditions if you like to be absolutely fair, we have had the advantage of full employment and abundant revenues and it has not been necessary for any person in the trade to come to the combines investigation branch and suggest that that section should be invoked.

Perhaps that is not completely correct because we have had one or two specific complaints under section 498A (a). Legal members will recall that that is the subsection which prohibits the granting of a discount to a purchaser over and above the ordinary quantity or quality discounts available to the whole trade. We had complaints that a certain firm in Canada was granting unfair discounts in contravention of that section.

What happened? We went to this firm and we said, "our attention has been called to the possibility that you have been contravening this section of the Criminal Code." They said, "we were not aware of this section of the Criminal Code, but maybe so. Here are our price lists; have a look at them." We said, "there is item so and so, there is item so and so and there is item so and so which in our judgment contravene that section." They said, "that is quite all right. You say what the proper discount should be in that case and we will amend it and abide by it. We are very glad to have this matter drawn to our attention."

Mr. Diefenbaker: When was that?

Mr. Garson: That was within the last year. Reading from the last report of the combines investigation branch with bated breath like the villain in a melodrama, my hon. friend says that there has not been a single case in which the minister has authorized investigation under the act by ministerial direction. Think of it! I have no doubt that out in Lake Centre he would probably evoke great cheers and carry tremendous conviction by a statement of that sort, but my hon. friend is singularly lacking in preparation for the part he has taken in this debate if he has not acquainted himself with the fact that he can go back through all the preceding reports of the combines investigation branch and discover that in only a very few, if any, instances—I cannot recall a single instance offhand—has ministerial direction been given for action to be taken under the Combines Investigation Act.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Does that not prove my case that there is no enforcement?

Mr. Garson: My hon. friend made a remark—

Mr. Diefenbaker: Does that not prove that there is not very much of a will to enforce?

Mr. Garson: It certainly does not prove any such thing, although that is what my hon. friend would like to convey to the people of Canada, and it is upon that type of propaganda that he and his party thrive. What are the facts? As I think my hon. friend knows—I would not be a bit surprised if he knew it when he rose to speak today—the facts are that under the act there are three ways in which investigations can be authorized. One is by ministerial direction. Another is by the action of the Combines Investigation Act commissioner himself, his powers with respect to initiating proceedings being just as full and complete in every respect as those of the minister.

Mr. Diefenbaker: You fixed him on the flour milling report.

Mr. Garson: Let me finish what I am saying.

An hon. Member: It is hurting now.

Mr. Garson: Third, there is the method which my hon. friend himself could have invoked if he was so very much excited about the impropriety of there being no prosecutions, by no more complicated a device than getting five of his fellow citizens to join with him in presenting a petition to the combines investigation commission which would compel action under the act. If he regards these things as having the degree of impropriety which he professes to regard them as having, I am very much surprised that he did not take that course long ago.

A little bit of common sense applied to the provisions of this act would, I think, convince any reasonable man that, where the minister has a first-class staff of able, sincere and hard-working people, for the minister himself to invoke from time to time the power to authorize investigations under the act could only be for one reason, because he thinks the combines investigation commissioner is failing to discharge his duties and exercise the powers which the act gives him. If the minister should adopt a practice of that sort I cannot imagine any other course he could follow which would be more destructive of the morale of the organization.

May I say that not only during the time of the present commissioner but also during the time of his predecessor, Mr. McGregor, there has never been any question in the administration of the Combines Investigation Act but that the commissioner could be absolutely depended upon to initiate the investigations that might be required from time to time.

My hon. friend makes a great fuss about the fact that there were only three formal investigations, and again he is trading upon the lack of information, as he supposes, of his audience. If he knew as much about matters of this kind as he professes to know he would know, for example, that in the case of the United States anti-trust division they figure that on the average it takes three years from the initiation of an inquiry in the first place until the matter is finally put into prosecution through the courts. While we do it somewhat more rapidly in this country, it still is a long, tedious and arduous process. It requires no imagination for anyone to realize that large and powerful organizations are involved in these matters. In this respect I do agree with one statement of fact my hon. friend made. They are large and powerful organizations, and they are also exceedingly intelligent men. They have the benefit of the very best accounting and legal advice, and we never launch a prosecution in any city in Canada that we do not go into court to be faced with a galaxy of the best legal talent that money can employ. It is a long, tough, uphill struggle all the way.

In a great many cases, as one might suppose, these agreements are not reduced to writing with big seals on them. They are not lying readily about for us to pick up. For example, in the bread prosecution we were only able to establish that there was an agreement, which could not be established definitely in writing or in any other way, by proving a whole series of acts, filing over 1,200 exhibits and taking 100 days of trial in order to show a long series of transactions which could only be consistent with the existence of an agreement, and in that way we secured a conviction. That being the case, I am sure a few moments' reflection would convince my hon. friend first of all that if there were any occasions in connection with the increase in the price of matches or flat glass for the commissioner to send in his operatives to investigate and see whether the increase in price was, as has been suggested by the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Croll) and the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker), to recover the amount of their fines—which if I may say so is a rather E. Phillips Oppenheim touch—or whether it might not be the result, as many increases are, of an increase due to economic forces. If it is due to economic forces and the commissioner so finds then we cannot prosecute people for increases in prices that are due to the operation of economic forces. I realize that in all of these remarks I am perhaps out of order, as the hon. member was during 95 per cent of his remarks—

Mr. Diefenbaker: Speak for yourself.

Mr. Garson: I am speaking for myself because my hon. friend was speaking for himself for a while, and we are both out of order. I am out of order because I have to reply to things that he said that were out of order. He raised the question of international cartels and implied more or less of a smear as to what we had done in that respect. Let me say, as my hon. friend well knows, that the disposition of international cartels has to be an international disposition. If my hon. friend has been following the matter at all carefully, he will know that in the proceedings that have been taken by the United Nations, Canada has been in the very forefront in trying to arrive at some method by which international cartels can be controlled. In the meantime, however, we are confined in Canada to the prosecution of those acts which take place within Canada, and that we have carried out as in the flat glass and match cases and others where we secured convictions.

My hon. friend said that if this legislation passes we will have a great outburst of price cutting which will put the small retailer out of business. He said, and again I agree with him, that it is very difficult to get facts and figures from the Canadian picture which can be used in our reasoning about this particular subject matter. Professor Fuller, who appeared on behalf of the Canadian pharmaceutical association and who gave what in my judgment was the best brief of any that was submitted against the legislation, admitted freely under cross-examination that there was not a single fact or figure in his whole comprehensive brief, or in the two supplements attached to it, that was Canadian in origin. All the prices, all the facts, all the data came from the United States where, as I am sure the hon. member for Lake Centre will agree, they have built up a substantial amount of literature and statistics on that subject of resale price maintenance. The proponents of the fair trade laws of that country have, in the course of the years, built up a substantial amount of literature and Professor Fuller drew heavily from that source.

In the absence of any reliable data about the Canadian scene, the committee was asked to draw comparisons between things that were really, as Professor Fuller admitted, not comparable. We were asked to draw the conclusion that, because in an industry in which some of the products were price maintained and others were not price maintained, the mark-up on the free goods was higher than it was on the price maintained goods, that proved that resale price maintenance was a good thing. We all remember the book "1066 and All That" in which this subject or the other subject was said to be a good thing or a bad thing; on the basis of such proof we were asked to agree that resale price maintenance was a good thing in that vague sense. Those who have read the book will gather my meaning. In other words, such a comparison proves nothing. The only way in which a system of free competitive selling could be compared with a system of resale price maintenance is to compare the price of identical goods sold simultaneously under conditions as closely identical as possible in a jurisdiction in which resale price maintenance prevails and in an adjoining jurisdiction in which resale price maintenance does not prevail. To apply the rules of logic, if you are going to compare the benefits of this system with the benefits of that system you have to have every other factor in your comparison common to the two, in order to compare the results of one system with the results of the other system.

When you apply that method—as Professor Fuller admitted, the only reasonably sound method—it does not make any difference where you go for the facts and there are not too many places you can go. You can only go to those places in the United States where there is a state in which free trade prevails, like Texas, and a contiguous state of about the same economic development in which resale price maintenance prevails, like California. You can make comparisons between Missouri and Illinois or between the District of Columbia and Maryland. In every one of those cases when the comparison is made by an independent body and not by some interested party, you find that the prices are substantially lower in the free trade state as compared to what they are in the other state. Not only is that the case, but in complete refutation of my hon. friend's theory that the only way in which the retail dealer can survive is with the crutch of resale price maintenance, you will find that the independent retailer in Texas has as great a percentage of the total retail business as he has in California. He has as great a percentage in Missouri as he has in Illinois, and so on throughout the comparisons.

We can invoke a fairly up-to-date example of that sort of thing. It is only a few months since an attempt was made by the Missouri supporters of resale price maintenance to have the system introduced in a state which, up until that time, had been under free trade. Here is a photostat copy of the St. Louis Star-Times for April 18, 1951. The headline reads:

> Eleven to twelve per cent hike in drug prices expected under fair trade bill.

That is to say if the particular bill which was then suggested became law, there would be an eleven to twelve per cent hike in drug prices. Here are the comparisons of existing Illinois prices, that is under resale price maintenance, and St. Louis prices under free trade. There is a smudge on this, but I think it reads, American shampoo; St. Louis price 98 cents; Illinois price $1.39; Bayer Aspirin, 100, St. Louis price 49 cents; Illinois price 59 cents; Fleet's Phospho-Soda, St. Louis price 89 cents, Illinois price $1.29; Hadacol, St. Louis price $1.09, Illinois price $1.19; Pond's cream, $1.13 in St. Louis, and $1.39 in Illinois. I am happy to say, Mr. Speaker, that the attempt to secure passage of this fair trade law was unsuccessful.

I suggest that a great deal of the thinking of my hon. friends of the official opposition is a relic of the days of the Bennett government. They are still thinking in the terms of the period from 1930 to 1935, and all their fears of the effects upon the independent retailer are based upon the fears which every person had, and for good reason at that time. When I say that I want to make it clear that there is no implication that there was any fault in government policies or anything of that sort. The depression of that time extended over more than one country. If my hon. friends of the official opposition who have shown considerable interest in a system of fair trade laws in the United States had only prosecuted their research a little further than they did, they would have discovered that the Miles case, in which the Supreme Court of the United States said that the Sherman anti-trust law was applicable to resale price maintenance, was decided in the year 1912. The first trade law of the state of California, and that was the first one, was not passed until 1931. During this nineteen-year intervening period, the small retailers and business people in the United States were exposed to this predatory price cutting and all the other devices it was possible to bring against them. In spite of that, the supporters of fair trade in that country were not able to get any laws through the Congress of the United States to provide for fair trade.

The hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Hees) has made two speeches and has shown, if I may say so, great ingenuity in a new method of filibustering, in using on the second occasion exactly the same notes as he used on the first, so that the text is almost identical. In that way he saves a great deal of labour and carries along his filibuster in an admirable way.

An hon. Member: They all used the same notes.

Mr. Garson: He portrayed to this house this beautiful picture of the operations of the fair trade laws in the United States where everybody was happy: the people who asked for them were happy, the consumers were happy, the governments who put them into force were re-elected, and so on. Mr. Speaker, those interested were not able to get the congress of the United States to pass any fair trade laws between 1912 and 1931. As anyone who has studied the subject knows, the fair trade laws that were then introduced—not in congress; they never succeeded in congress even then—but in the state legislatures, were a phenomenon of the depression. These American fair trade laws were produced by the same kind of thinking that our hon. friends of the official opposition bring into this parliament as a relic of the Bennett government days in their approach to this legislation now before us.

They tell us that these American fair trade laws are a great, spontaneous uprising supported by all of the people of the country; that they are highly acceptable to them and so on; but the fact is that the great majority of these state laws were put through without any public hearing, and without any adequate discussion, so much so that some of the central provisions in them around which the acts hinged contained a mistake; a bad misprint in the original act in California was repeated in several of the other states for quite a period of time before any person found that the error had been made.

Then with regard to the alleged great amount of support that there was for the Miller-Tydings amendment to the Sherman anti-trust law to provide that resale price agreements reached under the state laws would not come under the ban of the Sherman anti-trust law, what was the history of that amendment? It was introduced in congress and it was defeated. Its sponsors could not get it through in any other way so ingeniously, and I think one could apply a stronger adjective, so the sponsors of the amendment tacked it on as a rider to the appropriation bill of the District of Columbia in the dying hours of the session and put the President of the United States in the dilemma of either letting the amendment go through along with the appropriation bill or vetoing both and then not providing any money to meet the payrolls of the District of Columbia. That was the way in which the Miller-Tydings act came into effect; and this is the act and these are the fair trade state laws that my friend, the hon. member for Broadview, is recommending as a model upon which we should base our legislation.

A great attempt has been made, and without any accuracy whatever, by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) and others of his party to try to create the impression, by putting it on Hansard and having it go around the country to people who might not otherwise be informed as to what the facts were, that there had been an attempt on the part of the government, in connection with this legislation, to hold it over until the dying hours of the session in order that it could then be rushed through. What are the facts, Mr. Speaker? The facts are that this legislation was announced in the speech from the throne. Could we, by any chance, announce it any sooner than that?

Mr. Drew: It was a surprise that it was announced in the house instead of outside of it beforehand.

Mr. Mutch: Too much turkey.

Mr. Garson: I am quite gratified to have my hon. friend announce that it is a surprise to him. If I can only get him to admit the fact, which he has not done up to now, that it was announced in the speech from the throne, I should be glad.

Mr. Drew: I referred to that matter several times in my speech.

Mr. Sinclair: Which speech? You made many.

Mr. Drew: Every one.

Mr. Garson: Then the resolution setting up the joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons was moved in this house on November 2 of this year. After a somewhat protracted debate which, I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, was not the fault of the government, the resolution was passed and the committee, organizing rapidly and efficiently, had its first meeting on November 13. It then sat, I think I am safe in saying, on every date that was reasonable and reasonably convenient for all of the members to attend, and sat continuously up to the time that it made its final report on December 7. On December 7 the report was made by the committee in the morning and it was tabled in the afternoon. There was therefore no delay there. Then after the report had been tabled it was necessary, under the rules of the house, that we give notice of the introduction of the bill. As a result, the bill was introduced on December 10, took its place on the order paper, and was reached in the ordinary course of business of the house just seven days later, on December 17. The debate on second reading began then and it has continued intermittently ever since.

The mere recitation of these dates disposes of the allegation of any attempt upon the part of the government to delay the discussion of this bill. But when our hon. friends of the official oposition engage in protracted debate and have ten, twenty-five and forty speeches on the same subject, spend a whole day discussing points of order, and then come along and accuse us of delay, or of having held the bill off until the closing days of the session, I think it is really a little bit unreasonable. I will put it that way, not to be provocative at all; I think it is a little bit unreasonable. If we permitted them to get away with it, it would be conveying a wholly false impression to the people of this country.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member's time has expired.

Mr. Drew: It is agreed that he continue.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): May I ask the minister a question?

Mr. Garson: Yes.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): When the hon. member for Lake Centre spoke, I understood him to insinuate that Mr. McGregor, when he appeared before the committee, did not give us all the evidence that was required or available. Do you know of any evidence that was asked for and was not given?

Mr. Garson: Mr. Speaker, Mr. McGregor appeared on two occasions and, if I may say so, on both occasions made a magnificent presentation of his point of view. He was brought back on the second occasion for the specific purpose of answering any questions which the members of the committee might wish to ask him; and he certainly answered every question that was asked of him by any members of the committee.

Mr. Speaker: Is the house ready for the question.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Speaker: I declare the amendment lost. The question is now on the main motion. Shall the main motion carry?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: Those in favour will say aye.

Mr. C. W. Hodgson (Victoria, Ont.): Mr. Speaker, I take part in this debate with a good deal of reluctance, because I realize there has been considerable discussion on the amendment and subamendment. However, the few words I shall say will take up very little time, and I suggest hon. members should not complain because it is the first time I have spoken on the motion, the amendment or the subamendment.

May I call it six o'clock?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Hodgson: Listening to the debate in the last few days I have come to the conclusion that there is no necessity to rush the passage of the bill, and that its consideration should be left over to the next session of parliament. It is untimely to have all this discussion at the end of the session. I suggest further that it was not necessary to have us come back after Christmas. I say consideration of the bill could have been left over until the next session of parliament.

I oppose the bill because I believe it is a smokescreen in the faces of the consuming public. The hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Croll) has suggested that the government has done everything possible to reduce the high cost of living, but I am suggesting that if in his opinion the hiding for ten months of the flour milling report was an effort on the part of the government to reduce the high cost of living, then he is badly misinformed.

I have received several communications from different organizations and individuals in my constituency. All these have been in opposition to the bill, while I have not received any communication favouring it. Therefore I would be remiss in my duty if I failed at this time to voice my opinion in opposition to the bill. I should not sit idly by and permit small retailers in my riding to be thrown out of business at the expense of the consuming public. Over the Christmas holidays I made it my business to call on as many people as I could and still enjoy Christmas at home. Every retailer and every little businessman is fearful of this legislation.

Mr. Warren: Louder.

Mr. Hodgson: Apparently the crows have not all gone south, because I hear one from Renfrew North. After listening to the debate there is no doubt in my mind that the fears of the small retailer are warranted. I have seen it happen before and probably it will happen again, when many little retailers were put out of business.

It has been said, and I think it is worth repeating, that the little retailer on Main street, on the back concession line, or in the little village is worthy of a great deal of consideration in the community life of this Canada of ours. We know that when the labouring man is out of work he goes to the little retailer for credit. We know that many labouring men have credit arrangements with small retailers under which they pay every two weeks or every month. Those people depend upon that method of merchandising to supply their families with goods and services.

If you put those retailers out of business you throw that business into the hands of the chain stores and other large businesses. We all know what happens when business of any kind becomes a monopoly. Either the government do not act or they seem to have little power in dealing with it at times.

At 6.15 p.m. the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Hodgson: Mr. Speaker, before the house rose at 6.15 I stated that I had not received a single communication in favour of this legislation. In that I made a mistake because my train was late this morning and I did not have time to go over my mail before the house sat at eleven o'clock. However, during the dinner recess I found a letter on the notepaper of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture signed by one H. H. Hannam. He does not say so definitely, but from the letter one would take it that he probably is in favour of the legislation.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I ruled previously today that letters emanating from people outside the house referring to the proceedings in the house at the present time should not be read.

Mr. Hodgson: I am not reading the letter, Mr. Speaker, and I do not intend to. I have read it thoroughly, but in reference to it—

Mr. Speaker: I do not wish to be too strict, but I think other members of the house agreed not to discuss the letter.

Mr. Hodgson: It was discussed this afternoon by a Liberal member on the other side of the house. It is the same letter that was discussed this afternoon by the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Croll), I believe.

Mr. Speaker: It was referred to by him.

Mr. Hodgson: That is all I am going to do. I am not going to read the letter. I am just going to refer to it.

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. member for Spadina referred to it I think he probably was out of order, but if he did so, I will allow the hon. member to refer to it briefly.

Mr. Hodgson: In this letter Mr. Hannam is not speaking for the Canadian Federation of Agriculture. He is speaking for himself, because he does not sign it for the Canadian Federation of Agriculture. He merely signs it "Mr. Hannam, president and managing director of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture". I said it was on their note paper. He used their paper, but it is not signed by the Canadian Federation of Agriculture. He signs it as managing director. He is responsible for the letter, but I do not think he is responsible for 60 per cent of the farmers of this country. He is certainly not responsible for those in my riding, and is certainly not speaking for them when he writes this letter. I think Mr. Hannam has become more or less of a political stooge. I say that because it is a funny thing that this circular letter, which every member of the House of Commons has received, should be written yesterday and delivered to members of the house today. It looks like a case of giving the football one more kick. I do not know how he got his job, but I know if the farmers of my riding had any say that he would not have it very long. He would be one more with his hand on the doorknob of the government looking for a job. In view of the way he has acted and the service he has rendered to the government they should give him a job. I see the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) smiling. He would make a good candidate for you for the next election.

Mr. Gardiner: I thought he used to be a Conservative.

Mr. Adamson: Oh, no.

Mr. Rowe: You have great influence over him.

Mr. Hodgson: With respect to the sittings of the special committee, it seems to me the government went to a lot of unnecessary expense. They hired two lawyers at a cost to the people of Canada of $500 a day. If you add their fees, living allowances and travelling expenses you will find it comes to a little over $500 a day. At the same time they acted as prosecuting attorneys when at least five lawyers were members of the committee, each one of whom was quite capable of carrying on the cross-examination of any witness. It appeared to me as if the chairman of the committee wanted somebody there to help him frame the rules as they went along, as the hon. member for Spadina said.

The flour milling report has been mentioned. The same minister kept it under cover and out of sight of members of the House of Commons and the people of Canada at least for ten months. If that could be done for the benefit of the large milling combine in this country, I do not see any reason why this legislation could not be held over for six or eight weeks for the benefit of the small retail store and the consuming public.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I have sat here for nearly a week listening to the arguments of the members of the Progressive Conservative party against this bill. When the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) spoke and presented the views of this group I supported him. I was heartily in favour of the bill, and I must say that after listening to the arguments of the opposition I am more in favour of it than ever.

Mr. Brooks: Then we must be right.

Mr. Herridge: I am going to be quite brief, but I want to express my unqualified support for the legislation. I listened with care to the lengthy speech of the Minister of Justice

(Mr. Garson), on the motion for second reading. I think he gave a very complete analysis of the present situation and made a good case for the legislation now before the house. I believe it would be to the advantage of the Canadian consumer and create a better understanding of this very complicated situation if the minister would have his speech printed. If he will do so I will put in my order now for 300 copies. When the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) spoke this morning he was of course speaking as a Liberal and therefore as a firm believer in free enterprise. I thought he was on sound ground when he said he thought it was the responsibility of the retailer so far as fixing the price to the consumer is concerned.

I want to deal briefly with one aspect of this very complicated situation that is giving concern to large numbers of thoughtful people in the business and co-operative fields in various countries. I refer to the increasing percentage costs of distribution as the years go by. That fact has been noticed in Great Britain. It has been discovered in the United States, and without doubt it is a fact in Canada. In that regard I want to quote a few statements made by people well informed on this question. I refer to a statement by Mr. E. F. Schumacher which appeared in the London Observer of February 4, 1945. He said:

> In both Britain and the United States distribution costs have steadily risen while production costs have fallen. Whether the consumer has got any benefit out of the increased productive effort is more than doubtful.
> There is every indication that a rationalization of distribution may yield larger dividends in real wealth than any economies obtainable on the side of production. What is more, it is becoming ever more apparent that the lack of organization and co-ordination on the distributive side is the greatest single stumbling block on the road to increased productive efficiency.

Then Lord Woolton, who I believe is now the minister of food in the Conservative government of Great Britain, has characterized the distributive trades as one of the most expensive and luxurious factors of our national life. They are expensive not only in the large slice of the cost of living for which they account, but also in manpower.

I have one more reference. In dealing with this question the writer of this book says:

> The methods of enforcement of resale price maintenance vary considerably but they all effectively prevent the efficient retailer from passing on the benefits of his own efficiency to the consumer in the form of lower prices.

He goes on to explain it. I believe the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) mentioned that point when he was speaking. I believe that is a question that will more and more seriously concern the governments of all countries. Anyone who has studied the question at all realizes that the percentage of cost allotted to the distribution of goods is, to some extent, spoiling the benefits of the increased production that is taking place now. It is a considerable factor in the increased price of consumer goods. In my opinion there is no question about it; governments will have to give some consideration to this problem because society cannot continue to subsidize inefficiency. Under resale price maintenance as I see it there has been some inefficiency in retailing throughout the years. I just make that point in passing.

We in this group fully appreciate the fears some retailers have about the effect of this legislation on their business. These people have carried on for years under certain business arrangements to which they have become accustomed, and from which many of them believe they have derived a certain amount of protection. It is for this reason the amendment was moved by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell). We are opposed to resale price maintenance because we do not believe prices should be fixed by manufacturers. When the member for Rosetown-Biggar had moved his amendment I was interested to notice that several members of the Progressive Conservative party looked it over very carefully. As I sat here watching them they reminded me of a group of coyotes sniffing at a baited trap; they thought something was hidden. As a matter of fact it was clear and concise, much more so than the amendment moved by the hon. member to my right. I believe that the implementation of that amendment in the federal and provincial spheres would have done a great deal to remove any legitimate fears some retailers may have.

There is no question about the attitude of the consumer of this country. If you were to meet a man on the street and say, "Are you in favour of manufacturers fixing prices?", he would say, "No". I believe that is evident from the representations made to the committee by the various groups. In my case it is evident from the correspondence I have received. I have received one letter from a wholesaler in my constituency in opposition to this legislation. There is no question about the attitude of the majority of the people, as is evident from the representations made to the committee by the trade union representatives. There is no question about the attitude of the farmers. The hon. member for Victoria, Ont., (Mr. Hodgson), speaking just prior to me, suggested that Mr. Hannam was not speaking for the farmers of Canada. Surely he has read the brief presented to the committee on behalf of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture.

If Mr. Hannam was not speaking for the farmers of Canada I think we would have heard about it before now. I think Mr. Hannam's reputation is solid and well founded. He is known as a man who represents the people who have elected him to be head of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture.

So far as the southeastern interior of British Columbia is concerned, a few days ago I noticed in the press a report of a farmers' meeting at which there was a discussion of resale price maintenance. It was obvious that these men supported this legislation. One illustration of a part of the mechanism of resale price maintenance was brought to the attention of the members present. If a farmer finds it necessary to buy a dollar spring or some other small part, he finds that he has to buy a ten dollar assembly and other pieces which he did not require. It was brought out at the meeting that this is part of the mechanism of price maintenance. Then there was the excellent brief presented to the committee by the consumers association.

For a minute or two I should like to deal with the brief presented by the co-operative union of Canada. I have read all these briefs, and I thought the co-operative union made one or two points that are worth bringing particularly to the attention of the house. I mention this because I am personally interested in the co-operative movement. I have spent a good many years of my life as an official of a co-operative organization, and we have a very well developed co-operative movement in my constituency; a service co-operative operating busses, a fruit growers union, credit unions and so on. At page 700 of the minutes of proceedings and evidence of the joint committee of the Senate and House of Commons on combines legislation I find that paragraph 4 reads as follows:

> In operating their co-operatives and developing a Canadian co-operative program, the consumers whom we represent encounter difficulties and frustration. It is obvious that consumer co-operatives cannot function successfully without free access to goods. But our experience is that we are denied this right because of our policy of supplying ourselves with goods at cost through the payment of patronage refunds.

This legislation is going to be of considerable assistance to the co-operative movement of this country, because I have personal experience, as a member and official of the co-operative organization, of the refusal of manufacturers and wholesalers to provide goods.

In the concluding paragraph I think there is something worth bringing to the attention of the house. In paragraph 11 on page 703 we find the following:

> In dealing with the particular problem before your committee the interest of the consumer is paramount, and the submission is made primarily on behalf of the hundreds of thousands of consumers who have through necessity organized to supply themselves with goods and services at cost. The members in these co-operatives believe that through the development of the co-operative movement they can, by the application of the co-operative method and the elimination of profit in the supplying of their goods, eventually solve to a great extent the problem of monopolies which is giving this committee and parliament such deep concern.

I heartily agree with this contention.

> In support of this belief we would cite the case of the Swedish Co-operative Union and Wholesale Society (Kooperativa Forbundet). Beginning in the years immediately following the first world war, the Swedish wholesale, in company with other Scandinavian co-operatives, undertook a systematic attack on various cartels which were oppressing the consuming public. Most famous of their achievements was the successful entry into the electric lamp field which resulted in a saving of 5,000,000 kroner a year for the Swedish public. This was followed by similar attacks on the vegetable oil and cash register cartels, among others. In many cases these efforts were carried out in co-operation with other interested elements in the community.

And this is the short paragraph in which I am greatly interested:

> In conclusion, we submit that co-operative enterprise, if allowed to develop normally, will of itself do much to combat monopolistic, restrictive trade practices and to supplement federal and provincial legislative action in this field.

I now want to say this in conclusion. I think this legislation is going to be of advantage not only to the consumers of Canada as a whole but in particular to the co-operative movement in this country. When this legislation is passed it will be possible for the consumers of this country to do something for themselves, if increasing numbers of consumers would enlist in the co-operative movement, would support the promotion of manufacturing co-operatives, would support to a greater extent the development of wholesale co-operatives and would support to an even greater extent than they do today the development of retail co-operatives. The people themselves have in their own hands the opportunity of developing a co-operative movement that can be an effective check upon these unfair trade practices we are dealing with under this legislation. As a result of the investigation of the MacQuarrie committee, the investigation by the parliamentary committee, the debate in this house and the representations made by the co-operative union and other organizations of the people of this country, I trust that this legislation will bring a great stimulus to the co-operative movement in Canada and that, in so doing, it will provide a check by the people themselves on unfair trade practices.

Mr. F. E. Lennard (Wentworth): In rising for a moment to speak again in this debate, Mr. Speaker, I might say to the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge) that Mr.

H. H. Hannam certainly does not represent all the farmers of Canada; at least he does not represent a great number of those in my locality. As to the letter which we received this morning—and I am not quoting any more letters, Mr. Speaker—I wish to refer to one sentence in which he says that any prolongation of this debate—

Mr. Speaker: Order. That is one of the sentences to which objection is taken.

Mr. Lennard: At any rate, it is in the letter.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the house would like me to read the reference in Beauchesne's third edition. I will read paragraph 266, the latter part of which states:

> Members may quote an article or a book stating facts, but a commentary on any proceeding or any discussion in the house, with the object of swinging an opinion to one side or the other, is out of order.

Mr. Lennard: All right, Mr. Speaker. Mr. Hannam intimated that any prolongation of this debate might be considered as sparring for political advantage. Apparently Mr. Hannam thought that, by prolongation of this debate, there might be political advantage for some people in this House of Commons.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the hon. member should state his own views, not Mr. Hannam's.

Mr. Fournier (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): And if he has no views at all, he knows what to do.

Mr. Lennard: May I repeat, Mr. Speaker, that Mr. Hannam does not truly represent the agricultural interests of Wentworth county, at least. He has been referred to this evening as a stooge. I will not go quite that far, Mr. Speaker, but I will say that in my opinion over the past number of years he has been a good right hand man to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner).

What I have just said, Mr. Speaker, was prompted by the interjection by the hon. member for Kootenay West. I did not rise for that purpose at all. I merely rose to refer to something that was mentioned last Friday evening during the address of the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Browne), when an interjection was made by the hon. member for Maple Creek (Mr. Studer)—and I am sure that the hon. member would welcome this correction as much as anyone—where he said, as reported at page 2375 of Hansard:

> I was referring to our country out west when I made the statement that in the average town there is about one drug store for every thousand of population.

The hon. member probably did not have in mind the fact that the average town in his home province of Saskatchewan feeds a goodly circle of farming community surrounding it. He probably did not take that fact into consideration. On looking up the bureau of statistics census of 1950, I find that in the province of Saskatchewan there were 309 drug stores; and I am not referring to the country stores that sell some form of salicylic acid under some trade name, some patent medicines, castor oil, or horse liniment and that sort of thing. I am referring to the legitimate chemist shops or pharmacies that employ chemists to make up prescriptions and sell drugs. As I say, according to the bureau of statistics census of 1950 in the province of Saskatchewan there were 309 drug stores and the average drug stores served a population of 2,828; that is an average of nearly 3,000 people per drug store. The same thing applies in other sections of Canada. I merely rose to draw to your attention, Mr. Speaker, the fact that there are not in Canada nearly as many drug stores as some people might wish to intimate.

Mr. Sinnott: That makes your case that much worse.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, on earlier occasions I intimated that there was one feature of this measure which I proposed to discuss at a later time in this debate. It is for that purpose I now rise. Earlier I had hoped the government would recognize the fact that the course it is following is not one that is consistent with the best interests of the consumer or of the people of Canada generally, and for that reason might be persuaded to withdraw this legislation in view of the short time that would elapse until we met in another regular session. The government, however, has refused to consider that delay, although at no time has a single reason—and I repeat those words, a single reason—been given why inquiries could not be made that would place before this high court of parliament evidence upon which we could really form some understandable conclusion as to what should be done to meet this situation.

I regret that some of the speeches by supporters of the government and their socialist associates earlier today have made it quite clear that an attempt is being made to convey the impression that any effort to obtain adequate consideration of this measure is to be branded as defence of the big interests and an attempt to protect practices which the government say should be discontinued. It is not necessary to point out again, because it has been pointed out already, that the only big interests who have appeared in this matter voicing very, very vigorous support are the big interests in the retail trade of this country. I repeat what I said before. Size or bigness in any retail or other business is not an offence in itself; but certainly if there is any group which has indicated its desire to see this bill adopted it is that retail group which can be described as very big business indeed. That is their legitimate right. In this free economy of ours they have the right to assert their position, as the small retailer has the right to assert his.

When any suggestion is made that we are leaving uncertainty as to our position, because we ask for more information, may I point out that this committee sat for only a very limited time in relation to the importance of this subject, and that it did not permit many people who indicated their desire to do so to place evidence before it. The minister who has introduced this measure in a somewhat emotional display told us that the facts spoke for themselves, and that they demonstrated how little delay there had been in dealing with this measure. He said it had been announced in the speech from the throne that a measure was to be introduced, and that is correct. I believe that was on October 9. It was announced at that time that this very important measure was to be introduced, and it was indicated that it was to deal with the problem of inflation about which, it was stated, the government shared the concern of the people of Canada.

Let us see the measure of haste the government showed to deal with this tremendously important legislation. The announcement was made on October 9; and by great haste and a display of their desire to get ahead with this legislation a motion was made on November 2 that this committee be set up. Surely that was a display of haste which must convince anyone who does not recognize that for the whole of that three weeks and more this house could have been dealing with this very legislation if the government had really wished to set up the committee right away to deal with it.

Then what happened? After protracted debate, according to the minister who has introduced the legislation, the motion was adopted. An examination of Hansard will suggest that the debate was not very protracted in relation to the importance of the subject matter. That motion came forward on November 2 and the committee commenced its work on November 13, eleven days later—another great display of haste on the part of the government. The committee met, and the bill was introduced in this house on December 10. And though it could have been dealt with almost any day after that it was not reached, to use the words of the minister who introduced it, until December 17. There was no reason for that delay except to hold this bill back until the pressure that was naturally being exerted to get the business done in time for hon. members to get home for Christmas might possibly limit the time available for debate.

The dates given by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) support in the most conclusive way the fact that at every stage during this session there has been the maximum possible delay in proceeding with this measure. Not only this one bill still remains to be dealt with. There is the bill introduced by the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier). We have not yet seen the amended form it is to take. Most certainly if it still contains any wide-open avoidance of the traditional practice of tender there will be no short debate on that bill either. Then we have the annuities bill, an extremely important one, with certain new ideas introduced.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Drew: There are other measures before this house which are certainly going to involve considerable time.

In so far as this measure is concerned, it was brought forward with the other important measures in the same way that important legislation was brought forward at the end of the last session and at the end of other sessions which have preceded this, with the idea that adequate consideration should not be given to it. I am still urging the government to recognize that it would be evidence of one of the best New Year's resolutions ever made by the members of this government if they decided to change this course and let this measure stand until the next regular session, then appoint a committee that could continue to sit in the intervening period to hear the evidence which could be heard. Or if the government does not feel that such a committee should be appointed, it should really leave the task to the committee which was supposed to deal with it, and let the committee under the chairmanship of Mr. Justice MacQuarrie deal with this whole problem and present a complete report to this house in regard to the proposed amendments to the combines act.

There is another angle which I do suggest should be given the utmost consideration; that is the absence of any sound explanation why adequate inquiry from several points of view cannot be made. In his earlier remarks today the Prime Minister himself (Mr. St. Laurent) referred to the point I had made in regard to the Dominion Trade and Industry Commission Act of 1935 which was referred to the courts in 1936. He pointed out that I had recalled the fact that section 14 of the Dominion Trade and Industry Commission Act, which dealt with this question of agreement in regard to prices, had been declared ultra vires of the parliament of Canada by the Supreme Court of Canada in a judgment in 1936. In referring to that fact he indicated that doubtless the remarks I had made would apply to the suggestion that consideration be given to the setting up of a fair trade commission.

In those remarks the Prime Minister recalled references to decisions which were made in regard to the subject matter now before the house. At an earlier point in the discussion of this measure I mentioned the fact that the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) had not brought before us those independent opinions which had been presented to this high court of parliament on earlier occasions when other similar measures were under consideration, which gave the views of experienced constitutional lawyers in regard to the constitutionality of this measure.

I recognize the fact that there is no requirement that such opinions shall be produced. I would like to have the unqualified assurance of the Minister of Justice that he has received no opinion from any of those with whom he has discussed this subject which suggested the possibility that this measure now before us might be ultra vires.

Mr. Garson: This present bill?

Mr. Drew: Yes.

Mr. Garson: I am very glad to give my hon. friend the assurance that there has been no suggestion from any source whatsoever that it might be ultra vires.

Mr. Drew: The minister has stated he has received no suggestion of that kind. I would point out that this measure deals with precisely the same subject matter that section 14 of the Dominion Trade and Industry Commission Act dealt with in 1935, when that act was passed. It is perfectly true that the act which was passed in 1935 provided a permissible mechanism that would have legalized arrangements of the very kind which are now to be declared illegal, without any reservation and without any qualification.

I do suggest that it may be well to remember the grounds upon which the act of 1935 was declared invalid, and also to remember certain subsequent legislation which has had some bearing on the extent to which this parliament could go in dealing with matters ordinarily under the jurisdiction of the provincial governments, under the device of making it appear that it is a criminal offence or something relating to trade and commerce, or some other subject that would come within federal jurisdiction.

As the Prime Minister knows so well, there were two cases referred first to the Supreme Court of Canada and later, in 1936, to the privy council. One was a reference in regard to section 498A of the Criminal Code, and the other was a reference in regard to the Dominion Trade and Industry Commission Act. The Prime Minister acted as one of the counsel for the Attorney General of Canada in those references.

In the reference in regard to section 498A which was first heard by the Supreme Court of Canada and later on appeal by the privy council, there were certain references that I do suggest have some bearing on this measure now before us. In the judgment of the Supreme Court of Canada, in the matter of a reference as to whether the parliament of Canada had legislative jurisdiction to enact section 498A of the Criminal Code, being chapter 56 of the Statutes of Canada for 1935, the judgment of Chief Justice Duff, I find these comments:

> The prohibitions seem to be aimed at the prevention of practices which parliament conceives to be inimical to the public welfare; and each of the offences is declared in explicit terms to be an indictable offence.

Later in the same judgment the chief justice said:

> It is also well settled that the parliament of Canada cannot acquire jurisdiction over a subject which belongs exclusively to the provinces by attaching penal sanctions to legislation which in its pith and substance is legislation in relation to that subject in its provincial aspects alone.

That is the point which it seems to me should be in the minds of hon. members when they consider this aspect of the problem; that it is the pith and substance of the legislation, the pith and substance of the subject matter before the house, which must be considered in deciding whether this is in fact within the jurisdiction of the parliament of Canada or whether, under the British North America Act, it falls within the exclusive jurisdiction of the provincial legislatures and their governments.

When this came before the privy council section 14 was not actually dealt with. But there is one statement in the judgment of the privy council that I would like to read, because it follows these thoughts. It is this:

> The basis of that decision is that there is no other criterion of "wrongness" than the intention of the legislature in the public interest to prohibit the act or omission made criminal.

That is one quotation I wanted to read. The other quotation from the judgment of the privy council is this:

> The only limitation on the plenary power of the dominion to determine what shall or shall not be criminal is the condition that parliament shall not in the guise of enacting criminal legislation in truth and in substance encroach on any of the classes of subjects enumerated in section 92.

I have placed on the record those short quotations from the judgments of the Supreme Court of Canada and the privy council. I should like to correct one statement. I said they had not dealt with section 14, but it was really dealing with the question of an appeal in connection with section 498A, both to the Supreme Court of Canada and to the privy council.

Mr. Garson: I wonder if my hon. friend would read at the conclusion of the sentence that he finished the very next sentence. I think that will clarify his point.

Mr. Drew: I am going to read exactly what I have chosen to read and the Minister of Justice can read any part he sees fit. They are extensive judgments and I do not intend to read them into the record in their entirety.

Mr. Garson: Just the one sentence.

Mr. Drew: If the Minister of Justice wishes to read any part afterward I shall be happy to have him do so. I do wish to correct the record in that respect, that the privy council judgment I was referring to was a judgment in regard to section 498A of the Criminal Code. The other reference was in relation to the Dominion Trade and Industry Commission Act which was passed in 1935 and which was referred to the Supreme Court of Canada to express its opinion as to the constitutionality of the act.

I should like to quote from the judgment of Chief Justice Duff. He was dealing with the arrangement for the approval of agreements in relation to prices and other arrangements of the very kind we are discussing now, along with other arrangements in industry or commerce, and he had this to say:

As to section 14, we cannot perceive any ground for holding that the enactments of this section are necessarily incidental to the exercise of any powers of the dominion in relation to the criminal law. Nor can the section, we think, be sustained as legislation in relation to the regulation of trade and commerce consistently with the passage quoted from the judgment of the judicial committee in Snider's case (1), in the reasons given in the judgment upon the reference concerning the Natural Products Marketing Act. It is to be observed that this section contemplates action by the commission and by the governor in council in respect of individual agreements which may relate to trade that is entirely local.

If confined to external trade and interprovincial trade, the section might well be competent under head No. 2 of section 91; and if the legislation were in substance concerned with such trade, incidental legislation in relation to local trade necessary in order to prevent the defeat of competent provisions might also be competent; but as it stands, we think this section is invalid.

That judgment refers to a section which would have permitted, in cases where it was demonstrably in the public interest that such agreements should be permitted, agreements of the very nature which would be prohibited by the legislation now before us. That being so, I think the question naturally arises as to whether we should not have a great deal more information before us when we are called upon to pass a bill of this kind, when the possibility is raised that it might be ultra vires.

I do want to deal with one other aspect of this problem. There has been a very general impression that the parliament of Canada could declare almost anything a criminal offence, and that the courts were almost bound to accept the declaration by parliament that an act might be a criminal offence. I question if sufficient attention has yet been paid to the grounds upon which the privy council dealt with the margarine case as recently as earlier this year, at the time they had before them an appeal from the judgment of the Supreme Court of Canada. I submit that the case to which I have referred and which is described as "in re a reference as to the validity of section 5(a) of the Dairy Industry Act, Revised Statutes of Canada, 1927, chapter 45. Canadian Federation of Agriculture, appellants; and Attorney General for Quebec and others, respondents" indicates that there have been very real limitations placed upon the authority of this parliament to declare any act to be a criminal act. I wish to quote from that judgment which is reported in Law Reports, Appeal Cases, 1951, 179, at pages 181 and 182, as follows:

The first main submission is that s. 5 (a) of the Dairy Industry Act is legislation in relation to "the regulation of trade and commerce" and therefore validly enacted under head 2 of s. 91 of the British North America Act, 1867. Secondly, s. 5 (a) and the appropriate penal provision in s. 10 of the act, is legislation in relation to "the criminal law" under s. 91, head 27, of the act of 1867. Thirdly, s. 5 (a) is a law in relation to a matter not coming within the classes of subjects assigned exclusively to the legislatures of the provinces, and is therefore within the residuary power conferred by the opening words of s. 91.

I pass to page 196 of the judgment of the privy council, and I should like to read into the record several paragraphs of this judgment because it seems to me they place this whole subject on a different basis. I feel that they should be before the members of this house who are called upon to pass judgment on whether or not the parliament of Canada is going to assume responsibility for a measure that may conceivably be beyond our jurisdiction. I start to quote at page 196 of the judgment of the privy council, as follows:

Their lordships' views on this branch of the case may be happily stated by a quotation from the judgments of the majority in the supreme court.

Rand, J., said (83): "That object (i.e., the object of prohibition), as I must find it, is economic and the legislative purpose, to give trade protection to the dairy industry in the production of and sale of butter; to benefit one group of persons as against competitors in business in which, in the absence of the legislation, the latter would be free to engage in the provinces. To forbid manufacture and sale for such an end is prima facie to deal directly with the civil rights of individuals in relation to particular trade within the provinces; Shannon v. Lower Mainland Dairy Board (84). The public interest in this regulation lies obviously in the trade effects: it is annexed to the legislative subject matter and follows the latter in its allocation to the one or other legislature. But to use it as a support for the legislation in the aspect of criminal law would mean that the dominion under its authority in that field, by forbidding the manufacture or sale of particular products, could, in what it considered a sound trade policy, not only interdict a substantial part of the economic life of one section of Canada, but do so for the benefit of that of another. Whatever the scope of the regulation of interprovincial trade, it is hard to conceive of a more insidious form of encroachment on a contemporary jurisdiction. This conclusion is not in conflict with Attorney General for British Columbia v. Attorney General for Canada (85). (Section 498A of the Criminal Code.) There, the essential nature of the legislation was not the equalization of civil rights between competitors or promoting the interest of one trade as against another; it was the safeguarding of the public against the evil consequences of certain fetters upon free and equal competition. There is no like purpose here; there is nothing of a general or injurious nature to be abolished or removed; it is a matter of preferring certain local trade to others."

With these observations their lordships entirely agree, and they are fatal to counsel's second argument in support of the appeal. That argument would have had more weight if it had been possible to contend that the object of the prohibition was to exclude from Canada substances injurious to health. In support of their third argument, counsel relied principally on Russell v. Regina (86), and the recent case of Attorney General for Ontario v. Canada Temperance Federation (87), in which Russell's case (86), not for the first time, was considered and commented upon. In the latter case Viscount Simon, in delivering the judgment of the board, said (88):

"In their lordships' opinion, the true test must be found in the real subject matter of the legislation: If it is such that it goes beyond local or provincial concern or interests and must from its inherent nature be the concern of the dominion as a whole (as, for example, in the Aeronautics case (89) and the Radio case (90)), then it will fall within the competence of the dominion parliament as a matter affecting the peace, order and good government of Canada, though it may in another aspect touch on matters specially reserved to the provincial legislatures. War and pestilence, no doubt, are instances: so, too, may be the drink or drug traffic, or the carrying of arms.

In Russell v. Regina (86), Sir Montague Smith gave as an instance of valid dominion legislation a law which prohibited or restricted the sale or exposure of cattle having a contagious disease. Nor is the validity of the legislation, when due to its inherent nature, affected because there may still be room for enactments by a provincial legislature dealing with an aspect of the same subject in so far as it specially affects that province." This passage must, however, be considered with the words used by Lord Atkin when delivering the judgment of the board in the Labour conventions case (91): "But the validity of the legislation under the general words of section 91 was sought to be established not in relation to the treaty-making power alone, but also as being concerned with matters of such general importance as to have attained 'such dimensions as to affect' the body politic, and to have 'ceased to be merely local or provincial', and to have 'become a matter of national concern'. It is interesting to notice how often the words used by Lord Watson in Attorney-General for Ontario v. Attorney-General for the dominion (92) have unsuccessfully been used in attempts to support encroachments on the provincial legislative powers given by section 92. They laid down no principle of constitutional law, and were cautious words intended to safeguard possible eventualities which no one at the time had any interest or desire to define. The law of Canada on this branch of constitutional law has been stated with such force and clarity by the Chief Justice in his judgment in the reference concerning the Natural Products Marketing Act (93) dealing with the six acts there referred to, that their lordships abstained from stating it afresh. The Chief Justice, naturally from his point of view, excepted legislation to fulfil treaties. On this their lordships have expressed their opinion. But subject to this, they agree with and adopt what was there said. They consider that the law is finally settled by the current of cases cited by the Chief Justice on the principles declared by him.

It is only necessary to call attention to the phrases in the various cases, "abnormal circumstances", "exceptional conditions", "standard of necessity", (Board of Commerce case (94)), "some extraordinary peril to the national life of Canada", "highly exceptional", "epidemic of pestilence", (Snider's case (95)), to show how far the present case is from the conditions which may override the normal distribution of powers in sections 91 and 92. The few pages of the chief justice's judgment will, it is to be hoped, form the locus classicus of the law on this point, and preclude further disputes." Their lordships think it sufficient to say, in answer to this third argument, that the prohibition now under consideration relates to civil rights within each of the provinces and that neither the facts set out in the order of reference, nor any other fact of which their lordships could take judicial notice, lead to the conclusion that there exists in the present case the conditions which may override the normal distribution of powers in sections 91 and 92.

May I say, Mr. Speaker, that if the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) feels I have not read sufficient of that judgment I shall be very pleased if he will extend the quotation.

An hon. Member: Read it all.

Mr. Drew: But I would point out that this judgment has emphasized and re-emphasized that it is not only the safeguarding of the public interest that has to be borne in mind; that it is not merely a question of removing certain fetters upon free and equal competition, but that there must be some suggestion of a criminal aspect to the conduct which is under consideration. The judgments referred to with approval by the privy council have pointed out that where this principle has been supported it has not been under any loose doctrine that the parliament of Canada may declare anything to be criminal, but that it is something that relates to abnormal circumstances, exceptional conditions, that there is some great necessity, that there is extraordinary peril to the national life of Canada, that there is some epidemic or pestilence or something of that kind which must be dealt with.

These are the standards of emergency. These are the standards which are supposed to apply before this high court of parliament assumes the responsibility of declaring an act to be criminal. I am not presuming to place before this high court of parliament any dogmatic contention that the bill is necessarily ultra vires. Every lawyer who has been before our courts, every lawyer who has had such a wide experience in matters of this kind as the Prime Minister of Canada in his practice in earlier days, knows that even lawyers of the widest experience have on occasion found with surprise that the judges did not agree with the opinion they had originally expressed. I fancy that the Prime Minister, looking back over his years of experience, is not unique, and that he can perhaps recall cases where the court came to conclusions which were not entirely in line with the view he had originally expressed in regard to a subject of this kind. The fact that there is the possibility of such wide disagreement among highly trained legal minds is evidenced by the disagreement in the cases to which I have referred. I may say that not the present Prime Minister alone will recall that fact, because there is another member of this house who will recall, as a matter of family interest, the fact that there was a disagreement between the judges of the Supreme Court of Canada concerning the reference which had been placed before them on this subject.

There are great differences of opinion, and the balance sometimes goes one way and sometimes another. There are discernible trends in the judgments that are given. Sometimes one may detect a trend going on for a long time in one particular direction, and then the trend seems to go the other way. It may well be that at this time the trend of the judgments is to return to the original concept of confederation in which the rights conferred upon provincial legislatures were, in fact, to be exercised by provincial legislatures, and that the devices which were employed on so many occasions to override provincial jurisdiction should not be supported by the courts.

Believing as I do that the strength and unity of this country will depend upon a recognition of that distribution of power which was originally intended by those who drafted our federal constitution, I would hope that the tendency of our own Supreme Court of Canada would be in that direction. If it is, it may well be that the Supreme Court of Canada would hold that this subject matter now before us is the same subject matter that was before the house at an earlier time when this house passed the Dominion Trade and Industry Commission Act, which included section 14 that was declared to be ultra vires because the subject matter of that section was beyond the jurisdiction of the parliament of Canada. I submit the court may well decide that if the subject matter was neither trade and commerce nor criminal law and it was not competent for parliament to pass that section with its permissive authority, then it is no more competent for this parliament to pass a section which follows a strictly negative course and places an overriding prohibition on all transactions of this nature.

Where is the criminal offence? We still have not been told. It has been suggested that this is not a desirable practice. It has been suggested by at least one member on the other side that this is something in the nature of a reaffirmation of historic Liberalism. I hope it is not the same kind of reaffirmation which the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier) placed before us when he introduced the amendments to the Public Works Act a few days ago. However, the Minister of Public Works must accept some responsibility for our pertinacity in continuing this debate, because we were successful in convincing him that it was desirable to change certain of the provisions in that bill. With that example before us, we still hope the government may recognize that there are reasons why this legislation should not be passed.

Mr. Speaker, we have not yet been told who the criminals are. There have been these statements about the friends of big business. I know there have been speeches about the desire to protect the manufacturer; but I recall that the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) did not give us examples of excessive profits by manufacturers. He gave us examples of what he regarded to be excessive write-ups between the price at which the manufacturer sold the article and the price at which the merchant sold it. I gather from this that he regards the merchant as the criminal in this case. Since that is the only thing he has put before us that by any stretch of the imagination can be suggested as supporting evidence for what he is doing, that is the only interpretation I can place upon it. I suggest that in so far as the responsibility of this high court of parliament is concerned, in declaring that this long established practice is in the nature of a criminal act we would be doing something very much like the communist government of east Germany did two days ago.

Mr. Fournier (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): Oh, oh.

Mr. Drew: I hear one of the Liberal members to the right making sounds that I cannot quite diagnose. It may be that it is so close to Christmas he is still suffering some pain. I would suggest that the hon. member make more intelligible sounds, and I shall attempt to deal with them.

I was simply pointing to the fact that I heard with interest over the radio that the government of east Germany had declared it a criminal offence to chew gum. It was declared to be a criminal offence because it was not regarded as being in keeping with the high purposes of the government of east Germany that they should permit the people to follow this American practice, as they described it. I am only referring to this fact to point out that it has been our habit to be sure there is some criminal nature to the act before we declare something to be criminal. If it is merely a commercial transaction then we should not, under the guise of dealing with criminal law, try to prevent something that can be prevented in some other way. Mr. Justice Rand, in the judgment in the margarine case which was quoted with approval by the privy council, made it quite clear that where the subject matter is really commercial law or relates to commercial practices, it cannot become a criminal offence by simply declaring it to be criminal. We are still left with the fact that the only reason even suggested so far for the haste with which this is being put forward is to be found on the advertising pages of the newspapers which are appearing now. Here I see an advertisement, for instance, in yesterday's Toronto Telegram: "Simpsons Annual Fashion Clearance", and below that a great number of articles listed for sale, a number of them at half price. Then on another page of the Toronto Telegram I see: "Eatons Thursday After-Christmas Clearances". There again I see one subheading which reads, "Reduced 20 per cent to 33⅓ per cent", and I see another subheading which reads, "Reduced One-Third to One-Half".

Mr. Pouliot: Is that ladies' wear or men's wear?

Mr. Drew: Just so there may be no suggestion that it is only in the case of these larger businesses that reductions are already being advertised, may I say that in my own mail I received an announcement of a footwear sale advertising a discount of 25 per cent. So it goes. But mark this fact. The advertisements are quite clear; they are annual sales, they have been annual sales and they will doubtless continue to be annual sales. But the haste, of course, is to try to identify this legislation in some way with sales that are already under way.

Mr. Fournier (Maisonneuve - Rosemont): What is your opinion about it?

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Rowe: Your policy is too late.

Mr. Drew: I notice that the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Croll) this afternoon said: "What is worrying the leader of the opposition is that in addition to lower prices in January and February they may continue to drop." No, Mr. Speaker, that is not what is worrying me, and that is not what is worrying anyone else in this party. We have been urging that the government take steps which would make it certain that prices would drop. We have pointed out that one step they could have taken at any time during this session, and still could, would be to introduce appropriate legislation to remove the 25 per cent increase in the sales tax passed earlier this year, to remove the unnecessary excise taxes that were imposed earlier this year, and to reduce the increases in other taxes which are building up the surplus that is mounting month by month.

Mr. Howe: Why not eliminate all taxes?

Mr. Drew: Oh, no. It is not a case of eliminating all taxes; but it is quite clear that a great many taxes could have been eliminated in the public interest and still keep the revenue within the budget that was passed by this house, and actually keep the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) within his duty to this parliament which only authorized him to raise the amount set out in his budget.

Mr. Bradette: What about Ontario? A surplus is all right there.

Mr. Drew: There is a vast difference between suggesting that there be no taxes at all and suggesting that the government could well remove those taxes which have built up the huge surplus which has proved to be so unnecessary.

I have pointed out, Mr. Speaker, that it is not possible for anyone either on this side of the house or on the other side to say there can be no chance that the Supreme Court of Canada would not declare that this legislation is outside the jurisdiction of the parliament of Canada. This law which would make a criminal offence of practices that have been accepted for generations certainly should not be put into effect if there is the slightest possibility that later it may be upset; because it would be a difficult thing to unscramble the omelet which had been cooked by legislation of this kind. There is one way that situation can be avoided. It is a method that has found approval by this government and by some of those now sitting in this house. That method is to refer it to the Supreme Court of Canada. That is what Mr. King urged with regard to measures that were passed some years ago.

An hon. Member: And received a lot of criticism.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, when one of the ministers cannot even find his own seat in the house, perhaps it is not necessary to take too seriously the comments he is making.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, this legislation not only is similar to legislation that was before the house at the time Mr. King so strongly advocated reference to the courts; it in fact deals with precisely the same subject matter as that dealt with in one act which Mr. King said should go before the courts; and when he came to power in 1935 that was the course he followed. I would therefore think this course is one which should find acceptance by those who followed for so long his guidance in regard to constitutional matters. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe):

That Bill No. 36 be not now read the second time but that its further consideration be deferred until the constitutionality thereof has been submitted to and approved by the Supreme Court of Canada.

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the amendment moved by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) requires, I submit, something more substantial to support it than the legal opinions with which he has been regaling the members of the house for the past three-quarters of an hour. During the course of his remarks he asked me whether the Department of Justice or the combines branch thereof had received any opinion from any lawyer to the effect that the legislation now before the house was beyond the powers of this parliament to pass. My answer was that we had received no such opinion. I think, however, that you, Mr. Speaker, and the members of this house are quite entitled to assume—and I am sure that you properly do assume—that when the government introduces a measure of this kind the necessary precautions are taken, as a matter of routine, to make as sure as we can that any legislation which is submitted by the government is within the power of parliament. We would certainly be derelict in our duty if we were to bring into this house legislation which, in the opinion of the law officers of the crown, was beyond the power of the house to pass. I may say that in the present instance the law officers of the crown entertain no doubt whatever as to the constitutionality of the bill which is now before hon. members.

If I may, I should like to make one or two observations with regard to the argument which has just been presented by the leader of the opposition. Inasmuch as we had no reason to suppose that this bill would be attacked upon the grounds on which he has just chosen to attack it, I shall have to deal with his remarks on rising immediately after he has finished making them, and therefore I may not take up every single point which he has made. I must say that with some of the points he has made I am in agreement, but with many others I am in profound disagreement. He says he thinks it is necessary that an act to be proscribed by legislation of the character that is now before us should be criminal in character. Well, I should be very curious to know as to whether he thinks that section—

Mr. Drew: I do not want to interrupt the hon. member but, Mr. Speaker, I would point out that the motion has not yet been read to the house.

Mr. Speaker: I should have read it, but the minister rose before I had an opportunity to do so. Mr. Drew moves, seconded by Mr. Rowe:

That Bill No. 36 be not now read the second time but that its further consideration be deferred until the constitutionality thereof has been submitted to and approved by the Supreme Court of Canada.

Mr. Garson: I was saying, Mr. Speaker, that I was curious to know what opinion my hon. friend would entertain of section 498A of the Criminal Code which, as he will recall, was enacted by the Bennett government in 1935, if I remember rightly. The first part of that section reads as follows:

Every person engaged in trade or commerce or industry who

(a) is a party or privy to, or assists in, any transaction of sale which discriminates, to his knowledge, against competitors of the purchaser in that any discount, rebate or allowance is granted to the purchaser over and above any discount, rebate or allowance available at the time of such transaction to the aforesaid competitors in respect of a sale of goods of like quality and quantity—

—is guilty of an indictable offence, and so on. I suggest to my hon. friend, and I think upon reflection he will probably agree, that section 498A (a) which I have just read deals with a matter which but for section 498A (a) would be a commercial transaction lawfully within the power of those who took part in it. Thus that section, 498A, as my hon. friend himself has indicated, has been the subject matter of a reference to determine its constitutionality. The case went before the Supreme Court of Canada, and the section was there held to be intra vires of parliament, with Justices Cannon and Crockett dissenting. Then it went from the Supreme Court of Canada to the privy council where it was held as reported in 1937, 1 Western Weekly Reports at page 319, and I quote this particularly because my hon. friend's quotation came to an abrupt stop at the very moment when he was beginning to get warm and come to the real point.

Mr. Sinclair: How typical.

Mr. Garson: My hon. friend quoted this:

> The only limitation on the plenary power of the dominion to determine what shall or shall not be criminal is the condition that parliament shall not in the guise of enacting criminal legislation in truth and in substance encroach on any of the classes of subjects enumerated in section 92.

That is, as coming within provincial jurisdiction. At that particular point my hon. friend came to an abrupt stop. The next sentence is this:

> It is no objection that it does in fact affect them. If a genuine attempt to amend the criminal law, it may obviously affect previously existing civil rights. The object of an amendment—

And I commend this particularly to my hon. friend.

> The object of an amendment of the criminal law as a rule is to deprive the citizen of the right to do that which apart from the amendment he could lawfully do.

In other words, as applied to section 498A, here is a commercial transaction previously engaged in with perfect legality. Parliament comes along and by section 498A says: This much you previously did. You no longer can do it by reason of the enactment of this section.

Their Lordships go on further in their judgment to say this:

> In the present case there seems to be no reason for supposing that the dominion are using the criminal law as a pretence or pretext or that the legislature is in pith and substance only interfering with civil rights in the province. Counsel for New Brunswick called the attention of the board to the report of the royal commission on price spreads, which is referred to in the order of reference. It probably would not be contended that the statement of the minister in the order of reference that the section was enacted to give effect to the recommendations of the royal commission bound the provinces or must necessarily be treated as conclusive by the board. But when the suggestion is made that the legislation was not in truth criminal legislation, but was in substance merely an encroachment on the provincial field, the existence of the report appears to be a material circumstance.

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that there is this parallel between the constitutionality of section 498A of the Criminal Code and the validity of the legislation which is now before us; that, as was referred to in this selection which I have just quoted, section 498A was preceded by a report of the royal commission on price spreads which was referred to in the order of reference, and that the legislation we have here covers the specific recommendations of the MacQuarrie committee. Therefore it would seem to the law officers of the crown that the constitutionality of section 37A, which is the operative portion of the present legislation, would appear to depend upon the same considerations that determined the constitutional validity of section 498A, and that there is not much doubt about it at all, certainly there is not sufficient doubt about it to warrant the course which is recommended in the present amendment before the house, namely, that we should go no further but should refer the matter to the courts to determine whether we are acting within the powers of parliament.

In the course of his discussion my hon. friend went on to say that he was somewhat disturbed by other cases which had been decided, notably the one dealing with section 14 of the Dominion Trade and Industry Commission Act. Perhaps the following selection from the judgment of Chief Justice Sir Lyman Duff might dispel some of the doubts that he entertained. Chief Justice Sir Lyman Duff said this:

> As to section 14, we cannot perceive any ground for holding that the enactments of this section are necessarily incidental to the exercise of any powers of the dominion in relation to the criminal law. Nor can the section, we think, be sustained as legislation in relation to the regulation of trade and commerce consistently with the passage quoted from the judgment of the judicial committee in Snider's case (1), in the reasons given in the judgment upon the reference concerning the Natural Products Marketing Act. It is to be observed that this section contemplates action by the commission and by the governor in council in respect of individual agreements which may relate to trade that is entirely local.

That is not interprovincial or international trade, but trade wholly within a province. Then his lordship the chief justice goes on to say:

> If confined to external trade and interprovincial trade, the section might well be competent under head No. 2 of section 91; and if the legislation were in substance concerned with such trade, incidental legislation in relation to local trade necessary in order to prevent the defeat of competent provisions might also be competent; but as it stands, we think this section is invalid.

Another case which apparently gave my hon. friend considerable mental anxiety, which he wishes to invoke as a basis for the amendment he has moved, was the judgment of the privy council in the margarine case. In that connection I should like to read some of the same selections from the privy council judgment that were read by my hon.

friend; but, for some reason or other, I take a different meaning from them than he took.

The real point at issue in that case, I submit, was that in pith and substance, it was a law for the protection and encouragement of the dairy industry in Canada. And in the course of dealing with it their lordships of the privy council referred with approval to the judgment of Mr. Justice Rand, who had found that the object of the prohibition was economic, and the legislative purpose thereof was—and this is the nub of the matter, I suggest—to give trade protection to the dairy industry in the production and sale of butter. And then I quote from Mr. Justice Rand these words: "To benefit one group of persons as against competitors in business in which, in the absence of the legislation, the latter would be free to engage in the provinces." In other words it was distinguishing as between the civil rights of one group of people and the civil rights of another group of people. Again their lordships quote Mr. Justice Rand as follows:

"But to use it"—

And they are referring to the public interest in the regulation.

—"as a support for the legislation in the aspect of criminal law would mean that the dominion under its authority in that field, by forbidding the manufacture or sale of particular products, could, in what it considered a sound trade policy, not only interdict a substantial part of the economic life of one section of Canada, but do so for the benefit of that of another."

And that is the point. Then their lordships again quote Mr. Justice Rand, and they are now referring, in the course of the discussion of this margarine case, to section 498A of the Criminal Code:

There the essential nature of the legislation was not the equalization of civil rights between competitors or promoting the interest of one grade as against another; it was the safeguarding of the public against the evil consequences of certain fetters upon free and equal competition.

I would like to know what the purpose of the legislation before this house is, if it is not the safeguarding of the public against the evil consequences of certain fetters upon free and equal competition, namely resale price maintenance.

And as their lordships went on to further quote Mr. Justice Rand in the margarine case:

There is no like purpose here; there is nothing of a general or injurious nature to be abolished or removed; it is a matter of preferring certain local trade to others.

In my view it was upon that basis that the legislation in question was held to be ultra vires. I might say therefore in conclusion that not a single principle my hon. friend has sought to establish in his lengthy remarks offers a proper foundation for the amendment he has moved.

On motion of Mr. Chevrier the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Tomorrow we will proceed with this debate and then take up all other legislation. If the Secretary of State for External Affairs is here we will take up his resolution first.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to the order of the house passed on November 2, 1951.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, December 28, 1951

The house met at eleven o'clock.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

ARMY CLOTHING—PLACING OF ORDERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. G. Blair (Lanark): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Defence Production (Mr. Howe), but since he is not here I will ask it of his parliamentary assistant. Is it true that the Canadian government has placed orders for army clothing in Britain, United States or France?

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Defence Production): Mr. Speaker, I would think it is not true, but I had better check the answer and make a more detailed one. I may say that I have noticed that certain representatives of labour have been holding meetings in the constituency which the hon. member represents, and I assume that his question arises out of some of the statements made in connection with those meetings. If he will let the matter stand as a notice, I will get him full information and give a precise answer.

TRADE

GLOVES AND OTHER TEXTILES—INVESTIGATION REGARDING DUMPING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Lake Centre): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Revenue. I asked a similar one earlier in the session. Is the minister now in a position to say what is being done to meet the unfair competition of countries behind the iron curtain, such as Czechoslovakia, shipping into this country gloves and other textiles to the detriment of Canadians?

Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, as indicated in my statement on December 6 in reply to a question asked by the hon. member for Lake Centre, this matter was drawn to my attention also by a number of members as well as Canadian manufacturers, and it has been receiving our active attention for some time. An examination of the invoices covering these importations does not disclose any evidence of dumping as defined by the customs tariff, but we are endeavouring to ascertain the values at which these goods are sold for consumption in Czechoslovakia. As you will appreciate, this is a somewhat difficult task but we have been in discussion with the Czech authorities with a view to satisfying ourselves as to the proper values.

As I indicated in my previous statement, there are great difficulties in getting the type of information which we should have in order to determine whether or not dumping actually exists. It is true that there are fairly large importations from Czechoslovakia which act to the detriment of our Canadian manufacturers but, according to the law, the customs tariff, we must determine whether or not goods are being dumped; and the matter of determination is one of price and not of quality. We attempt to get the fair market price in the country of export and to see how that compares with prices under similar conditions in our own country.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I thank the minister for his reply. Is it not a fact that the United States has found it necessary to act in order to protect the Americans from this kind of thing?

Mr. McCann: I understand it has, Mr. Speaker; but I do not know whether that is done for economic reasons or for political reasons.

Mr. Graydon: If those reasons are good enough for them, they should be good enough for us.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

STRATEGIC CHEMICALS—REPORTED SHIPMENTS TO HUNGARY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) or to whoever can speak for him in this matter. There has been an extensive discussion in the press of the charge made by the commerce department of the United States that the Continental Pharma Company of Montreal has been secretly exporting strategic chemicals to communist Hungary. I should like to ask what information the government can give us about this matter and what steps have been taken, from the point of view of the Canadian government, to deal with this situation.

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I have not had notice of the question, so I cannot give a full answer at this time. I noticed the reference in the paper yesterday, and as I understood it, the action taken in the United States was based not on the fact that they were secretly exporting them, but rather that these exports were carried on contrary to the export regulations of that country. The matter of whether or not any exports had been made from this country was being examined into yesterday. I have not full information, and I cannot give any further useful information at the moment. If there is anything that can be added I will bring it forward.

Mr. Drew: Since the parliamentary assistant is taking this as notice and will be making inquiry, I would point out that the opening paragraph of the Associated Press dispatch on this subject reads as follows:

> The Department of Commerce said today a New York exporter, a Canadian and a Belgian firm have been ordered barred from U.S. export trade for secretly shipping strategic war chemicals to communist Hungary.

That is the quotation from the Associated Press dispatch, and I am merely placing it before the parliamentary assistant so that he will understand my use of the word "secret".

Mr. McIlraith: I have not the press dispatch with me. I saw the press dispatches, but I do not know that I should comment on the reading of them into the record, and I do not know to what extent in the reply I should seek to deal with press dispatches. I think if I can deal with the facts of the situation instead of dealing with press dispatches it will probably be more effective.

OLD AGE SECURITY

ESTABLISHMENT OF TRIBUNAL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gordon Graydon (Peel): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. I should have given him notice of it, but it did not come to my attention until this morning. I notice by the press that a board is being set up in various places to deal with the question of proof of age in connection with old age assistance to those in the 65 to 69 class. I was wondering whether that board will also have any jurisdiction over those over 70 who are attempting to qualify for old age security, but who have difficulty in proving their age.

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): The hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Laing) spoke to me yesterday about this very matter, and the hon. member for The Battlefords (Mr. Bater) told me earlier this morning that he proposed to ask a question not precisely the same but along the same line.

Mr. Graydon: I am in good company.

Mr. Martin: As my hon. friend says, he is in good company.

Mr. Graydon: Gosh!

Mr. Martin: The Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) said "For a change", but I would not agree with him. I may say that the regulations which have been formulated pursuant to the Old Age Security Act, but which have not yet been tabled in this house, will provide for an ad hoc tribunal representing the pensioner, the government and a third party in the community, at no expense, simply to assist the department in doubtful cases. But lest my reply give the impression that there is undue difficulty, let me say again to my hon. friend that over 95 per cent of those who are entitled to apply have done so.

QUESTION AS TO RETROACTIVE PAYMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. K. Fraser (Peterborough West): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. If an application for old age pension is sent in on or before January 1, 1952, but the applicant has not been able to secure proof of age before the end of January or February, will the old age pension date back to January, 1952?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): I always appreciate the nature of my hon. friend's questions. In view of its importance I would want to give some consideration before making a reply.

NEWFOUNDLAND

R.C.A.F. TRANSPORT ON SPECIAL FLIGHT FROM ST. JOHN'S TO GANDER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I find that on November 26 I directed to the Prime Minister a question, of which I had given notice at that time, in regard to the use of a Royal Canadian Air Force plane on November 22 to make a special flight from St. John's, Newfoundland, to Gander, under somewhat unusual circumstances. At that time the Prime Minister indicated that he would make further inquiries into these circumstances. I wonder whether he has that information now. If not he can take this as notice and give us the information he has obtained.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I know that the Acting Minister of National Defence had obtained information, and he showed it to me at that time. I know that he had a note about it in his folder to be used when the matter was again raised. I will endeavour to get that note and make use of it at the earliest possible moment.

KOREA

INFORMATION ON CEASE-FIRE NEGOTIATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Yesterday the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) asked for information concerning developments in connection with the cease-fire negotiations in Korea. I think I can give that information now. It was agreed in Korea on November 27 that if the military armistice agreement was not signed within thirty days—and I am quoting from this agreement:

> The subdelegations shall revise, immediately prior to the signing of the military armistice agreement, the above military demarcation line and the demilitarized zone in accordance with the changes which have occurred in the actual line of contact between both sides so that the revised military demarcation line will coincide exactly with the line of contact between both sides immediately prior to the signing of the military armistice agreement and will constitute the military demarcation line for the duration of the military armistice.

That is a quotation from the agreement made a month ago. At ten o'clock yesterday morning our time the thirty-day period from November 27 expired without any military armistice agreement having been signed. This means that after discussion which is now taking place—which is still taking place—on arrangements for supervision of the armistice and arrangements for the exchange of prisoners, and on the final item on the agenda, the two teams will determine a new demarcation line based on the line of contact as it stands just before the signing of any armistice. Since November 27, however, there have been no substantial alterations in the line of contact, and the line now, therefore, is almost the same as the cease-fire line which was agreed to on November 27.

An alternative method of procedure would be for the two sides to agree on an amendment of the agreement of November 27, extending the thirty-day period. We have no information as yet as to whether such an extension has been agreed on.

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT

AMENDMENT TO FORBID THE FIXING OF SPECIFIC OR MINIMUM RESALE PRICES

The house resumed, from Thursday, December 27, consideration of the motion of Mr. Garson for the second reading of Bill No. 36, to amend the Combines Investigation Act.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to take part in this debate, but because there have been so many speeches—many of them more or less to the point—from the official opposition side of the house, I felt I should give some reasons why, as a member of the government, I was of the opinion that this legislation should be supported. For that reason I should like to speak briefly on the subject of the legislation which the government has proposed to deal with resale price maintenance.

Any delay in the consideration of this legislation, as the Prime Minister has said, is not in the government's view in the interests of the public at large. Either we are serious about this matter or we are not. Nor do I think that the alternative measures which have been proposed are likely to produce the results that the people of Canada want. Let me give you some reasons for believing that we should reject the tactics, the delaying tactics, which have been submitted as alternative proposals to this house by those who have moved various amendments, and those who have supported those amendments with speeches.

After the prolonged consideration that has been given to the proposed legislation on resale price maintenance, there is perhaps little for me to say. When I hear, however, members from the opposition side of the house suggest that this matter is being rushed through without due consideration to a conclusion, I wonder what more could reasonably be asked from this side of the house.

Hon. members will recall first of all that the royal commission on prices under the chairmanship of Professor Clifford Curtis of Queen's university was—and I quote his remarks—"impressed by the degree to which individual manufacturers fix the sale prices of their products, and so narrow the area in which price competition amongst wholesalers and retailers is operative."

That commission, which included a representative of the women of Canada, in the person of Mrs. Sutherland, and a prominent representative of the Quebec co-operative movement, Mr. Bois, recommended that the combines investigation commission give careful consideration and study to the problem, with a view to devising measures to deal with it.

Then, later on, we had the MacQuarrie committee, an impartial and distinguished group of Canadians who made a study of resale price maintenance and reached the unanimous recommendation that the practice is not in the public interest and should be made illegal. That was a unanimous recommendation, and there was no reservation to it whatever.

There has been criticism of that report on the ground that the committee did not obtain sufficient factual evidence. I am not much impressed by that kind of criticism. What I think is significant is that men like Mr. Justice MacQuarrie from Nova Scotia, and Mr. Curtis from British Columbia, Mr. Lamontagne from Quebec and Dr. Mackintosh from Queen's university, Kingston, Ontario, were satisfied that they had enough information to reach the unanimous conclusion that resale price maintenance is not in the public interest. I am quite sure that if they had felt that more information was required before reaching such a conclusion they would not have hesitated to say so.

Nevertheless a joint committee of parliament was established. That committee sat for days. It heard representations from leading organizations who did not agree with the findings of the MacQuarrie committee. Of course, the committee could have sat for a much longer period of time. After reading the evidence presented to the committee I am satisfied, and I think the great majority of members of the house are satisfied, that the MacQuarrie committee's conclusions were well founded and that there is every reason to take immediate action.

In addition to the study given to resale price maintenance by the royal commission on prices, by the MacQuarrie committee and the joint parliamentary committee, we have been discussing this matter in the house for many, many days.

But what is the position of the official opposition in the matter? The truth is that they have no policy. They would like to get credit from those who benefit from resale price maintenance for preventing the passage of the legislation. On the other hand, they attempt to justify their position to the consumers and the general public by asking for more consideration.

Yet the fact of the matter is that the official opposition have spent a good deal of the time during which they might have debated the merits of the legislation talking about not having enough time.

Yesterday the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) refuted the suggestion that the government is not wholeheartedly behind this legislation. I wish to associate myself most strongly with the words of the Prime Minister, as I am sure every member on this side of the house would want to do. It is my view that the legislation is in the public interest, in the interests of consumers; and because it is in the interests of consumers, it is also in the interest of manufacturers and the distributive trades as well.

An attempt has been made to create the impression that this legislation is detrimental to the business life of Canada. I see no reason to think that that will be the case. The legislation should result in increased competition among distributors. At least it will remove one of the barriers to competition. Is that a good thing? I believe that it is. I do not believe any efficient business need fear competition. I know that many businessmen, large and small, share this view and admire the government's courage in introducing this legislation.

It would have been possible, of course, for the government to shut its eyes to the problems created by the growing practice of resale price maintenance. We could have let well enough alone. But, as I see it, it is the duty of the government to be vigilant where the public interest is concerned. Resale price maintenance may be relatively harmless in some cases; but in other cases, as the Curtis commission, the MacQuarrie committee and the joint parliamentary committee have pointed out, it is a grave and growing abuse.

It is a fact that business prospers when it is free to serve the public to the best of its ability, with as few restrictions as possible, whether imposed by governments or by private arrangements.

On the whole, we know that Canadian business is efficient, and I would like to see it become more efficient, more able to supply Canadian consumers with goods of the highest quality at the lowest possible prices. The evidence we have before us from these various commissions and committees, and the facts that have come to my personal attention, lead me to believe that the practice of resale price maintenance does not lead to consumers obtaining full advantage of competition. That is why I support this legislation.

In my judgment it is not going to lead to any revolutionary change in business practices or in prices. But what change there is will be in the right direction. When prices could or should be reduced, those reductions will come about more readily and more quickly. There will be more flexibility in the system.

We shall, I believe, be better able to meet competition from imported goods. As hon. members are probably aware, there is already a good deal of competition for the Canadian consumer's dollar from producers in other countries. It is logical to believe that there will be more competition if, as we hope, the world recovers from its present difficulties and the imminent threat of war is removed. For that reason alone I think we should support all measures that help to make Canadian business more efficient and better able to hold its own. We cannot afford to become flabby and to rely upon restrictive practices to support the inefficient.

Merchants who find themselves with stocks of goods which are moving too slowly will be able to reduce their prices in order to overcome consumer resistance, without endangering their future sources of supply. Consumers will be able to shop about, to get greater advantage from being able to pay cash, or from finding some merchant who, because of location or volume or for some other reason, is able to offer goods at a lower price.

As several members have pointed out, the effect on the cost of living will probably not be very substantial. It may be that the effect upon the cost of living index itself will be quite modest, partly because the index does not fully reflect reductions below regular prices, but that is not a reason for not going ahead with the legislation. There are many anti-inflationary measures which do not individually and by themselves affect the cost of living very much, but they are worth doing, nevertheless, as part of a general policy of restraining price rises and bringing about price reductions.

Already there have been four amendments to this legislation moved by members of the official opposition. There has been more time consumed with reference to this legislation than has been consumed in connection with a number of other matters which the house thought and which members of the official opposition thought should have taken more time than in fact they did. What I am trying to say is that practically every alternative has been canvassed with reference to this legislation and I feel that the time has arrived —I think the house is of the same opinion— when we should no longer delay its passage. Therefore I move, seconded by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin):

That the question be now put.

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, as I understand it, the motion which has just been moved by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) is debatable.

It must have been interesting to the house—

Mr. Abbott: Oh, oh.

Mr. Fleming: If anybody should have less to say about talking again it is the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) whose contributions to the deliberations of the house in recent days have consisted simply of wisecracks which are not very funny.

Mr. Abbott: I never speak unless I have something to say.

Mr. Fleming: It appears that the Minister of Finance has turned over a new leaf in the last minute.

Mr. Speaker: I am sure that it will be easier for hon. members who speak to keep their remarks relevant to the bill if they are not interrupted. It is difficult for them to do so when there are so many interruptions.

Mr. Fleming: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It must be embarrassing at this particular stage when I think the house expected the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) to have his opportunity to conclude the debate by replying, to find another member of the government entering the debate and reading a prepared statement. I think it must have been pretty embarrassing to the Minister of Justice to sit there and, at the point where normally as mover of the motion that this bill be read a second time he would reply, to have to sit back and listen to one of his colleagues make a speech setting out the government line. The statement just read by the Minister of Transport simply followed the government line.

What purpose that statement was intended to serve apparently will be left to the house to guess, but the motion which has been put before the house at least exposes to naked view what has been attempted here by the government in various ways for some days past, that is, to throttle discussion on this bill and to prevent adequate consideration of the important subject involved in the measure.

The motion that the question be now put is designed to stop the discussion of the measure on second reading. This being the government's position, this being the determination of the government, I hope that hon. members who are now called to step into line and vote as the government demands will have in mind that they are in this way giving endorsement to government action to stop further discussion of one of the most important measures which have confronted the Canadian parliament.

The fact that this measure has already run the course of debate for some time, the fact that it has given rise to a good deal of discussion in the house and outside, the fact that it is a measure which demands and deserves the study of the house will create a lasting indictment of this attempt on the part of the government, or this further stage in the attempt that the government has made in recent days, to throttle discussion of the bill.

The Minister of Transport said something this morning about getting along with this measure, that there had been enough discussion already in the house. If we do not hear anything more from the government than we have heard thus far one question will remain unanswered to the end of time as far as this debate is concerned. That question is this: Why was it necessary that such haste be displayed in this whole undertaking, that the parliamentary committee should not have been permitted to conduct a proper, adequate and thorough investigation? Why was it so urgent that it should have been left to a Liberal majority in that parliamentary committee to deny a hearing to people whose businesses stand in jeopardy in the light of this measure? Why was it so urgent that people should be told, people who had serious interests at stake and serious views to lay before the parliamentary committee, that the committee had no time to hear them? Why was it that organizations representing thousands of retailers in this country were denied access to and hearing by that committee?

Those questions remain unanswered. The government says that it is necessary that the house proceed with haste. I want to say to the Minister of Transport, whose acquaintance with this subject may have been a little recent, that he has a great big question to answer, a question which remained unanswered in his speech this morning.

Here is a practice which has been established in many lines of retail merchandising. It is a practice that has existed in some lines of merchandise since early in the century, and in many other important lines for at least twenty-five years. That practice has existed for that length of time within the knowledge of this government which has been in office since 1935, and yet in all those years this government, with that practice existing right under its nose, did not make the slightest move to stop or interfere with it. But suddenly in the fall of 1951, like a bolt from the blue, without the slightest warning, it becomes a matter of life-and-death urgency. Why?

[Mr. Fleming.]

Let the Minister of Transport tell us why this practice has gone on under the nose of this government since the government came into office in October, 1935, for more than sixteen years, without their moving a finger to interfere with it. Let him tell us why in the fall of 1951 it has become a matter of life-and-death urgency, a matter which will brook no delay, a matter which could not even wait until there had been an adequate study and understanding of the matter in a parliamentary committee appointed for the purpose and then throttled by government decision?

We have been told that the father of the Combines Investigation Act was the late Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King. Mr. McGregor was the commissioner under the Combines Investigation Act all the way through the late Mr. King's tenure of office as prime minister—yes, up until the fall of 1949 when he resigned rather than submit to further indignities at the hands of this government and to being a knowing party to a continued breach of the law of this country by the government.

Since this legislation is pictured to us as a matter of life-and-death urgency, I tell the government and every Liberal member in this house who is being whipped into line to vote for second reading of this measure today that by their action they are condemning the government of the late Mr. Mackenzie King. They are condemning what Mr. McGregor has done or failed to do during his long period of service as commissioner under the Combines Investigation Act. That is precisely what they are doing today. The government is proposing a vote of condemnation and censure upon the inaction of the late Mr. Mackenzie King and upon Mr. McGregor's stewardship in office over these long years because nothing was done then, and now whereas we of the official opposition say that this measure should have adequate study, the government's headlong rush now constitutes a blanket condemnation of all that has gone before it. I hope government supporters will weigh that fact well. I hope they will not overlook the fact that today, if they fall into line at the cracking of the government whip, they are giving a vote of condemnation on the government for what it has left undone in the past.

I will tell you why the government was so desperately anxious to make a show of doing something this fall. It was because the cost of living has soared out of sight, and when the government was not prepared to abandon its outrageous taxation policies, which have been responsible for boosting the cost of living out of sight, it was politically essential that they should drum up some kind of hoax to delude the people of Canada into thinking that something was really being done—and a hoax this measure is. That is the only name it deserves. It was conceived as an attempt to delude the people of Canada, but the cat has been let out of the bag. The Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) has added his contribution this morning to the confession which has already escaped the lips of one or two members of the government, and has indicated that this measure if adopted is not going to have any perceptible effect on the cost of living. That is an undeniable fact, and in itself is an exposure of this hoax that the government is attempting to perpetrate.

The second feature of the hoax is this, and of course it is an example of the technique of one Adolf Hitler, the well known technique that when you are taking a line of action that is designed to play into the hands of one particular group then you get up and deny it. You deny that it is going to have that effect, denounce those who are of that group who are going to be affected, and say that your measure is going to help somebody else. That is what we see taking place in this debate on the part of the orators opposite. Here is a measure which has been shown beyond any doubt whatever to be one that is sought by the big interests in the merchandising field. The biggest of the departmental stores are asking for it. The chains are going to benefit by it. It is the big interests in the merchandising field who are seeking this measure, and it is the little fellows in the merchandising field whose interests are at stake, the life of whose businesses in thousands of cases is in jeopardy and who are pleading for an opportunity to be heard and for fair consideration of their position.

Their position is a very important one. The small retailer in Canada represents as fine a flowering of the system of free enterprise in this country as you will find. Yet the government is placing that small retailer in jeopardy by their insistence on jamming this measure through. This hoax again is exposed as a callous attempt on the part of the government, in league with big interests, to hurt the interests of the little retailer. That is the second feature of this monstrous government hoax. We have not heard from the Minister of Transport this morning one word of concern about the fate of the little retailers. There has not been a suggestion of concern for their plight in face of the threat of the loss leader practice. The minister cannot deny that branded goods, the kind that are subject to the practice of resale price maintenance in Canada today, are the goods that are by their very nature the kind that the big merchandisers like to seize upon for the purpose of loss leaders. After all, sir, what is the use of the retailer selecting for his loss leader some article that is not branded, that is not the subject of national advertising, that has not a known price? The public could not then estimate the alleged reduction in price, but goods that are subject to resale price maintenance are those that naturally lend themselves to use as loss leaders by the big merchandising outlets. That, sir, is what is going to happen, and it does not matter to the government that those who know their own business best are pleading for consideration in face of the threat of the harm that will be done to their businesses by the loss leader practice.

The government has not the time to listen to them. The government is too busy pursuing through this measure its political purposes, its base partisan purposes, even to listen to those who are pleading for the existence of their businesses. Not a word fell from the lips of the minister this morning on the subject of loss leaders. Yesterday we heard the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Croll) call for an election on this issue. I would remind the house that in the committee the hon. member for Spadina at least was concerned about the loss leader practice. He was at least concerned enough over the threat that the loss leader offers to the business of the small retailer that he—and I give him credit for it—drafted legislation to illegalize the loss leader practice. When the committee considered that draft legislation it apparently arrived at the conclusion—and I think this is a fair summary of the views expressed by those who spoke in the committee on the bill—that it was not workable, that it would be very difficult to enforce, and that it was too rigid. But I do give the hon. member credit for at least recognizing that the loss leader practice is a grave and imminent threat to the small retailer. As far as the government is concerned, however, there is not the slightest inkling on their part of the merest concern over the damage that is going to be done to the small retailer by the vicious and altogether reprehensible practice of loss leaders in merchandising in this country. Therefore we are left with the conclusion that the government is prepared to leave the small retailer to the mercy of the big merchandising outlets applying the loss leader practice.

That possibility, I am sorry to say, did not greatly concern Mr. McGregor because he took an attitude that can be summed up in the phrase that the minister used this morning when he was talking about those whose businesses are placed in jeopardy by this measure. He spoke of them as inefficient retailers. The government apparently considers, as apparently Mr. McGregor thought, that the so-called inefficient retailer is the only man whose interests are placed in jeopardy by this measure. If that is the view of the Minister of Transport, then he had better go back and read the evidence presented to the committee. He had better have some regard for the views put before the committee by responsible leaders of organizations of retailers in various classes of merchandise. They are not inefficient retailers. They are people who will be put in jeopardy by ruthless practices on the part of big retail outlets unless they are permitted to continue to use this mechanism which has grown up as the small merchant's protection. This practice of resale price maintenance has grown up as the protection for the small retailer, and I altogether deny that the retail associations in this country who have raised their hands in a plea for hearing, who have raised their hands in a plea for consideration of the position of jeopardy in which this measure will place them, represent inefficient retailers. Apparently the view of the government is that it is better if a few of these retailers go to the wall. There is not the slightest concern about them. Mr. McGregor's attitude was, let the weak die. It is a fine doctrine to preach, something in the nature of tooth and claw competition.

Mr. Garson: Will the hon. member quote from Mr. McGregor's evidence any selection which will support the statement he has just imputed to him?

Mr. Fleming: I shall be glad to quote the whole of Mr. McGregor's evidence, because every last word of his evidence showed not the slightest concern about the plight of the retailer. His attitude was, let the weak die; they add no strength to our economic system.

Mr. Sinnott: There was no mention of anybody dying. Answer the question.

Mr. Fleming: The whole of his evidence is my quotation from Mr. McGregor. I suppose that within recent days all members have been refreshing their memories of Dickens' "Christmas Carol". You will recall the expression used by Scrooge when a plea was made to him on behalf of the weak and the hungry. His attitude was, let them die; there would be so much less overpopulation.

The view of the government, and it is revealed crystal clear in the very callous way in which the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) treated this subject this morning, is that there is overpopulation in the retail field, so let the weak die. The government attitude has been revealed in this debate—

An hon. Member: Even my four-year-old daughter understands that.

Mr. Fleming: If my hon. friend's four-year-old daughter can understand the analogy I believe that, given time, he may yet understand it too.

On the part of the government there has not been the slightest inkling of a willingness to give any consideration to the laws which have grown up in the United States to deal with this situation. Is it a mere coincidence that forty-five out of the forty-eight states of the United States have rejected the kind of legislation that this government is seeking to thrust down the throat of parliament? I ask this house to stop and ponder. Can forty-five out of forty-eight states all be wrong? They have been through this because resale price maintenance was banned in the United States many years ago. They tried this experiment that this government is outrageously trying to thrust upon this country without adequate consideration, and in the light of their experience with the situation then arising forty-five out of forty-eight states of the union passed legislation which legalizes this system of resale price maintenance.

It may be the great misfortune of the people of the United States that they have not someone like the Canadian Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) to tell them what they should do about what he no doubt regards as their mishandling of this situation. It may be the great misfortune of the people of the United States that the ability of the member for Coast-Capilano (Mr. Sinclair) to railroad things through a committee and apply the guillotine to the committee's deliberations is not available to the United States, so that the people could profit from the joint wisdom of these two hon. members. The United States is doing the best it can without the superhuman assistance of the Canadian Minister of Justice and the member for Coast-Capilano, and it has somehow got to the point where forty-five out of the forty-eight states, having had enough of this kind of experiment, have enacted fair trade laws which have the effect of making resale price maintenance a standard practice.

This government can crack the whip until the sounds reverberate in every corner of the Liberal lobbies, in every office occupied by a Liberal member, but they will not change the fact that the country in which retail merchandising practices and conditions are closer to the conditions obtaining in this country than in any other, even though deprived of the leadership of the Minister of Justice and the member for Coast-Capilano and having experimented with the kind of legislation the government is trying now to thrust through this house, has rejected it in the light of their own experience.

Mr. Coldwell: May I ask the hon. gentleman a question? Can he explain to the house what the legislation is in certain states regarding fair trade?

Mr. Fleming: Yes, if my hon. friend does not know.

Mr. Coldwell: I happen to know, but I do not think the hon. member does.

Mr. Martin: No, I do not think he does.

Mr. Fleming: Oh, I see health and welfare is coming alive at last. It would indeed have been strange, Mr. Speaker, if the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) had been able to go through this debate without injecting himself into it. I am glad to see some evidence of returning life in the minister, because he comes from the city of Windsor—

Mr. Martin: And there is no better city. Thank you for giving me that chance.

Mr. Fleming: —which is just across the river from Detroit where a good many of his constituents do their shopping. The state of Michigan, as one of the forty-five states, has enacted fair trade laws.

Mr. Martin: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, the citizens of my community do most of their shopping in Canada.

Mr. Fleming: Before the minister puts his long neck out too far on this subject, it would be highly desirable if he were to have some private treaty on this matter with the member for Charlotte (Mr. Stuart). I recall to the governmental embodiment of health and welfare that when the member for Charlotte was dealing with some degree of particularity with the kind of operation—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: I believe the hon. member is referring to another debate on another subject.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Speaker, I was not quoting from Hansard on the subject. It is only because of my concern for the Minister of National Health and Welfare, and for his political future, that I do not want to see him go too far on this subject and get at cross purposes with the hon. member for Charlotte who had spoken on the same subject as that on which the Minister of National Health and Welfare has just now indulged himself. But if the Minister of National Health and Welfare is not as well acquainted as are most people with the buying practices along the Windsor-Detroit border, perhaps it may not be unfair to inform him that across the river in the state of Michigan, where a good deal of shopping is done by Canadians as well as by Americans, the practice of resale price maintenance has full legal effect under the fair trade laws of that enlightened state.

For the enlightenment of my friend the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), I should like to tell him that in general, under the fair trade laws enacted by forty-five out of the forty-eight states, the practice is for the manufacturer to set a price and register it with the board established for that purpose by the state in question; and that price, having been approved, becomes the lawful price and can be enforced by the manufacturer and supplier as the price at which every retailer and every outlet sells his product.

Mr. Garson: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Fleming: I am delighted to do so.

Mr. Garson: From his apparently extensive knowledge of the fair trade laws in Canada, where does he get this curious idea—

An hon. Member: In Canada?

Mr. Garson: In the United States, I should say. Where does he get this curious idea that there is a board in the state of Michigan which approves the price under resale price maintenance? I can assure him that there is no such thing.

Mr. Fleming: The Minister of Justice can save his breath. He can devote his breath to learning something about that subject, because it is high time he did so. I did not say there is a board in the state of Michigan. In reply to the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, who asked about the effect of fair trade laws, I said that in general the practice has been to have the price registered publicly by a manufacturer.

Mr. Garson: On a question of privilege—

Mr. Fleming: There is no question of privilege involved in this, Mr. Speaker, and I decline to be pushed aside by the Minister of Justice.

Mr. Garson: As soon as my hon. friend has taken his seat, I will expose his ignorance on the subject.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Fleming: The Minister of Justice will be quite busy enough, I think, Mr. Speaker, between now and the time this debate closes —I think he is going to be extremely busy trying to cover up his lamentable exposure of ignorance on this subject. For two hours and forty minutes last week we listened to a marathon exposure of his lamentable ignorance on a subject upon which he, as a responsible minister introducing a bill, should have been well informed before he started. That is another fine sample of the way in which the government is preventing others from getting information on this subject when they have earnestly sought it with a view to arriving at intelligent decisions.

Mr. Coldwell: Will the hon. member permit one question which is really for the purpose of getting information?

Mr. Fleming: Yes.

Mr. Coldwell: How is the price arrived at which the manufacturer sets for the retailers?

An hon. Member: Where?

Mr. Coldwell: How is the price arrived at in the United States, under the fair trade practices?

Mr. Fleming: I expect that in every case the manufacturer will have due regard for the cost of the article, for what is a fair profit, for the ability of the people to pay and for what they are willing to pay for his product.

Mr. Coldwell: Is it not a fact that the manufacturer sets the price and that, if he can get one retailer to agree to it, that price is applicable to all retail business in that state?

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Speaker, I could not imagine any greater act of folly on the part of any manufacturer than to set the price of his article or product at an amount which the public will not pay. What we have been told in the evidence before the committee, so far as we were allowed to get any evidence, was that the manufacturer is not foolish enough to set the price of his article at a figure that the public will not pay. He is not going to price himself out of his market. That is the protection of the public.

In this measure the government is not protecting the interests of the consumer. On the contrary, the government is exposing the consumer of this country to the grave danger of being made the fair game of the big merchandising outlets and big merchandising interests which will, with the extinction of more and more of the small retailers, acquire a greater and greater degree of monopoly control of merchandising in Canada. That is the danger that has confronted the government in this matter; and that is the danger that the government chooses to ignore in favour of pursuing partisan purposes with regard to this measure. It is not simply a matter of trying to keep small retailers alive for the sake of the small retailers alone, Mr. Speaker. The consumer of this country has no greater assurance of fair play and proper trade practices than in the existence of a healthy retail trade flourishing through a multiplicity of small retail outlets. If you jeopardize the existence of those small retail outlets, you are placing in pawn not simply the life of the business of the small retailer but as well the fundamental interests of the consumer in this country. Many hon. members of this house who are being called upon today to be whipped into line and to do the government's bidding in this debate and in the vote to follow know that; and many of them have told us so privately around these corridors in recent days. The question is not being asked by members of the official opposition alone: Why this unseemly haste? That question has been asked, I may tell you, Mr. Speaker, by many Liberal members in this house.

Mr. Sinnott: Name them.

Mr. Fleming: I am not going to embarrass them.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Fleming: It would be a serious embarrassment to many of them. I am not going to embarrass them. They are going to be embarrassed enough when this vote comes. But that is the fact. That question, why this undue haste, this unseemly haste, this indecent haste, remains unanswered. It remains unanswered because the government is prepared to sacrifice the interests of the small retail outlets in this country, and is prepared to sacrifice the long-term and fundamental interests of the consumers of this country in favour of jamming through this house a half-baked, ill-considered, unjust measure to further its own partisan interests.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, we have heard a great deal about the fair trade practice in the United States, but I think that no one has yet explained it except the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) who did so to some extent last night. The reason that we did not support the amendment of my hon. friends was that we had been going into the matter of this practice in the United States. As was stated last night by the Minister of Justice, the fact of the matter is that the first so-called fair trade act was placed on the statute books in the United States by the state of California. That act was found to be unsatisfactory to the manufacturers and two years later, in 1933, there was added to that legislation a clause which made the resale price agreed upon by a manufacturer and a single retailer binding upon all retailers upon notice. That was the crux of the legislation which was copied in forty-five of the forty-eight states during the period of the depression when things were difficult indeed for retailers everywhere. As the minister said last night, the latest Californian legislation was so hastily copied that even typographical errors and errors in punctuation in the Californian legislation were copied in the acts put on the statute books in various states. In a recent case in Florida, when this matter was under challenge, the court pointed out that the power to fix prices under fair trade acts is vested in private persons; that no right to review the fairness of the price is provided for; and that no test or yardstick of fairness is defined. It has also been pointed out that the first fair trade acts were upheld in the courts in an atmosphere of crisis and emergency which no longer exists. The inference of course is that today different conclusions may be reached.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What is the hon. gentleman reading from?

Mr. Coldwell: I understand that today the legislation is practically defunct in some forty-two of the forty-five states that enacted the legislation.

Mr. Fleming: No evidence to that effect.

Mr. Coldwell: The hon. member says that there is no evidence to that effect; but the hon. gentleman gave no understanding to the house that he knew anything about the fair trade legislation and practices in the United States.

Mr. Fleming: Will the hon. member permit a question? Will he indicate what he has just been reading from?

Mr. Coldwell: Yes; I referred to an analysis made in two articles in the New York Nation.

Mr. Fleming: By whom?

Mr. Coldwell: On the dates of June 2 and May 19; two articles in a paper which has the reputation of—

Mr. Fleming: Of being socialist.

Mr. Coldwell:—authoritative analysis of all kinds of problems Whether one agrees with the New York Nation editorially or not, the articles that are published in that paper are, as a rule, very carefully prepared and authentic.

Mr. Fleming: Socialistic propaganda.

Mr. Noseworthy: What is wrong with that?

Mr. Coldwell: As a matter of fact, whenever something is disliked it is said to be socialistic propaganda, and yet I venture to say that a great deal of the legislation proposed by Mr. Bennett in 1935 was more socialistic than the bill which is now under discussion in this house. Incidentally, I have always given Mr. Bennett credit for the last-minute conversion to intelligent ideas that he expressed just before he was defeated in 1935.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): This is the first time your lot have ever given him credit for anything.

Mr. Coldwell: I want to put my suggestion once more before the house. If we are going to protect the consumers, the manufacturers and the retailers there should be a board which can hold public hearings, and to which an aggrieved person, whether retailer, consumer or manufacturer may apply to get a fair deal. That is what I believe should be done. However, it has been shown conclusively, I think, in the evidence before the committee which sat, 800 pages or more of the evidence, that the particular form of manufacturers' control of prices which now exists is against the public interest. For that reason, although our amendment was defeated, we shall support the bill when it comes to a vote in the house.

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, now that the government has seen fit to apply the closure—

Mr. Sinnott: Tell the truth.

Mr. Fulton:—although the Prime Minister—

Mr. Richard (Gloucester): Go on; take all the time you need.

Mr. Fulton: Now that the government has seen fit to apply the closure although the Prime Minister said yesterday that they had decided not to, we can see just to what extent the government really desires to prevent the evidence in this matter from coming before the people. The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) has just said that in the 800 odd pages of evidence which embodied the committee's proceedings it became abundantly clear that resale price maintenance harmed the consumer. I regret that the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar has not closely read the evidence, because the whole objection to the committee's proceedings is that there is at no point any evidence from which the conclusion can be drawn that the practice of resale price maintenance harms the consumer. Actually, when we asked that we be allowed the opportunity to obtain such evidence, if evidence existed, the guillotine was applied and the committee chairman choked off all attempts to call witnesses who might be able to give us that evidence. He also choked off all attempts to obtain evidence as to the comparative profit margins for price-maintained and non-maintained goods, and as to comparative prices to the consumer of price maintained goods and non-maintained goods. Therefore the position is that we have no evidence. We have no evidence that the practice of resale price maintenance is harmful to the consumer. I should like at any time to be furnished by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, or by any other hon. member, with evidence to that effect, because—

Mr. Coldwell: What about the MacQuarrie report and Mr. McGregor's evidence?

Mr. Fulton: They were not evidence, only statements of opinion. One would have thought that, if there were such evidence, the government would have been willing and anxious to bring it forward. The only conclusion to which one can come from their failure to do so, and from their obvious and successful desire to choke off discussion and to prevent us from getting such evidence, is that actually the evidence, if it were produced, would tend the other way.

There is, however, ample evidence to the effect that the small retailer will be hurt if the practice of resale price maintenance is eliminated. In the light of that evidence, we are left with the question, why is the government in such a hurry to hurt the small retailer? Why are they in such a hurry to remove the only protection which the small retailer has against the power of the big interests, the monopolies and the large chain stores, and leave him at the mercy of cut-throat competition? No satisfactory answer to that question has yet been given; yet the Prime Minister, in taking part in this debate yesterday, said that the government was not willing to leave this matter over for any further or fuller investigation; that they were going to remove the protection from the small retailer and leave him to stand on his own feet. It is a callous, ill-considered and ill-advised course to follow, with much harm to be done to independent Canadian business.

In dealing with this matter I believe it is important to remember that the evidence we have does not support, but indeed directly contradicts, the propaganda efforts which the government have been making to convince the Canadian people that it is the big interests that want this practice of resale price maintenance, and particularly the propaganda put forward by the government to the effect that it is the manufacturer who wants resale price maintenance. Nothing can be further from the truth; nothing can be more directly in conflict with the evidence which we have. The evidence which we had in the committee on this point showed most clearly that it is not at the instance of the manufacturer that resale price maintenance prevails, but that the practice was worked out and applied by and at the request of the small retailers who found it essential as a measure to protect them from the unfair types of competition being indulged in by the big interests. Once again I refer particularly to the evidence of Mr. Fred McGregor, who answered that question perhaps more clearly and with less hesitation than he answered any other questions in his whole evidence—and his answers to questions were on the whole not given in a hesitant manner; but of all the questions which were asked he was perhaps most definite in his reply to the questions as to who wants this most, who benefits most from it, the manufacturer or the retailer? His answer was, "unquestionably the retailer".

It is also important to bear in mind that there is nothing before this house, as there was nothing before the committee, on which we would be justified in basing the conclusion that the removal of resale price maintenance will benefit the consumer with respect to prices. Indeed, there is much before us to justify the conclusion that it will harm the consumer in the long run both generally and with respect to prices, and if for no other reason than that it will result in the further concentration of power and control over the distributive trades in the hands of a few huge concerns, a tendency from which we already suffer in Canada to a degree greater than in any comparable country. There can be no question but that the result of that process, in the long run, will be to damage the interests of the consumer. That has always been the outcome when giant monopolies and powerful concerns gain almost exclusive control of any field of enterprise so vital to the welfare of the people.

That is the outcome to which the government is deliberately exposing the consumers of Canada, if it pushes through this bill without offering any alternative protection to the retailer. But it is not only from the harmful effects of the increased power given to the giant concerns that the consumer will suffer. There is also an absolute lack of evidence that the consumer will benefit one iota from reduced prices as a result of the passage of the bill.

In that connection one can rely upon the evidence of Mr. McGregor who stated that in his opinion price maintenance was objectionable only because it is, as he described it, an undue restriction of competition—and not at all because of any effect it may have on prices. In other words his opposition to the practice was based entirely upon his theory as to the forms of competition which should prevail in this country.

He was a knowledgeable witness; but if the evidence that Mr. McGregor's opposition to it was based entirely upon theory and not at all upon practical effects is not sufficient, then one need only refer to the evidence of the Prime Minister's position, as he stated it in the house yesterday, as found at page 2385 of Hansard:

> I still do not think it will have very much effect on the cost of living index.

And so we find that the legislation is being rushed through on the basis of theory, on the theory of Mr. Fred McGregor and of the MacQuarrie committee, that the practice of resale price maintenance is an undue restriction of competition. For the purpose of serving these theoretical ideas, ideas that apparently are held by the government, the protection enjoyed by the retailer is to be removed, and the weak are to be allowed to die. For that is exactly the whole purport of Mr. McGregor's theory.

He said, "If there are retailers who will suffer as a result of the elimination of the practice of resale price maintenance—well, that is too bad. They probably were not efficient, anyway. And if they were not very efficient, then the community can get along without them, so let them be eliminated. Let them be extinguished. Let them die. The country can do without them." That is a most callous and a most unjustified attitude to take toward such a large and such a vital group in our country, one which has made so great a contribution to the strength of our economy.

It is difficult to avoid using strong words and harsh language when describing that outlook on the part of a theorist; but it is much more difficult to avoid using strong language to describe the situation which we now find, when that same point of view is expressed, not on the part of a theorist but on the part of this government, responsible as it is for the administration of affairs in this nation.

But that callous indifference to the fate of the small retailer is exactly the attitude reflected by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson); that is exactly the attitude reflected in this bill—that without any thought of consequence to the retailer, and without any recognition that the retailer has any interests to be preserved, this legislation, which is designed only to fulfil somebody's idea of a theory of free competition, should be rushed through, even if it eliminates the small retailer.

They think the situation can be satisfied by the repetition of an ominous phrase—"Let the weak die; they probably were not rendering any service to the community, anyway."

The evidence establishes that the small retailer needs the protection of resale price maintenance. At the present time it is his only protection against the powerful big interests. And let there be no mistake about it: the big interests are just as powerful and big in this day, just as crushing today, as they have been at any time in the history of this country. And the only protection retailers have built up for themselves, without any help from the government, is this method of doing business.

It is all nonsense to say that they wish it to be kept in private hands. If the government would study this matter, as we have urged it to do, and came forward with some alternative method by which the small retailer could be protected, he would be perfectly willing and indeed happy to give up his own system of protection, one which he has worked out and put into effect by himself.

But the government has not done that. They have refused to allow time for study and consideration which would be necessary to work out some alternative method. In the absence of that study, in the absence of that alternative protection, it can only be said that this legislation is being rushed through in an attitude of callous indifference to the welfare and the needs of the small retailer, and of the consuming public who will eventually, and before too long, as a result of this measure, be at the mercy of big, powerful monopolies, the chain and departmental stores.

The proof of what I am saying is found in the statement of the Prime Minister yesterday when, as set out at page 2385, he was attempting to justify the government's willingness to rush the small retailers of Canada into oblivion, and leave with a few big giants of industry the control of the distribution of goods in this country. He said:

> I made the statement the other day, and I repeat it, that if as a result of this legislation or as a result of any other condition there develops a contrary abuse, the government will consider what recommendation it should make to parliament to deal with that contrary abuse.

He was referring to the possibility of the loss-leader practice. Well, I would ask the Prime Minister or, since he is not in his seat, the Minister of Justice, just how long he thinks it will take to consider and work out that recommendation? And at what stage will the government decide that it has become necessary to work out some alternative form of protection? How many retailers will have to go to the wall? How many bankruptcies will have to take place in Canada? How many small concerns will have to be taken over by the giants of the distributive trades before the government decides the time has come at which they must give consideration to some alternative form of protection for the small retailer? Will it be one, or twenty-one, or a hundred or five hundred? How many thousands of dollars will have to be lost by small retailers before the government decides it is time to act?

Mr. Garson: I might tell my hon. friend that I dealt with that yesterday, when he was not here. I would be glad to tell him privately.

Mr. Fulton: The minister says he dealt with that yesterday. I shall not attempt to answer him in kind; I shall simply say that I read his speech, and I say he made no adequate answer whatever to the question.

Mr. Drew: He did not answer.

Mr. Fulton: I find no passage in the minister's speech in which he attempted to deal with that particular question. And if the retailers are to be left with that answer, then they must realize that there is an absolute certainty that they will find no protection whatsoever, and that the government does not intend to act to protect them against big business. Because there is no indication in the minister's speech that he has even remotely considered the problem, and that he has in any way shown that he is prepared really to come to grips with the situation that will confront the retailers.

What then is the retailer promised? What is the consumer promised as a protection against finding the retail and distributive trades of Canada in the hands of a few giant concerns? What is promised? What is the outlook which concerns, not only the distributive trades of Canada, not only the small independent businesses but also the consumer as regards protection against the abuses of loss-leader practices and other forms of unfair competition? It is the same sort of protection which the patient is promised—that he shall have an autopsy if his illness should prove fatal under the doctor's care. The retail merchants and small independent businessmen of Canada can get what comfort they can from the knowledge that after they have been driven to the wall, after they have gone bankrupt, after they have been killed off as a result of this concentration of economic power in the hands of a few giant concerns they will be given a post mortem to find out exactly what it was from which they have died.

Once more, when we have come to the point at which it would have been thought the government would come forward with some concrete evidence as to the real effects of price maintenance, when one would have expected that they would give some real reason and justification for their decision to push this bill through, what do we find? We find that instead of following that logical course the government is resorting to this closure embodied in the motion of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) presented to the house this morning.

When confronted with the efforts to force from the government some statement of facts, some concrete evidence which would justify their proposed course, they resort to closure. We are left only with the conclusion —to which this whole debate, the government's whole attitude forces us—namely, that the government itself realizes that it has proposed a course which plays into the hands of the big business concerns of this country and which is against the interests of the small retailer and the consumer. Among other efforts to prevent the consuming public of Canada realizing these facts, to prevent these facts from being brought out in debate, they are resorting now to closure so as to throttle discussion.

Never let it be forgotten that there is only one group, in so far as those who are affected by this legislation are concerned, who want it, and that is the biggest interests in the retail field in Canada. It is wanted by the biggest chain department store. Without exception the small retailer, the independent man who has struggled over the years to set up his enterprise and is struggling to keep it going, is opposed to this legislation.

When we ask the government to let us have some facts, instead of being content with theories, theories which doom the small man to extinction, when we ask for some facts upon which they can justify their claim that this legislation will benefit the consumer, we are met with closure. We are met with closure for one reason and one reason only. The government has no facts upon which to support its claim that the consumer will benefit. The government knows that if this discussion is allowed to continue and an effort is made to get at the merits of the legislation it will become quite apparent to all Canadians that far from the consumer benefiting, the consumer will suffer in the long run and that the only group, the only interests, which will benefit will be the government's friends in big business. Therefore they are now seeking to end this discussion and prevent that fact from becoming apparent by moving closure in the motion of the Minister of Transport.

I regret that the government should see fit to resort to these measures, but I think it becomes apparent to you, Mr. Speaker, in your position of impartiality, as it will become obvious to the public of Canada, that this government has lost all sight of its responsibility to the public of Canada, of its responsibility to preserve the independence of Canadian business, and is following tactics which are directly in line with the interests of monopolies and big business in Canada.

Mr. J. W. Noseworthy (York South): Mr. Speaker, in spite of all that has been said in this house and the language that has been used on both sides of the chamber, I suggest that every group, in so far as this bill is concerned, has one thought in mind—how best to curb the growth of monopolies in this country. I think that that is the concern of the government as well as of the opposition groups. We differ in the method to be employed to restrict the growth of these monopolies.

My concern is whether in supporting this legislation we are not inadvertently contributing to the growth of that which we all want to destroy, the monopolies. I think that that is the concern of the opposition groups. I am sure that it is the concern of many Liberals in the house whether this legislation will in and of itself contribute to the growth of one form of monopoly in this country while it seeks to curb the power of another.

The Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) has expressed that concern and has assured us that once this legislation is in effect, if it is discovered that the monopolies in the retail and distributing branches of business are undertaking price wars and are operating to the disadvantage of the small dealers, amendments will be introduced or new legislation brought forward to deal with that. The Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) has assured us and the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Croll) yesterday held out serious threats as to what would happen to big business in the distributing field if they undertook any such practices.

I suggest that that is just not enough. I think that this house is entitled to know from the government much more than we have yet learned as to just what the government proposes to do or how they propose to meet that difficulty should it arise. I think there is a real danger and I think the government realizes there is a real danger. They have no legislation to cope with it. I suggest that that legislation could be provided without unduly holding up this bill.

I am quite confident that the government is capable, if it wants to do so, of bringing in an amendment to this legislation or proposing alternative legislation which would meet the difficulty which they themselves have in mind without waiting until the damage had been done. It would seem to me to be much more businesslike to meet that problem now than to wait until the damage has been done and then bring before the house legislation to remedy something which in many cases will be beyond remedy.

Alternatives have been suggested and have been turned down by the house. Our alternative was cried down by the Conservative party as being socialistic. I want to put on the record the recommendation made to the committee in the brief of the Drug Trading Company. In the introduction to their brief they say that the company is operated by 1,535 retail druggists throughout Canada. They operate a voluntary chain of 450 independently owned retail drug stores. Quite obviously they are not a socialistic organization. Their recommendation as an alternative to this legislation is as follows:

> In lieu of this, we urge that the Combines Investigation Act be revised so that, operating under such act, a board be set up with wide powers to investigate complaints that instances of resale price maintenance are an offence against the public interest; such a board to include representatives of the consuming public, the manufacturing, wholesale and retail trades and the government; and where it becomes evident to such a board that an instance of resale price maintenance is contrary to the public interest, the board shall have the power to invoke penalties against the offending parties and to require that such price maintenance arrangements be modified so as to eliminate the offence.

They spell out in their brief the composition of the board which they have in mind and the powers of the board. I want to say that our suggestion, which was in line with theirs, asked for nothing more socialistic than their recommendation, a board representing the consuming public as well as manufacturers, retailers and the government, with power to see that where price maintenance is in the interests of the Canadian public it should be operated under a board that is subject to public control. It should be a board set up by the government with a government representative sitting side by side with manufacturers', retailers' and consumers' representatives. The leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) referred to such a board as we suggested as a board of bureaucrats. The leader of the opposition is very fond of the term "bureaucrats".

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I must ask the hon. member to refer to the place in Hansard where that is reported, and I ask him to do so before he repeats that statement.

Mr. Noseworthy: If it was not in those words, when he questioned us as to the type of board and the power that we would confer upon it, his statement was that he did not want a board of bureaucrats telling businessmen what to do. He wanted a board made up of men who knew their business.

Mr. Drew: I do not want to interrupt, but since the hon. member has Hansard I suggest that if he is going to say what I said he follow the very simple device of reading what I said from Hansard.

Mr. Noseworthy: My point is that the type of board which we were suggesting was not intended to be any more bureaucratic than the board recommended by the Drug Trading Company, and which the opposition did not see fit to support. There are one or two questions I should like to put on Hansard which I think the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) should answer when we get to the committee stage on the bill. I should like him to tell us how this legislation will affect those manufacturers who maintain their own retail outlets. Are they to be left free to fix the prices of their goods sold through their own retail outlets while all other manufacturers will find themselves committing an offence if they do so? What will be the effect upon those manufacturers who maintain exclusive agencies throughout the country? Is a manufacturer who has an exclusive agency in a town to be permitted under this legislation to fix the price of his article? Is he to be in the same position as any other manufacturer?

The public have been asking what effect this legislation will have upon the automobile manufacturers. Ford and General Motors follow the practice of fixing the retail price of their products. Are they to be permitted to continue to do so, or will every dealer be entirely free to sell a new car at whatever price he chooses to sell it? I should like the same answer as far as the gas and oil companies are concerned. By some device, apparently without infringing the terms of the Combines Investigation Act, the gas companies manage to have a fairly uniform price for the same grade of gas everywhere. Where will they stand under this new legislation? Where will the newspapers stand? Will a newspaper have the right to tell a dealer that he must sell the Star Weekly, for instance, for ten cents and the Globe and Mail for five cents, or is the dealer to be free to use newspapers as loss leaders if he wants to and sell them to the public at any price he wishes?

Then there is one other group that is very much concerned, the Drug Trading Company, to which I have referred. They operate under the name "I.D.A.", or "Independent Druggists Alliance" and have over 1,500 drug stores. They co-operate in their advertising. I have here one of their advertisements taken from a Toronto paper, and they tell me it applies to about 400 stores. The same articles are sold in all these stores. I am told that a group of retailers who are appointed for the purpose by the association are called in every Monday morning to decide on the prices which will be advertised for a whole host of articles. The I.G.A. or Independent Grocers Alliance, follows the same practice. A number of grocery chains follow the same practice. Is such advertising to be illegal under this legislation? If the minister will answer some of these questions when he gets an opportunity to speak I think it will clarify the situation.

Mr. Garson: May I ask my hon. friend a question which I think has some bearing upon what the answer to his question will be. My hon. friend says that these gentlemen get together and set the prices that are put in the advertisement. Does he mean that they literally set the prices or that they merely agree upon articles that are to appear in the advertisement, the prices of which are determined by some other method?

Mr. Noseworthy: They agree upon the price which is to be advertised for any given article. I understand the practice is for stores to sell the goods at the advertised price, but there is no compulsion upon them to do so. Occasionally there are stores who undersell and some who oversell the advertised price.

Mr. Garson: In a word, is the agreement to which the hon. member refers an agreement as to the advertisement or an agreement as to the price?

Mr. Noseworthy: It is an agreement as to the price which shall be quoted in the advertisement.

Mr. Rodney Adamson (York West): Mr. Speaker, I think I can finish what I have to say before one o'clock. First of all I should like to say that I agree with a great deal of what the hon. member for York South (Mr. Noseworthy) has said. However, when we suggested that a fair trade board be set up, it was not our contention that it should deviate in any great measure from the sort of suggestion that was made by the drug trade. I believe some measure of regulation has been found to be beneficial. I was certainly attempting to show that when I spoke on the subject, and I am glad the hon. member agrees with those of us who take the view that this is an important economic rather than political subject. I hope every member in this house is seriously trying to find a way to overcome the serious inflation which is hitting the country today.

If this bill in any way assisted in overcoming this inflation, I would most certainly be in favour of it. We have to judge the thing, however, on the basis of the greatest good for the greatest number. On one side you put the possible advantages to the consumer, on the other the inherent dangers to the retailer. If there are price wars and the consumer is in a position to purchase goods subject to drastic price cutting, there will undoubtedly be some bargains as a result of this legislation. On the other hand the history of price wars, as we have seen them, shows that these bargains will be rather illusory. Once the pressure is off, and the pressure must come off ultimately, prices will return to their former level or, if the recent price war in New York is any criterion, to a higher level. On the other side there are the small retailers, druggists and specialty shops. They evidenced a genuine fear of what is likely to happen to them through the creation of the more powerful monopolistic retail colossi which this country seems to breed. Their fear is genuine, their arguments impressive.

We have these two things to balance. The one group expresses a genuine fear, and for the other group there is a nebulous possibility of some benefit. They may be able to purchase brand name objects a great deal cheaper through the loss-leader device. In my view the danger of the harm to the small merchant outweighs the temporary and I fear rather illusory benefit to the few consumers who will be able to buy brand name products for a time at a great saving. I shall, therefore, oppose the bill as I have done in the past.

In conclusion let me say that serious measures will have to be taken to stop inflation. So far we have just toyed with the subject. We believe, and I believe a very large section of the Canadian people still believe, that they can profit by inflation. Apparently the government is still of that mind, because they believe that inflation is—certainly up to now beneficial and it has been and I think unfortunately still is—politically popular. Measures to stop inflation are always unpopular. The longer this country goes on without taking those measures, the more drastic and more unpopular they will be, when our economic salvation demands immediate action. When I say that, Mr. Speaker, I only hope that the government will see the real danger signals ahead before it is too late, and not bring in measures such as this which will have practically no effect in curbing the monstrous evil that is inflation. Time is short, terribly short.

Mr. Lesage: I was paired with the hon. member for Three Rivers (Mr. Balcer). Had I voted, I would have voted for the motion.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I was paired with the hon. member for Yukon-Mackenzie River (Mr. Simmons). Had I voted, I would have voted against the motion.

Mr. Speaker: The question is now on second reading.

Mr. Drew: One o'clock.

Mr. Speaker: Does the house wish me to put the question?

Mr. Drew: One o'clock.

Mr. Speaker: Order. It is now 1.20 p.m. I will therefore leave the chair and put the question for second reading immediately upon returning to the chair. Normally, we would reassemble at two o'clock. It is now 1.20 p.m. Would it meet with the wishes of the house if we reassembled at 2.20 p.m.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: Two o'clock.

Mr. Speaker: I would like to know what the wishes of the house are.

Mr. Fournier (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): 1.30 p.m.

Mr. Speaker: I cannot hear what was said. Therefore I will leave the chair and the house will reassemble at two o'clock.

At 1.20 p.m. the house took recess.

The house resumed at two o'clock.

Mr. Speaker: Mr. Garson moves, seconded by Mr. Fournier (Hull), that this bill, entitled an act to amend the Combines Investigation Act, be now read the second time. Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

An hon. Member: On division.

Mr. Drew: No.

Mr. Speaker: Call in the members.

Fleming	—31.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Dion in the chair.

On section 1—"Dealer" defined.

Mr. Fleming: Section 1 of the bill proposes to write a new section 37A into the Combines Investigation Act. There are some difficulties as to its meaning that at once confront anyone reading this proposed section 37A. I draw your attention, first, to the fact that subsection 1 defines the word "dealer" in terms broad enough to include a manufacturer, a supplier or a vendor of an article. Subsection 2 purports to prohibit any act on the part of a dealer by threat, promise or agreement to induce or attempt to require any person to resell an article at a specified price under the named conditions. Subsection 3 purports to make it illegal for any dealer to refuse to sell or supply an article to any other person because that other person has refused to sell the article at prices as specified under the conditions named or has actually resold or offered for sale articles at prices less than those specified by the dealer.

I point out at once that there is nothing in the section dealing with the retailer. This section does not purport to deal with the act of the retailer in selling goods; it concerns itself only with the manufacturer or supplier of the goods who at an earlier stage has dealt with the retailer.

Some very serious questions are being asked throughout the merchandising trades of this country as to the effect of this section on a number of quite wholesome and natural commercial practices. At the present time many manufacturers and suppliers are getting out their seasonal catalogues for use in the new year. Many firms are supplying their representatives with these catalogues for their trips commencing with the beginning of the new year. This raises a very lively and urgent question. What is going to be the effect of this section on the current practice of naming prices in catalogues? Very often prices are suggested by the manufacturer or by the supplier who may be a wholesaler or a general jobber. He puts out a catalogue with retail prices named in it. These prices very often indicate what are considered in the view of the manufacturer, wholesaler or supplier to be reasonable prices for resale. It is not necessarily a case where any agreement is involved or any threat or inducement, but I am informed it is quite a general practice in the case of the printing of such catalogues. It seems to me that this becomes a pressing and urgent question and one of far-reaching importance affecting many of the merchandising trades in this country.

There is another question that has an important bearing. Probably it affects the pharmaceutical industry more than most of the others concerned. It is the practice, in the larger centres at any rate, for a good many of those operating pharmaceutical outlets, to unite in one large advertisement of articles that are under the system of resale price maintenance. If the system of resale price maintenance is to be made illegal now, what is to become of the practice, and a perfectly natural and quite proper practice it is, of pharmacists uniting in the publishing at their joint expense of large advertisements that would be beyond the means of any one of them? At the present time this is the only means that the smaller pharmaceutical outlets have for holding or trying to hold their own with the large outlets.

It is a very simple matter, as you will realize, Mr. Chairman, for the large departmental store or chain to take a whole page in a large city journal for the advertising of their sales or whatever it is in particular that they are featuring in the day's advertisement, but your small retailer cannot afford to go in for advertising on a scale of that kind. Therefore those interested in the same type of merchandise have in many cases made a practice of sharing the expensive advertisements of articles that they are all engaged in selling. Many of them are asking quite seriously and with a good deal of concern what is now to become of that practice. If it becomes illegal for them to join together in advertising articles for sale, the articles being sold at the same price in all their stores under the system of resale price maintenance, they are simply not going to be able to hold their own in the field of advertising.

Advertising is expensive, and small retailers cannot hope to compete when it comes to advertising. These are just two illustrations out of many that one could choose indicating the type of question that is very naturally and seriously troubling many retailers in this country. I have no doubt that this new section, if enacted, is going to be the subject of not a little judicial construction because of the complexity of the language used and the no little difficulty that one can see at a glance in its interpretation. These two instances I have singled out especially are troubling a great many people at the present time. I hope some statement can be made on behalf of the government to clarify the situation and to set clear limits on the effect of the proposed new section 37A, because if the offence to be created here is not defined in the clearest possible terms, and if its scope is not to be restricted so as not to include quite proper practices, then even more harm is going to be done than many of us see likely to follow from the bill.

Mr. Garson: I think perhaps I should say a few words in reply to my hon. friend's questions. With regard to his first question, namely whether under the proposed legislation a manufacturer can name what he regards as an appropriate retail price for his product, I think there is no doubt at all that he can do so provided that the manner in which he does it does not constitute an attempt to require or induce the retailer to sell at that price in contravention of subsection 2 of the new section 37A as proposed in the bill. As I have said before in the debate, any manufacturer who wishes to obey the law will have no difficulty in that regard in naming his price. If, however, he chooses to name it in such a way as to try to enforce or maintain it or to induce the retailer to abide by it, then he would in that even fall under the wording of the section.

Mr. Croll: That was not the question, was it? As I understood the question of the hon. member for Eglinton, it was the case of the man who issues a catalogue to the consumer. Was that not the question?

Mr. Fleming: Not necessarily to the consumer. I am thinking in general of the catalogues put out by the manufacturer, wholesaler or jobber. In many cases that catalogue is put in the hands of a travelling or local representative who sells to the retailers. It is not simply the case of the departmental store putting a catalogue directly into the hands of the consumer. I am not thinking of that particularly. I am thinking of the broader question to which I think this section comes much closer.

Mr. Croll: All right.

Mr. Garson: I was quite clear as to what the hon. member meant. He asked whether at this time of the year, when the manufacturers are getting their catalogues ready for the coming selling season and are putting them in the hands of their travelling salesmen, it would be possible for them to indicate therein what they may regard as an appropriate price for their product? The answer is quite clear. It is quite permissible for them to do that provided they do not do so in such a manner as to attempt to require or induce the retailer to adhere strictly to these prices. The reason I enter that proviso is, as I think my hon. friend knows, that resale price maintenance where it has been practised has not been always, or indeed as a rule, the result of any written agreement or anything of that sort. It arises out of a course of dealings in which a travelling salesman may go to the retailer and say: Well now, these are our prices, and of course you understand that these are our prices. I hope you get my point. We would like you to realize that the manufacturer would like to have these prices maintained. Now, do I make myself clear?

If we ran across a set of circumstances of that sort, where there was pressure being brought to bear upon the retailer to maintain these prices with an indication that some kind of sanction was going to be imposed upon him if he did not, then I think that course of conduct would, if we could prove it, constitute an offence under this provision. But if the manufacturer in perfect good faith puts out a catalogue and says that in relation to a particular product he thinks the proper resale price should be $3, and he is prepared to sell it to the wholesaler and through the wholesaler to the retailer at that suggested price, there is nothing in that that would contravene the act, provided it does not go any further. But of course when the retailer gets the article he has paid for it. It is his, and his pricing policy in relation to that article is perfectly free. He does not have to adhere to the $3 if he does not wish to do so unless the manufacturer has set the $3 as a maximum price in which event not only can he fix the maximum price but he can also enforce it.

Mr. Fraser: Would that prevent the manufacturer from putting tags on the articles he sells indicating prices of $3, $4, $5, or whatever it may be?

Mr. Garson: No.

Mr. Fraser: They can put their tags on as they are doing now?

Mr. Garson: Yes. For example take ladies hose of fine quality marketed in a container, and the suggested price is $2. That is quite all right but the manufacturer must not take any steps which could be regarded as an attempt to induce the retailer to sell at that price, and not less than that price.

Mr. Coldwell: What about the position of an automobile or farm implement company which more or less compels the distributor to take a certain quantity at a certain price, and the agency is the sort of agency in which the retailer, if you like to call him such, does take the responsibility of buying and selling a quantity of goods and obtaining a certain amount of supplies for repairs and all the rest of it. Under this bill would the retailer be entitled to make his own arrangements regarding price or must he conform to the manufacturer's wishes because he is something of an agent for that manufacturer? It seems to me it is complicated, but I should like the minister to tell us what happens in that case.

Mr. Garson: I think I clearly understand the hon. member's question because he has explained it with his usual lucidity, but perhaps he will permit me to draw a distinction with respect to the type of agency about which he is speaking, the so-called agent who owns his own business and buys his goods from the manufacturer and then resells the goods belonging to the so-called agent. Actually, he is not an agent in the strict sense at all, but a dealer in those goods.

Before I go on to answer the question, I should like to contrast with that gentleman a man who is an agent for a manufacturer in the true sense of the word. He may own his place of business, but the goods which he handles belong to the manufacturer and continue to belong to the manufacturer until title passes from the manufacturer to the consumer. In the case of which my hon. friend speaks, this bill will provide, when it goes into effect, that that dealer will be free to resell at whatever price he sees fit, and no sanctions can be imposed upon him for doing so. In the case of the man who is the agent in the real sense, of course he will have, by reason of the nature of his arrangement with the manufacturer, to be guided by the manufacturer as to what price shall be attached to the goods.

Mr. Coldwell: There is just one point in that connection. In the instance which I had in mind, what happens if this dealer sells an automobile, we will say, at a price less than that at which the manufacturer says it should be sold, and the manufacturer says he is going to take the agency away from the dealer? What recourse has that dealer under those circumstances?

Mr. Garson: Under those circumstances the manufacturer would be committing an offence under this bill.

Mr. Lennard: Surely you can hire and fire.

Mr. Garson: I shall deal with that point in just a moment. If the manufacturer refused a further supply to the dealer because the dealer had sold for less than the maintained price, the manufacturer would commit an offence under this bill.

Mr. Coldwell: So that the bill gives some security to that dealer?

Mr. Garson: It does indeed. If, however, as the hon. member for Wentworth has interjected, a question arises as to whether a man can hire and fire, I believe, if I understand the point he meant to make by his interjection, that the manufacturer should continue to have the right, notwithstanding the passage of this bill, of terminating an arrangement with the dealer which was unsatisfactory to the manufacturer for reasons other than the cutting of the suggested price. If, for example, because the dealer was intemperate and did not attend to business he became a poor credit risk, or if he maintained a slovenly establishment which was a poor advertisement for the manufacturer's product, or for a number of other reasons, there was legitimate cause for the manufacturer to terminate the arrangement according to its terms, then the termination would not be an offence under this proposed law.

Mr. Drew: Who would establish the measure of tidiness that must be maintained?

Mr. Garson: I mentioned that, but perhaps it is not a very good example.

Mr. Drew: I think it is excellent, because it just indicates the world of make-believe in which this whole thing is being discussed.

Mr. Garson: I shall be glad to discuss my hon. friend's point. If the manufacturer has a dealer who has failed or refused to sell the manufacturer's products at the suggested resale price and the manufacturer refuses to supply that dealer with renewal goods or takes any other action to force him into maintaining the suggested price, then the manufacturer would be guilty of an infraction of this legislation. If the manufacturer, however, took any action in relation to his dealer, such as the cancellation of his contract or the refusal to supply him with more goods, not because he had reduced the maintained price but for other good and lawful reasons, then the fact that the manufacturer has taken that action would not, of itself, be an offence under this proposed legislation. Whether or not the action of any manufacturer would fall in one category as offence under the act or as a lawful action under the contract would depend upon the evidence that was laid before the courts. The judge would have to decide that issue.

The hon. member may say that is all in the land of make-believe, but if that is so then almost every lawsuit that comes before the court involves questions of fact of much the same character. The judge has to decide whether the reason for the cancellation of the arrangement is the failure to maintain a price or whether it is some other valid cause of action. In actual practice I would not think there would be any great difficulty in a competent court reaching an opinion on a question of fact of that sort.

Mr. Fraser: Would that apply if the dealer sold at a higher price instead of a lower price?

Mr. Garson: No, it would not under this bill. I had better withdraw that answer and amplify it a bit to make it not only responsive to the question but also accurate. While the manufacturer cannot, under this bill, set a minimum price or a price below which the dealer may not sell, he can set a maximum price above which the dealer cannot sell. That maximum price which he can impose, he can enforce by whatever methods he may now be using to enforce resale price maintenance. In other words, in the legislation a provision is made that if a manufacturer wants to protect the consumer by assuring himself and the consumer that the consumer shall not have to pay more than a certain figure—we will say $5 for a hat—he can fix a maximum price of $5, and he can take whatever steps may be necessary to make that $5 resale price stick, that the dealer cannot sell for above that price; but if the dealer wants to, he can sell below it.

Mr. Fraser: He can mark in the hat at the factory: This hat is to be sold for $5?

Mr. Garson: Surely.

[Mr. Garson.]

Mr. Graydon: I should like to ask the minister a question which has been causing me concern as the debate has been proceeding. One of the things I want to be clear on is this. Suppose the manufacturer is selling regularly to a retailer one or more articles of merchandise in the usual course of business, that the retailer is purchasing from the manufacturer directly and is paying the manufacturer according to the pricing arrangements they have. Then suppose the manufacturer and the retailer decide that that relationship is going to be changed and that the retailer is no longer going to act in his independent capacity but will be the agent for the sale of those products of the manufacturer. Is it possible, under this legislation, for that change of relationship to take place? If it does, then of course, as I understand the bill, it comes outside the terms and provisions of this legislation.

Mr. Garson: It will come outside the provisions of the act itself provided that the arrangement, to which my hon. friend refers as an agency arrangement, is an agency arrangement in the strict sense; that is, in the sense that the dealer will give up his own identity in the control over his own business and enter into an arrangement with the manufacturer under which, to all intents and purposes, he will become an employee of the manufacturer doing as the manufacturer tells him to do, and under which the manufacturer will own the goods and direct him as to what he is to do. If that is the arrangement, then of course the principals in the contract of sale will no longer be the dealer and the consumer but will be the manufacturer and the consumer, and the commercial identity of the former dealer will be lost entirely. He will be submerged in the identity of the manufacturer.

The reason why I rather emphasize that distinction is that there is a term that is quite commonly used; it is said that such and such a firm is the "exclusive agency" in such and such a city for such and such a product. I am under the impression that in the majority of cases in which that arrangement is made, the so-called exclusive agency means nothing more than that the manufacturer sells goods to this dealer who buys them, pays for them, owns them and as a principal himself resells them to the ultimate purchaser, and that the only basis for the term "exclusive agency" is that that manufacturer chooses to deal with that particular dealer because he is a man of repute and of reputation in the community, and the manufacturer has goods of a high quality and wants to deal with a high-quality representative. But he is not an agent in the sense in which I think my hon. friend was using the term.

Mr. Graydon: My point was this, if I may extend it a step further. I did not have in mind that the retailer would be the employee, for instance, of the manufacturer. I had in mind that he might perhaps be an agent, that the goods might be sent on consignment to the retailer and that a commission would be charged by the retailer upon the sale when it was made. The goods, I take it, would then of course be at the risk of the manufacturer until the title had passed to the ultimate purchaser. But if that is the case—and this is the reason I raised the question—it looks as though if any manufacturer decided to adopt that course of creating a bona fide agency arrangement between the retailer and himself, this act would be of no avail whatsoever in the protection either of the consumer or of business generally. If that were to be done on a broad-scale basis, this act would be just so much eyewash from the point of view of protecting those parts of our business that the minister has in mind giving protection to. That is the point I wanted to be made clear upon because it seems to me that if you are going to have an act it ought to have some powers and it ought to have reasonably wide coverage or else not be brought in at all. But if what I have suggested is the case, I can see exactly what is apt to happen—as can the minister and everybody in the committee who has some relation to business—namely, that you are going to find that the people the minister is trying to take a crack at in this legislation are not going to be there when he cracks the whip. That is the position I should like to be made clear on.

Mr. Garson: With great deference, Mr. Chairman, I must say that I do not entirely share my hon. friend's apprehensions in that regard. He knows as well as we all do that at the present time we have, under the present system of resale price maintenance, a large number of these business concerns in which the manufacturer retains control of his product until it is sold to the consumer. You find that situation in the clothing trade, the candy trade and in a number of others. In that case the manufacturer has made a decision that he, as a manufacturer, can take on the secondary function as a distributor and that he, in his capacity as a distributor, can distribute his own goods more satisfactorily and more economically for himself than he can by selling them to the trade. The independent retailers and the independent wholesalers of the country are facing that kind of competition right at the present time in all of these fields. I do not think for a moment that the passage of this bill will alter to any substantial extent that competition that now exists; but I should have thought that the decision of the manufacturer to enter into the distributive trade would probably be inspired or affected to a far greater extent by other considerations than by the passage of this bill. If up until the present time he has not felt that there was any particular advantage to him to get into the distributive business, I do not think that the passage of this bill is going to drive him there. For that reason I do not share my hon. friend's apprehension. I think the point that he makes is a colourable one, shall I say; there is point to my hon. friend's remarks. But I think that we will find that there will be no great increase in the fairly substantial amount of manufacturer distribution which is being carried on at the present time. I do not think that will likely change because that is very well established, as my hon. friend knows, in most of these cases like the Laura Secord people and the Tip Top Tailors and so on.

Mr. Fleming: Before the discussion goes too far afield, will the minister come back to the other question I asked him originally in regard to the joint advertising project carried out by the retailers selling the same type of product?

Mr. Garson: I will be glad to do so, but I was going to say with some reluctance. I guess there is an inconsistency there. I am a little bit reluctant to do it for this reason. I do not know whether the hon. member for Eglinton was in the chamber when I was asked questions during the debate on second reading on this very point, but the hon. member for York South—

Mr. Fleming: Yes, I was present. His question was similar to the questions I have asked.

Mr. Garson: That is correct. Perhaps my hon. friend will recall that I asked a counter question as to just what it was that was done before this advertisement was put in the newspaper. Did the gentlemen who got together each week to draft this advertisement agree as to the contents of the advertisement, or did they agree as to the price of the articles that were advertised in the advertisement, because if they agreed—

Mr. Fleming: I will clear that up. These articles in the given case I take it are all price-maintained. Here is a group of retailers who are selling the same group of articles, in each case at the same price. They are not fixing the price, they are simply following or applying the policy of price-maintenance, laid down by the manufacturer. In their case, what is going to become of these advertisements? Are they going to be denied any opportunity of sharing together in advertisements of the same articles, as they are doing at the present time. A joint advertisement is the only way in which numbers of these smaller retailers can hope to compete with the big full-page advertisements of the larger retail outlets.

Mr. Garson: I appreciate the manner in which my hon. friend has elucidated this point, but he has hardly met my difficulty completely, I think, for this reason. A case of this sort, as I am sure my hon. friend as a lawyer would agree, depends to a very large extent indeed upon the facts. What my hon. friend is asking for really is a legal opinion as to what effect this legislation would have upon a certain practice which he says is being followed. If I say that it will have no effect, and then it turns out that my hon. friend's information as to just what is done at these meetings is inaccurate, it would be very difficult for me to convince anyone afterwards that I gave advice upon a certain set of facts, and the real facts were different from those which he had represented to me. In saying this I am not questioning his veracity; not for a moment. Perhaps I can answer his question in this way. If in fact these gentlemen at these meetings at which the text of the advertisement is agreed upon did reach an agreement as to prices, then that, I apprehend, would be unlawful not under this new amendment but under the existing Combines Investigation Act, provided that it was significantly preventing competition to the public detriment.

If, on the other hand—this is the case that my hon. friend poses—these prices were maintained prices which have been up until the present time quite legal—I understand that is what he contends—and that the advertisement advertises such maintained prices, then the passage of this legislation would make it impossible to advertise maintained prices because maintained prices themselves are made illegal by the bill.

Whether or not what my hon. friend has stated—and what I am stating by way of reply—is in accordance with the actual facts of the case, I am not in a position to say, and I would very much prefer that no person should take this exchange between my hon. friend and myself too seriously until we get the actual facts of the case before us and express an opinion concerning them.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That warning is unnecessary.

[Mr. Fleming.]

Mr. Fleming: This is an extraordinary procedure. The Minister of Justice has said: Now, I have made an answer, but do not let anybody think I am bound by it.

Mr. Garson: No.

Mr. Fleming: We are not asking free legal advice from the Minister of Justice; we are asking for the government's interpretation of this legislation. I prefaced what I had to say on this subject by indicating that so far as my reading of this section is concerned, it just abounds with difficulties as to its meaning. It seems to me that this is a section that, when it is submitted to judicial interpretation, is going to present very great difficulties. That is why I think we wish to understand now just what it is we are dealing with. The case that I put before the minister was put for illustration. I think that he has in his answer introduced all the qualifications, surely, and all the statements of pertinent facts that are relevant to his answer. But I think when he does qualify his answer to his heart's content or introduces all kinds of hypothetical circumstances, surely when his answer is given we are entitled to understand that that is a considered answer and the government's view as to the effect of this legislation. I emphasize again, this is not an idle question.

Mr. Garson: On a question of privilege, before my hon. friend goes away from this point, I should like to make it clear, if I have not already done so, that I have tried, and I think successfully, to give an answer to the set of facts which my hon. friend has posed as the basis for his question; and I am quite willing to be accountable for that answer to his set of facts. But what I have suggested, with all respect, and not in any way questioning his veracity, is that it may well be that the real facts are not as he imagines them to be. I am simply uttering a note of warning that to the extent that the real facts are different from those which he has suggested, then to that extent my answer will not apply to the real facts. In other words, I do not want my hon. friend, nor do I want the Drug Trading Company, or whatever the organization is, to say, on the basis of the answer I have given to the facts stated by my hon. friend that, well, we are out in the clear on the basis of the real facts; but if the real facts are as stated by my hon. friend—and they may very well be—then I stand right behind my answer.

Mr. Fleming: I do not think anyone would ever propose to hold the minister to an answer except in terms of the question, and the question in this case is surrounded by what I thought was an ample statement of the understood facts. Certainly, the minister has predicated his answer upon the correctness of the facts as stated. Indeed, he has gone further and introduced a number of qualifications and hypotheses that surely qualify his answer to his own satisfaction. That answer having been given, I think the committee is entitled to feel that it is a considered answer; that it is the government's understanding of the legislation that it is introducing, and that it is its legislative purpose in connection with this measure.

I think this question must be considered further. This is not an idle question; this is a very serious matter for a great many retailers because, as I have indicated to you, the only way in which they can hope to compete in advertising with the large retail outlets is by association together, pooling the expense of advertisements.

Now, we are told on the one hand that if today they are going out to fix prices by a combination among themselves in a manner detrimental to the public interest, that is already contrary to the act. And we are told on the other hand that if this is not that case, but is simply a case of resale price-maintenance, laid down by the manufacturer who supplies these goods to all retailers, on these or similar terms, for sale at the maintained price, such practice is to become illegal.

But that is not the end of the question. The manufacturer is quite at liberty to indicate the maximum price. We have already been told that he is at liberty to suggest what he considers a fair price, so long as he does not attempt to lay down sanctions as applied to anyone who does not choose to follow his view as to fair price. But what is to be the position of a group of retailers in the same business who, in the light of a maximum price indicated by the manufacturer or a fair price suggested by the manufacturer, choose to unite together in publishing an advertisement which says, for instance, that the John Jones tooth brush is to be offered for sale at an indicated number of pharmaceutical outlets at a price of fifty cents, and that, we will say, a particular type of toothpaste is available at that group of pharmaceutical outlets at a price of forty-nine cents? There may be a dozen other articles in the same advertisement.

This is a very important question. It is something that agitates pharmacists and merchants who are motivated in their business dealings by the highest purposes. Their operations are honourable and above reproach. They keep within the law. They obey the law, and they wish to continue to do so. At the same time they do not wish to be exposed to the ravages of unfair competition at the hands of big and powerful retail outlets.

In the case I have put before the minister, I do not think we have had by any means an adequate answer to the question. Assuming that this legislation passes, what is the position with respect to the desire of those retailers who are interested in the same type of commodity to associate themselves in a common advertisement?

Mrs. Fairclough: Following up the same question, I should like to ask the minister if I understood him to imply that the joint advertising done in the past by groups of independent retailers or by voluntary chains contravenes the Combines Investigation Act. Also, whether they did or not, and if there is any question at all as to the legality of the joint advertising, who will be guilty? Will the retailers themselves be the ones charged, or will the newspapers be deemed guilty by reason of having published these advertisements?

Mr. Garson: Mr. Chairman, the question asked by the hon. member for Hamilton West is pretty good proof of the difficulty which arises in reply to questions such as that asked by the hon. member for Eglinton. The substance of the question of the hon. member for Eglinton was this: Can these druggists continue to advertise maintained prices? My answer was that since resale price maintenance will be banned by this legislation, it will be impossible to advertise maintained prices. That is my answer.

I did not say that they could not have joint advertising, which is a different question entirely. The difficulty arises in a matter of this kind, as any lawyer with any experience, such as that of the hon. member for Eglinton, will tell you, that the first thing counsel wants to know when asked for an opinion is this: What are the facts of this case? He wants to know what the real facts are—not the hypothetical ones, but the real ones. He will not give an opinion until he is told the facts clearly.

If the hon. member for Hamilton West has a different set of facts in mind, that there are not going to be maintained prices in some other type of advertising, then that indicates another answer.

My point is that this sort of question and answer procedure in committee is more likely to create misunderstanding than to illuminate the subject. One cannot express an opinion until he knows exactly what it is that these gentlemen propose to do. We are doing these men a disservice until we can consult with them and find out what it is they have in mind to do after the act is passed. Then we can tell whether they will be acting in compliance with the act.

Mrs. Fairclough: I think it is fairly obvious that what they want to do is to proceed in the manner in which they have in the past.

Mr. Garson: Yes.

Mrs. Fairclough: I should like to ask the minister whether it was his intention to indicate that this joint advertising has in the past run contrary to the provisions of the Combines Investigation Act. I gathered that from some of his remarks. I wonder now just what happens to this group of retailers. They are probably a voluntary chain—and I presume the minister understands that when I refer to a voluntary chain I mean that each store is independently owned and that they group together for purposes of identification. Each person, however, is the owner of his own store, and his association with other members is purely voluntary. In the past they have published advertisements jointly. Of course they would have to agree on the prices which would go in those advertisements. They would have to agree, because the very fact that they put their names to the advertisement would mean that they agreed.

Mr. Garson: No. Perhaps my hon. friend would permit me to interrupt. I think this would be an excellent interruption, if I may be permitted to say so. I assume that they do not agree at all. But if not, were they not advertising drug prices—

Mr. Hees: Not necessarily at all.

Mr. Garson: Just a moment, now. Were they not advertising drug prices which had been fixed at the manufacturing level by resale price maintenance?

Mrs. Fairclough: No.

Mr. Croll: He is trying to help you.

Mr. Garson: Because if they did not, if they got together among themselves to fix prices as a horizontal combine, then that would be in contravention of the act—not this present bill, but the act itself. That would be so, provided competition was eliminated to some extent by their action in so doing.

So their problem, it seems to me, is this—and these are not the best auspices under which to discuss it—their problem has been that under a system of lawful resale price maintenance, under which manufacturers have fixed resale prices of these products, they could publish joint advertisements. Having regard to the fact that resale price maintenance is lawful, and that it is lawful to advertise, the advertisement would be quite all right.

But now the question arises as asked by the hon. member for Eglinton: If we ban resale price maintenance, can they continue to do that? And of course if we ban maintained prices, the presumption arises at once that they have agreed to fix the prices themselves. Perhaps I would illuminate the subject a little more if I were to put it this way—although this perhaps is a ridiculous supposition: Let us suppose that these gentlemen pool their resources in advertising. From what the hon. member has said, I understand that they are all independent. If their prices were not the same on different products, there would be no question at all, because there would be no suggestion or thought of their being the same. But it has always been the law that dealers cannot get together to fix prices at which they are going to sell their products. If they do so and do it to the extent that it is contrary to public interest by a significant reduction in competition, then that would be an offence under the act. I assume that up until the present time they have just been advertising resale-maintained prices?

Mrs. Fairclough: That is not the fact and that is not what I meant. I take it from what the minister has now said that it is quite legal for A and P or Loblaw's or Dominion Stores to publish full-page advertisements indicating that you can buy ketchup in any store for twenty-seven cents, but it would be against the law apparently for a chain composed of independent merchants to publish the same advertisement and say that you could buy ketchup at any of their stores for twenty-seven cents. That would be considered collusion.

Mr. Croll: He did not say that.

Mrs. Fairclough: That is what it sounded like to me.

Mr. Garson: This just illustrates—

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): The stupidity of the legislation.

Mr. Garson: No. It just illustrates the difficulty of trying to give a legal opinion upon a set of facts asked by the hon. member for Eglinton, and again upon a somewhat different set of facts asked by the hon. member for Hamilton West, and so on.

An hon. Member: They are simple facts.

Mr. Garson: I think an exchange of this sort is doing a disservice to all concerned.

Mrs. Fairclough: These are the very things that are bothering merchants. I cannot see that it is doing a disservice to try to clarify the situation; quite the contrary. As a matter of fact, I was not talking about price-maintained articles entirely because a great many of the products and articles which are advertised jointly are not price-maintained nor have they ever been price-maintained. That is particularly true of food items. You see these big advertisements in the paper every Thursday where the chains advertise prices which will be in effect in their stores for the week-end buying. I asked the minister before whether that advertising would be contrary to the provisions of the Combines Investigation Act in the past.

Mr. Cannon: If it is against public interest only.

Mrs. Fairclough: It does not matter whether they contravene the act or not, it is not a matter of whether it is against public interest or not; I would say that that is secondary. The question is whether one set of dealers or one dealer operating through a number of outlets can practise a certain advertising policy while another group which has chained together cannot.

Mr. Fleming: May I point out to the minister that I think that he has quite overlooked an important feature of this bill. The question has to do with something done or undertaken by retailers. There is nothing in this bill that says anything about retailers. The proposed section 37A does not deal with acts done by retailers.

Mr. Cannon: They are included in the definition.

Mr. Fleming: The definition of the word "dealer" is broad enough to include someone who sells goods, but look at subsections 2 and 3 and you will see that there is nothing there that applies to what is done by retailers.

Mr. Garson: My friend's question concerned retailers.

Mr. Fleming: That is my point and for that reason I think the minister's answer is in error. I think in undertaking to answer these questions he has completely overlooked the fact that this bill has no application to acts by retailers. It purports to apply only to those who are supplying or selling to retailers.

Mr. Garson: Has my hon. friend looked at the definition of "dealer"?

Mr. Fleming: I referred to the definition of "dealer" when I opened my remarks this afternoon and just now. It is quite true that the word "dealer" is defined in terms broad enough to include a manufacturer, a supplier or a vendor. But look at the operative terms of section 37A; look at subsection 2. There is nothing there that applies to an act of a retailer selling to a consumer. There is nothing in the bill that applies to that situation. I think the answer of the minister is in error.

Mr. Cannon: The minister's answer referred to the case of retailers combining together which would be illegal under the existing act, not under the amendment.

Mr. Fleming: That was only one fragment of the minister's answer. He dealt with the situation that exists before this bill comes into effect. Whatever may be said about the correctness of his interpretation, certainly that has to be dealt with in the terms of the present legislation. The other question was as to the effect of this legislation on practices that exist. The minister has given a long answer which I think in the light of a proper reading of this section is quite erroneous.

This illustrates the importance of insisting on a discussion of this kind in committee. After all, what is a committee stage for except to probe into the terms of legislation like this and try to find out what they mean. Let us turn the sections inside out and see what they mean. We have been discussing this section for less than an hour and it seems to me that it is already apparent that the government does not understand the full extent of this legislation or what is involved and what is not involved in it.

Mr. Noseworthy: I should like to follow up this matter of advertising with the minister. I understand that a firm like Loblaw's can publish a full-page advertisement in the Toronto papers indicating that certain items can be bought in any one of fifteen or twenty Loblaw stores in Toronto and suburbs at a given price. What we are trying to find out is what would be involved if an association like the independent druggists or the independent grocery alliance, each of which has a number of stores, get together and publish a joint advertisement and name the prices at which items may be purchased in each of their stores. Is that just as lawful as if Dominion Stores, A and P or some other chain did the same thing?

Here is a full-page advertisement indicating what I have in mind. This appeared in the Toronto papers, and similar advertisements appear many times through the week. A number of stores combine, and apparently there is no violation under the present act, or there has been no indication that there is a violation. Some of the articles advertised are price-maintained, others are not. This has been going on for years. Will they still be permitted to publish these advertisements indicating the prices at which given articles can be bought in any of their stores?

Mr. Garson: I shall make another attempt to make myself clear in this matter. There is nothing to prevent a group publishing a joint advertisement, but in practice that advertisement—I am not suggesting this about that particular group of people—and the business of getting together to agree upon prices that are to be published may be merely a cloak for a horizontal price-fixing agreement. If that were the case, if it were a cloak and they were really fixing prices, the mere fact that under the law they have a perfectly lawful right to join together to publish a common advertisement would be no protection for them if it could be established that they had fixed prices. If the crown were able to prove in a given case that fixing went on to the extent of seriously interfering with competition, and that is what we would have to prove in order to prove that it was contrary to public interest, that would result in a conviction. But if a group of men came together and in good faith published a joint advertisement of prices of goods that were not resale price maintained, and if we can all imagine that by the most extraordinary coincidence they all happened to have individually the same price for the same article in the advertisement, if those were the facts then it would be quite within their rights to have a joint advertisement provided they were not using it as a means of fixing prices in contravention of the act. My hon. friend may say that all that sounds extremely complicated. In any practical case that would arise, we will say for prosecution, it would be a question of fact for the court to decide whether this was a bona fide coming together in a joint advertisement or whether on the facts of the case there had been a contravention of the act. My difficulty in discussing this question is that I am being asked, upon a purely hypothetical set of facts, to anticipate what judgment a court would give upon them.

Mr. Noseworthy: Will the minister show me what is the difference, so far as interfering with competition is concerned, when fifteen or twenty Loblaw stores scattered throughout Toronto and suburbs advertise a set price for every given article on their shelves in stores that have different overheads and staffs and where the cost of doing business is different? Loblaw's, because they are one firm, can have fifty stores and fix prices for every one of their stores, and you say it does not interfere with competition.

[Mr. Noseworthy.]

An hon. Member: They are not conspiring with anybody else.

Mr. Noseworthy: If fifty independent dealers agree to advertise their prices that is interfering with competition and I should like to know what the difference is.

An hon. Member: Loblaw's are all alone.

Mr. Garson: When as a matter of policy in a country—for example, the United States, Canada or Great Britain which is now engaged in the task—it is decided to pass anti-trust or anti-combine legislation, they prohibit agreements reached between different concerns for the purpose of fixing prices over the whole field, or a significant part of the whole field, so as to achieve by that means the economic equivalent of a monopoly. When you prohibit an agreement, it is an agreement amongst various separate owners and proprietors of businesses. In the case that my hon. friend poses, while Loblaw's may operate twenty stores they are, as he well knows, all under one management. That management establishes the pricing for those stores but it does not establish it for the whole industry. They are subject to the competition not only of other chains and departmental stores but of all these other fifty retailers, thousands of other retailers, in that business.

If you say, by this ingenious point which my hon. friend has raised, that you are going to let groups of other people set prices by agreement, the practical question arises in the administration of legislation of this character as to just where you are going to draw the line. You have either got to prohibit price fixing agreements across the board or not prohibit them. If you do not prohibit them, then what happens, as has happened in certain industries which I will not name, is that everybody in the industry, at the retail level, the jobber's level and the manufacturer's level, gets together in one great arrangement that controls the price of the product from the time it is manufactured through all its stages until it reaches the consumer.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Would that not be an offence now under the Combines Investigation Act?

Mr. Garson: For all who get together?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Would that not be an offence now if they all got together?

Mr. Garson: Oh yes, it surely would be. It is an offence if they all get together, and it is an offence if less than all get together.

Mr. Diefenbaker: You said all.

Mr. Garson: It would be an offence if the retailers got together in a horizontal agreement. It is an offence for the wholesalers to get together in a common agreement. It is an offence for the manufacturers to get together, and if the whole bunch of them get together it is perhaps a more grave offence but it is still just an offence under the act. The difficulty which my hon. friend raises is one which arises out of the nature of legislation of this character. You are either going to prohibit price fixing agreements or you are not.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Garson: That is the character of the combines act, and all of this discussion for the past fifteen minutes has nothing to do with the bill. It has been on the combines act itself.

Mr. Noseworthy: I understand it will be illegal for the 400 independent stores that form this voluntary group to get together, fix prices and advertise uniform prices. Yet it would be quite legal for these 400 stores to organize themselves into a corporation with one management and for that one management to fix the prices for the 400 stores.

Mr. Drew: That is what it encourages.

Mr. Hees: That is what you are encouraging. Is that not so?

Mr. Noseworthy: Am I correct in that assumption?

Mr. Garson: What is involved there is the surrender of the independence of every one of these proprietors to a larger concern. I think my hon. friend is right to this extent, that in dealing with arriving at agreements in contravention of the act you have to treat each proprietor, large and small, as an entity whose consent is a necessary feature in any agreement that he may reach with others to fix prices in contravention of the act. My hon. friend is quite right that it does not make any difference whether it is a large or small dealer. He acts as an individual and his consent is necessary to arriving at that agreement.

Mr. Ross (Souris): I think this bill is very confusing to a great many retailers. I have had considerable correspondence with executive members of the Canadian farm implement retailers association. You have partly cleared up the difficulty with the reference to the automobile agency or large farm implement agency that may lose its contract. I think the majority of the larger farm implements are handled on a catalogue basis. The prices are set out every year by the larger companies not only for their machines but for parts and repairs. In many cases that I know of a genuine agent handles these farm implements. He sets up an organization by agreement with a company to service the implements over a term of years. He purchases his own property and in many cases he purchases the parts outright from the particular company and carries on that service. These people are quite worried as to whether or not the legislation will interfere with them. Every time they go to their shelves for a particular part they look up the catalogue put out by the farm implement company concerned and charge their customers on the basis of the catalogue price. They are very much concerned as to whether the legislation will interfere with their carrying on on that basis. As I interpret it, that is really price maintenance.

Mr. Garson: When my hon. friend asks whether or not it interferes, what does he mean?

Mr. Ross (Souris): Is it price maintenance? The minister pointed out to the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar that a person could lose his agency for not carrying out the instructions of the company, and would come under this new legislation. Supposing someone comes along and reports one of those men carrying on this service. There is an investigation, and the dealer finds he is in difficulty for not adhering to this catalogue price. Is that considered as interference under this legislation?

Mr. Garson: I am not sure that I understand the hon. member's point. Perhaps I had better restate it and he can take careful note to make sure that I am stating his point correctly. If at the present time the basis upon which the implement dealer gets his implements and repair parts from the manufacturer is that in reselling them he must charge the customer the prices that are set out in the catalogue or else he will lose his agency or have some form of punishment imposed upon him—is it the hon. member's view that is the situation?

Mr. Ross (Souris): I am told it is not a hard and fast contract, but it is a suggested price. Nevertheless, I do know what has happened in many cases where the dealer has deviated from that suggested price.

Mr. Garson: The manufacturer has withdrawn the agency?

Mr. Ross (Souris): That has happened in some cases.

Mr. Garson: The effect of this bill will be that the dealer who purchased his implements or repair parts from the manufacturer and has paid for them, will have title to those implements. If he wishes he can sell them at the suggested price in the catalogue to which my hon. friend refers, but if he wishes to sell them for less than that the manufacturer cannot do anything to him, as the hon. member says he is doing now.

If the hon. member regards the penalties which are now imposed on the dealer as objectionable in any way, then this bill will do away with those penalties.

Mr. Hees: Getting back to what we were discussing before the member for Souris spoke, it is obvious that the large grocery chains like A & P or Loblaw's can combine their advertising for all their stores, and therefore can afford to advertise the products sold at all their stores, at whatever prices they want. The small stores cannot afford to advertise singly, and that is why, in the past, they have combined in order to make it possible to advertise their goods and draw customers to their stores. In the future, in order to compete with these large chain stores, there will be great compulsion on them to merge together in order to advertise and maintain stable prices. This eliminates individual competition; and will mean that you are only going to have mergers of small units, and you are going to do away with the individual unit. Does the minister agree that is what this legislation will make it almost impossible to get away from?

Mr. Garson: No; I do not agree with that at all, Mr. Chairman. It seems to me there has been considerable confusion of thought between the provisions of this bill, on the one hand, and the provisions of the Combines Investigation Act on the other. When I am asked to say what would happen on the basis of a certain set of facts, and to those facts the existing Combines Investigation Act is perhaps more applicable than this bill, I think in all honesty I have to give an answer in terms of the existing Combines Investigation Act.

Perhaps I could make this whole difficulty over advertising more clear if I put it in this way. It is now legal, and will continue to be legal after this bill is passed, to advertise all non-price-maintained goods which would include most of the groceries and will include nearly all goods after the bill comes into effect. I think I had better stop there, because that will leave a clearer impression in the minds of the members concerning the difficulty we have been discussing. It is a difficulty which does not arise under this bill at all, but is a difficulty under the Combines Investigation Act in its present form.

Mr. Hees: That is not an answer to my question at all.

Mr. Croll: Perhaps we can clarify it. The trouble is that everyone is asking questions and getting different answers to the same questions; that is what is bothering me. I am very unhappy about the answer that was given to the member for York South.

Mr. Hees: A new assistant.

Mr. Croll: I do not know why there is all the shouting. You are trying to get an interpretation of an act, and I am not giving legal advice. I want to understand what this means. I shall give the minister a set of facts to see if I understand the bill. A, B, C and D are retailers who buy from manufacturer X. The suggested retail price is 10 cents. They all advertise the article at 10 cents in a joint advertisement. Under this bill is there anything illegal about that transaction?

Mr. Garson: Under the present bill?

Mr. Croll: Yes.

Mr. Garson: The present bill has nothing at all to do with it.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): A suggestion has been made that 300 or 400 retail stores might combine in order to obtain the same results as Loblaw's and A & P. The thought occurs to me that the only way that could be done would be for one company to buy out these 300 or 400 stores.

Mr. Hees: No.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): If these stores were run the same as Loblaw's, the managers and clerks would be on a salary. The stores would be united, and you would have exactly the same circumstances as those under which Loblaw's operate. But if the 400 grocers got together and decided they would form a combine—that is the suggestion here—and said they would come under the one head but run under their own businesses and just get together on price, then that would be a combine.

Mr. Hees: No, a merger.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): No, it is a combine. If it is not under one management and the managers are not on a salary, then it is a combine.

Mr. Coldwell: I want to follow up the question put by the hon. member for Souris. Supposing a manufacturer discontinued supplying a retailer without giving any reason whatever, or ostensibly for some reason other than cutting price, what is there in this bill to prevent that? Supposing a co-operative society wishes to buy a line of implements: can a manufacturer refuse to supply the dealer in the one instance or the co-operative in the other instance with that line of goods? Is there anything in this bill or in the Combines Investigation Act which would enable either the dealer under those circumstances or an organized co-operative to get a line of goods such as implements, for example—that is perhaps what we are most interested in at the moment—without any discrimination whatsoever?

Mr. Garson: I would refer my hon. friend, if he has the bill there, to subsection 3.

Mr. Coldwell: I have read that.

Mr. Garson: It reads as follows:

No dealer shall refuse to sell or supply an article or commodity to any other person for the reason that such other person

(a) has refused to resell or to offer for resale the article or commodity

(i) at a price specified by the dealer or established by agreement,

(ii) at a price not less than a minimum price specified by the dealer or established by agreement,

(iii) at a markup or discount specified by the dealer or established by agreement,

(iv) at a markup not less than a minimum markup specified by the dealer or established by agreement, or

(v) at a discount not greater than a maximum discount specified by the dealer or established by agreement . . .

In other words, if the retailer has broken the price by selling for less, and the manufacturer subsequently refuses renewal of supplies or cancels the contract of supply, then I imagine what would happen is that a complaint would be made to the combines investigation branch, and we would inquire into the circumstances. If they revealed what seemed to be a case against the manufacturer, a charge would be laid; and when that was tried, the question of fact would be for the court to decide on the evidence as to whether the manufacturer, in refusing renewal supplies or in cancelling the arrangement with the dealer, did so in contravention of this section or whether he had other good reasons for doing so. If he had no other good reasons, and if the man was the same credit risk that he had always been and was doing a good job in every way, I should think that the conclusion which it would be almost irresistible for the court to come to would be that the real reason for the cancellation of the contract or the refusal for renewal of supplies was the fact that the price had been broken.

Mr. Coldwell: Having read that particular part of the bill, I had come to the conclusion that this rather restricted the grounds upon which a manufacturer could refuse to sell. It seemed to me that if we are really trying to bring about competition and to end this particular practice, we should simply have this clause read in this way:

"No dealer shall refuse to sell or supply an article or commodity to another person."

It seemed to me that we should stop there. Then every co-operative could obtain goods and every dealer could obtain goods; and once he obtained the goods and bought the goods, he could sell the goods in any way he liked. It seems to me that the clause should stop there if that is the intent of the bill.

Mr. Garson: With all deference, Mr. Chairman, I think that my hon. friend has not given his last suggestion the careful consideration and good judgment that he usually gives to matters that come before the House of Commons; because if we made it the law that any manufacturer would have to sell goods to any person—

Mr. Coldwell: Who would pay for them.

Mr. Garson: —who would pay for them, I would think that would be quite an extreme interference with the freedom of the individual, and much more so than anything that is contemplated in the whole of the act at the present time.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I have listened to the Minister of Justice, and I think he ought to pay a compliment to the hon. member for Spadina for applying a little bit of the common sense to which the Minister of Justice referred yesterday when he himself was discussing these sections. I do not know where we would have been but for the hon. member for Spadina and the assistance of the combines commissioner, although not on the floor of the house.

As to the present section, the point raised by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar is clear. The Minister of Justice seems to forget that with regard to prosecutions there is such a rule as that intent must be established; and the intent is fully set out in this section which says:

No dealer shall refuse to sell or supply an article or commodity to any other person for the reason that such other person

(a) has refused to resell or to offer for resale the article or commodity

(i) at a price specified by the dealer or established by agreement . . .

And so on. My hon. friend says that it is a question of fact. Certainly it is a question of fact that can only be determined if there is evidence upon which a court could determine it.

Mr. Garson: That is right.

Mr. Diefenbaker: On the statement made by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar there is no authority under this act that will deny the right of any dealer simply to refuse to deliver any commodity, whatever it may be, as long as the reason is not given. That point indicates exactly how half-baked legislation comes before the House of Commons, without the care and the attention it should receive. While the endeavour has been to close the door, in fact the door has been opened. There is no onus upon the accused. The crown must prove, in the prosecution, that the dealer refused to sell or supply the article or commodity for the reason that the intended purchaser has refused to be bound by the resale price.

Mr. Cannon: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Yes.

Mr. Cannon: The hon. member said: If the reason is not mentioned.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Yes.

Mr. Cannon: Even if the reason is not mentioned for the refusal to supply goods, does the hon. member, who is a lawyer, not realize that the reason can be established by outside evidence?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Oh, yes.

Mr. Cannon: That is, by collateral evidence.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Oh, yes.

Mr. Cannon: Of the circumstances.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is true.

Mr. Cannon: It does not have to be mentioned in the act.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is simply an interruption that is meaningless.

Mr. Cannon: I beg your pardon. It contradicts what you were saying.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is true.

Mr. Cannon: It is not meaningless for that reason, surely.

Mr. Diefenbaker: No; it is not meaningless to my hon. friend. But the point I am making is this, Mr. Chairman. By the section itself imposing the onus on the prosecution, the situation to which I have referred is possible, provided that there are no documents to the contrary or that there is no evidence to the contrary. If there is evidence, as my hon. friend says, then it will be established that the reason for refusal to deal was the refusal of the intended purchaser to resell at the resale price; that is so if there is evidence, either direct or circumstantial. But circumstantial evidence is certainly far different from what was referred to a moment ago as a principle by the Minister of Justice when he says that the courts may come to a conclusion as a fact that the reason for the denial was the fact that the purchaser refused to be bound. There would have to be some evidence of that, either direct or circumstantial, as the hon member for Iles-de-la-Madeleine has said.

For two days the Minister of Justice has been telling the house how difficult it is to get convictions under the Combines Investigation Act. In the United States it takes three years to get the evidence. If this section is passed as it now stands, and an alteration is not made in the draft, there is no reason why any person in this country need fear prosecution. I refer particularly to implement manufacturers or distributors, automobile distributors and the like. I take those as examples. Under the law as we intend to pass it, if it goes through in its present form, the crown will have an impossible task in proving intent; for, as the Minister of Justice has repeatedly said, prospective wrongdoers do not leave any more traces or fingerprints than they can help. He pointed out yesterday, with such power and force, that these great corporations have outstanding lawyers to act for them. That was given as an excuse for the fact that in some of the prosecutions government counsel were less astute than they ought to have been in the prosecution, and in the results of prosecutions no doubt. The fact remains that under the section as it now stands the onus on the prosecution would allow every manufacturer in this country, without giving any reasons—he need give no reasons—to simply say: On and after a certain date I do not wish to supply you. If there is no more than that available, and no circumstantial evidence, as the hon. member for Iles-de-la-Madeleine mentions, then there can be no conviction. I also point out that under this legislation there is nothing that will deny any manufacturer the right to say that one prospective purchaser shall be on a quota, and one quota shall be small and another large.

Mr. Nowlan: And that it will be six weeks before you get your order.

Mr. Diefenbaker: There is nothing to indicate that any offence will be committed if a dealer simply says: On and after this date, for no reason—and they will certainly set forth in the letter; we have no reason for doing this—your quota will be such and such. I point that out as a second weakness in the draft section.

As I see them, these two weaknesses can have the effect of parliament passing the section in its present form and constituting a threat, and effective in so far as commodities now on the shelves of the retailers are concerned, but ineffective as against any future dealings that might take place. In its present form, as I see it, the section will be—and I repeat—ineffective in relation to the various retailers who have goods in stock. They will be able to sell them; but in so far as goods that are in the wholesalers' stocks today are concerned, and which will ultimately find their way into the possession of the retailer, the section as it now stands will, in my opinion, come within the ambit of Colonel Ralston's description of section 498A in 1936 when he used the scriptural words, a sham and a delusion. Certainly—and I am not going into the question of loss leaders at the moment, although I hope the opportunity does come before we conclude the discussion on this section—in its present form the onus is on the prosecution, provided that the manufacturer or the distributor does not openly advertise the fact that he is refusing to sell because of his belief or his knowledge that the intended purchaser is not maintaining the price; and he will have nothing to fear as regards commodities that have not yet been bargained for or delivered. I place this before the minister with some knowledge of what proof is needed in the courts and some knowledge of combines cases from both sides, prosecution and defence.

If the minister does desire to do more than use a smokescreen in order to delude people into believing that something effective is being done, then section 37A will have to be revamped in order to assure that too great an onus is not placed upon the crown. I think that subsection 3 (a) and (b) will have to be redrawn, otherwise the crown itself will be establishing in law what the onus must be. In my opinion, with proper defence, it would be most difficult if not impossible to secure a conviction for goods that are to be bargained for after the date on which this legislation comes into effect. I bring that to the minister's attention. He may say that it has been considered by the law officers of the crown. That does not in any way deter me from offering suggestions. The law officers of the crown have drawn many laws, and they have been passed by parliament, and on the first occasion that they have found their way into the courts for interpretation, judges who are in no way affected by sentiment or considerations such as that, determining the law, as it has to be determined, by what parliament passes, will not consider what has been said in parliament in determining the degree of the onus or the need of requisite proof in order to establish and discharge that onus.

Mr. Garson: I think I should make a brief reply to my hon. friend and say that we are greatly indebted to get from him the opinion of a man who, as he has correctly stated, has had a great deal of experience in criminal law and in connection with the present act. I am glad to have this opinion. But it so happens that we have also had the opinions not only from the law officers of the crown to whom he referred, but from experienced officers who have had long years of work with the Combines Investigation Act.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Who are they?

Mr. Garson: One of them is Mr. Whiteley, who has been with the department for many years, and another one is Mr. MacDonald, who is a former deputy attorney general of Nova Scotia, and who has been with the department for about three years, and a number of others besides. They do not happen to share the opinion which has just been expressed by my hon. friend, and I must say for my own part that I would be much more impressed with his opinion if he would just go on and state the text that he would suggest to tighten up the hole that he says is now in this section. If he cannot get his criticism down to more definite form than that, I think we shall have to continue to rely upon the opinions of our officers.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Well, Mr. Chairman, my submission is that subsection 3—of course I realize that the hon. gentleman is merely inviting suggestions not for the purpose of giving them consideration, because I found that to be the case in the past—I suggest that subsection 3 in its present form and paragraphs (a) and (b) reduce themselves to a nullity by reason of the particularity and detail given. It is not for me to draft the exact words, but I submit this: that no dealer shall refuse to sell or supply an article or commodity to any person without justification. That will place the dealer in a position so that the crown will not have to establish all of the details, but the onus will still remain on it. It will not have to establish all of the details set forth in paragraphs (a) and (b).

Looking at this, I must say I would be very interested in the first prosecution under this section, provided a company or a dealer did not keep records indicating that the reason for the denial of a sale was that an intended purchaser had refused to resell or to offer to resell at a price not less than a minimum specified by the dealer or established by agreement. If all a dealer does is notify an intended purchaser that on and after a certain date he is on a quota; if he says "We feel that we have sufficient sales elsewhere, and do not have to deal with you. We appreciate the value of your patronage and respectfully decline it", I say there is no court in the country that would convict a dealer in the face of those circumstances. That would be the condition unless, as suggested by the hon. member for Iles-de-la-Madeleine, the dealer were foolish enough to give reasons either in the letter he might write, or in a memorandum, or in a conversation between his agents and the intended purchaser.

This has all the earmarks of being ineffective. With the greatest respect to those to whom the hon. member has made reference I say that, on the face of it, as the section now stands it will be ineffectual and inoperative; because these people of whom the Minister of Justice speaks with such awe, corporations with powerful counsel, are not going to have their records cluttered up with admissions of guilt or anything in the nature of statements that would come within the provisions of the section in question.

The situation is different under the Combines Investigation Act as a whole. The hon. member for Charlotte mentioned that a combination is sufficient. But the Minister of Justice quickly clarified that suggestion by stating that a combination, in itself, is no offence. Any number of manufacturers or distributors can combine or join together for the purpose of merchandising, so long as they have not the intent, or so long as their actions are not detrimental to the consumer. That was not very difficult to prove—although the Minister of Justice has said that it was—as compared with proving or establishing an offence under this new section. There is a vast gulf in between. One is comparatively easy. But I have read and reread the section, and I suggest that the difficulty the crown will have in discharging its onus by bringing a case within the provisions of subsections 3 (a) and (b), in their present form, is insurmountable so far as the prosecution is concerned. That would be so except in the isolated case where the smaller fellow, without legal talent available to him, may not cover himself. But any group of individuals desiring to evade this amendment and avoid its consequences, in so far as goods for future delivery are concerned, I submit will have very little to fear.

Having said that, I leave it to the minister to either make it effectual or leave it in its present form, as I know he will. But I am confident that when the first prosecution occurs some of my criticism will be justified by what takes place in the court; because it is obvious on the face of it that under the section as drafted the crown has piled upon itself an onus the discharge of which is almost impossible.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

Mr. Cannon: I suggest the difficulty of proof will not be as great as has been suggested, because one will be able to proceed by a process of elimination. We will suppose that manufacturer A has been supplying retailer B over a certain period of years, and that suddenly he refuses to supply the retailer any longer. Retailer B is your witness, and counsel will ask him: "Have you been paying regularly? Have you behaved as a retailer should behave toward his supplier?" It will be relatively easy, by a process of elimination, to establish that the only reason the manufacturer has refused to supply goods is the one foreseen by this measure.

One should not forget that in a prosecution of this kind the retailer can be called as a witness. One does not have to rely upon the evidence from the manufacturer. The hon. member for Lake Centre has referred to the difficulty of getting evidence from the manufacturer's records, but I suggest to him that a prosecutor would not have to rely upon that; because in a case like that, if you are going to prosecute it will be because the manufacturer has refused to supply the retailer. The retailer will not be very happy about it and will gladly cooperate with the department. I do not see any great difficulty in the section.

Mr. Fulton: The minister has been referring to the matter of enforcement. How would it apply to dealers who in fact purchase and pay for goods they are to resell, although they are called commission agents? I understand that the enforcement of this measure with respect to a retailer depends largely upon whether he is in fact an independent retailer or dealer, or whether he is an agent in the true sense of the term. What about the man who takes a commission agency, but in fact has to pay for the goods as he receives them, or on a monthly basis? How will the measure apply? He has paid for the goods, although he is described as the agent of the manufacturer.

Mr. Garson: I think my hon. friend will agree that what he has described is a manufacturer's agent working on a consignment basis. He would have a supply of goods from the manufacturer, and would draw on that supply when he made a sale. The circumstances to which the hon. member has referred are, I should think, somewhat exceptional, in that the man in question would pay for his goods outright. What does my hon. friend mean when he refers to paying by the month?

Mr. Fulton: I may have used the wrong expression. I think I used the word "commission", but I meant to say that it would be on consignment.

Mr. Garson: If the goods are on consignment, then I believe the title would remain in the manufacturer until the sale had actually taken place. And it might be that under an arrangement of that sort the conditions to be imposed would not contravene the act. But if my hon. friend will recall the answer I gave previously he will know they all related to a case where there was a transfer of title from the manufacturer to the dealer, who became the owner of the goods. When he became the owner of the goods he had the right to say what the selling price of the goods belonging to him would be. If the title remains in the manufacturer until the time it passes to the consumer, I think in that case the manufacturer would have the right to name his own selling price.

Mr. Fulton: Would that cover service station operators and motorcar dealers?

Mr. Garson: My understanding, and I may be wrong about it, is that a great many filling stations are owned and operated by the oil companies, by employees under the direction of the oil companies.

Mr. Fulton: There may be some, but I am thinking of the genuine dealer who owns his own establishment, who sells a certain brand of motor oil and gas at prices fixed by the oil company. It is his business; it is his property; he owns it, but with respect to the gas and oil he sells at prices fixed by the supplier.

Mr. Garson: I think my hon. friend will agree that even in those cases where the oil company is not operating the filling station but where they have a lessee who gets a quantity of oil and gas from the oil company, title to which remains in the oil company until it is sold—

Mr. Diefenbaker: No.

Mr. Hees: He pays for it.

Mr. Garson: It depends upon whether the manufacturer is selling his own goods direct to the purchaser or whether there is the intervention of another dealer who becomes the owner of those goods.

Mr. Fulton: I should like to deal with the specific basis on which these dealers operate. They own their own business and are supplied by an oil company with a certain line of oil and gas which they have to sell at a certain price. They are not acting as agents of the oil company. They pay for their supplies as they are received, or in some cases on a weekly basis, or in exceptional cases I believe on a monthly basis. They do not act as agents because they have to pay for their supplies. Although they are described in some cases as being agents of the oil company, would such persons be subject to the provisions of this bill?

Mr. Garson: If the dealer purchases the goods outright and then sells them he would come under the amendment, but not so if title to the goods remained in the manufacturer up to the time of the sale to the purchaser.

Mr. Drew: I think there is one aspect of this discussion that perhaps has not been sufficiently emphasized. The government is putting this measure forward with great determination. It is the obligation of the government, first, to know what the effect of this legislation is going to be and, second, to pass on to the members of this house information which the government possesses so the decision may be made with all the essential knowledge in the possession of the government.

It is the duty of members of this house to inform themselves adequately as to the effect of an amendment of this kind. I submit that the question which has been raised goes directly to the root of the problem we have before us. I ask the minister to tell us what is the exact situation in regard to the handling of oil and gasoline. After all, before bringing this bill forward he must have examined each of the great broad groups of merchandising and found out how they operated. I know he would not introduce this bill without having thoroughly considered every aspect. I think he should tell us now just how oil and gasoline is handled and what the impact of this amendment will be. We will then pass on to some other type of merchandise.

Mr. Garson: I do not think the most omniscient of governments could be expected to know all the operations and all the arrangements which oil companies may have with their dealers. I think most hon. members out of their common knowledge will bear me out when I say there are a number of cases in which oil companies operate filling stations with their own paid employees who are under their direction. The title of the goods remains with the manufacturer until they are sold direct to the motorist. That group would not fall within the terms of the amendment.

There is another larger group where the oil company has an arrangement with lessees of filling stations owned by it, under which the lessees are required to maintain the premises. The oil company agrees to supply the lessee from time to time with oil and gasoline as required, which he in turn sells to his customers. Regardless of what name we may give to that transaction, if the lessee, the filling station operator, or whatever appellation you wish to apply to him buys the oil and gasoline from the oil company direct, pays for it and resells it to the motorist, that transaction would come within the present amendment.

I do not know that I can make it any clearer. I am willing to continue to try to meet the quite reasonable requests of the leader of the opposition, but I think that pretty well covers the field.

Mr. Fulton: Will not the result of this amendment be to drive manufacturers and retailers into a principal and agent relationship, which would not be subject to the provisions of this bill? In order to preserve his competitive position as against his opponents, the powerful retail chains, departmental stores and so on, will independent retailers not tend somehow or other to give their transactions with their suppliers the colour of a principal and agent relationship rather than that of an independent retailer buying from a manufacturer? Surely that will be the effect of this legislation.

Mr. Garson: I do not pretend to answer that question with any particular competence because it has to do with the motor trade and I am not an expert in that field.

Mr. Fulton: Any type of trade.

Mr. Garson: Let us talk about one trade at a time. My answer to my hon. friend's question, for what it may be worth, is no, I do not think so. My impression is that the retailing of oil and gasoline is a pretty competitive business. With conditions as they are at the present time it is rather unlikely that any filling station operator would attempt to reduce the price of his merchandise in order to keep going.

Mr. Graydon: The avenue is open.

Mr. Garson: If there is competition in the field at all it would seem to me to more likely be by companies like the Joy Oil Company, which has introduced some element of competition at the manufacturing level.

Mr. Fulton: The minister has just said that this particular field is pretty competitive, with which I agree, although it is subject to resale price maintenance, as he has just said. In the case of the independent dealers I would say the majority buy their gas, pay for it and then resell it. The minister admits it is a pretty competitive business. However, he has said it is going to be subject to the bill. I cannot see how he can reconcile his two statements and say that the object of the bill is to increase competition when he says on the other hand that this particular business, which is subject to resale price maintenance, is pretty highly competitive.

Mr. Garson: I do not think I said it was subject to resale price maintenance.

Mr. Fulton: The minister did not say that in so many words but in fact it is.

Mr. Garson: It is all very well for the hon. member to say that, but do not imply that I have said it.

Mr. Fulton: Is the minister saying that it is not?

Mr. Garson: No, I am not saying it is or it is not because it has not been necessary for us to inform ourselves on that point.

Mr. Drew: I think the answer the minister has just given is simply further proof that every effort that has been made to obtain reconsideration of the bill has been more than amply justified. We are dealing now with the effect of a specific section of the bill. Previously we were dealing with the broad question of whether a bill in this form should be adopted. Now we are dealing with the specific section and its effect upon the retailing of merchandise and commodities of various kinds. They divide themselves into many fields, and we are dealing with one very important field. In view of the fact that we as members of the House of Commons are asked to support a measure which is going to define as a criminal offence agreements to carry forward certain practices that have been going on for some time, I feel sure the minister would not come before the house and ask us to adopt a bill in this form without having had an inquiry made into the impact upon every one of the major groups of retail sales in this country.

Certainly one of the important groups that would immediately present itself to anyone would be the merchandising of gasoline and oil. Therefore it is not for the minister to say: I do not pose as an expert; I do not say it will have this effect and I do not say it will not have this effect. I think it is for the minister to say to us that certainly they have examined the impact of the bill in this form on the merchandising arrangements of the country. When he is asked what the effect is in regard to gasoline or oil he should be able to say: This is what we have found it will be. If he is asked what the effect will be with respect to another type of merchandising he should be able to say: I will tell you that. It is in relation to this very important type of merchandising that these questions are being asked. Either the minister knows what the broad division of this type of merchandising is or he does not. If he does, then he should inform us. If he does not, then at this point he should admit he has not the information upon which he should proceed at this time.

Mr. Hosking: Probably if the opposition would take a case that was not hypothetical but practical the minister would be able to give a concrete answer. The position with respect to service stations is that if you own your service station generally one of the oil companies will offer to instal the equipment if you will sell their product. Once you have agreed to do so, then if you are in a position where they will accept your credit they will fill your gasoline storage tank and you may pay them by cheque. If your credit is not so good you will order so many gallons of gasoline, submit a cheque and when it is cashed they will then put the gasoline in the tank. As the minister has said, in a general way, if the service station owner buys and pays for the gasoline he can sell it for whatever price he wishes.

I think his answer was absolutely satisfactory to anyone who understands the trade. I should like to point out further to hon. members of the house who have witnessed gasoline price wars—and I think most hon. members have had some experience on this subject—that surely no one would think that when gas price wars have taken place the brunt has been borne by the lessee or owner of the service station. His profit is far too small, even if he worked for nothing, for him to take part in the gas wars that we have seen take place. They are carried on by the companies. I have never seen any price fixing in this trade. I think it is most unfair to ask the minister to build up an answer to a mythical case, to have an answer prepared for a case that does not exist.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I should like to give a practical case. In the city of St. John's, where there are about 60,000 people, there is an agency for Studebaker, one for Ford, one for Chevrolet, one for Pontiac and so on for other cars. There are several hundred parts in a motorcar. What is to prevent a dealer charging a higher price in the future than he has been charging up to now under catalogue prices?

Mr. Garson: He would be prevented by the amendment which provides that the manufacturer, if he wishes, may fix a maximum price for his product and may enforce that maximum price. Therefore if a dealer in St. John's were trying to charge the public more than the present suggested price the manufacturer would only have to fix a maximum price and he could prevent that.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): But if he does not fix it?

Mr. Garson: If he does not fix it then he must concur in whatever happens.

Mr. Fulton: I should like to follow up the motion we were discussing a few moments ago. I was dealing with the oil business, but let us leave that and turn to the electrical appliance manufacturing field. I understand from what the minister has said that if the retailer buys and pays for the goods himself and then resells them, that transaction, as between him and the manufacturer, would be subject to the bill now before us. If he is an agent of the manufacturer then the transaction between them would not be subject to the bill. To repeat my question, does the minister not believe that if these retailers and manufacturers are interested in preserving their competitive position as against more powerful business concerns the tendency will be for the retailer to take on the colour of an agent so he can continue to get the benefit of resale price maintenance which he feels is the protection he needs against unfair competitive practices of large concerns?

Mr. Garson: Again my answer is no; and again, notwithstanding what the leader of the opposition has said, I cannot honestly claim for myself any great competence in the field of merchandising of electrical appliances. The reason I say no is that when the bill comes into effect I think there is going to be in the electrical appliance field, as indeed there is now in respect of importations from the United States, a competitive area. Therefore the manufacturer who wishes to set up these agency arrangements will have to face this other competition. He may now have a very fine price-maintenance agreement with his own people but with a substantial part of the whole area open to this competition he is going to have to face it and, as was seen during the depression when resale price maintenance was in effect, if conditions get tough enough resale price maintenance will not stand up under it.

Mr. Fulton: I should like to make the observation that resale price maintenance was certainly not in effect in the depression in the same way it is today. I should like to put before the minister the other alternative and ask whether he does not think the situation may develop that even if retailers do not willingly become agents of manufacturers, yet manufacturers will be forced into the retail field, which would have the same effect of lessening competition rather than increasing it?

In that connection I want to lay before him the evidence given on this very point in the committee by the witness from the Canadian Manufacturers Association, as reported at page 575 of the proceedings. He was being questioned by Mr. Fleming:

Q. My last point is in regard to your statement that the abolition of resale price maintenance will force manufacturers into the retail business. Can you be more specific about that so we can estimate the degree of danger or the extent to which that might become a practice on the part of manufacturers?

A. Mr. Fleming, you are asking me to deal with a situation we have never had to face. As I see it, we would have to adopt the merchandising tactics of, for instance, the Singer Sewing Machine Company, in that we would open our own stores in various places. If you decided to buy a McClary refrigerator you would go to one of those stores, owned and operated by us. We could not possibly provide as many stores as now sell McClary refrigerators but we would try to provide enough to give us a satisfactory volume of business.

Q. What would be the effect on prices, eventually, to the consumer?

A. Well, sir, unless we proved to be more efficient retailers than the retailers in business now, the price would not be any lower. I, myself, have had a long and assorted business experience and I am a little inclined to think that there are very few people who have a talent for manufacturing and who have a talent for retailing also.

Q. Well, in short—

A. I am sure that we would not be any more efficient than the average good retailer today—and consequently we could not sell at any lower price.

The minister has been saying that if the relationship of the supplier and the dealer is maintained, then the transaction will come under the effect of this bill and price maintenance will not be allowed to continue. What I am putting before the minister is that we have had evidence to the effect that the desire of the retailers for the protection of price maintenance is such that when they find that as dealers they are deprived of it as a result of this bill but can get it as agents, they will become agents of the manufacturers instead of dealers. Furthermore, if that process does not take place, then the manufacturers themselves will go into the retail business. There we have the evidence of a manufacturer who says he does not think they would be efficient retailers, but nevertheless they might have to undergo that process. If this bill is enforced, according to this witness it will not increase competition but will really substantially reduce it.

Mr. Garson: When my hon. friend started on his question my mind instantly went to the evidence that was given before the committee and I wondered where I could put my hands on the quotation which would prove that my hon. friend is wrong in his contention. Then the hon. member proceeded to read it to the members of the house. The question which faces the manufacturer in the circumstances to which my hon. friend alludes is this. Can I receive my manufacturer's sale price and get my manufacturer's profit better by selling the article to people who are experienced in the trade or by becoming a retailer myself? If he thinks he can get it better by becoming a retailer himself, for whatever reason, whether it is connected with resale price maintenance or something else, he will go into the retail trade himself. But this witness indicated how he felt, and I read his answer:

—unless we proved to be more efficient retailers than the retailers in business now, the price would not be any lower. I, myself, have had a long and assorted business experience and I am a little inclined to think that there are very few people who have a talent for manufacturing and who have a talent for retailing also.

So there is the answer—

Mr. Fleming: Will the minister just read the next two or three questions?

Mr. Garson: Yes.

Q. Well, in short—

A. I am sure that we would not be any more efficient than the average good retailer today—and consequently we could not sell at any lower price.

The Chairman: Your last question, Mr. Fleming.

By Mr. Fleming:

Q. Is size a badge of efficiency in retailing?

A. No, sir. Size is not a badge of efficiency in any line.

Q. The question put to you this morning was as between the large efficient retailer on the one hand and the smaller inefficient retailer on the other hand, and I take it you are not prepared to say that is a correct reflection of existing circumstances?

A. No, sir, it is an incorrect conception.

Is that enough?

Mr. Fleming: Yes.

Mr. Garson: I do not think that makes any change, if I may say so. The hon. member asked me, will they do that? I say I do not think so, because once that amendment comes into effect and there is competition at the retail level it is reasonable to assume that any substantial mark-ups which now prevail will be narrowed to some extent by that competition. If the manufacturer does not think he can get into the retail business at a profit with the present mark-up he will not do it for less.

Mr. Fulton: The whole situation must be read in the light of the witness's earlier answer, which I read. His earlier answer was that, notwithstanding the difficulty, if resale price maintenance is abolished he thinks there is danger that manufacturers may be forced into the retail business. The minister appears to have overlooked that answer, so I shall read it again. He read only those parts of the answer which supported his own argument, but the whole answer does not support his argument for the very good reason that the whole answer was subject to the earlier question and answer.

Mr. Garson: May I ask the hon. member this question. If the manufacturer says he cannot see any profit in retailing, why would he worry about getting into the retail business at all as long as he gets his manufacturer's selling price? That is his business. Why should he worry about retailing at all?

Mr. Fulton: Because the point that was being made in the committee was that if resale price maintenance is abolished there is danger that many retailers will find they are not able to stay in business. They will be driven to the wall by the large concerns, and will not be able to take the manufacturer's goods at all. The manufacturer, in self-protection, will be forced into the retail business. This point was made over and over again in the committee, and I am sorry it did not register with the minister. The manufacturers, to protect themselves against the big department stores who want to be the sole outlets for these lines, would have to set up their own retail stores because they do not want—any more than the small merchant wants—to be at the mercy of the big giants in the retail field. They want the little retailer kept in the field. It is in the interests of the consuming public also to see the little retailer kept in business.

The point made by this witness is that if resale price maintenance is abolished the protection the little merchant has will be abolished and he will be driven to the wall, and the manufacturer will be in the position of finding retail outlets only through these giant stores. In self-protection the manufacturers will then be driven to setting up their own retail outlets. It was in the light of the earlier answer of the witness that he felt they may be forced to do that, that he made his later answer. And he was then asked: Supposing you did have to go into the retail field and set up your retail stores, what would be the effect on price? The witness said: We are not as efficient at retailing as the retailers now in the business, so the price would not come down.

The important part of this witness's evidence, which the minister overlooked, was to the effect that if resale price maintenance is removed the manufacturers may be driven into providing their own retail outlets rather than get into the hands of these giants who would now dominate the field.

Mr. Coldwell: I should like to say a word. The hon. member for Lake Centre made a suggestion which I think is worthy of consideration. He pointed to the fact that the clauses as now drafted are restrictive in their nature and that nothing in the present bill would entitle a retailer, whether it be a co-operative society or an individual, to get supplies from a manufacturer. He suggested that there should be a subclause to the effect that no dealer shall refuse to sell or supply an article or commodity without justification. It seems that would cover the whole field. I think it strengthens the suggestion we have tried to put before the house all during this debate, namely that there should be some public board to which the retailer, the manufacturer or the consumer could apply if he felt that he was not getting the kind of deal he should get from a manufacturer. If there is difficulty about the phrase "without justification", as there might be, the board, having considered the application and whether or not there was justification, would make a decision and that decision might be appealed to a court of law. In that way we would be getting nearer what would be just to all those interested in measures of this kind.

What I am afraid of—and the more I hear of the discussion the more fear I have—is that as the section is now drafted it is not sufficiently comprehensive, and that it does not do what many of us would like to see done under this kind of legislation, namely give everyone as just a deal as possible and enable retailers, co-operative societies and so on to get goods they could resell without having to maintain the price laid down by the manufacturer. The evil we are trying to cure, and I know it is an evil, is that there is price control on the part of private individuals, namely manufacturers. That idea is abhorrent to all of us. On the other hand I think we must be careful that we give to all those interested in merchandising—the consumer, the manufacturer and the retailer—the opportunity of competing for the business that exists, and give the consumer a squarer deal than he is getting at the present time.

Mr. Garson: I must confess, Mr. Chairman, that I would not have been disposed to go into any detailed discussion of the suggestion that was made by the hon. member for Lake Centre if it had not made such a great impression upon the mind of the leader of the C.C.F. party for whose judgment I have a great deal of respect.

Mr. Coldwell: I am not a lawyer.

Mr. Garson: I suggest, however, in all seriousness that if we are going to have any regard for civil liberties, about which the hon. member for Lake Centre is always so solicitous, of the individual citizen, then in creating a new crime we must set some kind of a definition or some kind of criterion of improper conduct. If we merely say, as he suggested, that no dealer shall refuse to sell or supply an article or commodity to any other person without justification, period, what kind of a prosecution would that be, if I may ask? You lay the charge and it comes before the judge and you say: "Well, he did this without justification". "All right", the court will say, "what is justification? What is proper justification?" Surely the hon. member for Lake Centre was not serious when he made that suggestion in the first place. If he says this bill is in bad shape as it is now worded, I would say it would be much worse if this suggestion of his were accepted, because there would be no kind of adequate standard in the creation of a new crime if you merely added the words "without justification". What would justification be? Could any person tell us? There would be no kind of objective act, thought or thing in relation to which justification, as defined as such in the section, could be applied. When we are amending the Combines Investigation Act for the purpose of abolishing resale price maintenance, if we are going to be halfway fair to the subject at all and are going to protect his civil liberties, what we must do is define in definite terms the crime we are committing or rather creating and with which we are proposing to charge him before the law.

Mr. Fleming: "The crime" you "are committing" is right.

Mr. Garson: My hon. friend says there would be great difficulty about enforcing this legislation. Let us just look at it for a moment. If it had not been for the impression made upon the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar by the suggestion of the hon. member for Lake Centre—

Mr. Diefenbaker: I would not expect it would make any impression on the Minister of Justice.

Mr. Garson: Let my hon. friend not waggle his hands and get excited about the matter.

Mr. Diefenbaker: All right. It does not require any of these smart aleck remarks.

Mr. Garson: My hon. friend says it would be difficult to enforce this legislation. I wonder if he has looked at subsection 2 of section 37A, which reads as follows:

> No dealer shall directly or indirectly by agreement, threat, promise or any other means whatsoever, require or induce or attempt to require or induce any other person to resell an article or commodity . . .

[Mr. Garson.]

I will not list the other provisions. If the dealer does so, it will be in breach of the act. That means that when this implement firm goes out in the spring to make arrangements with its dealers, it cannot enter into an arrangement directly or indirectly, or by any other means whatever, under which there is any implication or understanding that a resale price is to be maintained on its products. That is what it says to start with. If they do that, a charge can be laid under that section.

Suppose the gentleman who is their dealer has obtained a list of the goods on which they have suggested what the resale price shall be, and suppose he sells them for less than the suggested mark-up. This would not take place in a vacuum by itself—from a common sense point of view what would most likely happen is this. If the dealer was a reasonably good man and did it once, they would probably have their block man go around and have a little chat with him about prices. If he did it again they might have another chat. They would not immediately chop off the man who had been a good dealer for them for many years. The time would come, however, when if this little friendly coercion that had been applied did not produce any acceptable response, then they would refuse to supply him with any more goods. Then the dealer would come in to the combines investigation branch and make a complaint and we would investigate it.

My hon. friend says there would be great difficulty as compared with the administration of the Combines Investigation Act. In the case of the Combines Investigation Act we have to go out and get 100 per cent of our evidence from witnesses who are unwilling, from beginning to end, to have anything to do with our investigation. In the case of a prosecution under this amendment the retailer himself is a willing and able witness to assist the crown. He will say that on such and such a date the block man or the salesman spoke to him, and that he spoke with him at another time and then, two or three weeks afterward, his supplies were refused. He will say: It is true they have not said that they have refused supplies for that reason, but I have every reason to believe that is the case.

Notwithstanding what has been said by my hon. friend, who is a lawyer with great experience in criminal law, this is a pure question of fact, as I think he will admit. Under those circumstances if we put the dealer into the witness box, proved what had happened and subpoenaed the block man or the salesman, if the accused corporation was unable to give any other reasonable explanation as to why suddenly, after some lengthy period of experience, they had refused to give any further supplies, I should think there would not be too much difficulty in getting the judge to hold, under the circumstances, that an offence had been proved under this act. In any event I am perfectly certain that the suggestion which my hon. friend from Lake Centre has made is no improvement.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, what I said was that I was not in any way drafting a section. I said there would have to be something along the line of the words "without justification" and I did not particularize. It was obvious that I was in no way endeavouring to draft the section, but I was suggesting that something along that line might have been effective. When my hon. friend speaks of civil liberties and their protection, and concludes his remarks by saying "after we have placed a few suspicious circumstances before the court" and then goes on to say that if the accused was unable to give any other explanation he was sure the court would convict, all I have to say to that is that it is the best exposition of the denial of civil liberties that has ever been given on the floor of this house, because it would be placing the onus upon the accused to disprove something that the crown had failed to prove.

Mr. Garson: I should like to ask my hon. friend what the incorporation of the words "without justification" would do if it would not do that very thing?

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is exactly the point.

Mr. Garson: Certainly, it is the point.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I merely suggested that, by setting out in detail the offences, the onus on the crown was such that it could not be discharged, and that something along the lines of "without justification" would be "without legal justification" and anything in the nature of an offence against section 37A, subsections 1 and 2, would be without legal justification. I am not going to propose the thing; I am not here to try to make a section operative, but I am pointing out what needs to be pointed out in this committee, namely that what is being done is a sham designed to deceive the Canadian people into believing that the cost of living is going to be materially reduced, when in point of fact, on the face of it, this legislation will not have that result in the long run.

If the government had intended to act they would have done something about loss leaders, but they would not do that; it would hurt their great friends. That is the reason they did not act. As a matter of fact they could not draft an amendment regarding loss leaders. Well, an amendment has been drafted in the United States and is before the House of Representatives at the present time. The reason the government, with its overwhelming majority in the committee, refused to allow the amendment of the hon. member for Spadina was that they were afraid they might hurt their great and powerful friends.

Mr. Garson: My hon. friend knows he is not telling the truth when he says that.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, I have never asked for a withdrawal in this house. I will not ask for a withdrawal now, but I commend my hon. friend to these lines of Shakespeare:

> But man, proud man,
> Drest in a little brief authority,
> Most ignorant of what he's most assur'd.

That is my answer to my hon. friend. Whether I am truthful or not in this house I will not allow my hon. friend to determine. And if he is big enough he will get up and say: We say things heatedly in debate. I will not ask him to withdraw; I will give him an opportunity to do so.

Mr. Garson: Well, Mr. Chairman, when my hon. friend withdraws the wholly unwarranted imputation which he made against the government I will be very glad to withdraw what I have said.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is not—

Mr. Garson: Will my hon. friend withdraw? Let us make—

Mr. Diefenbaker: I do not withdraw; I reassert it. I am speaking about the government in debate and my hon. friend is speaking about an individual, and he has no right to say what he said. Apparently, however, that type of debate passes in the legislature of Manitoba. All I have to say is this. I make the statement again that the attitude of the government toward their great allies, the powerful merchants, as opposed to the small merchants of this country, is indicative of the reason why the action against loss leaders asked for by the hon. member for Spadina was denied not only in the committee but also by the government itself.

Mr. Garson: My hon. friend is placing some remarks upon Hansard which will no doubt make their appearance in due course in many outlying parts of Canada, and we cannot blame him for that if he thinks this sort of tactic will do him good.

Mr. Diefenbaker: All I have to say to the hon. gentleman is that he should withdraw any suggestion of untruthfulness, not the conclusion. I want to emphasize that. He can criticize the conclusions of any hon. gentleman. I will leave it there.

Mr. Fulton: On the point which appears to give the minister such concern, namely who is going to be helped most by this bill, and who is going to be hurt most, I would ask this question. It is a fact, I believe, from what he has said that the independent merchant who has to buy from the manufacturer will find his transaction brought under this bill. In other words, the small merchants will not be able to get the benefit of maintained prices. Let me ask him this. In the case of Eaton's, who do both manufacturing and retailing, will the bill operate to prevent them from selling the goods which they themselves manufacture through their own retail stores at whatever maintained prices they themselves wish to set?

Mr. Garson: That question has already been answered. Goods which the manufacturer produces and sells himself, naturally he sells, as the owner of the goods, to the ultimate consumer; and he sells for the price determined by himself.

Mr. Fulton: So the giant stores which do manufacturing as well as retailing will not be affected by the bill; whereas the little merchant will be affected. Is not that the case?

Mr. Garson: I would point out to my hon. friend that there will be no change in that respect.

Mr. Fulton: So that—

Mr. Garson: My hon. friend asks the question. Will he keep quiet until I give him the answer, or shall I take my seat until he has finished talking and then get up and answer?

Mr. Fulton: I am waiting for my answer.

Mr. Fournier (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): You are not a waiter.

Mr. Garson: In reply to my hon. friend's question may I say that the present amendment will not change in any respect the practice which prevails in that regard at the present time.

Mr. Fulton: The minister has not answered my question. Is it not a fact that with respect to setting prices, this bill does not affect the giant stores which do their own manufacturing and retailing, but it does affect the little merchant who has to buy his goods from the manufacturer?

[Mr. Garson.]

Mr. Garson: The answer to my hon. friend —and he as a lawyer must know this—is that this bill is of general application, and it affects all firms in Canada equally that come within its provisions.

Mr. Fulton: The minister still does not answer. Will he then answer this question. Is it correct to say that the giant stores which do their own manufacturing and retailing do not come within the provisions of the bill, but the little merchant who buys from outside sources does? I am waiting for the minister's answer. The minister has twice skated around the first question and is obviously unwilling to answer the second. His silence indicates he is stuck, so we will have to let the minister's refusal to answer speak for itself.

Mr. Fleming: It is quite obvious from the answers we have received that the talk we have heard from the government about this bill being designed to stimulate competition is just so much idle nonsense, because it is perfectly apparent from what the minister himself has just admitted that the net effect of this bill is going to be to build up more monopolies and reduce effective competition. We, the official opposition, have been trying to tell the government that. We have tried to do so in the committee, and we have been trying also in the house. It is crystal clear now; the minister has just indicated it by his last remarks, and it is perfectly apparent what course business is likely to take in this country. The effect of this bill obviously is going to be a reduction in the number of independent retail outlets. That did not worry the Minister of Transport this morning. It has not worried the government at any time. It did not worry Mr. McGregor before the committee. No; anybody who cannot survive after this bill has passed can die, and apparently they think his death will be a useful contribution to society. That is the government's attitude. What do we find, Mr. Chairman? It is perfectly clear what is going to happen. The bill has not the slightest application to the case of the big manufacturer, or at least the big merchandiser, who is perfectly free to combine manufacturing, merchandising and retailing. But it will hit the little retailer; and obviously it will hit him so hard that a great many retailers will be forced out of business. And the government likes that. That is what they want. That is what they are out to create by this bill.

Mr. Ferrie: Rubbish!

Mr. Fleming: Let us strip all the pretence from this bill!

Mr. Ferrie: Stop acting.

Mr. Fleming: Let us strip all the pretence from this bill! It is one which will deal damaging blows to free competition in this country. This bill, Mr. Chairman, will have the effect that we have been telling the house as best we could, namely that of playing into the hands of monopolies. I tell you this should be a separate bill and should be described by some such title as this: an act to build up monopolies in Canada; or perhaps it should be: an act to try to save the hide of the government in the face of inflation.

Mr. Ferrie: Nonsense.

Mr. Fleming: Well, I am glad to hear this interruption, because it just illustrates the Hitlerian technique to which I referred this morning.

Mr. Ferrie: Shave your moustache.

Mr. Fleming: The effect of this bill, so far as the so-called big interests in the manufacturing field are concerned, will be to help them, and there is not a member who does not know that by now, even though hon. members opposite are not prepared to open their ears. The big interests have been speaking. The big interests spoke while the committee was in session. Some of them went to the press with their statements. Members of the official opposition in the committee, seeking full information, asked that some of these big merchandising organizations be called before the committee to give evidence. We wanted to know what prompted them to support a measure of this kind. But oh, no; the government majority on the committee would not have them called. Why? Why did they not want some of these big departmental stores called before the committee to give evidence? I will tell you why they did not want that evidence brought out by examination in committee. The big interests have declared themselves to be on the side of the government. Does the government disown their support? There has not been a word uttered in the house or outside of it by any representative of the government disowning the support of this bill by the big interests.

Mr. Ferrie: In Toronto.

Mr. Fleming: No, in any part of Canada. The hon. member who has interrupted me does not confine his support from the big interests to any part of Canada. Because the interests I am talking about are the big interests to be found operating in all parts of Canada.

Mr. Ferrie: In Toronto; that is what you are talking for.

Mr. Fleming: And the effect of the bill is perfectly clear, because the big merchandising interests have made it clear that they like this bill. The hon. member who has interrupted is quite happy to be in the company of the big interests who say they like this kind of legislation.

Mr. Ferrie: We are not fighting for them. You are.

Mr. Fleming: The big interests in this country, so far as this bill is concerned, are on the side of the government; and they have stayed there. And, so far as the small interests are concerned, let me say that those who spoke before the committee said they did not want this legislation. They said it was bad for the retailer.

Mr. Garson: On a point of order, would the hon. member—

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Jutras): I would remind the committee that the hon. member for Eglinton has the floor, and I think we would make better progress if he were permitted to complete his argument.

Mr. Fleming: I had indicated, first of all, where the big interests stand on this bill. They told us several times. And I was in the process of indicating that the small retailer in this country, the backbone of so many communities throughout the length and breadth of Canada, is against the bill.

Now let me ask hon. members: In the face of that, how dare the government maintain this pretence that the bill is going to hurt any of their friends in big business? The Liberal party and this government have made such a tight alliance on this bill with the so-called big interests in merchandising today that never again will any honest person be able to talk about big interests in terms of any political association other than with this government.

Mr. Ferrie: What about the match inquiry?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Drew: No. I will return to the subject I was discussing, and in regard to which I received some useful information from the hon. member for Wellington South. I believe it is important that hon. members should know exactly what the facts are when they are being asked to pass a bill of this kind.

We had reached the point where the hon. member for Wellington South gave the minister some information, and said that in connection with gasoline and oil the companies deliver to the retailer, whether it be a garage or an ordinary filling station. He pointed out that in many cases the equipment is supplied by the oil company, but that the oil or gasoline is then sold to the retailer. As he pointed out, if the retailer's credit is good he gets the oil; if it is not good, he hands over his cheque and the oil is delivered when the cheque is cleared. In other words in that last condition he made it clear that there is an outright sale of gasoline and oil to the man who operates a filling station.

I take his explanation, because he is in that business. If that is so, then the filling station operators are the owners of the gasoline and oil. Under this act, if it means anything, there can be no agreed price. That would be right, would it not, according to the minister? I see the minister nods his head in the affirmative.

Mr. Garson: If my hon. friend wishes me to answer vocally I shall be glad to do so.

Mr. Drew: Yes.

Mr. Garson: I understood from what the hon. member for Wellington South said that the dealer paid for and became the owner of the gasoline and oil, and that it was not price-maintained at the present time. That being so, this amendment would not affect it at all, because it will continue not to be price-maintained.

Mr. Drew: But, Mr. Chairman, I find it difficult to think that the minister has made no inquiry in regard to the handling of gasoline and oil. I find it difficult to believe that he has not, because he mentioned the Joy Oil Company, a name well known when one discusses the matter of agreed prices in the oil and gasoline business. I am simply seeking information as to the effect of it. I think it is generally understood that in regard to well-known brands of gasoline and oil—and we are talking about branded lines—there is not only a standard price for the same lines of gasoline and oil produced by a particular producer, but there is also a standard price for gasoline and oil of the same standard offered by different producers. If that is so, and I think I have stated it clearly, I assume it would come under the prohibition in the amendment before us.

Mr. Garson: Well, I am just as anxious as I can be to accommodate my hon. friend in my answer. But I understood the hon. member accepted the statement of the hon. member for Wellington South, who is actually in the business and who knows what he is talking about when he describes the situation. In relation to the set of facts he placed before the members I have just said, and I now repeat, that the present position is that that price is not maintained. Under the amendment, as the leader of the opposition correctly suggested, it would not be maintained either. If it were maintained it would be contrary to the amendment.

Mr. Drew: I recognize that there must be a question of what the method is. I want to make it quite clear that, from what the minister and the hon. member for Wellington South have said, any attempt to settle agreed prices in the gasoline and oil business, according to the explanation given by the minister, would be in conflict with the amendment now before us.

Mr. Garson: On the part of independent dealers who buy their own stocks.

Mr. Drew: On the part of those who pay for their gasoline and oil in the manner described by the hon. member for Wellington South. Is that right? The minister indicates that that is correct. That being so, we now have a clear picture in regard to that particular business. I should like the minister to tell us if he has considered what the impact of these regulations will be upon the sale of photographic goods.

Mr. Garson: It is hardly necessary to take a poll of all businesses. The answer to my hon. friend's question as applied to any industry in Canada is that where resale price maintenance is practised now it will be made illegal by the present amendment. In those cases where it is not practised or practised very little, the present amendment will have little effect. I take it from what the member for Wellington South said that the gas and oil business was one of the latter cases.

Mr. Drew: I am assuming that when the minister presents this measure he does so with information in regard to its impact upon the various types of merchandising in this country. I point out that there are certain obvious types of merchandising about which we should have some information before we are asked either to support or even to discuss the advisability of details of this kind. Certainly one of the most clearly-defined types of merchandising on a large scale is that of photographic supplies. I think we should be told what is the general practice in that field and what impact the minister expects this amendment will have on that business.

Mr. Garson: Members of the committee will recall that the committee had some difficulty in getting from witnesses who appeared before it an estimate of the area of any trade in Canada in respect of which resale price maintenance prevailed. That is natural because a great many of these resale price maintenance arrangements are not of the character that are publicized to any great extent. The information we have in relation to the photographic supplies business is that there is a substantial degree of price maintenance. I would think that it is almost completely covered by price maintenance and therefore the impact of the amendment would be more extensive than on the grocery trade for example where there is hardly any resale price maintenance. I think that probably answers my hon. friend's question.

Mr. Drew: Will the minister explain what the impact will be on the sale of books?

Mr. Garson: I believe that there is a substantial measure of resale price maintenance there, but we have not attempted to form an estimate of the percentage for reasons that I have already given. The witnesses who appeared before us and other competent authorities who have attempted to make estimates of the coverage of resale price maintenance in various industries have indicated that they could arrive only at an approximate figure. I have no reference to books in my list, but I believe there is a substantial degree of resale price maintenance in that field.

Mr. Drew: If there is one type of merchandising in which the producer—the publisher in the case of books—advertises both nationally and internationally stated prices, it is in the case of books. In the consideration of this subject in Great Britain they made a most detailed analysis of the method of handling books and the way prices were dealt with. I would have thought there would have been a fairly comprehensive analysis made of that type of merchandising because after all the sale of books is something we do not want to interfere with unduly in view of the part they play in the development of the cultural life of the country. I do submit that we should have some information as to the anticipated impact of this amendment upon established practices in the handling of books in this country? Is the minister not able to add anything to what he has said?

Mr. Garson: My hon. friend has referred, and quite correctly, to the fact that books are published with a resale price indicated. However, it is one thing to make a price of that sort and another thing to carry resale price maintenance into full effect by policing and enforcing the suggested prices. If my hon. friend had gone into the matter at all I think he would find that all inquiries of this sort which have been made by bodies like the Lloyd Jacob committee and other such commissions have encountered considerable difficulty in establishing with any close accuracy the degree to which prices not only are named but are policed after being named in order to see that the retailer adheres to them.

I am sure that the leader of the opposition knows that in Canada many publishers suggest retail prices, and then when their books go into the trade they do not bother their heads about them. The great majority of buyers will adhere to those prices, but they do not bother about those who do not. In order to give my hon. friend an answer with any pretence of accuracy we would have to be in the position of being able to say what percentage of books were put out with prices suggested and what percentage of the prices were effectively policed. I doubt if there is a human being in Canada who knows that. I think it can be said that a substantial percentage are suggested, and I would think that there was a fairly substantial percentage where some attempt to enforce it was made.

Mr. Drew: You mean by the publisher?

Mr. Garson: By the publisher.

Mr. Graydon: What will be the effect of this proposed legislation upon producers or manufacturers in the United States who distribute their products in the normal course of business through retailers in Canada? What is the position with respect to this legislation in relation to that kind of business operation?

Mr. Garson: With all deference to my hon. friend because he may know of some cases of that sort, is it not the usual practice for the United States manufacturer to have a Canadian agent who acts as his distributor for the whole of Canada, or perhaps a provincial agent in each of the provinces? This man looks after sales for him and makes shipments to the trade in Canada. In a case of that sort I think the Canadian representative of the United States manufacturer or the Canadian branch office of the United States manufacturer would come within the definition of "dealer" in subsection 1 of section 37A where it says that a dealer means a person engaged in the business of manufacturing or supplying or selling any article or commodity.

Mr. Graydon: I think we have to consider another point. I do not want to labour the matter but I have had it represented to me on more than one occasion since the legislation was proposed that there is a difficulty with respect to the relationship of United States manufacturers and producers with Canadian retailers. I think we have to consider the possibility that, while what the minister says now may be quite proper practice at the moment with respect to a Canadian general agent, business of course will regulate its affairs in such a way—and it is a normal and natural thing that they should do so—as to try to come within the law and at the same time carry on as far as they can the practices they have normally carried on in the past. That is a natural and normal thing for business to do. It is possible that in the future there may be a number of United States producers or manufacturers who will be dealing directly with retailers in Canada without the medium of a Canadian agent. In the minister's opinion are there any difficulties with respect to the enforcement of the act so far as United States manufacturers are concerned as opposed to Canadian manufacturers? I ask the question because I do not want to see Canadians, whether they may be consumers, retailers or manufacturers, dealt with in a discriminatory way compared with their American friends across the border. That is my sole reason for asking the question, and I would be glad if the minister would clarify it.

Mr. Garson: Is not the practical answer to my friend that to begin with I should think the percentage of United States manufacturers who would sell directly to the retail trade in Canada would be very small?

Mr. Graydon: At the moment.

Mr. Garson: At the moment. I should think that any advantages they might seek to get in the form of exemption from this legislation, if they could secure it, by dealing directly would not weigh very heavily in the balance against the advantages of being represented by a proper distributing agency in Canada. What would be the object of their dealing directly with retailers in Canada if it were not merely that in relation to the goods which they so sold they could get the Canadian retailer to maintain prices which he would not be maintaining in respect of goods he purchased from Canadian manufacturers. Having regard to the very small area of the total trade that would be covered by an arrangement of that sort, I should think that as a consequence of the competition which would be offered in the remaining area by the fact that there was freedom of trade between Canadian manufacturers and their retailers any advantage of having resale price maintenance between the United States manufacturer and the retailer would be absolutely negligible.

Mr. Nowlan: I should like to direct the minister's attention to the position of producer marketing boards under the legislation that is proposed. I can think of several boards. We will take the one engaged in the sale of tomatoes over a relatively large area in the maritime provinces. That board fixes the prices at which the wholesaler will sell to the retailer. It has to do that because it also has to service trucks, which trucks are servicing outlying rural communities. It has a fear of competition from trucks coming into town and underselling the wholesaler. Therefore it enters into an agreement or at least it implies fairly clearly that you shall sell at a certain price or else it will refuse to deliver to you any longer. Rightly or wrongly, apparently that is thought to be a basis of orderly marketing. It is a practice which is sanctioned by provincial legislation, and I am not sure but what it is also affected by the dominion marketing act which approves of such provincial plans in certain circumstances. Would that practice come within the purview of the legislation now before us?

Mr. Garson: I do not think my hon. friend said so, and if he did I did not catch it, but in all cases I think it is a practice which is authorized by provincial statute, is it not?

Mr. Nowlan: That is right.

Mr. Garson: Then it would not.

Mr. Fraser: There is one question I should like to ask the minister. There are three advertisements for drugs in one of tonight's papers to which I should like to refer. One says "Your cold stopped", and so on, and the price is given as 59 cents at all drug stores. Another one is supposed to stop telltale breath, and it is 25 cents. The third purports to expel something from the throat and is advertised as being 35 cents at all drug stores. Will firms who advertise in that way have to say in the future, "Not more than 35 cents at all drug stores", or are they allowed to put in the price?

Mr. Garson: I want to be as co-operative as I can, but I think I can only repeat what I said previously. With respect to such advertisements that firms are running which is now legal they will continue to be legal after the passage of the amendment.

Mr. Fraser: Then they will be able to fix the price at 59 cents, 25 cents or 35 cents.

An hon. Member: The suggested maximum price.

An hon. Member: Fixed by the retailer.

Mr. Fraser: The manufacturer fixes it for the consumer.

Mr. Cardiff: In other words, the bill is of no use.

Mr. Fraser: You are looking after the big interests.

Mr. Fleming: I should like to turn to another aspect of the proposed section 37A. It is an aspect which seems to me to be of very great importance because it contemplates a complete departure from the principle of the Combines Investigation Act. One would have thought that, as this measure is put forward as an amendment of the Combines Investigation Act, it would be designed to be in keeping with the principle of the act, but it is not in this very important respect.

Section 2 of the Combines Investigation Act is the one which contains important definitions. It defines a combine as a combination having certain described attributes or a merger, trust or monopoly. Then follow these very important words:

. . . which combination, merger, trust or monopoly, has operated or is likely to operate to the detriment or against the interest of the public, whether consumers, producers or others.

It is inherent in every provision of the Combines Investigation Act illegalizing combinations, mergers, trusts or monopolies that the prohibition or illegalization is not absolute. It is only partial or conditional. In other words, before any combination, merger, trust or monopoly is one within the meaning of the Combines Act it is necessary for the prosecution to establish that such combination, merger, trust or monopoly has operated or is likely to operate to the detriment or against the interests of the public, whether consumer, producer or others. That provision has been in the act ever since it was first enacted, and so far as I know that principle has never been questioned in this house.

If one is to look at Bill No. 36 in that light, one finds in it a complete departure from that principle. There is nothing in the proposed section 37A which imports that qualification into this provision. The proposed section 37A does not deal with combinations, mergers, trust or monopolies as defined in section 2 of the Combines Investigation Act. This proposed section takes up a new subject, and deals with it in terms of absolute prohibition. I submit to you, sir, that departure from the principle of the act is not sound.

I call to mind some of the evidence tendered before the committee on that very subject. When the representatives of the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada appeared before the committee—and may I say that theirs was one of the best and most intelligent presentations with which the committee was favoured—Mr. Bengough, the president, and Mr. Wismer, the director of public relations and research of that estimable organization, had something to say on this subject. I refer now to page 372 of the proceedings of the committee where I asked some questions dealing with this particular matter:

Q. May I ask Mr. Wismer if he feels that this so-called practice of price maintenance is a detriment to or perhaps in harmony with public interest?

A. I think we can say this, in so far as the deal is made privately and enforced privately we would have to say no, but where it is a general practice I think we would have to have a lot more information.

Q. Have you examined the draft bill on page 34 of the proceedings of this committee?

A. I have read the original draft.

May I interject to say that the original draft was, to all intents and purposes, in the same form as Bill No. 36. There was no difference whatever in form, so far as the point I am discussing is concerned.

Q. You will recall it purports to propose blanket prohibition on resale prices. Would you think that is a proper and desirable way of going about this matter, that we have blanket prohibition, or if we are going to have legislation on it should it be left to determine whether in the particular case the particular type of agreement is in the given circumstances harmful to the public interest or not?

Mr. Bengough: It would have to be flexible.

Mr. Fleming: You wouldn't favour a general prohibition?

Mr. Bengough: No.

Mr. Bengough was not the only witness who appeared before the committee who entertained that opinion. At the moment I am not dealing with the other shortcomings of this legislation or with the failure to provide concomitant legislation to deal with the vicious practices I discussed earlier, such as loss-leadering. We are dealing here with the neat question as to whether this amendment of the Combines Investigation Act should be written in terms of a blanket prohibition, without regard to any necessity whatever of proof that the practice is harmful or detrimental to the public interest. In that respect the bill, as I have said, is a complete departure from the principle of the Combines Investigation Act.

It is no answer to say that in the course of judicial interpretation, if the combine has some of the attributes set forth in section 2, subsection 1 of the Combines Investigation Act, that will import, so far as the courts are concerned, that the combination is operating or is likely to operate to the detriment or against the interest of the public, whether consumers, producers or others. I submit that is no answer to the point we are dealing with here, where we have a section which is imported into the act, a section which does not deal with combinations, mergers, trusts or monopolies, but deals with a particular practice which we are told obtains today in certain lines of merchandising.

I submit that if there is anything to be said for legislation of this kind—I am not yielding anything of what I said about this bill—then certainly it can only be contemplated by the house on the basis that it should be within the principle of the main act. What objection could there be to carrying into this proposed section 37A the principle of the Combines Investigation Act that measures dealt with under the act or frowned upon under the act are made illegal only where it is proven affirmatively by the crown that they operate or are likely to operate to the detriment or against the interests of the public? Surely this legislation could not be supported seriously by the government on any basis other than that the government was prepared to assume on behalf of the crown, in any prosecution under the proposed section 37A, the burden and duty of establishing that in that particular case the practice frowned upon was operating to the detriment of the public. I submit, therefore, there are no reasons against preserving the integrity of this essential principle of the Combines Investigation Act. There is no reason for departing from it. I contend that if this legislation is to be entertained by the house, it must be made subject to that essential principle of the act, and its present terms of blanket prohibition must be revised accordingly.

Mr. Garson: Mr. Chairman, the short answer to the point my hon. friend has raised is that the Combines Investigation Act forbids combinations that are undue and against the interests of the public. What my hon. friend has overlooked, I suggest with deference, is that the courts have consistently declared that any substantial lessening of competition is undue and against the interests of the public. In the case of vertical resale price maintenance, the MacQuarrie committee came to the conclusion, and so recommended to the government, that having regard to the present growth of the practice, it does substantially eliminate competition and is therefore contrary to the public interest. On that account it is unnecessary to include this ingredient in the prohibition of resale price maintenance.

Mr. Fleming: I submit that is a totally unsatisfactory answer. When I spoke earlier I anticipated what the minister has just said. I said it was no answer for anyone to contend that by judicial interpretation these words had been construed as contemplating that where there had been a substantial interference with competition the courts would find that the combination, merger or monopoly, if one were found, was in fact detrimental to the interests of the public. That contention has not had the effect of wiping out these words in the act. These words are still part of the act. Nobody has proposed that these words should be eliminated from the act; yet the government now proposes that an amendment be made to the act which will not be subject to these restrictive words.

The minister is not prepared, I gather, to have this amendment made subject to those words which qualify all the provisions of the Combines Investigation Act in relation to combinations, mergers, trusts and monopolies. Those words are still present in the act, but they will have no bearing whatever upon this proposed new section 37A. The minister says it is unnecessary. Do you not think, Mr. Chairman, that it would be a good thing if the crown, in a situation of this kind, were called upon to prove that the practice complained of was in fact detrimental to the public interest? If the minister is so confident that the practice is detrimental to the public interest, do you not think he would be quite prepared to submit to the burden of proving that fact to the court and having the court make a finding to that effect?

The minister's answer is no answer at all to the point I am raising. I suggest to the minister that, far from answering the point, what he has said on the contrary supports what I have said about the desirability of writing these words into this amendment. He apparently is satisfied that they do not do any harm in the act. Why should they not appear in the amendment?

Mr. Fulton: On the point raised by my hon. friend, I think the minister must admit that although the MacQuarrie committee may have come to the conclusion that because the practice of resale price maintenance interferes with their definition of competition it operates to the detriment of the public—

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Fulton: As I was saying, I think the minister will admit that, although as he has stated, the MacQuarrie committee may have come to the conclusion that because the practice of resale price maintenance interferes with their definition of competition, it therefore operates to the detriment of the public—

Mr. Sinnott: Who said that?

Mr. Fulton: I understood the minister to say that just a few moments ago.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Two-job John.

Mr. Fulton: Does the hon. member think I am incorrectly stating what the minister said?

Mr. Sinnott: Who said that?

Mr. Fleming: The minister.

Mr. Fulton: I have told my hon. friend that it was the minister. If he had been following the discussion I think he would have heard the minister say that just a few minutes ago.

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Fulton: I should like to continue to address my remarks through you, Mr. Chairman, to the minister. I think the minister will also agree that this very practice of resale price maintenance has also been before the courts, and the courts have not held that it operates to the detriment of the public. As the minister knows, it is an accepted principle of our law that if a contract is in restraint of trade to an extent which is prejudicial to the public interest, the contract is not enforceable. In several cases, particularly in the recent Frosst case in Montreal, the courts have had such contracts before them and have not held them to be unenforceable as being against the interest of the public. The minister shakes his head. I know there is great disagreement as to what the Frosst case actually decided. In my view it proceeded on that basis, but in any event there were many other cases where these resale price maintenance agreements have been before the courts and have not been held to be against the public interest.

That being the case, I was not aware that the MacQuarrie committee had been set up as competent to make law or to set aside the findings of law of the courts of the land. If that is the case it is certainly an interpretation of the MacQuarrie committee's functions which was not placed before us. But to say what the minister has just said, and to make that the basis of his statement that it is not necessary to place in the act the words "detrimental to the public", does not in any sense deal with the point raised by the hon. member for Eglinton, who points out that it has always been part of our law with respect to combines that it should be necessary to prove damage to the public interest, and that since in the past the courts have not held those agreements to be detrimental to the public interest, then those same words should be in this present bill rather than a blanket prohibition without any justification in law for such a prohibition being assumed.

The Chairman: Shall the clause carry?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Fleming: No, Mr. Chairman. Has the minister not something to say on this matter? He read a statement on the subject which apparently had been prepared for him. Has he nothing to say? What we have heard from the minister briefly on this subject, Mr. Chairman, just illustrates further—if any further illustration were required—the utter folly of the government's actions. They appoint a committee to undertake a study of the whole operation of the Combines Investigation Act; then before the members of the committee have completed their review or made their report the government leap in and say: Come along; let us have an interim report on a particular subject; divorce that from the rest of your study; give us a report in a hurry. The committee makes a report on that particular subject; the government takes that report, manhandles it to suit its purposes, and brings in an amendment which departs from the essential principle of the Combines Investigation Act. If there is to be a departure from that principle which has a good deal of history behind it, I hope it will not be lightly done and that, in any event, it will be done only with full knowledge of its effect upon the operation of the entire act, not by any side-door method such as we are being invited to use here today.

Does the minister say that the principle of section 2 of the Combines Investigation Act is sound or unsound? If he says it is sound, then I invite him to tell us why this amendment should depart from that principle. If he says the principle of section 2 of the Combines Investigation Act is unsound, then let the government bring in an amendment, if they care to do so, to change the provisions of section 2 and manhandle the principle of the act, if they are prepared to do that.

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Fleming: No, Mr. Chairman. I invite the minister to say whether the principle is sound or unsound.

Some hon. Members: Carried.

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Chairman, before I speak on the point I wish to raise, I should like to ask this question. Are we to understand that a serious question asked by one of the members of this committee most competent to ask it is not going to be answered?

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): That is your opinion.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): If that is so, I am going to suggest that this is something new. I would suggest that it is not only new as a matter of government technique but I would also suggest to the minister that it is not in accordance with the courtesy which I think he tries to maintain even when things are a little bit tense. Am I to understand that no answer is to be given to this question? If so, I will go on to speak on my own point.

Mr. Garson: Mr. Chairman, I have answered this question—

An hon. Member: Four times.

Mr. Garson: —carefully—

An hon. Member: Six times.

Mr. Garson: —and accurately. I can go on and expand my answer for half an hour if you like and I can cite a number of cases and so on; but I would not add very much to the information I conveyed in the answer I gave just a moment ago.

Mr. Fulton: Zero added to zero still equals zero.

Mr. Garson: I do not want to be discourteous to any member of the committee but the fact of the matter is that the hon. member for Eglinton, in his research upon this subject, has gone carefully into the statute but apparently has ignored all the jurisprudence or all the decided cases on the statute. This matter turns upon that point. The detriment to the public which is referred to in this statute has been interpreted by the courts as meaning the prevention of competition; and resale price maintenance in itself is the prevention of competition.

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Hon. members had better stop that if they want to get away by next Saturday.

Mr. Langlois (Gaspe): We can stay as long as you can.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I meant a week from Saturday.

Mr. Fleming: The minister's reply is not an answer; it is simply an assertion.

The Chairman: Shall the clause carry?

Mr. Fleming: The courts have not held that resale price maintenance is against the public interest. The minister is proposing now that parliament should legislate that to be the fact which the courts have not said to be the fact. I suggest that before parliament embarks upon that course it should take the proper safeguard of stipulating, as is done with respect to the entire operation of the Combines Investigation Act, that the burden should be discharged by the crown of proving that in the particular case the public interest has suffered. He says that where it is proven that competition is substantially lessened the courts will infer from that that the public interest has been detrimentally affected. But, sir, the element he treats as equivalent to a proof of something being detrimental to the public interest is not present with respect to resale price maintenance, because it has not been proven to have the effect of discouraging or limiting competition.

The government has tried to skate around what should be an essential element of proof, knowing that under the proposed section 37A they have to prove that there is an undue limitation of competition before the courts will infer that the alleged combination, merger, trust or monopoly is detrimental to the public interest. Why are they not prepared to do so here? Why do they introduce the entirely new principle of making a total, blanket, outright, absolute prohibition? I will give you a reason. The reason is that the government is not prepared to prove and does not believe it can prove that resale price maintenance is contrary to the public interest. They are not in a position to prove that it has the effect of limiting competition. They dare not go into a court of law on terms of reasonable equality with some accused and submit that issue to judicial decision. They would rather here, where they possess this big majority and use it so tyrannically, legislate in terms of these blanket prohibitions, these blanket condemnations, without submitting the crown to that burden of proof which has been found by long experience and by judicial decision—if the minister is interested in the jurisprudence on the subject of decided cases—to be so essential and wholesome in not only the administration of the Combines Investigation Act, but in all judicial determinations under the act.

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Some hon. Members: Filibuster.

Mr. Casselman: Where have you been all day?

Mr. Martin: The hon. member for Greenwood would not, but the hon. member for Eglinton would.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I am glad we have got into committee. In committee questions have to be asked and sometimes answered and I think we get nearer to reality, but one thing is becoming very apparent, namely that the government prepared to stroll into this legislation without nearly as much knowledge as they should have had, merely hoping for the best. I must admit they have been frank about that. They say in effect: We do not know whether much will happen; we do not know what kind of benefit it will have. We hope for the best, but we are not very sure. I feel that the same principle is being used with regard to the wording of this legislation. The effect of what we are doing now is most serious. We are creating a new crime. Those who are more competent than I to discuss the terms of the legislation and who have been in the courts in cases affecting combines legislation are suggesting that this matter should be taken seriously; they are suggesting that it is worth more than tired and tiresome calls from across the gangway of "carried". Hon. members will not make very much impression that way. All they do is to waste time.

I have two or three remarks I should like to make. I have no apologies for being here and speaking on this, none whatever. If hon. members will look back they will find many instances where not four or five days but several times four or five days were taken on measures less important than this. This is an important measure, and as far as I am concerned I will talk as long as I even hope I have anything to say, but like the Minister of Finance who was cheered so loudly earlier today when he announced he talked only when he had something to say, I hope I have something to say. Whether you have something to say in this house very often appears to depend on how many people are ready to bang the desk when you say it.

Mr. Garson: Hear, hear.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I may say that we get used to this state of affairs. It used to bother me a lot, but it bothers me less and less; and sometimes, even though I am a very pacific man, it arouses a certain sense of opposition.

As I say, I am glad we are in committee because it seems to me we are getting closer to things. There is not the same amount of sparring. Questions and answers really produce something nearer to a meeting of minds. I submit that every minute since we have been in committee, every question asked and sometimes answered has made clear the hollowness, the make-believe of this thing. I do hope that the consumers are not going to mortgage their future on what they think is going to come to them out of this measure, because it seems to me the bitter irony has now become more apparent. This is a measure which, in some way I cannot understand, was supposed to be in aid of the consumers. It seems perfectly clear now—and my purpose in rising is to ask a few questions of the minister—that it is inevitably going to set up pressures tending to further combinations, monopolies and near monopolies. That is not something any of us want. I say I do not think any one of us in this house wants it, but we have to consider the consequences of our acts. When people pass statutes they have to try to figure out, even though it is the twenty-eighth day of December, what those acts are going to mean. Only the lawyers will be glad if we pass a statute that is full of vagueness, and which will raise a dozen lawsuits on every subsection. I do not suggest the minister is a lawyer of that kind. Of course there may be some, though not in this house.

I just want to interject one small thing. This is not original. I am sorry to repeat it, but I will be very brief. I just want to say a word on the expectation that this was going to have an anti-inflationary effect. That seems a dim, dim memory. I will say that the government has been pretty frank about it. As an anti-inflationary measure we know now you might as well try to catch Niagara in a teacup as believe that this measure is going to do anything to help out. As a matter of fact—

Mr. Martin: The desks are banging now.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): At 6.15.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Do we stop at 6 o'clock or 6.15?

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I think I am good for that.

Now, I think we should put in a word for the consumer. Of course we have listened to this tiresome talk—and how tiresome it gets! I will not worry about it any longer—that we in the opposition are here representing the big interests. The hon. member for Spadina was worried about that yesterday. He had it on his mind and he, of course, preached a homily about it. But as I say, when we come back to think about the poor consumer and what he will get out of it, we are reminded of the old couplet—with one word altered, because I would not like to use that word as applied to the minister—

> Oh, what a tangled web we weave,
> When first we practice to mislead!

It is nice to remember the words, to go back across the centuries to the language used in the speech from the throne with regard to the inflationary measure. That was to be a measure effective "in counteracting inflation without impairing our free institutions". That is in the true Liberal tradition. I think those were the words of the hon. member for Spadina yesterday—"without impairing our free institutions". Here we have been busy all week creating a new crime which we do not know anything about, and we put it into words so that hon. members opposite may understand. And that is described as doing something "without impairing our free institutions". What a task for a Christmas season!

Mr. Martin: You were never in better form.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I do not wish to talk just for the sake of talking. I want to be like the Minister of Finance, and only talk when I have something to say.

Mr. Cannon: Does the hon. member mean that he is now talking for the sake of talking?

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I will have to leave you to judge that. I never certify myself. Reflected light is much better, if you can get it. But I will say this, that I think the government made clear their attitude about this inflationary business; because so far as I know—and I am ready to be corrected if I am wrong—there were no figures of any kind given or attempted to be given to show how this can in any way affect inflation. It was just a hope. It was a hope, however little it may be. And so far as we can see, it will be microscopic. So far as the consumers are concerned it will be negative. They will have red figures, and they will know what that means.

Here is another fact you have heard before, but I mention it to make my speech complete on the record. There was a way to curb prices. The way was open before them. We told them clearly what they should do; everybody knew what they should do. All they had to do was reduce taxes. We told them that time and again. We have all told them that, but they would not do it.

The Chairman: Order. I do not wish to interrupt the hon. member, but it seems to me he is going somewhat far afield.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Chairman, my only explanation is that I have been led away. However I will come back and talk about the bill. But I think hon. members will agree that I was at least talking about something—if, perhaps, it was not about the bill.

I feel that in this measure we have reached a position of very considerable irony; because it seems to me that while perhaps resale price maintenance was never invented for that purpose, it did in fact produce the result that a large number of retailers were able, in effect, to co-operate. They had all their advertising done for them. It seems perfectly clear now—and this is a question I am coming to in a few minutes—that this is going to be made a crime. That is the point I am coming to, at any rate; that these acts are going to be made a crime, and that the retailers will have to resort to all sorts of devices to be able to co-operate. Co-operation, I think, is a very natural and good thing. It is good to be able to co-operate. There is a recognized and traditional method of co-operation. You may say it was rather incidental, and that perhaps the manufacturers did not intend it that way; but we are ready to take credit for the consequences of our actions even if we do not fully intend them.

Do you think for a moment the government would ever refuse to take credit for some act because it turned out by accident to be beneficial, just because they had not intended it? Of course they would take credit, all the credit they could get. And I think resale price maintenance is entitled to take whatever credit it can in that indirect way; and it is entitled to a lot of credit.

Earlier in the afternoon, when some questions were being asked the minister which he found difficult to answer, the question came up very clearly as to the position of a retailer, let us say, who would no longer find himself in a position where his advertising was done by the vendor of a branded product. And if we are going to have problems, and there are going to be problems to answer as to how they can co-operate—and let me say that I am sorry none of the socialist members are here because they talk a lot about co-operation—

An hon. Member: Not one of them is here.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): But have they fallen for this measure? As the hon. member for Eglinton has said, if there is anything certain about this measure, whatever its intention was, it will not bring down prices. No one has ever given assurance that it will. But some things are certain, and the first is the fact that it will give greater advantage to certain large distributors; second, that it will be a greater effort for the small retailers to resist these huge colossi, as they were called earlier in committee. They will, of necessity, have to try to co-operate.

Now co-operation, we have always been told in this house, is a good thing. I submit it is an irony that this bill will have the effect of jeopardizing and perhaps destroying that co-operation.

The point I wish to make is this, and I would ask the minister this question: Tip Top Tailors are, I believe, rendering a very useful service because they supply a good quality of goods at a very reasonable, indeed a very low price. I understand their business is of this nature: First of all they are manufacturers. Secondly, they are retailers with a great many stores of their own. Then thirdly, they sell to other retailers. Now what will be the results of this legislation as applied to that company? It will not affect them as manufacturers, of course. It will not affect their retail stores. But what about the other retailers who have been selling their goods? Will they be able, so to speak, to get under the cover of the advertising put out by Tip Top Tailors; or will that be an infringement where, as the minister described this afternoon, the retailers could not get together.

Before I sit down and before the minister answers I would like to refer to two or three methods which I understand are being used now by individual retailers to try to meet—and it is difficult because it is only arising—a situation which will be closely parallel to what will appear among the retailers when this bill is passed. I am told that the Red and White stores were pioneers in co-operative advertising and that this advertising was a factor in keeping the independent merchant in business in the face of the modern development of department store advertising. Secondly, in the case of Red and White stores I understand that the individual merchant who owns his store pays a fixed sum per week to the wholesale house as his share of the cost of advertising. That is given as an example of resale price-fixed items being advertised and the establishment of offering prices. There is a third illustration from the United States which may be somewhat different, although not substantially so. It is recalled that thirty or more years ago in the United States a printers' association published a list of suggested prices for its membership. This service had to be withdrawn from the membership, but it was replaced shortly after by a private organization which sold the same service of suggested prices to printers throughout the United States at an annual fee.

I put this question to the minister, particularly with regard to Tip Top Tailors and these other illustrations I have given. It seems to me these cases I have mentioned and those that came up this afternoon indicate that whatever effect this bill is going to have, it is inevitably going to create a problem which will tax the ingenuity of skilful lawyers. When I say that, I am not criticizing them. What is being proscribed here, what is being attacked here, is something which has the imprimatur, you might say, of some of the best and finest brains that have studied this question.

People who are treated in this way are going to have a sense of injustice. I think it is a terrible pity when legislation is passed which will leave a sense of injustice in the minds of thousands and thousands of citizens. If we did not have enough evidence before coming into committee, surely we have enough now to show that this is half-digested, that it has not had the discussion pro and con that it should have.

Leaving that, I come back and repeat that it seems a thousand pities that we have to pass a bill which no one can bless any more than to say that he hopes it may somehow do good whereas, on the other hand, its evils stick out just like red flags.

At 6.15 p.m. the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Chairman, just before 6.15 I had asked the minister certain questions. Perhaps he would answer them now and then I can make any further observations I have.

Mr. Garson: I would prefer my hon. friend to repeat his question so I will be sure I have it in the exact terms in which he asked it.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): The minister will recall I was referring to the difficulty which it seemed to me would arise—indeed it became very evident—in the case of retailers who in effect through resale price maintenance have had a method of co-operating; that is to say, they had their advertising done, and that has been one of their chief problems. We were given an illustration this afternoon of the difficulty of common advertising within the existing law if it is to be done by the retailers themselves. I brought to the attention of the minister the instance of Tip Top Tailors, describing them as first of all manufacturers, second as retailers with quite a large number of stores of their own, I believe, and third as having relations with other independent retailers.

I said to the minister that as I understand it what will happen will not in any way affect their own selling operations to the extent they act as their own retailers, but I said it seemed to me that the independent retailers who have been using Tip Top Tailors' goods would now be faced with the problem which came up several times this afternoon, and I asked the minister to state just where in his opinion they would be left. Of course the background of my question was the fact that apparently the co-operation which they have been able to exercise up to the present will have the difficulty now facing it which, as I understand it, was outlined several times this afternoon.

Mr. Garson: May I ask my hon. friend if the advertising he has in mind contemplates the naming of the associated dealers in the advertisement?

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): That is one of the questions I wanted to ask the minister.

Mr. Garson: My hon. friend must give me a statement of the facts upon which he wants an opinion.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Let me ask the minister to answer it on both suppositions, that their names will be mentioned and that they will not be mentioned, the two alternatives.

Mr. Adamson: In many cases they are mentioned. I have seen advertisements with the names of the firms.

Mr. Garson: Are the suggested prices also mentioned?

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I understand so.

Mr. Garson: Your question is whether, if Tip Top Tailors issue an advertisement naming suggested retail prices and the names of their dealers throughout the country, that would be made unlawful by the present amendment?

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): That is really the question. I understand that the prices are what are called nationally advertised prices. The advertisements are well known.

Mr. Garson: I apprehend that the arrangement for what we may perhaps call a common advertisement by a manufacturer and associated dealers, and naming suggested retail prices, which is legal now, will continue to be legal after this amendment is passed provided it does not form part of a requirement or inducement to the said dealers to sell the advertised goods at the suggested retail prices and does not eliminate competition to such a substantial degree as to amount to a combine. Before my hon. friend looks too mystified by that answer, may I say that the advertisement per se is quite all right provided it is not a part of or associated with a deliberate contravention of the proposed resale maintenance provisions of the Combines Investigation Act.

I should like to make the suggestion it is pretty difficult to imagine a manufacturer advertising prices for his dealers in that way after this amendment comes into effect unless there is some arrangement for those dealers to adhere to those prices. I should think the cautious manufacturer who is desirous of obeying the law would overcome the difficulty by mentioning maximum prices only, which he has a perfect right to do under the proposed legislation.

Mr. Fraser: I asked the minister this afternoon if they would not have to put in their advertisements that the price was not more than a certain figure, and he said no, that they could carry on as at present.

Mr. Garson: With all deference to the hon. member for Peterborough West, I am quite prepared to have Hansard stand with his question and my answer. That will speak for itself.

Mr. Fraser: That is what I asked. I asked if they would not have to put in not more than such and such a figure.

Mr. Adamson: There is a common device in the advertising of a line whereby all the dealers in a certain community will take a full page advertisement to advertise a nationally known branded article or group of articles, General Electric, Westinghouse, Moffatt, or half a dozen other nationally known products. All the local dealers are mentioned at the side of the advertisement and in the centre the articles for sale are named and the price. I assume that under this law that will be illegal.

Mr. Garson: That is not what I said. I chose my words as carefully as I could. I said that would be quite all right provided it did not form a part of a requirement or inducement. In other words there is no harm in the advertisement itself, but if the advertisement is employed as a device or part of a device whereby the manufacturer induces or requires the dealer to sell at not less than that suggested price it will become an offence under the act. In other words the man who wants to obey the law, who wants to confine himself merely to advertising his product and, if you like, the names of his dealers, and the suggested resale prices and who stops there will be all right, but the man who employs that device of advertising as part of a scheme to impose resale price maintenance upon his dealers will contravene the act.

Mr. Adamson: I am not learned in the law but to me that would seem to be, in legal terminology, a nice point. What is an advertisement if it is not an inducement to people to buy? If a manufacturer, the General Electric company or any of these others I have mentioned, puts an advertisement in the paper indicating the dealers, surely that is an inducement for the dealers to sell and the public to buy. If they are not inducing people to purchase their goods, surely there is no sense in advertising.

Mr. Garson: I assumed the hon. member had read the bill and had noticed that the bill refers to a requiring or inducing the retailer to sell the goods at not less than a certain price. It is not an inducement to the consumer. The whole point of the matter is this, that there is nothing wrong with a manufacturer having this common advertisement naming his price or naming his dealers providing it definitely stops at that; and then each one of these dealers is at liberty, once he has paid for the goods, to sell them at any price he pleases, except that he must not exceed the maximum price the manufacturer may have imposed.

However, I agree with my hon. friend that publication of an advertisement like that does at least set up somewhat the prima facie appearance of there being an understanding that these prices will be maintained. For that reason, as I suggested a moment ago, I would think that a manufacturer who was desirous of complying with the law, and who was a cautious man, would name the maximum price in this advertisement which he can do under the proposed amendment, and then there would be no question at all about his position. Those who buy from the retailers would know they would not have to pay more than that price, and possibly it would be less.

Mr. Adamson: I have read the bill, and the minister has stated exactly the difficulty that does arise. While the bill mentions minimum prices and the prohibition of maintaining prices, it is surely fruitless for a manufacturer to have an advertisement listing his dealers—which is an expensive mode of advertising—and then state a maximum price. In effect he would be saying, "Go to it, boys, and make your own deal with each one of these dealers." In ordinary terms of he trade, that seems to me an unrealistic approach to the thing. It seems to me that if you are advertising a motorcar or any major piece of equipment needed for the house, you are advertising it at a price. You advertise two things, the quality of the goods and the price at which they are sold. You would seem to be saying this is the quality of the goods and this is the maximum price, but get it for what you can. There is a list of the dealers in the advertisement, but the implication is that the stated price is not necessarily the price at which you can buy the article. This is going to be a great restraint upon trade, because you may go to your local dealer for a certain piece of equipment and he may give you $10 off the maximum price, another dealer may give you $2 off and another may not give you anything. In point of fact it is going to be very confusing, and very difficult to establish a proper price to pay for a stove or something like that of a certain quality.

I admit that it may be desirable, but I think it is going to be confusing. You cannot name a suggested price, but you can say what the maximum price will be. As the trade is now, many of these goods are sold on a trade-in basis and a suggested price. If a person knows a dealer he may get a better allowance on the article he trades, so there is not much rigidity there but the suggested price is the same. If you have a suggested price and a maximum price, it seems to me you are going to have quite a bit of confusion in the merchandising of this type of equipment. Whether it is good or bad economics, or whether it is good or bad socially or any other way, it seems to me you are going to have a certain amount of confusion which is not desirable.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I want to return to my question for a moment. I am quite prepared to believe it is my own limitation which brought it about, but I must admit that after hearing the minister make an explanation of the necessity of ascertaining what was in the mind of the dealer when the advertisement was put out, I really felt that one would need a psychologist or mental analyst as well as a lawyer to understand it. If anyone asked me to repeat what the minister said, summing up all I could get out of it I would say that if you broke the law, you broke the law.

Let us go to the case of Tip Top Tailors and the question of the advertisement. Incidentally, it seemed to me as I was listening to the minister that we have been talking so much about resale price maintenance as though it were a minimum price that we have overlooked the fact that it is also a maximum price. Let us go back to Tip Top Tailors and the situation I put to the minister. Presumably they will be able to advertise just as they have been doing at a certain price, that is in so far as they are selling themselves. Would the minister agree with that?

Mr. Garson: Yes.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Then I understand that if Tip Top Tailors are going to advertise in such a manner for the independent retailers who have been acting as their agents, or whatever the proper legal term is, if they are still going to be allowed to carry on business and sell goods through the independent retailers, then the terms of advertisement have to be changed to state that is the maximum price?

Mr. Garson: No. I was afraid my hon. friend would misunderstand my reply so I took the precaution of putting it down in writing to enable me to refer back to it.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): It was not deliberate, I may say.

Mr. Garson: I know that, but these questions that are being asked arise out of the bill before us which has to do with resale price maintenance. They also involve consideration of the Combines Investigation Act itself, and therefore, even for a lawyer much less a layman, these questions present some complexities and require careful and accurate statements of fact as a basis for a question and a careful reply. What I said was that the arrangement for a common advertisement by a manufacturer—in this case Tip Top Tailors—naming associated dealers and suggested retail prices, which is legal, will continue to be legal after this amendment is passed provided it does not form part of a requirement or inducement to the said dealers to sell these advertised goods at the suggested retail prices and does not eliminate competition to a substantial degree so as to amount to a combine; that is, so that it is not a case of resale price maintenance on the one hand or a case of a combine on the other.

As I said before—and I have not this written out—the manufacturer who wants to obey the law and who is not going any distance beyond this advertisement to require or induce his associated dealers to sell at not less than these suggested prices will, I think, have no difficulty. But the manufacturer who uses this advertisement along with other devices in order to require or induce his dealers to practice resale price maintenance and not sell at less than that figure will contravene the act. It was for that reason I suggested that a manufacturer who wanted to be quite in the clear and in compliance with the act could do so by no more complicated device than simply naming his price as a maximum price.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): It has been both maximum and minimum.

Mr. Garson: No. If he names a minimum price, that is a price below which the dealer cannot resell.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Would the minister not agree that it is a maximum in this sense, that the manufacturer would object just as much if the dealer sold above that price?

Mr. Garson: He would object if he sold above that price; but under the proposed amendment the manufacturer can fix and enforce a maximum price whereas he cannot fix nor can he enforce a minimum price. He cannot prevent the dealer from going below his suggested price, but he can prevent him from going above the suggested price.

[Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood).]

Mr. Brooks: May I ask the minister this question. Could not his price be both his maximum and minimum? Could they not both be the one price?

Mr. Garson: Yes.

Mr. Brooks: Yes.

Mr. Garson: Well, no; it could not be a minimum price because a minimum price is barred. A minimum price is a price below which the dealer cannot go, and that is barred by the proposed legislation. But the manufacturer can fix a maximum price because, under the legislation, he will not only be able to fix a maximum price but he can take any steps that are proper to enforce it.

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Adamson: Might I suggest that, in order to overcome the difficulty, advertisements will have to have at the bottom of them some such lines as advertisements for stocks now have in order to overcome S.E.C. difficulties: "These goods having been sold, this advertisement appears as a matter of record only." There is one question I should like to ask the minister in connection with subsection 3 which reads as follows:

> No dealer shall refuse to sell or supply an article or commodity to any other person for the reason that such other person . . .

And so on. The reasons given there are price and other things. There is one case, I think, where a manufacturer was unsatisfied with the method of marketing adopted by the dealer. I think there was one case where the manufacturer's products were sold in an unattractive way, and another case where they were sold together with second-hand goods.

An hon. Member: What product?

Mr. Adamson: The manufacturer said: I will not supply you with any more goods because your practice of retailing destroys the quality value which my goods have built up during the years I have been advertising nationally. I do not know whether that case was ever tried in the courts, but I know of one or two cases in which a manufacturer refused to sell to a dealer or to a wholesaler.

An hon. Member: What cases are they?

Mr. Garson: What was the question?

Mr. Adamson: Whether it is merely a matter of price or whether a manufacturer may withhold his goods from a retailer because he is dissatisfied with the method of retailing.

Mr. Garson: I think the bill makes it quite clear that whatever reasons may be lawful at the present moment for a manufacturer refusing to deal further with his retailer are left quite untouched by this bill, except the reason that he has broken a price which the manufacturer has fixed. If the manufacturer refuses to deal with the dealer because he is a poor credit risk, for example, or for any other good reason, his right to take that position is left quite undisturbed by this present bill.

Mr. Adamson: And if it is because of his method of marketing, he is left quite free?

Mr. Garson: Assuming that under the law as it now stands he could sever his connection—and I suppose that would be the case —then this bill will not affect him at all.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the minister to explain subsection 2 of section 37A which reads as follows:

> No dealer shall directly or indirectly by agreement, threat, promise or any other means whatsoever, require or induce or attempt to require or induce any other person to resell an article or commodity . . .

And so on. What is contemplated by the words "or any other means whatsoever"? What other means would there be than agreement, threat or promise that was contemplated in drafting the bill in this form?

Mr. Garson: Those words were inserted to indicate that the banning of these acts of requiring or inducing dealers was complete and that it did not matter by what means the requiring or inducing was brought about, it would be contrary to this section.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The minister must have in contemplation means that have been used other than agreement, threat or promise. What other means have been utilized over the years which this portion of the proposed amendment to the law is intended to cover?

Mr. Garson: I think the words my hon. friend has read—"any other means whatsoever"—are largely self-explanatory.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Yes.

Mr. Garson: They include all means of every kind which can be foreseen now or which cannot be foreseen. There is no limitation to them at all.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I put it this way. When this was drafted had the minister any means in mind other than agreement, threat or promise by which the resale had been affected in the past?

Mr. Garson: No; if we had we would have included them before we listed "any other means whatsoever".

Mr. Drew: I recall that earlier today the minister was very emphatic in his statement that if we are to create some kind of a crime, then surely we must define the crime. With that one statement the minister made today I agree. Surely if there is to be a crime that will call for severe penalties, then that crime should be defined so anyone may know it. Here in this legislation we have the statement that:

> No dealer shall directly or indirectly by agreement, threat, promise or any other means whatsoever, require or induce or attempt to require or induce any other person to resell an article or commodity . . .

Before hon. members pass this they should know what the crime is that is contemplated by that all-inclusive term.

Mr. Garson: With great respect, Mr. Chairman, I think the crime is very explicitly defined by this section. The crime is that of requiring or inducing or attempting to require or induce any other person to resell an article or commodity, and then:

> (a) at a price specified by the dealer or established by agreement—

And then follow (b), (c), (d) and (e). The reference to agreement, threat, promise or any other means whatsoever is a listing of the means or method by which the crime may be committed. The crime itself is the requiring or inducing or attempting to require or induce, and I think it is very explicitly stated. But there may be means of committing that crime other than by agreement, threat or promise, which we cannot now foresee and we simply describe them in the terms of the legislation as "or any other means whatsoever". It is not unfair to the accused because a conviction cannot be obtained against him unless we can prove that he has required or induced a dealer to commit the offence.

Mr. Rowe: You had better put it verbally.

Mr. Fulton: I should like to turn for a moment to another aspect of this matter, which has been referred to in the course of the previous discussion. Has the minister or the combines commissioner given any consideration to the type of legislation or protection which they have said might be introduced if the practice of loss-leadering or other abuses which have been referred to should become widespread? I ask the question because it must be agreed that should these practices in fact become widespread; should it develop that there is, as I maintain there is, a real danger of loss leaders, then it will not be sufficient just to act at leisure to work out some legislation to protect against it.

Because of the pace at which economic developments proceed nowadays it will be necessary to act very quickly if we are to protect a large number of retailers and prevent a situation which might cause devastation in the retail trade generally. Therefore I ask the minister whether any consideration has been given to the type of legislation, or additional protection, which might be recommended to parliament—those were the words used—if it should turn out that as a result of the present legislation loss-leadering and such other abuses—unfair competitive practices in general—become widespread.

Mr. Garson: My hon. friend himself was a member of the joint committee, and will recall the terms of the committee's report. I think he was one of those who did not concur in it. The committee said they did not think that as long as the present economic conditions continued there was any great likelihood of loss leaders or of predatory price cutting, but in the event of it taking place they suggested that the provisions of section 498A of the Criminal Code, which was designed for this very purpose, should be very rigorously enforced by the combines investigation branch, and that if the provisions of section 498A should prove inadequate for the purpose for which they were originally drafted we should consider other legislation to meet the particular kind of abuse which would then be apparent.

Our experience in connection with section 498A has been that as long as economic conditions have remained in the condition in which they have been during the past ten years or more there has been no call upon the combines investigation branch for the invocation of that section. And that has been why on only a few occasions have we had to invoke it.

We have given a great deal of thought, not only at the present time but on previous occasions, to the question of loss leaders. On one point, particularly as to what is a loss leader, my hon. friend from Kamloops will recall that before the joint committee we questioned—and he was one of those who took part in the questioning—several of the witnesses to secure a definition of loss leader from them. He will recall that the definitions were in great variety, and that those who gave them were wary about committing themselves to what they would regard, and what they thought the trade would accept, as an adequate definition of a loss leader.

Should it become apparent that section 498A is not adequate to deal with any abuse of that sort which might make its appearance, then we are in a position, because of the work which has already been done, to follow out quite quickly any policy which might be agreed upon by the government at that time. But our own view coincides with that of the committee, that as long as present economic conditions continue there is no substantial likelihood of widespread predatory price cutting or loss leaders.

Mr. Fulton: I take it from the minister's answer, then, that the government have not in contemplation any legislation which they might introduce quickly should it turn out that the practice has become widespread and that retailers are suffering. In other words they will wait until after the horse is stolen before locking the door.

Mr. Garson: I think I would prefer to have my remarks stand as they are without the modification my hon. friend has attached to them.

Mr. Fulton: Perhaps the minister might care to comment on the statement made by the Prime Minister yesterday when he said, as reported at page 2385 of Hansard:

> I made the statement the other day, and I repeat it, that if as a result of this legislation—

That is the bill now before us. I continue:

> —or as a result of any other condition there develops a contrary abuse—

Having in mind, obviously, this practice of loss-leadering, the Prime Minister continued:

> —the government will consider what recommendation it should make to parliament to deal with that contrary abuse.

Am I to understand that the government has something in mind by way of a concrete proposal to take care of that situation, should it be shown that the danger exists?

Mr. Garson: What my hon. friend is to understand and what I have already tried to explain to him is that in our department we have given very careful consideration to this question and, should the occasion arise in which legislation is required, a great deal of spadework has already been done. I think we would be able quickly to carry into effect any policy on which the government might come to an agreement, in line with what the Prime Minister has said.

Mr. Fulton: Can the minister tell us what that spadework is?

Some hon. Members: Oh oh.

Mr. Fulton: I am sorry, but I have to say I am not in agreement with hon. members opposite who take this sanguine view of the position today with respect to the safety of retailers throughout Canada. They seem to believe that the independent merchants are not faced with any danger if this legislation is passed. Now, I am trying to be reasonable. It is difficult to make any sense—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Fulton: It is difficult to make any sense out of the growls and mutterings that arise from the ranks of the Liberal party opposite, particularly interspersed as they are by senseless comments of the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Abbott: And you are a pretty good judge of senseless comments.

Mr. Fulton: We so often find, when Hansard comes out the following day, that the Minister of Finance has excelled himself in this regard.

Mr. Abbott: Hear, hear.

The Chairman: Order. The hon. member should direct his remarks to section 1; and I would ask other hon. members not to interrupt.

Mr. Rowe: Be careful of the ministers.

The Chairman: I would ask hon. members not to interrupt, and I would also ask the hon. member who has the floor to confine his observations to section 1.

Mr. Abbott: Hear, hear.

Mr. Rowe: Be careful of the ministers.

Mr. Fulton: Perhaps, Mr. Chairman, you might amend your request to hon. members opposite and suggest that if they wish to interrupt they do so one at a time. I can take them, one at a time.

Mr. Rowe: And stand up when you interrupt, too.

Mr. McCann: You try it.

Mr. Rowe: Oh, you are the great legal light over there.

Mr. Fulton: As I was about to say, had I been able to make myself heard—

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Fulton:—many of the witnesses before our committee expressed themselves very definitely to the effect that, although they were somewhat in favour of the legislation to eliminate the practice of resale price maintenance, they were of the opinion that at the same time some protection must be afforded to the retailers of Canada against the practice of loss leaders. In that regard I would like particularly to refer to the evidence of Mr. Bengough, president of the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada, when he was being questioned by the committee. He was asked what, in his view, should be done about this practice. At page 372 of the proceedings we find this question:

> What is your view; would you agree that it would only be fair, if we are going to introduce legislation to outlaw in blanket fashion all price maintenance agreements, that we should at the same time introduce legislation to prevent the loss-leader practice?

To that Mr. Bengough replied:

> "I think it would be vital it should be done."

What we are concerned about here is that we are confronted with legislation which, without any necessity on the part of the crown to prove that a particular price maintenance agreement operates to the detriment of the public, makes the general practice of resale price maintenance illegal. If that becomes law, there will be no method left by which an individual retailer, or retailers in general, can protect themselves against the practice of loss leaders. I do not think any member opposite can deny that statement. If this practice of resale price maintenance is outlawed, as it will be by this legislation, there is no method by which the retailer as an individual or retailers as a class can protect themselves against the loss-leader practice. Therefore the question surely is pertinent: by what alternative method does the government intend to protect retailers against the loss-leader practice? Because it has been proven to be the greatest threat against the existence of the individual independent retailer.

I am not going to read again the evidence I placed upon record before with regard to the findings of the royal commission on price spreads. I shall not put on record again the dangers to small retailers from the loss-leader practice, the extent to which it has been used, and the extent to which in the retail field it has led to the concentration of power in a few hands. Those facts are well known to any hon. member who will open his mind to the situation which does exist.

What we are asking is this: What method have the government in contemplation, what steps have they taken, and what steps are they prepared to take to protect retailers against the abuses to which they have been exposed in the past, against which they have been protected by the resale price maintenance system and to which they will again be exposed if this legislation passes? The minister has said his department feels it is well able, as a result of its research and studies, to take steps to deal with the situation rapidly should it arise. I am asking the minister to outline what those steps are, and what conclusions they have arrived at.

Some hon. Members: Carried.

The Chairman: Shall the section carry?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, the matter that has been raised by my hon. friend is one that exercises the minds of retail merchants everywhere in this country. I would point out particularly that it is a matter of concern to the retail merchants of Saskatchewan and their organization in that province. One of the requests they have made—it is a reasonable one, and should not be treated in the cavalier and disrespectful manner shown by some hon. members—should be faced squarely and fairly. The retail merchants of Saskatchewan were denied the opportunity of presenting their arguments in support of their brief. One of the things they fear particularly is set forth in the current issue of the Western Retailer. I refer to the question of loss leaders, which has been discussed by the hon. member for Kamloops.

This brief, prepared by Mr. R. E. Walker, a man of long experience in the retail trade before he became chairman of the retail merchants association of Saskatchewan, requests information from the government as to what would be done to protect the retail merchants from the dangerous possibility of loss leaders. The Minister of Justice has said that his experience and that of the government is that there is nothing to fear at this time, with economic conditions as they are today. In the brief of the retail merchants of Saskatchewan the following appears:

We have long maintained that we can compete—

And when they say "we" they mean the independents.

—with mass merchandisers if they will refrain or preferably if they are prevented from instituting unfair practices which are not within our capacity to meet.

And the unfair practice to which reference is made at the present time is the practice of loss leaders.

We submit, gentlemen, that resale price maintenance has had the effect of restraining mass buyers from such unfair practices and which has done so, as we have attempted to demonstrate, at no cost to the public, as confirmed by the royal commission on prices of 1949. And we further submit that if resale price maintenance is declared illegal,—

By "illegal" apparently is meant if it is set aside by parliament.

—that there can be no effective legislation, confirmed by the Stevens report, to curb these vicious unfair practices so clearly demonstrated and recognized by this commission. We think it would be of interest to this committee to discover whether the Hon. Lester B. Pearson and the Hon. James L. Ilsley, both of whom have served as cabinet ministers in the present government, and both of whom were members of the royal commission on price spreads—

[Mr. Fulton.]

The hon. gentleman was secretary of that commission, as I remember.

—would testify that the conclusions which they arrived at through a study of the history of many, many years of business, were only valid for a temporary period, or whether they consider these conclusions to remain valid.

The conclusions to which reference is made were those reached by the Stevens commission, and they were as follows:

The competitors of the store using the loss leaders are, however, the persons chiefly affected. That the deliberate use of cut prices to draw patronage away from competitors is an unfair trade practice, is quite clear. Such reductions are not prompted by any desire to serve the public by giving lower prices. One purpose is to attract customers to whom the store hopes to sell goods that are not loss leaders, at substantial profits. Another purpose is to create the illusion of lower prices on all articles. That this end is not always attained does not in any way lessen the unfairness of good practice.

Mr. Gardiner: Why did not the Bennett government act upon the report?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Let me say to my hon. friend that all the legislation which the Bennett government endeavoured to pass in order to meet this situation was challenged by the government of my hon. friend.

Mr. Martin: Not in that instance. That is not what Mr. Stevens said nor what the country subsequently said.

Mr. Sinnott: That is not the answer you got in 1935.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What happened was that after the present government came in they challenged the legislation and had the present Prime Minister as counsel in an effort to set aside the legislation. I know this is disturbing some of my hon. friends, but in 1935 their consideration was not the consumer when they submitted that legislation to the courts.

Mr. Gardiner: You are away ahead of the story. Mr. Stevens was put out of the government because of his attitude on the issues.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The generous support which my hon. friends received from big business in 1935 was paid back by the submission to the courts in 1936. I want to find out whether the government accepts the views of the 2,400 merchants in Saskatchewan who compose the retail merchants' association. That association has indicated that there is a danger to small business. I want to know whether consideration has been given to the drafting of necessary amendments in order to meet this situation.

The Minister of Justice says that if things turn out badly they will do something. It took them sixteen years to do what they are doing now. I only hope we can have assurance on behalf of the consumers of Canada that the practice of loss leaders, detrimental to the retail merchants and particularly detrimental to the consumers, shall not be permitted to threaten the economy of this country. That is the reason the hon. member for Kamloops asked the question he did. That is the question that is in the minds of the consumers of this country. They want to know whether this legislation is going to protect the interests of the consumer rather than preserve additional rights to big business.

Mr. Garson: I should like to clear up just one point. I think the hon. member for Lake Centre will agree that one of the main purposes of the legislation introduced by the Bennett government as a result of the Stevens price spreads commission was section 498A of the Criminal Code and that that section was tested in the courts, found to be constitutional and is on the statute books today available to serve the purpose for which it was provided.

Mr. Fulton: I may be wrong, but I do not recall the Minister of Justice saying that section 498A had ever been invoked. I would remind the minister that that section was placed on the statute books in 1935. It certainly could not be said that the economic conditions of 1934 and 1935 which gave rise to the Stevens inquiry and subsequently the royal commission on price spreads, that the terrible abuses which existed with respect to loss leader practices, were cured overnight in 1935. Vain as my hon. friends may be, ready as they are to give themselves credit, I do not think they will say that the mere election of their government in 1935 cured conditions overnight.

We must assume that those conditions continued. One of the main things the new government did was to submit the fair practices legislation of the Bennett government to the courts for the purpose of having it thrown out. It must be assumed that those economic conditions continued, as in fact they did, for some four years subsequently until the outbreak of war in 1939. If section 498A was the effective answer which the minister now says it is, will he tell us how many times it was invoked during that period? Will he tell us on how many occasions it was invoked successfully to prevent the practices against which he says it was designed as a protection? Can the minister tell us how many times section 498A was invoked?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Fulton: It would speed things up if hon. members opposite would keep quiet so the minister could hear the question. I am quite certain that the only reason the minister does not answer is that he cannot hear the question. Perhaps I should raise my voice, or in the alternative my hon. friends could be quiet enough so the minister could hear what I am saying. I will do whichever they want, but I would be obliged if the minister would tell me how many times section 498A has been invoked and on how many occasions it has been successful.

Mr. Garson: I was not Minister of Justice during the period 1935 to 1939. Having been given no notice of his question, I cannot give my hon. friend the information which he asks. But I can tell him, as I told the house yesterday—perhaps he read my remarks—that section 498A was used by us within the past year. We will use it on any other occasion on which it is required.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What case was that?

Mr. Garson: It is all in Hansard.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What case is it?

Mr. Fulton: It may be in Hansard, but until now we did not have an opportunity to question the minister about it.

An hon. Member: You were not here.

Mr. Fulton: How was it used and to what effect?

Mr. Garson: It was used in a case where a complaint had been received by the department under section 498A, subsection (a), of improper discounts being given to certain dealers compared with others. The matter was investigated and was accepted by the firm in question and adjusted in that way.

Mr. Drew: Surely a criminal prosecution was not adjusted.

Mr. Garson: The suggestion was that the trade discounts of this firm with respect to certain items were contrary to section 498A. It was not in any heinous degree at all, but complaints had been made by people in that trade. When the matter was brought to the attention of the people concerned they were very glad to adjust the list from that point on, and no further difficulties have been experienced.

Mr. Diefenbaker: There was no prosecution.

Mr. Garson: No. There was no occasion for prosecution.

Mrs. Fairclough: I take it from what the minister says it was a matter of discrimination in the allowance of discounts.

Mr. Garson: No; this was a case of the actual printed discounts which they had.

Mrs. Fairclough: But they had practised discrimination; they were not allowing the same discount to all people under similar circumstances?

Mr. Garson: That is right.

Mrs. Fairclough: The act definitely says that is contrary to the law, so why were they not prosecuted?

Mr. Garson: Because—

Mrs. Fairclough: They were given a second chance, in other words.

Mr. Rowe: Just a congenial settlement.

Mr. Drew: Surely the government was not using the Criminal Code for the purpose of compounding a felony.

Mr. Garson: Oh, no.

Mr. Drew: This is interesting—

An hon. Member: And boring, too.

Mr. Drew: —in view of the fact that we are now asked to pass something in the nature of a criminal law. I think the house should have a full explanation. If the minister has been accurate in what he has been stating, then he was using a section of the Criminal Code to enforce some compromise which, as the minister knows, is entirely contrary to the whole principle and purpose of the Criminal Code.

Mr. Garson: No, there was no compromise at all. It was brought to our attention that certain discounts were being granted which it was thought would contravene section 498A. The matter was brought to the attenion of the firm concerned. They accepted the view that was urged by the complaining company, and there has been no further difficulty in the matter at all.

Mr. Rowe: They must have been an awfully nice firm.

Mr. Abbott: Just like the paper companies.

Mr. Drew: In so far as what the minister has said is concerned—

Mr. Abbott: It was not Great Lakes Paper, was it?

Mr. Drew: —then we may take it that the government learned the Criminal Code was being broken and the government then wrote and said: You are breaking the Criminal Code; unless you correct your action and stop breaking the Criminal Code we are going to act. Is that not what the government did? Perhaps they did not go so far as to threaten.

Mr. Garson: Just the opposite. My hon. friend is very anxious to put it in that form but, as I have told him, a complaint was received from one commercial concern to the effect that in their view the discounts allowed by another commercial concern contravened section 498A, subsection (a), of the Criminal Code. The matter was taken up by invocation of this section with the firm against which the complaint was laid. They explained what the position was, showed their records and satisfied the officials of the combines branch that the practice they were following was in order. That was communicated to the firm that had made the complaint and the matter was closed. I may say that it was brought to my attention some considerable time after the whole thing had been adjusted. I point this out, however, to indicate that section 498A, subsection (a), is an effective instrument for the purpose which it was designed to serve, as I think the leader of the opposition was maintaining a day or so ago in this very debate, and that it can be invoked again as occasion may require. In any case where any breach of it takes place with criminal intent my hon. friend need not have any concern about appropriate action being taken under it.

Mr. Diefenbaker: This is very revealing because the section reads:

> Every person engaged in trade or commerce or industry is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to a penalty not exceeding one thousand dollars or to one month's imprisonment, or, if a corporation, to a penalty not exceeding five thousand dollars, who
> (a) is a party or privy to, or assists in, any transaction of sale which discriminates, to his knowledge, against competitors of the purchaser in that any discount, rebate or allowance is granted to the purchaser over and above any discount, rebate or allowance available at the time of such transaction to the aforesaid competitors . . .

Did the evidence disclose that this company had in fact granted rebates and discounts not granted to other competitors?

Mr. Garson: I only have the report I got from the combines commissioner, and I have related to the house everything that took place. It was thought by certain companies in the trade that discounts of this type, which in their view would contravene this section, were being allowed. The matter was investigated by officers of the department, and the concern against which the complaint had been made was able to show its good faith in the matter and that the list of discounts they were then using was in accordance with the provisions of the act. If my hon. friend wants any further information I would have to get it from those who handled the matter. However, it does prove one thing, namely that here is an effective instrument by which discounts of that nature can be prevented. I think it is also reasonable to say that the other two subsections of section 498A are equally useful if occasion arises to invoke them.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That scarcely is the type of enforcement of the law one would expect. If an offence was committed the Criminal Code should not be used as a threat. Every person who breaks it should be proceeded against regardless of who that person is. Now that we have gone this far and found that the degree to which section 498A is an effective instrument consists of one case in which the wrongdoer was not proceeded against, I think possibly we should find out the name of this alleged person who, having committed an offence, was still not proceeded against under this effective section.

Mr. Garson: My hon. friend is most unfair. There is no suggestion there was an offence committed. There was a complaint registered with the government to the effect that the discounts being granted by this concern complained against were out of line under section 498A of the Criminal Code. Upon the matter being looked into, the concern complained against, which is a very responsible and respectable concern, was able to show that that was not the case. Therefore the matter was not proceeded with, but it was very clear that if an offence had taken place it would have been quite possible to prosecute under the section.

Mr. Fulton: I must say I am unable to follow the minister in his distinction between what is an unsatisfactory practice in the light of section 498A and what is an offence against the Criminal Code under 498A; but even if at the moment we are unable to get from the minister the name or firm of the individual concerned, I think the minister will agree with me that what he has said indicates that although 498A was placed on the statute books in 1935 when the depression was continuing and the conditions which were brought to light as a result of the Stevens inquiry were still prevalent, nevertheless section 498A has not been invoked, and no prosecution under it has ever succeeded, against the loss-leader practice. I think the minister must admit that emerges from what he has said. Does the minister not agree with me that that is an accurate statement?

Mr. Abbott: Carried.

Mr. Fulton: His colleague the Minister of Finance is asking him to agree by saying "carried". Since that is what the Minister of Finance is saying—

Mr. Abbott: The Minister of Finance is just bored.

Mr. Fulton: The Minister of Finance is always professionally bored when he is not holding the floor himself. I am sorry if the answers of the Minister of Justice bore the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Abbott: It is not the answers that bore me, it is just the questions.

Mr. Fulton: I should like to have an answer from the Minister of Justice to a reasonable attempt at summarizing the situation.

Mr. Garson: I have already told my hon. friend.

Mr. McCusker: You have to tell him four or five times.

Mr. Fulton: If the hon. member for Regina would like to have the floor, perhaps—

The Chairman: Order. The minister has the floor.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, I was going to say that the member for Regina—

The Chairman: Order. The minister has the floor.

Mr. Abbott: Thank God I did not go to Oxford.

Mr. Fulton: I am grateful, too. It is bad enough to have you here without having had to put up with you there, as well.

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Fulton: I am sorry I was not able, because of the interruption by the Minister of Finance, to hear the Minister of Justice.

Mr. Garson: I thought I had made it clear to my hon. friend that I have no knowledge of any prosecutions that took place between 1935 and 1939, or even after 1939 until 1948, when I came on the scene. Since that time the only occasion on which we have had any reference to section 498A is the occasion of which I spoke.

Mr. Fulton: The only case.

Mrs. Fairclough: Mr. Chairman, I should like to inquire further into this incident because I am very much interested in it. In the first instance I believe the minister said the complaint had been lodged by a competitor of the company, or so it seemed to me. Is that correct, or was the complaint lodged by a customer of the offending company? He later said the customer was the one who was discriminated against. No prosecution was launched because when the investigation was conducted it was found the practice had been corrected. Was the practice corrected or was it found that the practice had, in fact, been a policy of the company but upon there being some smoke, let us say, the fire was put out, in which event the offending company certainly was guilty under the section; or was there never at any time any evidence of the practice?

Mr. Garson: Mr. Chairman, I am under somewhat of a handicap in discussing this item because I have no personal knowledge of it. I have had certain conversations with the officers of the department, and the impression I have is that it was a complaint by a customer of the offending company.

Mrs. Fairclough: Not a competitor?

Mr. Garson: No, I do not think I said that. It was a customer of the offending company who was complaining, as I gather it, that another customer had been given a discount which was not available to the complaining customer. Upon the officers of the department investigating the matter, the company complained against was able to show that no offence had actually taken place and that the matter was in order. The company was able to satisfy the officers who were sent down there. If any greater detail is necessary, I would have to get it for the hon. member.

Mr. McLure: Mr. Chairman—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. McLure: I want to thank hon. members for that wonderful salutation. I might say now that I believe I know the cause of it. I left here on December 20 to go home for a holiday, and I came back not to ask questions but to take part in that great event which I expected, closure. I want to ask the minister who is piloting this bill whether there is any difference between an assembler, a manufacturer or a primary producer.

Mr. Brown (Essex West): Ask a lawyer.

Mr. McLure: I am lawyer enough for that myself.

Mr. Sinnott: Why did you ask the question?

Mr. Hodgson: He is like you, he does not know.

Mr. Sinnott: That is a good answer.

Mr. McLure: I was just going to say that one gets used to these interruptions from the ivory dome. I want to know whether a primary producer and assembler is put in the same category as a manufacturer.

Mr. Garson: A primary producer; is that what my hon. friend said?

Mr. McLure: A primary producer or assembler; are they in the same category as the manufacturer, or are they called dealers?

Mr. Garson: If the hon. member will look at subsection 1 of the new proposed section 37A he will see that it reads as follows:

> In this section "dealer" means a person engaged in the business of manufacturing or supplying or selling any article or commodity.

[Mrs. Fairclough.]

Mr. McLure: We have today a dozen or two dozen farmers in my constituency who have formed a little company. It may not be a limited liability company, but they formed it to market their product. How are you going to deal with them? They set the retail price of their product. How will this bill interfere with them, or will it? Or does it interfere with any co-operatives in any form that are conducting business today without this act?

Mr. Garson: I cannot imagine any set of circumstances under which a group of farmers or an individual farmer has ever attempted to impose resale price maintenance upon his products. I should be glad if my hon. friend could give us a concrete example of that sort of thing.

Mr. McLure: Any farmers' marketing board would be a concrete example.

Mr. Garson: I thought perhaps that was what my hon. friend was referring to. The hon. member for Annapolis-Kings asked that question earlier today.

Mr. McLure: I know he did.

Mr. Garson: My answer was that if the marketing board was set up under provincial legislation, it would not be affected by this proposed legislation.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That opinion is extremely interesting. What is the foundation for it? Is it just an offhand opinion by the minister, or is that an opinion from the law officers? There is certainly nothing whatsoever in any portion of the Combines Investigation Act that exempts any provincial marketing board. The minister, in an offhand way, has said they are not covered by this legislation because that is a matter of provincial legislation. As to the marketing boards in the provinces, they will come within the definition of dealer. No exception whatever is made in the act, and there is nothing whatever that will deny the application of this bill in its present form, as I see it, unless something is done to exempt provincial marketing boards. As a matter of fact an exemption is made under section 498A of the Criminal Code to cover certain co-operatives because of this very difficulty. Section 498A, subsection (a) indicates as follows:

> The provisions of this paragraph shall not, however, prevent a co-operative society returning to producers or consumers, or a co-operative wholesale society returning to its constituent retail members, the whole or any part of the net surplus made in its trading operations in proportion to purchases made from or sales to the society . . .

Those co-operative organizations can be set up under provincial law just as marketing boards are today set up under provincial law. I believe my hon. friend has raised a point that is worthy of serious consideration, namely the degree to which this amendment in its present haphazard form may result in provincial marketing boards finding themselves in jeopardy. I think the minister should welcome the suggestion of an amendment in that connection, to make that point positively clear. Certainly the fact that the provincial authorities set up a municipal board does not place that municipal board above any federal law. I think the hon. member for Queens has raised a point and has directed the attention of the minister to a question that deserves more serious consideration than will have been given by an offhand opinion, unless that offhand opinion is based on the law officers of the crown having definitely indicated that, in their opinion, the section as amended will not apply to any marketing board.

Mr. Pouliot: Before the minister answers, I should like to ask my hon. and genial friend, the hon. member for Lake Centre, if he will agree that the function of the Minister of Justice is equivalent, mutatis mutandis, to that of the Lord Chancellor in England.

Mr. Hodgson: What has England to do with this matter? We run our own parliament.

Mr. Pouliot: My hon. friend does not understand who the Lord Chancellor of England is. I am just arguing a most important point with the hon. member for Lake Centre. He will agree that the Minister of Justice occupies a similar position and performs a function similar to that performed by the Lord Chancellor in England.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I agree that he exercises some of the jurisdiction; but the Lord Chancellor is the head of the judicial system in Great Britain, and I am certainly glad that the Minister of Justice in this country is not in that position.

Mr. Pouliot: I am satisfied that my hon. friend agrees with me partly, if not in toto; and I will tell him this. One day I spoke to Lord Hailsham who was then Lord Chancellor of England. I said to him: My lord, are you the guardian of the king? He said: No, I am the—

Mr. Diefenbaker: The keeper of the king's conscience.

Mr. Pouliot: The answer was: No, I am the guardian of his conscience.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, may I ask if this is in the form of a suggestion that the minister needs a guardian for his conscience?

Mr. Pouliot: No, not at all. My hon. friend was too quick.

Mr. Drew: I was trying to find the relevance of these remarks.

Mr. Pouliot: I was wondering if the Minister of Justice was not the guardian of the conscience of the leader of the opposition.

An hon. Member: What a job!

Mr. Sinnott: He has no conscience.

Mr. Fulton: That is a new form of spiritualism.

Mr. Pouliot: There is another point that I want to stress to the hon. member for Lake Centre, and it is this. I was shocked when I heard him suggest that the Minister of Justice should ask the opinion of his law officers. Why did he say that? The Minister of Justice is not only the guardian of the conscience of the leader of the opposition; he is the guardian of the law. When he speaks, even in a ponderous way—

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Why does the hon. member say that?

Mr. Pouliot: I will say this to the former judge: Even when the minister speaks not in a ponderous way, like the hon. member for St. John's West, he says: This is the law. He has no need to ask anything of his law officers. He is supposed to know the law as well as any law clerk in his department.

Mr. Drew: That is exactly what some of us had hoped. That is the reason we have been directing questions, in the expectation that finally we might get some evidence that he knows something about this bill.

Mr. Pouliot: He answers well all sensible questions.

Mr. Drew: The Minister of Justice has given strong reasons why the argument that has been presented for some days, that this bill should not be dealt with in haste, should have been recognized by the government. He has indicated that there is a rather strange attitude toward the measures already on the statute books, including the only measure that can possibly deal with a threat of loss leaders which is relevant to the bill now before us. But I want to refer back to something the minister said this afternoon, because it requires some explanation. The hon. member for Lake Centre pointed out that in this case, uncertain though the terms may be, the bill now before us creates an absolute offence without any qualifications as to the motive or intent of the person who carried out the act that might be regarded as an offence against this measure. He suggested there should be some words as "without justification", or something of that kind, to indicate that the offence would only exist if in fact there was the spirit of mens rea in what had been done.

The Minister of Justice said it was not possible or practical to introduce any such qualification, although the hon. member for Lake Centre had made it quite clear that he was not suggesting the exact words which should be used but rather that there should be some qualification which related to the wrong intent.

The explanation which has been given by the minister simply does not hold water, because there is the qualification that combinations, mergers, trusts or monopolies mentioned in section 2 of the Combines Investigation Act must be shown to have operated or to be likely to operate to the detriment or against the interest of the public, whether consumers, producers or others. The answer given by the minister is simply inconsistent with the operation of the act itself to which this is a proposed amendment. Then in the section of the Criminal Code mentioned before, section 498A, which deals with conspiracies in restraint of trade we find the words "unduly prevent or lessen competition". If in relation to transactions of this kind in other legislation the word "unduly" can be defined; if conduct that is likely to be detrimental to the public interest can be defined, then surely similar exceptions could be made in this legislation. Then it would be possible to deal with this with the likelihood that those who are carrying out some arrangement which in no way injures the public will not suffer because of the overriding prohibition contained in this legislation.

I suggest that the minister, even at this stage in the discussion, should reconsider his statement in that connection. It does not do his position justice that he should give an explanation which, if it is sound, means that we should have before us now amendments to the Combines Investigation Act removing those qualifications in regard to other combines, other joint enterprises, which certainly would be just as injurious in their effect.

The minister this afternoon gave one extremely interesting explanation of the nature of the grounds that might be employed by a dealer to deny to a retailer the things that he sought to buy and sell. One of the grounds was if the dealer maintained a slovenly establishment. This is the explanation given by the minister piloting the bill. Does that mean a dealer is going to become the censor of the cleanliness or tidiness of the retailing establishment?

Mr. Gardiner: They do.

Mr. Drew: Because that is the only thing his words implied. If that is going to be the condition, then surely no dealer will ever have any trouble in refusing to deliver the supplies the retailer has asked him to deliver. The minister made an interjection that left the impression that he was suggesting he had not said this, but he used the words "if he maintained a slovenly establishment."

Mr. Gardiner: They do that now.

Mr. Drew: That could only mean an untidy establishment, an establishment not having the appearance or the tidiness approved by the dealer.

Mr. Rowe: The minister had better get a new broom.

Mr. Drew: If that is the kind of ground on which the protection that is supposed to be afforded to the dealer under this legislation can be avoided, then this legislation is certainly a fraud on the retailer as well as on the public.

Mr. Garson: Mr. Chairman, if I have left the impression which the leader of the opposition has just stated I would feel with him that the bill was an improper one. But I think he has misunderstood my remarks. At the present time the manufacturer may discontinue the arrangement he has with his dealers for a number of reasons. Amongst others, if he is manufacturing goods which have to be exposed for sale to advantage in a neat establishment, he may not want to continue selling to the retailer when he maintains a slovenly one. He may want to discontinue his arrangement with the retailer if the man becomes a poor credit risk and will not meet the manufacturer's bills, or he may have a variety of reasons. The present bill does not touch any of the existing reasons the manufacturer may have for discontinuing his arrangements with the retailer. The point I was making in the context of the remark my hon. friend has just quoted was that the only basis on which the manufacturer could be held to account under the proposed amendment is if he discontinues supplying the retailer with renewal goods because of the fact that the retailer has failed to maintain a price which the manufacturer has set. It is the same point that was raised just a few moments ago by the hon. member for York West; that is, if the manufacturer has some genuine reason outside the terms of the bill for wanting to discontinue his relationship with the retailer he is just as free to do so after the bill has been passed as he was before.

Mr. Drew: Some point does come where it is perfectly obvious that any further attempt to tie the minister down to an explanation of this measure which will be in any way understandable simply has to be abandoned. I am satisfied the record will demonstrate that hon. members are being called upon to adopt a measure which the minister has very clearly shown he does not understand himself, which he has shown beyond all doubt is most uncertain in its application, and which in fact he even tries to leave the impression may have very little effect at all. On the other hand, of course it will always be there as a warning to those he might find occasion to deal with.

To hear the minister at one point one would think this is a stern measure. To hear him at another point one would think this has no teeth in it at all. Recognizing the fact that every answer the minister has given has further confused the issue and demonstrated why this measure should not go through, I can only close by quoting these words from "Alice in Wonderland":

"When I use a word," Humpty Dumpty said, in rather a scornful tone, "it means just what I choose it to mean—neither more nor less."

You can almost hear the minister listening to questions across the floor, because in this case Humpty Dumpty was being questioned. I continue with the quotation:

"The question is," said Alice, "whether you can make words mean so many different things."

"The question is," said Humpty Dumpty, "which is to be master,—that's all."

And that is all that is in issue here. We heard before the statement: "If we want to get away with it, who is going to stop us?" At every stage the only real argument we have had is: If we want to get away with it, who is going to stop us? We recognize that we must bow to the weight of this majority.

Mr. Cannon: I would like to say a word for the record, because the leader of the opposition has referred to the record. I want to say the record will show that the Minister of Justice has answered with unfailing courtesy and patience all the questions, despite interruptions. If there is one thing for which we could reproach the minister it would be for having had too much courtesy for hon. members opposite. And when you talk about the minister not having given explanations, I say the minister has given every explanation asked for. I will say this to the opposition, that they have just pretended not to understand, in order to prolong this debate unnecessarily.

Mr. Wright: The minister replied to a question of the hon. member for Queens with respect to provincial marketing boards being exempted, so far as this particular legislation is concerned. Could he give us the section of the bill on which he bases that statement? I would like to have something definite about it, something more than the statement the minister made before.

Mr. Garson: I think everyone knows, and I am sure my hon. friend will realize, if he reflects upon it, that the provincial marketing boards never undertake to maintain any resale prices upon the products they sell.

Mr. Rowe: Yes, they do. What do they organize for, then?

Mr. Gardiner: They sell.

Mr. Wright: If a provincial marketing board in future were to attempt to maintain prices for their products, could they be prosecuted?

Mr. Garson: That would not follow, at all.

Mr. Rowe: Why would it not follow?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Would the minister say whether he got an opinion from the law officers of the crown on that question? Did he receive such an opinion?

Mr. Garson: I have already expressed my opinion upon my responsibility as a minister.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Did you get an opinion from the law officers?

Mr. Garson: I expressed it—

Mr. Diefenbaker: Did the minister say he had an opinion from the law officers of the crown?

Mr. Martin: He said he had done it on his own authority, which is the highest in the department.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is what I feared. Because I would be very much surprised if they gave my hon. friend any opinion along that line. There is no virtue created as a result of setting up a provincial corporation which places itself above a dominion law. I should have thought the minister would have received more authentic information on the law in this regard than to depend upon himself in a matter of such importance to the farmers of this country.

Mr. Wright: The Minister of National Health and Welfare has indicated that the Minister of Justice speaks with supreme authority, and that the Supreme Court of Canada must abide by what he says on the floor of the house. I do not think that is a fact. I would like to know what particular section of the act would apply if a provincial marketing board were prosecuted for maintaining prices. Would they find it within their jurisdiction to say that they were not guilty of an offence under this measure?

Mr. Adamson: Would not the flue-cured tobacco association, which maintains a marketing association, be subject to this bill? I understand they have a very close marketing association, and sell at an agreed price to the tobacco companies.

Mr. Rowe: Interprovincially, too.

Mr. Adamson: Would that not apply to their process of selling?

Mr. Garson: No.

Mr. Casselman: Does the minister say no?

Mr. Rowe: Would the minister tell us why? If, as the Minister of National Health and Welfare says, you are the supreme judge of the law, then surely you can tell us why?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Rowe: Surely the Minister of Justice can tell us, when he is the supreme authority. These co-operative associations sell interprovincially. Their operations are not confined within a province. If, as the Minister of Health and Welfare has said, you are the supreme authority in all these things, then we, the common people, would like to know about it.

Mr. Fair: Many of us have done a lot of work in setting up marketing organizations all over Canada. We should find out just what the authority of this legislation is.

Mr. Rowe: We want to know.

Mr. Fair: We do not want any of the marketing organizations to be destroyed by this or any other amendment. While I have supported this amendment, still I want to make sure it will not be detrimental to the interest of those organizations. I would ask the minister to give us the information asked for by the hon. member for Melfort.

Mr. Gardiner: Mr. Chairman, I do not think there are any farmers' co-operative organizations that set up resale prices. Farmers' co-operative organizations do sell their products to distributors, who sell the products at whatever prices they themselves decide. The co-operatives do not set a resale price. They may set a price at which they are going to sell to someone else, but they do not establish resale prices. Those boards which are set up in provinces are set up under provincial legislation. The boards which are required to carry on interprovincial activities are set up here, under federal law. I do not think that there is any way in which co-operative organizations, as at present set up, can be affected by this particular legislation. You have already had that opinion from the minister. I do not think there is any reason whatsoever for delaying the legislation further.

As a matter of fact I have had representations from many if not all of the farm co-operative organizations right across Canada asking us to get this legislation through, as rapidly as we can, and not do anything to delay it.

Mr. Rowe: That is more of an agricultural interpretation than a legal one.

Mr. Gardiner: Sometimes they are better than the legal opinions.

Mr. Wright: I am fully aware of the rules of certain farm organizations with respect to the resale of their products. If I am correctly informed, for instance, the seed corn producers in Ontario have an organization for the marketing of seed corn. They set the price at which the seed is to be sold by the dealers who sell the corn for them. If that is a fact, would they be contravening this particular amendment?

Mr. Gardiner: If they do that, they do it because the constitution provides that in such cases the province has the authority. There is no way in which they can be prosecuted for doing it.

Mr. Wright: This act overrides any provincial act, surely?

Mr. Gardiner: No; where the constitution gives authority to the province, it does not override it.

Mr. Wright: Does the Minister of Justice agree with that? Does the Minister of Justice agree with what the Minister of Agriculture has just said?

Mr. Drew: No.

Mr. Rowe: We have asked the Minister of Justice for a legal interpretation, but we have received only an agricultural interpretation from the Minister of Agriculture. As the hon. member has said, we have in Canada the seed corn producers from whom every spring I buy corn for my farm. Then we have the flue-cured tobacco people. It is more important for co-operatives than it is for any individual, because there are great numbers of these co-operatives. I think the co-operatives of this country have been of keen political concern to the government in connection with taxation and other issues. It is most important that we should know at this stage how this legislation will apply. There is no escaping the fact that they fix their retail prices and that they sell interprovincially and internationally flue-cured tobacco and high grade seed corn. If this is going to be applicable to the individual it will surely be applicable to the co-operatives. What about the pools? The same thing will apply there.

Mr. Gardiner: No.

Mr. Rowe: The minister may have some different idea because he has had a lot to do with them.

Mr. Casselman: Just withdraw the bill.

Mr. Garson: When this bill was first considered it was upon the basis that it would not be applicable to any of these marketing boards, and that in its administration it would not interfere with their operations. I think it will be found in the case of tobacco or seed corn or wheat or any of these products that they go into commercial channels and then lose their identities.

Mr. Rowe: Why do they lose their identities? What is in the bill to make them lose their identities?

Mr. Garson: Take a concrete case where resale price maintenance applies. If a manufacturer sells a hat to a retailer and attaches a resale price, that hat must be sold to the consumer at a certain price. However, tobacco would go to a manufacturer of tobacco products and would lose its identity when it was manufactured into cigarettes. I am quite certain that the people who sell tobacco do not dictate to the manufacturer the price at which he shall sell cigarettes.

Mr. Rowe: In other words, if you sell a suit with the hat, the hat would lose its identity.

Mr. Garson: I am just speaking about the products my hon. friend referred to. There is no way of preserving the identity of goods such as are sold by most of these boards.

The Chairman: Shall the section carry?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): If I may make a suggestion, I wonder if we could get this bill through tonight. It looks as though everyone is in good humour and perhaps we could continue a little after ten o'clock.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Drew: I have indicated already that in view of the fact that closure was applied earlier in the day and that we have now discussed this matter in committee for the length of time we have, we certainly do not intend to attempt further to unravel the double-talk we have heard. For that reason we are quite agreeable that this measure should proceed because we recognize that with the government having the majority it has and determined to deal with this matter as it has indicated, we have exhausted every possibility of obtaining a reconsideration of this measure by the government, except one which we shall deal with in a moment.

The Chairman: Shall section 1 carry?

Some hon. Members: On division.

Section agreed to on division.

On section 2—Evidence.

The Chairman: Shall the section carry?

Some hon. Members: On division.

Section agreed to on division.

The Chairman: Shall I report the bill?

Some hon. Members: On division.

Bill reported on division.

Mr. Garson moved the third reading of the bill.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, as I indicated before, it is obvious that there is no advantage in further debate on this measure and I propose to move that this bill be not now read a third time. I do with the utmost earnestness urge members of this house, and particularly members on the other side, to recognize that during the whole of this committee discussion the evidence has mounted that the government has not yet adequately considered this measure.

The explanations given by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) are most conflicting misinterpretations of the real effect of this bill. I hope hon. members will look over the record and see the number of occasions the minister has directly contradicted himself as to the effect and application of this measure. I do not intend to pursue this. I only repeat that at one time the minister has sought to convey the impression that the bill would harm no one, and at another time that it was a stern measure designed to deal with people who were injuring the Canadian consumer.

It has been double-talk from the time we went into committee, as it was double-talk prior to that time. There has been no explanation given by the minister as to why this measure would not apply to agricultural organizations which are marketing products on a large scale. There has been no attempt by the minister to explain why marketing organizations right across the country engaged in every stage of marketing and establishing prices which they believe will be to the advantage of the producer will not come under the blanket prohibitions of this bill. There has been no evidence whatever why simple safeguards for the person who is harming no one should not be included. No reason has been given why there should not be an exception in the bill to provide that its provisions will apply only where what is done is contrary to the public interest or has unduly raised prices, as is included in the Combines Investigation Act and in the section of the Criminal Code which deals with a similar subject.

With all these facts before us; with all the evidence that has accumulated that the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson), who presents this bill, is not able to indicate to us that it contains safeguards or in fact will be effective for the purpose for which it has been said it was designed, I am moving an amendment as no mere delaying device but as a means of placing before the house the suggestion that the dignity of parliament be preserved by refusing to pass this measure into the law of the land now with so little evidence before us as to what its real effect will be. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton):

That Bill No. 36 be not now read a third time, but that it be read a third time this day six months hence.

The house divided on the amendment (Mr. Drew) which was negatived on the following division:

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed that the bill do pass and that the title be as on the order paper?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: On division.

Mr. Sinnott: Speaking for the record, may I say that there were only twenty-six Tories present.

Mr. Casselman: That is a bigger percentage than you have.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull) moved the adjournment of the house.

He said: Now that we have disposed of this bill which seemed to be a little bit contentious, we could take up something where there would be less contention. That would be the resolution in the name of the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson), under government notices of motions. The second item we would wish to proceed with would be the resolution of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner); and if the house agreed we would proceed with the various stages of the bill. I understand that my colleague, the Minister of Agriculture, has consulted the members of the various parties and that this measure is not contentious. Then we would take Bill No. 26, to amend the Public Works Act. That measure was contentious some time ago. It was discussed one afternoon. I think I would be wise in moving an amendment to that bill.

Mr. Fleming: I think you would.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I think we will all agree in no time on that bill.

Mr. Graydon: Page the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson).

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Then we should like to proceed with Bill No. 15, to provide for privileges and immunities in respect of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. The other measures I do not think—

Mr. Casselman: Oh, withdraw them.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): We probably would not withdraw them but would wait until the next session. That was suggested. Perhaps it would be possible to complete our work sometime tomorrow and perhaps prorogue during the evening, but we would have to have some procedures completed before that hour. If people are in as good humour as they are right now, I think we could succeed in doing that.

Mr. Casselman: Monday, anyway.

Mr. Drew: Just before you rise, Mr. Speaker, I would point out that there are a number of questions on the order paper, and it is possible that an inquiry in the morning might produce the information that these questions can be answered. I would suggest that in any cases where the answers are now ready, they be made available tomorrow.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): That is agreeable, Mr. Speaker.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 10.30 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

POSTAL SERVICE

PRIVILEGE, MR. DREW—DELAY IN MAIL DELIVERY

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege affecting both the privileges and the responsibilities of the members of this house. It is something which I think should be raised today, in view of the fact that we have reason I think to expect that we are within some measurable distance of the termination of this session.

This morning I received a postal package addressed to me at the House of Commons, and very clearly addressed and very properly packaged, which was postmarked "Vancouver, December 17." I recognize, and perhaps it will be understood by hon. members that I have as much reason as anyone in this house to recognize, the immensely heavy responsibilities of the postal department at this time of the year. I cannot however recall any Christmas or any time when there have been so many complaints from every part of the country in regard to the delay in the delivery of mail. This is something that affects the business of this house, that affects the business of this country. It has wide ramifications. I will simply give one personal experience which illustrates what happens in cases of this kind. I wrote a letter to a friend who was critically ill in a Toronto hospital. He died five days later. The letter had not been delivered and it was therefore returned to me. That merely serves to underline the possibilities that arise, from both the personal and the business point of view, where delays of that kind occur.

I can understand delays of one, two and three days perhaps, just because of the immense accumulation of mail; but surely between here and Toronto and here and Montreal it is not consistent with the place that the postal services have come to occupy in our whole economic and social structure that within these short distances there should be delays of a whole week and more in the delivery of letters. And most certainly no congestion can explain the delay of twelve days in the delivery of first-class mail or packaged mail from Vancouver to here.

I recognize—and as I say, I have reason to recognize perhaps as much as anyone here, next to the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and the members of the cabinet—what the real accumulation of mail is at this time of year, but I do think that with all this heavy pressure the Postmaster General (Mr. Rinfret) should assure us that, in the light of the experience of this year, adequate steps will be taken to ensure that next year, or on any intervening occasion when there is heavy pressure on the mail services, adequate provisions will be made for delivery within a reasonable time in relation to the circumstances.

I point out that not only may personal messages and very important personal communications be delayed, with very unhappy consequences in certain cases, but also that the business of this house is related to the delivery of the mail and that important business organizations all over this country depend upon some reasonable promptness of delivery. I am sure that none of this delay is the responsibility of the men themselves who deliver the mail. There is no more loyal and hard-working organization in this country. I am satisfied, however, that something has happened to affect the whole organization, because delays of this kind have become too frequent, not only in these recent weeks but for months past. This calls for some reassurance to the house.

Mr. Bradette: This is good!

Hon. Edouard Rinfret (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, the leader of the opposition did not give me notice of his intention of raising this question. He did not bring to my attention the reference he has made to the mail he received.

Mr. Drew: I only received it half an hour ago.

Mr. Rinfret: But I wish to point out to the house that in all our advertising we gave notice to the public that we could not accept in the mail any first-class mail for delivery in time for Christmas if it was put in the mail after December 17.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I do not want to interrupt, but I insist that the record be correct. This was not put in the mail after December 17. It was put in the mail in sufficient time to bear the Vancouver postmark of December 17.

Mr. Rinfret: I must reiterate my statement as to the advertising that was put in the papers. When we put that advertising in the papers we did not anticipate that there would be the large flow of mail that there has been this year—much more, in fact, than in any previous year. Nor did we anticipate that there would be the worst series of snowstorms we have had in many decades. All the delivery systems and distribution systems in all cities have been disrupted. We have tried in all ways imaginable to make deliveries, and made as many as four or five deliveries on the day before Christmas so that all things would arrive in time for Christmas.

Then, we employed more than 25,000 additional helpers for sorting and for letter carrying duties. And, sir, I do not think there is anything possible we could have done more than we have done.

Mr. Pouliot: At last, Mr. Speaker, I agree entirely with the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) and with the Postmaster General (Mr. Rinfret), too. I thank the leader of the opposition because he has supplied the government with the strongest possible argument for the construction of a new government building at the earliest possible date at Riviere du Loup.

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT

PRIVILEGE, MR. GARSON—CORRECTION OF STATEMENTS IN DEBATE ON PRICE FIXING

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. I should like to say that I referred in the house on Thursday last and again yesterday to a complaint under section 498A of the Criminal Code. I made this reference for the purpose of illustrating the use to which the section could be put, and the facts I gave were from my recollection of an informal conversation with the commissioner of the Combines Investigation Act in which he gave me general information about pending cases. Speaking from my recollection of this conversation, I indicated that the matter had been closed on the basis of no offence having been established. Since the house rose last night I checked with the commissioner and found that I was incorrect in stating that the case is closed. The complaint is still under investigation, and I wish to correct the record in that respect. I do not think I should say more since the case is still under inquiry.

And then, while I am on my feet, I think I should make reference to the fact that in response to a question by the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) I stated that the case to which I have just referred was the only case in which section 498A of the Criminal Code had been invoked. However, the commissioner sent to my office a note indicating that in the recent glass prosecution in Ontario a charge under section 498A was referred to the grand jury, and that although the grand jury brought in a true bill and the parties pleaded guilty to the main charge under section 498, the grand jury did not think that the evidence submitted to it warranted their bringing in a bill on the charge under section 498A.

DETAILS OF VISIT TO CANADA IN JANUARY

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that government notices of motion come before the orders of the day will be called, and that on one of those government notices of motion there may be considerable debate, perhaps I might be permitted at this time to refer to the forthcoming visit to Canada of the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom.

I have been in communication with Mr. Churchill from time to time about his proposed visit to Canada and the United States, and the dates were finally settled only late yesterday. They have already been announced in London. I hope that the further information that has come over the radio about the terrible storms along the coasts of England, and the delay occasioned to the Queen Mary will not require a change in the schedule that had been arranged for Mr. Churchill's visit. I might say there has been no information so far of any change being required.

As I indicated some time ago, Mr. Churchill did not wish to make more than one major speech while in Canada. It was suggested some time ago that the speech should be made at a state dinner in Ottawa, and should be broadcast. Mr. Churchill has accepted that suggestion.

The date which has now been fixed is Monday, January 14, and it is the intention of the government to have invitations sent to all members of both houses of parliament, including of course the lady members, although the dinner would otherwise be a dinner for men only, since Mr. Churchill is not being accompanied by Mrs. Churchill on this occasion.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Speaker: Before proceeding with government notices of motion, does the house wish me to call the order for questions?

Mr. Drew: Yes, I think they should be called.

Mr. Speaker: Then, with the consent of the house, I shall do so.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Agreed.

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

EROSION ON LAKE ERIE

Mr. Coyle:

1. Has any investigation been made into methods and means of preventing erosion on lake Erie by reason of the decay of the east pier at Port Bruce, Ontario?
2. If not, will the government give consideration to taking steps designed to stop the effects of erosion and to remove the cause?

NEWFOUNDLAND

R.C.A.F. TRANSPORT ON SPECIAL FLIGHT FROM ST. JOHN'S TO GANDER

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the leader of the opposition asked me yesterday if any further information had been obtained about a certain flight of an R.C.A.F. plane from St. John's, Newfoundland, to Gander in November last. I told him I understood that the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Lapointe), acting as Minister of National Defence at that time, had prepared a note which I had seen at the time. I said I would endeavour to secure it and communicate it to the house. It is in the following form:

In replying to the question asked by the leader of the opposition, regarding R.C.A.F. transport provided to assist the Newfoundland government, the Prime Minister on November 26 undertook to obtain further information which I am now in a position to give. As outlined by the Prime Minister, it is the general policy to be of service to provincial governments in instances of urgency and need where other means of transport are not available, but, in cases which would not normally fall under the heading of search and rescue operations, the provincial government concerned is normally asked to reimburse national defence out-of-pocket expenses incurred.

When this matter was brought to my attention on Thursday evening,—

That would be Thursday, November 22.

—it was not possible to communicate by telephone with either Premier Smallwood or the R.C.A.F. officer in command at St. John's. After reviewing the circumstances of the request and taking into consideration the assurances of the premier of Newfoundland that no civilian transport could be obtained, that this flight was urgent and that the flight involved transportation of a government official—not a politician—I felt that it might not be fair to throw upon a subordinate air force officer the responsibility for making what was essentially a ministerial decision, and I authorized the flight to be made on the basis of reimbursement in the usual manner of our out-of-pocket expenses.

Had it been possible to speak to the premier of Newfoundland, I would have ascertained precisely what the exact purpose of the flight was before making a decision.

I have since been advised the only passenger was one employee of the government who went to Gander and that no passenger arranged for by the Newfoundland government returned in the plane.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I recognize the difficulty with which the Prime Minister would be confronted in dealing with a matter of that kind and of necessity accepting the explanation that was given, but in view of the event that was anticipated a few days later in Newfoundland I do suggest that further examination will indicate that this was a rescue operation of a kind not ordinarily included in the term "search and rescue operation".

TRADE

STRATEGIC CHEMICALS—REPORTED SHIPMENTS TO HUNGARY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I should like to answer a question which was asked yesterday by the leader of the opposition with regard to the alleged shipment of strategic chemicals to Hungary. The question was as follows:

I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) or to whoever can speak for him in this matter. There has been an extensive discussion in the press of the charge made by the commerce department of the United States that the Continental Pharma Company of Montreal has been secretly exporting strategic chemicals to communist Hungary. I should like to ask what information the government can give us about this matter and what steps have been taken, from the point of view of the Canadian government, to deal with this situation.

In answer may I say that officials of the Department of Trade and Commerce have been in close touch with officials of the office of international trade of the United States department of commerce for some time in connection with this matter. The grounds for the proceedings by the United States authorities against A. E. Ratner Chemical Company of New York, Continental Pharma Company of Montreal, and the Continental Pharma Company of Brussels, involved one shipment of aluminum oxide, abrasive grade. This shipment was made direct from the United States to Belgium in May, 1949, and it is reported that it was forwarded from Belgium to Hungary.

The Royal Canadian Mounted Police examined the books of the Continental Pharma Company in Montreal in May, 1950, and from the evidence available there apparently was no infraction of the Canadian export control regulations involved in this shipment of aluminum oxide from the United States to Hungary. Since that time the export operations of this company have been closely scrutinized by the Department of Trade and Commerce and we have every reason to believe that there has been no infraction of Canadian export control regulations.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, in relation to the answer that has been given, may I suggest that since these matters are largely the subject of regulation this would appear to be an appropriate time to make the suggestion that it would be in keeping with the thoughts of the people of Canada that steps be taken to prevent the delivery of any kind of strategic materials to those beyond the iron curtain. This type of trade is peculiarly repugnant to our people at this time and if we err in any way, it should be to err on the side of stopping all trade with communist-dominated countries which can in any way support their economy, let alone build up their defensive power.

Mr. McIlraith: I want to say that the regulations do not permit the export of strategic materials to iron curtain countries. I think that should be pointed out. It should be remembered that this phase of the legislation was discussed at some length when the export and import bill was before the house. I think it should also be recalled to the attention of the house that this alleged offence was not a shipment from Canada, but concerned a shipment of material from the United States. In addition it should also be pointed out that the offence was alleged to have occurred in May, 1949, and was investigated in early 1950. The operations of the company concerned have been under very close scrutiny ever since and there is no reason to suspect any breach of our regulations. There has been a great deal of care exercised.

Mr. Drew: I think it is of sufficient importance, without debating the matter, to point out that no matter how any company may conform with our own regulations I am satisfied that the people of Canada feel sufficiently strongly about doing anything directly or indirectly which might assist our only possible enemies, that no device which may conform with our export laws but which results in the ultimate delivery to countries beyond the iron curtain should be permitted. When it is discovered I think every appropriate step possible should be taken to make sure that our regulations prevent indirect as well as direct delivery of substances of this kind.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I think the house as a whole would wish to be assured that the government is in full sympathy with the thoughts expressed by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) with respect to possible procurement from Canadian sources of strategic materials by countries behind the iron curtain. It is something which is perhaps difficult to deal with but the government wishes to have all its officials do everything possible to make it as sure as can be that no strategic materials from Canadian sources can be obtained by countries behind the iron curtain, whether there be apparent compliance with the regulations or not. If we find that by apparent compliance with the regulations there are still loopholes, we want to plug those loopholes because we feel, as does the leader of the opposition, that the people of Canada do not want strategic materials from Canadian sources to become available to countries behind the iron curtain.

[Later]:

Mr. Drew: On a question of privilege, I wish to refer to a word that I used in relation to the export of strategic materials. I recognized as I sat down that it might convey an impression that certainly is not in my mind. I said that we would not wish to have any arrangement whereby, directly or indirectly, strategic supplies or any supplies could go to the countries beyond the iron curtain that would build up their economic or defensive powers. I naturally did not use the word "defensive" in the sense of building up defensive strength because the reason that we are so concerned as Canadians about any strategic materials going there is that we recognize it is not for the purpose of building up defence but for building up their aggressive power. I wished to make that correction so that the word "aggressive" may be used instead of a word that has perhaps come to be used rather loosely as relating to military preparations.

MING SUNG INDUSTRIAL COMPANY

USE OF CANADIAN FLAG

On the orders of the day:

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Since this may be the last opportunity during the present year, may I ask the Prime Minister if he can state to the house what the present situation is and what steps the government has taken in regard to the Ming Sung company.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Perhaps the Minister of Finance might inform the house as to what is the position with respect to the Ming Sung company.

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I think the Prime Minister gave the house some information on this question when I was in Europe two or three weeks ago. So far as I am aware there has been no change in the situation. The local agents of the department in Hong Kong were instructed to institute legal proceedings to arrest the ships. The ships however have remained in Canton on the assertion of the owners that the crews refused to sail them under these circumstances. The owners of the ships were informed that in view of the attitude which had been taken the ships could no longer be permitted to operate under the Canadian flag. The matter stands there. We are unable to arrest them in Canton. So far as our information goes, they have not moved from Canton in the meantime. The question of Canadian registry is linked with the validity of the mortgages. There are some legal questions involved there, and I do not know that I would care to elaborate on those this morning without further informing myself as to what the situation is.

Mr. Drew: May I point out that the legal aspect of this matter rests upon a very frail foundation while these ships are in the harbour of Canton. I would suggest it is perfectly obvious that any recognition of a legal obligation will be one which will be enforced by other authorities than our own under these circumstances. I think the dignity of Canada, as well as respect for the Canadian flag, both demand that an order in council be passed immediately rescinding the special order in council which gave them the unusual right to fly the Canadian flag although there were no Canadians manning these ships.

Mr. Graydon: We should not have been in this in the first place.

OLD AGE SECURITY

RETROACTIVE PAYMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. K. Fraser (Peterborough West): Mr. Speaker, will the Minister of National Health and Welfare answer the question I asked him yesterday?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Yesterday my hon. friend asked me: If an application for old age pension is sent in on or before January 1, 1952, but the applicant has not been able to secure proof of age before the end of January or February, will the old age pension date back to January, 1952? The answer is yes. My reason for giving that affirmative reply is based on the act itself. The reason I did not make the reply yesterday was that the section of the act which gives this authority is purely permissive in effect, and as I had anticipated tabling today the regulations pursuant to the Old Age Security Act I preferred to wait until they were tabled. I can now add that pursuant to those regulations, where applicants have difficulty in establishing their age and delay results therefrom, this will be regarded as a delay arising out of circumstances beyond the control of the applicant, and payment in such cases where the application form has been received in December will be made retroactive to January 1.

CHINA

CANADIAN MISSIONARIES—POLICY AS TO REPATRIATION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): With your permission, Mr. Speaker, I should like to answer the question asked by the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Browne) on Thursday last dealing with the number of Canadian missionaries still remaining in China and whether the government had any special policy with regard to their repatriation.

The records of the Department of External Affairs show that the total number of Canadians in China is 201, and of these 162 are missionaries and their dependents. On a number of occasions toward the end of the civil war in China, and after the communists achieved power, the Canadian government notified all Canadian citizens in China known to the Canadian representatives that in view of the situation in that country they should leave as soon as possible. Many of them have done so, as the figures I have just given would indicate. Others have not been able to or, from the highest motives of service to the Chinese people themselves, have not desired to.

The established policy of the Canadian government is to repatriate, if necessary at public expense, any Canadians in distress abroad. With regard to those Canadian citizens who are still in China, the Canadian government takes as generous as possible a view administratively as to what constitutes destitution or distress among missionaries in China. In such cases the government is always ready, upon request by a church order or society, to do everything it can to assist the repatriation from China of any of its missionary members. On receipt of this assistance, the order or society is asked to give the usual undertaking for repayment.

It is becoming increasingly clear that Canadian missionaries and others have been subjected and are still exposed to mistreatment and injustice by the authorities of the Chinese communist government. There are no grounds which justify these actions which, indeed, violate all standards of decent international conduct. The government, and especially the Department of External Affairs, have received both privately and publicly a good deal of advice as to what should be done to stop this persecution and to protect Canadian citizens. The difficulties in the way of action which is likely to be effective in this regard are obvious, especially when we do not recognize the communist government of China and must, therefore, request the diplomatic good offices of other states. But I can assure the house that we are doing everything we possibly can to discharge our responsibilities in this matter. I would add, however, that if we tried to intervene along lines which have, with the best of intentions, been advocated by some, we would not help the unfortunate Canadians concerned but might well increase their difficulties and, indeed, add to their dangers.

FISHERIES

STORMS IN NOVA SCOTIA—DAMAGE TO FISHERMEN'S EQUIPMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. A. M. Kirk (Digby-Yarmouth): In view of the change in our procedure, are we going to be permitted to ask oral questions now? If so, I should like to direct one to the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Fisheries.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the wish of the house that oral questions should be asked now?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Kirk (Digby-Yarmouth): I should like to ask the parliamentary assistant to the minister two brief questions based on my question to him of a week ago Friday. Is the Department of Fisheries carrying on an investigation to ascertain the loss suffered by the lobster fishermen of southwestern Nova Scotia owing to severe storms in the last week? If such an investigation is being carried on, has he as yet any figures to indicate the extent of the loss?

Mr. J. Watson MacNaught (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Fisheries): I thank the hon. member for giving me notice of his question. The Department of Fisheries, as it does in all cases where the welfare of fishermen is involved, is carrying out an investigation concerning the amount of damage done by the storm in Nova Scotia. Preliminary reports have been received concerning the amount of damage but not sufficient information has come to hand on which could be based any actual estimate of the amount of damage done.

[Mr. Pearson.]

LABOUR CONDITIONS

UNEMPLOYMENT IN THE TEXTILE INDUSTRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. G. Blair (Lanark): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. Is the minister ready to make a statement on the measures to be taken by the government to relieve the unemployment situation in the Canadian textile industry? This matter is urgent.

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Labour): I think my hon. friend perhaps refers to that phase of unemployment to which he called our attention the other day. I know that he attended a meeting in that connection within the last few days. When he spoke to me the other day I told him that just before Christmas, with officials of the various departments of government concerned, I met a delegation on the matter. Since that time I have taken their representations up with the ministers concerned and the matter is receiving consideration.

IMPORTATION OF REFRIGERATORS—LAY-OFFS IN CANADIAN PLANTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. W. Hodgson (Victoria, Ont.): I should like to direct a question to the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Trade and Commerce, in view of the fact that I have received a communication from a labour group in my riding indicating that the work days had been cut from four to three days per week. On December 21 I asked a question about refrigerator freezer units and it was claimed that last year less than 500 refrigerators came from the United States whereas this year the number is 98,000. Has the government done anything to stop this dumping?

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Trade and Commerce): I believe there is no evidence of dumping at all in so far as refrigerators are concerned. The departmental officials have checked into the whole question of refrigerators, their production and sale in this country. I recognize it is not appropriate to debate the subject or deal with it fully now, but I feel I should place on the record the fact that in the early part of this year there was a rate of production on refrigerators that was very much beyond any reasonable expectation of consumption in Canada for this year. A considerable amount of the difficulty of that industry is due to that factor. As to dumping, I am not aware of any dumping within the meaning of the act.

Mr. Hodgson: In reference to dumping, may I say one word—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order. May I interject for a moment to say that today I have allowed wider latitude than the wide latitude I have allowed regularly, since this may be the last day of the session. I do not like to stop an hon. member at this time, but may I ask all hon. members to endeavour to abide by the rules with respect to the asking of questions.

Mr. Hodgson: I refer to this question of dumping because the Minister of Trade and Commerce referred to it as dumping when he answered the question on December 21.

ARMY CLOTHING—PLACING OF ORDERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Defence Production): Mr. Speaker, I should like to reply to a question asked yesterday on the orders of the day by the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Blair), which was as follows:

Is it true that the Canadian government has placed orders for army clothing in Britain, United States or France?

The answer is that no army clothing has been purchased in Britain, the United States or France with the exception of 75,000 pairs of socks of United States pattern and 50,000 pairs of cotton field trousers purchased in the United States last April and May to outfit Canadian troops training in the United States and proceeding to Korea. There was also an order for 2,590 kilts, involving seven different tartans, which were purchased in Scotland by the Department of Defence Production.

However, textiles have been imported when not available in Canada, but this has been done only after consultation with the industry. Wherever possible the material has been purchased in the greige, to be finished in Canada.

INQUIRY FOR RETURN

MARSHLANDS—EXPENDITURES UNDER RECLAMATION PROGRAM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. P. C. Black (Cumberland): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Agriculture about some questions I submitted on November 2 with respect to certain expenses in connection with marshlands reclamation. This is not by way of criticism of those who have the matter in hand; it is for the purpose of getting information for a great many people who want it. The questions were made an order for return and I have never received it. My questions were submitted on November 2.

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the only reason why the return has not been brought down yet is that we would have to send down to the maritimes for some information and probably it has not come back yet. As soon as I get the information, I shall see that the hon. member gets it, whether the return is down or not.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): I wish to thank the minister for his courtesy.

[Later]:

Mr. Robert McCubbin (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, if you will permit me to revert to motions I should like to lay on the table parliamentary return No. 25, moved for by Mr. Black (Cumberland); subject: What was the total expenditure under the marshland reclamation program, by projects?

Mr. Black (Cumberland): I am very pleased to get that return, but I should like to have a copy of it, if I may, as the mover of the motion.

Mr. McCubbin: We will try to get one for the hon. member.

POULTRY

NEWCASTLE DISEASE IN NOVA SCOTIA—USE OF VACCINE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. P. C. Black (Cumberland): I should like to ask the Minister of Agriculture if the vaccine used in Nova Scotia as a preventive against the possibility of Newcastle disease in poultry had the opposite effect and actually infected the hatcheries with this serious disease with the result that the birds vaccinated actually died by the thousand, and the disease was spread where there was none before, and is now a menace in whole communities. Are the owners to be fully reimbursed for the birds destroyed? Are the owners of hatcheries and others to be reimbursed for the loss of business?

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, we have legislation under which payments are made when farmers lose livestock because of the ravages of certain diseases. Under that legislation payments are made when the poultry has been destroyed as a result of the ravages of Newcastle disease among poultry. There has been some discussion with regard to the vaccine which has been used for the purpose of combating the disease. That question came first from the province of British Columbia. We have had considerable discussion with persons involved there. Since the outbreak in the maritimes we have been having some similar experience, but the matter of dealing with it has not gone sufficiently far yet for me to say definitely what the final decisions will be in connection with it. Much of the effort which is being made to combat the disease is of necessity experimental and there may be occasions upon which there is some responsibility involved; but so far none has been established. At the moment we are simply making the investigation and in due course the whole matter can be dealt with and announced.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): Mr. Speaker, I understand the outbreak in the maritimes is due to faulty vaccine, not to an ordinary outbreak of the disease.

Mr. Gardiner: No, Mr. Speaker, that is scarcely correct. We would not have been doing anything at all in the maritimes with regard to the disease had there not been an outbreak. The outbreak was there before we were operating at all in the province. There is some question, with regard to certain flocks, as to whether there might have been an outbreak in those flocks had not certain things been done; but that matter has not been cleared up yet.

UNITED NATIONS

ELECTIONS TO SECURITY COUNCIL—VOTE IN ASSEMBLY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): I wish to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. How did Canada vote in the United Nations assembly on December 20 in the contest between Greece and Byelorussia for election to the United Nations security council?

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): The vote in these elections in the United Nations is by secret ballot; and I do not think it would accomplish any purpose at this moment if I declared how we voted on this occasion.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Speaker, I know this matter is not debatable, but while the vote is secret in the United Nations assembly I do not see any reason why secrecy should be observed in this House of Commons with regard to a matter which I think is of no little interest to hon. members.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

PAYMENT OF STENOGRAPHERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. L. E. Cardiff (Huron North): I should like to address a question to the Minister of Finance. Owing to the fact that some members of the stenographers' staff find themselves short of cash, and because of the possibility that the house may close tonight, will they be expected to report for duty on Monday, and if not, when can they expect their cheques?

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance): I am afraid that is a matter that falls under the jurisdiction of Mr. Speaker, and not under the jurisdiction of the Minister of Finance. The house vote is there. It is available for the employees of the house in the normal way. I am sure that the office downstairs, including the treasury officer there, will do its utmost to see that not only the members of parliament but the members of the staff receive all that they should receive before the end of the current year.

AUDIBILITY OF DEBATE—SOUND-AMPLIFICATION SYSTEM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Public Works. Does he contemplate doing anything further with regard to the installation of amplifiers or a public address system in this chamber before the house meets next time?

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I wish I could give that assurance to my hon. friend; but in order to sign this contract there have to be two parties, namely the contracting party which does the work and the Department of Public Works. To date we have not reached an agreement. I will tell my officials to do their best to proceed with haste, as they always do.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, it is impossible not to recognize the fact that if there is one minister who can give an unsatisfactory explanation in a satisfactory manner, it is the Minister of Public Works. But I would point out that this subject has been under discussion for many years, and that while it has been under discussion here the House of Commons at Westminster has been rebuilt, that a system of loud speakers has been installed there which is entirely satisfactory, and that in a country which is not usually regarded to live at a tempo equal to that at which we live in our own country, they seem to have done quite a number of things prior even to the installation of the equipment, and then to have been able to put equipment into operation to the complete satisfaction of the members of parliament and everyone who visits Westminster.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): As the leader of the opposition often does, he has spoken with sense this morning. I am not alone in this matter. Had I been alone, I would have installed that system four years ago.

Mr. Drew: Where are you being restrained?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): It was necessary to get the agreement of 262 members as to what system we would instal.

An hon. Member: It was given last year.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Mr. Speaker went to Britain and to Rome. A former Speaker went to Havana and to Spain or some other country.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

An hon. Member: What about Peru?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): They both came back with their personal ideas. Then we had a committee of the house sitting with Mr. Speaker, and that committee decided that we should instal here a system similar to that in Britain.

Mr. Coldwell: That is right.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I suppose that the Tannoy company of Britain have patents on their equipment. We have to deal directly with them. I cannot see any other firm in Canada that actually has a similar system.

Mr. Fleming: Speak up, please.

Some hon. Members: Louder.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Being in the hands of the company which could instal that system, we have to come to some agreement, and we have not come to that agreement. I have outlined what we thought we would do for the House of Commons, namely have this company instal this system, maintain it in a state of repair and operate it, and then we would sign a lease with this company for some years and give it a trial. We have not reached that stage, but you may rest assured that after I have taken a few days' rest during New Year's time I will personally attend to this matter.

Mr. Coldwell: Do I understand that a firm offer has been made by the Minister of Public Works to the British company—

An hon. Member: No.

Mr. Coldwell: —that you will be prepared to enter into an agreement of this description provided satisfactory financial arrangements could be made?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): If my memory serves me correctly we tabled correspondence with the company at the request of the hon. member and in that correspondence we were discussing the way we could proceed with the installation of this system. We will in the future have this system installed.

REQUEST FOR DATE OF NEXT SESSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. I am sure it would be of great assistance to hon. members in making their future plans if they could know approximately when the government expect us to come back in session. Has the Prime Minister anything to say about that matter at this time?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, but I cannot make any forecast at this time as to the date when parliament will reconvene for another session. We shall have to dispose of this one first. As suggested by the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier), there are quite a number of matters that have not been attended to because of the pressure upon the cabinet of sessional business. They will have to be dealt with between the sessions, and I hope they can be dealt with both expeditiously and efficiently.

Mr. Graydon: I hope we will not have to wait until the loud speakers are installed.

REQUEST FOR ENGLISH "HANSARD" INDEX

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Jean François Pouliot (Temiscouata): Referring to a recent tribute by the member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) to the persons who prepared the English index of Hansard for the first session of 1950 and the first session of 1951 as well as this session, is it true that the three indexes will be ready and available to the members one week after prorogation?

Mr. Speaker: It is not the custom of Mr. Speaker to answer questions from the floor of the house. All I can say at this time is that the matter is receiving the careful attention of the officials of the house, and I am informed progress is being made. I shall be pleased to give the hon. member for Temiscouata any further information which I have on this matter if he will be kind enough to see me in my chamber.

Mr. Pouliot: Thank you, but the progress is not to that extent, if my understanding is correct.

FEED GRAIN

PRICE OF BARLEY FEED

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon): I should like to direct a question to the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Why is the western livestock producer being asked to pay $1.35½ per bushel for barley feed when the total payment received by the western barley producer for the 1951 crop was $1.10¾? Is this price of $1.35½ per bushel asked by the wheat board uniform right across Canada?

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Trade and Commerce): I have had no notice of that question. It is obviously one that cannot be answered offhand. There are several allegations of fact in the question, and I must assume the statements made are true, but I should like the opportunity of checking before giving any answer.

NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY

APPROVAL OF PROTOCOL FOR ACCESSION OF GREECE AND TURKEY

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs) moved:

That it is expedient that the houses of parliament do approve the protocol to the North Atlantic treaty on the accession of Greece and Turkey, signed by Canada at London on October 17, 1951, and that this house do approve the same.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the resolution which you have just read, and which I have the honour to recommend to the house, transfers our discussion from the domestic to the international field, and from the interesting if somewhat contentious questions of resale price maintenance to the equally interesting, but I think possibly less contentious, subject of the membership of Greece and Turkey in the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. Before dealing with that specific matter, it might be desirable if I made a short statement, not on the general international situation but on the work of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization itself, because that will I believe assist the members in understanding the importance and indeed the meaning of this resolution.

Hon. members will know, of course, that the council of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization met a month or so ago in Rome. It was, I believe, the eighth meeting of the council. Some very important questions indeed faced the council at that meeting. Some of these questions had been postponed from the meeting which was held in Ottawa, and some of them were new questions. The main problems which faced us in Rome were as follows: First, we examined, though in no official sense because that work was not completed, the work of the temporary council committee appointed by the council at its Ottawa meeting. This committee had the responsibility of attempting to match the requirements for defence and the resources of the separate members of the council which could be devoted to that defence, having regard to their political and economic capabilities.

This work of the T.C.C. under the chairmanship of Mr. Harriman, known as the burden-sharing exercise, was not completed; indeed it had not been nearly completed when we met at Rome, and we were not able to deal with it at that time. Since our meeting in Rome, however, the executive committee of this committee of twelve, also popularly known as the three wise men, have made a report on the matter to the full committee.

The committee of twelve met in Paris the other day to consider that report, and will meet again in Paris on January 15 to give further and final consideration to it. The subject will then be referred to the next meeting of the North Atlantic council, which will be held sometime in February, in Lisbon, Portugal. I do not think it would be desirable for me to say anything more at this time about that report, because it has not yet been finally submitted to governments, and no final decision has been taken on it yet by these governments.

Another very important question which faced us in Rome, and will face us again in Lisbon, is the association of Germany with western European and Atlantic defence. It is a matter of vital concern to the defence of peace in western Europe; but one that bristles with difficulties which, I suppose, are better appreciated on the continent of Europe than they are on the continent of North America. This association is now being discussed by the European countries concerned, and it is hoped that it can be brought about by the creation of a European defence force, which would itself be part of General Eisenhower's integrated force for the defence of western Europe under the Atlantic council. Progress is being made in the creation of this European defence force, and we hope that the council at its next meeting will be able to take important and far-reaching decisions regarding it.

Another question which is related to the one I have just mentioned, and which concerns our North Atlantic council, is the progress being made in the replacement of the German occupation statute by a peace contract with the government of the federal republic of Germany. Progress has also been made in this matter, but I think it is obvious to hon. members that a decision must be reached in regard to it before we can reach a final decision in regard to the association of western Germany with western European defence. These two subjects are interrelated; indeed, they hang together. These are complicated problems, and we should not I think get too impatient if final decisions are not reached in regard to them at once.

Another question which faced us at Rome, Mr. Speaker, was that of command in the north Atlantic and indeed command in the Mediterranean. We also discussed at Rome the question of the re-organization of the North Atlantic organization. It is becoming in a sense a rather unwieldy international agency. It has grown quickly. It has grown, as things sometimes do which grow quickly, without that kind of arrangement and planning which we would have desired, and which we would have achieved if we had had more time. So we are giving consideration in the North Atlantic organization now to the streamlining, the making more effective of the whole organization. Also—and this will be of very considerable interest I know to some hon. members—we received at our North Atlantic council meeting a report from the committee of five on non-military co-operation. That was in the nature of an interim report, and not meant to be anything else. Because it is an interim report I do not think I need say much more about it at this time, Mr. Speaker. We are continuing our work on this committee of five, and we will have something more to say about it at the next meeting in Portugal.

Then finally at Rome—and this was not a problem; it was a privilege—we welcomed to our deliberations, not as full members, because the protocol that we are considering today has not been accepted, but as observers for the first time, the representatives of Greece and Turkey. The hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) asked me a few moments ago how we had voted in the security council of the United Nations in the contest between Greece and Byelorussia for election to the United Nations security council. We have not in the past declared publicly how we vote in these matters and, as I said a few moments ago, no useful purpose would be served if I made a public declaration now; but I will assure him and the house that we welcomed very much the membership of Greece in the security council of the United Nations, just as we welcomed the representatives of Greece and Turkey to our North Atlantic council meeting in Rome as observers.

These big questions which I have mentioned and which are vital for peace and security in Europe were not decided at Rome. The Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs of the United Kingdom said not long ago that the Rome meeting was in a sense an intermediate meeting between the Ottawa meeting and the next meeting in Portugal. But it has become increasingly clear that we cannot postpone decisions on these matters indefinitely and we are expecting decisions to be taken at the next meeting.

Mr. Graydon: They cannot all be intermediate meetings.

Mr. Pearson: I read not long ago in the New York Times an article by one of its European correspondents, Mr. Sulzberger, which very well summarizes I think the Rome meeting and the problems that faced us in the North Atlantic organization subsequent to that meeting. Mr. Sulzberger wrote at that time:

> NATO undoubtedly became aware at this Rome meeting that its development is at a very critical stage. However, the ministers proved that they could debate one another's views in what is becoming a small and select parliament—

I may say in parentheses, it was not so small at Rome. One of our difficulties in the North Atlantic council is the number of people who now attend the meetings. We had between 300 and 400 at one of the meetings in Rome, and it is very difficult to conduct intimate informal discussions with that number of people in the room. Mr. Sulzberger goes on:

> —and still remain friends and allies. They also recognized that there is value in the habit of getting together.

And that value is emphasized more and more the oftener we meet together. He went on:

> The organization must surely have recognized that it is now in the period where it will suffer its greatest growing pains. Looking back, it can recognize the considerable achievement of the past year, in which an army with its allied headquarters has been consolidated in Europe. But looking forward, it is becoming increasingly aware of long, difficult and expensive years looming ahead for an indefinite time.
> The price of liberty is rather high and every one of the twelve nations (plus Greek and Turkish observers) was surely even more aware of that truism when the Rome meeting was over. This awareness is a necessity as the pact develops toward that condition of strength which, it is hoped, will finally permit the negotiation of a more real peace than exists today.

As one further step toward that goal of the negotiation of a real peace, we are today discussing a protocol which provides for membership in our North Atlantic Treaty Organization of Greece and Turkey. I said something about this matter in the house on October 22, and I do not wish to repeat what I said then. Hon. members will recall that at our North Atlantic council meeting in Ottawa in September it was decided unanimously to take the steps which would be necessary to invite Greece and Turkey to full membership in the organization. And the protocol which we have before us, and which I think has been in the hands of hon. members for some weeks, is the result of that decision taken in Ottawa.

What faces us now, before that protocol can be made effective, and before an invitation can be given to the countries in question, is its ratification. That, following a well-established constitutional practice, should receive parliamentary approval before the government acts. It is parliamentary approval we are requesting today in the resolution before the house.

This question of the membership of Greece and Turkey in our North Atlantic Treaty Organization is the result of long and careful consideration. There were various ways by which these two countries could be associated with the defence of western Europe, and with the defence of the Mediterranean and North Atlantic states. We examined these various ways before we decided on the solution of full membership. If we took some time in examining the alternative methods, it was not because we did not appreciate the importance of associating Turkey and Greece with our efforts in the North Atlantic organization.

These are two countries, Mr. Speaker, one of which has already been the victim of communist aggression, and the other of which in recent years has had to face threats of communist aggression. They have already indicated their devotion to peace, and their determination to protect their freedom.

They are two countries which in Korea have also proven their devotion to the idea of collective security. They have proven it by the heroic action of their men on the battlefields there. If we considered this question at some length it was also not because we did not realize the importance of safeguarding and strengthening the south flank of the North Atlantic area or because we did not realize the importance of the contribution Turkey and Greece could make to that end.

It was thought at one stage that possibly the result which we all desired could be achieved by some kind of reinforcement of the bilateral defence arrangements which these two countries already had with the United States and certain other countries, and which by the overlapping membership of those arrangements with the membership in the North Atlantic council could achieve the purpose we had in mind.

It was also thought at one stage that possibly this purpose might be achieved by building up a separate Middle East or Mediterranean pact which would be closely associated with the North Atlantic pact, again through overlapping membership and possibly military planning.

After careful consideration it was decided that the best solution of this problem was not those which I have indicated, but rather an invitation to these countries to become full members in the North Atlantic council, and signatories to the North Atlantic pact.

That was the position taken from the beginning by the United States and by the United Kingdom. It was the position taken by the governments of Greece and Turkey themselves, who felt that full membership was the best solution to this problem, from their point of view. It was the position taken by the North Atlantic military advisers. It was felt also that, even if it had been desirable, probably it would take too long to work out a Mediterranean or Middle Eastern or Near Eastern pact which, indeed, if we tried to do it, would involve problems of inclusion and exclusion which would not be settled easily, at least at this stage.

As a result of this consideration we agreed unanimously to draw up a protocol, which, if it were ratified by all the governments of the North Atlantic organization, would invite those two countries to accede to our pact.

The effect of the protocol is not to extend the nature of our obligations under the North Atlantic treaty. Those remain as they were. It does, of course, extend the area of obligations, the area in which we specify and reaffirm and indeed organize to carry out the general commitments which we have already undertaken as signatories to the United Nations charter.

While I admit that this protocol, if it comes into effect, extends the area of our international obligations, I think that an examination of this question must convince hon. members that that extension is more theoretical than real. If, for instance, a full-out aggressive attack took place on these countries, such aggression would immediately involve other countries, under their arrangement with these countries; and that, in turn, would involve the North Atlantic countries—and, indeed, it would be world war III.

Now, the step which we are recommending removes any uncertainty on this score. And uncertainty, as history proves, can sometimes in these matters be the greatest danger to peace. It strengthens peace by removing this uncertainty and by adding the defensive strength of these countries to our North Atlantic defensive alliance. It strengthens the deterrent value of NATO; and thereby, it makes for that peace, which is the only objective of the North Atlantic organization.

There is nothing provocative in this protocol, nor would there be anything provocative in the membership of Greece and Turkey in our defensive organization. It constitutes a threat to no one, except the aggressor. By removing, as I have indicated, the temptation to aggression in that area, an aggression which undoubtedly would spread all over western Europe, and therefore spread all over the world, it strengthens security everywhere.

That, Mr. Speaker, is why the government recommends this protocol to the House of Commons at this time.

Mr. Graydon: Before the minister takes his seat may I ask him a question. I believe it could be done better now than during the course of my remarks. Would he mind explaining to the house the significance of article II, which seems to be somewhat difficult to understand, and may present difficulty to those who read it for the first time.

Mr. Pearson: I should be glad to try to do it now. Article II, which I shall put on the record, and explain as I go along, reads as follows:

If the republic of Turkey becomes a party to the North Atlantic treaty, article 6 of the treaty shall, as from the date of the deposit by the government of the republic of Turkey of its instrument of accession with the government of the United States of America, be modified to read as follows:

And this would be the new article 6 on the accession of Turkey.

For the purpose of article 5, an armed attack on one or more of the parties is deemed to include an armed attack—

(i) on the territory of any of the parties in Europe or North America, on the Algerian departments of France, on the territory of Turkey or on the islands under the jurisdiction of any of the parties in the North Atlantic area north of the Tropic of Cancer.

The reason why Turkey is mentioned specifically, while Greece is not, is that Greece is a European country and will be covered by the words "territory of any of the parties in Europe." As most of the territory of Turkey is not in Europe, Turkey had to be mentioned specifically. The second part of this article II of the protocol reads, and I shall repeat the governing phrase:

For the purpose of article 5, an armed attack on one or more of the parties is deemed to include an armed attack—

(ii) on the forces, vessels or aircraft of any of the parties, when in or over these territories or any other area in Europe in which occupation forces of any of the parties were stationed on the date when the treaty entered into force or the Mediterranean sea or the North Atlantic area north of the Tropic of Cancer.

The change in that paragraph is to be found in the words "or any other area in Europe in which occupation forces of any of the parties were stationed on the date when the treaty entered into force." While that has no strict reference to the accession of Greece and Turkey it was included to take into consideration the possibility of the present occupation statute in western Germany being replaced by a peace treaty or a peace contract. If that took place and this change had not been made in the North Atlantic treaty the obligation to come to the help of forces of the member powers in western Germany would not exist because the treaty as we have it now applies only to occupation forces in western Germany. After the peace treaty or peace contract with western Germany they would not be occupation forces and so the words are used as they appear in this article II of the protocol.

Mr. Gordon Graydon (Peel): Mr. Speaker, first of all I should like to thank the minister for making clear the terms of that section of the protocol to which I referred a few moments ago. Speaking on behalf of the official opposition I think I should first of all indicate to the house that our party approves of the protocol to the North Atlantic treaty on the accession of Greece and Turkey. That having been said, there are some observations I should like to make this morning with respect to the matters with which this protocol deals.

I was interested in the remarks of the minister a few moments ago when he indicated that the meeting at Rome, which was held not so many weeks ago, was, in his own words, or in the words of someone else whom he quoted, an intermediate meeting between Ottawa and Lisbon. When the discussions were being held in Ottawa they were loosely referred to as being intermediate between the last meeting and the meeting to be held in Rome. We are now pushing our frontiers a little further along and Rome seems to be intermediate between Ottawa and Lisbon. I hope Lisbon will not turn out to be intermediate between Rome and another conference.

I think the peoples of the North Atlantic community deserve to have something concrete laid before their parliaments without much further delay because there is a great deal of conflict and confusion in the minds of the public as to where we are going in connection with the North Atlantic organization.

I think we have gone as far as we dare go in collaborating with the other nations of the North Atlantic community, without making certain that Canadian public opinion is along with us in what is certainly regarded by everyone as being a great and important objective, that is the preservation of peace itself. I hope that when the minister is closing this debate he will take the opportunity to reply to certain inquiries which I propose to make during my participation in the discussion in order that we may have a more comprehensive picture of where we stand in connection with the North Atlantic Treaty Organization.

Of course it would be idle to suggest that everything has been sweet and lovely so far as the deliberations of the North Atlantic council up to the present time are concerned. The meeting in Ottawa brought out some important facts. Perhaps it may be said that that meeting democratized the institution to some extent. It certainly brought into the council of the organization some of the smaller powers which up to that time had not felt that their voices had been heard in the same way as those of some of the larger powers.

There was one thing that struck me in connection with the meeting at Ottawa, and I speak only as an outside observer who was here while the meetings were in progress. I refer to the desire of certain European nations not to have their economies affected too greatly by NATO obligations with respect to military matters in the hope that they may be able to keep up their present social security programs in order to keep the threat of communism from penetrating from within while they are preparing to halt it from without before it commits any act of aggression. There I suppose rests one of the principal problems which NATO has to deal with.

Up to the present time there have been many committees working on what is required, but I think the great problem will be to find out how far each nation is prepared to go in carrying its share of the burden which it considers necessary in order that peace shall be preserved. When the minister goes to Lisbon I hope that, so far as Canada is concerned, he will take with him some concrete plans to be meshed in with those of other members of NATO so that we shall come out of Lisbon with something that is real and not merely visionary and imaginary.

If we do not come out of Lisbon with something that is worth while in the opinion of the public of this and other countries I am afraid we may have a lessening of enthusiasm and support which normally would be given to the NATO organization.

As one who from the beginning has been a strong advocate and supporter of NATO, I think we should make sure that this country is a supporter of NATO not only in words but in carrying out its commitments to the extent to which we should go in the interests of peace.

[Mr. Graydon.]

As the minister has said, two more countries are being taken into the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. I could not agree more with what the minister said a few moments ago when he pointed out the necessity of removing the last vestige of uncertainty in connection with crucial and delicate areas in various parts of the world. I am satisfied that uncertainty, wavering and hesitancy are an open invitation to trouble in many of these areas. I am satisfied that if prior to the crossing of the 38th parallel in June of 1950 there had been no hesitancy and uncertainty on the part of the United Nations then those who control the red armies, whether they are North Korean, Chinese or Russian, would not have proceeded to cross the 38th parallel at all. Having that very definitely in mind, it seems to me that the risk which some people think is involved in our acceptance of the membership of Turkey and Greece in the North Atlantic community is much less than they would have us think. While people say there are two tender spots so far as the Russian mind is concerned, the Dardanelles, the sea of Marmora and the Bosphorus, and at the Elbe in Germany, nevertheless let us not forget that something similar was said when Norway came into the organization. People said that Norway was taking a very long chance. The Norwegians interested in the preservation of peace were perhaps taking a long chance, particularly when a country so exposed to the Soviet flank joined such an organization even for defensive purposes, as it was understood it was to be.

But strangely enough, if my information is correct, the Soviet sent about the same kind of note to the Norwegians objecting to their entry into the organization as they have sent to the Turks and the Greeks. I think that indicates that after all if the Soviets are prepared to move they are not going to move just because we have made it certain that if they do so in a certain troubled spot and attack one nation all the others in the same organization will take appropriate action to stop that aggression. Having learned some of the lessons of two world wars, I think we ought to apply them now, and I am one of those who believe strongly that we should not allow a fog of uncertainty to settle over the Aegean sea or the sea of Marmora at this time. It is a strategic point because of the fact that the Soviets today are following the policy of trying to move towards warm water ports. Such a policy characterized the regimes of the old czars of yesterday. In all the Soviet moves outside the communist movement itself where it has been a question of Russia as a nation as opposed to other parts of the globe, there has been a strange similarity between the foreign policy of the old czaristic regime and the present foreign policy of the Soviet.

Through all the years one of the great plans which the Russians of yesterday had in their minds was to find an open warm water port for their commerce and shipping to the south of their land and into the Mediterranean. That has not changed. I believe we are taking today a step that is not provocative, a step which does not involve so great a risk, and one which I think will help rather than hinder the cause of peace in that area. When we talk of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization I think we have an obligation to the people of Canada whom we expect to support it to the limit once parliament has taken certain courses of action concerning it. I remember saying, when I came back from San Francisco, that I believed it was important that we should have the people solidly behind whatever we are doing in external affairs to the fullest possible extent because, as I said then and repeat now, in my opinion you cannot have a just, lasting and permanent peace unless it be in every form and fashion a people's peace.

I want to repeat those words again on this resolution because the minister spoke a few moments ago of it as being only a question of an extension of area. The extension of the area is pretty important. It is much more than just a detail to be considered along with the extension of the principle itself. For that reason Canadians must not enter into the additional commitments with their eyes shut. They must know the complications and implications involved because it is a serious business no matter how we may look at it. It means that we are at war if even the easterly province of Turkey is invaded. In this sense the protocol creates for Canada the most far-flung obligations of a direct nature that she has had in her entire diplomatic history. I am not saying, because it is the most far-flung diplomatic commitment in our history, that we should in any way be afraid to risk it. I have already said we are in favour of it, but I think it raises problems which the people of Canada must understand, and as a result of understanding will give just that much more basic support in the years that lie ahead.

It raises more problems than simply those on the military front. If I may say so, it raises problems on the political and economic front. I believe the house should be told by the minister at this time what are the full implications on the political and economic fronts as well as the military front as the result of the admission of these two Middle Eastern powers. I think we should be made thoroughly aware of all the ramifications of the international step we are taking. It is much better that we should know now than to learn it some time later. We are prepared to enter into this arrangement, so let us do so with our eyes open and with a full evaluation and appraisal of the advantages and disadvantages, if any, which may be inherent therein.

In dealing with the question of Greece and Turkey I should like to echo some of the things that the minister very properly put on the record. I think it has always been a matter of great pride to the Canadian people to see the way in which Greece and Turkey stand up to those who would interfere with their freedom. We in Canada are a long way from the troubled spots, although perhaps closer in these days than we sometimes think; but nevertheless in relative geographic mileage we are quite a way from these troubled spots. It is sometimes a little easier for the man a long way from the scene to throw out his chest, be very courageous and say what he is going to do. It is not as easy for the man who is right beside the danger. When one considers that Turkey and Greece are right next to the danger zone, right at the front line if you like, I think one can say that they show us a sterling example of the bravery of their people and the determination of these nations to see to it that the bastions of freedom are not in any way interfered with unduly by any aggressor, whoever he may be.

We have every reason to welcome both Greece and Turkey into the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. I suppose that part of the importance of Greece, geographically, lies in its location at the Mediterranean end of the Vardar valley which runs right into the Danube basin and into the very heart of communist east Europe. This country was exhausted as few countries were in world war II; she was exhausted to the point where, had it not been for the determination, the grit and the courage of her people, she would have gone under; a lesser people would never have survived and Greece today would have been in the orbit in which are several smaller nations which are now enjoying that questionable constitutional phase of development which can best be known to the Soviets themselves.

In accepting both of these countries, I think it is important to say that they are not liabilities, no matter how you look at it. We are not agreeing to the accession of Greece and Turkey only for the purpose of protecting them. In return for the agreement that we are making we are getting a substantial contribution to the North Atlantic Treaty Organization itself. From the military point of view, Turkey has an army whose estimated strength in 1951 was about 500,000 soldiers; Greece had not quite so many. Nevertheless, both countries are in a position, with the support of the great nations, to be able to say that they are not coming in as poor relations. They are coming in on an equal footing and are making a contribution that I think will be of inestimable value to the North Atlantic Treaty Organization as a whole. That is the way I like to see nations come in with us. I like to see them come in on an equal footing, on a proper partnership basis; because only then may we be able truly to assess the kind of contribution we all may make.

There will be Canadians, of course, who will naturally look upon this accession of Greece and Turkey in the Middle East as coming somewhat strangely after what has happened in the past in certain connections in that area. The Canadian memory is a long one. It is not so long ago that this government declined to send to a Middle East location, at a commonwealth defence conference there, any full-fledged delegates from this country; and that was a conference dealing with problems in that area that NATO now will be dealing with. It is true that the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) said that we were sending an observer. We are not asking Greece and Turkey to come in as observers; we are not going into NATO as observers. We are going in meaning business as a country. It seems to me that many people will perhaps lift their eyebrows over the fact that not so many months ago we were only prepared to send an observer, so little was our interest, seemingly, in Middle Eastern problems. Now, of course, we are going into it on a full-fledged basis. That is no argument against our going in on a full-fledged basis, but I point out that there is an inconsistency there that a sensitive Canadian public, so far as our commonwealth is concerned, will not fail to discern as this program goes forward.

Mr. Pouliot: Will my hon. friend permit a question?

Mr. Graydon: Yes.

Mr. Pouliot: By full-fledged membership, he means active membership, does he?

Mr. Graydon: In NATO, yes. I think everybody will realize that our membership in NATO is an active membership; and I hope that it will become more active as the days go by.

In that same area there was and is today a problem with respect to the Egyptian matter as well. I can recall that the government took some little time in the house before they were prepared to make a statement on that Middle Eastern problem in support of Britain which was at the time extremely hard pressed. I want to point those things out to the government only to indicate to them that in matters relating to Middle Eastern problems or to any other problems throughout the world, where a matter concerns us—whether it be Britain or whether it be some other country—I think that we as a nation deserve to take a forthright stand. That is one of the reasons why I am so glad that this stand has been taken at this time in connection with our NATO organization in the accession of these two important nations.

I have no intention of going further in connection with that matter, except to ask the minister one question which he will perhaps take occasion to reply to when he rises to close the debate. Now that we have established in this matter a somewhat new principle may I ask the minister this? It is, in a sense, a new principle, because prior to this time we were only in a North Atlantic community; now we have extended the principle, if you like, to another community, geographically speaking. Having done that, may I ask the minister whether the North Atlantic Treaty Organization council has in mind the taking into membership any other countries than Greece and Turkey? If so, what are those countries? Also, if I may ask the minister this, what will be the policy which will guide the council in the admission of additional nations from time to time? Perhaps he would also indicate to us whether this is the beginning of a world-wide alliance with respect to the lines between the slave and the free world.

I also want to point out to you, Mr. Speaker, and to the house, that when the minister was speaking about the various economic and military ramifications of our commitments to the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, he did not get down to anything that looked to me like even a hint of a cold fact anywhere. It may be that he will say to me: Of course we are going to discuss all these things at Lisbon. What I say, Mr. Speaker, is that we should be discussing in Canada some of the things that we are going to do as well as discussing them at Rome, Lisbon or London. I do not think that any harm will come to this country's representations and its conference activities in other lines if we have a full and frank discussion on the floor of this parliament as to what Canada's policy is going to be in connection with the North Atlantic Treaty Organization.

There are a number of vital questions which I think the minister ought to answer before this debate draws to a close, because the signing of international protocols and agreements is one thing, but following them up with decisive and effective action is another. I must say that I was disappointed —in fact I could go much further than that and say I was extremely disappointed, as I know many people were—to read in the newspapers of December 12 last that Canada was one of eight North Atlantic Treaty Organization members which seemed to have been weighed in the balance and found wanting so far as carrying out our commitments was concerned. I think that news, sufficiently widespread in its dissemination, must have been a very poor advertisement for Canada in other countries throughout the world. I believe the minister ought to clear up that point before we close this debate this afternoon. I, for one, did not like to see this country entering into obligations unless it was prepared to carry them out, both in the spirit and in the letter.

I believe there is nothing worse than a country that talks big and does not act as big as it talks. I am not suggesting we are in that position, but I do suggest we might perhaps get into that position if we were to follow along the lines suggested in the newspapers of that date. Immediately after that news came out, that we were asked to boost our contribution from 5 per cent to 10 per cent, if I recall correctly, there were a number of other nations who were in the same position. There were Norway, Denmark, and Italy, to name three that come to my mind. Those three nations did something at once to increase their contribution in order that the execution of their commitments might parallel the commitments themselves. I feel that at this time we ought to have an answer to that question from the minister.

In addition to that there are several questions of which I wish the minister would make a note, and so that we shall save the time of the house I shall not elaborate upon them. Our position would become quite clear if these questions were answered. One of them is, how many months is this organization behind schedule now? There has been a good deal of talk that NATO is behind schedule by something like a year in what it was originally set up to do. We ought to know if it is behind schedule, and if it is how far it is behind and what the chances are for picking up the slack. We ought to know if it is true that the arms output of some of the NATO members is down almost to a trickle because of a shortage of money, material and equipment. We ought to know what steps are being taken to prevent the possible break-down of NATO plans for defence, and what progress NATO is making in fitting in political and economic plans with the integrated military pattern. I should like to ask the minister if any beginning has been made with respect to the proposal I made in a speech earlier this session in connection with the setting up of a national development and production board for the purpose of trying to assess and appraise what we had in this country to back up our commitments to NATO and for our own national economic expansion. I should like to know whether or not further consideration has been given to that plan, because I have felt it is something that deserves consideration.

I should like also to ask the minister, in view of the fact that there have been reports of our commitments not having been met, to indicate whether or not that is correct. If it is correct to any extent, will he say what position the government is taking with respect to picking up that slack in the near future as well? I shall try to complete what I have to say before one o'clock, but I should like to ask the minister to comment upon an article—no doubt he has it in his files, too—with respect to the other than military aid which this country may be asked for at Lisbon, or perhaps has been asked to furnish. As the minister knows, there is a line of demarcation between the military and non-military aid. I believe it was the Financial Post that referred to the fact that we might be asked to send wheat and some other products to these countries. Will he state whether or not this kind of mutual aid, which apparently is being incorporated into the NATO structure itself, carries the judgment of the government and whether they intend to deal with it before the meeting at Lisbon? May I just ask the minister one more question? In any of the commitments which the government may be contemplating, what share of Canadian agricultural or industrial products is likely to be earmarked in such a program for the United Kingdom? Is this to form a part of the discussion between Prime Minister Churchill and the government in January of next year? I think we ought to have from the minister, if he can give it at this time, all the concrete proposals the government has in mind presenting to the Lisbon meeting in February designed to increase the tempo of the NATO plans.

I should like to close my remarks by saying that in the accession by protocol of Greece and Turkey I believe we are taking one more step in that great and comprehensive plan for peace. There were those behind the iron curtain who said, when NATO was set up, that it meant war instead of peace. Subsequent events have not borne that out. In my opinion the North Atlantic Treaty Organization has had a stabilizing effect upon Europe and upon the peace of the world. It is for that reason that this party, this parliament and this government, anxious as we all are to preserve and promote the interests of peace in every shape and form, are prepared to take this further step, in the hope that we shall further promote the cause of peace and see that casualty lists on a global scale have been published for the last time and that the dogs of war shall never be unleashed again.

Mr. Coldwell: May I call it one o'clock?

At one o'clock the house took recess.

The house resumed at 2.30 p.m.

TRIPARTITE FISHERIES CONFERENCE

TABLING OF RESOLUTIONS AND REQUEST OF FINAL SESSION

Mr. J. Watson MacNaught (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Fisheries): I beg leave to lay on the table of the house resolutions and request of the final session of the tripartite fisheries conference held in Tokyo, Japan, December, 1951.

NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY

APPROVAL OF PROTOCOL FOR ACCESSION OF GREECE AND TURKEY

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Pearson:

That it is expedient that the houses of parliament do approve the protocol to the North Atlantic treaty on the accession of Greece and Turkey, signed by Canada at London on October 17, 1951, and that this house do approve the same.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, today we are discussing a very important matter, and I sometimes think that the house is not nearly as interested in international affairs as it might be. During the past few days we have had a fairly full house discussing a matter of great domestic importance and interest, and I noticed this morning that after the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) had spoken the house pretty well emptied, and when the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) began to speak shortly afterwards I made a count and there were only 22 members in the house. That I think is a great pity, because after all international affairs are very important not only to our own country but to the countries associated with us, and indeed to the world generally. Canada's position in regard to these matters is one I know that is watched very carefully by a number of other countries, and particularly perhaps by those who are sometimes described as—I do not know now accurately—the middle and smaller powers. However, today we are discussing a matter of some importance, as I have said, both to Canada and to the world, namely, the extension of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization to include both Greece and Turkey. This, it seems to me, extends the association to an extent which cannot properly be considered to be a part of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. I understand the reasons why this has been done, and the necessity that the nations that have co-operated together in the North Atlantic Treaty Organization considered made it, as they have said, essential; but at the same time I think we should understand more clearly that what we are doing today is making an extension of this treaty beyond what many of us contemplated when the North Atlantic Treaty Organization was set up and when we gave it our support.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs this morning gave a very interesting review of the events that transpired at Rome, the discussions that took place there, as far as he was able to review them. May I say, Mr. Speaker, that the less secrecy we have in connection with these matters—at least as far as the members of the House of Commons are concerned—the better it is for all of us and for the world.

I was sorry this morning when the Secretary of State for External Affairs said that he did not think he should tell the house how Canada voted recently in connection with the appointment of one of the elected members to the security council. After all, these matters may involve us in difficulties, and indeed perchance in war, and the members of this House of Commons will be called upon to make a decision, so I think that we should be kept well informed of all that transpires and of all the attitudes of the government in relation to these matters, because I say to those of us who are in the house now, and to our successors, that should grave situations arise in the future, hon. members may be called upon to make decisions that may have far-reaching effects on the history of our own country, the welfare of our own people and of the world.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): It is not a trade secret.

Mr. Coldwell: No. Of course, as the hon. member for Greenwood says, it is not a trade secret, because after all the newspapers have told us that Canada voted one way and then voted another way. If that is not true, the minister might inform us as to what inaccuracies there are in these reports. In any event, newspapers seem to give us information that we should get from the government and from the minister. At least, then it would be authoritative, and we should not be misinformed in any particular.

This morning the minister also went into the matter of including in the North Atlantic alliance, or perhaps it would be more accurate to say, bringing into association with the members of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, Germany, and the necessity perhaps of some German rearmament. I think that all of us are very anxious indeed that whatever is done shall not in any way establish again militarism in Germany. We have had two world wars, both of which were at least started militarily; and whatever the background of the first and second ones may be, whatever arguments there may have been about the beginnings of these hostilities, nonetheless the first hostile moves were made by Germany. I can quite understand why it is that France, Belgium and other countries in western Europe are fearful lest we once again promote German militarism and bring into being a German military staff. Consequently I think we should hesitate in approving plans for the integration of German forces into the European army, or in association with the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, until we know precisely what is to be done and how the objective is to be achieved.

We should pay attention to the internal situation in Germany itself, because after all the political situation in Germany is pretty fluid, and while Dr. Adenauer is now in charge of German policy and the government, an election may change the picture and we might have Dr. Kurt Schumacher in power, which does not seem at all unlikely, a man who has stood against communism and fascism all during his years, but who is not at all sold on the idea that there should be a German army until he is assured that if and when an aggression is committed, if war should follow, the defence will be made on the river Vistula or on the Niemen; in other words, in the east of Germany and not on the western side when Berlin and other parts of Germany would be subjected to new devastation. I think we have to watch that carefully.

Then, there is something to be said with regard to our own contribution, militarily. I must say that I regret this debate is being held today at a time when the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Pearkes) is about to leave Europe for Canada. I wish he were here, because, if newspaper reports are correct, the views he expressed are very different indeed from the views which I understood the official opposition to express, and different, as I thought, from those I had heard General Pearkes himself express in the house from time to time.

I should like to place this newspaper article on record. The dispatch is dated December 22, from the Canadian Press bureau in Paris, and states:

> Major General G. R. Pearkes, V.C., Canadian delegate to the United Nations, said today the Canadian government policy of sending infantry troops to Europe is "unwarranted."

And the word is in quotation marks.

> The 63-year-old Victoria Cross winner who acts as military spokesman for the Progressive Conservatives in the Canadian House of Commons said in an interview he believes it would be better to send technicians instead of fighting men.
> Pearkes, who has travelled in various parts of western Europe for two months, said he found that Canada's 27th brigade is composed of fine Canadians and is well-housed and well-treated.
>
> "But I do not believe that the money which is being spent by Canadian taxpayers is getting anything like the return in defence assistance to the North Atlantic treaty organization that the Canadian people have a right to expect."
>
> Canada, by sending men, was exporting her most valuable asset. He implied they were being wasted by being sent to countries where manpower was the least of problems.
> "I feel that the Canadian government had not fully informed itself or the Canadian people as to actual conditions in Europe before sending the 27th brigade and committing Canada to a long-term policy which to my mind is unwarranted and extremely expensive."

That is a statement made by one for whom, I may say, I have always had and have today the very greatest respect. I know the record of the hon. member during the first war when he was awarded the Victoria Cross, and also during the second war when for a time he was in command of the forces which were subsequently engaged in the Dieppe raid. And, so far as information regarding his views on the raid is concerned, those are views he must be left to express himself. As I say, however, I have the greatest respect for the hon. member and his views on military matters.

I think there is something in what he has said. I am sure other people in this country share my view that while we have a North Atlantic treaty, in the light of the present world situation we have emphasized far too much the military contribution, and have overlooked the economic contribution to which we are committed by article II.

I noted the other day that in the British House of Commons, when the matter was under discussion, Mr. Churchill made the astounding statement—astounding to many o us—when, in referring to Mr. Aneurin Bevan, he said that the hon. member was right, with wrong reasons, for the attitude he took prior to the election in regard to British re-armament.

It seems to me we have been too interested in promoting rearmament without realizing that we must reinforce anything we do in that field with sound economic aid to our allies. To a degree, the same applies to our own country. We know perfectly well that the inflation we are undergoing at the present time is due to the tremendous amount of money we are spending on armaments. We must beware lest in doing this we undermine not only our economy but the support of the people for the defence project to which we are committed.

I wish to say immediately that I am not suggesting for one moment that we do not need to be properly armed for the defence of western democracy. What I am saying is that we must beware, lest in supporting re-armament under NATO we overlook some other factors which are at least equally important.

Hence I say once again that I hope our government—and from what I have been able to read from time to time I think the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) has said this over and over again—realizes that we must do all we can to make article II of the treaty effective, and to give all the economic aid within our power.

I hope that what the minister says publicly to our people in Canada he drives home in confidential meetings that take place in Rome—or, in the next month, in Lisbon—and elsewhere. I am sure that if we are going to meet the threat of communism and totalitarianism all across the world, the final decision will not be made on the field of battle. I believe the fact that we are stronger today militarily has eased the tension. But that tension may be renewed at any time. The great thing we have always to remember is that totalitarian communism can be met only by removing the causes that give an opportunity for communism to grow and to make headway in the world.

The emphasis for a while on guns, tanks, planes, armies, navies and air forces may have been essential; but I do think we should look carefully into those other important factors that in the long run will mean either success or failure of world communist propaganda.

I have just been reading a most interesting book by Mr. Justice Douglas of the Supreme Court of the United States. This book, "Strange Lands and Friendly People", it is called, contains a most interesting story of his travels in the Near and Middle East during the last two summers. It is a most revealing story, and one which I think holds a great lesson for us at the present time.

It may be true that collective security may be strengthened through this protocol; but on the other hand we are undertaking obligations in that protocol—and obligations in a part of the world where, after all, an explosive situation does today exist. This I suggest can be seen from recent events in Egypt and elsewhere.

The extensions of the obligations, as the minister said, are of course territorial rather than military or political. But they are extensions in an area which, to say the least, is explosive. And of course this is quite a reversal of the pre-war policy when we had no commitments whatsoever and parliament was said to be able to decide on what should be done when a situation arose.

The probability is that while many of us were inclined to support that policy prior to the second world war, that aggression and war brought home to us the necessity of the freedom-loving nations standing together after the war in order to prevent aggression wherever it might occur or threaten again in the future. I believe that more and more we have to associate with progressive elements wherever we can find them and with progressive countries wherever they may be established.

I just want to say in passing in connection with the part of the world involved in this protocol, Turkey and Greece, that in them and in the area adjacent to these countries are many millions of people living in squalor, in poverty, in misery and in want, particularly those in the Arab world. That is what makes this whole area explosive and revolutionary. There is the determination on the part of many peasants and ordinary depressed peoples in these countries to throw off the yoke of what they have looked upon, whether rightly or wrongly, as their imperialist oppressors. They want to govern themselves and raise their own standards of living.

As I say, I think we should associate ourselves with any elements in those countries which are promoting democratic methods and better standards of life and give them all the support we can. There is one small country in this area which has demonstrated that great progress can be made by democratic and progressive methods. Of course a new state of Israel comes immediately to mind. Anyone who has followed what has been happening in Israel must be amazed at the tremendous progress which has been made in that country and how it has become an example to the adjacent countries of Lebanon, Syria, Transjordan, Egypt and other eastern countries. If we are going to associate ourselves with any country in that area —I do not say that we can do this successfully at the present time because of Israel's internal conditions—we should endeavour to associate ourselves with the one democracy which has been established with our own parliamentary system, with Israel.

It is true that we perhaps alienated them, and I think that was done inadvisedly although it may be argued that it was necessary during the war to adopt the attitude that was adopted by the great powers. Nonetheless I say that every attempt should be made today to associate ourselves with Israel and to build up its strength economically and socially and in every other way so that we may have a real democratic friend in an area where heaven knows democracy needs a friend. In that area there are very few organizations that can be called democratic.

In that area, if we include India, there are at least a billion people living under conditions of squalor and misery. Eighty per cent of those people are peasants and one would think that peasants would have enough food. But having to deliver 40, 60 or 80 per cent of their produce to the land owners, in many areas they live in dire poverty. Unfortunately in the past we have been so largely associated with their oppressors. Now revolutionary movements are rising to end this age-old poverty, misery and want.

In my opinion it is in these areas, rather than in western Europe, that the fate of the world will be decided. Unfortunately the Soviet union, I think falsely, has managed to portray itself to the depressed peoples in Iran, Saudi Arabia, Iraq, Egypt, the Sudan and other countries in the East and Middle East as the nation which alone can bring them deliverance and prosperity. We know perfectly well that if the Soviet union were successful the peoples of those areas would simply be exchanging one group of reactionary rulers for another group of totalitarian dictators.

Consequently I say to the minister that in all these discussions that are taking place, whether in the United Nations or in the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, Canada should emphasize more and more the necessity for economic aid not only to countries with whom we are associated now but to those living under depressed conditions which may make them susceptible to communist propaganda.

While we accept this protocol, while we are aware of the dangers inherent in the extension of the North Atlantic treaty, while territorially we are enlarging our commitments, we realize that this is a most important matter for the parliament and the people of Canada. But again I say we are not going to win this world-wide struggle for the minds of men by considering almost exclusively the manufacture of armaments and the sending of military supplies overseas. More and more, victory will lie in the hands of the group which can offer to the depressed masses of the world wherever they exist—yes, even in our own country—the prospect of better standards of life and freedom of association, freedom of thought, freedom of religion and all those freedoms which they might otherwise exchange for the mirage of better economic conditions, which indeed they would be more apt to exchange for a totalitarian dictatorship, and which would only lead the world into greater catastrophies than it has ever known.

I do not want to prolong the discussion, but I did want to say what I have said. I wanted to emphasize the economic side of this matter as it concerns Greece, Turkey and the backward countries of the world. We should not be thinking almost exclusively in terms of armies overseas, in terms of sending overseas great quantities of guns and military supplies. After all, we in Canada perhaps can best use our resources, both human and material, by supplying the world with the means to improve standards of life wherever they can be improved and in that way assist most to win the battle for democracy and freedom.

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, this is a most important event, the approval of the protocol for the accession of Greece and Turkey into the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. Being a matter of so much importance it seems too bad that it had to come up so close to the end of the session. Otherwise I am quite sure that this chamber would have been filled with interested members. I am sure that if many hon. members are not here today to hear the minister and take part in this discussion it is not due to their lack of interest in such an important matter. I think it is due more to the fact that this is the tail-end of a session which has been interrupted by a Christmas holiday and many members are not able to be here. Otherwise I am quite certain that we would have had a most interesting debate by an interested membership of this house.

I am quite sure too that most members must realize the importance of the obligation which Canada is taking upon herself now by approving this protocol. I assume that since there has been so great an approach to unanimity of opinion today it will be approved unanimously. I hope it will. I do not know of any debate in the history of my membership in the House of Commons in which hon. members have been so near unanimity of view. I find myself in thorough agreement with all that has been said today. I find no exception whatever, and I want the house to know that that is the way we feel.

I think that we fully realize the seriousness of the obligations that devolve upon Canadians as a consequence of extending the area of these obligations into a territory that is different in many respects, strategically, geographically, socially and in every other way from the North Atlantic area. We think we have weighed most carefully the risks involved in approving the accession of Greece and Turkey against the advantages. I must say that as far as I was able to weigh the risks and the advantages with the information I had at my disposal I had to cast my lot on the side of the advantages, and I want to say that we thoroughly approve of the protocol and hope that this afternoon or evening the house will give its unanimous approval to it.

All through history Greece and Turkey have demonstrated that they are lovers of liberty. There have been cases where they have had a chance to demonstrate that they are lovers of liberty, that they are determined to preserve their liberties and to help preserve liberty throughout the world. For many years both of them, with the exception of a few intervals, have been traditionally friends of the Anglo-American people. I think they are now friends of the Anglo-American people, and the fact that they have indicated their acceptance of the invitation to become full members of NATO indicates that they have a friendly feeling toward us. I imagine that at least one of them, Turkey, might have been influenced to some degree by the near alienation, if I may put it that way, of some of the good feeling that existed in the Arab world prior to about four years ago. I believe that in the main there is every indication that Turkey has not been too seriously influenced in that regard and that it has friendly feelings toward the western nations.

Both of these nations have demonstrated that they are prepared to do their part to carry out their responsibilities as members of the United Nations. I listened very attentively to what the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) had to say this morning. One thing struck me as very pertinent, and it is something upon which I have commented a good many times. There are too many nations that have accepted membership in the United Nations organization and are not prepared to measure up to the responsibilities that they have taken upon themselves. They have been long on talk and short on performance. I do not say that of Greece and Turkey. I think within the range of their competence and capacities they have discharged their responsibilities well.

When attending the United Nations assembly in 1947 and in 1950 I was struck by the seriousness with which the representatives of these countries took their duties, the way that they conducted themselves, and the attitude they had toward the obligations of membership in the United Nations. The very fact that they did not hesitate to do what they could in connection with the crisis in Korea, particularly Turkey, by sending assistance in the form of armed forces, indicates to the whole world that they do not take their membership in these international organizations lightly. Therefore I think we need have no fear about these two nations fulfilling their obligations if they become full members of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization.

I said we had weighed the risks against the advantages and found that the balance was in favour of the advantages. Let us not overlook that there are risks involved in bringing these nations into the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. I am quite sure that our Canadian people must come to realize this, and I hope we can help them to realize it. There is no question about the risks. These nations are situated in a geographical area that is very close to countries that may become aggressors in another direction. There is no questioning the fact that strategically these two countries are in most important key positions. For many years Mr. Churchill has tried to get the world to understand how important the Mediterranean area is strategically in any conflict that may arise. A lot of people in the world have not heeded what Mr. Churchill has tried to make us understand.

The very fact that Russia has always looked to the west for an outlet through the Dardanelles and the Bosphorus makes Turkey, which has been for some years the guardian of the entrance to the Black Sea, of strategic importance beyond anything that we can emphasize here. So too the fact that Greece is situated very close to the iron curtain countries, and has indeed in the past five years had very serious relations with some of her neighbours either wholly or partially behind the iron curtain, makes of that country a very important and key strategic area. We know that the whole Mediterranean area is the area toward which any aggressor, such as may exist in eastern countries, would cast their longing eyes. It has been said time and time again, and I think with perfect accuracy, that whoever controls the entrance to the Suez canal controls the most important strategic position in the world. We know that if Russia ever felt she could overcome the forces of the west one of the first moves she would make would be toward the Mediterranean area in the direction of the Suez canal country.

We must realize therefore that one of the risks involved in bringing Turkey and Greece into NATO is that any event in that area would bring us into a war. Indeed I think hon. members should recall that Russia has already made threats against Turkey. That in itself emphasizes the risk we are taking, but I think if the minister had a chance to speak his full mind today he would agree that perhaps we can overestimate the importance of that threat. Nevertheless it is a threat, and it is something we have to keep in our minds as we measure the responsibilities we are taking by approving this protocol. The speakers who have preceded me have emphasized the fact that we are going into an entirely new area. We do not know fully, I suppose, at this time, exactly what that may mean, but it certainly extends our obligations. Though we may say that the accession of Greece and Turkey will strengthen security everywhere, let us not overlook the fact that it takes us into some territories that we are not quite familiar with in many respects and might possibly engage us in conflict sooner than we might otherwise be engaged.

I thoroughly agree with those who say that the Canadian people should know the fullest possible measure of the obligations that they take upon themselves when they become parties to any treaty, this one included. The minister therefore should make clear to the Canadian people the full implications, as far as he knows them, of the accession of Greece and Turkey into NATO. Let me hasten to say this, however. I am not blaming the minister for not taking more time this morning. He realizes, as we all do, that the session is nearly at an end and that perhaps this is not the occasion on which he could launch into a full-scale exposition of world affairs. But I for one should like to have been able to sit down with the minister in a committee where I could ask him questions. I have in mind a thousand questions, about things that I am sure we should all like to know about, that I should like to get answered. I am sure that the members of the other place greatly enjoyed the splendid exposition he gave to them a few days back. I just saw snatches of the reports in the papers; but it would be something like that, it seems to me, that would be useful to us at this time. We should understand the full implications of all that we are doing. The Canadian people are entitled to know. How in the world can we expect them to join wholeheartedly in any international co-operative effort if they do not know what is going to be involved? I therefore cannot emphasize too strongly the importance of what my hon. friends who preceded me have both said, namely, that there should be no secrecy whatever, that the Canadian people should be taken into the full confidence of the minister and of the government, and that they should know exactly what is involved in this whole matter.

Along with the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) I should like to say this. We should be careful to realize this. In his speech this morning the minister quoted Mr. Sulzberger, the editor of the New York Times, in a statement to the effect that we are now engaged in a long, difficult and expensive project that would carry us into many years ahead; and the price of liberty, he said, is high. Realizing that, as we must, I think we ought to be careful to adopt within our own country and within NATO itself economic policies which will cushion just as far as possible the dislocating impact of the effort at rearmament, or perhaps I had better say the impact of defensive military preparation. I do not like to look upon the North Atlantic Treaty Organization in any respect as a war-making organization. It is indeed an international co-operative effort which I, along with the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, hope is not going to be confined to military preparations. We ought to be doing a whole lot more than that, I admit. But let us make certain that as we proceed in this international effort at co-operation we do not take steps that will destroy our economic position as a nation. We could easily do that, when we realize that this is going to be a long, costly and difficult period ahead of us.

I am keenly interested in the questions that were asked by the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon). I only wish we had time to go into committee and to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) a good many more questions. I certainly will listen with keen ears to the answers which he is prepared to give to the questions of the hon. member for Peel.

I do not see any use at this moment in extending my remarks. As I say, I have given the best thought of which I am capable to the full implications of what we are doing today; and I, speaking now for our Social Credit group here, say that we are favouring the approval by this parliament of the protocol, and that we would urge the minister to make available to the Canadian people—at different times as he goes along and as it becomes possible—all of the information that will enable them to judge of the full implications of the moves we are making, and to make clear to them what obligations they are taking upon themselves.

In conclusion, may I say this. In each step we take in extending the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, either in area or in more intensive policies, let us make sure—as sure as we possibly can be—that it is designed to increase the security of the free nations of the world and to make it possible for us to avoid war, if we can; but if we cannot avoid war, then to make certain that we are strong enough to repel any aggressor that might have an inclination to attack us.

Mr. Jean François Pouliot (Temiscouata): Mr. Speaker, I listened with great interest to what the minister has said and also to the excellent speeches made by the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon), the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) and the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low), but I am not going to follow their lead. I am going to ask some questions of the minister and he may answer me later on.

In the first place he said that the Rome meeting was the eighth of the NATO council and that the work of the temporary council committee appointed by the council at its Ottawa meeting was examined, though in no official sense, because that work was not completed. He did not tell us what that work was. We may know what it was by a dispatch of the Associated Press which was published in the papers of the 27th of this month. I will translate that dispatch in a moment.

He added that the committee had the responsibility to match the requirements for defence and the resources of the separate members of the council which could be devoted to that defence, having regard to their political and economic capabilities. This is enormous. It is a decision of far-reaching importance to Canada as well as to the other countries represented on the council. He said in a rather jocular vein that it is a "burden-sharing exercise". The burden may be heavy, and we are interested in knowing what it is. I hope the minister will be more explicit in that regard. Then he added that the executive committee of this committee of twelve, also popularly known as the "three wise men", have made a report to the committee of twelve which will give final consideration to it in Paris on January 15. There are a lot of committees, and one reason why I was in favour of NATO was that all the nations were on the same footing apparently, while they were not in the United Nations Organization because the security council was deciding matters pertaining to all. But in this case I thought that all the countries of NATO were on the same footing. Now there is a committee of "three wise men" who report to the committee of twelve which is not the whole Atlantic council. It is quite embarrassing. One leads to the other. Perhaps it is a good thing not to make decisions right away. Perhaps it is good to temporize as did Fabius Cunctator; he used to temporize, to adjourn things until later on. Perhaps it is a wise move. I am not ready to say that it is wrong.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): He has had a lot of imitators.

Mr. Pouliot: Yes, but they are dead.

Mr. Brooks: Not all of them.

Mr. Pouliot: There may be some at these international organizations, but I do not happen to know them.

The report will be referred to the NATO council in Lisbon in February, and the minister added it is not desirable to say anything more about it because it has not been finally submitted to the government. Then he spoke of western Germany being included in the European defence force, and stated that important and far-reaching decisions regarding the defence of Europe would be taken at Lisbon. He spoke of peace with western Germany, which must be an easy thing because we have exchanged ambassadors with western Germany. The representative of Canada in Germany had his status raised from a minister to an ambassador, and we have a German gentleman here as ambassador of that country. The minister said that at Rome they also discussed the question of the reorganization of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization which is becoming, in a sense, rather unwieldy. He referred to the streamlining of the whole organization.

We had the League of Nations, and it is dead. We had the United Nations, and you know it did not work. We had NATO, and NATO is to be streamlined into a new organization. Where it will all finish, I do not know. Sometimes I complained about the way things were handled at these gatherings and everyone thought that I was not orthodox, that I was speaking about things of which I had no knowledge. Events proved that I was right, because nothing was good enough. There is a perpetual change in that kind of business. Then there was the interim report from the committee of five on non-military co-operation, and that will be discussed at Lisbon. The minister did not tell the house what the vote of Canada was in the contest between Greece and Byelorussia for election to the United Nations security council. The minister should have no secrets from the house. If he does not want to make the matter public, he could easily have the galleries cleared. It is not a complicated affair because there is a rule of the house to that effect.

Then the minister said that big questions were not decided in Rome. It was an interim meeting. The member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) said that they cannot all be interim meetings. I say that perhaps it is a good thing to have only interim meetings so that matters may come to shape in the right way. We should know what is going on, and again if it is of importance that the information should not be given to the public at large, the minister could inform the house in camera. There was another thing in the minister's statement that struck me, and I have just a few facts to mention. The overlapping membership and possible military planning in building up a separate Middle East or Mediterranean pact would invoke problems of inclusion and exclusion which would not be settled easily. These matters are always settled easily when good will is shown. At the present time we have signed a protocol for the admission of Turkey and Greece to NATO. Turkey is a great country and the people are wonderful diplomats. So far they have been doing very well, and they are honest people. The Greeks are courageous and would be an asset to us.

In my humble opinion, if we are to have an Atlantic pact, the more members we have the better. If we are to include Turkey and Greece amongst the Atlantic pact nations, why not stop and take Spain on the way? What is the objection to Spain? It would be easy to have them with us, and they would be an asset. Some people are afraid to talk about Spain. Spain would be a loyal ally. There is no reason for not having Spain. We go as far away as Greece and Turkey, and the more nations we have the better. I am in favour of it. It extends the area of our responsibility, but the thing deserves consideration. Moreover, Greece and Turkey were invited to become full members of the North Atlantic council, and I am sure that if the invitations were extended to Spain she would accept at once. Not so long ago President Truman changed his mind about Spain and gave her a large amount of money to have improved conditions in that country. If Tito is good enough for us, Franco would not be any worse.

Then, the protocol does not extend the nature of our obligations under the North Atlantic treaty, but it does extend the area of our obligations. It cannot extend the nature, because the nature is specified in the treaty, as the hon. gentleman knows very well. The area is extended, but it means that two other countries will be joined with us in that pact. The minister added it is more theoretical than real, but an aggression on those countries would mean world war III. This is well understood. On the other hand, the more powerful the organization is the less danger of war. It is for that reason I am pleased to see Turkey and Greece become members of NATO. I hope that Portugal will follow, then Spain, Italy and the other countries. How is it we have NATO meeting in Rome? Rome is willing to come into the North Atlantic council and there would be no Russian veto, but the veto would come from England and France, especially against Spain. This is a time when we should be careful.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I want to refer again to what Mr. Eden said during his tour of the United States. It was published in an Associated Press dispatch dated Chicago, August 20. It stated that Mr. Eden found the Atlantic pact was inadequate to protect the western world against the communist menace. Then, he suggested a larger and more general organization which would take into account the demands of each front, would make a survey of the resources, and would seek to allocate them according to the needs. It would be a supergovernment. He said that he did not think NATO was adequate from that point of view. And then he added: "During the war", declared Eden, "several of us were hoping that the United Nations would serve as a practical example as well as a precept toward unity." That is Wendell Willkie's key, one world, one government, one supergovernment. What the minister did not mention in his statement was put in a dispatch of the Associated Press of December 27. I have not the English text, but I will translate it as well as I can. It is a matter of supreme importance to all Canadians as well as to the other members of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. It is the three big ones who want to control the whole organization. If we have no peace it is because of the setting up of the United Nations by the big ones, by Stettinius, a banker, who thought that the world could be organized like the management of a bank. I will not comment on that; I will just refer to it. The dispatch reads:

London, Associated Press.

It is announced that the three great powers have presently plans to form a super international government, the mission of which would be to direct the affairs of the North Atlantic treaty organization. We foresee that Prime Minister Churchill will discuss with President Truman early in January certain suggestions to enlarge the purpose of that organism, composed of twelve nations. Some of the modifications studied in the United States are to the effect that France and Great Britain would transform the council of acting ministers of foreign affairs into a permanent council of ministers, whose task would be to study fully the economic, military and production problems amongst the allied nations.

We are told also that all the agencies of NATO, actually dispersed in the three capitals, would be put under one roof in Paris, close to the general headquarters of General Eisenhower. We would also name a secretary-general whose powers, prestige and role would be equal to that of Eisenhower. The extra governmental cabinet as proposed will not have supernational powers, but it could act on its own when the situation calls for prompt decisions. Each country of the alliance will keep its right of veto. Naturally, all the questions are still something of a project.

In the first place, the three great powers will have to come to an agreement among themselves on the work to be done. Then they will have to sell their ideas to the other nine nations of the Atlantic pact.

It will take some time to make a decision, and that is why it may be a good thing that no decision has been reached yet on such important problems. The article goes on, and I will cut it short:

The changes foreseen would make of NATO the central responsible authority for the solution of the great economic, political and military problems of the western world.

Well, Mr. Speaker, it is not without a great deal of apprehension that I have read it. I am satisfied to support this government, and I appreciate its collective wisdom, and the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) is included in that. I understand his difficulties. But I do not want this parliament to become a rubber stamp of any supergovernment, of any world government such as that foreseen by Wendell Willkie, Eden, Churchill and others; and I hope that when Mr. Churchill comes to Ottawa he will be well received, but that nobody will forget that he is the leader of the Tory party of Great Britain.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): May I move the adjournment of the debate until later this day? I have consulted the leaders of the opposition parties and they have agreed. I would ask now that we proceed with item No 6 on the order paper.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

PRAIRIE FARM ASSISTANCE ACT

AMENDMENT TO EXCLUDE CERTAIN AREAS, ETC.

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to amend the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, 1939, to exclude certain areas of land from the provisions of section one of chapter forty-seven of the statutes of 1950 and thus render such areas eligible for assistance.

He said: Mr. Speaker, when notice was given of the resolution some days ago I departed from the usual practice, with the consent of the house, and gave an explanation of what was intended to be done under the measure which we proposed to introduce. I did that, expecting that the house might have ended at an earlier date, and that it might have been necessary to proceed with this resolution in a number of stages at one sitting of the house. The situation has not changed in that regard. We are now hoping that we are in the last sitting of the house, and this is still in the resolution stage, so that if we are going to enact the legislation it would be necessary to put it through about three different stages this afternoon in a rather short period of time. I am sure that hon. members will expect some explanation as to why it is important to do that at this late stage in this session.

As hon. members know, we have on the statute books the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. This act makes it possible for payments to be made in townships where there are eight bushels or less to the acre of a yield in any particular year. That, generally, is the principle underlying the act. There are other details that I need not go into at this time.

Then, in 1950 we amended the act to say that lands, which had been dealt with by a governing body, whether it be a provincial government, the federal government or even a municipality, lands that were held by these governments still, as of the 31st December, 1940, were not to be considered eligible for payment under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. The intent of that at the time was to exclude lands which it had been possible for persons to homestead over a very considerable term of years, or possible for them to secure by purchase or otherwise over a considerable term of years. It was thought that if it had been possible, from some time back in the 1870's or 1880's down to 1940, to secure these lands, and no one had seen fit to take these lands over, then it was quite natural to suppose that they were submarginal lands and not fit for cultivation in the ordinary sense. For that reason, if they were put back in cultivation as a result of action on the part of local governments or even by this government, they should be put back on terms which would not make necessary the payment of prairie farm assistance. That, in general terms, is the provision of the amendment of 1950.

When that matter was before the committee on agriculture it was pointed out by members from the northern parts of the three prairie provinces, and particularly members from the northern sections of Alberta and Saskatchewan—and I should enlarge upon that by saying that the area extends from Saskatchewan over into Manitoba—that there were areas along the northern part which had not been put up for homesteading, had not been available to the public over a period of years, but had been brought under the homesteading provisions or in some other way made available to settlers since 1940. It was said that under the act those lands would be subject to payment of the one per cent on any grain delivered, and because of that they should be made eligible if, as time went along, it was indicated that they were entitled to payments.

As the minister in charge I conducted the bill through the committee. I stated at the time that the government admitted the justice of that claim, but we found it difficult to draw a line without first having some experience. For that reason I suggested that the legislation go through in the terms in which it was submitted to the committee, and afterward to the house; and I gave an undertaking in committee, which I read to the house when the resolution was introduced on November 14. I shall read it again, in order that it may be clearly before hon. members at this time. I said to the committee:

> I can give more assurance to my hon. friends.

By that I meant more assurance that day than I could the day before.

> Since we met this morning and before the meeting this afternoon, we had a meeting of council and I discussed this matter with council, and they agreed with what I suggested.

And then in a few words I repeat the suggestion.

> They think it should be retroactive in order to make the check that we want to make; and they are also committed to the undertaking I have given to the committee that if we find it is creating hardships which should not be created under the spirit of the act, we shall have amending legislation next year.

That undertaking was given to the committee at the time; and we have had two years' experience since that under the amendment. I just wish to give the committee the result of that experience, in order to show that it is very definitely indicated now that there is an area about which we should legislate.

In 1950, the year the legislation was passed, as a result of the operations of that year it was found that in the Alberta-Peace river bloc, which extends over into British Columbia, there were 1,628 quarter sections that were excluded because of the amendment we made in 1950, where payments otherwise would have been made. In that same area in 1951 there were 3,689 quarter sections. Of those 1,600 may be the same that were excluded in 1950; but it means that there were some 1,600 the first year and 3,689 the second year. In the Edmonton area, part of which is north of township 60—and practically all these quarter sections noted are north of township 60, even in the Edmonton area—in 1950 there were 392 and in 1951 there were 1,954 quarter sections.

Just to indicate the difference as between those areas and the areas with regard to which we were legislating and about which we were attempting to do something, in the Calgary area in the southern part of Alberta in 1950 there were only 87 quarter sections excluded, and in 1951 there were only 112. That plainly indicates that the area north is in a different class and should be treated differently in this regard. In other words, payments should be available to a very considerable number of those people. In order to indicate the Saskatchewan position, where the greater part of the lands are located, in 1950 the number of quarter sections that would be excluded by this section was 56, while in 1951 it was 978. That is, the figure is considerably higher in 1951 than it was in 1950. But when one looks at the map there is not an accumulation of these quarter sections in any one particular section, even in the north, where you could attribute it to the same reasons that can be given for the northern part of Alberta and the Peace river section of British Columbia.

So what we are suggesting is that one group of farmers in the northern part of Alberta have already been required to wait a whole year for their payments. The payments to the 1,628 quarter sections in 1950 would have been due in December of 1950, so they have not had their payments for a year. The payment of these other quarter sections will be due in December of this year, 1951. If the legislation were not passed at this session, but were carried over into the next session, they would be denied their payments for that length of time. The suggestion therefore in the legislation is that in British Columbia and Alberta we withdraw the effect of the amendment of 1950 and make payments possible to these farmers who live north of township 60. That is township 60, and north from there, we find from checking the map carefully, does take care of these persons who are concerned.

When I explained this at the resolution stage the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) and the hon. member for Melfort (Mr. Wright) raised the question of possible discrimination. As I explained at that time, I had included in it the provinces of Saskatchewan and Manitoba. But on further discussion of the matter it was agreed that we could not settle Saskatchewan and Manitoba at present because as these figures I have quoted would indicate there is no development of any district, in Saskatchewan or Manitoba, at the moment that can be dealt with in the same way we are proposing to deal with in Alberta and British Columbia. What I do wish to state, however, is that the decision given to the committee in 1950 still applies in so far as Saskatchewan and Manitoba are concerned. The position we took then was that until an area developed where payment ought to be made, it was most difficult to draw lines, and we should allow that to develop before drawing any lines.

What I wish to say now is that exactly the same position continues to exist in connection with Saskatchewan and Manitoba as is being dealt with in Alberta and British Columbia, with all the facts before us in connection with the matter. In other words, if our experience in administering the act indicates that a district develops in Saskatchewan or Manitoba which has the same rights as now exist in these areas in Alberta and British Columbia, it will be dealt with in the same way. That is to say, the passing of this legislation at this time will not lessen the claims of those in Saskatchewan or Manitoba, and therefore it is not discriminatory in any way. It strengthens their position. The fact that we had already dealt with it in Alberta and British Columbia on that basis should make it eminently clear that if a similar situation develops in the future in other provinces it will be dealt with in the same manner.

My main objective in suggesting that this be put through at this session is what I mentioned at the beginning, namely, that from our examination of the circumstances surrounding all these lands it is evident farmers there are entitled to payment. We suggest that if the legislation were not put through this session making that payment possible there would be considerably more delay in getting the money forward to these farmers. We therefore suggest that the legislation be put through the several stages and sent over to the Senate so that it can be passed by them and assented to today.

Mr. P. E. Wright (Melfort): Mr. Speaker, we on this side of the house are agreed that this legislation should be put forward at this session. I intend to reserve any further remarks I have to make until the bill is before us, which I understand will be in a few minutes.

Mr. Gardiner: I intended to read the one pertinent line so that every member would have it in his mind. There are printed copies of the bill available but probably they have not been distributed. The only exception is in this part:

(vi) lands lying north of township sixty in each of the provinces of Alberta and British Columbia.

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I should like to take one minute to thank the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) for bringing forward this bill at this session and to tell him that we deeply appreciate the fact that he has kept the promise he made in 1950 when an amendment was made to the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. We want him to know that there are quite a large number of people in northern Alberta and British Columbia, in the Peace river bloc, whose faith will be revived as a result of this legislation. We want it known too that we who represent northern Alberta's constituencies will certainly support amendments to the act if areas in Saskatchewan and Manitoba should at some future time develop the same kind of situation that we have had in the Peace river country in the past few years. We do not want there to be discriminatory legislation at any time.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in.

Mr. Gardiner thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 46, to amend the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, 1939.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Mr. Gardiner: By leave, I should like to move the second reading.

Mr. P. E. Wright (Melfort): Mr. Speaker, at this point I should like to say a few words with regard to the present bill and its implications so far as we in the northern part of Saskatchewan are concerned. The Prairie Farm Assistance Act was passed in 1939 to take care of a serious situation which had developed in western Canada during the 1930's. Since that time I believe some six amendments have been made to the act as the government found it necessary to make it more operative and more easily administered.

Up until 1950 the amendments were mostly to extend the act and make it more operative. In 1950 an amendment was passed, which we are now amending, with regard to a certain area in the northern parts of Alberta and British Columbia. That particular amendment was restrictive in its application. In other words, it took out of payment certain lands which were described as having been the property of the crown in 1940 and which had been placed in cultivation after that date, either through sale, lease or by other methods. As a result a number of people were brought under the act and have been under the act since 1940 but they found themselves in a position where they could not receive any benefits.

There was a certain amount of logic in the amendment as it applied to certain areas in Alberta and Saskatchewan which lay within the old Palliser triangle. By the way, those lands should never have been placed under cultivation. However, during the first war we and our allies were greatly in need of wheat and this land was brought into cultivation.

The Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act was passed, I believe in 1935, and an attempt was made to withdraw certain of these lands. In our opinion the 1950 amendment to the Prairie Farm Assistance Act was not only restrictive, it was discriminatory. Those of us from Saskatchewan felt that it was a slap at the administration of the land policy of the provincial governments concerned. It indicated that the Department of Agriculture felt that the provincial administrations had not been doing a good job. Therefore, there were certain of us who resented it.

We believed that the provincial governments in Alberta and Saskatchewan were endeavouring to develop land utilization policies which would be for the benefit, not only of the provinces but of the dominion as a whole. The original amendment as brought in was much more restrictive than would appear from the act. When it was placed before the agricultural committee the minister made certain amendments to exempt several areas in the provinces.

If the Prairie Farm Assistance Act and the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act are to be operated sucessfully, it can only be done with the co-operation of the provincial governments. The sooner we understand that and the sooner those in Ottawa recognize the necessity for co-operation the more efficient and beneficial the operation of these acts will be in Saskatchewan, Alberta and Manitoba. The position we took at that time is now proved to be correct, because the minister is introducing an amendment which in effect exempts all lands north of township 60 in the provinces of Alberta and British Columbia from the operation of the amendment passed in 1950. To be fair, so far as the province of Manitoba is concerned lands north of township 30 should be exempted. In the province of Saskatchewan lands north of township 40 as far west as the third meridian and lands north of township 50 from the third meridian to the Alberta border should be exempted. They would be the same type of land as is affected by this amendment concerning the provinces of Alberta and British Columbia.

The minister has undertaken that if there should be an area in the northern part of Saskatchewan, and I presume in Manitoba too, which is affected later in the same way as the area in the northern part of Alberta, further amendments will be made to the act so that payments can be made in those areas to those who may be affected. He has placed certain figures on the record with respect to the number of parcels of land affected. In Alberta in 1950 there were 1,628 quarter sections and in 1951, 3,689 quarter sections. He has indicated that in the province of Saskatchewan in 1950 there were only 56 quarter sections affected and 978 in 1951. I do not know whether he has any information to indicate whether the 978 quarter sections in the province of Saskatchewan are in the northern or southern part of the province. We are prepared to allow the bill to go through without too much debate and without moving an amendment on the understanding already given by the minister that if a similar area should be affected in the province of Saskatchewan at a later date an amendment will be introduced to provide for payments in that area.

I should like the assurance of the minister that it will not be necessary for the same number of parcels of land to be affected before such an amendment will be brought in. This year, when we are making this amendment, there are 3,689 quarter sections of land affected in the province of Alberta. It might well be that only 1,000 quarter sections would be affected in a similar area in the province of Saskatchewan in another year, and if there were 1,000 or even a smaller number I do not see why they should not receive payment under the act provided they otherwise qualify. I hope the minister will give us some assurance that this is his intention, and that he is not going to wait until there are three of four thousand parcels of land barred from payment under the act before he makes a similar amendment applicable to the province of Saskatchewan. With that assurance we are prepared to allow the bill to go through without moving an amendment, although we had intended to introduce one which would bring similar areas in the province of Saskatchewan in line for payment under the act.

Mr. Gardiner: I thought I gave that assurance when I was speaking, but in case I did not I give it now.

Mr. Robert Fair (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, I have no intention whatever of holding up this legislation. In fact I am wholly in favour of it, and if and when similar circumstances arise in Saskatchewan or Manitoba, or both, then if I am here, and I hope to be, I shall be equally glad to support the claims of the other provinces. At the resolution stage the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) in describing the area affected stated that it was township 60 and all that portion north thereof, but the bill reads, "lands lying north of township 60". When we get into committee I should like the minister to introduce an amendment inserting the words "and including" after the word "of" in the ninth line of the bill. Perhaps the minister has not noticed that but in its present form it excludes township 60 which is not the intention of the minister.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Dion in the chair.

On section 1—No award.

Mr. Low: Would the minister care to comment on the point raised by the hon. member for Battle River? I think it was the intention, as we understood his statement at the resolution stage, that the bill would be amended to include township 60 and those lands north. Perhaps the minister would comment on that now.

Mr. Gardiner: Yes, I must admit it was the intention to take in township 60 which would make it necessary to have the section read, "lands lying north of the south boundary of township 60".

The Chairman: Shall the clause carry?

Mr. Coldwell: It has to be amended.

Mr. Gardiner: If you will put it through with the amendment—

Mr. Coldwell: You have to move an amendment.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I move:

That clause 1 of Bill 46 be amended by adding to clause 1 in line 9 after the words "lands lying north of" the words "the south boundary of."

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. Herridge: I am all in favour of this type of legislation. I understand it has been of great benefit to many grain farmers on the prairies, but I should like to ask the minister a question. On what guiding principle does the government base its decision to assist grain growers who lack a crop and ignore the rest of the farmers of Canada who possibly do not have crops? For instance, there are the fruit growers, beet growers, tobacco growers and dairymen. Will the minister explain the guiding principle upon which the legislation is based?

Mr. Gardiner: I did when I introduced it, and got the consent of the house on the condition that I was not to go into that; but in a few words the reason for the legislation as it now exists has to do with the drought that extended over seven years in the prairie provinces.

Mr. Low: On a contributory basis.

Mr. Knight: Would the minister give us roughly the location of the 978 quarter sections in Saskatchewan?

Mr. Gardiner: I would have to go over the whole map. They are spread over the map in small groups.

Mr. Knight: That is the point I wanted to know about.

Mr. Gardiner: They are small groups spread all over the province extending from the United States boundary line northward.

Mr. Herridge: I understand the desire to get the legislation passed at the present time. Could we have the assurance of the minister that he will deal with my question next session during discussion of the agriculture estimates?

Mr. Gardiner: I am quite sure that I shall have to.

Section as amended agreed to.

Section 2 agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

PUBLIC WORKS ACT

TENDER BY PUBLIC ADVERTISEMENT FOR EXECUTION OF WORK

The house resumed, from Saturday, December 15, consideration of the motion of Mr. Fournier (Hull) for the second reading of Bill No. 26, to amend the Public Works Act.

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, when this matter was before the house previously, I adjourned the debate. I have some reason to understand that perhaps the minister wishes to make a statement now.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I will close the debate on second reading.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Just a minute. I want to know, Mr. Speaker, whether I shall be allowed to continue, because my understanding and hope was that the minister would make such statement as he wanted to make now, not a speech, that I might then finish my speech, and then the minister would close the debate. Is that the position, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Drew: May I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that with the consent of the house the minister indicate the wording of the amendment he will later move; because if, as there is reason to believe, the amendment is in accordance with the view that has been expressed by the official opposition, it would preclude unnecessary debate.

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I am ready to agree to that procedure. I had a lengthy speech prepared on this matter, but I think, at this late hour, I will not take long. If I had time I would spend most of it in thanking the hon. gentlemen who participated in this debate for all the kind words they said to me. If I took them as a mirror, I would not recognize myself. At all events I was impressed by the arguments that were made by the members who spoke on this question. I still believe in the tender system, and I reaffirm that belief. Only after listening to all those kind speeches did I find that there were dangers in the amendment I was proposing. If their interpretation of this amendment had reached the officials of my department and they thought they were being made all-powerful to deal with public works, without any restraint, I certainly would oppose that position. Even if the contractors themselves thought that with this amendment they could come to my office and say, "Now you can do this, why do you not give me this contract? I can do it as well as the other party", I still would be in a bad position. Even members on this side of the house seem to have that opinion also.

I took a lot of time meditating and cogitating on what was said, and I thought I should cancel the proposed amendment and substitute for it another one. Just to show how this thing works, may I say that while we were discussing this matter the Canadian Construction Association, which is the body most interested in this section of the Public Works Act, sent to my office proposals for amendments. Just to show the house what they think, here are the proposed amendments they suggested. As to paragraph (a) of section 36, they would keep that pressing emergency clause as it was. As to paragraph (b) they say:

> (b) of work having a value not in excess of $25,000 and which, from its nature, can be more expeditiously and economically executed by the employees of the department.

And as to (c):

> (c) where the estimated cost of the work is less than $25,000 and it appears to the minister, in view of the nature of the work, that it is not advisable to invite tenders.
> (d) in work of "secret category".

That is without any limit.

> (e) of work of conversion or alteration nature, and the minister is satisfied that a call for tenders by public tender is impracticable and that the public interest can best be served by entering into a contract for the execution thereof without inviting such tenders.

Even reading that I thought I would have exorbitant powers, and I thought I should have an amendment based on what was suggested in the house. I will read the amendment that I will ask my colleague the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) to move when we get into committee. It reads as follows:

> (c) where the estimated cost of the work is less than fifteen thousand dollars, and it appears to the minister, in view of the nature of the work, that it is not advisable to invite tenders.

That is a change from $5,000 to $15,000, Even a member of the opposition suggested that I might fix an amount which could go up to $20,000. I am being more reasonable even than certain members of the opposition. I am asking for less power than they were ready to give to me. I do not see that there can be any serious objection to this amendment, and I hope that the Senate will consider it in the way we will in the house.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, how true were the remarks of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) this morning when he said that the minister had a gift for making, I was going to say an unsatisfactory explanation—but why should I call anything about this unsatisfactory?—in a satisfactory manner. I am sure the minister will understand that it is only the strongest sense of duty on my part which makes me feel that, notwithstanding the Christmas season and notwithstanding the regard we have for the minister, it is absolutely essential that the record should make completely clear what has happened.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): That will be for future reference.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): For future reference we may hope, yes. I am sure the minister will not disagree with me that it is, let us say, an absolutely unprecedented explanation of an amendment. If we assess it properly it is really, as I think the Germans call it, colossal. What I mean by that is that it is something super. The real reason for changing, according to the minister, is that there is a danger that our arguments made two weeks ago, while not necessarily in themselves right, nevertheless might persuade the members of his staff who thereby might get an exaggerated idea of their power, and as a result, adherence to the principle of tender which the minister was at pains to support two weeks ago might in fact not be maintained.

As I say, I think it is only fair, in the interests of the record and in the interests of the opposition, that we try to set out—and I will do so briefly—exactly what was proposed; in other words, that we take stock of this situation. While the minister has dealt with it in an extremely delicate manner, the fact is—and I am sure it was not the minister who wanted it; I am sure it was one of his wicked partners—that there was a try-on here to get something through which really was quite basically in contradiction with our whole method of doing business. I want to make that very clear. I can do it by briefly reading the section as it was, and then reading the amendment which was proposed. In the section as it appeared, first of all subsection (a) says that tenders may not be needed in cases of pressing emergency, and that is carried into the new section, almost word for word. Subsection (b) reads:

(b) in which from the nature of the work it can be more expeditiously and economically executed by the officers and servants of the department; or

And that is carried into the new section. Subsection (c), as the minister has read, says:

(c) where the estimated cost of the work is less than five thousand dollars and it appears to the minister, in view of the nature of the work, that it is not advisable to invite tenders.

The minister's discretion is strictly limited to $5,000. I want to read subsection (c) as it stands in the proposed amendment, that is the one which is now amended. It reads:

(c) the minister is satisfied that the nature of the work renders a call for tenders by public advertisement impracticable and that the public interest can best be served by entering into a contract for the execution thereof without inviting such tenders.

It is clear, Mr. Speaker, that there is no limitation of any kind. It is not only the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier), but the rank and file of the ministers, just the ordinary ministers, who can come along and do the same thing. I believe any of the ministers could let tenders in this way without limit, except that they have to satisfy their own minds and we know how easy that is.

From the outset we said we regarded this bill as vicious. If I may quote a very great authority, namely myself, I said it was like throwing down the drain the practice of generations. Really one could hardly see anything further that could be done, unless one day the government turned up to say that parliament would only meet once every five years. After all, the C.B.C. gets a five-year lease on life, so why should they not call us back only once every five years? It is hard to see how much further they could have gone in setting aside the proper position of parliament and in arrogating more power to the executive. I do say seriously that it shows how far arbitrary power will go when it gets under a full head of steam. There is hardly anything we can imagine which would go further than this.

I must say that I thought we had seen the limit before, because there have been some rather wide stretches of power requested here. But if anyone had told me that the government would come in with a measure of this kind—not for defence production, because we are accustomed to broad powers for defence production—I would have said, "Just go and roll your hoop." I imagine that this section was really brought on through desire to emulate the Minister of Defence Production (Mr. Howe), who has such wonderful powers about which he tells us so often with such pride. I can imagine that it was really brought about by that kind of competition, the desire to keep up with the Howes.

We must however give the government credit, because they have come through now in a very handsome manner. They have made an amendment in line with what we advised. How wise they would be, and how much trouble they would save, if they accepted all our advice.

This is not an amendment; it is a repentance, a recantation. This is not a retreat; it is an absolute rout. We in the opposition should seriously thank the government for one thing. I do not suppose that for a long time there has ever been a case where the real function of the opposition has been so well and clearly demonstrated. Within the last few days we have been trying to persuade the government not to pursue another foolish course. We did not succeed. We shall have to let time take its course. We have to let the people become educated. There will be an education of the farmers within a few days—by reason of information given last evening.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Are you cautioning me, Mr. Speaker? I always defer to your slightest wish, as you know. What I wanted to say—perhaps there was a slight digression—was that the government has given us a wonderful chance to demonstrate the real function of the opposition. Within the last few days in the other case there has been some complaint that we were taking a little too much time in trying to get the public to understand the subject. In this case we stood up to the government. I want to give all the opposition credit, because they were all with us. This subject was rather simple, and it was not easy to confuse the public. The public understood, and what have they done? They have come to the assistance of the opposition and we have the results which we all know.

I do not want to waste the time of the house. It is repugnant to me to say anything which would seem like glorifying ourselves but I do say, and it is a conservative statement, that this may well rank as a classic case. I hope it may even get into the text books as a classic example of the power of the opposition to prevent injurious legislation.

It may also remind the people, Mr. Speaker, that the way of the opposition is not always easy. People do not always rate the opposition as high as they should. It may serve to give people a better understanding of the true function of parliament, particularly if the press is interested and brings it to the attention of the people.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, I hope this incident may have the effect of raising the whole institution of parliament. People are often apt to talk about us as if we were just putting in time, as if there were no means whatever of influencing the government, and are apt to say public opinion cannot do anything. I hope this case may stand in the record as a classic example, showing that public influence can still—I was going to say in the twinkling of an eye—actually in the space of two weeks, bring a great!? and powerful!? government to its knees.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Dion in the chair.

On section 1—Tenders to be invited for works.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): There is just one point I want to bring to the minister's attention. In the old act the word "or" comes at the end of subsection (a) and the end of subsection (b). I point out that in the new section there is no "or" at the end of subsection (a), and I suggest that that creates an entirely unexpected situation. Surely that will mean that (a) and (b) have to be read together, and that cannot be the intention. Does the minister not agree?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Mr. Chairman, I shall ask my colleague the Minister of Agriculture to move an amendment to subsection (a) by adding the word "or" after the word "interest".

Mr. Gardiner: I so move.

Mr. Drew: And subclause (b) also?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): It has it.

Mr. Drew: That is right.

Mr. Gardiner: I move:

That clause 1 be amended by deleting subsection C of section 36 of the Public Works Act as it appears therein, and by substituting the following:

"C. Where the estimated cost of the work is less than fifteen thousand dollars, and it appears to the minister, in view of the nature of the work, that it is not advisable to invite tenders."

Mr. McLure: Just before the amendment carries I should like to say this with regard to tenders. Last year a similar bill with regard to tendering was brought into the house, which had to do with the postal act. It gives the department too much absolute power to let contracts without calling for tenders.

Mr. Rinfret: Below a thousand dollars.

Mr. McLure: It does not make any difference whether it is below or above; the inequity is right there.

The Chairman: Order. That is not relevant at all to the present bill.

Mr. McLure: I will deal with this as it is. When you do away with tendering you are getting back to the old system of political patronage. We all know that is an excessively costly way of doing business. Only in the case of an emergency should any contract be let by the Department of Public Works without calling for tenders. We know that if tenders are called and properly handled the public can make a bid to do work, and when they make a bid the department gets the work done better and at a lower cost to the taxpayers of the country. But if we start in and let these contracts, with the officials of the department to judge whether or not they should be let, then it is purely political patronage, and I do not think the bill should pass this house at this time, even if it is the closing of the session, without there being a little more control instead of a reversion to political patronage in the letting of contracts, just as was done in reference to the matter I spoke about a moment ago, namely contracts for rural mail delivery.

Mr. Herridge: Before this amendment passes I want to say that we in this group are very pleased that the minister has recognized the soundness of the arguments of the opposition with respect to the necessity for a limitation in this section. I think the amount suggested, namely $15,000, is very reasonable. Anyone having a knowledge of construction at all will agree with that. I might say, Mr. Chairman, that I have been fairly closely associated with construction projects throughout the years. While I can recognize the dangers of patronage, and I am opposed to patronage, I know the great difficulties that district engineers have in proceeding with work under present conditions. I am in favour of a considerable amount of flexibility and placing in the hands of the district engineers more power than they have today to make immediate decisions. I know that important work has been delayed because the engineers have had to refer to Ottawa and could not make a decision on the ground to buy certain materials, or to get certain work done, because the man who was willing to do it at a certain price could not do it at a later date, and so on. I think that has to be considered when we are dealing with public works tenders and public works projects. We in this group are very pleased to see this amendment; we think it is most satisfactory.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Mr. Speaker, may I suggest that we have time to take up this little Bill No. 15, which concerns privileges and immunities in respect of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. I understand that the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) has consulted with members of the opposition, who seem to have no serious objection to bringing it on at the present time. If it were to bring about a long debate we would have to withdraw it to come back to NATO. It has been before a committee of the house, and it is now to go to the committee of the whole. Second reading has been given to the bill and it has been reported back from the committee on external affairs. If I can have the agreement of the house we will proceed with the item.

NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY ORGANIZATION

MEASURE TO APPROVE AGREEMENT ON STATUS OF ORGANIZATION, NATIONAL REPRESENTATIVES AND INTERNATIONAL STAFF

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs) moved that the house go into committee to consider Bill No. 15, to provide for privileges and immunities in respect of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization.

Motion agreed to, and the house went into committee, Mr. Dion in the chair.

On section 1—Short title.

Mr. Graydon: I have only one question to ask; I asked a number of them in the committee. The minister was away when the committee sat and did not have an opportunity to answer this question. It has to do with the NATO organization itself. In connection with decisions made by the members of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization in council, does there have to be unanimity before a decision is arrived at and a judgment given?

Mr. Pearson: Yes, that is so. No decision has been taken, or indeed I suppose no decision could be taken, in the North Atlantic council which was not concurred in by all of its members.

Mr. Graydon: I have raised the question because some people took umbrage at my saying there was a veto in NATO. Apparently that is really what it amounts to.

PROROGATION OF PARLIAMENT

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I have the honour to inform the house that I have received the following communication:

Government House, Ottawa,
December 29, 1951

Sir:

I have the honour to inform you that the Right Honourable Thibaudeau Rinfret, acting as deputy of His Excellency the Governor General, will proceed to the Senate chamber at seven o'clock p.m. today, December 29, for the purpose of proroguing the fifth session of the twenty-first parliament.

I have the honour to be,
sir,
Your obedient servant,
J. F. Delaute,
Assistant Secretary to the Governor General

[Later]:

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the house that the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General will proceed to the Senate at 6.15 p.m. instead of seven o'clock as previously announced.

NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY

APPROVAL OF PROTOCOL FOR ACCESSION OF GREECE AND TURKEY

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Pearson:

That it is expedient that the houses of parliament do approve the protocol to the North Atlantic treaty on the accession of Greece and Turkey, signed by Canada at London on October 17, 1951, and that this house do approve the same.

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say only a word or two on this resolution, not to ask questions and certainly not to make any new suggestions, but just because I find the occasion not only an important one but, in a way, a rather moving one.

I should like to say just a word or two about these two nations which are now to be associated with us in this new way. It touches the imagination, first of all geographically, when one realizes that the north Atlantic is now being extended through the straits of Gibraltar and two thousand miles through the Mediterranean and the Aegean to Turkey and Greece. As the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) said this morning, when we think of those countries, we think of them as being close to the danger, and feeling a realism about it which perhaps it is hard for us always to feel.

Then I should like to say just a word about what might be called the historic side. First of all, Turkey: sometimes we have been in alliance with Turkey, and sometimes in opposition. But in whichever quality we had to do with them it was the testimony of all, whether friend or enemy, that they were brave and chivalrous. I remember well in the first great war that those who fought against them in the peninsula always spoke of them as gentlemen.

And when we come to Greece, none of us can forget that our whole civilization owes more than we can ever express to Greece. I would like to read just a sentence from, I suppose, the greatest exposition ever made of what we owe to the Greeks. It was not made for that purpose. It was made hundreds of years before Christ by a great Greek speaking over the graves of those who had fallen in war. He describes in a sentence or two the civilization from which we have taken so much and by which we now live. This is the speech put into the mouth of Pericles by the great Greek historian Thucydides, where he says, speaking of Athens:

For we enjoy a form of government which does not copy the laws of our neighbours; but we are ourselves rather a pattern to others than imitators of them. In name, from its not being administered for the benefit of the few, but of the many, it is called a democracy; but with regard to its laws, all enjoy equality, as concerns their private differences; while with regard to public rank, according as each man has reputation for any thing, he is preferred for public honours, not so much from consideration of party, as of merit; nor, again, on the ground of poverty, while he is able to do the state any good service, is he prevented by the obscurity of his position.

Coming to more modern days we remember what the Greeks endured in the autumn of 1940 and from then on. We remember how they resisted what looked like an overwhelming force, how they fought on through the war, and endured and suffered in the war years and after those years. Then, in these latest days of all, there is fighting in Korea which again they share with us, and where the Turks notably have distinguished themselves in battle as they have so often done before.

For these reasons, Mr. Speaker, I felt I wished to detain the house for only a moment to signify my satisfaction with what is being done today.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I wish to follow the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) in a similar vein. There is a very special significance to the steps we are now taking to play our part in approving the arrangement made to bring Greece and Turkey into the North Atlantic Treaty Organization.

Greece was the birthplace of western democracy. Greece has given to the world the greatest of its art and culture, which really laid the foundation for those stronger societies which grew up in Italy and other parts of Europe in the years that followed.

I should think that at this time, when we are all hoping that the efforts that are being made may preserve peace and the freedom to pursue our own democratic way of life, it is particularly significant that Greece should be joined in this endeavour.

There is in addition to this the fact that the people of Greece have demonstrated their willingness to make great sacrifices in the cause to which we are now all committed. As the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) said this morning, the approval of this arrangement by the governments of all the nations joined in this organization would mean that an attack on either Greece or Turkey would immediately meet with the military response implicit in the North Atlantic treaty agreements. Greece has already within her own borders faced the communist beast. I think every one of us here can say with deep sincerity: Thank God they won. They overcame communist forces, trained, organized and supported from across their borders under the direction of Moscow. They have shown what free men can do against these evil forces. Therefore I think there should be in the heart and mind of each of us a feeling of gratitude and rejoicing that they will be associated with us in this supreme responsibility.

Glorious Greece, with a proud history of the past, now marching side by side with the western democracies, can have reason to hope for the glories which will come through the opportunities that are being opened to nations without great resources by the scientific achievements of the past few years, particularly through the peaceful employment of atomic power which may completely change the lives of many countries which have found things extremely difficult through inability to meet the requirements of modern industrial needs.

May I turn for a moment to Turkey, which country has been magnificent both in victory and in defeat. As has been said by the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell), all who have had occasion to meet them as enemies regarded them not only as men of great courage but also as men of chivalry and decent instincts which bring them in spirit within the community of the western world. After the first world war Turkey became the friend of the western democracies and since that time has marched side by side with the western nations in the effort to preserve the freedom of nations of different historical backgrounds and of different religious beliefs, but all sharing one common conviction, that it is only through freedom, that it is only through the preservation of self-government against the threat of communism that we can hope to advance the welfare of the peoples of these countries.

Turkey has shown, as did Greece, a willingness to fight the threat with which we are all confronted in differing degrees. While Turkey did not actually find it necessary to engage in mortal combat with communist forces, as did Greece, nevertheless it was the firmness of Turkey and only that firmness that held back the Russian forces from her borders at the time the northern provinces of Turkey were threatened only a few years ago. Turkey has the distinction of being both a European and an Asiatic nation. On both sides of the Dardanelles it extends to and is in contact with Asia. To the west of the Dardanelles it extends to and is in contact with Europe. Above all, however, it is the buffer in the Mediterranean area between the threat of the physical forces of communist Russia and western civilization. They have already shown the mettle of which they are made. I think we all have reason for satisfaction and confidence when we know that Turkey will be closely associated with us in this common undertaking. I am sure we will assist in every way we can to build up the strength of that great eastern bulwark in the Mediterranean so they may have the physical means to make their courage a strong deterrent to any efforts that might be thought of in the Kremlin, to any idea of repeating the adventure which brought the western world into war with Russia nearly one hundred years ago.

We should not forget that the reason Britain and France fought in the Crimea was the threat to Turkey. I hope the men of the Kremlin will not forget that the western world came to Turkey's defence before and that under an agreement of this nature the men of the western world, in much larger numbers, will come to Turkey's defence if necessary and with greater speed than on that former occasion.

I feel sure that all hon. members agree with what was said by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) that uncertainty is the greatest encouragement to the possibility of war. There is every reason to believe that had there been such a firm undertaking as now exists between the nations of the north Atlantic community there would have been no war in 1914 or in 1939, and that millions of human beings who were slaughtered in those conflicts might have been spared to pursue the peaceful course of their lives. If there is above anything else one clear and shining lesson to be gained from those two wars it is that a clear understanding that free nations will join to defend freedom is in itself the likeliest way to prevent the possibility of war at any time.

I do hope this may be only one step in a progressive incorporation within the North Atlantic Treaty Organization of those nations which share common ideals of freedom. It may well be that the North Atlantic Treaty Organization will be the only reality unless the United Nations ceases to conduct its meetings in terms of unreality. I continue to hope that the United Nations may fulfil the dreams of those who signed the charter at San Francisco in 1945. I do not believe, however, that anybody is placing the brutal facts before our eyes if they can feel confident that meetings which are used so largely for purposes of spreading communist propaganda and for throwing challenges to the western world in the terms that are used by Vishinsky and his associates can hope to fulfil the great purpose for which the organization was created.

Nothing I have said suggests that we should cease to hope, but I do think the time has come when it is necessary for all the signatories to the charter of the United Nations to remember that there is a provision therein for the exclusion of any nation which does not observe the undertakings of the charter. While that time may not yet have arrived, most certainly members of the United Nations should not let events proceed to a point where the United Nations loses the sanction of integrity and of clear purpose simply because of its unwillingness to face the reality of the Russian course.

May I pass from that to say that I would hope, no matter how brief it may be, we may have some comments from the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott), because he too had some part in the discussions related to this subject and, as has already been pointed out, the financial arrangements are part and parcel of our support of our partners in this great enterprise. The Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) is of course unable to make a direct report as he is now outside of the country.

Before I sit down I wish to refer briefly to one aspect of the problem which can never at any time be separated from the consideration of this subject. The North Atlantic Treaty Organization must depend for the success of its efforts to preserve peace upon the combined military power of the nations which are members of that organization. I do not think it would be in keeping with our responsibility to end this session without reference to the disturbing situation which was disclosed by the few meetings of the committee on defence expenditures. In the Financial Post of December 22 there is a chart which shows in a very clear way the difference between the commitments for defence requirements and the amount that has actually been spent from April, 1950 to the end of November, 1951.

I would commend to the consideration of every hon. member the graphic illustration of these figures which appears on the front page of the second section of the Financial Post of December 22. It will be seen that the amounts spent in relation to the commitments during that period are in most cases proportionately very small. Having said that, I wish to make it quite clear that I recognize that some considerable part of the amount represented by commitments will take some time to complete. Nevertheless, having regard to the fact that the chart covers a period from April of 1950 to November of 1951, and realizing that the expenditures represent for all practical purposes the amount completed, because payments are made upon delivery or very shortly afterwards, it would be wise to see what the situation is with respect to some of these things that are of such very great importance in the defence of Canada. In the case of aircraft the estimated value of the commitments over that extended period is $788,600,000, and the amount spent is $157 million. It should be recognized that the amount spent does not represent aircraft in service in a great many cases because much of that expenditure is for aircraft which have not yet been commissioned for active service.

I am not going to go through the whole chart because it is there to be seen and to be quickly understood, but I would point to the figures on small arms. Commitments for small arms, rifles and machine guns of different types, amount to $25,200,000 yet the amount spent is only $1,200,000. That indicates a very dangerous delay in those weapons which are the basic weapons of defence for our land forces. After all, it is frequently said that the infantry is still the queen of battle, and that in the end it is the infantry upon which we must rely. No matter how effective our air or other forces may be, it is the infantry which completes the task, and these are the basic and essential weapons of the infantry. We did not get very much detailed information in the committee on defence expenditures because we met so late in the session and only for a few meetings, because of the decision of the majority of the committee that we would not meet more often. Nevertheless, there is information which I think every hon. member of this house should bear in mind because when we talk of the effectiveness of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization we must not forget that its effectiveness to preserve peace will depend upon what we have in reality and not on what we simply have on order.

I would point out that in the statement tabled with the committee on defence expenditures on December 13 by the deputy minister of defence production we found, for instance, that in the case of small arms there is as yet no service rifle on order in any Canadian factory or government arsenal. May I repeat that. There is as yet no Canadian rifle on order, let alone in production, in any Canadian arsenal or factory. When I speak of a service rifle I am not, of course, speaking of the ·22 calibre rifle or of the other rifles that are used for special purposes. I have before me the list, and it shows that the only rifles on order in Canada with any Canadian arsenal or factory are 1,176 ·22 calibre rifles—which are only practice or target rifles or for use of that kind—and 4,440 survival weapons of ·22 calibre which are for the use of aircrew or other military detachments who might find it necessary to live on the country if they were separated from their ordinary sources of supply.

May I point out that there are no rifles on firm order from anyone else. I am talking now about service rifles with the meaning applied to that term that is understood by the Department of National Defence. A tentative order was placed with the United States government for 20,951 ·30 calibre rifles, but that order has been suspended. In other words, at this stage of this great crisis the Canadian government has not only no firm order for rifles for our infantry or other armed services—that is, of the hard-hitting service pattern—but it has no orders placed in our own country for the manufacture of those rifles. In fact there is good reason to believe that the Canadian government has not yet made up its mind as to which calibre of rifle it is going to make.

That, I suggest, is a situation which should cause grave concern to every Canadian at a time when we are expecting the huge expenditures that we are approving to produce positive and real results in the form of armed and trained men ready to take their part in the defence of freedom. I can only repeat that it is the actual military strength we show that offers the one real hope of peace.

Then may I also point out that while orders have been placed with Canadian Arsenals Limited for Browning ·5 machine guns, although these defence preparations have been under way for so long, and although the value of the commitments for those is $14,601,228, all that has been spent up to this month is $26,620. The very insignificance of that figure shows how little progress has been made in equipping our defence forces with machine guns of this type.

Then when we come to artillery weapons, which are the other major weapons of the land forces, I find in the same report, tabled on December 13, the only artillery weapons for which orders have been placed in Canada, either with any Canadian arsenal or with any private industry, are the following:

Supplier	Item	Estimated Value	Expenditure
Sorel Industries Ltd.	138 105mm. howitzers	$1,500,000	nil
Sorel Industries Ltd.	29 155mm. howitzers	650,000	nil

I would not wish to pass through these statements without saying that certain artillery weapons have been ordered from the United States government in comparatively small amounts. For instance, I find that in the case of 59 4·2" mortars, ordered from the United States government at an estimated cost of $141,070, there is no indication of the amount spent; although I understand that in this case there may have been some expenditure because it was under a blanket payment to the United States government. It may well be that all those guns have actually been acquired.

I would remind the members of this house, Mr. Speaker, that we have constantly heard Canada described, in this house and elsewhere, as one of the great arsenals of democracy. If we are not preparing to be the arsenal for our own defence forces, we are not preparing very effectively to be the arsenal for the defence forces of other countries. As we accept these responsibilities, with the clear evidence that the people of Canada support the members of this house in the acceptance of these responsibilities, with our industrial skill, with the capacity that was demonstrated by the workers and the technicians of this country to produce arms and military equipment during the last war, it is the duty of the members of this house to insist that we shall be producing the rifles, machine guns, artillery weapons and other things that we have made in the past and can make now as well as any other country in the world. This is so closely related to this whole problem that I hope that when we return for the next session there will be very positive evidence that the delay in facing this issue has changed to vigorous action, and that the tremendous productive skill and capacity of this country will be at work supplying our defence forces with the weapons and equipment they need.

I can only express the hope that the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) in closing this debate will go somewhat further than he did when a question was asked earlier today. He was asked what position Canada had taken in the vote on December 22 in Paris when Greece, by a very narrow margin, became a member of the United Nations security council. We were told that those meetings are secret, and for that reason Canada's vote should not be disclosed. The governments of the member nations of the United Nations know how Canada voted. The fact is that I believe most of the members of this house know how Canada voted. After all, these things are discussed and should be discussed. I believe the members of this house have a right to know officially, as most of them know privately, and I believe the people of Canada have the right to know how Canada voted on this particular occasion. After all, it has been the subject of discussion in the press.

I would refer to a Canadian Press dispatch of December 20 from Paris which had this to say:

> Greece narrowly won a seat today as eastern Europe's representative, in record-breaking balloting for a place on the United Nations security council.
>
> Strong United States backing of Greece over Byelorussia was reported to have finally won over Britain and France to help break the deadlock.
> Besides the temporary British-American split on the touchy issue, the commonwealth was divided on the question, informed sources said. Although the balloting was secret, these sources said Canada, Australia, New Zealand and Pakistan backed Byelorussia.

I grant that the government is not bound by a statement in a Canadian Press dispatch to the effect that informed sources said that Canada voted for the election of Byelorussia. But let us face reality. This Canadian Press dispatch was published right across Canada, and I am sure most Canadians accept that statement as being accurate. If it is not accurate let the minister say so. If it is accurate, then let him say so as well. The reasons for secrecy while the discussions and voting are taking place are obvious. There are difficulties enough in dealing with matters of this kind without the pressures which might perhaps be exerted if some of these discussions were not held in secret. I can see reasons for that secrecy up to the point when the vote is taken. But I believe that after the vote has been taken, a vote known to the government of every member of the United Nations, the members of this and other legislative bodies have the right to know how Canada did vote.

I have no hesitation in saying that I think it would be the strong opinion of the people of Canada that Canada should not have backed Byelorussia for election to the security council as against Greece, whom we now welcome as a member of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. Temporizing of that kind was the thing that brought on the last world war. Temporizing has not stopped any dictator or military aggressor in the past. In 1940 and 1941, as well as the years that followed, we all said with deep conviction that never again if it was within our power would we see the word "appeasement" written in letters of blood across the face of the world. I, for one, am unable to see what it could be but appeasement to support the election of Byelorussia, which for all practical purposes is an integral part of Russia itself, and at a time when Greece, the birthplace of democracy, was about to be welcomed as a member of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. I hope that in his reply, on this day when we welcome Greece into this fellowship, the minister will recognize that secrecy has no meaning now and that the members of this house are entitled to know where Canada stood, so they may express their opinion with knowledge as to what course they would hope Canada would follow in the future in regard to the inclusion of any countries which have demonstrated that they believe in aggression if they can get away with it.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I must inform the house that if the minister speaks now he will close the debate.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): It remains for me to close this discussion, and I suppose in a sense to end this session. In doing so I should like in the first place, on behalf of the government, to echo, though in less eloquent terms than those which have been used by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew), the feeling that we must all have when we contemplate the acceptance by this house of a protocol which will add Greece and Turkey to our numbers in the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. Canada, Mr. Speaker, owes much to the glory that was Greece two thousand years ago, and owes much to the courage that is Greece today. Therefore we welcome the membership of Greece in this association as strengthening and deepening the ties which already unite our two countries.

As for Turkey, the Turks have shown, both with us and against us, that they are steady and do not panic, and that they do not frighten easily. These are qualities, Mr. Speaker, which will stand us all in good stead today, qualities I may add which I learned during the years 1915 and 1916 in the Mediterranean that Turkey possessed.

A good many points have been raised in the discussion of this resolution which went somewhat beyond the purpose of the resolution itself, as indeed it was desirable to do. They probably deserve a longer reply than I am able to give today. I know the house regrets—this was specifically mentioned by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low)—that a discussion of this kind had to come in the closing hours of the session. All of us could have wished that this discussion—it is hardly a debate—had taken place earlier, and that there had been more time for questioning. I know hon. members will realize that it has not been the policy of this government, in matters of foreign affairs, to conceal anything from this house or from the country that could be told to the house or to the country. And if I do not go into all these matters in as much detail in the closing moments of this session as I would desire and the house would desire, I am sure it will be appreciated that it is owing to the circumstances in which we find ourselves at this moment. However, I would like to deal with some of the points that have been raised.

In the first place, I should like to comment on one or two of the observations made by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew). He spent some time on our armament program, and what he considered to be the inadequacies of the program and the progress that has been made in regard to it. I do not intend to go into that in any detail except to make one reference to rifles. It may be that our production of rifles in this country is not as great as any of us would desire; but it is also the case, Mr. Speaker—and I think this is well known to members of the house—that the Canadian government have been doing everything they can to bring about in the North Atlantic countries standardization of this weapon so that in an emergency we would all be using the same rifle, something that is obviously desirable. I think it is fair to say that we have taken a very active part in attempting to standardize rifles, but so far that standardization has not met with agreement on the part of all the members of the council. I should think it would be obviously sensible not to begin the manufacture of a rifle in Canada which a few months from now might be not the rifle agreed upon as the one to be used by the North Atlantic powers. We must hope that agreement will be reached very shortly indeed. Possibly a good deal of progress may be made in this important matter as a result of the visit Mr. Churchill is going to make to Washington very shortly.

The leader of the opposition also said that this was a good time for me to tell the house—I have been asked this already today—how we voted in the recent elections to the security council of the United Nations at the general assembly in Paris. It is, I think, a desirable principle that voting in these elections to United Nations agencies should be kept secret. We do vote in secret. Delegations are not supposed to know how other delegations vote, and there seems to me to be a good reason for that. The leader of the opposition himself stated that otherwise countries might be subjected, especially the smaller countries, to intolerable pressure, and the independence which they desire to exercise as members of the United Nations might be prejudiced if voting became known in this way. But, as the leader of the opposition has said, the voting is now over. It took place some time ago, and this might be a good occasion to inform the house of the action we took. I think he said—and I hope I am quoting him correctly—that he understood it was already known in Paris how we voted. The report in the newspaper which he read indicates that at least some people in Paris or some people in Canada do not know how we voted because that report was inaccurate.

When the first ballot was taken at the elections to the security council in Paris the Canadian delegation voted for Greece, Mr. Speaker; and when the eighteenth ballot, I think the last, was taken, Canada voted for Greece.

Mr. Sinclair: Drew is wrong as usual.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, even having regard to the source of that interjection, and remembering that there is a Hansard record, I do not intend to permit that to pass unchallenged. There was nothing wrong, and it was a most unjustified remark, because if the member had been paying any attention—

Mr. Sinclair: I was.

Mr. Drew: —he would have known that I was referring to a press report and to a common understanding which prompted an earlier question. And what I have already said will indicate that no one in the house welcomes more than I do this assurance as to the course Canada followed in this case.

Mr. Pearson: Now, Mr. Speaker, if I may turn to the remarks of the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) who asked me a good many questions, some of them very searching ones indeed: The hon. member expressed the hope, in commenting on the North Atlantic council meeting in Rome, that we would not have any further intermediate meetings of the council; that at the next meeting in Lisbon—and I think I am quoting his words—we would come out with something worth while. Well, I echo that hope, Mr. Speaker. I should like to mention, however, as indeed the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) mentioned, that it is sometimes desirable in matters of this kind not to act too quickly, but to act surely and to act right. Possibly the delays that may have taken place in the consideration of some of these vitally important matters may be well justified if at the next meeting, or at an early meeting of the North Atlantic council, we come to the right decision.

I would also like to point out that the North Atlantic council has already come out with something worth while. It will be a great mistake indeed if the impression is created that this organization has not a record of constructive achievement to its credit already. After all, this organization is not very old, I think something under two years. During that time its members have received and have confidence in the assurance of the collective support they will get from each other. They have drawn up plans to make that support effective, and they have made very considerable progress—though not as much progress as any one of them would like—in implementing those plans. We have an integrated force now for the defence of the Atlantic area, and we have a supreme command under a supreme commander—and he is supreme in more ways than one—General Eisenhower. I think by what we have already done in the North Atlantic organization a contribution has been made not only in Europe but in the whole world to peace and stability. This organization is not a failure and is not going to be a failure. It has had its disappointments, of course, but it has taken on one of the biggest collective jobs in history, and in two years it has made a real contribution to that job.

I agree with the leader of the opposition and with other hon. members who have said that what we must do in pursuing our work with the North Atlantic organization is to remove uncertainty, to remove hesitation if possible, to leave no country in any doubt as to what will happen if that country contemplates or undertakes aggression. In emphasizing this point, and rightly so, the hon. member for Peel used the illustration of Korea, and asked what would have happened if there had been no uncertainty in Korea when the aggression began there a year and a half ago; and he said that it was the hesitation as to what might happen in Korea which probably brought about that aggression. That may or may not be true. The corollary to that statement surely is that hesitation is almost inevitable when one is weak. And in Korea the free nations were very weak indeed. In order not to have that kind of hesitation in Europe we must get strong; and we are getting stronger in the North Atlantic organization.

The hon. member for Peel went on to ask about the new commitments that we were undertaking in accepting this protocol, new commitments for Canada. I think he put it in this way, by saying that they were the most far-flung military commitments we have ever contemplated. That may be true; but I would point out—indeed, I think hon. members would agree with me—that the absence of commitments does not save us from involvement in war. History has shown that. Effective commitments, however, might make war impossible. And by adding to our commitments in the way which we are now doing, in theory at least, we are adopting a course which may make them unlikely ever to be discharged. In other words, these new commitments are commitments for peace. It is because of this that there is such unanimity in this house and indeed in the country in regard to these new commitments.

The hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low) in discussing this aspect of the question said that while he did not object to these new commitments, for the reasons I have indicated, the people of Canada should be aware of their implications. I agree entirely they should be aware of those implications; and when they are aware of them they will realize, as we do, that they are commitments to prevent war, to make war impossible. As such we all welcome them.

In so far as the new members of NATO are concerned—we hope that shortly they will become new members—the hon. member for Peel said this morning they should come in as partners. That is what the North Atlantic organization is. It is based upon partnership. Greece and Turkey will accept all the obligations as they will enjoy all the privileges of membership, and we are happy to have them with us in that capacity.

The hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot), who is not now in his seat, indicated that inside the North Atlantic organization there may be growing up a sort of inner group of members who were dominating the organization, and he suggested that the organization was losing the basis of equality on which it was founded. I assure the house that that is not so. Naturally in any organization of this kind, any international organization which has as its members states so far apart in power and responsibility as the United States of America and Iceland, some members will have to accept greater responsibility than others, and some members will exercise greater influence than others. That is obvious, and in the circumstances it is probably desirable. But around the conference table we are all equal, and no one attempts to dominate anybody else. In that respect I might say the North Atlantic council is in pleasant contrast to some other international committees which come to one's mind.

On other matters not so closely related to the protocol the hon. member for Peel was inclined to be constructively critical about what had been going on. He contrasted the willingness of the government to accept these new commitments in a new area in the Middle East—and it was to that I believe he was referring, if he did not actually say it—to our indifference or our coolness with respect to the meeting of commonwealth countries called not so long ago to discuss defence in the same general area. He felt there was some inconsistency between the two positions. I do not believe there was any inconsistency. We have been discussing this matter of the admission of Greece and Turkey for many months. We have contemplated alternative arrangements which did not seem suitable. We have come to the conclusion that this is the best way to effect the greatest defensive strength in our alliance. We have accepted them wholeheartedly.

But that does not necessarily mean that our military commitments as such will extend to that area in the same way that we have accepted such commitments in western Europe. It might well be—and I am not dogmatic about this, because it is dangerous as well as unwise to be dogmatic in these matters—that the military commitments for that part of the North Atlantic treaty area—it is difficult to think of the eastern Mediterranean as the North Atlantic area—it might well be that the military commitments out there and the military planning and the military arrangements there may not involve for Canada the same kind of participation or planning as is the case in western Europe.

Then the hon. member asked me if we were contemplating any further extensions of the North Atlantic organization. My answer to that is that so far as I know we are not contemplating any further extensions at this time. It is true in a sense that by extending the area of our commitments to the eastern Mediterranean we are getting away from the geographical concept of the North Atlantic pact. But, in the strict sense, the North Atlantic pact never was a regional scheme so much as it was a scheme for collective defence under article 51 of the United Nations charter.

There is no reason in theory, although there may be arguments against it in fact, why an association of this kind should not ask into its membership any member of the United Nations which wishes to accept the price of membership under article 51. I am not suggesting that this should be done, and I am not suggesting that what the hon. member for Peel called an encirclement of the globe by these collective security arrangements under article 51 will take place. But there is nothing to prevent it if in the future it is desired that it should be done in the interests of national security and in the interests of peace everywhere.

Then at the end of his speech the hon. member asked me four or five questions about the operations of NATO itself. He was curious about the Canadian relationship to what has been referred to as the T.C.C. report. He indicated on the basis of a press dispatch—and I am not quarrelling with him for this—that that report showed we had not met our commitments as a member of the North Atlantic organization.

I would like to assure the house, Mr. Speaker, that no such interpretation of the T.C.C. report would be justified. I can assure the house also that we are meeting our commitments under the North Atlantic pact, and that we will continue to do so. The T.C.C. report—I tried to explain it this morning, although possibly not sufficiently—was in the first instance a document drawn up by three of its members who were chosen by the twelve to be their executive committee. It was a report which went into the question of military requirements and the resources of the various countries which could be devoted to meeting those requirements.

There was a military section of the report—a screening and costing study, it was called—which went into the military plans to see if they were realistic, to see if those that had already been drawn up by the military committee of the North Atlantic council were realistic, whether they could be cut or whether there should be additions to them.

Having done that the report examined what was called the political and economic capabilities of the various members to see if those capabilities matched the military requirements. When this study was completed by the committee of three, after they had discussed the various national programs with the national representatives, their report, as a report of the small committee, was then sent to the full committee of twelve. We have now had an opportunity of examining that report at a meeting of the committee of twelve. It has been sent back to us for governmental consideration. After being considered by the governments there will be another committee meeting on January 15. At that time we have reason to hope and believe there will be a report for the North Atlantic council which will be unanimously agreed to by all the members.

Until that report is received and until some member of the council gets up and states that he is not able to accept it there can be no question of any member of the council being charged with inability or lack of desire to meet its commitments. That is the situation so far as Canada is concerned, and indeed so far as the other countries are concerned.

My hon. friend also asked me how many months behind schedule were the NATO military plans and whether there was likely to be a breakdown of those plans. Although I have not the time to go into the matter, I would say there has been no breakdown of NATO military plans and it is not realistic at the present time to talk about those plans being behind schedule. The plans are being changed continually by the military committees of the organization, and they may be changed further as a result of this T.C.C. report. In some respects the plans are being speeded up over the original plans and in other respects they are being extended. I am afraid that will be the situation for years ahead. They will be continually reviewed. At the present time no member country is satisfied with the progress that is being made, and I hope that we will continue to be impatient with that progress. But it is not accurate to say that there is any likelihood of any of these plans breaking down or any likelihood of the NATO organization breaking down in any respect.

I should like to turn for a moment to the remarks of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell). The hon. member was preoccupied with the lack of progress in the non-military aspect of co-operation, and was anxious to know what we were doing in regard to expediting and increasing that kind of co-operation between members. I did not say very much about that this morning but I can add a few words to what I said then. As the hon. member and house know, non-military co-operation under the North Atlantic pact has been one of the primary objectives of Canadian participation in the pact. We have never faltered in our desire to see article 2 implemented to the fullest possible extent. It was partly as a result of our initiative that a special council committee was set up last September to go into the whole question. That committee got to work in London in October and had a report for the Rome meeting in November. It was obvious that in the course of four or five weeks that committee could not make a very exhaustive report on the subject, but it has made a beginning and there will be a fuller report made to the Lisbon meeting.

One of the difficulties that confronts us when we go into this question of non-military co-operation is to make sure that in building up the co-operation which is desirable within NATO we do not prejudice the co-operation which exists between NATO countries and countries that are not members of NATO. We do not want to add another overlapping agency to a lot of other agencies. Also, some members are interested particularly in certain aspects of non-military co-operation that they desire to push, and other members have their own non-military interests. One or two of the countries in our committee for instance were particularly interested in using the NATO organization for migration purposes and the movement of labour. That is a subject of importance to all members, but it is one that cannot be settled in a week or a month or possibly a year.

Great interest has also been displayed in the possibility of improving political consultation among all members of NATO so that no one member of the organization would be confronted with an important political decision by another country without there having been an opportunity for consultation in the council itself. We are trying to work out ways and means by which that kind of consultation may be carried on almost continuously. This may require a reorganization of NATO itself. It may even require having the North Atlantic council in continuous session, just as the security council of the United Nations is in continuous session.

I want to assure you, however, that it will not mean that the foreign ministers will be in continuous session at the North Atlantic council and away from their homes. What it may mean is that the authority of the deputies who now constitute a subordinate body will have to be increased so we will have something like continuous sessions where the representatives present will have sufficient authority to take action on behalf of their governments. This again is a decision which cannot be reached easily or hurriedly by governments. In Rome we were certainly not at a point where we could all agree on that.

I mention these things merely to show that we are not neglecting the implementation of article 2. We are not unaware of the importance of forms of co-operation other than military.

The hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low) indicated in his interesting contribution to the discussion that he was worried to some extent because people in this country were not aware of the full implications of what we are doing. I agree that one of the important tasks ahead of the NATO organization is providing for public information. That was one of the subjects we discussed in the committee of five, and it is one to which we are giving a great deal of attention. As this international organization develops we do not want to give the impression that we are working behind the scenes. If we do not have public opinion behind us in this development we will not succeed. It seems to me to be the part of elementary wisdom that we let our people know everything we possibly can about what we are doing and what we are trying to do. I assure the house that that is very much in the mind of the Canadian government.

I think, Mr. Speaker, that this is all I can say at this time in regard to this matter. However before I sit down perhaps I might say one word on the general situation as I found it in Europe after a visit of some weeks to the United Nations assembly, to the NATO council and a week or ten days in London. I would hesitate very much to toss off an ex cathedra opinion on a subject of such transcendental importance as the peace of the world.

Mr. Fulton: So long as you do not claim infallibility, it will be all right.

Mr. Pearson: I certainly do not claim that. The impression I brought back—I think the same impression was also in the minds of others who came back with me, such as the Secretary of State of the United States—was that there has been no deterioration in the situation over the last year. To put it at its lowest, the gap has not widened and we are holding our own. If you can get much comfort out of that, you are entitled to it. However, we will not continue to hold our own unless we build up, as we are trying to do, our collective strength. With all its disappointments and apparent setbacks, there can be no agency more effective for that purpose than the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. We are making that organization stronger, not only militarily—military strength has never provided a permanent foundation for peace—but also politically. We are building up an association of states who are willing to work together in peace and who, if they have to, will work and fight together in war. We are getting stronger and that strength has increased and will increase with the membership of Greece and Turkey in our organization. That strength is for defence alone, that strength is for negotiation. It is not for anything else no matter what the enemies of peace may say. We are putting power behind peace. We are doing that, however, in the knowledge that peace ultimately must rest on something greater even than power.

Motion agreed to.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

A message was delivered by Major C. R. Lamoureux, Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, as follows:

Mr. Speaker, the Right Honourable the Deputy Governor General desires the immediate attendance of this honourable house in the chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly, Mr. Speaker with the house went up to the Senate chamber.

In the Senate chamber, the Deputy Governor General was pleased to give, in His Majesty's name, the royal assent to the following bills:

An act to amend the Combines Investigation Act.

An act to amend the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, 1939.

An act to provide for privileges and immunities in respect of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization.

An act to amend the Public Works Act.

To these bills the royal assent was pronounced by the Clerk of the Senate in the following words:

In His Majesty's name the Right Honourable the Deputy Governor General doth assent to these bills.

PROROGATION OF PARLIAMENT

After which the Deputy Governor General was pleased to close the fifth session of the twenty-first parliament of Canada with the following speech:

Honourable Members of the Senate:

Members of the House of Commons:

The people of Canada have been deeply gratified by the rapid and steady recovery of the King's health. The transcontinental tour of Their Royal Highnesses The Princess Elizabeth and the Duke of Edinburgh was the occasion for a universal and heartfelt manifestation of the attachment of the Canadian people to the crown and the royal family.

Throughout the session, my ministers have continued to give constant attention to the policy of seeking the security of our country in co-operation with other peace-loving peoples through the establishment of real and lasting peace.

To resist aggression there and to discourage aggression elsewhere, armed forces of our country, combined with the United Nations' contingents from other countries, are performing their duties in Korea with valour and distinction. Meanwhile, negotiations to bring about a cease-fire have been undertaken and are continuing.

Elements of the army and air force have been dispatched to Europe to form part of the integrated force under the command of General Eisenhower.

In furtherance of our international policies, certain of my ministers have been absent from Canada for sessions of the general assembly and other organs of the United Nations, for meetings of the council and other organs of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization; and for the negotiation of a Pacific fisheries treaty with the United States and Japan.

You have approved a protocol which provides for the extending of an invitation to Greece and Turkey to join the North Atlantic alliance.

You have enacted legislation to implement agreements between the parties to the North Atlantic treaty regarding the status of their forces. You also enacted a measure respecting the Canadian forces.

The Pension Act has been amended to provide for substantial increases in the rates of pension for disabled veterans and widows of veterans and for their dependents.

In response to the main purpose for which you were summoned to the present session, you have enacted a measure to provide for the payment, from January 1, 1952, of pensions as a matter of right and without a means test to all Canadians with appropriate residence qualifications who have attained the age of seventy years.

You have given your approval to a measure to prohibit persons engaged in manufacturing, buying or selling articles or commodities from fixing specific or minimum resale prices.

You have authorized the creation of a corporation to be known as the St. Lawrence seaway authority for the purpose of constructing, operating and maintaining, either alone or in co-operation with the United States, a deep waterway between Montreal and lake Erie.

You have also approved an agreement between the government of Canada and the government of the province of Ontario with respect to the development by Ontario, concurrently with an appropriate authority in the United States, of hydroelectric power in the international rapids section of the St. Lawrence river.

The Railway Act, the Canadian National-Canadian Pacific Act and the Maritime Freight Rates Act have been amended in general conformity with the recommendations of the royal commission on transportation.

You have made legislative provision for a limited guarantee of short-term bank credit to grain producers in the prairie provinces, in order to meet temporary financial difficulties resulting from inclement weather during the harvest season.

You have passed legislation embodying recommendations of the royal commission on national development in the arts, letters and sciences with respect to radio broadcasting. You have also revised the legislation respecting the national gallery of Canada along the lines of the recommendations of the commission. My government is continuing to give careful consideration to other recommendations in the commission's report.

You enacted measures respecting the agricultural products board, Canada lands surveys, the revised statutes of Canada and the international convention for the regulation of whaling.

Amendments have been made to the Dominion Elections Act; the Judges Act, 1946; the Exchequer Court Act; the Supreme Court Act; the Public Printing and Stationery Act; the Bills of Exchange Act; the Canada-United States of America Tax Convention Acts of 1943 and 1944; the Civil Service Act; the Toronto Harbour Commissioners Act; and the North Fraser Harbour Commissioners Act.

You enacted a measure providing for the financial administration of the government of Canada, the audit of the public accounts and the financial control of crown corporations.

Honourable Members of the Senate:

Members of the House of Commons:

May Divine Providence continue its blessings upon our nation and upon the efforts of peace-loving peoples to establish the rule of law in the relations between nations.

This concluded the fifth session of the twenty-first parliament.
