CANADA

House of Commons Debates

OFFICIAL REPORT—REVISED EDITION

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Speaker: HON. ALBERT SÉVIGNY.

Wednesday, January 12, 1916.

This being the day on which Parliament is convoked by proclamation of the Governor General for the despatch of business, and the members of the House being assembled:

The Clerk read to the House a letter from the Governor General's Secretary informing him that the Chief Justice of Canada, in his capacity as Deputy Governor General, would proceed to the Senate Chamber this day at 3 p.m. to open the session.

A message was delivered by Lieut.-Col. Ernest J. Chambers, Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod:

The Chief Justice of Canada, in his capacity as Deputy Governor General, desires the immediate attendance of this honourable House in the Senate Chamber.

Accordingly, the House went up to the Senate Chamber, when the Speaker of the Senate said:

Honourable Gentlemen of the Senate:

Gentlemen of the House of Commons:

I have it in command to let you know that His Royal Highness the Governor General does not see fit to declare the causes of his summoning the present Parliament of Canada until the Speaker of the House of Commons shall have been chosen according to law; but to-morrow, at the hour of three o'clock in the afternoon, His Royal Highness will declare the causes of his calling this Parliament.

VACANCIES.

The Clerk of the House, standing on the lower step below the Speaker's chair, said: I have the honour to inform the House that, during the recess, the following notifications of vacancies in the representation have been received:

Of the Electoral District of Kings, N.S., by the resignation of Arthur De Witt Foster, Esq.

Of the Electoral District of Carleton, Ontario, by the resignation of William F. Garland, Esq.

Of the Electoral District of Hamilton East, by the death of the Hon. Samuel Barker.

Of the Electoral District of Lisgar, by the resignation of William H. Sharpe, Esq.

Of the Electoral District of Brandon, by the resignation of Sir James A. M. Aikins, Kt.

Of the Electoral District of Prince, P.E.I., by the death of James W. Richards, Esq.

Of the Electoral District of Hochelaga, by the acceptance of an office of emolument under the Crown of the Hon. Louis Coderre.

Of the Electoral District of the East Riding of the County of Grey, by the Hon. Thomas S. Sproule having been summoned to the Senate.

Of the Electoral District of Restigouche, by the death of James Reid, Esq.

Of the Electoral District of Lincoln, by the death of Edward Arthur Lancaster, Esq.

NEW MEMBER.

The Clerk said: I have also the honour to inform the House that I have received from the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery a certificate of the election and return of Hon. Esioff L. Patenaude for the Electoral District of Hochelaga.

ELECTION OF SPEAKER.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER (Acting Prime Minister): Dr. Flint, we have just been informed of the vacancy that has occurred in the Speaker's office, and the reasons therefor. I am now, I believe, one of the two oldest sitting members of the House—not in point of age—I am not alluding to that—but in point of service. With the exception, I think, of my right hon. friend opposite (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), I am the oldest. I have had the pleasure of sitting and working in this House under the guidance and direction of eight different Speakers, four of them belonging to one political party, and four having their origin in another political party. Our system of Speakership here is different from that which obtains in Great Britain; each has its advantages, and, perhaps, each has some disadvantages. I made allusion to my own experience simply to follow it with the remark that it gives me great pleasure to say that during thirty-four years of service under eight different Speakers I have found that these Speakers have worthily upheld the traditions which cluster around the Speaker's Chair; that, under their guidance and direction, the balances have been fairly held as between the two political parties, and that equal justice has been dealt out to both. If disadvantages and difficulties have existed in connection with the Speaker's tenure of office it may be said to their credit that they have overcome them, and that they have maintained the dignity of the office according to its traditions.

To-day I have the honour to submit the name of Albert Sévigny, Esq., member for the county of Dorchester, as Speaker of this House. Dr. Sévigny, who, comparatively speaking, is one of the youngest of our members, has, during the short period of his service in this House, by his pleasant personality, by his culture, by his affability and capacity, won for himself the respect and esteem of gentlemen on both sides of the House. I have every hope and confidence, and not the least doubt, that the hon. gentleman who is soon, I hope, to take his place in the Speaker's Chair, will uphold the honour, dignity and traditions of that important office. I beg to move, therefore, seconded by the Hon. Thomas Chase Casgrain:

That Albert Sévigny, Esq., member for the Electoral District of Dorchester, do take the Chair of this House as Speaker.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Dr. Flint, to those who followed closely the labours of the House last session, it became evident that the health of the then Speaker was failing him, and would no longer enable him to fulfil the arduous duties of the Chair. We were not surprised, therefore, to learn that the hon. gentleman had been summoned to that higher sphere, the Upper Chamber. Since Confederation, it has been the privilege of the Administration in office to select the member of the House who should be the presiding officer, and to make that selection from among the most prominent and most devoted of its followers. It has been stated by the hon. gentleman who leads the House in the absence of the Prime Minister—who, we hope, will soon recover from his illness and again take his place in the House—that our system of appointing the Speaker is different from the British system. In some respects it is. I am not sure that our system is not inferior to the British system; in any case, I agree with all that my hon. friend has said as to the character and ability of those of our colleagues who have in years past had the honour of being Speakers of the Canadian House of Commons. My hon. friend has spoken of his having had the privilege of sitting in this House under eight different Speakers. I am a little older than he—not only in point of years, but in point of service as well—a privilege of which I am not at all proud; in fact, I would, if possible, pass it over to him. At any rate, it has been my privilege to serve under eight or nine different Speakers, and I can bear out all that my hon. friend has said as to the manner in which they have upheld the dignity of the office. Whether they have been of one political party or of another, they have performed their duties to their own credit, to the great advantage of the House of Commons, and to the honour of the Canadian people.

As has been stated by my hon. friend, our first duty to-day is to select a new presiding officer for the House of Commons. My hon. friend has told us that the Government's choice has fallen on the hon. member for Dorchester (Mr. Sévigny). Considering the circumstances of his coming into this House, I think it is a fit sequence that he should be elected to the higher office of Speaker. When Dr. Sproule took the Speaker's Chair he was an ardent Tory; the hon. member for Dorchester when he came to this House was an ardent Nationalist. As extremes always meet, it seems to be fitting that Mr. Speaker Sévigny should follow Mr. Speaker Sproule. And what an evolution this is since the year 1911! If, in the year 1911, the Nationalist candidate in the county of Dorchester, now the Conservative member for the same county, had heard the prediction that he would accept an office, either high or low, from a Conservative Government presided over by Sir Robert Borden, I am sure that the hon. gentleman would have been the very first to protest against such an idea. I am not sure that he would not have taken it even as an insult, because those of us who come from the province of Quebec know that my hon. friend carried on a campaign of sulphur and brimstone, not only against the Liberal party, but, in equal measure, against the Conservative party. My hon. friend denounced the nefarious policy of Laurier—which was a matter of course with him—and also the nefarious policy of Borden just as vigorously, perhaps even more vigorously. He assailed without measure the navy, and I think he was pledged to the repeal of the Naval Service Act. I understand that he also opposed every form of participation by Canada in the affairs of Great Britain. He entered this House still breathing heavily, threatening still. But when once in this House he took his seat behind the Treasury benches—and behind the Treasury benches things which he had condemned took with him another shape. No one heard him in this House denounce the nefarious policy of Borden. I think he ceased to denounce the navy. Certainly he acquiesced in the participation of Canada in the war. He became a repentant sinner, and I never saw a sinner—and I have met some sinners in my time—who derived so much comfort out of repentance. My hon. friend never did penance in sackcloth and ashes. He was within the rays of the ministerial sun; he luxuriated in the tall and fat grasses of ministerial pasture; he was the recipient of some marked ministerial favours. I do not say this by way of complaining of his conversion—far be it from me to do so. If I have any fault to find with him it is that his conversion did not go far enough, because I am not aware that he ever, in the County of Dorchester, confessed his sins to his electors and begged pardon for having so led them astray in 1911.

But this is a matter which more concerns gentlemen on the other side of the House than those on our side. To-day my hon. friend is to be elected by this House to the chief office which is in its power. He has all the abilities and talents to perform the duties well—I give him this credit. It has been my privilege to know him for some time, even before he entered this House, and it is a pleasure to me to believe—indeed, to be sure—that he will discharge the duties of the office with credit and in the manner of his predecessors. However we may have differed from him in the past, the moment he assumes this Chair he becomes Speaker of the House of Commons, and entitled to all honour and all respect; and, so far as this side of the House is concerned, it will be our duty—nay, it will be our pleasure—to do what His Majesty's Opposition always have done so long as I have been in this House—we shall deem it our duty to give him every assistance to maintain the dignity and traditions of his office, and as well to maintain the dignities and privileges and rights of the House of Commons.

The motion being put to the House,

The Clerk of the House declared the motion carried in the affirmative, nemine contradicente, and Albert Sévigny, Esquire, member for the electoral division of Dorchester, duly elected to the Chair of the House.

Mr. Sévigny was conducted from his seat in the House to the Speaker's Chair by Sir George Foster and Hon. T. Chase Casgrain.

Mr. SPEAKER-ELECT: Allow me to thank you for having raised me to the honourable position of Speaker of this House. While I appreciate more than I can express the distinction conferred upon me, I am fully aware of the responsibilities and the difficulties that are attached thereto.

With your kind indulgence and advice, the task which I am called upon to assume will be made lighter; and, for my part, I will endeavour to be worthy of the goodwill you have manifested towards me in electing me unanimously to the Chair; it will be also my aim to justify the confidence you have reposed in me.

My predecessor had the advantage of many years of experience in this House, which was of great benefit to us all. His decisions, as well as those of the other distinguished legislators who have occupied the position of Speaker of this honourable House, will assist me in maintaining the dignity of this office, and in presiding, with justice and impartiality, over your deliberations, as well as in preserving the integrity and honour of the House of Commons.

The Sergeant-at-Arms then laid the Mace upon the Table of the House.

MEMBER INTRODUCED.

Hon. Esioff Leon Patenaude, member-elect for the electoral district of Hochelaga, by Hon. T. Chase Casgrain and Hon. Sir George Foster.

REPORT.

Report of the Postmaster General for the year ended March 31, 1915 (English and French versions).—Hon. T. Chase Casgrain.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I do not think that the presentation of a report at this stage is in order, but we will not raise the point: we will commend the hon. gentleman for his diligence.

On motion of Sir George Foster, the House adjourned at 3.35 p.m.

Thursday, January 13, 1916.

The House met at Three o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

OPENING OF THE SESSION.

Mr. SPEAKER read a communication from the Governor General's Secretary announcing that His Royal Highness would proceed to the Senate Chamber at 3 p.m. on this day for the purpose of formally opening the session of the Dominion Parliament.

A message was delivered by Lieut-Col. Ernest J. Chambers, Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, as follows:

Mr. Speaker, His Royal Highness the Governor General desires the immediate attendance of this honourable House in the Chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly the House went up to the Senate Chamber.

Then the Hon. Albert Sévigny, Speaker-elect, said:

May it please Your Royal Highness:

The House of Commons have elected me as their Speaker, though I am but little able to fulfil the important duties thus assigned to me. —If in the performance of those duties, I should at any time fall into error, I pray that the fault may be imputed to me, and not to the Commons, whose servant I am.

The Honourable the Speaker of the Senate then said:

Mr. Speaker, I am commanded by His Royal Highness the Governor General to assure you that your words and actions will constantly receive from him the most favourable construction.

Then His Royal Highness the Governor General was pleased to open Parliament by a Speech from the Throne.

And the House being returned to the Commons Chamber:

[Mr. Speaker.]

THE GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the House that, when the House did attend His Royal Highness the Governor General this day in the Senate Chamber, His Royal Highness was pleased to make a Speech to both Houses of Parliament. To prevent mistakes I have obtained a copy which is as follows:

Honourable Gentlemen of the Senate:

Gentlemen of the House of Commons:

Since I last addressed you the war in which we are engaged has been continued with unabated vigour and varying fortunes.

The Empire's part therein has been amply maintained at sea by the inspiring achievements of the Navy, and on land by the distinguished valour of the great armies which have enrolled themselves in all parts of His Majesty's Dominions for the common defence of our liberties.

In a spirit of splendid loyalty and unfaltering devotion, India and the Overseas Dominions have vied with each other in co-operating with the Mother Country to achieve this great purpose.

The call to service has evoked a widespread and notable response in Canada. Already 120,000 men have crossed the seas, an equal number is now being actively trained and equipped for service abroad, and a call extending the authorized enlistment to half a million men has been received with warm enthusiasm.

At the front our gallant soldiers have met the enemy in repeated contests, and by their pre-eminent courage and heroic endurance have shed lustre upon their country and upheld its highest traditions.

Equally praiseworthy and impressive has been the self-sacrificing and loyal spirit shown by all the Canadian people who have freely dedicated their manhood and substance to the common defence of the Empire.

The life of the present Parliament expires in the autumn of this year, and, under existing legislation a dissolution and election would be necessary in the early future. My advisers, however, are of the opinion that the wishes of the Canadian people and the present requirements of the war would be best met by avoiding the distraction and confusion consequent upon a general election at so critical a time.

That purpose can only be effected through the medium of legislation by the Parliament of the United Kingdom. A resolution authorizing and requesting the enactment of such legislation as will extend the life of this Parliament for the period of one year will be presented to you.

Measures will be submitted for your consideration to further the effective co-operation of Canada in the defence of the Empire and in the maintenance of this war waged for liberty and lasting peace.

It is a matter for profound thankfulness that Providence has blessed the labours of our husbandmen during the past with the most bountiful harvest in the history of Canada.

Gentlemen of the House of Commons:

The accounts for the last, and the estimates for the next fiscal year will be submitted to you without delay, and you will be asked to make the necessary financial provision for the effective conduct of the war.

Honourable Gentlemen of the Senate:
Gentlemen of the House of Commons:

The high courage, the splendid heroism, and the unalterable determination which have marked the united efforts of all portions of His Majesty's Dominions, during a year of unprecedented strain and effort, justify our supreme confidence in the triumph of our cause and in lasting affirmation of the principles of liberty and justice throughout the world. I commend to your earnest consideration the measures which will be submitted to you for aiding in the great purpose, and I pray that the Divine blessing may rest upon your counsels.

On motion of Sir George Foster, it was ordered that the speech of His Royal Highness the Governor General to both Houses of Parliament be taken into consideration on Monday next, and that this order have precedence over all other business except the introduction of Bills until disposed of.

SELECT STANDING COMMITTEES.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I beg leave to move:

That a special committee be appointed to prepare and report with all convenient speed lists of members to compose the Select Standing Committees of this House under Rule 10; said committee to be composed of Sir Robert Borden, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, Messrs. Reid (Grenville), Casgrain, Pugsley, Stanfield and Pardee, and that that portion of Rule 10 limiting the number of members of the said committee be suspended in relation thereto.

Motion agreed to.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Bill No. 1, respecting the Administration of Oaths of Office.—Sir George Foster.

REPORTS AND PAPERS.

Joint report of the Librarians of Parliament.—Mr. Speaker.

Report of the Department of Trade and Commerce, Part I, for the year ended March 31, 1915.—Sir George Foster.

Report of the Department of Public Works for the year ended March 31, 1915.—Hon. Robert Rogers.

Report of the Fisheries Branch of the Department of Naval Service for the year ended March 31, 1915 (English and French versions).—Hon. J. D. Hazen.

Report of the Department of Naval Service for the year ended March 31, 1915 (English and French versions).—Hon. J. D. Hazen.

Report of the Department of Marine and Fisheries (Marine) for the year ended March 31, 1915.—Hon. J. D. Hazen.

Report of the Department of the Interior for the year ended March 31, 1915.—Hon. W. J. Roche.

On motion of Sir George Foster, the House adjourned at 3.50 p.m. until Monday next.

Monday, January 17, 1916.

The House met at Three o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

THE GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH.

ADDRESS IN REPLY.

The House proceeded to the consideration of the Speech of His Royal Highness the Governor General at the opening of the session.

Mr. ALFRED THOMPSON (Yukon Territory) rose to move that an Address be presented to His Royal Highness the Governor General offering the humble thanks of this House to His Royal Highness for the gracious speech which he has been pleased to make to both Houses of Parliament. He said:

Mr. Speaker, in rising to move the Address to be presented to His Royal Highness the Governor General, I would like to take the opportunity of thanking the Government for according to me this honour, an honour intended, I take it, not so much a personal one as an honour to the constituency which I have the privilege of representing, the farthest north and the farthest west constituency in this great Canada of ours. In common with my predecessors who have been appointed to this office, I would invoke the grace and charity of the members in respect to my very imperfect address.

Before proceeding further, Sir, permit me to congratulate you upon your elevation to the high office which you at present hold. You are successor to a long line of distinguished men, who have presided over this House with dignity and conducted the affairs with decorum. I was very much pleased the other day to hear the distinguished leader of the Opposition, and the no less distinguished Minister of Trade and Commerce, pay their tribute to those who had held the office which you now fill. They are two of our oldest statesmen, and their testimony as to the manner in which the debates in this House have been presided over by the various Speakers is a tribute indeed to our system of government. I congratulate you, Sir, as the first commoner of Canada.

The proceedings connected with the opening of this House have always interested me. In the routine which we go through, there are many forms which have long since outlived their substance. For instance, that highly ornate and picturesque insignia which is indispensable to the opening of our proceedings, the mace, has evidently, indeed obviously, its prototype in the chieftain's club; and our genial and amiable Sergeant-at-arms is, I have no doubt, the lineal descendant of the armour-bearer. Moving the address itself has always struck me as having something of the dramatic about it. I think it smacks of the stage. In fact, the function I am about to perform is very much a prelude to our national drama; it smacks of a curtain-raiser, if you will. The stage is set, the actors are all in their places, and our great national drama is about to begin once again. And what actors, Mr. Speaker, have appeared on this our national stage since our national life began! What voices have these walls re-echoed, as the destiny of our country has been written by the various men who have sat on the treasury benches from time to time! I fancy that every inflection of the human voice has been heard within these walls during our national history. All honour to the men who have occupied these prominent positions, and all honour to-day to the two leaders of our national parties who are devoting their lives to the work of benefiting their country. These gentlemen do not always see eye to eye, but I believe, and I think the House believes, that each one follows what he believes to be right, and acts according to the light as he sees it. The historian of the future will give each of these distinguished men his proper place in our temple of fame.

I think it is particularly fortunate at this time we have the Duke of Connaught, the warrior statesman, as Governor General at Rideau Hall. He brings to his office the experience gained during a lifetime in the courts of Europe, in the military camps of the Empire, and at the council tables in Britain, in India, in Ireland, and for several years in Canada. His term of office here has been characterized by that prudence, foresight, and judgment which we all admire in our Governor General.

The legislative programme for this session, judging from the speech from the Throne, is rather brief; but although brief it is none the less important. The chief matter which we have to consider is the extension of our parliamentary term. For the first time since Confederation we have decided to pass an address asking the Imperial Parliament to extend the term of our Parliament. I hardly think, Sir, that the proposal needs any defence from any member of the Government, or from any one in this House. The logic of events during the past year and a half is in itself sufficient to warrant our asking the Imperial Parliament to extend our term. The winning of the war, this great world-shaking war, is the overshadowing issue to-day in Canada, as well as in every other part of the British Empire; and, that being so, this Ministry must have an eye single to this great contest; they must be able to devote their energies to this great issue; and it is for the purpose of removing the possibility of an election in the interim between this and the next session of Parliament that an extension of our parliamentary term is desired. I say that this war is such an overshadowing and overwhelming issue that nothing else must be permitted to stand in the way. The Ministry must feel that they have the confidence of the people, and while I believe they have, and they believe they have, I think the time is opportune to give them an extension of their term. If there is any doubt in the mind of any member of the House, or any doubt in the minds of the Ministers, I think that doubt should be removed. In a word, I think they should have absolute freedom of action in order to consecrate their energies to this great question of the war. The load which the Prime Minister and his colleagues have been carrying for the last year and a half has been a huge load, and the people of Canada are looking to him and his colleagues to continue the carrying of that load until the great victory is won.

According to the consensus of opinion, this is going to be a war of attrition involving a gradual reduction of men, resources, and money. It may be interesting to observe in passing how Canada has stood the awful strain. It is particularly interesting to notice that in almost every department of industry in our country there has been an improvement during the first year of the war. We have had the greatest cereal crop in our history, so great that some people have called it a freak crop. In 1914, the year in which the war broke out, we produced 561,000,000 bushels of cereals, and in 1915 we produced 926,000,000 bushels, or an increase of 364,000,000 bushels of cereals in the first year of the war.

Now, take the value of our cereal, root and fodder crops. In 1914 we produced $638,000,000 worth, whereas the total value of our roots, cereal and fodder crops in 1915 was $845,000,000, an increase of $207,000,000. We have good prices, we have good markets, and our grain is moving to these markets as it never did before. The north Atlantic is freed from the German raiders, British ships are carrying our grain to British ports, and the result is that the Canadian people are doing their full share to support our soldiers at the front and the British people at home.

Our mineral production increased somewhat in 1915 over 1914. The lumber trade in the east was a good deal better in 1915 than in 1914, and it is improving in the West. The only reason why it is not better there to-day than we find it is because dealers cannot get the means of transportation. The conditions surrounding our steel and iron trade are better than they were a year ago, orders are booked ahead, and altogether that important branch of our national industries is in a very thriving condition. Our fisheries have had a good year, so good that the catch has not been equalled, I am informed, for many years. Altogether the wealth which comes from our great national resources seems to have come to us during the past year in an almost unprecedented superabundance.

Added to this, our national revenues are responding to the magic touch of good times. Our domestic expenditures have been cut down without injuring our investments in our great public works. We have to-day throughout Canada comparatively few idle men. Our finances are in excellent shape. Institutions with very large sums invested in mortgage securities report that interest payments are better than they have been for some years past and because of the absence of a normal demand for funds there is a considerable accumulation of ready money.

Recently statements have been issued by the presidents of our leading banks, and in one and all we find a note of optimism. Our deposits are increasing, our circulation is up to its normal level, our railway earnings are going up, and the great investments which we have made in our national railways are bearing fruit. Credits which have been advanced to them by the federal and provincial Governments are being justified by results. The president of the Royal Bank, in addressing the shareholders the other day, made this important announcement:

> The highly creditable way in which Canada has stood the shock and strain of the war for seventeen months has justified the confidence expressed at our last meeting in her ability to weather the crisis. No better demonstration of her resourcefulness and economic stability could be offered to the world. The moratorium acts in some provinces and the suspension of specie payments for bank and dominion notes were the only departures from sound finance, and the latter was a purely precautionary measure. It is truly wonderful to record during such a period of world upheaval that this country has experienced no financial disturbance, a very small increase in failures, and with one exception no permanent default by municipalities; furthermore, that the loan companies report comparatively few arrears of interest on mortgage loans. As a result, the anxiety felt at the beginning of the war has been replaced by a spirit of relief and confidence.

He further says:

> Having turned from a debtor to a creditor nation under the force of urgent necessity, we should strive to make the turning permanent. We now know that we possess the essentials. The question is one of maintaining and increasing our exports by increasing production, and curtailing imports by economy in consumption. The Federal Economic Commission appointed to study these and kindred questions should receive every possible assistance.

He closes with this remarkable statement:

> After three years of liquidation and readjustment, our economic condition is basically sound, and we should try to keep it so.

The Bank of Commerce, the Bank of Ottawa, and many of our other banks have issued similar statements, and altogether the financial aspect of our country, judging from the utterances of the presidents of these institutions, who are eminently in a position to give us authoritative information upon this subject, seems to be most encouraging, and it is apparent that we have reached the point at which it becomes apparent that good times are coming again. But perhaps a better test than even that is that we have converted a debit balance into a credit balance, that we have become a creditor nation instead of a debtor nation. In the year ended November 1, we sold $153,000,000 worth more than we bought, which I think is a startling fact in our economic history and development. Who would have thought a year ago that we would have been able to finance a domestic loan? Yet during the year our Government decided to make the attempt, and they ventured to ask for a $50,000,000 loan. There was some doubt expressed in the financial world as to whether the people of Canada would subscribe to a loan of that kind, but this doubt was set at rest very early, because, instead of $50,000,000 being subscribed, in a very few weeks the Government were in possession of $100,000,000 of Canadian money for our Government loan. That struck me as a remarkable incident in our economic development.

You may remember, Mr. Speaker, that when the war broke out, this country was borrowing at the rate of $1,000,000 a day, and these borrowings were cut off just as if a tree had been cut off with the axe at its root. The stock exchanges of the world were closed down and no one knew what the collateral was, not even our bank men themselves. But Canada was fortunate in having a Minister of Finance who had the foresight and the courage of the present occupant of that high office to tide us over the financial difficulties of that time. The Government suspended gold payments, a risky thing to do; but they took the risk and they were justified in the results. They did more than that. They used the Government treasury as a rediscount bank for bank paper, and they were justified in the results. On that occasion you remember, Sir, and we all remember, that the financial superstructure of the whole world rocked upon its base, and we had a feeling at that time that Canada, a young country, in the early stages of its economic development, would suffer more than any other country as a result of that dire catastrophe, the declaration of war and its consequences, but in less than a year, Canada righted herself, confidence was restored, credit returned, and our trade balance was reversed. We raised $100,000,000 from our own people for the great war fund in addition to large sums for other patriotic funds. I consider it a magnificent record for Canada at this stage in our development.

To apply the financial and economic test beyond the borders of Canada, let us see how Great Britain has stood the test of this great war, notwithstanding the fact that she is to-day financing so many of the smaller nations of the world. You may issue a currency that will pass when it is restricted within the confines of the country itself, but offer that currency beyond the borders of the country and you will immediately find out what its value is. Apply that test first to the value of the British pound as against the German mark on the New York Stock Exchange. The British pound has gradually increased until now it is very nearly at par value, while for many weeks the German mark has gradually decreased, and in a few weeks' time, if the decrease continues, the German mark on the New York Exchange will be worth just about fifty per cent of what its face value calls for, so that, taking the financial test, whether in Canada or in Great Britain, I feel that at the present time we have stood the test well. This war is a tremendous strain, the greatest strain this Empire has ever been called upon to bear, and I suppose the greatest strain it ever will be called upon to bear, but it is pleasing to note, after a year and a half of this contest, that our financial condition is so splendid.

All this, Mr. Speaker, has been brought about because of this world-wide war, the greatest in the history of the world; but we all like to think in connection with it that we have done our little share; and, taking, not what our own people say we have done, but what others outside of this country say we have done, we need not be ashamed. Our Canadian boys in Flanders have carved out for themselves names in the halls of immortality by their bravery, and their dash, and their intelligent initiative. They have made the name of Canada immortal, as well by laying down their lives and making the supreme sacrifice for the great principles for which we are fighting. We little thought that we could raise such an army as we have done in so short a time, and it is a source of great pride to me, as I know it must be to every member of this House, to feel that the boys from the factories, and the banks, and the farms, and the forests, and the fisheries, after only a very few months of training, went to the very front rank of the battle line and stood shoulder to shoulder with the Allied veterans and fought victoriously against the veteran legions of Germany and her confederates. The record of St. Julien and Neuve Chapelle and Loos, and many another stricken field will always be to the credit of Canada and her soldiers. I never see the boys passing through Ottawa after being reviewed by the Governor General or the Minister of Militia but I feel that the name of Canada is safe on ever shoulder that bears it.

From a country of peace we suddenly became a country of war; from a country without an army we suddenly raised an army of thirty thousand men. This army was increased to fifty thousand, then to a hundred thousand, and then to a hundred and fifty thousand. We authorized the raising of a quarter of a million men, and another quarter of a million is about to be raised, a wonderful exploit for such a country as Canada.

Comparisons between what one province has done and what another province has done are odious; I do not wish to follow the statistics in regard to that. I just want to say, in a general way, that I am particularly proud of the western provinces between the lakes and the mountains, because they have furnished so many splendid regiments to fight alongside of their brothers from the eastern provinces in this great cause. I feel that the faith of our fathers in that vast country is well justified by the results of to-day, when we consider that a few short years ago, while we had the eastern provinces as the basis of Confederation, the plains west of the lakes were barren, the home of the buffalo and the Indian, with only a few white people beyond the mountain ranges on the Pacific coast. The buffalo trail has given place to the railway, the Indian wigwam to the home of the settler, and to-day great commonwealths have been carved out of those prairies. As a result, when the empire called for assistance, those prairie provinces sent forth their sons in great numbers to fight in this great cause. The province of British Columbia, which a few short years ago was, as someone said, a sea of mountains without enough white people to raise a regiment, has raised a division. The territory I represent, although its population is small, has done its little share; and as time goes on more men will be sent on from there and from the western provinces. The whole of Canada has done well and will do better as time goes on and more men are needed, because our boys are all fighting for the cause we believe in; they are all fighting that the flag which flies above this building shall continue to wave over this vast country of ours.

In regard to the fortunes of the war, we have had our setbacks and disappointments as well as our victories. If we have had Gallipoli, we have also had the Marne. If we have lost Serbia, we have saved the old capital of the Thessalonians, and Saloniki is to-day a great fortress on the Aegean sea, which we trust will yet be of some use in carrying on this war. If we have failed at Bagdad, we have saved Calais, the Gibraltar of the North sea. A ring of steel surrounds our enemy on land and sea, from the Baltic to the Black sea, and from Dixmude to Switzerland. The allied fleet keeps watch and ward from the Skagerrack to the Persian gulf. The Black sea, the Mediterranean sea, the North sea, all the inland seas of Europe, are in the hands of the Allies, except a small portion of the Baltic. More than that, the oceans of the earth are open to us but not to our enemies.

We have had misfortunes in this war, but let us not be discouraged. History tells us that we have had misfortunes in other wars. When the great Duke of Marlborough was in the very midst of his glorious career, he was menaced behind his back by hostile intrigues due to dynastic and party politics; yet he fought great battles and won great victories for the empire. Sir John Moore was attacked for his retreat on Corunna; yet his advance as well as his retreat disarranged Napoleon's plans. The embarkation at Corunna did not end in our defeat in the Peninsular war, nor will the evacuation of Gallipoli end in our defeat in this war. During this war many generals have been changed, but in other wars other generals were changed. Wellington himself at the battle of Vimeiro was superseded by two British generals; He was forced to sign the convention of Cintra, and he was afterwards tried before a parliamentary committee. Yet Wellington fought the marshals of the great Napoleon one after the other and was finally successful over Napoleon himself at Waterloo. Every one knows what a muddle the Crimean war was; even the Boer war was notable for many unfortunate events; but we were not dismayed. We are not dismayed now. History gives us warnings; but it gives us encouragement as well, and we shall be lacking in the wisdom which comes from experience if we do not take advantage of both. Let us not be dismayed: this war has not been won yet; but the empire remains solid, and our armies are undaunted, and we will fight on until victory is ours.

In this war we are fighting because it is a war of principles, and we believe in the principles that the Allies are fighting for. There are two principles which underlie our Government which are very dear to the people who live under this flag. One is that the primary sovereign power of the state lies in the people, and the second is that no tax shall be taken from any section of these people without the consent of the people themselves. Mr. Speaker, neither of these principles has been lightly won; they have cost much blood and much treasure. It took centuries to bring them to their fulfilment under our governmental institutions. But they are ours. It is only within the last one hundred and fifty years that the second of these principles was firmly planted as a part of the British constitution. It was only after the thirteen New England colonies had become the United States of America that the principle "No taxation without representation" became a part of the British constitution. Search the records of mankind, from the caves of prehistoric man to the pyramids and obelisks of Egypt, down through the centuries, and you will find in these records one continuous story of government by one man or by a few men, but never do you find a record of government by the whole people. The British people were the first among the peoples of the earth to evolve the idea that the power of the state resided in the people themselves. We had republics in ancient times: the cities of Greece were republics, but they were not democracies. Rome was a republic, but not a democracy. And Rome, at Caesar's death, became an empire. And all the countries that are warring to-day in Europe were within that empire, except parts of Russia. The Roman Empire became so great that it required two emperors and two capitals, one at Rome and one at Constantinople. After a varied history both these capitals fell and the Roman Empire was dissolved; and from the fragments of that great empire were erected the world-states of Europe. But of all those world-states, the British people were the one people to evolve the idea of representative governmental institutions. They planted colonies, and the colonists took the same idea with them. To-day, belting this globe, are the colonies and dominions of Great Britain, and the underlying principle in the government of each: Canada, Australia, New Zealand, and South Africa, is, that the people are supreme. We are fighting for this principle; we are fighting because we believe that right is more powerful than might, that the moral sense of a nation is but the aggregate of the moral sense of the individuals of that nation, and that the same moral law which our state expects its citizens to observe shall not be transgressed by the state itself, that there is the same law for the state that there is for the citizen. We do not subscribe to the doctrine that the state is a law unto itself.

Why are we fighting? Because we are a part of the British Empire, and because the Empire as a whole is threatened. Do the people of Canada realize what would happen if the British navy were defeated to-night? Do they realize that they would have to think and think quickly? One of the Roman Emperors, when Rome was at its zenith, said that the people who drank of the Orontes and the Rhone were the same people both belonging to the Roman Empire. The distance between the St. John and the Yukon is vastly greater than the distance between the Orontes and the Rhone, yet we are still the same people. The possibilities of this part of our Empire are wonderful. I was travelling once with Sir Charles Tupper, of revered memory, and I asked him what he thought of our western provinces, and he answered, "My boy, I believe they are to be the home of the race." Bryce, in The American Commonwealth, says that the quadrangle bounded by Hudson's Bay, the Gulf of Mexico, the Alleghenies and the Rocky Mountains is to be the future home of the race. And, judging by the intensive way in which farming is carried on in the older states of Europe, the possibilities of these western provinces of ours as the home of the people of the future, are enormous, for, with our wealth of forest, farm, fisheries and mines, it is possible for a huge population to live within this great Canada of ours.

We are fighting not only for these principles which I have enunciated, but also because we abhor the method of warfare which our enemies pursue. Their philosophers and historians have taught them to make war more terrible by the torch, the gibbet and the misuse of the sword. Our civilization abhors that. I was much struck by the speech recently made by

Mr. Masterman, a member of the British Government at the time of the outbreak of hostilities, as to the reason why Britain is now at war. He said:

> I do not suppose that any body of men ever passed through six such days as we did, sitting continuously with telegrams pouring in from every capital in Europe, and with the clock ticking out the hours, not the days, which remained if peace and civilization were to be continued in the world. During every one of those days there was no thought in the mind of any one of us but that of endeavouring to preserve the peace of the world. We tried this and that, we offered conditions, we asked for conferences, and we pleaded for time, but everything was refused us until finally we were left with this choice—the security or the destruction of the honour of our country. . . . It is not the interest of England that led us into this war, it was the honour of England.

That is why we are fighting to-day; and that is why we shall fight to-morrow, and fight on until, as the Prime Minister has said:

> Belgium has received all and more than all for what she has suffered and all the world will know for all future time that when England makes a promise she keeps it.

Why are we fighting to-day? We have four million men raised by voluntary enlistment in the British Isles; Canada with two hundred thousand under arms, fifty thousand more getting ready to go, and two hundred and fifty thousand more to be enlisted, and every province, city, town, hamlet and countryside contributing its quota. From Cape Breton to the Yukon men have answered the call, and men will come as men are needed. From the island continent of Australia and from New Zealand, what a magnificent response. It is not the fault of our Australasian brothers that the Gallipoli invasion failed. They fought like heroes and the legend of Suvla Bay and Anzac will be emblazoned on their banners for their children to see as synonyms of personal bravery. Is it not an inspiring sight to see the various races coming from the different countries in ships that plough all the seven seas converging upon the home of the Aryan race in Europe to settle this great question of principles? There must be some underlying reason for this magnificent spectacle of the people of England, of Ireland, of Scotland, of South Africa, of New Zealand, of Australia of Canada fighting side by side in this war. The Maoris of New Zealand, the Indians of our own country, the natives of India, the Soudanese, all take their part. Was there ever such a unanimity of will in any nation or empire in the world's history? Never. Why do all religious denominations join with united voices in support of this war? The Mahommedans, the Hindus, the Sikhs, the Parsees, the Buddhists, join with the Presbyterians, the Methodists, the Anglicans, the Baptists, the Roman Catholics, the Greek Catholics, and all other Christian communities. Why did the head of the Methodist church telegraph our Prime Minister congratulating him on offering to raise another quarter of a million men? I will answer that question by quoting the words of the head of the Roman Catholic church in Montreal, Archbishop Bruchesi. Speaking to the students of Laval, the Archbishop said:

> Canada being a part of the British Empire, it is the sacred duty of the Canadian people to assist Great Britain in her heroic defence of liberty. . . . It is the solemn duty of every Canadian citizen to the utmost limit of his force, to stand side by side with the motherland in her heroic effort to crush the tyrant who wishes to trample small nations and states beneath his iron heel. What fate would be ours if the Germans obtained a foothold here? Were Great Britain defeated, Germany would secure domination on the St. Lawrence. I, for one, do not want to be a German citizen.

Why is it that this vast concourse of men of so many different races, religions, and climes are going to the front to take part in this struggle and are willing to make, and are making the supreme sacrifice? Why? Because they live under the flag that floats over Parliament Hill. And they have found that wherever that flag waves, there you will find liberty for the individual, security for his life, and safety for his property; there you will find freedom of thought, freedom of speech, freedom of religion, and freedom of the press; there you will find the greatest possible freedom compatible with security of the state. And there you will find a state based upon the eternal principles of freedom, justice, and toleration.

Mr. EUGENE PAQUET (L'Islet) (translation): Mr. Speaker, it is my great privilege to second the motion which has been put before you so eloquently by the hon. member for the Yukon (Mr. Thompson). The honour redounds especially to the electors of the beautiful county of l'Islet, and my most heartfelt thanks go to the right honourable the Prime Minister.

In seconding the motion for an Address in reply to the speech of His Royal Highness, it is my object to rise above partisan considerations, and let myself be prompted by the truly Canadian sentiment of rallying every member of this House, every citizen of this country, every race, every effort and every sacrifice, to the sacred cause of the safeguarding our national existence.

At the front, our gallant boys are upholding that sacred cause and giving up everything for their country's safety. We, ourselves, must be guided by the same ideals in the consideration of the measures to be laid before us with a view to secure the participation of Canada in the defence of the Empire.

On the floor of this House my hon. friend from the Yukon has expressed himself in his native tongue. I am fortunate in being able to address you in the language of ancestors who lived in the fields and sunny hillsides of France. In so calling your attention to that fact, I wish to point out one of the remarkable qualities of the magnificent Empire which is ours, and acknowledge the freedom we are privileged to enjoy. His Royal Highness has stated:

> Measures will be submitted for your consideration to further the effective co-operation of Canada in the defence of the Empire and in the maintenance of this war waged for liberty and lasting peace.

The response my fellow-members will make, and that, I doubt not, of the Canadian people, must be summarized in the following words of Canada's Prime Minister:

> (Text.) More than a twelve month ago our Empire consecrated all its powers and its supreme endeavor to a great purpose which concerns the liberties of the world and the destinies of all the nations.
> In the dawn of another year our hearts are more resolute than ever to accomplish that task, however formidable it may prove. By the greatness of the need our future efforts must be measured.
>
> Nowhere is the Canadian spirit more firm and unwavering than among the men who hold the trenches and those who will shortly stand by their side; nowhere is it more undaunted than in the hospitals and convalescent homes.
>
> Already we have learned the full meaning of sacrifice. To all Canadian homes that have been saddened, to all Canadian hearts that have been stricken by the tragedy of this war, we pray that Divine blessing may bring consolation and healing.
>
> Much had to be learned during the past fifteen months because we had not prepared for this war. The strongest assurance of ultimate victory lies in the fact that we were not crushed in learning that hard lesson. Those who forced this war upon as may be assured by the traditions of our past that the lesson will be thoroughly learned to the end that there shall be enduring peace. The very character and greatness of the ideals for which we are fighting forbid us to pause until their triumph is fully assured."

[Mr. Paquet.]

In Canada, as in all allied countries, there is apparently a determination to hold fast, to suffer and to win. Sir William White, the Minister of Finance, who has just been knighted by His Majesty, will urge upon the Canadians new sacrifices for the cause of civilization and freedom, for humanity and our country's sake.

Our desire and determination to win must be persisted in. Otherwise the sufferings of our dead and our wounded would have been in vain. To allow ourselves to hesitate a single instant would amount to ingratitude towards our dead soldiers and treason against our descendants.

In 1912 and 1913, members of the House and certain newspapers scoffed at the idea of a German menace, and ridiculed those who dared mention it. On the 5th of December, 1912, the Prime Minister of Canada, after studying the situation in England with three of his colleagues, and after having been put in possession of state secrets he could not divulge, exclaimed in the House of Commons: "The need is urgent."

The Prime Minister heard then the rumbling of the distant thunder and saw the lightning flashes above the horizon. Sir R. L. Borden further declared:

> The burden is so great that the day has come when either the existence of this Empire will be imperilled or the young and mighty dominions must join with the Motherland to make secure the common safety and the common heritage of all."

With the German peril so clearly shown by Canada's Prime Minister, my only duty lay in giving my support to a Government who took means to secure the safety of the Motherland, while at the same time safeguarding our country's autonomy.

In view of the German atrocities, as I learned about the shooting of priests and the burning and destruction of churches, and shuddered at the awful blood orgies and the most inhuman crimes, will I be blamed for having listened to the Prime Minister's call, as he pointed out the danger?

It would have been treasonable on my part to refuse my support to the Government when it requested of me sacrifices to help maintain peace between the civilized nations.

I have always claimed that it was Canada's duty to defend its own territory and its own liberties. Since the beginning of the war, the country's integrity is imperilled. Shall we wait to see the enemy on our shores? Shall we wait to see the Germans tread Canadian soil?

Before taking up arms would you wait to see the Prussian slaughter your children, ravish your mothers and shoot down your priests? Treason it would be, and I refuse to be a traitor to my country.

It has been left to these times to witness a whole nation, a huge nation, stand up to Heaven and exclaim: I alone, I alone; I am above all nations.

Though Belgium's land, in shameful violation of that country's neutrality, William's army had invaded French soil and in forced marches was pushing towards Paris, its objective. Convinced of their invincible superiority, their hordes hurled themselves against the allied forces with a supreme confidence born of the recollections of Sadowa and Sedan. But the battle of the Marne checked, and repulsed the onset of the German army. Not England it was that desired war. His Majesty George V and his ministers made the most worthy efforts to preserve peace, but they could not agree to the dishonourable proposals of William II, who was violating Belgium's neutrality, spurning thereby the treaty obligations entered into by his predecessor. The Motherland has engaged in the most terrible war the world has ever seen for the purpose of avenging Belgium, of maintaining solemn obligations and in defence of the world's liberties.

The Prussian incentive is a determination to dominate the whole world and crush it under an economical and political tyranny not to be soon shaken off. To that end, the Prussian barons are determined to use the force of arms without being deterred by formal obligations, solemn treaties and by international principles observed through centuries. Their victory would mean the defeat of civilization and the triumph of cynical brutality. Should Germany come out of this conflict victorious, how could she be prevented from putting under her tyrannous domination our own country, the most brilliant jewel in the British crown.

What would become of Canada with Germany master of the world and in a position to dictate her own terms? What of Canada's future unless France and our Motherland did raise over Germany the sword of justice?

Who can say?

Listen to the words uttered at Vancouver on the 15th of August, 1915, by the honourable the Postmaster-General:

(Text.) It is a war in which we are deeply interested. It is as much Canada's war as England's war. It is your fight, it is my fight, it is the fight of every free citizen of this country, and let me again repeat that, speaking to you as one of the Ministers of the Crown, I have this message to give to you: We will leave no effort untried, no resource untouched, no nerve unstrained, before we have done the very utmost in this struggle in which the life of the Empire and the liberty and free institions of Canada are at stake. Then only will our task be accomplished.

(Text.) It is our duty, more pressing upon us than all other duties, at once, on this first day of this extraordinary session of the Canadian Parliament, to let Great Britain know, and to let the friends and foes of Great Britain know, that there is in Canada but one mind and one heart, and that all Canadians stand behind the mother country, conscious and proud that she has engaged in this war, not from any selfish motive, for any purpose of aggrandisement, but to maintain untarnished the honour of her name, to fulfil her obligations to her allies, to maintain her treaty obligations, and to save civilization from the unbridled lust of conquest and domination.

The Canadian people have been consulted in the most solemn manner. The call to the colours has assembled from the Atlantic to the Pacific 240,000 sons of Canada, full of patriotism and firmly convinced that they were fulfilling a national duty.

Without compulsion, our brethren take part in the conflict in order to ensure its victorious issue, and to secure the maintenance and unity of the British Empire, which Empire they feel sure shelters and safeguards Canada's autonomy.

With all of you, I pay my tribute to our fallen heroes. The Canadians who were killed on the battlefields of Saint-Eloi, Langemark and Festubert have won undying fame. They have given their blood to become our saviours.

In the province of Quebec, church and state are united in their support of the Allies' cause. We have heard the noble words uttered by the political leaders of French origin. You have all witnessed the noteworthy stand taken by our bishops. They assembled and prepared a most cordial endorsation of the attitude of England and France.

Hear now what says the episcopacy of the province of Quebec:

It cannot be ignored that this conflict, one of the most terrible it has ever been given the world to witness, cannot fail to have its repercussion in our own country. Great Britain is involved and who can deny that the fate of all parts of the Empire is bound in the issue of its struggle?

Rightly Great Britain looks to our help and that help, we are glad to say, has been generously offered in both men and money.

Mr. Speaker, a few minutes ago the hon. member for the Yukon translated in his own language an extract from an address delivered on the 7th of January last at Laval University, in Montreal, by Mgr. Bruchesi, Archbishop of Montreal, touching certain events in the province of Quebec. I believe it is my duty, also, to quote those words in my native language:

Nous sommes une colonie de l'Angleterre et dès lors, si l'Angleterre était défaite, la première proie de l'Allemagne serait le Canada. Or, nous ne voulons pas être allemandes. C'est pourquoi nous devons faire notre possible, puisque le sort du Canada est lié aux armes anglaises.

We are a British colony and hence, should Great Britain be defeated, Germany's first prey would be Canada. But we have no desire to become Germans. Wherefore we must do our utmost, since Canada's fate depends upon the success of the British arms.

At the beginning of the war the bishops made a study of the situation. No dogma or morals were under consideration, but a guidance had to be given.

That guidance the bishops of the Province of Quebec have indicated. In a letter published throughout the country, they have stated that Canada's duty was to help Great Britain and have congratulated the Canadians on the sacrifices already made. The bishops have not since altered their views.

In this war, Canada is not directly attacked, but it is so indirectly. The country is threatened and we must see to its defence. Nor have we failed in our duty. The Minister of Militia bears witness to the fact. Our young men have come forward in large numbers voluntarily. There has been no conscription and I hope the question will never be mooted in this country.

Our youth are enthusiastic. They are ready to shed their blood in the service of two causes: papacy and humanity. At this juncture, it is humanity that calls for defenders, and our brave children have rushed to the defence of liberty. Such was their motive in coming forward and such is to-day the inspiration that keeps them in the trenches over in France.

The Province of Quebec, and the French-Canadians, fully realizing the importance of the gigantic struggle and its meaning, have done their duty. The French-Canadians have recruited and are still recruiting regiments which will ever march where honour leads.

Among those who are taking a glorious part in the war are to be found descendants of some of our heroes. The recent address of Sir Sam Hughes at Toronto vindicates us from many calumnies. He is aware of the untiring ardour of my gallant fellow-people, and has given our race its due, and I must thank him for it.

On many solemn occasions, the Quebec members of the Canadian Parliament have asked the majority of this house and the majority of the citizens of this country to give recognition to the most sacred rights of the French-Canadian minority.

We, French-Canadians, know and appreciate the value and the sacredness of minority rights. So it is with a feeling of pride that I see my compatriots respond, nobly to the call of the flag and to the help of England and France who are now fighting together for the defence of the rights of minorities and of lesser nations.

The thrilling ardour with which our sons march forward to the battlefront is inspired by their wish to keep intact the right to their language, their faith, their institutions and the heritage of their forefathers. To my French-Canadian compatriots belonging to the minority I appeal. I ask them to answer with loyalty the call of His Royal Highness and rush to the front because the Motherland is fighting for the freedom and independence of nations; for the respect of treaties and the sacredness of international obligations, for the defence of smaller peoples, and of minorities, for international loyalty and the upholding of the noblest sentiments that distinguish mankind.

The Government is in duty bound to take immediately extraordinary measures for the defence of Canada. His Royal Highness states:

The life of the present Parliament expires in the autumn of this year, and, under existing legislation, a dissolution and election would be necessary in the early future. My advisers, however, are of the opinion that the wishes of the Canadian people and the present requirements of the war would be best met by avoiding the distraction and confusion consequent upon a general election at so critical a time.

That purpose can only be effected through the medium of legislation by the Parliament of the United Kingdom. A resolution authorizing and requesting the enactment of such legislation as will extend the life of this Parliament for the period of one year will be presented to you.

As a French Canadian, belonging to the minority, I realize fully how careful we must be before asking for any alteration, even temporary, of the British North America Act.

Only on account of the exraordinary circumstances created by this terrible war do

I feel justified in replying favourably to the wishes of His Royal Highness.

The Government's aim is to safeguard the rights of Canadian democracy. Moreover all patriotic Canadians of different political parties declare that they are closely at one with the aims of the Dominion Government. The statesmen who wield the destinies of Canada have reason to fear the turmoil and confusion which a general election might bring about. Order and peace reign in the country. In order that the nation's spirit may be kept sufficiently alert to cope with present events, that discord may disappear and dissensions be forgotten, that all hearts become as a single heart, there is need for the constant and sacred union of all Canada's sons in the one love of the Motherland. On the 4th day of August, 1914, all resolves have been blended into one resolve. In the soul of every true Canadian, there remained nothing of the fierce feuds of former days. Would it be wise by calling a general election to once more stir up those quarrels while there still lasts the terrible struggle which requires so strenuous sacrifices? One result of elections might be to diminish the amount of the war contributions, which have been flowing until now with such a magnificent generosity.

The different patriotic funds raised with the generous help of the Federal Government, the provincial governments, the municipalities and benevolent citizens, might be sorely affected.

For those reasons, and with a view to the unity and greatness of my country, and in order to help our oppressed fellowmen to maintain or regain their freedom and independence, I willingly and heartily give my support to the proposed legislation, the principle of which seems to me to be admitted in the Motherland.

Throughout the world this European war has brought about a financial stringency almost without precedent; but in Canada special circumstances have so far relieved the situation.

Our financial institutions, thanks to a prudent, skilful and enlightened direction, have avoided economic disasters. If it be just to admit the wise management of our captains of industry, so must we grant the Government the legitimate part they may claim to have had in the prudent administration of the country. The Government deserves congratulations for successfully negotiating the war loan of fifty millions ($50,000,000). The ready response of the public, who subscribed over a hundred millions, is significant of our prosperity.

This national loan is a remarkable turning point in the economic history of Canada. Our most perspicuous men of finance face the situation with a notable optimism.

The extraordinary expansion of our export trade and the decrease of our foreign purchases have turned in our favour the balance of external commerce, which we heretofore had to liquidate with loans amounting to several millions a year.

War industries are giving Canadian trade an unexpected boom and a greater value to our natural resources.

Commercial victory must crown the victory of our glorious soldiers.

The Dominion Government is concentrating its best efforts on the productive capacity of the soil. A year ago the Department of Agriculture appealed to the citizens of Canada to devote all their energies and efforts to the great cause so as to supply the needs of the war. This same department has organized in the Province of Quebec a campaign of patriotic endeavour and increased production.

The success of this campaign may, in a large measure, be attributed to the enlightened co-operation of the clergymen of our province. Heaven smiled on our efforts and we were blessed with the most abundant crop this country has ever produced.

The Government took an important step when it established, in October, 1915, a commission of enquiry concerning our agricultural resources. While our boys are bringing us honour on the firing line, our duty is to unite in order to develop our natural resources, increase our production, seek new markets for our products, and secure the markets which the enemy have lost, so as to assure the prosperity of Canada.

In concluding, I wish to express the regret we feel at the decease of several of the members of this House. All honour to the members of Parliament who have enlisted for active service.

Our colleagues in the field of hostilities, or in the prisons of Germany, are fighting for our liberties and deserve our admiration.

Let us also pay a tribute to the British sailors, who have borne themselves with bravery, upholding the ancient and noble traditions of England's navy.

In clearing the seas of the enemy they have rendered an immense service to Canada, to the Empire, and to humanity.

Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to second the motion in favour of the address.

Rt. Hon. Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Mr. Speaker, all those present in this Chamber must certainly have appreciated the tone and style of the addresses to which it has been their pleasure to listen this afternoon. The speech of my hon. friend from Yukon (Mr. Thompson) certainly reached a high level of patriotic eloquence. The matter contained in those addresses, if I may say so without being invidious, calls for some observations, which, however, I shall forego for the present, as they may be dealt with more fittingly when we come to discuss the two or three measures which are announced in the speech of His Royal Highness the Governor General.

I wish, at the outset, to emphasize the thanks and gratitude we owe to Providence for the bountiful harvest with which we have been blessed this year. The farmer, like all other workers, has to depend chiefly upon his own exertions; but, more than any other worker, has he to depend upon the elements. A little more rain or a little less rain, a little more sunshine or a little less sunshine, may to him mean the difference between disaster and success. This year it would seem that the elements have been particularly favourable; it would seem that the farmer held the key to the winds and the clouds, and obtained exactly the measure that he desired. It would seem, too, as if kind Providence, in order to atone for man's inhumanity to man, designed to compensate the farmer for that loss which he has had to suffer through being denied that profitable market which he has long sought in vain from this Government.

The bountiful harvest has been an offset for sore disappointment in every direction. We meet again under the shadow of the disastrous war in which we have been engaged for something like eighteen months —a shadow which seems to be darker now than it was in the month of April last, when Parliament prorogued. At that time our souls were full of hope that the campaign just then opening would see the advance of the allied forces upon the territory of the enemy. No one expected that in the year 1915 we would see the end of the war, but all expected that we would see the beginning of the end. All these hopes were doomed to disappointment; we are bound to say that our expectations, high as they were, have been sadly unfulfilled. On the western front the conditions are exactly the same as they were in the month of April last. Though we may say with pride that the allied forces have won notable victories—victories in which our Canadian boys, young as they were, fought like veterans—on some occasions saved the day —and filled Canadian hearts with legitimate pride; still we must admit—and we know only too well that it is true—that the Allies have failed to pierce the line of the enemy and to commence their march towards the Rhine. On the eastern fronts our disappointments have been greater. There our Russian allies have lost positions which they at first attained. They have lost Galicia and Poland; their soil was invaded by the enemy, and similar fears were held for Petrograd as were held in the early stages of the war for Paris. In the Balkans there was a noble resistance to the advance of the enemy, but no victory. Though in these circumstances there are causes for disappointment, there is no cause for alarm or discouragement, for this reason: the successes and victories of the German army have never been complete victories; they have been merely Pyrrhic victories, and there are signs not a few that both in morale and numbers the strength of the German forces, as compared with that of the allied forces, is decreasing day by day, and that in the not distant future the Allies shall at last be able to assume the offensive.

The only complete victory which has been won during the war has been won by the British navy. It is true that there has been no general engagement; but as regards what has been accomplished and is being accomplished every day by the British navy, I recall the words of the soldiers of Napoleon in the campaign of 1805, who used to say that their Emperor won battles without fighting and simply by marches and counter-marches. In the same way Admiral Jellicoe has been able to accomplish victories without any engagement and simply by patrols and by watches he has succeeded in keeping the German fleet isolated, impotent, imprisoned in its own waters; just as useless for the German cause as if it had been sent to the bottom of the sea. The British navy has kept the sea open to the trade of the Allies almost as effectively as in the times of peace. If, as is suggested in the speech from the Throne, more sacrifices will be required in order that we may reach complete and final victory, it may be well that we should assert again, at the opening of this session, the attitude which we on both sides of the House have maintained and the attitude which we on this side of the House do intend to maintain. When the war broke out, both parties in this House agreed that it was the duty of the Canadian people to participate in the war to the fulness of our resources. That decision, made on the floor of this Parliament by both sides of the House, was unanimously ratified by the Canadian people. No, I must make an exception to that. The ratification was not unanimous. There has been a minority which has always protested against our attitude, and that minority is the Nationalist party in the province of Quebec, who took the position from the start that it was a crime for the Canadian people to participate in this war. Not only did they use that strong language, but again and again in the Nationalist press they have asserted, and still assert, that we have taken our present position simply because we bow, servilely bow to the imperious dictation of the British authorities.

Sir, I hold no brief for the Government; but I have been fifteen years in office and I know the nature of the relations between the Imperial authorities and the Canadian authorities, and I say that there is no foundation for such an assertion—and I know whereof I speak. I know that I speak the truth. I know that I speak nothing but what is common intelligence to any man who knows the institutions under which we live when I say that there was on the part of the British authorities no command, no demand, no request. The offer of the Government was spontaneous, the ratification of the Parliament of Canada was deliberate. What we have done we have done in the full power of our legislative independence under the constitution which we hold from the British Parliament. What we have done we have done deliberately, voluntarily, not from any sentiment of compulsion, but because we thought that, as British subjects, as men who had been enjoying and still enjoyed, the benefit of British freedom, we owed it to ourselves to make sacrifice of our treasure, and of our blood, in order to maintain British institutions and freedom in the world. Such is the spirit of British institutions, such is the lofty character of the constitution under which we live, that not even the King of England, not even the Parliament of England has the right to order a single soldier to go out of Canada, or to take a dollar from the treasury of Canada. We are a free people, and I am sure that I express the sentiments of all Canadians worthy of the name when I say, that it is as free men that we have gone into this conflict and are continuing in it. It is not, however, to be supposed, that in coming to this conclusion on the floor of this Parliament, we were all impelled by the same motives.

Seldom, if ever, in any deliberate assembly, when a decision has to be reached upon any important question, is the problem approached from the same point of view by all the members of that assembly and a decision reached from the same standard. On this very question of our participation in the wars of Great Britain there has been between my right hon. friend on the other side and myself a line of cleavage. My right hon. friend has often asserted that the moment Great Britain was at war it was the duty of the Canadian people not only to defend their territory if attacked —and that goes without saying—but to send our forces wherever Britain was called upon to fight; whereas I have always taken the position that in such circumstances it was for the Canadian Parliament to decide whether or not Canada would participate and the extent of her participation. I have claimed for the Canadian Parliament the same rights absolutely as those which exist in the Parliament of the Motherland. If to-day I recall this line of cleavage it is not for the purpose of resurrecting a discussion on it—this is not the time nor the occasion for that, although the time and the occasion may come when the Canadian Parliament may have to decide that question one way or the other—but Sir, if to-day I recall this line of cleavage it is to show the inanity of the reproach of servility which is levelled at us in my own native province. Servility is a big word, it is a loud sounding expression; but there may be servility and servility. There may be and often is servility to a master; there may be and there is servility to passion and prejudice. And if to-day there is servility anywhere it is not with those who have taken the attitude which we have maintained, and will maintain in this House, but it is with those who, blinded by passion and prejudice, would deny us the liberty of being humane and generous, would deny us the liberty of following the instincts and the promptings of our minds, and our hearts, and our consciences; would deny us the liberty, when we see France threatened with dismemberment, when we see Belgium actually under the foot of the conqueror, of helping in the defence of France and of Belgium. It is not because they hate France, it is not because they hate Belgium, but because we cannot in this way help France or help Belgium without at the same time helping England. Sir, the case of France and the case of Belgium is the case of England. The case of England is the case of Belgium and of France. Away with such sophistry. It is nothing but an attempt to conceal the aridity of empty hearts. But, that is not all. These men also tell us that we may be fighting for an idea, as they say, and we may be fighting for the fate of the Empire, as they say, but that Canada has no direct or material interest in this war. And, every day we read in their press that if Germany were to triumph it would be of no material injury to Canada, that Canada would remain just in the position that Canada is in to-day. Canada, no interest in this war! Sir, I take a very different attitude; I take issue with that statement, and I not only assert that Canada has a direct interest in this war, but I go much further and I say that there is not to-day a civilized nation in the world which has not an interest in this war. Should Germany triumph there would be nations that would rue the day of their indifference and supineness. After all, what is Germany fighting for? For what has she deluged with blood the continent of Europe? Is it not, as has often been stated, for the purpose of world domination? The book published by the French Government on this point some months ago is most instructive. It contains a memorandum of the German staff of date March, 1913, in which it is avowed in so many words that the object of Germany is to dominate the whole civilized world. I may not quote at length, but let me quote just this one sentence which I translate from the French:

> Neither the ridiculous howlings of the French Chauvinists for revenge nor the gnashing of teeth of the English nor the feverish antics of the Slavs shall deter us from our aim which is to fortify and extend Deutschsthum (which means German domination) over the whole world.

And on top of that there is in the book another despatch from the French Ambassador at Berlin, M. Cambon, which further illustrates what I have just stated. M. Cambon, on November 13, writes to his Government in these words:

> I have from an absolutely reliable source the tenor of a conversation which the Emperor had with the King of Belgium in presence of the chief of staff, General Moltke, about two weeks ago, a conversation which as it would seem vividly struck King Albert.
> Nor am I surprised at his impression for it corresponds to that which has been for some time forcing itself on me, viz., hostility against us is becoming more deeply accentuated and the Emperor has ceased to be favourable to peace.
>
> The interlocuter of the Emperor of Germany, as everybody else, up to that time had believed that William II, whose personal influence had at several critical periods, been thrown on the side of peace was still of the same mind. This time he found him completely changed.
>
> In the course of that conversation the Emperor seemed nervous and irritable.
>
> The weight of advancing years is commencing to tell upon William II, and the traditions of his family, the retrograde sentiments of the Court, and above all the restlessness of the militarists, more deeply affect his mind.
>
> Perhaps also he frets at the growing popularity of his son, who caters to the passions of the pan-Germanists, and does believe that the situation of the empire in the world is not equal to its power.
> If I were to conclude I would say that we must be prepared for this new fact, that the Emperor is being reconciled to a conception of things which was previously repugnant to him.

There is the origin of the war. The military party at last prevailed upon the Emperor, and thus the world was plunged into that awful catastrophe. What would be the consequences of a German defeat? If the Germans are defeated the world may look for an era of peace, or disarmament, and of an approach to the ideal condition, the brotherhood of man. But what if Germany were to win? Germany cannot have a complete victory—as to that, it seems to me there cannot be a shadow of doubt. To triumph, Germany has to crush England, to crush France, to crush Russia and to crush Italy, and that is an impossible task. The only problem in my mind is as to the extent of our victory. If we had only half a victory, then Germany would be humiliated, but would still be defiant. She would continue her armaments, and then the other nations would have to follow suit. She would be preparing and arming, and even on this continent, Sir, we would not escape the vortex of European militarism. This, therefore, is our interest in the war; this is the justification of our course. Our action has not been based upon the sophistry which we have heard in the Nationalist press; our action has been based upon the primary condition that we must be free, or that we must lose our freedom. Upon that our choice has been made.

The speech from the Throne announces that we shall have measures to enable the Government to carry on the war. My right hon. friend the Prime Minister has the first day of this year issued a statement that he was prepared to offer 500,000 men. I shall not to-day discuss whether or not the premature statement of my right hon. friend was exactly on the lines of parliamentary government. I put aside all these questions on such a day as this. I understand that we shall have a statement made upon the offer of 500,000 men, which it seems to me is a large contract, but, again, upon this I pass no judgment. I shall be prepared, and my friends around me will be prepared to listen to, and to discuss in the spirit in which all such propositions should be discussed, the proposition which the Government deems essential to carry on the fight in which we are engaged. But let me say—and I believe that upon this we should have an expression of opinion—that we must repel at once the impression which has been sought to be created that this offer is a preliminary step to conscription. There is to be no conscription in Canada. Sir, there has been an attempt made for many years to frighten the people with the spectre of conscription. There are some men in this House, as you know, who in the elections of 1911 stated that the enactment of the naval law was a prelude to conscription. There are men in the province of Quebec who have been asserting that the moment conscription was adopted in Great Britain, conscription would be adopted or proposed in Canada. The naval law has been for six years on the statute book. It is still there; it has not been repealed, as many members in this House were pledged to repeal it. It is there, and there is yet no conscription. Conscription has come in England, but conscription is not to come in Canada. So far as conscription in England is concerned, it would be in bad taste, nay, it would be impertinent for us to attempt to pass any remarks, either of approval or of disapproval with regard to it. For my own part I am free to say that I expected that Great Britain would be able to carry on this stupendous war under her old system of voluntary enlistment. The British Government have thought otherwise; they have thought that the magnitude, the stupendous magnitude of the war we have to face, compelled them to resort to conscription, and the step taken by the government seems to meet with the approval of the great majority of the English people. But, Sir, the conditions are not the same in Canada as in Great Britain. The reasons why there can be no conscription in Canada are obvious. Apart from any other, one paramount reason, which is on top of all the others, is that we could not adopt conscription in Canada without giving a severe blow to our policy of immigration. If we are to pass successfully through the period which is to follow the war, and face the enormous debt which we are accumulating, the enormous expenditure which we are assuming, the best way to do it is to have a wise and broad policy of immigration so as to develop our resources. But if it were to be known that conscription existed in Canada, it would, I repeat, deal a severe blow to our hopes in that respect. Why, the very thought of conscription has had a detrimental effect on our settlements in the Northwest.

My attention has been called to a letter published in the New York American of December 26, in which the following statement from a correspondent in Omaha appears:

> Five or six years ago a hundred thousand of Iowa and Nebraska's finest young farmers broke away from their homes and went into Western Canada to take up homesteads and make their fortunes.
>
> And now these same young men are simply falling over themselves to get back to the old farms in the American west. Hundreds of them are passing through Omaha every week. Some walked across the border—sneaked their way across, in fact, because they feared they would not be permitted to leave Canada.
> Others purchased round-trip railroad tickets and showed the return portion as proof that they were going into the "States" on a visit only. Some had a little cash when the time came for them to get out of the Dominion, but others were forced to write back to the "old folks" for money with which to pay their way back to the old farm. They are all fleeing from threatened conscription.

When I read that I took some measures to obtain confirmation or information regarding it. I must say that my information, while not complete, has satisfied me that the statement is very much exaggerated. That there is some foundation for it I believe, but I do not think the movement has assumed such proportions as are here indicated. At all events, there is enough to show that it is important that we should have at once from my right hon. friend the Prime Minister an authoritative statement upon this point.

But, Sir, while the bogey of conscription can be easily disposed of, the same cannot be said of the financial consequences which must follow this war. We are piling up expenditures and debts which would be alarming were it not for the wonderful resources of this country. Wonderful and varied as the resources of this country are, there is still every necessity for the wisest and most rigid economy in every branch of the service, and in this connection I have some fault to find with my hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White) for the estimates which he brought down last year. I say to him to-day that in my judgment he should have cut off from these estimates $20,000,000 to $30,000,000, and I think he could have done it with perfect ease. On public works, chargeable to income, there is provision for an expenditure of $22,000,000, and if we analyse these figures we will find that the expenditure is for post offices, public buildings, postal stations, drill halls and armories, all expenditures of a kind for buildings which are in the nature of luxuries. Such expenditures, in time of peace, are perfectly allowable if the revenue is adequate, but in time of war I say to my hon. friend that all sorts of expenditure ought to be rigidly cut off, and that the budget should be limited to the barest necessities, and to the ability of the treasury to carry on the government.

I am sorry that in the speech of His Royal Highness no mention is made of any intention of cutting down expenditure to the greatest possible degree. I have been in office myself and I know the importunities that are put upon ministers for this kind of expenditure—post offices, postal buildings, drill halls, armories, and so on. Every member is anxious to favor in that way the constituency which he represents. I repeat that in time of peace such expenditures are allowable, but in time of war we must preach to the Canadian people the necessity of economy, not only in the public service, but in respect to private expenditures also. Upon this point we might well take a leaf out of the book of the British authorities, who have, since the beginning of the war, never ceased to represent to the British people the necessity of cutting off all luxuries and keeping expenditures to the bare necessities of life so long as we are at war. That is one of the sacrifices which we have to make in order to attain the great object we have in view. It is not yet too late, and I hope that when my hon. friend presents his estimates this year we will find that he has been preparing for us a pleasant surprise.

I was also disappointed when I saw no mention in the speech from the Throne of a transaction which took place during the recess, a transaction which was abnormal, and which, because it was abnormal, should have been brought to the attention of the House. I refer to the incident which occurred on the 27th November last, when the Government took forcible possession, by forced sale, of all the wheat which was in the elevators at the head of lake Superior and eastward. In times of war the Government has a right for military necessity to exercise such an abnormal power. That power has been exercised during this war—in France, I believe, if nowhere else—but certainly in France. But upon every occasion when such an abnormal power has been exercised it has always been with the sole object, where there was scarcity of a commodity, of keeping that commodity for the people and to prevent it from being exported abroad, thereby enhancing the price. But that is not the reason in this case. If the Government had commandeered the wheat which was in the elevators at the head of lake Superior, when they took some 17,000,000 bushels, such action was not taken on account of any scarcity. As was announced in the speech from the Throne, we never have had such a crop as we had last harvest. We are told, and correctly told, that the wheat crop last year amounted to 330,000,000 bushels. Out of 330,000,000 bushels the Government have resorted to this extraordinary measure of commandeering 17,000,000 bushels. For what reason? The reasons were given two days afterwards. The commandeering took place on the 27th November, and on the 29th November all the press published the following:

Official Government Statement.

Ottawa, November 28.—The following official statement was issued by the government to-night:

'The phenomenal crop of wheat in the Canadian west has brought upon the government the duty of assisting to the farthest extent possible in its marketing. The supply of wheat the world over is known to have been abundant, and the importance of taking advantage of every opportunity to provide for the disposing of our grain is on that account the greater. For many months the government has been in touch with the British authorities with a view to procuring orders from the United Kingdom and the allied governments in order that the utmost share of the consuming demand in those countries may be turned towards our Canadian surplus. As a consequence of this, the British Government has requested the Canadian Government to provide within a short time a very large supply of No. 1, No. 2 and No 3 Canadian northern wheat.'

The reason given is that the Government were so acting at the request of the British authorities. Now, the day following, strange to say, the press had an announcement from Great Britain to the effect that there had been no such demand from the British authorities. The following appeared in the press of Canada on the 30th November:

'The official press bureau made the following statement yesterday:

'With reference to the announcement from Ottawa on November 28, that the Canadian Government had commandeered 16,000,000 bushels of wheat at the request of the British Government, the Board of Agriculture state that the British Government have made no such request, and that at present they have no information on the subject.'

There is something extraordinary in this, and it is a most surprising fact that from the 30th November to the present day no attempt has been made to explain this discrepancy. I have seen statements in the press—not official, however, because the Government has not made them—to the effect that the wheat has been commandeered for the allied nations. Which nations? Great Britain? No; we have the information that Great Britain did not make such a request. Russia? Certainly not; Russia does not want our wheat; she is a large exporter of wheat. France? I am told on pretty good authority that the French Government have already taken measures to buy wheat in Canada, not through the intervention of the Canadian Government, but through the ordinary channels of trade. I am told, but of this I have no positive information—I may be wrong, but I have it on authority which I consider respectable—that some of the wheat which was commandeered, and which was in the elevators at the head of lake Superior, already belonged to France and had been purchased for the French Government.

Possibly this wheat may be intended for the Italian Government; but, Sir, if the wheat were bought for any of these governments, why did we not have an official statement as we had on the 30th of November in regard to the British Government? I firmly believe that the Allied nations are buying wheat to-day in Canada—not a paltry 17,000,000 bushels, but perhaps hundreds of millions of bushels—and they are doing it through the ordinary channels of trade. If the Allied nations wanted wheat from Canada, why were the ordinary channels of trade not made use of? Why was the trade disturbed as it was? Why was this dislocation of business allowed? This is a mystery which has not been explained up to the present time. There is no doubt whatever that the action of the Government has had the effect—which should have been anticipated, whatever may be the motive behind it—of dislocating business and of interfering with interests existing at the head of lake Superior. It has been stated by the millers that they were put back in their operations, and they flocked to Ottawa in order to get redress. They obtained redress and the wheat that belonged to the millers was unmolested. Then the transaction was reviewed by some of the business men; and one of the largest operators on the lakes, Mr. Richardson of Kingston, is reported to have spoken as follows, according to the Ottawa Free Press of November 30:

'The wheat could easily have been purchased on the open market,' said Mr. Richardson, of Kingston, this morning. 'It was not necessary to take such drastic action.'

'How could the grain have been purchased by the government without artificially boosting the prices?' Mr. Richardson was asked.

'By the use of brains,' Mr. Richardson curtly replied. 'The government bought oats at a time when there was a scarcity in Great Britain. They went about it quietly and succeeded in purchasing a large amount without boosting the prices. I myself bought two and a half millions of Du ham wheat when there was only four millions available. I didn't advertise the fact and managed to make its purchase without prices being raised. It wasn't necessary to throw the whole grain and flour trade into a turmoil by taking the drastic action taken.'

'Seventeen million bushels of the wheat taken was contracted for,' continued Mr. Richardson, 'and no compensation is to be given for that.'

Here is the important part:

No man will be sure of a contract in the future, for nobody knows when a similar action is going to be sprung at any time later. However, it is done, and can't be undone.

I make no charge—I never make any charge until the fact has been shown to me, and then I can judge for myself whether a transaction is right or wrong—I make no charge to-day, but I say to the Government that their action has given rise to suspicions. My hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) resented those suspicions, and he wrote a rather irate letter to the Ottawa Citizen to protest the purity of his intentions. I make no charge against my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce or against anybody else, but it is his own fault if it has been supposed that in that pile of wheat there is an Ethiopian concealed. The Government should have been more diligent in giving information and in putting the whole facts before the House. My hon. friend would have done justice had he stated in the speech from the Throne: My Government has commandeered a certain quantity of wheat; we need it for such and such reasons, and the whole correspondence will be placed upon the table of the House. That has not been done, but it must be done. I repeat:

at the present time I make no charge against any one, because I have not the facts before me, but I must insist upon having all the particulars brought to the attention and knowledge of the House. If the transaction is, as I hope it may prove to be, perfectly honest and above board, it will be my duty to say so; but if it is not, then it shall be my duty to say the reverse.

At the opening of this session of the Parliament of Canada, we on this side of the House, His Majesty's loyal Opposition, feel that we should declare that we are perhaps more than ever before imbued with the responsibility which appertains to an opposition, and especially in time of war. It will be our duty to criticise: to criticise fairly under all circumstances, and to criticise forcibly perhaps, but always to criticise wherever there is cause for criticism. It will also be our duty, and a far more pleasant duty it is, to support whatever there is just cause to support. We come to this House with this one aim only: to contribute as far as may be in our power to the final and complete victory of the Allies over Germany. Our supreme aspiration is that Belgium shall again be free and as prosperous as she was, if that be possible, in view of the awful destruction she has suffered. It is our aim also, that France shall recover her lost territory and her natural boundaries restored to her, and that old England shall retain, unimpaired and undiminished and as glorious as ever, her prestige and her power in the world. It is our aim that both England and France shall resume, as early as possible, their onward march towards the future enfranchisement of the human race from the shackles of passion and prejudice; that a renovated German democracy may be triumphant, and that the German people, sobered from their dreams of conquest and domination may return to the instincts of peace and benevolence which at one time characterized their race.

[Sir Wilfrid Laurier.]

Rt. Hon. Sir ROBERT BORDEN (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, let me in the first place congratulate you, Sir, upon your election to the Speakership of this House; and, in expressing those congratulations, may I be permitted also to express my confidence that you will discharge the duties of that high office in a manner worthy of its highest traditions. I join with my right hon. friend in congratulating the mover and the seconder upon the very eloquent, patriotic and earnest speeches to which we have listened this afternoon—speeches which express, indeed, the united spirit of the Canadian people with regard to the situation which Canada, as one of the great nations in this Empire, is presently called upon to face.

Since we last met some of our colleagues who sat with us in this House have passed away. One of these was the Hon. Samuel Barker, who represented Hamilton East. Mr. Barker had been a member of this House for about fifteen years. He was a man with whom I had very intimate association and upon whose counsel and aid I have many a time depended. He did not speak often in this House, but when he did address us it was as one well acquainted with the subject he undertook to discuss. Those who knew him only within the last four or five years did not fully realize the great energy and ability he brought to the discharge of his public duties in the earlier years of his parliamentary career.

Another member who has passed away is Mr. Lancaster. He entered the House, I believe, in the same year as Mr. Barker. Mr. Lancaster was a man of very earnest purpose and very strong convictions, which he expressed with great frankness and force. All of us have greatly regretted that during the past few years his health was clearly failing. We shall all pay tribute to his memory as one having an earnest and even intense desire to perform his duty as a public man and to serve the interests of the people in every possible way.

We mourn also the death of Mr. Reid, who represented Restigouche. My personal acquaintance with him was not so intimate as with the others of whom I have spoken. He did not often address the House. He deserved and received the respect and confidence of his fellow members.

A fourth member has passed away since we last met in the person of Mr. Richards, who represented Prince, P.E.I. He was a very genial, kindly man, one who made us feel that, whatever his party feelings might be, there was back of all a warm and sympathetic nature.

I am sure that both sides of the House will join with me in expressing to the families and relatives of our four late colleagues our very sincere sympathy and condolence.

My right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition has not been very critical in his remarks to-day. He has chided us a little for one or two matters to which I may be pardoned for devoting a moment's attention. He spoke of the large estimates of last session. The estimates were not greatly cut down last session, but they were left there with the distinct understanding, if I recollect correctly, that no new works should be undertaken during the pendency of this war, unless they were of the most urgent and imperative character. That policy has absolutely been carried out from the commencement of the war until the present time. We have undertaken no new works whatever, so far as I remember. All members of this House are as much impressed as is my right hon. friend with the necessity for strictest economy during this war. They can fully realize that in addition to beginning no new works we have had to consider from time to time whether it might not be in the public interest even to discontinue the construction of works already under contract. Fortunately the financial strength of this country has proven so great that up to the present time it has not been necessary to resort to such a course. But I desire to say that if, in the urgency of conditions as they may be pressed upon this country in the future it should be necessary for us to take that course, the Government would not shrink from taking it. I believe that in doing so, if it became necessary, we should have the support not only of members on both sides of this House, but of the people as well.

My right hon. friend also seems to have some remarkable suspicions in his mind regarding proceedings taken by the Government to secure a very considerable quantity of wheat in the latter part of November last. He was good enough to say that he had not any charge to make. Well, if he had not any charge to make it might perhaps have been in better taste if he had not referred to a charge at all. If he ever should have a charge to make, we shall be glad indeed to have him put it forward. It has been the aim of the Government from the first, and especially during the past autumn, in view of the abundant harvest with which Canada has been blessed, to seek an outlet for our products in every part of the world where a market could be found. When communications were made to us on behalf of the Allied governments with regard to a needed supply of wheat we took a course which, I think, should commend itself to every hon. member of this House. We sought and obtained the best disinterested advice we could procure in the country as to the proper proceeding on the part of the Government in the matter. To that end we consulted gentlemen whose opinion, I think, my right hon. friend would not be inclined to depreciate.

With regard to the dislocation of business of which my right hon. friend speaks, I do not think that such dislocation, if there was any, was at all of a serious character. As a matter of fact, I understand from my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) that the greater part of the wheat, thus secured by the Government in the full belief that the course they took was in the public interest, has been moved out; and I venture to say that our efforts, in that regard and otherwise, to secure for the producers of this country an outlet for the splendid product of Canada during the past year merits the congratulations rather than the condemnation of my right hon. friend. However, as to that, the Minister of Trade and Commerce will be fully prepared to give a complete account of his stewardship. As to the absurd rumours which were spread through some portions of the press, it is almost unnecessary for me to reiterate what the Minister of Trade and Commerce has already made public, that there is not the slightest foundation in fact for any such suggestion as that which has been made.

Leaving these points, I wish to allude to certain matters dealt with by the mover and seconder of the Address as well as by my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition, and also, in a later portion of my remarks, to give some account of the mission which I undertook to Britain in the past summer and of its results so far as they affect the public interests of this country and of the Empire.

In the first place, with regard to the war, my right hon. friend has spoken of the condition as it is today. Looking only at the surface of things and comparing the condition to day with what it was when this Parliament prorogued on the fifteenth day of April last, one would say that the outlook does not seem highly encouraging. All the events have happened to which my right hon. friend has referred. In the western theatre of war there has been no progress of any great strategic value. In the eastern theatre there was the Russian retirement, the recapture of a great stronghold in Galicia which had previously been captured by the Russians, the fall of Warsaw, the German advance into Russia, the failure of the Dardanelles operations, the entry of Bulgaria into the war and the over-running of Serbia and Montenegro. But I venture to think that, if we look below the surface into the very heart of things, there is not the slightest reason why any one in this Empire or in any of the allied nations should be discouraged as to the outcome.

I do not propose to speak of the economic situation. A great many opinions have been given—not always of an absolutely consistent character—by men who are much more highly qualified to speak on that subject than I could claim to be. Since Parliament prorogued on April 15, Italy has entered the war and has made it necessary that large forces of the enemy should be occupied near her frontiers. We have held the enemy in the west; we have secured time for preparation—and that, I am confident, is the most vital and important factor for bringing this war to a successful conclusion. I do not belive that we in this country—I do not believe that those responsible for the administration of public affairs in Great Britian—realized in the first instance what the German and Austrian preparations for fifty years meant. I shall discuss that more fully in speaking of what the Empire is really doing at present in the organization of its resources to win this war. At the moment let me express my full confidence that the necessary preparation is now being effectively made. Then we have the overmastering facts that the numbers and resources of the allied nations vastly exceed those of the enemy, and that the British and Allied navies have complete command of the seas—a consideration which in itself outweighs, in the balance of victory, all the military successes which Germany and Austria have attained. Then, last but not least, we have a just cause, and that of itself heartens each of the allied nations to the effort necessary for victory.

We remember that when the Russians retired from Galicia and Warsaw fell, the Emperor of Germany sent a somewhat flamboyant telegram to one of his relatives, in which he used these words:

My destructive sword has crushed the Russians; the war drama is now drawing to a close.

We can not pay too high a tribute to the valour of the Russian army and the resourcefulness of the Russian generals. The great aim of the Germans in invading Russia has failed. When we realize that the Russian troops were fighting almost without arms and munitions; that the man in the rear rank was without a rifle; that when his comrade in the front rank fell the man in the rear stepped forward and took his place and his rifle—when we realize that these were the conditions under which Russia fought in that terrible struggle in which Germany tried to crush her, I think we may have every confidence and hope that the Russian offensive, recently undertaken, will be successful, and that Germany will find that Russia is by no means crushed.

I have enlarged many times since the commencement of this war upon the enormous task which faces any nation in building up a great army under modern conditions. There is the enrolment of the men, the training of the men, the training of the officers, the provision of equipment, and, last but not least—this is, perhaps, the greatest task of all—the provision of guns, rifles and ammunition on a scale undreamed of. I hope that hon. gentlemen of this House and the people of this country will realize what it means for this empire to undertake the task of providing guns, rifles, machine guns, trench mortars, ammunition of every type, for an army twenty times greater than this empire ever expected to send into the field. I am ready to believe—indeed, Mr. Lloyd George has stated it openly and frankly in the British House of Commons—that time has been lost in making that preparation. But when we consider the enormous task that confronted the War Office in Great Britain, let us be thankful that so much was accomplished, and that so successful an attempt was made to deal with so appalling a situation. Our task in Canada with regard to the preparation of our own army was, perhaps, even greater than that of Great Britain, because we lacked the assistance of commissioned and non-commissioned officers of adequate training and experience to a greater extent than they did in the Mother Country. But still, what we have accomplished seems to me to have been a wonderful thing. I am making no boast on behalf of the Government, but I am claiming credit for the people of this country, without distinction of party, of race or of creed, who have come to the assistance of the Government in every possible way in the gigantic task which has been imposed upon us, and have shown that the races which make up the population of Canada are animated by the same lofty spirit of patriotism as that which characterized their ancestors in the past.

What have we accomplished? Mr. Speaker, you know that we sent within six weeks to Valcartier camp 33,000 men. During the past ten months our forces have crossed the Atlantic at the rate of more than 2,000 men per week. In the six months from July to December, 1915, there were enlisted 94,400 men in Canada and in the first two weeks of January, according to the information supplied by the Chief of the General Staff, more than fifteen thousand men were enlisted. Since Parliament prorogued, that is, between April 15 last and the opening of this session, no less than 80,250 men have been sent across the Atlantic to aid in the battle which our Empire and the allied nations are fighting. We have sent to the front altogether 120,000 men. First and last, we have had under arms in this country 220,000 men, of whom, of course, a portion are non-effective at the present time.

My right hon. friend has spoken of the very considerable increase which was proposed on the first day of January. Our authorized force was increased on November 7, 1914, by 30,000 men. On the 8th day of July, 1915, an Order in Council was passed increasing it to 150,000. On the 22nd day of October, His Majesty the King sent out an appeal. It was not specially directed to the Overseas Dominions; it was more particularly directed to the people of the British Islands. We thought it appropriate that that appeal should be recognized by the people and by the Government of Canada; and so, on the 30th day of October, 1914, the authorized force was increased to 250,000 men; and then, on the 1st day of January of this year, the announcement was made that the authorized force of this country would be increased to 500,000 men. My right hon. friend says that seems to him a very large number. So it is, a very large number. We must, however, remember that we are fighting in this war as one of the nations of the British Empire, and that in Great Britain the authorization for increased forces has reached the figure of 4,000,000 under the proposals made by Mr. Asquith on the 20th of December last. Let us also remember that there are enlisted and on active service in the British navy at the present time not less than 250,000 men. I realize that 500,000 men is a large force for us to undertake in Canada; and I realize further that the national strength of Canada must be maintained, and that in proceeding with our effort to increase our forces in Canada we must have regard to the necessities of the agricultural and industrial interests of this country. Canada, in all the elements of her national life, must be kept strong, and we shall have regard to those considerations. But it did seem to me, in view of all the developments which have taken place during the nine months since Parliament prorogued, it was fitting that at the opening of the New Year we should announce to the Empire and to all the world that we were not only prepared but willing to do something more. I do not know that I could express to the House my view of the situation in better words than those of the Order in Council which I presented to my colleagues and which was adopted by them without any hesitation, and assented to by His Royal Highness. The words which I used were these:

> The Prime Minister further observes that the developments in the various theatres of war during the past year unmistakably indicate the necessity of further vigorous and united effort on the part of all His Majesty's dominions to bring to a victorious and honourable conclusion the present conflict which unquestionably involves the power, integrity and welfare of the Empire, and even constitutes a menace to its existence. The realization of the great issues thus involved in the war has elicited from the manhood of the Dominion a widespread and splendid response ever since the outbreak of hostilities. The Prime Minister is convinced that this impressive response will be continued to the further appeal which is now proposed.

With regard to recruiting, the response has been good from all the provinces of Canada. It has been splendid. It may be that at first the Maritime Provinces and the province of Quebec were a little slower than some of the other provinces of Canada, but I know from information which has reached me recently that the enlistment in those provinces is now all that could be desired, and is thoroughly responsive to the call which has been made. It is appropriate that I should here pay a tribute to those Canadians of French origin who are fighting in France for the Fatherland of their ancestors. Among them are many who have distinguished themselves. At the moment I recall the names of Papineau, Barté, Dansereau and Roy. No greater, no more heroic deed has been or could be performed in this war than that of Major Roy, who died in the endeavour to save his men from danger. His name, for that gallant deed, ought ever to be blazoned in the memory of all Canadians.

My right hon. friend has alluded to conscription—to the idea in this country or elsewhere that there may be conscription in Canada. In speaking in the first two or three months of this war I made it clear to the people of Canada that we did not propose any conscription. I repeat that announcement to-day with emphasis. My right hon. friend has alluded to reports in the press of the United States. I believe that representations even earlier than those which he mentions were made, and that there was an attempt, not only in the western provinces of Canada, but elsewhere, to convince citizens of American origin residing in Canada that they were in danger in that regard. I doubt greatly whether they would be so influenced even if conscription were announced to-day, judging from the splendid spirit which has animated our citizens of American origin, both in the east and west of Canada. They have been as eager, as determined to do their part in fighting for Canada and for the Empire in this war as the native born citizens of this Dominion.

Now, with regard to this proposed large increase, let us remember that we are in the agony of the greatest struggle that our Empire or the world has ever known. We can win it if we make the necessary sacrifice and the necessary effort. We know what it means to all the allied nations. My right hon. friend this afternoon quoted from the despatch from the French ambassador at Berlin, which has been made public by the French Government. The same idea has been expressed by a great German writer, whose teachings evidently impressed themselves upon the German people, in these words:

> By one means or another accounts must be settled with France, if we are to win elbow room for our world policy. That is the first and most unconditional requirement of our world policy, and as French hostility is not to be removed once for all by pacific measures, recourse must simply be had to the power of arms. France must be so completely overthrown that she can never stand in our way again.

One of the greatest intellects in Germany, dealing with the part which Germany shall play and the part which the British Empire shall play in the future of the world, used these words:

> If our Empire dares to persevere resolutely in the new path of our independent colonial policy, a conflict of interest with England will be inevitable. It lies in the nature of things that the new great power in the centre of Europe must settle with every other great power in turn. With Austria, with France, with Russia, we already have squared accounts. The last settlement with England seems likely to be the longest and hardest.

Are we fighting in this war to win or to lose? There can be only one answer to that question in Canada and throughout the Empire. Then, if we are to win we must realize that this war cannot be brought to a successful conclusion without sacrifice. Undoubtedly throughout our Empire the preparation made by the enemy through half a century was underestimated. Thank God, we yet have time for effort, for preparation. But our preparation and our effort must not be too late. May I quote some very pregnant words of Mr. Lloyd George in his great speech of 20th December last :

> Too late in moving here. Too late in arriving there. Too late in coming to this decision. Too late in starting with enterprises. Too late in preparing! In this war the footsteps of the Allied forces have been dogged by the mocking spectre of "too late," and unless we quicken our movements damnation will fall on the sacred cause for which so much gallant blood has flowed.

So I say it is time for us in Canada to consider our course, to realize what further effort is necessary. Therefore I recommended to my colleagues, and we shall propose to Parliament, that the forces authorized in Canada for assisting the Empire in this war shall be increased in the measure which I have indicated. We owe something to the 120,000 men who have gone to the front. We owe something to those who have died in a great cause and to those who live to avenge them. If we are animated by the spirit of the men who fought at Ypres, Festubert and Givenchy, the Canadian people will not shrink even from the sacrifice and the effort thus proposed.

Before speaking of the results of my visit to Great Britain last summer, I must mention certain important orders in council passed since prorogation which will be laid on the table of the House to-morrow. Two of them at least are in fulfilment of pledges which I gave to Parliament at the conclusion of last session. We have appointed a War Purchasing Commission, the personnel of which, as the House knows, consists of the Hon. A. E. Kemp, a member of the Government, and Messrs. Geo. F. Galt and H. Laporte. The order in council contains special provisions to safeguard the public interest, which I believe the House will find satisfactory when hon. gentlemen come to examine them. The responsibilities of that commission have been very great; I believe that they have been efficiently and conscientiously discharged, and that the public interest has been conserved and advanced by the step which we have thus taken.

The Government also appointed a commission, consisting of Sir Charles Davidson, an ex-chief justice of the province of Quebec, for the purpose of making inquiry into all matters attending the purchase of supplies and munitions for the Government of Canada since the outbreak of war. Sir Charles Davidson, a man of unquestioned ability, character, and experience, has taken up this task, and has carried it on with vigour. In consequence of his investigation, some prosecutions have been instituted, and at least one man has been convicted. The Commission has not yet made its report, but as soon as received, it will be laid upon the table of the House.

Before proceeding to England in July last, I brought to the attention of the council the importance of inquiring into certain matters which are of obvious urgency at the present time, and which will be of increased urgency after the conclusion of peace. An order in council, then passed, will be laid upon the table of the House, and it will show that the questions submitted to that Commission are of a very comprehensive character. They relate to improved methods of agricultural production, to increasing the acreage under production, to the settlement of the land, to bringing immigration of a suitable type for that purpose, to giving assistance to persons who may be inclined to come to Canada for that purpose, to co-operation among producers, to the distribution of products, and to the problems of transportation which are incident to that purpose. Special consideration is to be given to anticipated immigration after the war. My hon. friend the Minister of Public Works delivered a very cogent and impressive speech on that subject a few months ago. The commission is actively engaged in studying the several questions, and they intend to call to their assistance, whether in Canada or elsewhere, the best expert opinion that they can obtain, and to give a complete and thorough investigation to these subjects, which we all agree, are of the greatest possible importance.

There was also appointed during the recess the Military Hospitals and Convalescent Homes Commission. I desire to express my very profound appreciation of the willingness, the eagerness of the Provincial Governments of Canada to co-operate with the Federal Government in that good work. All the Provincial Governments are, I think, represented on that commission, or have established commissions of their own, and the ancillary or assisting commissions in the various provinces of Canada are all working in co-operation with the main commission. I hope and believe that in this way the care of returned soldiers while invalided will be suitably provided for.

Now I come to my visit to Great Britain during the past summer. One of the objects which I had in mind in undertaking that mission was to ascertain from first hand information, as best I could, what might be the preparations of the Empire for winning this war by the organization of all its resources. I was given the fullest possible information by the ministers of the British Government. I recall with great appreciation the fact that for this purpose Mr. Lloyd George rose almost from a sick bed, while he was recuperating in the country after very prolonged and very exhausting labours. He came to London the day before I left Great Britain and discussed with me very frankly the whole situation. Mr. Lloyd George has made it clear in the speech to which I have alluded that opportunities may have been lost, but that there is still time to make good. He has stated that in May last while the Germans were turning out 250,000 shells per day, the greater part of them high explosives, the British were turning out 15,500 shells, of which only 2,500 were high explosive shells. High explosive shells were demanded most insistently by the generals at the front at that time. Production has been enormously increased and is still going on. It would not be proper for me to make public all that Mr. Lloyd George was good enough to confide to me. Those who have examined his speech will remember his statement that there are 33 national shell factories in Great Britain, and 100 factories in the hands of private firms; that the percentage of deliveries has been increased from 16 to 80; and that these factories will soon be able to produce in one week the amount which some time ago was secured by careful husbanding for four months. Larger guns are necessary. The very largest guns which Great Britain had on hand at the commencement of the war are now the smallest type of gun which they have in use at the front. The industries of Great Britain are engaged on a very large scale in the manufacture of field guns, machine guns, trench mortars, small arms, and every variety of shells and ammunition.

Let me read to the House a very graphic description contained in a letter to the London Times from a neutral who had recently visited Germany and Great Britain. This is his language:

> What is England going to do? This was the whispered query that I heard time and again in Germany. For I found that the possible power of Britain is more truly appreciated and understood in Germany than in any other country in Europe to-day. The great German captains of industry, who have hitherto made the success of German arms possible, seem to realize that if ever the vast industrial might of Britain, so akin to their own, is properly mobilized, if its resources are consistently and adequately exploited; if every ounce of latent energy is made available, then, no matter how great a success German arms may have achieved, no matter how firmly entrenched German troops may stand on enemy soil, the tables will turn, and German chances of final victory will fade into limbo.
> I have just crossed Great Britain from one end to the other, and I have visited innumerable towns and cities. Britain at last, after more than a year's delay, is mobilized for war. Her achievement to-day far surpasses the wildest idea of the "kolossal." I have seen factory after factory, working steadily 24 hours a day, seven days in the week, employing thousands of men and women making shells, shells, shells! I have seen factory after factory making aeroplanes; I have seen guns being forged under hydraulic pressure of 12,000 tons; howitzers forged out of the stoutest steel, which requires 16 hours in a blast furnace to heat.
>
> I have seen shell cases pressed out of the living ingot, in less than five minutes, and shells forged at a speed three times as great.
>
> I have seen men working at great forges, where gun parts are cast, straining every nerve and muscle to accomplish their difficult tasks; handling vast lumps of red-hot metal with lightning dexterity. I have seen machine-guns by the hundreds, and rifles by the thousand, all of the most careful workmanship and finish.
> The whole north country has been turned into one vast arsenal. The deep pall of fog and smoke that hangs low over the great industrial centres of the Midlands, deeper, denser than it has been for some years past, means that England has at last turned with full energy to the mighty task. The achievement is the more remarkable when it is appreciated that all this work is merely a beginning.

[Sir Robert Borden.]

In that connection, may I speak for a moment of what we are doing in Canada in that regard. A good deal has been made public in the press recently. In Canada we have about 250 factories engaged in the manufacture of munitions, none of them with any previous experience whatever. The value of the orders, as announced by the chairman, of the Imperial Munitions Board amounts to a little over $300,000,000, and I understand that munitions to the value of $100,000,000 have already been sent overseas. The orders that have been filled, and that still remain to be filled, involve the use of 500,000 tons of steel, and the payments in January of this year aggregated $35,000,000. It has been a source of great satisfaction to the Minister of Finance, and I am sure to the people of this country, that Canada, has been able to assist the British Government in financing the payments for that purpose. I believe that of all the payments to be made during the present month of January, the Canadian Government is providing at least one-half, so that we are not only doing our part in producing these munitions of war, but we are also doing our part in temporarily financing for the British Government about one-half of the payments.

Now, the question arises, why we are not doing more in Canada, and why they are not doing more in Great Britain. The reason for that is of a very simple character. The production of a portion of the shell is a work which can be undertaken without great difficulty by almost any factory in the country, but when you come to the more delicate and complex portions of the shell it is impossible to proceed with these as rapidly and as satisfactorily as with the simpler portions. I was told on the best authority that one company in the United Kingdom which undertook some years ago to produce the delicate portions of shells equipped with a time fuse did not make a great success of it for about three years, and that another great firm in Great Britain found it difficult to obtain satisfactory results in less than two years. We in this country, and the manufacturers in Great Britain as well, are undertaking to do it in much less time than that. It is of no value whatever to pile up shell bodies unless you can also supply all the component parts necessary to produce a shell ready for use at the front. As far as the fuse alone is concerned, I believe that 267 different gauges have to be used and that, contained in the time fuse, there are no less than 240 different parts. The supply of the simpler portions of the shell both in Great Britain and here has vastly outstripped the production of the more difficult and complicated portions. However, the work is in good hands both in Great Britain and in this country, and I have no doubt that we shall be able to advance in Canada as rapidly as in any other part of the world.

I need not speak of the necessity of munitions. Every hon. gentleman who has kept himself acquainted with the incidents of this war realizes most thoroughly that vast armies are absolutely of no use unless they are supplied with artillery of the most powerful type and with a most abundant provision of munitions.

I took up with the British Government Canada's ability to furnish supplies necessary for the war. We have repeatedly brought that subject to the attention of the British and allied governments. I took it up during my recent visit with several members of the British Government and I pressed it upon them most earnestly as I had done previously by correspondence. We provided them with a list of articles of a very varied character that could be furnished by this country for the use of the allied nations. I discussed also with the British authorities the importance of emphasizing to the allied governments the abundant resources of Canada for supplying many needed articles. I had also a conference with the International Purchasing Commission, or, as it is known, the Commission Internationale de Ravitaillement. All of the allied nations were represented there. I furnished them with a full list of articles that we could supply, and I pressed upon them the importance of looking to Canada in that regard.

Mr. Wintour, the Director of Contracts in the War Office, gave me a statement of the amount of the orders which had been placed in Canada up to the 10th July, 1915, and I was glad to observe that the total orders placed in Canada to that time ran up to $240,000,000. I have very little doubt that up to the 1st January, 1916, the amount of orders placed in Canada, not only by the British Government but by the allied governments, will run well up to $500,000,000. This is a great tribute to the producing power of Canada. The variety of articles supplied is immense, many new industries have been established, some of which will certainly be permanent, and there has also been a greatly increased production in others.

Then, I took up also with the British Government the important question of transportation. More than a year ago we arranged with the Canadian Pacific Railway Company that we should have the services of Mr. A. H. Harris in order to organize transportation for the very large supplies which were ordered in this country by the British Government. As indicating what has been accomplished in that regard I shall read an extract from a recent report of Mr. Harris. I need not read the whole report, but just a few paragraphs. He says:

> The prompt action of the government in adopting my suggestion has secured to Canadian manufacturers and farmers an uninterrupted outlet for the hundreds of millions of dollars worth of War Office orders, the acceptance of which would not have been possible but for the inauguration of an economical overseas service.
> Further, the fact that the transports owing to their regularity in sailings have been in a position to handle promptly the War Office supplies which otherwise would have occupied space on regular liners, has been of distinct advantage to the export trade of Canada, and has released to that extent ocean space for commercial tonnage. Since the inauguration of the service not a pound of Imperial Government transport has been forwarded on regular liners.
> During the period between 28th August, 1914, and 30th April, 1915, 244,913 gross tons were handled on account of Imperial and Dominion governments.
> Between, however, the 1st of May and 30th November, 1915, there was an enormous expansion—over 410,000 tons being forwarded during that period (7 months), or about 67 per cent more than was moved in the preceding 8 months.
> The Overseas Department is now being called upon to provide for about 125,000 gross tons of munitions, war material and supplies per month, or approximately one and a half million tons per annum, and the tonnage is still growing.

He then goes on to give the number of transports and sailings. I need not read further, but I may inform the House that in February, 1915, we arranged with the Admiralty for eighteen transports, which number has been increased during the past six or seven months to forty transports of which, during the winter, twenty are allotted to Halifax and twenty to St. John. In this way the producers of the country have had a great deal of necessary assistance in the transportation of their supplies.

Besides that we have continually been in communication with the Admiralty, both during my visit in the past summer, and by correspondence as well, in regard to the necessity of releasing as far as possible tonnage for the North Atlantic service and we did secure, by the efforts I made during the past summer, and by the correspondence which has taken place from time to time, the release of several ships for that service. I pressed upon the Admiralty the consideration that a larger proportion of steamships had been taken from the North Atlantic service than from any other service. This was for the reason that the ships plying in the North Atlantic were better adapted to the purposes of the Admiralty. So, we have done the best we could in this way; and the Government have taken some further steps through my colleague the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) as to which he will give the House information at a later date. The whole situation, of course, is subject to the paramount necessities of the War Office and the Admiralty. If we are going to carry on this war successfully it is necessary that large bodies of troops should be transported and that they should have ample supplies of every kind. Thus in all representations made by Canada we had to bear in mind those paramount considerations without regard to which the war could not be brought to a successful conclusion. Transportation on the Pacific was also discussed and I hope that some progress has been made.

I took up also with the British Government the purchase of horses and the establishment of Canadian remount depots in England. As to this we arrived at the conclusion, after a careful discussion of the whole subject, that it would be a waste of money for the Canadian Government to establish remount depots in the United Kingdom, or in France. Therefore we are availing ourselves of the British remount depots which are thoroughly well organized. But we went a step further upon the suggestion of my hon. friend the Minister of Militia and Defence (Sir Sam Hughes). He said that he saw no reason why the British Remount Commission here should not purchase all horses required for the allied forces in western theatre of the war, including the Canadian forces. Therefore, we arranged that the British Remount Commission should make purchases of all horses required for the Canadian forces and issue them as required at the net cost.

We also took up with the British Remount Department the purchase of horses in Canada by the French Government; and after considerable discussion and some correspondence, the British authorities finally consented that the arrangement which had prevented the French Government from purchasing in Canada should be terminated, and accordingly since the month of August last the French Government has been at perfect liberty to buy in Canada; and I hope that they will take steps to make purchases in this country, particularly in the West, where I believe there is a type of horse which would very well suit the requirements of the French Government.

There are other matters, but at the moment I need say no more as to the arrangements arrived at between the Government of Canada and that of Great Britain during the visit of the hon. the Minister of Militia (Sir Sam Hughes) and myself.

It is my privilege and my duty to speak of the spirit which I found in France and in Great Britain. The spirit of France is grave, patient, self-reliant, confident and determined. No great nation animated by such a spirit can be overthrown. The whole manhood of that nation is in arms; each man is doing his allotted task regardless of social condition, wealth, birth, or any other consideration. To give the House an illustration of what this war means to the French people and how each man is doing the duty which is allotted to him, the military chauffeur placed at the disposal of the Officier de Liaison at the headquarters of General Joffre was no less a person than the son of the French Ambassador at one of the great capitals of Europe. This young man did duty there as chauffeur, performing his allotted task to the best of his ability and as a matter of duty.

Wherever the Germans have passed in France is found ruin and desolation. I saw the town of Albert, not one single building of which from one end to the other was left with a roof on it—a perfect picture of desolation. I saw Senlis, only about seven miles from Chantilly, desolate, almost completely destroyed. Hon. members will recall the fact that when the Germans passed through Senlis, more than a year ago, they executed the mayor and, I believe, seventeen of the citizens because they had been fired upon by some Turcos as they entered the town. I saw also the ruins of Creil, which is in the immediate vicinity of Chantilly.

We do not realize in this country what war means; no man can realize what it means until he has witnessed the picture of ruin and desolation which can be seen in France. At Chantilly itself, only twenty-five miles from Paris, one can hear in the open the booming of the German guns at the front. The French people and the French army have an absolute and perfect confidence in the issue of this war, and I repeat again that they are inspired with an absolute and resolute determination that this war shall never cease until the invaders have been driven from France and until Belgium has been freed.

In Great Britain I found the same splendid spirit. I believe there has been a profound change in the spirit of the British nation during the past twelve months. The gravity of the situation is now realized thoroughly and fully. It may possibly be said that John Bull requires a little bit of hammering to make him thoroughly in earnest; but when John Bull is once aroused he is terribly in earnest, and there is no doubt about it that the British nation is now tremendously in earnest in this war. The British people have not been accustomed to methods of warfare such as those which have prevailed. The British soldier is naturally a humane man; he goes to battle with the idea that if he succeeds in conquering his enemy and taking him prisoner he should treat that prisoner not only humanely, but generously. That is his spirit. It is the same kind of spirit as that which animates two Britons when they fight with each other: when one comes out second best he immediately shakes hands with the man who has thrashed him, and there is no more bad feeling between them. In this war, however, the incidents which have taken place, such as the Scarborough raids, the Zeppelin attacks, the Lusitania horror, and, last but not least, the execution of Edith Cavell, have aroused in the British people a stronger and more intense feeling than I believe has ever been aroused in that nation in any previous war. These incidents and the inhuman and barbarous methods of warfare practised at the front have had their effect; they have brought more recruits to the British standard than any other agency in this war from first to last; and they have aroused a fierce and grim determination that this war shall not cease until the cause for which it was undertaken shall have been fully and absolutely vindicated.

As to the Canadian troops at the front, I saw the Princess Patricia Regiment on the 23rd day of August, 1914, at Lansdowne park, when divine service was held and the colours were presented by Her Royal Highness the Princess Patricia. I saw them on the 21st day of July, 1915, at the front, where they had been since the previous December. There were then only two officers out of all those who had gone to the front, only two still able to perform their duties; those were Niven and Papineau. In the trench warfare at St. Eloi on the 14th of March, on the 7th of May and on many occasions from the end of 1914 up to the time that I saw them, they had shown to the enemy how Canadians could fight. Hon. members will recall that on the 7th of May, 1915, this regiment was attacked in overwhelming force by the Germans. They went into the fight mustering 635 men; at the end of the day only 150 men were able to respond to the call. But they had held the line. Well might their brigadier general, in bidding them farewell, speak of their unparalleled tenacity, and declare that they had earned a reputation which would stand amongst the highest in the record of the exploits of the British army.

I saw the Canadian division at the front as well. I saw them at Valcartier camp in September, 1914, and I had the honour and the privilege of saying farewell to them, of shaking hands with every officer of the force before they went overseas. I saw what was left of them at the front on the 21st of July, 1915. In the meantime, their heroic deeds at Ypres, Festubert, Givenchy, had thrilled the whole country. As the mover of the Address said, they were men of no military experience; they were taken from every walk of life in Canada. Only nine months before they were put to the test, they had been engaged in the ordinary avocations of life in this country. You remember that just one week after this Parliament prorogued, that is to say on the 22nd of April, 1915, these men were put to as fierce and terrible a test as any troops in the world were ever subjected to. They were vastly outnumbered, they were almost surrounded, they were subjected to horrible and unknown methods of warfare. The awful effects of gas no man can realize who has not seen, as I have seen, the survivors of this terrible ordeal. The men I saw in the hospitals and convalescent homes included in their numbers some who had endured the full force of that attack, and who, even months afterwards, were actually gasping for breath. Under these conditions, their left flank in the air, the Canadians held on all that day. They held on during the following day. One brigade which had been eventually sent back for rest, tired, weary, exhausted, took up their arms before any respite was obtained when a further call was made upon them. One cannot say what would have happened or would not have happened if the Canadians had given way on that occasion. Perhaps the Germans might have really broken through and reached Calais. But the consensus of opinion of all those who spoke to me on that subject, and many of them were men who could speak with authority, the consensus was that on that day, the 22nd of April, 1915, the Canadian division saved the day for the Empire and for the allied nations. There is no doubt whatever as to the issue of this war, if we in Canada and in all the Empire are animated by the spirit which moved those men on that day. Among the men at the front, among the men in the hospitals and convalescent homes, there is a supreme confidence. But they believe also that the Empire must be aroused to supreme effort and to intense earnestness. We owe that to them, we owe it to ourselves.

There is no doubt as to what Germany anticipated and intended when this war was planned. She believed that Great Britain would stand aside and thus earn and deserve the contempt and aversion of her allies and the scorn of the world. France would be crushed, Russia hurled back, and peace made under such conditions as would completely isolate our Empire. Then at her leisure Germany would attend to Great Britain, her colonial empire and her sea power, in pursuance of a policy which regards treaties as scraps of paper, war as a legitimate national enterprise and the possession of overwhelming military strength as a justification for unprovoked aggression. The mills of the gods grind slow, but they grind exceeding fine. I believe we have still a long way to go before we see the end of this war. But I also believe that before its conclusion our Empire will have in the field armies rivalling in numbers and efficiency those of any belligerent nation and more thoroughly equipped than any of them with guns of every type, munitions and all the mechanical devices that are so essential. Again I say that if we are in earnest this struggle can have but one conclusion, and that is victory for the allied arms. And in the fierce flame of this war, in the ordeal of sacrifice which it entails, the strong elements of the Canadian nation will learn the better to understand each other, and through that understanding will be welded into a more perfect and splendid unity than ever before.

At six o'clock, the House took recess.

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK (Red Deer): In rising to make a few remarks upon an Address which does not lend itself to excessive comment, I should like to associate myself in the first place with the right hon. leader of the Government and the right hon. leader of the Opposition in the compliments which they offered to the mover (Mr. Alfred Thompson) and to the seconder (Mr. Eugene Paquet) of the Address. Some more than ordinary recognition was given to the honourable profession to which I have the honour to belong in the choosing of the mover and seconder, and I am sure that both of those gentlemen gave ample evidence of the fact that a scientific training was not lost upon them when they entered the profession of medicine. The seconder has spoken frequently and fervently in this House—I cannot quite follow the French language, but I am sure that he always speaks with effect; and I think everybody will agree with me that my friend the hon. member for Yukon delivered a speech which, whether we have regard to its matter or to its tone, was a very admirable speech indeed, and far above the average of addresses given by movers and seconders.

I very sincerely would like also to associate myself with the mover of the Address in the remarks he made about the happy circumstance which gives us His Royal Highness the Duke of Connaught as Governor General at this crisis in the history of our country and of our Empire. It will soon be 42 years, Sir, since I first saw His Royal Highness. I was a schoolboy in a crowd—such a crowd as always gathers when royalty appears in the old land—and I saw His Royal Highness, a young man at that time, at the head of his regiment, riding from one point in the country to another. From that day to this he has, as prince, soldier and statesman, been an example to all the citizens of this Empire of honourable devotion to duty and its efficient and continuous discharge. As a prince, son of one of the most illustrious monarchs that ever sat upon the throne of Britain—brother of one of the most beloved—uncle of our present monarch, he has been an example of how a man should live, even though he be a prince. As a soldier, he has ever set an example in his own person of the extent to which those who have had the defence of our flag and Empire in their hands from time to time have exemplified the watchwords of the British soldier, those watchwords being Duty, Discipline and Mercy. But I am not at all sure that the historian will not record, Sir, that in the peculiar crisis through which we have been passing in the last eighteen months—and here I am almost certain that the Government will agree with me—we have owed as much at least to His Royal Highness as a statesman as we have owed to him either as a soldier or as a prince.

Keeping still to grounds of agreement, I desire to express my entire approval of the paragraph in the Address which bids us all be thankful for the bounteous harvest which we have had. I rather agree with my right hon. friend and leader that there was an omission in that paragraph. When I first took up a farm in Western Canada, I did not find that Providence sent it very good crops of wheat; there was a fair crop of willow bush, of poplars and of grass. In the production of the crop we have had, I think the Government might have remembered, in framing the Address, that Providence had the active co-operation of the class upon whom for many years, if not generations, the prosperity of Canada will depend—I mean the great farming class of this community. I think they should have recognized that class especially, because a special appeal was made to them last year in the shape of a pamphlet bearing the title "Patriotism and Production." It was Providence plus the farmer—plus the pamphlet, if you like—which produced the results in which we are now rejoicing. The West especially, from which I come, has given us an example, perhaps for the first time in its history, of what it can really do if it gets proper encouragement. The fact of the matter is that in our western country we can produce almost up to the limits of the possible disposal of the produce, and it is at this point that the activity of a government needs to be associated with the activity of the farmer and the activity of Providence. It is true that at the present time, owing to the special circumstances of the war, we are getting an excellent price for wheat. Beef still remains at a figure highly remunerative to the western producer—a figure which has not descended below the mark which it first reached when a wise government to the south of the line gave us free ingress to their markets for our beef. Pork is higher at the present time than it is in the western states, owing to a special shortage on our farms. But there is a feature from which I think the Government, and anyone of us who wants to learn, may learn a lesson, and that is that when I left home a few days ago, neighbours of mine were selling excellent oats for twenty-five cents a bushel, for which they were getting forty-five cents at the same time last year. Now there is a lesson in that fact, because there are farmers who are reflecting as to how far it is wise for them to produce big crops. It is perfectly clear that a man will be very nearly as well off if he produces one bushel and gets forty-five cents for it as he will if he produces two bushels and gets but twenty-five cents. The lesson for peace times is that, as we have that drop in oats at the present time under the extraordinary and artificial conditions created by the war, so I very much fear we must look forward to an enormous drop in the value of agricultural products the moment peace is restored. It would be a function of a wise government, therefore, as of a wise opposition, to base their thinking and their policy upon that state of affairs, which we all hope will arise so far as it relates to the re-establishment of peace. I thought I detected some evidence that the Government was preparing to learn that lesson during the recess. My hon. friend the Minister of Public Works (Hon. Robert Rogers) was in the western country, and he informed the public that he had an open mind on the question of free wheat. Well, so far as I know, he has an open mind still. But the United States boundary remains closed —that is the thing that troubles the western farmer; and an open market in the United States would be of very much greater value to us than an open mind on the part of the Minister of Public Works. The problem remains—it will be accentuated by the declaration of peace—as to how we are going to till our soil profitably in the West if we do not avail ourselves of every available means of disposing of the produce. I do not know why the mind of my hon. friend the minister was not closed in the proper way on this question. If it is closed at all, we have not got any information on the subject; I am afraid it must have closed against opening the market for wheat to the United States. I have wondered if any millers met him out there and destroyed the good seed which the farmers were trying to sow upon that mind of his. Whatever the influence, we have not got the market yet, and I very much fear that up to the present point in our history the historian will record about this bountiful harvest that Providence smiled upon the efforts of the farmer, that the farmer did his duty in producing the stuff, but that we had a government in power that was so unwise that it did its best to thwart both Providence and the farmer by not opening a market to the south.

I want to congratulate the Government upon the fact that they have, I think, correctly interpreted the mind of the country in regard to the holding or not holding of an election during the time of war. I offer them my very sincere congratulation upon that interpretation and upon the change of heart and attitude which that interpretation indicates in themselves. It would not be in human nature—it certainly is not in mine—not to refer in a good natured way to the fact that there is very grave doubt whether this attitude of mind on the part of the Government existed last spring. I should be shutting my eyes to obvious facts if I did not assert that I know it did not exist. Why, there was one impatient member sitting behind the Treasury benches, the limit of whose patience was expressed in the term of twenty-four hours for this young and impetuous electioneerer said he would not wait twenty-four hours before having an election in the spring. I am certainly in order in congratulating that hon. gentleman, so far as he supports the Government, on his admirable change of heart. The Minister of Public Works, I think, made the discovery in the middle of last session that the people of this country were frothing at the mouth almost to tear the Senate in pieces. I think that during the summer he made the discovery that, in so far as there was any desire to tear anybody to to pieces, it was not the Senate of Canada, so far at any rate as his own province is concerned. The ferocious fangs of the people of Manitoba seem to have been whetting themselves for quite a different prey.

My right hon. friend the Prime Minister himself was not free from the suspicion of holding over us on this side of the House, the bludgeon of a general election. He waxed angry with my right hon. leader because he and those of us who sit behind him, ventured to criticise the Budget, even to the extent of introducing an amendment to it. Now, for my part I have no regret about the criticism or about the amendment, especially that portion of it which referred to the raising of additional obstacles against trade from Great Britain at this particular crisis of the Empire's history. I would appeal to my hon. friend the Minister of Finance, to whom I have never appealed without receiving careful attention, whether our criticism of that particular part of the Budget of last year has not been justified in the event. It cannot be pleasant to him—I am sure it is not—that at this moment the imports from Great Britain to this country should be disappearing almost to the vanishing point. This decrease in British imports into Canada comes at a moment when we know that Great Britain needs, for the particular purposes of exchange, to be sending more goods into Canada. The imports into Canada from Great Britain at this moment are disappearing almost to the vanishing point, to the enormous hindrance of Britain's complete efficiency in carrying on from a commercial point of view the war in which we are at the present time engaged. It is perhaps fair to warn the minister and the Government that in the event of any further proposals of a similar nature we should consider that we were neglecting our duty, as members of this House and as loyal sons of the Empire, holding the views we do, if we did not once more raise the strongest protest and submit any such proposals to the strictest criticism, even to the point of a division if the need called for it. As I say, these things are ample evidence that there has been a salutary change of heart on the part of the Government in regard to the desirability of an election while the war lasts. If, last Spring, when Parliament prorogued, you asked any prophet who was supposed to be in the inner circles of the confidence of the Government, when the election was to take place, there was not one who did not answer with the utmost certainty of the tipster: June is the time that you have got to look out for.

I do not want to pry any further into ministerial secrets, but I should be guilty of being untrue to myself if I did not admit that there were honourable exceptions. My hon. friend the Minister of Militia (Sir Sam Hughes), since he put his hand to the plough in this war, has never taken it off. I might mention others whom I strongly suspect of having been opposed to this trend in the party opposite. I am perfectly sure that my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) could never have smiled upon the prospect of an election while the war was on. I know that my hon. friend from St. Antoine (Sir Herbert Ames), who has done such splendid work in connection with the Patriotic Fund, knew, from the point of view of that fund alone, the damage that would be done to the country, the distraction and confusion that would be caused; and he was always opposed to an election. But I very much fear that the exceptions to those who have undergone this change of heart were like the righteous in Sodom: too few to save the city.

So far as this side of the House is concerned, so far at any rate as I am personally concerned, there has been no change of attitude. I believed at the time the first shot was fired in this war that during the continuance of the war, an election in Canada would be a public calamity, and I believe it now. Who is there that does not believe it? Our ladies are assembling all over the country, irrespective of politics, to knit their eyes out when they are not weeping them out, making comforts for the soldiers at the front. Who is there that would throw a bomb of contention into assemblies like that; distraction and confusion are terms most admirably chosen to describe the conditions which would prevail; conditions which can receive no justification whatever on grounds of policy, because on the ground of the policy of prosecuting this war to a successful termination there has never been the slightest difference of opinion between those on this side of the House and those on the other. Yet, although that is our attitude, we cannot absolve ourselves and do not wish to absolve ourselves for a moment from the duty of bringing to bear the best political ability we have, on any measures for the prosecution of the war, which are brought before this House and this Parliament. I cannot conceive, as I said a year ago, that any member of the Government could wish to avoid criticism. Mr. Asquith, from the very beginning of the war, not only excused criticism but invited criticism. What is Parliament for? What is an Opposition for except to engage in criticism, not necessarily in destructive criticism—and in this case I should say not destructive at all towards the political prospects of a government—but helpful and co-operating criticism. That is the kind of criticism which we thought we were giving when we went to the point of a division in regard to taxation last session. We thought that an extra tariff upon British goods was bound to affect deleteriously the entrance and the amount of goods entering Canada from Britain. That criticism has been justified in the result. It was not hurtful criticism; it was helpful criticism, and the country and the Empire would have been in a better position to-day if the Government had conceded our point, and had withdrawn an impost of which I do not think they are very proud at the present moment, and for which I am perfectly sure they will receive the condemnation of history.

Now, we are embarking upon the third war session of this Parliament, and the Government is once more facing Parliament with propositions which are unprecedented in the history of Canada. I hope that we shall never forget on this side of the House that they are unprecedented. The Government is asking Parliament to sanction their commitment to enormous responsibilities in regard to the raising of men for this war and the raising of money for the support of those men. Now, I just want at this stage in the session to tell the Government quite bluntly that, so far as I have been able to observe—and I have been up and down the country a great deal, both east and west—there are two things which are agitating the minds of the people in regard to these propositions of the Government. There are certain things that are exercising the public mind very widely, from east to west, in Canada. In regard to recruiting, I do not think that the people of this country will have the slightest objection to the Government naming half a million men as the figure at which we should aim for the present in our recruiting efforts. I do not think so, though I agree with my leader in questioning whether it was wise to name a specific number. I have always held and proclaimed in this House that in the event of the Empire being at war, Canada would be behind the flag with all her moral and material and human resources—that she would be there with the men and there with the money. There was a time, if I wanted to be controversial, when our hon. friends opposite were not so sure about the men. I do not wish, however, to press that point, or to raise any controversial point in regard to the defence of the Empire at present. That has been our attitude so far as I, a humble member of the Opposition, have had an opportunity to declare it; and I repeat that we on this side have no holding back as to the number of men that should be sent. It might have been wiser to say that we intended to proceed with recruiting just as fast as we could raise recruits without hurting the other services of the country, without hurting munition work, and without hurting the raising of those silver bullets by our industries, upon which, after all, the determination of the war will ultimately hinge.

But the point that is exercising the minds of our people is this: I think they would be glad of the assurance that there is no undue delay in getting the recruits, once they are raised, into the trenches. I hope the Government appreciate my point, and I hope that some one will give the country and Parliament the necessary assurance upon that point. One hundred and twenty thousand men have crossed the seas, but, so far as I understand the statements that have come from the Government from time to time, there are only 50,000 men from Canada now in the trenches. We have never had more than 50,000 men in the trenches. Now, Mr. Speaker, it occurs to a great number of my fellow citizens with whom I have conversed on this point that there is a great disparity between the 50,000 men whom it has taken 18 months to put in the trenches, and the half million—ten times the number—that we propose to raise in the immediate future—because I assume that the Government's proposition is not put up merely for show, but that we are to proceed to the utmost extent of our ability and persuasiveness to endeavour to get that number of recruits. I am perfectly sure that the people would be satisfied in their own minds if they could have an explanation of how long exactly it takes the men to get from the recruiting point to the point at which they are doing something really effective in the efforts that are being made for the termination of the war. That is where the Government's responsibility lands it. We have had statements from the Minister of Militia and Defence from time to time; we have had statements which indicate that there is no difficulty about getting a million men, but it is always safe, when my hon. friend is in certain moods, to take fifty per cent off his statements. However, I admire his enthusiasm, and I think his spirit is the correct spirit in which to approach the problem. I am certain that the recruits can be got in as great numbers as we can spare, but the people are not so certain that the best use is being made of the recruits when they are raised. I hope that that criticism can be repelled; I hope the doubt can be dispelled. After all, it is a simple problem in arithmetic. If it has taken a year and a half to get 50,000 into the firing line—and I believe the proper reserve for 50,000 is 100,000—then it will take six years at least to get the proper proportion of 500,000 men into the firing line. Does anybody anticipate that this war will last six years? It may, but I do not think anybody anticipates that it will last for that length of time; and, if not, then there is a disparity between the recruiting that is going on and the effective fighting that is going on as the result of the Government's efforts. I trust I have made my point clear, and that some explanation will be given of this matter. I think it is possible that an explanation will be forthcoming. I know the difficulties of transportation from Canada to the field of actual hostilities. I should be the last to want to minimize the difficulties that have beset the Government, and I hope the last to want to detract from the efforts they have made. But there is an uneasiness upon this point, and the uneasiness is not only in the minds of the civilian population of the country, but in the minds of the soldiers themselves. It is in the minds also of those who would become soldiers if they did not know that in our cities in the West it is possible to find men who have been in khaki for months and who seem to be no nearer the firing line, and who, I believe—I speak with bated breath—are learning in the cities where they are billeted more than belongs to the proper training of a soldier. This is not a point merely raised by an Opposition speaker for the sake of making a point against the Government. It is not raised for that purpose at all. It is raised with the practical object of helping the Government to satisfy the minds of the people that they are doing their utmost in this matter, and it is raised so that an obstacle may be taken out of the way of their getting the recruits whom they are setting out to seek. I am sure that the Government will be glad to have a chance of dealing with this matter, and of giving the country and Parliament the explanations which I think are due to them. That is one of the points upon which I have ventured to think there is considerable uneasiness in the public mind.

It is but a step of the mind from men to money and with regard to money the attitude of our people is exactly their attitude in regard to men. There is no stinting in the minds of our people. I am an adopted Canadian myself, Sir, but so far as my experience goes, and I have been as active as the average member, I think our people have been splendid.

One only needs to go to the most remote homestead, to the little schoolroom, and present the needs of the Patriotic Fund, to find that the poorest homesteader in the West is ready to respond in a way which makes one feel that the last dollar of Canada is behind this fight, and the spirit which I find there I am sure prevails everywhere. There is no desire to stint the Government as to money; there is no desire to stint the givings of our people for the purpose of the Patriotic Fund, Belgian relief, Red Cross work, or the taxes for the enormous undertakings which the Government is carrying on. But I should be false to my own sense of duty if I did not say that at this time the air is full of rumors as to what is being done with the enormous amount of money that is being voted by the Parliament of Canada. It goes without saying that the $150,000,000 which we have already voted is a mere drop in the bucket compared with what we shall have to vote if we are going to raise anything like half a million recruits. It is important that some one should do what I am doing, and I might as well do it as any one. It is important that it should be impressed upon the mind of the Government that while the people will give, and give freely, of their last dollar for a war in the objects of which they believe, they have grave suspicion about the road this money is travelling—some of it. I was glad to hear the Prime Minister state this afternoon that it has been discovered that there are horses in Western Canada, and there are horses galore in Western Canada. It would have been as well if all the horses had been taken from Western Canada if it would have spared us the discovery of those one-eyed Equine Methuselahs which were recruited in the province of Nova Scotia.

Mr. MACDONALD: And in Ontario as well.

Mr. CLARK: I think the most antediluvian horse was found in Nova Scotia. I have very little appetite, Mr. Speaker, for this class of politics; very little appetite indeed, and I do not know that in the midst of a war our people have a keen appetite for it, but when things like those that were exposed last year in the Public Accounts Committee, are pushed under their noses, they would not have been human if they did not ask themselves this simple question: Is the Government making the best use of the enormous sums of money which Parliament has voted for the purpose for which it was voted, that is, for the purpose of terminating this war at the earliest possible moment? That question is being very widely asked. I would be the last man to approach Parliament with rumours, I would be the last man to approach Parliament with statements which were not authenticated facts. I quite realize that there must be inquiry into all these matters and I am sure that the Government realizes it too, and I have not the least doubt that their attitude towards the appeal I am making now will be precisely what it was last year, and that they will hail an investigation; that they will hail the fullest possible inquiry as to the way in which these appropriations are being used. They would be unwise in their own interest, as well as unwise in the interest of the Empire, if they did not hail such an investigation.

As far as we on this side of the House are concerned, our attitude is unchanged. While we believe and endorse to the full the policy of the Government we do not by any means pledge ourselves to support the details of that policy, nor do we mean to condone for one moment any diversion to the private pockets of individuals of the public funds that should be given to the killing of Germans and the termination of this war. With this reservation our attitude is to-day what it has always been, one of hearty, thorough, and sincere support of the Government in providing the last man and spending the last dollar that Canada can afford for the legitimate purposes of this war.

I am going to claim, before I sit down, Mr. Speaker, that from the time the first shot in this war was fired until the present moment, there has been no citizen of the British Empire, there is no citizen of the British Empire at this moment, of whom the whole Empire has more reason to be proud, of whom it is more proud, than my right hon. friend who leads the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). With not a drop of British blood in his veins, he has never ceased to be an admirer and supporter of British institutions and an exponent of the highest statesmanship which has guided the destinies of the British Empire whether in the old land or in the new. From the beginning of this war his attitude has been that of a man who was impressed with the magnitude of the issues of the war and who was able to rise above all considerations of partisanship or of personal advancement; who has afforded to the world and to the Empire an example of a patriotic statesman who believed in British institutions and was prepared to do his best in defence of them. Need I recall the fact that during this last summer, when under the disadvantage of great physical pain and illness, he was game enough, he was British enough, if you like, to resume a speech in which he had to take a momentary rest, when most unfortunately, the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) had missed his train and did not get to the meeting at all? Then I have noticed no one in the province of Ontario, not even a minister of the Crown, who has been more assiduous in season and out of season in attending patriotic meetings, than has my hon. friend from South Renfrew (Mr. Graham), and in varying degrees we, the followers of my right hon. friend and his chief lieutenant, have nothing to regret in our record in this respect. Our attitude to-day is what it has been throughout this war.

The major portion of the speech from the Throne is taken up with the expression of two sentiments on the part of the Government, of the Parliament and the people of Canada, sentiments which received admirable expression in the eloquent speech of my right hon. friend the Prime Minister this afternoon.

The speech in the first place asks us to express our admiration for the efforts which have been made by our soldiers at the front along with the other soldiers of the Empire and of our Allies. We on this side of the House desire to claim our full share of that admiration. Upon the fields of Festubert, St. Eloi and others too numerous to mention, these sons of Canada have, by sacrifice of blood and of life, performed deeds of which the glory will never fade away. There is no one on the opposite benches who admires their deeds more than we do.

The Speech expresses not only admiration, but what is much more necessary at the present moment, and that is determination. And once more, Mr. Speaker, I desire to say that we here also claim our full share of the determination which is expressed in the Speech, that no effort shall be wanting on the part of Canada, so far as we can speak for any portion of it, to bring this war to a successful termination. Whether the blood that flows in our veins is English, or Scotch, or Irish, or Welsh, or Norwegian, or French, aye, or even German, there are few Canadians to-day, Sir, who do not know in their heart of hearts that we live under a flag which, wherever it floats, spells liberty, which in this fight spells succour to the oppressed, help for the small against the great, for the weak against the strong, that this flag to-day floats over a fight which is justified on the part of the Allies, if ever a fight was justified in this world. We on this side of the House hold these things as strongly as hon. gentlemen opposite, and in addition we hold no pessimistic views as to the future. We have no shadow of a doubt, any more than hon. gentlemen opposite have, that this flag will finally float over a complete and dicisive victory, because above this flag stands the god of justice, liberty and truth.

On motion of Hon. T. C. Casgrain (Postmaster General) the debate was adjourned.

INTERNAL ECONOMY COMMISSION.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER presented an approved Minute of Council appointing Hon. W. J. Roche, Hon. J. D. Reid, Hon. A. E. Kemp and Hon. T. C. Casgrain, a committee to act with the Speaker of the House as a commission under the provisions of the 11th chapter of the Revised Statutes of Canada, an Act respecting the House of Commons.

NAVAL SERVICE PAPERS.

Hon. J. D. HAZEN (Minister of Naval Service) presented:

Copies of Orders in Council authorizing Regulations for the Department of Naval Service in accordance with Section 47, Chapter 43, 9-10 Edward VII, as follows:

P. C. 2864, dated the 4th December, 1915, Payment of Separation Allowance in the case of Warrant Officers.

P. C. 3009, dated 21st December, 1915, with reference to application of the Naval Discipline Act, etc., for the Government of the Naval Volunteer Force.

P. C. 63-2422, dated 15th October, 1915, with reference to appointment of Assistant Paymasters in charge.

P. C. 2267, dated 25th September, 1915, with reference to regulations for payment of "Detained Pay."

P. C. 93-2151, dated 17th September, 1915, with reference to allowances to officers and men employed on coding and decoding duties, etc.

P. C. 1712, dated 21st July, 1915, with reference to scheme of pensions for officers and men of the Royal Canadian Naval Forces, etc.

P. C. 748, dated 13th April, 1915, with reference to institution of the ratings of rangetaker first and second class in the Royal Canadian Navy.

P. C. 58-1470, dated 24th June, 1915, with reference to increase in amount of Separation Allowance to a motherless child from 3s. to 5s.

P. C. 85-1158, dated 20th May, 1915, with reference to revision of amounts payable on account of Separation Allowance to dependents of Royal Canadian Naval Permanent Ratings.

P. C. 756, dated 13th April, 1915, with reference to payment of Allowances to officers of the Royal Naval Canadian Volunteer Reserve, —— performance of duties which carry with them an Allowance to officers of the Royal Canadian Navy.

On motion of Sir George Foster, the House adjourned at 9 p.m.

Tuesday, January 18, 1916.

The House met at Three o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

ABOLITION OF CAPITAL PUNISHMENT BILL.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT.

Mr. ROBERT BICKERDIKE (Montreal, St. Lawrence) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 2, to amend the Criminal Code.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. BICKERDIKE: Mr. Speaker, I have explained this Bill so often that I hope this will be the last time it will be necessary to explain it. If this Bill becomes law, it will have for effect the abolishing of legalized murder in Canada, and also of largely reducing the number of homicides and all other crimes in this young country of ours. It will also have the effect of making convictions for crime much less difficult, as juries will not hesitate to bring in verdicts of "guilty" when they are sure, if a mistake has been made, there will be time for the prisoners to prove their innocence; while if the law continues as at present, juries will hesitate to bring in verdicts of "guilty" in murder cases.

An hon. MEMBER: But explain the Bill.

Mr. BICKERDIKE: The Bill will do away with that evil.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

THE LATE SIR CHARLES TUPPER, BART.

On the Orders of the Day:

Sir ROBERT BORDEN moved:

That a committee composed of Sir Robert Borden, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, Sir George Foster, the Hon. Geo. P. Graham, and Mr. R. B. Bennett, be appointed to prepare a resolution of condolence on the death of the Rt. Hon. Sir Charles Tupper, Bart., G.C.M.G., and report the same with all convenient speed.

Motion agreed to.

REPORTS AND PAPERS.

Report of the Department of Customs for the year ended March 31, 1915.—Hon. J. D. Reid.

Printed copies of proclamations, orders in council and documents relating to the European war, compiled by the Department of the Secretary of State; also supplementary copies of proclamations, orders in council and documents relating to the same subject compiled by the Department of the Secretary of State; also a list of the orders in council which have been passed between the 29th April, 1915 and the 12th January, 1916.—Sir Robert Borden.

CANADA'S SHARE OF WAR EXPENDITURE.

Hon. WM. PUGSLEY: I desire to ask my hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White) if he will kindly lay on the table of the House, or if he can give now, information in a concise manner as to the arrangement between the Government of Canada and the British Government as to what proportion of the expense in connection with the carrying on of the war, in so far as Canadian soldiers are concerned, is to be borne by the Government of Canada. I desire to know whether all the expense of ammunition, guns, equipment, etc., is to be borne by the Government of Canada, or what the arrangement is.

Sir THOMAS WHITE (Minister of Finance): The matter will be dealt with probably by my right hon. friend the Prime Minister in introducing the war Appropriation Bill, which will provide means for continuing our participation in the war, or, if not, by myself in the Budget Speech, which will be made at a later date. In a general way, I may say to my hon. friend that the Government of Canada is bearing the entire expense of Canada's participation in the war. There will necessarily be certain accounts which cannot be adjusted until the war is over, or until a later date. Recently I had a conversation with Col. Ward, who is immediately in touch with the situation in London, and I understood from him that the Canadian Government is to-day paying all the expenses connected with the Canadian Expeditionary Force at present in England, and is paying the men of the Canadian Expeditionary Force in France, and Belgium, but that there will be certain adjustments of accounts necessary between the Government of Canada and the British Government at a later date covering such items as rations, supplies, and other equipment for the Canadian troops who are actually on the firing line. That matter is not susceptible of calculation and adjustment to-day, but the Canadian Government is responsible for the entire expense of the Canadian Expeditionary Force.

Mr. PUGSLEY: That means, of course, all the ammunition, all the guns, all the boots and shoes, and all the clothing used by the Canadian soldiers at the front?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Our understanding is that the Canadian Government will pay all, but that an adjustment is necessary and will have to take place later.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: Does that include transportation?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I speak subject to correction by my right hon. friend the Prime Minister, but I believe that the Canadian Government has agreed to pay all the cost of transportation also; in other words, we desire to pay the entire cost of the Canadian Expeditionary Force abroad.

THE GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH.

ADDRESS IN REPLY.

Consideration of the motion of Mr. Alfred Thompson for an address to His Royal Highness the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, resumed from Monday, January 17.

Hon. T. CHASE CASGRAIN (Postmaster-General): Mr. Speaker, it must have been a source of gratification to my right hon. friend the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden)—it certainly was a source of gratification to his colleagues—to notice the acclaim with which the people of Canada received the announcement made by him at the beginning of the year that half a million Canadian soldiers would be raised to participate in this war for the vindication of British justice and British freedom. So far, two leaders of the Opposition party have so expressed their views on that announcement that no doubt remains, if ever there was a doubt, about its unanimous endorsation by the whole people of Canada. We already had some indication as to how this announcement had been received by what had appeared in the press of the country. The comments of the leading Liberal journals of Canada proved that the Prime Minister was right in believing that although Canada had been doing her share in the war up to the date of the declaration made by my right hon. friend, Canada was ready to make still further sacrifices to support the cause of the Allies. May I give some citations on this point? Le Soleil, of Quebec, after discussing the question of the contribution of Canada to the cause of the Allies, ends an article of the 7th of January, 1916, by saying:

> It cannot be decently pretended that this sacrifice—

Meaning the sacrifice of five hundred thousand men.

> —is above the forces of Canada; it is a little more than one-eighth of the total male population of the country.

A correspondent wrote to the Toronto Globe asking what would George Brown say if he were living and saw the tremendous expense to which this country was put by its participation in this war. The Globe answered on the 11th of January:

> But on the main issue Sir Robert Borden is right, and the great mass of the people of the Dominion, irrespective of political ties, will endorse his decision. Canada joins with Britain in the declaration made by Premier Asquith on her behalf when he said: "We shall not sheathe the sword, which we have not lightly drawn, until Belgium has recovered more than she has sacrificed; until France is adequately secured against menace; until the rights of the smaller nationalities have been placed upon an unassailable foundation, and until the military domination of Prussia is finally destroyed." If George Brown were here he would say amen to every word in that declaration of the nation's purpose.

In an article which appeared under the signature of my hon. friend from Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil) in the Montreal Herald of the 6th of January, I read:

> The announcement made by Sir Robert Borden that his government have decided to authorize the enlistment of 500,000 men for overseas service will not be a surprise to the country. It will be a welcome announcement to the Empire and will demonstrate once more that Canadians are in this war in earnest, and that they are decided to leave nothing undone to achieve victory and a lasting peace. Sir Robert and his colleagues have had carte blanche, from the very start, the Liberal leader, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, and his colleagues in the House having assured the government of support in their military measures. Not only have the federal Liberals done this, but many leaders in the provincial field, Sir Lomer Gouin in Quebec, Mr. Rowell in Ontario, and the other Liberal leaders in other provinces having promised and given support and co-operation. The moment Canada entered the ring it could not rest with any half measure.

These articles, I believe, Sir, represent the sentiments of the country. In the speech which my hon. friend the member for Red Deer (Mr. Michael Clark) made to the House last evening, he made allusion to the number of men which the Government had decided to send to the other side; and without criticising at all the tremendous outlay which this involved, he expressed the feeling of anxiety of the people of this country at the delay between the recruiting of the regiments and their despatch to the trenches. My hon. and gallant friend, the Minister of Militia (Sir Sam Hughes) will no doubt give a full explanation of this; but as far as I can gather from the information I have, it is due to no fault of the Government. One must take into consideration the difficulty of transportation, and then again, if I am correctly informed, we send across as many troops as possible under the circumstances. Once they arrive on the other side they are under the control and command of the British authorities.

May I say, Sir, that the speech of the hon. member for Red Deer commended itself to me by its dignity of tone; indeed the tone of the debate so well set by my hon. friends who proposed and seconded the Address, the hon. member for the Yukon (Mr. Alfred Thompson) and the hon. member for l'Islet (Mr. Paquet) has been characterized by the loftiest patriotism. I commend particularly to the attention of the House the remarks made by my hon. friend from l'Islet. The members of the House who could not follow him in the language in which his speech was delivered, I am sure will find in the translation of that speech the real sentiments which animate the people of the province of Quebec in this momentous crisis. I trust, Sir, that in the few remarks which I am about to present to the House, I shall say nothing in manner or in form which may be disagreeable in any way to my hon. friends on the other side, or to any one in the country who may differ from me on the great questions at issue.

My hon. friend from Red Deer alluded to the splendid spirit which exists in the West, and I am a witness to the truth of what he says. Last summer I had occasion for two purposes to visit the West—that great portion of our Dominion of which we are so proud. The first purpose which I had in view was to judge at first hand, to hear with my own ears and to see with my own eyes, the postal situation there. The second purpose, and probably the most important one, was that I wished to allay certain prejudices, and to convey to any who might be misled correct opinions and ideas as to the situation in Quebec. I had read in some of the western papers that there was such an anti-war feeling in the province of Quebec that the Liberal party—and I do not wish to make the Liberal party responsible for this—wished to profit by this feeling to bring on an election, hoping by that means to secure a greater number of supporters in the province of Quebec. It seems to me—and I think I am correct in this view—that there is nothing which will detract more from the unity and harmony which should exist between all sections of the country, than the arousing of suspicions and prejudices between those of different race and faith who compose our federation. I wished to do as much as I could to allay those prejudices and susceptibilities, and suspicions, and to work so far as lay in my power for that brotherly love and good will which above all other things, should exist at this time in Canada.

Everywhere I went in the West I was received not only with the greatest courtesy but with the greatest sympathy. It was impressed upon me everywhere—that I was indeed a welcome messenger from the province of Quebec. Upon my return to Eastern Canada it seemed to me the imperative duty devolved on me of going into my own province, and placing before its people the real issues which confronted them. In the month of September, October, and a part of November, I held eighteen or twenty meetings in the eastern section of the province. My colleagues the Minister of Inland Revenue (Mr. Patenaude) and the Secretary of State (Mr. Blondin) held other meetings in the central part of the province and in the district of Montreal. The reason for holding these meetings was to bring home to the people the origin and nature of the present conflict, and the results which were bound to follow from the unthinkable possibility of a German victory. As far as I could see while addressing audiences sometimes twenty-five hundred or three thousand people in the most remote districts, my remarks were well received. I was listened to not only with courtesy, but with sympathy, and the opinions and ideas which I gave expression to were received with approbation by the people of my province. These meetings were held with no political object in view, and it is scarcely necessary for me, I hope, to deny the unworthy allegation made in some quarters, that, under the guise of holding patriotic meetings, we were holding political meetings in which to expound the principles of the Conservative party. I believe that under the system of Government under which we live it is the duty of the ministers of the Crown to visit from time to time the different parts of the country, and more particularly the different parts of the provinces they represent, so that there may be a bond of sympathy and union between the ministers of the Crown and the people whom they represent. I believe that in that respect we should take a leaf from the book of the great English statesmen, who are continually speaking to their constituents. That is the reason why I thought it was incumbent upon me, and why my colleagues in the Government from the province of Quebec thought it was incumbent on them to explain directly to the people the real position of affairs, so that they might judge for themselves of the action and conduct of the Government. It is true, Sir—and I must tell the whole truth—that at these meetings I defended the Government from what I considered to be unfounded and unfair attacks; but on no occasion did I make any attack on my political opponents, or introduce any controversial matter. It was not that I think the case we Liberal-Conservatives are called upon to defend is not a good case; not that I think there is no cause of complaint in respect to the opinions held on the other side; but it was that I did not think the occasion warranted any controversy. It was because that I sincerely believe that the only subject that should occupy the attention of our people at the present time is this war in which the very existence of this country is at stake.

I wish, Sir, to render justice to whom justice is due. It was not only the Conservative ministers who held patriotic meetings in the province of Quebec. The right hon. leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) held such meetings, some of which I had the honour to attend. The hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux), and the hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil) also took part in patriotic meetings. I regret, however, that others who should know better did not follow their leaders, but gave expression to opinions in some distant parts of the country which were not in consonance with the expressions which fell from the lips of their leaders. But, so as not to detract from the tone of this debate, which has been conducted on higher than party lines, I shall say no more on this at present, leaving to another and perhaps less dignified occasion its discussion.

What struck me most in these meetings in the province of Quebec which I attended was the manifest prosperity of the farmers. Everywhere we went we saw evidences of this great prosperity. I well remember that at a large meeting in the constituency of my hon. friend from Chicoutimi and Saguenay (Mr. Girard), at which there were present at least three thousand people, in that new country, which but a few years ago was nothing but a forest, we saw the farmers coming to the meetings in their automobiles and in carriages drawn by teams of splendid horses. Everywhere was to be found convincing proof to our friends from the other provinces, should they come to visit us, that Quebec is one of the most prosperous provinces in the Dominion.

Mr. PROULX: That was the result of Liberal rule.

Mr. CASGRAIN: I do not agree with my hon. friend. When we were in these more remote districts of the province of Quebec, we seemed to be very far indeed from the scene of the war. The residents have not yet felt the touch of the war; and such was the prosperity and peace which prevailed that we could not help thinking that even more than three thousand miles separated us from the theatre of hostilities. It has been said by an hon. member in this debate that recruiting was not quite so rapid in the province of Quebec and the eastern provinces as in the West. But let me point out that with the first contingent we sent 2,500 French-Canadians. Let me mention to my hon. friends the names of some of the officers who are serving in this war. At present we have in Canada Colonels Dansereau, Barré, Derosiers, Majors De Serres and Ranger, and Captains Leprohon and Roy, who have returned to Canada from the front and who are either organizing new battalions or otherwise helping to recruit new regiments in the province of Quebec. Among those still in the theatre of the war we have Brigadier General Landry, Lt.-Col. Edouard Panet, Lt.-Col. Henri Panet, Majors Lebel, Gagnon, Verret, Milot, Chaballe, Captains Lefebvre, McDonald, Lemieux, Lacroix, Brosseau, Darche, H. Beaudry, Lieut. Pinnode, Capt. Garon, Capt. Leblanc (son of Quebec's Governor), Capt. Caron, Capt. Duchene and Capt. Picard. Some of the best families in the province of Quebec are represented, among them De Beaujeus, DeSalaberrys, Laviolettes, Babys and de Lanaudières. And surely it is a spectacle to be admired when we see the descendants of those who fought against the British for supremacy in Canada fighting side by side with the Allies.

My hon. friend from Red Deer (Mr. Clark) has the proud advantage of having one if not two sons at the front. Let me congratulate him sincerely. And may I be permitted to say that there are five men of my own name, of my own flesh and blood, who are now wearing the King's uniform and doing their duty in this war—there were six, but one has made the supreme sacrifice on the field of battle.

I have shown that the Prime Minister's announcement at the beginning of this war was well received by this House, by the press, and by the country, and that is due, I have no doubt to the united efforts of the political leaders. Let me call attention to a point which was referred to in the speech of my hon. friend from L'Islet (Mr. Paquet), and it is this: the Catholic Church in the province of Quebec, as in days of old, has done its duty. At the very beginning of the war, a pastoral letter was issued by the archbishops and bishops of Quebec calling upon their flocks to respond to the call of duty and to serve the flag. The memorable words quoted in this House the other day by my hon. friend from L'Islet and also by my hon. friend from Yukon (Mr Thompson) are there to show that the Catholic Church, the hierarchy and the clergy, in the present war as during the Napoleonic wars, are faithful to the British flag and to the free institutions which have given them such great liberties in the Dominion of Canada.

And what has been the result of all these efforts? Up to the first of December, 1915, there were at least 9,000 French-Canadians enlisted in the army. It is difficult to tell the exact number of French-Canadians now enlisted or the number that were enlisted at that time, because as hon. members of the House are aware, many of those British soldiers who came across with Wolfe settled in Quebec and adopted the language of those among whom they came to live, so that to-day there are Frasers, Blackburns Warrens, McLeans, and many others of similar names the descendants of these hardy British soldiers, who speak not one word of English. But I take from the official lists which have been furnished me by the Militia Department, that on the first of December last, there were 9,000 men bearing French names who had already enlisted.

This is not enough. We did not consider the province of Quebec, when it enlisted 9,000 men was doing its full duty, and every effort has been put forward to ensure that in this great cause the province of Quebec shall bear its full share in the defence of the Empire. At the present time, apart from the regiments of Colonels Gaudet and Archambault which are on the other side of the ocean, there are now organized or being organized in the province of Quebec, regiments under Colonels Dansereau, Barré, Readman, Piuze, and last, but not least, under Major Asselin, the Nationalist. Let me say here that all praise is due to Mr. Asselin. I take it that it is not a crime for a man to change his views or his political opinions.

Mr. MURPHY: When he changes them rightly.

Mr. CASGRAIN: When he changes them right. In the words of M. Guizot, 'celui qui ne change pas d'avis est un sot." But, Sir, when I spoke of the unanimity of sentiment in the province of Quebec I was not forgetting what had been published in a paper which is well known to many members of this House, and from the columns of which I desire to read a few articles. On September 18, 1914, Le Devoir, of Montreal, under the signature of M. Henri Bourassa, published an article in which that gentleman first laid down the principle that Canada, as an irresponsible dependency of Great Britain, had no moral or constitutional obligation in regard to or immediate interest in the present conflict, and then this article proceeded:

> Independently of these colonial obligations, which from the standpoint of history, the constitution or the facts, are inexistent, is it possible for Canada as a young nation (nation embryonnaire), as a community of men, to remain indifferent in respect to the European conflict?
> To this second question, as to the first, I reply without hesitation: no!

Canada, an Anglo-French nation, connected with France and England by a thousand ethnical, social, intellectual, economic ties, has a vital interest in the integrity of France and England, their prestige, their right and their world action.

It is, therefore, Canada's national duty to contribute, according to her resources and by the proper means of action, to the triumph and especially to the endurance of the combined efforts of France and England.

Again, on September 15 of the same year, the same writer repeated what he had said about the national duty. He said he gave his definition of national duty after mature deliberation, and added:

At the risk of being accused of weakness and inconsistency by those who only look at the intrinsic situation of Canada and only the ulterior and real dangers of her immixture in the wars of the Empire, I have not written and I will not write one line, one word, to condemn the sending of Canadian troops to Europe.

There are circumstances, and this appears to be one, where logic and even the most legitimate fears must give way before the exigencies of the moment.

The Ministry and Parliament having taken the whole responsibility of their action, one must look at, for the moment, only the immediate objective of that intervention—the free and voluntary aid granted by Canada to England, France and Belgium. Even if one believes that this aid, independently from the motives of a political nature which we cannot admit, is not the most efficient which could be taken to attain the object in view, the time has not come to pass judgment. But what is legitimate and even rigourously obligatory, is to suggest and promote all measures which are proper to render as efficient as possible Canada's action, and especially to put Canada in a position to sustain and prolong her effort.

Hon. gentlemen who have read Le Devoir of later date must ask themselves what has taken place since the month of September, 1914, to change the views of its editor. Is it because we have not been successful in chasing the Germans out of France, that we are now to desist? Because we have lost ground in the Balkan States, should we refrain from continuing the efforts which we have begun? It seems to me, Sir, that everything that has occurred impels us to continue and to increase our struggle to secure success, triumph and victory.

The province of Quebec understands what her duty is; she understands that it is in her interest to participate in this war. A great deal has been said in this House, and out of it, as to the nature of the conflict. One has only to turn back the pages of history in order to see what is the origin, the object, and the motive of the present conflict between Germany and Austria on the one side, and France, Great Britain, Russia and Italy on the other. Ever since 1840, and before that, German writers have been telling the people of Germany that the only aim of the German Empire is that she shall be the dominant power in the world; that the commercial centre of the world shall be no longer Paris, or London, but Berlin. Let me repeat a quotation which is taken from one of the writings of the author of Der Wacht am Rhine, and was probably written in 1840 or 1845:

German Switzerland, Alsace, German Belgium, Holland, Denmark, the Baltic Provinces which speak German, will all be reincorporated in the Fatherland. Prussia will assume the direction of this new Germany. As for the old house of Hapsburg, it will no longer play any part, and Austria, whose frontiers will stretch to the mouth of the Danube, will be a slav empire, extending from Pesth to the Black Sea and from Prussia to Greece.

In 1840, Henrich Heine, who was not an ennemy of France, wrote that he loved the German Fatherland, that he would never deliver the Rhine to the French, that the day would come when Germany would roll her thunder with a roll such as history had never heard before, that she would retake Alsace and Lorraine, that she would precede the French by thought as she had preceded them in action and that she would surely impose her authority on the whole world. "Often have I thought," he continues, "of this mission, of this universal domination by Germany, when I was promenading alone with my dreams under the eternally green fir-trees of my country."

Sir, these thoughts were carried out in the war which Germany waged against Denmark for the conquest of Schleswig—Holstein; they were carried out in the war waged by Germany against Austria; they were held in view in the terrible war which was waged in 1870 by Germany against France. To-day the same aim is always held in view—the domination of the world by the German Empire and the substitution of German dominion and German power for the power of Great Britain on sea and on land.

The war which is now being waged is, therefore, for Canada a war of self-defence. It has been rightly said that the first line of defence of Canada is in the line of the trenches in Flanders. Let us consider for a moment what is the condition of Germany. We all know that her population has increased tremendously. It has been said with truth that England has colonies and colonists; that France has colonies but no colonists, and that Germany has colonists but no colonies; and one of the principal aims of Germany in waging the present war is to acquire colonies for her excess population. So far as Canada is concerned, what would be the result of the humiliation of France or the defeat of Great Britain? One of the first acts of the German Empire would be to acquire this Dominion, which has always been looked upon as the brightest gem in Britain's crown. I say, therefore— I have repeated this time and again in my own province—that the aim of the German Empire is not only the domination of the world, but the acquiring of colonies as well, and that this war is not only the war of Great Britain, the war of France, the far of Russia and the war of Italy, but it is the war of Canada. It is Canada's war; it is the war of free men who cherish the free institutions under which they live and prosper. If Canada became a German colony, what would befall the province of Quebec? To answer that question, I point to what befell Poland, and to what befell Alsace and Lorraine when they became German provinces. When we are told that we do not enjoy a full measure of liberty in this country, we ought to remember that if we ever became a dependency of Germany—which God forbid—the fight which we had to make for the liberties we now enjoy would have to be fought over again. Do we not remember the terrible struggle which took place in Alsace and Lorraine, and in Germany itself after the war of 1870? Hon. gentlemen who are old enough to remember will recall the kulturkampf which was inaugurated in Germany: the terrible fight against the Roman Catholic Church in Germany; the exile and imprisonment of its priests, bishops, even its cardinals. Everybody knows that in Alsace and Lorraine the use of the French language has been prohibited; it has even been erased from the crosses and monuments in the cemeteries. In the Danish provinces of Holstein and Schleswig no public meetings can to-day be held where anything but the German tongue is spoken. This is a picture, Mr. Speaker, of what would happen to the province of Quebec if it ever became a German possession.

It seems to me, Sir, that the province of Quebec has had its full share of constitutional controversy, and that it is about time to take measures which will prevent the occurring of such controversies in the near future. From some quarters we are confronted by what was said in years past by Sir John A. Macdonald, Sir Charles Tupper and others as to the participation of Canada in the wars of the Empire. We are confronted by what Sir John A. Macdonald said at one time as to Canada's participation in the Soudan campaign. But can any parallel be drawn between the wars of those days and the war which is going on to-day? It is sufficient merely to call attention to the differences which exist between the circumstances connected with the campaigns to which Sir John A. Macdonald, Sir Charles Tupper and other leaders referred and this world war. Does any one doubt that if Sir John A. Macdonald and Sir Charles Tupper were in this House to-day they would not be strong advocates of Canada's participation in this conflict?

But, Sir, this is putting the matter on a wrong basis. It is not England's war that we are asked to participate in; it is not the war of Great Britain, it is the war of Canada. It is a war in which every patriotic Canadian is bound to do his duty.

So much for the interest of Canada in the war, and so much for the interest especially of the province of Quebec in this great struggle. But what about sentiment? What do we owe to England? Is it not a fact that we owe her our free institutions, our autonomous government, the privileges which, I have no hesitation in saying, make us the freest people in the world? Is it not true, I say, that we owe these institutions and privileges to England? We have truly a government of the people by the people. Our Government is a democratic government in the truest and the widest sense. If sometimes we do not act wisely, we alone are to blame, not the mother country, who gave us the means wherewith to make good laws and to administer them wisely. It surpasses my comprehension how people can be so obdurate as to say that we should hold England responsible for what is said in some parts of this country simply because the words which are used are said and written by men speaking the same language as that which is spoken by the majority of the people in Great Britain.

What do we owe to France? We owe to France what the child owes to the mother: our greatest love and our fondest admiration. What an example France is giving us to-day! what an example France is giving to the province of Quebec! Everybody knows that before this great struggle began, France was divided and torn by factions. Everybody knows also that since the first day of August, 1914, France has given an admirable spectacle to the entire world; it has been called le miracle de la France. Sir, when the sound of the drum rolled over the peaceful fields of France; when its people heard the bugle call, all these cries of discord were hushed; one cry only was heard, and that was the cry of "Vive la France." My right hon. friend and leader of the Government, when he spoke yesterday, rendered a just tribute to the heroic French army. I know that my hon. and gallant friend the Minister of Militia, when he came back from the scenes of battle, was full of praise for the French generals and for the French army.

Let me refer for one moment to the heroic women of France. I do not think that there is in France one home which the hand of death has not visited, or in which mourning is not seen. Nevertheless, the women go on in the calm pursuit of the only aim which the whole nation has—to vanquish the German foe. Let me give one instance to show what the heart of the French woman is like. I read the other day in a newspaper—and some hon. gentlemen in this House must have read it— that a young woman holding a babe in her arms was standing on the roadside while a regiment which had just come from the trenches was passing by. In that regiment her husband had been captain. One of the friends of the captain, seeing the woman on the side of the road, came out of the ranks and said: "Do not wait; it is of no use; you will never see him again." The wife's heart stopped beating for an instant; then she took her child in her arms, and, raising it above her head, she cried: "Vive la France." That, Mr. Speaker, shows the character of the French nation; that shows the heroism of the people from which the majority of the people in the province of Quebec have sprung.

I should like to call attention also to the splendid example which is given by the British Empire, at home as well as in the colonies. My right hon. friend the leader of the Government, and other speakers who have preceded me, have referred to what the navy has accomplished and is accomplishing to-day. Where would we be if the British navy had not existed? Where would France be to-day if the British navy had not existed? What would have become of her ports, Cherbourg, Toulon, Bordeaux? They would have been bombarded and perhaps destroyed. Sir, if it had not been for the British navy I have no doubt that the ports of Canada would have been bombarded; and that we would have seen German cruisers sailing up the river St. Lawrence. The fact that we can go on with our trade and commerce as we did before the war, and that we can send our troops across the ocean, is due only to the unequalled and magnificent British navy.

I turn to the overseas dominions, and what a splendid example they have given to the world! An example unequalled in history. The moment the battle call went forth Australia and New Zealand came to the rescue. In South Africa we saw the loyal subjects go forth, first of all to put down rebellion in their own midst, and to-day they, too, are sending troops overseas to fight the battles of the Empire. As for Canada, she has done her duty, and she will continue to do her duty until the last man has gone and the last dollar is expended. In this concert of the British Dominions the province of Quebec will take her proper part. Her political leaders, her religious leaders, her representative bodies are unanimous. Is it possible that we are all wrong, and that a small group in our province has a monopoly of wisdom, sagacity, experience, and judgment? What I ask from this House, Mr. Speaker, and what I ask from the country, is simple justice. I ask that the province of Quebec be judged by the declarations which have been made by the Lauriers, the Lemieuxs, and the Marcils,—if I name them, Sir, I hope to be pardoned for this breach of parliamentary etiquette—and by the declarations of the Patenaudes, the Blondins, and the Beaubiens. These are the standards by which I wish the province of Quebec to be judged, and not by the vagaries and vaporings of a small group of misguided gentlemen.

But, Sir, by those who remain at home, by those who cannot go to the front, there is an important duty to be performed, and that duty is, first of all, to instruct those who need instruction. In view of what is being said and written at the present time, I say that in the province of Quebec we should redouble our efforts so as to bring her contribution up to the standard of the other provinces of the Dominion. We should make sacrifices in every way, sacrifices of our time, sacrifices of our talents, however humble they may be; sacrifices of our means. We should go to the last dollar that we possibly can spare to replenish such funds as the Patriotic Fund. What, after all, are those sacrifices that we who remain here are called upon to make? What are they compared with the sacrifices of those whose homes have been laid desolate by German invasion? What are they compared with the sacrifices of the Belgians, or of the French, of whose territory one-fourth is still in the hands of the Germans? What are the sacrifices of those of us who remain here and cannot bear arms compared with the sacrifices of our noble boys who to-day are in the trenches? Sir, it seems to me that in this conflict—and I am only repeating what I have heard others say, and what I feel most earnestly—the whole nation must have but one aim in view, that is, the triumph of our arms and the vindication of the eternal principles of right, and justice, and freedom.

My right hon. friend (Sir Robert Borden) alluded to the great speech which was made by Mr. Lloyd George in the British House of Commons. I take Mr. Lloyd George's words in concluding that speech and incorporate them in mine as expressing my own sentiments and the sentiments of the country:

> Let us fling to one side rivalries, trade jealousies, professional, political, everything. Let us be one people, one in aim, one in action, one in resolution, so to win the most sacred cause ever entrusted to a great nation.

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX (Rouville): Mr. Speaker, let me at once congratulate my hon. friend, the Postmaster General (Mr. Casgrain), on the very able and very patriotic address which he has just delivered to the House. I was unfortunate last year to be absent from the House mostly every day during the session on account of illness, but I have been amply repaid to-day in listening to my hon. friend. Let me say to the right hon. gentleman who leads the House (Sir Robert Borden) that he and his party are to be congratulated on their new acquisition. In speaking as he has spoken, the Postmaster General has followed and obeyed life-long convictions; the language which he has used to-day is the language which he used in 1911 and in all the general elections which have taken place since he entered politics. During the recess the hon. gentleman visited the West, and there delivered many patriotic addresses. These addresses were received in the spirit in which they ought to be received. Passing from the West my hon. friend came East. He was needed in the East, as you know, Mr. Speaker; he addressed several large gatherings; and I can give him credit for this, that at least he made two important converts. If there is such a thing as a ministerial heaven, there should be more rejoicing in that heaven over the two sinners whom he brought with him than over many of the just that are around him.

I now pass to the speech of His Royal Highness the Governor General. For the third session Parliament has lived under the shadow of the greatest conflict in the history of mankind. I need not repeat, Mr. Speaker, what has been said from the beginning of the sittings of this House, that there can be only one opinion, only one determination, as regards the great issue confronting us: that we must help carry to a successful conclusion this terrible war. The issue is and must be all-absorbing. All others are mere contingencies compared with it. All others should fade away and vanish. Sir, it is in that spirit that the members of the Liberal party have approached this great issue. Prior to the declaration of war on the 4th August, 1914, the right hon. the leader of the Liberal party (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), the veteran among the privy councillors in Canada, and probably in His Majesty's dominions, spoke thus:

> I have often declared that if the mother country were ever in danger, or if danger even threatened, Canada would render assistance to the full extent of her power. In view of the critical nature of the situation, I have cancelled all my meetings. Pending such great questions there should be a truce to party strife.

Sir, as a humble follower of my right hon. friend, I am proud to say that he has lived up to that patriotic pledge. During the recess he has addressed meetings at Napanee, in the province of Ontario, here, in the city of Ottawa, in his old native village of St. Lin, at Sherbrooke, and, a few days ago, in Montreal, and he has consistently and eloquently appealed to the yeomanry of this country to buckle on their armour for service in His Majesty's army. That has not been the attitude only of my right hon. friend individually; it has been the official attitude of the Liberal party. On the 21st December last representatives of the Liberal party met in Ottawa, and they unanimously passed the following resolution, which speaks their sentiments and their opinions:

> The National Liberal Committee is of opinion that so long as the war lasts, the Liberal party should continue as it has from the first to give its chief attention to the tremendous struggle in which the country is engaged and that, to that end, it should continue to give loyal support to all necessary war measures whilst exercising a vigilant supervision of the conduct of the Government, both in military and civil matters.

I am pleased to hear that my hon. friend from Peterboro (Mr. Burnham) has asked the Clerk of the House to wipe out from the Votes and Proceedings the notice of motion which he gave at the beginning of this session. My hon. friend from Peterboro reminds me of the Lord High Chamberlain in the Imperial Parliament at Westminster. We know that for three hundred years, at the opening of Parliament, the Lord High Chamberlain, accompanied by the Yeoman of the Guard, and all bearing halberds and carrying lanterns, visits and scrutinizes the regions underneath the Parliament buildings at Westminster, to see if, perchance, he can find any Guy Fawkes of gunpowder plot fame . My hon. friend has fortunately found out that this meeting of the members of the Liberal party a few days before the opening of this Parliament did not smack of any Guy Fawkes or gunpowder plot.

Sir, there is a truce, but that truce, I must say, does not spell abdication. We agree, both sides of the House, both currents of public opinion in Canada, as to the essential thing, namely, the legitimate prosecution of this war, but as to the scope of legislative enactments, as to the expenditure of public money, as to the mode of taxation, I reserve my right to be critical and to investigate if need be. The Government must expect to-day more than ever a strict control and scrutiny of its actions. The functions of the government in any British country are of the nature of a trust, generally speaking, and more so during a war when the expenditure are as stupendous as they are to-day. It is not a trust in the ordinary sense of the word; it is a sacred trust, and surely the Government will expect that His Majesty's loyal Opposition will be inclined to ask questions and be critical at times. This perhaps may surprise some of my fellow members, but I take my brief from probably the greatest of all parliamentarians in Great Britain. I refer to the immortal Burke. When he, for the first time, offered himself as a candidate in the old city of Bristol, he used the following language:

> Your representative owes you not his industry only but his judgment and betrays instead of serving you if he sacrifices that to your opinion.

As a Liberal, as a Canadian, as a free citizen of a free country, though I agree with the Government on the essential thing, the legitimate prosecution of the war, and the necessary expenditures entailed by that war, I wish to reserve for myself the right to criticise and to investigate if need be. Let me give a case in point. Without traducing any one, without making any accusations, I am simply referring to the rumors which are at the present time, saturating the atmosphere of this capital city of the Dominion. We all know that, acting under the direction of this Government, a commission has been appointed to give shell orders for the British authorities throughout the various industrial centres of Canada. That commission has been replaced of late. It is being said, and it has been said, that large orders were given without any tender. It is being said, it is hinted, that orders were distributed amongst the members of that commission. It is being said that extensive profits, profits abnormally high, were made. I do not know, I am not in a position to state if this is a true statement of the fact, and I make no accusations, but I say, Sir, that it is the duty of this Parliament to investigate, to scrutinise and to know whether such is true or not.

Oh, I know that people say that this Government, that this Parliament, has nothing to do with that commission, that the money was spent on behalf of the British Government, and that therefore we have nothing to investigate. Let me give the answer to that quibble by citing the words emanating from the trenchant pen of one gentleman who sat in this House when first I was elected in 1896, from a man whose crisp style is well known to the Conservative organizers in this country —I refer to my friend Mr. Ross Robertson, of the Toronto Telegram. Here is the answer made to that quibble by Mr. Ross Robertson writing in the Toronto Telegram of November 30, 1915:

> The worst sort of quibble travels in the suggestion that the shell committee was spending the money of the British taxpayers, and the work of that committee is therefore none of Sir Robert Borden's business. The shell committee was acting on behalf of Sir Robert Borden, just as Sir Robert Borden was acting on behalf of the Canadian people. The shell committee was not the steward of Canada's money. The shell committee was the steward of Canada's honour.

I make no accusations, I feel sure that the right hon. gentleman, who is the steward of Canada's honour, as was so well said and penned by my friend Mr. Ross Robertson, can answer any charges that may be made on account of that committee's action.

This being said about our right to criticise and to investigate, let me now pass to the speech from the Throne and state at once that it is an agreeable duty for me to join with my hon. friend the Postmaster General (Mr. Casgrain) in saying that the speech from the Throne this year reflects the admiration and the pride of the Canadian people at large for the noble achievements of those who fought and died in the trenches in Flanders. At Festubert, at Langemarck, and at St. Eloi, our soldiers, as the right hon. the leader of the Opposition well said yesterday, fought like veterans and heroes. They maintained high the traditions of the nation; they made immortal the name and the fame of our common country Canada. Sir, my right hon. friend the leader of the House was kind enough yesterday to mention the noble deed of Major Roy who fell in the trenches. Let me reciprocate with him and take off my hat in mentioning the name of Guy Drummond who left his palatial home in Montreal, who had in his possession all the happiness which life could yield a man, millions to spend, a bright intelligence, who left the shores of Canada with the Princess Patricia Regiment, and who fell like a hero in the trenches of Flanders. The effort of Canada is happily summarized and fully justified, it seems to me, in two phrases of the speech, as follows:

> The Empire's part therein has been amply maintained at sea by the aspiring achievements of the Navy and on land by the distinguished valour of the great armies which have enrolled themselves in all parts of His Majesty's dominions for the common defence of our liberty.

> Equally praiseworthy and impressive has been the self-sacrificing and loyal spirit shown by all the Canadian people who have freely dedicated their manhood and substance to the common defence of the Empire.

I have no hesitation in proclaiming high and loud that the common defence of the Empire means in my humble judgment the common defence of our liberty. In this sense my hon. friend the Postmaster General is right when he says that in the present war the first line of defence of Canada is in the plains of Flanders. I forget the name of the American statesman who once said, "I stand for my country right or wrong." The more I study the causes of this conflict, the more I am convinced that Great Britain is in the right in this war. The crime of blood guiltiness does not lie at her gate. History will say that she sought to prevent the strife from the very beginning, but that she could not view with indifference the brutal outrage perpetrated on poor Belgium and the unprovoked terrorism displayed on the Meuse and further on in Champagne. Great Britain was not attacked: France and Russia were attacked. Britain might have awaited the onslaught; she might have stood clear even; she might have husbanded her resources of men and money; she might simply and swiftly have prepared; she might even have loomed over the stricken adversaries in the end and claimed for herself the hegemony of Europe; but Britain did not do so. In the light of history it will be said that Britain did not do so; that she spontaneously and bravely threw her trident into the scale; that she threw her gold into the scale; that she threw her racial record, her great prestige; that she threw and is throwing in the balance the whole puissance of the mighty British Empire—and all for what? for that principle of the liberty of the individual which is the mainstay of the British institutions as against mediaeval autocracy. In the light of history, in the eyes of civilization. Germany on the contrary stands at the bar. She, and she alone, is responsible for this awful conflagration. Her aim, lust of conquest; her ambition, the domination of the world. And in order to dominate the world she had to crush the small nationalities. In order to dominate the world she had to maim France for the second time. In order to dominate the world, she had to humble the British Empire. This is why I say that in the present conflict the common defence of the British Empire, as stated in the Speech from the Throne, means the common defence of our liberties.

It has been said that we owe nothing to England. Sir, the whole structure of the British Empire is based on freedom, religious and civil freedom; and the fall of the British Empire would mean the destruction of those liberal institutions which are so necessary to mankind. It would mean the revival of autocracy and the disappearance from the world of those principles of government by the people for the people which were once so eloquently defined by the greatest of Americans, Abraham Lincoln. Need I say with my hon. friend the Postmaster General that we of French origin in this House and in this country, inspired by the memories of the past stand by the British ideals of government in this crisis. We know, as students of history, what is Britain's true glory. Britain's true glory, Sir, is not Agincourt, it is not even Waterloo. Britain's true glory is not her commerce though it spread its sails on the seven seas of the world. Britain's true glory is not her literature, so brilliant, her rhetoric so powerful, for even in that field she has rivals. Britain's true glory, Sir, is her genius for free government. It is not unlike the majestic dome of the great St. Paul's cathedral. To eyes that view that dome superficially it may appear aerial. But behold the massive pillars by which it is upheld. The British Empire also is surmounted by a dome, the freedom which it spreads over all the Dominions. And the pillars are the Dominions themselves—Canada, Australia, Newfoundland, New Zealand, South Africa, all young and lusty nations made free and happy under British institutions.

With the vast number of troops which this war has created in Canada, some may apprehend danger of militarism. Mr. Speaker, Canadians, even at the sight of five hundred thousand soldiers, will never be carried away by the glamour of arms. They will not be dazzled by the exploits of war. At best they look upon militarism as a curse. But they understand that this war is waged against militarism. It is because of the existence of the Empire, and because the liberties of that Empire were challenged and threatened, that the Canadian people decided, as by a lightning flash, to participate in this war. The Canadian people understand that this is not a war of conquest; it is a conflict of ideals, a conflict which may be summed up in these words: Shall the rule of the soldier in the twentieth century prevail over the rule of the citizen; shall the rule of fear replace the rule of law? We Canadians wish to maintain the rule of the citizen and not the rule of the soldier, the rule of law and not the rule of fear. And we know that in England the soldier is not the master but the servant of the people. Mr. Speaker, the reason why Great Britain stepped into this gigantic conflict has been aptly given by the Prime Minister the Right Hon. Mr. Asquith. Speaking at Bristol, at the beginning of hostilities, Mr. Asquith explained to the electors why England had taken the plunge into this war, and he used the following words, which, in my judgment are most inspiring:

> It is because we believe here, old fashioned people as we are, in the sanctity of treaties; that the weak have rights, that the strong have duties; that small nationalities have every bit as good a title as large ones to life and independence; and that freedom for her own sake is as well worth fighting for to-day as it ever was in the past.

[Mr. Lemieux.]

Noble words! They constitute in the present instance my brief as a French Canadian, if brief were needed, to justify my action in supporting the war. Yes, I belong to the minority. But I am proud also of my British citizenship. And it is because I belong to one of those small nationalities referred to in Mr. Asquith's Bristol speech, that I cling the more to the flag which protects my race and protects my rights. The triumph of Great Britain will be the triumph of the minority in this country; the defeat of Great Britain would be the defeat of the minority.

Sir, let me say to my friends of the English-speaking persuasion on both sides of the House that it shall never be said that England's difficulties are Quebec's opportunities. There now exists an indissoluble union between England and France, a union cemented by the blood of the bravest on the plains of Flanders and on the cliffs of the Dardanelles. May we not hope that as a result of this war, in which the two mother countries of the two leading races in Canada are taking such a noble part; in which the sons of those two races have joined the standards of both their mother countries—may we not hope that a better feeling will exist in the future between the French and the English races in Canada? My right hon. friend the Prime Minister, at the conclusion of his speech yesterday, used the following language:

> In the fierce flame of this war, in the ordeal of sacrifice which it entails, the strong elements of the Canadian nation will learn the better to understand each other, and through that understanding will be welded into a more perfect and splendid unity than ever before.

I commend the right hon. gentleman for this noble language. I say to my hon. friends on both sides of the House that the hon. leader of the Government was only re-echoing in that sentence of his, the sentiments at one time entertained by one of the greatest Canadians who ever lived. I refer to the late Edward Blake. In 1887, speaking in the province of Ontario, Mr. Blake used the following language:

> The true path of duty in a community of divers races and creeds like ours—where we must combine firmness in the assertion of our rights with fulness in the recognition of the rights of others—is to cultivate moderation and forbearance; we must hold to the ample acknowledgment of each man's individual rights of conscience in religious matters, and to the common citizenship of all in civil matters, if we would make of Canada a great and free country, inhabited by a happy and united people.

On another occasion, speaking of the minorities, he said:

> But more, I say that being strong, we ought to be what the strong should always be—generous to the weak. Measure full, heaped up and running over, is the measure to be given by the strong to the weak.

I ask my hon. friends who belong to the majority to reflect upon, to ponder, to read and to digest the words of Edward Blake:

> Measure full, heaped up and running over, is the measure to be given by the strong to the weak.

Edward Blake has passed away, leaving a name and fame worthy of his great intellectual power. May we not expect that there will rise another Blake in Ontario to defend and protect the minority? Sir, speaking at a recruiting meeting held in St. James Methodist church, Montreal, not long ago, I said:

> To respond to the call of the King is not only a duty, but an honour and a privilege.

And I added:

> This is a holy war, it is a new Crusade which fires us with moral enthusiasm. Let the churches be as many recruiting tents for the Crusaders.

I was taken to task by a so-called religious weekly for having used that language. But I have, as regards what I said at that church, nothing to retract. When I uttered those sentiments I remembered that it was from the pulpit that, in 1775, Mgr. Briand urged upon his flock to rally to the king's colours. I remembered that it was from the pulpit that, in 1812, Mgr. Plessis called upon his flock to rally to the colours of the King. Mr. Speaker, the language of the Archbishop of Montreal the other day does not reflect a new sentiment or a new devotion of the Roman Catholic church to British institutions in Canada. The traditional policy of the Roman Catholic church in the province of Quebec has always been one of fealty and loyalty to the Crown and to British institutions. It would take too long, perhaps, to quote the language of the first Bishop of Quebec after the Conquest; let me, however, quote to the House the language of Mgr. Plessis at the outbreak of the war in 1812:

> We have never ceased to inculcate in you on all occasions the principle of loyalty, respect and attachment with which you should be filled for our august Sovereign and his government. We have repeated to you many times that those words of the Chief of the Apostles, "Fear God, honour the King," were not only a counsel but a precept and an essential article of religious morals; that your fathers in the faith have ever followed no other doctrine.

This is, Sir, the doctrine of my Church as regards the duties of the flock towards the Crown and the constitutional authorities. As in 1775, as in 1812, so in this year of our Lord 1916, the clergy and the laity in the province of Quebec shall remain faithful to that doctrine, and do remain faithful to it.

My hon. friend the Postmaster General has referred in very eloquent terms to the efforts made in the province of Quebec to promote recruiting. May I say once for all to my hon. friends on both sides of the House—I wish that my voice could be heard all through this land, from the Atlantic to the Pacific—that the heart of Quebec is in this war, and that we must not mistake the words of a few eccentric persons as being the expression of the sentiment of my native province. Mr. Bourassa does no more represent public opinion in my province on this issue than Bernard Shaw represents England's opinion in the old country. Mr. Speaker, we are a unit. Nine thousand of our kith and kin are on the battlefront. I wish that my province should be judged of her efforts not by those who enlist at the present time in large numbers, but by the lists of the wounded which are being published every day by the press of this country. Mr. Speaker, recruiting is active at the present time in the province of Quebec. Thanks to the direction given not only by the Church—because we do not need the direction of the Church to direct us to our purely civil duties; I am a Liberal and I require no dictation as to my duties to the King and constitution—not only by the Church but also by the public men, my fellowmen, Conservative as well as Liberal, have united in making an appeal to the yeomanry of the province of Quebec which, thank Heaven, has been listened to. My hon. friend has mentioned some names which are prominent in the armies of His Majesty. We claim, with no uncertain pride, as being of our blood, men who belong to the historic French-Canadian families: the Gaudets, the Dansereaus, the DesRosiers, the Deserres, the DeSalaberrys, the Talbots, the Papineaus, the Duchesnays, the Casgrains, the DeLanaudières, and the Verrets—I could name many others. Last, but not the least, we are at the present time organizing two regiments, one under the leadership of Major Asselin and the other under the leadership of Major Barré. I was appointed president of the civilians' committee which raised the regimental fund for the Asselin regiment. I refused many contributions offered me by my English speaking fellow-citizens in Montreal, because I knew that they had done their duty liberally in connection with regiments raised by Colonel Meighen, Colonel Davidson and others. I insisted that the contributions should come from the French Canadians only, and I am proud to be able to inform you, Mr. Speaker, that in spite of the many calls which are being made on behalf of Patriotic fund, the Red Cross, the Comité France-Amerique, the Belgian fund, the Serbian fund—in spite of the many charities that are needed at the present moment for our institutions in Montreal, within three weeks we raised a very substantial amount amongst my fellowmen towards the regimental fund of the Asselin battalion. In six months, the turn of the tide having taken place, the public of the province of Quebec will have been educated—yes, educated as regards this war, because the population, being largely rural, and having enjoyed peace for a hundred years, is not, as many would think, so much affected by events in Europe as other sections of Canada, because it is Canadian born, seven, eight, nine, ten generations back. I say that the public, having been made acquainted with the facts concerning this war, thanks to the eloquence of the right hon. leader of the Opposition, thanks to the campaign of my hon. friend the Postmaster General, thanks to the articles published by the Quebec press, within six months, we shall have nearer twenty thousand than fifteen thousand new recruits in my province.

Mr. Speaker, when the rolls are published after the war, and when we shall be in a position properly to assess the Macleans and Scotts and Rosses—gallant French-Canadians with Scotch names—it will be found that the province of Quebec had its full proportion in this great conflict.

The speech from the Throne mentions the lasting peace which is to come. The last paragraph says:

> Measures will be submitted for your consideration to further the effective co-operation of Canada in the defence of the Empire and in the maintenance of this war, waged for liberty and lasting peace.

The time for peace is, I am sorry to say, still far in the future. There is not a single point of agreement between the contestants, and there can be no peace for men fighting for their lives; life must first be assured. No peace is possible, Sir, while the rulers of Germany cling to the belief that it is within their grasp and power to dominate the world. There can be no assurance of life for Russia, France and Great Britain until the German dream is destroyed; until the military caste, and the madness which conceived it, is shattered to pieces. In this gigantic struggle, the Allies all stand for freedom against autocracy, and on that roll of honour I am proud to see my own country, Canada, fighting for freedom, fighting against autocracy. Yes, Russia, tied down by her barbarous past, is fighting so that Europe may be free; Serbia refuses to accept the yoke of serfdom; Italy has drawn her sword, as in the days of old, for her unity and independence; France, gallant, imperishable, has been stemming for the third time in her marvellous history the tide of the barbarians; Ireland, the land of a thousand sorrows, has responded nobly to the call of Redmond; Belgium, undaunted and unyielding, has preferred the path of duty to the Hun shackles; England and Scotland are spending lavishly their treasure of men and money in order that the cause of free government shall subsist in the world. Yes, I am proud to see the name of Canada on that roll of honour alongside the names of those other countries, standing for the cause of democracy challenged by the German military party.

But, Sir, the speech from the Throne is silent on some vital questions. There is an old French adage which says: "Gouverner, c'est prévoir"—to govern is to foresee. We all agree as to the war expenditure properly speaking. I am not criticising the war expenditure, but I wish to refer to the ordinary expenditure—I should call it extraordinary expenditure—of this year. It has reached the breaking point. I wish to call the attention of my genial friend the Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White) to the trend of events in Canada from a financial point of view since he took office. You will remember that in 1891, with a population of practically 5,000,000 people, the cost of running this country was $7.50 for every head of population. In 1901, with a population of 5,500,000 people, it was $8.75 for every head of population. In 1911, that famous year, wherein no truck and no trade was to be had with our neighbours, with a population of 7,206,000 people, the cost of administering the country was $12 for every head of population. In 1915, the year that my hon. friend was knighted, after four years of his activities in the Finance Department, we can estimate a population of not more than 8,000,000, and the cost of running the country has reached the sum of $16.90 for every head of population. And let me at once, while he is sitting next the Postmaster General, tell him that in the Post Office Department, notwithstanding the administrative ability of the Postmaster General, notwithstanding his honesty of purpose, there exists a serious state of things. I charge nothing for the information—there is a ghost haunting that department. That ghost appears periodically when the Tory party takes office. When Sir William Mulock took charge of the department, with a vigorous hand and a few adjectives, he rid the department of the ghost, and I followed suit. But when my mascot, the former Postmaster General, took charge of that department, the ghost reappeared and he hugged the ghost.

5 p.m.

Mr. CASGRAIN: The ghost is in the closet now.

Mr. LEMIEUX: It is an old man with a long beard. His name spells deficit, and he seems to be installed in the Post Office Department, not for many years to come, I hope, but for some time at least, unless my hon. friend takes a leaf from my book or from the book of Sir William Mulock.

Now let us take the Post Office Department. In 1896 the expenditure in the Post Office Department was $3,752,805. In 1911, when a handsome surplus was shown, it had increased to $7,954,000 or an increase of a little over $4,000,000 in fifteen years—and we were selling stamps at two cents instead of three cents. By the way, let me congratulate by hon. friend on having relieved the people from the task of having to lick two stamps for every letter. In fifteen years we increased the expenditure by only $4,000,000. When the Hon. Mr. Pelletier appeared in that department and when he hugged the ghost, the expenditure increased from $7,954,000 in 1911, to $12,822,000 in 1914, and to $14,956,000 in 1915, an increase of nearly $5,000,000 in the three years and of nearly $7,000,000 in the four years. In other words, the increase in the annual cost of administration of the department for the fifteen years prior to 1911 was something like $4,000,000 while the increase for the four years following was something like $7,000,000. My hon. friend is a business man, besides being a brilliant jurist. I will ask him to restore the surplus which had superseded that ghost, and to rid once more the department of that deficit. Of course it means hard work on the part of my hon. friend. I am glad to see that he is still young hardy and jaunty. He has broad shoulders. It requires, indeed, quite an Atlas to carry the burden left to him by his immediate predecessor. I must not forget that he has three hundred and fifty thousand Pelletier padlocks to carry in the Post Office Department. If that is too heavy a load for his shoulders let him send them to the scrap heap or to the Shell Committee who might use them to make shells. Sir, in these days of loans and huge expenditures, let me tell the Minister of Finance that he might well adopt a policy of economy and retrenchment. I said in those days of loans. I hope that some time during this session the Minister of Finance shall be permitted to explain to the House, to the country, and to the noble seventeen of Toronto, how it came that he went—yes to New York to borrow money from the American financial institutions; he borrowed money from the United States! No truck, no trade with the Americans save when it is necessary to run a Tory Government machinery! Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend became a convert or a pervert after that famous meeting in Toronto when it was announced as part of the political gospel of hon. gentlemen opposite that there should be no truck and no trade with the Yankees. Before that he was, I know, a sound and consistent Liberal, and though it is true that he broke away from modern Liberals like the right hon. the leader of the Liberal party, surely he must hold dearly in his memory and green in his heart the name and fame of Mr. Gladstone. I shall not surprise my hon. friend when I say that Gladstone was, perhaps, the greatest exemplar in public finance in any country of the world. So keen was Gladstone in his battle for economy and retrenchment that that master of phrases, Disraeli, once said of him: "His duty is to supply ways and means, yet he is proposing votes with innuendo and recommending expenditures in whispered invective." My hon. friend the Minister of Finance learned in the whispering campaign of 1911 how to whisper. I know that he is not strong in invective. He has not the vocabulary of his friend the Minister of Militia and Defence. He is the Webster of the ministerial party, so far as invective is concerned. I would ask my hon. friend to learn invective from that Webster—I do not refer to the Webster of Brockville—Yes, I would ask my hon. friend to learn how to whisper invective when the Minister of Public Works, or the Minister of Customs, or even the Minister of our Navy, are besieging him for such huge expenditures as appear in the blue books this year. The words of Gladstone should be remembered by my hon. friend. What did Gladstone say?

> Economy is the first and great article in my financial creed. . . The Chancellor of the Exchequer should boldly uphold economy in detail and it is the mark of a chicken-hearted chancellor when he shrinks from holdng economy in detail, when because it is a question of only two or three thousand pounds, he says that it is no matter. He is ridiculed no doubt, for what is called candle ends and cheese parings, but he is not worth his salt if he is not ready to save what are meant by candle ends and cheese parings in the cause of the country.

I know the Minister of Finance is the salt of the earth, but he is not worth his salt if he cannot save the candle ends and the cheese parings for the cause of his country, which is now engaged in a terrible conflict, involving large inroads upon the revenues of the country, a country which is being taxed, and taxed severely, because of the war.

We must not forget that when peace is restored this country will be saddled with a huge war debt. The public debt in the month of November last was $501,668,167.71. If the war lasts two years longer Canada will be saddled with a debt of over rather than under one billion dollars. Therefore, the first lesson which my hon. friend the Minister of Finance has to learn is the lesson of economy, the most stringent economy. He has been borrowing and wasting too much, and a halt should be called, because he should not forget that while the burden of debt must be borne, the capacity to bear it is limited. Peace will some day be restored, and this country will have to face most serious problems. The land problem seems to me the most important, and I congratulate my hon. friend the member for Red Deer (Mr. Michael Clark) on the compliments which he paid in his speech yesterday to the farmers of Canada. The farmers of Canada are to-day, and to-morrow will be, the best hopes of this country. The roots of manhood are in the soil of Canada. "That nation is strongest," said Froude, "which has the largest proportion of its people with a direct interest in the land." In some parts of it, Canada may be an industrial country, but to a limited extent. Canada is bound to become the greatest farming section of the American continent. Our system of immigration in the past has not been as successful as it should have been. Thousands of immigrants have left their homesteads for city life; there is a congestion in the cities to-day, and many of these immigrants are a burden on the municipalities. With the fertility of our soil, with the advertising given to Canada abroad during the last 20 years, we should have had in this country a population of at least 20,000,000 people, whereas we have barely a population of 8,000,000. The farming industry of Canada must be specially looked after when peace is restored. because it is our great national asset for the future, as it has been this year, and unless we increase our output we cannot hope to meet our annual interest payments on the huge war debt that will be accumulated. The world, we know, is hungry for the foodstuffs of Canada, for her wheat, and for her meats and dairy products. We have millions of vacant acres, and with men eager for work, land needing to be worked, and the world ready to buy the products of such work, our country should emerge successfully from the wave of economic depression which now exists. I read only yesterday a description of the probable situation in Europe after the war, a description which is very graphic, in my judgment. This is published in the Daily Mail, of London, England, by Mr. T. Wells. He says:

> Twenty-five million men have taken up arms. It is estimated that nine million already have been slain or disabled, and that the total destruction of life in Europe in two years of war will be twenty million.
> This is the combatant waste alone. Civilian populations everywhere in Europe, even of neutral nations, are affected by the physical and nerve stress of Armageddon. Nearly everywhere the birth-rate is falling, the death-rate rising. British births are already 40,000 a year less and deaths 50,000 more than in 1913, a net deficit of 90,000 lives a year—the total population of whole towns like Coventry or Northampton, Paris is losing similarly, and Berlin and Vienna much more heavily.
>
> When the great war is over a shrunken Europe will realize that no plague of the Middle Ages ever ravaged it like the black death that came from Potsdam.
>
> The direct monetary cost of the war to the belligerents can be put at nearly ten thousand million pounds a year, figures that, like the astronomers' distances, outpass the human conception. Titanic as they are, the figures of the indirect cost of the war exceed them; lost trade, lost production, and creations of science, art, humanitarianism and discovery that have perished in embryo.
>
> Europe after the war will be a little Europe, with a population not much greater than the population of Europe before the Napoleonic wars, a Europe with these stupendous social problems:
>
> Three women to two men of marriageable age.

More old men than young men.
More boys than workers in their prime.
More physically unfit than physically fit.
Millions of men to be fitted again into civil employment, millions of women who have learned man's work and earned his wages.
Millions of manual workers who will have become accustomed to wages twice or three times as high as they earned in pre-war days, and who will still expect those wages.
Greatly diminished food supplies for many years owing to ravage of cultivated lands, diminished breeding stock, and shortage of production.
High commercial freights, dear imports, and handicapped exports, owing to shortage of ships.
These are only a few of the major problems that will confront Europe after the war.

Sir, out of all this awful welter Canada may benefit, Canada may profit, and that profit will go, must go first to the tillers of the soil. The farmer will secure a high price for his produce. So the policy of the Government at the present day should be to increase our farming population, to increase the yearly volume of agricultural products and to do away with the artificial barriers which exist in the West, to give the farmer of Canada fair play, a free hand and thus help him to make headway after this war is over.

New conditions will be created in belligerent countries and in neutral countries as well. Has the Government provided for the return of our soldiers? Has the Government provided for the return of those soldiers to civilian life and industry? The employment of our returning soldiers is one question and the large influx of immigration to Canada after the war is another. A meeting was held the other day in Montreal under the chairmanship of the Anglican bishop—His Lordship Bishop Farthing. At that meeting a memorandum was prepared which in a few days will be presented to the Government. That memorandum contains data and facts as regards the conditions of unemployment in the large centres and as regards the urgency of the establishment of labour bureaus throughout Canada. What reliable nation-wide organization does Canada possess to deal with the following gigantitc problems at the close of the war? The replacing of returned troops in suitable occupation; the readjustment of dislocated industrial conditions and the transference of workers from war industries to normal industrial occupations; the industrial training and technical equipment of potential citizens to meet the strenuous and fierce competition for industrial and commercial expansion; the handling of the stream of immigration which will set in when peace is concluded; the replacing of interned aliens from concentration camps throughout the country. These are the questions which were discussed the other evening at that meeting in Montreal at which the largest and most influential bodies in the city were represented. The memorandum will be submitted to my right hon. friend in a few days. A deputation headed by the Bishop of Montreal will be here. I hope that the Government will take the necessary measures to protect our returning soldiers, to protect the immigrants who will come into this country in large numbers after the war and to provide as much as possible for the distribution of employment among the various industrial centres of Canada.

I have just mentioned the question of technical education. There is a most interesting report on the shelves of the Department of Labour on the all-important question of technical education. Has the Government taken any action on this report? Has the Government the intention of taking any action on it? We know that the success of Germany and of the United States from the industrial point of view, and, in a measure, of England and France, is due to their system of technical education. I am pleased to know that there has been established of late years a splendid technical institution in the city of Montreal. But that is not enough. The Federal Government ought to help the provinces to establish and multiply technical institutes in order to equip the young men of this country for the economic battles of the future.

One word about another question. My right hon. friend the Prime Minister yesterday said that he would speak until after six o'clock in order to impart to the House the result of his trip to the Mother country during the recess. I waited and waited and listened attentively with bated breath to my right hon. friend as I always do. I expected something startling from him and yet, Mr. Speaker, will I surprise him when I say that I was sadly disappointed in his statements. It is very interesting indeed to know that he met the Prime Minister of England and the Minister of Munitions, Mr. Lloyd George, that he discussed the question of remounts and other sundry matters, but I expected from him a statement as regards that promise which he has made on so many occasions to the faithful jingoes of Toronto. Long before the war, my right hon. friend repeated time and time again, as he has done since the war, that the old order of things had passed away and that now on, Canada would have a voice in the affairs of the Empire. To be just with my right hon. friend let me quote his ipsissima verba in Toronto in 1913:

> Those whom those questions concern must always reckon with the inborn feeling in the Canadian breast that a British subject living in this Dominion must ultimately have as potent a voice in the government and the guidance of this worldwide Empire as the British subject living in the United Kingdom.

And after this deliverance I know that the stout and faithful from Toronto expected that within a very short time indeed that voice would be heard in the councils of Downing street. My hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) went further. Speaking in April last in Toronto again he said:

> Before the war many persons argued that Canada ought to have no foreign policy. Now Canada had a foreign policy and that was the policy of the British Empire. For good or ill they had taken an advanced position, and from this time forward they must have a united foreign policy.

At Folkestone in England on the 4th of August, 1915, my right hon. friend the Prime Minister said:

> The old order has in some measure passed away. Once for all it has been borne upon the minds and souls of all of us that the great policies which touch and control the issues of peace and war concern more than the peoples of these islands.

I know the old historic city of Folkestone, and I feel that perhaps the words of my right hon. friend, eloquent and wise as they were, had not much effect on the plain people of Folkestone; but I know that when he spoke at Folkestone he spoke for the stout and faithful of Toronto.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: As a matter of fact I did not speak at Folkestone at all.

Mr. LEMIEUX: It is reported in "The New Empire Partnership," a book published by Mr. Percy Hurd, page 289. I will pass the book to my right hon. friend. Anyway, did he use anywhere the words that I have quote?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: That is very likely.

Mr. LEMIEUX: An event took place anyway which was heralded by the jingo press as really an epoch-making event. On the 15th day of July, 1915—

Mr. MURPHY: What is the date?

Mr. LEMIEUX: On the 15th of July, 1915—not the 12th—the English press reported that by the invitation of the British Prime Minister, Sir Robert Borden, the Prime Minister of the Dominion of Canada, attended a meeting of the Cabinet at Downing street. If my right hon. friend can break the news to an impatient listener, I would like to know if he was present at that meeting of the British Cabinet as a spectator or if he was there as a participator; or let him say at once what I suggest as the case, was he playing to a Toronto gallery? The country is entitled to know this. True, Mr. Bonar Law said at Folkestone on the 4th of August, 1915:

> The time will come when the whole of the self-governing dominions, in proportion to their population and resources, will share with the motherland in the duty and honour of governing the British Empire."

But this is a mere opinion, an obiter dictum of Mr. Bonar Law, who no doubt clings to the opinions he held before being a member of the coalition government. But the statesman who really spoke for the British Government is Mr. Asquith, who in 1911—and I wish my right hon. friend would think of this—was present at an Imperial Conference in which the right hon. gentleman who leads the Opposition took part when the proposal was made by Sir Joseph Ward, the Prime Minister for New Zealand, for the very thing which has been propounded so assiduously and so insidiously by the right hon. gentleman during the last few years, that is, the idea that the Dominion should have a voice in the councils of the Empire and should dictate the terms of peace and war in the foreign policies of Great Britain. Mr. Asquith's answer was very plain. It reads as follows:

> It would impair, if not altogether destroy, the authority of the Government of the United Kingdom, in such grave matters as the conduct of foreign policy, the conclusion of treaties, the declaration and maintenance of peace, or the declaration of war, and indeed, all those relations with foreign powers, necessarily of the most delicate character, which are now in the hands of the Imperial Government, subject to its responsibility to the Imperial Parliament —that authority cannot be shared, and the co-existence side by side with the Cabinet of the United Kingdom of this proposed body—it does not matter what name you call it for the moment—clothed with the functions and the jurisdiction which Sir Joseph Ward proposed to invest it with, would in our judgment, be absolutely fatal to our present system of responsible government.

Now, Mr. Asquith has not varied his opinion; he has never said that he has retracted that statement. and until he declares that he has retracted it, I say that my right hon. friend in his claim for a voice in the councils of the Empire is only playing to the gallery. The modern, the sane idea of the British Empire is that of Gladstone, is that of Asquith, that its unity is based on the freedom of each of its component parts. Sir, freedom alone breeds the loyalty of the dominions. For my part, notwithstanding the hopes expressed by the right hon. the leader of the House, I am satisfied with my lot as a Canadian and as a British subject. Canada has won responsible government. Formerly England drafted our tariff, managed our post office, looked after the public works—and perhaps it was not a bad thing for Canada compared with the present-day administration—involved us in her commercial treaties, and defended Canada with her regulars. But, Sir, we have outlived that policy; we have moved towards greater efficiency, greater self-reliance and more complete self-government. I am proud of what we have acquired—our full freedom, —and I do not care to be involved in the foreign policies of Downing street. As Canadians we are masters in our own house; we none the less recognize the Empire as a fact; nay, we welcome it as a trust. As our freedom grew our reverence for the Motherland grew, proceeding from the depths of our hearts. Sir, when, in August, 1914, the tragic hour came, the Canadian people, before responding to the call of duty, did not insist that they should have a voice in the councils of the Empire. The Canadian privates, the Canadian officers, did not volunteer on any sordid considerations of a preferential tariff policy. They knew that, though fighting for Britain's cause in their full freedom, they could at the same time tax British imports. Yes, Mr. Speaker, the Canadian people responded with one heart and one voice to the call of duty. They were moved by higher, loftier motives than those suggested by some jingoes. Of our soldiers it might well be said, as the Latin poet said of the Roman legions, "Amor patriae ratione valentior."

Mr. W. F. COCKSHUTT (Brantford): Mr. Speaker, I wish to congratulate our hon. friend from Yukon (Mr. Thompson) on the splendid address he gave us yesterday, showing a great deal of thoughtful research, and drawing to our attention many facts of history that were both inspiring and educational. The hon. member who seconded the resolution (Mr. Paquet) also made an admirable address. I am sure both these hon. gentlemen are worthy of the thanks of this House for the manner in which they dealt with the important questions that are before us. The Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden) also gave us a very excellent resume of his visit to the front, and I am sure that his words of encouragement and praise of the Canadian soldier found an echo in the hearts and minds of all on both sides of the House.

The war in which we are engaged has called for very strenuous efforts during the year through which we have passed and since we last assembled here. It will call, perhaps, for a great deal more vigorous efforts in the future than it has called for up to the present. I am sure there are no hon. gentlemen on either side of the House who will begrudge in any way the expenditures that have been made in connection with the sending of our forces overseas. Up to date, as I understand it, we have voted about $150,000,000. Probably not the whole of that is yet expended, and that has run us for nearly a year and a half of the war. In that time 80,000 Canadian soldiers have crossed the water, probably 100,000 or 120,000 have been gathered ready to cross the water, and a further call is now being made for 250,000 more troops to be prepared to take their places at the front as soon as their services are needed.

These, of course, are very large matters for a country such as Canada which has not been accustomed to efforts of this kind within the past hundred years. We have been brought up to believe that we lived in a country of perpetual peace, that our peace was never likely to be assailed from outside our own borders. For this reason when the war broke out Canada's permanent force consisted of probably not more than three or four thousand men, and the militia, which is the backbone of the defence of Canada, consisted of not more than fifty thousand men—though nominally, perhaps, seventy-five thousand were enrolled. I question if more than fifty thousand were ever under training in any one year. So it was a very large undertaking that faced the Minister of Militia (Sir Sam Hughes) when he was called upon on very short notice to prepare the first expeditionary force. The call that went out in August, 1914, met with a more hearty response than might have been expected under the conditions that then prevailed. Upwards of thirty thousand men answered the call almost immediately, and within a few weeks were embarked to cross the water. That is not a very large force as compared with the armies of Europe, it is true. Yet that flotilla that went from Canada at that time, consisting of the transports and their naval convoy, was the greatest force that had ever crossed any sea since the world began in any one unit, so far as I am aware, and I think I am speaking according to the records of history. Upwards of thirty thousand men were embarked on these transports, and they were convoyed by a large number of cruisers and battleships and some of the lesser arms of the naval service.

All of these troops were successfully landed on the shores of Great Britain; not a man was lost. And in all the transfers that have been made to and fro during the war across the Straits into France and overseas, and also to the Mediterranean, scarcely any mishap has occurred. That speaks volumes for the efficiency of the British fleet. We have cause for thankfulness, in the opening of the New Year, that the British fleet, which was supreme when the war began, still commands the Seven Seas, and is supreme upon every water. This is a fact that cannot be gainsaid even by our enemies, and day by day the blockade of German ports is being tightened by the watchfulness of that fleet. It is true, in the early stages of the war, the British fleet did not perhaps put into force all those measures that we may now think should have been put into force earlier. The Declaration of London, under which we as an Empire were endeavouring to work, and which has perhaps received very little consideration in this House, has made a very important change in the manner of naval warfare, and in regard to those articles that were considered contraband of war. Therefore, for a considerable time the enemy received a very large supply of articles that were absolutely necessary to enable it to carry on the war effectively. Particularly was this true of cotton, which was allowed to cross until a few months ago, and which, though perhaps it was not landed directly in Germany, no doubt found its destination there very soon after it had crossed the water. Also, German reservists, under the Declaration of London, were allowed to cross in neutral vessels and take their places in the ranks of the German army, though Britain could have seized them in the early stages of the war and taken them off these ships, as she is now prepared to do. But at that time the enemy was given the benefit of every doubt and the naval service was conducted with a laxity which some might have said was commendable, but which in reality was feeding the enemy in such a way that its cost was all the higher in the late stages of the war.

This, however, will all be corrected as time goes on. It was inevitable that the education of the British people to meet the conditions of a world-wide war should be a matter of gradual growth, and so it has been a matter of gradual growth. But to-day the old lion, which some people think has been rather slow to wake up, has finally got going pretty strong; and if the signs do not fail it appears to me that the enemy will have reason to regret that he has twisted the tail of the lion. Britain has now under arms probably four millions of men, with possibly 250,000 employed in the naval service of the Empire; and further calls have gone out in Britain lately, and it is not unreasonable to expect that in the very near future we shall have five millions of men under arms in Britain and serving in Flanders, France, the Near East, Mesopotamia, Egypt, South Africa and other countries in which the war is being carried on. The vastness of the war has been something that was not contemplated in its earlier stages, and there has been a tendency on the part of almost everyone to underrate the capacity of the enemy and so to underrate the requirements of men, munitions and ships. For this reason we were pretty slow in getting started in that great conflict. It took Great Britain about three weeks to get the first 120,000 men on the firing line, and probably Great Britain's standing army at the moment war broke out did not exceed 150,000 of thoroughly trained and effective troops, ready for immediate action. Thank God for that small army! It was not large, but it did its part at a time when it was very much needed. It was on the spot at the time when the critical stage of the German advance on Paris was reached. We all know the history of the great fight at Mons and where the British were first engaged; and how both Great Britain and her French Allies were gradually driven back until the Marne was reached and German guns were almost heard within the city of Paris itself. They came very close to the city of Paris—they reached a point only about twenty-five miles from the Capital of France.

The right hon. leader of the Opposition expressed the horror with which he views the possibility of conscription. It is to be hoped that we will not require conscription in the Dominion of Canada. Probably, in the present state of public opinion no government could live that attempted to put conscription in force in this country at the present time. But while we may not be ready at the moment to adopt it ourselves, we should be very slow to condemn it in others, because it is conscription that has saved the day and that has put us as near victory as we are. If you condemn conscription you condemn the policy of France, of Italy, of Russia, and of Servia, as well as of Germany. In other words, all the Allies of Great Britain to-day are fighting under a conscriptive system. Where would France and Paris have been had France been as unprepared as the British were on land? Let anyone think of that for one moment. France was an armed camp the day war was declared. Every man knew his place, every man knew his duty; and to-day there is not an ineffectual man, we are told, in the whole of France who has not donned the arms and insignia of the French army and taken his place at the battle front, while the women and the old men are carrying on the work of the farm, in the field, in the factories and in the marts of commerce. That whole nation to-day is one armed camp as a result of the conscriptive system and of the universal training system which has done so much to head off the enemy. A great war is a good deal like a great fire. Those members who have been in Ottawa a good many years have seen some very threatening conflagrations in this neighbourhood, and very close to this city. A fire brigade that can put two good streams of water on a conflagration when it is starting is worth more than a fire brigade that can put on two hundred or three hundred after the conflagration has spread. It is the same way with regard to a nation. A nation thoroughly prepared, that can immediately jump into the breach and take its place against the enemy, is in a better position than one that has to hunt around, as Canada had, to get new recruits who know nothing of war, to train them and equip them as soldiers, send them across the sea and get them into the firing line. Time was the essence of the contract, and time was on the side of the man who was ready; and had it not been that our great and bold ally, France, in this war was more ready than we were, on land, we would have had a sorry tale to tell to-day, there is little doubt of that. The same may be said with regard to Belgium. Belgium was a peaceable country, a land that had not been led to expect that it would have any part in any great war in Europe, its neutrality having been guaranteed by all the great powers. And so Belgium was not well prepared for war. But for three weeks almost, that little country, with its gallant little band of 150,000 men, held up the German hordes at the border, and that three weeks enabled the British to get their forces across and tackle the enemy about the time the Belgians were exhausted. Look what happened in the country of Belgium, a little land but with almost the same population as the whole of Canada, seven millions of people, where we have perhaps seven and a half millions! For three weeks that little gallant band of Belgians held up the whole of the German army, and that gave Britain a chance to get her 120,000 men of the first division across, and gave France a chance to have her millions prepared, which she did in short order. Russia came forward with an immense army; Serbia was early on the field, a little country, gallant but impoverished and decimated and devastated to-day in a way that challenges the sympathy and pity of all communities. That lot might have fallen to us had it not been for our geographical position; and while we to-day have heard the sound of no foreign gun in Canada, and perhaps will not, if we are fortunate, in the whole course of this war, yet the fight is just as much ours to-day as it is the fight of Belgium, of Serbia, of Russia, of France or of Great Britain. We are then a peaceable country, a country where from almost every pulpit peace has been preached, and the wonder is that our people have been able in so short a time to overcome a prejudice that had been inculcated into their minds from their youth up, and to take their place now and rank with the armies of Europe in valour and in glorious deeds upon the battlefields. The roll of our first contingent, made up from the Atlantic to the Pacific, and comprising representatives from every province, from every city, from every town, from every hamlet, and from many farms scattered throughout the length and breadth of the land, included men who it was said were somewhat lacking in discipline; but though they had comparatively little preparation for the fray, they went to the front, and when the crucial test came at Langemarck, at St. Julien, at Givenchy, at Ypres, and at other points of which you all have heard —when the trial came, the Canadians were just as good as the best. Even the Germans themselves admitted that up to that time they had met no better soldiers than those who came from the western plains and the eastern provinces of the Dominion of Canada. We were all proud of the gallant deeds they performed on that day, and when the startling news came to us in the latter days of April that more than one-half of our first contingent had been wiped out, after three or four days of the most strenuous fighting that had taken place since the war began, the spirit of the Canadian soldier was reflected in the Canadian people at home. There is no better test of the vitality and endurance of a people than adversity, and the grim determination with which Canadians received the blackest news that has ever come across the Atlantic to this country, and learned that upwards of ten thousand of our men had gone down in that one fight—I say the grim determination with which our men, yes, and the mothers, and the wives received that news showed that the Canadian people were a people who not only could stand prosperity, but had the grace of God in their hearts to carry them through the days of adversity.

At six o'clock, the House took recess.

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: When the House rose at six o'clock I was endeavouring to recount some of the deeds of our Canadian sons who have gone to the front and taken their part on behalf of the Empire. Some of the speakers, notably my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition, think that we are undertaking rather more than we will be able to accomplish in announcing another 250,000 men, or in all 500,000, as Canada's contribution for the present war. We can only decide that, in my judgment, by comparing what we are doing with what other parts of the Empire are doing. I propose to spend a few minutes this evening in showing both what the financial obligations and the contributions in men and ships have been of the other component parts of the British Empire. I certainly have a good conceit of Canada, of its resources and people, and no word I shall speak shall be in the way of belittling what Canada has done and done so well. But in deciding whether or not we have done all that could reasonably be expected of us, we must look farther afield and see what the Mother Country and our sister commonwealths and dominions over the seas have done within the past eighteen months. Before the House rose at six o'clock I had stated that the Dominion Parliament had up to the present time voted $150,000,000 for the purpose of carrying on this war. It sounds like a large sum and my hon. friend from Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) thought it a very large sum. So it is, but compared with what the other constituent parts of the Empire are doing it does not appear to be quite so large. I have before me the financial position of the Mother Country as stated by Mr. Reginald McKenna in a recent speech in the British House of Commons. In order that I may not make any mistake in the figures, with your kind permission, I will read a short extract from the round table illustrating Great Britain's financial task as outlined by Mr. McKenna:

> Mr. McKenna has recently estimated that Great Britain's expenditure during this financial year will be about £1,600,000,000. Of this about £300,000,000, will be covered by taxation, leaving £1,300,000,000 to be covered by loan.

So, in other words, Great Britain proposes to raise one-fifth by taxation and carry four-fifths forward to loan account or borrowings.

> In last July a loan of £600,000,000 was raised. To cover our expenditure up to the end of next March loans in some form or other amounting to not less than another £600,000,000 will be required. By March next our daily expenditure will probably be well over £5,000,000 a day, or at the rate of not much less than £2,000,000,000 a year, a sum practically equal to the nation's whole income. Our revenue for next year is estimated at about £400,000,000. In other words, if the war lasts for another year beyond March next, we shall have to find an additional £1,600,000,000 by loan. Thus our financial burden, vast as it is now, is growing rapidly. Our present expenditure is enormously increased by the necessity we are under of lending very large sums to our Allies. These, we are told, will amount this financial year to about £400,000,000. We may hope in time to recover these huge debts, but for the time being they are just as much expenditure which we must meet as anything else. How important and essential is the financial help we give to our Allies is proved by the calculation that our loans are sufficient to pay for the equipment and maintenance in the field of 3,000,000 men.

Allow me to call the attention of my hon. friend from Rouville to the fact that while we spend $150,000,000 in eighteen months to carry on our share of the war that sum lasts Great Britain just six days at the rate of $25,000,000 a day. If we run our war for eighteen months for $150,000,000 surely we cannot say we are doing too much as compared with the Mother Country, provided, of course, the money is spent as it should be. I quite agree with any criticisms that my hon. friend has to offer in regard to the nature of our expenditures. Every dollar should be wisely expended and every dollar may need to be very carefully expended. I quite agree with my hon. friend from Rouville when he says that economy is necessary. I shall deal with that later on.

Having drawn your attention to the fact that Great Britain is spending all that money, the question naturally arises: how long will her resources stand it? That is a very crucial and a very necessary question. How long can Great Britain stand the strain, how long can she go on spending $25,000,000 per day upon this war only in addition to her ordinary expenses? I have here some figures dealing with that question and I think they are worthy of being placed on Hansard:

It is interesting to compare the figures usually given by statisticians for the value of our capital and income as compared with Germany's, and for the respective expenditure of the two nations, a comparison which gives some remarkable results. Statistical figures of this nature can only be very approximately true, and other difficulties arise, in comparing results as between nations, whose standards of life and ways of living are very different. Nevertheless they form an adequate ground for broad comparisons. Dr. Helfferich, the present German Finance Minister, placed Germany's capital wealth in 1913 at something under £16,000,000,000. He estimated the United Kingdom's capital wealth at only £12,000,000,000. But British statisticians make a considerably higher valuation, and usually give for the United Kingdom the same figure as he gives for Germany—namely, £16,000,000,000. Since then, the populations are respectively 68,000,000 and 47,000,000 our capital wealth per head is considerably greater, a result due no doubt in the main to our much greater holdings of foreign and Colonial securities, which are usually said to equal about £4,000,000,000 though it is probable that they have of recent years largely decreased in value. The comparative figures for income yield still more striking results. For Germany we will take Dr. Helfferich's figures, for the United Kingdom the figures of the Census of Production of 1907, though since that date our wealth must undoubtedly have increased.

	England.	Germany.
Goods, and services produced and received, about.. ..	£2,150,000,000	£1,960,000,000
Goods and services consumed.	1,800,000,000	1,560,000,000
Surplus wealth.. ..	350,000,000	400,000,000

These figures show that 47,000,000 British have an income of £2,150,000,000, just over £46 per head, whereas 68,000,000 Germans have an income of £1,960,000,000, or under £29 per head. They further show that, while our expenditure—

That is speaking for Great Britain.

—is over £38 per head, Germany's is £23. According to this calculation each man, woman and child in the United Kingdom spends £15 a year per head more than each German man, woman and child, and if, therefore, we were to cut down our expenditure to theirs, we should save £720,000,000 per annum.

There is room for economy in Great Britain, as the hon. member for Rouville pointed out.

The German economy in expenditure is especially striking owing to the fact that the cost of living is generally considered to be higher in Germany than in England.

But that is a matter about which I have a good deal of doubt. I have given these statistics in order that hon. members may know the financial resources of Great Britain and of Germany. We can now strike an estimate as to how long Great Britain with an income of this kind can continue to spend $25,000,000 per day on this war. When we look at Canada's contribution up to date of $150,000,000 for the forces we have sent abroad, and at Great Britain having spent already almost ten billions of dollars and spending at the rate of $25,000,000 per day, I ask my hon. friend from Rouville if he thinks that Canada is spending more than she should. My hon. friend does not choose to reply. I therefore take it for granted that he does not think that Canada is spending more than she should, provided of course that she spends it wisely.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I do not disagree with my hon. friend as regards the war expenditure; I stand with the Government as regards that. What I objected to was the huge ordinary expenditure. That is where I wish the Government to practice economy.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: I did not wish to misinterpret my hon. friend, and therefore I asked the question. We can conclude that as regards Canadian expenditure as compared with that of Great Britain, we are not doing too much if we provide 500,000 men.

Let us now see what Australia, the next elder member of the British family of nations is doing. Canada as the eldest child in the family should be the leader and not the follower. We have the resources, the population and the extent of territory. Why should we follow any of the other members of the great family contained in the British Empire? As being the eldest and the first-born, so to speak, we should show the way. In comparing our expenditure and also our resources in men,

I find that we have not led the way, and I am rather sorry for that. Australia, during the first few months of the war and long before we had done nearly as much, put into the field 165,000 men, although she has a population about half that of Canada. She has made further calls so that the total will now be 300,000 men. In putting those forces into the field how much did she spend? This is very important, because it shows what the Commonwealth of Australia, that great sister member of our family in the Antipodes, three times as far from the firing line as we are, is doing. Her contribution in men and resources placed at the disposal of the British Empire exceeds that of Canada until we make this further call which we are about to make. The Government of Australia is a labour Government, because Australia is the workingman's paradise, and the people of Australia have been ruled for many years by the labour party. These drastic measures with regard to Australia have all been put into force by the Labour Government, they realizing perhaps more fully than we do the great issues at stake. Mr. Fisher estimates the ordinary expenditure for the current year up to June 30, 1916, at £17,676,025, and payments due to the various states in the Commonwealth of £6,290,000. He estimates the cost of the forces at £45,749,450, or $225,000,000 for the one year, as compared with Canada's expenditure of $150,000,000 for about eighteen months. Therefore I say to every hon. member that, as compared with Great Britain and with Australia, whether it be in financial resources or in men that we are placing at the disposal of the Mother Country in this struggle, it cannot be said that Canada, with a programme of 500,000 men, is doing more than she should or more than can be reasonably expected of her. That does not include the navy, as I am reminded by an hon. member.

Mr. PUGSLEY: What portion of that $225,000,000 is for munitions of war manufactured by the Australian Confederation?

Mr. COCKSHUTT: I am sorry that the information I have at hand does not permit me to answer the question. The estimated cost of the forces is all put in in one lump sum. The number of men, I presume, would answer that question, because the expenditure is almost entirely for the raising and equipping and the sending forth of those forces.

New Zealand, only about one-fifth the size of Australia, has a record about as good as that of Australia. South Africa first attended to a very serious insurrection on her borders, and finally put it down, and then that gallant soldier and loyal premier, Botha, who has the admiration of this House, because the right hon. the leader of the Opposition on many occasions has thrown a bouquet to that statesman over the seas, immediately steps out of the House where he was leader and premier, buckles on the harness, and goes to show which side he is on and which side he is prepared to fight for. I say that the lead given by that hon. gentleman to the British Empire is one to which we should all take off our hats and say, God speed him. He has done nobly. I only refer to this in order that we may see that Canada is not alone in the great efforts she is making.

Then let us come to the great Empire of India. What has been done there? Immediately on the outbreak of the war they offered their resources of men and money. The princes and the rajahs came from far and near bringing their tributes of horses and camels, of jewels and silver and gold, and saying: Take these for that great Empire that has done so much for us. India was thought by the enemy to be on the verge of insurrection. Germany believed that the moment Great Britain got into a war, India would rebel and Britain would be unable to send her forces from that country. But we see that India is at the back of the Empire too. There are three hundred and fifteen millions of people in that little empire—it is little by comparison, scarcely one-fifth the size of the Dominion of Canada. It has been shown that these dark-skinned sons of the Empire know a good thing when they see it. Knowing British rule, British justice, British honour, British fair play, they declared: Though Britain has done some things that are not altogether to our taste, we prefer to have the rule of the good old benificent British Empire than to have Hun rule as exemplified in the continent of Europe. And so to-day we have a united Empire where Germany prophesied we should have discontent and division. Germany believed that Canada would take no part in the war; that India would break away, and above all that Ireland would immediately be in insurrection and that not only would England be unable to find a man jack in Ireland to send to the war but that she would have to send many troops to Ireland to keep the peace there. These prophesies have failed. Some of the most heroic deeds of the war have been performed by Irishmen. Perhaps I may be pardoned if for a moment I tell what was done by Michael O'Leary. Before dinner I recounted some deeds of Canadian valour and heroism; let me recall to you what that brave Irishman, little Mike O'Leary did. And, troth, I believe that Mike O'Leary lived for seven years in Western Canada and was a member of the Mounted Police when he enlisted for the war. Michael O'Leary came of humble parents. We are told that they lived behind the hill fourteen miles from nowhere. But Britain does not forget even the humblest of her sons who performs a great deed, and when Michael O'Leary won the Victoria Cross, and won it in the most gallant way, his parents in their little home were advised by telegraph of the fact. The company in which Mike was serving was ordered to retire as the fight looked hopeless. But Mike said, "Sure I am not going to retire; I will fight it out myself." And he broke from the ranks, jumped into the German trench, killed five of the enemy and captured two and the machine gun. That is what Mike did. And when he was asked by a friend how he did it, he replied, "Why, faith, I surrounded them." So, the British Government telegraphed to Michael's mother that Mike had won the Victoria Cross. The dear old lady had never received a telegram in her life before and was naturally very much flustered. But very soon telegrams came pouring in from everywhere congratulating her on having such a brave son. Then came the dreadful news that though Michael O'Leary had won the Victoria Cross he had been killed. And the neighbours all turned out to mourn with the bereaved parents and to hold a wake. But while the wake was in progress came the news: Mike is not dead at all, but is alive and in London. And it is said that the mother declared, "I never believe again that Mike is dead until he tells me so himself."

This was the exploit of Michael O'Leary. And I think that we can claim that something of the heroism that he showed was built up in him by the seven years he served in the Mounted Police in Canada.

It is very pleasant to recount the daring deeds of our own countrymen and of the sons of the Empire. But we must remember that we have a lot to do yet. If it was "A Long Way to Tipperary" when the war broke out eighteen months ago, it looks almost as if it were a longer way to-day. Some think we are farther away than we were eighteen months ago. I never have been an optimist on this war. I have for years expected exactly what has come. As I do not want any hon. gentleman to say: It is easy to be wise after the event, I have taken the precaution to bring a clipping from the Mail and Empire of February 10, 1910, the heading of which reads: "Immediate Aid to Empire Fleet—Empire Club Applauds Mr. W. F. Cockshutt's Remarks—Danger from Germany—No Sacrifice too Great to Save Nation for Posterity." And here is the report of the address in which I endeavoured to show to the people of Toronto that, as I saw it, we were in danger then of exactly what has since then happened. I take no credit to myself for believing at that time that danger existed. I had read the remarks of such men as Earl Roberts, Mr. Maxse and Mr. Blatchford, the Socialist. As a Socialist, Mr. Blatchford did not believe that workmen should be called upon to engage in war, nor was he convinced that Germany intended to fight Britain. But he made up his mind to go to Germany and learn the facts in order that he might be able to contradict the statements that were made. He went a believer in Germany, a believer in peace, a believer in the peaceful designs of Germany in relation to Britain, a believer that there was no emergency and no danger. But he came back a converted man, and declared to the people of Britain that not only was there danger for the future but that that danger then existed and that they could not prepare too quickly to meet it. It was reading the remarks of such men as these, men who faithfully endeavoured to tell the Mother Country of that peril that faced her, that convinced me eight or ten years ago that we must meet just such a crisis as that which has arisen.

It may be said that if Great Britain is furnishing about four million men and is spending about twenty-five millions of dollars a day, she is doing more than she ought to do. Let me state briefly what she has been doing up to date. I do not speak now of what she has done on the sea—as to that she has proved that Britannia rules the waves as she has done for hundreds of years and as she will do, I believe, to the end. But what is she doing on the land? It will be necessary to give a few figures which I will simply quote from memory. On the west front, the battle-line extends for about five hundred miles, from the North Sea to the border of Switzerland. It was upwards of a year before Great Britain held one-tenth part of the line. She held only thirty miles of that five hundred miles for over a year, only thirty, and that with the assistance of Canada, Australia, the Indian Empire, and all of her overseas Empire! She held thirty miles, while France looked after four hundred and seventy miles. All honour to that brave nation that for upwards of a year has held as though it were an impregnable fortress four hundred and seventy miles of battle front against the most powerful enemy and the best equipped nation the world has ever seen. Britain held only thirty miles, so I think that France had every reason to ask the Mother Country to stretch her lines; but with heroic fortitude she hung on and did her share, and she waited and waited until, after the end of the first year, Britain has now extended her lines and is to-day holding about one hundred miles of that five hundred miles, or one out of five, leaving France four-fifths and taking care of one-fifth, so that we, as Britons, cannot say that we are doing too much as compared with that splendid ally, France, who, as I said before dinner, has every man, woman and child that is able to do a stroke for the country at the country's service. There is no haggling about rights, about whether I am doing a little too much and the other fellow a little too little; but every man, and every woman, and every child, has placed his or her services unreservedly at the command of the nation, and has said: Where I can serve, send me! That is the spirit which we must display if we are going to win this war.

What have we won up to date? I do not want to be a pessimist, and it is not because I am a pessimist that I am trying to show you a few plain facts with regard to the war. But what have we gained up to date? Not one foot of German territory has yet been conquered, on the right, on the left, on the north or on the south—not one foot. Instead of that Belgium has been devastated from end to end; Poland has been devastated from end to end; Serbia has been devastated from end to end, and millions, yes millions of men, have bit the dust in this great war. The hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) estimated the casualties up to date at twelve millions of men, and I think that is not very far wrong. I estimated from figures I have endeavoured to collect with some care that about ten millions of men have been put out of business in this war up to date. Britain's casualties are a little over half a million, five hundred and twenty thousand, including Canadians, Australians and others; so that Britain has lost about one-eighth part of her fighting force, provided she has four millions of men under arms. Thus she has lots of reserves left. Canada and Australia have both suffered, but, while we mourn our losses in Canada, let us remember, in comparing ourselves with others, that Australia has suffered more than twice as much loss in men as we have—and in a far more hopeless task. I was a pessimist when I spoke in the House on the Dardanelles situation a year ago. I was a pessimist on that, and anybody who refers to my speech on that occasion will see that when people were talking in the House and out of it of wheat pouring out of Russia in the near future through the Dardanelles I made the remark that it is a long way to Odessa, a long way to Constantinople, and that the Allies would not be through the Dardanelles for a long time to come. That prophecy has more than come true. The event has been far worse than I anticipated, and to-day the whole peninsula has been evacuated; we do not hold a foot of territory there and the Australians, whose lives have been sacrificed, are buried in that lonely land. To-day we have a force of two hundred and fifty thousand men at Saloniki and I trust their fate will be more satisfactory than that of the British expedition in the Dardanelles. That goes to show that when anybody sets out to tackle an enemy such as we are lined up against they must have reserves of men, guns and munitions of war, and that is where we were sadly lacking. That is where we were outclassed, so to speak, by the enemy, because they had been preparing for years while we had made comparatively little preparation. The result was that when the war began England had little in the way of munitions, guns or anything else necessary for fighting on anything like the scale that has been required in this war. That was a pity and cost us dearly. But we are making up for that, and we are now called upon in Canada to raise another two hundred and fifty thousand men. I want it to be distinctly understood that in anything I say with regard to conscription I am expressing my own view and speaking for myself alone. I am only a comparative back bencher and do not claim to speak for anyone else. But I do believe that it will be necessary to take some other means before we get the five hundred thousand men we are asking for. I say it may be, and I think it will be necessary to take some more drastic means than we have taken with regard to the obtaining of recruits for the overseas service. Again I will quote from Australia, because there you have a democratic government and you have a labour government and surely what they do cannot be very far wrong. They are talking of conscription very strongly in Australia and have been for several months, under a labour government and it is a question to-day, if it were brought up in their House, whether it would not pass by three or four to one. That is the position in Australia. Let me tell you two or three of the arguments that they advance. This is what is said in one of their publications:

> The unsatisfactoriness of the voluntary system is not only that it does not produce a sufficiency of aid in proportion to capacity, but also that it induces the best to serve and leaves untouched the residue of careless and selfish, the "slackers" and the "cock-tails." The young men who have volunteered are among the best the country has. Thoughtful people ask whether it is justifiable that the flower of its youth should, by a process of "unnatural selection" be sent into the field whilst a larger and unworthier section remains behind.

That is one of the arguments used by the so-called conscriptionists in Australia. I shall read from a paper called the Bulletin. It is not the Edmonton Bulletin, but the Sydney Bulletin of Australia. That paper says

> The time is ripe, has been ripe for months, for the abandonment of the old conventions. The first anomaly that ought to go is voluntary service. The business of wailing for recruits by means of posters, politicians' speeches, white feathers, and so forth, is as degrading as those other appeals by which our hospitals are periodically rescued from insolvency. Speaking broadly, the system gets the wrong men—the best—leaving the bad patriots and the cowards behind. There is everything against voluntary service as a means of raising a national army, and nothing but a few deceptive old catchwords in its favour. It is especially fatal in a war where every fit man is wanted, inasmuch as it can never rope in all the nation's fit men.

Now, I hope that conscription is not necessary in Canada. I hope that it will not be necessary in Canada. But I make this statement—I do not know whether I am the only man who will make it in this House or not: If I have to choose between going in for conscription or the loss of this war, I am going to be a conscriptionist. That is my view. I say that rather than lose this war I am going to be a conscriptionist, and I say that knowing that every member of my family fit to go has already enlisted and that therefore conscription has no terrors for me, and the old man who has his harness on to-night has placed his services in the hands of the minister to be used at any time he can use them; and when men of my class go I am prepared and hope to go, but I say this House must realize that every fit man is wanted and wanted now. Our boys need them at the front. Why should we not go over and rescue the prisoners who have been held for a year in Germany? Why is not tnat front bench occupied by the late Postmaster General, a man whom we recall with honour to-night, Dr. Beland, who has been a captive in that far off country all these months? I say that calls like that ought to rouse every Briton. No deaf ear should be turned to a cry like that of our late Postmaster General. Let me give another instance. Talk about frightfulness in this war, talk about the frightfulness of the enemy! Was there ever a more frightful deed in the history of the world than the murder of that faithful women Edith Cavell at the hands of the Huns? And will you say that recruits will not go when men deliberately march out a woman and put her up against a wall and shoot her down—one of the most heroic spirits the British Empire has produced in later years? I say the blood of that murdered nurse cries out to every Canadian from the ground to-night: Will you enlist in the service of your King and country? That is a cry that should be heard, and it should be heard now.

These five hundred thousand men are wanted, and they are wanted now, there is no doubt of that; and we should be ready at the call of our King and country to say that we are prepared to go if you can use us. That is the spirit that we must have, and the voluntary system is on its test right now. The test of the voluntary system is this, that if it does not produce the goods it is not the right system. It has been tried in Britain for generations, and in all ordinary wars it has filled the bill. But this is no ordinary war, whether you look at it in regard to the extent of territory ravished, the number of peoples at war, or the sacrifices we are making in material and financial resources. Viewed in that respect, all the wars of all the ages, as estimated by the Finance Minister last year, are required to be thrown into the scale on one side, and then they would not make a war equal to the one we are in at present. While we sit here to-night, upwards of twenty millions of men are shaking every country in Europe with their tread, with the thunderous march, with their guns and the shriek and noise of those shells that fly by day and by night. We have not yet wakened up in this country to the fact that we are really at war. If some of us could only see trampled Belgium, if some of us could only take a walk through Serbia, take a glance through Poland and see homesteads devastated, the land bare and every young man, woman and child, old, maimed and crippled, all driven out of the country which to them was just as dear as ours is to us, then we would realize perhaps that we are at war. How soon will we realize it? This is a war that calls for service and for giving; and I for one am ready for extreme measures on the part of either the Minister of War or of the Minister of Finance. I say that this war should cost us all something if we value our rights, our liberties and our homes, and if we, as British men and citizens, let the British flag go down at the present time, and let the British Empire go down and be set at naught and dispersed, if we live to be one hundred years old we will find no place of repentance, though we seek it carefully with tears. There is something in this war that stirs the blood of every man who thinks of it. It calls for the best efforts of the best citizens. I for one do not agree entirely with what I have read from Australia in that respect. I say that no young man in this country is too good for the job—no young man. He may be a Christian and a saint, but he is not too good to fight for the issues that are at stake in this war, and for the rescue of posterity from the hold of tyranny that would be upon the necks of all nations for years to come if we should be so foolish as to allow the enemy to win.

How can the war be won? Only by supreme efforts—and supreme efforts now, not five years hence, not two years hence, but now. Mr. Speaker, that calls for prompt action, for drastic action, and I say to this Government that I believe they will be backed up to any extent, both financially and in men, that they are pleased to go.

I was surprised to hear yesterday the honourable the leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) express the opinion that five hundred thousand men was too many to call for, and that the call should not have been issued unless the House had asked for it. Let me bring to his attention the fact that Mr. N. W. Rowell, the leader of the Opposition in Ontario, has been stumping from end to end of this province calling for five hundred thousand men for many months past, and long before this Government announced it. So that is where the leader of the Ontario Liberal Opposition is; he is calling for five hundred thousand men, and I think he is right, and that we are not doing too much. Think of the issues at stake! You say you do not want conscription and do not want taxation, but I tell you, if you lose the war you are going to get both, and you are going to fight, not on the side of the flag, but on that of the enemy. If you do not fight now, voluntarily, for Britain and the British Empire, and do not pay taxes, voluntarily now for Britain and the British Empire you will have to fight later on as a soldier of Germany, and you will have to pay a war indemnity to Germany to let you live on the face of the earth at all. So, is it not better that we should voluntarily offer ourselves and our resources to the Canadian Government and to the Mother Country to the full limit, put everything, both material and personal, into the lap, and say that to the full extent of our resources we will be at the back of the Mother Country to see the finish of this war. There is a responsibility resting on us, a responsibility that we do not yet fully realize. It is the heritage that we have received from generations that have passed away. It is the heritage that we have received in freedom, in the laws that we have, in the constitution that we have, in the enlightenment, the education, and the history that we have received from our forefathers. We have received more: We have received the light of the gospel, and have scattered it abroad throughout all the nations of the world. What a fearful thing it would seem to us if we were lacking in what we might do and allowed the lights of liberty to go out that have been blazing all down the ages! Britain has always stood for the weak against the strong. She always stood for the weak, always stood for the oppressed against the oppressor. She has always stood against the tyrant and for the chap that is down; and I say that bad as she is—and I admit that Britain has her faults—she has shown the best example of Christian enlightenment and of Christian civilization and of Christian liberty that the world has ever known, and we will be unworthy of our heritage, we will be unworthy of the name we bear and of the race to which we profess to belong, if we do not see that when the time of reckoning comes the grand old Union Jack still floats aloft above all the Empire and for all the principles for which it has for a thousand years braved the battle and the breeze.

Hon. WILLIAM PUGSLEY (St. John): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with a great deal of interest and pleasure to the very eloquent address which has been delivered by the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. Cockshutt). While listening to that address, I could not help thinking that there are many places in this country where it might be delivered with the hope of producing results greater than can be expected in this Parliament, for the reason, Sir, that all the members of this Parliament are either ready to enlist if they come within the proper limits and are qualified, or, if they cannot enlist, I am sure they are all prepared to contribute of their means, be they great or small, towards all the objects which will assist in the cause for which Canada to-day is fighting as one of the great oversea dominions of the Empire. Let me assure my hon. friend that so far as the members on this side of the House are concerned—and I am sure I can speak also for the members on the other side of the House—they need no urging to make all the appropriation which the Government thinks necessary in order to send whatever number of men it may call for, whether it is 250,000 more men, or 500,000. This Parliament has shown by its unanimity of action since the war began that it is eager to respond in the readiest manner possible to any appeal which the Government may make to it.

My hon. friend in his very interesting address has made reference to what Australia has done. He does well to point to Australia as a great country which stands as a noble example to the people of Canada. Not only has Australia equipped an army for the front; Australia has done her duty also so far as the establishment of a navy is concerned. During this war, there has not been a deed enacted which redounded more to the glory of Australia, or which caused a greater thrill of interest throughout the Empire than the destruction of a German cruiser by one of the ships of the Australian navy. One hon. gentleman who spoke on the other side of the House—indeed, I think it was the mover of the Address, my hon. and eloquent friend from the Yukon (Mr. Alfred Thompson)—asked, What would Canada do if the British navy should be destroyed? Well, Sir, we all pray to God that such a dire calamity may not happen to the British Empire and to the civilized world; but if that dreadful day should ever come there would be found thousands, hundreds of thousands of people in this Dominion who would feel like praying that condign punishment might be visited upon those who prevented the establishment of a Canadian navy for the defence of our coasts.

My hon. friend, in referring to Australia, spoke of what she had done, and said it had been done by a Labour government. Well, Sir, why should not a Labour government be just as patriotic, just as broad-minded, just as prepared to stand behind the Empire, as a government of aristocrats or plutocrats? I am unable to discover any reason why we might not expect just as much from the Government of Australia, as at present constituted, as we would expect from the government of any other part of the British dominions.

I have listened with the greatest possible pleasure to the addresses which have been delivered on both sides of the House. They have all breathed a spirit of loyalty; they have all breathed a spirit of determination that this country shall do whatever is possible for the defence of the Empire. They have all breathed a spirit of confidence, and one could not help being inspired by the patriotic remarks which hon. gentlemen have made. One hon. gentleman sitting not far from me said that it seemed almost like a love feast as he listened to the members who have spoken. There has scarcely been one word of controversy. Hon. gentlemen who have spoken upon this side of the House have made no attack, so far, upon the Government; and hon. gentlemen upon the other side of the House have made no attempt at defence of the Government, in respect of their conduct since we last had the pleasure of meeting within these walls. Whether it is because they thought that the occasion was not a proper one, or whether they thought that the task would be an impossible one, I leave it to the House and to the people of this country to judge.

We have in the Speech from the Throne the statement which has been placed by the ministry in the mouth of the Governor General:

My advisers, however, are of the opinion that the wishes of the Canadian people and the present requirements of the war would be best met by avoiding the distraction and confusion consequent upon a general election at so critical a time.

Well, Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to-night to discuss the advisability, or otherwise, of extending the term of Parliament. That is a question which will come up when the resolution, of which notice has been given, receives consideration. But let me just say, Sir, in passing, that in my judgment it is a most serious matter for this Parliament, created as it was by the British North America Act, by agreement between all the provinces, and having its constitution fixed by the Imperial Parliament—it is in my judgment a most serious matter to alter the constitution and to extend the life of Parliament. Those who occupy seats in this House, private members as well as members of the Government, have been sent here by the people to serve them for a specified period of time; and under our constitution, as it stands to-day, when that time expires we are obliged to go back to the people and resign to them the trust which they have placed in our hands. Therefore, as I have said, it is in my judgment a matter of the most serious importance that Parliament should be asked to empower the Government to request the Imperial Parliament to make provision to extend the life of Parliament. I have no doubt that the Government have taken that point into their serious consideration, and when they state that they are of the opinion that "the present requirements of the war would be best met by avoiding the distraction and confusion consequent upon a general election at so critical a time," we must assume that, having considered the importance of the situation, the Government would not ask Parliament to have this change made in the constitution unless for the gravest possible reasons. I, as one member of this House, will await the statement of these reasons with the greatest possible interest, and if these reasons commend themselves to me, it will afford me very great pleasure to comply with the wishes of the Government in this respect. Since this war began I, conjointly with the gentlemen with whom I have been associated in this House, have complied with every request which the Government has informed Parliament it was necessary to comply with in order to enable it the better to take part in the carrying on of this war.

But, Sir, I shall be obliged, during the remarks which I feel it my duty to make to the House, to depart somewhat from the course which has been taken by hon. gentlemen who have spoken, and to find fault with certain actions of the Government, and also with their want of action, since this war began. I trust I shall not offend anybody by throwing into the discussion what may be deemed a discordant note. I do not intend to do so. My only purpose is to call attention to what I think have been the errors which have been committed, in the hope that these errors may be rectified and that a different course may be pursued in the future. When we feel there is anything to criticise or with which to find fault, I consider it our duty, sitting as members of Parliament, to criticise and find fault. If we are here simply to register what the Government brings down, to say no word to indicate our real views in regard to its conduct or misconduct, in regard to its actions or want of action, then we might better have stayed at home. We have come here under false pretenses, and we have no right to draw our indemnity if we fail to express our views on the questions which are before Parliament and the people. Therefore it is that I intend, in the discharge of what I believe to be my duty, to call the attention of the House, and, through the House, the attention of the country, to what I think have been grave errors of judgment committed by this Government since the war began. There are matters in regard to which, through their agents or through their appointees, this Government have been guilty of misconduct of the gravest character. I do not say that they have been guilty personally, but I say they have been guilty of wrongdoing through their agents, through those whom they have appointed to carry on matters in connection with this war.

First, in regard to their errors of judgment. Let us go back to the commencement of the war. Everybody who gave any thought to the matter must have been of the opinion that this was going to be a long war, that it was not going to be settled in two or three months, that it was going to be a war of long continuance. Everybody knew from the very day that the war began that Germany had been making preparations for a great many years. Everybody realised that she had vast stores of munitions, that she had a vast army, that the war would be not only a great struggle, but a struggle which would not be easily ended, and that it might reasonably be expected to last for a number of years.

What steps did the Government take when the war broke out to prepare to do its duty and take that part in the struggle that the Canadian people wished it to take? There were two matters to which attention should have been given at tne outset. I speak now with all respect, and as one humble member of this House who feels bound to express his opinion with regard to these matters. One was the great subject of transportation. Canada is a great agricultural country, a country of abounding resources, a country in which the farmers produce, taking them man by man, many times as much as is produced in almost any other country. Canada has often been described as the granary of the Empire. Under proper cultivation Canada would be able to feed the British Empire. The Government very properly urged the farmers of Canada to increase their production. Produce, produce, produce, was the watchword which the hon. Minister of Finance and other members of the Government spoke to the farmers of Canada. The farmers of Canada responded nobly. They tilled the soil with great care. I am told by some of my hon. friends from the West that on hundreds of thousands of farms they went over the land two or three times with the harrow in order to prepare it thoroughly well for the crop of the coming year; they used the very best seed they could get; they bought additional machinery and teams of horses; and the result was that they produced the greatest crop known in the history of Canada. It has been said during this discussion that in the West alone the wheat crop amounted to 330,000,000 bushels this year.

Was there not another consideration which the Government should have had in mind, and was not that the getting of the crop to the market or over sea to feed the Allies? What would you need for that? You would need proper rolling stock upon the railways, proper ships and an abundance of ships upon the Atlantic, so as to assure to the producers of the country and the consumers on the other side of the water the transportation of these foodstuffs at reasonable rates. Was not that something which went right to the root and foundation of the production of the great crop in Canada? What did the Government do? They bought not a single ship, they established not a single shipyard, they took no steps to build a single merchant vessel in Canada. Although they knew that the British Government would commandeer many British vessels, this Government took no steps whatever to ensure that the products of the Canadian people would be sent to the Allies at reasonable rates. What is the result of this want of action, Sir? That grain produced in our western country, brought from a long distance over the railways and reaching the Atlantic, has to pay a rate a thousand per cent greater than the rate was before the war broke out. The Government say: We are powerless to control the rates which are charged upon the steamers. Powerless, they say, we are, even in regard to those ships to which we pay enormous subsidies, notwithstanding that we have power by our contract with them to control the rates. Yet they say we are powerless, and as a result every bushel of grain which is crossing the Atlantic to-day is paying a thousand per cent more in freight than what the reasonable and ordinary rate was before the war began. Surely in that the Government fell down absolutely.

But what more was needed, and no one knows this better than my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Hazen). You must have elevators in different sections of the country, you must have great storage elevators upon the Atlantic coast, if you are going to ship your grain across the Atlantic. The Government had before them at that time the fact that there was just lately completed the Transcontinental railway running from the city of Moncton, and through the Intercolonial extending from the ports of Halifax and St. John on to Winnipeg, and by means of its ally the Grand Trunk Pacific railway through one of the most fertile sections of the Canadian West. This was a system of railways which was admirably adapted to bring the products of the West to the ports of the Atlantic, from which they might be sent across the ocean. Although nearly two years ago the grain elevator at the port of St. John connected with the Government railway system was burned down, this Government, although they appealed to the patriotism of the farmer to produce more and more grain. took no steps whatever to rebuild that elevator, and to-day its ashes remain as they were nearly two years ago, and the only remaining elevator connected with the Government railway system is a small one at the port of Halifax. The spectacle we have to-day is that the Government railway officials are advertising rates of freight for the grain of the Canadian West over the Government railway, and down to the port of Portland in the State of Maine, there to be shipped to the markets of the Old World.

In what other respect has the Government failed in its duty so far as transportation is concerned? This Government is one of the owners of the Canadian Northern railway system, and is entitled to be represented, if it is not already represented, on the board of directors of that railway. Yet so negligent has that railway been in getting the necessary rolling stock and motive power for the proper operation of the road in order to meet the demands of the farmers of the West, that I am told that upon one branch alone, where ten million bushels have been raised by the farmers, they are unable to get the necessary rolling stock in order to ship their grain to the markets. I would like my hon. friends on the other side to answer the charge which I make in that respect. When they made the appeal for increased production, they should have taken the necessary steps to see that the products which could be so produced by the farmers would get to the Allies in the old land at reasonable and fair rates. The result of these increased rates is that not only is the farmer of the West prevented from obtaining those reasonable profits which he has a right to expect by reason of the great demand for his crop, but he gets little additional profit over what he had before the war, because what should be his legitimate profits go to the transportation companies, and the consumer on the other side of the water is obliged to pay more for his breadstuffs because of those extra costs of transportation.

The same is the case with the lumberman. Go down to the province of New Brunswick, which is a great spruce producing country, the market for which is on the other side of the water. Although there is a great demand in Europe, resultant from the war, yet the lumberman cannot get his lumber to the European market except upon the payment of freight of as much as two hundred shillings per standard, whereas before the war the normal rate was about thirty shillings per standard. That is an increase of about eight hundred per cent in the tariff upon lumber, which is a great burden not only upon the producers, but upon those on the other side of the water who might be able to use the lumber to advantage.

What was the other great duty which rested upon this Government? Have these sixteen gentlemen who are in this Government given any thought to this subject, or have they been too busy? The hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Burrell) spent weeks, perhaps months, down upon the shores of the Pacific; other gentlemen were in the United States attending social meetings and delivering addresses, and others were frequently holding political meetings under the guise of recruiting.

Mr. ROGERS: Where?

Mr. PUGSLEY: I could tell my hon. friend of a number.

Mr. ROGERS: Tell us one.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I will tell you one. Just take one on Monday night. My hon. friend the Minister of Militia (Sir Sam Hughes) went to Prescott with about half a dozen Conservative members of this House, who were to speak, and not a single Liberal speaker was asked to address that meeting. Every speaker was put up to tell the audience that General Sir Sam Hughes was the greatest soldier—perhaps he did not use these very words—who had appeared since Napoleon, and perhaps before.

Mr. ROGERS: Quite right. There is nothing political about that.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I could tell my hon. friend about many others. The Postmaster General to-day admitted that he and his colleagues went around the province of Quebec professedly holding recruiting meetings. He said: It is true we defended the Government from the unjust attacks of the Opposition, but that was only in the line of our duty to the country; those he says were not political meetings. When I used to be a member of the Government half of my time in addressing meetings was taken up with the defence of the Government of which I was a member—and properly so. It is the duty of the Opposition to attack the Government in respect to matters which they think are worthy of attack, and it is the duty of the Government to defend themselves, and I venture to say that when the time comes that this Government must go to the people of this country the very largest part of the time that they will take up in public meetings will be in defending themselves from the attacks which their opponents will make upon them.

Mr. ROGERS: That will be easy.

Mr. PUGSLEY: All the Postmaster General was doing was taking a preliminary canter along those lines down in the province of Quebec, and he called them recruiting meetings. If these gentlemen, however, had not the time to devote to these matters why did not they ask my hon. friend the Minister of Militia? He must have known that this would be a war of metal as well as of men. He must have known—he ought to have known, and this Government ought to have known also—that in this Dominion of Canada there is a class of manufacturers, who, for executive ability, for the ability to turn out machinery of the very highest character, are not excelled by the manufacturers in any part of the world. Would you not have thought, Sir, that he would have at once endeavoured to mobilize the industries of this country? Would you not have thought that he would have arranged in England to bring out experts, or to have got men from the United States, where, for many years, they have been manufacturing shrapnel and high explosives? Those great and magnificent workshops which have been built near the city of Winnipeg, those magnificent workshops in connection with the Intercolonial which have lately been erected at Moncton, those new shops at Quebec which are nearly or quite completed —would not you have expected the Government to place these great establishments at the service of the Empire, saying to Great Britain and to her Allies: We will engage in the manufacture of these munitions which will go as far towards the ending of the war as even the sending of men, and we will furnish thm to the Empire at actual cost. We all know that Britain is engaged in a struggle which means civilization or barbarism, which means liberty or slavery, for the people of all the world. Canada is interested in this great struggle beyond any other question. Would it not have been reasonable then that the Government should say: We will put our men, our resources and our workshops at the service of the Empire to turn out shells, machine guns and field guns, not only for the use of the Canadian soldier boys, but for the use of all the soldiers of the Empire, without exacting any profit for the people of Canada. Would not that have been the noble, the patriotic and the wise course? But did the Government take that course? No.

Apparently, from the statements which the Minister of Militia has made, the first thing he knew about shells being required was when he was requested by the Home Government to order two hundred thousand shells in the United States. Why had not the Home Government been informed before this that Canada could turn out shells in any quantity required? If the members of the Cabinet could not go to Europe, where was the High Commissioner for Canada? Could not he have told the officials of the War Office something of the resources of Canada and of the ability of her manufacturers to turn out shells in great quantity? How different was the conduct of this Government from the conduct of the Australian Government to which I will invite attention a little later on. Instead of utilizing the Government workshops to turn out munitions for the service of the Allies, the Minister of Militia and this Government proceeded to form a Shell Committee, and that Shell Committee's record is one which brings shame to the people of Canada. The actions of that Shell Committee have produced scandals from which this country is reeking almost from the Atlantic to the Pacific. The press has been filled with the stories of these scandals, and newspaper after newspaper, Conservative and Liberal, have joined in demanding that this Government shall investigate the actions of that Shell Committee. The Shell Committee proceeded upon the theory that their organization was a great machine through which favouritism could be shown towards those who were closely connected with its operation. They proceeded to give orders for millions of dollars to companies with which their members were closely associated. They gave the firm of John Bertram & Sons, a company of which Sir Alexander Bertram, the chairman, is vice-president, orders amounting to upwards of a million dollars. They gave to a company with which Mr. Carnegie, another member of the Shell Committee, is not only closely connected but is the directing head, orders for upwards of a million dollars. Orders for other vast amounts were given to other companies with which members of the Shell Committee are closely connected. And did they call for competitive prices? No, they fixed the prices far higher than would be reasonable to pay even if the shells were not being turned out in large quantities. And what was the excuse they made? It was that they made a price at which manufacturers great and small could produce. So, the company that was producing a million shells would get the same price as the firm that was turning out a small order of five thousand. This was the excuse given by General Bertram in his extraordinary valedictory when he retired from the chairmanship of the Shell Committee, taking with him the honour of knighthood and going away for a rest. He said that he had fixed these prices in order to enable orders to be placed throughout the country so as to relieve the industrial depression then existing. Sir, one would have thought that the supreme object would be to furnish munitions for the Allies at actual cost, and not to distribute these favours throughout the country in order to create small industries that could not possibly turn out shells at anything like the price for which they could be turned out by properly organized industrial establishments.

The story of the Shell Committee is one of very great interest, and as it will take some time for me to dispose of it, I will ask my hon. friend (Mr. Rogers) who leads the House, to permit me to move the adjournment of the debate. Though it is only half past nine o'clock, still it is half an hour later than the time at which the Postmaster General (Mr. Casgrain) moved the adjournment last night.

Mr. ROGERS: Go on until ten o'clock.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I will go on until twelve o'clock if the hon. gentleman wishes. If a commission is appointed—and I should like my hon. friend's assurance that it will be appointed—to investigate the actions of this Shell Committee, it will be shown that through the bungling of this Government prices were paid for shells far beyond what was reasonable and fair, and that the Allies have been called upon to pay vastly larger sums than would have been necessary if proper organization had taken place. Note the contrast. The Australian Government organized the industries of the country in the manner to which I intend to call attention when I address the House to-morrow, and fixed the price which they would give for shells. And remember, this was the finished shell, the eighteen-pounder high explosive shell, and the price they fixed was $5.05, which is about $2 per shell less than the price fixed by the Shell Committee of Canada. When I tell you that and when you bear in mind how much further advanced Canada is in manufacturing than is Australia, you will realize how excessive were the prices fixed by the Shell Committee; prices, in which, as I have said, General Bertram, Mr. Carnegie, and I think possibly other gentlemen of the Shell Committee participated from the outset. This price of $5.05 fixed in Australia included the steel used for the making of the shell, whereas the price of $5.70 fixed by the Shell Committee did not include the steel, but the steel was furnished by the Shell Committee free of all cost to those who did the machining of the shell. The result is, I say, to make the price fixed by the Shell Committee $2 per shell more than the price fixed by the Government of Australia.

Mr. WILCOX: How did the Canadian price compare with the price that was paid in the United States at the same time?

Mr. PUGSLEY: I take the statement of Mr. Thomas, who says that the price was higher in Canada. Mr. Thomas is a gentleman who was sent out from England in consequence, I take it, of the dissatisfaction which existed.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Will the hon. gentleman take all of Mr. Thomas's statement?

Mr. PUGSLEY: I am quite willing to take all of Mr. Thomas's statement. Let my hon. friend take particularly Mr. Thomas's statement when he says that if he could raise the veil just a little—

Mr. MEIGHEN: Will the hon. gentleman quote that from Mr. Thomas's statement?

Mr. PUGSLEY: Yes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: All right, bring it out.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I will do so; I should like to oblige my hon. friend. I think it was in Montreal that Mr. Thomas made the statement; if my hon. friend will allow me, I will give it to him before I get through with my remarks. In that statement Mr. Thomas says also that he is a politician himself, and he rather conveys the impression that he found a great deal of politics in Canada in connection with the Shell Committee. He says also that the prices are rather higher in Canada than in Great Britain or in the United States, and that orders will be given to Canada provided the prices are fair and reasonable.

Let me tell hon. gentlemen another thing that has come to my knowledge. I do this, Sir, because I believe it is in the interests of Canada that these matters should be cleared up. I am not making an attack upon the manufacturers of Canada; their enterprise, their energy, their skill and ability are worthy of all praise. But they did not fix the price of the shells; the price was fixed by the creature of this Government, the Shell Committee. The manufacturers were not asked to tender; they took the price fixed by that committee. The matter which I am about to mention is a very important one, and should, I think, receive the very serious attention of this Government. As the Prime Minister said to-day, fuses are required in large quantities, and orders for fuses were given by the Shell Committee. I am told—these things get abroad; they are talked of in Toronto; they are talked of in Ottawa—that something like $24,000,000 worth of orders were given by this Shell Committee in the United States. I have not the shadow of a doubt that this statement is correct; it will be found in a statement in Toronto Saturday Night. Included, I presume, in that $24,000,000 was an order for about 4,000,000 fuses. While that order was under consideration, so I am told, by the Shell Committee, a gentleman of large manufacturing experience, representing a thoroughly equipped company in Canada, went to the Shell Committee and said that he was prepared, by himself and his associate company, to make a bona fide offer to supply these fuses in Canada at about $4 each. While, as he supposed, this offer was being considered, the Shell Committee, through, I am told, Mr. J. Wesley Allison—I beg his pardon, Lieut.-Colonel J. Wesley Allison—placed an order in the United States for 4,000,000 fuses at prices of $4 and $4.50 per fuse—almost 4,000,000 fuses at the very high price of $4.50.

Mr. ROGERS: You cannot get them for any less to-day.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Let me tell my hon. friend that not long after that, so I am informed, the Canadian company which was seeking the larger order took from the Shell Committee a smaller order at prices ranging from $3 to $4 per fuse.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Have they produced any?

Mr. GRAHAM: Has the other company produced any?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Oh yes, they have produced some.

Mr. PUGSLEY: At any rate, if my information is correct, $2,000,000 beyond what was a fair and reasonable price, was paid to a company in the United States for these fuses. I will not say that Col. J. Wesley Allison got any part of that $2,000,000, because my hon. friend the Minister of Militia says that Mr. Allison is a true patriot, and that he worked absolutely without pay so far as the Canadian Government was concerned, expecting to receive nothing but due recognition for his services in purchasing these goods for the Allies, including the British Government. It would be most unjust, therefore, for me without having knowledge on the subject, to say that any part of this $2,000,000 of excessive price went to J. Wesley Allison, the middleman through whom, I am told, this order was placed.

I am sure that a committee of investigation will be appointed by this Parliament to inquire into these matters, because the Government would not venture to refuse a commission to examine into a question of such importance, involving so many millions of dollars, and in which the people of Canada take such a great interest. If that commission is appointed I shall be able to show that in a large establishment the reasonable and fair cost of machining an 18-pound high explosive shell is about $1.85, as against $5.70, which was the enormous price paid by this Government through the Shell Committtee for the supplying of shrapnel shells and high explosives to the soldier boys at the front.

The actions of the Shell Committee, Mr. Speaker—I make this statement with full knowledge of the responsibility that rests upon me as a member of this House—appeared to have been animated by a desire to distribute favours to friends of the party in power and to give them the opportunity of making money out of the manufacture of these munitions.

Mr. ROGERS: I am afraid that is not correct.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I should like my hon. friend the hon. member for Picton to be here.

Mr. ROGERS: Who is he?

Mr. PUGSLEY: My hon. friend from Picton, Ontario.

Mr. ROGERS: You mean from Pictou, N.S.?

Mr. PUGSLEY: No, I mean my hon. friend, Mr. Hepburn, who resides in Picton, and who represents Prince Edward County. Now, Mr. Hepburn, not unnaturally, wanted to get his finger in the pie. He had been taught this fallacy, that the Shell Committee was not the creature of this Government but that it was an Imperial committee appointed by the British Government and therefore it would be right—

Mr. ROGERS: Quite right.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Hear, hear, does my hon. friend say? I hope I will be able to convince him in a short time that he cannot shelter himself or his Government behind the suggestion that this was an Imperial committee and that no matter what their wrong-doing or errors of judgment, sins of omission or sins of commission, might be, he can refuse to allow Parliament to investigate them.

Mr. ROGERS: We are not looking for shelter; let the hon. member not make any mistake about that.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Before we get through with this discussion we will find that Parliament will demand an investigation, and that the gentlemen who sit behind my hon. friend, while they may not do it publicly will privately demand it as strongly as the members on this side of the House. If there is an investigation this will be shown: That there were enormous profits in the manufacture of shells. That was the discovery which was made, there is no question about it. People came here from all parts of Canada, politicians, canvassing agents, committee men, influential people from different sections of the country, all clamouring for orders for shells, and among others my good friend, the gentleman to whom I have referred, the member for Prince Edward county, obtained for his company a large order. His company is not engaged in the manufacture of steel. It owns a planing mill, I understand, and is engaged in the manufacture of wooden ware. I could understand if he had limited his application to shell boxes that would have been a worthy ambition which could have been fulfilled by the utilizing of his machinery. But he got an order for shells, and the people of Picton naturally supposed it would mean the creation of a local industry which might have justified him in pressing upon the Shell Committee and the Minister of Militia that he was right in using his influence to secure this order so as to enable a steel plant to be erected in my hon. friend's home town. But he got an order for shells and took it to Montreal, and the shells are being made there now in the east end of Montreal by another concern, the member for Prince Edward county being simply the go-between or the middleman in connection with the transaction.

Then, again, I am told that another gentleman, a gentleman of my own profession, a lawyer in the city of Montreal, who contested the constituency of Richelieu at the last election, Mr. Morgan,—

Mr. LEMIEUX: Not Pierpont?

Mr. PUGSLEY: No, Mr. E. D. Morgan.

Mr. ROGERS: Pierpont's brother.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Pierpont's brother? If he keeps on manufacturing shells he will be Pierpont's partner and it will not be long before he can laugh at Pierpont Morgan. This gentleman, I am told, got an order at a considerably higher price than that which had been previously given, and at a very recent date, showing that the Shell Committee was disposed to recognize the arduous services which had been performed by Mr. Morgan in his efforts to defeat the Liberal candidate in the constituency of Richelieu. Then, again, as showing that the Shell Committee were looking around to find where favours could be bestowed, we find that a merchant in one of the constituencies in Ontario—I am not sure whether it is the constituency represented by the Minister of Militia—got an order for shell boxes. He had no plant, none whatever. He immediately proceeded to farm it out, gave it to a man having a planing mill, and that man proceeded to fill the order. And so I am sure, if my information is correct, all over this country orders of that character were given, given to the middleman, the man who had no machinery, and given in this way for the purpose of distributing patronage and doing what was a gross injustice to those who had manufacturing plants.

Mr. ROGERS: Unfortunately about 75 per cent of the orders went to Liberals.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Well,——

Mr. HAZEN: That is certainly the case in the city of St. John in my hon. friend's constituency.

Mr. PUGSLEY: In my own constituency? I suppose the hon. member refers to Haley Bros.

Mr. HAZEN: To the Messrs. McAvity and the Phœnix Foundry.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The Messrs. McAvity got their order as a sub-order from the Canadian Car Company, as part of an order which the Canadian Car Company had obtained for shells for the Russian Government. And while my hon. friend is upon that subject, what would he say about the York and Cornwall Cotton Mill?

Mr. HAZEN: What would the hon. gentleman say about it?

Mr. PUGSLEY: They are very worthy people and make splendid cotton. There is no better cotton mill in Canada than the York and Cornwall Cotton Mill. Their whole buildings are well filled with their cotton manufacturing plant. Their people are well employed in making cotton and I do not think from the intelligence of the gentleman—take my hon. friend Senator Thorne, one of the directors of the York and Cornwall Cotton Company, a most worthy gentleman, a gentleman of the very highest intelligence, who would not for a single moment mistake a shrapnel shell or an 18-pound explosive for a ball of cotton. Well, all over this country investigation will disclose that fact. But, more than that, it will disclose the fact that there were scores of plants throughout Canada capable of turning out shells which were not employed and which to-day are standing idle. It will disclose the fact, which I know, that in some cases manufacturers of wooden goods were demanding orders for making shell boxes, gentlemen who had all the machinery, all the plant for the purpose, but they were told at Ottawa, by General Bertram, Chairman of the Shell Committee: Nothing doing, orders all filled. And yet these orders had been given to middlemen who had no plants, machinery, or buildings, but who were simply getting orders in order to farm them out to others. The investigation will show more than that. I am only glossing over these matters at present, only speaking of some of those to which my attention has been particularly called, but it will show that one manufacturer in Ontario, who had an excellent plant, whose factory was examined by the inspector for the Shell Committee, and who was told he would get an order for shells, who went to an expense of $15,000 in getting additional lathes, when the day came and he was expecting the order, was waited upon by two gentlemen, one of them very closely connected with the Chairman of the Shell Committee, and was informed that he could not get the order unless he paid a commission of one and one-half per cent upon the cost. And there have been brought to my attention the cases of three other manufacturing concerns which were in exactly the same position.

Mr. STANFIELD: To whom was this commission to be paid?

Mr. PUGSLEY: To be paid to these gentlemen who called for it.

Mr. STANFIELD: I thought you meant to the Shell Committee.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Oh, no. I said a commission of one and a half per cent on the contract price. I do not pretend for a single moment that any of this was to go to the Shell Committee. I do not pretend for a single moment to say that anything was given to any one associated in any way with the Government, or with this House; I make no pretence to say that, but what I do say is that it was a most improper thing; that it was an act which ought to meet with the most severe condemnation of this Parliament and of the courts of this country.

Mr. MURPHY: Did the man not get the contract?

Mr. PUGSLEY: The man declined to pay 1½ per cent, and he did not get the contract. Now, whether my hon. friend from Colchester (Mr. Stanfield) would draw any inference from that fact in favour of the Shell Committee or not, I do not know. The two things synchronized, as my hon. friend the Minister of Finance would say. These two gentlemen approached the manufacturer who had already, as I have said, installed $15,000 worth of plant, and they demanded 1½ per cent on the contract as a condition of his getting it.

Mr. HAZEN: Who are they?

Mr. PUGSLEY: My hon. friend will hear of them when the commission is appointed.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It will be like the submarine inquiry.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Does my hon. friend want me to go into that? Let me tell him that he should hesitate before mentioning the submarine commission because, Sir, the investigation—the most shallow investigation—at which the Government refused to allow counsel to appear on behalf of the people of Canada, the examination, shallow as it was——

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does my hon. friend say—

Mr. PUGSLEY:—the examination, shallow as it was, brought forth this fact,—my hon. friend the Solicitor General will have ample time to answer me; if he will only allow me to finish my sentence I will sit down—the examination, shallow as it was, brought forth this fact, Mr. Speaker, that the Government, of which my hon. friend the Solicitor General is a member, paid for those submarines, although they had been rejected by the Chilian Government because they were not up to the specification, $332,000 more than the Chilian Government would have paid if they had been up to the specifications.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Will the hon. gentleman say, if he complains of the investigation, why after making the charges in the House he was not there to substantiate them?

Mr. PUGSLEY: Let me remind my hon. friend that a very able lawyer, one much better able to conduct the case than I would be, appeared before the commission in the city of Victoria, and asked that in the interests of the people, and in the interests of the Liberal party, of which party I happen to be an humble member, he might be permitted to appear before the commission, to produce witnesses and to examine witnesses, and that right was denied him by the chairman of the commission. I had it from the gentleman himself, because I happened to meet him in the city of Vancouver, and he told me of the application he had made, and which I had also noticed in the newspapers, and he told me that the chairman of the commission had denied him the right to appear and to examine witnesses.

Mr. MEIGHEN: He was not denied the right to produce witnesses to substantiate the charges if he could.

Mr. PUGSLEY: That is quibbling not worthy of one occupying the distinguished position of Solicitor General of this country.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Let us have this clear; it is just as well to have it cleared up.

An hon. MEMBER: It cannot be cleared up.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. gentleman says that the right was refused to counsel to produce witnesses and cross-examine witnesses. I am aware that counsel representing the Liberal party was refused the right of cross-examination for the reasons given by the Commissioner, who has been commended by almost every Liberal paper in Canada.

Mr. MACDONALD: Not at all.

Mr. MEIGHEN: He was not refused the right to produce witnesses.

Mr. CARVELL: It was the greatest whitewashing operation in Canada.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I would not like to say one word against Sir Charles Davidson, but from my long experience in the courts, where you have a lawyer on one side, and no lawyer on the other; where you do not have a lawyer to examine and cross-examine, the judge may unwittingly do the greatest possible injustice. Let me give an illustration. I watched with considerable interest the newspapers in Vancouver when I happened to be there for a day or two, to see whether it would occur to the gentleman who represented this Conservative Government, the Government with which Sir Richard McBride is, or was, so closely allied before a certain event took place; I watched to see whether any question would be asked of Mr. Logan as to how it was that he had carried on the negotiation for the purchase of the submarines for a fortnight and yet did not know what the price was to be, and why he simply whistled over the telephone when he found that the enormous price of $1,150,000 was named. I was struck with amazement to find that when Mr. Paterson, the man who had been in Seattle when the submarines were tested, and when the experts of the Chilian Government refused to accept them—I was struck with amazement to find that he was not asked as to the nature of the test, or as to how the submarines acted under the test. I was amazed to find that Mr. Paterson had not been asked to produce his books. I was amazed to find that no question had been asked of Sir Richard McBride, or of Mr. Paterson as to the grounds on which the former had represented that the Chilian Government were not able to pay for the submarines—a government which in respect to one article alone receives a revenue every year of $45,000,000; a government which has never defaulted during the past fifty years, at least in respect to any of its obligations; a government which stands high in financial circles, as a government which always carries out its obligations; I was amazed to find that the Commissioner had not asked him whether or not the Chilian Government had practically paid the whole amount of the contract price before the inspection and rejection took place. I was amazed to find that not a word had been asked upon all these vital questions, which a law student of six weeks' experience would have felt it necessary to ask.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Why did you not go and ask them?

Mr. PUGSLEY: I was not at the investigation.

Mr. MACDONALD: He would probably have been refused.

Mr. PUGSLEY: If the Government had said to me: We will allow you to go to Victoria to act as counsel and to examine and cross-examine witnesses before Sir Charles Davidson, I would gladly have gone, and I would not have asked a farthing for expenses, because I would have elicited the truth, I think. But further, I was surprised to find that none of these gentlemen were asked to explain why three cheques were given, why a draft on a Seattle bank was given, and why the remainder was divided into two sums, one of which was a Bank draft amounting to $500,000 and the other was for the balance out of which the bank charges and exchange were taken, Not one single question was asked in regard to that. What was asked of these witnesses was: did you pay any graft in Canada; did you pay any graft or commission to anybody in Canada? forgetting, apparently that Seattle in the United States is only forty miles away. Well, possibly my hon. friend is satisfied.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am satisfied of one thing only, and that is that the hon. gentleman is absolutely unfair and has deliberately misstated the facts.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order, order.

Mr. SPEAKER: I —

Mr. PUGSLEY: Mr. Speaker, do not ask the hon. gentleman to take it back.

Mr. SPEAKER: If the hon. gentleman (Mr. Pugsley) is satisfied —

Mr. PUGSLEY: Perfectly satisfied. If the hon. gentleman forgets himself and ceases to act as a gentleman, I forgive him. Mr. Speaker, having made these preliminary observations, I would move that the debate be now adjourned.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

WITHDRAWAL OF NOTICE OF MOTION.

Mr. ROGERS moved the adjournment of the House. He said: I would like to read a message of even date which I have received and which is as follows:

> Please state in House that I have removed resolution from Order Paper so that Government may have clear right of way for war measures.
> (Signed) J. H. Burnham.

Motion agreed to, and the House adjourned at 10.05 p.m.

Wednesday, January 19, 1916.

The House met at Two o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

DEPUTY SERGEANT-AT-ARMS.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the House that the Sergeant-at-Arms has, with my approval, appointed Louis Charles Panet as Deputy Sergeant-at-Arms for the present session.

REPORTS AND PAPERS.

Report of the Royal Northwest Mounted Police for the year 1915.—Sir Robert Borden.

Report of the Department of Indian Affairs for the year ended March 31, 1915.—Hon. W. J. Roche.

THE GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH.

ADDRESS IN REPLY.

Consideration of the motion of Mr. Alfred Thompson for an Address to His Royal Highness the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, resumed from Tuesday, January 18.

Mr. SPEAKER: Before the House proceeds with this debate, I want to refer to an incident which happened last night between the hon. Solicitor General (Mr. Meighen) and the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley). Rule 19 of the House of Commons says that "no member shall use offensive words against any member." I see in Hansard, on page 79, that last night the hon. Solicitor General used the following words:

> Mr. Meighen: I am satisfied of one thing only, and that is that the hon. gentleman is absolutely unfair and has deliberately misstated the facts.
> Some hon. Members: Order, order.
>
>
> Mr. Pugsley: Mr. Speaker, do not ask the hon. gentleman to take it back.

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. gentleman is satisfied—

Mr. Pugsley: Perfectly satisfied. If the hon. gentleman forgets himself and ceases to act as a gentleman, I forgive him.

According to the rule which I have just read, every member of this House will understand that the words used last night by the hon. Solicitor General were offensive, and at the same time I must say that the words used by the hon. member for St. John were also offensive. I see that the hon. Solicitor General is not in his seat; otherwise I would ask him to withdraw the words used, and I would ask the same thing of the hon. member for St. John. Both these two hon. gentlemen have the respect of this House, and no doubt in the future no such words will be used by them, nor by any other member.

Hon. WM. PUGSLEY (St. John City): Mr. Speaker, I am very glad that you have called the attention of the House to what was said last evening. I regret it very much myself, but I thought my hon. friend the Solicitor General had used the words which he did in the excitement of the moment, tho' I think he is not quite correctly reported in Hansard. I think he used the words, "and I fear that the hon. gentleman has done it deliberately." His language was not quite as strong as it appeared in Hansard. I thought that the Solicitor General was very much excited, greatly worried, and I was disposed to forgive him for what I thought was a lapse on his part. However, Mr. Speaker, I desire to say most sincerely that I regret the incident. So far as I am concerned, I am very desirous that all discussions in Parliament should be carried on with due regard to that courtesy which members are always anxious to show to each other, and I shall be glad to act upon your suggestion, Sir, and withdraw the words which I used.

I regret for another reason that my hon. friend the Solicitor General is not present because last evening, when I called attention to the fact that Mr. Thomas had come out to Canada as the personal representative of Mr. Lloyd George to look into the question of the furnishing of shrapnel and high explosive shells in Canada, he made a careful investigation into conditions, and upon one occasion, in making a speech in the city of Montreal, he used the words, "If I raise the veil a little." The Solicitor General at once challenged me to produce a newspaper report of that remark of Mr. Thomas. I now, Sir, produce the newspaper, which is the Montreal Gazette of, I think, October 9, 1915, and those are the very words Mr. Thomas used as a preliminary to some other observations he made. I will read the whole of the paragraph containing those words. He said:

If I raise the veil a little, it will be on my own personal responsibility, and do not take it as coming from the Minister of Munitions; but naturally from my official position I must have considerable inside knowledge of what is going on in Canada in the manufacture of munitions.

Those words are very significant as coming from a gentleman in the position of Mr. Thomas. You will bear in mind that he came to Canada at a critical time, when there were vast orders being placed. He came to consider a question of enormous importance to Canada and to the Empire. He would necessarily be very diplomatic, very careful; he would take his time to look into matters, and it is significant that when he made his speech at Montreal he used those words, "If I raise the veil a little, it will be on my own personal responsibility." Mr. Thomas said more than that. In the same paper he is reported to have made the statement to which I called the attention of the House last night with regard to economy. He said:

That must be considered, and I may tell you that the cost of shells in Canada has been higher than in competitive countries. It is complained that fat orders have gone to the United States, but I can assure you that a big slice will be reserved for Canada as long as the price is fairly satisfactory. The prices so far have been higher than in the United States or in Great Britain, where any extra profits have been commandeered by the Government.

In another place Mr. Thomas is reported to have said that up to the preceding June the deliveries from Canada were behind, and that only about two per cent of the orders had been filled.

Mr. HAZEN: What is the date of the Montreal Gazette?

Mr. PUGSLEY: October 9, 1915, as near as I can tell you. It is covered with a rubber stamp which is not very plain. While Mr. Thomas was, of course, very careful, very diplomatic, very desirous of not offending anybody, he was still very firm in his determination to get rid of the old Shell Committee. I have here the report of an interview with Mr. Thomas in the Montreal Herald—and of this also I cannot give the exact date because the record made with a rubber stamp upon the clipping is not clear. The report states as follows:

He believes that there is more "politics" in Canada at the present time than there is in England, and that it is a bad thing for Canada.

Big political interests here, at the present juncture, who are intimately connected with manufacturing concerns, are out after orders. Orders come first—the making of munitions being a secondary outcome. Mr. Thomas repeated that it was a bad thing; but added that, in so far as he was able, the British taxpayer came first, and that much as he liked to see the golden stream pouring into Canada, to the benefit of her industries and individuals, that he was guided by no other thought.

That the matter was one of very great importance will be apparent from the fact that up to December 16 last, the total contracts for shells and shell boxes—and I suppose the contracts include also fuses—amounted to the enormous sum of $265,000,000, or about $80,000,000 more than the total expenditures by the Government of Canada for ordinary purposes. It is important to the British Government, as Mr. Thomas well knew, that shells should be supplied at the lowest possible cost. To the people of Canada also, this is an important matter. It appears from the statement made by the Prime Minister on the day of the opening of this debate, that this Government is advancing a share of the cost of the munitions on the basis of the forces sent from Canada. I take it from the statement which the Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White) has made that this is merely a temporary advance to be adjusted with the British Government when they come to determine Canada's proper proportion of the expenditure. If we take the forces that Canada has at the front relatively to those that Great Britain has at the front, this would mean that Canada would be bearing one-thirteenth part of the expenditure for shells. If I am right in my figures, then, in addition to the vast sums which Canada is expending in other directions, she will have to bear an expense of more than $20,000,000 for shells. If there has been paid out, as I am informed is the case, millions upon millions of dollars more for shrapnel and high explosives than these munitions could have been produced for, had business methods been pursued, Canada must bear her share of this loss. My hon. friend the Solicitor General (Mr. Meighen), to whom I am obliged to refer again for a moment, is reported to have made a speech recently in which this subject was referred to. I speak of that hon. gentleman because he is a prominent member of the Government, and I refer to his speech because it particularly attracted my attention. That speech, if I remember correctly, was made either at Port Arthur or at Fort William. He stated that excessive amounts were being paid for munitions of war. And what was the remedy that he suggested? He suggested that Parliament should impose a war tax upon these excessive profits. In my judgment that is no adequate remedy. While it would bring into the Canadian treasury a part of the excessive profits, the whole amount of these profits would be taken out of the Imperial and Canadian treasuries respectively in the proportion of about thirteen dollars to one. If the Solicitor General knew as a member of this Government that excessive profits were being taken, that unreasonable profits were being paid for shells and other munitions of war, it was his duty to inform his colleagues and to take the necessary steps to compel the Shell Committee—which, as I have said, was a creature of this Government, a body with whose appointment the British Government had nothing to do except in a nominal way—to cease allowing excessive profits to be made. There are some who blame the manufacturers of Canada. I do not blame them at all. Under the Shell Committee they were not asked to tender; they were only asked if they could manufacture shells at the prices fixed. They would be more than human if they refused to take the profits which this Government, through its Shell Committee, offered them.

I think I yesterday called attention to the fact, and I desire to repeat it to-day, that the constitution of this Shell Committee was entirely contrary to the public interest, and this Government ought to have known it. This Shell Committee fixed the prices which one company, of which the Shell Committee's chairman was vice-president, and another company of which Mr. Carnegie, another member of the committee, was manager, were to receive for shells. In other words, the Shell Committee fixed the prices in the benefits of which some of its members were to share. This was clearly not in accordance with business principles, because to that extent incentive was taken away from these men to make the prices fair and reasonable. A portion of every extra dollar paid for shells went into the pockets of these gentlemen who were directing heads of the Shell Committee. What did General Bertram say on that subject? This was after he had received the honour of knighthood, which, as I said yesterday, was a very good way to get rid of General Bertram, and to afford opportunity to change the constitution of the committee. He gave an interview in which he said that the other members of the committee had nothing to do with the fixing of prices or giving of orders, that he took upon himself all these things and never consulted his fellow-members regarding such matters. Did the Government know that General Bertram, the vice-president of John Bertram & Sons, Ltd., which, besides manufacturing, is the selling agent of shell making machinery made in the United States, was carrying on the business of this Shell Committee without consulting his fellow members ?

Although this country was supposed to have guarding its interests a committee of eight members, four of them civilians and four of them military men, General Bertram says that really nobody but himself was looking after those important interests. Well, Sir, I am told that General Bertram has not entirely stated the facts, or the whole facts. I am told that Mr. Carnegie, whose company was receiving a large number of orders, was the only member of the committee who was acting with General Bertram; that it was these gentlemen who, in large measure, distributed these favours and, as I have said, to the amount of a vast sum of money, distributed them among themselves. Surely the House will see at once that that was entirely irregular. These gentlemen, who were directing the contracts; who were selling these munitions to the British Government, which was the partner of the Canadian Government in connection with the procuring of them, were both sellers and purchasers. As the vendors they fixed the prices; as the purchasers they took the prices which they themselves fixed. As I have said, my information is that millions upon millions of dollars have been taken out of the British taxpayers and out of the people of Canada by reason of the payment of these excessive prices, and by reason of the lack of ordinary business methods in connection with the appointment of the Shell Committee and its operations.

I stated in the House yesterday that there was an insistent demand from the people of Canada that an investigation should be had into these matters. There is no doubt that Mr. Thomas did investigate. There is no doubt that he came to the conclusion that this Shell Committee, the creation of the Government through my hon. friend the Minister of Militia, should go. He took his own time to have them go, but he made up his mind that go they should, and go they did. A new committee was appointed, with Mr. Flavelle at its head. Let me now read to you, Sir, and to this House, some extracts from leading newspapers bearing upon this subject. I do this because I think the House will agree with me that, speaking generally, the newspapers of Canada may be relied upon to give a fair idea of public opinion, and to express also the honest views of the editors, based upon the information which they have the opportunity of obtaining with regard to the matters of which they write. But before I proceed to that I should like to call attention to another remark which Mr. Thomas is reported to have made. I am now quoting from his public statement in both the Montreal Star and the Montreal Gazette. After stating that the cost in Canada had been greater than in the United States or Great Britain, Mr. Thomas is reported in these two newspapers to have further said:

> In June last Canada was, frankly, rather behind in making good in point of time on the orders that had been placed—only two per cent of the orders had made good. Public sentiment would not be met by retirement of the manufacturing members of the shell committee.

Mr. Thomas must have discovered facts of very great importance to have induced him, coming to this country as a stranger, to make these observations. And his remarks are evidence, I think, that he found the conditions very serious, and that the only way in which the interests of Canada and of the Empire could be served; the only way in which the public sentiment could be satisfied, was by completely disorganizing that Shell Committee and appointing a new committee, which should be directly under the control of the Imperial Government. Mr. Thomas made an important change in another respect. He did not approve the conduct of the Canadian Shell Committee in themselves fixing the prices and giving the contracts at those prices; he believed in and adopted the principle of competition.

Let me read, first, from the Toronto Saturday Night, a journal which has devoted a good deal of attention to this subject, and which, I believe, recently expressed some dissatisfaction with the new committee as well. There are some people who almost believe that my hon. friend the Minister of Militia shares the views of the Toronto

Saturday Night as to the new Commission. In its issue of October 23, 1915, that journal said:

> The shell committee was no place for a gentleman directly connected with the shell-making plants—corporations, be it noted, with directorates having wide ramifications.

I am sorry that my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works is not in his place, because I am going to quote from a newspaper with whose views I think he is very thoroughly in accord. He will, perhaps, be able to impress upon his colleagues the desirability of giving attention to those views. I quote from the Winnipeg Telegram of November 1, 1915:

> The greatest of Welsh humorists is D. A. Thomas. No one suspected that the hard-headed Welsh coal magnate had as strong a sense of humour as the author of Sam Slick. His farewell announcement has convulsed Ottawa with laughter. He spanked General Sir Sam, told him he was a good, active little boy, but to keep his fingers out of the jam-pot; gave General Bertram a fine dish of soft soap, but warned him that business was not his forte; praised the Canadian manufacturers for their energy and enterprise, but suggested that smaller profits would show greater patriotism; and kicked out Colonel Cantley, general manager of the Nova Scotia shell game, with such a grace, that this gentleman thinks he has been promoted.

A quotation appeared in the Ottawa Citizen from the Grain Growers' Guide of November 24—I assume that it is a correct quotation. The Grain Growers' Guide says:

> There certainly should be a thorough public investigation of this matter. If it is true that Canadian shell manufacturers have been robbing the British treasury of millions of dollars in these ways, they are guilty of assisting the enemy, and no punishment would be too severe for them. They belong to the plutocratic class that has always claimed for itself a monopoly of patriotic sentiment, and if they are guilty of what is charged against them their disgrace is all the deeper. Perhaps these charges are not true, and if so the manufacturers should be given an opportunity to prove their honesty. Let the public have the facts and let all concerned take the consequences.

As I have already said, I disagree with anybody who says that the manufacturers of this country are to blame. I say, if there is any blame; if there is any offence against the public, or any impropriety which ought to be condemned, it is upon the part of the gentlemen who were created a shell committee by this Government, and who themselves fixed the prices which they were willing to pay to the manufacturers.

The Ottawa Citizen, under date of November 29, makes reference to an editorial which appeared in the Toronto Telegram. It says:

> The Telegram publishes the followng editorial demand for investigation of the late shell committee by the Davidson Royal Commission:
>
> Is Sir Charles Davidson to squander all the time and energy on his inquisition upon drug clerks, vendors of aged and spavined equines or thrifty gentlemen who short change the country in the supply of oats for war horses?
>
> The work of the shell committee in the purchase of munitions for the British government should be lit up with all the illuminating power of Sir Charles Davidson's lanterns of truth.
>
> The worst sort of quibble travels in the suggestion that the shell committee was spending the money of the British taxpayers, and the work of that committee is therefore none of Sir Robert Borden's business.
> The shell committee was acting on behalf of Sir Robert Borden just as Sir Robert Borden was acting on behalf of the Canadian people. The shell committee was not the steward of Canada's money. The shell committee was the steward of Canada's honour. The procedure that keeps the work of the shell committee outside the zone of the Davidson inquiry is not worthy of Sir Robert Borden. That procedure is no fulfilment of Sir Robert Borden's promise to institute and prosecute a full and searching and impartial inquiry into all war expenditures.

That article appeared in a newspaper which is owned and controlled by a very prominent member of the Conservative party, who formerly sat in this House. It is one of the most influential papers in the city of Toronto, and I shall ask hon. gentlemen whether the argument which is made in favour of an investigation is not a sound one. He calls attention to the fact that the Prime Minister promised a full and complete investigation into the war expenditures. But here is a matter of expenditure running far and away beyond any expenditure in connection with ordinary war supplies. He asks why the work of the Davidson Commission should be confined to an inquiry into purchases of horses, drugs, and matters of that kind when these vast expenditures made in Canada by a commission appointed by this Government go uninvestigated. When the editor of the Toronto Telegram wrote that article he did not know what we in this House know to-day, from the statement which the Minister of Finance has made, that in the final accounting Canada is to pay her proportion of the cost of all these war munitions, including shrapnel, high explosive shells, and all kinds of equipment. If the editor of the Toronto Telegram had known that, he would have said that in these purchases of war material Canada and Great Britain are in partnership; Canada is to pay her share of all these expenditures relatively to the number of men she will have at the front; that, when the Shell Committee was purchasing shells for the British Government, it was purchasing shells for the Canadian Government as well, and, therefore, that for every million dollars of excessive prices which have been paid through the unbusinesslike and improper methods adopted by this Shell Committee, Canada is paying her share. When this Government advanced during the summer a good many millions of dollars to the British Government to enable payment to be made for these war munitions, she was giving to the British Government her own share of these expenditures, the amount of which has to be determined when the account comes to be finally adjusted. Therefore it is absolutely clear that if this Government is going to allow Parliament to investigate any war expenditures made by Canada, this is one subject of the very greatest possible importance which demands investigation at the hands of this Parliament; and in submitting the matter to Parliament I claim that the hon. gentlemen who occupy seats behind the Treasury Benches and those of us who sit on this side of the House have a duty to perform as trustees for the people of Canada, just as much as those who sit on the Treasury Benches; and we would not be doing our duty if we did not, by every possible, every legitimate means within our power, insist upon the fullest, the most complete investigation of these vast expenditures.

Why, what took place during the Boer war? While the then Minister of Agriculture refused to answer some questions with regard to purchases of hay in the province of Quebec, this House adopted a resolution requiring the Government to bring before the House all correspondence which had taken place with the Imperial Government in reference to the purchase of hay and other military supplies which were going to South Africa; and when there was some delay in the bringing down of the return, the present Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster), who was then a leading member of the Opposition, rose in his place and informed the then Minister of Agriculture that he must understand that his estimates could not be passed until those documents were laid before the House. That is the attitude which the Minister of Trade and Commerce took even in reference to the bringing down of correspondence regarding the purchase of hay. But, Sir, how different were the circumstances then from what they are to-day! At that time all that Canada was doing was to send to the front the Canadian boys who volunteered for service in South Africa, and all the equipment, all the supplies, all this hay about which inquiries were being made, were being paid for by the British Government, and Canada had nothing to do with the expenditure. How different it is to-day with regard to the shells and other war munitions for which this Government has entered into a solemn obligation with the Imperial Government to pay its proper proportion, so that Canada's proportion of this expenditure is disbursed through the Shell Committee appointed by this Government, just as is the money of the Imperial Government.

The Ottawa Citizen of November 16, 1915, says:

> Britain has been charged $5.15 for machining 18-pounder shells, though they could be machined profitably at $1. By steps the British authorities succeeded in getting the price down to $2.90. Even though a responsible contractor offered to machine the shells at $1.40, the Dominion Shell Committee ordered the shell-machining at $2.90. Certain Canadian shells have been costing more than United States shells to the Motherland.

Again, on December 4, the Toronto Saturday Night says:

> If Canadian manufacturers will get down to brass tacks, eliminate the stock ticker from their considerations, and if the "profiteers" will bend their energies to shell the German trenches instead of shelling the public with stock at ridiculously artificial prices, Canada as a nation will keep all its idle and semi-idle plants busy for as long as the war lasts, and will come out bettered financially.

Then, the Montreal Daily Mail, a paper which has the sympathy and enjoys the confidence of prominent members of this Administration, is quoted in the Toronto Globe of December 24 as making the following statement:

> It is with real reluctance that the Daily Mail suggests the incompleteness of what is termed General Bertram's "valedictory." A public duty, however, cannot be evaded, and it is a public duty to remind General Bertram that his statement, utterly lacking in detail and definiteness as affecting the criticism of the work of his committee, does not allay suspicion but tends to strengthen it. Major-General Bertram has been accused of enriching his private interests from business placed by the shell committee under his direction. He has been accused of showing favoritism in the distribution of shell orders, and of allowing prices to the manufacturers (including his own concerns) out of all proportion to the cost. Not one of these charges did he deal with in his valedictory, except in relation to the price of shells, and in this particular matter he witholds from the public the very information it desires.
> Major-General Bertram would have been well advised to say more or say nothing. His latest statement, padded with information which is of no material interest to the public, would appear to be a crude pretext for putting the public off the scent in regard to the operations of the late shell committee. The public is ready to be convinced that General Bertram can justify every transaction consummated under his official auspices. While it will not jump to any half-baked conclusions, it will accept definite answers to definite accusations. General Bertram, in his utter lack of frankness in defending the work of the committee, has done poor service to himself, and has very materially strengthened the demand for a public investigation of his direction of the shell committee.

That is a strong editorial, the editorial of a newspaper not only friendly but zealously friendly to this Government. Surely that is a statement which this Government, and this Parliament, cannot afford to throw lightly aside.

Then, the Hamilton Spectator—I do not know whether that paper supports the Government, or whether it opposes it.

Mr. MURPHY: It supports it.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I am told it supports it, a Conservative paper, strongly supporting this Government. The Ottawa Citizen of Dec. 11, quotes the Hamilton Spectator as saying:

> For the most part manufacturers in Canada as in Great Britain, have thrown patriotism to the winds, and allowed themselves to be governed solely by the law of supply and demand, to the extent of becoming extortioners when supply is greatly exceeded by demand. In other words—they have, while skilfully keeping within the law, robbed the commonwealth in which they live, and piled a load of debt on their fellow-citizens, to glut their private coffers. Their 'Stand and deliver' methods savour of the days of Robin Hood. In Great Britain this kind of profiteering has been curbed by the imposition of a special tax of 50 per cent on all profits beyond £100 in excess of the average profits of each concern during the past three years. In Canada no corresponding action has been taken.

Now, the fault I have to find with the Hamilton Spectator is, that while it states strongly, and states truly that vastly excessive prices have been taken out of the pockets of the British people, and, I would add, out of the Canadian taxpayers' pockets, it blames the manufacturers, whereas it should blame this Government and its appointees, the Shell Committee. These manufacturers did not, as the Hamilton Spectator seems to think, fix the prices. The prices were fixed by the Shell Committee, members of which, as I have said, were themselves supplying shells, shrapnel and high explosives, and had no motive to reduce the prices, whose self-interest indeed led them in the other direction.

Then, The Ottawa Journal, another newspaper strongly supporting the Government, said on Dec. 7:

> No doubt exists that undue profits have been made in Canada, as elsewhere, upon the first lot of orders for munitions of war. While a part of the increased cost may be due to the war conditions which result in more expensive materials and more expensive labour, there seems no reasonable doubt that also extortionate and discreditable profits have been taken in Canada and everywhere by the persons or corporations doing the work. Excessive profits in such a matter are discreditable to the beneficiaries—if not even criminal—in any country engaged in a defensive war. They injure the ability of that country to carry on vigorously a struggle essential to its welfare. The government which pays for the munitions does so with money which it must borrow; nobody at first can tell how much money will be needed and have to be borrowed by the government; and the possibility is that lack of money available by the Government may in the end cause defeat in the war. Any person, therefore, who in his own country is unfairly bleeding the Government is really playing the part of an enemy to his country. Any person or corporation who can be shown to have taken unquestionably excessive profits, all things considered, in any war contract merits public contempt, and should also be made to feel the force of public opinion not merely that way, but in his or its pocket. There should be, and we have no doubt there will be, government investigation of the matter; and there should be retroactive legislation which will enable the Government to confiscate any proven undue profits.

The Ottawa Journal suggests Government investigation. Sir, this country will not be satisfied with Government investigation. The people of this country, from the Atlantic to the Pacific are to-day demanding that this investigation shall take place by Parliament, or by a committee of Parliament, in the full light of day, so that they may know the facts and will be able to decide who is to blame for what has taken place in regard to the purchase of shrapnel, high explosive shells, and other munitions of war.

Then, the Vancouver Sun, of December 10, quotes from a leading Conservative paper, the Toronto Mail and Empire, as follows:

> It is palpable that with the prospect of a long struggle ahead, Britain and each of the dominions must strive to settle to an economic war-basis. In Canada we know only too well that most makers of munitions and furnishers of other war supplies to the Canadian and British Governments have striven to get large profits out of their contracts. Mr. David Thomas, Lloyd George's representative on munitions, who was in Canada recently, said that he had had an offer from a Hamilton manufacturer to make a great quantity of shells at cost. This was most praisewo thy, and in striking contrast to the attitude of the general run of 'profiteers.' In the United Kingdom munition manufacturers must contribute to the state 50 per cent of the profits they make in excess of an amount of £100 above their average annual profits for the last three years. While prices are still up, as Mr. Bonar Law says, so much of the excess over a reasonable margin above cost comes back to the state. In Canada, manufacturing industry is far from being in the closely-organized state of British industry. Strong pressure has been needed to work down prices of munitions to a fair-profit level, and in some cases they are yet far from meeting the requirements of economy set forth by the British colonial secretary. As we begin to bear our own financial war burdens we must necessarily see that far from being in the position of mere vendors of war wares to an outside government—with a vendor's privileges—our manufacturers are a part of the Canadian war economy, as well as of the imperial, and that patriotism requires munition contracts to be figured, not to make the greatest stroke for profits, but to give most benefit to the state.

Then the Vancouver Sun comments:

When the Mail realizes that it can not defend, much less acclaim the proceedings of the shell committee and the manufacturers, the News-Advertiser should understand that thick and thin support of its party under such circumstances is clear indecency.

Now, Sir, I am not sure that I am correctly informed as to the manufacturer in Hamilton who offered to Mr. Thomas to place his factory at the disposal of the Government so as to make shells free of charge; but I am told—probably it is the same gentleman—that there is a manufacturer in Ontario who, under the prices which had been fixed by the Shell Committee, and to which, as I have said, the manufacturers were not a party, made a profit of half a million dollars, and who, thinking he had got enough, then offered his factory to the Government to turn out munitions of war free of charge. He had been surfeited with the enormous profits which the Shell Committee had enabled him to make.

Mr. CARVELL: Did they accept his offer?

Mr. PUGSLEY: They did not accept his offer. And why, Mr. Speaker? What I told you yesterday showed that this Government, through its Shell Committee, did not take hold of this business with a view to supplying munitions of war for the armies of the Allies at the lowest possible cost. They took hold of it rather with the view of relieving industrial depression in this country, and they were guided by the thought that, as the result of the demand for army supplies, including munitions of war, they would be able to start small industries all over this country; that they would be able, I regret to say, to give much encouragement to political favourites and turn much money into their pockets. Probably my hon. friend the Minister of Militia will resent that statement. Still, Sir, I say that if that was their motive, they could not have gone about carrying it out in a more direct fashion than the way they did. Therefore, if they had started a factory themselves and turned out these munitions of war at actual cost, they would have had to reduce the price to these other factories throughout the country, many of which were merely the creations of mushroom companies which had started by reason of the giving of these war orders.

Then, the Manitoba Free Press in an article on Dec. 28, said:

It is beyond all question that the people of Canada will be more than glad to have it proved that the shell contracts have been honestly awarded and are being carried out with reasonable efficiency. There is not a Canadian worth discussing who would not prefer to believe that Canadian manufacturers are innocent of exploiting the unbottomed misery into which this war has plunged practically the whole human race. And, although much less important, because merely material, there is not a Canadian who would not prefer to believe that Canada's industrial capacity was equal to present war emergencies.

There is, however, a fundamental thing upon which decent Canadians of every stripe and colour are adamant. This fundamental thing is that beyond ordinary and reasonable profits on the supply of necessary and honestly manufactured war materials, private parties shall not derive advantage and that family fortunes shall not be founded, to be spent no doubt after the war in easeful and luxurious living.

With all respect to General Bertram his Toronto interview, reported in yesterday's Free Press, is just as weak as the uplifted hands of the Canadian weekly published in the same city. Mere assertions of virtue are entirely out of court. Whatever a full and fearless inquiry may disclose, grave suspicion as to extortion, and even graft, in regard to the shell contracts is at this present warranted.

The Montreal Herald, on November 30, said:

The humiliating thing is that this is the work of a "Dominion" Shell Committee—

Let that never be forgotten. I say that this was not the work of a committee appointed by the British Government; this was the work of a committee appointed by this Government, and for whose actions this Government must be held responsible to the people of Canada. The Herald says:

The humiliating thing is, that this is the work of a "Dominion" Shell Committee, and therefore represents the national policy regarding the manufacture of munitions. This is how our industrial resources have been 'mobilized' to meet the supreme need of the Empire and of civilization itself! Compare this with the policy in force with the rest of the Allied nations. Compare it with a statement for instance, of the chairman of the Steel Company of Scotland, in an address at the annual meeting of the stockholders in October:

Then follows the address, which I will read:

"You are aware that on more than one occasion I have in this place denounced government legislation as it affected the country's industries, and I may be permitted to say how heartily I approve of the principle (the special taxation of war profits) which has now been set forth in Mr. McKenna's budget, although I am not at all sure that its application is adequate. To my mind, there is something absolutely revolting in the idea of anybody making profits out of the nation's agony—and especially so in the case of a man or company who had no extra labour or anxiety, but whose opportunity has come solely because of an artificial scarcity created by the Government on account of the nation's need. The ideal principle of taxation is, of course, equality of sacrifice. . . . When we think of those splendid men of ours in Belgium, France, the Dardanelles, and elsewhere. . . who have sacrificed home, kindred, health, comfort and ease. . . . we must feel how paltry and insignificant is any monetary sacrifice which we, who must remain at home, can lay on the altar of patriotism. . . It may be, indeed, that before the war is ended, the Government may find it necessary to take not 50 but 100 per cent of those extra profits, and if they do, I hope none of us will complain."

In Canada some of the favoured companies are counting profits by the millions; they are gloating over prices that will run, it is declared, all the way up to 150 per cent profit on their entire capitalization. They see nothing revolting, apparently, in profiteering to the full out of the British nation's agony.

I want to pause for a moment to repeat here that the taxation of extra profits will avail nothing in so far as the relief of the British Treasury is concerned. It will present the anomalous spectacle of the members of this committee having fixed the excessive prices which will be paid to the manufacturers, including those companies of which they were the directing heads, and then by the imposition of taxes, taking the money back again, not giving it to the Imperial Treasury, but putting it into the treasury of Canada. That would be no remedy. The remedy was for this Government to have watched the work of the Shell Committee from the beginning, and have seen that they discharged their duty to the country, that they did not pay excessive prices, and that they did their duty by Canada and the Empire.

There is another very important article in the Toronto Telegram of December 22, which I trust I may be pardoned for reading. I do it because of what I conceive to be the vast importance of the subject, and because of the necessity of placing before the House the views of the public of Canada as represented by its leading newspapers. The Toronto Telegram published an article on this subject on December 22, 1915, which I will read in full:

Exploiting War Orders—Doings of Middlemen —Proposition is up to Premier Borden, Declares the Contract Record of Toronto.

Down New York way they're still sending out circulars that tell of desirable investments created by filling war orders in Canada, says the Contract Record in this week's issue. One of the latest comes from Gilbert Elliott and Company. It advises clients to invest in Canada Foundries and Forgings Company, which has shops at Brockville and Welland.

Then there is a quotation of the figures. If I am not mistaken, Sir Henry Pellatt is president of that company.

Mr. GRAHAM: No.

3 p.m. Mr. PUGSLEY: I may be mistaken as to that.

Mr. GRAHAM: Yes.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I saw that there had been some denial of a statement of profits which had been put forth by a company with which he was connected. I will read the article from the Telegram, not knowing, of course, whether there was any contradiction of it or not:

"We are advised from sources upon which we can rely, that earnings for the past ten months ending November 1, 1915, are over $900,000, and that the monthly earnings are now running at the rate of $150,000, or equal to $1,860,000 per year, which after taking care of fixed charges, will amount to over 150 per cent per annum on the outstanding common stock."

That is prefaced by the statement of Gilbert Elliott & Co., who, I assume, were brokers endeavouring to dispose of the stock of the company. Their information may or may not be correct. I cannot vouch for it, and I do not expect that the paper vouches for it either. It would not know, but the editor, or whoever wrote this article, saw it in the financial circular which was sent out by these brokers.

Sir Sam's Speech.

The circular also stated that the company has within the past year filled large orders for shells for the British government, in addition to its commercial business.

Right on top of this comes Sir Sam Hughes with a speech to Ward 4 Conservatives, Toronto. From a newspaper report of that speech the following is clipped:

"Sir Sam related how, when the first order for 200,000 shells came to Canada, there were only four men in the whole of the Dominion who had the courage to tackle 'that little twopenny ha'penny order.' It had taken a week and a half to even get them to face the issue.

"Since then we have delivered four million shells," declared Sir Sam. "Upwards of $350,000,000 from shells alone has been placed in the pockets of the workmen."

Who are the "Workmen?"

Now, taking the circular from Now York with the story told by Sir Sam, who would you take "workmen" to mean—the men who "worked" the Shell Committee or the men who work in munition factories? If Sir Sam means the latter he is evidently talking arrant nonsense. If the workmen have got-$350,000,000 in wages Canada must have shipped at least a billion dollars' worth of shells, for the cost of material and even reasonable profits would make the difference between the sums mentioned. Every body knows that Canada has not shipped either a billion or half a billion dollars' worth of shells. Cabinet ministers should be required to know some little thing about what they are talking.

Real Plants Ready.

Another excerpt from the report of Sir Sam's furious speech reads as follows:—

"S r S m said that men had gone to him with a white sheet of paper, in some cases with their sisters tagging on behind, and not a cent of capital, asking to get orders.

"And these are the men who are making the complaints. I threw them out of my office as fast as they came in and some of them were good friends of mine. Some of them were Tories, too."

That is the condition which Mr. Thomas found when he arrived in Ottawa; he found that politics and munition orders were mixed very thoroughly together. Then the Telegram proceeds:

And within a block of where Sir Sam spoke was a foundry capable of turning out thousands of shells daily, lying almost idle.

That is typical of the condition of affairs throughout the country, that there were scores and hundreds of shops which were not utilized. The Telegram proceeds:

And I can furnish Sir Sam with a list of men who have the factories and who could not get orders. If they are not complaining too loudly it is because they still have hopes of securing orders.

A Pet Organization.

These attempts to belittle the manufacturers who have been wronged by the shell committee are unworthy of men of cabinet size. But the shell committee was a pet organization of Sir Sam and he is only following the policy of his party to minimize those mistakes which lost to the manufacturers of Canada the greatest opportunity of a century.

Why did the Government lease the Transcona car shops to a private company for the manufacture of shells? Well, perhaps you had better ask D. A. Thomas. The shell committee was the part of the Dominion Government with which he came in contact. So when the Government proposed to start in to manufacture shells without saying anything about price you can imagine him throwing up his hands and exclaiming "Heaven forbid!" However, what he said to the Government was, "put in a tender." Well, you know that shell committee never did care for tenders, anyway. It just shied off and the Government with it.

Now, I need not read the whole of the article, but I come down to the last part of it in which a positive statement is made with regard to a clerk getting a contract, which is an instance of, the newspaper says, how the shell committee handled contracts. The Telegram says:

Clerk got Contract.

This story has been investigated and can be vouched for, as can the others that have from time to time found place in this column. The owner of a planing mill in an Ontario town went out after a shell-box contract. His application brought the usual answer that all contracts had been let. Imagine his surprise when a shipping clerk in a dry goods house in his own town secured a contract, put up a building, completed his contract and got a renewal. The shipping clerk had no plant, no experience and no business rating. But he knew a man who knew something about how contracts were got. Pretty wise man, wasn't he? Thrifty, too. For he still retains his job as shipping clerk, though he occasionally finds a few moments to run over to the shell-box plant and figure his profits.

How did he do it? Ask the average box manufacturer and his answer will be: "Search me." For, strange to say, this shell game does not appear to have run along purely political lines. There are instances given where Liberals secured contracts and Conservatives could not get within hailing distance of them. Truly that shell committee moved in a mysterious way its wonders to perform. It might be put on as a movie mystery with a contract as a prize for the nearest guesser of its methods.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Hear, hear.

Mr. PUGSLEY: My hon. friend the Solicitor General says, hear, hear. I have never stated that no Liberal got a contract. What I have been referring to is the apparent object of the organization of this committee, and the apparent object and methods which were pursued. That is what I have complained of. But let me say that so far as I am aware, any Liberal company or any Liberal individual who got a contract, had the experience, had the capital, and in most cases had the plant ready with which to do business. That is the information which I have, and I state it from what has come under my observation.

I do not want to weary the House by quoting all the extracts which I have, but there are four more which I will quote. The Toronto Globe of November 2, 1915, says:

The higher price paid by Britain for smaller shells was due in part to the distribution of orders in lesser quantities over a wide field. The purpose of this was to relieve the prevailing industrial depression over as large an area as possible. No honest Canadian will hear this without a blush.

I also say that, I say that while the Government ought ordinarily, where it can properly do so, have the encouragement of industries in view, and while it ought ordinarily to be influenced by the desire to relieve industrial depression, yet this is a question of the safety of the Empire and the production of shells, and the production of shrapnel and high explosive shells with the greatest rapidity, ought to have been the first consideration, in order that Canada might do her share towards enabling the armies of the allies to secure victory, I agree entirely with the Globe when it says that no honest Canadian will hear of what was done without a blush. The Globe goes on to say:

It was our duty to endure the depression by our mismanagement brought on us instead of seeking relief by taking unfair advantage of Britain's predicament. Mr. Thomas is willing to regard this, too, as ancient history, but we can never view it in that light until we redeem ourselves by restitution or heroic devotion. Until this shame is wiped out no one will have the effrontery to ask that British people be burdened to pay us more than the cost elsewhere, either directly by awarding contracts or indirectly by obstructing their trade. It is but right to let Mr. Thomas and the British people know that some Canadians are ashamed of what has taken place.

Then, the Toronto Star of November 19, 1915, has this article:

How much business has been taken by the Dominion Steel Company, Limited, has not been announced, but it is known that the Dominion Iron and Steel Company, one of its principal subsidiaries, is running at about full capacity on orders for shell steel and shells, and also for toluol, benzol, and other coke by-products. The Dominion Coal Company, which in the past has been a large earner, is engaged in filling heavy orders for the steel mills and for exports. Foreign shipments of coal by this company are at a record rate, and difficulty is being experienced in obtaining bottoms for its transportation. It is estimated that earnings are now running at the rate of $8,000,000 a year, or 13 per cent on the common stock, after the payment of the accumulated dividends and all charges.

Steel of Canada's share.—Steel Company of Canada is another concern that has benefited very materially from war orders. This company is said to have a contract for all the shells it can make for two years, and to be now running at the rate of $500,000 monthly. Profits are running at the rate of over 26 per cent on the company's entire capitalization, the $6,466,300 preferred stock sharing equally with the $11,500,000 common in all profits over 7 per cent on both.

National Car has large orders.—National Steel Car has large orders for cars and shells. The company is machining 2,000 shells a day, confining itself entirely to machining the steel forgings, which are supplied by Steel Company of Canada. No definite information of monthly earnings is obtainable, but it is understood that they are running at the rate of over forty per cent on the common stock.

Scotia Company at capacity.—Nova Scotia Steel and Coal Company, which has just increased its capital by the sale of $2,500,000 of stock, for the purpose of putting it in a position to extend its scope for taking war orders, is also operating at about full capacity on contracts for munitions.

From the west comes this article in the Regina Leader of November 20, 1915:

With hundreds of thousands of the best and bravest of Canada's youth risking life and limb in defence of the Empire, with some thousands already filling graves in France and Flanders, with an ever increasing stream of wounded and disabled men returning home, with men, women and children in the humblest of homes all over the Dominion making willing sacrifices in order that the cause of liberty may triumph, it will stand to the everlasting disgrace of the men of vast wealth connected with the great manufacturing industries of Canada who took advantage of the nation's necessities to extract extortionate profits out of war contracts and thus amass additional and enormous fortunes.

As evidence that many of these influential newspapers, some of whose views I have presented to the House, have shown too strong a disposition to blame the manufacturer and too little disposition to blame the Government, and its appointees the Shell Committee, let me refer to one incident which has been recorded in the press by reporters who had the opportunity of obtaining the facts. Not long ago Mr. Jones, the energetic manager of the Canada Cement Company, made up his mind that his company, which had a large capital, could make reasonable profits by going into the manufacture of shells. He went to the Shell Committee. He did not ask for their prices, but offered to manufacture shells at a lower price than that committee were giving. The Shell Committee refused him the order. According to the newspapers, Mr. Jones went to the Prime Minister and received sympathetic consideration from that right hon. gentleman. The Prime Minister evidently thought Mr. Jones' request of the Shell Committee was a reasonable one and, so far as he could properly do so, assisted him to secure for the Canada Cement Company a contract at a lower price.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The hon. gentleman is mistaken. I never had anything to do with fixing the prices. Mr. Jones did come to see me. I thought my duty was fulfilled by at once arranging over the telephone an interview between Mr. Jones and Mr. Thomas who represented the British Minister of Munitions, and that interview took place at once.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Then, I was giving to my right hon. friend a little too much credit. What I sought to do was to convey the impression I had, that the Prime Minister did assist Mr. Jones by getting the Shell Committee to give him a contract at a reduced price.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I wish to make the matter plain. Mr. Thomas was here fully representing the British Minister of Munitions. I thought that information on the subject should be conveyed at once to him. During the time that he was here, as I understood the matter, he regulated the price.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I should have thought that the Prime Minister, having information from a gentleman of Mr. Jones' prominence that these munitions could be produced in Canada at a much lower price than the Shell Committee were giving, and bearing in mind that the people of Canada must pay their share of the cost of these munitions, would have felt it his duty to endeavour by all the means in his power to secure the manufacture of these shells at this lower price. I am quite satisfied with the right hon. gentleman's explanation. Evidently he thought that if he introduced Mr. Jones to Mr. Thomas, under these favourable auspices Mr. Thomas would listen respectfully to Mr. Jones, and that this might be the means of lowering the price. Mr. Jones is a very prominent man, manager of one of the greatest manufacturing plants in Canada. He was very indignant, very persistent and determined to obtain a contract for his company. And instead of asking the price which the Shell Committee had been paying, and which no doubt they would have continued to pay, he submitted a lower price, and after much persistence he did secure a contract. It is stated that the result of Mr. Jones' persistence is to save the people of Great Britain and Canada something over twenty millions of dollars. And I believe that any one who will take the quantity of shells, and figure out the reduction effected by Mr. Jones' tender, will realize that my statement is within the mark. I am told that Mr. Jones has gone about this matter in a businesslike way. He had his workmen go to other factories to gain experience. I am told that, though it is only a few months since he got the contract, in a few weeks hence his company will be turning out shells.

Evidently the question of utilizing these magnificent workshops called the Transcona shops, near Winnipeg, came up. Let me repeat, from my meagre knowledge of the manner in which these things should be done, that it would have been the proper thing, the patriotic thing, for this Government to have utilized these workshops as well as other workshops to turn out munitions for the use of the Allies. But I find that in June, 1915, one of the Cabinet ministers, I am told that it was the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Cochrane) was reported as saying:

> There could be nothing madder than to push our Government shops into the manufacture of munitions of war at the cost of competing with Canadian private firms.

Sir, the minister does not seem to have realized that this is a contest in which the safety of Canada and of the allied nations may depend on an adequate supply of shrapnel and high explosives. But later on, in October, 1915, we find a statement by Mr. Thomas reported in the Montreal Gazette of October 9, as follows:

> "In the same spirit Hon. Frank Cochrane, Minister of Railways, had placed the Transcona railway shops at the disposal of the Imperial Government for the manufacture of munitions. They have done that," he said, "without provision for profit to any one, and I thank the Canadian Government for the splendid spirit they have shown."

Sir, that was a splendid spirit. I do not wonder that Mr. Thomas, returning home, would declare that at last the representatives of the Canadian people, the Ministry of Canada, had made up their minds to do their duty by the Empire and to engage in the turning out of munitions of war in the Government shops at actual cost. But, was that done? Not at all. It is a fact that when these workshops were taken over by the Government, the Grand Trunk Pacific were actually making shells. These shops have a splendid equipment. I doubt if there are any finer machine shops in the Dominion of Canada—indeed, in the whole of North America—than the Transcona shops near Winnipeg. The Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company was utilizing a part of that plant in the manufacture of shells. The shops were there, and the Government was in a position to use them to carry out the promise which the Minister of Railways made to the representative of Mr. Lloyd George. Did the Government carry out its promise?

No, Sir. The next thing we find is that this Government has leased the shops to a private company—organized, I am told, by a member of this House—for the purpose of carrying on the manufacture of shells for their own advantage as a private company. That is the way the splendid promise made to the representative of Mr. Lloyd George by this Government has been fulfilled: they have leased the shops for the purpose of organizing a private company to engage in the manufacture of shells at a profit. And what is the reason given at last by the Minister of Railways for not carrying out this promise? He has said that it would cost the Government about $125,000 to equip the shops with the necessary machinery, and that the Government could not afford to do that. This Parliament having voted money, not only by the millions but by the hundreds of millions, to enable Canada to do her share in the defence of the Empire; this Government having available these magnificent shops for the carrying out of their reassuring promise to the representative of Mr. Lloyd George, is it not inconceivable that the Government should go back upon their promise because it would cost the paltry sum of $125,000 to equip the shops with the necessary machinery to turn out shrapnel and high explosive shells? Sir, this Parliament and the people of Canada should demand from the Government a satisfactory explanation of the reason which induced them to adopt this most extraordinary and, to my mind, most unpatriotic course.

Let me read from an influential paper, the Winnipeg Voice, which represents the labour interests of Canada. The article is headed "Dominion and Shell Profiteering," and it reads:

> In leasing the Transcona shops to a private firm for the production of munitions, the Dominion Government not only neglected an opportunity to make a saving for the Empire, it tacitly confessed that it will make no effort to reduce the excessive profits of the war contractors. Business, it virtually announces, must not be harassed no matter what issues may be involved. This is clearly an unpatriotic attitude. Anything that tends to increase the cost of the war manifestly adds to the difficulties of the Empire, and a truly patriotic government would have this truth vividly in mind. It would be as keen about limiting the profits of the munition men as it would be about recruiting. Excessive war profits could not exist in a country which really believed itself to be in grave danger. All considerations of private interest disappear when the community is threatened. If therefore the governments of the United Kingdom and Canada still tolerate the extortions of the army contractors, they do so because they have not felt the pressure of the war as Belgium and France have felt it. There is no profiteering to speak of in France. Men do not haggle for pence when their entire possessions are at stake. They pitch in and help the common cause. Canada senses the realities of the war far less strongly than England. Distance no doubt accounts for this fact tolerably well. Nevertheless, the Government ought to understand the situation pretty well, and set an example in patriotism to the rest of capitalist Canada. If it fails to do so it will not be heard with any respect should it chide the workers when they begin to demand a share of the "prosperity" which this country has enjoyed as a result of the war. As the wheels of industry gather speed in Canada the workers will be encouraged to demand increases in wages. And they will not be restrained from doing so by the charge that they are unpatriotic. The sufficient reply to that charge will be to recall the fact that the Federal Government itself refused to lift a finger in order to cheapen the cost of munitions.

This is a well-written article, and one which should commend itself to the judgment of hon. members of this House.

I said yesterday that I was going to call attention to the manner in which the Australian Government had proceeded in connection with the providing of war munitions. If hon. gentlemen will read the January issue of that very interesting and reliable journal known as the Canadian Liberal Monthly—which I would commend to hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House by reason of the very valuable and instructive article which it contains headed "Australia and War Munitions"—I am sure they will agree with me that Australia, in this as in other respects, so far as taking her position in the defence of the Empire is concerned, is leading the way and has set an example which Canada might well have followed at the beginning of this war. Sir, one of the great hopes I have in bringing this matter to the attention of Parliament to-day is that the Government will realize that even now it is not too late to emulate this splendid example. The war is not yet over; I fear that it may last for some years. Even the most optimistic of us fear that the end is not yet in sight. It is not too late, therefore, for this Government to do its duty: to mobilize the industries of this country and to proceed to furnish munitions of war to the Allies at actual cost. This is what Australia did; you will see how different was her course and how businesslike were her methods compared with those of the Canadian Government:

> Little or nothing has been told in Canada as to what has been done in our sister Dominions of Australia and New Zealand in the manufacture and delivery of shells and other munitions of war. It may therefore come as a surprise to many to learn that, despite many natural difficulties not known in Great Britain nor in Canada, the Federal Government of Australia has grappled energetically and successfully with the problem and that the resources of the Island Continent are being worked to their utmost in order to render the maximum of aid to the Mother Country. When the call for shells came from Great Britain in the early summer of 1915, the Federal Government immediately appointed a Federal Munitions Committee, and co-operation with the different states of the Commonwealth resulted in each of these forming State Munitions Committees which at once got actively to work. Munition Bills were passed by the Federal Parliament, giving the Government the power to manufacture and contract for the manufacture of munitions, and the different states also passed similar regulations giving them similar powers. The work was thus entered upon in a public and official and thoroughly systematic manner.

Serious Difficulties Overcome.

The great difficulty encountered from the first lay in the fact that Australia, unlike Canada and unlike the United Kingdom, is not a mechanical manufacturing country. The necessary tools and machinery did not exist in that country and the tremendous distances from countries where these necessary supplies could be secured caused much vexatious delay. While this problem was being solved, however, active preparatory steps were taken in all other possible directions.

The leading engineers of the Commonwealth were called into conference to canvass the situation and supply all possible information on which actual progress could be based.

A Metal Exchange was established by the Federal Government to arrange for the control of metals produced in the country, so that all supplies would be readily available as required.

The Munitions Committee was instructed and proceeded with the formation and enrollment of a Munitions Workers Corps, to include all men of military age who are indispensable for the manufacture of munitions, and these men were given certificates to indicate that they have performed their full share of work in defence of their country.

Steel Supply Quickly Found.

The Federal Defence Department early made arrangements for the first supplies of steel for shells, contracting for the necessary quantity at the lowest price from the Broken Hill Proprietary at its Newcastle works.

Early in November, 1915, the first steel, after exhaustive Government tests, was shipped to the different states. Samples were also sent to England with a view to supplying Great Britain and her Allies, and arrangements were also made for shipment to New Zealand, where there is no steel available.

After due inquiry and consultation with the British War Office, the Federal Munitions Committee decided that the Dominion of Australia could best serve the needs of the Empire by the manufacture of 18-pound high-explosive shell bodies. A price of $5.05 per shell, including the cost of the steel, was set, and all contractors willing to accept this price were given open contracts to supply all the shells they could manufacture up to June 30, 1916, with the provision that this price might be revised, if so decided by the Government, on or after March 31, 1916. It was also undertaken that the British Government should give three months' notice when no more shells were required.

I pause to ask why this Government did not, at the very outset, make an arrangement of that kind with the manufacturers of Canada? Why is it that my hon. friend the Minister of Militia, when he is seeking to excuse these high prices, says that the orders from the British Government were spasmodic, and that they acted as if they thought—and some of their officials did think—that the war would end in three months; and that it was that which caused these enormously high prices to be paid. If this Government had gone about the matter in the right way why could they not have made the same arrangement as was made by the Australian Government? That arangement was that these contracts should run until March of the present year, and that while the Australian Government had the right to revise the figures at any time, still the contract would run, and if the British Government decided to terminate the contract the contractors must receive three months' notice.

Let me speak also of the price. Large quantities of these 18-pound high explosives have been manufactured in Canada. That was the shell which the Australian Government decided it would be best to manufacture. I believe it was regarded as about the most useful all-round munition which could be produced. What was the price that they paid? It was $5.05 per shell, and that was away off in Australia where the manufacturing industries are not at all in the advanced stage that they are in Canada; in Australia where the difficulty of obtaining steel is very much greater than in Canada. Australia is not like Canada, situated side by side with a great manufacturing country like the United States, where all the materials which could not be obtained in Canada might very easily be obtained. And yet, Sir, the Australian Government fixed the price for these 18-pound high explosives at 21 shillings sterling, which is equal to $5.05. That included the machining of the shell and the steel billets which would be used for the shell. What was the price fixed by this Shell Committee in Canada? It was $5.70 for the mere machining, and the steel billets were supplied by the Shell Committee free of cost to the manufacturer; and the steel for those shells would cost an average of pretty close to $2 apiece or perhaps $1.40 or $1.50, or somewhere between $1 and $2. At all events, it made the price of these 18-pound high explosives nearly $2 apiece greater in Canada than in Australia. That was the price fixed, as I said, by the Shell Committee, and fixed, evidently, out of all proportion to the cost of manufacture. Sir, no man who looks at this subject dispassionately can come to any other conclusion than that some of the gentlemen on the Shell Committee, engaged as they were in large manufacturing concerns themselves, being directing heads of large manufacturing concerns to which they themselves gave the making of vast quantities of steel shells, were quite content that the country should pay these enormous prices and that they made no honest effort to get low prices because—and this is a hard thing to say of any gentleman who was considered of sufficient importance to be appointed on this committee—because, of every excess dollar paid for the shells, a certain portion was going into their own pockets and into the treasuries of the companies of which they were the executive heads. A pretty situation for this Government to place the people of Great Britain and of Canada in, that this Commission, whom they appointed,—this Commission whose work they should have kept under their eyes from day to day, because the Imperial Government were trusting this Government to safeguard their interests as the people of Canada have trusted them to safeguard their interests—a pretty situation this, that these sixteen gentlemen who sit upon the Treasury Benches and whose duty it was under those circumstances to guard the interests of the Empire, including the interests of Canada, should have allowed this thing to go on from month to month, knowing that these gentlemen on the Shell Committee were buying shells from themselves and buying them at these exorbitant prices. I say it is a lamentable situation that they should allow this to go on for months and months, and that it was only after dissatisfaction had reached, apparently, to the Mother Country and after Mr. Lloyd George's representative, Mr. Thomas, had been sent out to this country to investigate, that these things were discovered, which nearly all men in Canada knew, and of which every honest Canadian was ashamed; and that it should have remained to Mr. Thomas to put an end to these scandals which ought long before that to have been put an end to by this Government.

Then this article proceeds as follows:

On this basis 31 tenders had been received—

That is, at the price of $5.05.

—up to November 1, of which 19 had been formally accepted, the balance being still under consideration.

Shell-making at actual cost.

These tenders revealed one very significant difference between shell-making in Canada, which is apparently inseparable from huge and unreasonable profit-making, and shell-making in Australia, where national service and the good of the Empire is apparently the first consideration.

Four of the tenders were from the State Governments of New South Wales, South Australia, Victoria and Queensland, the contract for the latter state being undertaken by the State Government Railways Department. In each of these cases the larger part of the work was to be done at actual cost in Government owned and Government operated shops, most of which are part of the equipment of the Railways Departments and other government departments. As all the railways of Australia are owned and operated by the state, the extent of the work undertaken in government shops can be readily understood.

I shall not trouble the House with the remainder of the article, but I may mention this very important matter: that the Government of Australia also undertook, early in the history of this war, the making of machine guns for the use of its soldiers at the front. And I would like to say just a word with regard to machine guns. I believe that this Government sent its boys to the front supplied with machine guns to a very small proportion as compared with the number in the hands of the Germans who stood in front of them upon the battlefield. I have been told that men have written from the front, that by reason of the want of machine guns they were mowed down as wheat is mowed down by the harvesting machines. My hon. friend the Minister of Militia went across to Europe and was said to have gone to the front, and when he came back he reported that all was well upon the front, when he ought to have known, and this Government ought to have known from week to week, from the reports of their officers at the front, that the equipment of the Canadian troops was lamentably deficient, so far as machine guns were concerned. No word of that came to the public's ears, and apparently the Government itself took no action to remedy the defect; and it was not until Col. Currie and Col. Meighen returned from France and addressed public meetings, and called attention to this lamentable state of affairs, that there appeared to be any waking up on the part of the Government to the necessity for properly equipping with machine guns our soldiers who are fighting the battles of the Empire. Then what happened, Sir? When the people of Canada were confronted with the fact that although this Parliament voted $100,000,000 for the proper equipment of our soldiers this Government had failed in their duty, all over the country there arose a wave of indignation, as well as a wave of intense patroitism, and from almost every hamlet and town, from almost every municipality and every city, from almost every man and every woman, came contributions for machine guns in order that our soldiers might be properly equipped. My hon. friend the Acting Minister of Militia (Hon. J. A. Lougheed) made an announcement through the press that the Government would be glad to receive these contributions, and would see to it that the money was devoted to the proper purpose. Sir, I think that every thousand dollars which was contributed by the people of this country for machine guns constitutes a strong indictment against this Government for its neglect to provide proper equipment for the soldiers. My hon. friend the Minister of Militia and Defence may say that the officials of the British War Office did not think that any more machine guns were necessary. But, Sir, for what do we have such an experienced soldier as the hon. Minister of Militia, for what purpose has he been selected, for what purpose did he go to the front, if not to see to the equipment of our soldiers? Surely he knows as much as the ordinary official of the British War Office; surely it is no answer to the people of Canada, no answer to the mothers and fathers of the boys whose lives have been sacrificed on the European battlefields, to say that the Minister of Militia did not know, and that he ought to be excused for not knowing, because the officials of the War Office in England did not realize the necessity for greater equipment. I say it is no excuse. The Minister of Militia must have known, or he ought to have known, of that great deficiency, and steps ought to have been taken earlier in the war to provide the necessary equipment in the matter of machine guns. The people of Canada want to know what has been done with the $2,000,000 which they subscribed—whether it is not to be used for machine guns, whether the assurance of Hon. Mr. Lougheed that the Government would be glad to receive contributions for machine guns and would apply the money received to that purpose, is to be carried out. If the money is not to be used for that purpose, then some explanation should be given to the public and more especially to the donors. The only explanation I have seen was in a letter written by my right hon. friend the Prime Minister a few days ago, in which he said that the money could not be returned because several machine guns had already been purchased. I am told that the total subscriptions were $2,000,000, and that that sum would purchase 2,000 machine guns. The Prime Minister says that several guns have been purchased up to this time, and that consequently the money cannot be returned. Sir, I think we ought to know why that money was not devoted to its proper purpose; we ought to know how much of it is on hand; we ought to know what is intended to be done with what is on hand; and we ought to know whether our soldiers are now properly equipped so far as machine guns are concerned. We ought to be informed as to how they were equipped when they first went into the trenches. The people of Canada, let me tell my hon. friend the Minister of Militia, are terribly keen to know that when our boys go to the front they have every possible protection which men can have, that they are well equipped, and well armed, and that they are fully supplied with big guns, machine guns, high explosive shells, and other munitions of war.

I am not going to detain the House any longer. I have already taken up longer time than I ought to have done, and I desire to express my thanks to the House for listening so patiently to what I have said. The subject seemed to me to be of the greatest possible importance. It seemed to me to be a question affecting the honour of our country and the honour of this Parliament, and to be of the very greatest possible importance to the people, not only of Canada, but of Great Britain.

I have been careful to make no charge against the manufacturers of this country. Before I take my seat I desire to bear testimony to the fact that they stand in the very front rank of the manufacturers of the world. I believe that there is nothing which is turned out in any part of the world that cannot be turned out by the Canadian people. Give them the contracts and they will supply the money, and the material, and the brains necessary to fill these contracts. But the Canadian manufacturers were not asked to fix prices for the shells, shrapnel, or high explosive, or any other munitions of war which were under the control of the Canadian Shell Committee. Prices were fixed entirely by that committee, and if anybody is responsible for any wrong-doing which may have taken place it is the Shell Committee, it is this Government through the Shell Committee, which they appointed, and for whose actions they are responsible.

All that I ask, Sir, is that there be a full and complete investigation by a committee of this Parliament in order to determine whether excessive prices have been paid, and if they have been paid to fix the blame upon the right shoulders. I have been careful not to say anything because I do not know as to the extent of the responsibility; but I do say, and I repeat it most emphatically, that, so far as my information goes, that blame does not rest upon the shoulders of the manufacturers, but upon the shoulders of those who fixed the prices. It rests upon the shoulders of the members of the Shell Committee, who were paying themselves these excessive prices, who stood in the position of both buyers and sellers, and who could not reduce the prices to outside manufacturers without reducing the prices to themselves. The whole business was of the most objectionable character, and one that demands the fullest and most complete investigation by a committee of this Parliament.

Mr. OLIVER J. WILCOX (North Essex): Mr. Speaker, you will allow me to extend to you, Sir, my congratulations upon your promotion to the dignified position which you now occupy. If I had been guilty of the tirade of unwarranted accusations, insinuations, and statements which have been made by my hon. friend the member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) I would have at least convinced myself that I was more anxious to undermine the Government of this country than to undermine the Kaiser. I cannot conceive of a speech that has been delivered in this House since the great world crisis has faced the people of Canada that has been so unbecoming, so out of place, as that which has been delivered by the hon. member for St. John. It had for its basis purely political motives and its object was to weaken the position of the Government which is to-day sustaining a responsibility the like of which no government has had to bear before in Canada. I regret the attempt of the hon. gentleman to lay a charge where there is no charge, bolstered and backed up by a lot of old newspaper clippings which are not admitted within the confines of Parliament as proof in support of any contention, in an effort to make out a case against a government whose skirts are clear and who are recognized by the people of Canada as being worthy of the position which they occupy.

It does seem to me to be a peculiar thing —yes, a wonderful thing—in this young country in which we live, and which has made such vast strides along all avenues of human activity in the past forty years, that in every great crisis the country has seen it has been guided by the representatives of the great political party with which I am to-day affiliated.

We are always delighted to hear from my hon. friend from Red Deer (Mr. Michael Clark). Oh, how I wish that the sentiments which animated the hon. member for St. John this afternoon had been as high and as noble as the sentiments that animated the hon. member for Red Deer the other evening, a man who has the proper idea of what it means to be a British subject and to live under British institutions, whose son is at the front doing his duty—

Sir SAM HUGHES: And doing it well.

Mr. WILCOX: —and who has another son, I am informed, going to the front. Contrast that speech of the hon. member for Red Deer with the heckling, with the wanderings, with the meanderings of the hon. member for St. John. He landed once or twice in Vancouver, jumped from there to an elevator in Halifax, got over into St. John and landed in the Shell Committee in Montreal.

An hon. MEMBER: High explosives.

Mr. WILCOX: All high explosives and the biggest explosion that has taken place in this House is the speech of the hon. member for St. John. This was all done with the object of trying to figure out if he could not by some hook or crook convince the people that this Government are not worthy of the trust that has been committed to their care in this time of stress and trial. I have commended the hon. member for Red Deer and from my place in this House I want to say, because I believe it, that a proper spirit animates my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). If I take his words to mean that which they appear to mean, I believe that I can put him, whatever transgressions he may have committed in past years in regard to loyalty and adhesion to the policy of Imperial defence, amongst those Canadians who desire to pursue a patriotic course in this great crisis. I trust that the principles contained in the speech which he delivered here the other day will be acceptable to patriotic Canadians. But the party of hon. gentlemen opposite at this moment is at the parting of the ways on this question. Who is going to be the leader—the hon. member for St. John with his measley politics and who is always playing the game? You would think we were living in times of the most glorious peace and not in times of war. We do not mind that from the hon. member from St. John; we expect it; we know that politics permeate his very being. I hope my hon. friend from St. John will not imagine I am casting any reflections upon the great ability 4 p.m. which we all recognize he possesses. But in this time of stress and trial it might have been expected that he would have employed that great ability in proper channels and that he would have given to the country that assistance which I believe every patriotic Canadian desires it should receive, thereby strengthening the hands of those who are endeavouring to uphold the British cause.

After the outbreak of war, when Sir Robert Borden, the distinguished Canadian who leads the destinies of this country at this hour, called the war session of Parliament, my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) made a speech from his place in this House, and in clear and distinct terms laid down the policy of the party which he leads. On page 8 of Hansard of the special session of Parliament of 1914, my right hon. friend had this to say:

> This session has been called for the purpose of giving the authority of Parliament and the sanction of law to such measures as have already been taken by the Government, and any further measures that may be needed, to insure the defence of Canada and to give what aid may be in our power to the mother country in the stupendous struggle which now confronts her. Speaking for those who sit around me, speaking for the wide constituencies which we represent in this House, I hasten to say that to all these measures we are prepared to give immediate assent. If in what has been done or in what remains to be done there may be anything which in our judgment should not be done—

Mr. PUGSLEY: Hear, hear.

Mr. WILCOX:

—or should be differently done.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Hear, hear.

[Mr. Wilcox.]

Mr. WILCOX:

—We raise no question.

Let my hon. friend say "hear, hear," now.

Mr. PUGSLEY: That is all right.

Mr. WILCOX:

We take no exception, we offer no criticism.

Let him say it now.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Hear, hear.

Mr. WILCOX:

And we shall not offer any criticism as long as there is danger at the front.

We took those words as coming from the leader of a great party, and we believed what he said.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Not in regard to wrongdoing.

Mr. WILCOX: My right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition has not transgressed to any great extent; but, Sir, there is an hon. gentleman on his right whom I would advise my right hon. friend, if he would take my advice, to take into his inner counsel, into that private office where he has put up so many political games in the past, where he devises those schemes to put it over us bad Tories. Let him take him in there and have a talk with him; and in the interest of the cause, and of the liberty and freedom of our institutions of which my right hon. friend spoke the other day, let us cut out this haggling and making political capital, which is nothing but political buncombe for the back concessions of the country.

In my constituency, when a man gets up and speaks a lot of what I call "hot air," we call it up our way "bull talk." Some ingenious business institution up there has got out a barometer as an advertising scheme. I have one in my hand. It has an indicator, and the first point on it is "blarney." Then, as the indicator rises a few degrees higher, the next point is called "hot air." If it reaches up a few degrees higher, it is called "stable talk," and if it goes to the top it is called "bull talk"; and I am inclined to think that if I had applied this test to my hon. friend, the indicator would have been at the top now.

As I listened to the words of the hon. gentleman, I thought of the words of Richard the Second:

> Of comfort no man speak:
> Let's talk of graves, and worms, and epitaphs;
> Make dust our paper, and with rainy eyes
> Write sorrow on the bosom of the earth.

My hon. friend quoted papers ad nauseam. I hold in my hand the Ottawa Free Press of to-day, January 19, which is the leading Liberal paper in the capital and one of the leading Liberal organs of the Dominion of Canada, and it laughs at the hon. gentleman and puts him in his proper place. I desire to place this editorial on Hansard. I do not usually read from newspapers, but I am sure that my hon. friends will bear with me on this occasion, because it is such a complete answer to the arguments which my hon. friend tried to make in his speech of one hour last night and two hours to-day. The Free Press says:

The "Shame" that Mr. Pugsley Sees.

The Dominion Shell Commission, appointed by General Sam Hughes within six weeks of the outbreak of the war under the chairmanship of General Alex Bertram, practical mechanic, manufacturer and soldier, established in Canada an entirely new industry that has brought to and distributed throughout the Dominion, hundreds of millions of dollars.

Six weeks after the opening of the war, and six months before Britain compelled by her necessities decided to do the same thing, Canada proceeded to organize its privately-owned industrial resources for the manufacture of the shells that General Sam Hughes correctly predicted would be demanded in appalling quantities.

It was a tremendous task—one for which there was no precedent, one which meant generally and largely a groping in the dark. It was a task for practical men, for captains of industry particularly connected with the metal trades, for those familiar with the manufactories of the country and their equipment, for tactful and essentially honest leaders.

In Messrs. Bertram and his associates General Sam Hughes found men of extraordinary suitability. They were practical machinists and inventors, had captained huge industries, and wide knowledge of Canadian manufacturing conditions, and had the confidence and respect of all who knew them.

Remember this is what a Liberal newspaper says.

These men accepted what from the first seemed a thankless, if not impossible task; they served continuously night and day without a cent of remuneration; they achieved against tremendous obstacles a wonderful thing—the organization, on a gigantic scale, of an industry entirely new to Canada, that has kept thousands of Canadians in employment, and that has driven away the distress that threatened our cities and towns.

That is the record which Hon. William Pugsley, from his place in the House of Commons, declares "will bring shame to the people of Canada," and which, he asserts, has "produced scandals which were reeking from the Atlantic to the Pacific." His condemnation will be printed in a hundred Canadian newspapers to-day, and in brief telegrams and cables people in the United States and Britain will be told of this horror that has come to the Dominion.

* * *

Why does Hon. William Pugsley make this startling statement?

The Commission had given large orders to firms in which its members were interested, for instance John Bertram and Sons, of which Sir Alex. Bertram was vice-president, and to a concern with which Mr. Carnegie was connected.

The Commission had fixed an unduly high price to be paid for shells.

A Canadian had quoted $4 for fuses that had been bought in the United States for from $4 to $4.50.

The Commission had been animated by a desire to distribute orders to friends of the Government.

Bernard Hepburn, M.P., had been given a contract which had been turned over to a Montreal firm.

E. A. D. Morgan, a Conservative candidate in Richelieu, had got an order at higher than an Ontario manufacturer, as having been told the rates recently paid, that he might expect to get an order, spent $15,000 in installing additional lathes, but was subsequently waited upon "by two gentlemen, one of them closely connected with the Chairman of the Shell Committee, who told him that he could not obtain a contract unless he paid a commission of 1½ per cent to them;" declining to pay, he got no order.

Men without plants got orders for shell boxes, while others with plants did not.

We believe this is a fair summary of Mr. Pugsley's charges, as reported in the newspapers.

Hon. Mr. Pugsley, so far as we can see, provides no evidence other than rumours that have been circulated by disappointed manufacturers, or distorted statements and half truths that have appeared in certain newspapers. But, supposing all his assertions are true, are they of a nature to make Canadians forget the real and wonderful achievements of the Shell Commission and bring shame, instead of pride, to the Canadian people?

Firms with which the Commissioners were connected were given orders at the outset because they were included among the few willing to try the experiment of making shells; Sir Alex. Bertram has denied that he has any but a nominal connection with John Bertram and Sons; comparatively high prices had to be fixed in order to tempt Canadian manufacturers into the new industry, and at that the total we are assured, was $15,000,000 less than the amount allowed by the War Office; oftentimes date of delivery offset a lower offer in price; many Liberal firms have handled contracts from the Commission; it was not such a heinous offence for a member of Parliament, or for a candidate for Parliament, to bring the war facilities of certain firms to the attention of the Shell Committee; many scores of firms who at first refused to have anything to do with the experiment flocked to Ottawa when they discovered that others had tried it and had succeeded well.

How trivial is all this compared with the essential fact that the Shell Commission established in Canada an industry that has brought hundreds of millions of dollars to the Dominion, besides materially helping in the prosecution of the war.

The assertion that there are in the country men, politicians possibly, mean enough to sponge on manufacturers who have received orders from the Shell Commission and bold enough to pretend that only upon payments to them could future orders be obtained, is quite believable after some of the revelations in connection with the horse purchases; but that men of the stamp of General Bertram, who, despite the rumours which Mr. Pugsley now gives voice to, was created a Sir Knight by his King a few weeks ago, would be a party to such contemptible tricks is unthinkable.

And the editorial goes on all the way through condemning the hon. gentleman (Mr. Pugsley) for the attitude he has taken in this House with regard to this matter.

Owing to the extraordinary growth of the munitions business in Canada, which started with so small an order that the difficulties of its inception were added to, the work of the original shell commission may not have been conducted with the complete system that the great task demanded; but the fact remains that results have shown that the Bertram Commission was one of the most efficient that has ever been appointed by a government of this country.

The Free Press regrets to find itself in opposition to so clever and distinguished a member of the Liberal party as Hon. William Pugsley, but we cannot help thinking that he has been led astray by the atmosphere of the chamber which has been the scene of so many gallant party fights in which he has been a leading antagonist.

From the speeches of the men on both sides who had preceded him, from the speeches of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, Dr. Clark, and Hon. Rodolphe Lemieux, we had been led to expect that the element of petty partisanship was to be eliminated from this war session, and we had obtained visions of a real drawing together of the two political parties for the prosecution of the war, beside which everything pales into insignificance.

If Mr. Pugsley's lead is followed by other Liberals, our hopes are shattered and Canada, we believe, will suffer.

So I make allusion to the fact that to-day is the parting of the ways. Will hon. gentlemen opposite follow the lead of the hon. member for St. John city, or will they follow the lead of the right hon. leader of the Opposition, who said that there would be no criticism of the conduct of this Government so long as the war lasted, because the interests at the front were too great?

In connection with the development of an industry on the scale to which the munitions output has attained, it is too much to expect that there has been nothing deserving of condemnation, but to, deliberately and in a wholesale way, blackwash men like Bertram and his associates who have accomplished so much that counts in the successful carrying on of the war does not seem patriotic.

The. fishing expedition upon which Mr Pugsley would have Parliament embark might result in the exposure of some grafters; but it would probably be more prolific in valuable information for the enemy.

That, Mr. Speaker, is the view of the leading Liberal newspaper of the city of Ottawa with regard to the statements made by my hon. friend this afternoon. There is, however, one satisfaction: my hon. friend, session after session, has brought charges against this Administration which have been proved to be absolutely groundless; consequently the people are beginning to know my hon. friend. Oh, they say, that is Pugsley—and there is a great deal in that. I want to say to my hon. friend—though in best of spirit, because I am in just a good a temper as he was when he spoke—that he should consider the words which I have quoted. I think he has made a great mistake, and I want to put him on the right path, if I can. Mr. Blaine a great statesman in the United States—

An hon. MEMBER: Here, too.

Mr. WILCOX: Yes Mr. Blaine, the American statesman, said in one of his books:

It never pays to be a blue-ruin man in the United States. The people are not influenced by that sort of tactics. They have an abiding confidence in the future, and when dismal accounts are spread broadcast, they simply lose confidence in the authority thereof.

I think that throughout the Dominion of Canada these words are beginning to apply fairly well to the hon. member for St. John city, because the hon. gentleman has said so many things in the past that the people have found to be untrue that they do not pay any attention to him now. For that reason, therefore, we do not look upon the matter as seriously as we would if conditions in that regard were different.

The hon. gentleman last evening tried to make a case against the Government by asserting that enough had not been done for the farmers of Canada. Why, he said the Government sent out a pamphlet telling the farmers to produce more, with the result that the farmers dragged the ground three times where, if they had not received the pamphlet, they would only have dragged it twice. Providence smiled on them and they got a great crop. You have neglected the question of transportation, he says. You ought to have built shipyards; you ought to have built a fleet of ships to carry this grain across the Atlantic. You ought, he says, to build elevators at St. John and Halifax—though I understand that there is an elevator at Halifax and that it is not half-full at the present time. I understand also that through the actions of this Administration in safeguarding the interests of the farmers of Western Canada, greater progress has been made in the movement of the crop to its destination than was made in any previous year.

Look at the freight rates, said my hon. friend; they are too high. Well, what makes the freight rates high? Is it the Government? The Government has been doing everything in their power to adjust the freight rates, but it should be remembered that conditions exist to-day upon the high seas over which no government has control. When the war broke out and the enemy's ships made their appearance upon the Seven Seas, it became risky for the great transports to carry their cargoes through the arteries of trade to the distant markets of the world, and no company in the world would insure that cargo at the rate at which they would insure it in times of peace. Is the Government responsible for that? If my hon. friend had not made so vigorous an opposition we might to-day have three dreadnoughts upon the great trade routes of the world, and probably the freight rates would not now be so high.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Who ever thought of doing that on your side?

Mr. WILCOX: The next point to which my hon. friend referred was the extension of the life of Parliament. I tell you, he said it is a serious thing—you know how he draws it out; I cannot do it like he can—I am practising. It is a serious thing to change the British constitution! You would think it was the rock of ages he was going to change. But it is not. It would be done just as simply as the King approved letting the soldiers vote, which my hon. friend said His Majesty would not do. It is only a matter of form, and if it is approved by the Parliament of Canada it will be done. This Government will directly urge it, we hope, hon. gentlemen opposite, with your assistance. We want it. We do not believe that we can use our best energies in this great conflict, and bring the force of this state to bear to the fullest possible extent without your assistance, and we plead for it. But if you, hon. gentlemen, are to take the course which is directed by the hon. member from St. John, then it means a weakening of the character of the citizenship of this country, and the ability of our citizens to uphold those principles of liberty and of freedom which have been handed down to us by the glorious ancestry from whose loins we have sprung.

But, Sir, speaking a few months ago, my hon. friend thought there was going to be an election. He thought that, but he thought wrong. You know I am inclined to think that although my hon. friend is clever and astute, polite, smart, all the rest of it; although he possesses all those essential qualities, he pays too much attention to newspaper scraps. Perhaps he is trying to keep in with the press. It may be that it would pay us all to do that. I have no charge to make against the press or against young men who grace the dignity of the position which they occupy. But, you know, in recess time they have got to write up editorials, and the hon. member for St. John seems to believe them all; he brings them back to this House and reads them. But he was in Winnipeg when there was talk of an election in that great city, which is the home of his friend the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Rogers), and he gave out an interview. He says, now, it is a serious thing to extend the life of Parliament, a serious thing to change the constitution. But it is only paper, it is not rock or stone. You simply go to the House of Commons in England and ask for an amendment of our British North America Act, and it will be passed just as any piece of legislation would be passed here. It is not so serious as my hon. friend would like to make the country think it is. I have here the interview which he gave out in Winnipeg. It is as follows:

Charges of Liberals.

Hon. Wm. Pugsley, Liberal member for St. John, N.B., and for years Minister of Public Works in the Laurier Cabinet, in the course of an interview given to the Manitoba Free Press, Winnipeg, on September 15, declared as follows:

Here is what he says, but he has had a new vision since then:

> The present circumstances are so grave from the standpoint of Canada and the Empire that it would be deplorable, in my opinion, to have the people divided upon party questions.

The first paragraph is all right.

> Another of the reasons why I favour putting off an election until after the war is because I think it would be a great pity to hold one just when the energies of all the people of Canada, especially the members of the Government who are primarily charged with the duty of attending to the recruiting and equipment of the soldiers, should be devoted to this one end.

That is the way he talked a few months ago. I have watched the course of my hon. friend ever since I have been in this Parliament, and upon many occasions I have admired him for his cleverness and his shrewdness; but since this Government came into power he seems to think that they have no right to govern the destinies of this country, and that he is the dictator and the all-powerful of us all. Why the change in his position to-day? The extension of the life of Parliament is not serious, and the Government has taken that position. If hon. gentlemen opposite wish to take another course, in my judgment they are not taking a course which is in the interest of our country, or of the Empire to which we belong.

My hon. friend said: Why, when this war broke out we all knew it was going to be a long war. But only a little while before that he did not know that there was going to be a war at all, notwithstanding the fact that he had the advice and counsel of the chief executive of the Imperial forces, and the knowledge of the conditions that existed in our own Empire, and of the history of other states and peoples that have been predominant in the world. The British Empire is not very old. Our history, since the British Empire has become pre-eminent and predominant in the world, does not date back very many centuries. But, Sir, in the past there have been other empires, the Phœnician Empire, Carthage, Rome; and the history of three thousand years points to the fact that all the good things of this life, home, land, commerce, trade, belong, not to the feeble or to the weak, but belong to the energetic and the strong. What did my hon. friend (Mr. Pugsley) say? Was he inclined to accept the advice and counsel of the chief lords of the Admiralty, who knew what they were talking about? Here is what he said on March 12, 1913, speaking in this House:

> I can say that the ignorance displayed in that memorandum of Canadian conditions and of Canadian people is enough to make a horse laugh.

My hon. friend from Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) also said something. He was a transgressor too, but he made a very fine speech the other day, a speech true and loyal to British institutions, and because of that speech I am not going to criticise him now. I would a hundred times rather raise the member of St. John to the elevated plane which my hon friend (Mr. Lemieux) has now reached.

I have some more quotations here, but they are a matter of past history. There were also many other points to which I intended to allude, but I must not weary the House. This great struggle in which we are now engaged, is recognized by all within the confines of this House and of this country to have been due to the most titanic crime ever committed against humanity and civilization. It has been written that our civilization, as we have it to-day, is based on the law of Moses, and since Moses handed down the law upon the flags of stone, and men forsook the worship of the golden calf and took to worshipping God who created them in his own image—since that primitive period in the history of the world, the unpeopled plains have become hives of industry, and hives of industry have become unpeopled plains as we see in Belgium, France, Poland and in other countries ravaged by the war, which has wrought such wonderful historic and geographical changes. To-day we are confronted with a doctrine, with a system that is absolutely opposed to that under which we have lived. We have been permitted to live, Sir, in a century of great achievement, and we boast of all we have accomplished. Wealth has been piled up in every avenue of our industrial and national life. But who accomplished all that? I ask you, Sir, was it not our forefathers who left the distant shores of France and England and Scotland and other countries and came and settled upon the rock-bound coasts of this country. They were men who endured untold hardships, who made great sacrifices, and who wrought many days that they might hand down to us the great heritage which we possess to-day. Mr. Speaker, the great races living under British institutions have been the torch bearers of civilization in past centuries. Other empires in the past in their day and generation made advances in civilization, but not since the world began has any empire been recognized as a more beneficent, humane, uplifting agency than the great British Empire to which you and I belong. The races who live under British institutions were the torch bearers of civilization because they enjoyed liberty and freedom and because they possessed the character to uphold these principles.

I have this to say as my last word to the House this afternoon: in my humble opinion, anything that tends to weaken the character of the citizens of this country at this time is unpatriotic. In my judgment nothing will have a more unfortunate effect than the stirring up of strife over a few horses and a few shells. Let me remind my hon. friend (Mr. Pugsley) that wealth after all does not constitute the power of the state; it is the individuality and character of the citizens. If we are to have wrangles in this House upon political issues; if this Government is to be attacked for reasons which are no reasons at all, and which are only a repetition of the old political game over which our hearts were sore in times of peace; if that is what we are going to have, I say that when these speeches are read in the constituencies by the Liberals and the Conservatives they will declare that we want to be one. What effect will the speech delivered this afternoon and last night by the hon. member for St. John have? He tells the country that the Government are a bunch of grafters and bunglers. What effect will it have upon the honest citizen of the country who desires to see honest work done during this great crisis? I say to my hon. friends opposite and I plead with them—I mean it; it comes from the bottom of my heart—I say let us for goodness sake throw this old political game into the ditch. It is rotten. Let us remember that the country and the institutions under which we live are at stake, and that everything that was won for us by our forefathers must go if Germany wins. Imagine, Mr. Speaker, the success of the German doctrine that the life of the citizen is measured only by its value to the state.

That is to be spread over Canada, accompanied by the hatred that has been implanted in the breast of the German race with, I am sorry to say, the wrongful assertion that we are their natural enemy. Statements have appeared in the German press to the effect that the German people in Canada are serfs, that they are downtrodden, that they have no rights here. Why? To stir up a spirit of enthusiasm in their own country and to carry out the wishes of the high military caste. Imagine a German race with such ideas as those in their minds. What would you expect if they became predominant over us? That system involves making such a hell of the country that the Allies, that every citizen, will accept anything in order to get away from its baneful influence. Let us, regardless of politics, be brothers for once in this game. Let us act all together and we will proceed to do our duty as God gives us to see our duty. Then we will proceed to bind up the nation's wounds, to care for him that has borne the brunt of the battle, his widow, and his orphans, and to do all possible to achieve a just and lasting peace.

Hon. FRANK OLIVER (Edmonton): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the Government are to be congratulated on the choice they have made of a champion of their cause on this occasion. We have certainly been entertained by the expressions of my hon. friend from North Essex (Mr. Wilcox), and we are bound to assume that he speaks with authority as representing the ideas of the Government in regard to the important matters that have been brought to the attention of the House by my hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Pugsley), as well as by other hon. members on this side. We are at one with him in desiring unity of action in this great world crisis, but the people of Canada who must pay the price in money and in blood, ask at the hands of those who for the moment have the administration of our affairs, that the handling of our money, and shall I say, the direction of our blood, shall be characterized by honesty and efficiency, to the end that the cause in which we are engaged shall triumph. Are we to understand that the policy of the Government is that their friends—their party friends—shall profit unduly out of the supply of the necessary requirements for this war, and that their champions shall stand up and say to the House and the country, that they are not to be criticised, that to criticise them is disloyalty?

In my humble judgment this is the parting of the ways. If the Government propose, instead of honestly meeting an honest statement of fact, and placing before the House and the country such reasonable explanation of that condition of fact as may be possible, to declare in the most imflammatory style that they are to have the divine right to do as they please, and that those who question them in the doing of that are guilty of treason against the state and the Empire, then I, for one, will certainly take issue with them, and I think that a large majority of the people of Canada will do the same. My hon. friend (Mr. Wilcox) was anxious to include all of us in this House and in the country in an embrace of brotherhood from which party politics would be altogether eliminated. May I ask how my hon. friend arrived in this House, may I ask in what interest he has cast every vote that he has ever cast in this House, may I ask in what interest he made the speech which he did to-day, if it were not in the interest of party politics? Is he to declare that there shall be no party politics in this Parliament, when, if there were no differences of opinion and if those differences were not crystallized into the forms of party allegiance, this Parliament would in effect have no reason for existence? That a member of the House of Commons should declaim against partyism in the discussion of public affairs can only be considered as an evidence of insincerity. Instead of the address of my hon. friend having been of a character tending to the elimination of party discussion in this Chamber, and from the platforms and press of the country, I cannot recall a more deliberate, a more unqualifiedly partisan utterance ever having been made in this House.

I did not desire to deal with the question of the supply of munitions to the British Government by the manufac-
5 p.m. turers of Canada. It was not my purpose in rising to address the House to deal with that question, and I do not go any further now than merely to say, that accusations of disloyalty against those who are sent here for the purpose of guarding the interests of the public because they ask in a most respectful way for information for the benefit of the public in regard to the expenditure of the moneys of the public, cannot be maintained. If there is disloyalty, the disloyalty is on the part of those who either have their hands in the public treasury themselves or are desirous of protecting those who have their hands in that treasury. This is a time when I see in the newspapers the motto "save and serve"—a good motto, necessary to be observed in this country as in every part of the British Empire as a means to success. But we have heard in this House that not tens of thousands, not hundreds of thousands but tens of millions of money have been improperly expended in the production of munitions for the actual prosecution of the war, and when my hon. friend says "he who criticises is disloyal." the disloyalty is on his side, not on ours.

May I deal now with a matter which was alluded to by the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley), by the hon. member for North Essex (Mr. Wilcox), and also by the Prime Minister. It is something that has a very important bearing upon the interests of the West, and I think the conditions should be thoroughly understood. The House is no doubt aware that, notwithstanding the bountiful crop of the West and the high prices that prevail in Great Britain for foodstuffs, the prices to the producer in the West this year are little, if any, higher than the average prices of the past number of years, and in some cases much lower. The reason of that is not because the railroad charges are higher, not because the elevator charges are higher, but because the cost of ocean carriage is so much higher, as my hon. friend from St. John says, 1,000 per cent higher, than it was a few years ago. The ocean carrier is to-day receiving for the transportation of Canadian wheat across the Altantic fifty per cent as much as the farmer receives for producing that wheat and putting it into the elevators. This has arisen no doubt in large measure because of war conditions. It is a matter which was brought to the attention of the Government during the past session. While the crop was in process of being harvested and before it was put upon the market, attention was drawn to the fact that the ocean rates were abnormally high, and the Government was urged to take some action towards bringing them down. The Premier and his party of friends spent some time in the old country last year, and if I remember aright, it was announced in the newspapers on behalf of the Prime Minister, that he was there for the express purpose of securing a reduction in those ocean transportation rates. When he came back he appointed a committee, of which the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Rogers) was chairman, for the purpose of dealing with this question with a view of securing for the western farmer a fairer share of the Liverpool price for his product. At the time of the return of the Prime Minister the ocean rate was quoted at 33 cents per bushel. After the appointment of my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works and his committee, I noticed that the ocean rate increased to 34 cents, to 35 cents, to 36 cents per bushel. Recently I saw in the newspapers that the ocean rate at that time was approximately 42 cents per bushel. I am not able to establish the connection between the Minister of Public Works and his committee and that increase in the ocean rates, but I will suggest this, that in view of the fact that the rates have continued to increase ever since his appointment, he would do himself a great deal of credit if he would resign and then he could not at any rate be blamed for that increase in the rate.

The Prime Minister dealt with this matter of rates in his speech the other day, and he showed that the Government had been able to secure ocean transportation on favourable terms for the munitions made in Canada. He informed the House that the Government had been fortunate in being able to secure the services of Mr. A. H. Harris, formerly connected with the Canadian Pacific railway, and he gave a statement of what Mr. Harris had been able to do. I will read the last paragraph in regard to that :

> The Overseas Department is now being called upon to provide for about 125,000 gross tons of munitions, war material, and supplies per month, or approximately one and a half million tons per annum and the tonnage is still growing.

As the Premier pointed out, there is now at the disposal, as I understand it, of this Mr. Harris, on behalf of the Canadian Government, forty transports which have been commandeered by the British Government, and which have been placed at the disposal of the Canadian Government for the transportation of Canadian munitions to England. Twenty of these transports sail from St. John and twenty from Halifax, and the Prime Minister says they will be able to transport one and one-half million tons of munitions in a year. Now, one and one-half million tons is equivalent, if I figure it correctly, to about fifty million bushels of wheat. Of course, we are glad to know that the Government have been able to make such a satisfactory arrangement for the transport of munitions made in Canada. But the question naturally arises: if they were able to do so well for munitions, why were they unable to do approximately as well for wheat? Why should it be that it is possible to get munitions taken across the ocean at a fair rate and with fair convenience and not possible to get wheat taken over under the same conditions? That is a matter that was brought to the attention of the Government, as I have said, by their own newspapers last fall, and so far the response has been of the character indicated by this statement from the Prime Minister:

> We have continually been in communication with the Admiralty, both during my visit in the past summer and by correspondence as well, in regard to the necessity of releasing as far as possible tonnage for the North Atlantic service; and we did secure, by the efforts I made during the past summer, and by the correspondence which has taken place from time to time, the release of several ships for that service.

My understanding of this is that the British Admiralty had commandeered a large proportion of the North Atlantic merchant fleet for the purposes of that Government, and that this Mr. Harris and the Canadian Government were able to secure from the British Government forty transports for the carrying of munitions. But, instead of going on to secure forty more transports for the carriage of wheat, what I understand the Prime Minister to say here is that they were able to induce the British Government to release from the condition of being commandeered certain of these vessels usually employed in the North Atlantic service, so that they could go back to their old employment. That is to say, while vessels commandeered by the British Government were held to carry these munitions, when it came to the carriage of wheat, instead of similar action being taken, the vessels that had been commandeered by the British Government were asked to be released so that they might carry wheat on their own terms; these terms being a thousand per cent over what was a fair rate two or three years ago. Mr. Speaker, I make this statement, I hope, without prejudice. I hope I have interpreted incorrectly the statement of the Prime Minister, but if I have interpreted it correctly—and I do not see in what other way it can be read—then certainly it is for the Government to give to this House and the country very definite information as to why the same consideration was not given to the farmers of Canada who have produced that which is even more necessary than munitions for the carrying on of this war, as has been given to the producers of munitions by this Government, as stated by the Prime Minister.

I may say, I was not one of those who clamoured for the Government to take control of the North Atlantic transport situation last fall. I was satisfied that we should take our difficulties as they came, the difficulties that naturally arose out of war conditions. I did not wish to urge upon the Government action that would be embarrassing in any way. But when I find in the statement of the Prime Minister himself that he took the action on behalf of munitions, that his own supporters asked him to take on behalf of wheat, which action he did not take on behalf of wheat, I certainly would be doing less than my duty if I did not bring to the attention of the House, and as far as possible of the country, what appears to me to be an absolutely unfair discrimination.

Dealing with the Address, I find two paragraphs referring to proposed action. We are promised " a resolution authorizing and requesting the enactment of such legislation as will extend the life of this Parliament for the period of one year," and also "measures will be submitted for your consideration to further the effective co-operation of Canada in the defence of the Empire and in the maintenance of this war waged for liberty and lasting peace."

These two suggestions are of the highest importance and are entitled to the fullest and most careful consideration of this House. When we consider the urgency of the conditions in which our country and the Empire is placed at this time, I must say I am somewhat surprised to find these suggestions in the sequence in which they appear. The proposal to extend the life of Parliament comes first, and the proposal to take measures for the further effective co-operation of Canada in the defence of the Empire comes second. It would seem to me that the first duty of Parliament would be to provide, under direction of the Government, for the effective co-operation of Canada in the defence of the Empire and then, when that had been done, if it were thought wise and necessary, to bring forward legislation to secure the extension of the life of Parliament. However, the Government has seen fit to put the extension of the life of Parliament first, and co-operation in the defence of the Empire second. I assume that that is the relative position that these two matters occupy in the mind of the Government. I hope I am not unfair in making that suggestion.

Dealing with the proposal to extend the life of Parliament, I am quite aware that in conditions such as we have at this time, the mere fact that it is unusual and unprecedented does not seriously militate against its favourable consideration or against its being given effect to. We must understand that we are in the midst, as my hon. friend, the member for Essex, said of world-shaking conditions, and that we must be prepared to take extraordinary measures from time to time, as the circumstances require. So that merely on that point there is no reason for refusing the suggestion that is placed in the Address. While I put the matter before the House in that form there is another side of the question, however, that strikes me, and I will take the liberty of placing it before the House. There is no doubt that the extension of the term of Parliament and the avoidance of the turmoil of a general election for another year, is something that will naturally appeal to the minds of those who sit in this House; at least it would be very unnatural if it did not do so. We are here; we are clothed with a certain measure of authority, and naturally we cannot look with direct disfavour upon the proposal to continue that authority in us for another twelve months' period, not only without expense to ourselves, but also in some cases with actual profit. And when that can be done in the name of loyalty to and in the defence of the Empire, there is not very much to be said; the proposal is naturally a winner. I am not so sure that the country at large will look on it quite as favourably, but we only hope that it will. After all, I will follow the lead of the hon. member for St. John City, and I will take the liberty of disagreeing with the hon. member for Essex in intimating that the constitution is merely a scrap of paper, to be disregarded whenever Parliament sees fit. The constitution, it seems to me, should not be lightly amended; should not be amended without good reason. No doubt when the Government comes forward with their measure for extending the life of Parliament, they will be able to show good reasons. They certainly can scarcely contemplate following the idea of the hon. member for Essex, whom they have chosen as their champion, and treat the constitution of the country simply as a scrap of paper. They will, no doubt, have good reasons, and we shall be prepared to consider them when they are brought forward. The vastly more important question is in the words of the address:

> The question of the effective co-operation of Canada in the defence of the Empire and in the maintenance of this war, waged for liberty and lasting peace.

I am sure that we can support both the idea and the words in which the idea is expressed. But there may be difference of opinion as to what are the best measures, or as to what is the best method of carrying out those measures. As it appears to me, the members of this House, gathered from all parts of this Dominion, met here in Parliament at this time for the express purpose of giving their best advice and knowledge as to these measures, would be doing far less than their duty if they did not point out wherein—if such be the case—measures taken in the past have not been as effective as they should have been, in the hope that measures taken in the future will be more thoroughly effective.

The first consideration in connection with the carrying on of the war is naturally the question of finance, the question of money.

Without money munitions cannot be purchased, food cannot be supplied, men cannot be paid, transportation cannot be secured. Therefore, if we are effectively to take part in the prosecution of this war, it is necessary that our expenditure of money shall be economical as well as effective. We have not a dollar to waste in connection with this war. We need every dollar we have, and we shall need every dollar we can raise in order to carry on our share in the war to a successful conclusion. There may have been a time when members of this House, as well as people throughout the country, looked lightly upon the responsibilities of this war. I judge from the utterances of the Prime Minister, as well as from those of the right hon. leader of the Opposition, that that condition of mind does not now exist; that it is thoroughly understood in this House and out of it that we have to meet a tremendous responsibility and that it will need the best that we have in money, in men, in judgment and in efficiency if we are to come out of this struggle victorious. I am compelled to say, Mr. Speaker, that having regard to what has been placed before the country as the result of parliamentary investigation, as well as of judicial inquiry, we have not had that economy or even honesty in the administration of our funds in connection with this war that we were entitled to, that we ought to have had, and that, speaking of the future, we must have or we cannot expect to succeed. When the last session closed—I think it was on the day on which the session closed, or the day before—the Prime Minister made a statement bearing on the transactions that had been made public before the Public Accounts and other Committees of the House, and he reached the conclusion, as set down in Hansard, that as the results of these transactions, the country had lost a matter of $12,000. That was an insignificant loss, and if I could agree with him that that was the limit of the loss it would not be desirable or necessary to take the time of Parliament to refer to it. But, having gone into the matter somewhat carefully, it seems to me that the utterance of the Prime Minister was so far wide of the mark that it was unfair to the country, and it is not right that that utterance should go unchallenged.

Let me put the case as shortly as I can and in words that, I hope, will be understood. When war broke out the Government of Canada borrowed from the Government of Britain—they did not borrow it on the money market, but borrowed it from the Government of Great Britain—a sum of $50,000,000 for the purpose of equipping an expedition of 33,000 men. This money, you will remember, was not an ordinary loan, it was an extraordinary loan for an extraordinary purpose. It was, in fact, a loan in trust for one purpose and one purpose only. The investigations of the Committee on Public Accounts and other investigating committees which have already been published in blue-book form, convey the information, as I read them, that of all the purchases made out of that $50,000,000 for the equipment of that expeditionary force of 33,000 men, in no case was the article bought direct by the Government from the manufacturers or from the wholesale dealers, and in every case the price paid was from 25 per cent to 100 per cent higher than the fair wholesale or manufacturer's price. Of the sum of $50,000,000, at least one-half or $25,000,000 must have been used for the purchase of munitions and supplies; and if we can place the average overcharge at not more than 25 per cent, we find that the people of this country paid $6,000,000 out of that $50,000,000 of trust funds in undue profits distributed amongst the political friends of the Government in power; that Government on whose behalf the hon. member for Essex (Mr. Wilcox) demands, with all the eloquence of which he is capable, that they be not criticised for their conduct of affairs since war began, on pain of the accusation of disloyalty against whoever ventures such criticism. I hope, that what occurred in those early days of 1914 has not occurred since, that it is not occurring now, that it will not occur in the future, because I say that this country of Canada, with the backing of the credit of Great Britain, cannot successfully prosecute its part in this war to a conclusion and stand such an enormous strain of improper expenditure which, after all, are the moneys of the people, upon which they must pay interest and principal to the last cent.

There is a matter that is even more directly important than that of money, and that is men. We are proposing to put in the field 500,000 men. It is not a man too many. Every man is needed, and he is needed now. We have already enlisted something less than one-half that number. The country has responded marvellously, when we consider the pacificist principles under which many of us were reared. It is marvellous that our people have responded as they have to the call to war. But when we have taken one-quarter of a million of our men we have cut fairly deep, and to get another quarter of a million we will have to cut to the bone. I assume from what has been said here that there is no intention on the part of the Government to introduce the principle of conscription. I am not going to discuss that point seriously. I do not intend to find fault with the Government on that ground, because I realize that in the situation in which Canada is there would no doubt be serious difficulties in introducing that principle. But I hope I may be permitted to express my own individual opinion as to the matter of national military service, and I wish to say that in my humble opinion, with the world in arms and with the world having adopted the principle of universal military service, for a single nation to refuse to adopt, or to fail to adopt that principle, is to leave itself at a very serious disadvantage. My own opinion is that when world conditions are as they are —and we have the evidence that it does require the last man and the last dollar— it is the part of wisdom to make preparation for that condition in good time. And while I do not suggest at the moment that it would be advisable for the Government of the day to undertake that policy, for it is a dangerous business to swap horses while crossing a stream, this condition must be kept in mind. We entered this war on the voluntary principle, and, as I see it at present, we had better see it through on the voluntary system. But my opinion is that if we are successful in seeing it through we then ought to adopt the principle of national military service.

My own opinions and views are not, however, the important question at the present time. The important point is that we have undertaken to find half a million men for active service in this war, and that as I said, we will have to cut to the bone in order to get them. There have been complaints about difficulties in recruiting. There certainly have been difficulties in securing that measure of enlistment in certain parts of the country that is absolutely necessary. I have seen in the newspapers arguments, speeches, editorials, in which those who did not enlist were held up to abuse and discredit. Recruiting meetings have been held, and recruiting compaigns carried on in various parts of the country. It is not for me to criticise what has been done by other people. I will just say this: that that part of the country from which I come is I believe conceded to have given the largest number of enlistments in proportion to the population, of the Dominion, and in that part of the country, so far as I am aware, there has never yet been a recruiting meeting held; there has never been any abuse of men who do not enlist; there has been none of those extraordinary efforts which I see are being put forth in other parts of the country. May I say this: at such a time as this when men are being asked to engage in a war such as the world never saw before, it is necessary that they should feel and realize the tremendous issues that are at stake, and their personal responsibility in regard to these issues. We have had a very gratifying response I say, to the demand for enlistment in our part of the country. That, I believe, is because those who have gone west, who have separated themselves from their families at home are, first of all, away from family ties; next they are men who have a sense of individual responsibility, otherwise they would not have struck out for themselves. The pioneer, necessarily, has a greater sense of individual responsibility than the man who is not a pioneer; and because of that fact, because of that sentiment, we have been able to get the response that has been made in our part of the country. What I think is necessary throughout the country—if I may be pardoned for saying so— is to impress upon the minds of the young men that sense of personal responsibility, to impress them with the tremendous character of the issues, and to secure their appreciation of the fact that it is upon the shoulders of the young men that the burden of war must necessarily rest.

Besides that, there are material considerations which affect the case. When you say to a young man who has no ties, and is free to go as a soldier, "it is your duty to enlist," he may say "I am willing to go, but first of all I sacrifice my present employment or expectations and next, if anything happens to me and I survive, to what extent will this country show its gratitude to me for the sacrifices I have made."

I hold in my hand a pamphlet issued by certain people in Toronto, Frank Darling, chairman; Hume Blake, C.A. Bogert, Ven. Archdeacon Cody, Pres. R. A. Falconer, U. of T.; J. J. Gibbons, Col. Gooderham, W P. Gundy, Col. W. C Macdonald, Most Rev. N. McNeil, Alexander McPhedran, M.D., Hon. Mr. Justice Masten and E. R.

Wood. This document is issued for the purpose of arousing public interest in the matter of securing adequate provision for disabled soldiers. The title is: "A plea for just provisions in the Pension Act for totally or partially disabled Canadian soldiers, more especially those in the lower ranks." I shall not weary the House by going into details more than to point out that here is a committee of most responsible men in the chief city of the province of Ontario who feel so strongly on this subject that they have issued this pamphlet at their own expense calling for the assistance of members of the House of Commons or of anybody else who may have influence in securing more adequate consideration for the soldiers who have gone to the front and have been disabled. They say:

> The scale of pensions as now fixed by the Government is too low for the rank and file, particularly in regard to those totally incapacitated from earning a living. . . . The case of the single man is much less satisfactory than that of the married man.

Then they go into details with which I will not trouble the House. But there is one feature to which they draw attention, and to which I wish to draw the attention of the House. They say:

> Another plan, which some have had in mind, is that the inadequate pension now contributed by the Government should be augmented by means of public subscriptions. Such action, however, would be a mistake in every way. It would be an admission that the Government of Canada is unwilling properly to maintain the wounded and disabled soldiers who have made the utmost sacrifices to serve and defend the Empire. It would, besides, place upon a portion of the community a burden which should be borne by the whole. There would arise, moreover, a tendency to regard it as a charity, whereas the payment of a pension honourably earned is a matter of public justice. It is therefore, necessary to state with emphasis, that the duty of supporting the disabled men should, and must, be undertaken solely by the Government, and that whatever is necessary for this purpose must be paid out of the revenues of the country.
> We should at once face the fact, that while the burden will be cheerfully undertaken by a grateful country it will not be a light one. It could not be left to the chances of public appeals from time to time on behalf of men who have established a permanent right to public support. For twenty, thirty, forty, and in some cases, even for fifty years, this support must be given, and it must be drawn from a source absolutely stable and secure. We owe our defenders no less than this. We must save them from both the humiliation and the uncertainty of public charity, and give them permanent and adequate security from want, paid them not as a favour, but as a right, for it would be an unpardonable insult to a body of brave men if the payment of a pension carried with it the faintest trace of charity or the least suspicion of patronage.

Now, Sir, I regret that the Government should have issued a scale of pensions for disabled soldiers that calls for such comment as is here made by the Toronto Committee. I endorse every word that I have read, and I wish to point out that, if we are to deal fairly with our young men, before we call them slackers or shirkers, we should convince them that we are prepared to do what is right and fair by them in case they suffer the terrible sacrifices that must necessarily come to many of them under the conditions of modern war. We have a duty to perform here as well as they have there. Ours is just as important as theirs.

There is at the present time the matter of dealing with the disabled men as they come from the front. I am prepared to question the Government's policy in regard to that. They have seen fit to call together representatives of the different provincial governments and to make some sort of an arrangement that certainly does not appeal to me, evidencing as it does a disinclination to take that responsibility on the shoulders of the National Government that should be taken in the case of national service. There seems to be an attempt to shoulder the responsibility off on to the provinces, on to the municipalities, on to somebody or something else than this Federal Government. Canada is a nation. These men have served and sacrificed for the nation as well as for the Empire and the Government of this nation has no right, and should under no circumstances attempt, to shoulder off any part of their responsibility to these men. It is not fair and it is not in the interest of securing that enormously greater enlistment that we must get if the proposals of the Government are really made in seriousness.

I have one or two cases that I will mention that have appealed to me very strongly. A private of the Tenth Battalion named Fox, it was reported to me, had arrived at Stettler. He had lost an arm. He had been given transportation from Quebec to Stettler. He was discharged at Quebec, and at the time I was informed in regard to him he was not in receipt of any pension, and he was an object of charity to the people of the town of Stettler. Another man named St. Pierre who had volunteered from the town of Vermilion, or some town east of Edmonton, was given his ticket from Quebec and $7. He had a brother resident at Vermilion, or at the town to which I have referred. He was able to reach his brother, and at the time I heard of him that was all the consideration he had received at the hands of the Government. I saw a boy, not more than twenty years of age, a great big fine-looking fellow, who was blinded. He was at Lloydminster. He told me that he had begun to study the Braille system for the blind in the old country and that he had been given $100 and shipped home to his father. That was his position when I saw him. Probably these things are being remedied now—I hope they are—but there are such cases to be found all over this country. This is a condition that is inexcusable, that is not to the credit of the Government, and that must militate seriously against recruiting for the contingents that are required.

On motion of Mr. Oliver, the debate was adjourned.

At six o'clock the House adjourned without question put, pursuant to rule.

Thursday, January 20, 1916.

The House met at Three o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

WRECK OF THE PILOT.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. GAUVREAU: I would ask the attention of the Postmaster General and the Minister of Marine and Fisheries to a telegram which I received last night. The matter will be more interesting to the Postmaster General perhaps, as he was a party to changing the ships that cross the St. Lawrence between Riviére du Loup and Tadousac. The Telegram is as follows:

Rivière du Loup, Jan. 19, 1916.

C. A. Gauvreau, M.P.,
Ottawa, Ont.

The pilot grounded on Red Island last night and the Mahone has gone to her rescue.

Dr. Parrot.

I should like to know if the Postmaster General has any information on this subject, and especially whether the Mahone has been successful in her mission.

Hon. T. CHASE CASGRAIN (Postmaster General): Up to the time I left my office to-day my attention had not been called to any news having been received in the Department on this subject, but I have just had placed in my hands a despatch from Mr. Thom, one of the members of the Quebec Ferry Company, the owners of the Pilot, as follows:

Quebec, 20th January, 1916.

Hon. T. Chase Casgrain, Postmaster General,
Ottawa.

Pilot wrecked Tuesday, Red Island. Very important immediate action. See telegram to Mr. Johnson, Deputy Marine, for particulars. Please hurry them. Passengers and crew in danger. Forced to hire Mahone as they did nothing and she was dismantled.

John S. Thom.

Immediate action will be taken, of course, to afford every aid that is possible.

Mr. GAUVREAU: I hope the Postmaster General will give us the facts later, especially as to whether there has been any loss of life.

SUPPLY OF MUNITIONS FROM CANADA.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. CHARLES MURPHY (Russell): I desire to ask a question of the Prime Minister. Among the press despatches in yesterday's Canadian newspapers there appeared the following:

New York, January 19.—A cable to the New York Sun from London under yesterday's date says that in reply to a question in the House of Commons this afternoon, Lloyd George, Minister of Munitions, said that American munitions were still coming to England. He added that the fact that American munitions were still coming to us is a triumph for the Morgans and not for Canada.

In view of the very meagre nature of the despatch, and because it seems to carry with it some reflection upon Canada, I would ask my right hon. friend if he is in a position to amplify it, or to give the House any information in regard to it.?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN (Prime Minister): I have not seen the despatch and do not know anything about it. I should greatly doubt the accuracy of the report. It is not in consonance with what Mr. Lloyd George said to me during my visit last summer.

REPORT.

THE GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH.

ADDRESS IN REPLY.

Consideration of the motion of Mr. Alfred Thompson for an Address to His Royal Highness the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, resumed from Wednesday, January 19.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I observe in Hansard that at your suggestion, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) retracted an expression he had used. It was suggested by you that I make a similar retraction and I take pleasure in doing so.

Hon. FRANK OLIVER (Edmonton): When the House adjourned last evening I was discussing the measures mentioned in the speech from the Throne to be brought forward by the Government in relation to the prosecution of the war. I presume, of course, that these measures will have reference to the increase of Canada's war contributions to half a million men. I desire to place before the House to the best of my ability the views I hold in regard to the best means to be followed to assure that increase of our overseas forces. I am bound to take for granted, and the House is bound to take for granted, that when the Prime Minister made the announcement that Canada's overseas forces would be increased to half a million men, and made that announcement only twelve days before the opening of Parliament, he did so because of the recognized urgency of the proposed action. We must all recognize the propriety of the increase of Canada's overseas forces, and the immediate and urgent need of that increase. These things also we must recognize: that if increase is to be effective, it must be made for the coming summer, and that the rate of enlistment and of preparation must be greatly accelerated throughout this Dominion or that expectation cannot be realized.

I hope that the conditions of last winter will not be repeated. At the beginning of last winter in Canada, and I am afraid throughout the allied countries, the impression was that we were winning, and the winter passed without adequate preparation for the spring campaign. On the other hand, the alliance of the central powers spent the winter in active organization and preparation, so that when they took the field in the spring the condition was absolutely changed. In the fall there was a disrupted and defeated Austria; in the spring, there was a thoroughly reorganized and effective Austria, and the combatant forces of the central powers had been increased to that extent. With the beginning of the present winter direct communication has been established between the Germanic and the Turkish allies, and we may be very sure that, as last winter was spent in reorganizing Austria, so this winter will be spent in reorganizing Turkey; and we must expect that with the spring the allied powers will have to face an enormously augmented and comparatively efficient array. It is in the last degree necessary that we and our allies should meet that contingency, which we are certainly assured of, by adequate preparation, in the increase in the numbers of our men, in the supply of their munitions, and in the efficiency of their arms. When we recall the speeches made by the Minister of Munitions in Britain, Lloyd George; when we recall the urgent utterances of Lord Kitchener, Minister of War, and, above all, when we refer to the apeal of the King himself to his subjects throughout the Dominions, we must realize that this is a case of the utmost urgency, and that if Canada's aid is to be effective it must be promptly rendered. I am bound to assume, therefore, that it is not the intention of the Government to continue warlike preparations at the rate that has been followed during the past months. As I said yesterday, if we are to have this increase in our forces, we must go deep into the body of our people; we must arouse their souls as they have not yet been aroused. The campaign that has been made in the past will, in some way or other, have to be increased in effectiveness, or the promise made by the Prime Minister of Canada, without the responsibility of Parliament, will not be implemented at the time when it must be to be effective. So, Mr. Speaker, as it appears to me, it is desirable, in the discharge of the duty that every member of this House owes to his country and to the Empire, that we should freely and fully state the conditions that seem to tend against a more rapid enlistment, and, at the same time, speak on behalf of conditions that would tend towards that more rapid enlistment.

In order that my own position may be clear, I may say that I took occasion yesterday to speak of the proportion of enlistment in the province from which I come. May I be permitted to go further, and to say that, so far as my information goes, the constituency that I have the honour to represent has sent into the overseas forces of Canada a larger number, and a larger number in proportion to its population, than any other in the Dominion. I spoke yesterday of some of the reasons for this being the case so far as our new settlers were concerned, and, for fear that I be misunderstood, may I also make mention of the fact that whatever may be the case in other parts of the Dominion, in that constituency and vicinity the native-born population have not been behind any other section of the community in their response to the call for service. Twenty and twenty-five years ago there was only a small resident population in Edmonton and vicinity, and, as is natural in the development of a new country, there have been many changes in that resident population. That part of the resident population, therefore, that was there twenty and twenty-five years ago is necessarily very limited, and of that small population I recall that six families have sent three sons each, that fifteen families have sent two sons each, and that of the handful of native-born people who are there, at least one hundred have up to date given their services to the Empire overseas. So that, Mr. Speaker, the House will understand that any remarks I make are not made because there has been any lack of response to the call up to the present time in that part of the country from which I come. But that response has been of such a character that perhaps I may claim to realize more thoroughly than some other members how deep the cutting will have to be in our remaining population in order to meet the demand for another quarter of a million men.

I was speaking yesterday of the hindrances, as I understood them, to recruiting that arose because of the inadequate pension list that was provided in the case of maimed or disabled soldiers. I brought to the attention of the House the opinion of a committee of very responsible men in the city of Toronto. There could be nothing more clear or distinct than their expression of opinion—an opinion that must be coincided in by every man who gives the matter fair attention. While we may use patriotic language and flamboyant expressions, we must recognize that if we call on the young man to give his prospects, his limb, possibly his life, to the cause of the country, it is only right and fair that the country should acknowledge its share of the obligation and deal with that man liberally, fairly and ungrudgingly. I spoke of cases where maimed men had been discharged at Quebec, cut off the pay-list, not put on the pension-list, given a discharge, a railway ticket and a few dollars to take them home, and made a charge on their friends and relatives for the time being. I hope that that condition has been remedied. It was not fair to allow that condition to exist and to have the slur thrown upon the young men of our country that they are not doing their duty, when this Parliament or this Government has not done its duty by them. Let us have fair play on both sides.

In this connection let me say that I saw in the newspapers a short time ago something that was very discouraging to me. It is a fact that in a war waged as this present war is being waged, by new means and new methods such as never were used before, there have come into existence new conditions of disablement; and among those conditions is what is called shock, physical or mental shock, resulting in a greater or less degree of insanity. It must be assumed that if a thoroughly robust man, as these men are thoroughly robust before they enter the service, has, by reason of temperament or special conditions suffered from mental or physical shock so that his mind is to some extent deranged, there ought surely to be every reason that under proper treatment, with fair consideration he will in time make a complete recovery. I was astonished to read in a newspaper just the other day that it was contemplated that these men should be consigned to lunatic asylums. I hope that the Government will realize their responsibility in this, and will see that other arrangements are made than to simply treat these men as ordinary lunatics. They should not be placed in a position that, in the first place, is degrading and not warranted, and in the next place, would in all probability prevent the ultimate recovery that under fair circumstances, may reasonably be expected.

There is no doubt that whatever pension list may be provided, in the case of helpless men who have no relatives—and we are appealing for his services to the young man who has no relatives—the country should assume the responsibility of absolutely caring for those men in institutions properly equipped and properly conducted. We knew nearly eighteen months ago that we were at war. It is more than a year since our men began to be maimed and killed. We have had a session of this Parliament since that time, and although at the last session of Parliament, at the suggestion of the Government, we voted many many millions for public works in this country, so far as I am aware there was not one dollar voted for the establishment of institutions of the character I have mentioned, and which it is certain are a first necessity to meet the conditions that must arise out of war, and in some measure discharge the obligations of this country to these men who render such public service at such awful cost. The erection of such institutions would show to our young men, to whom we look for military defence, that the country recognizes sacrifice made and is prepared to deal with them honourably and generously in consideration of their sacrifice, doing the best that can be done—and even that best is but a poor return—for the sacrifice they have been called upon to make.

There is another branch of this subject with which I propose to deal, and in relation to which I may find myself not in accord with a majority of the members of the House. But I am here, on my conscience, to deal as best I can with the conditions that surround us, and I propose to deal with that question as well. There is something that is dearer to a man than his own life or limb, dearer to him than his country, and that is his wife and children. If we were able to secure our military requirements from amongst those of our people who have not either wife, or children, or other dependents, that would be well. We have not been able to do that in the past, and much less will we be able to do it in the future. We have had to accept the services of married men in very large proportion in order to secure the requisite number of enlistments. If we are going to call for another quarter of a million men we must certainly depend more and more greatly on those who have the ties of wife or child. If we are asking a man who has dependents to give his services, his limb, or his life, for his country, then his country, in fairness and in common sense, is called upon to make reasonably adequate provision for those dependents. That the country has not done up to the present time. A scale of separation allowance and assigned pay has been made out, which, from the day it was made out, was admitted to be inadequate for the purpose that was intended to be met. It never was considered to be adequate to the proper support of the dependents of the soldiers who had enlisted. From the beginning it was intended that this sum supplied by the country should be supplemented by what is called the Patriotic Fund, that is to say, sums of money raised by public subscription. I am quite aware that the demands of the Patriotic Fund have been generously, even enthusiastically met. All credit to those who have contributed to that fund. That is not the point. It is not the individual citizen who owes the soldier the maintenance of his dependents, but the country, and the country should discharge that debt. It should not be left to the individual citizen, his benevolence, his generosity, his patriotism, or whatever other word you may see fit to use.

I am quite aware that no matter what amount of separation allowance had been fixed, there would always arise incidents in which there would be room for the exercise of benevolence and patriotism in assisting dependents of the soldiers who might be specially unfortunate. In cases of sickness, in cases of fire, in cases of many accidents, there would always be a call for the benevolent and patriotic to go to the assistance of dependents of the soldiers. There is, therefore, good reason why there should be a patriotic fund, but there is no good reason why the patriotic fund should have had from the very beginning to bear a definite portion of that burden which properly rests on the shoulders of the country. It is not creditable to this country that we should take that position. I have heard the hon. gentleman who is the president of the patriotic fund give reasons for that fund, stating that the scale of living was different in different provinces, and that the patriotic fund, under non-Governmental administration, permitted an elasticity that was to the benefit of all concerned. I do not agree at all that it is necessary to take the matter out of the hands of the Government in order that the allowances for dependents may be fitted to the conditions of the province in which they live. It is surely a well-known fact that the cost of living is greater in some provinces than in others. The Government is as well aware of that as any body else, because to-day in the scale of pay allowed by the Government to many of their employees, a difference is made to meet that very condition. Now, what can be done in the case of the employees of the Government can be done just as well in the distribution of maintenance allowances for dependents now undertaken by the patriotic fund.

There is a feature of this case which is difficult to deal with without possibly giving offence. I wish to be understood as not desiring to give any offence, but as desiring to get at the very bottom of the motives that govern men when they are offering their services to their country. I say, and it cannot be contradicted, that the man who leaves a wife and family is not as well satisfied to leave that wife and family partially dependent upon the benevolence, the generosity or the patriotism of the individual citizens of the country as he would be to leave them to benefit by a fixed allowance coming directly from the treasury of the country. Perhaps you think that that makes no difference; that if they get the money it makes no difference where it comes from. That is the very point, Mr. Speaker; they are not getting the money. The allowances that were fixed when the first contingent was enlisted, the allowances from the patriotic fund, and the method of distribution that was adopted when the first contingent was enlisted having, for good reason or bad, I know not, been changed, so that the man who enlisted and was told that his dependents would get a certain separation allowance from the Patriotic Fund, finds to-day that they are not getting that amount, and that they are not getting it on the same conditions which obtained in the first place. I can only call that a breach of faith with the soldier, who, when he gave his services and signed the book, had no string attached to his service. His service had to be to death if he were called upon, and I say that the needs of his dependents should be met according to the terms arranged at the beginning, and that there should be no withdrawal for any reason whatever. This country has the money to pay for munitions and arms, and surely it has the money to pay for the support of the dependents of the men who use these arms and munitions. If it has not the money, or if it has not the generosity to employ the money in that way, then we in this Parliament of Canada are not the men who should call in question the loyalty of our citizens because they do not volunteer in larger numbers.

I am suggesting, and suggesting very strongly to this House and to the Government, without desiring to make charges of any kind against the Government, or to hold them responsible particularly for what has taken place—I am pointing out to them the desirability of revising, and revising at once, the conditions in regard to allowances for the disablement of soldiers, the conditions in regard to soldiers when they have returned from the front, and the conditions and allowances in regard to the support of the dependents of those soldiers. When they are calling for another quarter of a million of men, my suggestion to them is that the first thing they should do is to establish beyond any question the attitude of the people of this country at large as represented by the Government and by Parliament; to establish their appreciation of, and gratitude to the men they are calling upon to serve. It is not fair, Mr. Speaker, that such a large proportion of the support of dependents should rest upon benevolence. because it comes to this, that the benevolent or patriotic citizens carry the burden, and those who are not benevolent and who are less patriotic do not carry the burden. That is not fair, and that should be adjusted so that whether they will, or whether they will not, the population of Canada generally will bear their share of that burden according to their means under our system of taxation.

I have here a most illuminating document on that point. It is bulletin issued by the Canadian Patriotic Fund on October 15, and it gives a list of places in the province of Ontario that have contributed to the fund. It gives the name, the population, the amount of the contribution, and the amount per head. I think nothing could make it more clear that the support of the Patriotic Fund does not rest equally upon the shoulders of our people, as it should. Collingwood contributed $1.12 per head; Barrie contributed 28 cents per head; Oshawa contributed $2.63 per head, while Walkerville contributed $11.18 per head. Not to weary the House, I need only say that the variation in these contributions per head at the different points establishes beyond question the point that I make, that this is a levy absolutely unfair by which the unwilling gain, and the willing pay the cost. When we are increasing our enlistment of men so enormously as we are proposing to do, in the first place, we must change the conditions in regard to the Patriotic Fund or we will not get the enlistment and, in the second place, I am afraid that those who have been bearing the burden so far will become weary in well doing, and that the Patriotic Fund will actually fail of its purpose when it is called upon to meet the enormous charge that it must necessarily be called upon to meet if this enlistment is successful.

There is another feature of the case that I think should be drawn to attention, and it is that while nominally these contributions are contributions of patriotism and good will, in a very large proportion of cases they are forced contributions. In a number of cases, the city or the county levies a tax upon the people in order to raise the whole or a portion of the money that is expected from that town or county. That is fair as far as it goes, but if it is fair for the county or the city to levy a general tax for its contribution to the Patriotic Fund, why is it not just as fair and just as right for the Parliament or the Government of Canada to levy the necessary amount by the ordinary process of taxation? There is another way in which money is raised and it is this: An employer of labour will call his men together and will say: We are called upon to make a contribution to the Patriotic Fund. The men are expected to contribute so much out of their pay. Of course, they do not have to contribute, but they can lose their positions if they do not contribute; and I am under the impression that if this contribution from the town of Walkerville were looked into carefully it would be found to be identically, or in a large measure, of that class. Certainly there are many other cases in which this is the fact. It is not, as it is represented to be, a free contribution, the evidence of patriotism or benevolence; it is in large measure, a forced contribution and certainly it should not be levied in that way.

There is something besides the maintenance of the soldier himself or the maintenance of his dependents. There is the question of the efficiency of the soldier and of his weapons. We may enlist 500,000 men before the spring, but unless these men are adequately armed and unless they are trained in the use of the arms put into their hands, their assistance in the struggle during the coming summer will be of little value. This is a matter of the highest and greatest importance. It may be that what I desire to say will be resented and it will be said that I am giving information to the enemy. At this period of time and in this condition of affairs, it is important that we should know what our position is. That we should see that optimism is replaced by efficiency and if there is no other way to arrive at it then inefficiency must be exposed. We have 50,000 men on the battlefield in France and Flanders, we have 60,000 men training in England, I believe, to take their places on the battlefield, and we have 120,000 men in Canada also preparing to take their places on the battlefield. Unless these men are armed and equipped and trained in the use of their equipment and weapons they are not of value in deciding the conflict that is now in progress. It was not long after the first great battle had been fought that it became known to Canada that their men went into that battle inefficiently and insufficiently equipped as compared with their opponents. We lost an enormous number of men in the early battles in Flanders and we lost these men in large measure because they had not an adequate equipment of machine guns. The battle of Langemarck took place in April. I read in October the statement made by the right hon. the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden) in the city of St. John, in which he said that machine guns which had been ordered at the beginning of the war were then being delivered, and I read shortly afterwards a statement by the hon. Minister of Defence (Sir Sam Hughes) in which he said that they were about to be delivered. Have these machine guns been delivered yet? Are our 50,000 men in the trenches in Flanders properly equipped with machine guns, are our 60,000 men in Britain because they have not got machine guns to enable them to take their places in Flanders? Why is it that we have 120,000 men in Canada instead of over in Britain or Flanders?

I spoke a little while ago of the difficulties of recruiting. Let me say that when you appeal to the young man and you tell him that the fate of the Empire, in a measure, rests upon his shoulders, and you urge him to leave his employment, to enlist, to train for service, and when he sees a hundred thousand of his fellow-citizens who have left their employment, who have cut themselves off from their ordinary avocations, who are under arms, who are under orders, but who are not, as a matter of fact, doing anything for the effective decision of the contest, he will say: I will go when you need me, and you do not need me as long as you do not need these men whom you already have under arms. There is no question about the conditions being as I have said; we have it on the statement of the Prime Minister that that is the condition. And I say that such a condition does not tend to inspire our young men with the idea of the urgent need that exists for their services and their sacrifices, and that when we call for these men to leave their avocations, to give up their prospects, to risk life and limb in our service, it is surely necessary that they should understand that they are wanted and wanted immediately. Just let me mention an occurrence in my own constituency. Some time in the month of August last, if I remember aright, authority was issued for the raising of two battalions at Edmonton. Recruiting officers were sent to Peace river, and on the Grand prairie of Peace river, while the harvest was ripening, young men, homesteaders there, obeying what they believed to be the urgent call of their country, left their harvest in the field, arranged with their neighbours as best they could to take it off, and came down to Edmonton and joined the 66th Battalion. That battalion is in Edmonton yet. What occurred in the case of these men has occurred in the case of hundreds of others. It is evident, on the face of it, that when representations were made to these men, if such representations were made, and I take it that they must have been made, that they were urgently and immediately wanted, because that was the reason why they left their harvests in the field, there was no reason why these men should have been called away at that particular time, why they should not have finished their harvesting, arranged their business, and left when the business of the season had been concluded. Now, we have the spectacle of these men, who have left their belongings, doing military drill in the city of Edmonton, putting in barrack life under conditions which are necessarily irksome to men who have been taking the part of pioneers, and we cannot consider that such a method of handling the recruiting of our regiments tends to the enthusiasm necessary to secure success. There surely should be more judgment exercised in the enlistment of men to make sure that they are not called from their proper avocations unless and until they are needed, and when they are needed, then they certainly should be made use of.

I am going to make a statement now that appears to me to be a very serious one. I have spoken of the need of machine guns, but it must be admitted after all that in the wars of the present day the rifle is the weapon that finally wins. The ability to use the rifle effectively is the first necessity of the infantry soldier, and is the decisive factor in any war. This summer there were 8,000 men in camp at Calgary for brigade manœuvres and target practice. I am credibly informed that for the use of those 8,000 men at target practice there was a matter of sixty service rifles, and that those men did not get target practice to any extent that would reasonably tend to their efficiency in rifle shooting; that those men were armed with rifles which have not been considered suitable for active service, but which are used merely for drilling purposes, and that, as a matter of fact, those men had not at that time, and so far as I know, they have not yet been provided with rifles suitable for active service and for target practice. There are three regiments in barracks at Edmonton to-day, and there is a rifle range at Edmonton within the limits of the corporation. I discussed with the Minister of Militia last session the use of that rifle range. There is no good reason why it should not be used; but it has not been used, and although three regiments have been there since the beginning of the winter, they have not fired a shot for the improvement of their rifle practice. Is that fair to the country? Is it fair to the soldiers that when the call does come, they are sent across the ocean and into the trenches without having had that opportunity to improve themselves in that part of their military service which is of the greatest necessity, not only to protect their own lives, but to destroy those of the enemy, which after all is the purpose of war.

I have heard it said that we are getting men as fast as we can equip them. If that is the case, if we have not the rifles with which to arm those men, surely we ought to be busy making them or getting them made somewhere and somehow. We have had a rifle factory in Canada for many years. I do not know whether that is the only factory that is turning out rifles now or not. I do not know what the conditions in that respect are, but I do know this: that when we enlist a man for overseas service we should be prepared to put on his back a uniform, to put in his hands an effective rifle, and we should not lose a minute or an opportunity, from the day he enlists until the day he goes into the trenches, to render him proficient in the use of that rifle as well as in drill and in all military requirements. But we are not doing that, and I cannot consider it anything less than a crime against our soldiers, against our country and against our Empire, that the present condition exists.

If I am mistaken in what I have said, we are here in Parliament, and it is for those who know better to put me right and to put the country right. I shall be glad to know that what I have stated is not correct. But, Mr. Speaker, it is correct, and I very much regret that it is so. We have to-day, as I have said, three battalions at Edmonton. It is surely a part of the business of these men, not only to become expert in the use of the rifle, but also certain sections should be expert in the use of the machine gun. But, up to the time I left Edmonton, there was only one machine gun upon which these men could drill in the use of that weapon. The 51st Regiment had a Colt machine gun, but the other two regiments, I am credibly informed, were drilling their machine gun squads with dummies—as effective, somebody has suggested, as if they were working a mouse-trap without bait. These are conditions that are terrible, and they should be remedied and remedied now. It is necessary that they should be remedied now if we are to meet the demand that is being made upon the Dominion of Canada for this largely increased force of men. We have now three battalions in barracks in Edmonton, and we are enlisting two more. I fancy that the enlistment will be made. When I left, the 138th Battalion was up to over six hundred strong, and the 151st Battalion was recruiting rapidly.

There is one thing I wish to say with regard to the system of recruiting that is being followed in many parts of the country this year, as I have seen it stated in the newspapers. A town is told that if they will recruit twenty-five or more men, the men will be billetted in the town during the winter, and the town will get the benefit of their expenditure during the time they are so billetted. This may appeal to those who are military men. I am not a military man, I never was, and it certainly does not appeal to me as being the means of building up as rapidly as the urgency of the case demands—and there never was so urgent a case in the history of the world—an effective army to do credit to Canada and to defend the Empire during the coming summer. How much further ahead will these twenty-five men be in military efficiency after having been billetted at Government expense for six months of the present winter? Will they have gained anything in military experience, anything that will be of advantage to them when spring comes? I should hesitate to characterize such a proposition in the terms in which it appeals to me. It does not appeal to me as being a serious attempt to actually increase the numbers and efficiency of our overseas forces within a reasonable time. If it is a matter of getting so many more names on the rolls; no doubt it is a good way, but names on the rolls are not good enough at this time and under present circumstances; nothing is good enough except a man whose heart is in his work, who is prepared to make the supreme sacrifice, who has a weapon in his hands and knows how to use it, and is where he can use it effectively.

Is it because we have not enough money that we have not armed and equipped our men, or is it because we do not want to arm and equip them? What is the reason? It is past the understanding of man that those who claim such a superabundance of loyalty to the Empire, and express such a strong appreciation of the obligations of our country, should permit, on their responsibility, the existence of such conditions. I believe that if the Government will take hold of this matter of sending men overseas as they should, and as their announcement on New Year's Day was intended to indicate, if they will properly provide for the men in case of disablement, if they will adequately provide for their dependents, if they will supply the men with arms and equipment promptly and efficiently, and if they will use the men when they get them, I believe we can get the men. But I do not believe that we can get them, under the conditions that have prevailed up to the present time, within the time that we need to get them if they are going to be of actual service. We may get them two or three years from now, but two or three years from now is not soon enough. We want them now, or certainly when the campaign opens in the spring. That is when they are needed, and anything short of that is a dereliction of duty on the part of those who are charged with the responsibility of the government of our country at this time.

When war was declared, we were a country at peace. We boasted that we had enjoyed peace for a hundred years. We knew nothing of war; we cared nothing about war, and we did not want to know anything about it. So, when we wanted to raise an expeditionary force we certainly had difficulties in finding experienced officers; and when we raised our second force the condition was much the same. We have been at war for eighteen months; we have been represented on the battlefields by many thousands of our men, and I would think, Mr. Speaker, that it would be the part of wisdom if to-day we made use, in very much larger measure than we are doing, of the experience that has been gained by those men in the terrible ordeal of war itself. Surely a man who has gone through the crisis of an engagement has learned more of war in ten minutes than he could learn in ten years in ordinary civilian life. Surely the thousands of men that we now have in France and Flanders, rendering noble service to their country and to the Empire, men who answered the very first call of duty, surely these are the men to whom we may very well look to raise the battalions that we are now raising or are going to raise for the conflict of the future. I withdraw no credit from the man who, although he may have been in civilian life, desires to serve his country; who receives a commission, makes enlistment, and by reason of his position is able to secure the adhesion of other men to the cause. I have no fault to find with that man; I give him all credit. But at the same time we must recognize that what is wanted in this war is experience and efficiency, and when we have the men of experience and efficiency we are not doing justice to ourselves if we do not use those men, and use them to the limit. It certainly would be a graceful recognition of patriotism and merit if that were done. I respectfully urge upon the Government that they take this into their consideration, and that in the efforts they are to put forward in the future they take cognizance of the men of experience on the battlefield and use them here for the purpose of enlistment and the training of the new battalions.

I gathered from a statement made by the Prime Minister last session that it was the intention to keep in Canada as many men enlisted for overseas service as were on service across the ocean; that is to say, if we had 30,000 men across the ocean, we were to have 30,000 in Canada. I do not know what led the Prime Minister to that decision, but I want to say, first, that when a man enlists for overseas service he expects to go overseas; in all probability he would not have enlisted if he did not expect to go overseas. If it is a part of the policy of the Government to keep on this side of the water a portion of the men who have enlisted for overseas service they are not meeting the desires and hopes and intentions of the men who have enlisted, and, further, they are discrediting that spirit of sacrifice which was in the hearts of the men when they made their enlistment. It may be that it is considered advisable that there should be kept in Canada, while the Empire is in a state of war, a large proportion of the military force. I agree that it is desirable that while the Empire is at war there should be at all times a military force of considerable size in the Dominion of Canada, but I maintain that that force can be provided adequately and efficiently by the active militia, and that it is not necessary to keep on this side of the water a single man who has enlisted for overseas service. Every man who has enlisted for overeas service should, in due course, be sent overseas, and the active militia of the country should be given a status, both as to conditions and arms, that they have been deprived of since this war began. It has appeared to me that in the opinion of the Department of Militia, or of the Government, the men who formed the active militia were in some way shirking their duty, or preventing the enlistment of other men for overseas service. It is my view that that is an entirely mistaken apprehension; it is absolutely the opposite of the fact. When war broke out we had in Edmonton an infantry battalion and a mounted squadron. Those two bodies of active militia were the basis, first, of an infantry battalion and of a cavalry unit enlisted for overseas service, and, afterwards, of three or four other battalions enlisted for overseas service. We did not have less enlistment for overseas service because of these active militia regiments in Edmonton; we had more, because when the time came for the young man—who had acquired some little military spirit by reason of his association with the active militia—to enlist in another battalion for overseas service, he was ready to go into it, and we got another man in the local battalion. But the Government, instead of recognizing the service that these local battalions render, has taken away from them their arms; has taken away from them any recognition in the way of pay. They are there without uniforms; they are there without recognition of any kind; yet they have sufficient military spirit to meet for such drill as they can carry out without weapons. I say that when the Empire is at war, in the first place it is the duty of Canada to send every man to the theatre of war that it can send; and, in the next place, it is no less its duty to maintain on an active and efficient footing a sufficient body of voluntary militia in the country itself, properly armed, properly equipped, and ready for service in case service should be required. I take it that in a case such as we are in, every man that can be depended upon for his loyalty and is ready to handle a gun should have a gun to handle, so that whatever may come—and no man can tell what may occur—we shall be prepared as well as we can be for that eventuality. As I see it, our military business is conducted as though we had no interest except what is across the sea. Of course, that is our paramount interest and our most urgent interest, but that interest does not in any degree detract from the necessity of having an active militia force in the Dominion of Canada on a proper war footing, with encouragement to rifle associations or other organizations that will accustom our people to the use of weapons and to the idea of self-defence. I say that our condition should be recognized as a country at war, and that it should be recognized that we need a military force in the country; that that force should be composed of active militia men, who, for the time being, or by reason of circumstances, are not desirous of going overseas, so that, although every man we have who can and will go overseas may be in the fighting line, we will still have a sufficient military force within the country to hold our country against any eventualities that may arise. We never know what may occur. To be unprepared is to invite injury, to be prepared is the best possible defence.

Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) has been for most of his parliamentary career one of the most uncompromising fighters on the floor of this House; at all events, from the time he ceased to be a sturdy, independent pioneer from the West and became a member of the late Government, and extending, I think, to a period as far advanced as the time when the clouds of this war appeared in Europe. Uncompromising though he has been as a party warrior, and forceful though he has been as such, I say, and I say cheerfully, that his speech in the House yesterday and to-day did no discredit to his sense of duty now. It is either a fact or it is not a fact, that the character and tone of parliamentary discussion and of public discussion in general should be modified by the dangers and disasters that enthral us, and hang above us from Europe. I am glad that the hon. gentleman from Edmonton has ranged himself among those members of the Liberal party who agree that these considerations should have an effect, and he has demonstrated this by the character of the speech he has just delivered.

I noted with interest his closing sentence. He stated that to be unprepared was to invite attack, and that to be prepared was itself one-half the battle. May I be forgiven if I express regret that that sentiment did not seem to animate him more forcibly eighteen months ago.

I remember, however, a speech that the hon. member delivered on the 18th of November, 1912, shortly after his return from Europe. He then stood in his place in parliament and, in words of singular force and significance, warned this country and warned the Empire against the day of German aggression. The language he used on that occasion is language of which he need not be ashamed. He pictured the peril under which our country lay as comparable only with the old Napoleonic days when Europe trembled under the rod of a colossus and when Bonaparte was encamped at Boulogne. I think he would have been a prouder man now if he had adhered to the convictions that animated him on that day, and if he had guided his conduct in conformity with those convictions, and had stood behind the preparations he urged on the 18th of November, had stood behind the character of preparations endorsed by both the Government of his own country, and the Government of the Empire.

However that may be, those days are passed and I am prepared to remember now that, behind the errors and the vagaries that we think have characterized his public life, there has always appeared a firm foundation or background of British fidelity, exemplified, confirmed, and emphasized now by the fact, of which we are all proud, that two of his sons stand to-day enrolled as combatants under their country's flag.

I shall not undertake to comment as a member of the Government, on much of what the hon. member has said with regard to the conduct and equipment of the forces of Canada. An answer, in so far as an answer can be given to the specific complaint he makes, having regard to Imperial interests, can be better made by some member of the Administration more closely in touch with our military forces. I am aware that there are regiments in Canada whose men and officers feel that they have been unwarrantably delayed. I have in mind the very regiment mentioned by the hon. member, the 66th of Edmonton, which I had the honour to see myself only a few weeks ago, and which, so far as I could judge, appeared to be a regiment excellently well prepared. I know that they themselves would like, as many another, to be hurried more rapidly to the scene of conflict. But, we cannot forget that though complaint has been laid against the Canadian authorities in this regard, complaint in vastly greater volume has also been laid against the British authorities for the same thing, and we observe across the water men by the thousand, yes by the million, delayed month after month in England for one reason or another. I think it can be shown in Canada, as there, that the reasons that are behind that delay are good and sufficient, and, under the circumstances, unavoidable.

The hon. gentleman stated that the scale of pensions and the scale of allowances in Canada were inadequate, and he urged upon the Government, not only the enlargement of that scale, dealing more liberally with the dependents of the soldiers who fight our battles, but also that the funds from which that support is given should be afforded by the Canadian Government, and that we should not rely on public subscriptions for that purpose. Now as to the first phase of his complaint, that the scale of pensions and allowances is too small for this country, I have only to observe, as my information is, that the scale is the largest of all the twelve belligerent nations, that it is the most generous of them all. I observe this also, that the scale as fixed was laid on the table of this House some time before the close of last session, so that it was open to the observation and criticism of hon. gentlemen opposite, and the pages of Hansard will be searched in vain for a single question or a single criticism offered then. If hon. gentlemen thought that the scale was too small, that was the time to say so. Of course, if they now feel that it should be enlarged, it is only their duty to point it out; it is a matter that should engage the attention of the Government, and doubtless will, at the request of hon. gentlemen.

I was not present when the hon member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) referred yesterday to certain matters that particularly concern our part of the Dominion. However, I have had an opportunity of reading his remarks, and it may be worth while that I should make a little comment upon them. The hon. gentleman, in the opening part of his speech yesterday, called attention to the high ocean rates, which seem also to have disturbed the soul of the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley). The hon. member for Edmonton complained that although provision had been made, through the joint action of this Government and the Imperial Government, for the carriage of munitions of war in commandeered vessels to the Motherland, we had not pushed through the matter of procuring from the Imperial authorities the commandeering of vessels for the carriage of our wheat. It would doubtless be a considerable advantage—yes, an advantage amounting to millions of dollars—if by any action on our part, or by any action on the part of the Imperial authorities, we could have succeeded in reducing the rates on Canadian grain, and also on Canadian imports over the North Atlantic. But when the hon. gentleman complains that we should have insisted upon the British Government commandeering vessels under their control for the purpose of carrying grain, so as to be consistent with our design in getting them to commandeer vessels for the carrying of munitions, he fails to observe that there is a very clear distinction between the carriage of Canadian grain and the carriage of British Government munitions. It has been the policy of the Imperial Government, as I understand it—and I think the records throughout this war and previous to this war will confirm what I state—to commandeer British vessels for the carriage of British Government supplies, for the carriage of Government property, and Government property only. They have never commandeered vessels for the carriage of private property. Whether they are right in taking that position, or whether they are wrong, it is, at all events, a matter over which we have no control. But if we are disposed to criticise, I venture to offer these observations to hon. gentlemen opposite, and, indeed, to members on both sides of the House. I do not offer them as having been advanced directly by the Imperial authorities, for I would not be the one to receive them, but as observations that will appear clear to any one who desires to understand the situation. Were the British Government to commandeer their vessels for the carriage of Canadian grain, to be consistent, they would have to commandeer them also for the carriage of all other Canadian commodities—that would be only just to the Canadian people—and they would also be compelled to commandeer them for the carriage of all the commodities of all the dominions of the Empire. They could not deny to one what they granted to another, and to undertake that would be a very vast undertaking indeed. At all events, so far, it has not appeared to them to be their duty to do so. Furthermore, were they to undertake on behalf of the dominions of the Empire to commandeer vessels of British register, would it be any more than consistent to commandeer them for the carriage of private property belonging to or addressed to the British people. What would apply to one portion of the Empire would apply to all portions. I might go beyond that. Were the British Government constrained to utilize the sea power which has given them control of the waters of the globe and enabled them to protect shipping the world over, and enabled them also to commandeer vesels at their will—were they to utilize that sea power for the benefit of their own commerce, as opposed to the commerce of their Allies, it is not inconceivable that just complaint might arise. I shall proceed no further along that line, but I think I have suggested considerations which every one must think out for himself if he feels in any way constrained to complain of the treatment accorded to Canadian commodities in their passage over the Atlantic. It is of course too obvious to require expression that it is beyond the power of the Government of Canada to exercise a commandeering power over vessels on the North Atlantic.

Mr. KNOWLES: Will the hon. gentleman allow me to ask a question. I do not ask it in a partisan sense, but will the hon. member kindly tell us what the right hon. the Prime Minister accomplished along the lines of getting our wheat transported?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I will refer to that shortly. I only mention now that the Prime Minister himself explained that two or three days ago, but I have no objection to repeating what he said. What I was saying was this, that no power rested in this Government to exercise a commandeering power. When hon. gentlemen talk—I do not now refer to the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver)—when hon. gentlemen talk about the high rise in ocean rates, about the robbing of the Canadian people of many millions of dollars by the owners of the transportation interests, it is surely obvious that they ought to remember that the people of the United States—a country not of eight millions but of ninety million people—are also labouring under the same disadvantages in that regard as we are labouring under; and if that country, which surely ought to have power in this matter far transcending the power we can exercise, labours under the same disadvantage without serious agitation, surely under the stress of the war it is no more than just to ask that there be no agitation raised because we are compelled to do the same. There is no country on the face of the globe at the present time that is not compelled, under the conditions which obtain, to pay exorbitant transportation rates. These rates are not arbitrarily fixed by the steamship companies or tramp owners; they are fixed by the owners of commodities who offer the rates, and a vessel owner, or a steamship owner, has ever right to steer his vessel from one port to another, and if offered a higher rate to go to another port to accept it. If he is offered a still higher rate, he perhaps takes that. It is his business to get the highest rate he can, so that it is more correct to say that the rates are fixed by the desire of shippers to get the boats. These being the conditions, we have simply to do the best we can.

Now, I have been asked what has been done in regard to this matter. The Prime Minister has stated that it has engaged the attention of the Government, and that it particularly engaged his own attention on the occasion of his visit to Great Britain. The British Government, taking the course they have, adopting the policy that they have adopted in the matter of commandeering, there was only one other line of procedure possible on the part of this Government, namely to secure the release for the purpose of the carriage of Canadian commodities of as many vessels as possible; that is to say, to augment the number of vessels competing for trade in the North Atlantic and in that way to secure the diminishing of the ocean rates, or at all events, to prevent an aggravated advance of ocean rates to the greatest possible extent. In that the Prime Minister has been successful; in that the Government has been successful. A number of vessels—the figures were given by my right hon. friend—aggregating six or seven have been so released and so utilized and as a result of his efforts I am proud to say—I cannot vouch for the figures now but I will give them later on and have them right—Canadian grain this year—the year of the greatest production in our country—has been transported from the harvest fields over the railways to our ports, and through the ports of entry to the south, more expeditiously than in any previous year in our history. Thus the Government has secured transport to the markets of the world, resulting in a very considerable increase in the prosperity of this country.

While we complain of ocean rates, and while doubtless it is our duty to do everything in our power to have these rates reduced and to bring about conditions that alone will reduce them, it is only by the multiplication of vessels available that they can be reduced, until the time comes when it may be possible by the concerted action of the several countries to gain control of them. And while it is our duty to secure that reduction to the greatest possible extent, we must remember that it is impossible to say that the rate upon wheat means so much of a reduction in the price to the Canadian farmer. It is impossible to shut our eyes to the truth, that doubtless a part of the increased rate is paid b the consumer himself. The conditions that obtain in the trade are complicated, they vary from day to day, and it is only putting it moderately to say that without any question whatever a large share is paid by the consumer in European countries. I observed, during a period of two weeks the progress of prices in this country, and I noted in that two weeks that while the increase in the price in Great Britain was 15 cents a bushel the increase in ocean rates during the same time was 5 cents per bushel and the increase in the price in Canada was 10 cents a bushel. At all events, this evidence would clearly indicate that a very considerable portion of those high ocean rates are borne by the consumers of Great Britain. Doubtless a proportion of the extra cost of freight on traffic coming from Great Britain to Canada is also paid by us. They know that as well as we do, and in the face of that they adhere to their policy of leaving this matter to the general play of competition.

There is this consideration also that it is worth while for the people of Canada to bear in mind. Great Britain is supplied from Canada, the United States, Argentina and Australia. These are the chief sources of supply now because of the prevailing conditions as to Russian wheat. Canada and the United States are the nearest to the consuming markets; the Argentine and Australia are much farther away. Under ordinary conditions we have an advantage in ocean rates over our competitors of three, four, or five cents a bushel. Under the conditions that obtain to-day we have an advantage over these competitors of not three, four, or five cents a bushel, but of twenty, thirty or forty cents, per bushel. We are not the only ones to suffer. We have no desire to procure an undue advantage at the expense particularly of our sister colony of Australia, but we are not the only ones to suffer, and we suffer in far less degree than do these competing countries. It is no more than the truth to say that the very fact that these rates have been so high, and that we have had such an advantage over other countries that compete in the British market, that fact has been a factor not inconsiderable in enabling this country to secure the sale of a large part of its surplus in good time in the British market. It has not been an unmixed evil by any means. But let me be not misunderstood. I do not argue that high ocean rates in themselves are good, nor do I argue for a moment that it is not the duty of this Government in these times and at all times to exert the utmost of its power to secure a reduction. This is a year, however, when the world's crop of wheat transcends the records of the past, and when, consequently, the problem of securing an early market for the tremendous Canadian surplus is an aggravated problem, and therefore the advantage that we have secured by reason, indeed, of the high ocean rates is an advantage that we should appreciate and not minimize.

Having said that, I pass to make a few comments on the speech delivered yesterday and the day before by the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley). I regret that he is not in his place in the House. I was present throughout his address, except during a very few minutes when I was called out of the chamber, and in the course of it I came into collision with the hon. gentleman on several matters of importance. I am afraid it would be impossible, with any deference to truth at all, to say that the hon. member for St. John had conducted himself in Parliament with any regard whatever to the tremendous and appalling character of the events that overhang this country. He has delivered in this House not only the most bitterly partisan speech that we have heard in it since the war began, but he has delivered a speech that, proportionate to its length, has less foundation in fact than any speech that I have ever heard in this chamber. I am going to endeavour to expose to the House the artifices to which the hon. gentleman descended, and the devices which he adopted in order to secure what he thought was a party advantage, and I shall ask the House whether, in the exercise of these arts and devices, he conducted himself in a manner befitting an hon. member of this House in these times.

The hon. gentleman, in the course of his speech, made an attack on what is called the Shell Committee of Canada. He made a bitter personal attack upon the members of that committee, particularly upon the chairman of it, and upon Mr. Carnegie. I want it to be distinctly understood before I enter upon this subject, that I do not stand here as a sponsor of, or as one responsible for, the conduct of this Shell Committee. I am not here to attack the Shell Committee; I am not here to defend the Shell Committee; I am here to offer some remarks in regard to what they have done, in regard to their status and character, in regard to their responsibility, and in regard to our duty towards them. The members of the Shell Committee were named by the Government of Canada, and that was at the request of the Imperial authorities. It was done for the purpose of securing the manufacture of shells in this country for the Imperial authorities. The naming of them was done by this Government. They were constituted, on being so named, and having been constituted, they were placed at the disposal of the Imperial authorities and became a committee answerable to the Imperial authorities alone. Now, have I stated that emphatically and clearly? Upon their being named by us at the request of the Imperial Government, they became an Imperial Government committee, responsible to and answerable to the Government of this Empire. They conducted their business directly with the Imperial authorities. Communications passed from the Shell Committee to the Imperial Government and from the Imperial Government to the Shell Committee. Had they been in a position where we had authority over them, had they been constituted as a committee under a department of this Government, they would have been answerable to this Government; we would have had authority over them and we would have been responsible.

When the matter of contracts for shells in Canada came up, and when at the initiative of the hon. Minister of Militia (Sir Sam Hughes), the manufacture of shells was undertaken by this country, two courses of procedure were plainly available to the Government. One was to proceed directly under governmental authority or under agents of the Government in one way or the other, by a commission or otherwise, but directly under Canadian governmental authority, and take control of the shell manufacturing in this country and take the responsibility therefor. The other was to appoint a commission independent of this Government and to constitute that commission a British commission for the manufacture of shells in Canada independent of the Canadian Government. I apprehend from the speech of the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) that he thinks, when the parting of the ways confronted us, that we took the wrong course; that we made a false election, and that we should have taken in hand and made it our business to control the manufacture of shells in Canada, and that we should have made the commission, or department which undertook that control, responsible to the Government of this country. Well, if we had done so, if we had made that election and taken that course, then we doubtless would have been responsible. Then if errors were committed, we would have been the ones to answer for them; but at the same time we would have had control, and we would have been in the position to prevent errors from taking place. But had we taken that course, I think I can hear the speech that would have been made by the hon. member for St. John. I think I can hear the scraps that he would have read from the Liberal newspapers of Canada. I could write myself the article for the Liberal Monthly, that would be very appropriate if we had made such an election. Oh, they would have said, here is a Government that utilizes the war and the manufacture of munitions for its own advertisement; here is a government that takes under its own control the disposition of contracts, that has kept under its own arm the power to dispose of a contract here and a contract there at prices fixed by itself, that utilizes its power as a government to aggrandize itself politically to the disadvantage of the people, and with the purpose, at all events with the result, of splitting in twain the unity of this country in the cause of the Empire. Why, they would have said, any government that had the slightest regard for Imperial interests, any government that wanted to be fair between the two parties of this country, would have done what? Why, they would have selected experts; they would have selected business men; they would not have taken this thing under the eye and under the hand of politicians; they would have put business men into control and made them independent of government, and given them the disposition of the shell contracts. Would not that have been the speech of the hon. member for St. John? I have heard that speech from him time and again on other subjects. I have heard the Liberal press of Canada over and over again call for the very course that we took in regard to the manufacture of shells. We divorced the shell committee from the Canadian Government in the matter of responsibility; we made them a committee of the Imperial authority. I am not here to say whether they did wrong throughout or whether they did right throughout; they are answerable to the Imperial authorities for what they did. The Imperial authorities have so recognized; they have acted upon it; they have conducted investigations; they have made reports; they have 5 p.m. exercised their sovereignty over that committee; they have given their verdict. But the hon. member for St. John is not satisfied with the verdict. Why? Because it does not satisfy his own partisan ends for advantage in the politics of Canada.

Mr. PROULX: Does the hon. gentleman believe that the Shell Committee was divorced from the Minister of Militia?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have stated so. Why does the hon. gentleman doubt my belief?

Mr. PROULX: I am informed that the Minister of Militia procured a contract of $700,000 for the hon. member for Prince Edward (Mr. Hepburn).

Mr. MEIGHEN: Was it the hon. Minister of Militia who procured a contract for the firm of which the hon. member for South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) is a director? The evidence on these matters is too plain for any man, however dull, I may say, however stupid, to mistake. Whatever may be said about the conduct of the Shell Committee, this at all events can be said, that they have not conducted the distribution of contracts on any partisan basis. I repeat that; I invite a challenge. The hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Carvell) shakes his head. Now I make this challenge. For every company or every man he names belonging to the Conservative party who has got a contract, I will name him another belonging to the Liberal party. My offer stands good just as long as there is a shell committee. Now we will wait for my hon. friend's answer.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Come on.

Mr. SCHAFFNER: Speak loud.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The day before yesterday the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Hazen) said that in the very city from which the hon. member for St. John comes, 75 per cent. of the contracts went to the Liberals. When the hon. member for St. John asked for an instance, he gave the instance of McAvity Brothers and of the Phœnix Company. What was the answer of the hon. member for St. John? Oh, he says, you are out, the McAvity's got their contract from the Canada Car and Foundry Company, and, consequently, the Shell Committee had nothing to do with it at all; it was a Russian contract which they got from the Canada Car Company. Was that an honest statement to this House? The McAvitys got a contract; they got contracts aggregating over half a million dollars from the Shell Committee, and it was the same with the Phœnix Company. Was the hon. gentleman fair with Parliament? Was he fair with the country? Was he behaving himself in a manner befitting a member of Parliament at this time? I do not think the hon. member for St. John was unaware of the facts. There is no one who has lived through the last Parliament who does not know the close relationship that existed between that hon. member and the McAvity family. I have nothing to say against their getting contracts; but I have something to say against an hon. member who, from his seat in this House, tells us that an hon. member is wrong in stating that the McAvity Bros. got contracts of over half a million dollars but that the contract came from the Canada Car Company, when the fact is that they got contracts of over half a million dollars from the Shell Committee. Whether or not they got a contract from the Canada Car Company I do not know, and I have no way of finding out, but I do know that they had a contract of over half a million dollars from the Shell Committee.

The hon. member made another very interesting reference, too, in the course of his speech, and I am sorry that the hon. member for South Renfrew

(Mr. Graham) is not here to hear what I am about to say. This is really one of the most fascinating by-plays I have ever seen in Parliament. The hon. member for St. John quotes the Toronto Telegram. He has suddenly come to the opinion that the Toronto Telegram is a newspaper to be absolutely relied upon with regard to its political advice, and he presses that advice upon the Government. Here is the quotation he made:

Exploiting of war orders—Doings of middlemen—— one of the worst terms of contempt in the whole vocabulary of hon. gentlemen opposite.

—Proposition is up to Premier Borden, declares the Contract Record of Toronto.

Down in New York way they're still sending out circulars that tell of desirable investments created by filling war orders in Canada, says the Contract Record in this week's issue. One of the latest comes from Gilbert Elliott and Company. It advises clients to invest in Canada Foundries and Forgings Company, which has shops at Brockville and Welland.

I quote from yesterday's debate:

Mr. Pugsley: If I am not mistaken, Sir Henry Pellatt is president of that company.

Mr. Graham: No.

Mr. Pugsley: I may be mistaken as to that.

Mr. Graham: Yes.

Mr. Pugsley: I saw that there had been some denial of a statement of profits which had been put forth by a company with which he was connected.

Did you ever see hedging more skilful than that when he found he had been chasing the wrong animal? The hon. member (Mr. Pugsley) continued:

I will read the article from the Telegram, not knowing, of course, whether there was any contradiction of it or not:

'We are advised from sources upon which we can rely, that earnings for the past ten months ending November 1, 1915, are over $900,000, and that the monthly earnings are now running at the rate of $150,000, or equal to $1,860,000 per year, which after taking care of fixed charges, will amount to over 150 per cent per annum on the outstanding common stock.'

This is the instance selected by the hon. member for St. John as the greatest with which to denounce the iniquities of the middlemen, believing, as he thought, that Sir Henry Pellatt was president of that company, or at least as he stated he thought. But the hon. member who interrupted him, the hon. member for South Renfrew (Mr. Graham), could not let that go, because a director of the company is the hon. member for South Renfrew himself. The president of the company is a gentleman by the name of Weir, of whom I know nothing. But this is a company of which Hon. George P. Graham is a director, and it is the company which the hon. member for St. John cited as a hideous example of the conduct of middlemen, and as an example to demonstrate that the work of the Shell Committee brought shame to the cheeks of all Canadians.

I stated that I would have something to say about the devices adopted by the hon. member for St. John. I made a statement in opening this speech that the British Government had recognized from the beginning that this was their committee, and had dealt with it as such, and that at no time and in no sense was it an agency of the Canadian Government; that they had made investigations, that they had exercised superintendence, and that they were furnished with reports as a part of that superintendence. One of the men who came over representing the British Government, the personal representative of the Minister of Munitions himself, was Mr. Thomas, who was formerly a member of the Imperial House. Another representative since has been Mr. Hichens. Both of these gentlemen have made their reports. The hon. member for St. John referred to the verdict given by Mr. Thomas, and how did he do it? He stood in his place in this House and stated that Mr. Thomas had said that there were too much politics in the Shell Committee. Now, I affirm here—and the hon. gentleman has all this session to prove me wrong—that he cannot show that Mr. Thomas made any such statement. Then he went on to say that Mr. Thomas had said, "If I could lift the veil just a little." It is well to quote Hansard in these matters to get things right. Here is what he said, and I do not think that anything could better illustrate the parliamentary methods of the hon. member for St. John:

Mr. WILCOX: How did the Canadian price compare with the price that was paid in the United States at the same time?

Mr. Pugsley: I take the statement of Mr. Thomas, who says that the price was higher in Canada. Mr. Thomas is a gentleman who was sent out from England in consequence, I take it—

"in consequence, I take it."

—of the dissatisfaction which existed.

Mr. Meighen: Will the hon. gentleman take all of Mr. Thomas's statement?

Mr. Pugsley: I am quite willing to take all of Mr. Thomas's statement. Let my hon. friend take particularly Mr. Thomas's statement when he says that if he could raise the veil just a little—

There are no two inferences to be drawn from that—Mr. Thomas, the hon. gentleman said, had expressed the desire that he might be permitted to raise the veil just a little. I knew that Mr. Thomas had made no such statement, and so I said:

Mr. Meighen: Will the hon. gentleman quote that from Mr. Thomas's statement?
Mr. Pugsley: Yes.
Mr. Meighen: All right, bring it out.
Mr. Pugsley: I will do so.

And we all remember how he stood in his place so long trying to find it. I do not know whether he found it then or not. He went on:

I should like to oblige my hon. friend. I think it was in Montreal that Mr. Thomas made the statement; if my hon. friend will allow me, I will give it to him before I get through with my remarks. In that statement Mr. Thomas says also that he is a politician himself, and he rather conveys the impression that he found a great deal of politics in Canada in connection with the shell committee.

Making it clearer still that Mr. Thomas, the representative of the Government of Great Britain, had said in this country that he desired to, but could not, lift the veil, the lifting of which would show that there were a lot of politics in the Shell Committee, and that the result would be disastrous to the committee. No other inference is possible. Now a day passed, a day in which to forget the exact language that he attributed to Mr. Thomas. The next day the hon. member for St. John stands in his place and endeavours to fulfil his undertaking to quote these words from Mr. Thomas. I will read what he said on this subject on the 19th of this month:

I regret for another reason that my hon. friend the Solicitor General is not present—

That is just at the opening; I came in just as he got through with this paragraph:

—because last evening, when I called attention to the fact that Mr. Thomas had come out to Canada as the personal representative of Mr. Lloyd George to look into the question of the furnishing of shrapnel and high explosive shells in Canada, he made a careful investigation into conditions, and upon one occasion, in making a speech in the city of Montreal, I think—

There was no "think" to it before.

I think he used the words: 'If I raise the veil a little.'

Why did he leave out the word "could," after the twenty-four hours that intervened? He stated yesterday that the day before he had made the statement that Mr. Thomas had said," if I raise the veil a little." He did not say that Mr. Thomas had said, "if I could raise the veil just a little." It is just the difference between black and white. Mr. Thomas was explaining that he was raising the veil just a little, and was going to tell what he saw. And he did tell what he saw under the veil; he told it to the people of the Canadian Club, and quoting from the Montreal Gazette, I am going to read what he told them:

If I raise the veil a little, said Mr. Thomas, it will be on my own personal responsibility, and do not take it as coming from the Minister of Munitions. But, naturally, from my official position, I must have considerable inside knowledge of what is going on in Canada in the manufacture of munitions.

Then he proceeds to raise the veil a little, not to regret that he could not raise it at all. He proceeds to raise it; he tells what is under the veil, and I am going to read what he tells, and all of it, on this subject of the manufacture of shells. I will read it from the very paper from which the hon. member for St. John city himself read. I wonder why it did not occur to the hon. member for St. John, when he spoke about Mr. Thomas raising the veil, to tell what Mr. Thomas said when he did raise the veil. It would not suit him to do that.

Mr. Thomas goes on at some length without referring in any way to the manufacture of shells or to the Shell Committee. Then the report says:

With regard to munitions, Mr. Thomas said: I am in a position to tell you the Government desires—that is, the Imperial Government——to place further orders for the smaller shells, and also desires to place orders for larger shells, provided prices and conditions are satisfactory. The British Government was anxious to give Canada every preference, but had to consider three conditions: efficiency of ammunition, expedition in manufacture, and economy. As to delivery, Canadian manufacturers up to last June had been far behind, but had made great improvement since then, but even yet they were not always up to time.

A condition of affairs which the hon. member for St. John would doubtless attribute to the Canadian Government, and in respect of which he would entirely absolve the manufacturers.

As to efficiency of the shells, those which had passed inspection had turned out well. In this connection Mr. Thomas paid a warm tribute to the shell committee—here is the veil lifted, and this is the verdict:

—a warm tribute to the shell committee, and particularly General Bertram—the maligned of the hon. member for St. John——who, he declared, had placed the whole Empire in his debt for the manner in which he had devoted himself to the work. The committee had been criticised because manufacturers of shells sat on it, but he pointed out that if these were cut off it would be impossible to get experts on it at all.

The very feature of the Shell Committee which the hon. member for St. John denounced as corrupt and scandalous is the feature commended by the British representative, Mr. Thomas:

The shell committee is now about a year old, said Mr. Thomas, and I think the time has come when its work might well be revised. At my suggestion Sir Frederick Donaldson, perhaps the most distinguished expert on munitions in the Empire, is coming to Canada. He was chief superintendent of ordnance at Woolwich, but resigned to become Lloyd George's adviser. He will be here in a few days, and, I think, will be able to render a good deal of assistance in the manufacture of shells, and also in the manufacture of big guns.

Then, further, the report says:

With regard to economy, continued Mr. Thomas, that must be considered, and I may tell you the cost of shells in Canada has been higher than in competitive countries. It is complained that fat orders have gone to the United States, but I can assure you a big slice will be reserved to Canada as long as the price is fairly satisfactory. But prices so far have been higher here than in the United States or Great Britain, where any extra profits have been commandeered by the Government.

I want that sentence noted; this is from the Montreal Gazette, the paper from which the hon. gentleman quoted:

Prices so far have been higher here than in the United States or Great Britain, where any extra profits have been commandeered by the Government.

As a sample of the patriotic impulses of Canadian manufacturers, Mr. Thomas stated that recently Messrs. Baillie & Wood, of Hamilton, had undertaken to manufacture a million 18-pounder catridge shells at absolute cost. In the same spirit Hon. Frank Cochrane, Minister of Railways, had placed the Transcontinental railway shops at the disposal of the Imperial Government for the manufacture of munitions. They have done that, he said, without provision for profit to any one, and I thank the Canadian Government for the splendid spirit they have shown.

Mr. Thomas himself took the responsibility of raising the veil a little, and having raised the veil, in that speech he exposed to the people of Canada what was behind it—and I have read all that he said on the question of the Shell Committee.

Mr. E. M. MACDONALD: Will the hon. gentleman be good enough to tell us—I assume he knows—whether the Government's offer was accepted, and what was done in regard to these Transcona shops so far as the making of shells was concerned?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not think it was accepted at the time. As far as the Canadian Government was concerned, the statement of Mr. Thomas shows that it was made.

Mr. MACDONALD: What was done about it?

Mr. J. D. REID: There is a question on the Order Paper in regard to that; you will get the answer there.

Mr. MACDONALD: He might tell us now.

Mr. REID: You will get it when the question is answered.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I understand that it is a rule of order—the hon. member for Pictou likely knows this that one shall not refer to questions and motions on the Order Paper. However, I would tell the hon. gentleman myself if I were in a position to give the particulars, but I am not. That, however, will be answered; the hon. gentleman need not fear at all.

I turn from that to another quotation which the hon. member for St. John made. The House has heard me read from the address of Mr. Thomas before the Canadian Club at Montreal, as reported in the Montreal Gazette. I have read in the clearest language from that address that Mr. Thomas stated that the price in Canada was higher than the price in the United States and in England. That is exactly the way it reads. How did the hon. member for St. John place that upon Hansard? I am not going to say that the variation to which I am about to refer was deliberate on the part of the hon. member for St. John; I do not know whether it was or not, but the character of the error is remarkable. Here is the way it is put upon Hansard, doubtless for distribution throughout the length and breadth of Canada:

That must be considered, and I may tell you that the cost of shells in Canada has been higher than in competitive countries. It is complained that fat orders have gone to the United States, but I can assure you that a big slice will be reserved for Canada as long as the price is fairly satisfactory. The prices so far have been far higher than in the United States or in Great Britain.

Strange that that should be the way that it appears in Hansard in the speech of the hon. member for St. John, when the word in the quotation from which he read distinctly say "that the prices have been higher than in the United States." It is a remarkable coincidence that the change is in conformity with the extravagant language of the hon. member for St. John himself.

I do not know that it is a matter that requires very much elucidation that the prices should at first have been higher in Canada than in the United States. It may be that the prices were higher than the conditions warranted; I am not an expert, and I do not know. But I do think it is worth our while to consider this fact: that when the orders were given, they were given at a price which amounted to compensation—and which was intended to amount to compensation—to the contractors for the machinery which they had specially to install for the purpose of executing the orders. At that time there was a more or less general belief that the war was to be of short duration, and that not a great deal of this shell production could go on, and as a consequence the only method that appeared to be at the disposal of the committee—so, at all events, the chairman has stated—of securing contractors to do the work was to include in the contract price an amount sufficient to cover the cost of the installation of the necessary machinery. Therefore the price was fixed at $5.70. The hon. member for St. John says: Here is the Commonwealth of Australia; they have gone about this thing in a business-like way, and have let contracts for $5.05 inclusive of the steel, which will be $2 less than the price in Canada—and he quotes from the Liberal Monthly in proof of that assertion. I am not going to attack the Liberal Monthly, but from the lips of an hon. member who still persists in looking on this Government as a mere partisan machine, I think it is worthy of note, as an evidence of his inner belief in the fairness of spirit of this Government, that he undertakes to convince them by quoting the Liberal Monthly. The Liberal Monthly makes the statement that the price in Australia was $5.05, inclusive of the steel, and says that is $2 less than the price of $5.70, exclusive of the steel, in Canada. But the hon. member does not emphasize the fact, that appears even in the Liberal Monthly, that the Australian contract covers all the shells to be made by the contractors up to June 30, 1916. This is the price fixed for all the shells to be made up to June 30, 1916, and no notice of cancellation can be given until the 31st of March; whereas in Canada, during all these months, the price has gone down from $5.70 to $4, and so on until it has reached $1.75. Is the aggregate price higher than in Australia? Will the average be higher? I venture to say that the arithmetic that already is at the surface indicates that the average price in this country will be the lower. But, however that may be, let me, in this matter of price, again emphasize this fact, that the Shell Committee, in fixing the price, acted under the authorization of the Imperial Government itself, and the Shell Committee fixed no price in excess of its authorization. That is the statement which is made to me and which I believe. And, furthermore, the Shell Committee succeeded in getting prices below its authorization, effecting a saving of a very large amount to the Imperial treasury. I am not saying, and I do not wish to be taken as saying, that there cannot be any attack on that committee. The committee may be open to criticism, nor will I say that, under proper authority and at the proper time, there should not be a review of the work at that committee. But I do say that in fairness to it and to the cause to which all our energies should be directed, it is only just that we remember these ruling principles that are plain to the eyes of all, and try to do justice to the men who did that work. We are asked: why did you not do as the Liberal Government did in the days of the late Administration? I am not going to make any attack on the Liberal Government, but I do think it is not going beyond the limit when I endeavour to reply to the intimation clearly given to the House by the hon. member for St. John (Mr Pugsley) that this Government set a notable example in the late Administration which we would do well to follow in the matter of investigation of Imperial contracts and purchases in this country. We made Imperial purchases in this country for the Imperial Government in the days gone by. They were made in the days of the South African war.. They were made by a department of the Government of Canada. They were made under the direct responsibility of the Government, and the matter came up in the Parliament of Canada. I invite the attention of the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) in this connection because I am without the honour of the presence of the hon. member for St. John. I can quite recall the warning hurled at the Government by the hon. member for Rouville, whose speech as a whole was not only patriotic but highly creditable to himself; I remember the warning he threw out to us that this Government should never shelter itself behind the miserable quibble of saying that we were spending Imperial money and not Canadian, and that therefore the Government were not responsible. I know the lofty scorn with which he attacked that miserable quibble and held it up to the Canadian people as unworthy of the Canadian Government or Parliament. But what did he think of the quibble in 1903? In 1902, yes, I think in 1901 as well, but certainly in 1903, there was a discussion of that miserable quibble in the Commons of this country. A motion was made in 1903, not when the war was on, when there might have been high and Imperial reasons for the reservation of the information, but after the war was over and when all those reasons were removed. More than one motion was made in this House for inquiry into the purchases made by departments of the Government under the late Administration. And how was that demand for inquiry met by the late Government? Were they parties to a miserable quibble that it was Imperial money and not ours? Remember this, that that money was expended, not by a committee answerable to the Imperial authorities and divorced from the Canadian Government, not by a commission who were not under the thumb and under the influence of the head of a department and of the Government itself. Those moneys were expended by a department of the Administration; the work was done by a Minister of the Crown, through one of his officers in the department. They expended the money, first Canadian money in large degree, afterwards recouped by the Imperial treasury; and charges were made in the House that the expenditure had been made improvidently and that the interest of the people of Great Britain had not been conserved in the expenditure. The matter was brought up first when the war was on, and the Minister of Agriculture of that day answered that, inasmuch as they were Imperial moneys that were being spent and not Canadian moneys the Government were not responsible to the Parliament of Canada. That answer at that time was accepted. The war, however, had ceased in 1903. The matter came up again. There were no more hay and no more oats to be purchased for the war, and any information given could not have the slightest effect upon the prices, could not effect Imperial interests in any way that I could think of. It came up on the motion of the late lamented member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk), who moved for:

1. The total amount paid by the Government of Canada for hay and oats, purchased for the Imperial Government, for shipment to South Africa, during the years 1900, 1901 and 1902.
2. The names of the parties from whom hay and oats were so purchased.
3. The prices at which the said hay and oats were so furnished during the said periods, from each of the said parties.
4. The total amount paid to each of the said parties, both for hay and oats.

What was the answer? I commend it to the hon. member for Rouville. It is not his answer. I admit all that; but it is the answer of a member of the late Government for whom I think he had, and likely has still, the highest regard and respect, the late Minister of Finance. The Hon. Mr. Fielding said:

I think I am correct in stating that my hon. friend brought this matter before the House a year ago in the form of a question. And my hon. colleague, the Minister of Agriculture, said that it concerned only the Imperial Government, inasmuch as it did not affect the public moneys of Canada in any way, therefore he was unable to supply the information asked for. I think that we ought to take the same position to-day. For all expenditure of the public money of Canada, the ministers are accountable to this House and the House is entitled to every information, but this is an expenditure of Imperial money for which this Government is not accountable to this House.

Did you ever hear of a quibble quite so well expressed as by the Minister of Finance of the late Administration? Then he goes on:

The matter would be a proper one to be brought forward in the parliament of Great Britain, but not in this House. I hope my hon. friend will see the reasonableness of this view and will not press his motion.

The motion, however, was pressed, and the late Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) himself took a part in the discussion. Here I shall quote the words of the late Prime Minister:

I believe that everything in this matter was done fairly and well. We have no complaint from the British Government, and I therefore see no reason why this House should inquire into the expenditure of money which does not concern it.

Mr. Borden (Halifax): I would like to know whether the right hon. gentleman is willing or not to have these purchases ventilated in the Committee of Public Accounts, as they might be, if they were the expenditure of this country.

The Prime Minister: Certainly not.

That was when all possible objections were removed, and it went to a vote in the House. And who do you think voted to sustain the miserable quibble but the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) himself.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Was it not stated yesterday, or the day before, by the Minister of Finance that the Government of this country was paying part of the cost of the shells manufactured in Canada?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is a phase of the subject which I shall come to. I understand the point to which the hon. member refers, and I intend to comment upon it. Before I do so, however, let me press upon his mind this distinction, that those moneys were in 1902 expended by officers of the Crown, by a minister of the Crown or his subordinates in the department; that the work of expending it was work performed while such minister and the officers utilized were themselves in the pay of the Government of Canada. In the present case the Shell Committee, from its inception, has been answerable for its work to and has conducted its work under the guidance, jurisdiction, and superintendence and financial sustenance of the Imperial Government. There is that distinction.

Mr. MACDONALD: And the Minister of Militia.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Not at all. The hon. member for Pictou seems to have a knowledge of the Minister of Militia that I do not possess. The Minister of Militia is a member of the Government of Canada, and in that capacity bears the same relation to the Shell Committee as any other member of the Government.

Mr. MACDONALD: Was he not a member of both committees, the committee that was retired at the request of this Government, and the new committee, which was named by this Government to take its place?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The Minister of Militia was at two meetings, the first one and the one at which the committee disbanded, and he was at no meeting between.

Mr. MACDONALD: He was a member of both committees; it was so stated in the press.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Will my hon. friend send out and get the names of that committee?

Mr. MACDONALD: I can discuss my hon. friend's remarks at a later stage.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have said that I have no knowledge that he was a member, and I would like my hon. friend to get the names of the respective committees and show that the Minister of Militia was a member. The committee, however constituted, and whatever its personnel, was, from the time of its institution, a committee acting under the authority of the Imperial Government.

Now I come to the point raised by the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux), and a point which came just at the last minute to the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley). I could see clearly that the debate and division of 1903 had been called to his attention in the interval, and he set about to dig out from his ingenuity some way in which he could possibly distinguish the Imperial moneys of 1902 from the Imperial moneys of 1915. So he asked the Minister of Finance whether it was not the case that we were paying our share of the cost of maintaining our troops at the front to the Imperial treasury. The Minister of Finance answered in the affirmative. It is our intention, it is our policy to pay our share of the cost of maintaining the men at the front which the Imperial Government is paying on behalf of our men. It is true that the Imperial Government is to be recouped for the share of expenditure, as nearly as can be estimated, that is being paid for the maintenance of the Canadian forces at the front. "Oh, then," they say, "we ought to review this expenditure which we have to meet." Well, that is either true or it is not. If we have the right to review part of the moneys that are payable to the Imperial Government we have the right to review all the expeditures in which we are interested. We are interested in the same degree in the money paid by the Imperial Government in the United States as in the money paid in Canada. We have to pay some part of that, and we have to pay some part of any money that may have been spent in Japan and in Great Britain itself, and if there is a duty upon the Parliament of Canada to investigate the expenditure of Imperial moneys for the munitions of Canada, the same duty must apply to all the moneys in which we are interested expended by the Imperial authorities. Furthermore, this Government has assumed a position not only consistent with, but strictly in conformity with its policy initiated long before the war: that in matters of defence we and the Imperial Parliament are on common ground; that in matters of defence—until the time comes when this country shall have a seat in the Imperial councils—we trust to the Imperial Government for advice and for the disposition of our forces; we place the forces under their control, and we trust them in the expenditure of money for the common purpose. I do not think that if the Imperial Government is looking for examples as to how best to deal with the moneys of the British people, or if they are looking for improvements in the methods of handling that money, they are going to take the advice of, or look for inspiration to, the hon. member for St. John. I have parted with the question of the control of the Shell Committee; I am through with it, and I propose to deal with just one other matter that came up during the debate when the hon. member for St. John was speaking. He had occasion to refer to the question of submarines.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Before my hon. friend passes from that point might I give him the answer of my hon. friend the Minister of Finance to the question put to him as to our share of the expenditure of moneys on munitions. On page 42 of Hansard, I find this:

Hon. Wm. Pugsley: I desire to ask my hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White) if he will kindly lay on the table of the House, or if he can give now, information in a concise manner as to the arrangement between the Government of Canada and the British Government as to what proportion of the expense in connection with the carrying on of the war, in so far as Canadian soldiers are concerned, is to be borne by the Government of Canada. I desire to know whether all the expense of ammunition, guns, equipment, etc., is to be borne by the Government of Canada, or what the arrangement is.

Sir Thomas White (Minister of Finance): The matter will be dealt with probably by my right hon. friend the Prime Minister in introducing the war Appropriation Bill, which will provide means for continuing our participation in the war, or, if not, by myself in the Budget Speech, which will be brought down at a later date. In a general way, I may say to my hon. friend that the Government of Canada is bearing the entire expense of Canada's participation in the war. There will necessarily be certain accounts which cannot be adjusted until the war is over, or until a later date.

Then he gives the conversation he had with Col. Ward. The hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) then puts another question:

Mr. Pugsley: That means, of course, all the ammunition, all the guns, all the boots and shoes, and all the clothing used by the Canadian soldiers at the front?

Sir Thomas White: Our understanding is that the Canadian Government will pay all, but that an adjustment is necessary and will have to take place later.

I desire to ask my hon. friend in a friendly spirit, because I want to be right in this matter: whether he claims that, in view of that understanding that we are to pay our share of the cost of munitions and guns, no investigation can take place regarding the charges made. I quite understand his answer as regards the Imperial part of it, but as regards what is being paid by Canada, does he deny any investigation?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not know that I am certain of the object of the hon. member for Rouville in rising. In so far as his quotation from the Minister of Finance's answer is concerned, it is exactly as I stated to the House. His object could not have been to correct me in that regard. It is exactly as I stated; we pay in a general way our share of the expense of maintenance. Then, he says: Now, do you say that because of that there should be no investigation? I never said any such thing. I have only argued that the fact that we pay our share of the maintenance is no argument whatever why we should investigate any more than we should have investigated in 1903. It adds no point whatever to the contention of hon. gentlemen opposite. If they have charges to make as to the conduct of any member of this Government in relation to the Shell Committee, or otherwise these charges will be investigated as they always have been investigated under this Administration. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Pugsley) tried to get the benefit of making charges, but carefully refrained from making any in this House, shielding himself always behind a closing sentence that he was making no charge himself, but that he was only saying what was reported, or stated here, there, or somewhere else.

By the way, the hon. gentleman made one remarkable assertion which I think disclosed the whole purpose of his speech. He emphasized with tremendous force that no commission was going to satisfy his ambition. He did not want any judge investigating these things; he has lost confidence in judges. He did not want any judge but he wanted a committee of Parliament. That is the only thing that would satisfy him. He not only said that but he made the solemn statement that from the Atlantic to the Pacific they were crying for an investigation by a committee of Parliament.

Then he proceeded to wade through every newspaper that he could get from one end of Canada to the other, especially every Liberal paper, and he hoped by calling his own witnesses for opinions to make a case against the Government, I say now, having read them of every sort and character, that he cannot find in a single quotation from a single paper, Grit or Tory, that he quoted one demand that there should be an investigation by a committee of Parliament. He has raked the country with a fine tooth comb to support his assertion that he is voicing the indignation of the great Canadian people, and having made his quotations after doing all the raking, he cannot produce a single opinion concurring with his own.

He says that these papers reflect public opinion. We have quite as much respect as the hon. member for St. John for the opinions of the editors of this country, and for, on the whole, their exceedingly patriotic conduct during this struggle; still, it is a notable fact that after he got through with each quotation, which almost invariably laid the blame on the manufacturers, he was careful to say that this opinion did not agree with his own at all because in his judgment the manufacturers were all right and the Government all wrong. I do not know whether he was taking a sort of side dig at his rival for supremacy as the chief lieutenant of the Liberal party or not, but he was careful to lay bare to the House that the Canada Forging and something Company were among the arch middlemen, but when he was chided by the hon. member for Renfrew (Mr. Graham) he became very appreciative indeed of the manufacturers of this country.

At six o'clock, the House took recess.

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Perhaps the House will bear with me while I make just another brief reference to the attack of the hon. member for St. John on the Shell Committee. I observe in the body of his address a reference by way of insinuation to an alleged visit of two men, whose names and identity are unknown, to some company whose name and identity is also unknown, representing somebody whose name and identity is also unknown, and asking for a commission of one and a half per cent. on some contracts they hoped to get from the Shell Committee. I observe also that in reference to that very specific and daring charge of the hon. member for St. John, he comments as follows:

> I said a commission of one and a half per cent on the contract price. I do not pretend for a single moment that any of this was to go to the Shell Committee. I do not pretend for a single moment to say that anything was given to any one associated in any way with the Government, or with this House.

In the first place it mystifies me what influence two men, who do not represent the Shell Committee or the Government or any one connected with either, could have in asking for a commission from any firm of contractors. Upon what ground would they expect their request to be granted? The insinuation answers itself on the face of it. But the reason I refer to it at this moment is this: the hon. member for St. John is asking for an investigation; he would like to get men like this exposed. His regard for purity is so high that he is not satisfied until these men are properly punished. Well, the method of punishing them is open to him. We have on the Statute books of Canada at the present time a law that will come directly down on the heads of men who ask for a secret commission from any firm of contractors. What is our Secret Commissions Act for? It has been on our Statute books for some time; and if any man claiming to represent any one wants a commission of that kind, he is liable to punishment and imprisonment, and all the hon. member for St. John has to do is to go to this firm of contractors that hopes to get the job, and either do so himself or get one of them to lay a charge against these two individuals, and the prosecution is bound to follow. If then he wants an investigation or punishment, why does he not take this step? I will tell you why he does not. That is not what he wants at all. He wants a select committee of Parliament—presumably selected by himself; at all events if it is not, he will not be satisfied with it—in order that he may have a chance for political pyrotechnics in the House of Commons. That is what animates him in making that reference, the same as in every other.

In the course of his observations he referred to a speech said to have been delivered by myself at Port Arthur or Fort William, in which I made the statement that I knew that excessive prices were being paid for shells. In the first place, I made no speech at Port Arthur or Fort William. I do not suppose there was any intention at all on his part to be incorrect there; I think he refers to a speech I made at Portage la Prairie; but in my speech at Portage la Prairie I made no statement that I knew excessive prices were being paid. What I stated was in answer to a request to speak on a proposition as to war taxes, and I said that I believed there had been some cases of large profits. That is a very different thing from stating that I knew that excessive prices were being paid. It would be utterly inconsistent, upon the principle upon which the Commission acted, namely, that they were compelled to include in the initial prices the cost of machinery, that there would not be cases of large profits. Perhaps the matter was scarcely worth referring to. I want, however, just in closing this phase of the subject, to place upon Hansard the report that men and experts, who were representing the British Government, to which this committee was responsible, have made with regard to that committee. I have already read the verdict of Mr. Thomas. I now propose to put upon Hansard what the second man says. His investigation of the work of the committee is a very recent one; his report has been made, and the substance of it is embodied in a letter written by the gentleman in question to the Prime Minister of this country. The contents of that letter have been made public. I only make quotations. Mr. Hitchens writes as follows:

> The Shell Committee which was appointed in September, 1914, by the Minister of Militia and Defence to deal with the munition orders placed in Canada by the Imperial Government has, I think, met with remarkable success in dealing with a difficult task. In the early days the problem was to persuade manufacturers to undertake the work of making shells, which was quite new to them, and presented formidable difficulties that caused many of the leading firms to hold back. The orders at that time destined for this country were on a small scale; there was naturally no assurance of continuity in the work, and the prospects of success were doubtful. The readiness with which the Canadian manufacturers adapted themselves to a new industry is, I think, remarkable, and although, as in England, they have often been unable to live up to their original promises, yet they have nothing to fear from a comparison with the early efforts of firms of the highest standing in England.

Then later on he says:

> I should like to take this opportunity to point out, after a careful inquiry into the facts that the Shell Committee has been submitted to much unfair criticism. It was, as I have said, appointed to deal with orders of modest proportions, and from the nature of the case was intended to be educative rather than administrative. It was natural therefore that it should contain an infusion of steel manufacturers whose advice and experience was necessary to the proper development of the new industry. The measure of their success can be gauged by the remarkable results achieved. The facts speak for themselves. There are now some 320 firms in Canada manufacturing shells of their component parts and in the short space of 14 months the Shell Committee with the active encouragement and support of General Sir Sam Hughes have developed the largest industry in the whole of the Dominion. They have been the means also of bringing into being certain important industries subsidiary to shell-making which will have a permanent effect in developing the resources of the country.

Then he goes on elaborating on the work of the committee, and in closing these are his words:

> These far reaching and important results have not been achieved without the most exacting and strenuous labour, which has fallen more particularly upon General Bertram and Colonel Carnegie, and which a single minded enthusiasm for the cause has enabled them to sustain. Perhaps I may be allowed to add that these striking results owe their inception and a large measure of their development to the practical zeal and the active encouragement of General Sir Sam Hughes. To conceive a big idea is hard, but to give effect to it in action demands qualities of a rarer kind. I wish, therefore, to place on record that the shell committee have for the first fourteen months been carrying on a work of the most exacting and strenuous nature, and that they have fulfilled their task well. The changes therefore which are now being made are the logical development of their work—the necessary superstructure upon the foundations laid by them.

I wish now, Sir, to refer to another subject, and one with which I am confident I can deal without long engaging the attention of the House. Certain references were made by the hon. member for St. John to what is now popularly named the Davidson Commission, a commission appointed under the Inquiries Act to investigate the letting of war contracts. It will be remembered that the hon. member for St. John made what cannot be described otherwise than as a slighting slur or a savage attack, whichever he intended it, on that commission. It is known to every one that that commission is still in existence, and that it has not reported. Neither the evidence nor the report referring to the purchase of submarines, therefore, has been handed in. It is not desirable, therefore, that I should say anything anticipatory of that report. But it is worth while to bring the attention to the fact that before this commission—constituted of a retired chief justice of the province of Quebec, a man whose reputation from one end of Canada to the other, is not only unblemished but distinguished—has made its report, the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Carvell) in his place in this House denounces it as a whitewashing report.

Mr. CARVELL: I stand by that.

Mr. MEIGHEN: He stands by that, before he knows what the report is. It will be remembered that about a year ago the people were startled—if indeed it is possible any more to startle this country by speeches of the hon. member for St. John—startled by a speech made by that gentleman referring to purchase of submarines immediately before the outbreak of the war on the 4th of August, 1914. At that time, as every one knows, the Government of this country was able to purchase two submarines completely constructed at Seattle by the Seattle Construction Co., and previously under contract for purchase by the Chilian Government, the price being $1,150,000. It pleased the hon. member for St. John to rise in his place in this House and, in a speech that showed many of the characteristics of the tirade delivered yesterday, to try to embed in the minds of the people of this country the insinuation that there was some graft or something crooked in connection with that purchase. He asked that the matter be investigated. The investigation was put under way, the matter being included in the subjects within the purview of the Davidson Commission. That commission sat in Montreal, it sat in Victoria, and in at least one city south of the line. These sittings, I believe, were held during several months. But from the commencement of those sittings to the end the man who was responsible for the charges that were made and who, if he had been the man that he should have been, would have made it his duty to prove the charges if he could, never showed his face within the walls when the commission was sitting, and never brought a tittle of evidence to prove his charges. He gave no assistance to the commission in any way whatever. And he excuses himself now in Parliament on the ground that in the city of Victoria, some time after this investigation had begun, a solicitor of that city named Taylor had applied to His Lordship Chief Justice Davidson for permission to appear and cross-examine witnesses on behalf of the Provincial Liberal party of British Columbia, which permission, as I stated in the midst of the speech of the hon. member for St. John yesterday, was denied.

In the first place, every one knows that under the constitution of that commission, under the Inquiries Act, the commissioner is himself representative of the people of this country. It is his business to make an investigation on behalf not of the Conservative party but of all the people of Canada. In that duty he was assisted by Mr. John Thompson, K.C., of the city of Ottawa, a son of a former Prime Minister of this country. The duty of Mr. Thompson, as the duty of the Commissioner, was, not to represent a mere political party, but to investigate anything within the purview of the commission brought before its attention for investigation, and investigate it to the bottom, on behalf of the Canadian people. Mr. Thompson represented the Liberal party as he represented the Conservative party—or rather he represented neither but represented the whole people of Canada apart from all political parties. Therefore, the commissioner took the view that if Mr. Taylor were allowed to represent the Liberal party before the Commission he would infringe upon the duties assigned to Mr. Thompson. Let me draw the attention of the House to the clause of the Act referring to this matter. I should not have to do that, for the wording of the Act is as well known to the hon. member for St. John as it is to me. The hon. member knows well that under that Act it was no part of the duty of the Commission to allow any attorney to take part in its proceedings except the attorney representing the people, as Mr. Thompson did, or the attorney representing any person charged with an offence. The Act is clear and precise in its terms in that regard. Here is the clause:

> The commissioners may allow any person whose conduct is being investigated under this Act, and shall allow any person against whom any charge is made in the course of such investigation, to be represented by counsel.

These are the limits of the powers of the Commission, and acting within these limits His Lordship Chief Justice Davidson felt that he was bound to refuse the application of Mr. Taylor.

Now, is Commissioner Sir Charles Davidson to be subjected to attack in this House because he acted within the limits of his powers? Is he, because he gave effect to the law, to be attacked in this House? We remember that the conduct of Sir Charles Davidson in this inquiry has met the approval not only of Conservatives but of Liberals as well. Sir Charles Davidson has not been criticised by any responsible Liberal paper in Canada, but on the contrary they have commended his non-partisan impartiality.

The hon. member for St. John chooses to characterize that investigation as shallow; he chooses to attack not only the commissioner, but Mr. Thompson, K.C., as well. He says of that honoured counsel—who has given his services free to the people of Canada—that he did not know enough to ask questions that would have appealed to a mere student-at-law. Those are the references of the hon. member for St. John to these two gentlemen. Let me, on the other hand, point the hon. member for St. John to the opinion expressed not by the Conservative journals but by the Liberal journals of this country. I refer particularly to that journal which, at all events outside the city of Ottawa, is the most outstanding Liberal organ in Canada, the Toronto Globe. Here is what the Toronto Globe says of the work of Sir Charles Davidson, who is denounced by the hon. member for Carleton as a whitewasher, and who is blackwashed—in the words of the Free Press—by the hon. member for St. John. I quote from an editorial in the issue of the Globe of Nov. 30 last:

To-morrow morning, at the Toronto City Hall, Sir Charles Davidson, as Commissioner by appointment of the Dominion Government, will continue his investigation of such charges of wrongdoing in the procuring of military supplies as may be brought to his attention. There can be no fault found with the way in which Sir Charles has discharged his by no means pleasant duty for several months past. He has been fair to leniency with every accused vendor or go-between brought before him, but he has also displayed the keen insight of a trained jurist and the moral courage of a stern judge in exposing actual wrong-doing and reprobating deliberately fraudulent conspirators.

If he has done that, wherein has he offended?

That none of those so condemned have yet been sent to jail is not his fault. In his work he has had valuable professional aid from the Government counsel, Mr. Thompson—

The gentleman who, in the opinion of the hon. member for St. John, has not the knowledge of a schoolboy in law.

—Mr. Thompson, whose duties are just as onerous and as important as those of the Commissioner.

And they proceed to urge that certain war contracts should be investigated by that commission. Those who were present at the investigation were quite sure that they were sifted to the bottom, much to the discomfiture of the men who made the charge.

In a later issue, that of December 4 last, after the investigation at Toronto had been concluded, the Globe comes forward with words of approbation for Sir Charles Davidson. They have evidently been reading some journals which, in language as indefinite and vague as in many cases it was meaningless, complained about the country reeking with scandal, and about the blush of shame being on this man and on that, just as did the hon. member for St. John. Here is what the Globe says—and I commend this very good advice to the hon. member for St. John himself. The Globe makes reference not to the Shell Committee, but to other war contracts made out of the money of the Canadian people:

There should be, and we have no doubt there will be, Government investigation of the matter, and there should be retroactive legislation which will enable the Government to confiscate any proven undue profits. Meanwhile, to a number of Liberal newspapers which harp on the subject and claim to have exact knowledge, we may point out that the Davidson Commission exists for the purpose of investigating all war contracts, and that any private individual can place charges before the Commission and have them examined without cost to himself. There will probably be Government investigation; but if any of our newspaper friends are impatient or dubious, and know what they say they do, they don't need to wait for Government action.

In substantiation, or in supposed substantiation, of his attack upon the Davidson Commission, the hon. member for St. John made use of the following language in his speech of the 18th instant and I am compelled to put practically all of it on Hansard. He passes from one subject to another, expressing at first his surprise and then his amazement that there had been no inquiry into this subject and into that subject, naming them one after the other. I am going to name these subjects, and I am going to refer to the evidence and to ask the House to come to a conclusion as to whether the hon. member for St. John is now the only one who should express amazement. The hon. member (Mr. Pugsley) said:

I watched with considerable interest the newspapers in Vancouver when I happened to be there for a day or two, to see whether it would occur to the gentleman who represented this Conservative Government, the Government with which Sir Richard McBride is, or was, so closely allied before a certain event took place; I watched to see whether any question would be asked of Mr. Logan as to how it was that he had carried on the negotiation for the purchase of submarines for a fortnight and yet did not know what the price was to be, and why he simply whistled over the telephone when he found that the enormous price of $1,150,000 was named.

Will it surprise the House first to learn that the evidence clearly shows that Mr. Logan did not carry on any negotiations for a fortnight, or anything of the kind? Will it surprise the House, in the next place to find from the evidence that Mr. Logan had been asked, and asked repeatedly, the very question which the hon. member for St. John complains that he had never been asked? I am sorry to have to delay the House with what must be a rather dull proceeding, but I cannot make the reply that should be made to the hon. member without doing so. I quote from the evidence. I am informed that the evidence has been handed to the Opposition—at all events to the leader of the Opposition—and, consequently should be at the disposal of his followers in the same way as it was at mine, which was only yesterday. Mr. Logan tells about sitting in a club in the city of Victoria when there were some gentlemen present, including Mr. Paterson, who had been the engineer or president of the Seattle Construction Company, which had been engaged in the actual work of constructing the submarines. Mr. Logan was asked:

Q. Try to recollect, please, who else was present?—A. I cannot say, I think H. B. Thompson was there, the Lieutenant Governor J. V. Paterson, I. W. Paterson, Mr. Harry Bullen, and myself. Paterson mentioned incidentally that he had a pair of submarines that we could get if we wanted, but there was not much said about it. Then later on—

Q. Did you ask him the price?—A. No, I did not say anything at all about it.

Q. Did anybody ask him the price?—A. No.

Q. Are you quite sure?—A. Yes.

Q. Paterson said somebody asked him the price and he did not know?—A. I did not ask him; somebody may have said something about it, but I did not hear.

Q. Were you not curious to know the price?—A. No.

Q. Not in any way?—A. No.

Q. Although you had been talking about submarines?—A. We were only talking generally on these vessels, they are out of my line. I am in the merchant service.

Q. Yes, but you had a conversation with Paterson, when we were evidently on the break of war, and as I understand it you were discussing submarines?—A. We were discussing the probability of the war, not the submarines.

Q. And Paterson said he had two submarines?—A. He said he had a couple of submarines which Canada could have if they wanted to.

Q. You do not recollect anybody asking what the price was?—A. No, I do not recollect that at all. On the Sunday, just preceding the fourth of August, I think it was the second of August, I was sitting in my house when I got a telephone message from a man named Kay.

Now it is clear that all he had known of the matter up to this point was that some time before, in a club in Victoria, he had heard Mr. Paterson say to a number of friends around the table that there were two submarines there that the country could secure, and that, not being an expert in this line or knowing anything about it, he had made no inquiry about the price.

He was asked repeatedly about it, and in every case the answer was that as he knew nothing about the price he made no inquiry. The next thing he knew about it was on the Sunday before the declaration of war, when he was called upon at his house by a telephone message from Mr. Kay. He states that he did not know Kay, but that Kay had been in the court room, and he was asked to say what took place.

Q. Is he here to-day?—A. I do not know, there will be some one present in the Court who knows him.

Q. Well proceed.—A. That man telephoned to me and asked me if I didn't think we should form a citizens' committee to wait upon Sir Richard McBride and urge on him to buy a battleship in Valparaiso from Chile, and I told him I thought the idea was absurd. When I got down to my office the next morning, I telephoned over to Sir Richard McBride and told him about these two submarines.

That was on the Sunday before the declaration of war. All that had occurred before that was simply a club conversation, at which Paterson suggested that there were these submarines down there which might be obtained. Then he goes on and tells about the proceedings that followed:

Q. With whom did you return?—A. With Mr. Barnard and the Hon. Mr. Burrell. We had a meeting in the Premier's office just about lunch time, and Mr. Bowser was there and I think Mr. Ross.

Q. What Mr. Ross?—A. The Hon. Mr. Ross, one of the provincial ministers. At that meeting I was asked if I knew the price of these submarines, and I told them I did not, and I was urged to give an idea of the cost of these boats and I said: as to cost I would say $375,000 each, but I had absolutely no knowledge of the cost of submarines, and I made that very clear at the time.

But still the hon. gentleman says that no reason at all was given why this man did not know the cost of submarines until he was later told by Mr. Paterson over the telephone:

Q. Why did you talk of $375,000 apiece?—A. Because I knew that was about the cost of a destroyer, but I had no knowledge at all of the cost of a submarine.

What better reason a man could give, I am at a loss to understand. Then he tells about going down to the naval yard at Esquimalt with Mr. Burrell and Lieut. Pilcher:

We discussed the question of submarines being required. It became apparent that they were required and the question of price again cropped up.

Q. How did it crop up?—A. I think Mr. Burrell or Lieut. Pilcher, I am not sure which asked me, but anyway I know it did crop up, and I telephoned from that office to Mr. Paterson to ask him the price of these boats.

and that is when Patterson replied and stated the price at just the price which was paid, which was adhered to from beginning to end, $1,150,000. That does appear to be something of an answer to the allegation of the hon. member for St. John, that no questions were asked as to why this man, who, he said, had been conducting negotiations for two weeks, did not know what the price was until the last.

Then what is the next complaint?

I was struck with amazement to find that when Mr. Paterson, the man who had been in Seattle when the submarines were tested, and when the experts of the Chilian Government refused to accept them—I was struck with amazement to find that he was not asked as to the nature of the test, or as to how the submarines acted under the test.

It will be no surprise to the House to learn, and I will substantiate it from the evidence, that Paterson was asked as to the test and gave his evidence as to the test and how the submarines acted under it. Inquiry was made, most prolonged inquiry. This thing was investigated from place to place, and witness after witness, every witness I should think the wit of man could call to mind, was examined fully on all these points. I quote from the evidence.

Q. Had any asserted inefficiency of these vessels anything to do with the non-possession of them by Chili?

Perhaps, to make this clear, I had better review this phase of the subject. The Chilian Government had defaulted in their contract to purchase the submarines at $818,000, and the commissioner was trying to ascertain the reason of the default. It was shown that they were about $150,000 behind and had made some complaint, through their engineers, that the vessels were deficient in buoyancy which, if I understand rightly from the evidence, is the power of the vessel to speedily come to the surface after being submerged; and the commissioner was endeavouring, and endeavoured through page after page, to ascertain whether or not there was ground of complaint on the part of the Chilian Government as to this buoyancy, and whether or not that was the real cause of their not taking up their contract and, therefore, whether or not they were willingly relieved of the contract and glad to get their money back. Mr. Paterson, in that connection, gave this evidence.

Q. Had any asserted inefficiency of these vessels anything to do with their non-possession by Chili?—A. No.

Sir Charles Davidson: In no sense whatever?—A. I do not know what you mean by "in no sense." What I mean is this. It is the same thing as if you were to take the Princess Charlotte there on a draft of water to carry 1,000 tons and the owners came to a clause in the contract which said they were to carry stores for two months, and they said stores for two months amount to five thousand tons, and you will have to put on five thousand tons. The Chilian Government said that stores for two months amounted to so many tons.

Sir Charles Davidson: Do you mean actually that number of tons?

The Witness: No, that is merely by way of illustration, they put the weight on corresponding to that amount and they said: "Run your trial trips," and they ran their trial trips and they dived and performed it, but they did not come up with the speed that they should have come up and they did not perform their function with the speed that they would have performed it in had they been in a fighting condition.

Sir Charles Davidson: Was it in consequence of that that they refused them?

The Witness: No. They would have taken them anyway, they would gladly have taken them if they could pay them. But that was their official protection against our enforcing the contract which would have made them pay, and by the by, with regard to the price of these boats—

And so on. He goes on talking about the price and how cheap they were. So he was there stating what the real kernel of the difficulty appeared to be, namely that the Chilian Government interpreted the contract as involving enough stores to run the boats for two months, and that with such stores on board, as he explained more fully later on, the boats did not come to the surface with the buoyancy desired; but that no such stores as that would be loaded on for the purposes of battle for which they were intended. There was no difficulty or complaint as to the buoyancy at all.

Mr. PARDEE: As I understand they had paid for the boats to within $130,000 of the purchase price.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Approximately.

Mr. PARDEE: Progress estimates had been paid up to $130,000, so that was all that the Chilian Government defaulted upon.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is stated in the evidence $150,000, but it was in that neighbourhood. Just in that connection it is remarkable that the hon. member for Lambton knows just how much the Chilian Government had paid.

Mr. PARDEE: You said so.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Not yet; why does he know? Because the evidence was given. If the hon. member for Lambton had heard the hon. member for St. John yesterday he would have known that that hon. member said that nothing was asked as to what the Chilian Government paid.

Then the examination of Paterson goes on:

Mr. Thompson: There is a letter from J. W. Paterson addressed to Sir Richard McBride, and printed at pages 21, 22 and 23 of this blue book. This is what Mr. Paterson says:

It is untrue that the boats are in any way less efficient than their design provided for. It is true the Chilian commission reported the boats as not satisfactory, but that does not mean what Mr. Pugsley tried to show. It really means that the boats, loaded with a quantity of stores and provisions far beyond what they were designed for or could reasonably be expected to carry in war service, did not function so rapidly as in the fighting condition for which they were designed.

It is true that the contract with the contractors gave the Chilians the right to load the vessels in this way, but that is the fault of the terms of the contract and not the defect of the boats as fighting submarines, and it was for fighting that I sold the vessels and you bought them to fight, and not to carry cargoes of provisions.

Mr. PARDEE: In other words, they were no good.

Mr. MEIGHEN: My hon. friend poses as an expert on submarines. I do not suppose he knows that experts were called upon to examine the submarines and that every expert, without a single exception, pronounced them to be efficient in every respect.

Mr. PARDEE: Except that they would not rise.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. gentleman will have a chance to speak, but I say that there was not a witness whose evidence I have read but says—

Mr. PARDEE: That they would not come up.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There was not a witness who complained of the buoyancy of those submarines. Admiral Kingsmill's evidence will show that. Who is the gentleman to whose evidence my hon. friend refers?

Mr. PARDEE: You have read it. They would not rise.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Certainly they would not rise if loaded with too many tons of mere freight and neither would the hon. gentleman if he were so loaded. For the purposes for which they were purchased by this Government the submarines were pronounced by every expert to be efficient in every particular. But the point I am meeting is this—and the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Pardee) had better keep it in mind—the hon. member for St. John asserted, on his responsibility as a member of Parliament, that no question was asked as to what test the submarines were put to, or as to how they came through the test. The evidence shows that such questions were asked. The hon. member for Lambton says they would not rise. He is in conflict with the hon. member for St. John, but the important thing for Parliament to remember is that a member of this House, on his responsibility as a member, affects to give information to this House when the record shows that that information is entirely incorrect, and on the basis of that information, on the basis of the facts embodied in that information he undertakes to level a charge against an honoured member of the Bench of Canada, Sir Charles Piers Davidson.

An hon. MEMBER: Go on.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am willing to go on as far as my hon. friend wants me to go. What was the next complaint of the hon. member (Mr. Pugsley)?

I was amazed to find that no question had been asked of Sir Richard McBride, or of Mr. Paterson as to the grounds on which the latter had represented that the Chilian Government were not able to pay for the submarines.

Well, now, the amazement of my hon. friend the member for St. John must really have been appalling. Here was Mr. Paterson, the president of a construction company, an engineer I think who had to do with the work of constructing submarines, and the hon. member for St. John is dumb with amazement because that gentleman was not asked as to the financial capabilities of the Government of Chili. Does the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Pardee)share his amazement? Would he expect Mr. Paterson to be an expert on the financial capabilities of the Chilian government?

Mr. PARDEE: Does the hon. gentlemen expect us in this House, or the people of Canada, to believe that when there was only $150,000 left to be paid on those submarines, the Chilian Government was so bankrupt that they would default on that amount of money after paying the rest?

Mr. MEIGHEN: It all depends on whether they wanted the submarines or not. They may have been very anxious and very glad to get the money back; the evidence indicates that they were. But how are we concerned with that? The question is, was it advisable for the Government of Canada to buy those submarines, and were they bought in a clean and honest way? As a matter of fact, the president of the construction company did undertake to give evidence on that point, but he was not asked regarding it, because it would have been foolish for anyone to think that the evidence he would give would be anything but hearsay. At all events he undertook to give evidence as to the desire of the Chilian Government to get away from their contract on some technical difficulty, and to get their money back. But with that we have no concern, except in so far as it flatly contradicts the assertion of the hon. member for St. John. That hon. gentleman was amazed a little more.

> I was amazed to find that the Commissioner had not asked him whether or not the Chilian Government had practically paid the whole amount of the contract price before the inspection and rejection took place.

The hon. member for Lambton now refutes the hon. member for St. John and asserts that there is evidence to show that the Chilian Government had paid $700,000.

Mr. PARDEE: I did not refute it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: He asserts that they got $700,000 back and some $14,000 of interest as well.

Mr. PARDEE: I did not refute that charge at all. I simply asked the hon. gentleman a question as to whether or not, after paying the amount on progress estimates, the Chilian Government would default for $150,000. I did not refute the charge.

Mr. MEIGHEN: My hon. friend just a few minutes ago—

Mr. PARDEE: The hon. member admitted it himself.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. member stated that the Chilian Government (who had agreed to pay $818,000) were only about $150,000 behind. Where did he get that information except from the evidence?

Mr. PARDEE: From my hon. friend.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, it was before I said a word about it that my hon. friend mentioned that.

Mr. PARDEE: My hon. friend read it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Not at all. Before I reached the subject, and I appeal to Hansard for confirmation, and my memory is pretty accurate—

Mr. PARDEE: Is it true?

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is true, and the hon. member knew from the evidence that it was true that they had paid all but $150,000, What they had paid they got back. But the hon. member for St. John is filled with unutterable amazement and asserts that they were never asked the question at all. The hon. member for St. John went on:

> But further, I was surprised to find that none of these gentlemen were asked to explain why three cheques were given, why a draft on a Seattle bank was given, and why the amount was divided into two sums, one of which was a note amounting to $500,000 and the other was for the balance out of which the bank charges and exchange were taken.

Well, this is on a par with the rest. In the first place, his facts are incorrect. There were two drafts signed, and subsequently a cheque for some $29,000 that had been in dispute between Mr. Paterson and the Boat Company. But Mr. Paterson was asked the question, and he gave the reason. Does my hon. friend want me to quote it; I have it here in the evidence. Mr. Paterson explained that it was entirely a private matter with himself; that he did not know at the time how much was owing to the Company in respect of the building of the submarines; that he remitted the first draft for $500,000; that he discussed the matter with the bank manager before remitting; that one cheque was given him for the submarines, and that out of it he paid the first draft, not knowing what was owing by the Electric Boat Company in Seattle; that subsequently there was a dispute as to whether the commission should be $40,000 or $70,000, that he remitted the $29,000 odd which was the sum in dispute as to commission, less the exchange, and that that ended the whole matter. But what is to be thought of an hon. member of this House who, in the face of that evidence of Mr. Paterson, solemnly states to Parliament that no question was asked as to why this money was divided.

Furthermore, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Pugsley) goes on to say:

> Not one single question was asked in regard to that. All that was asked of these witnesses was: did you pay any graft in Canada? did you pay any graft or commission to anybody in Canada? Well, possibly my hon. friend is satisfied.

Now, I undertake that in at least ten places in the evidence I can show that, not only Mr. Paterson, but witness after witness, was asked as to the disposition of every dollar of that money, that every dollar of it was traced to its ultimate destination, and each witness in the most absolute and unreserved terms stated that not a cent of commission was paid to anybody in Canada or elsewhere, except the $40,000 which Mr. Paterson got; every dollar of which he says he kept to himself, except what he paid for expenses.

The evidence is complete, the evidence of Mr. Frost, vice-president of the Electric Boat Company, the evidence of Mr. Taylor, the auditor of the company, the evidence of Mr. Paterson, the evidence of the president of the Electric Boat Company, and all agree, in response to repeated questions by the commissioner and Mr. Thompson, that not a cent of commission or anything else was paid to any person in this country or anywhere else, or to any association in this country or anyhere else, and that everything in connection with the purchase was regular in every particular. In the face of that, the hon. member states that all they were asked was simply the question: Was any graft paid in Canada?

Mr. PARDEE: What was the contract price that was to be paid by the Chilian Government for these submarines?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I gave that.

Mr. PARDEE: And what was the price we paid for them?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I also gave that, but I know the hurry that the hon. gentleman is in to get away from the reckless charges of his associate from the city of St. John. I have already told the House that the Chilian Government's price was $818,000, that the price paid by the Government of Canada was $1,150,000, and I will read the hon. gentleman the evidence if he wants it. The evidence, not only of the Seattle Construction Company, which built these boats, but the evidence of the officials of the Electric Boat Company, who were the owners and who engaged the Seattle company to build them, is that at the price they were selling them for to the Chilian Government there was a loss to them of approximately $100,000 apiece; that is to say, that the cost of construction to the Electric Boat Company was approximately $818,000. They gave an explanation to the Commission, and it was that they had quoted this price below the actual value of the submarines, for the definite and business-like purpose, namely this:—The Chilian Government were only then undertaking the purchase of submarines on a large scale, a Commission had been appointed by the Chilian Government which had only got under way, and they were anxious that their type of submarines should be the type accepted by that Commission, and in the words of a witness, this price was fixed by them as a bait, as it were, in order to induce the Chilian Government to adopt their submarines. Furthermore, it was said, that the Chilian Government, in the course of the construction, adhered so rigidly, and, as they considered, so unreasonably, to the terms of the contract in regard to the tonnage that the submarines were to carry, that the cost had reached a figure that was unnecessary and one that was higher than a more reasonable interpretation of the terms of the contract would have entailed.

9 p.m.

Mr. PARDEE: And this was from a bankrupt government?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I never said they were bankrupt.

Mr. PARDEE: Does the hon. gentleman claim that they were?

An hon. MEMBER: He said so.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, I never said so at all.

Mr. PARDEE: You said that they could not pay for them.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I would like the hon. gentleman to read Hansard to-morrow, and then reveal to me the state of his conscience. I know nothing about the financial condition of the Chilian government. I know that they did not fulfil the contract, that a considerable row was raised by them over losing the boats—whether it was sincerely raised or not I do not know—that they took their money back and the general weight of the evidence would appear to be, although I do not pretend to give any verdict on the evidence, that they were not displeased at getting it.

At all events, evidence was further taken to show the value of these submarines and the way they operated after they became the property of this Government. The evidence of Admiral Kingsmill, the evidence of the officers of the Electric Boat Company, the evidence of the experts on both sides of the line, was given and, as far as I have been able to read that evidence, I have found many to agree and I have found none to differ, all accepting the opinion that the boats, under the conditions of war, were bought exceedingly cheaply, and that if delay had occurred they undoubtedly would have been obtained only at a larger price. The evidence of Admiral Kingsmill is most emphatic that in their actual working out they have answered to every test and that with the exception of minor defects of no major importance whatever, they have been perfect in every respect, and that even assuming some minor and very unimportant defects they have been efficient in every particular and have answered all the purposes for which they were bought.

I have failed to find a single criticism of the price that was paid. While I am not the Commissioner, and while I refuse to make any statement as to what may be his findings, still there does appear, in so far as the Government is concerned, to have been ample cause for congratulation that they were able to procure these vessels at the time they did, at the price they did, and under the conditions they did.

In the face of the attempt made before this House by the hon. member for St. John, to impugn Sir Charles Davidson and his commission, and to impugn this Government, in the face of the assertions he made specifically as to the evidence before the Commissioner, the questions asked and the evidence as actually quoted by me from the documents, I ask, is it any wonder when he railed at me, and asked me if I was satisfied, that I replied to him in the terms I did? Is it any wonder that, being asked if I was satisfied, after he had made these statements as to the evidence, I exceeded the bounds of parliamentary decorum? Yes, there is cause for amazement in this House, cause for even greater amazement than that expressed by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Pugsley) but the amazement must be on the part of every hon. member of this House and over the conduct of the hon. member for St. John himself.

I have only this to say before I sit down, that the Government does not ask, and does not expect, immunity from criticism. On the whole, so far during this session, I do not think there is cause for complaint as to the character of the criticism offered by the hon. gentlemen opposite. We have had speeches on the Opposition side of the House every one of which has been critical. We have had the speech of the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark), he, who, perhaps, of all other hon. gentlemen opposite wields the brightest sword behind the leader of the Opposition, a speech critical, line after line, from the commencement to the close, but a speech that was evidently animated by the highest motives and which was intended to assist this country, and which certainly did not have its root in any sordid ambition for the loaves and fishes of office. We had similar speeches from the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) and from the hon. member from Edmonton (Mr. Oliver), and, in what I have felt it my duty to say in regard to the address of the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) I do not wish any words of mine to apply in general to the Liberal party in this House. I isolate him, or rather I do not isolate him, because he, by his own speech, isolated himself, for I do not believe he enjoyed, in the making of that speech, either the sympathy or support of the Liberal party in general, or as represented in this House.

It is to the credit of journalism in Canada that one of the most prominent, if not the most prominent Liberal organ in this country, that is the Liberal organ at the capital itself, at the very time he was making the second part of his address, denounced his utterances as unpatriotic and denounced him as seeking to serve a party and not a patriotic cause, and as acting unworthily as a member of Parliament, at the time at which he spoke. Whatever may be the course of this session, whatever may be done, there is no desire on the part of the Government, and it would be most unreasonable for the Government to ask it, that it be immune from criticism. But it seems to me that it would be only just to accord to the Government, under the circumstances, a freedom from purely partisan criticism which is not too desirable in even ordinary times, but which is little short of treachery now. It is reasonable to ask that we should be freed from those demagogic arts, from those partisan devices, from those appeals to class and race, which, bad as they are in ordinary times, are worse than bad to-day. We ask for fair and honourable criticism. Criticism intended to be a benefit will assist Parliament and the party from which it emanates and it will not do harm to the Government as a Government. At all events if it does harm, it is only the harm which is deserved.

Now I have said all I purpose to say, and the time which I have occupied I believe involves an apology to the House. I believe, however, that words of mine, although they may have been in part severe, are deserved by the hon. member against whom they are addressed, and if perhaps now I have gone in severity further than I intended to go, it could scarcely have been avoided, having regard to the grounds that moved me in so doing.

Mr. GEORGE W. KYTE (Richmond, N.S.): Mr. Speaker, I was very much interested, and I am sure every member of this House was interested in hearing the statement made by the right hon. the First Minister when he rose to reply to the leader of the Opposition in this debate. I have reference to the observations made by the Prime Minister as to his visit to the battlefront during the past year. We were all interested in hearing what was being done in Canada for the purpose of furthering the interest of the Allies in this great war, as we were interested in hearing from the lips of the Prime Minister the plans which he has for further advancing the interest of the Allies.

I was very proud to reflect that, coming from the province of Nova Scotia, I could bear testimony to the fact that Nova Scotia has been bearing her full share in contributing men and money towards the great needs set forth by the various organizations in the interest of the entente belligerents. The province of Nova Scotia up to the present time has contributed over 12,000 men to the armies of the Allies. That represents more than two and a quarter per cent of the total population of Nova Scotia, and fully ten per cent of those of military age, and the work of enlistment is still going on. If the right hon. the Prime Minister makes a call to the people of Canada for another quarter of a million men, I have no doubt that the province of Nova Scotia will be found equally ready to contribute its share.

As I speak of the province of Nova Scotia, my thoughts naturally revert to that section of the province from which I come —I refer to the island of Cape Breton. I believe there is no section of Canada—and I do not desire to make any invidious comparisons—that has contributed more men to the allied forces than the island of Cape Breton, and the supply of men who are willing to place themselves under the colours and to assist the other armies of the Allies in the future is not by any means exhausted. Not only have the men of Nova Scotia contributed towards the success of the Allies, but the women are contributing as well. In every city, town, hamlet and village, aye, in every farmhouse and in the abode of every fisherman and mine worker in the province, there is work going on for the purpose of relieving the inconveniences and of adding to the comforts of the soldiers at the front. Red cross work is going on in every section of the province. Early in the war the Hon. Mr. Murray, Premier of Nova Scotia, sent out a call to the people of he province to contribute to the Belgian relief fund. That call was handsomely responded to, and the province of Nova Scotia takes its place in the front rank of those sections of Canada that have listened to and heeded the voice of those who are in need as the result of the war which is now being waged. Nova Scotia is not a rich province, and the contributions made by its inhabitants are in many instances being felt. Sacrifices are being made on every hand by the people of the province, and the watchword of economy sent forth to the people of Canada by the Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White) is practised in the greatest degree in Nova Scotia. We know that the cost of living is going up by leaps and bounds, while the earnings of a large proportion of our people are decreasing in the same ratio. It is extremely difficult for many of our people who are engaged in day labour to make ends meet, and they are under all these circumstances, considering the members of the families which this class of people have contributed to the war, perhaps making greater sacrifices than those more happily circumstanced. But if economy is to be the watchword, and if it is only by the practice of the most rigid economy that we can hope that the people of this country will be able to bear their reasonable proportion of the expense resultant from this war, the example is not being set for us by the Government of Canada. The Government of which the Minister of Finance is such a distinguished member is not doing its share in the practice of economy and thus relieve as far as possible the burdens of the people. I take the record of the Post Office Department, recently published. The expenditure of the department from 1912 up to 1915 has increased enormously. During the last fiscal year the expenses of the department have gone to $15,961,191, an increase of some $4,000,000 over and above that which was spent a few years ago. In 1912, there was a surplus of $1,310,219. On the 31st of March, 1915, there was a deficit of $2,914,-541. In 1913, there was a surplus of $1,177,-000. In 1914, there was a surplus of $134,-137. In 1911-12, the net revenue of the Post Office Department was $10,482,255. In 1915, the net revenue was $13,046,000, so that the enormous deficit of the Post Office Department during the last fiscal year is not due to any decrease in the revenue of that department, but to the unwarranted expenditure embarked upon by the late Postmaster General. The revenue increased by 30 per cent while the expenditure increased by 75 per cent. We have some explanation for the extraordinary increase that has taken place in this department in the fact that during the past four years, while there were 1,507 employees dismissed and 3,860 who tendered their resignations—which I am bound to say in this connection is a euphemism, as the resignations were compelled—or a total of those who resigned and who were dismissed of 5,357, there were appointed in their places no less a number than 9,903 officials. Therefore there are now 4,546 employees in the Post Office Department in this year more than there were four years ago. Therefore if economy is so essential to the welfare of the country in the present crisis, the Post Office Department has not set a good example to the people of Canada.

The expenditure in the Department of Public Works for the last five years is as follows:

1911-12	13,928,666
1912-13	18,844,224
1913-14	27,991,436
1914-15	29,283,316

That is to say, in a year after the war had broken out, and while economy is preached by the Finance Minister to the common people in Canada, "economy" was practised by his colleague of the Department of Public Works in such a way that the expenditure was about two millions of dollars more than for the previous year. I understand that a small reduction is made in the fiscal year 1915-16, but that it amounts only to about three million dollars. So I think there is great scope for the exercise of economy on the part of these two important departments of government.

There is another respect in which, I think, this Government might exercise economy and thus lighten the burdens that the tax-payer will be called upon to bear. At this session of Parliament we shall be called upon to provide another enormous sum of money, by either direct or indirect taxation. The subject of the economy to which I refer is the Hudson Bay railway and terminals. These were estimated to cost $17,000,000, and I understand that up to the present time the expenditure on this head has amounted to about $7,000,000. I am bound to say, there is a very wide divergence of opinion as to the advisability of carrying on that undertaking. I do not know upon what data the construction of the Hudson Bay railway took form in the mind of the late ministry. The plan was conceived, I understand, some years ago, and it was urged upon the ground that it was necessary to complete the road, not only in order to open up a large and fertile section of Canada, but also to afford another outlet for the export of Canadian grain. A great many things have happened in Canada since the inception of this work. For one thing, the Government of the United States has offered to give free access to the markets of that country for the farmers of the Canadian West. It is not now necessary to expend vast sums of money in order to secure an outlet for the products of the Canadian farmers. The Government can very readily provide another outlet by simply agreeing to take down the barriers in this respect that exist between the two countries. And, as to the Hudson Bay railway as a colonization road, the same necessity does not exist for it as existed some years ago. We know that up to 1911 a great stream of immigration flowed into Canada from all the countries of Europe, and not only did Europeans come, but some of the very best citizens of the United States found it to their advantage to take up their household goods and move across the boundary into the Canadian West. Unfortunately, for reasons which I shall not discuss at this time, immigration has fallen off to such a degree that it has reached the vanishing point. There is no expectation that in the near future there will be a very large influx of imigrants into this country. Therefore, the necessity for a colonization road is not urgent at this time. I would appeal to hon. gentlemen sitting upon the Treasury benches to spend no more money upon the Hudson Bay railway until the conditions in Canada are more favourable and the people are better able to bear the burden of extra taxation than they are at this time.

But I have another reason to urge why the expenditure on the Hudson Bay railway should cease. I have before me the report made by Mr. Anderson, who, I understand, was in charge of the Hudson bay survey during the past year. From the report I read:

> When the Acadia arrived off Cape Chidley, on the 19th of July, open water was visible from aloft, and the steamer Bonaventure, some miles to the northward, reported similar conditions. The ice, for the most part, appeared to be winter ice, probably from Hudson and Ungava bays. Although occasional bergs and arctic ice were seen, the main pack of arctic ice had passed to the southward. "Winter ice" means ice one year old, but "Arctic" or "polar" ice may be two or many years old, and consequently much heavier and harder.

The constant easterly winds held the field ice packed, making further progress impossible until 31st July, when the wind veered to the westward and finally blew a full gale from the N.N.West, opening up the pack. Conditions were not so severe after this date, but until the latter part of August great fields were continually passing out, part of which returned with the flood tide, partially obstructing the passage.

It was specially noticed that the greater portion of this heavy pack ice drifted towards the south side of the entrance about Cape Chidley and the Button islands, rather than to Resolution island, and, with the strong tidal currents, making it a dangerous locality for any steamer attempting a passage. During the ebb tide the ice pack may become well opened, affording good leads, but on the change of tide it would close up with great pressure in places.

A couple of years ago a powerful Newfoundland steel sealing steamer was caught and received a very bad nip.

During July, 1913, a small auxiliary schooner, being caught in this locality, received such pressure that oil tanks in her hold were burst. The crew abandoned the ship and took refuge on the ice, but on the change of tide, when the pressure slackened, the ice opened up again, and as the ship appeared still seaworthy, owing to her staunch construction, the crew returned on board and managed to clear the ice pack before the next tide.

On the other hand, towards the north side of the entrance, about Resolution island, although the tidal currents were found just as strong, the ice appeared lighter and much honeycombed, probably some that had been carried out on the south side by one tide and returned by the next.

Entering with much ice, about the best passage has generally been found close to Hatton headland and along the north shore. Careful note should be taken of the direction of the wind. A fresh south wind would drive the ice to the northward when a mid-channel course would be the better one to take.

As already mentioned, navigation would have been greatly impeded by ice until the end of August for vessels entering the strait from the east, and from early in October entering from the west, because Fox channel ice began to appear at the west entrance about the latter date, greatly interfering with vessels.

The Acadia, leaving Hudson bay on October 15th, found the passage between Diggs and Nottingham islands about closed, and was forced to pass the night in the ice pack. On the following morning the change of tide opened the pack sufficiently to allow passage, and all ice was cleared about ten miles past Eric cove. Cape Chidley was cleared for the season on the 2nd of November with no ice in sight.

During the past season, after the middle of September, snow storms were the order of the day, and this, taken in conjunction with the ice condition detailed above, rendered the period during which ordinary tramp steamers could have navigated the strait with safety very limited.

Owing to the great masses of ice to be encountered and the difficulty of finding the best lead, hydroplanes operated in connection with the wireless stations might be used with good results, to inform captains concerning the disposition of the ice and where they may find open leads. These would be particularly useful in the autumn at the passage between Diggs and Nottingham islands. It is submitted that they might be more useful than the seagoing tugs hitherto suggested. The information would be obtained much more quickly, with no danger of being caught in the ice. On the other hand, there would be the danger of an accident occurring and the crew of the machine being cast away on an ice flow. In the autumn frequent snow storms and heavy winds might hamper the operation of these machines, and in the spring fogs caused by the sun on ice fields would certainly be a drawback.

Ice conditions in James Bay.

The prevailing northerly winds in Hudson bay during the early summer drive all the field ice to the south end of the bay, very effectually closing up the entrance to James bay until the latter part of August or first of September. This ice consists chiefly of winter ice, although icebergs and Fox channel ice have been found. During the season of 1912 the powerful steel sealing steamer Beothic reported having encountered heavy Fox channel ice and many bergs in this locality about the middle of August, and a period of 8 days was spent in forcing a passage. Strong northerly currents were also reported when abreast Cape Henrietta Maria, making considerable motion in the ice fields that greatly increased the danger. It is quite unusual to find strong currents in this locality, but they were probably caused by a constant northerly wind forcing the water into James bay.

An ordinary tramp steamer would stand a poor chance of escaping injury under similar circumstances, and it would not be well to attempt this region until the latter part of August or early in September. The closing of James bay, for the season, may be taken about the middle of November, as weather conditions are much similar to Hudson bay.

Here we have the report made by an officer of the department sent out specially to investigate the matter, and he reported the fact that Hudson bay is safe for navigation only for a period of about two months in the year. I ask: Is the need for another outlet for our wheat so urgent, or the need for opening up more territory for the settler so pressing, that in the face of the enormous burden we are called upon to bear, we should be expected to continue the operations that have been carried on on the Hudson Bay railway and terminals for the last two years? I spoke to a young man in my own constituency who worked on Hudson bay last year. He told me that in the latter part of August he went on board a steamer to return to his home, and that when they were two days out they were held up for nine days in the ice. I am bound to say that from all the evidence which I have been able to gather, this country, under the present circumstances, would not be justified in embarking upon any further expenditure in respect of the Hudson Bay railway or terminals. I trust that the Government will heed the criticism that is being made in many parts of the country, and will, for the present at least, eliminate from the estimates to be submitted to Parliament by the Finance Minister, any item of further expenditure in that direction.

We have had a very interesting discussion during the last two or three days on the subject of shells and the manufacture of shells in Canada. This war has given rise to many new industries in Canada, and the manufacture of shells is one of the largest and most important of them. I was very much interested in the address delivered by the Solicitor General (Hon. Arthur Meighen) this afternoon, in which he endeavoured to defend the actions of the Shell Committee in respect of certain contracts which were let for the manufacture of shells during the last year and a half. While the Solicitor General admitted that the price of shells was in some respects somewhat high, he excused the exorbitance of the price by saying that new plants had to be established, and that, for the purpose of defraying the cost of these new plants, it was necessary that the prices in the first contracts awarded should be somewhat high. I have here a statement which I will quote from a New York despatch dated November 15 last:

> A letter written by Sir Henry M. Pellatt, president of the Steel and Radiation Company, Limited, of Canada, has been received in the financial district naming prices being paid for certain classes of shells in Canada. A contract for 100,000 eighteen pound shrapnel shells was mentioned as obtained by that company at a price of $3.80 per shell, and this order was renewed at the same figure. Another contract also renewed called for 100,000 eighteen-pound explosive shells at $4 each.
> The first and second contracts will be completed about January 31, 1916, after which renewals of the first contract will be completed every four months and renewals of the second contract about every three months.
>
> On each of the first two contracts and on the renewals, the letter said, the profits were estimated at $200,000. The third contract should turn in profits, the letter stated, of $250,000.
> Further renewals of the contract, said the letter, will probably be at gradually shaded prices, but as against this we are gradually reducing costs month by month. Our rejected shells are now less than ⅞ of 1 per cent of our output.

Here we have a statement made through Sir Henry Pellatt, the president of this large and important manufacturing company, that the profits upon these shells amounted to $2 each, not only in respect of the first contract, but in respect of first renewals and all subsequent renewals as well, upon which he avers that the profits amounted to at least $200,000, and in one case to $250,000. I think it would be well for the hon. Solicitor General to get close to his friend, Sir Henry Pellatt, and tell him that the only justification or defence that he could think of for the exorbitance and greed of shell contractors was that it was necessary to pay the first cost of erecting their plant, and say to him that that is no longer a justification for continuing to manufacture shells at that price, inasmuch as the original cost must long since have been paid.

The Solicitor General has endeavoured to get the Government away from the responsibility for the conduct of the Shell Committee upon the ground that it is a creation of the Imperial Government. In a few moments I shall refer to that subject, but for the moment I desire to say that on the 20th day of December, 1915, referring to orders of shells from the United States, Mr. David Lloyd George said:

> David A. Thomas comes back speaking in the highest possible terms of the service rendered this country by J. P. Morgan and Company, not merely in the selection of firms for contracts, as in fact they saved us many millions of pounds by their efforts to reduce the inflated prices prevailing before they took the matter in hand.

It just struck me, on reading that paragraph, that it is most unfortunate that the Shell Committee of Canada came in for no encomiums from Mr. Lloyd George in the language that he addressed to the Morgan Company. I am quite sure that Mr. Lloyd George would have been glad to pay a similar compliment to the Shell Committee in Canada, were they deserving of it. But it is well known all over this country that the Shell Committee, as constituted here in Canada, instead of endeavouring to reduce the price of shells to the Government of Great Britain, were actually a party to enhancing the price of shells so that certain particular friends might reap the benefit. The Solicitor-General stated that the Shell Committee was a creature of the British Government, and that this Government have nothing to do with it, and that, therefore, this Parliament has no right to investigate their actions or inquire into the disposition of any moneys that passed through their hands. I have here Hansard of last session for the month of April, and turning to page 2614 I find a statement made to this House by the right hon. Prime Minister. After referring to certain investigations which took place in the Public Accounts Committee during the last session, he said:

But, nevertheless, I realize, and I think all members of the Government realize, the Minister of Militia himself realizes, that that department was not organized to perform the enormous amount of work that is imposed upon it at present. What has been the course taken by the Mother Country under similar conditions? In respect of such matters, the course taken by the Government of the Mother Country has been to call to the aid of the Government the best business ability of the country. The business men of that country have responded and splendid results have been thus obtained. The Minister of Militia himself, it is only just to say, at least two or three months ago brought this question before Council and urged upon Council the advisability of having his department assisted in this regard by a committee of three business men. In respect of some other matters, the Minister of Militia has taken a course along that line which has brought about most excellent results.

If the House will pardon me—my remarks have been extended beyond what I had at first contemplated—I wish to place before Parliament the record of what has been accomplished by the committee appointed in this country to fill orders which the British Government desired to place here, if they could be placed in Canada, for the supply of munitions. A committee was formed by the Minister of Militia in the early stages of the war, consisting at that time of Col. A. Bertram, Chairman; Thos. Cantley, Esq.; Geo. W. Watts, Esq.; E. Carnegie, Esq., representing the manufacturers; Col. T. Benson, Master General of Ordnance, Col. Greville Harston, Chief Inspector of Arms and Ammunition; and Lt.-Col. F. D. Lafferty, R.C.A., Superintendent of the Dominion Arsenal, representing the Department of Militia and Defence.

Here we have the history of the formation of the Shell Committee which the Solicitor-General was ungracious enough to repudiate this afternoon. The right hon. Prime Minister at the same time stated that he had asked the Chairman of that committee to prepare a report of their work for the purpose of showing what was being done by a business organization of that character, and he placed upon Hansard the report of the committee. I shall not read it all, but from the opening to the closing sentences of that report there is evidence, which cannot be controverted for a single moment, that this committee was brought into being by the present Government and by the Minister of Militia and Defence. It says:

On the 8th of September, 1914, at a meeting held by the Minister at the Dominion Arsenal, the following committee was appointed to organize the work throughout the Dominion.

This is the committee in respect of which the Solicitor General read a letter written by Mr. Hitchens some time ago.

Another paragraph of this report says:

Perhaps an equally important decision was the appointment of an inspection company to deal with all shell components; this has taken the entire responsibility of inspection from the shell assembling manufacturers, and has also given the shell committee the opportunity of satisfying themselves beyond any doubt that the component parts of shells are correct before the finished shell passes into the hands of the Government inspector.

Many other minor details regarding insurance, shipping, financing, etc., were decided, which have proved to be of great help in carrying on the work of the committee.

4.—Executive Work.

The executive work of the committee has been very wisely entrusted to the chairman, Colonel Bertram, who reports weekly to the Minister of Militia and also to the committee when it meets (which is usually monthly) or more often, at the call of the minister.

The work consists of controlling what might be regarded as a huge combination of factories, in which various contracts are being executed to British War Office specifications, which entails constant attention and queries regarding the selection of suitable factories, the placing of contracts, instructing manufacturers in the art, inspecting the parts made, and the payment and auditing of accounts, etc.

Before contracts are placed, the ability of the firm to carry out the work is fully investigated. If there is any question as to their plant being unsuitable, a competent inspector is sent to report upon the state of the factory.

To safeguard the interests of the committee and to insure the work being carried out in accordance to promise, contracts are placed subject to concellation, if not carried out promptly.

Each manufacturer is supplied with a set of inspection gauges as a guide in making the manufacturing gauges required. They are kept to check the working gauges, and are the property of the committee.

The preparation of drawings of the gauges for the various component parts of the different shells manufactured and the preparation of gauges and their distribution and use, involve a considerable amount of labour.

The inspection of the various component parts, including the analyses of material, various physical tests calling for the employment of over 146 inspectors, besides four chief inspectors, show in some measure the nature and extent of this part of the work. Most of the inspectors employed are experienced machinists and tool makers, who can be trusted to carry out the work thoroughly.

The final inspection of the finished shell is carried out by an army of nearly 200 examiners and district inspectors, under the direction of the chief inspector of arms and ammunition.

On receipt of a certificate that the shells have passed examination and have been packed ready for shipment, payment is made to the manufacturer.

A chartered accountant recommended by the general manager of the Bank of Montreal, checks the accounts of the committee every month. These are then forwarded to Mr. J. W. Borden, chief accountant for the Militia Department. It might be said in passing that the committee's accountant has expressed himself in gratifying terms of the highly efficient way in which the accounts of the committee are kept.

5.—Shell Contracts.

When it became generally known that shells were being manufactured successfully, the demands for contracts from all classes of manufacturers were very numerous, and it became necessary to inspect the factories to decide which were suitable for undertaking the work. Visits were made to them, and it was found that a large number of additional factories could be usefully employed.

The ordnance advisor reported this matter and indicated how many more shells could be undertaken. The Minister of Militia called a meeting of the committee at Ottawa, and, after discussing the matter, cabled to Lord Kitchner, pointing out that much larger contracts could be undertaken by the manufacturers in Canada. He emphasized the fact that many works were standing idle in the Dominion, while contracts were being placed in the United States for shells by the British War Office. This resulted in additional contracts for 18-pr. fixed ammunition, complete without fuses and empty 18-pr. shrapnel shells.

It was proposed by several of the manufacturers that a deputation from the committee should be sent to the War Office, London, to put their claims before the Secretary of State for War. The Minister of Militia decided, on the recommendation of the committee, to send Mr. David Carnegie, as he was familiar with the whole situation. It was also decided that he should visit Woolwich Arsenal and obtain the latest information on the various details in the manufacture of complete ammunition.

The result of his visit has been fully reported to the Minister of Militia, but it might be briefly stated here that the War Office officials did not fully understand the nature and importance of the committee's work, and had no idea that the factories in Canada were capable of undertaking such contracts, until these facts were placed before them.

Mr. Carnegie presented to the Master General of the Ordnance, General Sir Von-Donop, K.C.B., one of the first shrapnel shells made entirely of Canadian materials, excepting the copper band. He also informed the various officials at the War Office that it was the intention of the Minister of Militia and his committee to make ultimately the copper bands in Canada. As a result of this visit, several additional large contracts have been placed with the committee.

The only material not made in Canada is copper, which, however, is mined and smelted in the Dominion and subsequently sent to the United States for refining.

Miscellaneous.

In addition to the foregoing, the Minister of Militia, through his committee, has made several investigations for the War Office in connection with the supply of propellants and high explosives. An investigation was undertaken regarding the supply of nitro-cellulose powder by a large firm in the United States. Other matters have been investigated, such as the supply of rifles and ammunition for the Russian Government.

I should like to know by what process this committee, over night, had its authority transferred from the Canadian Government to the War Office in England. The only defence the Solicitor General attempted to make, by way of answer to the hon. member for St. John that a committee be appointed to investigate the transactions carried on by this committee, was that the committee was appointed by the British Government, it was a committee over which this Government had no control. And he went further—and here I am at a loss to understand how an agile mind like that of the Solicitor General sometimes lapses—and he made the admission that if it were shown that any member of the Government was responsible for this committee in any way, an inquiry would have to be granted. I trust that the Solicitor General will not require further coaxing or cajoling on the part of hon. member for St. John or any other member of this House, but that he will advise his colleagues in the Cabinet that it is up to them to grant a committee to inquire into the purchases by this commission because I, by reading these remarks made by the Prime Minister in his place in the House a year ago, have brought the appointment and control of this committee directly home to the Minister of Militia. Do we want any further proof that the Shell Committee is an adjunct to the patronage dispensing department of this Government? Is it not well known all over Canada that it has been absolutely impossible to get a contract for shells from the committee unless the applicants had the endorsation of certain Conservatives in the sections of country from which they came? It is well known that—

Mr. ROGERS: That is a very strong statement and I beg to take objection to it because it is absolutely incorrect.

Mr. KYTE: I have so often seen the virtuous indignation depicted on the face of the hon. Minister of Public Works in respect to wrong-doings in the party of which he is such an ornament, that I am not impressed with his interruption to-night. It is well known that in eastern Canada one of the largest steel manufacturing companies of this country was obliged to go around, week after week and month after month, beseeching the privilege of manufacturing shells, and it was not until officials of that company were able to enlist the sympathy of certain prominent Conservatives in Toronto that that concern succeeded in getting a contract.

Then what about the question of the appointment of shell inspectors? I have just read, from the report of the shell committee which was read to this House during the last session of Parliament by the Prime Minister, that they appointed a special committee for shell inspection. Let us see how these shell inspectors were appointed. The Solicitor General seems to be very much surprised that the appointment of shell inspectors was a part of the party patronage of this Government throughout this country. I have in my hand certain correspondence which passed between the Conservative candidate in my riding at the last election and the Conservative candidate in my riding at the next election, relative to the appointment of an inspector of shells. The first letter is as follows:

Glace Bay, C.B., July 29, 1915.

Joseph A. Gillies, Esq., Barrister, etc.,
Sydney, C.B.

Dear Mr. Gillies,—I have your favour under date of June 28th, with reference to the application of the above-noted for a position as inspection of shell steel. I have to-day written Mr. ———, as you suggest, and am also placing the case before the Borden Club, through whose hands all Sydney recommendations must be made.

Thanking you for your interest in the matter,

Yours faithfully,

(Sgd.) John C. Douglas.

I am sure it comes as a shock to the Minister of Public Works to learn that the appointment of shell inspectors is a matter of party patronage in the province of Nova Scotia. Mr. Douglas is the Conservative candidate in South Cape Breton for the next election, and is at present a member of the local legislature for Cape Breton.

The second letter which I have is as follows:

Glace Bay, C.B.,
June 29, 1915.

Sydney, N.S.

Dear Mr. :—

Mr. J. A. Gillies has written me recommending that you be given an appointment as Inspector of Shell Steel at Sydney. As I have advised Mr. Gillies, I have also to advise you that all recommendations for Sydney positions must be made through the Borden Club.

I have referred your application to that body, and will be pleased to act on their advices at any time such a vacancy occurs.

Yours faithfully,

(Sgd.) John C. Douglas.

Here under this Shell Committee, which was appointed by the Minister of Militia but which has just been repudiated by the Solicitor General and said by him to have been appointed by the War Office in England for the purpose of having shells manufactured in Canada at the lowest price and under the best conditions, we have the spectacle of the inspectors being recommended by the Borden Club, which club has made this Shell Committee an adjunct to the political patronage of the county of Cape Breton. And I have another letter——

Mr. J. D. REID: Give us the name of a man who was appointed on the recommendation of that club.

Mr. KYTE: If I were to give a name I would expect the man would be dismissed from his position inside of forty-eight hours.

Mr. REID: I say that the hon. member cannot give a name.

Mr. KYTE: Inasmuch as the Minister of Customs does not know whether I can or not, his statement is not of very much value. (Reads.)

Sydney, C.B., June 30, 1915.

Mr. ———
Sydney, N.S.

Dear Sir,—I am to-day in receipt of the enclosed letter received from Mr. Douglas in reply to mine of the 28th, written in your behalf, making application for the position of inspector of shell steel. From the enclosed you will see that Mr. Douglas has acted upon suggestion, namely, that he should write yourself so that you might see that he was interesting himself in the matter.

I hope to see you get the position. I will see the president of the Borden Club and will urge upon him to have you strongly recommended for the appointment.

Trusting that you may get this position, and wishing to see you from time to time, I remain,

Yours very truly,

(Sgd.) J. A. Gillies.

Now, I would like to know what position the president of the Borden Club in Sydney is in to judge of the efficiency or capacity of a man to discharge the duties of shell inspector. I cannot recall at this moment who the president of the Borden Club is, but I do know that that very honourable and respectable position has been held in the past by a lawyer, by a doctor, and by a merchant. I have no doubt that the position is filled at the present time by one or other of the classes I have mentioned. But is it not a most humiliating spectacle, if the statement of the Solicitor-General is true, to find that a committee appointed by the Imperial Government upon the recommendation of the Minister of Militia and Defence to discharge the important and serious duties of purchasing and manufacturing shells in Canada must depend for the inspection of those shells upon recommendations made by the Borden Club? And that is the situation all through. Do we need any other evidence of partisanship in the administration of the Department of Militia and Defence? Why, it was only yesterday that I read in an Ottawa paper that the privilege of shaving the chins of volunteers in Lansdowne Park last summer could not be awarded to a barber in Ottawa unless he had a certificate from the dispenser of political patronage. I also know that in a small town in the province of Nova Scotia, the privilege of washing the soiled linen of the soldiers in a small encampment of volunteers was awarded to the man who now enjoys that important bit of patronage by the Conservate candidate in the riding. The captain in charge did not think it of very much consequence what particular laundryman washed the soiled linen of the company under his command, and he sent the laundry to a laundryman who was a Liberal. Immediately afterwards the captain was sent for by the dispenser of political patronage, the Conservative candidate, and was asked to immediately transfer the laundry to another laundryman. The captain of the company asked why it was necessary to make a change, and the patronage dispenser said, "it is not for you to ask; it is for you to obey."

Now, Mr. Speaker, we have other instances to show that so far as the Militia Department is concerned, the whole province of Nova Scotia is reeking with partisanship. Take for instance the recruiting officers. I stated a moment ago that Nova Scotia was nobly doing her duty in the matter of sending recruits to the front. I know that there is only one privilege practically allowed to Liberals in the province of Nova Scotia, and that is to fight in the trenches. But the commissions are very rigidly guarded by the dispensers of Government patronage in the province. I cannot recall at the present moment the name of one Liberal in the province who is a recruiting officer. There may be, I would not say absolutely that there are no Liberal recruiting officers in Nova Scotia, but at the present moment I cannot recall the name of one. I do know, however, a gentleman in the province of Nova Scotia whose only son was among the first to enlist, and who has been fighting in the trenches for the last eighteen months, bearing all the fatigues and all the discomforts and all the dangers that pertain to life in the trenches—that man was sincerely and honestly interested in the Allies' cause and desirous that Nova Scotia should give the best of her men to the great cause. He attended several recruiting meetings in the province of Nova Scotia, and I say that without exception he is the most effective recruiting officer that I have ever heard in my life. After a meeting that I attended was over, I asked him if he was employed or commissioned by the Department of Militia and Defence to act as a recruiting officer. He said: "No, I am not." He added, "I am doing this because my heart is in the work. I was told that the department would appoint me if I got a recommendation from a certain man responsible for the patronage in that part of the country, but I said I would not do so." And he was not appointed.

Take the question of medical officers in Nova Scotia. There may be some Liberal medical men in that province who have received commissions from the Department of Militia and Defence but at the present moment I cannot recall the name of one. I speak of course of those who have joined the service since war broke out. I do know of one who belonged to the militia of Nova Scotia for many years as a medical officer to a particular regiment, and whose position has not been taken from him. He is still a medical officer under the Department of Militia and Defence, but apart from that case, I cannot recall a single Liberal medical officer in the Province of Nova Scotia who is attached to the forces at the present time. I do know, however, several Liberal medical men who are anxious to do their bit in the great war that is now going on, but they were refused commissions in the Canadian forces, and were obliged to apply to the War Office in London and became attached to units of the Imperial aramy. That is absolutely true. I could name half a dozen Liberal medical men who are attached to the Imperial forces under these circumstances. The right hon the Prime Minister realizes as every hon. member of this House realizes the importance of this country being united in this war. Why, Sir, so impressed has this Government become upon the subject of unity among our people that they have swallowed themselves on the question of holding an election. Instead of being in favour of an election now, as certain prominent members of the ministry were in favour of an election in June last, we have this paragraph placed in the speech with which His Royal Highness the Governor- General opened this session of Parliament:

> The life of the present Parliament expires in the autumn of this year, and, under existing legislation a dissolution and election would be necessary in the early future. My advisors, however, are of the opinion that the wishes of the Canadian people and the present requirements of the war would be best met by avoiding the distraction and confusion consequent upon a general election at so critical a time.

Keep our people united; have no divisions and no distractions such as would follow in the wake of a general election. That is the cry at the present moment. Mr. Speaker, I question very much the sincerity of certain hon. gentlemen when they speak of the advisability of having a united country. Do they realize that they have divided the Liberals and Conservatives if not all over Canada, certainly in the province of Nova Scotia, on the question of the war. Why is it that none but young Conservatives are recommended for positions in the army? Why is it that none but Conservatives are appointed as recruiting officers? Why is it that none but Conservatives are appointed as medical officers? If the Government desires to keep the people united, I would suggest to the Minister of Militia and Defence that he appoint a few Liberal officers before he gets very much older or carries on the work of the department very much longer.

These are only a few instances that I might recite of the manner in which the administration of the Militia Department is carried on in the province of Nova Scotia. The whole fabric is reeking with shameless and inexcusable partisanship from the one end of the province to the other. It is up to the Minister of Militia to remedy that condition, and I think I am able to say, and say with confidence, that if we have not had more recruits in Nova Scotia it may be because of the unfortunate divisions that have been made amongst the people in that province in respect to the appointments that I have mentioned.

There are several other matters that I intended to refer to, but I have already exceeded the limit of my time. Now, there is one more subject that I am going to deal with and then I am done. Last session we had an investigation in the Public Accounts Committee which resulted in the disclosure of scandals that were absolutely unheard of, taking into account the circumstances under which these scandals were fostered in this country. We do know that two hon. members of this House, when it was suggested that they had been implicated in dealing in supplies for the Militia Department, stood up and indignantly denied the accusation. We know what happened, we know the investigation that took place in the Public Accounts Committee, and we know that the right hon. the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden) found it incumbent upon himself to read both of these hon .gentlemen out of the party and out of this House. Here is the language used by the right hon. gentleman on that occasion:

> An delt me say now, for the benefit of Parliament, and particularly for the information of persons throughout this country who may be concerned in selling supplies or materials to the Government account, if any man in Canada, be he Conservative or Liberal, purposes to commit any fraud or imposition upon the Government and people of this country, or to be concerned in any attempt for that purpose, especially in connection with the war vote, he should remember that there are courts of justice in this country and that the doors of the penitentiary are opening for every person who commits such an offense.

I think the Prime Minister stated when he addressed the House the other day that there had been some three prosecutions and one conviction for frauds committed upon the Government. I was not aware that there were three prosecutions. I am aware that there was one prosecution in Regina a few months ago and that a conviction resulted from that prosecution. If others have taken place in the criminal courts, I am not aware of it. Further, the Prime Minister said, speaking of the case of the late member for Kings, Nova Scotia.

> But I am bound to say that his (Mr. Foster's) explanation to me of his undertaking the duty and his explanation—if it could be called an explanation—of his failure to supervise in the most careful manner the expenditure of that money and to bring back to the Government an exact account, with vouchers of every dollar that has been expended must be regarded as far from satisfactory.
> Therefore, in respect of the honourable members for Carleton, and in respect to the honourable member for Kings, N.S., I feel that I owe it as a duty to the Government of which I am the head of the party, of which in Federal affairs I am the leader, and to this House, and to this county, to express, as I do here express, my firm disapproval of their conduct in respect of the matters which have been under investigation by the Public Accounts Committee.

That is the declaration which, I believe, resulted in these two hon. gentlemen sending in their resignations to your predecessor, Mr. Speaker. It is well known that the counties of Carleton, Ont., and Kings, N.S., are unrepresented at the present time in the House of Commons. But the Conservative party in Kings, N.S., met in annual meeting a few weeks ago, and I will read for the information of this House what the Conservative party in Kings County thinks of the repudiation of their member by the Prime Minister:

Kentville, January 6—The annual meeting of the Kings county Liberal-Conservative association was held this afternoon at the court house. After the usual routine business was finished, the president invited DeWitt Foster to address the meeting. At the close of a powerful address on the war and Canada's participation in it, the following resolution was moved by Councillor C. R. Nichols, seconded by Councillor W. A. Reid, and carried amid three cheers and a tiger:

"Resolved that the Liberal-Conservative Association of Kings county, in annual meeting assembled, take this opportunity to express its appreciation of the untiring efforts put forth by A. DeWitt Foster, in the interests of the county and to record its unbounded confidence in his integrity and ability to successfully and creditably represent Kings county in federal affairs."

Now we have the pot fairly bristling over. The Prime Minister, in indignant tones, read the member for Kings out of the party last year and the Conservative press of this country claimed great credit for him for his sturdy manliness, in determining to rid the Conservative party of all grafters and wrong-doers and for having actually read Mr. Foster out of the party. There has been no election held in Kings but I understand that if an election is called the Conservative party in Kings, living up to their resolution, will name Mr. A. DeWitt Foster as their candidate because they consider him good enough to support this Government in Parliament. What ground have I for making that assumption? There is a precedent for it. We know what happened in the province of New Brunswick a few years ago. We know that Mr. J. K. Flemming, the Premier of New Brunswick, was the subject of accusations in regard to certain peculations in which he indulged in respect to the owners of timber limits of that province. He was deposed from the leadership of his party in provincial affairs, he was driven out of the public life of the province, but the Conservative party in federal affairs, a very short time afterwards, named him their candidate in Carleton county for the House of Commons because they thought that, although he was not good enough for provincial politics, he was good enough to associate with the ministers who form this Government. I cite this instance to show the insincerity of certain elements supporting the Conservative party in this Dominion. Recalling the professions made by the First Minister and his promise to prosecute until he had landed in the penitentiary those who had been guilty of wrong-doing, I would not say that the situation of this country was so critical, but in view of what has taken place in the past, in view of what we are sure will take place in the future, the only safety, the only assurance that the people can possibly have that this Government will carry on more economically, more honestly and more in the public interest the affairs with which they have been entrusted is in the appointment of a committee of this House for the purpose of investigating every dollar of public expenditure, not only in respect to shells, but in respect to supplies of every kind and description purchased by the Government during the last eighteen months. Not until this report is presented to Parliament and the Government prove by their actions that they mean what they say, will suspicion be allayed and confidence be restored.

On motion of Mr. Murphy, the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Rogers, the House adjourned at 10.05 p.m.

Friday, January 21, 1916.

The House met at Three o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

ON THE LIBRARY.

Messieurs

Béland, Borden (Sir Robert), Boyer, Broder, Casgrain, Clark (Bruce), Copp, Crothers, Doherty, Foster (Sir George), Laurier (Sir Wilfrid), Lemieux, Lewis, Meighen, Pardee, and Pugsley.—16.

On motion of Sir Robert Borden, the report was concurred in.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN moved:

That the Select Standing Committees of this House shall severally be empowered to examine and inquire into all such matters and things as may be referred to them by the House, and to report from time to time their observations and opinions thereon, with power to send for persons, papers and records, with the exception of the Committee on Debates and that on the Library of Parliament.

Motion agreed to.

THE PRINTING OF PARLIAMENT.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN moved:

That a message be sent to the Senate to acquaint their Honours that this House will unite with them in the formation of a joint committee of both Houses on the subject of the Printing of Parliament, and that the members of the Select Standing Committee on Printing, viz.: Messrs. Bickerdike, Bowman, Brabazon, Brouillard, Cardin, Chabot, Clark (Bruce), Clarke (Wellington), Currie, Douglas, Elliot, Graham, Gray, Lavallée, L'Espérance, Martin (Montreal, Ste. Marie), Middleboro, Murphy, Nicholson, Roche, Rochon, Stevens, Verville, White (Victoria, Alta.), and Wilson (Wentworth), will act as members on the part of this House, on the said Joint Committee on the Printing of Parliament.

Motion agreed to.

THE LIBRARY OF PARLIAMENT.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN moved:

That a message be sent to the Senate to inform their Honours that this House has appointed Messrs. Béland, Borden (Sir Robert), Boyer, Broder, Casgrain, Clark (Bruce), Copp, Crothers, Doherty, Foster (Sir George), Laurier(Sir Wilfrid), Lemieux, Lewis, Meighen, Pardee and Pugsley, a committee to assist His Honour the Speaker in the direction of the Library of Parliament, so far as the interests of the House of Commons are concerned, and to act on behalf of the House of Commons as members of a Joint Committee of both Houses on the Library.

Motion agreed to.

THE PARLIAMENTARY RESTAURANT.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN moved:

That Messrs. Fripp, Pardee, Ross and Stanfield be appointed to assist Mr. Speaker in the direction of the Restaurant, as far as the interests of the Commons are concerned, and to act as members of a Joint Committee of both Houses on the Restaurant, and that a message be sent to the Senate to acquaint their Honours therewith.

Motion agreed to.

PRIVILEGE—MR. PUGSLEY.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. WILLIAM PUGSLEY: I desire to speak on a question of privilege. I had not the pleasure of being in the House yesterday when my hon. friend the Solicitor General spoke, but I observe that he regretted my absence, and pointed out that he had been present while I spoke. I can assure my hon. friend that my absence was not caused by any want of desire to hear him. I had understood that my hon. friend was to follow me, but the distinguished and able debater from North Essex (Mr. Wilcox) was put up so as to give my hon. friend breathing time. If I had known my hon. friend was going to speak yesterday I should have made my engagements to suit. My hon. friend made an extraordinary statement yesterday with reference to the shell matter, which I think it is my duty to call to the attention of the House. It appears on page 129 of Hansard, as follows:

Here is the way it is put upon Hansard, doubtless for distribution throughout the length and breadth of Canada:

I was quoting from the speech of Mr. Thomas:

"That must be considered, and I may tell you that the cost of shells in Canada has been higher than in competitive countries. It is complained that fat orders have gone to the United States, but I can assure you that a big slice will be reserved for Canada as long as the price is fairly satisfactory. The prices so far have been far higher than in the United States or in Great Britain."

Then, the Solicitor General proceeds to say:

Strange that that should be the way that it appears in Hansard in the speech of the hon. member for St. John, when the words in the quotation from which he read distinctly say "that the prices have been higher than in the United States."

The fair inference from that is that I read an extract to this House which was altered in Hansard.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. PUGSLEY:—at my instance, I presume, for the purpose of being circulated broadcast throughout Canada.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The fair inference from the words of the Solicitor General is that I read what purported to be an extract from the speech of Mr. Thomas, and that it was altered in Hansard for distribution throughout the length and breadth of Canada, so as to give a faulty impression of what Mr. Thomas had said. The extract as I read it to the House was sent to Hansard word for word, without any alteration. I did not see any member of the Hansard staff upon the subject; I had no communication directly or indirectly with any member of the staff, and the error which occurred occurred in Hansard and without any fault of mine. As I read the extract, so I sent it out to Hansard with other memoranda for which the Hansard reporter asked. I noticed the mistake when I read over my speech in the Unrevised Hansard, and I immediately corrected it, striking out the word "far," and sent the correction for the Revised Hansard, before my attention was called to the remarks of the Solicitor General.

With regard to the matter of the purchase of submarines, my hon. friend, very unfairly I thought, sought to convey the impression that when I made the statement to the House that to my surprise certain matters had been left uninvestigated, that certain questions had been left unanswered, I at that time had in my possession a copy of the evidence taken by the commission; because my hon. friend is reported to have made this statement, which appears on page 137 of Hansard:

> I quote from the evidence. I am informed that the evidence has been handed to the Opposition—at all events to the leader of the Opposition—and, consequently should be at the disposal of his followers in the same way as it was at mine, which was only yesterday.

Now, Sir, the day when I spoke on the subject of submarines was the day before my hon. friend had himself obtained the evidence.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What I said was that I had received it yesterday.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I had not seen the evidence; I had not heard of it, and I presumed it would not be available for anybody until the official report was brought down and submitted to the House. That is the time when we have a right to expect the evidence and when I expected that it would be brought down, and I very much suspect that, after I had made my remarks with regard to the submarines, my hon. friend took pains to get the evidence, and in all probability he had a copy of it sent to my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition, but it was done after I had made my remarks.

Mr. hon. friend did me an injustice in another respect when he sought to convey the impression that I had been guilty of very great unfairness in not quoting correctly the examination by Mr. Thompson before the commissioner with regard to the test.

[Mr. Pugsley.]

Mr. MEIGHEN: I rise to a point of order. This is no question of privilege whatever. The hon. gentleman is endeavouring to make a reply to my speech. He is distinctly out of order.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Not at all. The hon. gentleman went on to attack me. He stated that I had been guilty of conduct which in truth he could not describe as the conduct of a gentleman. Before he closed, it is true, he said he had made remarks which he had not intended to make, and which were unparliamentary or might be unparliamentary.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Mr. Speaker, I ask a ruling on the point of order.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I am addressing His Honour now.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I understand that the hon. member for St. John is speaking in order to correct some remarks which were made by the hon. Solicitor General, and, according to the practice followed in this House, as can be seen in Bourinot, I think that the hon. member for St. John can proceed with his remarks.

Mr. PUGSLEY: My hon. friend sought to convey the impression that I knew when I made those remarks that the commissioner had inquired very carefully into the test which had been made of the submarines, and he quoted from the evidence, as reported on page 139 of Hansard. My hon. friend sought to convey the impression that Mr. Paterson had stated what the test was. An examination of the evidence as submitted by my hon. friend shows that no such test as the hon. member speaks of was made, and therefore it shows that his attack on me as misrepresenting the test is entirely unfounded. My hon. friend proceeded to say that there was evidence that there were tests, and one would infer from his remarks that the test required the submarines to be weighted down to the extent of 5,000 tons. If we read the evidence, we find that Mr. Paterson only mentions 5,000 tons as an illustration of what the contract might require. When I call the attention of the House to the fact that the total displacement of the submarines is only 313 tons each, hon. members will see how unfair my hon. friend was when he said that there had been a full examination as to the actual tests that had been made, and that I was unfair in my remarks.

I am only going to speak of these few matters, because from one you may judge all. My hon. friend says that I was entirely wrong and unfair to this House when I stated that Mr. Logan had not been thoroughly interrogated as to his connection with this matter. Just a word as to that. When Mr. Thompson entered upon that examination, he must have had—presumably he would have, he ought to have had—that return.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I think the hon. member for St. John is trespassing beyond the question of privilege.

Mr. PUGSLEY: If, Sir, you will just allow me to reply. I based my remarks upon the return which was made to Parliament, and I said I had been amazed to find that there had been no inquiry into Mr. Logan's connection with the matter. Do you not remember, Sir, that I mentioned the fact that I watched to see whether any question would be asked of Mr. Logan as to why he whistled over the telephone when the price of $1,150,000 was named?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Surely, Mr. Speaker, this is not a personal explanation.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I am addressing the House on a point of order.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I would rise to a point of order also. This is the queerest personal explanation I have ever listened to.

Mr. SPEAKER: I trust the hon. member for St. John will keep to the question of privilege.

Mr. PUGSLEY: What I said with regard to the perfunctory examination of Captain Logan was said with the knowledge that the Order in Council passed by the British Columbia Government, which you will find at page 9 of the correspondence relating to the purchase of two submarines for the Canadian Government, contained these words:

> Victoria, August 21, 1914.
> In pursuance of negotiations conducted for some time previously, Captain W. H. Logan, of Lloyds, made arrangements with Mr. J. V. Paterson, general manager of the Electric Boat Company, Seattle, for the purchase of two submarines.

There is also the fact that Captain Logan had put in a bill to this Government which they paid, I believe, and which hon. gentlemen will find at page 32, as follows:

To personal fees, 15 days at $25	$375
Hotel expenses, 15 days at $10	150
Transportation from Victoria to Seattle and Tacoma, five trips	22
Wires, long-distance telephone, stenographer and other incidental expenses	$50

Having knowledge of these things, I think I had a right to express amazement that Captain Logan was not questioned as to how it happened that, though he was negotiating for a period of fifteen days in relation to this matter, he had never heard of the price. That is the reason I made the statement I did, and that is the reason why I think I am right in saying that the hon. gentleman misrepresented the matter.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I quite understand the hon. gentleman's explanation that he had not read the evidence—

Mr. PUGSLEY: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: I understand that the hon gentleman is speaking to a question of privilege.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I just wish to accept the explanation—

Mr. PUGSLEY: Let him rise to a question of privilege.

Mr. SPEAKER: The Solicitor General (Mr. Meighen) says he wishes to make a personal explanation.

Mr. PUGSLEY: No objection.

Mr. SPEAKER: I think it according to the rules and practice of the House that an hon. member is entitled to make a personal explanation before the Orders of the Day are called.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I accept the explanation of the hon. gentleman that he had not read the evidence. I assumed, of course, that before he complained of the evidence and based an attack on the integrity of a judge upon it, he would have read it. I now quite accept his explanation, and understand better than ever why he made that attack.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I wish to make a personal explanation in answer to my hon. friend. Let me say that while I had not read the evidence in official form, I did read it in the press as it came out, and the newspapers contained very full reports of what occurred from day to day.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Liberal Monthly.

Mr. PUGSLEY: No, but newspapers published in Victoria, where the examination took place. And let me say that an examination of such of the evidence as the hon .gentleman has read confirms me in that opinion and justifies the remark I made.

WRECK OF THE PILOT.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. C. A. GAUVREAU (Temiscouta): I desire to read to the House telegrams received this morning concerning the total wreck of the steamer Pilot on Red Island. In reading the first of these telegrams, I wish it to be a correction of the telegram read yesterday by the Postmaster General (Mr. Casgrain) from Mr. Thom. Mr. Thom says in this telegram:

> Forced to hire Mahone as they did nothing and she was dismantled.

I wired down to Dr. Parrot, president of the Trans-St. Laurent Navigation Co., and here is the telegram received from him this morning. In justice to the company, I think I should be allowed to read it:

> Rivière du Loup Station, Que.,
> January 21.
>
> C. A. Gauvreau, M.P.,
> Ottawa.
> Mahone ready twenty-four hours after accident. Arrangements made with Thompson for the rescue of passengers now safe on Red Island. An attempt to reach them failed yesterday on account of the strong wind. Will try again to-day with calm seas. Lots of ice. Mahone will live up to her reputation and will save the passengers.

This was received early this morning, and coming into this House at three o'clock to-day I was handed a telegram from Dr. Parrot, which I translate as follows:

> Passengers and crew of pilot have been all saved this morning by the Mahone.

I hope the Postmaster General will be pleased to hear that news. And, if permitted, now that the Pilot is a total wreck, I would ask the Postmaster General if he is going to give back to the Mahone—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order:

Mr. SPEAKER: These last remarks of the hon. gentleman are certainly out of order.

Mr. GAUVREAU: It is only a question I wish to put, and I think that at this stage of the proceedings I have the right to ask a question.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. GAUVREAU: I am denied the right to ask a question?

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member is not denied the right to ask a question; that is his right and is conceded.

[Mr. Pugsley.]

Mr. GAUVREAU: I beg you to allow me to ask a question of the Postmaster General.

Mr. SPEAKER: I understand that the hon. member has already put his question to the Postmaster General, and the case is closed.

Mr. GAUVREAU: I have no right to ask another question, then?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. GAUVREAU: Then, I will come back to this question another day.

PRIVILEGE—MR. HEPBURN.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. BERNARD R. HEPBURN (Prince Edward): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. On the 18th instant, the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) made certain observations in this House regarding my connection with shell contracts. On that particular evening I was not present in the Chamber, and I regret very much that the hon. gentleman did not tell me he was going to speak in regard to myself, or I would have made an extra effort to be present. On the following day I was out of the city and had not had an opportunity to bring the matter to the attention of the House until to-day. On page 76 of Hansard the hon. member for St. John is reported as saying:

> People came here from all parts of Canada, politicians, canvassing agents, committee men, influential people from different sections of the country, all clamouring for orders for shells, and among others my good friend the gentleman to whom I have referred, the member for Prince Edward County, obtained for his company a large order. His company is not engaged in the manufacture of steel. He owns a planing mill, I understand, and is engaged in the manufacture of wooden ware. I could understand if he had limited his application to shell boxes that would have been a worthy ambition which could have been fulfilled by the utilizing of his machinery. But he got an order for shells, and the people of Picton naturally supposed it would mean the creation of a local industry which might have justified him in pressing upon the Shell Committee and the Minister of Militia that he was right in using his influence to secure this order so as to enable a steel plant to be erected in my hon. friend's home town.

It is quite true that the firm of Hepburn Brothers, Limited, obtained an order for the forging and machining of shells. My brothers and myself, and my father before me, operated steamboats on the Great Lakes and river St. Lawrence for many years. In connection with that business we maintained and operated a machine shop at Picton. We have known General Bertram, formerly chairman of the Shell Committee, for many, many years, and have transacted to our mutual satisfaction no inconsiderable amount of business with his firm. We applied to the Shell Committee for a contract for the forging and machining of shells. We were awarded a contract, not because I was a member of Parliament, but because General Bertram and the committee knew that we had a plant and could complete any contract we undertook. We believed at that time that, with certain modifications and additions, we could utilize our plant at Picton. After having obtained the order—at a price in the fixing of which we had no part, but which was at the uniform rate given to all producers of shells for the same work at that time in Eastern Canada—we discovered, on the report of a competent engineer from Montreal, that our plant at Picton could not economically be utilized in fulfilling the contract. I then obtained further expert advice, as a result of which, having regard to the point at which billets were being manufactured, and having regard also to the fact that Montreal was the labour market of Eastern Canada, we located the plant at Montreal, where we have since forged and machined shells to the satisfaction of the committee and its inspectors. I regret to say that we were unsuccessful in securing a box order, though from time to time we waited upon the Shell Commitee. I sincerely trust that when other orders are to be placed, it will not be forgotten that the firm of Hepburn Brothers have a planing mill in Picton, and that some orders will be turned our way.

The hon. member for St. John continued:

> But he got an order for shells and took it to Montreal, and the shells are being made there now in the east end of Montreal by another concern, the member for Prince Edward County being the go-between or the middleman in connection with the transaction.

These statements are absolutely incorrect. I am a new member in this Parliament. The hon. gentleman who made that statement is an old parliamentarian, and I resent very strongly the imputation that there was anything dishonest or dishonourable in connection with my relation to this contract.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Will my hon. friend pardon me a moment?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I wish to say right here that I made no suggestion—and would be sorry to say I made any suggestion— of fraud on the part of my hon. friend. I should like to disabuse his mind in that respect.

Mr. HEPBURN: I understood that the Shell Committee was letting contracts for the Imperial Government. A firm of which I am a member and a director has obtained an order for the forging and machining of shells. That work is being done by that firm, and I have been and am giving to the business of the company as careful attention as it is possible for me to do. I have made inquiry, and I have been unable to ascertain that there is any rule or custom in this House or in the Senate that prevents a member of either body from being a shareholder or director or officer of a company or corporation holding contracts with the Imperial Government. If I violated any rule or custom, I at least, have the satisfaction of knowing that others are similarly situated. It must be known to the hon. member for St. John, as it is to most members of this House, that no inconsiderable number of the members of both parties, in the Commons as well as in the Senate, are interested in companies of that kind, as shareholders, directors, and officers. I trust that one with the long parliamentary experience of the hon. member for St. John will at least do me the justice of withdrawing the imputation which he has made against me on the floor of this House.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I have too much respect and too much regard for my hon. friend to be willing even to appear to do him an injustice. I was not finding any fault with him—not at all. The Minister of Labour may laugh, but it was with gentlemen occupying positions similar to that occupied by him—members of this Government—that I was finding fault, and with the Shell Committee. I dealt with my hon. friend's firm as a firm that was not engaged in the manufacture of steel, my point being that the Shell Committee had given orders to many people who had no plant, no machinery, and no experience in steel-manufacturing work. I made a statement also which my hon. friend says is true: that the work was not established in Picton, but in the east end of Montreal. As I explained, my hon. friend denies only the statement that I made that he was a go-between or middleman. If my hon. friend says that that is not the position he occupied, I cheerfully accept his statement, and withdraw the statement which I made to the effect that he was a go-between or middleman. But that does not at all interfere with the argument which I was making: that the Government and the Shell Committee were to be condemned for the practice that they pursued of letting out shell contracts to people who had no plant capable of manufacturing such munitions.

THE COMMANDEERING OF WHEAT.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. KNOWLES: I should like to ask the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce as to whether there will or will not be any more commandeering of wheat this winter.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I should like to fill that remarkable large receptacle for information that my hon. friend carries about with him, but, in respect to the question which he has just put, I am sorry that I cannot yet find a small donation to make to that end.

INQUIRY FOR PAPERS.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. J. J. HUGHES: I wish to call the attention of the Prime Minister and of the Minister of Militia and Defence to the fact that on March 17 last I obtained an order of the House for a copy of the correspondence in connection with an order given by the Militia Department for some 30,000 shovels from the Midvale Steel Company, of Philadelphia. Although that was ten months ago, I have not yet received the papers in connection with that matter. They should not be voluminous, and I presume that if we had them they would supply information that would be useful in connection with the matters that are now before the House. I should like to know if I may expect to receive them shortly.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I do not know anything about the matter; I will look into it and bring down a return.

THE GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH.

ADDRESS IN REPLY.

Consideration of the motion of Mr. Alfred Thompson for an Address to His Royal Highness the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, resumed from Thursday, January 20.

Hon. CHARLES MURPHY (Russell): Last night, at the conclusion of the speech of my hon. friend from Richmond (Mr. G. W. Kyte), in pursuance of what I was informed was an understanding between the two chief whips, I moved the adjournment of the debate. You, Sir, put the motion and declared it carried. Just as you were in the act of leaving the Chair, the hon. member for South Waterloo (Mr. F. S. Scott), unaware that you had put the motion to which I refer, rose and moved the adjournment of the debate. Lest there should be any misunderstanding on that point, this morning I communicated with the chief Government whip and stated that I was quite willing that the usual order of debate should be followed, and that, out of regard for the hon. member for South Waterloo, whom I hold in esteem, I was willing to yield my place if he so desired. However, the chief Government whip said that both he and the hon. member for South Waterloo were agreeable that I should proceed. I make this explanation so that it may be understood why I rise first to address the House this afternoon.

If, Sir, you have not been surfeited with the congratulations that have already been extended to you from both sides of the House, perhaps I may be allowed to add my felicitations on the honour that was paid you in being selected as the first commoner of the Dominion. In doing so I desire to express my confidence that your present tenure of office will be marked by the same courtesy, by the same devotion to duty, that you displayed while acting as Deputy Speaker of this House.

To my hon. friends the members for the Yukon (Mr. Alfred Thompson) and L'Islet (Mr. E. Paquet) I desire also to extend my congratulations upon the very eloquent and acceptable way in which they discharged the duty assigned them by the Government of moving and seconding the Address in reply to the speech from the Throne.

It is eminently fitting that at the opening of another war session we should reaffirm our determination to consecrate with renewed energy all the moral and material resources of this country to the task of securing victory for the cause in defence of which so many thousands of our brave fellow countrymen have already laid down their lives. That determination on the part of the Canadian people has been asserted so often in this debate that it seems to me it would serve no purpose if I were to repeat it. I may, Sir, however, reassert that the members of the Opposition are as one with my hon. friends on the Government side of the House in their willingness to pass all necessary war legislation and to subordinate the interests of party to the needs of the nation. That unity does not by any means imply the stifling or the absence of criticism on either side of the House; for it is only by helpful criticism that measures may be perfected, past errors corrected, and future mistakes avoided. That being so, I proceed to deal with some matters that, in my judgment, are fair subjects of criticism in the public interest.

Dealing first with the larger aspect of some of the questions raised in this debate, let me say that, like the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) I too was disappointed that, in his speech, the right hon. the Prime Minister did not give the House and the country some information with regard to the invitation that was extended to him to attend a meeting of the British Coalition Government while he was in England last summer. As the right hon. gentleman has not vouchsafed any information on that subject, we may be pardoned if we discuss the incident itself and the results, if any, that are likely to flow from it, in the light only of such knowledge as we have been able to gather from the newspapers. And first let me inform you and the House as to how that incident was represented by the Toronto Daily News, in an article published in the month of September last and reproduced in part by the Ottawa Citizen on the 29th of September, 1915. The Toronto News is represented to have spoken about the incident in this fashion:

> Sir Robert Borden has lifted the Dominion out of an inferior position to equality with the Mother Country.

I am quite prepared to admit that that unqualified statement, if true, would have marked perhaps the most important step taken by this country since Confederation. The News was very definite upon the matter, and it proceeded in these terms:

> Upon journeying to the Imperial Capital to consult with the British Government, the War Office, and the Admiralty, Sir Robert was welcomed directly into the Imperial councils. For the first time in the life of the Empire a Dominion minister was received into the inner circles of the government and took a seat in the Imperial cabinet. The triumph of the policy which he has so long advocated marks a long forward step in the consolidation and re-organization of all the King's Dominions for effective defence purposes. The recognition for Canada thus obtained by the Prime Minister will be regarded by future historians of these times as a highly significant and overwhelmingly important development.

You notice that there was no qualification on the part of the News; it asserted that this forward step had been taken and that the hope held out for closer Imperial connection had been realized. That is not by any means the way in which the incident appeared to other journalists of high standing in the Mother Country. For instance, in the Statist of July 24, 1915, Sir George Paish, whom all the members of this House will recognize as a very able man, a most eminent financier, one so eminent that even the Minister of Finance would not,—I think, disdain to sit down and talk exchange and currency generally with him. Sir George Paish has this to say about the right hon. the Prime Minister's attendance at that meeting of the British Cabinet:

> The invitation given by Mr. Asquith to Sir R. Borden to join in the proceedings of the Cabinet on Wednesday of last week has given rise to much speculation amongst our contemporaries. We venture to think that a great deal of the speculation is entirely beside the mark, and that the incident, though well worth noting, has not the significance generally attached to it. It is quite true, of course, that this was the first time that a minister of any of the Dominions beyond the sea was invited to attend a meeting of the Cabinet. But it is to be recollected that the action was not merely exceptional but was so exceptional as to demand a departure from accepted rules in very many particulars. Sir R. Borden, in the first place, is the Premier of the greatest of the Dominions beyond sea. In the second place, Canada has contributed in a remarkable manner to the defence of the Empire against unprovoked aggression, and, in the third place, Sir Robert is the first notable minister of any of the Dominions to visit London while the war has been in actual operation. An honour paid to him, then, is as exceptional as are the circumstances in which it is paid. But there is a much more powerful reason for thinking that entirely too much significance is attached to the presence of the Canadian Prime Minister at a meeting of the purely United Kingdom Cabinet.

Then, Sir, Sir George Paish goes on to analyse and discuss what will be the condition of the various nations of the world after the war. The analysis is most interesting, but it is of such length that it would not be proper for me to put the whole of it upon Hansard. However, I shall read you the concluding paragraph:

> If our readers agree with these observations, they will see that when the war comes to an end there will be in reality only three really great powers in the world—the British Empire, the United States and Russia. It will be clear, then, that a new war will be one of the most unlikely of things, and everybody will be disposed to look forward to at least half a century of peace.

And here I may interrupt the reading of this article to say that, within the last few days, that view has been strongly supported by Lord Derby. The article proceeds:

If that be so, what motive will the self-governing dominions have to draw closer their relations with the Mother Country? While they had to count with a war with so aggressive and so powerful a country as Germany it was natural that they should desire not only to give assistance to the Mother Country, but also to secure the protection of the British fleet for their overseas communications. But what need will they have for the protection of the British fleet if they can reasonably count upon peace for half a century? Similarly, we ourselves will come out of the war loaded with debt. Our main thought will be to reduce that debt as rapidly as possible, to find means of keeping up our revenue, and especially of pushing our trade in every direction, so that we may pay off at least 100 millions of debt per annum. If that is to be our main preoccupation, is it likely that either the public or ministers will trouble much about drawing closer the relations with the daughter countries? We shall retain for them the same affection as now. But we shall comfort ourselves that if the day of distress comes they will prove to us as they are proving now, "that blood is thicker than water," and we shall put off to a time of greater leisure the reorganization of the Empire.

On second thought, and perhaps after reading that article of Sir George Paish, the Toronto News in a further discussion of the subject was not so cocksure of the position which it had taken in the first instance, and in a quotation from an editorial of the News, reproduced in the Ottawa Citizen of October 14, 1915, I read this:

On crossing the Atlantic he—

That is the right hon. the Prime Minister——

—was invited to take his seat in the Imperial Cabinet—an honour never before enjoyed by a Dominion statesman. The incident was full of meaning for the future. Sir Robert Borden's demand on the part of the Dominion for a voice in Imperial affairs is in the way of being realized.

The first article in the News said it had been realized.

Now, the right hon. the Prime Minister, so far as I know, has not given the public of this country any information on the subject. The only incidental reference that has fallen from his lips on the subject since his return from England, that has come under my notice in any event, is contained in a speech which he delivered some time last month before the Canadian Club in New York. In the course of that speech, The Farmers Sun of Toronto represents the right hon. gentleman in its issue of December 29 last, as having said this:

4 p.m.

[Mr. Murphy.]

It is realized that the great policies and questions which concern and govern the issues of peace and war cannot in future be assumed by the people of the British Islands alone.

And commenting on that somewhat delphic utterance, The Farmers Sun said:

The proposal implies of course either distrust of British diplomacy in the past or a crusader's impulse to bear arms against the world. While it is doubtful whether the colonies can by any arrangement whatever or by any menace of arms become influential in European politics, it is not doubtful that to make the attempt, however feebly, they must permanently commit themselves to share the burdens of European militarism. They will never be able to speak again of voluntary participation in Europe's wars.

About the same time as the right hon. the Prime Minister spoke before the Canadian Club in New York, the matter was practically given its quietus in the British House of Commons. On December 22, 1915, the Ottawa Citizen published this cable despatch:

London, December 21.—The Premier in the House of Commons to-night was asked whether, in view of the share taken by the dominions in various theatres of war, he would include representatives of Canada, Australia, New Zealand and South Africa, in the British Cabinet without increasing its size.

Mr. ASQUITH: I don't think the proposal is practicable. The Colonial Secretary has already intimated to the dominions that they will be consulted in connection with terms of peace, and that the Government will warmly welcome any Prime Minister who finds it convenient to come here to discuss fully and frankly questions of Imperial policy.

This would show, according to Mr. Asquith, that a warm welcome awaits any Prime Minister of the overseas dominions, but no seat in the Cabinet. That, Mr. Speaker, makes it quite evident that so far as our Imperial relations are concerned, they were not changed by the attendance of the right hon. the Prime Minister at the British Cabinet meeting last summer. It further makes plain that the original dictum of Mr. Asquith still stands, namely, that the British Government cannot share its responsibilities for the issues of peace and war with any of the overseas dominions.

In his speech yesterday, my hon. friend who sits beside me to the right (Hon. Frank Oliver) urged upon the Government the necessity of new and larger action in the care of wounded and disabled soldiers. My hon. friend was listened to with profound attention, and in my judgment he never was more convincing than he was in that speech of yesterday. He fully deserved the compliment that was paid him by my hon. friend the Solicitor General. In speaking as he did, the hon. member for Edmonton spoke not at all from a sense of the parental sacrifices that he has had the privilege and the pride of making, but rather from that sturdy sense of public duty which has always distinguished him as one of the people's representatives. Naturally, in my case his words fell upon receptive ears and if any word of mine can add force to what the hon. gentleman said yesterday I would appeal to the Government to lose not one minute in applying themselves to the task of revising the schedule upon which allotments are to be made in the future to wounded and disabled soldiers. I say, further, that while we have voted hundreds of millions, this House and this country are quite willing to vote hundreds of millions more in order that a proud, willing and generous people may discharge its full duty towards the men who have faced the Grim Reaper and have given the best that was in them in defence of their native land and the British Empire. The Government cannot act too quickly in this matter, and in acting they may be assured of the unanimous and hearty support of the gentlemen on this side of the House. As my hon. friend from Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) has said, all these expenses, no matter of what character, should be borne by the Government, and if the Government, in performing the task which my hon. friend has suggested, and which I also urge upon them, could do something to stop the mad rage that has seized upon a certain portion of the community for soliciting subscriptions for this, that and the other thing, they would confer a very real and lasting benefit upon a worried and harassed portion of the business and professional community. Parliament, I repeat, should provide all these funds, and I am sure that both sides of the House will combine to support the Government in whatever new measures they may propose.

In his criticism of war expenditures my hon. friend from Red Deer (Mr. Michael Clark) urged upon the Government the necessity of holding a speedy enquiry into all these expenditures. A similar request has been made by every hon. gentleman who has spoken from this side of the House, and all these gentlemen were merely voicing a demand that has become general on the part of the public. Let me illustrate, Mr. Speaker, how general that demand is, and perhaps I can best do that by citing certain facts connected with the correspondence that took place in the fall of 1914 between the Canadian Manufacturers' Association and the right hon. the Prime Minister. It will be recalled that my hon. friend from South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) made an inquiry in this House on the 29th of March last regarding the receipt of that correspondence by the Prime Minister or by any member of the Government. On that occasion the Prime Minister was not in his seat, but the Minister of Trade and Commerce, who was leading the House, said that he had no knowledge of the correspondence, but would bring the enquiry to the attention of the Prime Minister, when a decision would be reached as to whether it could be brought down to the House. That was on the 29th of March. On the 8th of April last the matter again came up in the House, upon a motion by my hon. friend from South Renfrew, which was adopted by the House. The motion read as follows:

> For a copy of all correspondence that has taken place since August 4 last between any official of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, and the Prime Minister, the Acting Prime Minister or any member of the Government or any department thereof.

On that date, April 8, a short discussion ensued. The Prime Minister stated that he had received a communication from the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, but that he understood the Canadian Manufacturers' Association regarded it as of a confidential character. Later on he added that after communicating with the association he would bring the correspondence down if they had no objection. Another inquiry was made in regard to this correspondence on April 13, 1915, by the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) on behalf of the hon. member for South Renfrew, who was absent at the time, and in reply to that inquiry the Prime Minister said that he had communicated with the gentleman who had written him the letter but had not yet received a reply.

Now, Sir, there is something extraordinary about all this. As I have stated, the first inquiry about this matter was made in the House on March 29. On the following day, March 30, 1915, an interview with Mr. G. M. Murray, Secretary of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, was published in the Toronto Star; and, speaking with reference to this correspondence, Mr. Murray said that it was not confidential and that the Prime Minister could bring it down if he pleased. About a week later the Toronto Globe appended to its report of a further discussion in this House about the matter a foot-note in these terms:

> Mr. G. M. Murray, secretary of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, in an interview on March 30, while not admitting that any letters of protest had been written to the Government in regard to the above, was quoted as saying, "Any letters that were written were to the Premier, and he can make them public if he chooses."

As you will observe, Mr. Speaker, there is a very sharp conflict between the statement of the Prime Minister and that of Mr. Murray. I make no comment on that. I do not want to introduce anything harsh or controversial into the discussion. It is not necessary for me to make any comment at all; the facts speak for themselves. The matter was further dealt with in an editorial in the Toronto Globe on April 17 last, two days after this House prorogued. I will quote some paragraphs from that editorial:

> Why did the Prime Minister arrange for the prorogation of Parliament without first bringing down the war-graft correspondence between himself and the executive of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association? That correspondence was called for again and again, and yet again, within the past four weeks. Parliament had a right to it. It is of intense public interest. Its interest is measured not only by its intrinsic merits, but also by the studied and persistent efforts of the Government to keep it secret. Why is it kept secret by the Prime Minister?
> That correspondence, as known to other members of the Cabinet, deals very plainly and in interesting detail with important lines of war-graft not investigated and not even mentioned in the committees or before the House. A series of typical graft cases in several provinces, and covering various types of exploitation by different orders of favoured "middlemen," are described. Names and places and dates are given. Circumstances are recited. Evidence both illuminating and condemnatory is outlined. It is all in the hands of the Prime Minister. Why was it not submitted to Parliament?
>
> That correspondence dates back to the early days of the war-contract scandals. It presents facts. It appeals for investigation. It warns against delay. Why was it unheeded?

Later on in the same article, referring to the Prime Minister's attitude in the House, the editorial goes on:

> He talked about the correspondence being "confidential." He professed willingness to lay it before Parliament if granted "Permission." He needed no man's permission. Why did he not do it?
>
> The correspondence was public, not private. It was between a public body and the Prime Minister. It dealt solely with matters of high and serious public moment. Weeks ago the Executive of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association declared publicly that "the Premier may publish it if he chooses." Why did Sir Robert Borden not choose to lay that very important correspondence before Parliament?
> Is it true that the publication of that correspondence might clash very harshly with the Prime Minister's grave-toned condemnation of Garland and Foster, and might contradict very emphatically, and utterly discount, all his own protestations about war-grafters and middlemen? Why was not his zeal for Governmental honesty, his condemnation of barefaced robbery, his respect for the doors of the penitentiary, and his enthusiasm for political purity as professed solemnly on Thursday—why did all these fine qualities slumber through September and October? Had he heeded the warnings of his friends in the Manufacturers' Association then would two of his supporters in Parliament be accursed as war-graft scapegoats now? Why did he mock at those warnings? That is the people's question to the Premier. Why?

This matter was regarded so seriously by the Canadian Manufacturers' Association that special reference was made to it in the report presented at the annual meeting of the executive committee of that association held in the city of Toronto on the 9th of June last. So seriously did the association regard this matter that it took the trouble to hand out official reports of the proceedings of the annual meeting to the several newspapers. In these reports so handed out by the executive, special attention was drawn to one important paragraph in the executive committee's report. That paragraph, as reproduced in the Citizen of June last, reads as follows:

> Less than a month later, on October 23—

That is, in the year 1914——

> Less than a month later, on October 23, a letter was addressed to the Premier, pointing out that the method of handling war orders was giving rise to a good deal of dissatisfaction. He was informed that, making all due allowance for the fact that some manufacturers might not have had the necessary equipment, and that others might not have been able to guarantee satisfactory deliveries, it was apparently true that some had more than their share of business, while others had gone without. In some quarters the impression seemed to prevail that war material could not be sold to the Government on its merits, but only through influence, and it was accordingly suggested to the Premier that the business should be thrown wider open, and placed as far as possible with manufacturers or producers direct, instead of through middlemen, thus insuring competitive prices, and at the same time giving the Government the satisfaction of dealing with responsible parties.

Then, Sir, in order to emphasize the warning that they had sent out to the Prime Minister, the executive committee go on in their report to explain why they did that, and they furnish by their explanation a key to practically the whole of the correspondence. I quote again from the Citizen report of the 10th of June last:

> The words of the executive committee's report, showing the motive behind the explanation of the association's position in the matter of war contracts were: "Your committee consider it important, however, in view of certain facts that have been elicited by public inquiry in Ottawa, to offer this statement, so that no stigma can attach to the association for any alleged inaction or indifference."
>
> The report enumerates a number of constructive suggestions which were submitted to the Premier as a practical means of throwing the business "wide open." They were as follows:
> 1. That all the requirements of the various departments of the Government, whether for ordinary or special war purposes, should be advertised, and interested manufacturers invited to tender on their supply.
> 2. That a permanent Government sample room should be opened at Ottawa, with possibly branch sample-rooms in other points, such as Montreal, Toronto, etc., where, as far as practicable, samples of all goods required would be available for the inspection of contractors.
> 3. That in charge of each sample-room there should be an officer to supply inquirers with full particulars as to any kind of Government requirements.
> 4. That in the awarding of contracts it should be a standing rule that preference be given in every case, other things being equal, to Canadian products.
> 5. That generally speaking, the policy pursued should be frank and open so as to induce Canadian contractors to quote on any lines they might be capable of producing.
> The letter concluded with an offer to give free insertion in Industrial Canada to all advertisements calling for tenders from manufacturers, and even to bring out special issues supplementing the regular monthly issue, should such a course be deemed necessary or advisable from the Government's standpoint.

I do not propose to make any comment on that report. I need only say, the facts speak for themselves. Although this correspondence with the Canadian Manufacturers' Association has not been brought down, although more than nine months have elapsed since its production was ordered by this House, what has been revealed with regard to it proves conclusively that several duties have been cast upon the Government. In the first place, it is their immediate duty to bring that correspondence down to this House. In the next place, it is their duty to grant a committee of inquiry before which the legitimate manufacturers belonging to that association may appear and justify the warning that they sent to the Prime Minister in October, 1914. Another duty is incumbent upon them viz—to grant that committee so that these manufacturers may repel the insinuation, as they desire to repel it, that they have in any way been mixed up in the game of war profiteering. Further, it is the duty of the Government to appoint that committee so that these legitimate manufacturers may make plain who are bona fide manufacturers and who are the mushroom manufacturers that have grown up under the aegis of the Shell Committee and of the Government.

I started on this branch of my subject by stating that there was a general demand for the appointment of a committee of inquiry. The Solicitor General yesterday took exception to the quotations from Liberal newspapers on this subject. Well, I will meet him on that point—in fact, he has already been met on that point. My hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Pugsley) read from the Ottawa Evening Journal a demand for that investigation. Now, the significance of that demand lies not so much in the fact that that newspaper is an out-and-out supporter of this Government as in the fact that its editor is a warm personal friend of the Prime Minister. It is not likely that that gentleman would make a demand for an inquiry unless he was very strongly impressed by the absolute necessity for investigation. My hon. friend from St. John also read the demand for an investigation from the Montreal Daily Mail in its criticism and ridicule of the valedictory of General Bertram. Again the significance of that demand from the Daily Mail lies not so much in the fact that it also is an out-and-out supporter of this Government as in the fact that the editor of that paper is a half-brother of the Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White). So that, with regard to the Daily Mail, we may say that the demand for an investigation comes from within the bosom of the family itself.

The demand has also been made by such staunch Tory papers as the trade journals published by the MacLean Publishing Co., of Toronto, including the Contract Record, the Electrical News, and, I think the Lumberman's Record. In order to satisfy my hon. friend the Solicitor General that I am not quoting from a source friendly to the Liberal party, I will read, first, a declaration of the political faith of the editor of the Electrical News, whose opinion on the subject of investigation I intend to quote. In his issue of the 1st of January, 1916, the editor refers to his criticism of the Government, and says:

> Right here at the start let me say that this criticising of the Government is no pleasant task. I am well aware that the publishers of this paper will get little credit for honesty of purpose. So accustomed is the public to the harpings of the party and corporation press that it has become case-hardened. It has learned to look through the printed articles for the self, party or corporation interest that prompted it. Let it be known then, once for all, that I prefer the Borden Administration, with all its sins, to a government controlled by a party that sought to tie us up to the United States with a reciprocity treaty. But this paper represents a constituency of business men. It realizes that they are tired of seeing politics practised where business methods should be applied. They know that honest criticism is the best medicine for any government—even if you have to hold its nose while you administer the dose.

We do not propose anything so drastic as that. The editor goes on:

As I have said before, the publishers are not in a position to handle a war contract and do not care to farm one out.

A little further on in this same article is the following :

We simply want to show that petty politics are no satisfactory substitute for patriotism, and that party machines cannot do the work of factory lathes.

Surely the Solicitor General could not be supplied with better authority than that. I have gone to a good deal of trouble to get it for him, and I hope he will be satisfied with it. In this same issue of the 1st of January the Electrical News has this further to say on the subject of an investigation:

The public demand an investigation. They look not to the Conservative political machine but to Sir Robert Borden for that investigation. They feel that the Premier who is a gentleman rather than a politician, has been sinned against. They know that when next Sir Robert Borden visits England he will not want to be pointed out as the sponsor for a committee that scattered its contracts like so much political graft, while our soldiers cried from the trenches for the munitions they so sorely needed. Sir Robert Borden may be deluded by the men he has trusted but he is not the man likely to stand idly by while the good name of the Dominion is dragged through the dirt and grime of a war scandal. Sir Robert Borden will act. Sir Robert Borden must act to save the reputation of the country he represents and his own political honour.

Further on the same issue the Electrical News discusses this subject of an investigation in this fashion:

The Government has everything to gain and nothing to lose by being open and above-board in the matter. So many stories have been whispered, so many charges have been flung broadcast that to remain silent must simply be taken as an admission of guilt—an admission that the worst has not been told. Never since Confederation have so many stories of trickery, trafficking and grafting been afloat. They come to this office by the score. All cannot be given because all cannot be investigated. It would take a big staff working overtime to get into them all. But they pass from mouth to mouth, growing with each telling. Probably most of them have not yet reached Sir Robert Borden. His "machine men" probably see that such as do reach him are fumigated, sugar-coated and otherwise specially prepared for his consumption. But even his own party organs are hinting that makers of munitions "have striven to get large profits out of their contracts." The Toronto News (Conservative) charges it all to "stock market booming," but closes its article with the rather ominous sentences: "As in previous crazes a reckoning is coming. It may be close at hand and some very prominent men may be involved in the inevitable disclosures."

That last sentence is quoted by the Electrical News from an editorial in the Toronto Daily News, which, as every one knows, is one of the strongest supporters of this Administration. In view of the opinions of these newspapers which support the Conservative Government of the day, surely it will not be pretended that the demand for investigation is not as strong from the members of the Conservative party as it is from the members of the Liberal party.

The story of how the contracts for the shell boxes were let is also told by the Electrical News in its issue of December 1, 1915. That paper said this:

The purchase of shell boxes was another of the duties of this now famous Shell Committee. Naturally you would expect them to follow the same policy in regard to the boxes. And you won't be disappointed. There was the same secrecy, the same spreading out of contracts to cover commercial or political depression, and the same awarding of contracts to the little fellows regardless of their equipment or financial capacity. That one of the largest box factories in Canada received a contract for 25,000 boxes and manufactured on a sub-contract 50,000 boxes more is eloquent evidence of the business acumen exercised in carrying on this branch of the business. That a Montreal firm not in the box making trade was awarded a contract which it sublet to a box manufacturer in the same city is further evidence that if the committee was honest it was incompetent. That a company of low financial standing was able to secure a large contract, even though it had to construct a new plant for the work, would indicate that the government—for this shell committee stood for the government—had poor relations whose exigencies gave it greater concern than the exigencies of the Empire.

And then, Sir, returning to the subject on January 1, 1916, the Electrical News said:

Just one more instance of how the Shell Committee handled contracts. This story has been investigated and can be vouched for, as can the others that have from time to time found place in this column. The owner of a planing mill in an Ontario town went out after a shell-box contract. His application brought the usual answer that all contracts had been let. Imagine his surprise when a shipping clerk in a dry goods house in his own town secured a contract, put up a building, completed his contract and got a renewal. The shipping clerk had no plant, no experience and no business rating. But he knew a man who knew something about how contracts were got. Pretty wise man, wasn't he? Thrifty, too. For he still retains his job as shipping clerk, though he occasionally finds a few moments to run over to the shell-box plant and figure his profits.

Here is a friend saying to the Government: All the stories that we have published in these columns have been investigated and can be vouched for; grant a committee, and they will be proved before that committee. That, in effect, is what is said by these gentlemen, who prefer the Borden Government, with all their sins, to the Liberal Administration. I ask, Mr. Speaker, how can a Government refuse a friend such a demand as that? Surely the challenge of the Tory editor of the Electrical News will, in any event, not be ignored.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES: Where is the Electrical News published?

Mr. MURPHY: It is one of the publications of the MacLean Publishing Company, of Toronto.

In the course of his speech the hon. member for St. John cited the experience that Mr. F. P. Jones had had with the Shell Committee as a further reason why an investigation should be granted. It seems to me that that incident was so important that the full details of it should be put upon Hansard; it is because I am impressed with a sense of its great importance that I shall venture to do that. The Contract Record, in its issue of November 9, 1915, thus refers to Mr. Jones' experience:

Mr. Jones, like many another, went to Ottawa with a tender for shells. When the contracts were let they went as usual to the favoured few and Mr. Jones was not of them. Those contracts were let at prices lower than previous contracts but higher than Mr. Jones' tender. Unlike many another Mr. Jones did not throw up his hands and go home. Instead he went straight to Sir Robert Borden. The Premier was not inclined to listen to a disappointed tenderer, but when Mr. Jones turned to the door with a decisive "Very well, I'll give my statement to the press," he was invited to call again in a couple of days.

Here I interrupt the reading to say that a little later I shall read a letter written by Mr. Jones, giving effect to the explanation which the Prime Minister interjected the other day when the hon. member for St. John was referring to the same subject. The article continues:

"On the second visit he found Mr. Thomas with the Premier. Mr. Jones sat down at the typewriter and made three copies of his statement, one for the Premier, one for Mr. Thomas, and the third he kept. That statement showed that the contracts let by the committee were just $21,000,000 higher than if awarded at the rate of Mr. Jones' tender. A cable to England stopped the contracts before they had been approved by Lloyd George. And in future all contracts for munitions will be open to competitive bids.

"Of course explanations were in order and they were made. It was pointed out that certain concerns had taken risks when shell making was an experiment that might prove costly to the makers and these concerns were entitled to consideration. And probably they were. The earlier price charged the Empire was $5.15 for machining a dollar's worth of shell. This was later reduced to $2.90 for doing the same dollar's worth of work. At these figures one would naturally conclude that it was the Empire and not the experimenter, or rather contractor which was entitled to any consideration that was going. Again it was pointed out that policy demanded that the contracts be spread around so as to help relieve commercial depression brought on by the war. And it is only fair to add that this policy has been more or less successful.

There has been no noticeable commercial depression at or near the concern of which Mr. Thomas Cantley is the head and which is said to be making more profits in a month than it ever did before in a year. Neither is the company of which Mr. G. W. Watts is representative making any complaint of hard times. Of course, it is merely a coincidence that Mr. Cantley and Mr. Watts are both members of the Canadian Shell Committee.

It is clearly understood that the manufacturing members of this committee are there in a purely advisory capacity and it is probably to clear them of unjust suspicions that their names are not expected to appear when the new Munitions Committee is appointed.

That article from the Contract Record was widely copied in the Canadian papers. At the request of the right hon. Prime Minister, Mr. Jones wrote a letter explaining what occurred in connection with his interview with the right hon. gentleman. That letter, as reproduced in the Toronto Globe of November 13, 1915, reads as follows:

I called at your house by appointment in regard to the manufacture of shells. After hearing what I had to say you informed me that I should place my representations before Mr. D. A. Thomas, who was acting for the British Government, and who was then in Canada. To this I agreed, and accordingly you then consulted by telephone with Mr. Thomas, who was then in Montreal, and arranged that I should interview him for that purpose in the immediate future. The interview as arranged took place within forty-eight hours. I never saw you and Mr. Thomas together, and I never said or in any way intimated that I would give any statement to the press, nor had I any intention of doing so. The statement which has appeared in the press with regard to my interview with you is utterly unfounded. You received me most courteously, and listened attentively to everything I had to say, after which the interview was arranged as above stated with Mr. Thomas.

That letter, Mr. Speaker, is all very well so far as it goes; but, as you will not have failed to notice, it leaves the serious charges quite untouched. For instance, it says nothing about the prices previously allowed to manufacturers by the Shell Committee being very considerably higher than the prices at which Mr. Jones was prepared to make the same class of shells. It also leaves untouched the published statement of the Contract Record that Mr. Jones had shown the Premier that a saving of $21,000,000 could have been effected on the previous shell orders had the Shell Committee awarded them at the rate of Mr. Jones' tender.

It further leaves untouched the other statement that the contracts already let at the higher figure and sent to Mr. Lloyd George for approval had been stopped by cable. These rather important details being overlooked in Mr. Jones' letter, you will not be surprised that the letter did not satisfy the Contract Record. An editorial from that paper on the subject of Mr. Jones' letter was reproduced in the Ottawa Citizen of November 26, 1915, and is in these terms:

At the request of Sir Robert Borden, Mr. F. P. Jones, of the Canada Cement Corporation, has come forward with a sort of blanket denial of the story of his interview with the Premier re the shell game. According to Mr. Jones' statement, Mr. Thomas was not present at that interview, nor did he threaten to make a statement to the press if his tenders were not given proper consideration. He admits, however, that Sir Robert sent him to Mr. Thomas, and to ensure him due consideration in that quarter, called up Lloyd George's representative and arranged the interview. Mr. Jones further states that at the interview arranged by the Premier, Mr. Thomas warned him that tenders would be called for.

It would appear from the above that Mr. Jones is not taking the public entirely into his confidence. He neglects to mention why it was necessary to call on the Premier and later attend a premier-arranged interview with Mr. Thomas in order to acquire the valuable information that tenders for shells would be called for.

He also neglects to mention whether he had first been to the shell committee with his proposition. Of course, if he had, it might be necessary to go to either Sir Robert Borden or Mr. Thomas in search of such valuable information as he received. Were not the shell committee representing Canada in regard to the purchase of shells? Were they not giving out information in regard to the asking for tenders? Were they not using their every endeavour and undoubted business ability to secure for the Empire the munitions she needed and in the cheapest market? Apparently not, for Mr. Jones, according to his own statement, had to go first to the Premier and then to Mr. Thomas before he could discover that tenders were to be asked for. But please note the grateful sequel: "Our company again tendered and I am pleased to say got business at the prices tendered by us." These little words "again tendered" are an indication that previous to his interviews with Sir Robert Borden and Mr. Thomas, his company had been in the field for shell contracts. Why doesn't Mr. Jones go further and tell the public why his other tenders had been turned down, and why he found it necessary to go over the heads of the shell committee before his tenders received the consideration they merited and his factories the orders subsequent events show they were entitled to?

Blanket denials are not explanations, and it is explanations that are in order at the present time. Mr. Thomas has stated that profits of the manufacturers have been higher than they were entitled to; the shell committee has been allowed to drift into oblivion, and evidently requested to do its drifting with the least possible noise; it has been replaced by a Munitions Committee, which is in the hands, and evidently under the complete control of Mr. Lionel Hichens, who has come out from England as the personal representative of Mr. Lloyd George. What does this all mean? Why, if the story told here is not true, was the shell committee abolished?

This column admitted on the start that it was impossible to get sworn statements. It is so still. Consequently, it is impossible to be exact as to details. But the essentials of the story of the breaking up of the shell game have yet to be denied. The interviews between Mr. Jones, Sir Robert Borden, and Mr. Thomas took place. They were followed by the disappearance of the shell committee. A report was sent out from Ottawa that all munition contracts had been cancelled. A competitive system of tendering replaced the old haphazard system. And big firms got contracts who had not been able to get even information concerning them before.

Just why it is impossible to get exact details is perhaps shown by several letters addressed to this column. They come from contract holders in Toronto, and, in each case the writer complains that his firm cannot get any more contracts because it is accused of giving things away.

As you are aware, this Government appointed what is colloquially referred to as the War Purchasing Committee. That committee, I understand, is under the chairmanship of the member of the Government without portfolio, the hon. member for East Toronto (Mr. Kemp). Public attention was directed to that committee by a charge published in a Toronto paper called Men's Wear, to the effect that a clothing contract had been awarded to a Toronto real estate agent, one Carl F. Hopkins. In course of time that charge was taken up by the Davidson Commission, and, not to trouble the House with too many details, it was found by that Commission that the particular contract referred to in Men's Wear was a contract for clothing for the British Government, and therefore did not come within the scope of the Commission. But, in the course of the inquiry it was revealed that this Toronto real estate dealer, Mr. Carl F. Hopkins, had, as the Empire Clothing Company, got another contract, and this other contract he obtained from the Militia Department of this Government. Some of the facts brought out with reference to that Militia Department contract before the Davidson Commission are illuminating. In the Toronto Globe of December 30, 1915, I find this report of the proceedings of the day previous at the sitting of the Davidson Commission in Ottawa:

Ottawa, December 29.—The "Men's Wear" charges as to the granting of Canadian military clothing contracts were again before the Davidson War Contracts Commission this morning.

Mr. J. V. Reid, secretary of the Contracts Branch of the Militia Department, was the first witness. He produced a letter written on March 29 last by C. F. Hopkins of Toronto, to the Director of Contracts, stating that it was immaterial whether a contract was given to C. F. Hopkins and Company or the Empire Clothing Company—whose name was on the patronage list—so long as one was secured. A contract was actually given in August to the Empire Clothing Company for 12,000 pairs of trousers, being secured by tender. Hopkins himself had received no contract.

The letter referred to, which was produced from the files of the Militia Department, was headed:

"C. F. Hopkins & Co., clothing manufacturers, factories 150-160 John street, office 30 Adelaide street, Toronto; cable address; Hoco." The letter was addressed to P. W. Brown, director of contracts, Militia Department, Ottawa, and was as follows:

"Dear Sir,—Following my phone conversation with you this afternoon, I sent you views showing some of the interior of our plant and also a letter from one of my partners which will explain itself.

"It does not matter whether we receive the orders for clothing in the name of the Empire Clothing Co or of C F Hopkins and Co., clothing manufacturers, so long as we receive them.

"According to your letter of December 18, 1914, our name has been on the patronage list for the supply of clothing since that date. We have received no word or contract, although several of the members have spoken on our behalf.

"Since I spoke to you last, I understand that the clothing for the third contingent has practically all been ordered, and I trust we may secure a portion of the next clothing order."

It is peculiar that, in this investigation before the Davidson Commission, this Toronto real estate clothing dealer, Mr. Hopkins, was not called as a witness.

Mr. Acton, the man responsible for the publication of the article in Men's Wear, was called as a witness, and if one can judge by newspaper reports of the proceedings, he was dealt with rather severely by the commissioner. In point of fact, he was handled in such a fashion that you would think that he, and not Hopkins, was the guilty party. Eventually he was induced to hand in a sort of half apology for having dared to make the statements that he had made in Men's Wear. Now, these somewhat peculiar happenings before the Davidson Commission led the editor of the Electrical News—you remember him, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman who said that with all its sins he preferred the Borden Government to the Liberal administration—in the issue of January 15, 1916, to say this:

We are informed from Ottawa that the work of the Davidson investigation commission is almost finished. To criticise that work would probably be considered contempt of court and I would hate to be the only one to receive punishment at its hands. But I fain would ask a question or two. Surely one may venture that far. And my first query would naturally be: "In the Hopkins investigation was it Mr. Hopkins or Mr. Acton who was being investigated?" And following this would it be unwise or unkindly to ask why Mr. Hopkins was not called to the stand? Mr. Hopkins' home is in Toronto, but he is taking most of his meals at the Biltmore Hotel in New York city. I believe he prefers the New York climate and if he does spend an occasional Sunday in Toronto it is because his family still resides in the Queen city. Of course he might have gone to Ottawa as a witness but those attorneys have a way of talking to mere witnesses that does not make their position in the box an attractive one.

Further light on the work of this Davidson Commission is thrown by an editorial of the Toronto Globe of December 15, 1915, in which the editor of that paper discusses the distribution of an order for 188,000 pairs of trousers. I will read a few paragraphs from the editorial in question:

The only cure for the suspicion that army contracts are being awarded by favour at excessive prices is publicity. When the names of successful tenderers, the prices quoted by them, and the quantity of goods ordered from them are published in the Press unsuccessful bidders can at once learn why they did not obtain the order or a share of it. In the case of the trousers contract, which is the subject of judicial inquiry, the commission did not award the contract to the lowest tenderer, 5 p.m. but split it up among a considerable number of bidders, all of whom were paid the price at which they tendered. This, Mr. Kemp explains, was done because there was urgent need for the clothing and because there would inevitably have been delay had the lowest tenderer been given the entire contract. An order for 188,000 pairs of trousers was distributed among ten eastern Canadian firms and several in the west, the units averaging about 12,500 pairs. The eastern companies participating and the prices per pair at which they tendered and at which each company did the work were as follows:

	Price per pair.
T. Eaton Co., Toronto	$3 20
A. Kilbert & Co., Montreal..	3 28
Crown Pants Co., Montreal..	3 43
Copley, Noyes & Randall, Hamilton.	3 43

	Price per pair.
Cohen & Sons, Montreal..	$3 50
Punchard, Burril & Co., Toronto ..	3 58
Canada Clothing Co., Montreal.. ..	3 64
Empire Clothing Co., Toronto.. ..	3 69
W. E. Sanford Mfg. Co., Hamilton.	3 72
Capital Brand Trousers, Toronto ..	3 73

Had the contract gone to the lowest tenderer —the T. Eaton Co.—the total cost to the country would have been exactly $40,000 less than it was under the system of "divvying up" and giving each firm the price it asked for. Was the need for haste served by this extra price? It is stated by Mr. Kemp that the Eaton Co. had half a million dollars' worth of government work on hand when the trousers contract was awarded. Was that work of such a nature as to stand in the way of the speedy carrying out of the trousers contract? Had the "Capital Brand" company, for example—which is unknown to the most important houses in the clothing trade in this city, and which got $6,625 more for making 12,500 pairs of trousers than the Eaton Co. would have charged for the same work—greater facilities for turning out this clothing in a hurry than the Eaton Co.?

Hon. J. D. REID: Would you have liked them to go without trousers?

Mr. MURPHY: I must ask my hon. friend the Minister of Customs to solve his own conundrums. My hon. friend the Solicitor General quoted from an article which had appeared in the Toronto Globe in approval of the Davidson commission. May I be permitted to say that that article was written prior to the hearing of this case by the Davidson Commission, and that after that case was heard the Globe was not exactly of the same opinion. Here is what the Globe said after the Men's Wear charges had been gone into:

Is Mr. Kemp playing politics with army orders instead of awarding them to the lowest tenderer irrespective of politics as Sir Robert Borden promised? It looks very much like it. That apology of Brother Acton was distinctly premature. The Public Accounts Committee of the House of Commons should spend an hour or two in the company of Mr. Carl F. Hopkins real estate dealer in the main and clothing manufacturer on the side and learn who the members were who spoke "on our behalf" before the Kemp Purchasing Commission was appointed and whose influence was so potent that after the commission took charge the Empire Clothing Co. was given 49 cents per pair more for making army trousers than the lowest tenderer.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There is nothing said against the commissioner in that Globe article.

Mr MURPHY: No, there is nothing said against him, but may I point out to the Solicitor General that there is nothing said in his favour? Of the methods pursued by this War Purchasing Committee the Electrical News offers pointed criticism.

[Mr. Murphy.]

In its issue of December 1 last, after referring to the fact that this War Purchasing Committee was staggering along under a sharp fusilade of criticism, it stated:

But here again that scattering of contracts to cover that same commercial depression creeps in and brings forth the usual criticism. The segregation of tenders thus rendered necessary often practically wipes out competition and the net result is that the big concerns are often neglected while may a sweat shop with a machine hastily stuck in a cellar is working night and day to turn out materials that do not keep the equipment up to the requirements of enlistment. Some of the big concerns are prepared to take this work at actual cost in order to keep their factories running and their staffs together. But the system in vogue does not give them a chance.

Now, Mr. Speaker, in view of these disclosures, taken from responsible public journals in this country, I submit that the public will not be satisfied unless the work of this War Purchasing Committee is included in the scope of whatever investigating committee may be appointed by Parliament to go into the subject of war contracts generally.

You recall, Mr. Speaker, that throughout a large part of last session a special committee of this House sat to investigate the contracts that were awarded by the Militia Department for boots and shoes. You will further recall that, in connection with that investigation, it was disclosed that in one case a middleman had received over $15,000 for securing contracts for an old and well-known boot and shoe manufacturing concern in the city of Quebec. You would naturally have expected, Mr. Speaker, that, in view of the disclosures before that special committee of this House, war graft in boots, in any event, would have stopped. Well, Sir, I am sorry to inform you that it has not. I have under my hand a copy of the court record of a suit entered in the Superior Court in the City of Quebec. The plaintiff is a gentleman of the name of Frank W. Belmer. The defendant is the John Ritchie Company, a long-established and highly respected firm in the city of Quebec. The plaintiff, Belmer, produced a contract in writing whereby he was appointed to act as middleman between the John Ritchie Company and the Government for the purpose of securing contracts for boots and contracts for canvas shoes.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Who were the parties to the contract?

Mr. MURPHY: The contract is contained in two letters, dated respectively

October 13 and October 28, 1914, signed by Mr. Warrington, secretary of the John Ritchie Company, and addressed to Frank W. Belmer, Quebec. Belmer alleges that under this written contract he secured orders for boots and shoes for the John Ritchie Company from the Militia Department. The contract stipulates that Belmer is to be paid a commission of fifty cents a pair on every contract for boots he secures for the John Ritchie Company from the Militia Department, and a commission of thirty cents a pair on every pair of canvas shoes. It is not alleged in court that Belmer makes any claim for any commission in connection with the boot contract, but apart from the record I am informed that he was paid a very considerable sum of money for the boot contracts he obtained. Belmer claims, and in fact this constitutes his whole claim, that through his agency the John Ritchie Company obtained from the Department of Militia and Defence between October, 1914, and November, 1915, contracts for 150,000 pairs of canvas shoes, and he accordingly claims the sum of $45,000 commission, which is at the rate of thirty cents a pair on the 150,000 pairs. It is only fair to say that the defendant company does not admit that the plaintiff is entitled to any commission with respect to the canvas shoes. But the written contract—and this is tne most immoral part of the whole proceeding—this written contract by which Belmer is appointed as middleman or go-between for the John Ritchie Company the defendants do not dispute. Surely, Mr. Speaker, if ever there was a case that ought to be investigated, this case of Belmer is the one.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Hear, hear.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: What was the result of the action?

Mr. MURPHY: It has not been tried yet. The defendant disputes the plaintiff's claim, and the action is still in court.

Hon. J. D. REID: It could be investigated by the Public Accounts Committee.

Mr. MURPHY: Parliament is the High Court of the nation, and any investigation that is held should be held under the direction of Parliament.

Mr. REID: I said it could be investigated by the Public Accounts Committee.

Mr. MURPHY: Certainly. I was proceeding to say that instances could be multiplied of middlemen acting in other capacities, with a loss to the Government in each case; but I have already taken up a great deal of the time of the House, and I feel it would be loading up Hansard unnecessarily if I were to enumerate these cases. I submit that I have made it clear that a demand for an investigation is general on the part of the public, and the necessity for it is such that without it the honour of this Government, the honour of this Parliament, and the honour of this country, can never be vindicated.

Let me now refer somewhat briefly to the speech made by my hon. friend the Solicitor General yesterday. Considered in the large, that speech may be divided into two parts; that part in which he laboured to prove that his colleague the Minister of Finance, did not say what he meant, or did not mean what he said, when he answered the inquiry of the hon. member for St. John as to whether this Government was paying the whole cost of the Canadian overseas expeditionary forces, and that part in which he laboured an attack against the hon. member for St. John, and sought to minimize the effect of that hon. gentleman's speech by showing that here and there he had been mistaken as to a name, or a date, or a place, as, for instance, when he said that the Solicitor General had delivered a speech at Fort William when it should have been Portage la Prairie. The hon. member for St. John exposed this afternoon some of these mental acrobatics on the part of the Solicitor General, and it is therefore unnecessary for me to refer to these particular things. I have just this to say, that, listening as I did yesterday, and as I always do, with great interest to what the Solicitor General had to say, I was more than ever impressed with the strikingly strong resemblance between the hon. gentleman and the famous knight, Sir Hudibras, immortalized by Butler. Do you remember, Mr. Speaker, Sir Hudibras as Butler depicted him? Perhaps you have forgotten, so for your benefit and the benefit of the House I will just quote his description:

> He was in logic a great critic
> Profoundly skilled in analytic;
> He could distinguish and divide
> A hair 'twixt south and southwest side;
> On either which he would dispute,
> Confute, change hands, and still confute.

That is a perfect picture of the Solicitor General, and the resemblance between him and the worthy knight was never so striking as it was yesterday. He laboured long and valiantly to extricate his colleague the Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White) from the difficulty into which it was evident he feared the Minister of Finance had got by the answers he made to the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) on Tuesday last. It was somewhat amusing to us on this side of the House to see the agitation that broke out on the benches opposite immediately after the Minister of Finance had made those answers to the hon. member for St. John. The Minister of Finance himself was obviously disturbed. He moved uneasily in his seat; he moved out of his seat; he went around the opposite side of the House talking to his friends; he was obviously ill at ease. Now, why should he be ill at ease, and why should the Solicitor General labour to prove that his words did not mean exactly what he said and what he intended them to mean? The Minister of Finance was asked an ordinary and a proper question. Like an honest man he gave that question an honest answer. Yesterday my hon. friend the member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) emphasized the honesty and the point of that answer. The matter has evidently become one of such agitation in Government circles that I propose to put upon Hansard again question and answer as they fell from the lips of the two hon. gentlemen on Monday last. On page 42 of Hansard I find the following, referring to the previous answer given by the Minister of Finance:

> Mr. Pugsley: That means, of course, all the ammunition, all the guns, all the boots and shoes, and all the clothing used by the Canadian soldiers at the front?
>
> Sir Thomas White: Our understanding is that the Canadian Government will pay all, but that an adjustment is necessary and will have to take place later.
>
> Mr. F. W. Maclean: Does that include transportation?
> Sir Thomas White: I speak subject to correction by my right hon. friend the Prime Minister, but I believe that the Canadian Government has agreed to pay all the cost of transportation also; in other words, we desire to pay the entire cost of the Canadian Expeditionary Force abroad.

It cannot have been many minutes after the Minister of Finance had made that perfectly honest and frank statement that somebody whispered in his ear: "Why, you have given the whole case away; when you admit that we are paying for these things, then we cannot dispute the right of Parliament to investigate them." That explains the disturbance on the opposite side of the House. Now, I submit that my hon. friend the Solicitor General did not make the matter any better by his handling of it yesterday. He spent a good deal of his time in an attack upon the hon. member for St. John; but as part of that attack was repelled by that hon. member this afternoon, it is unnecessary for me to refer to it at any length.

I want, however, to refer to one matter in regard to which the Solicitor General waxed warm and indignant. He accused the hon. member for St. John of misrepresenting what he, the Solicitor General, had said in a speech at Portage la Prairie about taxing war profits. Quoting from Hansard of yesterday, page 134, I find that my hon. friend the Solicitor General spoke thus:

> I said that I believed there had been some cases of large profits

Now, Mr. Speaker, I want you to pay particular attention to this, because in a moment I am going to appeal from Philip drunk to Philip sober, and I want these words remembered.

> I said that I believed there had been some cases of large profits.

Why was he so specific? He was repelling the charge of the hon. member for St. John, that he had knowledge that there were large profits. Well, it so happens that I have in my hand the report published in the Ottawa Citizen of December 20, 1915, of the speech delivered by my hon. friend at Portage la Prairie.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Don't you think I ought to know what I said better than the Ottawa Citizen?

Mr. MURPHY: I am willing to concede that my hon. friend ought to know better than the Ottawa Citizen, but my hon. friend will consider this, that the people can judge of what my hon. friend said only by the reports of his speech that appear in the newspapers. I am going to read the report, and it will be open to my hon. friend to say that it is wrong. It must have been some such report as this read by the hon. member for St. John that led him to make the statement which he did yesterday. The Citizen report of the speech of my hon. friend the Solicitor General at Portage la Prairie was, in part, as follows:

> Touching on the question of the war tax, Mr. Meighen referred to the necessity of raising funds for relief purposes, and expressed the opinion that it was the function of the Government to raise such moneys by way of taxation, and in this manner all would be forced to assist. The Federal Government said Mr. Meighen, cannot get past the British North America Act in connection with taxation, but can assist by increasing the tariff.

"We have no power to tax lands," continued Mr. Meighen, "and have not got the one hundred and one methods that the provincial government has for this purpose. A great deal has been said about taxing the munition makers, and I for one am in accord with the scheme."

Upon that pronouncement I heartily congratulate my hon. friend. The report goes on:

There is no doubt that there have been great war profits—

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is quite different from what the hon. member for St. John said.

Mr. MURPHY: Yes, but how could a man without knowledge have made such a specific and pointed statement as that?

There is no doubt that there have been great war profits, and if they can be gotten at fairly to get a share of the money for the public treasury, then they should be gotten at, but it is up to the Minister of Finance to look after that, and if it can be done he will no doubt do it.

And this very patriotic announcement on the part of my hon. friend the Solicitor General, based on what everybody concluded was his knowledge of large war profits, so appealed to the Ottawa Citizen that with the report it published a portrait of my hon. friend so that people might recognize their benefactor when they met him on the street. If that report is not true, my hon. friend can contradict it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The report contains just the ordinary inaccuracies that appear in reports that travel over thousands of miles. In regard to the point in question as to what I said in regard to there being large war profits, it is exactly as I said, and as I said yesterday in the House that large profits were paid out at first. But I pointed out the reason: it was that the price of machinery was included in the price first paid to the contractors. But at this time that is not being done.

Mr. MURPHY: I have listened to the Solicitor-General very often, and I would remind him of the old proverb about the net being spread in the sight of the bird. The hon. gentleman does not deny the accuracy of this report in the Ottawa Citizen.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, I do.

Mr. MURPHY: Then, the hon. gentleman does deny it?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Not as to the point of there being large profits. But in other respects there are inaccuracies.

Mr. MURPHY: Then, we are in agreement on that. Very well. Now, this is what he said yesterday:

I believe there have been some cases of large profits.

We will leave it at that. But let me point out that there was a great omission in his speech of yesterday, an omission that must have sadly disappointed hon. members from the West. He forgot all about the commandeering of the wheat.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is coming.

Mr. MURPHY: Oh, that is coming. But a part of it did come. That part was in the shape of an official statement handed out by my hon. friend, with his name attached, to the press.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No.

Mr. MURPHY: The press said so. Here it is: "Government statement handed out by the Solicitor General, Hon. Arthur Meighen." And in that appeared the statement that the wheat had been commandeered at the request of the British Government.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Read that statement.

Mr. MURPHY: The hon. gentleman will find it in last Monday's Hansard, quoted in the speech of the right hon. leader of the Opposition.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I can tell the hon. gentleman he will find nothing of the kind in the statement.

Mr. MURPHY: Just for the sake of accuracy, let me quote it. I will not be Sir Hudibrased. Here is the speecn of the right hon. leader of the Opposition, reported in Hansard of the 17th January:

Official Government Statement.

Ottawa, November 28.—The following official statement was issued by the Government tonight:

Mr. MEIGHEN: Go ahead.

Mr. MURPHY: Then, my right hon. leader said:

The official press bureau made the following statement yesterday—

Mr. MEIGHEN: Let the hon. gentleman read the statement which he says was made by me that the wheat had been commandeered at the request of the British Government.

Mr. MURPHY: The statement handed out by the Solicitor General, as quoted by the leader of the Opposition, contained that statement.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Let the hon. gentleman read it. We will decide this point.

Mr. MURPHY: The Solicitor General wants the statement read rather than the quotation of it. I have here the Toronto World of the 29th November, 1915—

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: It is quite sufficient to quote Hansard.

Mr. MURPHY: I have this official statement of the Government:

> The phenomenal crop of wheat in the Canadian west has brought upon the government the duty of assisting to the farthest extent possible in its marketing. The supply of wheat the world over is known to have been abundant, and the importance of taking advantage of every opportunity to provide for the disposing of our grain is on that account the greater. For many months the government has been in touch with the British authorities with a view to procuring orders from the United Kingdom and the allied governments in order that the utmost share of the consuming demand in those countries may be turned towards our Canadian surplus. As a consequence of this, the British Government has requested the Canadian Government to provide within a short time a very large supply of No. 1, No. 2 and No. 3 Canadian northern wheat.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does that say that the British Government said to commandeer the wheat?

Mr. MURPHY: It says: "The British Government has requested the Canadian Government;" and that is the reason hon. gentlemen opposite advanced to the people of this country for commandeering the wheat. What is the use of hair-splitting? What is the use of taking up time unnecessarily?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The British Government asked us to provide the wheat. Does that mean that they told us how to provide it? That was our affair. If the hon. gentleman calls this hair-splitting, I am afraid there is something wrong with his mind.

Mr. MURPHY: No, what is wrong is with my hon. friend and his colleagues. This statement was contradicted by the British Government the next morning. And what followed? Immediately after the contradiction, another statement was put out, that the request for the commandeering of the wheat came from—

Mr. MEIGHEN: I must take the hon. gentleman to task again. There is no statement in the official statement contradicted by the British Government nor by any press report from the British Government.

Mr. MURPHY: What the British Government said, as quoted by my right hon. leader, was:

> With reference to the announcement from Ottawa on November 28, that the Canadian Government had commandeered 16,000,000 bushels of wheat at the request of the British Government, the Board of Agriculture state that the British Government have made no such request, and that at present they have no information on the subject.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is exactly what I have been telling him.

Mr. MURPHY: That is the whole point. Surely it is idle to discuss these trivialities raised by the Solicitor General. What was this statement handed out for? To explain why the Government had commandeered the wheat; there could be no meaning in it but that.

Now, another position taken by my hon. friend (Mr. Meighen) yesterday was that he would not attack or defend the Shell Committee. Then he went on to put up what looked to us on this side like something intended to be a strong defence of that commitee. I must say he damned them with faint praise; and I can well imagine each of the dismissed members of that committee, after reading the hon. gentleman's speech this morning, expressing his own feelings in a paraphrase of a famous couplet:

> 'Twas all very well to dissemole your love,
> But why did you kick me down stairs?

As a last word to my hon. friend the Solicitor General, who yesterday so strongly objected to our quoting from Liberal newspapers and animadverted very severely upon the speech of my hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Pugsley) let me show him how that speech impressed one of the strongest and most consistent Conservative newspapers in this Dominion. In its issue of yesterday, the Montreal Star has an editorial in these terms:

> The Shell Committee Charges.
>
> Charges of the gravity of those which Dr. Pugsley has made against the late Shell Committee should not be allowed to remain as the mere casual remarks of a debater on the speech from the Throne. So old a Parliamentarian as Dr. Pugsley knows that there is a proper way to bring statements of this sort before the House. And doubtless he will make good his accusations by some such formal step before the session is very much older.
>
> In any case, the Government cannot permit these shocking and humiliating charges to remain uninvestigated. We are confident that no Canadian Government will hide behind the technicality that the money, said to be worse than wasted, was British money, entrusted to us to be carefully spent amidst the strain of a great war, and not our own money. That would be to confess and proclaim that we would be less honest in dealing with sacred trust funds than in handling our personal property.

If a pound of British money, entrusted to a Canadian committee to buy the greatest possible amount of war material, was allowed to be diverted to Canadian private purses in inordinate profits, then the men guilty of this sordid and despicable treason were guilty of weakening by just so much the fighting forces of the Empire in the face of an appalling peril. They might as well have gone to the trenches and taken the rifles out of the hands of our boys, fronting a German attack, and then sold these rifles for their personal profit to the first second-hand dealer whom they met. If this has been done, the country wants to know it, regardless of legal technicalities or partisan politics.

A thorough investigation into this whole shell game should be set on foot at once.

In contrast with the sordid greed of the war profiteers, and to show the brighter side of human nature, I want to pay a tribute, before I conclude, to an American gentleman resident in Philadelphia, who has set an example that we may well follow. The name of this gentleman is Albert C. Middleton. He was virtually the proprietor of the Victor Talking Machine Company, in conducting the business of which he made several millions of dollars; now, though under fifty years of age, he is practically retired from business. His American company had an English connection, the Gramaphone Company, of England. This English company has a large contract for supplying war munitions. One of the managers of the English company requested this Philadelphia gentleman to purchase munitions in the United States. Mr. Middleton agreed. Up to May last he had sent to England about $30,000,000 worth of munitions, and he had placed orders in the United States for as many millions more. The bills for all these munitions were sent to this American gentleman of high repute, and were paid on his personal voucher. For doing all this, Mr. Speaker, Mr. Middleton not only made no charge, but he actually paid the expenses of the office staff necessary to look after these war munition orders. And, Sir, when he was asked why he gave gratuitously the services of himself and his staff, the only reply that he made was: "I am deeply interested in the Allies' cause." I think that I would be correctly interpreting the feeling of this House and of the people of Canada if I should thank that man in the name of the people of this Dominion for the unselfish service that he has rendered gratuitously to the cause in which we are all so deeply interested. I am satisfied that there are many men in Canada who would do as Mr. Middleton has done if they were but given the chance, and I appeal to my hon. friends in the Government to give every man who is willing to bear a man's part in this great struggle the chance to play his part.

One word more in conclusion, and by way of pointing the moral that I want to bring home to the members of this Government. There has been laid before you, Sir, a portion only of the black record of the war profiteers. But even that portion is so bad that, not unnaturally, you ask yourself: by what process of reasoning could these men justify what they have done? Let me, Sir, suggest an answer to that question. If the war profiteers reasoned at all, it occurs to me that they must have followed a course of reasoning similar to that which, it is said, a former generation of medical men used to employ in dealing with certain desperate cases. You are aware, Sir, that in the crisis of a serious malady the bleeding of a patient was often said to turn the scale towards healthy life. Possibly with that in mind, and, in any event, looking at Canada in the crisis of this war, the profiteers must have reasoned thus: as with individuals, so with nations, so even with empires; therefore, at this critical stage in Canada's life, financial phlebotomy on a national scale has become necessary as a desperate remedy. And to work they went, with knife and tomahawk, all the time loudly proclaiming:

> True patriots we; for, be it understood,
> We bleed our country for our country's good.

Mr. Speaker, the first and paramount duty of this Parliament is to provide a ligature that will stop the country's bleeding. That ligature can take only the form of an investigating committee, and, as one of the representatives of the people of this country, I now ask this Government to appoint such a committee without one moment's further delay.

Mr. F. STEWART SCOTT (South Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, permit me to add my congratulations to the many which you have received upon the honour which has been conferred upon you in the position to which you have just been appointed.

The hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Hon. Chas. Murphy) will pardon me, I am sure, if I do not attempt to follow him in some of the questions which he has raised. Speaking for myself, I must say that I have nothing but admiration for the tone and spirit of the many magnificent speeches which we have heard during the course of this debate, and the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat, has especially in his opening remarks, kept up the high standard of the speeches which we have heard during the last few days.

The hon. gentleman raised the question as to what was the true meaning of the visit of the Prime Minister of Canada to the councils of the Empire. I confess that I am unable at this time to give an answer to that question; I do not know what the answer will in the course of time be. Twenty years ago the Right Hon. Joseph Chamberlain, speaking on the subject of imperial federation, said that he was almost afraid to speak on that subject for fear he might lose his reputation as a practical statesman. He said, too, that imperial federation was described by many as a dream, but that somehow or other, it was one of those dreams that seemed to fasten themselves upon the public imagination, and dreams that impress the public in that way somehow or other had a way of coming true. Our Empire has travelled far since Mr. Joseph Chamberlain gave expression to that opinion. At the time of the South African war, owing to the part played by the people of Canada, the relations which existed between the Motherland and the colonies were vastly changed. I do not know what may be the true significance of the visit of the Canadian Premier to the councils of the Empire, but I do know that when it was cabled to Canada and to the different parts of the Empire throughout the world it kindled fires of Imperial patriotism that, when we associate with it the great sacrifices of treasure and blood that have been made by the colonies in this great struggle, will, it seems to me, have a tremendous influence on the future development of the Empire. We may not know at the present time what may be the future position of the colonies and their relation to the Motherland but we do know that never again will the people of this Empire be satisfied with the relations that have existed in the past.

The last speaker said that in the investigation which took place under sanction of this Parliament in the last session it was shown that a certain middleman named Charles Slater had received a commission of $15,000 on a contract which he had secured from the Dominion Government for the supply of army boots. What were the true circumstances in connection with that incident? This man was associated with a company located in Quebec called the Gauthier Company, which was at that time conducted by the widow of the man Gauthier, who founded it. She had assumed that business, and was carrying it on as a limited liability company. There was associated with her as a commercial traveller a man named Charles Slater. He had been in the past, owing to his experience in the shoe business, as was brought out in the investigation, the shoe expert of the late Government. That shows the estimation in which they held his ability. This man represented to this lady, who was conducting this business, that, through the influence which he possessed with the Government at Ottawa, if she would pay him a commission of 5 per cent. on any orders which she might receive from the Government, he would use his influence in getting those orders. What are the facts? The Gauthier Company, in common with many other shoe manufacturing concerns throughout the Dominion of Canada, were awarded contracts for shoes. They filled those contracts. They received their contract at exactly the same price as was paid to other manufacturers. This man represented to this woman that it was through his own influence that he had secured this order. I submit that an arrangement of that kind, entered into in that way, in so far as this Government or any other Government might be concerned, involved nothing discreditable or disreputable. I may say further that this same firm, owing to just such careless, such unbusinesslike methods, have since gone into insolvency, very largely as the result of their operations in these war contracts, and have been able to pay their creditors only a small percentage of their liabilities.

I have no knowledge of the other contract to which the hon. gentleman referred. If I heard the names correctly, he referred to one Belmer and the John Ritchie Company; and I believe the case, as he makes it out, narrows down to this, that Belmer, having a contract with the Ritchie Company is now suing them for a commission on orders which the John Ritchie Company received. The right hon. leader of the Opposition asked the hon. gentleman a question which it seemed to me was pertinent. The first impression which I gained was that the contract to which he referred was a contract between the Government, or some representative of the Government, and this firm; but we find that the contract was an ordinary contract between a commercial man and the firm; and I have only this to say, that if the John Ritchie Company, after the knowledge that has gone throughout the length and breadth of this country after the investigations we have had, knowledge which has been heralded broadcast throughout the press, that no middleman can secure orders for boots or for other commodities from the Militia Department, that if any business firm enters into a contract of that kind with a middleman, they have only themselves to blame. And I submit further that it will be found that if the John Ritchie Company did secure that order they received it at the same price that was paid to other manufacturers at the same time. I submit further that if they are foolish enough, under those circumstances, to enter into a contract of that kind, certainly this Government is not to be blamed or to be held responsible.

As I said before, I have enjoyed very much indeed the speeches which we have had during the past few days. I listened, as I always listen, with a great deal of interest to the remarks of the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Michael Clark). He is always so clear cut and so emphatic in his statements that I am sure the whole House joins with me in saying that we all listen to him with a great deal of pleasure. I want, for a moment, ask the consideration of the House to a point that was brought up by the hon. member for Red Deer in his speech of the other day. He was speaking about the amendment which was submitted to this House upon which the House divided in the session of last year. He said:

> Now, for my part I have no regret about the criticism or about the amendment, especially that portion of it which referred to the raising of additional obstacles against trade from Great Britain at this particular crisis of the Empire's history. I would appeal to my hon. friend the Minister of Finance, to whom I have never appealed without receiving careful attention, whether our criticism of that particular part of the Budget of last year has not been justified in the event.
> It cannot be pleasant to him—I am sure it is not—that at this moment the imports from Great Britain to this country should be disappearing almost to the vanishing point. This decrease in British imports into Canada comes at a moment when we know that Great Britain needs for the particular purposes of exchange to be sending more goods into Canada.

He was supporting an amendment that was submitted to the House. I will read the amendment once again:

> This House is ready to provide for the exigencies of the present situation and to vote all necessary ways and means to that end, but it regrets that in the measure under consideration duties are imposed which must be oppressive upon the people whilst yielding little or no revenue, and that the said measure is particularly objectionable in the fact that instead of favouring it, it is placing extra barriers against Great Britain's trade with Canada, at a moment when the Mother Country is under a war strain unparalleled in history.

There were two points raised in that amendment, the first being that the budget of one year ago would yield little or no revenue. The hon. member for Red Deer the other day said that he had no regrets for the stand he had taken upon that occasion. I have here the figures furnished by the Minister of Finance in his Budget speech a year ago. He stated that to meet the requirements of this country there would be needed $150,000,000 or $30,000,000 over and above his estimate of what would have been raised under the old method and system of taxation. Now, we have had some months' experience of the working of that budget, and what is the result? I am informed that the estimate of $150,000,000, which the Minister of Finance had reason to expect would flow into the coffers of this country, was altogether too small, and that the receipts will be very considerably in excess of that figure.

At six o'clock, the House took recess.

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. SCOTT: When the House rose at six o'clock I was referring to the argument of the hon. member for Red Deer as to the effect of the budget increase of five per cent last year upon goods imported from Great Britain. The argument of my hon. friend was that it must be a matter for regret to the Finance Minister to-day to find that as a result of that action upon the part of the Government imports from Great Britain to Canada had fallen to such a low point. For the consideration of the House I should like to submit some figures from the trade returns which it seems to me hardly bear out the argument of the hon. member for Red Deer. In August, 1914, the month in which the war broke out, there was a decrease in our imports from Great Britain of 26.3 per cent as compared with August, 1913; in September the decrease amounted to 40.3 per cent; in October to 31.8 per cent; in November to 42.3 per cent; in December to 35.2 per cent; in January, 1915, to 26.8 per cent. Taking the average percentage of decrease during those months we find that from July, 1914, to January, 1915, there was an average decrease of 33⅓ per cent. In February, 1915, the tariff proposals of the budget of 1915 came into effect, and in that month we find a decrease in the imports from Great Britain of 21.7 per cent; in March a decrease of 38.1 per cent; in April of 28.1 per cent; in May of 40.2 per cent; in June of 38.4 per cent; and in August a decrease of 33.6 per cent. We find, then, that the average rate of decrease for the months during which the new budget proposals were in operation was 29 per cent. So that the situation resolves itself into this. The decrease in imports from Great Britain during the months of the war previous to the imposition of the extra five per cent imposed by the Budget of 1915 was greater than the decrease during the months the Budget has been in operation. It does not seem to me a matter for wonder, however, that there has been a continued decrease in imports from Great Britain to Canada. I think that decrease can be attributed to other reasons than the tariff. For instance, the importation of steel from Great Britain to Canada has decreased. Steel is a very important industry in Great Britain, but at the present time Great Britain is so absorbed in carrying on the war, and her industries are so much engaged in turning out munitions, that she has no steel to spare for Canada and the other countries of the world. The same thing applies to woollens. The woollen mills of Canada are busier at the present time, perhaps, than they have ever been before. The reason for the decrease in our imports from Great Britain is not because the people of Canada are not prepared to buy owing to the imposition of the additional five per cent war tax, but simply because Great Britain has not goods to sell; and at the present time we see Canada not only supplying her own market but exporting large quantities of goods to Great Britain.

If we examine the imports of the United States from Great Britain, dividing them into the two periods I have described, we shall find that the situation there is largely the same. In December, 1914, the imports from Great Britain to the United States decreased 47·8 per cent; in January, 1915, 38·4 per cent; in February, 27·7 per cent; in March, 20·5 per cent. In the United States we have no additional tax placed upon imports from Great Britain. Their imports from that country decreased just the same as our imports did. If we take the world-wide trade of Great Britain we shall find just the same thing. I have the figures here, and I find that in the month of August, 1914, the decrease as compared with the same month in 1913 was 45·1 per cent; in September, 37·1 per cent; and so on. The export trade of Great Britain has steadily declined.

During the course of this debate we have heard the Government criticised for the manner in which it has carried on the business of this country—that they did not use economy enough, that they were not careful enough in the expenditure of public funds, and that as a result the best interests of the country were suffering. I have before me a statement prepared by the Finance Department of the receipts up to January 10, 1916, and I find that the receipts up to that date are $25,205,634.51 in excess of last year. On ordinary account the expenditure is $10,743,393.76 less than last year. Capital expenditure during the same period is $6,257,400.82 less than last year.

So that if we take the total additional revenue that this country has received up to the present time as a result of the Budget of 1915, and if we add to that the economies that have been effected in the administration of the affairs of this country as compared with the previous year, we shall find that the financial position of Canada at the present time is better by $42,206,429 than it was one year ago. Therefore I do not think that the charge can be successfully substantiated that the ministers of the Crown of this Administration have not been alive to the necessities of the occasion, and have not practised economical methods wherever possible. When the war broke out the Minister of Finance, in his Budget speech at the war session of Parliament, said that until the conclusion of the war no new work on capital account would be begun, and I believe that that has been the policy, and that it can be said that no new work has been undertaken by the present Administration since the outbreak of war.

I have followed the various gentlemen who have taken part in this debate, and it seems to me that the situation in this Parliament at the present time hinges, to a very large extent, upon the charges that have been made against the Shell Committee. As I thought of this feature of the situation, history seemed to be once again repeating itself. Just as last year we had a great deal of discussion about other charges that had been spread broadcast throughout the land, so at this time we have charges of a somewhat similar nature lodged against a very large and important industry. The hon. member for Russell (Mr. Murphy) this afternoon referred to the so-called shell scandal, and demanded an investigation. You will remember, Mr. Speaker, that last year the right hon. leader of the Opposition brought to the attention of the House and of the Government the fact that there had been very widely discussed throughout the country certain charges against a few manufacturers of having supplied a poor quality of boots. The Liberal press throughout Canada had many references to that matter, just as we find many references at the present time to the so-called shell scandal. Newspaper references to the boot question could have been quoted quite extensively last year just as there have been quoted in this debate references to the so-called shell scandal the Toronto Globe said:

> The punk boot men are still at large. The boot scandal will stand as a discouraging warning until it is cleared away by the adequate punishment of the guilty.

Again it said:

> Shavings of wood and pieces of cork do not appear to be good material out of which to make the soles of soldiers' boots.

The Government at that time decided, rightly or wrongly, that that question should be investigated, and for weeks throughout the entire session a special parliamentary committee investigated every possible detail, every tittle of evidence that could be submitted for its consideration, to prove that there had been scandal in connection with the purchase of boots. As a result of that investigation, a majority report and a minority report were submitted to the House. I will not weary the House by going over the ground further than to say this, that the hon. member for North Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt), who was a member of the committee of investigation, said from his place in the House, after the matter had been given the fullest and most careful investigation, that the manufacturers had supplied to the Militia Department boots which were well up to the sample, and that there was absolutely no evidence of any fraud upon their part. The reports came down for the consideration of this House. The matter was fully discussed by the members of the committee; yet it was so clear that there was nothing to justify the charges that had been made that, when the matter came to a division, there were only five members among hon. gentlemen opposite who thought that it was of sufficient consequence to record their vote. Therefore, from that time to the present, alarmed and excited although I will admit the public mind was, just as it is alarmed at the present time, we have not had a single complaint about the way in which those boot manufacturers have fulfilled their contracts. I said there was a similarity between the conditions that existed at that time and the conditions that exist at present. I have listened to the remarks of hon. gentlemen opposite; I have heard their references to the way in which this business has been conducted by the Shell Committee; but up to the present I have not seen brought to the attention of the House any charge that would justify an investigation. As an example, let us take what the hon. member for St. John the other night said:

> Then, again, I am told that another gentleman, a gentleman of my own profession, a lawyer in the city of Montreal, who contested the constituency of Richelieu at the last election, Mr. Morgan,—
> Mr. Lemieux. Not Pierpont?
>
> Mr. Pugsley: No, Mr. E. D. Morgan.
>
> Mr. Rogers: Pierpont's brother.
> Mr. Pugsley: Pierpont's brother? If he keeps on manufacturing shells he will be Pierpont's partner and it will not be long before he can laugh at Pierpont Morgan.

And so the fact of this Mr. Morgan having received a contract was held up to contempt and ridicule. I have in my hand a letter from this Mr. Morgan, setting out the situation in so far as his shell contract is concerned, and I would like to submit his statement of the situation to the consideration of this House, with this exception: there are certain references of a personal nature made to the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley), which I would very much prefer not to be the medium of bringing to public attention. If the House will permit me, I will read this letter of Mr. E. A. D. Morgan, with the extracts to which I have referred left out:

> Montreal, January 20, 1916.
> Hon. Mr. William Pugsley,
> House of Commons,
> Ottawa, Ont.
>
> Sir,—My attention has been called to a statement made by you, on the floor of the House, that a contract had been given to E. A. D. Morgan, barrister, of Montreal, former candidate for Richelieu, at a higher price than given to others. I, however, wish to state, to show you how uncalled-for were your remarks—

I leave out a paragraph.

—the only facts in this connection with which you were unacquainted.

There is in Sorel a very large machine shop, the property of a bank, who had to take it over when the former owners found themselves in difficulties, it is splendidly equipped and very well disposed for the manufacture of shells, and it was only running at about one-third capacity.

Another factory, the property of another bank, was idle

Ever since the question of manufacturing shells was broached, in order to obtain employment for the great number of men in Sorel, who found work hard to get owing to war conditions, and more particularly the cutting down of the number of men in the Government shipyard at Sorel, and the absence of large steamers coming to the port of Montreal having done away with lightering, I worried the former Shell Committee to get a shell contract, and at any price.

I had induced my two sons to invest $10,000 each and had obtained the promise of several thousand dollars from friends as well as about $25,000 in $100 subscriptions from the workingmen in Sorel.

Once again I omit a reference of a per sonal nature.

To return to shells. Getting no results from the Shell Committee, I even went to Mr. Thomas, and when he suggested our making shells at cost price, I told him we were prepared to do so, but, like my Irish forbears at Fontenoy, I wanted "the English to begin first," and the Welsh mine owners to show the same disinterestedness, by agreeing to give the miners the same wages for three years after the war, as they were giving them at present, so as to prevent strikes at a time when France was in such dire need of coal.

I also agitated very strongly with the members of the Federal Cabinet the importance of having a French-Canadian on the Shell Committee, as a measure of justice to them.

Possibly, for those reasons, I got no shell contract, but when tenders were called for, my sons and I tendered for two contracts, one for 60,0 0 4·5 and another for 40,000 60-pounders These tenders were put in at the price suggested in the circular, which I had been lucky enough to get hold of.

We obtained a contract for only 25,000 shells and not at a higher price than given to others.

This contract was too small to allow of the purchase of the large plant at Sorel, as the bank refused to sell. I then asked for an increase in the number of shells, at least up to 40,000.

Upon the statement of the new board that they could not increase the number of shells, but that they expected to get further orders, and we would have an opportunity to tender, I offered to renounce our contract and to take a 100,000 shell order at the lowest price that any one would ask for tenders. This was also refused.

I then asked the bank to start work at their factory on the order given to my sons and myself, transferring them the contract without any consideration whatsoever except that the work be carried on at Sorel. This was declined.

I thereupon endeavoured to organize a company and succeeded, as a matter of fact the building is now under construction and the machinery under purchase, for delivery in time to carry out the contract. As the three brothers who became interested in the matter had already bound themselves to purchase the machinery, and insisted that they should have the entire say in the matter, my sons (one of whom, seeing the delay in obtaining a shell contract, had decided to "do his bit" otherwise, and enlisted for overseas service, which, by the way, is more than any of yours have done), instead of putting money in the new company, took one-fifth of the stock for their interest in the contract and I agreed to transfer 2½ per cent of the stock which I was to get to the manufacturers of the machinery, the sole consideration being the quick delivery of the machinery.

Once again I omit a part.

As I know you will not rectify your statement and that I cannot, until after the next election, refute it on the floor of the House, I am sending this letter to your colleagues, who heard your accusations against me.

Yours truly,

E. A. D. Morgan.

This is one of the cases cited as showing that there has been wrongdoing in the letting of shell contracts. It seems to me that if something of a more substantial nature than this cannot be charged against the Shell Committee, there surely is not at the present time any ground for an investigation.

There have been other rumours. Last night there was brought to the attention of the House by the hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Kyte) something that went further than mere rumour, a quotation from the columns of a New York financial paper. It referred to a letter written by Sir Henry M. Pellatt, president of the Steel and Radiation Company of Canada, naming prices being paid for certain classes of shells in Canada. I do not wish to take up the time of the House by going over this entire article. In effect, the situation is this: Sir Henry Pellatt writes to New York financial interests that the company of which he is the president had received contracts for the manufacture of shells, and that on this first contract his profit is going to be $250,000, and that he has another contract that will show a profit of $200,000. Now, I submit to the judgment of hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House that if they were legitimate manufacturers engaged in the production of shells and had their own business to carry on, would it be reasonable to suppose that they would write a letter of that kind giving to the public the profit they were going to make. Who is Sir Henry Pellatt? Is he a great captain of industry? I have never heard him so described. He is a member of the firm of Pellatt & Pellatt, stockbrokers, of the city of Toronto. Sir Henry Pellatt, when he wrote that letter, wrote it as one form of advertising. He is not concerned about the profits that are going to be made out of the shell industry in Canada. He is playing for bigger game. He wants the impression to go abroad in Wall street, in the stock exchanges of Toronto and Montreal, that he is getting big, fat, round contracts for war munitions, and he has got a war stock that he is going to sell to the unsuspecting public.

I come from a place where shells are being manufactured as successfully as in any part of this Dominion of Canada—and the work is carried on not for stock-jobbing purposes, but as a legitimate manufacturing enterprise. In connection with the shell orders that have been given in my constituency—and many have been given up to the present time—I may say that 75 per cent of the profits are represented to-day in the capital cost of new machinery and equipment. I know nothing of the operations of the stock market, but I will guarantee that Steel and Radiation stock, simultaneously with the announcement to which I have referred, was placed upon the market in the stock exchanges of Canada and the United States. I will guarantee also that that stock had a phenomenal rise, and that when this war is over, Sir Henry Pellatt will not hold that stock and will not be in a position to receive those war dividends—the unsuspecting public will once again have been taken in. I believe that the case of the Steel and Radiation Company may be taken as a fair sample of where this agitation has come from with regard to the abnormal profits that are being made in the production of shells.

I do not wish to enter into any discussion as to what might have happened if hon. gentlemen opposite had held the reins of power in August, 1914. I myself am persuaded that if Sir Wilfrid Laurier had been Prime Minister of this country at the time war broke out, he would have given to the service of his country all the earnestness and zeal that patriotic enthusiasm could command. But I desire to say that the people of Canada have followed the record of the Borden Administration since the war began. They have observed the way in which the Prime Minister of this country has assumed and discharged the duties of that difficult position; the way in which the Minister of Militia has fulfilled his arduous task; the way in which the Minister of Finance has guided our financial course during a most difficult and trying period; the way in which the other members of the Cabinet have measured up to the situation. And I may add—when all this passion that is being aroused has passed away, hon. gentlemen will agree with me—that I would include the Shell Committee amongst those who have given magnificent service to their country. When I think of what the Government has done during these trying times; when I think of the way in which they have represented the genius and the aspirations of the Canadian people, as a humble member of the party which I represent, I am indeed proud.

I feel that I must not too long transgress upon the time of this House. As I said before, I have taken a great deal of pleasure in listening to the speeches that have been delivered in this debate, and I think that the tone of them has been splendid, and creditable indeed to this House of Commons. I am not one of those who think that the Opposition should sit still and say nothing. I think that if there is anything, even in the present situation, that demands criticism, hon. gentlemen opposite would be derelict in their duty if they hesitated to criticise it. But it seems to me that when we think of what has been accomplished in this country, when we think of what the country has passed through, and of the opportunities that there have been for irregularities, when we consider that nothing more substantial has been brought against the record of this Administration, our affairs have indeed been conducted in an honourable and creditable manner.

Reference has been made to certain agitators in the province of Quebec, of whom we as Canadian people do not feel proud. In this respect I am prepared to accept the view of the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux), who said the other day that we must look not to the Bourassas and the Lavergnes for an expression of the feelings and sentiments of the French-Canadian people, but that we may find those sentiments properly expressed in the speeches that have been delivered by the Lauriers and the Casgrains. I believe implicitly that that is a proper summing-up of the situation. In regard to the statements that have been made recently in the Quebec legislature, I believe such is the benign influence of British institutions, that these men will live to regret the day that they ever gave expression to such sentiments, and that their children, whatever their fathers may have advocated, will be loyal and patriotic Canadians.

As I endeavoured to catch the spririt underlying the opinions of hon. gentlemen of this House, and as I tried to think of what I might appropriately say on this occasion, it seemed to me that in concluding the remarks that I was to make to-night, I could not do better than quote to the House an extract from a spech delivered more than fifty years ago by a distinguished member of Parliament. He was speaking for unity; for the removal of race and class prejudices. The late Thomas D'Arcy McGee, in the course of an address in which he was speaking of the future of Canada—and with these words I shall conclude—said:

> All we have to do is, each for himself, to keep down dissensions which can only weaken, impoverish, and keep back the country; each for himself, to do all he can to increase its wealth, its strength, and its reputation; each for himself—you and you, gentlemen, and all of us—to welcome every talent, to hail every invention, to cherish every gem of art, to foster every gleam of authorship, to honour every acquirement and every natural gift; to lift ourselves to the level of our destinies, to rise above all low limitations and narrow conscriptions; to cultivate that true catholicity of spirit which embraces all creeds, all classes and all races in order to make of our boundless Canada, so rich in known and unknown resources, a great new northern nation.

Mr. ONESIPHORE TURGEON (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, before I enter upon the subject of my remarks on this occasion, I deem it my duty to offer you my congratulations on your elevation to the seat which you now occupy, knowing that in that position you will display the dignity which you have shown in an inferior seat, and that impartiality will at all times characterize your actions, as we have seen even during the few days you have presided over this House.

I have listened with great attention to the mover and seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the Throne. It has been my pleasure in other sessions to listen with gratification and admiration to the hon. member for the Yukon (Mr. Alfred Thompson). On this occasion he has again been equal to the task imposed on him, and his speech will remain among the cherished records of Canada for many years to come. The seconder of the address has recalled to this House many of the deeds of the French Canadian people from the province of Quebec in the present war. I need not mention the speeches of the right hon. Prime Minister and the right hon. leader of the Opposition, who have both been equal to the task of the day. It was my pleasure again to listen to the eloquent address of the hon. Postmaster General (Mr. Casgrain), who also reminded this Parliament and the country of the deeds which have been acomplished in the field of battle by French Canadians from the province of Quebec. He gave us some information as to the number of soldiers who have gone to the front from that province, many of whom have already come back with glory, while others have given their lives and died the death of heroes in defence of the sacred cause of liberty, justice and right. I join with these gentlemen in paying honour to the members of the French-Canadian race from the province of Quebec and from Western Canada for the part they have taken in this great war.

But I rise to say that far to the east of Quebec, along the coast of the Atlantic and the gulf of St. Lawrence, there is also an element of the French race, in the land of Evangeline, the forest primeval so poetically described by Longfellow, now converted into prosperous towns and villages, and happy homes, blessed with large families, educated to the forgiveness of the harshness of conquest in the present enjoyment of the glorious faculties of British citizenship, the Acadians of the Maritime provinces, who, in this present crisis, have given testimony of their love of country and their appreciation of the benefits of British citizenship equal to that given by any other section of the Canadian people. As senior member for the Acadian people in this House, representing the largest number of Acadians in the Maritime Provinces, who opened to me the gate of this sanctuary some sixteen years ago and have kept it open for me on every occasion since that time, I deem it my duty to make you acquainted with what has been going on among the Acadian people in the Maritime Provinces. Let me tell you that the efforts of the French race in the province of Quebec have been equalled —I say it with pride—by those of the Maritime Provinces. Not only the common citizens among the Acadians have given their attention to the position in which Canada has been placed through this turmoil of European war, but every man of intelligence of every position, every Acadian priest in the Maritime Provinces, has devoted his time, his efforts, his eloquence, to calling upon the young men of his place to enlist with others and go and defend their country by defending the rule of Britannia. It has been my pleasure on many occasions during the last year to address recruiting meetings in my county. There is not one district which I have not visited, and in many of them, especially in the larger places such as Bathurst, where the population is mixed, we have always had the ministers of the non-Catholic denominations side by side with the Catholic priest; and in every other district, the French districts more particularly, every meeting was presided over by the parish priest; and as my hon. friend Mr. Lemieux said of the Province of Quebec, in any place where no hall or schoolhouse afforded sufficient accommodation for the multitude, the vestry of the church of the locality was open to the recruiting meetings, presided over, as I say, by the parish priest.

The hon. the Postmaster General, as well as the seconder of the Address, in order to show to the country at large, as well as to this House, the unanimity of action of the whole people, more particularly among the ecclesiastical authorities, has read to this House the noble words that have fallen from the lips of the Archbishop of Quebec and the Archbishop of Montreal.

I am sure that every one in this House will be edified by his words, and that they will be read by future generations. Will you permit me, Mr. Speaker, to read a few more passages to the House. I am sure you will agree that no more patriotic, no more eloquent and fervid appeal has been made during the war than that made by the only Acadian Bishop in the Maritime Provinces, Bishop Leblanc, of St. John, at a public meeting held in the city of St. John on the 1st November, 1914. This is what he said:

> As Canadians our cause is bound up with the cause of Britain her interests are ours; if England falls we are going to fall with her, and we are going to lose all the glorious privileges we enjoy as citizens of the British Empire. Canada now so free and so happy, so blessed by God with such great resources, Canada that has such a brilliant future before her, will be reduced to a condition of vassalage and crushed under the iron heel of a foreign 'and unsympathetic ruler.
> Failure for England in this war will mean England's destruction and even success will have to be dearly paid for; but, let us thank God, the age of chivalry is not passed; there is still enough patriotism and heroism in the young men of this province to make a supreme effort now for England's cause. Our hope is in our young men, to them we look to uphold the honour and the glory of the British Empire, of that empire which, rather than break its plighted word to gallant little Belgium, has been willing to sacrifice the best and noblest of her sons

Coming from such a high dignitary, these words could not fail to have a beneficent effect, and I may say that since then, on more than one occasion, Bishop Leblanc has given expression to similar sentiments at French gatherings, more particularly at Moncton and Shediac. May I point out, Mr. Speaker, that a great number of Acadians have enlisted in the military forces. They have enlisted in every county of the Maritime Provinces. I know whereof I speak, so far as the counties of New Brunswick are concerned, and I think the hon. members from Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island, who represent consituencies containing French elements, can testify to the fact that in their constituencies also the Acadian people have risen to the occasion. Hundreds and thousands of them have already gone to the front, and only recently, just before the Christmas holidays, it was decided to form an Acadian battalion.

I desire to extend to my hon. friend the Minister of Militia my congratulations upon his prompt response to the request of the Acadian people. At present they are engaged throughout the counties of New Brunswick and other parts of the Maritime Provinces in forming a battalion of their own, with their own officers, and, let me add, with their own chaplain. Only a few days ago, just as I was about to leave my home to come here to attend to my duties in Parliament, we received a report in Bathurst that two brave young men from the county of Gloucester had been killed in action. One, Cyril Vigot, though born on the island of Jersey, had been a resident at Caraquet, in the county of Gloucester for many years. He had left one of the best positions open to young men in the county of Gloucester, having been manager of one of the branches of the Loggie Company in Caraquet. The other young man, Henry Bertin, before leaving to join the colours, appealed to his mother not to refuse him permission to go, saying, "I feel I have to go for my country." The action of these brave fellows showed what the young men of Acadia are prepared to do to play their part in the struggle for liberty, right and justice.

The people of Canada have always shown themselves willing and ready to respond to the call of duty. Many outside observers have remarked that the plane of Canadian patriotism was the loftiest ever offered to human contemplation by reason of the many virtues of the different races embraced in the Dominion, races inspired by the highest ideals of Christianity. In the present crisis they have exhibited to the world their readiness to bear the greatest sacrifices for the preservation of those ideals. The fact has been dwelt upon that Canada engaged voluntarily in this war. She went with all the speed possible to the assistance of the Motherland, and of the small nations which were threatened by Prussian militarism. But Canada has not been alone in showing such a fine example. We have seen the same response on the part of our sister dominions. We have seen Australia, New Zealand, South Africa, Newfoundland, and other portions of the Empire moving with the harmony which has been the admiration of the world and the consternation of the Kaiser of Germany. How is it that Great Britain has been able to evoke the patriotism of all her possessions at the moment of trial? How has she been able to link together her distant possessions, and to present such solidarity in the face of the enemy? All this was accomplished, not by any threat or menace such as the Kaiser of Germany would use, not by the blood-and-iron policy of Bismarck, not by conscription, but through love beaming across the seas and drawing from every British shore the affection of Britain's millions of subjects blended into one common soul under the benevolent smile of Providence. From Ireland, which has suffered persecution for centuries, we have seen thousands of soldiers instantly respond to the call and take their place in the trenches alongside the Belgian soldiers. The Irish soldier in the battlefield, mindful of the noble words of Gladstone his protector, does not merely look on while the fight for freedom progresses but rushes into the fray and willingly sacrifices his life. His valour and fearlessness is excelled only by the heroism of the Belgian soldier. Such, Mr. Speaker, is the position in which we are to-day, and which is likely to continue for some time to come. The people of Canada will continue to make any sacrifices that may be needed, sacrifices in men and sacrifices in money.

As I said a moment ago, Britain accomplished all these marvels without conscription, and I wish to say how much I appreciated the declaration of the right hon. the Prime Minister the other day, and the declaration of the leader of the Opposition, that there shall be no conscription in Canada. Why, Mr. Speaker, we are engaged in this war for the very purpose of effacing, if we can, conscription from the face of the earth. The conscription of the Prussian people has been the cause of all the bloodshed during the last eighty years. It is against this Prussian militarism, which has made a whole nation of seventy million people merely the tools of military officers, that we are sending our young men to-day. The Prussian soldier is fighting to-day not because he is exercising his own intelligence, nor from any motives of freedom, but to give vent to his passions,—and patriotism takes second place in his heart.

Canada is to raise five hundred thousand troops. In speaking to the young men of my county I have always said that we wanted them to go voluntarily, that we wanted them to go because we did not want conscription applied to Canada if Germany should unfortunately win this war, and the more deeply our young men have been impressed with this idea the more eagerly have they come forward. My hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Hazen), who knows conditions in New Brunswick, is aware that in the early months of the war recruits in that part of the country came forward rather slowly, for the reason that like nearly every one in Canada and in Great Britain too they made the mistake of thinking the war would be a short one. Many young men have said to me, What is the use of going? Why, after we have had six months training at Valcartier the war will be over. But now, when the necessity for sacrifice has been made clear to them, they are coming forward in thousands where a year ago they came forward in hundreds. I agree with the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) that if conscription is absolutely necessary in Canada we shall have to resort to it, but I maintain that if we adopt the proper measures it will not be necessary to have conscription in order to raise the 250,000 men who are required. The people of Canada will willingly give them. I wish to place myself emphatically on record against conscription. I do not wish to say anything offensive in regard to what has happened in England lately. One of the glories of Britain is that she has never had to resort to conscription. It is of course only a mild sort of conscription they are proposing there now and merely a temporary measure, because the leading men of Great Britain no doubt feel that they owe it to the Allies to do all they possibly can to help secure victory. It is to be regretted that a year ago the labour element in Great Britain was not really educated to the necessities of the occasion. We have seen that Welsh statesman, Mr. Lloyd George, appealing to the labour element, and the labour element once it was educated to the necessities of the occasion responded with a patriotism that could not be excelled by any other class of British subjects.

I agree also with the opinion of my hon. friend from Edmonton, that our wounded soldiers who return to Canada must receive a larger pension. If you satisfy our young men that if they become incapacitated through the war they will be treated by the nation according to their sacrifice, if you convince them that they are fighting for a nation which is worthy of the sacrifice, and that when they come back incapacitated they will not be at the mercy of any municipality or even a province, but that the Government of the nation itself will give them an adequate pension—and they have a right to it having sacrificed their future and exposed their life—then I say, we shall get all the recruits we need.

The duty of providing for our wounded soldiers ought not to be left to the provinces nor to the Patriotic Fund. Our soldiers must feel their security before they go. The provinces should not have such a burden imposed upon them, because some of our provinces have certainly no great wealth at their disposal. My hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Hazen) will agree with me, I am sure, when I say that the revenues of the province of New Brunswick are small compared with all its necessities, and if we were to impose to-day upon the Government of that province the responsibility, or a part of the responsibility, for the maintenance of our returned soldiers, some of them might not get the comforts which they have a right to expect. The Dominion Government and the nation at large should undertake this duty. The same thing has been done in the United States. The Government of the United States after the war of the Revolution did not distribute the cost of the pensions to her returned soldiers amongst the different states nor leave it to the devotion of her people, but established a pension board and gave the soldier what was needed for his comfort and that of his family when he got back from the front.

Another question which I wish to bring to the attention of the House is a paragraph in the speech from the Throne which reads as follows:

> The life of the present Parliament expires in the autumn of this year, and, under existing legislation, a dissolution and election would be necessary in the early future. My advisers, however, are of the opinion that the wishes of the Canadian people and the present requirements of the war would be best met my avoiding the distraction and confusion consequent upon a general election at so critical a time.
> That purpose can only be effected through the medium of legislation by the Parliament of the United Kingdom. A resolution authorizing and requesting the enactment of such legislation as will extend the life of this Parliament for the period of one year will be presented to you.

No one appreciates more deeply than I do the position in which Canada is at present on account of this war. It has been said by the Liberal party at least that the Government of the day should carry on the prosecution of the war. Now, the war has lasted eighteen months, and is not yet ended, and while the end may come within a short time, the war may, unfortunately, last a very long time. The proposal in the speech from the Throne means an amendment to the British North America Act under which we live to-day, and I view it with all sincerity and seriousness. My views upon the constitution of Canada have been well known to this House. I believe, since I have been a member of it, and also to the people of my constituency, either through my addresses to the public or through the press, for many years before I became a member of this House. My hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries knows that I always view with apprehension any suggestion of a change in the constitution of Canada. While the minority in New Brunswick have suffered on account of the constitution, we have been educated to suffer for the sake of the constitution, in order that changes in it and in the methods of applying its principles may not endanger privileges conferred upon some classes of the people by it. Our constitution is not exactly the same as that of Great Britain: it is the depository of the privileges of the minorities throughout the whole Dominion. Majorities of to-day may be minorities of to-morrow, and the constitution is for the happiness of all the people of Canada and of the minorities, whichever they may be. I do not yet say definitely what position I may have to take on this question; but you, Mr. Speaker, and my colleagues from the Maritime Provinces, as well as the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries, know that I have strong views on this question; that I have always opposed as strongly as I could any change in the constitution unless effected by the very means indicated, if not by the letter, by the spirit of the constitution. It is my respect and love and admiration for the constitution which has led me during my life time to stand by it and to ask my people to stand by it. It is to me the ideal legislation which has as yet been given to the people of the western hemisphere, and which is far superior to the constitution of the United States. I have always given the fathers of Confederation the highest praise for their wisdom at the time when they met together to frame that constitution, which was to insure the happiness of the people of Canada not only for the past fifty years, but for centuries to come. Only very recently Sir Chas. Tupper, the last survivor of the fathers of Confederation, passed away. His death was the occasion for expressions of admiration for this old statesman of Canada. The whole press of Canada was filled with praises of his name for his deeds. A great many of our leading statesmen from the capital of Canada, and from other cities and towns throughout the Dominion, flocked to his funeral in order to give an expression of their admiration of his career. Owing to circumstances, I was not able to participate in that demonstration; but I have given strong expressions of my admiration of Sir Charles Tupper, as well as of every other one of the fathers of Confederation, for their framing of our constitution.

I do not know yet with what safeguards the Bill may be surrounded when it is presented to this House for consideration. I have always claimed that if any change in the constitution is to be made, there is only one way to proceed, and that is by the submission of the proposed change to consideration on the part of the representatives of the provinces. Confederation is a union of the provinces of Canada, and these provinces have come together for certain purposes and on certain terms, which are set forth in the constitution. Only last session I attempted to prevent a change in the constitution with regard to representation in this House. It was not for the sake of popularity that I took that stand. All my colleagues in the province of New Brunswick were not only willing but anxious to have the change made, because it would secure larger representation for New Brunswick and for the Maritime Provinces generally. The change was made upon an address of the two Houses of this Parliament to the Parliament of Great Britain. If the right hon. leader of the Government (Sir Robert Borden) were here he would bear me out in stating that at the last moment, before that Bill was passed, I again appealed to him to have the proposal submitted to a conference of the Premiers of the provinces. If it were approved by such a conference, then the Parliament of Great Britain could sanction it and all would submit to it. But, unfortunately, my last appeal fell upon deaf ears, and so we have that change made in the constitution of Canada. Now we are asked to-day to do what, perhaps, a large proportion of the people of Canada might regard with some apprehension, as I do. Our electors have sent us here for a period of five years, which period will expire on the 7th or 8th of October, when, if not before, in regular course, this Parliament will cease to exist. But we are asked now to sanction the lengthening of that term. This will save us the trouble of returning to our electors. This question has a legal as well as a moral aspect. There is the legal objection to giving ourselves an extension of life as representatives when the people whose representatives we are have not sanctioned that extension. There is also the moral aspect when we undertake to vote for ourselves indemnity for one or more sessions beyond the time for which the people sent us here. These are considerations, which, I believe, the people of this country have seriously in mind.

I quite realize that in this time of war many and great sacrifices are called for. No one dreads more than I do the sadness of this war, which has invaded my own home as it has thousands of others. It is not for the sake of a political fight that I would express my disapproval of this proposal. We must consider conditions in all these matters, and must regard so grave a question as this with the seriousness which the people expect of us. It is true that a change has just been made lengthening the life of the present Parliament of Great Britain. But, as I have stated, the British Parliament is not in the same position as ours. Under our constitution this Parliament is the depository of the liberties of many classes, minorities and majorities, in the Dominion of Canada. We must remember, also, that Great Britain has assumed the financing of the war not only for herself but for her allies as well, a tremendous task to be undertaken by the British Parliament. We must remember also that the statesmen of Great Britain have only demanded an extension of the life of their present Parliament for eight months, which term will expire before the natural expiry of the term of our own Parliament next October. But we are asked to extend the life of this Parliament for a year beyond its regular term. Consider also how different are the conditions in Great Britain and here. There, as soon as the war was declared, the Prime Minister of Great Britain called to his assistance and to the councils of the nation, not only the titular leader of the Opposition, but a number of the most eminent members of that party, forming what has since been called the coalition Government, in which almost every party in the House of Commons is represented, making a representation, we may fairly say, of the whole nation. But in Canada the same thing was not done. Had the Prime Minister at the beginning of the war called to the councils of the nation the right hon. leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), and had he acted with that right hon. gentleman in the same spirit as the leading statesmen of both sides in Britain have acted together, the people of Canada would be in a different mood, and many of them would not be actuated by the spirit which actuates them to-day. If then this Parliament had expired and the war was not yet ended, Canada might have enjoyed the spectacle of a general election carried on practically without opposition, resulting in the return by acclamation of practically every member on both sides of the House to continue his work here.

These are views, I believe, which will strike my electors of the county of Gloucester, and so I wish to make them clear to this Parliament, as well as to the people of Canada. A Bill to amend the constitution is to be presented. What safeguards it will contain I cannot say, but I deem it my duty again to express my opinion in regard to any proposed change in the constitution. Not only last year, but three years ago as well, I said that I would always oppose any modification or change in the principle of the constitution without consultation with and the sanction of the provinces of the Dominion. If my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition were here to-night I would remind him of the correspondence which I had with him at one time concerning the terms of subsidies to the provinces. On that occasion I wrote him that I could not possibly support any change in the constitution unless that change were sanctioned by an interprovincial conference. My hon. friend and leader at that time—I believe it was in 1906—made immediate reply to my communication, expressing his appreciation of my remarks, and advising me that he had made up his mind to submit the proposal for the change in subsidies to an interprovincial conference. This was done; the change was subsequently sanctioned by the British Government, and since that time no fault has been found with the further subsidies which have been given.

It is now forty years since I first called upon the people of my constituency to adhere to the terms of the constitution. Forty years ago I was perhaps younger than I am to-day, but I gave all my efforts to my people, and I am willing to give them to-day. Again, a few years ago, when Saskatchewan and Alberta became provinces of the Dominion, I stood by the terms of the constitution. I thought it would be useless to give to these provinces more than was given to them when then entering Confederation, because if we were to grant them more, the proposed terms would be submitted to the Privy Council, and the Privy Council would strike off anything that was not contained in the statute which admitted these provinces into Confederation. At that time I appealed to my electors to stand by the terms of the constitution; to-day I feel it my duty to say, without saying that I am bound to oppose the Bill, that until I know the safeguards by which it will be protected, I shall maintain my ground. Only when the terms of the bill are explained shall I be able to say whether it is my opinion that we should avoid the turmoil of an election in Canada at this time by adopting such a measure. Nobody is more fond of peace than I am—I am known in my country as the peacemaker—but if I apprehend greater friction in the future as a result of the adoption of this proposed measure than would be caused by an election, I would choose the lesser evil; I would say let us have an election rather than submit the people of Canada to future controversies by changing the constitution in an improper way.

Mr. Speaker, I am thankful to you for your attentitve hearing, as well as to the other members of the House.

On motion of Hon. J. D. Hazen, the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Hon. Robert Rogers, the House adjourned at 9.40 p.m.

Report on the Agricultural Instruction Act, 1914-1915.—Mr. Burrell.

THE GOVERNOR GENERALS'S SPEECH.
ADDRESS IN REPLY.

Consideration of the motion of Mr. Alfred Thompson for an address to His Royal Highness the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, resumed from Friday, January 21.

Hon. J. D. HAZEN (Minister of Marine and Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, I desire to be associated with the previous speakers in this debate who have referred in terms of congratulation to your elevation to the high and important position of Speaker of this House. I think it is a fact that you are the youngest man who has ever been called upon to be the first commoner of Canada; but in spite of that fact, those who have been associated with you in the work of this House for the past four or five years are satisfied that you will discharge the duties of this important position in a way that will be worthy of the traditions of the office; that you will have due regard to the preservation of the dignity and decorum of debate, and that as between the parties in this House you will hold the scales of justice with an even hand.

I desire also, as others have already done, to extend my congratulations to the hon. member for the Yukon (Mr. Alfred Thompson) and to the hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Paquet) on the manner in which they discharged the task of moving and seconding the address in reply to the speech from the Throne. It was my pleasure a few years ago to visit that far distant constituency of the Yukon; and although I think in no constituency in Canada is there keener party feeling, yet I found on all hands an expression of opinion that the present member represents that constituency in a way that gives satisfaction to the people irrespective of politics, and with due regard to the ambitions and potentialities of that great and extensive district.

I also, Sir, would like to say that I concur in the words that have been uttered with regard to the Governor General of Canada. It has been a good thing for this country that during this time of stress and strain the representative of His Majesty in Canada is a gentleman who has had such an extensive, varied and long experience as a military man, and whose knowledge of military matters has been of very great value in making more effective than it otherwise would have been the aid which Canada has given to the Empire in the present crisis.

My hon. friend from Red Deer (Mr. Michael Clark), to whose speeches, I, in common with other hon. members, always listen with pleasure, who always holds the attention of his auditors, whose moderation in criticism and in debate, and whose admirable parliamentary manner are worthy of emulation, has made certain representations in regard to delays that may have occurred between the time when the Canadian troops are enlisted and the time when they actually get into the firing line. I would like to say a few words on that. At page 37 of Hansard, the hon. member for Red Deer used these words:

> But the point that is exercising the mind of our people is this: I think they would be glad of the assurance that there is no undue delay in getting the recruits, once they are raised, into the trenches. I hope the Government appreciates my point, and I hope that some one will give the country and Parliament the necessary assurance upon that point.

I can assure the hon. gentleman that the Government fully appreciates this point. It has been the subject of more or less discussion in this country, and there is no doubt that there is, among those who enlist, a feeling that possibly at times unnecessary delay has occurred before they are able to get into the trenches, and come face to face with the foe. That opinion reaches us from those who are overseas. My youngest son, who is serving with the Artillery overseas, who went to England in August last, and who, I think, about a week ago crossed over to France, has frequently written to me complaining about the length of time that he is obliged to remain under training in Great Britain, and expressing his impatience at the delay in getting into the firing line. That is the feeling which characterizes all of our young Canadians who go overseas. They are impatient at any delay that may occur, as their desire is to get into the firing line as soon as possible, and they are apt to fret and chafe at the months they have to spend in training and drill before the British military authorities think it is desirable that they should actually go into the trenches. Hon. gentlemen know that the First Canadian Contingent which crossed the seas was only a comparatively few weeks in camp at Valcartier before it was transported to the other side; but after it arrived in England it was kept under most unfortunate conditions in camp at Salisbury Plain during the whole of the winter before the British authorities thought our troops sufficiently trained and disciplined to take their place in the firing line; but, when they did meet the foe face to face, they proved themselves the equal of the best soldiers that were fighting side by side with them, and they brought undying honour and glory to their country. Everybody knows that, except in comparatively few cases our Canadian soldiers have had little training of a military character, and so it is necessary that they should undergo a certain amount of preparation before they cross the sea. The Canadian Government and the Department of Militia are sending those men forward week by week as they get the necessary training, and as the war office wants them, and as transports can be obtained. When they arrive on the other side of the water, then their disposition is a matter for the British War Office. They are not members of the Militia of Canada, but are enlisted specially for overseas service, and when they get to the other side they become part and parcel of the British army. It is then for the British War Office to decide when they shall be sent to France and when they shall take their place in the firing line. I say to my hon. friend from Red Deer, and to the people of this country, that, so far as the Government of Canada and the Minister of Militia of Canada are concerned, they are fully alive to the desirability of sending the men forward as quickly as they can be sent forward, having regard to their training and fitness for the work, and they will continue to do so in the future as in the past.

My hon. friend and colleague from the city of St. John (Mr. Pugsley) made a lengthy speech to this House the other night, a speech very different in tone and in style of criticism from that delivered by the leader of the Opposition and that of the hon. member for Red Deer. In the course of that speech the hon. member (Mr. Pugsley) referred to the question of transportation, the difficulty of getting tonnage, and the increased freight rates upon the ocean, and he referred to it with the intention of holding the Government of Canada responsible for the conditions that exists. The hon. gentleman, with an absolute lack of generosity—to use no stronger term—suggested that the reason for the existing conditions was that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Burrell) last year had to spend several weeks away from Canada, overlooking entirely the fact that the Minister of Agriculture was forced to leave Canada on his doctor's advice and in consequence of the condition of his health, and that while he was away under his doctor's orders he was able to render good service to Canada by representing the Dominion, and also His Majesty the King, at the Exposition in California. The hon. gentleman suggested also that the Government were not attending to such matters because they had gone out to address recruiting meetings. It is very hard to satisfy my hon. friend and some of his friends. I have been reading in Liberal newspapers criticisms of the members of the Administration because they had not made more recruiting speeches than they have been able to make, in view of the tremendous amount of work thrown upon them during the last two years. A leading newspaper in Ontario, some months ago, found fault with the Prime Minister because he was not addressing more recruiting meetings, and it asked, who had heard a word in favour of recruiting from the lazy lips of Sir Robert Borden. And now the hon. member for the city of St. John holds the Government responsible for the high freight rates because, as he suggests, the members of the Administration had been spending too much time in addressing recruiting meetings.

With the war, a state of affairs arose regarding tonnage and transportation that has certainly been very difficult to deal with. The breaking out of the war put out of business a great many ships that had been engaged in the carrying trade. Go down to the ports of Boston and New York, and you will see there steamers of the North German Lloyd and the Hamburg-American swinging at anchor, absolutely idle, unable to continue the business which they had carried on before the war, because were they to venture out from their safe havens in Boston, New York, or other American ports, they would be captured by the vigilant British cruisers which, operating from Halifax, are protecting the trade routes across the seas for the people of Canada and the Empire.

In addition, ships flying our own flag have been held up and interned. I know of two vessels belonging to St. John or other Maritime Province ports interned in the port of Hamburg where they happened to be when war was declared. Such vessels are prevented from taking part in the general carrying trade. Besides the dislocation of trade in this way, hundreds of ships have had to be taken over by the British Admiralty, as is absolutely essential if the war is to be carried to a successful termination. All this has led to disturbance, trouble, and difficulty in the transportation of goods, and naturally it has caused an enormous increase in the freight rates which have to be paid. My hon. friend might have known that this is a condition which applies not only to us but to all the shipping of the world generally. It would be quite as fair to hold the Government responsible for the fact that freights have advanced equally in the United States, and even more in the Argentine Republic and other South American countries, but in view of the statements he has made, I desire to give a fair, frank statement of what the Government has done to meet the transportation question and to give to the product of Canadian mills, forests, and farms, means of reaching the market during the progress of the war.

The efforts made by the Government to secure adequate tonnage for the Canadian export trade relate to two classes of exports. One class includes the whole of the general commercial overseas exports of the Dominion; the other comprises the large quantities of supplies and munitions of war which are being purchased in Canada by the British Government. As will be seen a little later on, a very efficient and comprehensive organization has been built up for dealing with the last-mentioned class. But, while making certain that there would be no obstruction in the flow of war supplies to the other side, the Government at the same time realized the necessity of doing everything possible to meet the need of ocean transportation for general commercial purposes. As early as March the question was taken up formally with His Majesty's Government. At the instance of the Prime Minister strong representations were made by means of official communications to the Secretary of State for the Colonies, pointing out that the Canadian export and import trade was facing a serious condition on account of the shortage of ocean transport due to the requisitioning by the Admiralty of so many of the best carrying vessels of the principal steamship lines. The necessity for taking all possible measures to relieve this situation was urged. The Prime Minister had already put the matter forward through Sir George Perley, the Acting High Commissioner in London, requesting him to take it up directly with the appropriate departments of the British Government. This was done and Sir George attended many conferences with officials in London. The question was kept continually before the Admiralty and other departments all through the spring. Representations were made on behalf of various Canadian shipping companies whose tonnage in greater or lesser degree had been requisitioned. In June a large boat for the St. Lawrence coal carrying trade and three vessels belonging to the lumber trade were released after much negotiation.

In June also conferences were held in Ottawa between an Inter-Departmental Committee and representatives of Canadian steamship companies operating between Montreal and the United Kingdom. Measures for meeting the growing scarcity of tonnage were considered.

At the end of June the Prime Minister went to London to confer in person with His Majesty's Government, and particular attention was devoted to this problem of providing adequate transportation for general commercial purposes. The whole question was fully discussed during July and August at a number of interviews which the Prime Minister had not only with the permanent officials of the Admiralty, but with several of the members of the Cabinet, all of whom realized its importance. It was recognized that the matter was equally important to Great Britain and to Canada; to Great Britain because of the food supplies which she must receive from this country and in order that her manufacturers might have access to the Canadian markets; to Canada in order that trade with the Mother Country might be maintained, and that the large crops which were to be harvested might find a portion of their market in Great Britain and other European countries. It was pointed out that in view of the part Canada was taking in the war it was especially desirable that every facility should be given to continue our export trade. The fact that a very large wheat crop was anticipated was particularly and insistently put forward. It was urged that from sixty to sixty-five per cent of our normal tonnage, peculiarly constructed for the North Atlantic trade, had been requisitioned, and that a serious situation would develop unless adequate steps were taken to meet it. As a result arrangements were then made that the Admiralty should release, so far as the paramount exigencies of war would permit, every available vessel that could be used for this service. The matter was also taken up with the steamship lines whose ships had been requisitioned by the Admiralty, and urgent representations were made to them as to the chartering by them of steamships wherever they could be obtained that might take the place of those requisitioned. One immediate result of these steps was the assigning of two steamers fitted with refrigerator plants to be used in transporting frozen meat from Canada. Assurances were also given that if more tonnage was needed for this purpose it would be provided.

After the Prime Minister returned in September the subject was still kept before the British Government. Strong representations were made to the Colonial Secretary; at the same time the matter was urged through Sir George Perley, who made it the subject of many conferences both with the British permanent officials and with the members of the Cabinet. As a result, since the 1st of January, 1915, twenty ships requisitioned by the Admiralty have already been released for the Canadian service, and, in addition, the High Commissioners' Office has secured the release of three ships as to which notice of requisition had been given. His Majesty's Government have also assigned three prize ships, the Kawak, the Barenfels, and the Nerime, to be used in the North Atlantic trade. Furthermore, the Colonial Office secured three large sailing vessels which have been chartered to the Canadian Government and will be made available on this route. His Majesty's Government have also transmitted information as to other sailing vessels which are open for charter, and this information has been given to shipping agents. It is also to be borne in mind that the fact of the inauguration of the regular transport service since last February at the instance of the Government for the transportation of war supplies has released, to a considerable extent, the space in the regular liners, and this space so released has been and is now available for ordinary commercial tonnage.

In considering this question it must always be borne in mind that after all and above all we are at war. More than 1,500 steamers have been requisitioned by the British Government alone for war purposes, and the governments of other nations have been obliged to pursue the same course with respect to their mercantile marine. As Premier Asquith pointed out in the Imperial House of Commons several weeks ago, the demands made upon the British Government in this respect have involved the transporting of 2,500,000 officers and men, in addition to 320,000 sick and wounded, 2,500,000 tons of supplies and munitions, and 800,000 horses and mules; and these figures are exclusive of millions of tons of stores which have been carried by the navy for Allied Governments. Military and naval requirements must be paramount, rough and ready though their demands often are; and they must be served fully at the cost of all other considerations. The life of the Empire depends on this, and all interests should bear in mind that considerations of commercial advantage should never be allowed to place any restriction or impediment upon the difficult and momentous military and naval operations in which we are engaged. In view of these facts and considerations, Canadian producers and shippers may consider themselves fortunate to have fared as well as they have. The steps taken by the Government have resulted in giving to the exporter enough ocean tonnage to make the transportation of our great crop a certainty, and have enabled our prices to be placed on an export basis immediately. More ships than in other seasons have been employed in the North American grain trade. The export shipments during October were the greatest in the history of North America. It also appears that while there has been a marked advance in freight rates on the North Atlantic route, yet the freight rates from Australia and the Argentine, our chief competitors, have advanced to a much greater degree.

I now wish to say a few words regarding the regular transportation service inaugurated for carrying supplies and munitions of war for the British Government.

Mr. KNOWLES: If the honourable gentleman will pardon me, I should like to ask him two questions. The first is: have the twenty-three vessels that were released for the ordinary commercial transport work been earmarked for the carrying of Canadian export trade, or are the owners at liberty to ply the ships in any waters that they like? The second question is: what is the total tonnage or carrying power of these twenty-three vessels?

Mr. HAZEN: I cannot give my honourable friend an answer to his last question, but, in reference to the first, I may say that the release of these vessels had special reference to the Canadian carrying trade.

Mr. KNOWLES: They cannot engage in anything else?

Mr. HAZEN: I cannot say that; it had special reference to the Canadian carrying trade. We have found that the paramount considerations of the war make it necessary that a vessel shall at times be transferred to a port other than its original destination. I will tell my honourable friend what I mean. Suppose a transport sailed from St. John, loaded with a cargo for a port in France and before reaching its destination those in charge of the vessel would receive instructions to proceed to Greece or to a port in some other country; the paramount necessities of the war would make it necessary that they should take their cargo there. That has, to some extent, affected regularity in sailing; but, as I have said, the release of these vessels had special reference to the Canadian carrying trade.

Mr. KNOWLES. Could they be carrying from the United States?

Mr. HAZEN: Of course, they continue under the direction of the Admiralty, who can change them from time to time as they see fit.

The difficulty of obtaining tonnage and the consequent rise in freight rates having become noticeable in the early stages of the war, it was at once appreciated that the most pressing need at the moment was to provide ships for the large quantities of supplies and munitions of war which were being purchased in Canada. It was recognized that if the productive capacity and industrial resources of Canada were to be effectively employed in the prosecution of the war, this was a need that would become even more pressing as time went on, and that any steps taken must be such as would make it certain that in any event there should always be available for this purpose adequate facilities. The Government took steps forthwith to meet the situation. In the fall of 1914 the Government appointed an acting director of overseas transport who had had long experience with one of the large transportation companies in matters relating to overseas shipping. Under the direction of the Government, this officer entered into negotiations for the charter of suitable vessels, and by anticipating charter conditions and securing ships in many instances considerably in advance of requirements, the Government was enabled to move war material, munitions and supplies at rates approximating those prevailing in normal times for ocean freights.

Early in the present year the growing scarcity of marine tonnage and the increasing charter rates having become acute, the Government sent this officer to London for the purpose of laying before the War Office and Admiralty proposals involving closer co-operation between these departments and the Government of Canada, and looking to the requisitioning of a sufficient number of vessels to constitute a tri-weekly service for the carriage of war office supplies and munitions between Canada, United States ports and France. In conjunction with Sir George Perley, who has at all times rendered the most valuable service in this matter, a number of preliminary interviews were held with the officials of the War Office and Admiralty. Finally, as the result of a joint conference held on February 9 last, an agreement was reached under which the Admiralty engaged to supply 18 transports at once for this service, and more when required. This number, owing to the enormous growth of War Office purchases in Canada, has since been increased to 40, and still further additions are anticipated. In short, the regular transportation services contemplated was inaugurated and the organization established for this purpose has since grown to very large proportions.

The very great benefits accruing to the Canadian export trade from the establishment of this service have not, perhaps, been widely understood. A brief consideration of some of the figures available will give some idea of the situation that would have confronted Canadian producers if they had been obliged to depend solely on ocean space available in ordinary commercial liners, whereas, by reason of the work of the Overseas Department, there has been an uninterrupted service for the transportation of supplies of all kinds, including hay and oats, shells, and all the great variety of articles which are being purchased in Canada by the British Government for war purposes.

During the period between August 25, 1914, and April 30, 1915, 244,913 gross tons were handled by this service on account of the Imperial and Canadian Governments. Between, however, May 1, 1915, and November 15,1915, there was an enormous expansion—over 375,000 gross tons being forwarded during that period (6½ months), or about 60 per cent more than was moved during the preceding eight months. But a still greater expansion is taking place. The Overseas Department is now being called upon to provide for about 125,000 gross tons of munitions, war materials and supplies per month, or approximately one and one half million tons per annum; and the tonnage is still growing.

Arrangements for this winter contemplated the operation of 20 transports on a regular service between West St. John, United Kingdom and French ports, and adequate accommodation has been reserved at West St. John for the exclusive use of the Overseas Department. Between 50 and 60 sailings are anticipated from that port during the winter, and these vessels will lift between 250,000 and 300,000 tons. It is also arranged to allot to the Halifax route 20 additional transports, which constitute a service to the United Kingdom and French ports. As in the case of West St. John, dock and shed accommodation has been reserved for the exclusive use of the Overseas Department. From Halifax also 50 or 60 sailings are expected and these vessels, too, will clear between 250,000 and 300,000 tons.

Negotiations were completed for the prompt bunkering of transports at both Halifax and West St. John while the loading is being carried on. The addition of this enormous tonnage to the regular winter business of Halifax and St. John has necessitated the provision by the railways of increased railway yard accommodation, and it is hoped that the remedial measures taken in that regard will prevent serious congestion. The work of the Overseas Department in handling this large tonnage with the ships available has been made possible by the efficient and systematic organization built up, by which intelligent segregation at the sea-board and prompt loading have been secured. The average time on this side—excluding the period of vessels in dry dock or undergoing repairs—has averaged less than five days. It is difficult to reach an adequate conception of the vast amount of detail involved.

The prompt action of the Government in taking the steps which were taken toward the establishment of this service has secured to Canadian producers, both of manufactured goods and of farm products, an uninterrupted outlet for the hundreds of millions of dollars worth of War Office orders, the acceptance of which would not have been possible but for the inauguration of an economical overseas transportation service. Further, the fact that these transports, owing to their regularity in sailings, have been in a position to handle promptly War Office supplies which otherwise would have occupied space on regular liners, has been of distinct advantage to the general export trade of Canada and has released to that extent ocean space for commercial tonnage. Since the inauguration of the service not a pound of Government transport has been forwarded on regular liners.

I thought it was only fair and right that I should give a full statement of what the Government has done in connection with the matter of transportation since the war broke out, in order that the facts might be known throughout the country, that any false ideas which might prevail in consequence of the speech made by my right hon. friend the member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) might be removed, and that everybody would have an opportunity of looking into the facts for himself.

Now, let me explain how these arrangements have worked out.

Mr. LEMIEUX: May I be permitted to ask the hon. gentleman a question? I have been informed by some pulp firms that ships which have been requisitioned by the home authorities had to be released. Thanks to the efforts of my hon. friend the Postmaster General I have been able to obtain the release of at least two or three of those ships. I see in this morning's newspapers that an embargo is to be imposed by Sweden on pulp for England. That means that there should be a great business in pulpwood between Canada and Great Britain, but unless the ships are released, and they are of small tonnage generally, the pulp business and the country will suffer. May I ask my hon. friend to look into this matter, and see whether there is no possibility of getting other ships from the naval authorities in Great Britain so that these small vessels can be released.

Mr. HAZEN: The embargo to which my hon. friend refers—I judge from newspaper reports I have seen, for I have nothing else— is in a sense a retaliatory measure. I can assure my hon. friend that the Department of Naval Service, and the other departments of the Government will continue to press upon the British Admiralty and the British Government the importance and necessity of having ships available to carry the products and manufactured goods of Canada to the markets of Great Britain. We will continue to press that. I have had requests made to me to use my influence to get the British Admiralty and the British Government to release ships that had been requisitioned for other ports. In a number of cases they have requisitioned that the ships after reaching the other ports of the United States proceed to the ports in Canada. Under the circumstances I felt I could not make that request to the Admiralty because we were urging the British Admiralty and the British Government to supply us with all the ships necessary for the purpose of carrying the products of this country across to Great Britain. Under the circumstances I felt it would be a most illogical thing for me to make that requisition. The men whose ships are requisitioned are paid according to a scale prepared by a committee of ship-owners and a committee of the Admiralty. It may be that they can get more while engaging in private work than they might be paid by the Admiralty, but during this time of war we must all be prepared to make sacrifices, and ship-owners cannot be any exception to the general rule.

Mr. KNOWLES: Did the commandeered wheat go over in Admiralty vessels or in ordinary transport vessels?

Mr. HAZEN: I speak entirely subject to correction, but I presume it goes over in the ordinary transports. I think that is the case. I wanted to point out to the House—and I am sorry my hon. friend from St. John is not here, because one would gather from his remarks that shipping on the ocean between Canada and the Motherland was not so great as formerly—I should like to have pointed out to him, taking the port of St. John for example, what the effect of the action of the Government in regard to that trade has been. I hold in my hand a letter written by Mr. A. H. Harris, the acting Director of Overseas Transportation, dated Montreal, January 6. In it he says:

> Dear Mr. Hazen,—In the memorandum to which you referred at our interview yesterday afternoon I stated that the Overseas Department would put an average of about 50,000 tons per month of Imperial supplies through West St. John this season and that this added to Canadian Pacific estimates would probably mean the handling on an average of about 350 carloads per day at that port.
> During the month of December the following Imperial transports cleared from West St. John,—
>
> Peshawur, Egori,
> Dunedin, Pascal,
> Thespis, Royal Transport,
> Hunstrick, Elswick House,
> Trelawny, Lord Strathcona.
> Wayfarer,
> with 67,484 tons of cargo as compared with five transports containing 14,296 tons of cargo for the corresponding period 1914—an increase of 400 per cent.
>
> During December 1915 eight steamers of the Canadian Pacific and allied lines cleared from West St. John with 67,892 tons of cargo plus 1,166 horses as against four vessels containing 29,351 tons of cargo plus 605 horses for the same period in 1914—an increase of 130 per cent.
>
> Other lines in December 1915 had 19 steamers from West St. John with 45,994 tons of cargo, as against 11 steamers with 16,699 tons of cargo and 657 horses in December 1914,—an increase of 200 per cent.
> The whole making a grand total of 181,370 tons and 1,166 horses in December 1915 as against 60,346 tons and 1,262 horses in December 1914, a general increase of 200 per cent.

I am told that the result will be even more satisfactory during the present month and during the month of February. Further, I am told that while I have given the figures for the port of St. John, a similarly gratifying state of affairs exists with regard to shipments from the port of Halifax. I may tell the House further for their information that from statements I received this morning, I find that to-day there are seven transports loading at the port of St. John, six transports loading at the port of Halifax, in addition to vessels of the C.P.R. and other commercial lines.

My hon. friend from St. John made special reference to the lumber trade of New Brunswick. He said:

> The same is the case with the lumberman. Go down to the province of New Brunswick, which is a great spruce producing country, the market for which is on the other side of the water. Although there is a great demand in Europe, resultant from the war, yet the lumberman cannot get his lumber to the European market except upon the payment of freight of as much as two hundred shillings per standard, whereas before the war the normal rate was about thirty shillings per standard. That is an increase of about eight hundred per cent in the tariff upon lumber, which is a great burden not only upon the producers, but upon those on the other side of the water who might be able to use the lumber to advantage.

Let us see what the facts are with regard to the lumber trade and the transportation of lumber to the other side of the water.

The lumber trade received the consideration of the Government in the same manner as the other business of this country, and since July 14, 1915, the Naval Service Department, in conjunction with the Acting Director of overseas transport, has shipped, under orders from the Admiralty, by vessels entirely distinct from those transports which I have referred to as having been commandeered by the Admiralty for other purposes, the following quantities of lumber from the ports named:

Quebec.—Four cargoes (spruce, elm, pine), toal approximately, 7,600,000 feet B.M. from six shippers.

Gaspé.—One part cargo, 724,000 feet B.M. from one shipper.

Chatham, N.B.—Two cargoes from three shippers, total 5,700,000 feet B.M.

St. John, N.B.—Four cargoes, approximately, 12,000,000 feet B.M. shipped to date.

Four further cargoes of approximately the same dimensions now loading or due to load from five shippers.

Halifax, N.S.—Two cargoes, 6,500,000 feet B.M.. Two further cargoes of approximately the same total now due to load from five shippers.

Box shooks.—In addition to above quantities, 400,000 boards for ammunition boxes are being shipped, part from St. John and the remainder from Halifax.

Estimated total from eastern ports, 50,000,000 feet B.M.

Pacific coast ports.—Ten cargoes, 30,000,000 feet B.M. from various shippers.

Estimated total shipments from Eastern and Pacific ports, 30,000,000 feet B.M.

Mr. E. M. MACDONALD: What about the rates?

Mr. HAZEN: This is lumber which is bought and paid for in this country, and the man on the other side is paying for freight. I shall have something to say about that later.

I give a further statement, more in detail, of lumber shipped from Canadian ports under the direction of the Imperial Transport Service and the Department of Naval Affairs. The ships which carried lumber from Canada are given in the following table:

If my hon. friend from St. John was correct in his argument, there would be very large stocks of lumber remaining in the province of New Brunswick this year. In order to get exact facts with regard to that, I communicated with a gentleman in the city of St. John, a friend of mine and of my hon. friend opposite, and asked him to give the facts with regard to the shipment of lumber from St. John, the stocks that were being wintered over, and other information concerning lumber shipments from the province, and how the trade was being handicapped by lack of transport. In reply I received this letter, under date January 20:

St. John, N.B.

Hon. J. D. Hazen, Minister, Marine and Fisheries,
Ottawa, Ont.

My dear Minister,—I have your letter of the 19th instant.

I will be very glad to give you the desired information, as nearly as I can.

The Admiralty have, so far, loaded at St. John, seven transports, carrying in round figures 20,000,000 superficial feet and there are two cargoes sold which will be shipped in the near future, about 6,000,000 more, making a total of 26,000,000 superficial feet.

[Mr. Hazen.]

The regular liners will not lift as much stock this year as in former years, owing to the very large amount of other traffic which is offering, but as near as I can figure out, these liners will about clean up the balance of the wintering stock here at St. John and these shipments will be complete the latter part of April.

The shipments from St. John in,— 1915	was approximately	130,000,000

1914	"	85,000,000

So hon. members will see that the lumber shipments from the port of St. John in 1915 were 44,000,000 superficial feet in excess of the lumber shipments in 1913; and 45,000,000 feet in excess of those in 1914. My correspondent, one of the best informed lumbermen in New Brunswick, goes on to say—and I shall give the whole letter to the House, not only part of it:

The wintering stock here at St. John this season is much less than in average years. The wintering stock on the Mirimichi in round figures, in 50,000,000 and on the Restigouche 40,000,000. Nova Scotia, has to-day, of last year's stock, unshipped, in round figures 35,000,000.

Regarding the log cut for this year, in my opinion it will be considerably less than the average of former years. The North Shore people say they will cut about two-thirds of their average cut and on the St. John river the cut will not exceed two-thirds of last year.

Then the Nova Scotia production for this winter will be almost 50 per cent less than last winter.

The combined stock in Liverpool and Manchester, England, for the past five years, were as follows:—

These figures are made up to the first of January.

	Standards.
1911	18,440
1912	11,370
1913	25,570
1915	31,320

The figures on the first of this month, would seem to be very large, but I think a large portion of this stock is really sold and is lying on the docks at Liverpool and Manchester, waiting removal to the interior of the country.

The winter shipments will be comparatively small this season and the stock figures for Liverpool and Manchester should be away down low on the first of May next.

Approximately this is the best information I can give you and if you desire to do so, you may use my name.

I am sorry not to have seen you before you went back to Ottawa.

With kindest regards.

Yours very truly.

(Sgd.) John E. Moore.

On Saturday I had a conversation with one of the largest lumber operators in the northern part of New Brunswick, a gentleman well known to us all in New Brunswick, who has been here attending the meeting of the Commission of Conservation. He told me that these stocks, 50,000,000 feet on the Miramichi and 40,000,000 feet on the Restigouche, were slightly larger than were usually wintered over, but while that was the case they were sold at a productive price and paid for and the lumbermen had been making a large amount of profit out of their operations. He further told me that the large lumbermen would cut as much lumber during the present winter as during last winter, but that the smaller operators were not able to cut so much as they had during last winter. Any one who has listened to these figures, who has heard the statement that came from the shippers, who has heard the letter of Mr. John Moore, of St. John, who is one of the best informed lumber shippers in the St. John district, will conclude that the Government have done their part and done it successfully in order to have proper arrangements made for the transportation of lumber, manufactured products and agricultural goods from Canada to the Mother Country. So successfully have they done it that the shipments this year from the winter ports of Canada, from St. John and Halifax, have been two hundred per cent in excess of what they were during any previous year, and my information is that a still more gratifying result will be shown by the shipments during January and February. At the present time transports are coming with regularity to St. John and Halifax. According to the statement I received this morning, there were seven lying in St. John, in addition to the ordinary commercial vessels, and six in Halifax. So we need not have any great fear that goods will not be carried in good faith from Canada to the Motherland, and that our people will not have an outlet for these goods so long as England remains mistress of the seas, and the navy guards the trade routes from Halifax and St. John to the British Isles and to Europe.

Passing from that, I want to refer to certain statements made by my hon. colleague from St. John (Mr. Pugsley) in regard to the Shell Committee.

Mr. MARCIL: I was interested in the hon. gentleman's statement regarding lumber on the Restigouche river. Is he in a position to give the House any information as to the condition of affairs regarding lumber in the province of Quebec?

Mr. HAZEN: No, I am not. I have quoted figures regarding the shipments of lumber which have taken place from Gaspé and from the province of Quebec by means of transports prior to the close of navigation on the St. Lawrence. But I was dealing with the statement made by my hon. friend from St. John, who confined his remarks to the question of lumber shipments from the province of New Brunswick, and my answer was simply directed to that. My hon. friend from St. John dealt with the question of the conduct of the Shell Committee, of which General Bertram was Chairman. I do not intend to follow him all through his argument, and his address on this subject, but I do intend to take up one or two points in connection with the question, and, first of all, I would say that it was remarkable how gently and with what soft gloves my hon. friend referred to the manufacturers of this country. What a change has come over the spirit of the dream of my hon. friend! He would do nothing to injure the manufacturers, and yet, if the argument of my hon. friend meant anything, it meant that the manufacturers had employed middlemen for the purpose of approaching this committee, that they had got their contracts by dishonest and improper means, and that they had received money in excess of the value of the goods which they had supplied. That was the meaning of my hon. friend's statement if it meant anything. My hon. friend can not attack the Shell Committee without reflecting upon the manufacturers of the country, because his whole statement, his whole grievance, was, that middlemen had been employed by the manufacturers, and that sums had been paid for shells to manufacturers for political purposes, and that they were far in excess of the value of the goods that they had provided. My hon. friend was treading on delicate ground. My hon. friend knew, and this was the reason he did not want to offend the manufacturers, that fully fifty or seventy-five per cent of the orders for shells which had been placed by the Shell Committee had been placed with companies some of which were controlled by friends of his own and others of which had friends of his own on their boards of directors, and that if he uttered a word reflecting upon the directors of these companies, he was reflecting very seriously upon his own friends and quite as seriously on those who were associated with him politically and who supported the party on that side of the House. My hon. friend knew that in reflecting on manufacturers who were supporters of hon. gentlemen opposite, he would be reflecting upon gentlemen sitting at the back of my right hon. friend opposite who are interested in many cases in these companies, and in some cases are directors of companies to whom contracts for shells were awarded. Therefore, my hon. friend, while attacking the commission at considerable length, repeated time and time again that he made no reflection on the manufacturers of the country.

Now, Sir, I think everybody will admit, while I hold no brief for the Shell Committee and am in no way bound to defend it, that it had a very responsible and difficult task to perform. When it was first appointed it was to manufacture 200,000 shells, representing about $1,000,000, and then the business developed more rapidly than any business in this country or anywhere else was ever developed before. In a short time it found this business running into thousands of shells and hundreds of millions of dollars. The perfecting of the organization was a great work, and it had to be got through very quickly. If they had proceeded with mathematical precision, step by step and detail by detail, with every feature of the work, it is very probable that some money might have been saved to the country, but, while they might have been able to save a certain amount of money, they would have denied to the manufacturers and mechanics of this country the great bulk of the business which has come to them through the action of the Shell Committee, and which is still continuing under the action of the Imperial Commission.

The hon. member for St. John undertook, as men are very apt to undertake, to underrate what is done by our own people, what is done here at home, in comparison with, and in contrast to, what is done at a distance. My hon. friend undertook to praise the way in which shell contracts were awarded in Australia, and the way in which the problem has been dealt with there, in comparison with the way in which the matter has been dealt with by the Shell Committee in Canada. I do not purpose entering into an argument on that point, or answering the argument that my hon. friend has made. I will let one of his own friends answer it. I will let his own friend, the editor of the Free Press, which has been referred to as the leading Liberal paper in Ottawa, and one of the most ably conducted Liberal papers in Canada, answer the statement of the hon gentleman when he makes an invidious comparison between the Canadian and the Australian methods.

Mr. CARVELL: Can the minister do it without smiling?

Mr. HAZEN: I thought I was dealing with a serious question. I certainly should not think that any one in this House, on the other side would laugh when he found how quickly the argument that had been made on this question by the hon. member (Mr. Pugsley) was answered by the editor of the leading Liberal paper here. The Free Press, in its issue of January 21, Friday last, says:

> Fair-minded men, anxious not to jump to too-hasty conclusions in regard to the general charges against the Shell Committee which handled the entire munitions business of Canada for the first fifteen months of the war, will, we believe, study the statement (reprinted in another column), made by the chairman of the committee, Sir Alex. Bertram, in December last before leaving for a much-needed rest.
> The keynote to the whole situation, we submit, in General Bertram's assertion that he "had difficulty in obtaining fifteen manufacturers at the outset who would take a contract." The other important fact is that at the beginning the orders placed by the War Office were so small, with no assurance that they would be followed up by others, as to make expenditures on the necessary plant by manufacturers a very doubtful investment.

It is an easy thing now to say that, at the outset, methods should have been adopted that were put into operation later. At a time when manufacturers had to be metaphorically dragged into the making of shells, of what avail would it have been to advertise for tenders as was done last fall, when the War Office orders had been enormously increased and when manufacturers were falling over each other for contracts?

Some of General Bertram's statements, to which particular attention may be drawn, are the following:

Of the first Canadian order from England, all contracts, with the exception of one, were placed in Canada, at prices fixed by the War Office.

The exception was for 100,000 shells which were awarded at a price fixed by General Bertram, a practical machinist, at $1.45 lower than contracts awarded in the United States by J. P. Morgan & Co., the British representatives.

The first Canadian order was filled at a price $20,000 lower than the estimate of the War Office.

The statement submitted to the Duke of Connaught in June, 1915, showed contracts awarded in Canada at a saving of $14,000,000 over the prices estimated by the War Office.

The contracts awarded in Canada at the end of 1915 totalled, as audited, $345,000,000, or $42,000,000 below the War Office estimate.

The manner in which Australia is handling the business of making munitions has been held up as an example in contrast to the Canadian method of supplying British guns with shells. The current issue of the Canadian Liberal Monthly, published from the Central Information Office of the Canadian Liberal party, contains an interesting article on "Australia and war munitions." The commonwealth and State governments in that colony do seem to have tackled the problem of manufacture in an aggressive and business-like way from which excellent results may be expected. In this article we notice, however,

(1) It was not until "the call for shells came from Great Britain in the early summer of 1915" that the Australian government took any action at all towards manufacturing munitions;

(2) Up to November 1, 1915, "31 tenders had been received of which 19 had been formally accepted, the balance being still under consideration; and

(3) It was not until November, 1915, that "the first steel, after exhaustive tests, was shipped to the different States."

Now, it should be observed that all the criticisms aimed at the Canadian Shell Committee are in respect of transactions prior to "the early summer of 1915," when Australia took the first steps; that Canada began operations six weeks after the first outbreak of the war and six months before even the War Office thought it necessary to organize the privately-owned factories for the manufacture of munitions; and that by November Canada had placed orders for three hundred million dollars worth of shells in numerous factories spread all over the country, and at competitive prices, which, we are assured, are on the average lower than the "cost prices" fixed by the Australian governments.

The editor of the Free Press says that prices in Canada are lower than the cost prices fixed by the Australian Government. At first it was difficult to get people to go into the business of making shells, because it was not known how many shells would be wanted, or how long the war would last, and necessarily the price had to be fixed at a higher figure. As time passed, however, the price became lower, until now the Liberal Free Press says that the average price paid for shells in Canada is lower than the cost prices fixed by the Australian Governments. The editorial says:

If Australia had done in September, 1914, what it did in June, 1915, and on as little encouragement as Canada received from the War Office for what it did in September, 1914, then we should agree with the Canadian Liberal Monthly that Australia is a fitting object lesson; but with the facts as they are, we cannot admit that the example is very impressive.

Passing from that, Mr. Speaker, I will now refer to a statement made by my hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Pugsley), as reported on page 76 of Hansard. Endeavouring to show that the Shell Committee acted entirely from partisan reasons and placed their orders with Conservative firms in consequence, he said:

And so I am sure, if my information is correct, all over this country orders of that character were given, given to the middleman, the man who had no machinery, and given in this way for the purpose of distributing patronage and doing what was a gross injustice to those who had manufacturing plants.

Mr. Rogers: Unfortunately about 75 per cent of the orders went to Liberals.

Mr. Pugsley: Well—

Mr. Hazen: That is certainly the case in the city of St. John in my hon. friend's constituency.

Mr. Pugsley: In my own constituency? I suppose the hon. member refers to Haley Bros.

Mr. Hazen: To the Messers. McAvity and the Phœnix Foundry.

Mr. Pugsley: The Messers. McAvity got their order as a sub-order from the Canadian Car Company, as part of an order which the Canadian Car Company had obtained for shells for the Russian Government. And while my hon. friend is upon that subject, what would he say about the York and Cornwall Cotton Mill?

Mr. Hazen: What would the hon. gentleman say about it?

Mr. Pugsley: They are very worthy people and make splendid cotton. There is no better cotton mill in Canada than the York and Cornwall Cotton Mill. Their whole buildings are well filled with their cotton manufacturing plant. Their people are well employed in making cotton and I do not think from the intelligence of the gentleman—take my hon. friend Senator Thorne, one of the directors of the York and Cornwall Cotton Company, a most worthy gentleman, a gentleman of the very highest intelligence, who would not for a single moment mistake a shrapnel shell or an 18-pound explosive for a ball of cotton.

When the hon. gentleman made the assertion that the Shell Committee acted from partisan motives, the hon. Minister of Public Works said that unfortunately about 75 per cent of the orders went to Liberals, and I followed it up by stating that that was true in the hon. member's own constituency, which is also part of my constituency. The hon. gentleman seeing how that would weaken his charge that these things were being done for partisan purposes, at once, without a moment's hesitation—although living in the city of St. John he must have known the facts, but I must presume that he did not—said that the contract awarded to Messrs. McAvity were awarded to them by the Canada Car Company as part of a contract which the Canada Car Company had obtained for shells from the Russian Government.

On the following morning I sent over to the office of the Shell Commission and asked for an answer to these questions:

1. Is it correct, as stated by the hon. Mr. Pugsley, that Messrs. McAvity received an order for shells as a sub-order from the Canadian Car Company, as part of an order which the Canadian Car Company had obtained for shells for the Russian Government?
2. Were any orders given direct to Messrs. McAvity by the Shell Commission?

The answer to the first was:

Nothing known of transaction by Shell Committee. Was awarded by Russian Government direct to Canada Car and Foundry Company.

And the answer to the second question was:

On March 15, 1915, 10,000 4.5 shells at $6.70.
On May 15, 1915, 20,000 4.5 shells at $6.00.
January 1916, 25,000 4.5 shells at $4.00.

Or, there was given direct to Messrs. McAvity by the Shell Commission these three orders for shells to the amount of $287,000.

In addition to this the Shell Commission gave them the following orders:

	Cents.
Dec. 23, 1914—25,000 brass sockets and plugs at..	60
Feb. 12, 1915—65,000 brass sockets and plugs at..	55
May 3, 1915—50,000 4·5 sockets at.. ..	70
Aug. 26, 1915— 5,000 plugs at..	25
Oct. 23, 1915—10,000 plugs at..	25

These orders made $224,500. All told, this concern in the city of St. John which my hon. friend said had got these orders from the Canada Car and Foundry Company, got orders direct from the Shell Commission for $511,500. I charge my hon. friend with impropriety in making a statement of the sort he did, intended to mislead, but if the truth had been stated to the House at the time it would have shockingly weakened the effect of his argument that the Shell Committee were handing over these contracts for political purposes. So far as I am concerned, I am glad that these contracts have gone to Messrs. McAvity. They are not political friends of mine, though they are personal and social friends. But, apart altogether from friendship, I am glad that the Shell Committee awarded to a long-established firm like the Messrs. McAvity these contracts, the carrying out of which represents employment given in the constituency I have the honour to represent. While I was approached time and time again by different manufacturing concerns in my province to give recommendations to the Shell Committee by writing, stating what I knew of their capacity and their ability to carry out contracts, I never refused any concern that was under Liberal control if I believed they were capable of turning out good work, because I was desirous of seeing the work placed with firms that would carry it out properly and naturally I was desirous also of seeing a fair and reasonable proportion of this work go to manufacturers in the province I represent.

Now I come to the Phœnix Foundry Company. And, while the hon. gentleman makes no charge—and he is quite in the habit of making no charge but deals in insinuation and innuendo—yet, as he has dragged in Senator Thorne's name in connection with the Phœnix Foundry Company, I wish to say a few words on the subject. Who are the directors of the Phœnix Foundry Company? They are James F. Robertson, manager, W. H. Thorne, Jas. Manchester, A. C. Dawson and F. P. Starr. These are gentlemen of the highest possible business standing and reputation in St. John. Some of them are Conservatives, some, I believe, are Liberals. But the hon. gentleman picked out Senator Thorne's name, basing an insinuation upon the fact that Senator Thorne is a prominent and active Conservative. These gentlemen are public-spirited and have subscribed their share and done their bit in connection with the patriotic purposes of the war, and are among the last men who can fairly be charged with making money out of the crisis which Canada faces. I refer to the matter because some gossip has reached my ears, and the matter might as well be cleared up. A contract was given to the York and Cornwall Cotton Company, of which Mr. J. B. Cudlip, of St. John, is manager. In the month of November, I think it was, of last year, about the time the talk of shell orders became general, this cotton company had been for some time running on short time. It occurred to Mr. Cudlip, who is a most expert mechanic and machinist, and who knows the cotton business from the ground up, having been through every stage of it, that it might be a good thing, as keeping the company's help employed, to obtain a shell contract. Mr. Cudlip is an expert mechanic, as I have said, and he knew that a part of the plant of the mill might be available for the manufacture of shells. He came to Ottawa, saw the Commission, and obtained an order for the manufacture of 20,000 4:5 shells at $6. This was the month of May. Mr. Cudlip, as I understand it, was taken ill, and found difficulty in connection with the manufacturing of the shells, though there was room and plant in the establishment of which he was manager that could be utilized for this manufacture. So he made a contract with the Phoenix Foundry Company controlled by Messrs. Flemming, who are not political supporters of mine—or were not at the last election, but one of whom was chairman of the committee of the hon. member for the city of St. John in Victoria ward. The Phœnix Foundry Company is an old-established and well known industry. Messrs. Flemming enjoy a splendid reputation as did their father and grandfather, the latter of whom, I understand, was the founder of the business. I understand that Mr. Cudlip had difficulty in persuading Messrs. Flemming to undertake the manufacture of shells, as they thought there was little in it for them in view of the need for the purchase of new machinery and the uncertainty of the continuance of the business. However, after discussing the matter they undertook it and the contract was handed over to them. When the Shell Commission learned that Messrs. Flemming were filling the order the name was changed to that of Messrs Flemming or the Phoenix Foundry Company, and all continuation orders were given direct to them. They got orders as follows:

Jan. 28, 1915, 25,000 18-pounder shrapnel shells at $3.80.

May 15, 1915, 20,000 4.5 shells at $6.00.

October 18, 1915, 20,000 18-pounder shells at $2.90.

January 1916, 55,000 18-pounder shells at $1.85.

I have not totalled this exactly, but it amounts to something in the neighbourhood of $300,000.

Let us follow out the other orders placed in New Brunswick and see if they bear out the statement made by my hon. friend from the city of St. John, that the commission had been placing these orders simply for partisan reasons. Large orders for boxes had been placed with the Wilson Box Company, in the parish of Lancaster, adjoining the city of St. John. They are a wood-working concern whose special business it is to make boxes. And who are the directors of this company? Their names should be known by the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Carvell) as well as they are to me: T. H. Estabrooks, Stanley E. Elkin, S Y. Wilson, of Halifax, John Galey and Alexander Wilson of St. John. These names of directors do not bear out the idea that the commission were actuated by polical motives in giving these orders to Messrs. Wilson. I was glad to see this concern get the orders because it is an important industry in the constituencyI represent and I am sure that their work will be done in a way satisfactory to the public.

The Record Foundry Company of Moncton is another concern for which orders were obtained, and obtained, according to the hon. member for the city of St. John, by middlemen and on party grounds. I think the hon. member for Westmorland (Mr. Copp) will know the names of the directors and will be able to judge whether or not it was for party reasons that a contract was given to the concern which is under their control. The directors are Hon. Clifford W. Robinson, president, who was until recently the leader of the Liberal party in local politics in the province of New Brunswick; Mr. F. C. Dennison, a local Liberal in Moncton is the secretary; Hon. James Barnes, of Buctouche, for years member for the county of Kent, and a member of the Government in which my hon. friend and colleague the hon. member for the city of St. John was attorney general; F. J. Shreves, His Honour Josiah Wood, Lieutenant Governor, and the late Graham Fraser. Would anybody say that it was for political reasons that this contract was awarded? It was awarded to a company composed of both Liberals and Conservatives—though Liberals seem to predominate; it was awarded because the Record Foundry Company was the only one equipped in such a manner as to be able to fill their contracts satisfactorily.

So far as shell contracts in New Brunswick are concerned, a contract was placed in Chatham with a foundry company called, I think, the Maritime Foundry Company. I do not know who the stockholders or directors are. A contract was placed in Campbellton with the McLellan Foundry Company; I do not think that anybody from Campbellton would suggest that the gentlemen in that concern have been active supporters of the Conservative party in the past. A contract was placed in Fredericton with the Smith Foundry Company, the members of which—all of them, I think—are supporters of the Conservative party.

Mr. CARVELL: Come to Sackville now.

Mr. HAZEN: A contract was given to Messrs. Fawcett, supporters of the Conservative party. I do not know whether there are any stock-holders in that company outside of the Fawcett family or not, but Messrs. Horace and Charles Fawcett, and I presume, their brother-in-law, Mr. Ryan, now in British Columbia, are members of the concern.

Mr. MARCIL: Have any contracts been awarded in Campbellton?

Mr. HAZEN: I understand that a contract for 12,000 shells has been awarded to the McLellan Foundry Company. With regard to box contracts, the following is a list of some of the firms to which contracts have been awarded: The Wilson Box Company, of St. John; Sussex Manufacturing Company, of Sussex; Hillsboro Manufacturing Company, of Hillsboro; W. H. Farnham, of St. Stephen. I do not know what Mr. Farnham's politics are. I presume that stockholders representing both political parties may be found in the Sussex Manufacturing Company. I think that the leading man in this company is Mr. S. H. White.

So much for contracts which have been awarded in my province; I presume the same is true of those that have been awarded in the other provinces of Canada. In doing what they did, the Shell Committee were guided solely by the desire to advance the public interest and the public good. They were not influenced by narrow considerations of petty party politics; they placed the contracts with those who, they thought, would properly carry them out in a manner satisfactory to the British Government, and who would provide shells of the quality necessary for our armies in the field.

I have here a list of the contracts awarded generally throughout Canada. I do not intend to read it all, but I shall read a few of the names, and ask hon. gentlemen of this House who are familiar with the manufacturing industry in Canada if they think that the names which I read suggest for one moment the idea that the Shell Committee were trying to make political capital on behalf of the party in power.

Mr. MACDONALD: If the hon. gentleman would put the whole of the list upon Hansard, it would be much more convenient for reference.

Mr. HAZEN: I would have to get it in more perfect form, but if the hon. gentleman wants it all put on Hansard, I will do it.

Mr. MACDONALD: Take it as read, then.

Mr. HAZEN: There is a little that I will read before I do that.

Mr. CARVELL: Put it all on Hansard; do not put it in your pocket.

Mr. HAZEN: I am willing to put it on Hansard. I do not wish to weary the House by reading it all, but there are certain names that I am going to read.

Mr. CARVELL: We would like to have the contents of your pocket as well.

Mr. HAZEN: That is just a covering letter, which would give no information of value to the House. What do we find? We find that in Brockville contracts were awarded to the Smart Manufacturing Company, and the Brockville Lumber Company. In Amherst, Nova Scotia, contracts were awarded to the Canadian Car and Foundry Company, Victor Wood Works, Ltd., and the International Engineering Company. These companies are each, I understand, composed of both Liberals and Conservatives. In Dartmouth a contract was awarded to the Star Manufacturing Company, which, I am told, is a very excellent concern, composed of stockholders of both political parties. At Kingston, Ontario, a contract was awarded to the Canadian Locomotive Company, which, I believe, is controlled by Mr. Harty, formerly a Liberal member of this House. At Levis, in the province of Quebec, a contract was awarded to the Lauzon Engineering Company, and to the Public Enterprise Company. I find that contracts have been awarded to the following companies in Montreal and vicinity: Canada Cement Company, Canadian Vickers Company, B. J. Coghlin Company, Deacon Construction Company, George Labelle, Peter Lyall & Sons, Lynburner, Limited, Robert Mitchell Company, Henry Morgan & Company, Montreal Tramways Company, National Acme Manufacturing Company,William Rutherford & Company, James Shearer, Wilson-Paterson Company—and so on. In Nova Scotia the Nova Scotia Steel and Coal Company; I do not think this Company can be regarded as a political concern, one way or another; it has directors and stockholders on both sides of politics. At New Glasgow, a contract has been awarded to the McNeill Machine and Motor Company, and to John J. Grant. I do not think that my hon. friend will say that contracts were awarded to these companies for political purposes.

Mr. MACDONALD: The contract in the last two cases was.

Mr. HAZEN: In Sherbrooke, Quebec, the McKinnon-Holmes Company; Sorel, Beauchemin & Company; Yarmouth, Nova Scotia, the New Burrill-Johnson Company. I may be wrong, but I understand that the Burrill-Johnson Company of Yarmouth went under Liberal control. I have a list here; it is not as complete as it should be, and I do not think it takes in everything, but if my hon. friend wishes me to do so, I shall be glad to lay it upon the table of the House.

Mr. MACDONALD: Put it on Hansard.

Mr. HAZEN: I will hand it to Hansard.

Mr. CARVELL: Will the hon. gentleman at the same time give us a list of all the firms in Canada who have received contracts?

Mr. HAZEN: I have been trying to get a completed list.

Mr. CARVELL: My hon. friend has not one-quarter of them.

Mr. HAZEN: This list may have some omissions. I did not prepare it with the intention of laying it before the House; it was for my own purposes in this debate. If my hon. friend does not want me to hand it to Hansard, I will not do so; I was merely acceding to the request of the hon. member for Pictou.

Mr. CARVELL: We should like to have it, as well as a supplementary list showing all the contractors.

Mr. HAZEN: How easy it would be for my hon. friend to ask that somebody should bring down a statement showing the names of the concerns to whom contracts were awarded by the Shell Committee. I am sure that if he himself would go to the Shell Committee, they would be delighted to give him such a list. However, I will do as the hon. member for Pictou has requested; I will lay this document, as I have it, on the table of the House, and, in order to save my hon. friend (Mr. Carvell) trouble I shall be very glad to go to the Shell Committee and ask them to give me a statement containing the names of those to whom contracts for shell boxes were awarded. This I shall lay upon the table of the House.

Mr. CARVELL: Will you give the dates, quantities and prices? As the hon. gentleman is in a good mood, it may be a good time to get this information.

Mr. HAZEN: I shall be glad to get it for my hon. friend; I am always obliging. My hon. friend could get it for himself, but I shall be glad to send to the Shell Committee and get it for him. Under these circumstances, I suppose it is not necessary that I should put this statement on Hansard, as I told the hon. member for Pictou I would do.

I have, Mr. Speaker, quoted these names as an absolutely complete answer to his statement made to the House by the hon. member for St. John city:

> I am sure, if my information is correct—

"If my information is correct." The hon. gentleman made no independent investigation on his own account; he has simply listened to the gossip on the subject.

> If my information is correct, all over this country orders of that character were given, given to the middleman, the man who had no machinery, and given in this way for the purpose of distributing patronage and doing what was a gross injustice to those who had manufacturing plants.

I ask my hon. friend, who was the middleman in the case of the McAvity Company? Who was the middleman in the case of the Record Foundry Company? Who was the middleman in the case of the Fawcett Company? Who was the middleman in the case of the Wilson Box Company, the Nova Scotia Steel Company, and other companies all throughout this country? General assertions of this kind are very easy to make.

Mr. CARVELL: Who was the middleman in the case of the Phoenix Foundry Company of St. John?

Mr. HAZEN: So far as I know, there was no middleman. I have told my hon. friend the circumstances as told to me: that that contract was obtained by Mr. Cudlip, who, being unable to carry it out, turned it over to the Phoenix Foundry Company.

Mr. CARVELL: I will supplement that information at a later date.

Mr. HAZEN: Very good. The hon. gentleman says that he will supplement that information; we shall wait and hear what he has to say about it. The Phoenix Foundry Company, as I have said, obtained their first contract through the Cotton Company, the directors of which I have named. I am satisfied that these directors would not act as middlemen for anybody; I am sure that they would do nothing which was not in the public interest.

I now pass on to refer to a few other matters in connection with some subjects that were dealt with by hon. gentlemen opposite. First, I desire to refer to the statement made by the hon. member for St. John with regard to the investigation held by Sir Charles Davidson into the purchase before the war of the submarines at Seattle, for use in British Columbia waters. The circumstances under which these submarines were purchased are well known to this House. This matter was fully discussed here last year, and since then it has been investigated by the Commission of Sir Charles Davidson. I think I will satisfy the House that the investigation carried on by Sir Charles Davidson was of the most thorough and searching character possible. Hon. gentlemen remember that there was very great alarm in the province of British Columbia just before the outbreak of war and for some time after. It was known that certain German cruisers, the Leipsic, the Dresden and the Nuremburg, were abroad on the Pacific, and great fear was entertained that an attack might be made on the coast cities of British Columbia, Victoria especially, and also Vancouver, which were without any adequate means of defence. It came to the notice of Sir Richard McBride that there were two submarines at Seattle, which had been built for the Chilian government, and which could be purchased. Sir Richard McBride purchased these submarines, paying for them $1,150,000. They were brought over to Victoria and proved a great source of relief to the people there; and undoubtedly they were absolutely effective in preventing a German attack on the small British cruisers on the Pacific.

Mr. TURRIFF: Were they provided with torpedoes when they were purchased?

Mr. HAZEN: I doubt whether I should answer that; there is a question to that effect on the Order Paper, which will be dealt with when it is reached, and, as my hon. friend is aware, it is contrary to the rules of order to answer a question of which notice has been given on the Order Paper.

Those submarines were bought for $1,150,000. The matter came before this House last session and the charges made were practically of a two-fold character. One of the charges was to the effect that there had been graft in connection with the purchase of these vessels. When I say charge, it was just the same sort of charge that the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) always makes. He says: I do not make any charge— and then he goes on to deal in insinuation and inuendo. The result of what he said last session was that immediately after the session newspapers supporting hon. gentlemen opposite and public speakers advancing their cause from the public platform did not hesitate to herald all over this country that there had been graft to the amount of hundreds of thousands of dollars in connection with the purchase of these submarines. Let me read to the House the statement made by my hon. colleague from St. John when he discussed this matter in February of last year. I quote from page 122 of Hansard.

I should like to know when I made any insinuation that Sir Richard McBride had received this $250,000? I did not do so. I have great respect for the intelligence of Sir Richard McBride, and I would not for a single moment suggest that, having paid out $1,150,000 of the money of the people of British Columbia, he would be guilty of taking back this large amount of $250,000 and putting it in his own pocket or using it for an election fund. We all admit that my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works knows how to run elections, but who for a single moment would suggest that the Minister of Public Works would besmirch himself with the handling of election funds? Who would imagine that Sir Richard McBride would do so? But Sir Richard McBride and this Government have their friends in British Columbia, and if any one were disposed to take advantage of it, here was a magnificent opportunity. Here were two submarines, valued by Mr. Logan at $375,000 each, the price of which according to the original contract to build was only $387,000 each. They had been rejected by the expert of the government of Chili. War was on, and public opinion in British Columbia demanded that these boats should be purchased at any price. Oh, Sir, what a temptation there was for those in the Conservative party who would like to wipe the Grits off the face of the earth, and who know so well how to use campaign funds in order to do so. What a temptation there was to take advantage of the situation. I do not, upon the information which has come to me, charge the minister with wrong-doing, nor did I do so from the beginning to the end of my address. I do not charge Sir Richard McBride with wrong-doing; I did not do so from the beginning to the end of my address.

And yet the effect of his speech, which was heralded broadcast through the party press and by their supporters, was that Conservatives had profited by this transaction for improper and election purposes to the amount of $250,000. These submarines were taken over by the Dominion of Canada on the advice of the British Admiralty. Before we confirmed the purchase made by Sir Richard McBride we communicated with the British Admiralty and they advised us to purchase them if we could get crews to man them.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Did not this Government inform the British Government that the reason they were not taken by the Chilian Government was that it was not able to pay for them?

Mr. HAZEN: I do not remember the language of the telegram, but it makes no difference—

Mr. PUGSLEY: It would have made a difference if they had been condemned.

Mr. HAZEN:—because the British Admiralty have, and then had, a thorough and intimate knowledge of every war vessel being built in any shipyard in the world. They knew all about these, they knew their price and everything about them; and they advised that we should purchase them if we could. And we did right in purchasing them, because the evidence is conclusive, after a thorough investigation, that there was not a dollar of graft in connection with the transaction, and that the submarines were most efficient, and have continued to give good service down to the present hour. Let me read to the House the statement made by Sir Charles Davidson at the opening of the inquiry. He said:

> Our sittings will be held in the sight and hearing of all men. Our determination is as it has been throughout our past sittings, to pursue the investigation of any matters which may need inquiry, with great thoroughness and earnestness. I had, at the outset, the good fortune to secure the consent of Mr. John Thompson, one of His Majesty's Counsel at the Ontario Bar, to act as counsel to the Commission. He will examine the witnesses and I am sure he will welcome any information which may reach him from any source, and which are germane to our future duties.

At the inquiry, which was open to all men—it was open to my hon. friend had he chosen to attend, and he was in the neighbouring city of Vancouver when Sir Charles Davidson was holding his inquiry in Victoria.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Does not my hon. friend know that Sir Charles Davidson distinctly refused to allow any counsel to be present to examine or cross-examine witnesses?

Mr. HAZEN: My hon. friend is making the same interruption that he made the other day. What Sir Charles Davidson did decline was something quite different. He was vested with the duty of probing the matter to the bottom, and other matters that came before him—and a better man for the purpose could not be obtained. He is a judge of high standing and great experience. He had a large practice at the bar and was regarded as an able practice lawyer. Sir Charles had the advantage of the assistance in that work of Mr. John Thompson, K.C., a prominent member of the Ontario bar, a son of the late Sir John Thompson. In addition to that, at every inquiry, the Auditor General was present. As each witness was examined, the Auditor General was asked if he had any further question to put to him, or if there was any further witness whom he would suggest should be called for examination. The fullest opportunity was given for the fullest possible hearing. What Sir Charles Davidson did decline was something quite different. A counsel appeared before him and said that he appeared on behalf of the Liberal party of British Columbia. Sir Charles declined to allow him to act as counsel and examine and cross-examine witnesses—and I would ask where the end of this thing would be if that sort of thing was permitted. He permitted him to suggest any question, and I shall read from the evidence of the Auditor General in a moment what he said about the matter. I shall read the evidence of the Auditor General because I think the Auditor General was the man responsible for this inquiry being held, and possibly for the discussion with regard to the matter. I find that Mr. John Fraser, I.S.O., was examined by Mr. Thompson, K.C.:

> I asked Mr. Auditor General to come to Victoria in advance of the sittings of the commission to ascertain, if possible, any further information with regard to the purchase of these submarines—have you been able to obtain any evidence or any source of information which would lead you to the opinion that anything has not been disclosed in evidence that should have been disclosed?

Mr. Fraser: No, I have not.

Mr. Thompson: Generally speaking, have you anything to suggest that I may further inquire into, with regard to the purchase of the submarines?

Mr. Fraser: Nothing, unless it may be advisable to examine officials of the Electric Boat Company, if they are willing to be examined.

Mr. Thompson: I think that is the intention of the commissioner.

Sir Charles Davidson: You mean the officials of the Electric Boat Company in New York?

Mr. Fraser: Yes.

Sir Charles Davidson: That is our immediate purpose, so far as the commission is concerned. The moment we return East we will seek at Montreal or at their own homes to secure their evidence, and we hope they will facilitate our inquiry.

That is what Mr. Fraser said, and I quote it to show that the Auditor General, who went to Victoria to find out everything he could in regard to the matter of the submarines, was asked to suggest any questions that had not been asked, to suggest any line of examination that had not been undertaken, or any line of inquiry that had not been pursued, and that the only suggestion he made was as to the examination of certain officials of the Electric Boat Company, which examination was carried out.

There were examined before Sir Charles Davidson, Sir Richard McBride, James Venn Paterson, F. L. Crawford, Manager of the Bank of Commerce; Capt. William Henry Logan, Mr. H. Barnard, M.P., the Auditor General, Mr. Taylor, auditor for the Electric Boat Company; Mr. E. B. Frost, Vice-President of the Electric Boat Company, and Mr. Carse, President of the Electric Boat Company. The whole inquiry was in the nature of an inquisition. Questions were asked of a character, which, if they had been asked in a court of law governed by the ordinary rules of evidence, would never have been permitted. The inquiry was broad, comprehensive, searching, and thorough. I am sorry I have not the time at this late hour in the afternoon to go into the evidence more fully; I do not wish to tire the House unduly by reading too large portions of the evidence, but there is one portion I should like to read. The question was first brought up on June 25, 1915, when Sir Richard McBride voluntarily appeared before the Commission at Ottawa and was examined with reference to the question of commission, as follows:

Mr. Thompson: There is just one question I may ask you—

I am dealing with the question of graft; the question of efficiency will come later.

There is just one question I may ask you—do you know of any rebate or money being paid to any private individual or any official by way of commission?

Sir Richard McBride: Absolutely not one cent.

Sir Charles Davidson: Directly or indirectly?

Sir Richard McBride: Directly or indirectly.

Sir Charles Davidson: Either as a matter of commission—

Sir Richard McBride: Or otherwise.

Sir Charles Davidson: Or as a matter of contribution to election funds, because that has been mentioned?

Sir Richard McBride: I can say positively that I know of no commission that was paid directly or indirectly to any person or persons, corporation or corporations, in respect to this operation.

Sir Charles Davidson: Or contribution?

Sir Richard McBride: Or of contribution.

Then later on:

Sir Charles Davidson: Mr. Auditor General, are there any questions which you would suggest as being desirable to be put to Sir Richard McBride?

Mr. Fraser: No.

Sir Charles Davidson: If there are any, I hope you will freely mention them.

Mr. Fraser: I do not know that there is anything more than Mr. Thompson has asked him, and the suggestion that Mr. Paterson, who is the one who can clear up the suspicion, or rumour, should be examined.

Sir Charles Davidson: What was the suspicion and what were the rumours?

Mr. Fraser: That there was a very large commission paid.

Sir Charles Davidson: Did you hear anything further than that?

Mr. Fraser: There were some rumours that I would not care to put on record here; I do not think it would be fair to do so.

Mr. Thompson: You considered them not substantiated?

Mr. Fraser: Not substantiated.

Mr. Thompson: Not substantiated at all events sufficiently to make a statement with regard to them before the Commission?

Mr. Fraser: Yes.

Sir Charles Davidson: Is this the whole of the correspondence which you have in your department respecting submarines?

Mr. Fraser: Yes.

Sir Charles Davidson: Private or otherwise; have you private correspondence?

Mr. Fraser: I had some, but not in connection with any of the people dealing with the matter at all.

Sir Charles Davidson: Of what character?

Mr. Fraser: Sometimes people might have been giving me some information.

Sir Charles Davidson: Have you pursued that information?

Mr. Fraser: As far as I could.

Sir Charles Davidson: And?

Mr. Fraser: Without results, as I say. I think the only man who can clear it up is Mr. Paterson.

Then we have the examination of Mr. Paterson:

Q. And no commission was paid yourself?—A. I did not pay it to myself, I had it.

He referred to the fact that for his services he got $40,000. Here is the examination by Mr. Thompson, K.C.:

Q. What we want to ascertain, Mr. Paterson, is whether any part of this money was waylaid or improperly paid?—A. You mean, whether I have got some underhand way of getting out of answering a straight question?

Q. No, I am not making any reflection on you at all.—A. That is what it means to me. There is only yes or no about that thing. The question is, was there or was there not a commission—there was none.

Sir Charles Davidson I desire, just to put to you an enlargement of the question which was put to you before by Mr. Thompson—was there any contribution directly or indirectly to any association or interest in Canada made by you or your company?

The Witness: None at all.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Will my hon. friend read that again, please?

Mr. HAZEN (reads):

Sir Charles Davidson: I desire just to put to you an enlargement of the question which was put to you before by Mr. Thompson—was there any contribution directly or indirectly to any association or interest in Canada made by you or your Company?

The Witness: None at all.

Sir Charles Davidson: Nothing whatever?

The Witness: Nothing at all, nothing was paid in Canada, at all, or to any Canadian.

Sir Charles Davidson: Or to any association?

The Witness: Or to any association in any way whatever.

Sir Charles Davidson: And you say there was absolutely no irregularity in connection with that?

The Witness: Absolutely no irregularity.

Then we come to the evidence of Mr. F. L. Crawford, the Manager of the Bank of Commerce. The Commission even went to the extent of examining the books of the bank, so thorough and searching was Sir Charles Davidson's inquiry.

Mr. PUGSLEY: That is the bank at Victoria.

Mr. HAZEN: The bank that cashed the cheques and sent the drafts. (Reads):

Q. Do you know of any account in your bank in Victoria which has any suspicious circumstances about it pointing to a commission on these submarines?—A. No, none.

Q. None whatever—A. No.

Q. Have you any account which would show any payment which would appear to be an indirect commission on these submarines?—A. Not that I know of.

Q. Were there any payments made into any account in your bank shortly following or appreciably a short time after these cheques were issued, which excited your suspicion that there was a commission on the purchase of the submarines?—A. No.

Q. Was a payment made in respect to the sale of the submarines that you know of?—A. None.

Q. I am using the term in the broadest possible sense, and you say that there is not in the books in your bank any account which would excite your suspicion in that regard?—A. None to my knowledge.

Capt. William Henry Logan was also called. My hon. friend (Mr. Pugsley) suggested that Capt. Henry Logan, who negotiated for the purchase of the submarines, was simply asked a question, "Did you pay any commission to any one?" As a matter of fact, he was examined and cross-examined most thoroughly.

Mr. PUGSLEY: My hon. friend has forgotten what I said. In commenting upon what I thought was the insufficient examination of Mr. Logan, I said that while he sought to convey to the Commissioner the idea that he was simply called in a cursory way, that he had had a conversation at the club about the submarines, and had said he knew very little about submarines; it was stated in the Order-in-Council of the British Columbia Government that it was Mr. Logan himself who, after considerable negotiation, had purchased those submarines.

What I argued was that it struck me as strange that he was not thoroughly examined as to why he did not know the price after negotiating for two weeks, and was practically merely asked as to whether a commission had been actually paid.

Mr. HAZEN: I will read the examination of Capt. Logan as I have it here

By Mr. Thompson, K.C.:

Q. Did you make any claim for commission?—A. No.

Q. You did not render a claim for commission?—A. No.

Q. Of any sort?—A. Not of any sort, nor did I get any commission of any kind from anybody.

Q. Did you not render an account to the Dominion Government for commission?—A. No, sir, I did not.

Q. Did you receive any commission from J. V. Paterson?—A. No, sir, I did not.

Q. Did you receive any promise of a commission from him?—A. No, sir, I did not.

Sir Charles Davidson: Or other benefits?

The Witness: Or other benefits of any kind.

By Mr. Thompson, K.C.:

Q. You received no indirect benefit from anybody?—A. I received no indirect benefit of any kind in connection with that matter, or with that purchase.

Q. And you received nothing from the Seattle Dry Dock and Construction Company?—A. I received nothing from the Seattle Dry Dock and Construction Company, or from anybody else.

Q. Nor from the Electric Boat Company?—A. No.

Q. Nor did you receive any promise of any contribution to any political party funds?—A. Not at all, of no kind. I say most emphatically that I got nothing from anybody or from anywhere.

Q. You say that all you received, either directly or indirectly, in connection with this matter is the amount you received on that account to the department for $620?—A. Yes, that is my account.

Q. And you did not on that occasion ask him whether he would reduce the price?—A. No.

Q. Did you ask him over the telephone whether he would pay a commission?—A. No, sir, I did not; I never mentioned a commission.

Q. When you saw him in Seattle, did you ask him if he would pay you a commission?—A. No, all I mentioned then was the boats.

Q. Did you ask him whether his company would pay you a commission?—A. No.

Q. Or whether the Electric Boat Company would pay you a commission?—A. I never mentioned a commission of any kind.

Q. Neither on behalf of yourself or any other person?—A. Neither on behalf of myself or any other person.

Q. Nor did you suggest it in any way?—A. Nor did I suggest it in any way. I did not get any commission. The only thing I got was a lot of abuse since that time. I have heard nothing but dishonourable insinuations and innuendo since the last twelve months, and I have, in a small way, shared in the heap of abuse piled on the Premier of this province. I feel indignant and disgusted over the whole thing; I think it is enough to make a man who is inclined to do anything for his country stand aside.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Is that all he was asked?

Mr. HAZEN: That is all I have in this quotation.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I have not seen this evidence.

Mr. HAZEN: I should judge not from my hon. friend's speech.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I have not; but it seems to be word for word what I saw in the Victoria papers, and, therefore, it shows how accurate was the report in the Victoria papers. Will my hon. friend let me ask him this? How does he explain the fact that this Capt. Logan was stated by Sir Richard McBride in the order in council to have negotiated for these submarines and to have purchased them, and that yet for fifteen days before they were bought not a word was said as to the price?

Mr. HAZEN: As I did not draw the order in council and have not consulted with Sir Richard McBride I have nothing to say about the matter at the present time.

[Mr. Hazen.]

Mr. PUGSLEY: Would not my hon. friend have though, that Sir Charles Davidson would have asked him about that?

Mr. HAZEN: In view of that apparently Capt. Logan is recalled, and I have here some further evidence given by him. Sir Charles Davidson apparently had him recalled for the purpose of putting these questions to him and the report of his evidence on this point is as follows:

Sir Charles Davidson: I would desire, Mr. Thompson, that you should put to Capt. Logan the questions in the same broad form that you put them in to Mr. Barnard, as to payments or commissions in connection with these submarines, because your previous questions were identified with his personal acts.

Mr. Thompson: I ask you now, Capt. Logan, whether you know of any commission being paid to any official or unofficial person in Canada, by Paterson, or the Seattle Construction and Dry Dock Company, or the Electric Boat Company, or by any person or company, or by any person on their behalf, either directly or indirectly, in respect to a commission on the purchase of these submarines?

Capt. Logan: None whatever.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Is the question always limited to the words, "in Canada"?

Mr. HAZEN: Not always. We have the question there whether any commission was paid "in Canada" and we have the question whether it was paid "either directly or indirectly." Then the examination proceeds:

Sir Charles Davidson: Or gift or benefit?

Capt. Logan: No, sir, nothing of any kind, from anybody.

Mr. Thompson: Or a promise of anything?

Capt. Logan: No.

Mr. Thompson: Either to any person here or as a contribution to any party fund?

Capt. Logan: Nothing of the kind.

Mr. Thompson: Or for any political purpose?

Capt. Logan: Nothing at all, sir, I do not know of anything of that nature.

Sir Richard McBride came back to the stand. You will see how careful Sir Charles Davidson was that no question should be left unasked:

5 p.m.

Mr. Thompson: Did Logan make any suggestion to you as to a commission?

Sir Richard McBride: No.

Mr. Thompson: Of any sort?

Sir Richard McBride: No, sir.

Mr. Thompson: Or did he suggest that the Seattle Construction and Dry Dock Company would allow a commission?

Sir Richard McBride: No.

Mr. Thompson: Or did he suggest that Paterson would?

Sir Richard McBride: Absolutely no.

Mr. Thompson: Or that the Electric Boat Company would allow a commission?

Sir Richard McBride: No.

Mr. Thompson: Or that any of them would make a contribution to party funds?

Sir Richard McBride: Absolutely no.

Mr. Thompson: Did anybody else suggest that?

Sir Richard McBride: Never, except Mr. Pugsley in the House of Commons, and the Auditor General, I believe, has a suspicion; at least he so expressed himself at Ottawa, that the transaction was not an honest one.

Here is further evidence by Sir Richard McBride?

Mr. Thompson (to Sir Richard McBride): Before we conclude taking your evidence in Ottawa, I asked you on the subject of a commission, and I put to you the questions that have been put to other witnesses. I ask you now, do you know whether Paterson, or the Seattle Dry Dock Company, or the Electric Boat Company, paid any commission to anybody, either official or unofficial?

Sir Richard McBride: I recollect that you asked me that question, and my answer was: no.

Mr. Thompson: Or whether they made any contribution of any money, or whether they made any promise of money, to party funds, or anything of that kind, of an indirect or direct nature?

Sir Richard McBride: No, sir, neither directly, nor indirectly, did any person or persons, or the agent of any person or persons, in any capacity whatsoever, mention the subject of commission to me, or to any one of whom I know.

Mr. Thompson: Or paid any?

Sir Richard McBride: Or paid any.

Mr. Thompson: Or promised to pay?

Sir Richard McBride: Or promised to pay anything, or paid anything, or undertook to promise anything.

And so on. I cannot read all this because time will not permit. I have the evidence of Mr. John Fraser, Auditor-General, who had been asked to go to Victoria in advance of the commission. He tells Mr. Thompson that he has nothing further to say, nothing to ask, and he only suggests that the officials of the Electric Boat Company might be examined. So, the officials of the Electric Boat Company are examined. Mr. Taylor, the auditor of the Electric Boat Company came to Montreal to give his evidence and this is what he said:

By Mr. Thompson, K.C.:

Q. Did you pay anybody whomsoever any commission out of that money?

"Anybody whomsoever"—not anybody in Canada, but anybody anywhere?

A. We did not.

Q. Did you make any allowance to any person by way of commission out of that money?—A. We did not.

Q. Neither directly nor indirectly?—A. No, sir.

Q. Is there any part of that money held in suspense by way of commission for any person?—A. No, sir.

Q. Has there been any suggestion to your company that any part of that money should be paid by way of commission to any person?—A. I think Mr. Bailey claimed that he ought to have a commission.

Q. Bailey was your agent, was he not?—A. Yes.

Q. Did you encourage that?—A. We did not.

Q. Is it finally settled and disposed of that he shall not get a commission?—A. Finally settled.

Q. What was he asking in the way of commission?—A. I do not think he named any sum; I think he left it to the company.

Q. Is Bailey working on commission, or is he on salary?—A. On salary.

Q. At any rate, you decided finally not to allow him any commission?—A. Yes.

Q. There is no outstanding question now about any commission out of that money, or any part of it?—A. None whatever.

Q. And your company has used the whole of that money for its own purposes?—A. Yes.

Mr. Elihu B. Frost, vice-president of the Electric Boat Company, gave this evidence on the question of a commission:

Mr. Thompson: With the exception of the $40,000 which Paterson obtained, I understand that your company received the full amount of the purchase money paid by Canada, and, excepting, of course, the legitimate bills which were paid and owing to the Seattle Construction Company.

Mr. Frost: Less the sum which went to Mr. Paterson, which was about $40,000, and the 130,000 odd thousand dollars which was due to the Seattle company and paid to them, the Electric Boat Company received all the money that Canada paid for the submarines.

Mr. Thompson: And you eventually refunded to the Chilian government the amount they had paid you on progress estimates?

Mr. Frost: We did.

Mr. Thompson: Did your company pay any commission to anybody?

Mr. Frost: Apart from the Paterson commission, no.

Mr. Thompson: Neither directly nor indirectly?

Mr. Frost: Neither directly nor indirectly.

Mr. Thompson: You paid nothing whatever to any Canadian?

Mr. Frost: We did not.

Sir Charles Davidson: How do you consider the commission to Mr. Paterson, as to it being reasonable?

Mr. Frost: I think our people think that it was a fair commission and not exorbitant.

Mr. Carse, the president of the Electric Boat Company, was examined in New York, and the question was put to him:

Mr. Thompson: Do you know of any commission being paid to any person other than the $40,000 paid to Mr. Paterson?

Mr. Carse: There was absolutely nothing paid to anybody outside of that.

Now, I have gone hurriedly over this. I say that the evidence shows that this inquiry was of the most thorough and searching character possible. Sir Richard McBride was examined and cross-examined and re-examined. The manager of the bank at Victoria, the president, the vice president, the general manager and the auditor of the submarine companies were examined. Everything was done that could be suggested by the Auditor General; every precaution was taken to elicit the truth; and while I do not know what Judge Davidson's finding on the evidence will be, it seems to me that only one conclusion and one finding can be come to. It is unfortunate, however, that this discussion has been precipitated before we have Judge Davidson's report and before the evidence has been laid on the table of the House.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The discussion was provoked by the Solicitor General.

Mr. HAZEN: While my hon. friend admits that he has made a very serious charge; while he has criticised the evidence, while he has made the charge against Mr. Thompson, a lawyer of standing, that questions had not been asked which a law student of six weeks' experience would have felt it necessary to ask, while he has commented upon the standing of Judge Davidson, and while this commission has been referred to as a whitewashing commission, it appears that after all, my hon. friend has made his criticism of Judge Davidson's conduct of his commission before reading the evidence submitted to Judge Davidson. It is true that my hon. friend read some evidence in the newspapers—

Mr. PUGSLEY: That is not correct.

Mr. HAZEN: It is correct with this limitation: My hon. friend says he read the evidence as published in the newspapers. Every hon. member knows—and a lawyer of the standing and experience of my hon. friend knows very well—that no lawyer would depend for his facts in addressing a jury or in summing up before a court on the summaries of evidence that are printed in the newspapers, but that he would have before him the whole official evidence if he intended his remarks to carry weight. It is a matter of regret that my hon. friend could not have waited for a little while until Judge Davidson had made his report, before bringing this matter before the House and endeavouring to base his remarks on evidence as published in the daily press.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The Solicitor General provoked the discussion.

Mr. HAZEN: The Solicitor General asked my hon. friend a question, and at once my hon. friend went into the whole matter and told how badly the witnesses had been examined and how badly the investigation had been conducted. I appeal to any hon. member who will read the evidence carefully, if my statement, which has been made several times already to the effect that the inquiry was a most thorough and searching one, is not absolutely true, and if it is not supported by the evidence which Mr. Justice Davidson has taken.

Mr. PUGSLEY: My honourable friend says he appeals to every member of this House if he is not correct. Let me ask my honourable friend this question, as he has the official evidence before him: Did the commission, when it was in New York, examine the books of the Electric Company, and was there any explanation of how it came about that this $1,150,000 was divided into three amounts, one being a draft on Seattle for $250,000, less exchange, one being a draft on New York for the net sum of $500,000 and the third being a draft on New York for the sum of $400,000, less the bank exchange and charges?

Mr. HAZEN: I am sorry I have not the whole of the evidence here. As I recall it, it affords ample evidence with regard to the division of the cheques.

Mr. PUGSLEY: My honourable friend ought not to make statements unless he has the whole evidence before him.

Mr. HAZEN: Is it the desire of my honourable friend that I should read the whole evidence from first to last?

Mr. PUGSLEY: My honourable friend will pardon me. This is what I say: when my honourable friend appeals to the House to say whether or not there was a full and complete examination, he ought to be able to answer a question which a member puts as to whether there was any examination, upon a most vital and important question, namely, whether the books were examined to see what actually became of those two drafts on New York, as well as of the draft for $250,000 for Seattle.

Mr. HAZEN: I have read enough of the evidence to satisfy the honourable members of the thoroughness of the investigation that took place and of the absolute unfairness of the criticism directed by my honourable friend against the manner in which Judge Davidson conducted the examination. When Judge Davidson's report is received and is laid on the table of the House, as it will be, if my honourable friend wants to discuss the matter further, there will be ample opportunity for him to do so; but I think it is a matter to be deplored that a gentleman of the high standing and ability of my honourable friend should have undertaken to cast aspersions upon the professional standing of Mr. Thompson and upon the bona fides of Judge Davidson, before reading the evidence produced before them, and before the report of Judge Davidson is submitted to the country.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I cast no aspersions upon the gentleman whom my honourable friend calls Judge Davidson. He is no more Judge Davidson than the Minister of Justice is Judge Doherty. He has retired from the bench. I cast no reflections upon the Hon. Sir Charles Davidson; but what I said was that there has occurred in this case what will always occur when you have a lawyer upon one side only. Unless you have both interests represented, so that witnesses may be examined and cross-examined, there is apt to be the very gravest possible injustice done, and the commissioner is not responsible for that because he takes the evidence which is presented to him, and in this case he evidently relied solely upon Mr. Thompson who simply represented one side of the case.

Mr. HAZEN: My honourable friend wants the statement to go broadcast throughout the country that there was a lawyer on one side of the case only.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Yes, there was.

Mr. HAZEN: Mr. Thompson did not appear before the commission as representing Sir Richard McBride or the Department of Naval Service of this country; Mr. Thompson was there representing the people of this country, just as Sir Charles Davidson was. The provisions of the Inquiries Act—

Mr. PUGSLEY: He was representing the Conservatives.

Mr. HAZEN: When my honourable friend says he was representing the Conservatives he is making a statement that is not correct. My honourable friend cannot browbeat the House in that manner. Mr. Thompson was representing the people of this country. Every requirement of the Inquiries Act was complied with by Mr. Justice Davidson and every question that had any bearing upon the matter was asked. The Auditor General of Canada, who was here before the commission to protect the treasury of Canada, was asked to go to Victoria and make suggestions; every witness he suggested was examined, and every question he suggested was asked. The inquiry was thorough and fair, but I do not wish to say anything further about it until we receive Judge Davidson's report. Now I have been speaking so far with regard to the circumstances connected with the purchase of the submarines and of the attempt made to make the people of this country believe there was something dishonest in connection with the transaction.

I wish now to refer briefly to the other ground of attack, namely, the question of the efficiency of the submarines. I find that on that point evidence was given by Commander Jones, Mr. Paterson, Admiral Story, Commander Hose, of the Rainbow; Engineer-Lieut. Wood, Admiral Kingsmill and Mr. Elihu B. Frost, vice-president of the Electric Boat Company of New York. The first witness is Commander Jones, who gave this evidence with regard to these boats:

Q. Did you inspect them?—A. I inspected them, yes.

Q. Did any other officer accompany you?—A. The Chief Engineer of dockyards.

Q. Is he in Canada at present?—A. He is in the dockyards now.

Q. Is he available as a witness?—A. Yes.

Q. What is his name?—A. Engineer-Lieut. Woods.

Q. Did he inspect them with you?—A. He inspected them with me.

Q. Both of them?—A. Yes.

Sir Charles Davidson: Is he of the Royal Navy?

The Witness: He is Royal Canadian Navy now, he was in the Royal Navy.

By Mr. Thompson K.C.

Q. Did you make a thorough inspection of them?—A. I made a thorough inspection, yes.

Q. After you had brought the submarines to Canada, did you make further tests of them?—A. As soon as we had them we commenced practising with them and training crews.

Sir Charles Davidson: What had been your previous experience?

The Witness: I had been five years in the submarine service at home.

By Mr. Thompson, K.C.

Q. What was the result of your further tests?—A. The results were that the boats behaved very well and as far as I remember it was the day following or may be two days after they arrived, one boat was diving outside the harbour training the crew. We started on one boat because it is very difficult to train two crews at the same time.

The instruction staff was limited.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Would the hon. gentleman state what took place when one of these boats sank to the bottom?

Mr. HAZEN: I will come to that. I have noticed, in many years' experience of the hon. member for the city of St. John, in the legislature or in Parliament, that it is with great difficulty that the hon. gentleman can remain quiet while any one else is speaking. He has got into the unfortunate habit, if he will allow me to say so, of interrupting one who is trying to present an argument. I continue the citation:

Q. And after the crew was trained, was it placed on the other vessel or how did you arrange about that?—A. I think it was a fortnight after the arrival of the boats that one boat had a complete crew trained, and we proceeded with the training of the second crew, and at the end of August both boats had complete crews, and we were diving and carrying out exercises daily.

This evidence is somewhat lengthy, and I can not read it all and finish my remarks by six o'clock, as I desire to do. But, generally, Commander Jones states that the boats were efficient and very desirable in every respect.

The next witness was Mr. Paterson, who also told about these boats. Then we have the evidence of Admiral Story. He is an admiral in His Majesty's Navy. He was living in Canada at the time the war broke out, and was appointed by the Naval Service Department of Canada to take charge of naval affairs at Esquimalt. This is his evidence:

Q. I would like you to make a statement as to the efficiency or otherwise of the two submarines purchased by Canada.—A. I consider these two boats as very efficient boats in their way. Since I have been here I have been in touch with the officers in command and they have always expressed themselves as satisfied with the behaviour of the boats. They have been continually at work. When I first came to Canada they went out to sea alternate days and kept to the sea. Since then they have been going out every week for exercise, several days in the week, and this has been going on all the time, except when they were having their annual refit. On one occasion one of the boats went out to Flattery, early this year. There was a heavy sea on, and the officer that was in charge of the other ship that was with this boat told me that there was a heavy sea on and that the submarine rode the water like a duck, and the officers generally have said that the boats are very handy in every way and compare very favourably with the English boats of the same class.

Q. Do you know whether or not the cost of repairs has been normal or abnormal in the case of these vessels, comparing the cost of repairs with that of similar vessels in the Royal Navy?—A. The amount of repairs has been normal, what would have been expected. They are new boats. They had their annual overhauling and as new boats a certain amount of work would be expected, especially when they were built by people not used to that class of work. There was nothing but that might be expected.

Mr. LEMIEUX: How long have the submarines been in dock since they were acquired?

[Mr. Hazen.]

Mr. HAZEN: A very short time. One met with a small accident which involved some repairs, and then, of course, every vessel must have its annual overhauling.

Mr. LEMIEUX: How did it meet with an accident?

Mr. HAZEN: That is all given in the evidence. Something was wrong with one of the valves. It was believed that she struck something crossing from Seattle. It was a trifling matter, and soon repaired. Probably the hon. gentleman refers to something that is mentioned here in the evidence:

Q. It was reported that a portion of the side of one of the vessels had been removed for some purpose or other and Lieut. Jones stated that no part of the hull had been removed, but that a part of the superstructure had been removed in order to have the hull painted?—A. Yes, that is quite correct. When they were having their annual refit it was found that some of the rivets in the stern tube had to be attended to, replaced, and the only way to get at it was to removed these plates belonging to the superstructure. That is, the part above the cigar-shaped hull, but the same plates were put back; you could not get at it without removing them.

Q. Had Number 2 submarine been at sea as much as Number 1?—A. Oh, quite.

Q. And used in the same way in practice and so on?—A. Yes, exactly.

Q. And no distinction is made between these two vessels.—A. No distinction whatever made between the two.

Q. It has been said that the crews are afraid to go to sea in Number 2 submarine, on account of the danger attending cruising or diving in that vessel. What do you say to that, have you heard anything about it?—A. I never heard one single word of any sort or description about it.

Q. Has any complaint been made to you by any of the crews?—A. No.

Q. Or any representations?—A. None. Certainly I should have heard it if it were true.

Q. You would be the first person to whom such reports would be made?—A. Certainly.

There is further evidence about it, but it simply shows that idle reports got abroad for which there is no foundation. No doubt some of these idle reports have reached the ears of members of this House.

Engineer-Lieut. Wood gives evidence as to the efficiency of the vessel. I will give just one answer which is typical of the whole of Engineer Wood's evidence:

Well, I think so, so far as submarines go, they are in every way efficient.

Similar evidence was given by others. And now I come to the evidence of the director of the Naval Service, Vice-Admiral Kingsmill, which I will read in full. This is Admiral Kingsmill's evidence:

Mr. Thompson, K.C.: You will recollect, Admiral, that Canada purchased two submarines at a cost of $1,150,000 just on the eve of the declaration of war, would you give the Commission your opinion as to the cost of these vessels, considering the conditions under which they were purchased?

Admiral Kingsmill: My opinion of the cost of the vessels was that under the conditions of war it was not an excessive price to pay. It was a price less than that paid by the Admiralty for the same class of vessels, when they paid a heavy premium for them being finished within a certain time, which was much what we were doing in this case. The submarines would have been no use to us two months later. I presume that the price we paid, although it was a very heavy price, was worth it.

Mr. Thompson: What do you say as to the expediency of acquiring those submarines at that time?

Admiral Kingsmill: As a matter of expediency, I consider that the British Columbia Government which had made the purchase, acted promptly and rightly. The fact of these submarines being there, I am perfectly certain in my own mind, saved the city of Victoria, if not the city of Vancouver, from serious damage.

Mr. Thompson: That is on the part of the German Navy?

Admiral Kingsmill: On the part of the German Eastern squadron, which had left Kiau-Chow almost on the outbreak of the war, and which we know were cruising in the Western Pacific at the time.

Mr. Thompson: I understand that at the time these vessels were acquired, an officer named Lieut. Commander Keyes was at Victoria, or arrived there shortly after they were acquired.

Admiral Kingsmill: Lieutenant-Commander Keyes was a retired lieutenant-commander in the Royal Navy, who had been an expert in submarines. At the outbreak of the war, I happened to hear of him being in Toronto in the employ of the Canadian Northern Railway Company, and I telegraphed him and he arrived here the same morning, I think, that we received the information that the submarines were being delivered, and he immediately went out. He picked up one or two experts in Toronto, men he had happened to meet, who were ex-service men, and he went out there and gathered a crew and took the vessels over from the Electric Boat Company, or the vendors —I forget who they were without looking at the file. At all events, he took them over from a Mr. Smith and he tested these vessels. When I arrived in Victoria, some time afterwards, he informed me that the CC-1, that is the first one, was in excellent condition, and quite serviceable. He admitted he would not like to say the same about the other one without having her docked, as there was some leak somewhere that he could not detect. So the vessel was docked and it was found that she had struck something and that there was a slight leak which prevented her from maintaining her buoyancy, but otherwise the vessel was in excellent condition, and both of them were efficient. I may say that from that day they have continued ordinary work, out for practice, firing torpedoes, submerged and on the surface. With the exception of minor defects and one or two accidents they have had, there has been nothing to complain of in the vessels at all.

Mr. Thompson: My recollection is that Commander Jones is now in command of these two submarines.

Admiral Kingsmill: Lieutenant-Commander Jones, after the Scharnhorst and Emden had been sunk, Mr. Keyes returned to the Admiralty and subsequently served in the Dardanelles.

Mr. Thompson: I understand from the evidence of Commander Keyes that the defect which existed in one of the vessels that was brought across from Seattle was in one of the valves not being properly seated; would that be caused by an accident, such as you spoke of, before they were acquired?

Admiral Kingsmill: It might have been caused by the vessel striking some submerged object.

Mr. Thompson: I understood from Commander Jones that that was a very minor defect.

Admiral Kingsmill: All the defects have been minor; there was no serious defect at all.

Mr. Thompson: After these defects were remedied, was submarine No. 2 as efficient as submarine No. 1?

Admiral Kingsmill: Yes, quite.

Mr. Thompson: What are the qualifications of Commander Keyes to make a report on such vessels?

Admiral Kingsmill: Commander Keyes happened to be a man who had served in all of our earlier submarines and had been out in all their tests. I asked him, when he came to Ottawa: "Do you happen to know anything about submarines?" I did not send for him because he knew anything about submarines, but because he was an ex-naval officer. He said: "I happen to know a great deal about them; I was out on the tests for buoyancy and stability in nearly all of the A class." When I heard this I suggested that he should go to Victoria, which he did. His reputation as an expert is very high.

Mr. Thompson: Is he in the service at present?

Admiral Kingsmill: He is in the service at present, and lately has been honoured for good work at the Dardanelles.

Mr. Thompson: What do you say as to the efficiency of these vessels as compared with vessels of a similar class in the British Navy at the present time?

Admiral Kingsmill: From all the information we can get, and from Keyes' own report, he says they are quite on a par with anything they have.

Sir Charles Davidson: What as to buoyancy?

Admiral Kingsmill: That I could not remember without the files; that is a technical question that I did not know I was going to be asked.

Sir Charles Davidson: The Chilians made that a ground of rescilliating the contract.

I think rescinding is what is meant.

The boat company rather suggest that the Chilians did not want to continue the bargain for another reason, and I would like, if possible, to know what your official opinion is.

Admiral Kingsmill: As to their buoyancy?

Sir Charles Davidson: Yes.

Admiral Kingsmill: The submarines are efficient in every way. They are continually out and diving and firing their torpedoes. The statement that there was anything wrong with their buoyancy or anything wrong with them in any other way is absolutely false, because from the very day that Keyes got hold of them he went out. In my presence in Victoria these submarines have gone out and submerged and done their work and come back again.

Mr. Thompson: Were ever any complaints made in any way that there was a lack of buoyancy in these vessels?

Admiral Kingsmill: No, except in CC-2, which, as I have mentioned, struck something.

Mr. Thompson: That, I understand, was before the defect was remedied.

Admiral Kingsmill: That was before the defect was remedied.

Sir Charles Davidson: The contract between the Chilian Government and the Electric Boat Company called for tests with two months' provisions on board. Have they ever been tested in that respect, or is it required that they should be so tested in the service they perform for the Canadian Government?

Admiral Kingsmill: It would not be required of them. They have never been away from their parent ship to that extent, and that test has never been made to my knowledge. They were not built for overseas submarines; they were built for coast defence—at least they were used for coast defence—what they were built for I do not know. They cruise with their parent ship.

Sir Charles Davidson: They were built to go to Chili?

Admiral Kingsmill: Yes, but they could do that coasting.

We have no information on our files as to anything the Chilians asked for. That has been obtained by the Commission, I presume, but we have no knowledge of what the Chilians asked for. We have only the report of our own officer as to the efficiency of the boats for the purposes for which they were needed by us; that is, the protection of the British Columbia coast.

Mr. Thompson: What would you consider would be the probable normal cost of building such vessels in Canada in normal times?

Admiral Kingsmill: That is a very vexed question. We have never been able to solve exactly what it would cost us here. We did not propose to build any submarines, but Australia did, and at the Conference in 1908 they said they could build them for £55,000 each in England for the Australians, and later on the Australians, in their estimates, put down nine submarines for £810,000, which would bring it up to about £90,000 each. But in this country we could not do it. If we added about 40 per cent to this £55,000, which is what we were going to add when we proposed to build Bristols here, that would bring it up to about $450,000 each.

Mr. Thompson: Would that be a submarine of the same class as these two that Canada purchased?

Admiral Kingsmill: That estimate was made then for a sea-going class, which is a little different, and not quite as elaborate. There are improvements in this class, which they have not got in the sea class.

Mr. Thompson: Do these improvements cost more?

Admiral Kingsmill: They cost considerably more. They have submarine telephone and different small items like that, and they would have had a greater surface speed than the sea class. Altogether, these are a better class of vessels than were going to be built by Australia in 1909.

Sir Charles Davidson: Would the price you mentioned include overhead charges?

Admiral Kingsmill: That is roughly the actual cost to the Government in building them. But in August of 1914, Messrs. Vickers offered to build for the Canadian Government submarines at a cost of $572,000 each, a similar boat to these on the Pacific coast, and six months afterwards, when the question was again raised, they asked $600,000 for each boat. The Admiralty paid more than $572,000 for each boat, because they paid a very heavy premium that the vessels should be built within a certain time. That is a matter of Admiralty information that I have not got on our files.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Does he say what the length of the submarines was?

Mr. HAZEN: Similar boats, he says.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I understood that they were larger boats. They were built in a shipyard at Massachusetts.

Mr. HAZEN: They were assembled at Montreal.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Ten were built at the Fore River Shipyards, and then assembled at Montreal. I understood that they were larger boats, but I may be mistaken.

Mr. HAZEN: These boats were built at the Vickers-Maxim works in Montreal; when I say "built," my hon. friend knows what I mean. The material that entered into their construction came from the Fore River Shipbuilding Company, and, I think, the Union Iron Company of San Francisco. The parts were assembled at Montreal. It was in respect of this contract that Admiral Kingsmill says the British Government paid more than $572,000 a boat.

Mr. PUGSLEY: It is said that one of the submarines assembled at the Vickers-Maxim works in Montreal is the submarine that sank a large German cruiser in the sea of Marmora. Can my hon. friend give me any information on that subject?

Mr. HAZEN: I do not know whether or not that is the case, but I have been informed that these submarines have done excellent work.

Mr. PUGSLEY: It is a pity that Canada did not turn out more of them.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Is it a fact that the Vickers-Maxim people employed about 1,000 people in the construction of these submarines?

Mr. HAZEN: They employed a good many people; I do not know how many. Admiral Kingsmill's evidence continues:

Mr. Thompson: The premium would be in addition to the $572,000?

Mr. Thompson: The premium would be in addition to the $572,000?

Admiral Kingsmill: The premium and the cost of building, which Vickers charged, is more than $572,000. I only know there was a premium because Mr. Tynan, the representative of the company who were building at Vickers, told me so.

Sir Charles Davidson: What is the character of the premiums concerning which you have spoken?

Admiral Kingsmill: It is a premium if the vessels were built within a certain time.

He is asked to state the extent and so on, and he says he cannot. I think there is nothing further in the evidence.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Did Sir Charles Davidson ask any of these experts what was the actual weight of the supplies? I would like to know what weight of supplies these ships could carry.

Mr. HAZEN: I do not see that question here.

Mr. PUGSLEY: A vessel ought to carry some supplies. If it did not I would regard it as defective.

Mr. MURPHY: I understood from the extract that Admiral Kingsmill, in reply to a question as to the buoyancy of the boat, said he could not answer the question without reference to the files. Does he refer to the departmental file here?

Mr. HAZEN: I suppose that is what he means. He says that the boat is absolutely satisfactory, but he means that he could not give scientific and technical data without reference to the files.

Mr. MARCIL: I wish to ask the minister just one question.

Mr. HAZEN: I am beginning to think that I am on the witness stand, being cross-examined by hon. gentlemen opposite.

Mr. PUGSLEY: It is all very interesting, this question of the submarines, and I think it is a pity that the Government have not seen fit to give us more information.

Mr. HAZEN: The evidence of Mr. Frost, Vice-President of the Electric Boat Company, was taken at New York. He says:

To my knowledge the boats were very effective and efficient boats.

I think the evidence I have quoted must satisfy any one whose mind is open to be satisfied of three facts? First, that the transaction was honestly conducted and honestly carried out, and that there was no foundation or justification for the charges made with regard to Sir Richard McBride or the people who had to do with the transaction. Second, that the boats were efficient. The evidence of all the experts, Admiral Storey, Commander Keyes, Admiral Kingsmill, and others all goes to show that. Third, the evidence of Admiral Kingsmill goes to show that the boats, bought as they were in a hurry, were bought at a price not as large as the price that the British Government subsequently paid for submarines of similar type. When the report of Sir Charles Davidson is laid upon the Table, and when we have an opportunity to read Sir Charles's summary of the evidence, we will have an opportunity for further discussion if my hon. friends care to pursue the subject further.

The hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) referred to another matter of great importance, that is, the pensions paid to Canadian soldiers. I have in my hand two tables, one showing comparative rates for pensions for totally disabled soldiers, the other, comparative rates for widows of officers and men killed on active service. This is not the first time the matter has been referred to in the House. I turn to Hansard of last year, March 24, 1915, and I find that on that day Sir Robert Borden laid on the table of the House the draft Order in Council that had been prepared containing an amended scale of pensions. He said:

It is very desirable that the House should be made acquainted with what we propose and that an opportunity should be given for discussion, if desired. Therefore, I shall lay upon the table of the House a copy of the proposed Order in Council. It has not yet been passed, and will not be passed until the House has had an opportunity of making suggestions and expressing an opinion upon it.

That was three weeks before the prorogation of Parliament. The matter of pensions was referred to only once afterwards in this House, at page 1450 of Hansard, when my hon. friend (Mr. Graham) who sits beside the right hon. leader of the Opposition asked the question, when the Minister of Militia was making a statement on some other subject:

Will the pensions be paid according to the rank which the men held in the militia of Canada or according to the rank in which they have been serving in the war?

There was some little discussion on that point, and that is the only time it was referred to. The Order providing for the pensions was on the Table of the House for three weeks, open and available to every member of the House, and no discussion took place in regard to the rates to be provided. That, however, is no reason for not discussing it now. It is a perfectly proper subject for discussion, and I think the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) is within the bounds of legitimate and proper discussion in bringing this matter to the attention of the House, because it is one which, for my part, I would be very sorry indeed to have regarded from a party standpoint. I wish, however, to give a few facts to the House and then, if the House will permit me, I shall ask permission to have the tables which I hold in my hand inserted in Hansard. It would take a very long time to read them and they would hardly be grasped by the members. I shall give a few figures first. In Canada the unmarried soldier who is totally disabled is paid $264 per annum. I am speaking now of private soldiers. In Australia he is paid $253 and in Great Britain $316. Thus, in Great Britain, the unmarried soldier who is totally disabled gets more than in Canada and still more than in Australia. But in Great Britain no provision is made for extra pension if the man is married; while in Canada if a man is married his pension becomes $396, in Australia $380, and in Great Britain $316; in Britain it is just the same as he would receive if he is a bachelor. The pension paid to a soldier who has a wife and one child is, in Canada $456, in Australia $443, and in Great Britain $348; a wife and two children, in Canada $516, in Australia $506, in Great Britain, $380; a wife and three children, in Canada $576, in Australia $569, and in Great Britain $412. If he has a wife and four children he receives in Canada $636, in Australia $633, and in Great Britain $444.

Mr. MACDONALD: Would the minister tell us the difference between the amounts paid to officers in the two countries?

Mr. HAZEN: In Canada a lieutenant who is unmarried would get $482, in Australia $443, and in Great Britain $700. The higher officers get larger sums in Great Britain, in proportion, than they do in Canada and Australia. A lieutenant with a wife and one child, in Canada gets $774, in Australia $727. With a wife and four children, a lieutenant gets $990 in Canada, and $917 in Australia.

Mr. CARVELL: What about Great Britain?

Mr. HAZEN: As far as I can tell, the pension there does not increase on account of his being married. I have a note saying:

> In addition he receives a gratuity of one year's pension the first year.

That is in Great Britain. I am not clear about the state of affairs in the United States, but I think their pension there, for total disability, is higher. It is lower in other respects. In the United States, as far as I can learn, there is no fixed amount covering the term total disability, as the rate varies according to the form of disability, without regard to rank. I see it is $400 a year for total deafness and it runs up to $1,200 a year for the loss of the sight of both eyes. It is fixed according to the nature of the injury, without generally saying total disability, and for total disability I should say that in the United States a larger amount is paid than in Australia, Great Britain, or Canada.

Mr. OLIVER: Is that $1,200 to a private soldier?

Mr. HAZEN: I think it is. I am told that there is no distinction as regards rank in the United States. However, we want to obtain further information on that point.

Now, I come to the question of the rates paid to the widows of officers and men who were actually killed. In Canada, the widow of a private without any children, under the pension scheme laid on the table, would get $264. The widow of a private in Australia would get $253.

Mr. MARCIL: That is, so long as she remains unmarried.

Mr. HAZEN: In Britain she would get $126, and in the United States $144 or $120 less than the widow in Canada. In Canada the widow with one child would get $324, in Australia $316, in Great Britain $189, and in the United States $168. The widow with four children in Canada would get $504, in Australia $504, in Great Britain $283, and in the United States $240, and so on. I will place these tables upon Hansard so that hon. members may have an opportunity to study them for themselves.

	British	900 00	1,020 00	1,140 00	1,260 00	1,380 00

There is one important point which requires consideration. If any one looks over the casualty lists of the Canadian forces, especially those of the spring and early summer, he will find that in a great many cases the next of kin of the men who went from Canada, and who were killed, were residents of the British Isles, so that the pensions we pay will go to people who live in Great Britain, to the children, widows, or mothers, as the case may be. That is going to give rise to this state of affairs, that the next of kin of the soldiers who have gone to fight from Canada and who have been killed, living in Great Britain will get pensions very considerably higher than those paid to the next of kin of British soldiers who live in Canada or Great Britain. I think that is a matter worthy of some consideration.

The new scheme of pensions was drawn up by a committee of the Militia Council in consultation with a subcommittee of the Privy Council who had before them the scales of pensions paid in other countries. The pensions for totally disabled soldiers are based, to a very large extent, on those introduced by the Parliament of Australia. In the case of totally disabled soldiers, it will be noted that the Canadian rates are slightly higher than the Australian rates, and considerably higher than the British rates. In the United States there are a number of rates for different classes of disability, and these are awarded without any regard to the rank of the individual, with the consequent result that the rates for disability of soldiers is much higher than in any other country; but it should be noted that special provision exists in the Canadian scale by which the pension may be increased by one-third if the soldier requires the constant services of an attendant.

As regards officers—in the case of those who are single—my summing up is that the Canadian rates are higher than the Australian rates, but considerably lower than the British rates. The Canadian rates for the widows of soldiers are almost exactly the same as those recently provided in the Australian Act, and they are practically double the amounts authorized for the widows of British soldiers, although in Great Britain the rates have been materially increased since the outbreak of war. The rates allowed to widows of soldiers of the United States are considerably lower than the Canadian rates. As regards officers the Canadian rates for widows of lieutenants and captains are almost exactly the same in Canada, Australia, and Great Britain, with the advantage slightly in favour of Canada. As regards officers of higher rank, majors and lieutenant-colonels, the Canadian rates are higher than the Australian, but less than the British. In both Canada and Great Britain on the widow re-marrying, a gratuity equivalent to two years pension is granted on re-marriage taking place. The only other point worth mentioning is that in Great Britain an increase of pension of $30 a year is given to a soldier's widow on attaining the age of 35 years, and another increase of $30 on attaining the age of 45 years, but even with this increase the rates do not come up to the Canadian rates.

This, as I said, is a proper subject for discussion in the House, and the Government will welcome the discussion of it and any suggestions that may be made. I do not think there is a man in this House who would attempt to make political capital out of the question of pensions. We are all striving to provide a pension rate that will be fair to the brave men who are going forward to the front to fight the battles of Canada and of the Empire.

Mr. Speaker, perhaps you will permit me to transgress a little and prolong my remarks beyond six o'clock. There are one or two other matters with which I would like to deal, and I think my remarks would come sooner to an end if I were allowed to continue before the adjournment for dinner. My hon. friend the member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) made certain references to the extension of the term of Parliament. My hon. friend from Gloucester (Mr. Turgeon) also referred to it. He has always been a stout upholder of the Constitution of this country, and I have always respected his opinions on matters of this sort, for I know him to be sincere. He pratically told us he had an open mind on the subject and that although he was always prepared to stand behind the Constitution he might vote in favour of an extension. My hon. friend from St. John, however, has discovered that the question is a most serious one, that we have to interfere with the British North America Act, and that that is a most serious thing to contemplate. Yet, it is no more serious now than it was on 15th September last, and on the 15th day of September last my hon. friend from St. John knew as well as when he delivered his speech on the Address that, if there was to be an extension of the term of Parliament, there would have to be an amendment to the British North America Act, because without legislation by the Imperial Parliament this Parliament has not the power to extend its term. I find that on the 15th September last my hon. friend from St. John, in the city of Winnipeg, declared to a reporter of the Free Press:

> The present circumstances are so grave from the standpoint of Canada and the Empire that it would be deplorable in my opinion to have the people divided upon party questions.
> Another of the reasons why I favour putting off an election until after the war is because I think it would be a great pity to hold one just when the energies of all the people of Canada, and especially the members of the Government who are primarily charged with the duty of attending to the recruiting and equipment of the soldiers should be devoted to this one end.

Why this sudden change? Why is he so impressed with the importance of the matter now when he was not so impressed with it in September. It may be due to the fact that in September last the Government was supposed to be contemplating an election, and my hon. friend thought he would put himself squarely against such a proposal as something opposed to the best interests of the country. But now, when the Government comes to Parliament and asks for an extension of the term, my hon. friend must again be against the Government and so he is deeply impressed with the importance of the question, an importance which he did not see in September when he was interviewed by the Winnipeg Free Press.

But my hon. friend from St. John was not alone in making such a statement. My hon. friend from Red Deer (Mr. Clark) whose criticisms, as I said before, are always moderate, and none the less effective because of their moderation, also placed himself squarely on record as opposed to an election during the period of the war. Then my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) has practically said the same thing in speeches he has made and in interviews he has had throughout the country. I might refer to the address he gave in the House of Commons on 19th of August when he said:

> Speaking for those who sit around me, speaking for the wide constituencies which we represent in this House, I hasten to say that to all these measures we are prepared to give immediate assent. If in what has been done or in what remains to be done there may be anything which in our judgment should not be done or should be differently done, we raise no question, we take no exception, we offer no criticism and we shall offer no criticism so long as there is danger at the front.

Then the right hon. gentleman in a speech delivered at the Montreal Reform Club on December 12, 1914, declared that:

> As soon as war was declared we thought it was part of the duty we owed, not only to our policy, but also to our country, to lay down for the time being, all party discussion, and to give our whole thought and energy to the new problems which were brought by the war, and not in any way embarrass the Government, but on the contrary to facilitate its duty which this new situation created for the Government.
>
> At the present time the only thing we have to think of is to finish the war, and to adjourn to a future date those domestic problems which will have to be taken up later.
>
> The war is still on. Upon the policy introduced by the Government to discharge the duties we owe to the Mother Country, we have taken no issue with the Government. We have supported their policy, and therefore there is no cause for an appeal to the country.
>
> I am as strong a party man as there is in Canada, but at the present time I overlook all my connection as a party man, simply to remember the duty which I owe to the Mother Country, England, and I must add to France also, the land of my ancestors.

The hon. member for Pictou, N.S., (Mr. Macdonald) was interviewed by the Toronto Star on September 17, on which occasion he made this statement:

> An election while the struggle is raging for liberty and humanity would be a crime. An election during the war would divide the Dominion; there should be no election during the war.

The Toronto Globe on September 6, 1915, said:

> If the war is still in progress.... Liberals will be just as keen to postpone a general election as Conservatives. Election talk should cease. It distracts attention from the greatest work Canadian statesmen and the Canadian people have had to do since Confederation.

On October 20 the Toronto Globe said:

> To secure an absolute insurance against partisan strife in our national political arena there must be an agreement for the extension of the Parliamentary term until a period some time after the close of the war.

The Toronto Star, on September 9, said:

> We do not want an election now, or during the war.

The Star again says:

> As there is a general agreement of opinion that there should be no election during the war there should be no difficulty in making the arrangement referred to (extension of parliamentary term). It would be an advantage, not only to have the election deferred until after the war, but to put an end to the nuisance of periodical election rumors.

The Winnipeg Free Press of August 23, 1915:

A bitter party election in Canada would be a deplorable diversion of national energy.

The Chronicle, Halifax, April 12, 1915:

We need not pause to remark that election day should not come until the war is over. Every decent-minded Canadian, regardless of party, knows and admits that.

In the Chronicle of September 13 and also of September 16 a similar opinion is expressed. The Recorder, Brockville, says:

Both parties in Great Britain have agreed that there will be no election until after the war is over. From Australia, New Zealand, South Africa and every other outlying part of the Empire come similar announcements. Canada alone talks of a party conflict at a time when 'none should be for party, but all be for the state.' This country would present a fine spectacle to the Empire, and to the rest of the world, if an acrimonious conflict should held while the Empire is fighting for its very existence.

The Herald of Montreal, in December last, put the case against an election very strongly and the Free Press, Ottawa, on May 11, said that at the next session Sir Robert Borden should introduce enabling legislation extending the life of Parliament. The Ottawa Citizen on April 14, said that it did not believe that the people of either party wish a general election and the Times of St. John, N.B., the particular supporter of my hon. friend from St. John, says:

All that Sir Robert Borden needs to do is to announce that there will be no election until after the war.

Yet, in spite of his own previous declarations, in spite of all these pronouncements by prominent men in the Liberal party and their leading journals, my hon. friend has discovered that it is a very serious thing to talk about amending the British North America Act so as to provide for the extension of the parliamentary term.

The hon. member for Richmond, N.S., (Mr. Kyte) spoke the other night about the evidences of patronage in connection with shell matters in Cape Breton and more particularly in connection with the appointment of inspectors. My hon. friend stated that nobody could be appointed as an inspector unless he had a recommendation from the Borden Club or some other political organization there. I am not quoting my hon. friend's exact words but that was the effect of them. What are the facts, as I am informed? I am informed that the chief inspector of the district of Cape Breton is Mr. A. E. Strubel, whose appointment did not come through the Borden Club, or any Conservative candidate, or any political pull of any kind whatsoever. He had been the chief inspector for the Canadian Inspection Bureau, which is the bureau that inspected shells that were manufactured under the direction of the Shell Committee, or of the Imperial Munitions Board. He had been chief inspector for the Canadian Inspection Bureau before the Government inspection service was organized and he continued the work under the new arrangement. I am informed by my correspondent that he does not believe that there are a dozen persons on either side of politics in Cape Breton county who know on what side of politics Mr. Strubel is, and as far as anybody knows he has never yet cast a vote in a Dominion or provincial election in this country. The inspector who stands next to Mr. Strubel, I am informed, in the matter of salary received, is Mr. D. E. Ross, a Liberal in politics, secretary of the Sydney Fielding Club, and son of Mr. A. C. Ross, formerly the Liberal member for Cape Breton North and Victoria. Another inspector is Mr. Wells Woodill, who is a Liberal, whose father was a Liberal, and all of whose brothers and immediate relatives belong to the Liberal party. For the appointments which have been made during the past six months, I am told, Mr. Strubel gives the assurance that he himself is personally responsible. Naturally he has received letters of solicitation from politicians, but he has never been influenced by them. Some time ago he wrote to a gentleman who had urged an appointment for political reasons, advising him that all appointments would be made on merit, and that preference would be given to Canadian wounded soldiers who had returned from the front. I am told that there are at present six inspectors under Mr. Strubel, three Liberals and three Conservatives. Mr. Strubel, I am informed, is not in any sense a political partisan or connected with any political organization in any way. The statements made by my hon. friend from Richmond are wide of the mark, and he must have received inaccurate information in regard to the matter.

Mr. McKENZIE: Who is my hon. friend's authority?

Mr. HAZEN: I have not the right to give the authority now, but I will see if I may be permitted to do it.

Mr. McKENZIE: I might suggest to my hon. friend that if any question be raised as to why Mr. Ross had received his appointment, the answer would be that it was because his father had renounced the religion of his fathers.

Mr. HAZEN: I do not know anything about that. I am simply giving the House the information I have received.

Mr. McKENZIE: I am giving my hon. friend the correct information.

Mr. HAZEN: I do not know Mr. Ross, but I come to the conclusion, from the hon. gentleman's remarks, that Mr. Ross must be a very sensible man. I must trespass no further upon the time of the 6 p.m. House, which I have already occupied too long. When I addressed the Canadian Club at Boston a few months ago, I pointed out that after the war is over there will, no doubt, come a period of reconstruction for Canada, as for all the other countries engaged in the conflict, which will be followed, I believe, by an era of tremendous expansion, so far as our Dominion is concerned, caused by an immense influx of population, attracted to our country by its fertile lands, its moderate taxes, its democratic institutions, and the opportunities which it affords to every man within its borders of acquiring for himself a happy home, and of winning position and distinction if his talents and character entitle him to do so. We have no doubt in Canada of what the ultimate result of the war will be. While no man can foretell its duration, we conscientiously believe that our cause is just, and that there is an unflinching determination to make it triumphant. In the language of Sir Robert Borden, any reverses that have come or may come in the future will only inspire us with deeper courage and a greater determination.

All that our fathers fought for and achieved, all that we have inherited and accomplished, our institutions, our liberties, our destiny as a nation, the existence of our Empire, are all at stake in this contest, and we are confident that the resolution, the determination, the self-reliance, and the resourcefulness that have never failed Canada in the stress and trials of the past will assuredly not fail her now.

Since Parliament prorogued in April last we have had some disappointments, and events have not moved so rapidly and favourably as we then believed they would, but the spirit of the Allies of Canada and of the Empire is undiminished, and there is an even greater and more serious determination than existed months ago to bring the war to a successful close. Recruiting in Canada has proceeded satisfactorily, and in Great Britain political difficulties that at one time seemed threatening and serious have largely disappeared. No matter how long the war may last, or how serious the sacrifices, personal and national, that must be made, and which Canadians, in common with the inhabitants of other portions of the Empire, are fully prepared to undergo, we will always remember that:

> Freedom's battle once begun,
> Bequeathed from bleeding sire to son,
> Though baffled oft, is ever won.

It is freedom's battle that is now being waged, and the Canadians in the battle line are fighting for freedom's sacred cause.

At six o'clock, the House took recess.

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. E. M. MACDONALD (Pictou): Mr. Speaker, this is the sixth session of this Parliament and the third session since the war began, and I think it might not be out of place, in speaking to the Address in this third war session to recall briefly the changing events, so far as Parliament is concerned, since August 1914. We all remember that, like a bolt from the blue, the news of conflict came, and the representatives of Canada in Parliament, called suddenly together, came here to take counsel as to what our attitude was to be in a war, the extent and consequence of which we had then but little knowledge. With one accord, disregarding party lines and previous political disputes this Parliament voted to give all that was necessary in the way of money, and of men in the field to help the Empire. There came a period of doubt and suspense when throughout this land as well as throughout the whole of the English-speaking world, there were discussions as to the effect of this White Paper, and that Yellow Paper, and as to which nation was responsible for the initiation of the war. These discussions, without any marked event, attracted a great deal of attention until we met about one year ago. And even then, I think it will be conceded, that honourable members of this House as a body were not impressed with the deep consequences of this mighty struggle.

We came through that session with a shadow overhanging us, yet we were not given up wholly and exclusively to the contemplation of what our duties and our rights were in the circumstances. Honourable gentlemen on the other side of the House claimed our attention for some time with what I think will be recognized to-day to have been a rather singular measure in view of the peculiar world situation, a proposition that we should send to Flanders—and, as it would appear now, to the Dardanelles also—to take the votes of the boys who had gone out to fight for liberty. That proposition was seriously discussed one year ago. In the light of events since then, I think it will be conceded that that proposal and that discussion seem very singular indeed. The Minister of Public Works (Mr. Rogers) told us that the country was demanding in thunder tones some remedy for the alleged evils arising from the decisions of the other branch of this Parliament. I do not believe that the people were demanding this in any kind of tones, to say nothing of thunder tones; but I cite these facts to establish the truth of what I say, that we in Parliament last year hardly realized the position in which the whole world and our own nation stood in relation to this great conflict.

Since that time there has been, I am sure every one will concede, a great and marvellous change not only in the feelings of the majority of members of this House but in the feelings and sentiments of the whole Canadian people. We had hardly reached our homes when we were shocked by the news that the German nation had violated every rule of the code which is supposed to guide the relations of belligerents and had sent to the bottom of the ocean hundreds of people in the steamer Lusitania. Then came the word of the disaster at St. Julien and Langemarck, when the Canadian boys for the first time felt the stress of conflict, and which cast a shadow of sorrow upon many a home in this land. Then came the after results, the splendid position maintained by our sons at Ypres, where, it is now conceded not only by Canadians but by the sons of Empire everywhere, the bravery, intellligence and capacity of our Canadian boys prevented the Germans from coming through to Calais. In the intervening days there has been this strange, peculiar association of Germany with the Balkan principalities and Turkey, the outcome of the immense ambition of this man who rules the German nation, this personality actuated by the lust for world-wide power, bringing home to us the dangers and seriousness of this war in a measure in which they had never come to us before. Hence it was that from all portions of this land our boys have gone forth to the conflict, animated with the highest ideals. Here in this House there are vacant chairs of members who have gone to the conflict, while all around us are men whose sons are at the front or are preparing to go at the earliest opportunity. And into the homes of many of our people has come the sorrow for the one who will never return, and there are returning to us the maimed and the blind whom it will be our duty to maintain and provide for in the future.

So, we have met this year under conditions different from any that have characterized the opening of any session of Parliament in the history of our country and, I believe, under a deeper sense of our duty than we have ever had before. I think the majority of us are animated with the desire in our deliberations to correct the mistakes of the past and to correct them in the full light of day. If this is done it should not call forth complaint or criticism from those who may be responsible for those mistakes. I believe that we desire to provide those things and take those steps which our duty calls for, and, so far as we can look into the future and provide not only for the soldier boys who shall return, but also for the people who shall live in this country happy and prosperous under the benign rule of the great nation to which we belong. Looking over the history of the year, we, the representatives of a free people, may express ourselves in an adaptation of Lincoln's immortal words: "That we here highly resolve that these dead shall not have died in vain, that, under God, this nation shall have a new birth of freedom, and that government of the people, for the people, and by the people shall not perish from the earth."

With these feelings I approach the consideration of the questions that come before us as representatives of a free people at this time. And I say again, that if there have been mistakes in the past, let us frankly ascertain and correct them; if there are abuses, let them be righted, and let us prepare with all sincerity for our future.

Shortly before the New Year the Prime Minister announced that, in addition to the 250,000 men who have already been called to the colours, 250,000 men are to be called and are to form a quota of Canada's contribution. Let me remind you, Mr. Speaker, that according to the census returns of 1911 there are, or were at that time, only 1,537,581 men in Canada between the ages of 20 and 45. That means that if we are to get the 500,000 men, we must take one man out of every three. Without conscription you can get those men only by living up to the highest ideals; you can get them only by impressing them with the fact that the consequences of this conflict are so great that this Government and this Parliament are willing to throw aside the considerations which in the past have furnished ground for complaint and for proper investigation, on the part not only of the Opposition, but also of Parliament as a whole and of the people at large. If hon. gentlemen opposite fall short of this ideal; if they are not guided in every respect by the highest motives, how can they expect one man out of every three in this country to come forward and fight? They need not expect them; they will not come.

The other day the Solicitor General, referring to the hon. member for St. John city, said that he "isolated" him from the other members of the House. Language of that kind from any member of the Government is entirely out of place. If the freedom for which our boys are going out to fight and to die is a really valuable thing, then here where we have freedom we must maintain it. And if hon. gentlemen, speaking as representatives of the free people of this country in the debate on the Address—where they get an opportunity of pointing out their grievances and asking for redress—are to be told that they shall be isolated because they give expression to that which is heard on the streets, read in our newspapers, spoken by supporters of the Government; if, I say, they are to be told that they shall be isolated, I for one protest most emphatically.

I noticed in the Conservative papers that the hon. Solicitor General was stated to have referred to the remarks of the hon. member for St. John City as being along the line of treachery. I find on looking at Hansard that the Solicitor General did not go that far, and that his remarks were misinterpreted by the press. But the hon. Solicitor General must not be so sensitive of criticism. If this Government will conduct the affairs of the country fairly and honestly, along proper lines, and with the highest ideals in view, they will receive from the Opposition the utmost possible consideration at this time. If, on the other hand, they disregard these ideals; if they sink to lower levels; if they are guilty of mistakes or acts of malfeasance, they may expect criticism; they will receive it, and have no right to complain because of it. No government in any British country has a right to set itself up as a body which ought not to be criticised. Just as we object to the domination of the German autocracy, so do we object to the Government's declaring itself to be above the people. We want no kaisers in this country; we want no field marshalls and no crown princes to say that hon. gentlemen on this side are guilty of lese majeste if they criticise the Government. Hon. gentlemen on this side of the House realize to the full the tremendous importance to the Empire of the present situation. Let hon. gentlemen on the other side, many of whom realize the seriousness of the situation to the fullest extent, remember that they are the representatives of a democracy, and that that democracy must have its fullest expression in this Parliament, as it should in every other parliament over which the British flag flies.

My hon. friends opposite complain of criticism. Let me suggest to them a very ready way of relieving themselves of a great deal of criticism. Let them abolish the patronage system in the Militia Department in regard to war expenditures; for it is the case that only a Conservative can sell supplies to the Militia Department. The people of this country will find their ideals rudely shattered if that continues to be the practice of hon. gentlemen opposite. After all, a time will come when these men who have the patronage will not be able to expect from other men, actuated by the highest ideals, the highest form of sacrifice in this war. My hon. friends, who are so very sensitive to criticism, can settle that difficulty by simply declaring that they will do as is done in Great Britain; that they will tell the party heelers and the men who want to control the distribution of favours in this, that, or the other constituency, that the nation is in too serious a position for them to potter with dealings of that kind. Let hon. gentlemen opposite take this opportunity of doing away with that system for ever in Canada. My hon. friends maintain a list in the Militia Department. If, as is the case in my county, no medical man who is not a Tory doctor may examine a recruit who desires to go to the war, I want to know what kind of idealism you are going to have from the Liberal doctors in that and the other Liberal constituencies in Canada.

Mr. DUGALD STEWART: There is nothing in that statement.

Mr. MACDONALD: Why is it that my hon. friend, who is supposed to be a major in the medical corps, is not down earning his money in Nova Scotia and attending to his business? I want to tell him that I know more about the county of Pictou than he does. I want to tell him that I can give him an instance where men who were supposed by Conservative medical men to be not satisfactory to the gentleman who has the patronage in my constituency were prevented from examining and reporting upon recruits who wanted to go to the war; that the reports were not received, and that the applicants were compelled to go to a man who was named by the man who had the patronage. My hon. friend, who is a major in the army medical corps in Nova Scotia, should correct that abuse. There is no reason why any duly authenticated medical practitioner in this country, no matter what his politics may be, should not, at first hand, be permitted to certify as to the physical qualifications of the men who want to go and fight. I mention that merely to indicate to my hon. friends that I make this statement on my responsibility as a member of the House, knowing the circumstances as they exist in my county—and having a son who is preparing to go to the front. Will it be said—it is just as well to be clear on this point—that anyone was guilty of treachery or lèse majesté last winter when we discussed the question as to the wisdom of taking $75,000 out of the Militia Department and giving it to Mr. Foster of Kings to spend in buying horses. Was it improper that that matter should have been investigated? My hon. friend the Minister of Finance should see to it that no department of this Government permits seventy-five thousand dollars or seventy-five thousand cents to be paid out in the way in which that $75,000 was paid out.

The fact that $75,000 can be taken out of the treasury of a department of this Government and given to any man to spend carte blanche is not sound and proper administration and the Minister of Finance knows it.

That brings me to the consideration of the matter which was brought up by my hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Pugsley). And let me say that the intimation which has been made by some hon. gentlemen opposite as to that hon. gentleman occupying a position of isolation on this side of the House is entirely beside the mark. When you find a paper that is a consistent supporter of the Government, like the Montreal Star, asking an investigation, when you find the Montreal Daily Mail asking for an investigation; when you find this question of shells discussed all over this country in the papers, why should an honourable gentleman be declared to be in an isolated position because, as a representative of the free people, at a time when, under the constitution, these things should be brought to the attention of Parliament, he does so? Does he commit any wrong in doing so? These things are a matter of public notoriety, they are known to the press, they are discussed in all the business centres of Canada. Hon. gentlemen know that. The Government come here and, through their Solicitor General and their Minister of Marine and Fisheries, absolutely decline to take any position by way of defence of the Shell Committee. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries said this afternoon: I hold no brief for the Shell Committee. The Solicitor General said: I do not stand here as a sponsor for, or as one responsible for the conduct of the Shell Committee. I am not here to defend the Shell Committee. I am here to offer some remarks in regard to what they have done, in regard to their status and character, in regard to their responsibility, in regard to our duties towards them. But when my hon. friend says further, as he does:

> I am not saying and I do not wish to be taken as saying that there cannot be any attack made on the Committee. The Committee may be open to criticism. Nor will I say, under proper authority and at the proper time, there should not be review of the work of that Committee.

That is the position taken by the Solicitor General. The Minister of Marine says: I hold no brief for this committee. He will not undertake the responsibility of defending them. But while he and the Solicitor General take that position and say: We are not responsible for the Shell Committee at all; yet they are able, in some mysterious way, to get from this committee, which they say is connected with the Imperial authorities only, the information which the minister was able to bring to the House this afternoon. It is a very strange committee this, if it is a body having relation entirely with the Imperial Government, for which this Government has no responsibility whatever, if ministers of the Crown here, who wash their hands clear of it, can go and get this information and bring it down as they did to-day. The position of the Solicitor General in regard to the Shell Committee is very much the position of the lawyer who goes into court and says: I am going to demur to the plaintiff's statement of claim, not upon the ground that it does not disclose good cause of action, not upon the ground that it is untrue in any way, and I say the court in which he has brought suit is not the proper court; he should go to some other court. That is the position of the Solicitor General when it is simmered down. Or it might be compared to another position sometimes adopted in court. He confesses the case, but he pleads in avoidance, as we say: It is true that this committee should be investigated, there is no doubt about that, and some time in the future we or somebody else may investigate it, but the man who ventures to stand up in Parliament to-day and say anything about it, is isolated from his friends and from the House, because he ventures to bring to the attention of Parliament this very thing which we say ought to form a matter of investigation.

I want to say in regard to the hon. member for St. John that there are few men in this House, apart from our revered leader, whom we hold in higher esteem. He is a man whom we regard as a great parliamentarian, a man of great ability, as he has demonstrated in this House over and over again, and he has the confidence of every one of us.

No other hon. gentleman in this House but the Solicitor General, with his casuistry, would venture to dispute the soundness of the doctrine which has come down from the days of the revolution, so far as constitutional principles are concerned, that wherever Parliament or the country, for which Parliament stands, or of which it is a representative under British institutions, has had anything to do, directly or indirectly with the spending of money, the expenditure of that money is a proper matter for investigation by Parliament. I stand for that proposition, and I take the statement of the Minister of Finance who told us the other day—and as he indicated in Toronto in his speech before the Board of Trade—that Canada was arranging for credits for Great Britain, more particularly with reference to munitions. They have told us that Canada is going to pay for these things, both munitions and other things that are going over to the other side. Yet the Solicitor General comes in and says: It is true that the Shell Committee requires to be investigated; I will not defend them for a moment; it is true that they were changed and in some mysterious way a new body called the Imperial Munitions Board came into existence; it is true that we threw them down and all that, yet if anybody wants to make a charge against any Minister of the Crown, we will investigate that, but we will not allow an investigation of the Shell Committee. I assume the papers are going to be brought down. I say that in this Parliament every gentleman should be actuated by the highest ideals, and if this Government refuse to go on and look into this whole matter in this Parliament, they will be falling short of the ideals they are holding up to the boys of this land whom they are asking to go out and fight for liberty. Let us see where we are on this question. It is well to understand it fully, because these issues are apt to be beclouded. We had the story given to us last year by the Prime Minister in regard to the Shell Committee. He told us how it was constituted. It was constituted by the Minister of Militia.

> On the 8th of September, 1914, at a meeting held by the minister at the Dominion Arsenal the following Committee was appointed to organize the work throughout the Dominion.

And he gives the names:

> About two weeks after the organization of the Committee Mr. Carnegie of London, England, was appointed by the minister as ordnance advisor of the Shell Committee.

He goes on to tell what they did:

> The executive work of the committee has been very wisely entrusted to the chairman, Colonel Bertram—

The strange part is that this statement is signed by Col. Bertram, in which he states that the executive work has been very widely entrusted to him.

> —who reports weekly to the Minister of Militia and also to the committee when it meets, which is usually monthly, or more often at the call of the minister.

At this point, I should like to correct my hon. friend the Solicitor General, who I am sorry to see is not here, in regard to the statement he made about the Minister of Militia and Defence in connection with this committee. "Why," says the Solicitor General in that positive way which he assumes, "the Minister of Militia was present at this Shell Committee only twice, once when it was going out of office and once when the new committee came in;" whereas Col. Bertram says here that when this committee was appointed all the executitve work was entrusted to the chairman who reported weekly to the Minister of Militia, and also to the committee which met once a month, or more often at the call of the minister. As I shall show as I go along, the Minister of Militia must have been in close touch with the committee at every stage of its operations; it is so stated here. Who passed the bills after all? The chartered accountant of the department, says Col. Bertram:

A chartered accountant recommended by the general manager of the Bank of Montreal, checks the accounts of the committee every month. These are then forwarded to Mr. J. W. Borden, chief accountant for the Militia Department.

Now, why were these accounts forwarded to Mr. J. W. Borden, the Accountant of the Department of Militia? What had he to do with them? "Why," says the Solicitor General, "we divorced ourselves from this committee," or rather he says, "we divorced the committee from us,"—a curious kind of transfer which I think was hardly legal. "We divorced the Shell Committee from the Canadian Government in the matter of responsibility," says the Solicitor General; "we made it a committee under Imperial authority." I would like to know the date when this wonderful divorce took place.

Mr. MURPHY: After they were found out.

Mr. MACDONALD: There never was any divorce; there could not be any divorce. It was not a case of "whom God hath joined together let no man put asunder." It was a case of a father disowning his own child. That was the trouble; there could be no question of divorce.

Mr. ROGERS: Has my hon. friend proved the consummation of the marriage yet?

Mr. MACDONALD: My hon. friend the Minister of Public Works did not catch what I said. I said it was not a case of marriage or of divorce; it was the case of a father trying to disown his own child. It was a case of leaving the baby on somebody else's doorstep. Now, I assume that the Government will bring down these orders in council, and tell us all about this thing. This is the proposition seriously put forward by a responsible Minister of the Crown; that this Government could call into being a committee having the powers which they had in regard to performing the wonderful duties set out by Col. Bertram in his report, which was read by the Prime Minister last year, and that on their own volition they proceeded to make that creation of theirs a committee under Imperial authority. Well, this Government has done some pretty queer things, but they could not do that, and they have not done it; there is no way in which they could do it.

Let us go on and see what Col. Bertram says. These bills were all made out and sent to the Accountant of the Department of Militia.

The Minister of Militia called a meeting of the committee at Ottawa and, after discussing the matter, cabled to Lord Kitchener, pointing out that much larger contracts could be undertaken by the manufacturers of Canada.

Now, I think the Solicitor General will be bound to admit that he is wrong in regard to the Minister of Militia being present at only two meetings, for already we have seen that he was present at three or four. Col. Bertram goes on:

It was proposed by several of the manufacturers that a deputation from the committee should be sent to the War Office, London, to put their claims before the Secretary of State for War. The Minister of Militia decided on the recommendation of the committee, to send Mr. David Carnegie, as he was familiar with the whole situation.

Is that not a very strange thing, that this body, constituted by the Government, divorced in some mysterious way from the Government, that this body, having been in existence for quite a period of time, should send Mr. Carnegie over to England to tell the Imperial authorities what they could do, or what they could not do. When did this transfer from the Canadian Government to the Imperial Government take place? He goes on to say:

He also informed the various officials at the War Office that it was the intention of the Minister of Militia and his committee, to make ultimately the copper bands in Canada.

So we have this situation: we have this committee constituted by the Minister of Militia, we see that the accounts went to the man who passes the accounts of the Militia Department; and there is no evidence at this moment that in any order in council any powers were given to this body as an imperial institution; on the contrary the evidence shows it has always been a Canadian institution operated by the Minister of Militia as a side wind of his department.

I do not wish to go into detail with regard to the various matters that might be urged and have been urged from time to time in regard to the Shell Committee; but coming, as I do, from a constituency where, I think, the first shells made in Canada were made by the Nova Scotia Steel Company, I have followed this matter very closely. Colonel Bertram and Mr. Carnegie are the gentlemen who seem to have been running this committee in regard to the allotment of contracts, and when it is said that there was no politics in the inspection of shells—I do not care how many letters my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Hazen) may read from people in Sydney—if my hon. friend goes to my constituency, he will learn what everybody in the community knows, what my hon. friend from Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair) who lives in my constituency, knows, something in regard to the carrying on of the industry. We have two systems of inspections in regard to shell construction. There is an inspection which is carried on by the Canadian Inspection Company of Montreal, the inspectors being experts whose business and duty it is to pass upon the quality of the steel that enters into the ingot that makes the shell. I have no complaint to make in regard to the inspectoral duties carried on by these experts. Their duties are very technical; and have to do with the analysis of the quality of the steel. In that respect a careful inspection has to be carried out, but when it comes to measuring the shells when they come from the presses—why, who are the men employed as inspectors? There is one political heeler from Cape Breton; there is another who had been engaged as a party scribbler in the Conservative press, a man who is known by every Liberal in my own constituency. And so it is down the whole list; that class of inspection is entirely under the control of the gentleman who has the patronage in my county. Hon. gentlemen need not come here and make any statements with regard to there being no politics in the matter, because these are the facts so far as my county is concerned, facts that cannot be questioned.

I am not going further into the question of the creation of this committee. I assume that the Government will bring down all the information that they have in their power to give in regard to that, that is, all the information which relates to the expenditures that have been made, all the information that they can bring down having regard to the limitations placed upon such questions in time of war. I wish to reiterate in the strongest and most emphatic way that so far as any evidence is before us at this moment, my hon. friend the Solicitor General has no warrant for the statement, either as a matter of law or as a matter of parliamentary practice, to say that the right of investigation is not in this Parliament. If my hon. friend the Solicitor General or any other hon. member of this Government, came into this Parliament and said: Yes, we believe that this Shell Committee is a body which has done that which is honest and right, and, while it may have made mistakes, still, it is not entitled to be criticised; if any minister of the Crown ventured to take that position in regard to it and was able to satisfy Parliament and the people that that was a tenable position, that would be one thing; but when the Solicitor General and the Minister of Marine and Fisheries say: We will neither defend nor will we excuse, nor will we say that we yield any principles to this institution which we have divorced ourselves from and attached to the Imperial authorities in some imaginary way; we think it may have been wrong and that it ought to be investigated and all that, but the Imperial authorities, or some other people, are to do it—if, I say, they take that position, and if they expect from this House, and from Canada a continuation of those ideals which many of us entertain in regard to this war, it is an impossible position, a position they cannot take in the face of Canada and of this Parliament in regard to this question and they must realise it.

My hon. friend from North Essex (Mr. Wilcox) was put up the other day to deal with this question and to answer it. I want to say what one of their own papers said about that. We will leave out the Toronto Telegram. There is no use of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries coming to us and stating what the Free Press said, and thereby settling the whole question. Why do not these hon. gentlemen tell us something themselves, something that they know about, instead of taking the Free Press and saying that excuses the whole thing. What does the Free Press know about making shells? What has it had to do with the shell business? If it knows all about this thing, the Minister of Militia ought to attach the editor of the Free Press to his staff and put him in charge of the business of making shells. The ministers themselves do not appear to know anything about it; they run away from the situation and say we will not stand up for the Shell Committee, and abuse my hon.

friend from St. John (Mr. Pugsley). This is what the editor of the Montreal Evening News says with reference to the extraordinary remark which my hon. friend from North Essex made in the House the other day:

> General Bertram and his associates may well cry to be saved from their friends.
>
> There should be no stirring up of strife over a few old horses and a few shells.'
>
> The remark was made seriously and will be taken seriously. . .
> In the face of the evident unwillingness of the members of the Dominion Shell Committee to defend their honour, the country must look after its own honour which is also compromised in the charges that have been made. . . . The apologists of General Bertram must be told that they are doing a great disservice to that gentleman and his colleagues, to themselves, and to the country by their ostrich-like policy. As for the remark of the member for North Essex, it condemns itself. It is indeed beneath contempt.

I have attempted to emphasize as strongly as I could the duty which this Government owes to the country and to Parliament of endeavouring, first, by the abolition, and if not the abolition, the restriction at least, of patronage during the war, and by the taking of an attitude having a semblance of justice and fairness in regard to the situation which has been created with reference to the Shell Committee, to put themselves in such a position that they can hold up to the 250,000 Canadian boys who will rally round the flag that ideal and those sentiments which they must have if they are going to come forward to fight for their country.

But there is another thing that I think this Government should do in this regard having reference to the sentiments of the Canadian people. I am sorry that the hon. the Secretary of State ((Hon. Mr. Blondin) is not in the House. There is a certain duty that these hon. gentlemen who are his colleagues are charged with and one which they will not perform in regard to him. We all know the constitutional principle of the collective responsibility of the members of the Government in regard to their views upon important questions. That is laid down by all the constitutional writers. I am speaking from the seat of a colleague admired and esteemed on both sides of this House, who is now in a German prison in Berlin because he was taken in Antwerp engaged in the humane task of giving succour by his medical science to Belgian wounded. Speaking by his authority, and repeating what he said to me, I want to say that there sits in this chamber in this time of stress when the heart of the nation is stirred, a man who in 1910 on a platform in the province of Quebec, in the presence of Dr. Beland, fell on his knees on the platform and with hands uplifted in the attitude of prayer besought the Holy Virgin and all the saints that the young men of the province of Quebec might be saved from the awful calamity that would come upon them if this Laurier naval law went into effect and they were asked to go and fight the battles of Great Britain upon the sea and be compelled to lose their lives on the deck of a British battleship. I am aware that the former Minister of Inland Revenue, now Secretary of State, has a habit of denying these things. But there is something more that he said from his place in this Parliament in 1910. I find by reference to Hansard, page 44-53, 1910, that he said this:

> I feel that I am bound to protest loudly against the policy of the Government and against that of my own party as regards the question of creating a Canadian Imperial war fleet or of making a cash contribution.

He loudly made that protest in Parliament, those of us who were here heard him, and you will find the statement in Hansard. In these days when all our hearts are stirred, when our boys are going out to fight, when the bodies of some of our friends are being left in Flanders and the Dardanelles, are we to have in this Government a man who has made this statement, which I have repeated here, and who has never taken it back as he should have taken it back right in this House. It will not do for this gentleman, with his last hour repentance, to make recruiting speeches in which he never disavows a single one of these utterances. What ideals will the boys of this land have in regard to governmental management when you find within its leadership a man who has never taken back these words and who will not now stand up in Parliament and declare that he has abandoned forever his nationalistic principles as he should do. I declare that this is a time for the searching of hearts upon questions of this kind, and it is up to the Secretary of State to let us know whether these recruiting meetings of his are wholly mockeries or whether he has foregone those sentiments which he reiterated all over Quebec.

Now let us take another honourable gentleman. We have not got to know him very well yet. He, (the Hon. Mr. Patenaude) is the successor of the former Minister of Inland Revenue now the Secretary of State. Mr. Bourassa declared, I am told, in Le Devoir that he was one of his great friends at St. Remi and other places in Quebec and it is interesting to know what he thinks of the attitude of the Canadian people in war time. The Hon. Mr. Taschereau, whom, honourable gentlemen will recall, is the Minister in the province of Quebec who had a verbial encounter with Mr. Armand Lavergne, a week or so ago, spoke in the city of Toronto in the year 1909. Loyal and true Canadian, and lover of Britain he is, then as now entertaining sentiments to which we would all give adhesion. Mr. Taschereau, expressing his views said:

> We consider that Canada develops in a marvellous manner; we feel that she is on the highway to nationhood; we recognize her as a part of the greatest Empire that ever existed; we think that Canada should bear her share of the burden that falls to the lot of all prosperous and growing countries; we believe that, for a long time to come, our future is bound up in the advancement and integrity of the Empire; we believe that a call coming from the Mother Country should be heard.
>
> Will our sons serve on that fleet? In answer to that question I will cite the following fact: In one of our public squares, some years ago, a monument was erected in honour of eleven of our brightest youths of Quebec who had given their lives in South Africa. There were one thousand of them to go forth; those who fell sleep under the sands of the dark continent, but their memories live in bronze to remind our children of the courage and loyalty of the Quebecers.
>
> Gentlemen, what Quebec did in the past she will do again in the future, and when the trumpet calls, in true Canadian style, we will answer "present."

That is an extract from the speech of the Hon. Mr. Taschereau delivered in Toronto in December, 1909. In the following session of the Legislature, this motion was proposed by Mr. Prévost:

> Whereas in December last, during a trip to Toronto, which the speech from the Throne has invested with an official character, the Minister of Public Works and of Labour declared himself, in the name of the province of Quebec and in presence of the Prime Minister, to be in favour of Canada's participation in the wars of the Empire, the formation of a Canadian war navy or of any other measure which the Federal authorities might deem proper to adopt in that regard;
>
> This House regrets that one of the ministers of the province should have, without any mandate, upon subject foreign to the jurisdiction of the Government whereof he is a member, and under circumstances that impart a significant meaning to his words, made indiscreet declarations which are calculated to place the views of the electors of this province in a false light.

This resolution was voted upon, and I have the division list in my hand. Amongst other names appear those of Mr. Armand Lavergne and Mr. Patenaude in very singular proximity.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Who is Mr. Patenaude?

[Mr. Macdonald.]

Mr. MACDONALD: He is the new Minister of Inland Revenue. At this time when naturally our hearts call for unity in all things, these two gentlemen, if they have ceased to entertain those sentiments and feelings which they entertained in 1910, should come forward and in the light of day before this Parliament and this country declare that such is the case, so that the boys who have gone out to fight and perhaps to die, may know that the men who compose the Government of this country are in earnest in regard to this question and are not fooling with them.

Mr. PARDEE: When was the Minister of Inland Revenue sworn in?

Mr. MACDONALD: Some time last fall, I think. The remarks which I have made with regard to these gentlemen have not been made with any personal feeling, but under a deep sense of the serious attitude which I entertain towards this war and its consequences. There are hundreds of men in this country who entertain the same sentiments that I do; in fact, every one does who knows of these things, and I ask the Government under the circumstances to see to it that these men declare where they stand in this year of grace 1916, in view of the situation in which this country and the Empire now stand owing to the war.

We had this afternoon from my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Hazen) a lengthy and interesting speech in which he dealt with a variety of subjects. In regard to one or two of the matters to which he referred I think he claimed a little too much credit. In the province from which I come, the lumber trade had last year reached the highest possible point. My hon. friend rather indicated that he was entitled to some especial credit by reason of the fact that in July, 1915, the Naval Service had taken some steps to arrange for vessels to carry lumber and other products to Great Britain, and the figures which he gave to the House were to the effect that more lumber had gone from our Maritime ports in the year 1915 than in either of the two immediately preceding years. That is true, and I am very glad to know that the hon. minister has made those arrangements in regard to the carrying of lumber. I am not quarrelling with him on that score; but from business dealings with clients and others connected with the lumber business, I know that in so far as that business in our part of the Maritime Provinces is concerned, the arrangements for the sale of the lumber and for the carrying of it by Norwegian vessels were all made in the winter of 1914-15. Yet my hon. friend, if I understood him correctly, did not begin to make any arrangements until July, 1915. Therefore, while I am perfectly willing to give the minister all credit for any efforts put forth by him to encourage the transportation of our products to Great Britain, in that respect I think he is not entitled to the credit which he claims.

9 p.m.

We hear from many sources that the ministry is overburdened with work. The stress of this war upon these hon. gentlemen is so great that they have to appoint commissions to do this, that and the other thing. Let us be perfectly frank about this matter. I recognize fully that the right hon. the Prime Minister of this country has at this critical time in our history, a very great and serious burden placed upon his shoulders, one which is probably the most onerous that any man in this country has ever had to bear. I make the same statement with regard to the gentleman who fills the position of Minister of Militia (Sir Sam Hughes), and also with regard to the Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White). These three gentlemen have very serious and responsible duties to perform; but when I am told that my genial friend the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Rogers) has worked harder at his duties since the war began, I am asked to believe too much, because I fail to see where in the slightest degree this war has added to my hon. friend's burdens. We are told that only large public works are going on, and that the thousand and one details, that I have no doubt troubled the minister in the past, are absent. I see, however, that the expenditure is still maintained at a great height, and I wonder whether my hon. friend is really as busy in connection with this war as he is alleged to be. I believe that if we are able thoroughly to appreciate the situation, we shall find that the Minister of Public Works has very little to do in connection with war matters. My hon. friend the Minister of Customs (Mr. Reid) has so little to do at the present time that he is running not only his own department but the Department of Railways as well, and the Minister of Railways (Mr. Cochrane) is taking the time for a jaunt across the ocean to see his sons. That is a very laudable thing to do, and I have no complaint to make with regard to it, except that I wish to look perhaps a little frankly at the situation and see how much there is in this mystery about the burden of care that is weighing these hon gentlemen down, with the exception of the first three whom I have mentioned.

Take the Minister of Inland Revenue to whom I referred a moment ago. How much is he worrying about the war? Or the Secretary of State (Mr. Blondin), how much is he worrying about it? Then there is the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Roche), he is having no immigrants to look after, and not many homesteads are being taken up. He is not working as hard as he used to. And the Postmaster General (Mr. Casgrain) is not looking as if he were worrying about things. He goes about spending a good deal more money than his predecessors spent and adding a great number of people to the service, and though he has taken a large amount of money from the people he manages to acquire a deficit, which deficit is not due to the war in the slightest degree. The statement that it is due to the war will not bear analysis. So, I go through the list of these gentlemen and I find that when one of their supporters talks about the awful burdens resting upon them, I wonder at the imagination of those who can believe it.

Take my hon. and genial friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries and of the Naval Service (Mr. Hazen), he has been leaving undone the things he ought to have done ever since the war began. He has not been attending to his business at all. Let me show you in what respect he has failed. Take the Island of Newfoundland, the smallest of the British Dominions, with a population of a little over two hundred thousand, or about half that of the province of Nova Scotia. In addition to sending its quota of men to fight in the field, Newfoundland has sent a thousand men as a naval brigade to fight upon the seas. Take Australia and New Zealand; three thousand of their boys have gone out as part of the naval service and have done marvellous work in the peninsula at Gallipoli. Then there is South Africa—South Africa with whom we were fighting only a short time ago. Why, Cape Colony sent to the naval brigade a first instalment of 1,692 men and has been sending reinforcements ever since. All these other oversea dominions have been there with naval assistance but, though we enjoy as they do the protection of the British navy, we have not done a single thing; the Minister of the Naval Service has not even tried to do anything since this war began.

And, mark you, the need has been very great. Let me read to you an advertisement that appeared in the British papers. People talk about the necessity of having trained sailors, trained mechanics, in order to be of assistance in the naval brigade. But here is the advertisement:

Royal Naval Division—Public School Battalion.

The Admiralty have given official permission for raising a battalion of 1,000 men, which will be strictly limited to public school or university men and who will serve together as a unit.

Training is now going forward.

Applicants desiring to enrol should apply at once to

Royal Naval Division,
6, 7, 8, Old Bond Street, London, W.

Here is what they said last week in the Imperial House of Commons when this question was before them. An amendment was adopted to the Bill in regard to compulsory service by which the Admiralty was given first call on men desirous of enlisting in the navy. And the First Lord of Admiralty stated that a supplementary estimate would be presented for the expense of 50,000 men for the navy by next March. And here is what Mr. Ashmeade Bartlett, the brilliant war correspondent of whom we all have read, says, in regard to the naval conditions in the Dardanelles:

Mr. Ashmead Bartlett states that in some of the vessels off the Dardanelles there is hardly an active service rating on the upper deck. "There are many men between 48 and 56 years of age; nearly all are fathers and many are grandfathers. They have reached that age when, after a hard life at sea, they might reasonably expect to look forward to passing their declining years surrounded by their children and grandchildren, in the happy enjoyment of their small pensions, and engaged in the civilian pursuit each may have adopted at the conclusion of his period of active service."

That means simply that the condition is so serious that these men who had passed through all the stages of active service and had gone home have to be called out again in order to fill up the positions in the navy. We talk about having done our duty. Think of our tremendous sea-coast, stretching on the Atlantic from the Maine border around the province of New Brunswick, from which my hon. friend (Mr. Hazen) comes, around what is almost an island, the province of Nova Scotia, then on the eastern side of New Brunswick away up the Baie des Chaleurs and around the peninsula of Gaspé and all through that tremendous St. Lawrence territory; and then our British Columbia coast running from Puget Sound up to Alaska. Can any man say that we are doing our duty when not one sailor boy has gone from Canada to assist the navy in this time of stress? South Africa has put us to shame. See what General Botha, who was fighting the Empire in 1900, said when the South African naval contingent started on its voyage to the scene of hostilities, where it has done such splendid service:

"Please convey to the commander, officers, and men of the Naval Contingent, South African Division of the Royal Naval Volunteer Reserve, my warmest good wishes on their departure. It gives me and my government great pleasure to think that the Admiralty, by asking for their services, has recognized the good work and efficiency of the only naval unit which South Africa has yet been able to organize for the common cause. I feel confident that all ranks of the contingent, by constant devotion to duty and by irreproachable conduct, at all times, will show that South Africans, even though few in numbers, are worthy to be represented in that great naval service which is the pride and bulwark of the Empire, and now striving, as ever, to guard our most precious inheritance of justice and liberty."

And we have not got a man there at all. This is what Dr. Macnamara said in regard to the South African naval contingent:

Dr. Macnamara, in reply to a question by Commander Bellairs, states that the offer of the services of a number of the South African Royal Naval Volunteer Reserve was gladly accepted by the Admiralty, and the men are now attached to the Royal Naval Division in this country. It was understood that they wished to serve as a unit representing their corps.

Now, there is this to be said about the Minister of Militia (Sir Sam Hughes), that he has been energetic. Whatever criticism may be directed against his actions, and whether he has done right or wrong, a point which I am not considering at this moment, he has been busy; he has been "on to his job." But the Minister of the Naval Service has not done anything, nor has he tried to do anything. I have information to the effect that in 1912 a number of enthusiastic young men in Victoria, B.C., and surrounding districts, conceived the idea of forming a volunteer naval reserve similar to the one recruited in South Africa. I am instructed that although that reserve was formed in 1912, they were unable to obtain any recognition from the Department of Naval Service until after the war began. I have looked through the reports—I have them under my hand—and I can find in them no mention of the Royal Volunteer reserve until, in the report of last year, Admiral Kingsmill referred to the fact that such a body was in existence. Gentlemen from British Columbia will know whether or not what I say is correct. I am told that Sir Richard McBride, who was in England after the war began, wanted to raise a naval brigade in British Columbia; that this Government was approached in connection with the matter, and that—I am simply stating the information that comes to me from what I consider to be authentic sources; if I am not correct, hon. gentlemen will tell me—nothing was done either to encourage or to assist the project. In January and March, 1915, after that volunteer naval reserve had been formed, an order was issued notifying the men who had come together in that body that they had permission to retire from that service and to join the army instead of the navy. If these are the facts, I should like to know from this Government why that condition of affairs has been allowed to exist. Shall we say that we are going to do nothing for the Empire upon the sea? Shall we say that we will not try to do anything? If so, the Newfoundland boys had better not have gone, the Cape Colony boys had better have stayed at home; and so with the boys from Australia. I am not going to renew the old discussion of naval matters; I am going to deal with this matter simply and solely from the standpoint of whether or not we should be doing something upon the sea to aid Great Britain. I say that we should.

Hon. gentlemen tell us that this war was foreseen; that we should have done this, that or the other thing. But it was a strange thing if anybody in connection with the Naval Department foresaw the war. Here is the official report of 1914 in regard to the recruiting of men for the Canadian ships:

> No recruits have been entered since 1st October, 1912, pending a decision being arrived at as to the future naval policy. The repairs to the Niobe were completed in December, and trials were carried out, which proved satisfactory; the ship is now in an efficient seagoing condition, but is not able to undertake cruises, owing to a deficient complement, the active service ratings having been sent back to England without being replaced.

Which means that all men who could engage in active service on the Niobe in that year had been sent back to England, and nobody had been supplied to take their places. The same thing occurred in regard to the Rainbow. The report says:

> The Rainbow made various cruises on the coast of Vancouver island until August, 1912, when the active service ratings were sent to England and were not replaced, since when the ship has remained at Esquimalt, with occasional cruises to keep engines in an efficient condition.

That is the way things stood in 1912; let us see what where they were in the next year. The report says:

> The Government having decided not to continue H.M.C. ships Niobe and Rainbow in full commission, no recruiting was carried on during the year, and the programme of exercises and training laid down for these ships was not continued. During the year free discharge was given to those Canadians who entered the service as boys and wished to avail themselves of the offer; in addition, many of the ranks and ratings lent from the Imperial service have completed their engagement under the Canadian Government, and returned to England, without being replaced.

That was the situation in April, 1914, just before the war broke out. Having read this report, I say to hon. gentlemen that if they had any prescience of the war, they were dealing with it in a very strange way.

In September, 1915—that is, last year—we find mention for the first time of the Royal Naval Canadian Volunteer Reserve. The report says:

> The R.N.C.V.R., chiefly recruited at Esquimalt, have been actively and usefully employed both ashore and afloat, and have shown, both officers and men, commendable zeal in the performance of their duties.

That, mark you, was the first time we ever heard anything about a volunteer reserve of any kind. When the war broke out—it is told here in the books, and needs no amplification—the Niobe was tied up at the wharf, with not a man on board but the few officers who made their homes there. No recruiting had been done. While the Niobe was tied up at the wharf the valuable German vessel Willehad left Quebec, came down around the coast of Nova Scotia, passed the harbour of Halifax, and reached the port of Boston in absolute safety. According to these books, the Rainbow was in exactly the same position as the Niobe, and we were indebted to Japan —Japan, mind you—for the protection of our western coast during a period of time after the beginning of the war and until the Newcastle came. It is just as well that our people should know the facts in connection with these matters. As soon as possible after the war, but too late to catch the German vessels now interned in New York and Boston, Great Britain sent out ships. The Niobe could have captured these German vessels; every naval officer will tell you that; they told me in Halifax that they could have captured these ships had the Niobe been afloat and ready for operation. About a month after that the Niobe came out. What for? To intercept any German ships that might be in the vicinity of the coast. These were soon cleaned off the seas by Craddock and Sturdee—and what are our ships doing now? What have they been doing all summer? It is the humiliating fact that the flagship of the squadron, which was off our coast last summer, was the Sidney, which had been built and equipped by the overseas Dominion of Australia. That was the flagship which headed the fleet that was off our coast last summer, and which was there chiefly for the purpose of guarding the trade routes to and from United States ports. When our transports wanted to cross the ocean last summer were they consorted by British ships? Not at all. If it had not been for the vessel with which Mr. Jack Ross presented the Government, the Grilse, which had been fitted up as a torpedo-boat destroyer, and which escorted practically all, if not all, of the transports which went from Quebec there would have been no protection against German submarines in the vicinity of the Atlantic coast. The Government of Canada did absolutely nothing in that regard. The people in the Maritime Provinces, in Montreal, and elsewhere in the province of Quebec, last year heard a good deal about the danger from German submarines. German submarines had found their way to the Mediterranean; in order to operate at a long distance from home waters, all they had to do was obtain a base of supply for oil and provisions.

A vessel of a neutral nation, say from Norway or Sweden, could carry these supplies to some inaccessible spot. Any one who knows anything of the geography of our sea coast knows that, and men who are connected with naval matters were fully convinced that it was possible last year that German submarines could have made a base anywhere along the western coast of the old colony of Newfoundland, or on the northern portion of Cape Breton, or on the southern portion of Nova Scotia. There was no reason why submarines could not have come out and operated from a base in any of these districts. If they had done so what protection had Canada? Mark you, the larger vessels are not the protection which countries have against submarines. There has been a wonderful development in regard to naval construction as the result of this war. Look at the stories of the battles that have taken place in the North sea, where the destructiveness of the submarines has sent to the bottom vessel after vessel of the ironclads of Great Britain, which were unable to protect themselves against the silent and stealthy message of death that came from the nose of these submarines. The only way to protect a vessel against these submarines is by a torpedo boat destroyer or another submarine. The minister said nothing in regard to that. Why has not the minister gone to the Vickers-Maxim Company in Montreal or some other industry and kept them busy during this winter building some submarines for the protection of our coast? Great Britain took the submarines that came from the Vickers-Maxim shipyards across the sea, under their own power. We have not a single submarine in Canada to defend ourselves. Why has not the Minister of the Naval Service done something in this regard? It is quite natural that gentlemen who do not live near the sea—and I do not wish to be understood as speaking in an offensive way—should not be fully alive to this matter; but I would strongly impress on this House and on this country that, through this Department of the Naval Service, some steps should be taken to defend both the Atlantic and the Pacific coasts from submarine attacks. There is little danger of a large German ironclad getting out. One might pop out from the North sea and get around the north of Scotland, but it could be easily caught. But the submarine could come out undetected, have her base on the St. Lawrence or Cabot strait, and from there send to the bottom our transports crossing the ocean, for all the protection that Canada has. Every one in the Maritime Provinces says that and knows that; I am not stating any fact that is not fully known. The minister should even now proceed to provide protection by the construction of submarines and of torpedo-boat destroyers, which can be built in Montreal or elsewhere. I do not wish to go into this old argument of what Canada can do and what it cannot do do. But we have done it. We have gone ahead by the enterprise of our own people in this way, and have built submarines, and they have sailed across the ocean and, as the hon. member for St. John said this afternoon, one of them has performed marvellous work and rendered splendid service in the sea of Marmora. Shall we do nothing on the sea for Great Britain? Will we not even protect ourselves? I say to my hon. friends from British Columbia, who, I believe, are very much interested in this question, that I regard it as the bounden duty of every one to face this situation and, if the facts are as I have stated, the situation is one which must be dealt with, and dealt with speedily. I am not able to understand why the minister has not dealt with this question. I visited the dockyard in Halifax two weeks ago or a little over, and I was astounded to find that at that moment there was only one vessel that was able to go to sea out of all the vessels around the dockyard belonging to the Canadian Government. That was on the 2nd of January. The Canada was in the marine slip at Dartmouth. Here were two vessels purchased in the United States last summer for which large prices were paid. They were taken to Montreal and a very great amount spent upon repairs. Then they were brought down there, and the information given to me very freely in the dockyard was that the captain of one of these vessels absolutely refused to go to sea. That was the condition of affairs on the 2nd of January, 1916, with this war on. All the British vessels at that moment were down in the West Indies, there was not a single one within hundreds of miles of the Nova Scotia coast, except one vessel, a sort of lame duck, which was able to struggle out. There was quite a regiment of little tugs and other small boats which were of no use whatever. Again, here in this dockyard, built by the money of the Imperial Government, which the Imperial vessels use but very rarely and to a very slight extent, anybody who looks honest to the Dominion policeman who stands at the gate of the dockyard can walk in and go anywhere he pleases. I say the Minister of the Naval Service should have that dockyard under the control of men who are there attached to the Niobe. There are seven or eight hundred men there on the Niobe, which was being dismantled, at least her guns were being taken off.

Mr. CARVELL: Again?

Mr. MACDONALD: Again, the guns were being taken off her, she was practically being torn to pieces. I asked some of these seven or eight hundred men what they were going to do and they said they did not know. There was nobody guarding the dockyard gate except a Dominion policeman. If this Naval Service is not the most awful farce that any Government ever intended to carry through in any country, do you not think that they would have some of their men detailed to guard the gates of this dockyard at the city of Halifax, which is supposed to be the great centre of the Atlantic squadron on this side of the ocean? Yet that was the situation. It seems to me surprising, I am bound to say I was astounded,

I bring this matter to the attention of Parliament not from any desire to be partisan in placing the matter before the House; but I believe that these conditions are such that Parliament should know of them, the country should be informed of them, and the matter should be dealt with accordingly. What are we to do in regard to this matter? I should like to have any hon. member of the Government tell me why, with our magnificent Atlantic and Pacific sea coasts, we should not send over to England some men to help the fleet, to join the naval division, to take the places of those hardy old men who have been dragged from their homes to go out and fight at Gallipoli because the younger men could not be had. We have been doing splendidly in sending boys to fight on the land; but around the sea coast of this great Dominion there are as many men, just as good and stout hearts, who go down to the sea in ships, and make their living amid the perils of the life of a fisherman, who would make splendid material for the navy. There are many more of these men in Canada than there are in the colony of Newfoundland. Why are these boys not asked to go and join the Imperial fleet? I venture to say that in the county of Guysborough there are hundreds of men who would be willing to go and who would acquit themselves nobly as the boys from Newfoundland have done. Will anybody say why they should not go? Among hon. gentlemen living in the interior of this country in our great inland centres, from Montreal to the Rocky mountains, it is quite natural that there should be apathy in this matter. I can quite appreciate the fact that the man who lives in Winnipeg or in Western Canada generally, who is away from the Great Lakes, would not know, as those of us who have lived on the seaboard from boyhood know, just what the possibilities are in that regard. I know there are boys in my county who would much rather go into the navy than into the army, but they have never been asked to go; no opportunity has been given to them to go. I am sure that that is true of the constituencies of hon. gentlemen on both sides of politics, and I would ask the minister to seriously consider the matter, and let us have a statement at some later period as to whether or not it would be possible to offer to Great Britain a naval brigade, and so do what South Africa, Newfoundland, New Zealand and Australia have done,

I would like to ask, too, in view of the tremendous amount of money which we are spending in connection with this war for all kinds of purposes, whether there is any reason why we should not have two torpedo boat destroyers on our Atlantic seaboard. We have the Grilse, a converted steam yacht, but outside of the Grilse there is no boat that could catch or cope with a submarine if it happened to come through the Straits of Belle Isle. Why should there not be destroyers in course of construction at Montreal which would be ready for the summer, and why should not the same condition exist in regard to the Pacific coast? I seriously urge upon my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, that this is a problem which ought to be dealt with at once. In these matters we must look ahead, as well as at present conditions. The old theory that we could not build steel ships in Canada has been entirely exploded; there is no longer any room for argument in that respect.

What are the people of this country going to do when the war is over? Already you hear mutterings from our western friends in regard to the transportation of the great wheat crop, complaints as to freight rates, and as to the failure of the Government to get ships to carry the grain; and these conditions will continue, I warn the Government, until Canada sets herself to provide and equip herself properly for transportation upon the sea just as she has equipped herself so magnificently upon the land. To-day we have three transcontinental lines stretching from one end of this country to the other, and after the war is over we look for an immigration which will exceed anything we have had before. Add 100,000,000 bushels of grain every year to the production of western Canada, bring them down to our seaports, and then what are you going to do? Are you never going to build ships; are we never going to provide for transportation on the sea just the same as on the land? I say, Sir, that this is the time for the examination of the conditions of the future. Unless the Government at this juncture immediately proceeds to give special encouragement to transportation so that we may have a merchant marine upon the seas, those who live inland may be pardoned if, with their inexact knowledge of marine matters, they think probably that their business will be paralysed. When this terrible war is over, we must look forward to a readjustment of conditions. Mr Speaker, I have already talked too long——

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on.

Mr. MACDONALD: I hope that the imperfect remarks I have made will not be misunderstood. I have spoken strongly on some questions, but I have refrained from approaching the consideration of those problems, in so far as it is possible to do so, in the spirit of keen or aggressive partisanship.

An hon. MEMBER : Oh, oh.

Mr. MACDONALD: My hon. friend who wears the uniform ought to be earning the money for it and should refrain from sniggering. When hon. gentlemen like my hon. friend from Lunenburg come into this House as majors of medical corps, I am bound to say that I do not understand why, if they are on active service, they are not attending to their medical duties instead of coming here, or how their medical duties are performed in their absence. They should either do the one thing or the other. There are certain hon. gentlemen whose imputations I might not resent, but I do resent any such imputation as that thrown upon me by my hon. friend when he suggests that I have approached these questions upon a partisan plane. I have endeavoured in all sincerity to approach them on a higher ground than ordinarily. The views I have presented in regard to this whole matter have reference to questions which the people of this country and the Government ought to seriously consider at this juncture. I am sincerely desirous that at this stage in our country's history we should endeavour in Parliament to hold up an example to the boys who have gone and who are going to the front, and that when we go to recruiting meetings and ask our young men to make sacrifices in order that our liberties may be maintained, we should show them an example and convince them that we know what we are talking about. We must correct the mistakes of the past and of the present as we go along; that is what Parliament is here for, that is our duty as representatives of a free people. Not only that; we should look forward to the future. Moreover, our duty to-day is not only in regard to these material things. Let us remember what was said at the time of the American war. Let us strive to finish the work we are in and to bind up the nation's wounds, and let us do the best we can for the widows and the children of those who are fighting for Canada and the Empire.

The question of pensions, which was discussed this afternoon by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, is one of great importance, and one which I was delighted to see my hon. friend approach in the manner he did, because I regard it as one of the most important matters which could be considered by the members of this House. Hon. gentlemen will probably remember that a gentleman in Toronto, Mr. Frank Darling, prepared a pamphlet which discussed the question of pensions in a most interesting way. After that pamphlet had been brought to my attention, I placed on the order paper a notice of motion in regard to this matter, so that the whole question may come up for discussion at a later day. However, I appreciate very much indeed the action of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries in placing upon Hansard the information which he gave us this afternoon, because it is a question in which hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House, no matter what their political predilections may be, are interested, and one with which they are anxious to deal fairly.

Over and above that, there is a question which has not, perhaps, been specially mentioned. One of the great problems, apart from pensions, is, what is to be done with the soldier who comes back partly injured and entitled to receive a pension, but who desires to avoid living a life of idleness. I understand that the Government have appointed a commission to deal with that question, with Senator Lougheed as chairman, but I wish to suggest, as I am interested in that question, having taken it up in Nova Scotia, that that committee is too large. The matter should be taken hold of by a minister, and dealt with by him on his responsibility as a minister. The relations between the Federal Governemnt and the Provincial Governments are very close and intimate in regard to this matter, and require attention in a greater degree than can be given by a commission. Provincial committees have been appointed also to deal with this matter. Complaints have been made as to the difficulty of getting together and working out these problems. I want to make a suggestion with all deference to the gentlemen who compose that commission, and I do so without making any reflection upon them, but living as they do, in various portions of the country and being engaged in various occupations, it is almost impossible for them to get together and have that concentration and community of ideas which is necessary in order to work out that problem. It is becoming more acute every day. My hon. friend from Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) referred to cases that have come under his observation. There are young men who have come back to our part of the country and they are in the same way. While drawing their pensions, their future should be anticipated. Then, there comes in the problem of the development of technical education. By careful consideration of the possibilities of technical schools you may be able to give all these veterans that species of education which would enable them to fit themselves for earning an honest livelihood for themselves and their children, in addition to receiving their pensions. Then, there would be the avoidance of those conditions which we have heard from story and history, are always to be found after a war—the lack of employment and the lack of interest in the men who have fought for the nation. That has occurred in the Old Land, and history always repeats itself. My suggestion in regard to that question would be that some one of the ministers should take that matter under his direct control with his own staff and deal with it, and be the means of communicating directly between this Government and the various Provincial Governments whose assistance and co-operation may be desired.

The problems of the future for Canada are very serious. Already they are engaging the attention of our press. I see that my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Rogers) has made an address upon this question and has been looking to the future in that regard. How these things will shape themselves is a matter which is most difficult, no matter how far seeing any one may be, to tell with any degree of certainty. This much we do know, however, that there ought to be coming to this land from the older countries an immigration of even greater extent than that which came in the past. There ought to be special attention paid by the Government to this problem.

Again let me say that I have no faith in these commissions that this Government persist in appointing. The British system in relation to constitutional government is that the members of the Administration of the day, on account of their having been trained in public affairs, and with that sense of responsibility which is always possessed by men in public life to a greater degree than those who have not had the experience, with that intimate knowledge of the conditions of Government that only men on the treasury benches can have, are the proper ones to deal with these questions, and, if they have the ability to do it, they should be seized of their responsibility and should endeavour to formulate and lay down whatever plans they can conceive for the future. Whatever our notion may be about the position of this Government in that regard is one thing, but this duty is one which ought to be seized by the Government themselves. If there is any device, any method by which attention can be properly directed to Canada when the day of victory comes, this plan ought to be thought out and developed by a responsible minister who would have the advantage of being able to provide in advance in their executive administration for the conditions which would produce the desired result.

It has occurred to me that a suggestion might be made in that regard as to how to deal with a condition that has been found a difficulty in the past. We find it in our province and I am sure it exists elsewhere. Take the small farmer in a European country and bring him out and put him on a farm in the East or the West; he buys a farm in the east of 100 or 150 acres and if he goes west he gets a homestead of 160 acres. Both of these farms are entirely too big for him, they are beyond anything he ever had to do with before and the consequence is that he is endeavouring to deal with a problem so far beyond anything he has ever attempted in his own country that he gives up after a short time and drifts into the city. You should endeavour to provide him with a homestead, or to put him in possession of a holding, smaller in area and under conditions more in consonance with those of the country from which he came and more in keeping with the conditions that exist where he grew up. In that way you would have a collection or a colony of people who, living together, would have a community of interest and you would develop all those conditions that go to make happy homes and to make life interesting. That is a problem, however, which I am quite sure hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House who know the West better than I do are more able to deal with than I am. I only throw out that suggestion because it appears to me to be one that is well worthy of consideration.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have spoken very much longer than I had intended. In this third war session, with a deeper appreciation throughout the country and in the hearts and minds of every one of us as to the position in which we are at this time, I think that, in so far as it is possible for us to do so, we should endeavour to proceed to our duties with the understanding that the interests of Canada shall be advanced first and last, and that if possible division and dissension may be avoided upon non-essential matters. Hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House have no right to complain, and must not complain, if there have been errors in the administration, if there have been mistakes which are injurious to the commonwealth, if we, in pursuance of our duties, as members of Parliament, point them out. If investigations should be had they should be granted at this time more than any other time. We owe this duty not only to ourselves, but to the people, who are watching to see how the affairs of Canada are being carried on.

As yet there are very few signs of the beginning of the end. There have been many dark days in the year and a half since this war began, but every one who has studied the story of the great nation to which we belong remembers that all down through the stormy pages of the history of the islands where to-day and for so many years has been found the centre of this Empire, there have been times when things looked far darker than they do to-day. Recall the days of the Crimea; the older men who lived in that period told you of the sad hearts in England, and of the doubts and fears which existed there as to whether or not the issue of the war would be favourable. Following that were the days of the Mutiny, of horrible atrocities in India with the great nation in that southern land which had always been associated with Great Britain in revolt against the Mother Country, and under conditions which indicated that that revolt very likely would be permanent. These days of gloom passed by. So will, I feel sure, these days of doubt and uncertainty; they will be dissipated, and if we Canadians, as true believers in that constitutional government which we have inherited from our fathers, will do our duty so that we may transmit to our children those principles of freedom and justice which have come to us, we will be fulfilling in some measure our ideals, and will be laying the foundation of that future prosperity and greatness which I hope and believe we in Canada will see with certainty.

On motion of Mr. Carvell, the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Hon. Robert Rogers, the House adjourned at 9.55 p.m.

Tuesday, January 25, 1916.

The House met at Three o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

REPORTS.

Report of the Department of Labour for the year ended March 31, 1915.—Hon. T. W. Crothers.

Report of the Registrar of Boards of Conciliation and Investigation, of proceedings under the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act, 1907, for the year ended March 31, 1915.

MUNITIONS CONTRACTS.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. F. B. CARVELL (Carleton, N.B.): I desire to ask the acting leader of the Government (Sir Thomas White) if the Government is prepared to lay on the table a statement of the contracts for shells in Canada, with names, dates, amounts, and places, as promised by the Minister of Marine (Mr. Hazen), yesterday afternoon.

Sir THOMAS WHITE (Minister of Finance): May I ask my hon. friend to renew his question when the Minister of Marine is in his place?

Mr. CARVELL: I expect to discuss some of these matters this afternoon, and it would be convenient to have the information now.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Possibly the Minister of Marine is attending to this matter, which was presented for his consideration yesterday.

Mr. CARVELL: Then, before the Orders of the Day are called, I call the attention of the Government to an article in the Ottawa Free Press of yesterday, headed, "Ask Lloyd George about Inquiry Over Shells." This article goes on to say:

> It has been stated that when Mr. D. A. Thomas came to Canada to represent Hon. Lloyd George in putting the munition basis on a new footing, several members of the Canadian Government suggested to him that there should be a public investigation of the manner in which munitions contracts had been let; they wished that this should be done to satisfy the criticism which was heard in Toronto and Montreal.
>
> Mr. Thomas stated that when he left England he had been directed by Mr. Lloyd George to do nothing to stir up trouble in Canada, or to give publicity to any points of friction. Therefore, he declined the suggestions which were made to him.
>
> The Government in communicating with Mr. Lloyd George expects to receive an intimation from him that investigation at this time is not desired, and to settle in this way the agitation in Parliament.

I desire to ask the Government if there is any truth in the statement in the latter part of that article, and if any representations along that line have been received of recent date by the Government.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I am sorry to be obliged to ask my hon. friend to renew this question when the Prime Minister is in his place. The matter referred to is not in any way within my knowledge.

RECRUITING—THE COLOUR LINE

Hon. WILLIAM PUGSLEY: May I ask the attention of the Minister of Militia, or, in his absence, of the acting minister, to a somewhat urgent matter. I have a letter from a coloured citizen of St. John, stating that some twenty young coloured men were anxious to enlist and that they were sent to Sussex, and thence back to St. John. While at one time they were told that their services might be required, they have not yet had an opportunity to enlist, as they are anxious to. My purpose in rising is to ask if there is any colour line drawn for service overseas. It is a matter of great importance that any young men in Canada who are anxious to serve the Empire in these days should not be prevented from so doing because of their colour. I ask the leader of the Government what is the policy of the Government in this respect; and will he kindly have the matter looked into? I shall be glad to give him any information in my possession, and to show him the letter which I received from a very respectable citizen of St. John who speaks positively as to the facts I have mentioned.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I shall be very glad to bring to the attention of the Minister of Militia the statements my hon. friend has made. Personally I have no knowledge of the facts mentioned by the hon. gentleman.

THE GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH.

ADDRESS IN REPLY.

Consideration of the motion of Mr. Alfred Thompson for an address to His Royal Highness the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, resumed from Monday, January 24.

Mr. F. B. CARVELL (Carleton, N.B.): Mr. Speaker, I hope you will allow me to join with many other gentlemen who have spoken in congratulating you on the distinguished position which you occupy. I do not need to express the hope, for I have the knowledge, that during the time you occupy this position the affairs of this House will be presided over with dignity and ability.

We meet this session under conditions very different from those which have characterized any other session of the Canadian Parliament. We are here when the Empire of which we form no inconsiderable part is not only in a world war, but in a war which practically means a life and death struggle; a struggle the outcome of which will decide whether civilization shall rule the world, or whether barbarism shall be its guiding influence for the next century, and perhaps longer. When we attempt to discuss public matters under such tragic conditions, our feelings and thoughts cannot but be greatly different from those which have animated us in former times. If, in the observations I shall make to the House to-day I shall feel compelled to make some plain statements, I wish it distinctly understood that every statement I make is one which in my judgment it is necessary to make in order to bring the peoeple of this country, and the Government as well, to a better realization of the terrible conditions which exist at the present time.

When the great war was declared in August, 1914, the Parliament of Canada was called, and in a four-day session we voted $50,000,000 to help to defray Canada's war expenses for the remainder of the fiscal year. That money was voted without a dissenting voice, without argument, without discussion. We said to the Government at that time: take this $50,000,000 and use it in the conduct of the war. We leave the matter entirely in your hands; all we ask is that you use it honestly and properly. When the next session of Parliament was called, in January, 1915, the Government asked for an appropriation of $100,000,000, which was voted just as readily and just as gladly as was the $50,000,000 in the preceding year. I assume that the Minister of Finance will, in a few days, ask Parliament for an enormous sum of money —I do not know how much, but in all probability it will not be less than a quarter of a billion dollars. I should not be surprised if the amount to be asked in order to carry on the warlike operations of this country during the next twelve months should run up to $400,000,000 or $500,000,000. In view of this enormous outlay I do not think that any man in this House ought to be called disloyal, or ought to be charged with exciting party animosity, or with conducting himself in an improper manner if he discusses financial matters, and asks the Government to give an account of their stewardship in respect of the $150,000,000 that we have already voted, and of the three, four, or five hundred million dollars, which, in all probability, we shall vote during the present session.

I am anxious to hear what my hon. friend the Minister of Finance will say with regard to the financial situation of the country. I am willing to confess, Mr. Speaker, that I ake a very pessimistic view of this matter. In the month of August, 1914, our public debt was something around $350,000,000. According to the latest announcement, our public debt to-day is something over $500,000,000, and, in view of the enormous current expense, I believe that by the close of the present fiscal year, on March 31 next, the public debt will be nearer $600,000,000 than 500,000,000. In any case, it will be somewhere between these two figures. If my belief as to what may take place in the next fiscal year is well founded, then, at the end of March, 1917, this little country—little in point of population—will be saddled with a debt of about $1,000,000,000. This is such an enormous sum of money that possibly no person in the country can realize its extent. I imagine that the Finance Minister, who gives a great deal of attention to these things, has tried to picture in his mind what a billion dollars means. I confess that it is almost beyond my comprehension. But, Mr. Speaker, I do know what the interest on that $1,000,000,000 will be. To-day we are paying 5½ per cent for our money; probably by the end of the next fiscal year our interest rate will be 5¾ or 6 per cent. While it is true that, in respect of a part of our debt, the interest is at a low rate, I think I am safe in saying that it will average 5 per cent, which will mean an annual interest charge of $50,000,000.

In addition to that, we have an obligation—an obligation which must be met—to care for the maimed and wounded soldiers, and for the wives and families of those who have laid down their lives on the battlefields of France, and Flanders, and other parts of Europe. This is a duty which, no matter who may be Finance Minister, no matter which party may be in power, must be carried out bravely and manfully. I wish to congratulate the Minister of Marine and Fisheries for the frank manner in which he dealt with the subject of pensions yesterday afternoon. Supposing we should have half a million men, which is very doubtful, but suppose we have even 400,000 men in the army at the close of the war, I do not believe that we can possibly get along with a pension list of less than $30,000,000 a year, and it is more likely to run up to $40,000,000 or $50,000,000. In order to provide for interest and pensions, you will have to take every dollar of the unappropriated revenue, and you will have to look elsewhere for the money to carry on the business affairs of the country. Or, to put it in another way, in order to carry on the affairs of the country you will have to raise pretty nearly $100,000,000 in addition to the revenue we are raising at the present time. As I have said, I am willing to admit that I am somewhat pessimistic in regard to these financial matters. I realize that this is a new country; I realize that there are tremendous possibilities in our natural resources, and that we have a bright and active population; I realize that there may be some immigration at the close of the war—although I am not as optimistic on the subject of immigration as some hon. gentlemen opposite, and as some editors throughout Canada who are writing on this subject—and in view of this serious prospect of affairs, have we not a right to discuss financial matters in connection with the conduct of the war? Have we not a right to call the Government to strictest account, not only for every dollar they are handling as trustees for the British people, but also for every dollar they are handling as administrators for the Canadian people? The nature of the attacks made upon the hon. member for the city of St. John (Mr. Pugsley), because of his having brought some of these matters to the attention of Parliament, would seem to indicate that there is something behind the indignation of hon. gentlemen opposite, and that there must be fear as well as indignation on their part. Otherwise, I think we would not find the Solicitor General splitting hairs, bringing up the narrowest possible points of police court law, and telling that because the Liberals in 1902 did not give an investigation into a few tons of hay, the present Government are not going to grant an investigation into the expenditure of $400,000,000 or $500,000,000. I do not believe that the people of this country will stand for that. I do not believe that gentlemen on this side, including the hon. member for St. John city, will be censured by the people of Canada for bringing these matters to the attention of Parliament, and, through this medium, to the attention of the whole people.

A good deal has been said about shells, shell boxes, and all sorts of military contracts. We have heard two defences of the action of the Government, one by the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries, and the other by the Solicitor General. Perhaps you will pardon me, Sir, if I deal with these in a very cursory manner, and in opposite order to that in which they were given to the House. My hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries always talks very glibly. His sentences are well rounded; he usually reads his speeches, and, therefore, he makes no mistake in diction. I must say that he did not depart from his usual custom yesterday afternoon. I have no doubt that a copy of that speech was sent down to his personal newspaper in the city of St. John, and if we could see that newspaper to-day we would see a front page of vermilion with a twelve-inch square photograph of my hon. friend in the centre. Of course, he made exactly the same speech that he always makes every time he speaks in this House. He berates the hon. member for St. John city, and tells the people of St. John what wonderful things he is doing for them. For the next month the Standard newspaper will not cease telling what the hon. gentleman told them yesterday; the whole burden of their story will be what the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries is doing for the port of St. John. I congratulate the hon. gentleman on a number of things. I congratulate him that in his discussion of the remarks of the hon. member for St. John he did not get as far as the mud of Courtenay bay. We fully expected that he would land there, but, fortunately, he kept out of it. Neither did he get as far as the tumble-down wharves on the other side of the harbour; possibly he may reach them before the session closes. Neither did he tell the reason why the only fighting ship Canada has on the Atlantic coast has been dismantled; a most remarkable thing which was mentioned by the hon. member for Pictou last evening. That announcement must have horrified this House and the country to a greater degree than any other announcement made public in Canada for the last twelve months. What object could there be in dismantling the Niobe? Indeed I do not have to ask. We know the object of dismantling her before the war. The assertion was that the Niobe was no good; that she was only a tinpot vessel, that she was a death trap for Canadian sailors, and they dismantled her in pursuance of their pre-election contract with Bourassa and the Nationalists in Quebec. They kept the Niobe dismantled until the war commenced, and, then four or five weeks after, they sent the Niobe to sea, when she should have been at sea the day before the declaration of war. We who live on the Atlantic coast know that if she had been at sea and in her proper place, more prizes would have been taken from the Germans in the first forty-eight hours of the war than would have paid for a dozen Niobes. But why in the world she has again been dismantled at this late stage, is something I cannot understand. My hon. friends are not in a position to fall back on their argument of four or five years ago, that it was only a tinpot vessel and a death trap, because if you read the history of this war you will find that the first naval engagement off the bight of Heligoland was conducted by Admiral Beatty in a ship the exact counterpart or sister ship of the Niobe. I am not going into the discussion of naval affairs here; I do not think this is the place. But I want to tell my hon. friends opposite that so far as I am concerned—and I am speaking now for my party—we will welcome a full discussion of naval affairs at any time hon. gentlemen opposite want to bring it on, either in this House, in the press, or anywhere else in Canada. If ever the Liberal party or any party was justified in its attitude by the course of events, the Liberal party has been justified in the attitude it maintained on the navy in the years 1909 to 1911. The policy of that party was the building of ships of war, the manning of ships of war, the paying for them; having a navy in the biggest sense of the word, instead of being mere hangers on of the Mother Country.

The remarkable part of the speech of the Minister of Marine, as I understand it, was a defence, or a reply, to the gentle intimation made by the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) that political considerations entered into the contracts for the manufacture of shells in Canada. Hon. gentlemen opposite say that these shells were being purchased by an entirely independent Imperial Commission for the Imperial Government. My hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries called attention to what has taken place in our own province. I do not purpose following him through all that tortuous course, but I shall refer to one or two matters, and, perhaps, the House will then see that everything is not as well as the Minister of Marine would try to make us believe. My hon. friend referred to the fact that the McAvity's got a contract. So they did—and I am not going to discuss the details of it, and I think the Minister of Marine knows why I am not. I can tell the House that the Minister of Marine knows how and why the Messrs. McAvity got a contract. If he wished to enlighten the House yesterday he had every opportunity in the world to do so.

I come next to the other firm to which he referred, namely, the Phœnix Foundry Company of St. John. The Minister of Marine told a very nice, plausible story, a story which was glossed over very nicely, a story which, if left there, might sound all right, and would give the impression that there was no middleman in the transaction. No man in Canada knows as well as the Minister of Marine the true story, no man knows as well as he who were the middlemen, no man knows as well as he how much money was paid for the contract. He had to admit yesterday that a contract was given to the York and Cornwall Cotton Company for 25,000 shrapnel shells. They have no facilities for manufacturing shells; they are running a cotton mill; they have no turning lathes, they have not room and space for the work, they have not operators, they have not machines.

Mr. STANFIELD: Does not my hon. friend know that all cotton or woollen mills of any size have lathes?

Mr. CARVELL: Oh, my hon. friend runs a woollen mill and has a little machine shop, ten by ten, with a little lathe and possibly a twist drill. But neither he nor any other man with his little lathe and his twist drill could make shells; he knows that and he knows that the York and Cornwall Company could not make shells and never intended to do so. The manager of that company—and I am not charging the directors of the company with any wrong-doing, I take the explanation that the minister gives—but the manager, through political influence—and you would not have to go very far to see where the influence came from if you knew who Mr. Cudlip and his friends are in St. John—Mr. Cudlip got a contract for 25,000 shrapnel shells and immediately went to James Flemming & Son, the Phoenix Foundry Co.—and just here I want to endorse every word stated by my hon. friend when he said that there is no better manufacturing concern in Canada for its size. They are an old-established firm, established, I believe, by the grandfathers of the present owners, they do a lot of marine work, as must be the case in a port like St. John, and they are men who know what they are doing. Mr. Cudlip promptly went to these men and handed over the contract. But it was not handed over as quietly as the Minister gave us to understand yesterday. The Flemming people had to pay a commission of 10 per cent, and there is no man in Canada who knows better than the Minister of Marine that Flemmings have already paid on that contract a commission of nearly $5,000 to the York and Cornwall Cotton Co. But the Minister of Marine did not mention that yesterday when he was explaining this thing away, and showing that there is no politics in the shell business in New Brunswick. My hon. friend did not tell something else that he knows, and that is that when Mr. Thomas, the representative of Mr. Lloyd George, came to Canada to investigate, he went to St. John; he went into the foundry of Flemming Bros., and said it was the finest equipped machine shop he had found in Canada. He found them doing business under better conditions than any other factory in Canada, at least so he stated. But when he found the stamp "Y & C" on these shells he began to ask questions, and then the whole story was unravelled. It is said that a shell with "Y & C" on it was on exhibition in the Union club, St. John, and it is also said that Mr. Thomas first saw the letters "Y & C" on a shell at that club. Be that as it may, he found them. Finally the story was unravelled, and he found that instead of the Flemmings working directly under the Shell Committee, they were manufacturing on a contract on which they were paying a commission of 10 per cent to a Conservative middleman. He told the Flemmings that there was no necessity for men in Canada who had an institution such as they had, paying a commission to anybody, that so long as shells were manufactured in Canada, they would have all the contracts they wanted, and that they would be kept going by the Imperial Government without even having occasion to say thank you or anything else to the Shell Committee or to the Conservative party of Canada. My hon. friend did not tell you that. I told him yesterday that I would supplement the information which he gave, and I will tell you more. If he has any doubt about the accuracy of what I have said, let the Government give us a committee of Parliament, and we will prove it. Well, Sir, I do not want to follow the vagaries of my hon. friend any further; anyhow, that is all the defence he made of the conduct of the Government.

I come next to the defence put up by hon. the Solicitor General (Mr. Meighen). If there is a man in Canada who can take up a bad case, argue from one corner to another, draw a line here, and put in a word there, and draw nice distinctions, it is the Solicitor General. I give him that credit; I give him the credit of being the lawyer par excellence in Canada who is able to perform that operation. Out of his ingenuity my hon. friend did his utmost to defend the Government in regard to the letting of those shell contracts. In order to be perfectly fair I desire to state what I understood were the two main propositions in his speech. The first was, that the Government of Canada had nothing whatever to do with the conduct of the affairs of the Shell Committee; that that committee was appointed entirely by the Imperial Government, or rather that it was appointed by the Canadian Government and handed over to the Imperial Government, that it is responsible only to the Imperial Government, and that it has nothing whatever to do with the Canadian Government. For fear that I might be charged with not stating the case fairly and frankly, I am going to read a few extracts from the speech of my hon. friend, delivered in this House on the 20th inst. You will find practically his whole statement of the case on page 131 of Hansard:

> In the present case the Shell Committee, from its inception, has been answerable for its work to and has conducted its work under the guidance, jurisdiction, and superintendence of the Imperial Government. There is that distinction. . . . The committee, however constituted, and whatever its personnel, was, from the time of its institution, a committee acting under the authority of the Imperial Government.

Now, Sir, I do not know that any words of mine could make the case any plainer. I think I have rendered fairly the statement made by my hon. friend the Solicitor General, but in case I have not given it fully I will read a quotation which will be found on page 125:

> We divorced the Shell Committee from the Canadian Government in the matter of responsibility; we made them a committee of the Imperial authority. I am not here to say whether they did wrong throughout or whether they did right throughout; they are answerable to the Imperial authorities for what they did. The Imperial authorities have so recognized; they have acted upon it; they have conducted investigations; they have made reports; they have exercised their sovereignty over that committee; they have given their verdict.

Yes, Mr. Speaker, they gave their verdict; there is no doubt about that. This committee was organized, as I understand, about the month of October, 1914, and immediately commenced to do business. I cheerfully admit that the manufacture of shells was an entirely new industry in Canada, but after all it is not a very serious proposition. There was not only one firm in Canada, but dozens, aye, hundreds, who were in a position at that time to manufacture shells, and who only needed the incentive of the business being given to them.

As to whether this committee is responsible to the Imperial Government or to this Government, it seems to me that that matter has been thoroughly settled by the statements made by my hon. friend from Richmond (Mr. Kyte), who cited the Prime Minister himself as having, from his place in this House, on the day of the prorogation of last session, made the statement that the committee was composed of eight gentlemen, the last four of whom represented the Minister of Militia and Defence of Canada. My right hon. friend admitted more than that; he had asked for and had received a report from this committee as to what they had done, and altogether it was a wonderful panegyric of the virtues of the Minister of Militia and Defence. If you want any more evidence that this committee is entirely amenable to the Government of Canada, you had it yesterday afternoon. I would like to know what right had the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, in order to bolster up a weak case, to bring here extracts from the records of that committee if that committee has nothing to do with the Government of Canada. The very fact that he produced those records, and that without hesitation he agreed to bring down a report and lay it on the table of this House as to the work of that committee, as to the amounts paid, the dates, and so forth, is the best evidence that in his heart of hearts he recognizes that this is a Canadian committee, and not an Imperial committee. It is only an Imperial committee in name. It is a Canadian committee, created by the Canadian Government, and under the control of the Canadian Government for all practical purposes. I go further and say that it is a political committee of the Conservative party of Canada, created in order to work out what they think best for the interests of the Conservative party of this country. If any man has any doubt about that, I think I can remove his doubt. I know that the reading of documents in the House is not a pleasant occupation, but in order to make this record clear, I must trespass in this respect to some little extent. They say that the Canadian Government had nothing whatever to do with those contracts. They say that those contracts were given out by the Shell Committee, when, how, and to whom seemed best to them, without interference and without hindrance on the part of the Government. We on this side have not the advantage of having the records of the Shell Committee in our hands; but we have a lot of data, and we have some degree of common sense. We know how ordinary mortals act under ordinary conditions, and, placing the facts together, I do not think there is any man in Canada, no matter what his politics may be, who will not come to the conclusion in his heart of hearts that this committee is nothing more nor less than a commission created by this Government, manipulated by this Government, and worked by this Government for the benefit of this Government and its political supporters in Canada.

Mr. BURNHAM: This is a truce.

Mr. CARVELL: There is no truce so far as boodling in Canada is concerned. We hear nice platitudes about the abilities of this Shell Committee; and just here, before I go into discussion of another branch of the subject, I want to refer to the old Shell Committee. I am very sorry to be compelled to do it, but there comes a time in the public life of every man, of every party, and of every nation, when men are compelled to do things for the public good that may not be to them a pleasant task. The chief exponent of the virtues of the old Shell Committee in Canada, outside of the Minister of Militia and Defence himself, is a publication in the city of Ottawa called the Ottawa Free Press, a paper which, on the day that my hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Pugsley) made some remarks, came out with an article severely castigating the hon. gentleman for having referred to the matter at all, telling him that he was all wrong, that everything was well with the old Shell Committee, and that it was unpatriotic on his part or on the part of any one else to say one word against it. That editorial has been hawked around from Ottawa to every Conservative newspaper in Canada, since that date. No, I will not say that much; I am happy to say there are a few notable exceptions. There is one notable exception in Montreal, and another notable exception in Ontario, but all of the smaller fry, all of the papers outside of the big cities, outside at least of Montreal and Toronto, have reproduced this article as conclusive on the subject, as the final word, as the absolute ablution of the old Shell Committee.

An hon. MEMBER: Absolution.

Mr. CARVELL: Yes, absolution.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Ablution.

Mr. CARVELL: Ablution might do as well, but absolution is the word I want to use. This paper is reported as being the great Liberal journal of Ottawa; the great journal of the Liberal party of Canada.

Let me tell you, Mr. Speaker, that, so far as I am concerned, I do not allow the Ottawa Free Press to speak for me. I do not believe there is a man sitting around me in this House of Commons who is willing to allow the Free Press to speak for him. It is not the organ of the Liberal party of Canada, it is not the organ of the Liberal party in the city of Ottawa, it is not a Liberal paper, it is not owned by Liberals, it is not controlled by Liberals, and it is in no sense whatever a Liberal journal. When I say this, I am saying nothing against the two estimable gentlemen who attend to the managing of that paper at the present time. These two gentlemen may have voted Liberal at some time, or they may not have. I care not how they may have voted. They are just as much entitled to their opinions on the virtues or vices of the old Shell Committee as I am, and in so far as they are voicing their own sentiments I have no fault to find. I am finding fault, not so much with the management of the Ottawa Free Press as with the Conservative party which has taken the words it has printed and heralded them broadcast over the country, as a castigation of my hon. friend from St. John by the principal exponent of Liberalism in this portion of Canada. Less than 33 per cent of the stock of that company is owned or controlled by the men who are running it, and the remaining stock of the company is owned and controlled by a Conservative lawyer in the city of Toronto, acting as a trustee for certain newspaper interests in the city of Ottawa, one of whom is very close to my right hon. friend the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden). That company cannot pass a by-law without the consent of the Conservative trustee; that company cannot sign the minutes of a meeting without the consent in writing of that Conservative trustee and under no possible conditions can the ownership of this paper pass out of the hands of that Conservative trustee until some time in the year 1923. With these statements of fact before us, unpleasant as the duty has been to me, I hope we will hear no more in this connection, or see no more quotations in the Conservative newspapers from the Ottawa Free Press as the great organ of the Liberal party in this portion of Canada.

As soon as this Shell Committee got to work it was only natural that men should commence to look for contracts. I want to ask this question: Why should not manufacturing firms get contracts? I do not have to argue it, when I ask you to agree with me in the statement that there never was a time in the history of the British Empire when we were as near going over the precipice as we were in the months of April, May, and June of 1915. There never was a time when the fate of this Empire trembled in the balance as it did during these three months. I have talked with returned militia officers, who have told me that the way in which our troops were sent into battle was almost legalized murder, because we did not have the munitions to back them up. It was a necessity, they had to do it, they had to go into battle under most unequal conditions, and they did it bravely and nobly. In one battle something like 12,000 or 15,000 brave Canadians laid down their lives in order to save this Empire, and they did it with the knowledge that there was not a sufficient supply of munitions behind them to make good any advantage they might gain by their heroism. Under these circumstances it was the duty of this Government; it was the duty of every government in the British Empire, to make shells, munitions, and everything that possibly could conduce to the winning of this war. It was their duty to manufacture, or buy, everything that was required, and to look after the smallest detail which would make the British Army more efficient. In so far as they gave contracts to big concerns which were able to turn the work out in a hurry I have no criticism to offer.

There have been a lot of taunts flung across the floor of the House at my hon. friend from South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) because he happens to be an officer of a company called the Canada Foundry and Forgings Company. The Canada Foundry and Forgings Company is one of the oldest institutions in Canada. It has been making this very class of material for years, and when the war broke out, outside of the Nova Scotia Steel Company, there was no big company but the Canada Foundry and Forgings Company which was able to do the work for which they had received an order. Who is going to blame them for receiving an order, and who is going to blame the Government for giving it to them? It was not a question of getting money; it was a question of getting shells, and of going to the men who could supply the material from which shells could be made. I would not care if at that time the leading industrial company in Canada which was in a position to make shells had been controlled by the Prime Minister himself; there would have been no criticism from me if they had given him an order. But, what we do object to, the thing with which we do quarrel is the fact that there were dozens and dozens of big manufacturing establishments who wanted to do work for the Empire, who went to the Shell Committee and demonstrated that they were in a position to do the work more expeditiously than anybody else, and who, because they did not have political influence, were unable to get an order, while millions of dollars' worth of work was given out to little mushroom companies, organized, operated and controlled by Conservative politicians and Conservative voters all over Canada.

You may ask me: what proof have you of this? Well, Sir, I usually try to produce the proof for any statement I make, and the first proof I am going to produce is something that took place in the little town of Woodstock, N.B. There is a firm of foundrymen and machinists in my town called the Dunbar Engine and Foundry Company. I am not putting them forward as the biggest manufacturers in the country, but it is a firm composed of Scottish mechanics, men who can build, and who, in the last twenty years, have built anything at all which can be built out of iron and steel; men who have built logging engines which are nearly as large, and more intricate, than an ordinary railway locomotive; men who have been in the business for years and years, men who are backed financially, to the knowledge of the hon. the Minister of Marine (Mr. Hazen), by the biggest manufacturers in the province of New Brunswick, a firm of lumbermen who annually cut, manufacture and sell more than 100,000,000 feet of ordinary lumber, and who are worth an enormous amount of money. They wrote to the Shell Committee and asked for a contract. I shall read this, not because I am putting them forward as men in the class of the Dominion Iron and Steel Company, or the Canada Foundry and Forgings Company, but to show you the system that was adopted by the Shell Committee in dealing with the people who wanted to work for the Empire. The first letter is dated February 25, 1915, and it reads:

February 27, 1915.

The Dunbar Engine and Foundry Co.,
Woodstock, N.B.

Dear Sirs,—Yours of the 22nd forwarded to us by the Master General of Ordnance, Ottawa, regarding possibility of getting contract for machining shrapnel shells, and would advise that we have already allotted to the various companies in Canada all the shells which we have contracts for from the British War Office, and regret to advise that we will not be letting further orders for at least three months.

Yours very truly,
Shell Committee,
A. Bertram, chairman.

Mark the date, Feb. 27, 1915. I now come to a memorandum prepared by one of the biggest manufacturers in Western Canada. I am not going to give his name at the present time, but when the committee is appointed he will appear here to substantiate the facts in this memoranda, which I now hold in my hand. This man —and I can tell my hon. friends from Western Ontario that he is big enough and such an honourable man, that when he makes his statement here they will not be able to gainsay what he says—this man started a correspondence wanting to get business away back on Feb. 4, 1915, but as I started this series of correspondence from the 27th of February I will come now to the letter dated March 12, 1915, from Colonel Bertram to him, advising that:

All orders for shrapnel shells have already been placed and that the order referred to as being placed with Wm. Kennedy & Sons, Ltd., Owen Sound, is for steel casting only for 4·5.

Then on May 8 this man wrote a letter to the Shell Committee inquiring:

Have you any additional orders to place for shells now, and will you please favour with specifications on sizes required, etc.?

That was answered by Colonel Bertram on May 13:

Would state for the present there is no further order to allot, and we have sufficient factories now equipped to carry on the orders we have on hand.

Mark you, that letter was written on the 13th day of May, 1915. The next is a letter to the committee dated May 14, and inquiring whether they had any additional orders to place for shells, and asking that they kindly favour with specifications as to size and detail. In this letter they were not asking for orders, but merely for specifications in order that they might be ready to tender when orders were available. That is followed up by a letter dated June 4 stating the urgent need of Great Britain for munitions as indicated by recent appeals of Lloyd George, and that Great Britain would doubtless call for still more shells from Canada. The letter concludes:

Will you please keep our request in mind, and as soon as you have further orders to allot favour us with advance specifications, etc.?

That was answered on June 7, by H. A. Bertram, assistant:

Expect that the British War Office will be placing additional shell orders in the future, but of course we are not conversant with the size of the shell which they will order.

That is followed by a letter from the Shell Committee to the Dunbar Engine and Foundry Company, my own constituents, as follows:

June 1, 1915.

The Dunbar Engine and Foundry Company,
Woodstock, N.B.

Gentlemen,—Acknowledging yours of the 28th ult., as stated in our favour to you on the 27th of February, all orders for shells have been allotted. Should we receive additional orders from the War Office, we will be pleased to consider your application further.

Yours very truly,
Shell Committee,
H. A. Bertram, asst. to chairman.

The next is a letter dated July 8, as follows:

July 8, 1915.

Messrs. Dunbar, Engine and Foundry Co.,
Woodstock, N.B.

Dears Sirs,—We beg to acknowledge receipt of yours of the 30th ult., inquiring if there are any prospects for shell contracts at present, but regret to advise that the situation at present is that we have a much larger machining capacity than our contracts call for and cannot offer any encouragement whatever.

Yours very truly,
Shell Committee,
H. A. Bertram, asst. to chairman.

You will observe, Mr. Speaker, that the correspondence I have read began on the 27th of February and continued with the different firms to the 8th day of July, 1915.

4 p.m. Let me now show you some of the things which this non-partisan Imperial Shell Committee did between the 27th of February and the 8th day of July, 1915. I would not mind them deceiving—I cannot use a milder term than that—if it were necessary, and if they would admit that they were placing orders with big manufacturers; but when they deliberately play the game of politics, when their friends all over Canada were organizing mushroom companies by the score, without plant, without location, without material, and many of them without money, and were receiving hundreds of thousands of dollars worth of orders; surely when I have proved that, I have gone a long way towards proving my assertion that this was a political game.

I will now give some evidence on that point. You will remember, Sir, that the correspondence I have read began on the 27th day of February, 1915. I have here a list of companies organized after that date and before June 8, and I will give you in as concise manner as possible their history, their capital, and the amount of orders they received.

The first is the Metal Drawing Company, Ltd., of St. Catharines, Ont., a mushroom company incorporated under the Ontario laws, March 5, 1915, with an authorized capital of $50,000. They took over the plant of the Reo Motor Car Company. The president of this mushroom company is Mr. J. D. Chaplin. Mr. Chaplin is the Conservative candidate in the county of Lincoln, and will contest that constituency in the next election, and this company of his, organized after the Shell Committee had said they had no contracts to give, and that their machinery plants were all established, received, I am informed, contracts amounting to four million dollars! You might say that there is some justification for that, as this mushroom company took over a motor car plant fitted up with lathes and other machinery. I have been in the plant and know something about it. It is a fairly good-sized factory where they assemble American motor cars. I now come to the smaller companies.

Mr. EDWARDS: When was the order given to the St. Catharines company?

Mr. CARVELL: I cannot imagine an order being given before the company was incorporated.

Mr. EDWARDS: When was it given?

Mr. CARVELL: I do not know, but if my hon. friend means to say that the Shell Committee gave orders to their political friends before a company was organized, and then sent their friends over Canada to organize a company, they were much worse than I thought they were, and they stand convicted out of my hon. friend's own mouth.

Mr. EDWARDS: I do not want to interrupt, but——

Mr. CARVELL: I prefer not to enter into a discussion now.

Mr. EDWARDS: We will have it later.

Mr. CARVELL: The next company is the Kerr & Goodwin Machine Company, Limited, another mushroom company incorporated under Dominion charter, April 28, 1915, with a capital stock of $30,000. The principal persons interested in this company are W. K. Kellett, D. O. Johnson, Dr. Marquis, and Mr. Brewster and others. All of these gentlemen are Conservatives except Dr. Marquis, and they were able to secure an order for at least $150,000.

The next company is the G. W. McFarlane Company, Limited, of Paris, Ontario. While this Mr. McFarlane was at one time in the employ of Penmans, Limited, and afterwards took contracts for the laying of sidewalks, it can be stated with accuracy that the G. W. McFarlane Company, Limited, is nothing more than a mushroom company, as they had never undertaken the manufacture of anything approaching shells until after the war started. Owing to political influence, Mr. McFarlane was able to secure an order of over $75,000 for shells, and he immediately proceeded to Paris, Ontario, and made arrangements to install a plant in an old town hall; where he is now manufacturing shells in a somewhat slow manner. They secured the order some time in April and commenced working some time in October. And yet they say there is no political influence in the giving of these contracts, and that there were no orders to give at that time.

Next we have the Cobourg Steel Company, Limited, with head office at Toronto, and works at Cobourg, a mushroom company, incorporated under Ontario laws, May 10, 1915; authorized capital $40,000; the provisional directors being the members of the law firm of Elliott and Hume of Toronto. This concern secured an order for something approximating $150,000.

Then we have the St. Lawrence Machinery Company, Montreal, Clarence F. Smith, president, a mushroom company, incorporated under the Dominion law, with a capital stock of $15,000, of which $5,000 is paid up. They were able to secure an order for shells to the amount of $125,000, which they are now manufacturing at some place in Montreal.

The next is the Spartan Machine Company of Montreal.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: What name?

Mr. CARVELL: The Spartan Machine Company—named no doubt after that wonderful people who never surrendered and never could be conquered. The president is R. G. Gilbride. This concern was incorporated May 21, 1915; authorized capital, $50,000, with $27,000 paid up. Mr. Gilbride was formerly connected with the Grand Trunk Pacific; and Mr. Robb, the vice-president is president of the Cannuck Supply Company of which the Spartan Machine Company is a subsidiary company.

The next is one that will surely interest my hon. friends opposite—Hepburn Brothers of Picton, Ontario, of which the hon. member for Prince Edward (Mr. Hepburn) is a member. The hon. gentleman told us the other day that he had some sort of a woodworking factory——

An hon. MEMBER: A planing mill.

Mr. CARVELL: Yes, a planing mill—at Picton, Ontario. I am not going to discuss this matter very much, because it is not pleasant to discuss the conduct of a fellow member. But one or two points I may call to your attention. This gentleman has a planing mill; he never had a machine shop in his life, for he tells us that he was compelled to get this contract worked out in Montreal. He received an order for 200,000 forgings, 4.5 shells at $2; the machining of 50,000, 4.5 shells at $6, or a total of $700,000. This was given to him on May 29 last. This was at a time when people were told there were no orders to give, and that all the machining plants were organized. Can a man believe that there is no politics in a thing like this? Is there a man on the other side of the House who can help hanging his head in shame when figures such as these are given to the people? I wish my hon. friend the Minister of Militia and Defence (Sir Sam Hughes) would lift the veil for one moment and tell us what he knows about the securing of this contract for $700,000 by a man who had not even a factory or a place in which to put a plant. Will any man say that there is no middleman in this case? I wish the hon. member for Prince Edward were here, for I would like to ask him a question. I am not here to make statements on this subject, but I would put a question to this House: is there a man in this House who believes that the hon. member for Prince Edward, and his company are able to manufacture 4.5 forgings? Why, there were only three or four companies in Canada that could do it when the war broke out. There were the Nova Scotia Steel Company and the Canada Foundry and Forgings Company; later there were the Dominion Iron and Steel Company, and the Steel Company of Canada, in Hamilton. I understand that there are one or two other firms in Ontario that are doing this work. I do not know whether Mr. Hepburn is making the forgings or not, but until he stands up and says he is I must reserve to myself the right to have very great doubts about it. It is my judgment that this is absolutely a case of the middleman making a profit out of the country, for, if Mr. Hepburn is not manufacturing the forgings himself, he is buying them from some other concern that is making them; and if he is doing that he is doing it at a profit. And, if he can buy them at less than $2, surely the Shell Committee can do the same. In the machining of these 50,000 shells he is like the other mushroom Conservative companies organized in Canada. I suppose he will worry them out, that he will get out a few shells at a time, and that ultimately he will get his $700,000. If ever there was a case that required close investigating it is this contract to Hepburn Brothers.

The next is another case which I wish the Minister of Militia were present to listen to, another one upon which I wish he would raise the veil for a moment to show what he had to do with the organization and the securing of a contract. This concern, F. W. Wilford & Company, Limited, Lindsay, organized May 31, 1915, and given an order for 50,000 shells at $4, a total of $200,000.

The next is a small one, the Alton Foundry Company, incorporated under Ontario laws, June 22, 1915; capital, $50,000; J. M. Dodds, president. This concern has a contract for $75,000.

The next is the St. Thomas Construction Company, of St. Thomas, Ontario,—we are here getting pretty close to another member of the Government. This is another mushroom company, incorporated in June, 1915. It was able to secure a contract for shells to the amount of at least $100,000. The members of the firm are all Conservatives except R. J. Strough, a German-American. I presume he is a Conservative too,—of course he is.

The next is the Eastern Machine Company, Armand Lalonde, president. This is a mushroom company organized October 26, 1915. This brings me beyond the date of the letters to which I referred, and I cite these cases only to show that even after the time covered by this correspondence the same condition existed as before. The authorized capital of this concern is $45,000, and it got a contract for $50,000.

Then we have the Holden-Morgan Company of Toronto, organized November 8, 1914; capital, $40,000. This concern got a contract for at least $325,000.

Besides these, I have the names of dozens of these mushroom companies. Without going into details, I will give the names of some of them, and hon. members can look them up for themselves. There is the Albion Machine Company of Stellarton, N.S., which was organized for the express purpose of manufacturing shells. I may have something to say about that later on. However, I might as well tell the facts of the case now, for in my judgment this is a most obnoxious case, almost the most disloyal case that has come under my observation in the course of the somewhat extensive investigation I have made of this matter from one end of Canada to the other. Here is a company organized, as I have stated, for the express purpose of securing a contract to manufacture shells. The president is W. McNeill; vice-president, Charles McNeill; secretary, Alexander R. Fraser. In the spring of 1915 they sent a consignment of shells to Quebec to be inspected. That consignment of 1,500 shells was condemned by the inspectors, a mark showing their condemnation was placed upon the shells, and they were afterwards returned to the makers. In the course of a month after that, the same shells, with the marks obliterated, were mixed up with another lot of shells and sent to Quebec. The obliteration was detected; they were rejected and again returned. I want to say here, to his honour, that one of the members of the Shell Committee wrote the committee informing them that he objected to the Government of Canada or the Shell Committee having anything more to do with a company whose operations in this respect were so unpatriotic and disloyal. They came to Ottawa and investigated the matter; the Prime Minister was consulted, and knows all about it. With this knowledge in their possession, hon. gentlemen opposite allowed these men to continue manufacturing shells, and they are doing it to-day. Is it necessary that I should argue further in order to point out the real object, the real purview, the real business of the Shell Committee?

Then there is the London Manufacturing and Machinery Company, to which a contract amounting to $200,000 was awarded; the Ingersoll Machine Company, $175,000; the Invincible Machine Company of Walkerville, Ontario, $160,000, the Zenith Machine Company, Montreal, $150,000, and so on. Before I leave this branch of the case, there is one contract which, I think, deserves more than a passing reference from any one who attempts to discuss this matter from a comprehensive standpoint. This is a matter which brings right to the door of the Government the question as to whether they want shells, or whether they want political support. I refer to the Transcona Shell Company, which has a large contract for manufacturing shells at the Transcona shops in Winnipeg.

Mr. BURNHAM: Will the hon. gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. CARVELL: Certainly.

Mr. BURNHAM: Does the hon. gentleman intend to move a vote of censure upon the Government for the conduct of the war so far? If not, of what avail is all this abuse now?

Mr. CARVELL: I do not wish to be discourteous to my hon. friend—

Mr. MARCIL: Do not hurt his feelings.

Mr. CARVELL—but I may say I am not the leader of the party, and do not move votes of censure unless I am instructed to do so. I have the greatest confidence however, that the people of Canada, when they get the opportunity, will carry into effect a vote of censure much more effectual than anything we can say in this House.

Mr. SCHAFFNER: They do not want it.

Mr. BURNHAM: This is for a general election, then.

[Mr. Carvell.]

Mr. TURRIFF: That is what you wanted last year.

Mr. CARVELL: I hope that my hon. friends on the other side will have a chance to discuss this matter. They have been very reticent of late; in fact, it looked at one time as if this debate would peter out for want of material. I am glad to observe that I am supplying them with something which makes them sit up and take notice, and I hope that there will now be more interest in the debate on the part of hon. gentlemen on the other side than there has been during the past ten days.

A good deal has been said and written in Canada with regard to this Transcona shell contract, and I do not intend to weary the House by repeating things which have already been placed on Hansard. But my hon. friend the Solicitor General in attempting—and very weakly, at that, to defend himself from the mild suggestions made by the hon. member for St. John city— because you could not call them charges at all—was compelled to read a report published in the Montreal Gazette of an address given by Mr. Thomas, representative of Lloyd George, before he left Canada. In doing this he was compelled, of course, to read the whole address. In his speech Mr. Thomas referred with the greatest patriotic feeling to the fact that the Government of Canada, through the Minister of Railways, had patriotically offered to place at the disposal of the Imperial Government the magnificent shops at Transcona, near St. Boniface. I never had the pleasure of going through these shops, but I have been near them and I have some knowledge of what they look like. From what I have seen and from what I have been told by others, I believe that no institution in Canada is so well equipped, so far as the ordinary requirements of a manufacturing establishment are concerned, as are these shops at Transcona. They have splendid power, splendid light, splendid facilities of all kinds, plenty of trackage rights, everything which could possibly be required in the manufacture of anything in the iron and steel line. The people of Canada felt a patriotic thrill when they heard that the Government of the day, getting away from their little grafting propositions, were going to manufacture these shells themselves; to manufacture them at cost, and to give the Empire the benefit of the money which we have expended in the Transcona shops. This would not necessarily interfere with the people who were manufacturing. There is no doubt in the world that the Government can manufacture shells cheaper than private persons or corporations can. I am told by men who know that the actual cost of machining an ordinary 18-lb. high explosive or shrapnel shell is not more than seventy-five or eighty cents. I do not say that any private individual ought to produce a shell at that figure, but that is the actual cost of machining; in fact, I am told that it comes very much below that. I realize that a private company have to get the interest on their plant and on the special machinery which they say they have to install. They have their overhead charges to meet; they have to take the chances of cessation of business. I do not think, therefore, that it would be reasonable to ask private corporations or persons to manufacture shells for eighty cents. I do know, however—I am not drawing on my imagination now—that when they get $1.75 they are making a handsome profit. And, Mr. Speaker, if they make a handsome profit at $1.75, what in heaven's name can they do with the money which they make at $5.70? Just think of it.

As I have said, we all felt a glow of patriotic enthusiasm when we heard that the Government were going to hand over these splendidly equipped shops to aid in the defence of the Empire, and to supply the weary Titan, who is furnishing the sinews of war on the other side of the water, with the munitions of war which are necessary for the very preservation of the life of this country, and which should be furnished at the lowest possible cost. There are different stories as to who made the offer. From the statement made by the Solicitor General a few days ago, it would look as if the offer had been made by the Minister of Railways and Canals. I am in a position to say that the request came from Mr. Thomas, and was sanctioned by the Minister of Railways and Canals. If my hon. friends will give us a committee of inquiry, we will give them all the facts of the case; we will prove them not only by the statements of those who conversed with Mr. Thomas, but also by written documents emanating from one of the Government offices in this city. That is only a matter of detail; the important point is that we all hoped that the course suggested by this offer would be carried out, and that we are all disappointed that it was not. It meant a good deal, Mr. Speaker, not only to Canada, but to the Empire as well; it meant a good deal to the businessmen of Canada. By adding a reasonable profit to the actual cost of making these shells, and by allowing for overhead charges, interest, depreciation on plant, increase of power at one place as compared with another, and all other incidentals of a manufacturing concern, it would have been possible to show what would be a fair and reasonable price at which these shells could be manufactured by private corporations.

Because, Sir, remember that this war, unhappily, is not over yet; and that there must be shells and more shells and after that still more shells manufactured before it can be brought to the successful issue that must result before the people of Canada or of any portion of the Empire can lay down their arms. And, Sir, you cannot win in this war, in Canada, in Great Britain, or any other part of the Empire, unless you have the very bone and sinew of the nation joined together by indissoluble bonds in order to carry it to a successful conclusion. You never can make a success, you never can have a proper economic organization for the manufacture of shells, so long as everything remains in the hands of the big corporations or the political friends of the Government. You have got to work right down to the very lowest strata of the people of this country, you have got to get the labouring man, who, after all, does things, the man without whom this war cannot be run, I do not care whether it be in Canada or in the United States. In order to present to you the view of organized labour in this country as to whether it was right or wrong to go into the manufacture of shells, I want to read a letter written by Mr. J. C. Watters, president of the Dominion Trades and Labour Congress, addressed to H. R. Ward, secretary of Canadian District No. 2, International Order of Machinists ,Winnipeg, Manitoba. I shall not read the whole letter, because in it Mr. Watters discusses the minister's view, and the question of whether the shells should be made by private corporations or by the Government. He goes into all of that, but he sums up the situation in two paragraphs which I wish to place on Hansard.

> The Dominion Government is bearing the expense of raising and equipping contingents for active service to aid primarily the Mother Country and incidentally all of her Dominions—Canada included. The Dominion Government could and should have just as materially aided the Mother Country, without cost to Canada, by converting all of its available machine shops into shell-making establishments and turning the shells over to the Imperial authorities at cost. Had this been done the stream of money flowing from the nation into the pockets of the profiteering leeches would have been saved; which at this particular time, means the saving of the very life blood of the nation. Had this been done it would have meant too, without any question, the placing in Canada of much larger orders for shells with the consequent employment of greater numbers of men.

Protest justified.

From the foregoing statements you can draw your own conclusions. In my opinion the attitude adopted by Mr. Hichens is entirely correct. The value attaching to the statements of the minister as to the amount required to install machinery in the Transcona shops—if any at all is further needed than that now installed—to provide employment for men by leasing the shops, rather than keeping them idle, to whether the Government had been asked to tender and to make shells and to whether the Government could undertake the work at all, I leave you to estimate. You are in a better position also than I am to judge the value of the information supplied me by the machanical engineer. It seems to me, however, under all the circumstances you are amply justified in registering a vigorous protest against being compelled to make profits by your labour for the private profiteers instead of being given an opportunity to contribute your aid to the nation in its time of stress by turning out the needed shells direct for the Empire at cost. In the one instance you are employed for the purpose of making profits direct to the contractors and only incidentally providing the needed ammunition for the Empire; in the other you would be employd to aid the Empire direct. And which is the most inspiring and calculated to bring out the best efforts of the men, to slave for the private gain of the hard and calloused profiteers or to work for the defence of the Empire? Make your protest and let the people judge.

J. C. Watters, president.

Ottawa, December 1, 1915.

In my judgment the situation could not be more fairly, more clearly and more patriotically placed before Canada than in that letter of Mr. Watters, in those two paragraphs. What is true of the shops at Transcona is true also of the Government shops at Quebec which are almost completed, true of the Government shops at Moncton, true of the Government shops at Sorel, true of the Government shops at Prescott. All of these are owned by the Government of Canada, and why should they not have put men to work in those factories? If they had done so, not only would they have turned out shells for the Mother Country, but they could have established the price to be paid to other people. They would have doubled the production of shells in Canada; and if there is anything in which Canada has been laggard and for which she has reason to hide her head in shame in connection with the conduct of this war, it is the huckstering, incompetent, inefficient manner in which this Government has handled the shell contracts which were entrusted to it by the British Government.

Not content with huckstering in contracts, the next thing we find is profiteering, not in shell contracts but in the shares of the companies which were going to make the shells. That has been going on all over Canada. I shall give a small illustration which will show you how the thing is worked. Down in Truro, N.S., there is a little foundry; I am sorry that the chief Conservative whip (Mr. Stanfield) is not here, because he could tell us a great deal about the foundry, its possibilities and capabilities better than I could; he could tell who were the actual owners, let alone the reputed owners, better than I could. However, the little foundry was there and had been doing nothing for some time past. A company was organized to take over this foundry. I have here the prospectus and shall read it as an illustration to show the House and the country how they have not only profiteered out of the contracts themselves, but profiteered out of the companies that are going to make the shells. The prospectus of this company reads:

Truro Steel Company, Limited, Truro, N.S.
Capital, $200,000, 20,000 shares at $10 each.
Bond issue authorized, $150,000.
2 year 7 per cent first mortgage bonds, due August 1, 1917.

There you have an illustration of how this thing is being worked in the Maritime Provinces. We knew down there that this thing had been hanging fire for months; we could not understand why this company did not start. But they would not commence until they made their money out of selling their stock. They have sold their stock, I presume, because they have gone to work. They have gone to work for the purpose, not of turning out shells for the Empire, but of making money, not only in the manufacture of shells but in hawking all over the United States, the stock of a mushroom company, organized after the war broke out, purely as a political organization, in the home province of the right hon. the Premier of Canada. And what is true in that instance you can find all over the Dominion of Canada.

An hon. MEMBER: The foundry is not working yet.

Mr. CARVELL: Oh, I beg pardon of the House. I was led to believe that it had actually got to work, but I am informed by my hon. friend that they have not yet commenced doing business.

That brings me to a consideration of the prices which were paid. In the correspondence regarding the operation of the Transcona shops, the principal objection alleged to have been raised by the Minister of Railways was that it would cost $150,000 or a little more to equip these shops for the manufacture of shells, and he said that in view of all the locomotives they had to buy, and of the small amount of money at his disposal—he was not like the Minister of Public Works, who disposes of it whether he has it or not—he could not see his way to spend the enormous sum of $150,000 to equip the Transcona shops. Therefore he was compelled to hand the shops over to a private corporation, with whom dame rumour connects the name of a member of this House. I want to say, Sir, that if these contracts are going to private corporations I have not very much objection to the gentleman to whom you know I refer getting a share; if they are to go to the Government's privateers, I do not see why he should not have a hand in the spoils as well as anybody else. But let us see what an awful thing the expenditure of $150,000 on a plant would have been. I want to specify a few of the contracts that were given out by this economical shell commission, and just here perhaps I should refer generally to the second part of the speech of my hon. friend the Solicitor General, because I desire to do him justice. On page 129 of Hansard he says:

Mr. TURRIFF: Where are the members of the Government now?

Mr. CARVELL: They will come back; I have something else for them. Before I am through some of them anyway will come back.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: Do not threaten.

Mr. CARVELL: I think the Minister of Agriculture will be back before I am through.

Mr. BURRELL: The Minister of Agriculture is here.

Mr. CARVELL: I beg my hon. friend's pardon. This is what my hon. friend the Solicitor General said:

> It may be that the prices were higher than the conditions warranted; I am not an expert, and I do not know. But I do think it is worth our while to consider this fact: that when the orders were given, they were given at a price which amounted to compensation—and which was intended to amount to compensation—to the contractors for the machinery which they had specially to install for the purpose of executing the orders. At that time there was a more or less general belief that the war was to be of short duration, and that not a great deal of this shell production could go on, and as a consequence the only method that appeared to be at the disposal of the committee —so, at all events, the chairman has stated— of securing contractors to do the work was to include in the contract price an amount sufficient to cover the cost of the installation of the necessary machinery. Therefore the price was fixed at $5.70.

That means for the 18-pounder high-explosive shell; I think it is 3 inches in diameter, and $5.15 for the 18-pounder shrapnel, and that is just for machining. That is, under these prices the Government furnishes blanks to the contractor, and the contractor machines these blanks; he bores them out in the inside wherever it is necessary, then he lathes them on the outside, turns out the completed shell, and puts in whatever is required in the way of high explosives, or receptacles for the same, and so on. For that he got $5.70 for one lot and $5.15 for the other. They say it was necessary to give this high price in order that the first order should furnish sufficient profits to provide for the plant. The remarkable thing to me is the enormous discrepancy in the orders given to provide profits with which to pay for the plant. The first order on my list was given to a small concern, M. Beatty & Sons, Welland, Ont., who got a 10,000 order at $5.70. Evidently, Mr. Speaker, they did pretty well; they must have paid very quickly for their plant, because they came back in a short time and got another 10,000 order at $4. Then they came back again, and got an order for 20,000 at $3. To-day they are manufacturing shells by the million at $1.75 each. Therefore, out of a little order of 10,000 they could make sufficient profits to pay for their plant.

Then, what have my hon. friends to say about the Dominion Bridge Company of Montreal? Their first order was for 200,000 shells at $5.70, and, taking $1.75, the present price, as a basis, that one order gave them a profit of $800,000. And yet the Solicitor-General, poor man, comes to this House, and by his specious hair-splitting tries to make out that it was necessary to give the Dominion Bridge Company, the finest organized mechanical institution in Canada, a profit of $800,000 to enable them to install a few lathes and machines for shrapnel shells. This concern came back a short time afterwards and got an order for 300,000 shells at $4; so that out of those two orders they made a profit of $1,400,000. And they tell us it is necessary to give prices like that in order to pay for a few lathes and drills.

Then, take the case of a little shop, the Chapman Engine Works. They managed to get along nicely with an order for 10,000 at $5.70, and then they came back and got another order for 25,000 at $4 each. They were able to provide for the machinery all right.

Then we come to another, the Massey-Harris Company, Toronto. They got an order for 100,000 shells at $5.70, so that they made a nice profit of $400,000 out of one transaction; and they say it is necessary to give them these prices in order to buy machinery.

Then, we have a little fellow, the smallest of them all, I think, the Mechanical Engine Company of Montreal. They got along with an order for 5,000 at $5.70, and repeated with a 10,000 order at $4. They got along all right, and they want more orders.

Then we have the Monufacturing and Contracting Company of Toronto, one of those mushroom companies, of which both the president and the secretary are Americans. They got an order for 125,000 at $5.70, and another order for 100,000 at $4; so that out of those two contracts they have made a profit of $600,000, based on the price of $1.75. But I want to tell you, Mr. Speaker, that they are even making money with the price at $1.75, so that you can probably add another $100,000 or $200,000 to their profits.

Then, we come to the Metal Drawing Company of St. Catharines, Ontario, owned by a Conservative candidate. They got an order for 100,000 at $5.70, and afterwards an order for 50,000 at $4. I am told it was a small concern at the start, but that it was not very long before it was among the big ones.

I have another one on the list, and I think the Minister of Militia would want to keep the veil drawn over it. I do not think he would want to lift the veil and tell you what he knows about the organization of and the securing of contracts for the company which is called the Universal Tool and Steel Company of Canada.

An hon. MEMBER: How do they spell steel?

Mr. CARVELL: On my sheet it is spelt s-t-e-e-l. It may interest my hon. friends to know that the Universal Tool and Steel Company has, I think, for its president, or at least for one of its directors, no less a personage than one Sir Donald Mann. I do not know what the connection may be between building railroads and manufacturing shells; there may be a necessary connection; but really I am somewhat at a loss to know it unless I allow my imagination to run riot, and I do not know where I might land; I am afraid I would land pretty close to the Minister of Militia. However, this company got an order for 100,000 shells at $5.70, and a later order for 20,000 at $4. In other words, they made between them about half a million dollars profit out of the manufacture of those few shells.

I am prepared to state more than that: in the month of May, 1915, a contract was given to a Montreal middleman for a very large quantity of shells, which he sublet to an American, and, mark you, within eight days thereafter, this Imperial Commission gave an order to one of their own members at 75 cents a shell more than the middleman took it at, and he took it for the purpose of handing it over to Americans to manufacture for him.

But we find that it was not necessary to give prices like these. We find lots of the smaller companies taking contracts at prices away down below that without any difficulty at all, begging and falling over each other in their eagerness to get them. The city of Ottawa simply swarmed with would-be manufacturers eager to get contracts, not at $5.70, but at any figure which they could possibly get, even down to $1.75.

Here we have the Alton Foundry Company, a little mushroom company, perfectly satisfied to take 75,000 at $3.25 apiece, buy and install their machinery, and go on with the business. They are doing business and making at least $1.50 a shell, and out of that order they will get $37,500 profit.

The Canadian-Ingersoll Rand Company of Sherbrooke were satisfied to take 10,000 at $3.25 for their first order, and 30,000 for their next order at $3. They were able to install their machinery and make a profit.

Darling Bros. of Montreal were willing to take 25,000 at $4, and in the month of December last they took a little order of 10,000 at $1.75.

Then, there is the Peterborough Machine and Lubricator Company, of Peterborough, Ont.

An hon. MEMBER: Oh.

Mr. CARVELL: Yes, Peterborough, Ont.

Mr. BURNHAM: What is the matter with that?

Mr. CARVELL: Nothing at all; it is all right. These fellows are real patriots, because they were satisfied with a little order of 25,000 at $3.25 per shell. They did not want any $5.70. I pay that tribute to my hon. friend's town; they did not have to have $5.70 to enable them to buy their machinery.

Then, we have the National Manufacturing Company, of Brockville. My hon. friend from South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) comes from there. Here are more of those patriots who took a 20,000 order at $3.25 and yet they were able to buy and install their machinery.

And so you might go on; there is no end to it. You could talk all night upon these inconsistencies. It seems that the only question was as to how much pull a man had, and then you could give the answer to the question how much of a contract he would get and what price he would receive.

Now, let me give some of the later contracts. I do not want to attack anybody. I am only placing facts on record, I will personally vouch for them, and if you will give me a committee I will prove every statement I have made this afternoon.

Mr. BURNHAM: When do you want it?

Mr. CARVELL: Right away, as soon as this debate is closed.

Mr. BURNHAM: Surely you would not consider that an interruption?

Mr. CARVELL: My hon. friend is always gentlemanly; I have no fault to find whatever. We find that a lot of these small fellows are willing to take orders away down as low as $1.75 a shell. Here are Darling Bros., who take an order for 10,000 at $1.75; the Universal Tool and Steel Company, of Toronto, 30,000 at $1.75.

Mr. LEMIEUX: The same shell?

Mr. CARVELL: The same shell exactly. I am talking about the 18-pounder high explosive shell, because the same condition of affairs exists in regard to the 18-pound shrapnel or the 4.5 high explosive, or even a shell of larger calibre. It would be an unending job if one attempted to discuss the merits of the different shells, so I am only taking the 18-pounder high explosive as a standard.

I find that also in the month of November the Northern Electric Company of Montreal got a contract for 16,000 shells at $1.75 and as far as I am able to find out this was their first order. These men could install machinery at $1.75 a shell, and they only got a 16,000 order. Yet the Solicitor General says that it was necessary to give a somewhat higher price in the beginning in order that the manufacturer might make a sufficient profit out of his first order with which to buy his machinery.

I find here something I cannot understand—there may be a good reason for it. In the month of December the Manitoba Shell Company of St. Boniface were given a 10,000 order at $2, and about the same time an order was given to the Saskatchewan Bridge and Iron Works of Moosejaw for 20,000 at $2. There may be some good reason why they paid 25 cents a shell more in Winnipeg and Moosejaw than in Eastern Canada. However, on 25,000 this difference only means $5,000, which is nothing for this concern.

Then, I find another most remarkable thing, which I presume will interest some of my Conservative friends from Quebec. I find that in the month of December there was a small contract for 20,000 high explosive shells—that is, the 60-pound high explosive—given to the E. Long Manufacturing Company of Orillia, Ont., at $4.50. I find that in the month of December, a few days later, another contract was given to the Canada Malleable Iron Company of Owen Sound, Ont., for 70,000, but the price had climbed to the extent of a quarter of a dollar; they got $4.75.

Then, I find that in this present month of January A. B. Morgan and Sons of Montreal, Mr. Morgan being a former Conservative candidate in Richelieu—

Mr. LEMIEUX: And the future candidate.

Mr. CARVELL: And the future Conservative candidate in that constituency—got an order for 25,000 at $5.

Mr. HAZEN: When?

Mr. CARVELL: In January.

Mr. HAZEN: That would be given by the new commission.

Mr. CARVELL: Sure; there is no difference. I am not here to make any attack on anybody but I have not seen very much difference in the general management of the thing. It is all politics.

Mr. W. H. BENNETT: If the hon. gentleman says that it is all politics, let me state that the E. Long Manufacturing Company of Orillia are not in any way concerned politically, because Mr. Long was in the last provincial elections a Liberal candidate, he is a strong Liberal, and I am very glad that he got the contract on his merits.

Mr. CARVELL: I thank my hon. friend for the information; but it would have been much more instructive to the House and to the country if he had told the House who was his associate and what he had to do in order to get the contract. There is also a most remarkable incident in this, that of these three contracts—and they are the only three that have been given lately—he got only $4.50, while the Canada Malleable Iron Company got $4.75, and the Conservative candidate got $5.

Mr. W. H. BENNETT: I will add that I personally wrote a letter to the Minister of Militia recommending the E. Long Manufacturing Company as a most reputable company. I did not accompany them to Ottawa, but they presented their claim and got their contract.

Mr. CARVELL: I wonder how far Mr. Long would have succeeded in getting the contract if the member for the constituency had not written to the Minister of Militia, not to the Shell Committee, another proof of politics in the beginning, politics in the middle, and politics in the end. Here we have the honourable member for East Simcoe standing up in this House and unblushingly confessing that in order to get a contract for a political opponent he went to the Minister of Militia, the man who has nothing at all to do with these contracts, and succeeded through his political influence in getting a contract for 25,000 shells. Is it not a pity that he did not press his claims a little harder and get the same price that other companies wholly Conservative were getting?

Mr. GRAHAM: He was long on shells and short on price.

[Mr. Carvell.]

Mr. CARVELL: I do not know the meaning of that term. Perhaps some of my hon. friends opposite do.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: He knows what short and long is.

Mr. BURNHAM: This is not a truce; it is an armistice.

Mr. CARVELL: I have some other evidence here, and it is only another of the straws which show which way the wind blows. In this particular case the Conservative candidate in the county of Pictou in the province of Nova Scotia felt himself somewhat aggrieved. He was unable to get as much as he wanted, and so he came to Ottawa to lodge his petition at the foot of the Throne. When here he made several charges. One was that no person could procure contracts unless they purchased the lathes through the company of which the chairman of the Shell Committee was a member. His second charge was that a sum of money had been paid by Flemings of St. John, in order to secure a contract for shells. I have referred to that already. He also said that certain contracts for the making of boxes had been re-let by the Nova Scotia Steel Company at a profit. He was very dissatisfied and had the matter investigated before the Shell Committee. The matter was also brought before the Premier. He knows all about it, but I do not know whether there have been any results or not. Whichever way you turn, Mr. Speaker, you will find politics mixed up with this business from beginning to end.

But the thing which in my judgment looks the worst, and which I think requires explaining to a greater extent than all the others put together, is the question of fuses. I have not very much inside information about these fuse contracts, except that I know what they are, and I am afraid we shall have some difficulty in getting inside information, because these contracts were placed in the United States and not in Canada. It is a most remarkable thing that with all these manufacturing concerns in Canada tumbling over one another in order to get contracts, we could not get fuses made in Canada. The result was that the Shell Committee gave first an order for 833,333 fuses to the American Ammunition Company of New York at $4.50 each. Later on a second order for just twice that number, 1,666,666, was given to the same company at $4.00 each. The average price on the two contracts was $4.16⅔ per fuse. About the same time the Shell Committee gave another order to the International Arms and Fuse Company of New York for 833,333 shells, and a second order for 1,666,666. But, instead of paying $4.50 on the first order and $4.00 on the second, as they did in the case of the American Ammunition Company, they paid $4.50 on the whole transaction, lock, stock and barrel. These 2,500,000 fuses will therefore cost this country nearly a million dollars more than the 2,500,000 bought from the American Ammunition Company. It does seem to me that if there is anything in Canada which should be investigated, it is this matter of fuses.

I find that the Shell Committee could have let contracts for fuses in Canada. Some time after these contracts had been made, a contract was let to the Russell Motor Car Company of Toronto. The Shell Committee bought the first quarter of a million fuses from the Russell Company at $4 each, and the next quarter of a million at $3 each; in other words, the half million fuses averaged $3.50 each, whereas the two and a half million fuses that were purchased in the State of New York cost $4.50 each. I am told—and I wish to place every particle of information which I have on this subject on record—that the fuses which are being made in Canada are not filled with the powder, but that the ones made in the United States are complete. I give this statement to the House because I do not want to do any person an injustice. Any of my hon. friends who know what a fuse is know that it consists of a brass knob that goes into the end of a shell. There is a graduating scale on the top of it, which turns around and can be set at the exact second or fraction of a second at which the shell is to explode. A spiral groove goes round inside the fuse, and this is filled with some kind of gunpowder paste, and in order that this shall burn at the same rate per second it must be pressed down at exactly the same pressure. This is merely a matter of hydraulic pressure, and the thing is done in a few minutes. I do not know what the cost of putting in that powder would be, but it cannot be very much. The powder ignites from the flash of the gun, and burning at the required rate per second explodes the charge of cordite, or whatever it may be in the shell. In the one case it would be cordite, and in the other black powder. It does seem to me, Sir, a most remarkable thing that there should be this enormous difference in price in these fuse contracts, all of which were given within a short time of one another. Hardly a fuse has been delivered in Canada, and if our shells are not on the firing line in France and Flanders it is because we have not the fuses for them rather than because we cannot get the shells.

I find, also, evidence of all kinds of political partisanship, and everything else that ought not to exist in Canada at this time, in the contracts for shell boxes. Shell boxes are a very important matter, running not only into millions of dollars, but, I believe, into hundreds of millions. They are something worth investigating in minutest detail. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Hazen)), in trying to take so much credit to himself yesterday afternoon for the manner in which these contracts were being handled in his own province, referred to the fact that the contracts had been given to the Wilson Box Company of St. John, one of the officials of which was a Liberal.

Mr. HAZEN: I gave the hon. gentleman the names of the directors.

Mr. CARVELL: And one of them was a Liberal.

Mr. HAZEN: More than one.

Mr. CARVELL: Well. The hon. gentleman also told us that the contract was given to the Sussex Manufacturing Company of Sussex, N.B. I want to tell him that if there was a contract given by the Shell Committee for which they deserve special credit, it was the contract given to the Sussex Manufacturing Company—and they are practically all Conservatives. This company is made up of men who know their business. They run one of the finest sash and door factories and planing mills in Eastern Canada. They were given a contract for 20,000 boxes, and were allowed three or four months within which to produce them. But they made their plans on business lines; they are men who know how to do things in a big way. The consequence was that they turned out these boxes in four weeks instead of in four months. Then they came back to the Shell Committee and said: Give us a contract for 100,000 boxes; we have demonstrated that we can do this business right. Do you suppose they could get a contract? It was impossible. But a man named W. H. Farnham, of St. Stephen, whom the Minister of Marine and Fisheries knows nothing about —I do not wonder that he wants to wash his hands of the whole business—who had been in Montreal or Toronto, landed back in New Brunswick with a contract for 25,000 shell boxes, and this at a time when this great, big, efficient Sussex Manufacturing Company could not get a contract at all. Mr. Farnham went down to St. Stephen to get some factory to make these boxes. They wanted to know where the money was coming from. He went to the representative of the Steel Company of Canada in the Maritime Provinces, who told me the story himself, and wanted to buy the screws and the iron straps for his work, a matter involving from $3,000 to $5,000. This representative of the Steel Company of Canada wanted to know where the money was coming from. The answer was: I will pay when I get my money from the Government. Why, this man Farnham had not even $1,000 to put up. He hawked that contract about New Brunswick for at least a month. He went to different institutions in St. Stephen and St. John, and could not get a company to manufacture the boxes or even to buy the screws to hold them together. I have not followed this matter up—I have been very busy of late—but I believe that Mr. Farnham managed to get a combination of politicians together; but whether they are manufacturing or not I do not know. I will ask the Minister of Marine and Fisheries if he looks upon this as playing the game in the big way that this Empire should play it, under the conditions in which we live to-day?

I do not wish to multiply instances, but let us go to the constituency of the Minister of Militia himself—to Fenelon Falls. I think that my hon. friend from Russell (Mr. Murphy) has placed on Hansard a clipping from the Canada Lumberman.

Mr, MURPHY: No.

Mr. CARVELL: Then I will read it, because I think it is of sufficient importance to be placed on Hansard. It refers to the shell box contract of C. W. Burgoyne—5,000 shell boxes at $2.50, and a second contract for 25,000 boxes. The Canada Lumberman says:

> In the first place, the contract was apparently secured through personal or political influence by a party who had no apparent right to it. In the second place, the contract was apparently handed on, or sublet, to Tiers, a proceeding which is understood usually to involve remuneration to the first party, although he actually produces nothing. In the third place, another contract for a much larger quantity of boxes was secured by the same parties. We cannot see how such methods of handling the shell-box business can be justified. Even in ordinary times the letting of contracts in this way could not be defended, and at a time like the present it is quite indefensible. The suspicion that this contract was handed over by Burgoyne to Tiers for a definite monetary consideration is strengthened by the fact that these two parties formed a partnership under the name of C. W. Burgoyne & Company. Evidently they wished to give the transaction a more respectable appearance; but we cannot see how this can be considered as lending the affair any respectability. It amounts to the same thing in the end, namely, that a party quite unable to produce boxes, secured the contracts and turned them over to another party. The fact that he entered into a partnership with Tiers indicates rather clearly that he did so in order to make it appear that he was entitled to a share of the profits which he was securing and towards which he had contributed nothing. When one considers that throughout Canada there are hundreds of planing mill plants which have suffered heavily through business depression and would be greatly benefited by securing shell-box contracts, he is thoroughly justified in criticising a Government which has permitted the letting of contracts in such a manner.

If my hon. friend the Minister of Militia were in his place this afternoon, I would ask him to tell this House the part he played in securing that contract for his friend Burgoyne. As he is not here, I can only express the hope that when he addresses this House, as I understand he intends to do, he will not forget to tell the whole facts—all the things he said and all the things he did, in order to secure this contract for his friend, a grocer, who never owned a planing mill, and knew nothing about this business, handed it over to him to make money out of. Perhaps it would not be fair to be more particular than that.

Well, Sir, I have spent some time discussing the shells and shell boxes. I may have a word or two to add before I am through. But there is another matter to which I wish to refer. I may be charged, perhaps, with being provincial in this matter. It may be said that this is a purely local matter. But it is of such great importance to my constituents and to the people of the province of New Brunswick generally, that I should be recreant to my duty did I not refer to it. I hope the words I speak may not merely be heard in this Chamber, but that they may be read by every farmer in the province of New Brunswick, especially by every farmer in my own constituency. Yes, and I hope they may be read by the Imperial authorities themselves. And if they want evidence that this Government is playing the game of politics—not honourable politics, but contemptible politics—I think I can furnish that evidence in connection with the hay contracts which this Government has been handling in the province of New Brunswick within the past two years.

Shortly after the war broke out, it became necessary to get fodder for horses, and the Government started out to buy hay. This was a perfectly proper transaction; no man could find fault if every pound of hay and oats in Canada were commandeered if necessary and taken away to be used in helping to win this war. But when we look into the matter—and I did not know all the facts of the case until some time well along in last session—we find that this is the state of facts. A contract was given to a company called the Atlantic Hay Company, among the members of which are B. F. Smith, my opponent in the last two elections, now a member of the local legislature; the A. C. Smith Company, of St. John, very close personal and political friends of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries; the Peters firm, the exact name of which I have forgotten, but of which there are two members, also friends of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries; and a Mr. McDonald, of Montreal. These men were given a contract for 7,000 tons of hay, afterwards increased to about 10,000 tons, at $24 a ton, delivered in St. John from press, ready to be put on board the vessel —I am not sure; I was under the impression that the contract price was $24.50. My hon. friend the Minister of Customs knows about this, because he and I talked the matter over.

Mr. J. D. REID: When was that?

Mr. CARVELL: That was one night last spring.

Mr. REID: You are referring to something which took place a year ago.

Mr. CARVELL: I am referring to something which took place a year ago.

An hon. MEMBER: That is too deep for him.

Mr. CARVELL: No, it is not too deep for him. The Minister of Customs and I will not quarrel over this matter. If he had been allowed to handle this thing there would not have been the terrible condition of affairs that exists in New Brunswick to-day. The Minister of Customs told me that the contract price was $24.50. He may have been wrong, but we will let it go at that; I presume that the Minister of Agriculture will tell us exactly what the facts are. The contract was for 10,000 tons of hay at $24 a ton, delivered at St. John. Then, through the political interference of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, three other contracts were given to three concerns in New Brunswick. One of these was to Messrs. Connelly and Wetmore. One of them pretends to be a Liberal, but he is very closely associated with a prominent Conservative in the city of St. John.

Mr. ROGERS: They are all Tories there now.

Mr. CARVELL: Are they? Bring on the election, and we shall see. Another was a Mr. Stephens, of St. John, a good Conservative; and the other was a man named Charles Cyr. This gentleman lives in the county of Madawaska and runs a barroom opposite the international bridge. Just across the line, in the State of Maine, there is a prohibition town of three or four thousand people; this gentleman, therefore, has the greatest gold mine that I know of in the province of New Brunswick. He was formerly a member of the Legislative Assembly of New Brunswick, and, in all probability, will be the Conservative candidate against my hon. friend the hon. member for Madawaska in the united counties of Restigouche and Madawaska. He was given a contract for 2,000 tons, Stephens a contract for 2,000 tons, Connelly & Wetmore a contract for 5,000 tons. These contracts were given at $21.50 a ton, not $24. These men never pressed a bundle of hay in their lives; they would hardly know the difference between an ordinary bundle of hay and one which had been pressed. They never owned a hay press, and never had anything to do with that business. At a rake-off of a dollar they sub-let their contracts to Liberals in my own town, the Phillips Estey Company and the McCain Produce Company. They got $20.50 for their hay, compressed according to government inspection and delivered in St. John at the same point at which the Atlantic Hay Company was required to deliver. The Atlantic Hay Company—that is, the political company—had an advantage of $3.50 to start on over the men who went out and bought the hay and did the pressing. These two Liberal concerns went out and bought the hay, brought it to Woodstock, pressed it, paid the freight to St. John and got their $20.50 for doing so. In this way they established the price of hay, because it would cost them a certain amount for pressing, a certain amount for freight, and a certain amount would have to be allowed for profit. The result was that the price was driven down to somewhere between $11 and $12. So the farmer of New Brunswick, during last season, through the manipulations and machinations of the Tory politicians, got between $11 and $12 for his hay, loose in the barn. I may explain that in the province of New Brunswick hay is always bought on the basis of its being loose in the farmer's barn. Sometimes the farmer presses it himself; if he does, he adds $1.25 to the price, but in nine cases out of ten the merchant presses it. The farmer boards the pressers, feeds their teams, hauls the hay to the railway station and gets the price, figured on the basis of the hay being loose in his barn. As I have said, the price last year was $11 to $12 a ton. Practically all the export hay which comes from the province of New Brunswick is produced in my own county and in the constituency to the north which will be the constituency of Carleton and Victoria after the next election. Mr. Smith, a leading member of the Atlantic Hay Company, has warehouses in many portions of Victoria and Carleton county. When the price of hay was established at $11 and $12 a ton, Mr. Smith went and bought his 7,000 tons of hay out at that price—$11 to $12. He bought a few small quantities from the merchants, for which he possibly paid fifty cents additional. I have the information; I have the documents; in fact, I have a lawsuit in prospect in connection with this matter, and I know what I am talking about. When they established the price at $11, Mr. Smith bought his hay at the same price as was paid by the others, and he made $2 profit in the compressing, the same as the others did, thus leaving him $3.50 over and above the legitimate profit which the other men obtained. There you have $45,000 taken from the pockets of the farmers of my constiutency, or out of the coffers of the British Government, for the small quantity of 19,000 tons of hay. This was nothing in the world but politics; this was done by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, or with his knowledge—manipulated by him and by his followers—with the intention of giving to these people the chance to make that profit. Not one of them has had the hardihood to stand up and attempt to defend this transaction from that day to this.

Mr. Speaker, I was busy during the last three or four weeks of the last session, and I was not in the House very much. I was in another part of the building most of the time.

An. hon. MEMBER: Doing good work.

Mr. CARVELL: I hope so. Earlier in the session I had put a notice of motion on the Order Paper asking for a discussion of this matter. On two occasions, when the motion was reached, the Prime Minister asked me to allow it to stand, taking the ground, I believe, that there was some doubt as to the right to discuss these questions, owing to the fact that the persons in question were said to have been agents of the Imperial Government. I went to the Minister of Customs, then acting Minister of Agriculture, and stated the case to him. He admitted the iniquity of the whole transaction and promised that if I would not say anything about it, this thing would not happen again; that this iniquity would be remedied. I believe that if the Minister of Customs had been continued to act as Minister of Agriculture, he would have carried out his promise, and that a similar iniquity would not have happened again.

In order to make the record clear, I should say that during last year practically all of these smaller contracts were carried out in the town of Woodstock. The Phillips Estey Company, men of good financial standing, big men in every way, entered into an agreement with James Scott & Sons, of Montreal, who are, I presume, the biggest hay merchants in Montreal. They brought a compressing plant down to Woodstock and operated it there on the basis of thirty cents a ton royalty; that is, they got thirty cents a ton for the use of their presser, paid the transportation of the presser and of two men to superintend the transportation from Montreal to Woodstock and back to Montreal.

They worked under rather unfavourable circumstances, but they compressed that hay for less than $3 a ton, including 30 cents a ton royalty for the use of the press, and including transportation charges. I know whereof I speak, because I am the solicitor of the company; and I have not only their consent but their hope that I will go on and discuss this thing, so I am at liberty to tell everything I know about it. They pressed that hay for less than $3 a ton, and the Atlantic Co. of St. John are pressing it for less than $2.50. I will agree to take a contract and do it for $2.50 a ton and make a lot of money. I know what I am talking of. I have had experience in this matter. During the South African war I was a member of a company that compressed hay, and I speak with knowledge. I was not then a member of the legislature or of the House of Commons. I was a member of the New Brunswick Hay Company. We had a small contract from the Department of Agriculture, about $7,000 altogether. We had to compress our hay down to 70 cubic feet to the ton, whereas under present specifications it is compressed to only 100 cubic feet per ton. That makes a difference of from 50 cents to 75 cents a ton in the cost of pressing. But I am willing, in my argument, to allow $3 a ton for pressing, which is at least 50 cents more than it ever cost them or anybody else.

The other firm compressing hay in Woodstock was the McCain Produce Co., who also had a contract during the South African war. They had a press, but could not get a contract, although they got a sub-contract and pressed the hay at $20.50 a ton. Their plant is all set up in Woodstock; it needs only the turning on of a motor, and they could be pressing hay in twenty-five minutes. Back as far as October 28, 1915, this company wrote to Mr. J. A. Ruddick, the Commissioner of Agriculture, as follows:

> Kindly let us know if you are open to purchase any quantity of compressed hay to be delivered in West St. John, N.B., in the near future. As we have the only press in this province at the present time capable of doing this kind of work, we would be glad to have a chance to put our press to work, and would take an order for any reasonable amount that you would be willing to let us have.
> Kindly advise us by return mail, etc.

That was not answered until the 15th day of November, two weeks later, when they got back this answer:

> Messrs. McCain, Produce Company, Ltd.,
> Florenceville, N.B.
> Dears Sirs,—I must apologize for the delay in replying to your letter of the 28th ult., with respect to New Brunswick hay. A contract has been entered into with the Atlantic Hay Company to supply 15,000 tons and as there will probably not be much more than that available this year there will be no object in entering into further contracts.

They wrote back on the 20th of November and offered to furnish any amount at one dollar a ton less than any other firm. On the 22nd day of November they wrote this letter. I have it here in my hand, for the inspection of any hon. gentleman, but I will not encumber the record with it. That was followed up on the 11th of December, 1915, by a telegram to the minister himself:

>
> Offer two to three thousand tons hay, cofpressed; delivered West St. John $22.50 per ton, subject to government inspection at pressing point. Answer.
> The McCain Produce Co.

That was fifty cents a ton less than they are paying the Smith Co. or the Atlantic Co. They followed that by a letter, and they got an answer on the 13th of December, saying:

> I am in receipt of your wire in regard of contract for compressed hay. The question of handling of hay in New Brunswick was given careful consideration, and, on our estimate of the amount of hay available in New Brunswick, and having in view the most convenient methods for ourselves in regard to shipment and inspection, a contract was awarded for an amount that we believed would practically cover the available hay of the standard that was required. We would not at the present time care to undertake any more contracts and have pointed this out to one or two correspondents who have written us along similar lines. There is little doubt, however, that if there should prove to be more hay available in New Brunswick than was anticipated, every ton of it would be required before we get through.
> (Signed) Martin Burrell.

That is followed by a letter of the 17th in which they protest very keenly against the course of the Minister of Agriculture in having given the whole contract to one concern, who had not a press, who never owned a compressing plant, but had to bring down a plant from Montreal and operate it there on a royalty basis. They told the minister that they were the only firm with a press in New Brunswick, and said:

> Also we were prepared to offer to you and did submit to you an offer at a price which is much less than the price you have paid the people having the contract for some 15,000 tons; and now, at a time when the honour and independence of the Empire is at stake, politics and religion and all other issues should be laid to one side and everything worked out to the very best interests of the country.

That even did not bring an answer.

Then I come, Sir, to my own sphere of operations in this matter. On the 8th of December I wrote a letter to Sir George Foster, Acting Premier of Canada, because I knew that Sir George was a New Brunswicker, I knew he was acquainted with conditions, I was aware that he knew many of the people, and I had no idea of being disrespectful to the Minister of Agriculture in going to him. I pleaded with him to do justice to my constituents. I wrote him a long letter. It is unnecessary to read it. I told him the whole story. I told him the nefarious manner in which the matter was managed the year before. I followed that up by an interview in his office on the 20th day of December. We telephoned for Mr. Burrell, but he was sick in bed. Then Sir George Foster asked to have Mr. Ruddick brought over. Mr. Ruddick came and we discussed the matter for probably an hour in Sir George Foster's office. I told him my complaint, I told him that these men, under this contract, could pay the farmer $15 for hay loose in the barn, and if he would give a contract to McCain or any other man who would agree to pay the farmers $15, I would be satisfied. We discussed the whole question, and I have here the original figures, made upon a sheet of the Weekly Bulletin, in Sir George Foster's office, giving all the figures, everything in connection with the whole transaction. I claimed that a contractor could pay $15 for this hay. I put down the cost of the hay at $15. I put down $1.25 as the cost of pressing in the farmer's barn. I know that is enough. I am a farmer myself. I press my own hay. I have my own press, and I know what it costs me. I press my hay, and hire every dollar of work done, for less than $1.25 a ton. We put in 50 cents for wastage in transferring the hay from the farmers' barns to the presses, but Mr. Ruddick said: "That is too much; put down 30 cents";—and Mr. Ruddick is the man who has charge of pressing hay for the Government all over Canada. He says that their experience is that 30 cents is a sufficient allowance for waste and loss in compressing. I put in $1.75 as the average rate of freight. It might go ten cents above that or ten cents below that, but that was a fair average. Then we put down $3 a ton for the compressing—and that is 50 cents more than it ought to be.

If you figure that up you get $21.30 a ton. Sir George turned to Mr. Ruddick and said, "Are these figures correct?" "Yes," said Mr. Ruddick, "they are right." We are pressing our hay in Montreal, we are paying for all overhead charges, we are paying rent for our buildings and paying for the inspectors, and we are doing all that for around $3; sometimes it might go five cents over, sometimes five cents under. When you go to the province of New Brunswick you find that they do not have to pay for inspectors, and I do not think that the Smith Company even pay for the rent of their building.

Mr. HAZEN: They pay $300 per month.

Mr. CARVELL: Three hundred dollars per month, a mere bagatelle on a contract amounting to over $300,000. I said to Sir George, "What are you going to do about it?" He said, "I am not the Minister of Agriculture," but he turned to Mr. Ruddick and said, "You go to him, and tell him that my advice is either to make this man pay the farmers what that hay is worth, or give the contract to some man who will pay the price." I said, "Thank you," and left the office. But, Sir, just a few days before that, this Government had put an embargo upon the exportation of hay from New Brunswick. They gave these people, the political friends of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, a contract for every ton of hay in the province of New Brunswick, and after giving the contract they put an embargo on the hay, so that the poor farmer in New Brunswick has the grip of this combination around his throat. There is no way of getting that grip removed except by the Minister of Agriculture. It is up to him to remove that death grip, which those politicians have upon the throats of the farmers in my constituency.

Mr. MARCIL: What was the reason for the embargo?

Mr. CARVELL: I do not know. They say they need all the hay.

Mr. J. D. REID: It was the British Government.

Mr. CARVELL: I have no fault at all to find; if they want to put an embargo on everything produced in Canada they can do so. But I object to them saying, "You cannot sell your hay where you want to sell it." I have $1,500 worth of hay in my barns, and the Government says, "You cannot sell that hay in Boston," where I can get $16 for it to-day; they say, "You have got to sell it to the political friends of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries for $13." That is what I object to, Mr. Speaker. If the British Government will cut down the price of those people and make it $20 I will sell my hay for $13, and if they cut down the price still more I will sell my hay for $3 less. In this I am speaking for every constituency in the province of New Brunswick. But we do object to the Government taking us by the throat and preventing us from selling our hay in the best market, and then telling us that we have to give it away at half price to the political favourites of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries.

Mr. TURRIFF: They are doing that with every one of our farmers in the West.

Mr. CARVELL: Well, I went home, and I felt I had accomplished something. But I did not know my man; I did not know the Minister of Agriculture. The day after I got home the McCain Company wrote this letter to Mr. Ruddick, the Commissioner of Agriculture:

Dec. 24th, 1915.

J. A. Ruddick, Esq.,
Commissioner of Agriculture,
Ottawa, Ont.

Dear Sir:

The writer has just returned from Woodstock after having had an interview with Mr. F. B. Carvell, M.P., who informs me that he has been discussing the hay situation with the Hon. George E. Foster and yourself and would say that we are willing to take on a contract of three to five thousand tons of hay for $23 (twenty-three dollars) per ton as closely as possible to track West St. John, N.B., and will agree to pay the farmers $15 per ton loose for their hay in the barns. This hay to be pressed under the usual rules and conditions of inspection at pressing point.

I might say that we could start our plant in operation on very short notice as the press is all set up and the only connecting link would be having the motor replaced.

We have a large quantity of hay stored at our different warehouses throughout the county and as we are unable to sell same at a reasonable price we would thank you very much to give this letter your most favourable consideration and hope to receive your reply by wire asking us to make preparations for pressing at once.

Thanking you in advance for a favourable reply and wishing you the Compliments of the Season, we remain,

Yours very truly,
McCain Produce Co., Ltd.

I sent a letter also to Sir George Foster, and I had no doubt in the world that this man would get the contract, or that the other company would be told to pay the farmers a reasonable price for their hay. These letters were handed over to the Minister of Agriculture, and in due course I received a letter from the Minister of Agriculture dated January 5. Perhaps I should read it to the House, because I want to treat the minister fairly:

Ottawa, Jan. 5th, 1916.

F. B. Carvell, Esq., M.P.,
Woodstock, N.B.

Dear Mr. Carvell:

When I was laid up with the grippe I understand that you discussed matters relating to hay contract in New Brunswick with Sir George Foster and he subsequently sent me the letter which he had received from you on the same subject, but in special reference to an offer of Mr. McCain to undertake a contract for pressed hay. I received a somewhat similar letter from Mr. McCain some time previously which I answered and I am not writing him again as there is nothing to add at the present time. Since I have got around again, which was only a short while ago, I have been giving this matter consideration and getting fuller information on the subject.

My department has been acting for the War Office in regard to hay all over the country and while the conditions in various parts of the country naturally vary, and in some cases a very low price would be obtained for the surplus hay if it were not for the War Office purchases, it is our desire to see that the War Office does not have to pay unnecessarily high prices, and that while the farmer gets a fair figure for his product the contractors should not make an unreasonable profit for the work and responsibilities which they undertake.

In so far as the situation in the Maritime Provinces goes, I am getting our officers to look thoroughly into the situation in order that I may have full information on the whole matter.

Yours faithfully,
M. Burrell.

Perhaps I was a little incensed when I got that letter. Any man who knew the situation as well as I did would be incensed to find a minister of the Crown, with all the information he had, and after all the trouble over this thing, writing a put-off letter saying that he had instructed his officers to make an investigation in order to get more information. Here is the answer I sent to him:

January 6th, 1916.

Hon. Martin Burrell,
Minister of Agriculture,
Ottawa, Ontario.

Dear Sir:

I am just in receipt of your letter of yesterday regarding the hay situation in this county, but am sorry that, after reading it over several times, I fail to find anything in it which looks like a solution of the problem.

You state that you are getting your officers to look thoroughly into the situation. Let me assure you that your officers have looked into the situation, and have known all about it for months past.

You signed a contract with the Atlantic Hay Company, which is really B. F. Smith, a twice defeated candidate in this constituency, for 15,000 tons of hay at $23 a ton delivered in West St. John, and you have in your office an offer from the McCain Produce Company, or A. D. McCain, who are thoroughly responsible people in every respect, and well able financially to carry out any promises they make, to deliver you the same quantity of hay at the same place at $22.50 per ton, thus saving the British Government $7,500 in the transaction, and to this letter, so far as I am aware, at the present time, you have never even given an answer.

Then you received a letter within the last fortnight from Mr. McCain, agreeing to deliver you 5,000 tons of hay at West St. John at $23 per ton, and a covenant that he will pay the farmer at least $15, loose for the product. To this you have made no answer excepting an acknowledgement of its receipt by Mr. Ruddick.

In addition to this your Government has prohibited the exportation of hay, and the farmers are entirely at the mercy of Mr. Smith, and your political friends. They are receiving today about $13.50, which is $1.50 a ton more than he was paying when I started after the business, and under the present prices, he is cleaning up no less than $3 on every ton he is handling, and in some cases much more, or $45,000 to $50,000 profit on the transaction being made out of the farmers of New Brunswick.

You know this is not a fair deal, and the only way to do justice to the farmers is to compel Smith to pay $15 per ton, not only in the future, but for that which he has purchased in the past, or give a contract to McCain, under his offer of a fortnight ago.

I understand you have agreed to give to Mr. Hatfield an order for 2,000 tons and perhaps you are innocent, I am going to assume you are, but I can assure you that an offer of this kind will never raise the price of hay a cent. In fact, this is only part of the game to stifle competition.

Now Mr. Burrell, it is fairly up to you, either make Smith pay the farmers $15 for their hay, or give a contract to the man who covenants that he will pay that amount, and who is financially able to stand by his covenant.

There is no other way of handling it, and I trust before I reach Ottawa next Wednesday, this matter will be worked out along these lines.

While I have not the power to force the Government, I suppose you will agree with me that I have the power of speech, and it is my intention to see that justice is done to my constituents, for I will never be charged with having been negligent in presenting the case.

Believe me,

Sincerely yours,

Mr. Speaker, what do you suppose was the answer I got to that? I had been here and had gone home again, and I found this letter on my desk acknowledging receipt of it, but the answer I got was a personal invitation from the Minister of Agriculture begging me, for God's sake, not to refer to this matter in the House of Commons, and telling me that it would look bad if it were published in the newspapers.

Mr. BURRELL: Would the hon. gentleman extend me the courtesy of allowing me to interject one remark? I do not want to do him any injustice, and I trust that he does not want to do me any injustice. I did not beg him, in God's name, to refrain from doing this. I stated my reason to him, as I did also to the right hon. the leader of the Opposition. That reason is good, and I shall speak of it later on. It is simply a matter of justice to put this interview in its proper terms.

Mr. CARVELL: I will stand by what I say, and this House and this country will accept my word for it too. Let me tell the hon. Minister of Agriculture that if there was not something crooked and dirty about this, he would not be trying to stifle investigation and discussion in this House. It is true that at that interview he wanted to tell me certain things in confidence, although I told him not to. He told me certain things, and I shall not reveal them. It was up to him to explain to this House and this country about the manner in which he tried to chloroform me and to keep me from discussing this question. When he found that I was going to speak out, he went to the Liberal whip, and then to the leader of the Opposition, and begged them to pull me off and keep me from telling of this dirty, contemptible stealing of these Conservative politicians in the province of New Brunswick.

Mr MACDONALD: When was this?

Mr. CARVELL: Three or four days after this debate commenced. I told him also in that interview—and he will not deny it—that I did not want to discuss matters here that there might be some question about with relation to the public interest, but that this was a matter of so much interest to my constituents that I would never dare to face them again if I did not discuss it. I told him that if he would give to McCain a contract for 5,000 tons of hay at $23 with this covenant, or to some of his Conservative friends with the same covenant, they could have McCain's press; or if he would write a letter to the Atlantic Hay Company telling them that they must pay $15 for hay, I would never open my mouth, and that would end the whole transaction. Why does he not do it? Because the Minister of Marine and Fisheries will not allow him to do it.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Saving the Empire.

Mr. CARVELL: Saving the Empire—yes. It is like Foster saving the Empire; it is like Garland saving the Empire; it is like that bunch of patriots whom we investigated in the Public Accounts Committee last session saving the Empire. Now we have the Minister of Agriculture saving the Empire by bleeding my farmers to the extent of about $50,000 for the benefit of the political organization of his friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. The minister told me some of the things that he was going to do in order to have this thing straightened out, and I told him that he did not know his men. The poor, innocent Minister of Agriculture up against a proposition like my hon. friend's friends down in New Brunswick! He does not know the Tory politicians of New Brunswick. But I took back a letter to him in order to show him something of the standing of my friend, and I gave him this letter, or rather I read it to him. "Now, Mr. Minister," I said, "in face of that, can you still refuse to do justice to my constituents." Here is the letter. It is a letter from a poor man, with a big family, a hard worker on a rocky farm, which, I am sorry to say, he does not own in full. He is a good, hard worker; he is going to come out all right; he has paid, during the last year, more than one-third of the mortgage on his farm; but he is among the smallest of the small farmers. Here is the letter I received from him.

Centreville, Jan. 13, 1916.

Mr. F. B. Carvell,
Woodstock, N.B.

Dear Mr. Carvell,—I have sold my hay to B. F. Smith. I got stuck for money, so his brother gave me only $13 per ton. He said when Frank came home he would give me more. So when he came I wrote to him and asked him to send me the bill, which he did not. Now, how am I to make him? The letter I send you with this and also the bill for hay. Can you make him settle with me? He promised to give me as much as any one and said he was in a position to give a little more. The balance on the hay is $11.42—

Mr. Speaker, the amount is only $11.42, and what is that to a man who has a contract with this Government for $325,000?

—or you can figure it up yourself. The weight of hay is 11,450. He paid me $13 per ton. Will you let me know what can be done, please.

(Signed) Walter W. Pryor,
Centreville, N.B.,
R.M.D. No. 4.

Here is a man who only had an insignificant amount of less than 6 tons of hay to sell. Surely that man is entitled to all the British Government is paying for hay. Surely that man is entitled to protection from the Minister of Agriculture, and he should not be subjected to the scandal of having his hard-earned money filched from him in order to line the pockets of the political grafters in New Brunswick. Let me read the answer which he got:

East Florenceville, N.B., Jan. 8, 1916.

Walter W. Pryor, Esq.,
Centreville, N.B.

Dear Sir,—Your favour of January 3rd duly received. I note all you say with reference to what I was to do when I secured a contract. I fear that you have been listening to bad counsel.

I have usually paid my bills and paid as high a price for hay or anything else as any one else in the business and I do not think that at this time in life, after I have been in business twenty years, that I will allow any one to come forward and tell me what I have to do. I think you know me well enough for that.

Yours truly,
(Sgd.) B. F. Smith.

God save the King, one of my hon. friends says, and may I add the poor farmer who is in the hands of this political monopoly and who is not allowed by this Government to sell his hay to any person on earth except this monopoly.

At six o'clock, the House took recess.

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. CARVELL: When you left the chair at six o'clock, Mr. Speaker, I was discussing a matter which I admitted was perhaps of a somewhat local nature. I was pointing out to the Minister of Agriculture some of his sins of omission and commission respecting the mismanagement of the hay situation in my province. I just want to add a little more in order that there will be no misunderstanding about the whole transaction. I detailed rather fully the handling of this business by the Department of Agriculture in the year 1915, and also what is going on in 1916. I had pointed out that the department had first given a contract to a set of political friends for all the hay which they hoped to buy in that province for the present year. They then applied an export duty, which prohibited our people from sending their hay to the United States and obtaining the price they were entitled to. The Minister of Agriculture has in his hands to-day very serious protests from some of the best farmers in the province of New Brunswick. A very illuminative and businesslike letter on the situation was written me from Sackville, in the county of Westmorland, by a Mr. Fawcett, a man known over the length and breadth of New Brunswick, well known to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, and regarded as probably the most up-to-date farmer in the whole province. That letter was forwarded to Sir George Foster, and by him forwarded to the Minister of Agriculture, who has the document in his possession to-day. In the county of Westmorland the situation is even worse than in my constituency. As can be seen from the documents I have read, the farmers in my constituency are receiving about $13 for their hay, and the Government is paying $23. In some cases our farmers receive $13.50. If it is a poor man who cannot help himself such as I have described this man Pryor to be, they crowd him down, but if it is a bigger man, who can hit back, they give him fifty cents more. In any case they simply put a string around the farmer's throat, and then twist it just as hard as they can and yet leave life in his body. There is no escape. That is the position in which we find ourselves. In the county of Westmorland the hay is hardly of as good a quality as ours. I do not say that offensively, but they grow in that county a certain quality of marsh hay, which the authorities, at the time of the South African war, would not take at all. But they have also what is called upland hay, which is a splendid article, just as good as the Government are buying elsewhere, and which answers the requirements of what is called No. 2 hay. They started in to pay $12 for this hay in the county of Westmorland, but the Company thought that the gentleman from whom they were purchasing down there was paying too much, so they stopped doing business with him and started in with two other men, who are now paying $11 or $11.50, and to-day the farmers in the county of Westmorland, who have no market at all for their hay except this gang of politicians, have been compelled to sell their hay to these two men for $11 or $12. These agents then pay $1.75 freight on the hay to St. John, compress it there and get $23 from the British Government.

Mr. BOYCE: Does my hon. friend say that that is what the farmers are getting now?

Mr. CARVELL: Yes, and I say it on the authority of the farmers themselves, the men whom I have seen personally and discussed the situation with. I also have the written authority of Mr. Fawcett, of Sackville, a man known to the Minister of Marine, and, I believe, to the chief Government Whip, a man who is so big and well-known in the farming world in New Brunswick that every man who knows anything about farming knows him. These farmers are compelled to accept $11 or $12 for their hay which these men then sell to the British Government for $23. Worse than that, they are even bringing hay by the schooner load from the Annapolis valley in Nova Scotia. The whole intention is to show the farmers of New Brunswick that they can get the 15,000 tons of hay without them, and make them accept the price they are willing to pay. Our hands are tied; we cannot help ourselves; we have no other outlet except a little local market.

I should just like to read three telegrams I have received recently from men who have been handling hay in my constituency, some of them for twenty-five years. The first is from the McCain Produce Company, who I am safe in saying are the biggest hay merchants in the Maritime provinces and among the biggest in Canada, handling between ten and fifteen thousand tons of hay per year. Here is what they say:

> Hundreds of tons of hay here available, farmers at distance very anxious to move stock. Embargo on St. John shipment. Can't you do something secure contract and thus relieve situation.
> McCain Produce Co.

The next one is from Bohan Brothers, an old established firm who have been in business over twenty years:

> Hundreds of tons of hay available. Farmers anxious to haul. An embargo to St. John and United States. Can you not do something to secure contract and relieve the situation.
>
> Bohan Bros.

The last one is from the Phillips-Estey Company:

> Is there any possibility of arranging for compressing hay at Woodstock. Several thousand tons available here. Embargo on St. John. Cannot ship to the States. Everything tied up. Can't something be done to relieve the situation.
> Phillips Estey Co.

I have already discussed the embargo on hay going to the United States. The term " embargo " in St. John means this. These people have been bringing hay over from Nova Scotia by schooner loads and landing it on the Government wharf. They have also brought it from Westmorland County, where they paid $11 or $12 a ton for it. They will not receive any more hay than they can handle nicely, the yards are piled up, and the Canadian Pacific railway will not allow any more cars to be loaded for St John points. The result is that many of the merchants in my county have thousands of tons of hay stored up in their warehouses, and even if they wanted to sell to the Smith crowd they could not get the cars, and they will not get them till the place is cleared in St. John. I do not blame the Canadian Pacific railway for that. They cannot allow the farmers to use the Canadian Pacific railway cars as storehouses for hay. Accordingly, they put on an embargo and said: "You cannot ship any more hay until they have pressed out what is in the yards already." There is no escape for us; we are tied hand and foot, and are compelled to take the treatment which these people are giving us.

If this were not bad enough—and I think it is—let me tell you that last year, after these people had made $35,000 to $45,000 out of the manipulation of these contracts, after they had filled their order of 7,000 tons, they started out to get more. I find no fault with the Government for giving all the contracts they could, because they want the hay. But these people bought up every ton of the rotten, black, condemned clover hay there was in the county of Carleton. There were 300 tons of hay condemned at the plant of the Phillips-Estey Co. at Woodstock; there must have been more than 300 tons at the plant of the McCain Company at Woodstock, and 300 tons more at different points along the line. And, mind, at the two plants to which I have referred, this hay was condemned by Government inspectors. But every ton of that black, rotten hay was loaded on the cars, sent to St. John, put through the Atlantic Hay Company's presses, and they got $24 a ton for it from the British Government. No, I want to qualify that. There may have been a carload or two that did not go through their presses. I was in the shed at St. John in the summer, and there was a little lot of hay piled up in one corner. Now, what kind of inspectors must they have in St. John? What kind of supervision does the department give to the purchase of this hay? What kind of cursed influence must the Minister of Marine and Fisheries exercise upon the minister of this department, and upon all the rest of them, to allow these things to go on unchallenged —to allow this profiteering to continue at the expense of the British Government and of the Canadian farmer?

Mr. LEMIEUX: All Smith?

Mr. CARVELL: All Smith—the Atlantic Hay Company. These are facts that I charge publicly, facts that I got from the men who know—from the Phillips Estey Co., clients of mine; from the McCain Produce Company, clients of mine; men who have their books to show, men who know what they are talking about.

Mr. LEMIEUX: How much do they get for it?

Mr. CARVELL: Twenty-four dollars a ton. Why, they bought some of that hay for $12, landed in St. John. This hay, condemned by Government inspectors in Woodstock, was loaded on the cars and sent to St. John. And they were only willing to pay $12 for it. But the matter is not yet settled; it is quite likely there may be a lawsuit about it, because the McCain Company say that the price was $12 a ton f.o.b. Woodstock, and the Atlantic people say it was $12 a ton f.o.b. St. John. I think some of it was consigned to Messrs. Connelly & Wetmore, and they made some kind of arrangement with Smith and put it through their presses. I hope the Minister of Marine is taking note of this. I think there is enough to make him take note, and I hope he will get the Minister of Agriculture to give the matter consideration and do what is fair and right.

Mr. CROTHERS: With the hon. gentleman's permission, I desire to ask a question for information, as I am not sure that I understood him. Did he say this hay was pressed at Woodstock and then sent to St. John, opened up there and re-pressed?

Mr. CARVELL: This hay was pressed in the farmers' barns. It was drawn into Woodstock for compression—that means to be opened up and re-pressed. It was unfit for compression and would not stand the test. It was condemned by the Government inspectors and piled out. Then it was sent to St. John and compressed. I hope I have made that plain. I am only too happy to give information on the subject, so serious is its significance, so gross and so criminal, in view of existing conditions, that I think the fullest information should be given upon this ignominious subject.

I am sorry the hon. the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Burrell) is not here. I presume an attempt will be made to answer me, and I should like to be absolved from my promise of confidence in the interview I had with him three or four days ago. Of course, as he is not here, I cannot be given that right, and without that right I cannot go into the matter. But I can say this: I know how the Minister of Agriculture hopes to straighten out this horrible mess in which he finds himself. But if he knew the character of the men he is up against he would laugh himself to ridicule; he would not know what to say to himself about his plan to protect the British Government and the Canadian farmers. As he is not here, I cannot disclose the matter. But if he does attempt to discuss this question, I give you notice, Mr. Speaker, that I will take the earliest opportunity to show exactly what his little scheme means.

I know what defence the Minister is going to put up. He is going to say that in 1902, when I had an interest in a hay contract, the company in which I was interested got a greater price for hay than did the McCain Company and Peters, who had a contract at that time. Well, there was no politics at that time, for the Peters, now partners in the Atlantic Company, and Conservatives, under the name of the Imperial Hay Company, pressed hay in St. John for two years, while the company that I was in pressed hay for only a few months. As I have said, the Minister will say that I got a bigger price than the others. I do not know what the Imperial Company got. I may have known at the time, but I do not know now. We got $17 a ton for our hay landed in St. John, pressed down to seventy cubic feet to the ton. The McCain Company got $14 a ton f.o.b. at their place of business at Florenceville. The freight to St. John would be $1.70 or $1.80—the rate was 8½ or 9 cents, I have forgotten which. Our freight would be the same from different points along the line. In addition to that, we put our hay off at McAdam Junction, re-pressed it, and sent it forward on the same bill of lading, and paid 20c. a ton more for freight than did the McCain Company. They would add to the $14 they received $1.75 to St. John, making the cost to the Government $15.75 in St. John. Ours cost them $17 in St. John, but it cost us 25c. more for freight. It worked out that our hay cost the Government $1 a ton more than the McCain hay. And here is the reason. We bought no hay from the farmers, but bought all our hay from the merchants; McCain bought no hay from the merchants, but bought altogether from the farmers. We bought hay from every merchant in the county. We got them all together. They knew what we were getting from the Government; they knew it cost $3 a ton to press it; they knew the freight rates, and the cost in the farmers' barns. We made a trade with every hay merchant for $10.25 f.o.b point of shipment; and they made an agreement among themselves to pay the farmer $8 a ton.

Among the men in that arrangement were Mr. Smith, Mr. McCain, and a dozen other hay merchants in the county and in the three or four adjoining counties. Prior to that time hay had never been worth more than $6 a ton, loose in the farmers' barns.

Mr. J. D. REID: It must have been worth more than that in some years.

[Mr. Carvell.]

Mr. CARVELL: No.

Mr. REID: Never before?

Mr. CARVELL: It has never been worth more than $6 or $6.50.

Mr. REID: That seems to be a very low price.

Mr. CARVELL: I know it is, but that is the fact just the same. I have here a return brought down to Parliament on June 13, 1900, showing that the Government bought from this same Mr. McCain 1,450 tons of hay at $9 a ton f.o.b. Florenceville. Taking $6.50 and adding $1.25 for pressing, you have $7.75—and Mr. McCain had $1.25 for his labour and trouble. That shows what was the price of hay in New Brunswick at that time; I will send the return over to my hon. friend so that he may see it. That price of $8 was $1.50 in advance of anything ever got before. We allowed the merchants $1.25 for pressing the hay and $1 for his profit and trouble, and paid him $10.25 f.o.b. at the point of shipment. We bought over 2,000 tons of hay from this Mr. Smith at that price, so that the farmers got practically the same price whether he sold his hay to Mr. McCain or whether he sold it to any other merchant. The hay which the Government bought from us cost them a dollar more than that which was bought from Mr. McCain, but that dollar went not to our company, but to the middleman or the hay merchant. Our profits and Mr. McCain's profits were exactly the same. I have always justified my conduct in that regard and I will do it again. I never thought that, because we stepped into an unexpected or unusual condition of affairs, we had the right absolutely to drive out of business these men who had been doing a legitimate business for a quarter of a century, and to take from them all the profits to which they were entitled, and put them in our pockets. But that is the kind of thing that is going on to-day in the province of New Brunswick. Moreover, this same firm, the Phillips-Estey Company, a week ago yesterday went to Mr. Smith and begged him to take some hay from them at any price. The best price they could get was $17 in St. John. You can figure that out for yourself; you have $1.75 freight to pay; you have $1.25 for pressing in the farmer's barn. That brings the price to $14, and you give them a dollar for doing the business, which brings it back to $13. This is the very best price a man can get in New Brunswick to-day.

I see that the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Burrell) is in his seat. I think I have a right to ask the minister if he intends to discuss this matter in reply to what I have said to-day, and, if so, whether he will allow me to relate the conversation which he and I had in Room 16, which he asked me to treat as confidential. I do not want to do this unless the hon. gentleman himself is going to refer to it. If he is going to refer to it, I think I should have a right to give it to the House.

Mr. BURRELL: If my hon. friend's relation of that conversation is not more accurate than his relation of the conversation that he has already given to the House, I should prefer that he would not say anything at all about it.

Mr. CARVELL: All right; I accept that. I assume from that that the minister will not refer to it either.

Mr. BURRELL: Since my hon. friend puts that question, I think he will grant me the same privilege to state what took place and to put before the House a version as against the version that he gave this afternoon.

Mr. CARVELL: So far as I have gone, certainly.

Mr. BURRELL: So far as you have gone.

Mr. CARVELL: Certainly, but no further. Of course, if my hon. friend chooses to go further, I think I know enough about the rules of the House to find an opportunity to have the matter straightened out.

I have discussed this matter at considerable length, but I feel that I have done no more than I ought to do under the circumstances. I here publicly accuse the Department of Agriculture of having during the year 1915 deliberately, and with the knowledge of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, so manipulated the contracts for hay in the province of New Brunswick that his political friends were placed in a position to filch $45,000 either out of the money which this Government is handling as a sacred trust on behalf of the British Government, or from the pockets of the farmers of the province of New Brunswick. I go further: I here publicly accuse the Minister of Agriculture of so allowing the contracts to be manipulated for the present year with the knowledge and consent of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, that the Atlantic Hay Company will filch about $35,000 either from the funds held in trust for the British Government or from the pockets of the farmers of my constituency and the rest of New Brunswick. I am sorry to have to make these statements; I am sorry on account of the Minister of Agriculture. I want to say here, Sir, that no man in Canada feels as badly over this matter as does the Minister of Agriculture. I sympathize with him from the bottom of my heart. He is an Englishman by birth, a gentleman by instinct and training; a man who, I believe, is absolutely loyal to the core; a man who, if left to himself, would never have caused the nefarious conditions that have existed. I am sorry that he has allowed himself to be jockeyed into the position in which he finds himself to-night, by his colleague the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. But, Sir, he is the responsible head of the department, and he is the man whom I must blame for the condition, and to whom I must look for redress. I have presented the situation to the House, and my hon. friend can take whichever horn of the dilemma suits him best.

Mr. Speaker, the question now naturally arises, what are you going to do about it? That is the question that every elector in Canada is asking to-night: what are you going to do about it? What is Parliament going to do about it? What is the Government going to do about it? What is the Prime Minister going to do about it? To-day I have pointed out facts which, if I can substantiate them, ought to drive this Government into oblivion; ought to drive the Conservative party of Canada into oblivion for the next twenty-five years. I ask you again, what are you going to do about it? Are you going to get behind the contemptible quibble of the Solicitor General, or are you going to investigate the matter? Are you going to give the electors of Canada the right to get to the bottom of these things and to know whether or not I am right in the charges I am making? Or are you going to chloroform them, muzzle Parliament and refuse a chance to investigate these matters? And if you are going to investigate them, how are you going to do it? Before what sort of tribunal will these charges be inquired into? Will they be entrusted to a royal commission such as was fooling around the country during the last summer, or will the investigation be held in the broad, open light of Parliament? Will it be done by hole and corner means, where counsel for the public shall be absolutely refused the right to prosecute, or will it be done in Parliament, so that every member on this side as well as on the other side of the House shall have an opportunity to examine into the matter, in the presence of the representatives of the people, so that it will receive such investigation as the condition of affairs in this country demands? That is the question. I hope my friends, the members of this Government, will address themselves to that question very seriously. They think, in face of what has been said here during the last week, that they can simply close the door and say: Go hang yourself. If they want to take that responsibility, of course they have the right to do so; but I very much doubt if they will do it. I could pick out three or four members of that Administration who, I think, would be heartily ashamed to do that, and I am looking to them to see that justice and right and honesty is done to the people of Canada. You may say: what objections have you to a royal commission such as we had last summer? I have many objections to it. I am not going into the submarine business, and I am not going to read these two immense volumes of evidence which I hold in my hand. The submarine business has been pretty well discussed by speakers on both sides of this House. I am only going to call the attention of the House to the fact that one of the most serious charges that could be made against a public man in Canada was made against Sir Richard McBride, practically alleging that there had been a rake off of $350,000 in the purchase of these submarines, taking advantage of the nation in its hour of need, when these things were a real necessity, considering the fact that they were obsolete, that they had been refused by the government of a South American republic, not because they would not shoot torpedoes, but because the things would not come to the surface when they wanted them to.

Taking these considerations, taking the enormity of the charges, think of a royal commission that would not allow counsel for the people to appear before them, that closed the door to the people, that closed the door to any man who would have any real ambition to show the exact condition of affairs. The Minister of Marine spent half an hour yesterday afternoon trying to tell us how absolutely honest and upright Sir Charles Davidson had been. I am not charging him with dishonesty; I am simply charging him with not doing his duty—side-stepping, as my hon. friend behind me says. Let me bring it down to our own experience. Suppose we had an investigation in the Public Accounts Committee of this House of some charge against a prominent member of the Government, a serious matter involving almost his political life, and there was nobody in the Public Accounts Committee except his political supporters. Supposing that no opposition members were allowed there—and I do not care whether the ruling power be Liberal or Conservative—what kind of an investigation do you suppose you would get? How near would you get to the facts? I am sorry that my hon. friend from Ottawa (Mr. Fripp) is not here to-night. Take our investigation of that poor deluded young man, Powell, in the Public Accounts Committee last spring. He was a young man whom I pitied as I do not think I ever before pitied a witness on the stand in my quarter of a century of professional activity, a young man who was brought there by Garland and made to perjure himself in the most horrible manner I have ever seen in any court. And the only contribution offered by my hon. friend from Ottawa to that investigation was to say: "Oh, well, that money would be very handy to put him through college." That is an illustration of what these one-sided, jug-handled investigations are. If there was nothing wrong with this transaction, if everything was perfectly straight and honest, why has Sir Richard McBride thrown up the premiership of British Columbia and gone to London? Why has he accepted a twopenny-halfpenny job, with a great big salary attached to it, putting another man out on a pension of $10,000 to make room for himself? Men act on certain business principles usually; they do not do these things if everything is all right.

Mr. DAVIDSON: Did not the Davidson Commission discover very many more facts in connection with the Garland case than the Public Accounts Committee under the guidance of my hon. friend?

Mr. CARVELL: No. He owned up to the Davidson Commission and he would not to us. Garland brought that poor young man there and made him perjure himself in the most blackhearted manner I ever saw.

Mr. DAVIDSON: My hon. friend was unsuccessful in getting the truth.

Mr. CARVELL: Certainly; how could I help it if a man perjured himself? When they got before the Davidson Commission a change came over the spirit of their dreams—they owned up and coughed up.

Mr. J. D. REID: That must have been a better commission than the Public Accounts Committee.

Mr. CARVELL: No, it was not. The Public Accounts Committee cannot help men perjuring themselves if they want to. But they had a chance to think it over; they repented, and I say I was sorry, and I am sorry to-night, for that young man. He had as fine a countenance as any man I ever met. I should like to have a young man like that for my own son, which unfortunately I have not. He appeared to me to have every instinct of a gentleman, and I am glad that he had the moral courage, or that his father had the moral courage, to make him go before the Davidson Commission and tell the whole story. I believe that he will be able to go through life with a clean record, because, according to my religion, if a man is willing to confess his sins I believe that there is a power to forgive him his sins both here and hereafter.

I come now to the horse investigation. I am going to show the doings of this wonderful commission. The investigation of these Nova Scotia horses came up in the Public Accounts Committee. We certainly had a lively time of it for three or four days. We proved many things, and in substance here is what we proved. We proved that the Government gave about $73,000 over to one of its supporters, the member for Kings, N.S., with which to go out and buy horses. He was given carte blanche to draw cheques or drafts against this money, which was placed to his credit in the Bank of Montreal. He went to Nova Scotia with a gentleman named McKay, who had been the secretary to the chief Conservative whip.

Mr. STANFIELD: Acting secretary.

Mr. CARVELL: Acting? He was in the office and had access to all books and papers. He was on the job, that is all I know. He took also two men whom he picked up in Ottawa, Keever and Woodworth. I think he went so far as to say that one of these men, Keever, had a desk in the same room as he had, in a building in Ottawa.

Mr. STANFIELD: That was not my office.

Mr. CARVELL: I am not blaming the chief Conservative whip a particle. I do not think the hon gentleman had the faintest connection with the purchase of these horses. I should be very sorry, indeed, if anything I might say would lead to such a suspicion. He took these three men down to Nova Scotia, and they started buying horses, and it was the most perfect whirlwind campaign I ever heard of in my life. Billy Sunday was not in it for a moment. They would lead their halt and maimed and blind horses up there and go through a process of investigation, which was all sworn to in the Public Accounts Committee. They would tie on a tag and send the horse on and bring on the next one. Some of them would not even be untied. They would look sometimes at their mouths, sometimes at their tails, and sometimes even at their sides. When a man went there with a good horse to sell, they said: "Nothing doing, we do not want that kind of horse." They bought a few good horses but as a rule the good ones were all turned down. They bought a few, but as a rule the horses were all turned down.

Mr. REID: Not all.

Mr. CARVELL: Harvey brought a good horse, and they would not buy it.

Mr. REID: The same witness swore that there were good horses.

Mr. CARVELL: The Government did not want good horses; the Government turned down good horses, and these men telephoned to their friends to bring in the lame, the halt, the blind, the spavined, the ring-boned, and every other kind of horse with all the ailments to which horse flesh is heir to; and they brought them in, and got enormous prices for them.

Now, Mr. Speaker, where was the trouble? According to the evidence, the limit price to be paid was from $172 to $175; they must not exceed that. If they had bought horses up to the standard they would have paid $172 or $175 for them. But if they had bought those good horses at $172 or $175 there would have been no rakeoff; therefore they refused to have the good horses, and paid the limit price for the halt, the blind, the spavined, the ring-boned, and the aged and infirm horses, horses that had been too old to pass muster during the South African war 14 years before. The farmers got $125, $130 and $135 for the horses, and when the horses fell down they were just allowed to lie until they had sufficient force to enable them to get up again. According to the evidence, the price averaged about $130 each, and on that basis there was a total profit of $15,000 on the transaction.

You will remember, Sir, that when I cross-examined Mr. Foster I asked him what he had been doing in Washington on Easter Sunday. He was very much surprised, and wanted to know how I knew he had been in Washington. I said, "I know." "Yes," he said, "you have been trailing me with detectives for the last three years." I rather admitted the accusation, although I want to tell you, Mr. Speaker, that it was not so.

Mr. REID: My hon. friend just took a flier.

Mr. CARVELL: I just took a flier. I happened to be at the Chateau Laurier the night before, when I met a gentleman who told me he had seen Foster's name registered in the New Willard Hotel, Washington. He had been telling his Government for days before this that he could not get in touch with these men—that they were engaged in some mining propositions in Arizona. When he admitted that he had been in Washington, I asked him if he had seen Keever and Woodworth, and he said no. I said, "You met them in Boston." and then he said that he had met them there, but that he had never asked them to come to Canada and produce the receipts. I do not know what the Minister of Customs thought about it, because he has a habit of keeping his tongue to himself, but I thought from his countenance that I could form a pretty good idea. That was the state of affairs when we left Ottawa last session. I think I have narrated the facts exactly.

Now, Sir Charles Davidson went to Nova Scotia—I do not know what for. The Lord knows what took him down there, because we proved enough here and settled it all; the Prime Minister himself read the fellow out of his party, and told him to get out. I do not know what more Sir Charles Davidson had to investigate, but he went down and spent a month in Nova Scotia. Of course, the climate of Nova Scotia is all right in summer time; he had a pleasant time, and all his entourage had a pleasant time at the expense of the country. I am sorry I have not the evidence before me. I have tried for three or four days to get it. The statement was made by the Solicitor General that a copy of the evidence had been sent to the Opposition. We have volumes 1, 2 and 5, and part of volume 6, but we have not volumes 3 and 4, and, as I understand, volume 3 contains the evidence taken in Nova Scotia in regard to the horse deals. Why we have not that evidence before us I do not know. I tried to get it on Friday, I tried again on Saturday, and again on Monday, and I could not get it. I am told it will not be ready for perhaps two or three weeks yet. Therefore I am not able to discuss this matter from the evidence taken by the Davidson Commission, and I am lawyer enough, or farmer enough—whichever you like—not to discuss a matter without having the evidence before me. I have, however, a very distinct recollection that not a day was allowed to pass on which Sir Charles Davidson did not publicly, from his place on the bench, chastise the farmers for selling horses of that kind to the Government. He even went so far as to ask men whether they realized the position in which they had placed themselves in making the sales they had made. The whole investigation was a deliberate attempt to throw the blame of those decrepit horses on the farmers of Nova Scotia, and to take it off the shoulders of the Tory party of Canada. Any man who read the evidence in the newspapers would come to the same conclusion. As I have said, I have not had an opportunity of reading the official evidence, and I reserve the right to make further criticisms upon the matter later. At any rate, that was the thing that impressed itself upon my mind, and that would probably impress itself upon everybody's mind.

I can tell you, Mr. Speaker, more than that: Sir Charles Davidson made a statement to a gentleman not more than six or seven days ago that there was nothing wrong with Foster. No, there was nothing wrong with Foster; it was those two scoundrels who left for the United States. He blamed those two scoundrels for getting the money. But what on earth was Foster, a member of the Conservative party in this House doing, handling the money for those two scoundrels?

Mr. LEMIEUX: Who gave him the money?

Mr. CARVELL: The Government gave it to Foster, and Foster never looked after his receipts. There was one little bit of evidence in the investigation before the Public Accounts Committee which I did not see reported in the newspapers. Foster admitted that on several evenings he and the secretary of the Conservative Association, Mr. Oates, went over the receipts and checked them up. They had them in their possession, and I would like to know, if they had them in their possession after the horses were bought, how they got into the possession of Keever and Woodworth. I have very grave doubts about it.

I come next to the investigation of the horse deals in Ontario, and here again, while I have not the evidence before me, I want to tell you, Mr. Speaker, that the same slipshod methods and the same conditions prevailed in Ontario as prevailed in Nova Scotia. When the Davidson inquiries were started there was a good deal of blowing of trumpets, nice letters, and that sort of thing, and at the opening of the commission a statement was made by Mr. Thompson. You will find it on page 7 of the evidence:

I wish to say at the very opening of this Royal Commission, that if any representations are made to me by reputable persons, which I consider will lead to the disclosure of any irregularities in the purchase of military supplies, or wrong-doing, or deceit, I place myself unreservedly at the disposal of persons who will give such information, and I am prepared to bring before you, my lord, any valuable information and evidence that appears to be of a reliable nature.

Acting on that invitation, men who were absolutely reliable, absolutely responsible, and absolutely respectable, went to Mr. Thompson and gave him not only information but sheaves and sheaves of evidence. They had men meet him at different points all over Canada to arrange matters beforehand. These men would meet Mr. Thompson, and tell him who was to be subpœnaed, and who was not. More than that, Mr. Thompson was furnished with typewritten statements about every case. I hold in my hand copies of the documents which were placed in Mr. Thompson's hands, and he was told in these documents who to subpœna and where to find evidence; he was told who were the guilty parties. I have not the time nor the disposition to read them all, but if the Prime Minister wishes to see them I will send them over to him. I will just read one of them in order to show the kind of information which those respectable persons gave Sir Charles Davidson. I am going to read one which deals with the purchase of horses in Ontario. A Mr. Cox—I do not know his Christian name—a son of the late Senator Cox, from purely patriotic motives, decided to present to the Government fifty horses from his stable at Oakville.

These horses were taken away, they were inspected by the Government veterinary, every one of them was passed and every one of them accepted. Their manes were shaved off, their tails were trimmed, they were put in military shape, and became the property of the Government. When Sir Adam Beck was put in charge, for some unaccountable reason, I do not know why, he refused this gift; he sent around other veterinary inspectors, and they refused to accept every one of these fifty horses. Then the man who had charge of these horses—I think that perhaps Mr. Cox may have had a little finger in the pie as well—decided to test the sincerity of those who were acting for the Government in this matter. Mr. Cox said: "We will see how serious these men are in their rejection of these horses; they will not take my fifty horses that I want to give to the Empire, but they are going around and paying fancy prices for old, broken-down horses, and I want to see how sincere they are in what they are doing." Mr. Wilson, the man who was in charge of Mr. Cox's stable at Oakville, took at least twelve of these horses of which we know to a public sale at Brampton, he got different people to lead the horses up at the sale and every one of them was bought by Sir Adam Beck's men at a big price, they were all accepted without a murmur, and Mr. Wilson got his pay for them. What happened in the case of these twelve horses I believe we can prove happened in the case of the other thirty-eight horses. Here is the memorandum that was placed in Mr. Thompson's hands regarding this transaction:

Hugh Wilson is the farm manager of Mr. Cox, son of the late Senator Cox, who owns a very large stock farm at Oakville. It would appear that at the beginning or some time after the war started Mr. Cox presented to the militia authorities in Toronto 50 horses which he took from his stables at Oakville. They were accepted by some of the officers connected with the militia in Toronto. Later on when Sir Adam Beck ascertained that these horses had been presented to the Government he made an inspection of them and rejected every one of the horses and sent them back to Oakville, notwithstanding that they had been previously accepted by some officer of the Government, and their manes had been cut off and they had been trimmed up for military purposes. No one seems to know what eventually became of all the horses, but it is known that Mr. Hugh Wilson brought twelve of them to Brampton and through Jones presented them for inspection—

This man Jones was the accomplice in this whole transaction of Fallis, a member of the local legislature.

—and they were passed by the veterinary and accepted by Fallis and the money paid for them. It is expected that some consideration was given for passing these horses and either Jones or Fallis, more likely the former, would tell what this consideration was.

Jones went to Oakville before the horses were bought. When they reached Brampton Jones distributed them about, or in other words, had different people lead them up to be sold, and when the cheques were made out Jones had these different people endorse the cheques and he put the cheques in his pocket and had them cashed himself.

This information was placed in the hands of the commissioner, and more damaging information regarding other transactions in Brampton and vicinity. When the investigation came on, and when they had Jones on the stand, the only question I am told—and this comes from Mr. Thompson himself—asked him was: "Did you buy any horses from J. Wilson?"—and the answer was: "Yes." Not a word about what horses they were, not a word about what was paid for them, not a word as to whether they were the horses that had been received and rejected! Can any man believe that this is an honest investigation? Do we want that kind of investigation into the pilfering of millions, such as I described this afternoon? No, Sir. I know the Prime Minister down in his heart does not want it. It may be that his followers behind him may drive him to it, but I hope that will not happen. I refrain from further comment on that branch of the case, because, as I said before, I have not the evidence, but I am in a position to make that statement because Mr. Thompson told the gentleman who told me that that is the only question he asked, and he said that he was afraid that he forgot to ask the rest of them.

Now I come to another matter to show the searching investigation which this Commission gave to these grave public affairs—the most searching investigation, as detailed by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries and by the Solicitor General. I am afraid that I shall have to take a little more time, and I apologize to the House, but it seems necessary to get this before the people. I refer now to the sham investigation into the purchase of a thousand automatic pistols by Major John Wesley—

Mr. GRAHAM: Colonel.

Mr. CARVELL: Colonel John Wesley Allison—in the early stages of the war. You will remember, Mr. Speaker—I know you will, because at that time you were attending the committees with us occasionally—that we had a witness here for two or three days. I have forgotten his name; there was a man here from Morrisburg.

An hon. MEMBER: Nash.

Mr. CARVELL: We had a witness called Nash here for two or three days to give evidence about some suspicious circumstances that took place at Morrisburg regarding the purchase of military clothing, but the Government were in such a hurry to get away last spring—

Mr. REID: That is not right. The hon. gentleman knows that we offered in that committee to wait as long as the hon. member was willing to have any matter investigated.

Mr. CARVELL: I know you did, but I also know that when I had to go home on the Thursday before Good Friday, and when I was compelled to hold a nomination convention in my riding on Easter Monday, and could not get back here until Wednesday, I asked that the committee adjourn over until I got back, and they would not do it. They sat, not on Good Friday, but on Saturday and on Easter Monday, something which had never happened before.

Mr. REID: But we went on with some other cases.

Mr. CARVELL: I know you did, but they had nothing to do with this matter.

Mr. REID: But there were other members who wanted to take up other cases, and we were willing to take up your case when you returned.

Mr. CARVELL: Yes, and we went into them pretty fully, too.

Mr. REID: I admit that.

Mr. CARVELL: However, there was not time to investigate Mr. Nash, and he went away. In the present month of January a so-called investigation into this transaction of the purchase of automatic pistols took place in the city of Ottawa. Col. Allison was called, and here is the evidence which he gave. I am sorry that it will take me some time to make this case complete, because I must read the evidence:

Q. Did you sell any revolvers to the Canadian Government?—A. No, sir.

Q. Or pistols?—A. No, sir.

Q. Were you the agent of any person who sold revolvers or pistols to the Canadian Government?—A. No.

Q. Or are you the agent of any company who sold any revolvers or pistols to the Canadian Government?—A. No.

Q. Did you profit by way of commission on any revolvers or pistols that were sold to the Canadian Government or to the Department of Militia and Defence?—A. No, sir.

Q. Not in any way?—A. No.

Q. Neither directly nor indirectly?—A. No.

Q. While I am on this I might clean up another point—did you sell any clothing to the Militia Department for Canada?—A. No.

Q. Are you interested, as partner, with any person who sold any clothing to the Canadian Government?—A. No, sir, I never had anything to do with the sale of clothing.

Q. To the Canadian Government?—A. No, sir.

Q. Not at any time?—A. Not at any time.

Q. Neither directly nor indirectly?—A. Neither directly nor indirectly.

Q. Did you receive any commission on any clothing sold to the Militia Department of the Canadian Government?—A. None whatever.

Sir Charles Davidson: Was there a memorandum with respect to this?

Mr. Thompson: Yes, sir, that is the information; I have asked the witness with reference to the information coming to me.

General Sir Sam Hughes: I want to see that memorandum, your lordship.

Mr. Thompson: I have not got it here.

Sir Charles Davidson: I have a vague recollection of having seen one. (To Mr. Allison.) Will you be in town for a day or two, Mr. Allison?

Mr. Allison: I do not know, I have been very unwell and came out of a sick-bed to be present here.

Sir Charles Davidson: Perhaps you could wait a little while until Mr. Auditor General is present, so that we may see if he desires to ask anything further. It is evident that you are in quite a weak condition, Mr. Allison.

Mr. Allison: Yes, sir, I have been quite ill.

Mr. Thompson: I may say, Mr. Commissioner, that there is no evidence that Mr. Allison actually sold any clothing or equipment to the Militia Department. My information was that he had some clothing and equipment in his possession at Morrisburg, and the suggestion was that this had been sold to the Canadian Government, but he tells us that neither he nor any partner of his is associated in any way with the sale of clothing to the Canadian Government.

Sir Charles Davidson: That should dispose of the matter in the meantime.

It is all over with: the show is finished so far as Sir Charles Davidson is concerned. But there was another gentleman who was not quite so willing that the show should be over, and that was the Auditor General; and this country should thank God that we have an Auditor General who brings some of these things to the attention of the public. We cannot have a counsel to represent the public on these commissions; we have no way of investigating them ourselves; and therefore it is a blessing that there is one man whom this Government cannot turn out of office, and who will see that something like justice is done in so far as it is possible for him to do it. But he is only an official; he cannot act as counsel; and he has to do the very best he can. I turn to page 7, and take the evidence of Sir Sam Hughes. Before this the minister had been giving some evidence about clothing, and I may say that he had made a most grandiloquent speech. Why, it was the chance of a lifetime to make a speech and have it published to the country. The minister seemed much more anxious to make speeches at that time than he has been during the course of this debate:

Q. Do you know if that would apply to revolvers or pistols?

Sir Sam Hughes: We have nothing to do with pistols. The deal was made through American officers, or friends—perhaps I should not use the term "friends"—but at all events he had nothing to do with the pistols in any sense whatever. Mr. Cochrane, who is a wholesale dealer complimented me on the prices we obtained the pistols at and he told me it was lower than the ordinary price.

That settled it so far as Sir Charles Davidson was concerned, but this ubiquitous little man Fraser was called the next day, and you will find his evidence on page 8. He says:

My information as to the wholesale price was that it was $18.50 with trade discount—ten and five, and two and a half, for cash. We paid $18.50 net. I know they were selling them to the New York State Government for about $14.00.

Mr. Thompson: Was it the same pistol?

Mr. Fraser: The same pistol.

Mr. Thompson: The same make of pistol?

Mr. Fraser: Yes.

Mr. Thompson: That is the Colt Automatic?

Mr. Fraser: The Colt Automatic.

Mr. Thompson: Do you know if that was a new model?

Mr. Fraser: I cannot give you the description now, but the description in the vouchers, and the description of those sold to the New York State Government is the same.

That settled it. On page 9 Sir Charles Davidson asks the Auditor General:

Q. Have you the vouchers for the Canadian purchases?

Mr. Fraser: Yes.

Then, instead of having them produced and finding out what they were, Sir Charles Davidson said:

You might produce them to-morrow, Mr. Fraser.

Mr. Fraser says, "I shall," and then they went on to another part of the evidence. Mr. Fraser came back. This little man was determined that he would get his evidence on the records anyhow, if he had to fight the whole crowd. You will find his evidence on page 17. He gives a lot of correspondence, which I will not read, as it is hardly necessary. However, he says on page 13:

In examining the accounts for the purchase of revolvers and automatic pistols I found that the Government had paid $18.50 for each pistol. I subsequently ascertained that the same pistol was sold to the New York State Government for $14.50.

I think that should be "Canadian" Government. Coming down to page 17, Mr. Thompson asks:

That is the whole of the correspondence on the subject?

Mr. Thompson wants to shut it off, but this persistent Scotchman says:

Yes, there are the vouchers.

Mr. Thompson: You might quote one of them.

Mr. Fraser reads:

"Colt Patent Fire Arms Mfg. Co., sold to Canadian Government, Department of Militia and Defence, September 11, 1914, 1,000 .45 calibre, automatic pistols, Government model, $18.50—$18,500."

Sir Charles Davidson: There appears to be a deduction for two pistols?

Mr. Fraser: Yes, there appears to have been two pistols short, and there is a deduction for these two pistols.

Sir Charles Davidson evidently did not want this to go in, for he tries to shut the Auditor General out by asking him about two pistols that were not there. But the Scotchman says:

The voucher continues: Shipped to J. Wesley Allison, Waddington, N.Y., duplicate copy sent to Valcartier to-day.

That is the man who had nothing to do with it. On page 21 Mr. Fraser states positively—I will not read his evidence—that the price of these automatic pistols was $18.50 with ten, five and two per cent off, which would bring the net price down to about $15.42. He got that evidence in for the third time, and they shut him off again. On page 23 there was a long discussion about these prices and as to whether Fraser would be able to substantiate the information he had got in New York. Sir Charles Davidson spent a couple of pages of the evidence quibbling over this, and then they were through again. Sir Charles Davidson asks:

Is there anything further?

Mr. Fraser: I think you suggested that Mr. Thompson should ask me who made the purchases.

Sir Charles Davidson: Yes.

Mr. Fraser: I was under the impression judging by the vouchers, that the purchases were made by Colonel Allison, but I read the evidence taken yesterday in which the Minister of Militia stated that Mr. Allison had nothing to do with the purchase of the pistols. The Minister of Militia stated that Mr. Allison had absolutely no connection with that, but he must have had some connection with it as the pistols were consigned to him.

[Mr. Carvell.]

Sir Charles Davidson: He may have been the consignee without having bought them?

Mr. Fraser: Certainly.

Sir Charles Davidson: Your impression grew out of the fact that they had been consigned to him?

Mr. Fraser: The voucher states so.

Sir Charles Davidson: Your impression was that he had been the purchaser because the voucher said he was the consignee?

Mr. Fraser: Yes.

What a severe cross-examination that was! How anxious this gentleman was to get the facts of the case! How his soul must have gone out in mortal combat almost, in the effort to find out who bought these pistols, whether Allison had anything to do with it or not. Such was the man who investigated these charges for the Government. Further on Mr. Fraser said that the prices were all wrong, that he could buy pistols himself by ones and twos for $18.50, and that the trade in Ottawa could buy them for that price with the trade discount off. And yet the Minister of Militia said that Mr. Cochrane complimented him on having saved the country so much money by paying only $18.50 for these pistols.

They called one T. M. Birkett, a gentleman well-known to my hon. friends opposite—certainly not a very bad Grit, anyhow. Mr. Birkett was put on the stand, and here is his examination, at page 28 of the evidence:

Q. Are you an importer of firearms? A. Yes.

Q. Have you imported, within the last two years any Colt's revolvers or Colt's automatic pistols? A. Yes.

Q. What was the price paid by your company for Colt's automatic pistols?

Sir Charles Davidson: Give the dates.

He did not want the prices before the war; he wanted them as high as possible.

A. We imported Colt automatics on September 25th, 1914, and on March 4th, 1915.

Q. How many did you import on the 25th of September, 1914? A. We only imported two, we are small dealers in those.

Q. What did you pay for them? A. We paid $18.50, less twelve and a half, less five, and less two.

Q. Making the net price per pistol how much? A. $15.06 f.o.b., Hartford, Conn.

Sir Charles Davidson: I would like to know the kind and quality, if there is any distinctive mark.

The witness: .45 calibre Government model, automatic pistol.

By Mr. Thompson, K.C.:

Q. How many of those did you import on March 4th, 1915? A. Two.

Q. What were they? A. Two .45 calibre automatic pistols, Government model.

Q. What was the price? A. $18.50 each, less twelve and a half, less five, less two.

Sir Charles Davidson: You purchased them at the same price as you purchased the others?

The witness: Precisely.

Then they called another witness, George Easdale, Manager of the Ketchum Sporting Goods Company, of Ottawa. Mr. Easdale's examination was as follows:

Q. Have you imported Colt's revolvers ·455 calibre? A. Yes.

Q. Have you any invoices for them? A. I have not imported any Colt's ·455 service since before the fire, and the invoices were destroyed by fire in our establishment, but I have here a list of the wholesale prices. Our invoices up to last December were all destroyed in the fire.

Q. How many automatic pistols did you import on March 6th, 1915? A. One.

Q. That was a .45 calibre, Government model, Colt pistol? A. Yes.

Q. What did you pay for it? A. I paid $18.50, less twelve and a half per cent, and two per cent.

There is something left out there, as the next question makes plain:

Q. That is the same as Birkett's price? A. Yes, I think so.

So evidently the five per cent. discount was left out.

Q. Let us take another one, November 8th, 1915, how many did you import then? A. We imported two ·45 automatic pistols, Government model, price $18.50, less twelve and a half per cent and two per cent.

Q. Is that a Colt pistol? A. Yes.

Q. That was the same price as the other you imported? A. Yes.

Q. Were your other importations at the same price and with the same discount? A. Yes, I might mention, of course, that although we only import one or two at the time, we are on the wholesale list, and I get the same price as the wholesalers do.

How many did you import—same price as wholesalers do?

They next called Mr. H. W. Brown, a gentleman well-known to members of the Public Accounts Committee, purchasing agent of the Department of Militia and Defence. He was put under quite a cross-examination, and here is the report of part of it:

Let me ask you, initially, are you aware of the correspondence between the Auditor General and the Militia Department?

The witness: I know there has been correspondence, but I have not seen it lately, and I do not remember it, I have seen it but I do not remember what it was.

Sir Charles Davidson: Then you had better look at the correspondence.

The witness looked at the correspondence filed by the Auditor General.

The Witness. Yes, Sir, I have seen these letters.

By Mr. Thompson, K.C.:

Q. Would you produce from your file the document showing how this contract for Colt's automatic pistols and revolvers was given?—A. So far as I know, there were no orders given for revolvers. The only orders I know of, I am speaking from memory, were orders for automatic pistols.

Sir Charles Davidson: The revolvers were only a small matter compared with the other. I think there were just twenty of them purchased, and you will recollect, Mr. Thompson, that it was said that these were handed over to the Sifton battery.

By Mr. Thompson, K.C.:

Q. What orders were given for automatic pistols?—A. The first order is one for 1,000 automatic pistols given on the 5th September to Colonel J. W. Allison, by authority of an Order in Council of that date. I have the Order in Council here before me.

Sir Charles Davidson: You might read that.

Mr. MURPHY: That is the man who had nothing to do with it?

Mr. CARVELL: Not a thing.

"The Committee of the Privy Council have had before them a report, dated 5th September, 1914, from the Minister of Militia and Defence, recommending that he be given authority to purchase for the Canadian military forces 1,000 automatic pistols, 45 calibre, at a price not exceeding $18.50 each; and 10,000 rounds of ammunition therefor, at a price not exceeding $40.00 per 1,000 rounds.

"The Committee advise that the requisite authority be granted accordingly.

"Rodolphe Boudreau,
"Clerk of the Privy Council.

"The Honourable the Minister of Militia and Defence."

In accordance with that Order in Council, and in accordance with verbal instructions which I got from the Deputy Minister of Militia, I wrote Colonel J. Wesley Allison, Morrisburg, Ontario, the same day, namely, the 5th of September, as follows:

"Ottawa, Sept. 5th, 1914.

"Sir,—

"I am directed to request you to be good enough to procure and supply to this department, at as early a date as possible, 1,000 automatic pistols, 45 calibre, at a price not exceeding $18.50 each; and 10,000 rounds of ammunition therefor, at a price not exceeding $40.00 per 1,000 rounds; subject to any instructions, verbal or others, which you may have already received. Shipping instructions will be furnished later on. The invoice, in triplicate, should be sent to the undersigned.

"I have the honour to be,
"Sir,
"Your obedient servant,
"H. W. Brown,
"Director of Contracts.

"Colonel J. Wesley Allison,
"Morrisburg, Ont."

Mr. Speaker, can any man imagine, in the first place, that evidence like that could be given before a public investigation in Canada? But, such evidence having been given, can you imagine this high commissioner, clothed with his great powers, never having brought to the witness stand Sir Sam Hughes, never having brought back Mr. J. Wesley Allison, doing nothing whatever to investigate this matter further, but closing the books so far as it was concerned? And I suppose he will come back and report to this House that everything is lovely, and that there is no trouble in the country over the purchase of automatic pistols. It is true, they brought Mr. Brown back and hectored him for a day. He read order in council after order in council, and letter after letter, the only effect of which was to prove the case more completely and make it worse. They proved at least two orders in council to buy these from the Colt people themselves, and one order in council absolutely wide open.

Now, is there any man on the other side of this House so absolutely innocent that he believes that order in council having been put through by this Government directing the Director of Contracts to purchase these pistols from Mr. J. Wesley Allison at a price not exceeding $18.50——

Mr. REID: There was no order in council of that kind.

Mr. CARVELL: No, but the order in council was to purchase them, and a letter followed, authorized by the deputy minister, on the strength of that order in council—

Mr. REID: That is the way to put it.

Mr. CARVELL: I want to put it quite fairly. Is there a man in this House or out of it, so innocent that he believes that the minister was innocent in that transaction? When Mr. J. Wesley Allison was told to buy these automatic pistols at a price not exceeding $18.50, do you suppose he was going to buy them at less? And is there any man so innocent as to believe that when the Colt Arms Company will sell two pistols to Birkett and two to Ketchum for $18.50, less discounts amounting to three or four dollars—their ordinary trade discount—that these men are going to get the whole $18.50 from the Government? I put it to the Minister of Customs.

Mr. REID: Birketts are wholesale dealers, and get the trade discounts.

Mr. CARVELL: Then, why on earth did not they get some wholesale dealer to buy them? Why did not they get the Minister of Railways to buy them? He is a wholesale dealer. He could have bought them for $18.50, less the trade discount. middleman, middleman, middleman—everywhere you go it is the middleman. Why could he not go to some one here in Ottawa? Why could he not go to Birkett's? If there was any commission to be made, why not give it to them? They are in the business. Why not go to Ketchum's; why n t to hundreds and thousands of people in Canada who are in the business and get the trade discounts? The hon. Minister of Customs tries to explain these things away, but there they are; I put them before him and before the Government. Do my hon. friends opposite want this country to go through another farce? Do they want to hand over the inquiry into a matter involving hundreds of millions of dollars, under the conditions that I have described this afternoon, to such an organization as that to which I have referred? Are they sincere in that? I cannot believe it. These things must be investigated in the broad light of day; they must be investigated by this Parliament, and I tell my hon. friends right here and now that the people will stand for nothing less than that. Hon. gentlemen might as well face the situation now as at any other time.

I realize the extreme gravity of the charges that I have made this afternoon and evening. I make them with full realization of my responsibility as a member of Parliament. I have been a member of the House now since 1904; I have been a barrister in the province of New Brunswick for nearly a quarter of a century; I have made my living during that time by practising my profession in the courts, and I think I know something about the rights, duties and privileges of a barrister. I think I know, too, what is required by the ordinary common decency of this country when a man stands up in his place in Parliament or in any public place and makes statements of the kind which I have placed before you this afternoon and evening. Sir, I do not believe that the Government —I do not want to believe that the Government—are going to allow this session of Parliament to pass without giving us a chance to investigate these matters to the very bottom. If there is anything in which I am wrong, set me right; if there is anything which have not made strong enough give me an opportunity and I will supplement it with the real facts of the case. I have pointed out the condition of affairs in Canada; I have pointed out the manner in which the shell contracts have been let and the manner in which the hay transactions have been bungled in my province. I want my people to know that, by the manner in which this thing has been, not bungled, but botched in the interests of Tory friends in New Brunswick—my constituents are compelled to take $13 a ton for their hay, whereas the people in the province of Quebec, where the Government are buying the hay and pressing it themselves, are getting $17. In the daily papers to-day you will find No. 2 hay quoted at $20.50 in Montreal. Take away $1.25 for pressing and $1.75 for freight, and you get back to $17. In Quebec the farmer is getting $17, whereas my constituents are getting $13, or $13.50 at the very outside. In Nova Scotia—I am not going into that, but I am told that the Government are pressing there, and the contractors are not making the horrible rake-offs that they are making in my province. Perhaps I am taking a more serious view of the condition of affairs in Canada than I should. I confessed to you this afternoon that I took a somewhat pessimistic view of it; I repeat that now. The Government say that they are going to increase our army to half a million men. We have now little over 200,000; I tell you that they have a gigantic task on their hands to raise the other 300,000 men. I have no doubt they will find enough Conservatives to fill up the offices, but I am afraid they will have some difficulty in getting enough Liberals between the ages of eighteen and forty-five to fill the ranks.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. CARVELL: The Liberals are allowed to fill up the ranks, but that is as far as they are allowed to go in the defence of the Empire.

Mr. SMYTH: That is not correct.

Mr. CARVELL: Is it not? I will discuss that with my hon. friend the Minister of Militia; I am not going to discuss it with any back-bencher. I will have an opportunity of coming face to face with the Minister of Militia to discuss this matter, and I will prove my statements.

Mr. SYMTH: That is absolutely false.

Mr. GAUVREAU: You are paid to tell that.

Mr. SMYTH: That is absolutely false, too.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Take it back.

Mr. SPEAKER: It is my duty to say that the expression which the hon. gentleman has just made use of, that " it is absolutely false," is unparliamentary and offensive, and I should like the hon. gentleman to withdraw it.

Mr. SMYTH: Of course, I bow to your ruling, but I say it is absolutely false, because the colonel of my regiment is a Liberal.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Take it back.

Mr. CARVELL: Let it go, Mr. Speaker; it is another case of a man who forgets to be a gentleman.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman, immediately after you called him to order, repeated the very offensive words which he had used. The other day, of your own motion, you required me—and very properly so—to withdraw an expression which I had made use of with regard to the Solicitor General. There should be one rule in this House, for members on one side as well as for members on the other.

Mr. SPEAKER: I certainly always do my best to have but one rule in this House for members on both sides of the House. As soon as I heard the hon. member say that the statement was false, I rose and called him to order, and asked him to withdraw it. The hon. gentleman said that he was ready to submit to my ruling; the hon. member for St. John says that he repeated the expression.

Mr. CARVELL: Immediately repeated it.

Mr. SPEAKER: I understood that the hon. gentleman had withdrawn the remark; I did not catch the other words. If the hon. gentleman repeated it, I must fulfil my duty and ask him to withdraw it.

Mr. SMYTH: Of course, I bow to your ruling, but will you allow me to explain? The hon. gentleman just said—

Mr. CARVELL: I object, Mr. Speaker, to any explanations; the hon. gentleman withdraws it, and that is the end of it.

Mr. SMYTH: He made a mis-statement.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. CARVELL: I object to any explanations on the part of the hon. gentleman.

Mr. SPEAKER: I hope the incident is closed; I understand that the hon. member has withdrawn the remark.

Mr. CARVELL: Mr. Speaker, after this little breeze, I shall spend a few moments in trying to collect my scattered thoughts. I have tried to draw the attention of the country to the very serious conditions which have prevailed. I have tried to point out that the Government will have some difficulty in getting 300,000 men. But, Sir, it is the duty of this Government to get them, if that number of men is necessary in order to assist in bringing this war to a successful conclusion. I am not advocating conscription—I do not like that term; I am not going to advocate force of any kind; but there are hundreds of means by which this Government can get men, if they would adopt different methods from those to which they are adhering at the present time. What do you think must be the view of the ordinary man of this country when he reads of the horrible pilfering of public trust funds which has been the subject of newspaper articles during the last two or three months? What will be the opinion of the man who has a family to support and who feels that if he goes away his wife and family may become a public charge? What will be the thoughts of the man who, perhaps, has scarcely enough money to keep body and soul together, when he looks around him and sees the political henchmen of my right hon. friend the leader of the Government profiting, not by the thousands of dollars, but by the tens and hundreds of thousands? I tell you, Sir, they must adopt a new principle, and turn over a new leaf, if they are going to get men. I tell them that if they will go at this thing honestly, uprightly, decently, patriotically, they can get the men; but they cannot do it by conducting affairs as they have been conducting them in the past. I asked the Government this afternoon if it was true that Mr. Lloyd George had sent a message over here that he did not want to have these matters investigated. I was not able to get an answer and I do not believe it is true. But if it be true, if Mr. Lloyd George does not want us to investigate his end of the transaction, I want our end of it investigated. If this Government has been misappropriating millions of our money—and the Minister of Finance says we are paying our proportionate share of these expenditures—we want our end of it investigated. I quite understand the position in which the British Government finds itself to-day. It is up against the most horrible proposition any government has had to face in the last one hundred years. The British Government wants every man, and every dollar, and every round of ammunition, and every ounce of influence of any kind that it can command, in order to bring the war to a successful conclusion. It is compelled by force of circumstances to deal with the men who occupy the Treasury benches in Canada to-day. It cannot come over here and quarrel with these men and tell them publicly the things that I am telling them to-night. It would not be politic. The British Government is bound to look to these men so long as they remain in office, in order to have them help them out of its troubles. But, if everything was all right, why did the British Government find it necessary to send a representative over here in the person of Mr. D. A. Thomas? And if things were all right after Mr. Thomas came here and investigated, why was it necessary to dismiss in ignominy the old Shell Commission, reorganize it, and form a new one? These are the questions I want the Government to answer. If things are all right why do these things happen? Why does Toronto Saturday Night announce: No new orders for Canada, while Russia tries to place $150,000,000 contract in the United States? Why do manufacturers all around the city the last day or two tell you that there are to be no more war orders for Canada? Why is it published in the public press? I think it is the duty of the Government to tell us at once whether it is true that no more orders for munitions are coming to Canada. If it be true it is a misfortune for Canada because it is, no doubt, of enormous advantage to us that our labourers be kept busy, that our factories be kept humming and our industrial life be kept in as high a state of efficiency as possible. It is of infinitely greater importance to this country to know whether the Government of Canada has so mismanaged, yes, so grossly mismanaged the affairs that the British Government has entrusted to its sacred charge, that the British Government absolutely refuses to come over here and do any more business with our Government? That is the lamentable part of it, the part of it to which I wish to direct the attention of members of the Government and their supporters. I repeat that it is the duty of the Government, and I hope they will not allow the sun to go down again, before they state to the House what the facts are in connection with this lamentable condition of affairs which exists in Canada to-day. How can these men expect recruits to pour in when they see this horrible condition of affairs existing? How can they expect recruits when they know that this petty political patronage is going on in every hamlet in Canada? A Liberal cannot get a chance to sell a pound of tea to the soldiers.

Mr. WILCOX: Rot.

Mr. CARVELL: It is not rot; it is a fact. It is known to every one of you. There is not a man sitting over there who is not guilty clear to the ground.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. gentleman knows himself, I think, that the expression which he has just directed to the members of this House of knowing that they are guilty, is offensive and unparliamentary.

Mr. CARVELL: Perhaps I might be allowed to qualify the word "guilty" by saying "guilty of looking after party patronage."

Some hon. MEMBERS: Withdraw.

Mr. SPEAKER: What do I understand the hon. member to say?

Mr. CARVELL: I say: guilty of looking after party patronage. That is the sense in which I used the word. I try to measure my words and to use proper language. When you consider this state of affairs, when you consider that people all over the country are making sacrifices in order to work out this great problem which we have staring us in the face; when you consider the fact that public bodies, municipal corporations, have been granting money by the thousands and tens of thousands to supplement our patriotic fund; when you consider the great campaign going on in Montreal and Toronto to-day to raise millions for the patriotic fund; when you consider that in every hamlet in this country the women are organized in Red Cross societies and patriotic societies; when they are saving their quarters and sometimes their dimes in order to add to the amount of money available for these objects of mercy; when you realize that even the school children are holding concerts and saving the pennies and dimes for the same purpose; when you consider that the women of this country, the mothers, sisters and wives, are knitting and praying and praying and knitting, from end to end of Canada, for the safety and comfort of their dear ones at the front; when you realize the terrible sacrifices that the poor people of this country are making; when you realize the awful responsibility resting on every public man, yes, on every private citizen in Canada, to do his bit, and to do it in the most manly and upright manner, in order to bring the war to a successful conclusion; and then place against that the condition of affairs I have been describing here this evening; how can you go out and ask people to recruit, to take the chance of giving up their lives, to put their loved ones in the charge of charitable institutions in order that they may go to fight for their country?

I thank you, Mr. Speaker, and the House for the very patient attention which you have given to me. It has not been a pleasant duty, I can assure you, to lay before you these facts which I have been compelled to state this afternoon. But I have performed the duty to the very best of my ability. I have placed before this country the facts as I see them, as I know them; and I can only say, in conclusion, that if the Government will give us a committee of this House, I will guarantee to prove every word I have stated, and I will supplement it by very much which I have not stated.

Mr. S. FRANCIS GLASS (Middlesex East): Mr. Speaker, the congratulations that have been extended to you by eminent leaders and other members of this House of high standing in public life and in the country but emphasize the honour conferred upon you. In my humble sphere as one of the rank and file among those who have the honour of representation here, I desire to join in the congratulations and endorse the kindly sentiments that have been extended to you. The position of Speaker is not only an honourable one, but an historic one. I understand that in England it dates back to the year 1382. While it carries with it the highest honour within the gift of Parliament, it likewise symbolizes confidence and trust in the occupant. But great as are the responsibilities involved and onerous the duties, I venture to say they will be discharged by you efficiently, and with that fairness, dignity, and impartiality which for nearly the last half century have characterized those eminent men who have been elected to fill that honourable post. I will go further and congratulate the House on the choice it has made.

The unusual conditions which we are called upon to meet remind us of the weighty problems with which this country is confronted at the present time. It seems, therefore, peculiarly fitting that in the sentiments expressed by the right hon. the leader of the Opposition and by the right hon. the Prime Minister and by other members who have already addressed this House, there should be a preponderance of opinion and sentiment favourable to a unity of purpose and co-operation in the task that lies before us which on ordinary occasions might not be expected. Let me read the words used by my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition in his address a few days ago. He said:

> When the war broke out, both parties in this House agreed that it was the duty of the Canadian people to participate in the war to the fulness of our resources.

Further on in his address the right hon. gentleman said:

> We on this side of the House, His Majesty's loyal Opposition, feel that we should declare that we are perhaps more than ever before imbued with the responsibility which appertains to an opposition, and especially in time of war. It will be our duty to criticise: to criticise fairly under all circumstances, and to criticise forcibly perhaps, but always to criticise wherever there is cause for criticism. It will also be our duty, and a far more pleasant duty it is, to support whatever there is just cause to support. We come to this House with this one aim only: to contribute as far as may be in our power to the final and complete victory of the Allies over Germany.

If the right hon. gentleman speaks, as he should, for those whom he leads, it seems to me that some of his followers have not hewn closely to the high and lofty spirit of patriotism which was so much in evidence throughout the address of their right hon. leader.

I have listened patiently, and with a great deal of interest, to my hon. friend who has just preceded me (Mr. Carvell). I may say, Mr. Speaker, that I had hoped to have four or five hours of this sitting within which to address the few observations I might have to make to this House, but from the very extended remarks he has made, and at this late hour, I am afraid I will have to considerably curtail them. It is said that one in public life must be over-praised by his friends to compensate for the harsh criticism that he sometimes receives from his enemies. If the tone of this debate continues on the lines which have been followed by some members of the Opposition, I am afraid, Sir, that we will have to extend to our friends on this side of the House who have been so harshly criticised a degree of praise that will overtax the thermometer to which my friend the hon. member for South Essex (Mr. Wilcox) referred. The people of this country are awakened to a sense of the mighty problems involved in the prosecution of this war. I say that no matter by what standard we measure it, this war is without precedent or parallel. If we measure it by the destructiveness of the weapons employed, nothing so horrible has ever been known. Inventive genius has been exhausted to find new ways by which man can kill his fellow man. The trade of the whole world has been deranged. Transportation has been crippled, especially so by the withdrawal of shipping from the customary channels to provide for the more urgent needs of war. Not only the lack of ships, but the increased risks of the sea have resulted in higher carrying charges. As a result, it is said that it costs three times as much to transport a bushel of wheat at the present time as it did in times of peace.

And why all this struggle; why this destruction of life and of property? There is a cause to be found in that false philosophy, that false doctrine, that might makes right. McCutcheon has, in a recent cartoon, illustrated two characters, one representing War, and the other Anarchy, curious, hideous looking monsters, and across the breast of War was written the words, "Might is right," while across that of Anarchy was written, "dynamite is right." It seems to me to be difficult to draw a distinction between these two doctrines. If we support the doctrine that might is right, we must be prepared to repudiate all the moral code upon which we relied for the protection of individual right, and for the guarantee of private property. There is one lesson, and that is, that nations which aspire to mere physical supremacy can have no hope of immortality. The fact that they put their faith in force is proof positive that they have only the seeds of death. The pathway of human progress, from ancient times down, has been strewn with the wrecks of empires which at the zenith of their power thought themselves invincible. We realize that Germany is the most resolute, the most cunning, implacable, unscrupulous foe ever arrayed against our country. We are fighting against a military organization which for forty years has been preparing for this struggle. Last May they were making shells at the rate of over 250,000 a day, while the Motherland was producing 2.500 high explosive shells and 13,000 shrapnel. The result of these superhuman efforts of Germany were seen in the tremendous turnover in Russia. Through a tornado of shells Galicia was won back, and the Austrian morale was restored, Poland came under the invader's foot, and a large part of the Balkan provinces have been overrun. The whole explanation of the astonishing success of the enemy, except in the case of Serbia, was that the Germans had enormous supplies of ammunition, whilst, compared with them, we had none; we were short of guns, especially of machine guns. However, this preponderating advantage has to a very large extent been overcome.

That brings me to the point in the discussion which has taken up a large part of the time of my hon. friend from Carleton, N.B. (Mr. Carvell), the munition question, which I think, has taken up the greater part of the debate since its commencement. I do not know that I can add anything new, but I do not think that the remarks of my hon. friend from Carleton will tend to stimulate and influence and increase production amongst the manufacturers of this country. From a patriotic point of view, from a sense of giving stimulus to industry in this country, I am afraid that the remarks he has made this afternoon, if they are spread throughout the country, as no doubt they will be, will rather tend to discourage the development of our industries along these lines. I noted that my hon. friend said, with a great deal of force and vigour, that he was prepared to prove every statement that he had made.

My hon. friend throughout his remarks gave a great deal of attention to that species of industries which he called mushroom industries, and in connection with these mushroom industries, he presumed to refer to an industry in the city of London. I would like to ask my hon. friend what is the definition of a mushroom industry. I do not know what his remark means as applied to those institutions which have carried out their contracts and have delivered the goods to the War Department. My hon. friend referred to an institution in St. Catharines, which, he said, had received a large order for shrapnel shells. Could my hon. friend tell me just how many shells were given to this company in St. Catharines to which he refers?

Mr. CARVELL: My notes have gone to Hansard, but when I get them back I will be only too glad to.

Mr. GLASS: My hon. friend has no doubt that there was an order for shrapnel shells given to this firm to which he refers?

Mr. CARVELL: I cannot carry all these things in my head. But if I made the statement this afternoon I stand behind it.

Mr. GLASS: My information is that the Metal Drawing Company of St. Catharines, incorporated with a capital of $50,000, took over the plant of the Reo Motor Company to which he referred.

Mr. CARVELL: I made that statement.

Mr. GLASS: We are then referring to the same company?

Mr. CARVELL: Yes.

Mr. GLASS: An order was given for brass cartridge cases, not shells, and not shrapnel—brass cartridge cases were never before made in Canada, and, as far as I know, not made by any other plant now. I will not say that they are not made now, because I do not know.

An hon. MEMBER: Not made at that time.

Mr. GLASS: Not at that time, anyway. This company use presses, not lathes, for their work, and they added to their plant presses costing $200,000 to carry on the manufacture of these cartridge cases. Some one had to go into this business if Canada was to make fixed ammunition. Even if an order for shrapnel had been given to them I would be unable to appreciate the force of the argument that my hon. friend put up this afternoon. I would be rather pleased to know that these orders had been so widely distributed all over the country because the fundamental need of 10 p.m. the industries of this country was to distribute these orders so that labour might be employed as far as practicable. That was the object of the Government.

My hon. friend has taken a good deal of time to discuss the question of prices, which has been discussed amply and fully by hon. gentlemen who have preceded me.

I note that the hon. gentleman this afternoon read out of the Liberal party the Free Press of Ottawa. I fancy that the Free Press will survive. I do not even know now whether the hon. gentleman altogether represents the views of the Liberals in this House, or of the members of the Liberal party, but I do know that this paper has been recognized as a Liberal organ in this city, and my hon. friend knows that during the time the Liberal party controlled the Government that paper received its share of the Government patronage. Therefore it was rightly considered as a Liberal paper.

Just here I want to refer to the fact that my hon. friend was very much incensed because he was interrupted on one or two occasions this afternoon. My attention has been drawn to the fact that my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Hazen) was interrupted no less than sixty-three times during his address to the House yesterday and several times by the hon. gentleman who objected to-day.

Mr. CARVELL: I think I should call my hon. friend's attention to the fact that he is very much in error. I have no recollection of raising any objection. I tried to answer questions put to me, and I thought that I did so with some degree of success. I did not know that I had objected seriously at all.

Mr. GLASS: I forget the incidents in connection with these interruptions, but if I have wrongfully interpreted the hon. gentleman's attitude I regret it and take it back.

Mr. EDWARDS: There is no misinterpretation at all. I asked the hon. gentleman to explain in regard to the St. Catharines business, and he could not answer the question and consequently objected.

Mr. CARVELL: Mr. Speaker, I make no comment.

Mr. GLASS: In the House yesterday the hon. member for Carleton asked for some information in regard to the shell question, and the Free Press had some observations concerning it. It says:

> In the House of Commons yesterday Mr. Carvell asked the Minister of Marine why he did not read a complete list of the companies who had received contracts from the Bertram Shell Committee.
>
> "Go to the Shell Committee and get them," was Mr. Hazen's suggestion.
>
> "Nice chance we would have of getting them," commented Mr. E. M. Macdonald.
>
> "While the minister is in the giving mood," observed Mr. Carvell, "I would ask him to get the dates of the contracts, the quality of the munitions to be supplied, and the price to be paid as well."
>
> Would it be believed that all this information, in just as complete and detailed a form as Mr. Carvell suggests, was actually supplied to the Liberal Opposition last July? Messrs. Carvell, Macdonald and Pugsley seem to be slashing around in the dark when men sitting alongside of them are in possession of documents which, though confidential, would at least enlighten them if they seek only for facts. These gentlemen pretend to laugh when The Free Press opinion of this shell business is quoted; but their laughter is as nothing to the amusement The Free Press derives from such dialogue as the one quoted above.
>
> To sane men it is unnecessary to argue that the Bertram Shell Committee could not reveal all its operations in the newspapers. But knowing as we do that the Bertram Shell Committee did take the Liberal Opposition into its confidence privately, in regard to all the contracts placed in the period under criticism, how can we interpret otherwise than as petty partisanship the efforts in some quarters to create the impression in the public mind that there has been a refusal to "lift the veil"?
>
> And The Free Press months ago set its face against petty partisanship for the duration of the war.

The Free Press has referred to these charges and to the Shell Committee scandals, as they may be called, and, in the edition of the 21st January, it published again the statement made by General Bertram. I think it is regrettable that Sir Alexander Bertram, who has sacrificed so much, who has so worthily discharged his duties, and who has been honoured by his King only recently in recognition of his services, should be made the subject of reflections of this kind, and that these criticisms should be spread broadcast throughout the country. General Bertram is a gentleman who is held in the highest esteem by all who know him, and his honour cannot be questioned. General Bertram, in a statement issued on December 27 last, said:

> At the outset, I wish it to be understood that I am not a politician seeking honours or graft. I have been trying to do a job faithfully and honestly, and to do something which will be a credit to the country. Evidently what little I have done has not pleased some—the Daily Mail, of Montreal, and others.
> There is absolutely no truth in the report of my resignation, said Gen. Bertram. I have not resigned and don't intend to. I have been working night and day for fourteen months, and it has undermined my health. Mr. Flavelle urged me to take a holiday. I expect to be away a month or six weeks.
>
> Now I suppose it is proper, since I am going away, to make some answer to my critics. I want to clear the air. I have seldom sought to be interviewed, but feel now that it is necessary.
>
> I was asked to undertake a contract by the British War Office, and I have here the contracts showing that these were allotted through myself to manufacturers at prices fixed in all but one instance by the British War Office. That single instance I refer to was a contract for 100,000 shells at a price fixed by myself. I had nothing to go by, or any records to assist me. In comparison, I can show that the prices for similar work on a contract let through J. P. Morgan & Co., New York, were $1.45 per shell higher. I was guided by American prices, and it was due to the ability of our manufacturers and mechanics that Canada was able to produce these shells much cheaper and quicker than elsewhere.

My hon. friend knows very well that in the early days of the war it was difficult to get manufacturers to take the responsibility of putting in equipment for manufacturing shells. In my own city of London the firm of E. Leonard Sons & Company, of which Mr. Frank Leonard is the head—he has two sons rendering distinguished service at the front to-day—were offered orders for manufacturing shells, but at the start they did not feel that they had the machinery and equipment adapted for it, and at the prices offered and under the conditions at that time they did not feel disposed to accept the order. It was not until shells had been manufactured in this country for some time that Mr. Leonard, stirred no doubt by the splendid valour of his sons at the front and imbued with their loyalty and patriotism, made up his mind to go into the shell business. When the earnest appeal for shells came he accepted orders under the regular terms and conditions. My hon. friend seems to make a great deal of the fact that repeat orders were given for a lesser price than the original orders, that the price kept getting lower with successive orders until it has got down possibly to rock bottom. I do not think there is anything mysterious about that. I do not think my hon. friend is dull of comprehension at all. He told us this afternoon that he was both a lawyer and a farmer. Well, even a lawyer or a farmer can readily appreciate that experience and increased orders must regulate to some extent the cost of production. Speaking of lawyers reminds me of a little skit I saw in the Globe recently. A young fellow from the country went to town to study law, but after three days he came back home again. His father said: "Well, son, didn't you like it?" "No," said the boy, "I am sorry I ever learned it." My hon. friend has objected that shell orders have been given to certain firms, and he asks what connection railway companies have with making shells. I believe that one of the criticisms my hon. friend made later on in his speech was that the Government had not used the Transcona shops for manufacturing shells. In this crisis, so long as the goods are delivered, it makes no difference who makes the shells. The shells are what the people want and that is what the Government try to obtain.

I am not in a position to make any reply to my hon. friend's remarks about the hay scandal in his province, but I have no doubt the Minister of Agriculture will reply to him to the full satisfaction of this House. If I had any observation to make on that head, I would say that the farmers in his part of the country seem to be a good deal easier and softer than the farmers in my part would be. I submit that we should take a great deal of what my hon. friend has said this afternoon with a degree of reserve, for I remember former occasions on which his judgment did not seem mature and reasonable. I wish to refer for a moment or two to some of the criticisms made by my hon. friend of the Militia Department's Estimates when they were up in the House in the year 1914. At that time my hon. friend said:

> The principal cause of the trouble with the minister (referring to the Minister of Militia) and his top-heavy Militia is the report of a General named French, who came to this country some years ago, and in my judgment his visit was one of the greatest misfortunes that has befallen Canada.

Further on he says:

> I told the late Minister of Militia (Sir Frederick Borden) publicly and privately, that in adopting the ridiculous and unreasonable report of this gentleman he had committed a great mistake. It might be all right if General French were reporting on the conditions in Bulgaria, or Russia, or Germany, or even Italy, but when it comes to a country like Canada where there is no possibility of trouble his ideas are ridiculous. There is no more possibility of war breaking out between Canada and any country in the world than there is of the Minister of Militia and myself committing suicide between now and to-morrow morning. There might of course be a possibility of the Empire being at war and we might find it our duty to volunteer.

Further on he says:

> We do not want this top-heavy militia force.

Mr. CARVELL: I would ask whether my hon. friend knows that the Conservative party have canned and discarded within the last three weeks some tons of literature which they had had prepared on the French incident?

Mr. GLASS: My hon. friend knows more about the Tory literature than I do.

Mr. ROGERS: I should know something about this. If any such thing had happened I should certainly have some knowledge of it, but I can assure my hon. friend that his statement is absolutely incorrect.

Mr. CARVELL: In view of what is taking place in Europe.

Mr. GLASS (reading):

> The difficulty in arguing with my hon. friend is that he seems to believe in it. When a man really believes in such a policy as that, it is arguing with a crazy man, because there is no good in arguing with him. Does the minister believe that the Canadian Militia works for the benefit of any man in Canada, morally, religiously or in any other way in the world? He does not have enough of it to improve him physically. When I was in Germany, I admit, I could see the result of military training there. You could see it as the men walked along the street. In Canada you do not get enough military training to be any benefit physically.

All you get in the militia of Canada is that you teach about twenty-five per cent of the men in Canada how to get drunk. That is the size of it.

Further on the hon. gentleman said:

The trouble is my hon. friend is living in a fool's paradise over this. I believe he is sincere about it, and as I said before that is the difficulty. I am sincere when I say that I believe my hon. friend is sincere about it. He lives in this thing, he is dreaming over it, and he believes all of these fairy tales he is telling. I want to tell him they are only fairy tales and they do not exist.

This was six weeks before the declaration of war.

Mr. CARVELL: Will the hon. gentleman tell me how many of the first contingent had performed their annual drill during the three or four months prior to their going?

Mr. GLASS: I am not in a position to give my hon. friend that information, nor do I see what material bearing it has on the question. I am quoting these remarks of his to show that we have to take his words with reserve, because in the past we have not found them consistent nor altogether right. Referring to the engineering corps, the hon. gentleman said:

What is the good of an engineering corps unless you have highly trained technical officers? If you would take farmers or lumberjacks they would be some good because they know how to do a good many things.

If you can find two other sentences in Hansard, side by side, that are so inconsistent as these two, I should like to know where they are to be found. First, the hon. gentleman calls for trained technical officers, and then suggests that farmers or lumberjacks should be taken. I agree that the farmer is an intelligent man and understands a good many things, but I think the average man would question his adaptability as a technically-trained officer. The hon. gentleman proceeds:

The men there are dudes, lying around and drinking booze. They are good enough, decent fellows out of camp, but when they get into camp it is simply drink booze from the day they come until they leave.

On the same day, the hon. gentleman made these observations, as recorded at page 4620 of Hansard. He was showing the minister how to be economical, how to spend money so that it would be good for the country.

If the minister would spend this money in something that was of real value to the people, I would not mind so much, although I would not consent to spending $15,000,000 a year. On rifle associations and bands—something of real value—he is only spending $80,000. If he would take half a million dollars of this money he is squandering and get some decent bands in the country he would be doing some good.

That is the hon. gentleman's idea of what was most essential at that time, before the war. He objected to the expenditure on clothing, munitions and arms, and all the accoutrements of the army. If the minister would discontinue his extravagance in building armouries, and training militia, and would buy half a million dollars' worth of bands—that is what the hon. gentleman thought the country most needed. He referred on this occasion to the fact that he had been in Germany, and had seen the result of military training there. He should have observed the meticulous preparations of the Germans, and, having had the benefit of such observations, one would naturally have looked for a broader vision and a keener perception of the future than that which he displays.

But he is not alone in the views he expressed on that memorable day. The hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) spoke on the same day and on the same question. I refer to his speech at page 4591 of Hansard:

Canada is simply going military-mad under my hon. friend.

Referring, of course, to the Minister of Militia. He goes on:

This huge expenditure on militia is simply monstrous, and the people of this country will revolt at such useless extravagance.

Referring to the cadet movement in Quebec, he said:

The cadet movement is not a new institution.... My hon. friend has invented nothing and he will deceive no one. In our day the Minister of Militia did not try to impress upon the minds of the youth the foolish idea that war was imminent and that our country was to be a camp of warriors and of barbarians, as in the days of old.

And my hon. friend from East Lambton (Mr. Armstrong) at that time quoted a line from the pen of Eliza Cook, which, in view of subsequent events, seems to have been most appropriate:

Never trust the soft breathing that preaches of peace
With a pledge giving lip and a smile-lighted eye;
Hear it all with good will, but be provident still,
With men that are earnest and powder that's dry.

On the same occasion the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) gave expression to his sentiments in connection with the Address, at page 4580:

There is no danger in sight; why, then, raise the militia of this country to the enormous figure of between 75,000 and 80,000 men? There is no reason for it; there is no emergency in sight, and there will be none in our day and generation.

This was six weeks before the war. Further, the hon. gentleman said that on one occasion the Minister of Militia had said that he could turn out 750,000 men if the necessity arose, and then proceeded:

Well, he does not believe, I do not believe, and nobody believes, that the occasion for turning out such a large number of men will ever arise in our lifetime, or in the lifetime of the children who are to come after us.

That was the foresight that this hon. gentleman possessed at that time, in reference to the urgency of preparation.

I wish now to refer to some remarks that my hon. friend from Russell (Mr. Murphy) made the other day. The hon. member wished to make some capital—or I do not know what he was trying to get at—about the circumstances of the right hon. the Prime Minister of this country being called to the council of the Imperial Cabinet. And he went ahead to give statements made by Sir George Paish. I do not know that what Sir George Paish thinks or says has any more significance than what the press of England says. I believe that to a greater degree than any personal influence the press of the country directs public opinion. We remember that on the 1st of January the right hon. Prime Minister announced an increase of the forces of this country to half a million, and this is what the Post of January 4 said on that subject:

Canada had already authorized the raising of 250,000 men, so at the outbreak of war, Canada determined to contribute an army about the size of the existing British Army—and she has now doubled it. Together with Canada, Newfoundland, Australia, New Zealand, and South Africa, we are contributing men and treasure to the common cause of the Allies. Each and all of the self-governing Dominions have won imperishable honour in the field. It is not too soon to understand what these things mean, for their significance is for the present, as well as for the future. What do the people of the Dominion mean by the word "Empire"? Even the most perfervid among those who opposed the Imperial idea before the war would hardly have affirmed that the Dominions considered it to mean a military autocracy. The Dominions are self-governing communities exercising in practice a perfect autonomy of government. Their local patriotism is intense, yet they somehow succeed in disproving the theory that local patriotism and a sentiment for something wider cannot exist together. Before the war there were many excellent people who were quite unable to perceive why the existing condition of affairs was not in itself sufficient.

The war has at least demonstrated the fact that the body of civilization and tradition and the material possessions of the Empire are liable to the most furious and determined attack, and it follows that as security can only be gained by unity, some closer form of unity is required. It also follows that as every state or assembly of states is exposed to the war of commerce in which the war of arms is often implicit, a security in this respect is also required, and it can only be attained by the same method of a common organization. In so far as this country is concerned, it has long been clear that, in default of some such coherent scheme of association with the overseas Dominions, she must decline from her place among the nations. The true conception of Imperial development has been defined by Lord Milner as "the permanent organic union of free commonwealths and states to maintain the greatest ideals common to them all." War was declared by this country without, so far as is known, consultation with the Dominions. Their entrance into the war was an act of free will; therefore the organic union has for the moment been actually achieved. That momentous fact does in itself alter at a stroke the whole situation. It is not England alone who is fighting on the side of the Allies, but the British Empire—a very different thing. Nor is it conceivable that in the war the Empire should be acting as an organic whole, and that in peace it should resolve itself into separate parts, only connected each to the other by casual and indeterminate relations, subject to the whim of the colonial office. The old conditions cannot be resumed, because the people will not have them. That the present Government should have steadily declined to invite the premiers of the Dominions to their councils is greatly to be deplored. It is no longer a question of courtesy or of expediency; it is a question of right. The people are indifferent no longer. Men who have fought together side by side cease to regard one another as strangers. The nation will insist that no matter whatever else is done in the interval, the Dominions should have an equal voice in the framing of the terms of peace.

This is the view of the Post as to what effect the co-operation of the Dominion in the affairs of the Empire would have upon its future destinies and politics. It may be that considerable significance and honour was attached to the visit of the Prime Minister of this country to the councils of the Empire, and it is strange that there should be any objection to his not being prepared to make any complete statement as to what occurred at that time.

In the earlier part of my remarks, I referred to the loyal words of my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition: "It will be our pleasant duty to support whatever it is just to support." As I listened to the remarks of my hon. friend this afternoon, I wondered, having in regard the statement of the right hon. leader of the Opposition, if the hon. gentleman really saw anything to support. It looks very much as if the idea of hon. gentlemen opposite as to their duties in this House is that they should oppose and criticise everything. It looks as if they have made up their minds in advance that there is nothing good in the Government of this country. My hon. friend devoted a good deal of time to the subject of partisanship and patronage, and particularly to the partisanship exercised in the province which he represents, as well as in Nova Scotia. He was good enough, in the rambling remarks which he made, to take up the politics of even the distant province of British Columbia. The hon. gentleman says that he has been a member of this House since 1904. I should like to ask him if, during the time that he occupied a seat on the government side of the House, when the Government of which he was a member had the patronage, he on any single occasion, in connection with the Civil Service in his constituency, recommended a Conservative to office.

Mr. CARVELL: Yes, Mr. Speaker, many of them. And I may tell my hon. friend that when the Government went out of office, I had not a solitary constituent in the Civil Service at Ottawa, and I had but one on the Intercolonial railway.

Mr. GLASS: I am very glad that there is some good in my hon. friend after all. However, aside from that, I do not think my hon. friend expects that his personal Liberal friends in his constituency have the primary right to consideration in the matter of vacancies that may occur within his district. That is contrary to the accepted rule of party government, anyway, and contrary to the practice of his party when hon. gentlemen opposite were in power.

The address of the hon. member for Richmond (Mr. G. W. Kyte) the other evening, until he reached the small and picayune politics to which I am going to refer, was full of interest and fair criticism. But I wonder if my hon. friend, when the pages of history are written, will recall with pride the fact that in this Parliament, at a time when his leader pledged his support to this Government, he discussed the matter as to whether a Conservative or a Liberal barber should have the right to shave a soldier in Ottawa, or as to whether a Liberal or a Conservative should do the laundry work in the militia. In this time of mighty conflict, when all the physical, moral, and material forces at our command should be co-ordinated and concentrated to the purpose of prosecuting this war, remarks of this kind are scarcely in place, and I hardly think that my hon. friend will have cause for congratulation when he comes to review the words of the speech which he made the other evening.

Very frequently the attitude assumed by an opposition is that of pessimism. I have been looking for a definition of pessimism, and I find that the dictionary defines it as the doctrine that everything in nature is ordered for or tends to the worst, or that the whole world is essentially evil.

Another definition is: The worst possible state or condition. At a time like this I do not feel that that should be the feeling permeating our people, even in the air of politics that surrounds this House. Robert Burns, away back over a hundred years ago, at a time when the Mother Country was at war and somewhat the same conditions seemed to prevail, made use of these words:

> O let us not, like snarling curs,
> In wrangling be divided,
> Be Britons true, be Britons still,
> Amang oursels united.

I think and I hope that that is the attitude that the members of the House, on whichever side they may be, should adopt, that we should get away from this whining, captious criticism, and discuss the broader issues. I want to say right here, and I am now speaking for myself as a member of this House, so far as the criticism of the Shell Committee is concerned, that I know no reason why the fullest information should not be given to this House. I do not believe it is necessary to take up the time of this House in investigating a thing of this kind, which might be given over to a Commission. But I do not see why a Commission could not be appointed that would give every possible chance to the Opposition to satisfy their interest in the matter. I give my own opinion of it, but I do say that public opinion has got to be respected; and if there is any matter of doubt, if there has been created even by the suggestions and criticisms of the Opposition, a doubt in the minds of the people of this country, I feel it is the duty of the Government and of this Parliament to satisfy the minds of the people. I take that attitude, so far as I am concerned, and express that view for myself. I have not discussed it with members on this side of the House and I do not know how they feel; but I believe that the great majority of the members of the House feel this way. But let me qualify that also. I do believe that our hon. friends do not criticise in that kindly spirit and in that manner that can command the consideration that possibly they otherwise should be entitled to, and at the present time, when so much is at stake, I would ask my hon. friends: Can we not get this information, can we not criticise, without that apparent undercurrent of petty, picayune politics, which is so distasteful and which stirs up that feeling of resentment and enmity. I do not think that my hon. friend in his criticisms this afternoon has shown exactly that spirit of desire for information. I believe that questions are put on the records of this House, asking for returns and asking for information that could be obtained by any individual member, whether he be of the Government or of the Opposition, from the department concerned, without any hesitation, and without the necessity of occupying and wasting the time of this House. It looks to me as though a great deal of this information was attempted to be obtained in that way for the mere purpose of shall I say grand stand play? but certainly for some ulterior purpose.

I would naturally expect that under the extraordinary conditions and in view of the splendid condition of this country financially, with the prosperity that seems to abound on all sides, that, so far as the Government can guide and direct these things, if our hon. friends were fair and wanted to follow out the lead set by their right hon. leader in the effort to carry out those ideals, they would have had some word of kindness and commendation to offer with reference to these conditions. Surely the Minister of Finance is deserving of praise for the way he has handled and guided the affairs of his department which has brought the highest encomiums from bankers and from the biggest business men in the country. Hon. gentlemen have no adverse criticism of the policies pursued, except that old question of the tariff which will naturally come up from time to time. But, broadly speaking, the difficulties that they predicted a year ago and the pessimism that was so prevalent then, have not been justified by the result. Can they not see in the existing state of things something for which we should be thankful and not be altogether despondent in spirit and so be tempted to adversely criticise?

Naturally, at a time like this, there are considerations outside of the war which should and do demand the interest of this country, and for that reason I believe it is all the more necessary that the members of this House should be united. When the wages earned, owing to the activity of industrial life, are almost unprecedented, as they are in this country to-day, some encouragement should be given to the labouring classes to save their surplus earnings. In England this matter is engaging the attention of the Government, and they have appointed a National War Savings Committee to look into it. The committee, I understand, have had many meetings and have considered some suggestions. Their inquiries are not yet completed. Arrangements are being made to take evidence from various represenative bodies, one of the first being the parliamentary committee of the Trades Union Congress. One of the suggestions there is to extend the facilities of the Post Office Savings Department, and to increase the rate of interest paid on deposits from two and a half per cent to four per cent. I do not know that, as a member of the House and supporting the Government, it is right for me to make an observation that I feel impelled to do, but I do think that at this time there are some changes that the Government might consider in view of the changed conditions in the country. I believe that the insurance companies of this country are collecting entirely more money in premiums than is necessary for the reserve they have to maintain. A three per cent reserve would appear to be no longer necessary, in view of the present high earning power of money, and I think that, at this particular time, every effort should be put forward to encourage the labouring classes to conserve their resources and invest in life insurance.

The matter of vocational training is also of great importance, more so, possibly, than at any other time in our history.

The question whether Great Britain will adopt a protective tariff after the war is being discussed in England, and the idea finds favour among many newspapers which were formerly free traders. The Morning Post, for instance, strongly supports the protective idea as a means of carrying on the fight against Germany by economic pressure, and it urges certain steps to form a union with the colonies on this basis, and later to approach France, Russia, and Italy with a proposition for a zollverein. In view of this I believe that we should secure the most competent, the most able men of science available to advise and assist in developing the infinitely varied potential resources of our country.

I think, also, that after this war, with the increased number of immigrants who will come to Canada, the matter of rural credits, which has occupied so much attention in the United States Congress during the last year, and which will no doubt result in legislation during the present session of Congress, should receive some attention in this country. I am sure that the people of this country, and, I think, even the Opposition in this House, can find something in the conduct or management of the affairs of the country which commends itself to them. I read in an English paper also a report of the statement issued by Sir Robert Borden to the Canadian people on the first day of the year. I believe the sentiments he expressed in that announcement were full of patriotism, and would be endorsed by the people throughout the whole of this country. I desire to repeat these words announcing the authorization of an increase of the Canadian forces to 500,000.

> In the dawn of another year our hearts are more resolute than ever to accomplish that task, however formidable it may prove. By the greatness of the need our future efforts must be measured. Nowhere is the Canadian spirit more firm and unwavering than among the men who hold the trenches, and those who will shortly stand by their side. Nowhere is it more undaunted than in the hospitals and convalescent homes. Already we have learned the full measure of sacrifice. To all Canadian homes that have been saddened, to all Canadian hearts that have been stricken by the tragedy of this war, we pray Divine blessing may bring consolation and healing. Much has had to be learned during the past fifteen months, because we were not prepared for this war. The strongest assurance of ultimate victory lies in the fact that we have not been crushed in learning that hard lesson. Those who forced this war upon us may be assured by the tradition of our past that the lesson will be thoroughly learned, to the end that there shall be an enduring peace. The very character and greatness of the ideals for which we are fighting forbid us to pause until their triumph is fully assured. The Canadian forces at the front have fought a good fight, and have crowned the name of Canada with undying laurels. To them and all of our overseas forces now under arms awaiting to do their part, we bid God-speed, in the sure faith they will never fail in duty.
>
> The Morning Post of London, England, speaking of this action, says: Canada has now announced, has decided to raise its armies to half a million men. Do not let us lag behind our own children in duty to the Empire, but rather let us lead them by example—and we ought also to consult them both as to the conduct of the war and the terms of settlement. It becomes more and more evident as the great struggle proceeds, that if we are to hold our own in the world we must take our children into partnership. Alone, events may prove too much for us, but if a united Empire acts together upon a common policy, it may face anything the future has in store.

[Mr. Glass.]

Now, Sir, in face of all that has happened, in view of the conditions that exist, is it not our duty to look forward with cheer and hope to the prospects of another year? Canada's outlook, to some extent, must be based on the experience of the last eighteen months; no idea based on the experience of peace years can be of moment in discussing the possible results of the year 1916. We assume that the war will continue throughout this year, and though the position of the Allies at the present time lends much encouragement, it seems evident that we are yet a long way from the end of the struggle. On that assumption, we may reasonably look forward to a continuance of the good prices for grain and farm produce, and it seems to me, Sir, that the programme, or propaganda, whatever we may call it, of production that was inaugurated last year may well be continued to the advantage of the country this year. The large increase in our wealth, the large increase in our exports, the large increase in the revenues all lend hope and encouragement, and yet behind them all there is the sacrifice which our people are making with good hearts to assist the Motherland. Those of us who have been around in the country and have witnessed the eagerness and the zeal with which the mothers of our land are devoting themselves to the things that may be of assistance in this war, must have been impressed by the loyalty and patriotism which prompts our people in all parts of the country. When I read of the campaign inaugurated in this city for the collection of $400,000 in three days for the Patriotic Fund, it seemed to me paradoxical that those who represent the people, those who are in this House of Commons should find so much to quarrel and wrangle over. I am satisfied in my own mind that, after all, there is behind these differences that spirit of loyalty and devotion to the country which will prompt our hon. friends opposite to lend assistance to the Government. If we get fair criticism, honest criticism, not that captious picayune party criticism which is offered for the purpose of politics and not for the purpose of obtaining honest information, I think we will get rid of a good deal of those differences between us.

I do not know, Mr. Speaker, that I should detain the House any longer with the remarks I have to make. My hon. friend who spoke this afternoon (Mr. Carvell) referred to some matters which, as I have said, do not come within my province or power to discuss, or answer, but I am satisfied that, notwithstanding what he has said, when the Minister of Agriculture replies to him, there will be, as there always is, the other side of the story. In connection with his remarks as to how he could get the co-operation and aid of the labouring man, without which we cannot continue this war with conditions as they exist, and as he represented them, my hon. friend seemed to think that there will be considerable difficulty in getting the 500,000 men we have set out to get. That is only characteristic of the pessimism which has been exhibited before on the opposite side of the House, and I do not believe that tactics of that kind will aid the recruiting. I like the optimism and good spirit of the Minister of Militia, and when he is called upon to defend his department I have no doubt that he will be able to give an ample answer to the interrogations that have been put to him. My hon. friend the member for Richmond, the other night, referring to the conditions in Nova Scotia, and to the partisanship which he claimed had been shown there in almost every instance connected with the Militia Department, said that at the moment he could not recall the name of more than one Liberal captain in that province. In the district from which I come the colonels of the three leading battalions that have recently been organized, one of which is at the front now, the 34th, were all Liberals. I have never, in my experience, since the war commenced, found the minister acting in the partisan manner described by my hon. friend. I have found that the minister has on every occasion given consideration to the qualifications of a man seeking appointment.

Let me close my remarks this evening with a sentiment which I have thought appropriate at this time. We have been referring to the loss of the lives of our young men on the battlefields of France and Flanders, and the following lines seem particularly fitting:

Not in vain have these young lives been lost
Amidst the carnage of embattled hosts:
The bravest of our sons have shown the world
That in the hour supreme they were the mates
Of those whose names are on the golden roll
Of Britain's truest heroes.
They wrought that freedom might prevail
throughout the world;
They fought the fight and counted not the cost.
We sorrow for our honoured dead, but not in sorrow
Shall we prize their names, for all the future Shall we hold with pride the record of the deeds they did
When on the fateful day they met the foe
And, grimly fighting,
Fell, victors in death, immortal in their deeds.

On motion of Mr. Stanfield, the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Hon. Robert Rogers, the House adjourned at 11 p.m.

Wednesday, January 26, 1916.

The House met at Two o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

PRIVATE BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bill (No. 11), respecting British America Nickel Corporation, Limited.—Mr. Northrup.

Bill (No. 12), respecting The Calgary and Edmonton Railway Company.—Mr. Douglas.

Bill (No. 13), respecting The Canadian Pacific Railway Company.—Mr. R. B. Bennett.

Bill (No. 14), respecting The Central Western Canada Railway Company.—Mr. Green.

Bill (No. 15), respecting The Pacific Northern and Omineca Railway Company.—Mr. Green.

Bill (No. 16), respecting The Quebec, Montreal and Southern Railway Company.—Mr. Lemieux.

REPORTS AND PAPERS.

Copies of general orders promulgated to the Militia for the period between November 25, 1914, and December 24, 1915.—Sir Sam Hughes.

THE GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH.

ADDRESS IN REPLY.

Consideration of the motion of Mr. Alfred Thompson for an address to His Royal Highness the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, resumed from Tuesday, January 25.

Hon. Sir SAM HUGHES (Minister of Militia and Defence): Permit me, Mr. Speaker, at the outset of the few remarks which I purpose making, to offer you my hearty congratulations upon your being called to fill the high position which you now occupy. I know that you will pursue the line of your predecessors, and reflect nothing but credit, honour, and dignity upon the position.

I scarcely know, Mr. Speaker, how to begin my remarks. Thus far, nothing of an adverse nature of any importance has been said concerning the department over which I have the honour to preside. There has been more or less talk concerning the organization called the Shell Committee, but, as was the case with like expenditures at the time of the South African war, the expenditures in connection with the Shell Committee and the conduct of its business do not appertain to this Parliament. In 1899 and 1902 large sums of money were placed by the British Government to the credit of ministers of the Crown in Canada and they were checked out by the ministers or by their attorneys, and when inquiries were made by members of the House as to the disposition of these moneys, they were met with a prompt refusal. On that occasion I myself had a thirst for knowledge. In my locality in the central part of the province of Ontario, rumor had it that a large number of horses had cost the British Government the sum of $157 or $160 each on an average, were, within three or four weeks of the closing of the war, sold for the sum of $38 each. It was in vain that I made inquiries in regard to this matter, so I promptly dropped it, and I have never been enlightened as to the real facts of the case, from that hour until the present. At the outbreak of the present war I declined to follow the line set by my predecessors in that regard, and accordingly, the funds for all these shell contracts were placed to the credit of a special account under the control of the Shell Committee. For a double reason, therefore, I do not see that it is the function of this House specially to inquire into any of the transactions in connection with that committee; although I should be more than pleased, so far as I am able, to give all the elucidation of the facts, and all the enlightenment as to them which it is possible for me to give. I attended two meetings of the Shell Committee, the first and the last—but I shall take that up later.

I wish to deal, as briefly as possible and yet as fully as possible, with some of the statements that have been made by gentlemen on the other side—possibly by gentlemen on both sides—as to the impatience of the troops to get across the water. We all realize that the troops are impatient to get away, but I am sure that every one who understands the situation knows that upon the British Government and the British Government alone depends the calling of the troops across the water. Canada today stands prepared to send twenty regiments as soon as transports can come for them, but the British Government have not the transports available, nor have they huts available for winter quarters. In general, without going into the details of the matter, it is impossible for us to send the troops over until they are asked for on the other side. We feel that it would be good for these splendid fellows to get over and to obtain a stepping-stone training in England before they cross to the front to do their duty for King and country. However, it does not necessarily follow that because the troops are kept in Canada their training is not good. We feel that the troops that were trained in Canada for the first division were second to no troops in the world; I know that the troops that have recently gone over are favourably reported upon. Our boys who have gone across the water are better trained in shooting and manoeuvring than are any troops on the other side that have been under training for a similar length of time. This speaks well for the training of our troops in Canada. This impatience to go to the front is a matter, affecting not only those who are now training for overseas service. Personally, my own heart's ambition was to go to the front, but my duties at home prevented me from doing so. Possibly I am filling a better job here than I could at the front. It is true that I had my own ideas of how this war should have been conducted at the beginning. It is true, as everyone knows, that your humble servant, before the war began, predicted that this war would be a trench war, and endeavoured to lay plans to have it thus carried out from the beginning. However, I feel that my position here is much larger than it could possibly be in command of a mere division or corps at the front.

I do wish to say a word for a great many of my officers who cannot go to the front. Surgeon-General Fiset served in the South African war with great distinction, under fire and not under fire. He was always a friend of the soldier and was always ready to do his duty fearlessly and well. It would have been the joy of his life had he been able to go to the front; but it was impossible to spare him. The same thing is true of General Macdonald, Quartermaster General, was anxious to go overseas to look after his department, but he could not be spared. So with many more, General Gwatkin, General Hodgins, Colonel Winter, every officer on the staff has been anxious to go to the front, but we could not spare them.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: General Lessard—do his duties prevent him going?

Sir SAM HUGHES: And there is General Lessard also. No doubt he is anxious to go to the front, although I have not seen an application from him. We know that his health is not good. There are also General John Hughes, General Logie, Colonel Mewburn, soldiers second to none, some of whom have distinguished themselves in war before, who have had more experience than others, but who have not been sent to the front, because they cannot possibly be spared. Therefore no one has been invidiously selected to remain at home. I think that if any one has a right to go to the front General Fiset or I would have that right; but we realize the situation and are content to stay at home and do our duty in Canada, be that duty well performed or ill performed.

Reference has been made to machine guns. That subject, in fact, has been discussed very fully in the House, and I am sure every one here will agree with me that this is one topic that ought not to be openly discussed in Parliament. I will gladly furnish to the Prime Minister, and I am sure he will be only too glad to give to the leader of the Opposition, a full statement in connection with the disposition of machine guns, under our own purchases and under the purchases made with the sums that have been contributed from time to time. I may say that the guns are coming in now with considerable rapidity, and I am satisfied that the statement, when it is furnished to those who have a right to see it and who are concerned in it, will more than satisfy them that everything is being done that could be done, that the wishes of those who contributed money to this cause are being carried out to the letter, and that the wishes of the Canadian people and the Canadian Government in the same regard are also being observed to the letter. If that will satisfy the right hon. the leader of the Opposition, or any member of Parliament who chooses, we will show the details in connection with the matter and I am sure when they see them they will be more than satisfied.

Reference has been made to the discharge of soldiers, and to returned soldiers, and to pensions. I believe that these matters have been satisfactorily explained to the House and disposed of. However, if there is any question put to me at any time I will be only too glad to give any data in connection with these subjects.

I might point out in connection with the training of officers, that when the war broke out we had a large number of very finely trained officers. A great many of the best of these naturally were selected to go with the first contingent. But we had to keep a lot of them home in order to supervise the training of the new regiments. However, as contingent after contingent went over, we were obliged—and we were glad in one way and sorry in another to do so—to send these good officers to the front, until we must now train up in their place a large number of officers to fill the gaps in the new regiments which are being raised all over Canada. In order to get the best men for these positions we are about to open military schools in every military district in the Dominion of Canada, and these will be opened at a very early date. Admission to them is practically open to every man who has any sort of a decent education and shows any fitness whatever for soldiering. Certificates will be issued to men who attend these schools, showing the qualification which they have attained, whether it be sergeant, lieutenant, captain, major or so on. In order to make it as democratic as possible, we are taking men in from week to week and giving them as thorough a training as possible, graduating them from class to class and stage to stage, until they are finally able to get the certificate of whatever grade they aspire to and are able to attain. It is partly on the lines of the old military schools which we had in the old military days in Canada, and partly on more democratic lines. The plan is meeting the approval of all those who have had an opportunity to look into it, and I am satisfied that the success of these schools will be such that every one will have the same good opinion of them that we have already formed.

In connection with every overseas battalion organized, we immediately organized schools for the training of non-commissioned officers, and also for the training of officers in the district. At the present moment we have hundreds of officers in the schools. But under this system, if an officer has not been able to attend on the date set for the opening of a school, he has had to wait for three months in order to take his course. Under the new policy they will be able to enter every week, and thus we will prevent useless delay in the case of many excellent men. A splendid lot of men are coming forward and offering themselves as privates, non-commissioned officers and officers. In this regard I wish to point out that a large number of men of the class of engineers, business men, men of strong character and superior education are tearing themselves away from their occupations in life and are coming forward. They are put into training at once and from these the most efficient will be chosen to fill up the new corps.

I might say, in passing, that the right hon. leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) last session brought up the question of the purchase of the Valcartier camp site. I am pleased to inform him that the claims of the proprietors have been before the Exchequer Court, and, I think, have now practically all been settled.

I have also observed that some question was raised in this debate about Colt pistols and Colt machine guns. As this is a Canadian matter, I wish to give the fullest information at once. At the beginning of the war, as every one knows, the United States manufacturers doubted whether they could legally contract during war time with a foreign government engaged in war for the delivery or sale of munitions of war. The United States Government, after a month or two, settled that matter in the affirmative, deciding that the manufacturers could sell. In the meantime the British Government was purchasing a very large supply from the United States. The problem was how to get these supplies out without possibly involving the manufacturers in trouble, because they would not assume the responsibility of shipping direct to a belligerent power. I took the matter up. I se ured the services of a life-long friend of mine Col. J. W. Allison, a man in whom I have had life-long confidence, a man who is the soul of honour and kindness. Thousands and tens of thousands, yes, millions of dollars' worth of war materials were brought in from the United States to Canada by arrangement with our Customs Department, and were then shipped by way of Canadian routes to the old land. Finally, Col. Allison followed the matter up, and it was arranged with Washington that a declaration should be made that these commodities could be shipped by these people direct from New York, or any other United States port, or directly to Canada, without violating any United States law. That accounts for the letter read by the hon. member for Carleton, N. B. (Mr. Carvell), yesterday as being sent by the director of contracts of the Dominion of Canada to Col. Allison in regard to these shipments. He was the officer I had employed, he was kind enough to oblige me in this regard. It is true that the matter of the Colt pistols has been before the Davidson Commission. Inasmuch as this matter has also been referred to, I may be permitted to read to the House a letter which I received from the Colt firm. At the time the question of Colt pistols was brought before Judge Davidson. a wire was sent to the Colt Company asking how they happened to be selling these pistols in Canada to commercial dealers at a lower price than the Government had paid for them. I had had the assurance of the Company—I did not observe at the time that the words " sold to any Government " had been introduced—that the lowest price at which they sold to any Government was $18.50. I naturally concluded that the Government would get a better price than the wholesale merchants, but I was very much surprised to learn that great as our business with the Company had been, it was small compared with their business with some single wholesale merchants. I may say that an officer of the Company and another officer came promptly to Ottawa, and knowing that Judge Davidson was going to hold an inquiry, promptly offered to appear before him and give a full explanation concerning the prices. This company has an arrangement with the United States Government providing that the United States Government in their own factories can make one of those pistols to two made by the company, and they control to a certain degree the price of the article. The United States Government takes hundreds of thousands of pistols, and, as probably the House is aware, the different states in the Union have for war purposes an agreement with the Federal Government that the equipment and material and weapons of the Federal Government should also be adopted by the various states of the Union. This is the letter received from the Colt Company:

Hartford, Conn., U.S.A.,
13th January, 1916.

Major-General Sir Samuel Hughes,
Minister of Militia and Defence,
Ottawa, Ontario, Canada.

Sir,—In reference to the price at which this Company has sold and is selling automatic pistols, Cal. .45, to the Government of Canada and to wholesale hardware or sporting goods concerns throughout the Dominion, we desired to place you in possession of facts which we believe fully justify our position and account for the difference in price to the wholesale distributers.

Policy.—For many years this Company has marketed its product very largely through the medium of the wholesale distributers who in turn sell the arms to the small retail dealers, by whom the arms are again sold to the individual consumer.

The established wholesale list price of the automatic pistol, Cal. ·45, in the United States of America is $18.50. From this price the distributer is allowed a discount of 12½ per cent and 2 per cent for cash, also an additional commission of 5 per cent, provided he agrees to co-operate in the upholding of the resale price and to assist to the best of his ability in creating a demand for the Colt's arms.

These concessions in price we believe he is entitled to for the advertising done through the valuable space given in his catalogue for illustration and description of the pistol, to compensate him for investment represented by stock of pistols carried in his store, some of which he often keeps on hand for many months before selling, and to help share in other selling expenses involved in the conduct of his business.

Our customers in Canada are requested to use as their selling price the United States price of $18.50, plus duty into Canada, which at present is 37½ per cent, plus an amount sufficient to cover carriage charges and incidental expenses.

Government business.—This company has in its selling arrangements with the dealers, reserved government business to be handled direct. Such business is of a spasmodic nature, not coming with any regularity as commercial business does, and usually when it comes in any volume, is due to abnormal conditions requiring special attention.

Since the outbreak of the present war, we have had very large orders from several governments involved and each one, like your own, has requested us to do everything possible to effect speedy deliveries. This we have done at very great inconvenience and largely increased expense of manufacture. We have had to provide a large amount of additional space, procure a great many new machines, pay a much higher rate of wage to workmen, and in addition, have given each and every workman a bonus of 12½ per cent of his regular wage in order to get the fullest measure of co-operation and loyalty. All pistols made for governments are subjected to unusual tests and most rigid inspection which involves extra expense.

These very unusual expenditures have added materially to the cost of the automatic pistol, Cal. ·45 and in consequence this company has not since the beginning of the war, sold any of those pistols to any government other than the United States of America at a price lower than $18.50, neither is it prepared to consider doing so. We have supplied and are at present supplying a great many of these same pistols to other governments involved in the war, at same price you paid. This price has been uniform, regardless of quantity purchased.

The fact is, we consider the price most reasonable in view of the service desired during a period of great stress, and we are proud to be able to serve so well as we have succeeded in doing, our friends who have wanted help. Had we selfishly considered only our own interests, we could have placed much of our product at premium prices, but have not done this, preferring to be loyal to our friends.

These pistols are made under a license for which we pay a considerable royalty to the inventor who also has licensed a European manufacturer to make pistols of his invention, giving to them the exclusive right to sell in certain countries where we are not at liberty to offer our pistols. This fact makes it incumbent upon us to render strict account of the ultimate destination of each pistol we produce under the license, necessitating our exercising very rigid control of the sales. We would not consent to the resale of the pistols at a price less than $18.50 by any dealer who buys from us.

Your orders to us for automatic pistols, Cal. .45, aggregated 5,000. We have regular wholesale dealers who each year purchase a greater number of pistols and revolvers than that from us. Business coming to us regularly from month to month, year by year, is much more profitable than irregular orders which demand unusual facilities to supply.

This Company has its regular corps of travelling representatives throughout the world, who each year devote considerable time to the negotiation of government business, although in many countries, as in your own, many years pass without any business being secured. In consequence, a portion of the selling expense involved during each of these several years must be taken into consideration when the selling price to governments is arranged. Commercial business each year bears its own apportionment of the selling expense but in government business, the sales for some one particular year or season, such as the present, must bear the allotment of several years selling expense.

We are not unappreciative of the orders with which you have honoured us, but we want you to fully understand the conditions under which we have to operate.

I may say further concerning Col. Allison—I shall refer to the matter of fuses in a very short time—that in all his dealings with business firms in the United States he has in each instance, so I am informed and believe, given those with whom he dealt the following letter, or one similar:

May 14, 1914.

Confirming my verbal statements to you of yesterday and in order that there can not be any room for misunderstanding, I now reaffirm in writing my position in connection with the fuse question.

I have been and am doing my very best to secure the lowest prices possible for the Government, and above all things wish to do whatever I can to aid them in procuring the best workmanship, lowest prices, and largest deliveries possible; and if you are bidding for the manufacture of this fuse for the Shell Committee or the Canadian Government, I want it distinctly understood that I do not want any profit added to the price under any conditions, with the intention of providing a commission for me, as I would not under any circumstances accept a commission of any kind from anybody, in connection with this matter.

Very truly yours,

(Sgd.) J. Wesley Allison.

At this point I may be permitted to state briefly where our soldiers are stationed. At the present time we have about 60,000 soldiers in France, nearly 60,000 in England, and the balance of 250,000 odd training in Canada. We have three divisions at the front, and a fourth is in course of preparation. Other troops are ready in Canada to cross to England, and the troops in England are getting ready to cross to France. We trust that in a very short time we shall have the different units, the artillery, infantry, army medical corps and army service corps complete for the four divisions at the front.

I observed a remark concerning complaints as to recruiting. For the first contingent, our recruiting plans were, I think, different from anything that had ever occured before. There was really a call to arms, like the fiery cross passing through the Highlands of Scotland or the mountains of Ireland in former days. In place of being forwarded to the district officers commanding, the word was wired to every officer commanding a unit in any part of Canada to buckle on his harness and get busy. The consequence was that in a short time we had the boys on the way for the first contingent, whereas it would have taken several weeks to have got the word around through the ordinary channels. Under that plan the contingent was practically on the way to Europe before it could have been mobilized under the ordinary plan. For the second mobilization, during last winter and summer, there was no immediate hurry, and we followed the ordinary routine of going through the divisions. It was found that recruiting still kept up well. For the contingent which is being recruited this winter, realizing that we would have a large number of troops for which the British Government would not likely have use for another month or two; at all events, we followed the plan of billeting them in their own localities. For example, in my own county, there are twenty or thirty places where troops are being billeted during the winter. A great many people say that you cannot control men if you keep them isolated. I believe that nearly all of those gentlemen who are wearing the uniform are just as capable of governing themselves as are the people who take so much interest in looking after them. These men are good, law-abiding citizens of Canada, decent, respectable fellows, the best in the land. In the county I have the honour to represent we have turned out upwards of 3,000 men, and we have about 700 there still, and not one solitary case of misconduct has occurred since the beginning of the war amongst those troops, except in the case of a couple of fellows who got boozy one evening, and I do not know that that is limited to soldiers. The same record holds good throughout the country. The consequences are that, where the system which has been inaugurated has been properly carried out, we have these men billeted in villages here and there and all over the country, many living at their own homes at night, going to drill every morning, surrounded by the best associations and, little by little, acquiring that discipline, self-control, and knowledge of military drill that are essential to the upbuilding of the soldier. Morover, we find that in all these localities, they can engage in military sports. We furnish them with miniature rifles and dummy targets, and these fellows put in a very entertaining, instructive and upbuilding time. This system also saves us the trouble and expense of furnishing large buildings in the principal centres, renting buildings at enormous expense wherein to house these men. It must also be remembered that when you bring men to the larger centres you bring them, not to the comfort and convenience of these localities, but to temptations which do not certainly contribute to the upbuilding. I do not know that I need add anything to what I have already said with regard to the plan of recruiting.

I wish to take up for a few moments that very-much-discussed question in days gone by, the Ross rifle. The proof charge calibre of the Ross rifle, following the former Lee-Enfield rifle, was .459 at the base. I have given all the figures to the leaders on both sides of the House, and I would be glad to supply them to any hon. member who may wish to see them. This was the exact size practically of the cartridge of the .303 British rifle. It was found soon after the war broke out and before a Canadian rifle was fired at all, that the brass of the cartridge case was too soft. The many troubles and disasters that from time to time befel the British rifle and the soldiers between Mons and the Marne, and in subsequent engagements, were found to be traceable to bad ammunition. The Princess Pats, who used the Lee-Enfield rifle, met with disaster and trouble owing to the bad ammunition supplied them—it was not due to the rifle but to bad ammunition. When the Canadian division fought at St. Julien —that magnificent and memorable fight— they largely used our own Canadian ammunition, which was absolutely perfect, as were some other brands of ammunition. Some of the American ammunition was good, a great deal of the British ammunition was good, but there were three lots of British ammunition that were bad, and they were not recognized at the time by our boys or by the British regiments as being bad. The consequence was that both at St. Julien and Festubert, where the Canadians used our own Canadian rifle and our own Canadian ammunition, there was no trouble. At Festubert there were a number of rifles that jammed, but it was found to be due to the fact that the ammunition was defective and not the rifle. I may say that as soon as the cry went up about jamming rifles, I immediately took steps to have the Ross rifle chamber enlarged to .464, which is two-thousandths of an inch larger than the Lee-Enfield, which is .462. A good deal of fault was found at the time about this, but the House, I am sure will be glad to learn that now the British Lee-Enfield is being enlarged to exactly the same size, one more instance in which they are following in the steps of the Canadian people, they realizing that it is better to have the ammunition slightly smaller than the chamber of the rifle rather than that it should be too tight a fit. The reason is that dirt will get on the cartridge; the brass of the cartridge case will sometimes be soft in consequence of too much annealing, and if it is too soft there is going to be jamming. Therefore, at the present time, I am in a position to state that reports from the front say that both rifles, with the enlarged chamber, are giving the best satisfaction. On January 18 General Carson sent the following report:

> Full report from General MacDougall states that no cases of jamming of either rifles have occurred in England for months and the confidence of the men in both weapons and ammunition has been fully established. Bad ammunition which formerly jammed in both rifles has been withdrawn.

Another report received by Col. Helmer with reference to the cause of jamming, said that it was due to defective ammunition. He says:

> A large amount of "B," "G" and "N" ammunition in some mysterious way again found its way to the Canadian trenches. This ammunition was condemned a year ago nearly. Result: when rifles were used for rapid fire, after about 60 rounds, bolts began to hang—an entirely expected result. What the men do not know—and what no one appears to have had courage to demonstrate to them is that with the same ammunition the Enfield rifle cannot be relied upon to fire 15 rounds.

The House will be glad to know that both rifles are now in perfect condition, and that the supply of ammunition is very carefully watched to see that nothing goes wrong.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Has the Lee-Enfield rifle been enlarged?

Sir SAM HUGHES: The new British Lee-Enfield rifle has been enlarged to exactly the same size as the Canadian rifle—.464 and corresponding sizes right down through. There has been a reference made to the last Lee-Enfield rifle, and it was only about three weeks ago that I learned that the new British rifle had been enlarged to the same size as ours, namely, .464.

When the war broke out, hon. gentlemen will remember that my right hon. friend the Prime Minister stated in the House that in so far as he was concerned, the conduct of this war would be non-partisan and non-political. As far as my observation goes, and I have observed very carefully, he has religiously carried out his promise. On that same occasion, or a couple of days afterwards, I also made a similar statement in so far as I was concerned, following the lead set by the Prime Minister. I said that in the conduct of the militia of this country, where Liberals and Conservatives were facing the music alike, there would be no party politics.

My good friend from Carleton, N.B. (Mr. Carvell), in the course of his address yesterday, trusted that I would raise the veil with regard to shells, and explain some party politics in that connection in my own county. I will do so with the very greatest pleasure. In my county there are twenty-seven to thirty organizations where shell boxes could readily be manufactured. I think only two or three of those organizations, in my county, have obtained orders for shell boxes. I was amazed and very angry when I saw that so few contracts had been given. I certainly thought that the Shell Committee, knowing that my time was occupied elsewhere, should have looked after the county I have the honour to represent a little better than it did. Let us see who these three firms were.

The first is a firm in Fenelon Falls, a most charming town. Mr. Tiers, a very estimable gentleman, who runs a little planing mill there, had not the necessary facilities, and so he obtained the assistance of Mr. Burgoyne, who put up considerable money. Mr. Tiers is one of the most intelligent and decent Liberals you can find in the whole community, and I was only too glad that he and Charley Burgoyne were in a position to get the contract. The veil has been lifted as regards Fenelon Falls.

Mr. CARVELL: I am afraid the veil will have to be rent again before all will be plain.

Sir SAM HUGHES: The next firm is F. W. Wilford—a good name, whether as surname or Christian. Mr. Wilford is from a staunch old Liberal family in the Eastern Townships of the province of Quebec. He saw fit to marry a charming Lindsay girl some years ago. I have never asked him for a vote, or offered him any advice on the subject, so I am not in a position to say how he votes, but all the evidence I have on the subject points him out as a staunch Liberal, well acquainted, I believe, with the leader of the Opposition. I hope, however, that he has become intelligent by this time.

The next firm is the Digby Lumber Company. I do not know who the members of that firm are, but the gentleman at the head of it is a good Liberal.

The next is a firm by the name of the Stinson Company. Stinson's father was a good honest old Tory, and young Stinson is a partner of Mr. R. J. McLaughlin, a bosom friend of the leader of the Opposition. He, McLaughlin, is a gentleman whom it has been my privilege to trim on two or three occasions at election time, a very estimable gentleman in civil life, but in politics, Oh dear! The veil has now been lifted so far as my county is concerned. I think the Shell Committee has neglected my county shamefully, and the next time I meet Sir Alexander Bertram I shall tell him so. My time was so occupied that I could not join the horde of promoters and others who were hanging around the doors of the Shell Committee.

Let us take up next the Militia appointments. Two divisional commanders out of three are good staunch Liberals. I refer to General Currie, of Victoria, and to General Turner, of Quebec, two of the finest fellows who ever stood inside jackets, and two of the best men to be found in the Dominion.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Hear, hear.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Not a solitary Conservative in the whole Dominion objected when I nominated these men for brigadiers long ago. The other one is General Mercer. As regards the politics of the brigadiers, I understand they are about half and half. I do not know what my own son's politics may be, but I know he will vote straight anyway. As regards the lower commanders, I am told by those who have looked up the matter—I have not looked it up myself, it would make no difference anyway—that three-fourths of them are Liberal and one-fourth Tory. That is only what we should expect to find, and I say this seriously. The Liberal party was in power sixteen years, and naturally under the system that was first used a number of young gentlemen of the Liberal persuasion would come to the front, just as a number of young Tories are coming to the front to-day because the Conservative party is in power. That is only human nature. When I took office a great many of the gentlemen occupying senior positions in the service were Liberal. I might point out that a gentleman has written me—I do not know whether it is true or not—that in one regiment in Nova Scotia twenty-four of the twenty-eight officers are Liberals and the other four Tories, that three of those Tories are at the front, but the Liberals are all occupying soft jobs at home. Whether that is true or not I can not say. I would not recognize such twaddle anyway.

Mr. CARROLL: What regiment is that?

Sir SAM HUGHES: I shall be glad to tell my hon. friend privately, but I can assure him it is not the regiment to which he belongs. As regards the medical men, I am told that of the forty-eight senior officers only four or five are Conservatives. General Jones is a good staunch Liberal. General Roberts, one of the loveliest boys and best soldiers and best medical men that was ever in a hospital, is also a staunch Liberal. Fotheringham is also a Liberal, and so is Scott, who is my own nephew; he is a black Liberal. Dr. McEwen, of Toronto, is a most magnificent man. I took him on account of his long medical service. I also picked out Dr. Bruce of Toronto. I found that Dr. Bruce, Prof. Anderson, Dr. Orr, and others had been in the service years ago as regimental surgeons. I have in my possession a notification, sent to one of these gentlemen who had applied to join the new Army Medical Corps. The writer of this note, a Liberal doctor, regretted that he could not accept him for the medical corps, as he was a Tory. I had, therefore, no hesitation in granting Dr. Bruce, who is a famous surgeon in Toronto, the same status he would have had he remained in the corps. He has been over on the other side.

As regards shell contracts, I am informed by those who have looked into the matter that four-fifths of the contractors are Liberals and that seven-tenths of the shell-box contractors are Liberals.

I now come to a very interesting part of the discussion, namely, the Shell Committee. And here let me frankly admit to the House that it is my baby; I am the father of the concern, be it for good or be it for bad, and I purpose sticking to it as long as it has a button left on its jacket. Let me point out the facts of the case, and when I get through I purpose giving some evidence—not hearsay, but evidence. In July, 1914, owing to the fact that the Kaiser had been rattling his sabre up and down the streets of Berlin for a year or two, and that the clang of the Krupp forges had been keeping the financial and commercial world a little uneasy for some considerable time, business in this country was at a stand-still. Factories were closed, dinner pails were empty and commercial and financial disaster faced Canada, Great Britain and almost every country on the face of the earth. That was the general condition prevailing when war broke out, and the breaking out of war did not make the capitalists of the country any more ready to invest their money, or bankers any more ready to back up commercial men in any enterprises they might undertake. When war was declared Canada fearlessly did her duty. The right hon. the Prime Minister immediately cabled to the British Government an offer of a division comprising from 17,000 to 20,000 soldiers. On the night of the 7th of August, 1914, this offer was accepted. Accordingly, the soldiers were summoned to Valcartier—but of that I will speak later.

On the 24th August, 1914, the War Office sent us a letter, asking if we could procure for them a small order for shells in the United States. On reflection, it struck me that the highly equipped industries of Canada, which were standing idle at the time, could readily manufacture shells. I I had seen shrapnel shells being made in the arsenal at Quebec, and it is merely a blacksmith's shop. Accordingly, we called a meeting of the Canadian manufacturers.

Mr. CARVELL: Do I understand the minister to say that shells had been manufactured in Canada before the outbreak of the war?

Sir SAM HUGHES: Yes, at the arsenal at Quebec. About 75 shells per day was our output, and 75 per cent were bad. The hon. member will understand that an inquiry was made some time ago, and it was found that out of 75 shells that we picked out to test, fifteen would not go into the guns. I know whereof I speak.

At that meeting of manufacturers, which was a very large one, they were so nervous over their capital that only a very small number—I forget the exact number—could be induced to enter into the business at all, and they could not be induced to do so until we took them down to Quebec and showed them during a period of several days how the manufacturing of shells was done, comparing our not up-to-date equipment with the splendid machinery in their big factories. In some cases we had to get them financially encouraged by the banking institutions before we could induce that small number at the beginning to enter into the shell business. We lent them our military experts, officers of the department; and, in passing, let me say that we lent these experts also to the big firms in the United States which had been making shells and which had asked the privilege of consulting our experts and seeing our factories turning out shells. We also sent our experts from factory to factory in the United States to give instruction in the making of shells for the British Government, because the urgency was so great. The Shell Committee was then formed. This is a sample of a shrapnel shell (exhibiting shell.) I do not purpose to cause an explosion.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Is it full?

Sir SAM HUGHES: No, it is empty. I take the liberty of bringing this shell down in order that the House may understand the matter. This is what we term an empty shell (showing the whole shell). This is the steel shell case (showing), with the copper driving band on it fitting into the grooves of the barrel. The brass part which fits on the top of the shell case is called the fuse-plug, and in the shell at the present time is a powder cup empty.

3 p.m.

Mr. GRAHAM: That is a shrapnel shell?

Sir SAM HUGHES: Yes. There is a tube connecting the upper part with the powder cup at the base, and the shrapnel charge lies around this tube above the powder cup, and is filled in with resin so as to keep it as tight as possible. The fuse screws on, connecting with the tube, and when the fuse is put on the time is set for the number of seconds it takes for this shell to reach its destination, and when it does so it is supposed to explode.

Mr. GRAHAM: That is a time fuse?

Sir SAM HUGHES: Yes. The time fuse explodes the powder cup at the base and the bullets are driven out through the resin, the end of the shell is blown out, and the bullets scatter broadcast. This is called the cartridge case (showing), which is made of copper, and a primer which fits in at the end is fired by a spring. The powder propelling the shell, the cordite or gun cotton, is confined in this cartridge case. In the high explosive shell akin to this we use the high explosive bursting charge to smash the shell case all to pieces and scatter it broadcast. The two parts together make a complete filled cartridge. The fuse is made either empty or filled, either with the gain or without the gain, and it is filled with the gain subject to inspection. Number 80 is the time fuse and number 100 is the detonator or concussion fuse.

This is a cablegram from the British War Office to the Militia Department under date of August 24:

Can you provide or obtain from American trade shell empty shrapnel, Q.F. guns, 18-pr., without cases or fuses. If so, what rate delivery could you promise?

The Militia Department cabled the War Office in reply:

Re yours August 24, concerning 18-pr. shrapnel. Can get large quantities from neighbours speedy delivery. Please advise.

On the 26th of August, the War Office cabled the Militia Department:

Your telegram August 26. Please cable quotation 100,000 segment shells, Q.F. guns, 18-pr. shells only. Presume you have detailed drawings and specifications. Can you arrange inspection. Am sending specifications of 15-pr. shrapnel shells, quotation required 100,000 of these.

The Militia Department cabled the War Office on the 2nd of September in reply:

Am arranging Canadian manufacturers turning hydraulic presses to work on shells. Had meeting to-day with number. Arranging for many more. Already can contract for 4,000 shrapnel weekly, delivery to begin in about four weeks time. This could be increased to more than double that quantity. Believe could produce 75,000 before November 1st. Do you want shell Q.F. empty shrapnel 18-pr., without fuse, as per vocabulary stores 1912, part 2, page 480. Have all details, plans and specifications for 18-pr., but have none for 15-pr. Please send latter immediately. Price not determined yet. Please advise.

[Sir Sam Hughes.]

On the same day, September 2, we sent the following cablegram to the British War Office:

Have organized committee of manufacturers on shells. They guarantee 20,000 by first November and 30,000 monthly thereafter. May be able to largely increase this amount.

The following telegram was sent on September 11:

Regarding shells. Have discovered one firm, Canadian General Electric, which guarantees alone to manufacture by the first of January 100,000, either 18-pr. or 15-pr., and 100,000 monthly thereafter. Important to know will you want more than the 200,000 already placed.

The following was received by the Militia Department from the War Office on September 12:

Your telegram No. 121. We still await your quotation for 100,000 18-pr. shrapnel shells with plugs. 100,000 shrapnel shells, 15-pr. with plugs, 100,000 cases for 18-pr., and boxes with in my telegram 954 9th inst.

The following cablegram was sent by the Militia Department to the War Office on September 18:

Reference your cipher September 17. Committee reports price of 100,000 shrapnel 18-pr. as per your cablegrams and specifications will be $8.55 each delivered at Montreal, 20,000 by November 1, and at least 30,000 monthly thereafter. Usual inspection charges. Shall we proceed? If so, please arrange line of credit through Canadian High Commissioner and in favour of Deputy Minister of Militia and Defence, Canada. Specifications 15-pr. just to hand. Price later. Please answer. Committee wait.

I may say that later we arranged to have the credit note placed to the credit of the Shell Committee in Canada, and not as is suggested in this message. The price of $8.55 was arrived at by the experts of the Militia Department, who made their calculations with the assistance of machinists and large steel workers throughout the country. Another cablegram follows, from the Militia Department to the War Office, dated September 18:

Committee reports 100,000 shrapnel 15-pr. shells, price $8.30 each, delivered at Montreal. Assuming proceeds with 18-pr. first, can make delivery of 18-pr. already cabled, and follow with 20,000 15-pr. November, and 30,000 per month thereafter.

I should like the House to note that we made the offer of $8.30 for the 15-pounders and $8.55 for the 18-pounders. On September 19 the War Office cabled as follows:

With reference to your telegrams numbered 132 and 133, we accept the prices as offered for 100,000 each 15-pr. and 18-pr. shells. Please proceed. We trust you will ensure punctual delivery.

At that time the Shell Committee was formed, and, until they were dissolved some time ago, took over entire control of the whole business. Neither directly nor indirectly did the Militia Department or I as Minister of Militia ever interfere in any shape, form or manner with the contracts, or with the price. In each instance the price was fixed by the British Government.

At this same time, I obtained many offers from American firms. I will take one as an example, to show what credit is due the Canadian manufacturer for standing by his guns to help the Empire, as compared with the concessions given to United States and other manufacturers, which were really freely conceded to them by the British War Office. Our manufacturers never got one cent of bonus, never got one cent of cash payment, never got anything. They took their own risks, put in the machinery, turned out the shells with their own capital and under their own arrangements, and delivered the goods; I will show before I have finished that they delivered the goods at a lower price than any other country, not even excepting Great Britain. The course which the Canadian manufacturers pursued in this connection will stand to their credit for all time, the little handful of them that we could induce to take hold of the business at this time; later they were more numerous.

The Crucible Steel Company, one of the largest concerns on the continent of North America, on September 10, wrote me as follows:

> We are prepared to make the following proposition: three weeks after the receipt of order for 200,000 shrapnel shells complete, without explosives, and absolutely in accordance with blue-print already submitted. We can ship 1,000 per day for three weeks; after six weeks we can ship 2,000 per day until the order is completed.

You will remember that our price was $8.55 for the 18-pounders and $8.30 for the 15-pounders. Their price was as follows:

> Price, $12 each.

Mark you, our manufacturers undertook the work at their own risk, put in their own machinery, financed their own business, did everything. I will read on:

> In view of the fact that very speedy delivery is required, it means we will have to put an extension to our plant, and also purchase additional machinery. While we do not feel that there is any likelihood of the passing of legislation by the United States Government which would interfere with the shipments of these shells, we are willing to agree that in such event we would be willing to absorb the cost of all the small tools and the extension to our plant, but the Canadian Government would pay us the actual cost of the extra machinery, in which event it will become the property of the Canadian Government and subject to their disposal. The contract not being subject to cancellation,—

The contracts of the Canadian manufacturers were all subject to cancellation.

> —suspension, or reduction, for any other cause than above referred to.

That is, the passing of legislation by the United States.

> All of the above quotations f.o.b., Harrison, New Jersey. Cash in gold on surrender of bill of lading.

It will be seen, therefore, that the famous Crucible Steel Company, one of the best institutions of the kind on the continent of North America, made a price of $12, while our manufacturers did the work for $8.55 and $8.30. Not only that, but the proposal of the Crucible Steel Company was such as to give rise to the possibility that at the close of the war the Canadian Government would have some thousands of tons of scrap iron on its hands—and that is what the British Government is doing in the United States to-day. To one United States firm with a branch in Canada $12,000,000 in cash was advanced by the British Government to carry on the work; the Canadian industry has not been advanced one dollar to carry on the work. It will be seen, therefore, that the Canadian Shell Committee is not subject to condemnation, and that the Canadian manufacturers are worthy of every support, encouragement and blessing that can be heaped upon them.

On April 25 I had the honour to receive the following communication from His Royal Highness the Governor General. I did myself the honour of asking the permission of His Royal Highness to lay this before the House and the country, and he cheerfully acceded to my request:

> Government House, Ottawa,
> 25th April, 1915.
>
> Dear General Hughes:
> I have received the enclosed telegram from Lord Kitchener, which speaks for itself.
> Believe me,
> Yours sincerely,
> (Sgd.) Arthur.

This is the telegram, dated April 24, which was the third day of the fighting at St. Julien:

> London, April, 24th, 1915.
>
> His Royal Highness Duke of Connaught, > Ottawa.
>
> Will your Royal Highness be good enough to thank General Hughes, the Canadian Shell

Committee, and Canadian manufacturing firms, for their satisfactory delivery of shells. I hope that the future deliveries will come up to anticipation.

(Signed) Kitchener.

Let me point out that on that occasion at St. Julien, our boys were armed with Canadian rifles, shooting Canadian ammunition, and firing Canadian shells. Having no shells to fire on Thursday, General Morrison found on Friday afternoon that a shipment had come to one of the stations eight or nine miles back. He sent his wagons back and commandeered 8,000 shells, and found that they were Canadian. Then, on Friday evening and Saturday, Canadian riflemen, armed with Canadian rifles, firing Canadian ammunition, and Canadian artillery, firing Canadian shrapnel shells, held back upwards of one hundred thousand of the best soldiers the world has ever produced. More than that, the records show that 12,000 Germans dead and 22,000 German wounded fell before our boys in those four days fighting, a record of which we are proud.

The history of the shell industry in Canada divides itself naturally into three periods. There is first what I should call the initiatory stage. Let me point out—I do not know whether the First Minister will remember this—but after we had met at Valcartier for upwards of a week studying this matter, working at it from every viewpoint, and when we had finally arrived at the figure of $8.55, the manufacturers of this country were so nervous, and capital was so sensitive, that they came to me and demanded that I give them a guarantee that they would be recouped for any loss they might sustain at this figure. I told them that my guarantee would not probably be worth the paper it was written on, but I said that if the Prime Minister of Canada would give a guarantee, he, as Prime Minister, would see that it was carried out. The Prime Minister will remember that they waited on him the next day when he came down, and he assured them that in case they found, after making this experiment, that they were losing money at $8.55, he would use his best endeavours with the British Government to see that they were recouped whatever their loss might be. So these manufacturers entered into this enterprise with a great deal of trepidation and, to their credit, they succeeded. The orders were spasmodic, each might be the last.

Then came the second period, when the British Government no longer required empty shells, but wanted filled shells, with the cartridge case and component parts, all except the fuse. It took some time to get that started, but we tackled it, and our manufacturers again succeeded.

Then, later on, the bankers became more confident; and towards the close of what I term the second period we found the bankers and financiers, every one who had money tied up in a stocking, wanting to bring some blacksmith shop or some shoeing forge back in the woods into the game of making shells. The trains to Ottawa were packed with promoters. Young barristers, their hair parted in the middle, armed with a sheet of paper and a pencil, came down here and all wanted to make shells. They were going around the country saying: If you will put up machinery I will guarantee to get you an order for 100,000 shells, 200,000 shells, any number you like. These young fellows would go around looking for orders for 300,000 or 400,000 shells as though they were selling eggs.

This was all done on a pretty definite business basis; all they asked was 50 cents a shell. That was the commission regularly asked for and I heard a great deal of it. Dear old General Bertram and David Carnegie got so that they could size them up, and the first question they asked was: "Where is your machine shop," and before the machine shop could get orders it had to be inspected,—and of course in fully ninety cases out of a hundred it was knocked out. I heard a great deal of talk then, and as the one who had induced the British Government to trust the Shell Committee of Canada, I felt my personal responsibility, not the Government responsibility in all this matter. Whenever I heard any of these yarns—and my dear friend from St. John (Mr. Pugsley) has not commenced to touch the fringe of the yarns yet, he has only given about what we would get in an ordinary afternoon—we investigated them, and I challenge the Dominion of Canada to show one solitary instance yet that has come before my notice that had a tittle of foundation for it. Not one. I felt that, having got the British Government into the scrape, it was my personal business to see that the thing was run right, and I have yet to learn that it was not run right; and therefore I am at General Bertram's back morning, noon, and night in this business. In the early part of the game we were told: Oh, but your steel will not do, you must get your steel from certain companies in the United States or elsewhere. I found that about four or five hundred tons of steel was all we could get. I consulted the Prime Minister in nearly everything I did, as I had great faith in his wisdom and judgment. Some then might think I might be a little erratic and all that sort of thing, but I felt that the balance wheel would be found in the Prime Minister. So I consulted him in this matter. Now, I am not a scientist; and I know nothing about steel. I know powder, I know lead, I know a rifle as well as any man; I know what is wrong with a rifle cartridge, but I do not know the first definite thing about steel, and I never could understand why, when our Canadians could make stoves and railway rails and all that sort of thing out of our steel, they could not make shells. But we were told: Oh, no, acid steel must be used. I was as wise as ever; I did not know what acid steel meant. So I said to the Prime Minister: "Who in — Canada could teach me this?"

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I may have used the other, too. I said: "Who can teach me something about steel?" "Well," he said, "Cantley, of New Glasgow, was here just a few minutes ago; he is an expert steel man." So I hunted up Colonel Cantley and got him to explain to me the difference between acid steel and basic steel. I said: "Why will not basic steel do?" "I do not know," he said. I said: "Will you undertake experiments with basic steel and see if it will stand up under the heat test and the annealing, and if it is short of carbon cannot you chuck a little more into it and get it up to the standard, so that it will stand the test?" He started on his experiments and expended on the work for the Shell Committee $500,000 before he received one cent in return. He tested the steel, we tested the shells on our own ranges in Canada and we found that the contraction was nil; that they lived up to the standard. We sent a shipment over to Woolwich arsenal and they more than stood up to the test. So to-day the Canadian industries have been benefited to the extent of eight hundred millions of pounds of steel made in Canada by Canadian workmen, turned out of Canadian shops, and turned into shells by Canadian enterprise.

I might say that as regards the first contract I handed it over promptly to the Canadian Shell Committee and that committee carried on all the business. The Shell Committee took the first contract and they delivered the shells, allowing for the delay in producing plans, gauges, etc., on the part of the British Government, practically on time; whereas a contract let in the United States a short time afterwards to one of the established firms, a regular shell manufacturing concern, has only recently been completed. The Shell Committee was made up of Col. A. Bertram, who I believe is a Tory; Brig.-Gen. T. Benson, who, I believe, is a Tory; Lt.-Col. T. Cantley, who, I know, is a great friend of my good friend Col. Macdonald, the hon. member from Pictou—I do not know whether he is a Liberal or a Conservative, I think he has voted both ways.

Mr. ROGERS: The member for Pictou voted both ways?

Sir SAM HUGHES: Oh, no, but he is going to. Col. Greville Harston is, I understand, a Tory, and Col. Lafferty is a Liberal, a splendid fellow, and one of the best experts in Canada, but he has the misfortune to be a Liberal. Yet I appointed him to the Dominion Arsenal. Mr. George Watts is, I am informed, a Liberal. Mr. E. Carnegie is a member of the Shell Committee, but had nothing to do with the letting of contracts; his brother David is an expert, and two finer men, two more skilled men, cannot be found in the Dominion, and they are both Liberals. Then there is J. W. Borden; he was appointed Paymaster General, and he has the misfortune to belong to the Liberal brand of the Borden family. Incidentally, I may say there is another of the fraternity who at the last election stood at the poll and—I will not say intimidated—but at all events urged the soldiers as they went to the poll to cast their ballots against the present Prime Minister of Canada. The young gentleman was brought before me and, seeing he was a manly straightforward fellow who openly admitted the corn, I sent him over to England—

An hon. MEMBER: And would do so again.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Certainly I would do so again. He is a splendid, manly fellow, one of the best fellows in Canada; he bears the name of Borden and is a Grit. My hon. friend from Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) will endorse all I say about him. I want it to be understood that I did not allow politics in any sense whatever to enter into these matters, and if my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition knows of any Liberal in his following who is anxious to go to the front, let him send him to me and I will put a uniform on him, give him his training, and let him do his best.

I may point out that although Britain gave a bounty in advance to every industry in the United States which made shells for her, we got nothing. Canada furnished the parts so that we could distribute them throughout the different factories. We got them to work, we got one factory to produce the steel, another to produce the billets, another to do the turning, another to do the fuses, and so on; the Shell Committee distributed the work up and down the country, to the great advantage of the people of Canada, and to the great advantage of the British Government. It gave the small dealers an equal chance with the large factories, and the prices were uniform, thus avoiding any unhealthy competition. There was no object in scamping the work. The inspecting company examined the work of the different firms, and I may here say that they had considerable difficulty in getting gauging machinery.

I shall not discuss the question of basic steel; I have a prepared statement here on the subject, which I shall be glad to show any of the members privately if they care to see it.

Now I come to the question of shells. The price for the first order, for 18-pounders, was $8.55; machinery and assembling, $5.15. The second order was for 400,000 shells, and the price was reduced to $6. The third order was for the completed shell filled, and for machining and assembling the price was reduced to $3.80. Our manufacturers had to pay the cost of the machines out of the first order. I may say that once in a piano factory the first polisher could only earn $2 and something over a day; at the end of two months he had become an expert and was able to earn $20. They reduced his pay, but after a few months more he was able to earn $25, and he was again reduced. I mention this to show that these men soon became experts at the work. At the beginning, we did not have the facilities that we have now, and we did not have the men so well trained as we have now to do this class of work. Some of the dealers spoilt 40 per cent of the shells they made at first. I understand that Colonel Cantley's people and many other firms spoiled a good many at first and lost on them, and are trying to recoup themselves now selling the shells for fancy lamps, etc. But they took risks on those first orders, and they lost money in many instances. Because they have now the men skilled and expert at the work the orders recently given have come down in price to as low as $1.85, and, of course, the quantities are much larger. In the United States the cost of machining the Russian orders was $2.20, and that despite the fact that they got an advance in cash.

With regard to Australia, I may say that what Australia knows about shell-making she owes to our Shell Committee. Australian officers came here and spent considerable time going into the whole business, and at the time Australia was given orders the Australian officers were here and the prices were arranged here. It was considered to be a fair and reasonable price for Australia considering everything. At that time our price was $3.80. In Australia it was $5, because facilities there were not what they were here.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Did the price of $3.80 include the billets?

Sir SAM HUGHES: I said machining and assembling.

Mr. PUGSLEY: What would be the cost of the steel billets? Would that not make the price of $3.80 still higher than the original price in Australia.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Not if you add the price of the billets in each case.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The billets were included in the $5 paid in Australia.

Sir SAM HUGHES: No. My information was obtained from those officers who came from Australia, and it was to the effect that they were not included.

Mr. PUGSLEY: My information is to the contrary.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I understand my hon. friend gets his information from some Liberal monthly; I got mine from my own officers who trained the Australian officers and fixed the price at $5 for them, and I think it is more reliable. I am going to make another statement, showing that stage by stage the prices in Canada were lower, with one or two exceptions—one of these is called No. 100 fuse—than either the British or the United States Government arsenal prices, or even the United States or British commercial prices, and that despite the fact that Canada got no bonus, and that in both Britain and the United States cash advances were made to enable the dealers to put in the machinery. I am in a position to prove that. The Canadian Shell Committe has formed a model for Great Britain; it has formed a model for the United States and Australia. It led the way in prompt deliveries, in the quantities turned out, in the quality, in low prices, and in driving force. Canada has led the way in the British Empire.

Now, with regard to prices. On December 8, a cablegram came from England giving the recent prices paid there. The price for 4.5, mark VI, (250,000) made in England 42s. 6d., that is, $10.33. In Canada the first orders were for very small quantities, and we had to pay $10.45. The price on December 8 was $7.45. In England the machines were supplied by the Minister of Munitions; in Canada nothing was supplied, and yet our price was $7.45, while in England it was $10.33. The price for 4.5 forgings was 18s. 6d. in England, that is, $4.50, while our former price, the highest price ever paid was $4.25. The second price was $3.60 on small lots; our price on that date was $2.95. For 18-pound high-explosive shells, machining, the English price is 15s, 8d, equal to $3.81; in Canada the price is down as low as $1.85 now. For the 6-inch shells, the price in England is £4 2s, equal to $19.94, while the price in Canada is $16.85. For 6-inch forgings, the British price is £2, equal to $9.63, while the price in Canada is $7.50, and in Great Britain the machinery is put up for them at the cost of the British Government, while in Canada not one dollar is given to the Canadian manufacturer for that purpose.

Now we come to a comparison of United States and Canadian prices. First, we will take a 4.5-inch shell, including steel forging and machining. The Canadian billet costs $2, the forging formerly cost $1.60, now $1.20; the base plate formerly cost 20 cents, now 15 cents; machining formerly $6, now $4. Under the old costs for materials and work, the Canadian price of the 4.5 shell was $9.80, the present price is $7.35. The Morgans price for this shell is $10.40, with an advance in gold to start the machine going. Recent contracts let by Morgan are at the price of $9.81, or 25 per cent higher than the Canadian price, and the Morgan contracts are for millions where the Canadian contracts are for hundreds of thousands only. Since the beginning of the business, the Canadian Shell Committee has turned out in Canada 22,000,000 shells; 800,000,000 pounds of steel made by Canadian workmen in Canadian shops and turned into shells by Canadian workmen, brass, zinc and copper, 45,000,000 pounds; copper, over 22,000,000 pounds; lead, 102,000,000 pounds; black powder for shrapnel, 4,000,000 pounds; cordite, 10,000,000 pounds; nitro-cellribose powder, 4,000,000 pounds; tri-nitro-toluene, the famous high explosive, 11,000,000 pounds, put into shells in Canada, besides several millions of pounds exported to the British Government.

Canada has turned out 250,000 men under arms to fight the enemy and take their chance, and Canada has trained 90,000 skilled mechanics to turn machines to one ten-thousandth part of an inch. We have 90,000 skilled workmen who will constitute one of the greatest assets this country can have after the war is over. Shells are turned out and shipped at the rate of more than 1,100,000 a month, 1,500 inspectors are employed, and the volume of orders given out by the old Shell Committee totalled upwards of $350,000,000 in cold cash to the Dominion of Canada as the result of the institution of the Shell Committee.

Now let me say a word as to the materials forming the component parts of the shell such as Canadian steel and lead. I have already given the quantity of lead that we have produced. That means that our mines have received an impetus. At the beginning of these operations we used foreign brass, zinc and copper. To-day we use Canadian steel, Canadian lead, Canadian copper and brass and Canadian zinc for the first time in our history. We took the matter up, the Prime Minister gave us his endorsement, and as a result of Canadian enterprise, zinc is turned out at 15 cents a pound, whereas we used to pay 42 cents a pound and upwards in the United States for the same zinc. There is another point in connection with that. Our zinc was formerly refined in the United States. We would dig the zinc out of our mines, pay from $10 to $15 a ton freight, pay the duty into the United States, pay the cost of refining it, pay the freight back to Canada, and pay the duty on the refined zinc coming into Canada. To-day owing to the policy put in force by the Prime Minister, zinc is made in Canada from first to last, and we are supplying not only the Canadian demand, but the British and Russian demand at 15 cents a pound as against 42 cents a pound on the other side. Copper was never before refined in Canada, but, through the action of the Canadian Government, we are now refining our copper in this country. I have not analysed these figures myself, but I am assured that the copper, zinc and brass industries of Canada for the last year before the war would have given employment on the work done to 30,000 skilled workmen, to meet the ordinary commercial needs of our people in brass, copper and zinc alone. There will be an asset at the conclusion of the war when these machines stop turning out shells. These workmen and these machines, with very little adaptation, will be enabled to turn to these various commodities of zinc, copper and brass in Canada, and we will be able to produce our copper at minimum rates and develop our great water powers by transmission lines and associated industries at the lowest possible figure. The prices of copper and zinc were high, and that is why we began to manufacture them in Canada. In this connection there is a point that is worth noting. As you know, zinc is found in association with silver and in lead. Formerly Canadian ores were penalized by the presence of the undisposable zinc in them. The lead and silver in these ores were of no use because they could only be extracted at a loss. To-day, the extraction of the zinc puts a premium on the ore, and more than pays for the work in connection with the silver and lead, the result being that we have the value of the silver, the lead and the zinc, and instead of the presence of zinc penalizing the ores as it formerly did, it is putting a premium upon them. Engineers and mining men had been directing the attention of the Government to this matter, and I entrusted Colonel Carnegie and General Bertram with the solution of this problem. We have worked out all the side issues, and the result has been to confer great benefit on the Dominion of Canada.

I have not had the privilege, since the war began, of addressing the House on the question of the formation of the Canadian force. I would ask the indulgence of the House for a moment while I say something with regard to that subject. On August 4, 1914, war was declared; on August 7 the Canadian division was authorized, the offer of the Prime Minister having been accepted. That was on Friday. On Saturday, the 8th, Valcartier was taken over, and on Monday the 10th ranges and waterworks were begun. By the 20th three and a half miles of ranges were completed, and 1,500 targets were put in position. Up to the same date 12 miles of watermains had been laid in, and 15 miles of drains, open and covered, had been located. Army Service Corps and Ordnance buildings were constructed, railway sidings laid in, fences removed, crops harvested, ground cleared, streets made, upwards of 200 baths for the men put in, water chlorinated, electric light and telephones installed, wool made into cloth, cloth into uniforms, leather into boots, equipment provided, supplies collected, transport of all kinds purchased, and 35,000 men got under canvas in less than three weeks from the acceptance of the call.

The men were trained in marching, manoeuvring, and shooting. The men would fire five rounds in 40 seconds at the targets from five hundred yards, then they would run to the next range and fire five more rounds, and so on to the next range, and down to one hundred yards. The result was that when the troops marched out, some of the regiments scored over seventy per cent of hits on these targets, and the lowest was fifty-two per cent of hits; whereas the average number of hits in the service of any other nation is about twenty per cent. When our boys marched away from Valcartier they were an army of free men, trained to handle a rifle as no men had ever handled it before.

Canada has developed confidence in her manhood and confidence in her womanhood. The women of this country have performed noble service, perhaps even better than the men, and they continue to give great encouragement to the work that is going on. We have turned out 250,000 soldiers who have already made a historic record in the world and 100,000 skilled mechanics. Our manufacturers at the present time are capable and ready for any undertaking. As I have said, at the outbreak of war, Canadian financial and industrial life was paralyzed. After making due allowance for the imported products which went into the shells made in Canada, there has been added to the wealth of Canada, through the action of the Shell Committee, $250,000,000; or $30 each for every man, woman, and child in the country.

Mr. MACDONALD: Would the minister be good enough to say why there was a change from the old Shell Committee to the Imperial Munitions Board?

Sir SAM HUGHES: The early part of the work was what I might call scientific. I chose the very best men I could get who would do the work. Bertram, Carnegie, Cantley and the others were all experts. I also picked the very best military men I could get, such as Col. Lafferty and Col. Weatherbie. I don't remember the names of the others, but they were men who had been accustomed for years to this highly technical work. Before the Shell Committee was dissolved there were in the factories of Montreal and Toronto and the other big cities of the Dominion hundreds of men who were just as expert as these men were at the beginning of the war. So the Shell Committee became a commission to look into the question of the steel production of this country, and to look after the best interests of the steel work, for steel is the basis of the industry of any prosperous nation. I think that should be a satisfactory answer to my hon. friend.

Mr. MACDONALD: Why were the services of these men dispensed with, and new men who knew nothing about the business taken on to purchase shells?

Sir SAM HUGHES: I am not aware that there has been any purchase of shells. Orders have been placed with certain firms. Before the Munitions Board was formed the arrangement was that a certain number of shells would come in automatically from month to month.

I should be lacking in justice if, before concluding, I did not express my appreciation and sense of gratitude to the press of this country. Let me give just an instance of how matters were managed with regard to the Ottawa papers, and the same procedure was carried on throughout the length and breadth of Canada. In Ottawa there are the local papers and the representatives of the great dailies of both political parties. I say "political parties," but I hope that party politics is ancient history now, and that there is no such thing in the country to-day. I called the representatives of these papers together and explained the position. I said that if there was any item of news that we could legitimately give them for publication we would do it, and they agreed with me that anything which was not in the interests of the Empire and the service to publish should be withheld. I explained to them that occasionally a newspaper got hold of an item of news in some back-handed fashion and published it, and very often such an item would do harm. I took these men into my confidence and gave them everything that could be legitimately published. We further let them know about the movements of troops, and transports, too, on the understanding that such items were not to be published, and in not a single instance has any of those newspaper men violated my confidence. Their conduct has been simply perfect.

I trust that no one will suggest that there has been anything like party politics in the Militia Department. Whenever I found them, I took the sons of our best men on the other side of the House out of the ranks and put them where they belonged. For instance, I knew that the son of the late Finance Minister of Canada (Mr. Fielding), who is a very excellent young man and a splendid fellow, was serving in a subordinate capacity at the front, when he was capable of filling a superior position, and without any suggestion whatever from his father, I placed him where he belonged. When I was in France I found among the fifteen men of the original Princess Patricias who had fought right through from the beginning of the war, the son of the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Michael Clark). I took him out of the ranks and I was proud to do it, and I have done the same with others. I have already pointed out that the women of the country have helped us in every imaginable way, and so have the clergy. Hundreds of them are at the front to-day, and many of them are going as combatant officers when they cannot go as chaplains. They are showing a splendid spirit. Members of all churches are actively working for the cause in every part of the country. I had the honour recently of standing on the same platform with the Roman Catholic Bishop of Peterborough, and it was a most enjoyable sight to see the orange and the green standing shoulder to shoulder. I enjoyed it, as no doubt did His Lordship. In the trenches to-day French, English, Scotch and Irish soldiers are standing shoulder to shoulder, all doing their duty fearlessly and well; and let me say to the credit of the German-Canadians, that many of them have already given up their lives for the cause, and they are doing their duty just as well as the other boys.

Mr. DANIEL D. McKENZIE (Cape Breton, North): Mr. Speaker, this being the first time that I have had the privilege of addressing this House since you were elevated to the high office of Speaker, let me congratulate you on the distinction. Let me hope that the now regime will be able to hold a just balance between the parties, and that liberty shall exist in this House in debating the many questions that come before it consistent with the dignity of the Chair.

I realize that in rising in my turn to address the House I am taking a great responsibility. I shall be expected, I suppose, to make some reference to the very wise and strong address presented to the House by the Minister of Militia this afternoon. Would it be expected that I, myself, or any other member of this House would make any adverse criticism of the standing that the Canadian people have attained for themselves in connection with this war? Was it contended for one moment that from start to finish the yeomanry of Canada were not ready to sacrifice their lives, their property and everything near and dear to them for the general advancement of our country, and to lay everything within their reach upon the altar of our country? Was it necessary for the minister to come here to-day and make a defence for Canadians along that line, as if anybody was taking the other position? Nobody has taken the other position and nobody in Canada will do so, but we do take the position that there has been politics from the very beginning in the department over which the hon. minister presides; there is politics in it to-day, and there will be politics in it while he presides over it. It is all very well to speak in broad and vague generalities and to tell us that this, that, and the other thing has been done. It is very well to tell us that the Canadian people can do practically anything to which they put their hand. I am glad to see that a change of heart has come over not only the Minister of Militia, but his "balance wheel" as he is pleased to call the Prime Minister. Only three or four short years ago the Prime Minister, and the Minister of Militia, reached the conclusion that Canadians could hardly do anything but the most commonplace things; that it was unsafe to break them away from anything but the ordinary humdrum tasks of every day life; that if they were asked to build ships in this country, they were absolutely unequal to the task, and it would be wasting time and energy to ask them to do so. If it is true that we can turn our hands to the making of shells and high explosives, of which we had previously no knowledge at all, and in the short period of a fortnight or three weeks or three months become experts at it, what can be said now about Canada being unable to build ships of war and commerce? I am sure that the Minister of Militia and the Prime Minister have changed their views absolutely upon that question, and if the time comes when they will have an opportunity of formulating a policy on the question of shipbuilding in Canada, we shall never again hear the argument put forth that the Canadian people are not capable of performing that task.

I wish to follow for a little some of the points made by the Minister of Militia in the order in which he made them. He has told us that hundreds of millions of dollars of our money and of the money of the British Government are being expended in this country. He has told us that that money has been spent in divers ways, of which he has given us very few particulars, although he is well aware that a strong contention has been made in this House and throughout the country that a proper accounting should be given to the Canadian people of the expenditure of that money. It will not be contended in this democratic country, where we have free institutions, where we have responsible government, that millions of the public money can be taken and expended at the beck and call of a few individuals, however worthy they may be, and that we can never call upon them to account for what they have done with that money. But the very first sentence uttered in this House this afternoon by the Minister of Militia and Defence, who is particularly responsible to this House and the country for this expenditure, was that it belongs to and was subject to the control of another Parliament and another country; that we have nothing whatever to say about it, and that we are only wasting our time when we think of asking the Government to account for the manner in which they have dealt with the affairs of the country in that regard. That answer will not do, and the people of the country will not be satisfied with it from the Prime Minister or from any other member of the Government, or from any member supporting the Government. In this country we must know first the necessity for the expenditure, and secondly, that the money was spent for the public benefit, and also that every cent of it was spent in the war and for the protection and advancement of the Empire. If that is not the case, we shall hold rigidly to account those who are responsible for doing otherwise. The quotation has been given already, but in view of the statement made by the Minister of Militia and Defence, who is the responsible head of his department and who above all others must be accountable to us for this war expenditure, I think it is incumbent upon me once more to place upon record the exact position which the Opposition occupy in regard to the expenditure, and the position which the Canadian people are occupying in respect to it. I refer to the statement on page 42 of Hansard of this year on this very point. The hon. Mr. Pugsley said :

Hon. Wm. Pugsley: I desire to ask my hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White) if he will kindly lay on the table of the House, or if he can give now, information in a concise manner as to the arrangement between the Government of Canada and the British Government as to what proportion of the expense in connection with the carrying on of the war, in so far as Canadian soldiers are concerned, is to be borne by the Government of Canada. I desire to know whether all the expense of ammunition, guns, equipment, etc., is to be borne by the Government of Canada, or what the arrangement is.

Sir Thomas White (Minister of Finance): The matter will be dealt with probably by my right hon. friend the Prime Minister in introducing the War Appropriation Bill, which will provide means for continuing our participation in the war, or, if not, by myself in the Budget Speech, which will be brought down at a later date. In a general way, I may say to my hon. friend that the Government of Canada is bearing the entire expense of Canada's participation in the war. There will necessarily be certain accounts which cannot be adjusted until the war is over, or until a later date. Recently I had a conversation with Colonel Ward, who is immediately in touch with the situation in London, and I understood from him that the Canadian Government is to-day paying all the expenses connected with the Canadian Expeditionary Force at present in England, and is paying the men of the Canadian Expeditionary Force in France, and Belgium, but that there will be certain adjustments of accounts necessary between the Government of Canada and the British Government at a later day covering such items as rations, supplies, and other equipment for the Canadian troops who are actually on the firing line. That matter is not susceptible of calculation and adjustment from to-day, but the Canadian Government is bearing the entire expense of the Canadian Expeditionary Force.

Mr. Pugsley: That means, of course, all the ammunition, all the guns, all the boots and shoes, and all the clothing used by the Canadian soldiers at the front?

Sir Thomas White: Our understanding is that the Canadian Government will pay all, but that an adjustment is necessary and will have to take place later.

That, Mr. Speaker, without equivocation and without varnishing one way or the other, is a clear-cut statement of the situation in which we are placed. We are furnishing the money for the soldiers at the front in the same way that we furnished the money for the Hudson Bay Railway; there is not the slightest difference between the one and the other. If we have a right, therefore, to ask the Minister of Railways and Canals for a just and proper accounting of the expenditure in connection with the Hudson Bay Railway, we have an equal right to ask for an accounting of the moneys that are to be expended in connection with the war. The Canadian people do not propose to apply the same rigid form of inquiry to this matter as they would to a matter like the Hudson Bay Railway, because they are in such a frame of mind with regard to the war that they are not going to stick at trifles or ask for very close calculations. But in a general way, we have a right to make these inquiries, and we have a right to receive a proper answer to them. I submit that the minister cannot dispose of the matter by telling us, with a wave of his hand, that this is a question for the home Government; that this is a question with which we have nothing to do. The minister told us that the precedent for his course was the fact that some years ago, at the time of the South African war, an inquiry was asked by the then Opposition in regard to expenses in connection with certain provisions required by the home Government for the expeditionary forces that went to South Africa. I need hardly mention the fact that the two cases are entirely unlike. On that occasion, as I remember, there was not the slightest hint of wrong-doing; there was not a word from anybody to the effect that one dollar had been misappropriated or that there had been any graft or political favouritism in connection with the expenditure. Further, there was not the slightest hint that one cent of Canadian money went towards defraying the expenses in that connection. That being the case, it was clearly a matter which was entirely within the purview, scope and authority of the home Parliament, and only the home Parliament could deal with it. The mere fact that on that occasion we did not choose to exercise authority which we did not possess is no justification for saying that the same course should be followed now. Even if any wrong had been done—I am not admitting for one moment that there was any wrongdoing, because we had no authority or jurisdiction to enter into an investigation of the matter—but even if we had done something twenty years ago that was not quite right, is that a justification for blindfolding the people to-day and preventing them from having a thorough knowledge as to the expending of their money?

We have had a very long—not too long, perhaps, for the occasion—and a very smooth glossing of different points by the hon. gentleman who has just addressed us. I venture to say that not a man in this House, whether he be of the Opposition or of the Government, is very much wiser now than he was when the hon. gentleman took the floor. His remarks consisted of mere generalities, with no attention to details. We are told that there are no politics in his department. I know nothing about the provinces of Quebec, of Ontario, or, indeed, of New Brunswick, but I do know that in the province of Nova Scotia, from which I come, the political line is drawn just as closely in the Militia Department as it is in the Department of Customs, and that is close enough. You have just as much right to expect an appointment from the Department of Customs if you are not recommended as a solid Tory as you have to expect any standing or any inside advantage from the Militia Department.

Mr. CARVELL: You have to go through the patronage committee.

Mr. McKENZIE: The patronage committee, pure and simple; that is the position in Nova Scotia, and I can prove it. I should not mind, Mr. Speaker, if that committee were used in what we might regard as a decent and proper manner. But I do charge, in the presence of the Prime Minister, who is a Nova Scotian of whom we are proud, that in the county of Halifax, where I hold him responsible for the patronage, the vilest sort of partisans are put at the head of battalions, in the highest positions that they can be given. If the Prime Minister, or anybody else who cares to look the matter up, will turn to the files of the Halifax Herald—the organ of the right hon. gentleman—of a few days ago, they will find on the front page the picture of a distinguished gentleman who some time ago fled the country on the pretext that he was going to the war. He will find that this gentleman is back in Nova Scotia with the title of major, and that he is going to be given a battalion in the province of Nova Scotia and sent back to the front. Why was he sent away? Why did he leave the country? He left the country, Sir, because the Supreme Court of Nova Scotia was entering upon a trial at that time, in which trial he has been found guilty of forgery; in which, in not less than eight cases, he has been found guilty of being an accessory before and after the fact to perjury. He was blacklisted and disqualified by the Supreme Court of Nova Scotia, and under that cloud he left the country. But he came back—he came back promoted to the position of major, and he is to-day honoured and petted and advanced in the county of Halifax, where the patronage belongs to the Prime Minister, and with the knowledge that the records of the Supreme Court of Nova Scotia prove to the hilt everything that I say in respect of him.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I have no idea to whom the hon. gentleman is referring. If he desires to connect me with the person mentioned, I can say I never heard of him. I have not the slightest idea whom the hon. gentleman has in mind.

Mr. McKENZIE: I have reference to Major Muirhead, and I have nothing to take back of what I have said. The Prime Minister cannot be ignorant of the fact that, in my place in this House last year, before Dr. Hayes, who is now a captain—

Some hon. MEMBERS: A colonel.

Mr. McKENZIE: A colonel. Yes, if you please, he was appointed to the position of colonel. I pointed out to the minister that not only should he not be promoted in the army, but that he should occupy no position whatever in connection with public affairs in this country. This gentleman was the chief organizer of the Conservative party in the province of Nova Scotia. Without repeating the same language, I submit that he went through the same condemnation, the same charges, the same blacklisting, as this Major Muirhead, in the Supreme Court of Nova Scotia. I venture to assert that they could not keep him any longer in connection with the party, the thing was too nauseous altogether, and his reputation was such that they were ashamed to have him. They dumped him off on the Militia Department, and he was made a colonel by the hon. gentleman who says there is no politics in his department. That is the class of men who are being promoted in the province of Nova Scotia over the heads of good, honest, old, officials of those regiments who have, to use a vulgar expression, not got a look in at all, when there is one of these other men to be picked up anywhere and promoted to office. That, Sir, is what I complain of. And I submit to you, Mr. Speaker, that it is the most marvellous thing that ever could happen in any country, the magnificent stand that the people of Nova Scotia have taken in the face of the way in which they are treated by the Militia Department, and the class of men who are being placed in office in that province. But so strong is the feeling, so sturdy and strong are the Acadians, Irish, Scotch, English and every one else, in our determination to do justice to our country, to our King, and to the great institutions which we are proud to defend, that we will not for a moment allow a Minister of Militia, or even a Muirhead or a Dr. Hayes, or anybody else, to stand in our way. We shall have the reputation of being a great province, a great people, and a great country when they are forever forgotten and wiped off the slate, and receive that oblivious forgetfulness in which such characters ought always to be left.

We were told this afternoon that the minister had done great things for us for which we ought to be glad. We were told that we can make shells, that we have copper, that we have brass and zinc. Of course we are well aware that for the last two or three years copper, and brass, and zinc, and the more shining metals have not been lacking at the head of the Militia Department of this country. But it is extraordinary that there should be any wonder or any surprise expressed that the Canadian people should take advantage of having great resources within their land, and that they should utilize them to the full? It would be surprising, indeed, if the contrary were the condition. Of course some marvellous things could be expected and might be expected from a great man at the head of a great party, and no doubt we are not entirely disappointed in the wonderful things that this wonderful man has done. I am sorry that the great statesman has not thought it worth while to stay a few minutes in this Chamber, that we might be able to give him some sort of an idea of what the people of this country think of the wonderful man whom they are so fortunate as to have at the head of military affairs in this country. But, of course, he would not for a moment think of staying in his seat in the House when one of the ordinary laymen of this country, one of the people of this country, was addressing the House. That would never do. But the Government of which he is a member, himself and the whole outfit, if I may use the expression, will learn, not many days hence, that there is a people in this country and that it is the people that speak, and that it is the opinion of the people that will count, that I am one of the people, here for the purpose of knowing what is being done, and that the people cannot be wiped aside by the glitter and glare of red coats and buttons, or by the rattling of the sword of so great a man as the Major General—promoted to that position, I believe, on his own recommendation. I suppose the people of this country, for many months, thought that Major General Hughes, later Sir Sam Hughes, was promoted to the major generalship on the recommendation and, of course, as the gift of the home Government. Imagine their astonishment when they found that, after a great deal of consultation with himself, after gathering his war counsel around him a great many times, taking the closest observation of his own military record and examining himself from the spurs up to the top of his head, he reached the conclusion that he could go down to the Council and present a recommendation that Mr. Hughes should be made a major general, that it was a well deserved and proper recognition of his services to his country. That is how the promotion came, and I want the people of Canada to have some conception of the inordinate vanity of any man who would think for one minute, in this democratic country, of thus trying to raise himself by pulling on his own boot straps. That is how this great distinction has come to our great friend. He has done some great things, and there have been, perhaps, a few great men to whom he can be properly compared. I heard a distinguished clergyman of this town giving a discourse on some heroes of olden days who were warriors, and I was thinking how they compared with our man. I thought of Moses, who was a warrior and a leader. Well, what did he do? He is said to have struck the rock and to have got water out of it. Well, perhaps our man did not strike any rock, but he is supposed to have struck Webster one time, with what result I do not know. This clergyman talked about such men as Joshua who did great things; he made the sun to stand and go back. Well, our great man, the general, did something perhaps better than that. I understand that he made one of Foster's horses stand up one time; I do not think that he ever made him back, because he could not back. So far as making anything stand is concerned, I do not think that Mr. Joshua has anything on the Hon. Mr. Hughes. We are told that Moses had a rod. Yes, so he had, but the hon. gentleman has a shovel that is of equal importance. There was no hole in the handle of Moses' rod, so far as we can find, but there is a a hole in the shovel that we hear so much about. There is another peculiarity about this shovel that was not found in the rod of the great statesman and leader of ancient days. I must tell you, Mr. Speaker, what that peculiarity is, so that you and I may understand it. Will you permit me to tell a story about a man who sold a coach dog, that is a dog with spots of black and white. This coach dog was sold, and when it went out into the rain the man who bought it discovered that there was some fraud about it, that the spots which were black had become white and that the white spots had become black. The new owner of the dog, feeling very badly about it, went to the man who had sold it to him and said, "What sort of dog is this? it has all gone to pot, and is no good." "Oh," said the man, "I forgot to tell you that an umbrella goes with that dog." He had sold the dog without the umbrella. Now, about this shovel with the hole in it, which is the great wand by which the Minister of Militia and Defence performs all his miracles—let me tell you that it is a well understood thing that a woman goes with this shovel. There is a hole in the shovel so that the minister may look through and see the woman. It is impossible to use the one without the other, and in that way this shovel is a companionable sort of article which performs wonderful things with its proper concomitants. Of all the discoveries that our good friend has made, there is none really different from the mass of ordinary humdrum business connected with the running of a department except this shovel, and I waited with the greatest patience, and looked very closely at the minister, to see if he would give us some account of this shovel, or of what goes with it; but I am sorry to say we were not enlightened upon the subject.

These, Sir, are some of the great achievements of this great man who will not for a moment condescend to listen to one of the ordinary members of the House. I am pleased, not sorry, to say that on this side of the House, possibly with very few exceptions, we are ordinary people with ordinary common sense, who represent the ordinary brain and brawn and business of this country. We were told that there were no politics in the department, but, Mr. Speaker, let me put to you in the form of a few questions, some things that were put up to the minister, and let me point out to you that when these matters were put up to him he was aware that the affairs of his department were not being conducted as they ought to be. I am now going to quote from a letter put upon Hansard by the Prime Minister on April 15, 1915, a letter which gives us an idea and a clear understanding of the fact that at all events from that date the Minister of Militia and Defence had knowledge of the fact that things were not regarded as being right in his department. On page 2611, volume 3, of the Debates of 1915, we find this letter:

Ottawa, November 18, 1915.

Dear General Hughes,—When acting as Minister of Militia during your absence at Valcartier I instructed Colonel Fiset, Deputy Minister, that the use of outside agents and middlemen should be avoided and that contracts should be made directly with manufacturers so that any unnecessary commissions or increased prices might be avoided. This is undoubtedly the wise policy and is entirely in accordance with the principles laid down by our party during the years past. If for any good reason you may think it desirable in the public interest that a different course should be pursued in any particular instance by reason of conditions arising out of the war I hope that you will first consult me as I consider the principle to be of prime importance.

Yours faithfully,

R. L. Borden.

Major General,
The Hon. Sam Hughes,
Minister of Militia,
Ottawa, Ont.

That, Sir, was on the 18th November, 1914, after the Prime Minister had had an opportunity of presiding over the Militia Department for a short time, and, no doubt, of learning for himself the condition of things in that department. Six months afterwards, while the department was still, of course, under the control of the same minister, and after he had been told that things were not going right, we find a strong Conservative coming down to this House with a report upon the affairs of that department which says:

In view of the evidence adduced during the course of their inquiry into the matters referred by the House to them, your committee desire to draw the attention of the House to the requirement for the inauguration of a system of purchase, inspection and audit that will adequately protect the country from irregularities and frauds.

That, Sir, is the condition which had prevailed six months after the Prime Minister had warned the Minister of Militia that things were not going right in his department. A like report was brought down from the Public Accounts Committee. It had been moved by the hon. member for Kingston and carried unanimously in a committee which had an overwhelming majority of the supporters of the minister and of the Government. That shows that six months after the warning he had received it was absolutely impossible for the gentleman at the head of the department to get things straight.

I said, Mr. Speaker, that I was going to put to you, in the form of a few questions, certain propositions that came before the Minister of Militia and Defence in regard to the running of his department. After he had received the warning which I read a moment ago he was asked by his party heelers: "Can we send the soldiers to the trenches with improperly made shoes, practically with paper shoes, and with bare feet?" The answer was: "So far as the department is concerned, yes, if you can make money out of it, and can conceal it, I have no objection." "Can we send our soldiers to the front with horses with heel-spring, horses that are spavined, horses that are blind, horses that are ring-boned, horses that are winded—can we send such horses as those for service with our troops?" "Yes, so far as General Hughes is concerned, if you can manage to do it without being found out." "Can we send the boys to the front with defective and treacherous field glasses that cannot be depended upon?" "Certainly, if you can get away with it; I will stand behind you as far as I can protect you in doing it." That is what happened in so far as these things are concerned. As we heard here last night, the question is naturally put: can we take a monopoly of the hay and oats required in any province of the Dominion of Canada, fix the price just to suit ourselves, take the farmer by the throat, take his goods whether he likes it or not and sell at our own price at the most extraordinary profit we can make? Can you stand by that and will you stand behind it? That has been done, and we have not heard a murmur from any member of the Government saying that the thing was wrong. That is what is being done to-day in the province of New Brunswick and I have no doubt in other provinces all over the country. The most extraordinary thing is that they feel called upon to fix the price for the farmer so that the farmer cannot get anything but what they are pleased to give him. After commandeering his hay at a starvation price, Tory heelers ask and receive at the hands of this Government the right of monopolizing the traffic in this country so that this hay cannot be sold in any other province or in any place outside of the Dominion except as it may please the Government to permit the farmers to do it. This is a most extraordinary condition of things and a state of affairs that was never known to have existed anywhere else, or under any government, except the Government which is presided over by the present Prime Minister and under the department with which I am dealing particularly at the present time, presided over by the hon. gentleman who has addressed us this afternoon.

In so far as the management of that department is concerned, it could not be worse than it is. There is not a thing upon which they put their hands but they leave the ear-marks of mismanagement and the ear-marks of what appears to the ordinary looker-on as dishonesty and lack of proper business principles. When this Government comes to this House, or goes to the country, and asks for a further lease of power, they are presuming to a most extraordinary degree upon the patience of the people of Canada. The war question is the paramount question, and the people of Canada, and the people of Nova Scotia, for whom I speak most particularly at the present moment, will be united in the desire to place at the disposal of the Government everything that can be used for the promotion of the war and the final and ultimate success of the Allies. But it is putting the patience, the endurance, and the loyalty of the people to the most extraordinary test when you ask to be permitted to extend the principal beyond those proper constitutional limits which should govern the management of the affairs of the country.

I pointed out a few minutes ago, and I point out again, that no minister of the Crown can come to this House and say that he never knew about wrong doing in his department until it was brought out by the Public Accounts Committee. What was brought out in connection with the Garland and Foster business was well known to the public before it was disclosed by the Public Accounts Committee. Does anybody tell me that the gentleman who was then the member for Carleton county did not go to the minister for his contract? Will anybody tell me that he was willing to play second fiddle, that he would go to anybody around the department to get his contract except to the minister himself? He certainly did not, and he certainly got his contract from the minister. Will anybody tell me that the minister did not know that he was the member for Carleton? Will anybody say that the poor innocent boy who was led to the slaughter was anything but a mere stool pigeon in the matter? Did he not know that the money that he was throwing into the lap of this boy was going into the pocket of the member for the county? Will anybody tell this House that the minister was ignorant of these things, and that he knew nothing about them until the matter was brought out in the Public Accounts Committee? I think I am making no unwarranted deduction from the circumstances when I tell you, Sir, that the minister must have known about it, that his chief officers must have known—that all must have known everything concerning that nefarious piece of business, that when it was brought out in the Public Accounts Committee it was nothing new to them and that they knew just as much about it before as they did after.

Will anybody tell me that the Minister of Militia and Defence did not know that Mr. Foster of Kings, N.S., was not getting a contract to buy horses? Who hired him, who took him on, who gave him the money? The people of Nova Scotia and the people of this country generally will want to know if it is possible that a young man, such as the Prime Minister described Mr. Foster to be, who had no experience in business whatever, who had never been in this House before except for a term or two of the present Parliament, could have had $73,000 in cash placed to his credit, which he could squander as he pleased, without the head of the department knowing all about it. We have it on record that the Prime Minister did not know anything about it; but one thing we do want to know is, who is responsible for the handling of the money? That is something that the people of Canada will insist on knowing. What sort of an institution is this when $73,000 in cash can be taken out of the revenues of the country and put where some irresponsible, unbusinesslike man, such as we are told Mr. Foster was, could get it out at his own sweet will, while nobody knows who gave it to him, nobody knows what he is doing with it, and nobody knows how he is going to account for it? The people do know, however, where the money came from; they know that the money came out of their pockets; they know that they are contributing this money; they know that they should get proper value for it; and if this Government persist in putting it at the disposal of characters of this kind, the people will take care to find men who will look after their business in a proper way, who will know to whom the expenditure of money should be entrusted, and who will see that proper value is obtained for that expenditure.

On the closing day of last session the right hon. the Prime Minister told us about the wonderful things that he was going to do with those who were trespassing and transgressing in so far as the expenditure of money was concerned. We were told that the walls of the penitentiary would move out and make broad their wings, and then play a flanking movement and gather in the men who were stealing the money of the people. I have watched with care to see what was being done in that respect, and I find that the walls of the penitentiaries and prisons are in the same place, and that not only are the walls and doors in the same place, but those who steal the money are also in the same place, except a few of them who have got promotion from this Government. While gentlemen opposite have given no assistance in widening the doors of the penitentiaries to admit political offenders, the records show that they have given the greatest facilities for getting these offenders out after we have put them in. I remarked once to the Minister of Justice, and on another occasion to the Acting Minister of Justice, that we received little encouragement in trying to convict those who were guilty of criminal political offences, for as fast as we put them in the penitentiaries they would let them out.

Reference has already been made to the searching inquiry that the Premier promised to us on the closing day of last session. I know the ideas that hon. gentleman has of the proper procedure. He is an experienced and eminent lawyer, and I am sure that he could not have looked upon the only inquiry that went on as anything but superficial, and, to a great extent, farcical. We were given some samples of the commission's work last night, and if what we heard was a fair sample of the Davidson Commission's work, I hope that never again will we be asked to regard such an inquiry as a rigid one, or one that is likely to see that the parties who deserve it are brought within the walls of a penitentiary.

I have given my views on the political mix-up, that is, as between the Militia Department and the duties that devolve upon that department and its officers under present conditions. I hope that it is not too late even now for the minister to bring to the notice of the department that this idea of political patronage and political preferment must be cut out, and that everybody who wants to serve his country in connection with this war comes into the Militia Department on an equal footing. If the Government would show that they were in earnest about this thing, no person would be more ready than I to give them credit for any effort in that direction. But I must tell the minister and his colleagues in the Government that so far as the province of Nova Scotia is concerned we had nothing from start to finish but the closest application of the closest kind of party patronage in regard to the militia.

Let me say a few words in a general way as to the general administration of the country. This germ of dishonesty, which seems to percolate down through the ages, so far as Toryism is concerned, is again showing its head, as it has always done under a Tory Administration. It is too bad that the same sort of thing should break out whenever we have a Tory Administration. It cannot be a matter of chance. The disease always breaks out when our friends opposite are in power. If they look at the history of this country they cannot blame the people for not giving them a splendid opportunity for making good. At one time they had eighteen years in power, at another six years, and now they have been given another trial. But on every occasion the same disease breaks out, the same malady is manifested throughout the body politic. What did we find when we came into power in 1896? If a man had been sent forth into this country like the dove that Noah let out of the ark, he would have had to come back without finding one solitary place on which to place his foot that was free from the contamination of Tory politics. There was not a stump or a tree that was not contaminated. The leader of the present Opposition applied various remedies. He got honest men to work for him, and out of this chaos produced dry land. The sun began to shine, and the country prospered in the fifteen years he was in power. Unfortunately, after fifteen years of isolation, fifteen years of fumigation, of severance from wrongful handling of moneys or anything of that kind, the Canadian people made the mistake of thinking they could trust honourable gentlemen opposite again. They said: We will put them back in power again now that the country has been thoroughly fumigated; they know what that fumigation was for, and surely they will profit by that experience. Sad to relate, no sooner was the old hut occupied again than the old disease broke out. I am afraid it is something like the old story that we have heard so often, and which is quite true. I suppose I should not touch upon theology in this discussion; but you will remember, Sir, that when the evil spirit that was sent out of the man into many dry places came back and found the old place swept and garnished and empty, it brought back seven devils worse than himself so that the last state of that man was worse than the first. That seems to be what has happened in this country. From Manitoba the doctrine has gone forth that we did not know, that even the Tories did not know, how to play politics. You have been too honest to play the game, they said. The Minister of Elections said in our presence: "I know how to win elections; I will show you a thing or two as to how elections should be handled." And I am sorry to say that in our province by the sea the people reached the conclusion that they had only been playing at politics. In New Brunswick the thing was adopted at once by unanimous vote of the Tory party. The disease is breaking out here and there all over Canada. Worse still, it broke out in Manitoba, and the Minister of Elections could not control the situation. He is now something like the Scotchman's flea, driven from home—there is no place in Manitoba now where he can win elections by the old method. This doctrine which went forth from Manitoba was accepted in New Brunswick as the proper dodge, the proper trick, the science from the master hand, and what has been the result? It has driven the Premier in disgrace from his seat in New Brunswick, and more should follow him.

Mr. CARVELL: I want to inform the House that he is the nominee of the Conservative party in my constituency, so that he is not disgraced in their eyes.

Mr. McKENZIE: Well, he has evidently been disgraced in the eyes of some decent people, because there are some decent people in New Brunswick. But he evidently has been promoted to a certain level at which certain parties are supposed to be fit to be supporters of this Administration. That is what is happening in New Brunswick. Now let us see what has happened in the little province in the bosom of the Gulf. A very few years ago we had only one man supporting the Liberal party in the legislature of the province of Prince Edward Island. To-day the Conservatives are hanging on by their eyebrows; and at the very first opportunity, because the Liberals did not know how strong they were so far as that province was concerned, the people will go back to their old life and to Liberalism. I need not tell you, Sir, what has happened in the province of British Columbia. You know that the people there are rising in their might to have clean government and clean administration and to have back again the condition of things which we brought to them when we put the Conservatives out of house and home before, and the time will come when our old grand chieftain will once more give clean government to the people of this country, and when we shall all rally around him and the old conditions will prevail.

I wish to say a little in regard to the partyism which has been rampant in this country since the Conservatives came into power in 1911, and to point out that, in so far as my part of the country is concerned, this Government has been to us a disappointment. We had laid out for ourselves certain schemes, and it was the policy of the Administration of Sir Wilfred Laurier that large developments in railway matters should be brought about in our part of the country so that our fisheries and our farming industry and all our other large industries should be put in touch with the heart pulsations of this country. A railway policy was adopted by Sir Wilfrid Laurier's Government for the province of Nova Scotia, but I am sorry to say that with the exception of that part of the road which is in the constituency of the present Premier, everything else was cut out. I am sure that the Premier himself cannot be to proud of this matter. For years before 1911 the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald), the hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair), and all the members for the island of Cape Breton, including myself were pulling on the same oar with the then leader of the Opposition for the obtaining of better railway facilities in the eastern part of the Maritime Provinces. While our railway was to be built, his railway was to be built as well; but when the wheel of fortune turned and we had no further say as to the expenditure of money, the present Prime Minister built his own railway and pitched us over the side of the boat into the sea and would not look at us at all. That is not a very big way for a big man to deal with a question of such importance to us and to our people.

We were told by Conservatives at that time that they would build the railroad that we were to have, but one year, two years, three years, four years have passed and the fifth year is passing and nothing has been done. They do not intend to do anything and nothing will be done until the Liberals come back into power. It would not be so bad if our friends had been saving the money, if it could be said that although they were not building the rail-

5 p.m. ways for us, the money was in the treasury. We left them with all bills paid, everything squared up and the finances of the country in first-class condition. To show you, Sir, in how excellent a condition the finances were, I simply refer to the first Budget speech delivered by Sir Thomas White when he became Minister of Finance. We were told by the present Prime Minister, a few months before our friends came into power, that an expenditure of something like $87,000,000 was the clearest evidence of dishonesty and misappropriation of the money of the people of this country, and that, if they came into power, they could run the country with much less money and show better results for it. If the Prime Minister had been in earnest about that, we should have had some evidence of it when he came into power, and that evidence would be that he would reduce the expenditure. What do we find? The first year our friends were in power, the expenditure was $98,000,000, or 11,000,000 more than this horrible expenditure of which the Prime Minister spoke. The second year the expenditure was $112,000,000, or $25,000,000 of an increase. The next year the expenditure was $127,000,000, or $40,000,000 of an increase, and the fourth and last year of which we have an account the expenditure was $140,000,000, or $53,000,000 of an increase. That shows that the expenditure was growing by leaps and bounds, and that the Government was absolutely regardless of the promise of retrenchment that we had heard so much about a few years ago.

What about the interest charges? When we came into power in 1896 the interest expenditure of this country was $10,000,000. We went out of office in 1911, the interest expenditure was only $12,000,000, or an annual increase during the fifteen years of the Laurier Administration of $135,337. The interest expenditure, or the interest appropriation for the last year of which we have an account, that is so far as the ordinary expenditure is concerned, outside of war expenditure, was $21,500,000, or a yearly increase since the Conservative party came into power of $3,166,000, and this expenditure is getting worse instead of better as time goes on.

It is up to us all to put all our energies together in order to put an end to this war, to do all that we can as a great country, to put forth all our resources of men and money in order to bring about a victorious ending to this struggle. But let us not forget and let not the people of this country forget the conditions which prevail to-day in British Columbia, in Manitoba, in Prince Edward Island, and in New Brunswick, or wherever else the Tories have sway in this country. We must not forget that our great duty is not only to bring back to power the leader of the Opposition, who is the old political physician in this country, but to bring back the conditions, both financial and moral, which he created in this country, and which no other party than that of which he is the leader is capable of restoring and perpetuating in this great country of ours.

Hon. MARTIN BURRELL (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, you will permit me, in rising to speak on the motion for an Address to His Royal Highness the Governor General in reply to the speech from the Throne, to join with the other members of this House in congratulating you upon your being elevated to the office which you now occupy. I am not a very old member of this House, but I have had the pleasure of sitting under the administration of three Speakers. I think that those of us who sat in the House during that length of time realize, as I do, that the task of the Speaker is not by any means easy; that it calls for qualities of an exceptionally high character; that it calls not only for great tact and great impartiality, but for great firmness as well. Upon many occasions these qualities have been tested to the very uttermost, and it is inspiring to find in the young democracy of Canada, where we are carrying on institutions British in character, that under those tests the Canadian character has risen to the same level as that of their Anglo-Saxon forebears, and that democracy has held its own in the conduct of the affairs of this House.

I wish also to congratulate the mover of the Address, the hon. member from the far West (Mr. Alfred Thompson), and the seconder, the hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Eugène Paquet). I was particularly glad that the hon. member for the Yukon had the honour of moving the Address in reply to the speech from the Throne. I myself am a western man, and, as the northern part of my constituency touches that great country from which the member for Yukon comes, naturally we have a good many things in common, and, perhaps, look at national questions at a different angle from that of other members who have not been familiar with the West.

I noted with a great deal of interest the length at which hon. gentlemen dealt with the question of the war, which, after all, occupies our thoughts to the exclusion of almost everything else at this time. I suppose there is not a member in this House, from the leader of the Government to the leader of the Opposition and down to the youngest member, who does not feel, in common with the rest of the people of this country, the presence of the shadow of this great conflict. I think that every waking moment of our lives is to some extent affected by the grave and tragic character of the struggle that is now going on. My right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition, in opening his remarks, observed that we meet again under the shadow of this disastrous war. We unquestionably do, and it is, perhaps, a sad feature of our democratic life and of our party government that we lay too much stress on these smaller affairs of party interest, to the neglect of the paramount issue that is before the Canadian people at the present time. The morning after war was declared, I happened to be in the city of Vancouver, that beautiful, far-western province with which so many members of the House are familiar. It so happened that the Prime Minister had asked me to address a convention of Canadian Clubs; it was on August 5. War was declared late in the night of August 4, and I reached Vancouver the night before. I am not likely to forget the deep emotion that stirred all those people on that occasion. I am not likely to forget the wave of passion that swept over every man and woman present, or the profound conviction that these people had as to the underlying justice of the cause which had at last driven Great Britain into the war on the side of the Allies. Nor am I likely to forget the determination that moved every heart and every mind, out in that far-western province, to stay with this thing and to see it through, no matter what it might cost. It was with a recollection of this incident, which would naturally burn itself into one's brain, that I watched with the deepest sympathy and the deepest pride the generous response that was made by our far-western country when the Empire called for their support in this great struggle. I recall many instances of men in my own constituency in the far north who walked twenty, even thirty and forty miles from distant and isolated sections of the country in order that they might be on hand at the earliest possible moment to answer the call. I remember one typical instance: that of a man, living in one of the beautiful valleys in the northern part of British Columbia. He was English by birth; he had been in the country a great many years, and had finally built his house, developed his small farm, and arrived at the point where he expected to get some little comfort from his labours and some little enjoyment from his life. His mother was still alive; his father was not. His mother had three sons in the war: one in the navy and two in the army. Not very long after the outbreak of war she wrote her son that one of his brothers had been wounded and another killed, and that she thought the hour had struck when he too should take his turn. He did not hesitate. He packed the few small things that he wished to take with him on his journey, nailed fast the door of his small house, took the train and answered the call, believing that he was fulfilling the highest duties of a British subject in his country's hour of trial. It is that spirit, Sir, that has dominated the people of the West generally in regard to the call which was so strong and which came with such sudden and terrific force. The fact that they responded to that call and that they responded to it in that spirit is the best guarantee of the final outcome of this war.

I should be a very poor Canadian if I did not share the pride of those who are living in eastern and central Canada that the response which I have described in the far West was also made, with equal vigour and equal patriotism, throughout the length and breadth of the eastern country. Certainly, if there should be any inspiration to those of us who are not at the front to do our duty here, it should be the feeling that those men have given up everything they possess in the world—home, comforts, even honourable and distinguished positions—in order that they might fight our battles. I have seen these men march through the city of Ottawa; it has been my pleasure to be present on many occasions, especially when the western divisions have gone through, when the Duke of Connaught, whom we are all so delighted to have with us in this time of stress, and the hon. Minister of Militia, were present to review the troops. I have seen scores of personal friends amongst them; I have watched their career. I have, as every man in this House has, lost by death in the battle trenches many a warm personal friend. I have known others who were wounded, and some have returned. It has been an immense satisfaction to a man from my province, who has known these men, not only to watch the response that they made, but to see that they have borne themselves not only as we would expect a Canadian to bear himself, but in such a way as to line up with the very finest traditions of the whole Empire. I do not dwell on these things, because it was not for that purpose that I rose to speak. My hon. friend who has just sat down (Mr. McKenzie) will perhaps pardon me if I do not allude to the matter he has given us in the last hour. I found it, I confess, a little bit mixed. He was talking about chaos, and the sun and stars and military shovels, and the iniquities of the Conservative Administrations in Manitoba, New Brunswick and British Columbia, and the rampant partyism that has been observable in this country since the unfortunate hour when the Conservatives assumed office in Ottawa. I think, perhaps, we can take all that for what it is worth; at least my hon. friend will not think I am discourteous to him if I do not touch on the matter which he produced just now. No man could take any exception to the tone of a good many of the speeches that have been delivered. No man could take exception to the tone of the speech of the right hon. leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) or that of my hon. friend from the West who sits behind him (Mr. Michael Clark), or those of several other hon. gentlemen opposite. It is true that some of those speeches have contained a good deal of criticism of things in connection with which we must expect criticism. I do not know that any man can object to having strong and keen criticism levelled against him, when he is placed in a position of responsibility, as members of a government are. Nobody will complain of that. But I think, also, we can realize that there is a good deal of criticism that is expressed, and a certain amount of criticism has been heard in this debate, which is not of a helpful character, but is entirely designed to make political capital for the man who advances it. The suggestion that the recruiting meetings addressed by members of this Government and others on this side of the House during the past year have been simply instruments to advance the political interests of those who have taken part in them, I regret. It has been my pleasure to take part, as it is every man's pleasure and duty to take part, in meetings of that kind, not only in other parts of Canada, but in Ontario. I attended one or two with my hon. friend from North Renfrew (Mr. Graham). I would just as little think of accusing him of trying to make political capital out of a speech of that kind when appealing to the best instincts of the Canadian people, in a common cause, as he would think of accusing me of trying to make political capital out of such a meeting.

While we have had several speeches in which there might be nothing to object to, we have had two speeches to which there has been every reason to object, both as to their tone and their matter. I refer particularly to the remarks of the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) and the hon. member for Carleton, N.B. (Mr. Carvell). We all know our hon. friend from St. John. He is a gentleman who has occupied a prominent position in the counsels of the Liberal party and of the late Government. He is a Privy Councillor, a man who has been a distinguished member of the Bar, and who, of all men, should weigh his words when he speaks in public. We know his methods, we know that particularly suave way of his. There is an old saying of a certain man, that the words of his mouth were softer than butter, but war was in his heart. I do not know that the words could be as applicable to anybody else as to my hon. friend from St. John. He is very astute. His methods are of such a kind that he can suggest all sorts of desperate and sinister motives in those whom he politically opposes without coming out flatfooted in such a way as to expose himself to be called to order for transgressing the rules of parliamentary procedure—although he must be accused of coming very near the limit of parliamentary debate on some occasions this session.

The hon. member for Carleton, N.B., is a man of different mould altogether. In his tactics and his manner, if he will permit me to say so, he could never be accused of suavity, whatever else we may accuse him of. I think we can say that he is of the sand-bagging, bludgeoning type, using that expression in a parliamentary sense; and I think it is perhaps fair to say that he is not at all handicapped by any lack of recklessness or inaccuracy in a great many of the statements he makes. The members of this House have long learned to take anything that the hon. member for Carleton, N.B., may say with a very large grain of salt. I shall have occasion later on to touch on some of the utterances of my hon. friend, as they were directed to myself.

I wish first to refer to a subject which has been freely discussed in this House, which happens to affect me in a rather important way, inasmuch as I am the minister representing the province of British Columbia in this Government, and because, particularly, I happened to be in Victoria on the day that war broke out; and it happened to fall to my lot to have something to do with the purchase of the submarines about which so much discussion has waged in this House. I shall not discuss the evidence, which is bulky, which has been open to the inspection of members on both sides, and which has been extensively quoted from by both the hon. the Solicitor General and the hon. the Minister of Marine. I regret, in the deepest way, the language that has been used in the discussion of that question by both the hon. member for St. John and the hon. member for Carleton, N.B. I do not know Sir Charles Davidson very well. I know him, as a good many members of the House know him, on a slight personal acquaintance, and from hearing of his reputation from others who are able to judge. Never, until the hon. member for St. John and the hon. member for Carleton referred to that distinguished gentleman in the way they did, did I hear one word of blame or harsh criticism, or criticism that could be looked upon as regrettable in any way, applied to the ex-Chief Justice of Quebec, Sir Charles Davidson. Perhaps the best answer that could be given to either of these members is the answer that was read by the Solicitor General, from the chief Liberal organ in this country, the Toronto Globe. If my hon. friend from Carleton and my hon. friend from St. John are not satisfied with Sir Charles Davidson, if they think he is the type of man who has been biased, superficial, shallow, I think they could be referred to no better authority than the leading organ of their own party, the Toronto Globe, which has expressed a very different opinion of that distinguished man. It was not, however, so much in regard to Sir Charles Davidson that I wanted to speak. he is a man well enough known to be able to take care of himself; and he has friends enough, on both sides of the House, to resent the references made to him. I wanted to say half a word in regard to the counsel appointed, not, as has been stated again and again by these two members, as a party counsel, to look after the interests of the Conservative party, but as a counsel who was looking after the interests of this country. I refer now to Mr. John Thompson, who happens to have been for years a strong personal friend of my own, and who, as many members of this House know, is a distinguished and honourable son of a distinguished and honourable father. I think that the references that were made to him, the contemptuous references made by my hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Pugsley), who has just come in, and the references which were made only yesterday by the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Carvell), who I think, used the phrase that Mr. Thompson pursued the police court methods—

Mr. CARVELL: I made no such reference to Mr. Thompson.

Mr. BURRELL: I beg my hon. friend's pardon; I think he applied these words to the Solicitor General.

Mr. CARVELL: I did.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Will my hon. friend allow me to correct him? I made no contemptuous reference to Mr. Thompson; my reference was entirely to the shallow investigation which Mr. Thompson conducted.

Mr. BURRELL: The astute and sophisticated mind of my hon. friend very often sees fine distinctions that are not differences.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I have known some very able counsels conceal the facts.

Mr. BURRELL: I think that is the last conclusion which any one would reach regarding Mr. Thompson. At all events, I think I am fully justified in using the words I did in characterizing the references of my hon. friend. Both of these hon. gentlemen certainly gave the impression that not only was this commission conducting a very shallow and partisan commission, but that the methods employed by Mr. Thompson, to whom, I think, my hon. friend from St. John referred as an ordinary student—

Mr. PUGSLEY: Not at all. What I said was—

Mr. BURRELL: Excuse me, I have the floor. If my hon. friend will allow me to finish my sentence—

Mr. PUGSLEY: I wish to correct my hon. friend right now. I rise, Mr. Speaker, to a point of order.

Mr. SPEAKER: I understand that the hon. member for St. John rises to a point of order. When the hon. member states his point of order I shall rule upon it.

Mr. PUGSLEY: My point of order is this. My hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture says that I compared Mr. Thompson with a law student. I did not. I said that any law student would have known that, in order to obtain the truth, and to get out the facts, it was necessary to ask the question which I suggested.

Mr. BURRELL: If my hon. friend can take any comfort from that difference, he is welcome to it. If my hon. friend had allowed me to finish my sentence, which he would not do—he is always so ready to interrupt—he would have heard me say that his reference to Mr. Thompson was that he did the work in a way an ordinary law student would do it. It was a slighting reference. I say to hon. members opposite that if they would put aside their desire to make political capital out of a commission which has done its duty to this country in the fullest sense, they would at least give credit to these gentlemen for the highest possible motives, and show some recognition, as most people have shown, of the way in which they have done their work.

Mr. KNOWLES: Knowing Mr. Thompson, does my hon. friend say that he proved himself equal to the onerous work of investigating a $50,000,000 transaction?

Mr. BURRELL: My hon. friend must not expect me to answer questions like that. I think Mr. Thompson was capable of doing the work. I am not a lawyer—I understand my hon. friend has the distinction of being a lawyer, and possibly he is a better judge—but a good many lawyers think so. On this subject of interruptions I would like to point out that when my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries was speaking he was interrupted I think forty or fifty times, certainly thirty or forty times, by hon. members on the other side of the House, especially by my hon. friend from Carleton (Mr. Carvell), and sometimes by my hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Pugsley), and yet when my hon. friend from Carleton was interrupted twice yesterday he said, "I will not be interrupted; I do not want to be interfered with." The hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) asked a perfectly natural question, and my hon. friend from Carleton told him to sit down, that he had the floor, and would not be interfered with. That may be one way of playing the game, but I do not think it is one which can appeal to the fairness of hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House who have observed these things. I hope I will not object to answer any proper question which may be put, but my hon. friend would not be interrupted at all, and I think that at least he might extend some courtesy to members on this side of the House.

Before I leave the subject of Mr. Thompson, let me say to my hon. friends from St. John and Carleton that Mr. Thompson, who is, at all events in the opinion of some people, well qualified for the work which he undertook,—my two hon. friends are both lawyers, and I presume they are regarded, by some people at all events, as something more than ordinary members of the bar—gave his services in the finest spirit of patriotism for absolutely nothing all through that Commission, and he is now in the King's uniform ready to go and fight for his country. When my two hon. friends can rise to that height, it will be time for them to criticise.

Mr. ROGERS: Rise to a point of order now.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Will my hon. friend allow me?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: It is my duty to remind the House of Rule 23 which says: "No member shall interrupt another member."

Mr. DEVLIN: Except with his permission.

Mr. SPEAKER: The rule does not mention that, but if the hon. member who is asked a question is willing to be interrupted, of course I will not interfere. I think it is the desire of the hon. minister not to be interrupted, and he is entitled to have Rule 23 applied.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I understood that my hon. friend did not object.

Mr. CARVELL: If my hon. friend wants to know why I am not in uniform, I have the answer here in a file of correspondence, which I will show him if he wants to see it.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. Minister of Agriculture has the floor.

Mr. BURRELL: I am not complaining of these hon. gentlemen if they interrupt to ask a question; I simply ask that the same fair play which is extended to hon. gentlemen opposite will be shown to hon. gentlemen on this side of the House.

Mr. CARVELL: My hon. friend should not fire shots across the floor.

Mr. BURRELL: To return for a minute to the question of the investigation of the submarines, I am not going into the evidence, as I have stated, for various reasons. My hon. friend from St. John rose, as he has risen a great many times during the debate, to interject a criticism and some remarks. The last time the subject came up, when, I think, he made a speech on a point of order, he asked again about the three cheques; he asked why these three cheques were given instead of one cheque. Now, all that matter was fully gone into and thoroughly explained by my hon. friend the Solicitor General. The statement is on page 140 of Hansard, and I am not going into that question again because my hon. friend knows all about it as well as I do.

Mr. PUGSLEY: It does not explain it at all.

Mr. BURRELL: I am not going into the question of buoyancy and efficiency, because my hon. friends are perfectly familiar with them. They have had the evidence placed before them, the cumulative evidence of experts who know what they are talking about. It is only beating the air to go on suggesting—

Mr. CARVELL: Hear, hear.

Mr. BURRELL: I say that it is absolutely beating the air to go on suggesting that the matter which has been referred to exhaustively in the evidence as proved under the testimony of experts can be insufficient in the belief of this gentleman who has never given it any close study at all. A discussion took place as to the price of these vessels and it fell to my lot to be in Victoria when the matter first came up.

I was asked to go down to the Navy yard by the commanding officer and I went down with Captain Logan. I was there two days running and when the question came up as to the possibility and advisability of getting these submarines at a time when there was critical danger to the coast cities of British Columbia the commanding officer was urging in the strongest way possible that they should be got. Captain Logan, whose testimony is given in the evidence, was comparatively familiar with the type of these vessels, the class to which they belonged and to some extent with their efficiency. He did not know anything about the price. I was standing at the "phone" when Captain Logan asked the agent in Seattle to quote a price if these boats could be procured. My recollection is now—and I think it is pretty clear—that they did not know at Seattle and had to obtain that information from the Electric Boat Company in New York. At all events, the price was quoted over the phone as $1,150,000 or $575,000 each. That amount was inserted in the telegram advising my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Hazen) of the fact and it was stated from the commanding officer: I thoroughly concurred as to the advisability of getting these boats but the question of price, or anything of that kind I left to the Government to deal with. I cannot see, in view of the evidence that there can be the slightest question in any reasonable man's mind as to the value of these boats. Let me ask my hon. friend from St. John: Why was there all this suspicion? Why was it that from the start he was so suspicious of these boats?

Mr. PUGSLEY: Does my hon. friend desire an answer?

Mr. BURRELL: Oh, no, I do not think I will ask the hon. gentleman to give an answer.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I would be very glad to give the answer.

Mr. BURRELL: I know perfectly well that my hon. friend would be quite willing to talk for half an hour if necessary, but I do not think it is necessary at all. When a man is in serious danger of his life and finds that a rifle is the only weapon he can get to save his life, and it is a question of whether the rifle is going to cost $10, $15, or $20 he is not very much concerned whether he is going to pay $10, $15 or $20; he is going to get the rifle in order to save his life. I cannot understand my hon. friend not giving credit to the situation which existed in British Columbia at that time. He ought to know, as every man in this House should know, that at the particular time at which this transaction took place the declaration of war was a matter of hours, that there was no time to enter into lengthy negotiations, even if we had disputed the price of these boats. It was a matter of necessity to get them. I know what the condition of things in Victoria and Vancouver was at that time, and I know how seriously alarmed the people were. It was a matter not only of possibility, but of probability that the German fleet on the Pacific were liable at any time to steam in and shell the two cities of Victoria and Vancouver.

Mr. PUGSLEY: They had a Japanese cruiser there.

Mr. BURRELL: The only thing that saved the western coast from a possibility of the kind that I have described was the presence of the submarines that we purchased at that time.

Mr. MACDONALD: There were no guns on them.

Mr. MURPHY: And no torpedoes.

Mr. BURRELL: It was not very long before torpedoes were put on these boats. But the fact that it was known that these submarines were in possession of the authorities at Esquimalt did more to ensure the safety of these two coast cities than anything else that possibly could be done.

In discussing this question the other day, the hon. member for Carleton made this remarkable statement and it is characteristic of the methods of my hon. friend that he should have made it. I am reading from page 274 of Hansard, and it will be seen that the statement was made when he was nearing the close of his speech:

> The submarine business has been pretty well discussed by speakers on both sides of this House. I am only going to call the attention of the House to the fact that one of the most serious charges that could be made against a public man in Canada was made against Sir Richard McBride, practically alleging that there had been a rake off of $350,000 in the purchase of these submarines, taking advantage of the nation in its hour of need, when these things were a real necessity, considering the fact that they were obsolete, that they had been refused by the government of a South American republic, not because they would not shoot torpedoes, but because the things would not come to the surface when they wanted them to.

That is a pretty bold, a pretty reckless statement for the hon. gentleman to have made and it is the most regrettable statement that he could have made and one which he would not have made had he been in Victoria or outside the precincts of this House. The hon. member for Carleton would not have dared to have repeated that statement if he had been in Victoria at that time. Sir Richard McBride did, as the people of British Columbia think, a patriotic thing for his country in getting these submarines or by giving his services to the extent that he did in getting them, and for the hon. member for Carleton to get up in the way in which he did and behind a man's back, and enjoying the privileges of this House, to accuse a man of being a grafter to the extent of $350,000 is something that must strike every member of this House as surprising and deplorable. Why did he not have the manliness to do these things in the proper place where he could be called to account for them?

An hon. MEMBER: He was out there.

Mr. BURRELL: Yes, and could have been given an opportunity—

Mr. CARVELL: I could have got a Davidson investigation, I suppose.

Mr. BURRELL: Yes, or anything else; or, the hon. gentleman could have said this in such a way that the gentleman to whom he referred would have had an opportunity of replying. There is nothing more regrettable or deplorable, amongst all the phrases that have been put upon Hansard than the statement of my hon. friend. Speaking as a British Columbian, knowing something of the facts that existed at that time, knowing the gravity of the situation, as it affected a large part of the Canadian people in the far West—and they are no less Canadian because they live in Victoria or in the province of British Columbia, whatever opinion my hon. friend may have of that province—knowing the situation as I do, Sir Richard McBride is to be congratulated and he is to be admired for the efforts which he made, financially and otherwise, through his Government to enable this Government to obtain possession of these two boats which practically made the Pacific coast immune from danger in that particular.

My hon. friend from St. John never seemed to have realized that there was a situation of considerable gravity at that time in the western coast. He is all the time harping on suspicions as to the fact of a possible rake-off. I presume he will find time to thoroughly examine the evidence that has been submitted. He is a good enough lawyer to sift that evidence and I venture to say that if he gives an honest opinion upon it he will admit that there never was a more thorough examination into anything and that there never was a clearer transaction put through in our country's history than that which was put through in connection with this matter. Let me say to my hon. friend, who is so regardless of the position and the perils of the people of Victoria and Vancouver, how differently would he have spoken if a German cruiser had been within fifty miles of St. John. He would have been down on his knees begging the Government to do something. One million, three millions, would not have been enough if it were necessary to ensure protection, and he who so lightly disregards the peril of a city on the far western coast and would have taken a very different tone if the danger applied to his own city, should be the last man to cast reflections on those who had anything to do with that matter. As I have several letters here which I wish to put on file in connection with another matter to which my hon. friend from Carleton referred yesterday, I trust, Mr. Speaker, that you will allow me to call it six o'clock.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Will the minister allow me to ask him who actually purchased the submarines? Was it Mr. Logan or Sir Richard McBride.

Mr. BURRELL: My hon. friend can find out all that information without any trouble. This Government bought the submarines through the good offices of the British Columbia Government, who helped us because those people had to have the money then and there, or we should never have had the submarines before war was declared. I should think both governments were fully justified.

At six o'clock, the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to rule.

Thursday, January 27, 1916.

The House met at Three o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

THE GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH.

ADDRESS IN REPLY.

Consideration of the motion of Mr. Alfred Thompson for an address to His Royal Highness the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, resumed from Wednesday, January 26.

Hon. MARTIN BURRELL (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, when the House adjourned last night I had just finished presenting to the House a few words in connection with matters which had been brought up during the course of this debate, and I was about to refer to some things which had been lengthily discussed by the hon. member for Carleton, N.B. (Mr. Carvell). That hon. member has seen fit to discuss at very great length in this House a question which, from my point of view, and I think from the point of view of a good many other people, it was not in the public interest to discuss. On that point I shall speak a little later. I shall not attempt to follow the ramifications of my hon. friend's arguments, because it would be very hard to follow them, even should I desire to do so; neither shall I attempt to follow all the reckless statements that he made in connection with the subject. I sometimes think that democracy, for whose existence we are fighting now, and coupled with democracy the love of freedom and the liberty of free speech, is not an unmixed blessing when the privilege of freedom of speech degenerates as it sometimes does into license. My hon. friend has made a good many reckless speeches in the course of his career in this House; and he has got into trouble a good many times in this House; he would have got into trouble a good many more times outside the House if he had said outside the House what he has said inside the House. I might, in that connection, direct my hon. friend's attention to the excellent editorial in the Ottawa Free Press of last night, in which the editor cordially invites my hon. friend to repeat the remarks made here in reference to the Free Press outside of this House, when he will find himseslf in the law courts.

Mr. CARVELL: Would my hon. friend pardon me.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. BURRELL: Have I made a misstatement?

Mr. CARVELL: I just want——

[Mr. Burrell.]

Mr. BURRELL: If I have made a misstatement——

Mr. CARVELL: I want to inform my hon. friend that I have written a letter to the Free Press, and I am going to give them all the opportunity to bring all the actions they want in the courts of law.

Mr. BURRELL: I am perfectly sure that the House is exceedingly interested in that, and I would suggest that if my hon. friend is very hard pressed he can secure the distinguished legal services of the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley).

Mr. CARVELL: And he will win for me, too.

Mr. BURRELL: My hon. friend, in the very long speech which he made the other day, started out with a misstatement of fact. Of course that is not very surprising, although it is rather astonishing to hear a gentleman who is always so keenly desirous of bringing down proof for every statement he makes, starting out on an argument with an absolute misstatement of fact. In starting to discuss the question of hay in New Brunswick, he made the statement that the contractors in 1915, the Atlantic Hay Company, had a contract for 7,000 tons of hay which was increased later to 10,000 tons. My hon. friend, if he is going to make statements of that kind, should try and get somewhere near the truth because that contract of 7,000 tons was never increased to 10,000 tons. And he makes the statement further on in that speech, that after they had filled the terms of this contract they immediately went after more, and he broadly intimates that they got more. I am here to say that they never had any other contract than that for 7,000 tons. A little further on, he states that the contract was given for $24 a ton for compressed hay; and then at page 263 Hansard he says:

> These men were given a contract for 7,000 tons of hay, afterwards increased to about 10,000 tons—

I have shown the inaccuracy of that.

> —at $24 a ton, delivered in St. John from press, ready to be put on board the vessel—I am not sure; I was—

I thought my hon. friend was always so sure of the facts.

> —under the impression that the contract price was $24.50. My hon. friend the Minister of Customs knows about this, because he and I talked the matter over.

Mr. J. D. Reid: When was that?

Mr. Carvell: That was one night last spring.

Mr. Reid: You are referring to something which took place a year ago.

Mr. Carvell: I am referring to something which took place a year ago.

An hon. Member: That is too deep for him.

Mr. Carvell: No, it is not too deep for him. The Minister of Customs and I will not quarrel over the matter. If he had been allowed to handle this thing there would not have been the terrible condition of affairs that exists in New Brunswick to-day. The Minister of Customs told me that the contract price was $24.50.

There was never a contract given for $24.50. There was no mention of it, and the Minister of Customs could never have said it. My hon. friend the member for Carleton should not have believed it, because he did not get the facts, and he could have got them if he had wanted to. I shall not go into the whole question of that contract, but I wish to touch on some features of it. It was given on January 4, 1915. I did not happen to be here at the time, because I was then recovering from pneumonia and was in the Southern States. The department, however, and those who had anything to do with the department, acted in perfectly good faith in giving that contract. My hon. friend refers in very scathing tones to the iniquities—he almost used that phrase—of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Hazen), who, he gives us to understand, is playing havoc with everything that is good and pure and righteous in New Brunswick, and whom he holds responsible for these things. Well, if a matter came up concerning the province of New Brunswick, I do not know that it would be a crime to ask the advice of, or to consult with, the minister who represents that province in the Government. If my hon. friend ever achieves the distinction—I do not think it likely that he will—of being a cabinet minister, I can easily believe that he of all men—

Mr. CARVELL: You know that some very ordinary men have become cabinet ministers.

Mr. BURRELL: If my hon. friend ever did achieve such a distinction, he would be the first to expect to be consulted when things come up in connection with his own province. I do not think my hon. friend is ever likely to achieve that distinction; looking at his record, I certainly do not think he ever will. The hon. member for Carleton was elected in 1904 by a majority of 274. He appealed to the electors again in 1908, and he had meanwhile forfeited their confidence to the extent that he got in by a majority of only 154. He appealed again in 1911, to find that he had forfeited nearly all the confidence of the electors because he only got a majority of 11; that time he got elected by the skin of his teeth, and if he continues to keep up his reputation in this House he will certainly not get elected next time. I think it would be good policy on the part of my hon. friend to support an extension of the term of the present Parliament, otherwise we may not see much more of him.

Mr. GRAHAM: Was that the argument used in caucus?

Mr. BURRELL: Now let me refer for a moment or two to the question of hay. The first offer we had of pressed hay was from Kennealy and Wetmore. I think they are Conservatives——

Mr. CARVELL: No, Liberals; one of them is anyway.

Mr. BURRELL: I am not sure about their politics. Anyway, on January 2, 1915, they made an offer of 10,000 tons of hay at $21.50 a ton. The condition was made that the Department of Agriculture should furnish the presses and the tender was not accepted. I think, perhaps, it would be well in that connection to put two letters on Hansard, because they will show how the thing took place.

St. John, N.B., Jan. 2, 1915.

J. A. Ruddick, Esq.,
Commissioner, Department of Agriculture,
Ottawa.

Dear sir,—At the request of Hon. J. D. Hazen we have submitted a tender for ten thousand tons compressed hay delivered West St. John for War Office account.

Hon. Mr. Hazen advises us that your department can arrange for the presses for this business. Will you advise us full particulars of the arrangements covering this item so that we may take the necessary steps to complete arrangements providing our tender is accepted.

Awaiting your reply, we are,

Yours very truly,

Kennealy & Wetmore, Ltd.

Messrs. Kennealy & Wetmore, Ltd.,
St. John, N.B.

Dear sirs,—I have your letter of the 2nd instant, which has crossed mine of the same date. I do not know what the Honourable Mr. Hazen had in mind when he advised you that this department could arrange for compressors to handle New Brunswick hay. As a matter of fact the only presses which the department has control of at the present time are those which are in use at Montreal. There must be some, misunderstanding on that point.

Yours truly,

J. A. Ruddick,
Commissioner.

These letters explain why at that time Kennealy & Wetmore did not get that contract. The Atlantic Hay Co. was the only other tender received or considered at that time, and a gentleman came down here—I am now only speaking from memory of what Mr. Ruddick said, because I was not here at the time,—I think he was the son of a member of the firm, or at all events he was some one connected with the firm. The matter was discussed, and he asked for a contract at the price of $24, at which price they offered to supply their own presses. My hon. friend knows that the cost of freight, and of the installation of presses and motors comes to a very considerable sum; they put it at about $20,000.

Mr. CARVELL: Thirty cents a ton will pay for the whole thing; I did it.

Mr. BURRELL: Will my hon. friend sit down.

Mr. CARVELL: I will keep the hon. gentleman straight.

Mr. BURRELL: May I speak to a point of order, Mr. Speaker; we may as well get the air cleared before we start on this subject. I would not object to any hon. gentleman opposite asking the privilege to correct a statement of fact. I hope I would not object to that; I have never objected to it, and no man would object. But I do object to be constantly interrupted if the interruption does not relate to any question of fact. The interruption of my hon. friend had nothing to do with the statement I made. I simply referred to the cost of the presses; I am not referring to the cost of the pressing at all. I made the plain statement that this firm stated that the presses cost them nearly $20,000 to purchase, to freight, to install and to operate the motors.

Mr. CARVELL: I deny that; that is not true.

Mr. SPEAKER: I think my hon. friend should correct his statement. The words "not true" are certainly not parliamentary.

Mr. CARVELL: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I say it is not a correct statement of fact as to the cost of these presses; that is all.

Mr. BURRELL: I am amazed at my hon. friend who is a lawyer, being so absolutely out of his province, and showing such a lack of intelligence. I did not say it was a fact; I stated that the gentleman who came here claimed that the cost was $20,000.

Mr. CARVELL: It is a wonder they did not say $40,000.

[Mr. Burrell.]

Mr. BURRELL: Just keep quiet. Let me tell my hon. friend that he will get all he wants before I am through.

Mr. SPEAKER: I must ask hon. members not to interrupt the hon. minister. I understand he desires to have the protection of Rule 23, which every hon. member is entitled to when addressing the House. I ask hon. members not to interrupt the hon. member.

Mr. CARVELL: All right.

Mr. BURRELL: Now, I can elucidate this point which we were discussing perhaps a little more clearly. I made the statement that the contractors who came up here considered that it cost them nearly $20,000 to install those four presses, with their equipment. My hon. friend says that is not a fact, if I said it, but I did not say it. I do say that it comes pretty nearly to that sum, and I am going to give the best proof I can for that statement. It is a fact that my hon. friend himself when he had a contract with the Government in 1902 put in a certain claim for loss after finishing his contract, and in that claim he stated that the amount invested in his pressing plant, consisting of two presses, was $8,530. That comes pretty close to it.

Mr. TURRIFF: That is not $20,000 for one press.

Mr. BURRELL: So much for that. At that time when this contract was given, and given in perfectly good faith by the department, the department had no accurate knowledge as to the cost of compression, for it was not until after this date that the presses at Montreal were taken over by the department, and that we could get knowledge of these facts. At that time we were paying, under the arrangement that had been made in the earlier stages of the pressing at Montreal, $4.95 to the firm that was pressing, and adding $18.75, which was paid for the hay, and adding the freight to St. John, that brought the cost to us of the compressed article at West St. John up to $25.70. So that at this price we were saving $1.70 as compared with the Montreal price. There were other contracts given that year in addition to this one of 7,000 tons, because Kennealy & Wetmore came back with the request that we might give them one at a higher figure, but my hon. friend the Minister of Customs (Mr. Reid), who was, I think, Acting Minister of Agriculture at that time, took the ground that as they had tendered for $21.50, whether they thought the presses were going to be supplied or not he was going to keep the price down to that figure, and so it was kept down to $21.50. George Stevenson & Company, Mr. Stevenson also being a Conservative, had been given a contract for 3,000 tons, and Charles Cyr one for 2,000 tons. The hon. member for Carleton has something to say at page 271 of Hansard particularly about the quality of the hay. He spoke of the fact that these people, after completing their 7,000-ton contract, reached out for more, and intimates that they got more. He says:

I find no fault with the Government for giving all the contracts they could, because they want the hay. But these people bought up every ton of the rotten, black, condemned clover hay—

Nobody can fail to recognize where that language came from.

—there was in the county of Carleton. There were 300 tons of hay condemned at the plant of the Phillips-Estey Co. at Woodstock; there must have been more than 300 tons at the plant of the McCain Company at Woodstock, and 300 tons more at different points along the line. And, mind, at the two plants to which I have referred, this hay was condemned by Government inspectors. But every ton of that black, rotten hay was loaded on the cars, sent to St. John, put through the Atlantic Hay Company's presses, and they got $24 a ton for it from the British Government. No, I want to qualify that. There may have been a carload or two that did not go through their presses. I was in the shed at St. John in the summer, and there was a little lot of hay piled up in one corner. Now, what kind of inspectors must they have in St. John?

You know the tone he would speak that in if he were saying it.

What kind of supervision does the department give to the purchase of this hay? What kind of cursed influence must the Minister of Marine and Fisheries exercise upon the minister of this department, and upon all the rest of them, to allow these things to go on unchallenged?

I will have a word or two to say about this hay. My hon. friend takes the broad ground that a great lot of this hay was not only neglected in the way of inspection, but was disgraceful in character, and should never have gone over to the War Office at all. What I shall read here will apply to a lot of the hay with which we had to deal in New Brunswick last year. The following is a telegram from Thomas C. Strong, who was one of our inspectors at Woodstock:

Car of hay No. 42844 C.P. inspected at Woodstock by me and rejected has been reshipped to St. John by the James A. Scott Co. to the Atlantic Hay Co. for compressing as they claim that I am too hard on the grading and they will receive hay in St. John that I reject. Please keep a check on this car and let me know the results.

Yours,

Thos. C. Strong.

The following is a telegram from Mr. J. A. Ruddick to Mr. J. L. Cooke:

Ottawa, March 13, 1915.

Car C.P. 42844 rejected by our Woodstock inspector has been shipped to Atlantic Co. Look out for it.

(Sgd.) J. A. Ruddick.

The following letter was written to Mr. J. L. Cooke by Mr. Moore, who has had this matter in hand. I may here interject in reply to my hon. friend, who asked me in stentorian tones what kind of inspectors we have in St. John, that we have a very efficient man in Mr. J. L. Cooke, who was appointed under the late regime in 1909. He is the man who did the inspecting. Is my hon. friend satisfied now?

Mr. J. L. Cooke,
256 Rodney street,
West St. John, N.B.

Dear Sir,—I have just telegraphed you as follows: "Car C.P. 42844 rejected by our Woodstock inspector has been shipped to Atlantic Co. Look out for it."

It would be unfortunate if hay that is rejected by an inspector for the department at Woodstock should be accepted by an inspector for the department at West St. John. Of course, I expect you to use your own judgment and accept or reject this car on its merits, but in this particular case it would be better to be too severe rather than too lenient. It is possible that the main objection to this hay may be an excess of clover and, as I told you when I saw you, I think you are allowing a greater percentage of clover than they are at Woodstock. In fact I have been somewhat uneasy since I left St. John because I fear that you are taking rather too much clover, which at this season of the year is apt to be dusty and when it is pressed very hard will present anything but a fine appearance when the bales are opened up in France. If the clover can be properly blended with straight timothy it is all right, but compressed bales containing more than forty per cent clover will, I am afraid, prove objectionable. Be sure to let us know what action you take with regard to this car.

Yours truly,

(Sgd.) W. W. Moore,
Chief, Markets Division.

Here is a letter to Mr. Moore from Mr. Cooke, the inspector, dated March 15:

Dear Sir,—I have the honour to acknowledge receipt of your letter of the 13th inst., with regard to C.P. car 42844. This car arrived alongside of shed 15 last night and was opened this morning. I found contents of car to be of poor quality, consisting mostly of wild grass mixed with a small per cent of timothy.

This car was not unloaded, only a few bales were taken out of the doorway for the purpose of seeing into the car. I found contents to be worse, I had the bales put back and rejected same.

I have the honour to be sir,
Yours truly,
(Sgd.) J. L. Cooke.

This is a letter to Mr. Ruddick from Thos. C. Strong:

Dear Sir,—I feel it my duty to let you know what is being done in regard to the Kennealy & Wetmore contract—

I am dealing now with the general question of the class of hay which was accepted, and with my hon. friend's charge that black, rotten hay went to the War Office, a thing which would certainly distress me as much as it would him, if it were a fact:

—I feel it my duty to let you know what is being done in regard to the Kennealy & Wetmore contract.

These parties are buying all the cull hay that I sorted out of two thousand tons and are shipping it to St. John and having it compressed there, so you can take whatever action in the matter you see fit.

Yours respectfully,
(Sgd.) Thos. C. Strong.

Then here is a telegram from Mr. Ruddick to Mr. Cooke:

Inspector Strong, Woodstock, reports Kennealy & Wetmore shipping all hay rejected by him to West St. John. Look out for it.

With respect to this transaction, I may tell the House that this hay was watched very carefully and that little, if any, hay, that should not have gone did actually go. The best proof that such is the fact is that Messrs Kennealy & Wetmore say that they could not fill their contract owing to the heavy rejections. They say:

Owing to heavy rejections it is possible we may be short about thousand tons; we have more hay on track than presses are handling; we are not delaying them; may possibly be able to complete in Montreal.

Both Kennealy & Wetmore, and Stevenson, who also shipped hay to Montreal, had a large amount rejected, and, as I have stated that Kennealy & Wetmore were absolutely unable to fill their contracts because they could not get the hay owing to the heavy rejections. I have referred to the Stevenson contract. As he could not get the amount of hay he wanted in time, he shipped to Montreal and very much of the poor hay was rejected and he was therefore put in a similar position. Certainly there were a lot of difficulties about these 1915 contracts. The point I want to make is this: It is quite possible that, looking back, it would have been better to have paid the contractors, who certainly had a very hard row to hoe a little more and the Atlantic Hay Company a little less. But the whole transaction was conducted in absolutely good faith by those who were here while I was absent and statements made about the exorbitant profits of the company are absolutely beside the mark. The best proof that the hay was not of the character that my hon. friend described it to be is that we had not a single complaint about the hay from the War Office when it arrived in France and they were absolutely satisfied with it. We furnished the War Office with all the accounts and details that they wanted in regard to these transactions and no complaint whatever was made. In the earlier stages of large undertakings of this kind which are suddenly thrust upon a department, it would be astonishing if mistakes and blunders were not made. Does my hon. friend think that any department of the Government in times such as these can suddenly take hold of a transaction of this kind and make no mistake whatever? I do not profess to be infallible, neither do the officers of the department; but we all endeavour to make as few mistakes as possible, and in absolute good faith to rectify those mistakes which may have been made in the past. Let me point out to my hon. friend, that the War Office, having had a full account of all these transactions up to that time placed before them, not only did not say: we find no fault in you in connection with these transactions, but since that time they have placed on my shoulders increased responsibilities in connection with supplies for the armies at the front.

I come now to the transactions of this year, with which I am a little more familiar. This is a story which I think will interest, if it does not weary the House, for my hon. friend has dealt with it pretty vigorously already. A contract was given to the Atlantic Hay Company this year for 15,000 tons at $23 a ton. This contract was for hay, compressed from eighty to one hundred cubic feet to the ton, and which would pass inspection at St. John. This company owned four presses. We thought that it was not at all likely—and I think my hon. friend will admit this—that there would be as much hay available in New Brunswick this year as last. We thought, and rightly so, that it would be more convenient for us to deal with the one firm owning the four presses. I think there was only one other press in the whole province able to do that work. Furthermore, we thought it would be better for the War Office we should have our inspection at one point, and at the price of $23 a ton it would be giving the hay to the War Office at $2 less a ton than was being paid for Montreal hay, adding freight to St. John.

Mr. CARVELL: Is it not a fact that the four presses now used by the Atlantic Hay Company were not at that time in the province of New Brunswick but in Montreal?

Mr. BURRELL: I did not say they were in New Brunswick. I said that the Atlantic Hay Company owned them, and that they were available.

Mr. CARVELL: No. Mr. McDonald owns them.

Mr. BURRELL: Mr. McDonald is, and has been, a member of the Atlantic Hay Company. We thought that in giving this contract we should not only be ensuring to the War Office a good class of hay at a reasonable price, but that the contractors would also be able to give a fair price to the farmers, and not make any undue profit for themselves. We believed in good faith that it was a contract that could be entirely justified. Other offers came in soon afterwards, and I may say for the benefit of my hon. friend from Carleton, who thinks that we do everything for Conservatives and nothing for anybody else, that several of these offers came from strong Conservatives and were not considered for the reasons I have mentioned.

Mr. CARVELL: I know it.

Mr. BURRELL: Subsequently the honourable member for Carleton started in the press a great controversy on hay matters generally in the province of New Brunswick. My hon. friend cherishes a very poor opinion of the contractor, Mr. B. F. Smith. I am not very familiar with New Brunswick politics—I know they are very vigorous—but I think that Mr. Smith may have been my hon. friend's political opponent, or is going to be. Anyway, my hon. friend cherishes an exceedingly mean opinion of Mr. Smith, judging from what I have seen of the controversy, and I am quite sure Mr. Smith cherishes an equally poor opinion of my hon. friend opposite. When I was ill with the grippe a little while ago, the hon. member for Carleton came to Ottawa to see the Minister of Trade and Commerce, who was at that time acting premier, and who, as an old citizen of New Brunswick, knew conditions in that province fairly well, I suppose. My hon. friend from Carleton set forth a great many statements in regard to this hay controversy in New Brunswick, and produced a dazzling array of figures as to cost of pressing, freight, shrinkages, and various other things, to such an extent that he made out that an iniquitous state of affairs existed, and that the farmers were not getting a look in. He demanded, in very vigorous tones, I should gather, that the Minister of Trade and Commerce should immediately compel those rascals down there to give to the farmer two more dollars, or whatever it was, or that another contract should be let, or that the embargo which had been imposed should be lifted. I may say that the embargo does not affect New Brunswick to anything like the same extent that it affects Quebec, inasmuch as during the whole four months since the last hay crop and prior to the imposing of the embargo, only 400 or 420 tons were shipped from New Brunswick to the United States. My hon. friend made all these statements, and the Minister of Trade and Commerce said, as he naturally would under the circumstances, that if such a state of affairs existed it was deplorable, and that he would turn the matter over to the Minister of Agriculture. He said he would have Mr. Ruddick come over and discuss the matter with him, and if everything was as the hon. member for Carleton had stated, something ought to be done to remedy it. In that visit—and I am not breaking any confidence in saying this—my hon. friend from Carleton mentioned that he himself would benefit to the tune of several hundred dollars if the farmers got a bigger price; I presume he has several hundred tons of hay himself. He said to the Minister of Trade and Commerce, as he has in effect said to me since in a letter: Give this extra money to the farmers, make these people pay more, or let the work out to other contractors, or lift the embargo; and if you will do one of these things I will not say a thing about it.

Mr. CARVELL: That is all true.

Mr. BURRELL: He was going to get a bigger price for the farmer, for his friends and for himself. I may say for the benefit of my hon. friend that in everything connected with this hay business I have been only too glad to consult with the Minister of Trade and Commerce on every step that I have taken, and on the correspondence, and anything that has been done in that matter since my hon. friend visited the Minister of Trade and Commerce has been with the entire concurrence of my colleague. Among other things that my hon. friend discussed with the Minister of Trade and Commerce at that time was that we should give to Mr. McCain, a friend of my hon. friend opposite, a contract for three, or four, or five thousand tons of hay in that part of New Brunswick where my hon. friend lives, and that this would settle it. Subsequently Mr. McCain wrote to the department; he had written once before. In one case he wrote offering to take a contract for from three to five thousand tons at $22.50 a ton. He could well do that. In any case it would not have been much better than what we were doing, even if other circumstances had been equal. We should have had to send a special inspector up there, and more expense would have been involved in pressing the hay at Woodstock. Mr. McCain subsequently made an offer of $23 a ton and pay $15 to the farmers. He could well do that. The Minister of Trade and Commerce, who knows the fact, observed that it might be possible in one small district where there was a considerable quantity of hay and conditions were more favourable in regard to labour, and freights not so much as in other parts of the province, to get the hay for less than we could at St. John; but he pointed out that that would interfere with the general arrangement for the whole province. That point was well recognized, because as my hon. friend has stated, when Mr. McCain got a contract in 1902 there was a considerable difference in the price, viz.—$14 f.o.b. Florenceville, as against $17 St. John. We therefore did not consider it advisable to take that step, nor did I think the Minister of Trade and Commerce consider it advisable. Subsequent to the visit of my hon. friend, Mr. Smith came to Ottawa. He also went into this hay question and put up a lot of facts and figures and I think was able to show that some of the statements of the hon. member for Carleton might be questioned as regards expenses of operation and various other details. At all events, he made the statement—and there may have been some force in it—that they were getting only a reasonable price for their hay contract and that he was willing to pay and would pay what he considered a fair price. That price might fluctuate from time to time to the farmers, and he did not expect to make an unreasonable profit; but as so much had been said about it, and as Mr. Smith and the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Carvell) had been scrapping and fighting so hard and filling the newspapers of St. John and other parts of New Brunswick with this controversy, Mr. Smith offered to transfer his contract to any other firm in New Brunswick, under exactly the same conditions, and allowing the department to fix a reasonable price by arbitration for the expenditure he had incurred and for the expenses of his plant. Now, that was a pretty fair offer. We did not accept that offer, nor did we accept another offer that he made, for very sufficient reasons. In the first place, it would have been inadvisable, from the department's point of view, even if the offer had been accepted, to transfer the contract, because it would have meant delay in the delivery of hay and in the adjustment which would have been necessary under the conditions of the transfer. Mr. Smith also made another offer to which I am now going to allude. It is strange, however, during all this time that the controversy was going on and under the dismal state of affairs as pictured by the hon. member for Carleton, that neither the department nor I, myself, received a single protest from any farmer in New Brunswick in reference to this matter, and the only protest that I ever heard of at all came through one letter that was sent, I think, by the hon. member for Carleton to the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster), and which is not now in my possession, because I returned it, and the letter which my hon. friend read in the House. The letter to which my hon. friend referred was from a Mr. Fawcett, whom I do not know at all. My hon. friend referred to him in most eulogistic terms, and I recall, in the opening phrase of Mr. Fawcett's letter which he addressed to Mr. Carvell at Woodstock, that he looked upon Mr. Carvell as the one man in New Brunswick who would give agriculture a square deal, and that it was a matter of great thankfulness that they had such a man in the country. It would not be very difficult to infer that he is of the same affiliation as my hon. friend.

Mr. CARVELL: There is no doubt about that at all. He is a good Grit, if there ever was one.

Mr. BURRELL: The point I make is that not once had there been any protest to the department, or to myself, or any explanation or suggestion, and I am informed from other sources that on the whole the New Brunswick farmers have been fairly well satisfied with the condition of things. However, I was not going to leave the matter there, and I did not leave it there. I went into the matter again and discussed it thoroughly. I asserted to Mr. Smith, what I have always asserted from the start and what I asserted in a letter to my hon. friend, namely: that the sole object the department has as a trustee for the British War Office in this matter is to help as far as we can to get a market for the Canadian farmer, and while getting him a fair price for his product—and he would get a much fairer price in this way throughout the country than he would have got if the War Office had not stepped in—at the same time to get the War Office a good article at a reasonable price, and to ensure that the contractors do not make an unreasonable profit. On that occasion, or subsequently, Mr. Smith wrote me this letter, which, with my reply, I wish to place upon Hansard:

Ottawa, 10th January, 1916.

The Hon. Martin Burrell,
Minister of Agriculture,
Ottawa, Ont.

Dear Sir,—On my return to New Brunswick from a trip to the cities of Ontario and Quebec I found that the number of reckless, absurd and indeed silly assertions which had been bandied about in the public press and otherwise, in regard to the contract of this company to supply hay to the Department of Agriculture, had been indeed larger and their character more gross than I was aware of at the time of my recent visit to your department.

On that occasion and on January 3 following, as an evidence of the good faith of this company, I submitted two alternative propositions. One addressed both to the department and the public was as follows:

"We, the Atlantic Hay Company of St. John, New Brunswick, are willing to transfer our hay contract with the Department of Agriculture to any firm in New Brunswick who will agree to deliver the quantity of hay to the department, and carry out the terms of the contract; provided such firm or person arranges to pay us for expenses incurred to the date of the transfer and takes over for use our plant at St. John, the figures to be paid for the use of plant and for disbursements incurred to be determined by arbitration under the direction of the Department of Agriculture."

The other was made direct to your department and reads of follows:

"We, the Atlantic Hay Company of St. John, N.B., agree to cancel our contract with the Department of Agriculture (Dominion) and buy and compress their hay in the war bale on the basis of 5 per cent for handling the entire output of the province available for that purpose during the season, all books and vouchers to be open at all times to the department and a final audit made under the direction of them. Price to be paid the farmer and for hay delivered at West St. John to be fixed from time to time by the department."

I have explained why we did not think it advisable to consider the first offer, and I thought that it was not advisable to accept the second one, because, after I had consulted with the department, it did not seem clear that there would be any inducement to keep down the expenses of operation. The letter goes on:

As a further evidence, however, of the determination of the company to deal absolutely fairly both with the farmers and the department, and to show that the contract as originally made is based on that principle, we now make this additional voluntary offer:

We are ready to submit to the Department of Agriculture all purchase vouchers, books, documents and papers relating to the carrying out of the contract. The department may determine the sum which may be fairly allowed for all expenses connected with the purchase of said hay, freight, the operation of compressing plant and otherwise incidental to the final delivery of the compressed hay, and having so determined we agree that if the department finds there is any profit to our company beyond one dollar ($1.00) per ton, such excess profit will be retained by the department for the benefit of the Imperial Government.

I will be glad to hear from you at once as to the above.

Yours very truly,
(Sgd) B. F. Smith,
for the Atlantic Hay Company.

To that letter I replied:

Ottawa, Ont. Jan. 11, 1916.

B. F. Smith, Esq.,
The Atlantic Hay Company,
East Florenceville, N.B.

Dear Sir,—I am in receipt of your letter and note what you say in reference to the controversy which has taken place about your hay contract.

There was certainly no intention on the department's part when this contract was given that it would permit any exorbitant profits to be made. Our desire was that the War Office should be supplied with hay at a reasonable price, that the farmers should get an opportunity of disposing of their product at fair figures, and at the same time the contractor should not reap undue profits.

You have made several suggestions, but I think that the one contained in your letter of the 10th, namely, that you are willing to undertake that your profits shall not succeed $1 a ton, and that the department itself shall fix upon a proper basis for the expenses, is very fair and affords strong evidence of your good faith in the whole matter, and I shall therefore be glad to act upon it.

Yours truly,
(Sgd) M. Burrell.

My hon. friend might say, perhaps, that it would be very hard to determine that.

Mr. CARVELL: Impossible. You do not know whom you are up against.

Mr. BURRELL: All right. We know the opinion of these people, and we also know the opinion of the hon. member. We need not discuss that. We have some pretty good men in the department who know as much about operating hay plants as any man about that plant, but I can tell my hon. friend and the contractors (because I presume they will get some knowledge of this debate) that it is my intention not only to have our expert officers to determine those operating expenditures, and to go into it all thoroughly, but to assist the officers of any department by giving them the services of a chartered accountant from time to time before the contractors are settled with in order that there may not be the slightest doubt on this matter. In connection with those letters which I have read, I also want to say that while my hon. friend had been howling all over New Brunswick that these men were iniquitous in their dealings, and that they were grinding down everybody and making extraordinary profits, and he was urging me to give more contracts, that on the 6th of January there appeared in the public press of New Brunswick statements, which I have read, from these contractors, saying that they would be willing to transfer that contract to any firm that would take it on the same terms. The hon. gentleman or his friends could have taken it up, but they never touched it, and nothing on the subject came to our department. I think that fact should have prevented the hon. gentleman from making some of the remarks that fell from his lips the other day.

Now, the hon. gentleman wrote me some time ago and gave me his views on these matters, and he gave them in pretty strong terms. He pleaded that more contracts should be given, but I said that we were not considering giving any more. He wrote again, a very strong letter, which letter he read in this House the other day. The hon. gentleman will remember that the closing phrase in that letter was to the effect that if something was not done to stop all this, at least he thought I would admit that he had the power of speech. He has—speech of a kind; and such as it is he has a great deal of it. At page 268 of Hansard he referred to this matter. I would like my hon. friend to pay particular attention to what I have to say within the next ten or fifteen minutes, including the reading of this quotation:

> Mr. Speaker, what do you suppose was the answer I got to that?

That answer was to his letter of the 6th January.

> [Mr. Burrell.]
>
> I had been here and had gone home again, and I found this letter on my desk acknowledging receipt of it, but the answer I got was a personal invitation from the Minister of Agriculture—

This I am going to discuss by itself later, and so shall need to quote this again.

> —begging me, for God's sake, not to refer to this matter in the House of Commons.

Now, my hon. friend might as well have been frank in this matter. He talks about stating the facts and sticking close to the mark; why, then, did not he read this letter which I wrote to him? I did not answer his letter because I knew he would be coming to Ottawa soon, but I wrote him on the 14th January:

4 p.m.

> 14th January, 1916.
>
> F. B. Carvell, Esq., M.P.,
> House of Commons,
> Ottawa.
>
> Dear Mr. Carvell,—I duly received your letter of the 6th. I assume you did not expect me to reply to you at Woodstock, as you expected to be in Ottawa so shortly and I thought perhaps I would run across you before this.
>
> You say you understand I agreed to give Mr. Hatfield an order for two thousand tons, but you must have been wrongly informed on this. I have not made any agreement of the kind.
>
> In this whole matter, as I stated to you in my previous letter, it is my desire to see that the War Office does not have to pay unnecessarily high prices and that, while the farmer gets a fair figure for his product, the contractors should not make an unreasonable profit. This has always been my viewpoint when any contracts have been entered into and I can hardly think that the contractors themselves could take any other view.
>
> At all events, I am glad to assure you that the arrangements which exist preclude the possibility of the contractors getting anything more than a reasonable remuneration for the work and responsibilities they have undertaken.
>
> Yours very truly,
> M. Burrell.

But though I wrote to the hon. gentleman that letter, he makes no allusion to it. He does not take the trouble to put that on Hansard. But, if he demands fairness, surely he ought to be fair and do the square thing that he so often talks about.

Now I come to a matter which while, perhaps, not of real public importance, is of such importance to me as a member of the Government and personally that I feel that I have the right to touch upon it, and in a rather strong way, though, I am afraid, in a poor way. I hope I shall keep within the bounds of parliamentary rule and procedure in any language I use in regard to my hon. friend, though I am bound to say it is extremely difficult to do so after the episode of the other day. Now, for the purpose of exactness, let me quote again from page 268 of Hansard:

> Mr. Speaker, what do you suppose was the answer I got to that? I had been here and had gone home again, and I found this letter on my desk acknowledging receipt of it, but the answer I got was a personal invitation from the Minister of Agriculture begging me, for God's sake, not to refer to this matter in the House of Commons, and telling me that it would look bad if it were published in the newspapers.

Now, we might as well clear this thing up. A few pages later on, at page 273, the hon. member for Carleton spoke as follows:

> I see that the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Burrell) is in his seat. I think I have a right to ask the minister if he intends to discuss this matter in reply to what I have said to-day, and, if so, whether he will allow me to relate the conversation which he and I had in Room 16, which he asked me to treat as confidential. I do not want to do this unless the hon. gentleman himself is going to refer to it. If he is going to refer to it, I think I should have a right to give it to the House.
>
> Mr. Burrell: If my hon. friend's relation of that conversation is not more accurate than his relation of the conversation that he has already given to the House, I should prefer that he would not say anything at all about it.
>
> Mr. Carvell: All right; I accept that. I assume from that that the minister will not refer to it either.
>
> Mr. Burrell: Since my hon. friend puts that question, I think he will grant me the same privilege to state what took place and to put before the House a version as against the version that he gave this afternoon.
>
> Mr. Carvell: So far as I have gone, certainly.
> Mr. Burrell: So far as you have gone.

The hon. members of this House will see that this is an extraordinary state of things. Here is an hon. gentleman who asks me to give him the right to divulge a private and confidential conversation which had taken place between us, after he had not only divulged it but put an interpretation upon it that was absolutely false to the fact. What sort of stuff is the hon. member for Carleton made of? I do not think there is a man in this House who would have done this except himself.

Mr. CARVELL: Mr. Speaker,——

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. CARVELL: The hon. minister knows that I was referring to——

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. CARVELL: I rise to a point of order. My hon. friend is stating that the portion of the conversation I gave was the confidential portion, when it was not, and my hon. friend knows that it was not. The portion he refers to——

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. CARVELL: I am not through with my point of order. The portion he referred to as confidential was the new contract——

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Mr. Speaker, that is not a point of order, and the hon. member knows perfectly well that it is not.

Mr. BURRELL: I am going to discuss this episode pretty thoroughly, and I am going to keep myself within the bounds of the rules of this House, but I am going to set forth the facts so that there cannot be any mistake. My hon. friend and myself may have some difference of view as to what was confidential and what was not. So far as the whole matter that took place is concerned, it would not hurt me very much if anybody had been there to take it all down, and reproduce it in the public press. As to the contract, I did say, perhaps, that that was confidential, but it scarcely mattered becasue I had given the hon. gentleman the assurance in that very letter that I had ample safeguards. But this is what I am complaining of. I understood he did not want me to refer to this thing unless he took it up; but it seemed to me an extraordinary thing to try to tie my hands and rob me of any defence in this, when I had already been stabbed in the back by these other statements he had made. I want to say to my hon. friend, and nobody knows this better than he, that I never used the phrase "In God's name do not bring this up;" that I never said it would be bad in the newspapers, because there is nothing that I have ever done in this Parliament that I would be ashamed to put in every newspaper in the country. Talk about being amazed! I never was more amazed in my life than when the hon. member for Carleton, N.B. (Mr. Carvell) used the phrase de did. I cannot understand any man doing such a thing. To my mind it is the most deplorable incident that has ever taken place in this House, since I have known it. My hon. friend may laugh, it does not do him credit; that is all I can say about it.

Mr. CARVELL: What did you say?

Mr. BURRELL: I do not know what his own view of these matters is, but if he has this interpretation of what is an honourable course to take—I say nothing about my hon. friend's conduct or character or anything else in his private life—but if that is his interpretation of what can be done in public life, nothing can stamp him so well as being absolutely unfitted for public life as that one thing. I think I can comment on this, and show the absolute grotesqueness and absurdity of my hon. friend's contention. I went to the Prime Minister soon after I got my hon. friend's letter telling me that he had the power of speech, and intimating, as I thought, and rightly thought, that he was going to bring all hay matters in connection with the War Office up in this House, and I stated to the Prime Minister my views on the matter, as I did to the hon. the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster). My views were these; that we were operating in a very large way for the War Office, on account of the military forces all over this country, purchasing hay, oats and flour. When the whole story comes to be written, when the war is over, it will be only too great a pleasure for me to bring down the whole details to the country, for it is a great work, a very much larger work than anybody imagines. But no business man in this House can come to any other conclusion than that it is inadvisable to bring up these matters in Parliament when the war is on and these supplies are being contracted for, and large operations are going on in all these businesses all over the country. It does not matter so much in his own newspapers down there; they would not attach the same importance to any remarks the hon. member for Carleton might make as they would to his remarks in the House where he gets a fictitious importance by virtue of being a member of this House, and to give it publicity for that reason, from my point of view, was not in the best interests of the War Office or of the public. At all events, I stated that view to the Prime Minister and the Minister of Trade and Commerce. They understood it was not in the public interest, and they will bear out what I say. I said it did not matter to me personally whether it was brought up or not, that I had, I thought, a sufficient answer to anything that might be said; but that, solely and entirely on account of the public interest and the War Office interest, I thought it not advisable to discuss this in the House. The Prime Minister and the Minister of Trade and Commerce agreed, and I suggested, and they concurred, that I should speak to my hon. friend and put that view before him. In fact, the Minister of Trade and Commerce suggested that I could appeal to my hon. friend's patriotism in this matter, and it was suggested, by either myself or the Prime Minister, that, if I liked, I could speak to the right hon. leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) on this broad line. I was very glad to do it for this reason also, that on the 7th of April, 1902 a gentleman in this House, who has now passed away, the late lamented Hon. F. D. Monk, placed a question on the Order Paper asking for particulars about the purchase of hay for the War Office during the South African war; and Mr. Speaker, the then Minister of Agriculture gave this answer, which I think was an absolutely correct and proper answer to give:

This question, relating entirely to the business of the Imperial War Office, I am not at liberty to answer it.

I think that was a perfectly proper answer, and not a man on our side disputed its justness. In 1903 the matter came up again in the shape of an Order asked for on the floor of the House by the Hon. Mr. Monk, for all this information, because the war was then over. A long debate took place, which was referred to by the hon. Solicitor General the other night. We asked for all correspondence, documents, papers, etc., all the particulars about the transactions, of people like my hon. friend (Mr. Carvell) who then had a contract with the Government for the War Office. The debate was participated in by my right hon. friend, by Mr. Fielding, by the late Postmaster General and others. We took the ground that, as the war was over, it was perfectly proper to bring down all these matters, as they did, to some extent, concern the people of Canada. I am not disputing whether they were right or wrong, but the late Government took the ground, very emphatically, that, as it related to the War Office and it was Imperial money which was spent here, it was not a responsibility incurred to this House, and they did not think it right to bring the information down, and they did not bring it down. They put it to a vote and the motion was negatived and the Order was not granted. I am not disputing whether the position of the late Government in 1903 was right or not; I say it was absolutely right in 1902 but in 1903 it might be open to question; and I say right here and now, that after the war is over, speaking for myself, and I think the Prime Minister would feel the same way, I would have absolutely no hesitation in bringing down every single record we have got in connection with these transactions.

At all events, I took the course which I have outlined, a course which was suggested or concurred in by the Prime Minister and the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I do not know whether I am counted as a very strict party man. Sometimes I think that some of my friends who are strong party men do not so regard me. I am a good Conservative; I think I have a right to stick up for Conservative principles and Conservative practice, however deplorable that may be to gentlemen like the hon. member for Carleton. I have a great many friends in my own constituency on the Liberal side. I have many Liberal friends in Ottawa—some of my warmest friends are Liberals in politics. I hope I have some friends in this House who are Liberals in politics and sit on the other side. I never held the doctrine that one should carry one's political animosities into private life, nor would I regard life as being tolerable if I had to do it. I want to say this further in regard to this matter with which we are dealing, that I would rather go out of public life forever, and walk out now, and keep such regard as I may have been fortunate enough to get from any of my friends as a public man, than remain in public life at the price of descending to the depths to which my hon. friend for Carleton, N.B., has descended. It may be said that that is not a matter of very great public interest; but I do appeal to you, and to the older members of this House who have sat here for many years, that this is the sort of thing that touches the finer side of life, and makes public life tolerable. And so it is well worth touching when we are dealing with this matter. I have already spoken of the grotesqueness of my hon. friend's assertion that I said "for God's sake don't bring the matter up in the House; the papers will get it, and how bad that will be." I have already said that there was absolutely no truth in that assertion. I never used such words at all; I did not refer to the newspapers, nor did I use the name of God at all in any shape or form, so that my hon. friend does not know where he is at. If I feared anything; if my hon. friend was so absurd as to think I was afraid that there might be public exposure, why I had an easy way out; I could have done what the member for Carleton demanded, and got out of the mess, if mess there was. But of course I was not in any way afraid, because I had nothing to conceal. I was simply speaking in the public interest. Now I do not like to bring the names of other people into this matter, and I will apologise to my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition for mentioning his name in connection with it. I would not have done so if it had not been for what the hon. member who sits behind him (Mr. Carvell) said. He not only made the absolutely inaccurate statement I have referred to; he intimated—he did not say so in so many words—that I had gone running to the leader of the Opposition and to the Liberal Whip for the same reason, that I was afraid of this thing coming up in the House.

Mr. CARVELL: My hon. friend made the statement first; I did not.

Mr. BURRELL: I spoke to the hon. member for Carleton, and he refused to promise that he would not speak on it.

Mr. CARVELL: That is right.

Mr. BURRELL: I was actuated absolutely and solely by the view that this matter affected or might affect the War Office and the public interest. I said I did not think it would be advisable in the interests of the War Office to do so, but that if he did, he must do it according to his own judgment. I met the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Pardee) in the corridor, I think a few days afterwards. I told the Liberal Whip that I would like to speak to the right hon. the leader of the Opposition in regard to the matter, as I thought it of sufficient public importance to place my views before him, as the Prime Minister had suggested. My right hon. friend was busy at the time, and I could not get access to him. I told Mr. Pardee, the chief Liberal Whip, the circumstances in exactly the same way, namely, that I did not think it advisable in the interests of the War Office to bring this matter up, but that my hon. friend from Carleton seemed determined to do so, and if he did, all right. I said that I would reply and would be able to refute anything he might say that seemed to reflect on the department or on myself. Subsequently I was enabled to see my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), and I was treated by him with the courtesy which he has always shown to me since I came here in 1908 as a back bencher from the far western province. I am appealing to him in a sense; it is an appeal to Caesar from one of Caesar's very insignificant legionaries. I know my right hon. friend will bear me out that it was precisely in this tone that I placed the circumstances before him. I simply said I did not think that a discussion of this matter would be in the best interests of the War Office, that we had not made any of our proceedings public, that we did not think it desirable to do so, and that I thought the contract sufficiently safeguarded the public interest. I said, I am not in a position to implore you to insist that Mr. Carvell shall not speak; I simply put this to you, and if he does speak, well, all right. I ask again, I ask any man in this House if my attitude has not been absolutely consistent throughout this whole matter, and I leave it to the judgment of the House to say whether what has been done, in order, I presume—for there could be no other object in view—to secure some little political capital by having it repeated in the press, that I begged somebody to call him off. Is this fair? I ask what sort of fighting in the House of Commons of Canada in this year of grace, 1916, that is! I say that if ever there was in this House an exhibition of hitting below the belt that was it. My hon. friend expressed pity for me the other day. He said he was sorry from the bottom of his heart for the poor Minister of Agriculture, who had fallen an innocent victim to the wiles and machinations of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Hazen); that I was a very decent chap and so forth. What sort of man is this that can violate the code of ethics which is prized by those who cherish the good old name of gentleman?

Now, Sir, much as I hate the tu quoque argument; much as I dislike saying that the other fellow has been doing things, therefore pitch into him; I think it only right to ask who this man is who brings these charges and makes those wild and reckless assertions. Who is this gentleman who has such a disinterested and passionate zeal to secure better prices for the farmers in New Brunswick and for my hon. friend's friends. Who is he? Well, I noticed the other night that he was a little uneasy. He seemed to think that I would probably speak after him, and he was quite right. He used these words:

> I know what kind of defence my hon. friend is going to put up; he is going to say that in 1902 when I had a small contract, and so on. My hon. friend was beginning to get uneasy, and was afraid I might say something that would hurt. On page 265 of Hansard he says this:

> I have had experience in this matter. During the South African war I was a member of a company that compressed hay, and I speak with knowledge. I was not then a member of the legislature or of the House of Commons, I was a member of the New Brunswick Hay Company.

My hon. friend was secretary and treasurer, the whole body and bones of the institution; at all events he was the most prominent man in it, and the man who appeared here to do all the business with the department. He added, "We had a small contract from the Department of Agriculture, about $7,000 altogether."

Mr. CARVELL: Seven thousand tons, not dollars.

Mr. BURRELL: It is $7,000 in Hansard, but I accept my hon. friend's correction. He says it was a small contract. My hon. friend had contracts altogether amounting to about 11,000 tons.

Mr. CARVELL: Not filled.

Mr. BURRELL: Pretty nearly all filled; we have the records, and they show that they came pretty nearly to 11,000 tons, which, figured up at the price he got, which was $17, came to about $187,000; not very small. Now, my hon. friend at that time got a price of $17 a ton for compressed hay at West St. John; he will correct me if I am wrong in any of my statements. My hon. friend anticipated that I would deal with this or would say something about it. He pointed out that they were giving the farmer at that time $8 a ton, and he thought what an exceedingly good price that was, considering what hay was at that time. In fact, he went the length of saying—I could give the exact figures, and I shall come to them presently. They were giving the farmers $8 a ton.

I want to point out one or two things. My hon. friend has contended that under this contract, at $23 a ton, the spread between the price obtained by the farmer for his loose hay and the price that the contractor gets for his compressed hay, which passes inspection, is a tremendous one, and that the contractor is going to make the enormous profit of two or three dollars a ton—three dollars, was it?—or, at all events, a very enormous profit. Under a contract like this it would amount to some $45,000. The contractors, unquestionably, in different parts of the province of New Brunswick, pay different prices. We have never insisted on fixing a price, but we have insisted that he shall give a fair price. He has given as high as $13.75. I have had that information in most positive terms. My hon. friend admitted that he had given $13.50. I will take my hon. friend's lower figure of $13.50, which gives a spread of $9.50 between the loose hay of the farmer and the compressed hay supplied to the Government. But my hon. friend says that at that he makes a tremendous profit. There was a spread when my hon. friend had a contract of $9. I do not think that my hon. friend will dispute that the cost of operation in 1902 was lower than it is to-day.

Mr. CARVELL: I dispute it.

Mr. BURRELL: My hon. friend disputes it. When I make a statement of fact my hon. friend feels it incumbent upon himself to dispute it. He had four hours in which to speak, and I do not think he can begrudge me another half hour. I do not think any business man would doubt that the cost of operation would be heavier to-day than it was in 1902. My hon. friend has made the statement that it cost more because they had to compress to a limit of 70 cubic feet to the ton at that time, and we are now compressing to a limit of from 80 to 100 cubic feet to the ton. We have compressed a good deal to 80 cubic feet. My hon. friend did not compress all of this hay to 70 cubic feet; there was much of it that was compressed to a less degree than that.

Mr. CARVELL: Have you any record of that?

Mr. BURRELL: At all events, this is a small matter, because I am informed by those who know what they are talking about in the department, that the difference in the cost of compression as between 70 and 80 feet would be absolutely trifling, and that they would use less wire with the tighter compression than with the other. When my hon. friend says that these people, with a contract at $23 a ton, are imposing on the farmer, and that I am filching out of the pockets of the farmer and holding up the War Office and everybody else for the sake of enabling these contractors to amass filthy lucre, how does it compare with the amount that he himse f made when he had the contract? What are the facts? So far from his having amassed a fortune out of the business in 1902, when the war closed, he came back on the department with a claim for $13,000. I must in fairness say that no doubt his was a harder position, because, the war having closed, it left a certain amount of hay on his hands. But that was not included within the terms of his contract. He came back upon the department with a claim for $13,435 to compensate him for loss under his contract, because the termination of the war left him with a considerable amount of hay on his hands. A Liberal Government was then in power, the department was presided over by Mr. Sydney Fisher, but he could not stand for the rapacity of my hon. friend, and he turned him down and would not give him the amount that he asked for.

An hon. MEMBER: He is a patriot.

Mr. BURRELL: Yes, he is a kind of patriot. I do not like saying these things, I hate saying them, but I think it is time the House should know the type of man who is making these reckless charges. In regard to the price paid, my hon. friend, at page 272 of Hansard said this:

> Among the men in that arrangement were Mr. Smith, Mr. McCain, and a dozen other hay merchants in the county and in the three or four adjoining counties. Prior to that time hay had never been worth more than $6 a ton, loose in the farmer's barns.

He qualified that by adding that it had not been worth more than $6 or $6.50 a ton. I am not a New Brunswicker, but I am informed by a New Brunswick man that for a long time the price had been from $6 to $10 a ton for loose hay in the farmers' barns and I cannot believe that there is any province where the maximum price of loose hay to the farmer in his barn would be only $6. I have farmed myself for a good many years and it would be a discouraging business if all that a man could get for loose hay in his barn, after paying the expense of cultivating, seeding and harvesting, was $6 a ton. If that is my hon. friend's experience I do not wonder that he is looking like a very unhappy type of farmer. My hon. friend introduced this argument—or so it looks to me—because he evidently knew that I was going to allude to the price which he had to pay at that time. He goes on to refer to the fact that he had to pay $8, but I have been informed that at the time my hon. friend's contract was in force, and when he was performing it, he brought hay in from Quebec which assisted in regulating the price. If my hon. friend denies it I will accept his statement that he did not bring any hay in from Quebec.

Mr. CARVELL: My recollection is that we brought in about ten cars of hay.

Mr. BURRELL: I am glad to know that because it fixes the price at $8 and if my hon. friend brought in hay from Quebec it looks like a very judicious way of keeping the farmer in New Brunswick satisfied at not getting more than that. Further on my hon. friend says, in regard to this $8 a ton, that they bought hay from sub-contractors and that the sub-contractors among themselves made an arrangement by which they would pay $8 a ton to the farmer. The House will gather, and I think everybody will gather, from that suggestion, that $8 was a reasonable price and that my hon. friend, who had a large contract, and who was to supply 11,000 tons to this Government, with a spread of $9 between the price that he paid for loose hay and the price which he received for compressed hay, should make something substantial out of his contract; whereas the fact is that it landed him in the hole to the extent of $13,000 according to his own showing. But, at all events, they were paying the farmers only $8. My hon. friend made the contracts with the sub-contractors and, by the irony of fate, one of the sub-contractors was the very firm which has the contract now that my hon. friend is denouncing in this House. I have a copy of the contract which my hon. friend drew up in regard to the sub-contractors. My hon. friend said, you will recall, that the sub-contractors made an arrangement amongst themselves by which they would pay the farmers $8 a ton. I want you to listen to some of the phrases. I take it for granted that, as my hon. friend was the sec'y-treasurer of this company, a gentleman who had been very active in coming up and getting contracts made with the Government and in presenting the claims, he would have everything to do with the framing of the sub-contracts.

I presume that, being an astute lawyer, he would not adopt any cheap police court methods, or have any junior law students around, but would do the work himself because of his knowledge of the law and out of his born zeal for the farmer. He says we are bleeding the farmers. Inflamed with that splendid passion of patriotism, of a local kind, and sympathizing with these unfortunate men, he of course would do the right thing. Let us see what was put in this contract.

Memorandum of agreement entered into this thirteenth day of December, A.D. 1901, between A. C. Smith & Company, of West St. John, commission merchants, of the one part and "The New Brunswick Hay Company, Limited," of Woodstock, in the county of Carleton, hereinafter referred to as 'The Company," on the second part.

Witnesseth, First.—Subject to the following conditions the said A. C. Smith & Co., hereby agree to sell and deliver to the said Company between this date and the first day of April next, four thousand tons of first and second qualities of Carleton county hay in carload lots.

Second.—The said Company, in consideration of the foregoing agreement hereby agree to pay the said A. C. Smith & Company the sum of ten dollars and twenty-five cents per ton, f.o.b. points in Carleton county, subject to being weighed by the Company at McAdam Junction, provided, however, that if on such weighing the whole amount does not fall short more than twenty tons, then no deduction shall be made for shortages, and any shortages above that amount will be borne by the said A. C. Smith & Company. The hay to be paid for on delivery.

and so on. It continues:

The said Company, in consideration of this contract hereby agree that they will not pay any other person or persons whatsoever, a greater amount for hay, during the continuance of this contract, than the sum of ten dollars and twenty-five cents,—

That is for baled hay.

—as aforesaid, f.o.b., nor will they allow Mathias Meagher, William A. Estey, Coles W. Dugan, Harris Everett, George A. Davis, H. H. McCain, Bohan Bros., Charles E. Gallagher nor Rupert Hutchison, being the only persons from whom they are buying hay in the county of Carleton, to pay more than eight dollars to the farmers for loose hay in their barns.

The hon. member for Carleton came down here and demanded that I fix the price and fix it high, or he would expose me in this House by his power of speech; but here we see in this contract these men were not allowed to pay more than $8 to the farmer. Let us read on a little further, and my legal friends who understand legal phraseology will of course be better able to appreciate this than a simple farmer like myself:

And in case any of the said parties shall, during the continuance of this contract, pay, or offer to pay any farmer in the county of Carleton a greater sum that eight dollars, then they agree, upon satisfactory proof of such paying or offering to pay, to refuse to purchase or receive any hay from the said offending—

Mark the word, Mr. Speaker, "offending."

—from the said offending party or parties, and also, that in case Bohan Bros. shall pay or offer to pay to any farmer in the counties of Carleton or Victoria, excepting that portion of the parish of Kent lying north of Bath Station and east of the River St. John, more than eight dollars for their loose hay, as aforesaid, then, upon satisfactory proof of such payment or offering of payment, the Company agree to pay the said A. C. Smith & Company for the remainder of their contract then unfulfilled, whatever amount the said Bohan Bros., shall have offered or paid above eight dollars in excess of the ten dollars and twenty-five cents.

I do not know New Brunswick geography or politics very well, but I understand that Bohan Bros. were doing business in a small section where there was a great hive of votes, all of them the right way, and therefore they could pay a little more. But I am not insisting upon that, I do not want to be unfair to my hon. friend. Here is another interesting clause:

It is also agreed that neither of the above parties shall be at liberty to pay for hay already pressed to any farmer more than nine dollars and twenty-five cents per ton, under the same penalties hereinbefore mentioned as in the case of an offer of more than eight dollars for loose hay.

It is also agreed between the parties hereto, and made a condition hereof, that in case the said A. C. Smith & Company, or any of their recognized agents or representatives in the counties of Carleton or Victoria, shall be known to have paid or offered to pay to any farmer a greater sum than eight dollars for loose hay—

My hon. friend even gave credit to these notorious people for having some bowels of compassion and thought that out of the kindness of their hearts they might possibly pay a little more in some cases. So he says that if they pay more than eight dollars for loose hay——that for the balance of the contract then unfulfilled they shall deduct the sum of twenty-five cents per ton, excepting in the case where trades have been legally concluded prior to the date hereof, and in the case of the other parties above mentioned who are buying hay for the said Company shall bona-fide, prior to the date hereof, have made legal trades for hay in excess of eight dollars, then——then the punishment hereinbefore provided.

Mr. Speaker, you can hardly wonder at my asking what sort of a patriot this is. He says I am bleeding the farmers, this gentleman who binds them down hard and fast says that these contractors shall be punished if they pay the farmers more than eight dollars. It continues:

Then the punishment hereinbefore provided shall not apply in such case, and also, that in the case of any of the parties purchasing hay for the Company as aforesaid, shall be known hereafter to pay or offer to pay any farmer more than eight dollars for his hay, excepting in the case above mentioned where a bona-fide trade has previously been concluded, then upon proof of such paying or offering to pay, there shall be the sum of twenty-five cents per ton deducted on all hay not actually paid for up to that date.

In plain language the contractor is not allowed to pay more than eight dollars to the farmer; and if this contractor, who now is the Government contractor and upon whom I am imposing no strong conditions except that he shall not get more than $1 a ton profit, should under this agreement I have in my hands pay $8.40 to the farmers, say on two thousand tons, then he would be find $500 for doing it. All that I have to say on this matter has been said. I think it is a pretty sordid sort of tale and I do not want to touch on it any further. I have, I think, made a fair presentation of the department's point of view, and in disposing of this hay matter I repeat that the country owes a debt of gratitude to the officials of the department, who, night and day, in season and out of season, without an extra cent of pay, have for over a year tried to do the square thing by the country and by the War Office. As far as I am concerned I have been animated by no other motive. I have nothing to conceal, and I am willing to be judged on this whole matter by the speech I have made in the House here to-day. I do not want to discuss the matter further.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have not much more to add, and have indeed already taken up too much time; but in connection with such matters as have been discussed here during the last few days, I would like to point out that in the multifarious and complicated situations that war brings, especially to those democratic nations who are not organized for war, the constant pressure, the necessity of large and hasty industrial adjustments, place almost impossible burdens on the shoulders of governments. No government under such circumstances can avoid blunders and mistakes. The British Government is not immune, nor is it likely that the Government of a young country like this, which never had a thought of war in its heart before this outbreak occurred, could be—the millennium is not yet come.

The hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald), who is not in his seat, referred to the heavy additional obligations that were placed on ministers. He made a graceful reference to the Prime Minister, and unquestionably this House and this country will recognize that never since Confederation has so heavy a load been placed on one man's shoulders as upon his, and they will also bear testimony that that burden has been borne and those duties discharged with unflagging devotion and conspicuous ability. We shall agree also with the hon. member for Pictou in his reference to the heavy additional work on the Minister of Militia, whose tremendous energy has been an inspiration in these trying days. To the Minister of Finance also such a tribute is due. Ministers holding that portfolio do not always get the full recognition that they might, possibly because the work involved does not make so obvious and forcible an appeal to the public as in other cases. But in the case of my hon. friend who now occupies that high office, (Sir Thomas White), we all abundantly recognize the tribute which the country owes to him for steering with such consummate ability the financial ship of state through the present troubled waters.

The hon. member for Pictou thought other ministers did not have much to do. I suppose we can let that pass, though he probably did not intend that that should be taken very seriously. But I would like to add that not only in the case of ministers holding portfolios, but in the case of the three members of the Government without portfolios, and I refer to the hon. member for East Toronto (Mr. Kemp), to Senator Lougheed and to Sir George Perley, each one is doing as earnest, self-sacrificing and useful work as any of the members of the Administration.

I think it is due also to those very many departmental officers upon whom heavy burdens have been imposed, that a tribute should be paid to the spirit in which they are doing their bit, not minding much heavy and extra work and much longer hours than in times of peace.

What all countries want in such times is that their governments should earnestly strive night and day to prosecute this war to a successful conclusion, and if they do these mistakes and blunders will be forgiven, and in any case such mistakes and blunders will be judged by the people at the conclusion of the war.

There is a worse thing, however, than making mistakes, and that is to have a mind poisoned by the desire continually to criticise and carp, not for constructive but for destructive purposes. It was satirically said of the Republican party in the United States prior to the last election, that it was a party consecrated to keep in office. If it is bad to be consecrated to keep in office, it is equally bad to be consecrated to the task of trying to get into office.

The hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Carvell) has made a speech of between four and five hours in this House. He made a brief ten minutes' reference to the war. The whole of the rest of his time was taken up in a reckless discussion of scandals, or alleged scandals. I presume he is patriotic enough to want to win this war; but if one were to judge merely by the length of time that he has given to the respective subjects, one would be almost justified in saying that he was far more anxious to smash this Government than he was to smash the Germans. He spoke of the pain caused him by having to speak of all these dreadful things, and shed crocodile tears while suffering the acute distress of a manufactured anguish. The hon. member for Carleton has no doubt heard of Pecksniff, and I will refer him to a fresh study of his great prototype.

In view, however, of all that he has said and of my own already too long remarks, if he is inspired with any sense of manliness, he might well regret and deplore having made such reckless and baseless assertions as he did in this House on Tuesday evening last. I again apologise to the House, not only for taking the time, but for dealing with this subject as I have had to do. It is a task that I have hated and loathed. I am quite sure—and in this I am sure I shall have the concurrence of my hon. friend the member for Red Deer (Mr. Michael Clark), who takes the larger view—that the country is sick of this intercalumniation at this time. There are bigger things and more vital things filling the thoughts and minds of the people, and I would not have touched on this subject had it not been forced upon me by the hon. member for Carleton.

My right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition, in his remarks in reference to the shadow of this great war in which we are all resting, said that the shadow was even greater at the present time than when this House last met. I trust this is not so, and that, trying as the present condition of things is, there may be much behind the scenes that makes for a speedier and happier turn of events than we think. Not one of us can or must doubt the final achievement of victory, and to that event all our thoughts and energies should be turned.

There are very many other important questions that should be touched on in a time like this, some that my hon. friend from Pictou touched on in the close of his speech—questions of great importance to Canada after the war, such as land settlement, educational work, etc. It is the business of the Government, not only to think of all these things, but to welcome the criticism and the suggestions of all our friends opposite, and of other people in the country who have helpful criticisms and suggestions to make, in order to enable us to do something more, something bigger in the way of constructive work for the country which we love.

Mr. E. B. DEVLIN (Wright): Mr. Speaker, allow me to assure the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Burrell) that I will not follow him upon the hay question, which apparently has been pressed and compressed and thrown into the troubled waters of this debate, and in which I might prove too poor a navigator. I will leave it to hon. members from the province of New Brunswick, to the electors of New Brunswick, and to an investigation if one is to be held, to decide.

I shall allude to one or two other points of the hon. minister's remarks, before he disobeyed a teaching of Shakespeare and tore passion to tatters. I thoroughly agree with the hon. gentleman in the patriotic utterances with which he opened his speech. I subscribe to all the sentiments of patriotism that have been given expression to by the right hon. the leader of the Government (Sir Robert Borden) and by the right hon. the leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). It seems to me that the very enjoyment of our constitutional rights and of our free institutions in this autonomous country, is sufficient cause to force every citizen of Canada, no matter what may be his origin or his creed, to be loyal to the authority which makes that constitution and that freedom secure: the King of England, and the flag of the Empire. We recognize that without the security of the throne and the flag, while we are a country of great area and small population we would be wholly dependent on the good will of the greater nations, and liable at any time to have the same treatment meted out to us as Belgium suffered under at the hands of Germany, and as Serbia received at the hands of Austria. If we are loyal to our constitution we shall aid to the utmost of our power in maintaining our status as Canadian subjects of the King. That, I conceive to be the duty of every hon. gentleman in this House and of every citizen of Canada. Therefore bearing that in mind, we. as members of the Opposition, readily asented to the war measures introduced by the hon. gentleman who leads the Government.

But, Sir, before I begin to discuss what I conceive to be our other duties besides those that rest upon us as members of the family of dominions which make up this Empire—our duties respecting the domestic affairs of this country to the electors of Canada—I should like to deal with one particular matter, and that is, the purchase of two submarines by this Government, through the good offices of the British Columbia Government, and of Sir Richard McBride. I think the Minister of Agriculture misapprehends our criticism on this transaction. Our complaint is not that he purchased vessels, but rather that he paid too much for obsolete vessels. I for one should feel quite disposed to congratulate the hon. gentleman upon the exercise of his judgment in saying to Sir Richard McBride—if he did say it to him—that he had done well to purchase these two vessels. He told us in this House, that at the moment this country was in critical danger, when our coasts were imperilled by the enemy, his very first thought, and the very first thought, of the people of British Columbia, was, not to cable money over to Great Britain, but to take refuge under the Naval Service Act passed by the late Liberal Government of Canada, and purchase where they could, how they could, and for no matter what amount, the necessary submarines. Why, Sir, the hon. gentleman is one of those who, prior to 1911, denounced the Liberal party as disloyal because we ventured, in the exercise of our judgment, to pass legislation to permit the purchase of war vessels, submarines included, for the defence of the coast of Canada, and for the help of England in the hour of her peril. You will remember, Mr. Speaker, what the attitude of the Liberal party was prior to 1911. You will remember that my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition and his friends went to the province of Quebec and throughout the Dominion of Canada, and said to the people we will be ready to pay when it becomes necesary to pay; we will be ready to give our assent, as under our constitution we must, to our young men going to fight the battles of the Empire if they so desire; but at the present moment we deem it essential to inaugurate a system by which this country shall first be protected. What was the language of my hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture in referring to this point? I quote from Hansard:

I know what the condition of things in Victoria and Vancouver was at that time, and I know how seriously alarmed the people were. It was a matter not only of possibility, but of probability that the German fleet on the Pacific were liable at any time to steam in and shell the two cities of Victoria and Vancouver.

And you remember that, prior to the election of 1911, the Conservative party, having joined hands with the Nationalist party of the province of Quebec, went about this country declaring that should this country be in peril they would appeal to the British navy which owed us protection. But the Minister of Agriculture told us that the very moment he saw that the province of British Columbia was in danger, he set about purchasing submarines.

5 p.m.

Mr. Pugsley, the hon. member for St. John, then interjected:

They had a Japanese cruiser there?

I want you, Sir, to mark these words:

Mr. Burrell: The only thing that saved the western coast from a possibility of the kind that I have described was—not the British navy and not the Japanese cruiser——was the presence of the submarines that we purchased at that time.

What is the inference? The inference is that if this Government had not dismantled the Niobe and the Rainbow and had left them in operation, as they brought them into action later on, they would not have had to purchase those two submarines which they got from the Chilian Government, and would not have had to pay for them such an enormous price. The hon. member for Pictou ventured this further remark:

Mr. Macdonald: There were no guns on them.

Mr. Murphy: And no torpedoes.

Who ever heard of the purchase of submarines for immediate action, at a moment when the Empire was in danger, at a moment when Canada was in danger, without torpedoes, or the machinery necessary to fire the torpedoes? Is that the way the Pacific coast was to be protected? Is that the way our Atlantic coast would be protected? The Minister of Agriculture gives this answer:

It was not very long before torpodoes were put on these boats.

Not very long, Sir, but it was imperative, at the very moment that the submarines were purchased, to purchase them, so as to prevent an attack by German battleships. The Minister said that the Japanese cruiser did not protect the Pacific coast, but that the two submarines did it. Then, how did they protect the coast? Going out without armament or torpedoes, as we might send out two of the barges that lie in the Ottawa river, to protect the coast of British Columbia? He goes on to say:

But the fact that it was known that these submarines were in the possession of the authorities at Esquimalt did more to assure the safety of these two coast cities than anything else that possibly could be done.

Imagine the Kaiser's navy being afraid of two little submarines! Imagine the Minister of Agriculture asking us, in this deliberative assembly, to believe seriously that because he purchased two submarines, unfit for action, at an exorbitant price, he put the fear of the Lord into the Kaiser and his navy, and protected the Dominion of Canada! May I leave it at that, Sir?

The Minister of Agriculture, in opening his remarks, said, and apparently rightly, that it was the duty of the Opposition to criticise, that he for one welcomed criticism, and that the Government should expect criticism. You will note, however, the tone in which he answered the criticism. I do not want to enter into any personalities, and therefore will not allude to it. But I do propose, in the discharge of my duties as a member of the Opposition, to offer some criticism of the Government before I take my seat. This, under ordinary circumstances, would be the last session of this Parliament. Hon. gentlemen opposite would naturally go before the electors and tell them what they have done as nation builders in laying the foundation for future wealth in this country, because wealth will not come through inertia. What has the Government done for the future prosperity, for the future wealth of this country? The Government has done absolutely nothing except to rely upon the patience of the Canadian people in increasing by every means possible their taxes; and upon the credit of the country in effecting loans to cover, in great part, their extravagant expenditure, which to-day is a by word throughout the length and breadth of the Dominion. The best service we can do to the people of Canada at the present moment is to keep the keenest watch upon the way that the people's money is spent and to watch these blunders and this extravagance that the Minister of Agriculture informed us this Government was liable to on account of the war. The people have willingly and patriotically given their assent to the levying of the funds necessary to carry on Canada's share in this world-wide war; but the people will hold their representatives responsible for any failure in controlling or condemning looting and speculation in the administration. Every dollar that has been voted for war purposes must reach the channels of war, or be saved to the people of Canada. The people of Canada fully realize that the members of the Opposition have gone far in supporting the Government in their war measures and will go further; but the people of Canada must also realize that in the expenditure of that money not even my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), whose whole life has been one of unselfish and unswerving devotion to Canada and to the Empire, has been consulted. What is our position in Canada? We are borrowing; we are taxing the people of Canada. The Government informs us, through the Minister of Finance, that it is absolutely necessary to raise money by way of borrowing and by way of taxation. We have been told that there are two ways to meet the Canadian financial situation. The Minister of Finance, in a very able address in the city of Toronto before the Board of Trade, dealing with that particular subject of how we shall face the financial situation, used these words:

> Well, I am old-fashioned. I do not know any other way for Canada to become a lending country and to save more money than to produce more and save more. I do not know any way whereby an individual can save money and have it for investment except the old fashioned mode of living within his income and his profits to the extent that he can.

The hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce, when in Opposition, constantly laid down the principle that the only way that a wise and economic Government could act in dealing with the financial situation of the country was to control the public expenditures; and, he added, a second way is by seeing that the trade balance, instead of being against the country, should be favourable to it.

We believe that the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce was quite serious in the advice that he gave, otherwise I might feel tempted to apply a criticism to him that has been applied to others in other places, and say,

> Though fraught with all learning, yet straining his throat
> To persuade Tommy Townsend to lend him a vote.

What is our condition in Canada? I do not think I could put it better than it was put in the Toronto Globe some time ago, and with your permission, Mr. Speaker, I shall quote from the Globe. The article is entitled—I beg the Government's pardon for giving the title—"Have spent money like a drunken sailor."

> As the people of Canada begin to understand that the heavy burden of the new taxation is not imposed to pay the Dominion's war bill, but to meet a huge deficit in the ordinary expenditure of the country, a feeling of amaze ment spreads throughout all classes of the community.
>
> The ordinary expenditure during the last four years of the Laurier government was, in 1908, $76,641,000; 1909, $84,064,000; 1910, $79,411,000; 1911 $87,740,000. The Borden government came in during October, 1911, and became responsible for the expenditures of the year ending March, 1912, which were $98,161,000. These expenditures were based in some measure on Mr. Fielding's figures, so that responsability may be said to rest on both parties for 1912. In 1913 the expenditure on consolidated revenue account went up $112,059,000, in 1914 to $127,384,000, and for the current year ending March 31, 1915, Mr. White says it will be $140,000,000. For the year ending March, 1916, he estimates that it will be the same amount.
>
> Now what does this mean to the taxpayer? Setting aside all war expenditures and all expenditures on capital account, the Borden government, less than four years in office, has increased the cost of operating the ordinary services of the country and of paying interest on the country's debt from $87,774,000 to $140,000,000. Assuming that there are now eight and a half million people in Canada, this means additional expenditure of $6.14 for every man, woman and child in the Dominion.
>
> In the year ending March, 1911, the country's revenue from taxes was $89,835,000. In 1914 it was $127,478,000. In the current year ending March 31 there will be a great falling-off in customs revenue, and as a result an enormous increase in the public debt. In the year ending March, 1916, the people of Canada will have to contribute in taxes at least $140,000,000 if they are to pay their ordinary current expenditure, apart entirely from the cost of the war.
>
> The government of Canada has been spending money like a drunken sailor, and now the people must pay for the debauch. They will have to keep on paying long after the present generation has ceased to bother about taxes. The year the Laurier government came into power the interest on the public debt was $10,645,000. When it went out fifteen years afterwards it was $12,535,000. Mr. White tells us that in the year ending March, 1916, it will be $21,000,000. Before such figures is it to be wondered at that the country stands amazed?

Now what is the solution which my hon. friend the Minister of Finance offers in regard to that situation? He says: "borrow money and raise taxes," and I suppose he implies that our income will increase, and that we must live on that income. His words, uttered in this House at the last session of Parliament, were:

It is therefore the intention of the Government to negotiate for a continuance of the arrangement which I have mentioned with the Imperial Government for the purpose of procuring the funds necessary to meet our special war expenditure. . .

It is not a question of raising a few millions by stamp taxes, by income tax or other minor means of supplementing revenue. We must endeavour to raise additional revenue to an amount of at least thirty million dollars, and when we have accomplished this we shall still be obliged to borrow heavily over the next fourteen months, that is to say, between now and March 31, 1916, to meet expenditure for purposes other than for war.

I have a very great respect, I may say, for the Minister of Finance, and I fully realize the difficult position in which he has been placed since the beginning of the war. I sympathize with him, perhaps, on account of the very humiliating position in which the Government placed him when they sent him to New York to borrow $45,000,000. I have not very strong feelings as to where we get the money, provided we get it; as to where we get our trade, provided we have it; as to where we sell our goods, provided we sell them. But, just prior to the election of 1911 I had almost become—how shall I put it?—I had almost become convinced after listening to the arguments of hon. gentlemen opposite, and who were then in Opposition (my hon. friend the Minister of Finance was not among them at that time, that is why I presume he was chosen to go to New York) that we must have no trade or truck with the American people. Up to that time I had thought the Americans were a very fine people. I make a point of visiting the United States at least once a year, and there are some things in their institutions one cannot yet admire; yet there are many things to admire, and one is the great progress the United States has made commercially and financially. Hon. gentlemen opposite told us that it was disloyal to have any trade or truck with the American people. I did not much believe in this lip-loyalty, but in my own humble and modest way I did want to be loyal to the institutions of my country, and of the Empire. Hon. gentlemen opposite said it was disloyal to deal with the American people, but how much more disloyal must it be to go begging to the American people for money to carry on the business of this country. The day I saw the Minister of Finance starting down to the station to buy his ticket for New York, carrying that carpet handbag which had been bequeathed to him by my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce —the same carpet bag which my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce had used in his former trips to Washington—I felt that his position was a painful one, and I have wondered how he explained it to the American people. I suppose he said: "I was not in the House at the time they were saying it would be disloyal to trade with you; I need money now; I have become converted to other ideas; I will pay a higher rate of interest than any one else; will you lend us a little? I congratulated him when I saw him come back with $45,000,000 in his pocket. He will be back again. I put this question to my hon. friends opposite: What are you going to say to your loyal constituents—that you deceived the people? Prior to 1911 you taught them that we must have no trade or truck with the people of the United States. What did the Finance Minister do with that $45,000,000? He told us, in his Budget speech last year, that he required the money to fill the gap between revenue and expenditure. Here are his words:

It is obvious upon consideration of the figures which I have submitted that we shall not, by any reasonable supplemental taxation measures, be able to close the gap between revenue and expenditure, much less to pay a portion of the principal of our special war outlays.

But, what about those taxes imposed in the Inland Revenue Department? What about the increased postage on our letters? How did we get that deficit in the Post Office Department this year of some $3,000,000? Where has the money gone that was received for the stamps? We pointed out that the stamps would go to pay no part of the war expenditures, but the minister assured the country that not only had they to impose special taxation but they had to go and beg of the American people to loan them $45,000,000 to fill the gap between the revenue and their expenditure. Now, Sir, may I be permitted to offer a word of advice to the Government at this moment? The hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) says we must live within our revenue. I can conceive the scene around the Treasury Board when my hon. friend repeated that advice to his colleagues, and when he said to them: We are practically financially bankrupt; you have been spending, according to the Toronto Globe, like a drunken sailor. The hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Rogers) says: We need the money, we have to give the boys the buildings they want. The Minister of Finance says: I cannot possibly give you any more money; I have not got it. The Minister of Public Works says: We must have that money. His friends upon the other side of the House insisted upon getting the luxuries to which they were accustomed before the war. Then what did the Minister of Finance do? He appealed to my right hon. friend the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden)—he will correct me if I am wrong—and said to him: Can you not help me to control my colleagues? They are accustomed to all the luxuries; we had heaps of money when we came into office because the country was prosperous and the Liberal Government had left the coffers full, but we have spent the money and we have no more. The Prime Minister shrugged his shoulders, looked more bothered than usual and said: What can I do; I am not the Finance Minister? The hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Burrell) apparently needed more money to purchase hay. These hon. gentlemen around the treasury board called out as one man: Mr. White, take up your carpet bag and go back and get more money from the American people. But he said: I cannot go back to the American people; it is too humiliating a position. Where will you go? they asked. He said: I will go to the Canadian people, and he went to the Canadian people and borrowed more money. What does Sir Edward Walker, President of the Bank of Commerce and chief financial adviser to the Borden Government, say about all this borrowing? I am not objecting to the borrowing of money for war purposes; I do not wish to be misunderstood. I am as ready as any man in this House to vote every dollar necessary to carry on this war to a successful issue, but what I do complain of is the way that the money, apparently required for war purposes, is being spent by the Cabinet to help their friends and supply them with the luxuries which they had been accustomed to since 1911. What does Sir Edmund Walker say?

> In the years to come we shall be bending our backs to a taxation, such as in this country, which has been singularly free of taxation, we have never known before and so also will our children for generations to come.

It is apparent that the Minister of Finance, do what he would, work as hard as he could, and I admit that he has worked hard, has been unable to live up to the doctrines that he was advocating in the city of Toronto of living within his income. He has signally failed in that and now he is appealing to the Minister of Trade and Commerce for a solution which brings me to the second point of the remarks which I propose to offer to the House in that fair criticism that the Minister of Agriculture said the Government invited us to make. In fairness to the Minister of Trade and Commerce, I want to quote his words from Hansard, 1910-1911, and which may be found at page 6604. I commend them most earnestly to hon. gentlemen opposite who are constantly asking for buildings in their constituencies which are absolutely of no use to the public service. Here are his words:

> Now, ought there not to be a check on expenditure?

I appeal to my hon. friend from Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) to my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), to my hon. friend from South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) and to other hon. gentlemen on this side of the House—can you not almost imagine that you hear the Minister of Trade and Commerce crying out a "check upon expenditures"? Then he asks:

> Here you have, for instance, millions of dollars being spent every year for the construction of public buildings, and on what principle is this money spent? There is no proper principle upon which it should be spent but one! Build a public building because the public service needs it and cannot be properly carried on without it.

Let us apply that doctrine to the history of our hon. friends opposite since they assumed power. Erect a public building because the public service needs it and cannot be properly carried on without it! Did the public service absolutely need, and could it not be properly carried on, without expending $50,000, as per the estimates of 1914-15—war time—at Amherst for a post office and $70,000 for a drill hall when the total population of Amherst, single, married, widowed, divorced and legally separated, was 8,973? Did the public service at Bear river call for a public building costing $4,000 when the population, by the census of 1911, is simply 589? Did the public service demand that Bridgetown should have a post office costing $4,000 when the population was simply 996?

Does the public service of Canada demand that at Dunnville (Haldimand county) which, according to the census of 1911 had a population of 2,861, there should be erected a public building at a cost of $20,000; or that there should be erected at Elmira (Waterloo North), with a population of 1,782, a public building costing $37,000? In order that the public service may be efficiently carried on, is it necessary that we should spend the sum of $5,000 at Gore Bay (Algoma), which in 1901 had a population of 723, and in 1911 a population of only 703.

Mr. SMYTHE: When was that spent?

Mr. DEVLIN: That amount was in the estimates of 1914-15, and has not been withdrawn yet.

Mr. SMYTHE: You said it had been spent.

Mr. DEVLIN: Will my hon. friend guarantee that it will not be spent?

Mr. SMYTHE: I will give no such guarantee, it should be spent.

Mr. DEVLIN: I am criticising honestly and, I hope, impartially the finances of this country and the Government's control of expenditures. If the money is not going to be spent, what is it in the estimates for? Members of this House must be guided by the Estimates. Was it absolutely necessary that in order to carry on the public service of this country an item of $20,000 should be placed in the Estimates for a public building at Mill Brook (Durham), which in 1911 had a population of only 793? These are only a few instances of what has happened, and perhaps the Government, which has invited this criticism will enlighten us as to the need for these public buildings.

Let me quote from the Canadian Financial Post of January 22, 1916, and this is not a party organ, but a financial paper published in Toronto:

> The country has made a magnificent response to the calls upon it since July, 1914, and is prepared for further sacrifices; but the people will not go on listening to ministers mouthing homilies on economy, while extravagance riots in the department under their administration.
>
> The annual report of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1915, shows a deficit of nearly three million dollars. This increase in expenditure is not only very large, but also very unexpected. It is nearly 2 per cent more than in 1914, while the population can have increased very little, if at all, so that it can hardly be claimed to be due to natural expansion.
>
> The question of expenditure has become as important as that of revenue. Speculation is aroused as to what is happening during the current fiscal year and induces a feeling of unrest. It would be well if monthly returns by the Government, published in the Canada Gazette, gave the itemized expenditure in similar form to that now used for revenue.

> The amount of capital expenditure for the first nine months of the fiscal year ending March 31 next, is $113,118,691, as against $55,002,443, the increase being entirely due to war expenditure. The amount expended on public works, $26,151,882 against $28,342,347 in 1914, seems very large, however, in comparison with the drastic cuts made by the great railway corporations and leading municipalities in the Dominion.

Let me point out, Mr. Speaker, what these great corporations are doing.

> The Canadian Pacific railway reduced its capital expenditure on branches, improvements, rolling stock and shops, from $79,186,958 in 1913, to $58,037,236 in 1914, and $11,774,094 in 1915.
>
> The building permits for 1915 amounted to only $25,000,000, for the whole Dominion, against $170,000,000 in 1913, and $200,000,000 in 1912.
>
> Four cities in the West—Edmonton, Calgary, Moosejaw and Saskatoon, reduced their capital expenditure in all, from $15,195,013 in 1913, to $6,758,303 in 1914, and $1,247,617 in 1915.
>
> These drastic economies effected by our great railroads and leading municipalities are striking instances of what can and has been done in this way. And if by these corporations, why not by a government department?
>
> Members of the Government never lose an opportunity of preaching the necessity for economy to the Canadian people; which is as it should be. At the same time the Canadian people look to see the ministers never losing an opportunity of practising that virtue in the administration of their respective departments.

I wonder if my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce thinks that one way of controlling public expenditure is to dismiss and cause to retire, as hon. gentlemen did when they assumed office, 13,000 civil servants or persons connected with the Civil Service, and to replace them by 25,613. You will remember, Sir, that this Government dangled before the eyes of the civil servants for a very long time a promise to increase their salaries. They got Sir George Murray over from England to make a report on the Civil Service. Hon. gentlemen opposite may find that report in a pigeon hole of the Prime Minister's desk down in the west block, all covered up with dust and cobwebs. Sir George Murray reported how a saving might be effected in the Civil Service, but the Government, instead of following the advice of this special commissioner and increasing the wages of the civil servants and others attached to the service, caused to resign 13,000 employees, and put in their places 25,000 others. In the department presided over by the Minister of Agriculture, who worked himself up into such a passion this afternoon, 138 were put out and 579 put in. I will not take every department, but to the credit of the Minister of Trade and Commerce let me say that he carried out in his own department his theory of controlling expenditures. He saw only 54 go out and 49 come in. If it were absolutely necessary that the 54 should go out, that is very much to his credit; but if they were put out for party reasons, I think it was rather cruel and somewhat crude. In the Marine Department there were 464 dismissals, 340 caused to resign, and 1,608 appointments. This Government, following out their theory of controlling expenditure, has succeeded in increasing the cost of civil government in this country from $88,000,000 in 1911 to $127,000,000 in 1914, and to $140,000,000 in 1915. We are told that we can not control expenditures because of the war, but expenditure is being controlled, as I have already pointed out, by the big corporations, by companies, by individuals and by governments in this country; and I know of no better example to offer hon. gentlemen opposite than the example set by the Government of the province of Quebec. The Provincial Treasurer, the Hon. Walter Mitchell, has just given to the public his financial statement.

The fiscal conditions in the province of Quebec must be the same, or about the same, as they are throughout the Dominion. The financial statement of the province shows that the ordinary revenue was $9,597,925.67, the ordinary expenditure $8,330,257.01, which left a surplus of $1,267,668.66. The extraordinary expenditure was $380,258.63, leaving a surplus over ordinary and extraordinary expenditure of $887,410.03. The Provincial Government have expended $692,994 in war donations in the way of grants to the British Government, l'Hôpital des Paroisses Canadiennes Francaises in Paris, the committee for the relief of the Belgian war victims, and the Comité de Secours National, Paris, and individuals in the province of Quebec have most generously given to the different funds that have been raised. Now, after giving for war purposes, all this money, which was a great deal considering their very small budget, after being able to control their expenditure, ordinary and extraordinary, they are able to show to the people of the province of Quebec in this year of war a surplus of $194,416. That is somewhat to the credit of the Hon. Sir Lomer Gouin, who is at the head of the Government of that province, and it is somewhat to the credit of a Liberal Government to show that they at least are able to control their expenditure when hon. gentlemen opposite in a Conservative Government are forced to confess to the people of Canada that they are altogether unable to control the expenditures which have been occasioned, not only by the war, but by the exigencies of their party friends.

I shall now refer to the advice of my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster), who said that in order properly to deal with the financial situation of Canada, we should convert our adverse trade balance into a favourable one. I wish to point out that the agricultural classes, who control the basic wealth of this country, have not been protected to the same degree as the manufacturing classes, and it is important to protect them in view of the fact that after the war we shall have to look to them to make up the awful deficit with which this country will be faced —a greater deficit, perhaps, than any we have had since Confederation.

At six o'clock, the House took recess.

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. DEVLIN: When you left the Chair at six o'clock, Mr. Speaker, was proceeding to show that the advice given to us by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) was that in order to make this country's affairs prosperous and to regulate its finances it was essential to prevent an adverse balance of trade. In the session of 1910-11, the Minister of Trade and Commerce, speaking in this House, used this language:

> I find in connection with the United Kingdom that our favourable balance of trade is $44,146,518. That looks good, but it is not as good as it ought to be. When we come to the United States of America, what do we find? We find that last year we imported from the United States $217,500,000 worth, that we sold to them $104,000,000 worth in round figures, and that there was an adverse balance against us of $113,000,000 odd.

His conclusion was that the sooner we could remedy that and the more completely we could remedy it the better. Now, I wish to call your attention to the way in which the present Government, on coming into power, proceeded to remedy this condition of affairs. Take our trade with the United States as an example. The Minister of Trade and Commerce complained that it was a bad thing for us to purchase $217,000,000 worth of goods from the United States; in fact, if my recollection is right, that was the theory generally accepted by hon. gentlemen opposite, and apparently accepted at that time by the majority of the electors—that it was a bad thing to trade at all with the United States. The reports which we have in hand show us that in 1912, after these hon. gentlemen got into office, we imported from the United States goods to the value, not of $217,000,000, as in the previous year, but to the value of $330,000,000. In 1913, we purchased from the United States goods to the value of $435,000,000, and in 1914, of $395,000,000. At the same time our exports to the United States were: In 1912, $102,000,000; in 1913, $139,000,000, and in 1914, $163,000,000. Now, if the Minister of Trade and Commerce was sincere in believing that an adverse balance of trade was a bad thing and should be remedied, he must have believed that when he and his friends came into power they could so control trade that this adverse balance would quickly be righted. In fairness to hon. gentlemen opposite—and I wish to be fair in my criticism—I must admit that the Minister of Trade and Commerce, following out the theories which he advocated, sought channels of commerce other than those which seemed to be bringing to Canada no very great wealth, and so he went off to China. Believing, as he did, that it was a bad thing to trade with the United States, and being unable to trade wholly with British countries, he felt that he had to seek other countries with which to trade. He succeeded fairly well in China, and on his return he gave this House a fair description of his travels; he told us that he had exacted of certain agents of the Government there that they should learn as much as possible of the Chinese language, and incidentally had prepared the ground for some trade with China. Being of a curious turn of mind at times, I have looked up the trade reports for this country, and I find that this has been the result of the hon. gentleman's mission to China: For the fiscal year ended 31st March, 1914, we sold to China $473,000 worth of goods and we bought from China over $1,000,000 worth. The net result of that trip to China by the Minister of Trade and Commerce was to convince the people of China that this was a great country to sell to and a poor country to buy from, and so he succeeded in establishing an adverse trade balance in our commerce with China.

What is our aggregate trade; how has that gone on under this noble theory that we must not have an adverse trade balance? In 1913, the total exports from Canada were $393,000,000, and the total imports, $692,000,000. There we had an adverse balance of trade under these same hon. gentlemen of about $298,000,000. In 1914, we exported $478,000,000, and imported $650,000,000, an adverse balance of trade of $171,000,000. In 1915, our imports were $629,000,000, and we sold abroad $490,000,000, leaving a trade balance against Canada of $138,000,000. I appeal to the Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White), for whom I have the greatest personal regard, to take his colleague the Minister of Trade and Commerce into his confidence, have that hon. gentleman step aside, and assure him that when he preached that it was a bad thing to establish an adverse trade balance he was apparently preaching something that he did not know anything at all about.

My hon. friend the Minister of Finance might answer me at once and say: Have you looked over the figures of this year? I presume the hon. Minister of Finance will deal with that in the Budget speech which he will deliver in a few days. But I wish to call his attention to the fact that this year is not a year that might stand out as an example in Canada. Conditions are such, because of the war, that we cannot claim that our trade has been upon a basis upon which it will rest in the future. But we have the United States alongside of us; they are not at war; and while Canada under the present Government has gone on increasing its adverse balance of trade, we find that the American people have established the greatest financial trade in the history of their country.

And what is it? The American exports increased 70 per cent in 1915 and reached a total of three and a half billions, breaking all previous records. The figures of the Department of Commerce to-day show that heavy exports and declining imports together set a new American trade balance record at $1,772,000,000. The imports were the smallest since 1912. The country's total foreign trade, exports and imports, passed the five billion dollar mark during the year, each month showing heavier exports, until December's reached $350,000,000, a trade balance of close to $2,000,000,000 was five times greater than that in 1914, when it stopped at $324,000,000.

Compare that with ours. In 1912 our adverse trade balance was $225,000,000. In 1914, when hon. gentlemen opposite had had three years to work out their theory, the adverse balance of trade was $180,000,000.

In the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite agriculture, which is a basic industry of Canada, has been sacrificed to manufactures. To prove this contention I desire to cite the exports of agriculture and manufacture from Canada in the years 1913, 1914, and 1915. The figures are as follows:

1913.
Agricultural produce	$196,134,043
Manufactures	52,212,592
Excess agriculture over manufactures	$143,921,451
1914.
Agricultural produce	$150,201,314
Manufactures	66,989,308
Excess agriculture over manufactures	$ 83,212,006
1915.
Agricultural produce	$193,543,711
Manufactures	137,702,849
Excess agriculture over manufactures	$ 55,840,862

In 1913 the excess of our agricultural exports over exports of manufactured goods amounted to $143,000,000; whereas, for the year ending November, 1915, our exports of agricultural products exceeded our exports of manufactured products by only $55,000,000

What conclusion can we draw from this? I draw a conclusion which, I feel, must appeal to the people of this country, in view of the fact that the war must, of necessity, cease some time. The agriculture of this country forms two-thirds of the basic wealth of Canada. Manufactures help to a certain degree, to a very large degree, but the farmers, before everybody else, produce the wealth of which we have been so proud in this country. Hon. gentlemen opposite—and I appeal to them very seriously at the present moment—should see to it that whilst the manufacturers are protected, whilst railways are protected by way of subsidies, the farmers of this country should not remain the only unprotected class of people in Canada. If we expect from the farmers the wealth that will be necessary to carry on the affairs of this country we must, in turn, protect the farmers. This year's figures which I have just put to the House show that exports of manufactured goods have been on the increase, and that agricultural exports have slightly increased. We must not forget for one moment the fact, which is apparent to every hon. member, that, with our agricultural products, at the present moment we are helping to feed millions of men who are now fighting the battles of the Empire and of the allied countries; and that the very moment the war ceases these exports of agricultural products must, of necessity, cease, because the Governments which are to-day purchasing our agricultural products will not then require them to the same degree. Whilst our exports of manufactured products have increased this also has been due entirely to the conditions brought on by the war. We have exported this year shrapnel, we have exported shells, we have exported ammunition—practically everything that is required by the armies on the other side. The moment the war ceases we will cease exporting anything in the nature of the ammunition, or at least very little.

In thus urging the Government to be careful how they face the problems of the future, I want to tell them that, whilst the farmers of this country have much to fear through the actions, or lack of action, of the present Government, the manufacturers of this country certainly also have very much to fear because this Government is so tiding them at the present moment to increase this output in the way of war munitions, whilst at the same time following out the main plank in the policy of the Conservative party, as I think every hon. gentleman opposite will admit, whilst following out their theory of offering every possible protection to manufacturers in the way of an increase in the customs duties. In order to prove what I have just advanced relative to the condition of our manufactures owing to the war, I want to quote an item which I find in the Labour Gazette, a newspaper published by this Government:

> Exceptionally active conditions prevailed throughout the year in the large iron and steel works at Sydney and Sydney Mines, and also in similar industries in Quebec and Ontario. Practically all foundry and machine shops in the country were busy in the manufacture of munitions, and large orders for cottons, woollens, clothing, leather and other goods used in military equipment kept establishments handling these lines in the main industrial centres of the Dominion very busy. The steel plant at Sault Ste. Marie was also very active during the year.

We therefore have it announced in this mouthpiece of the Government, the very reason why we have an increase in the export of manufactured goods. The Minister of Finance, I know, will agree that the increased exportation of agricultural products is entirely due to the war, so that this year is not a year upon which my hon. friends opposite can claim to have found a new system by which they have lessened this adverse balance of trade against Canada. They must of necessity appeal to normal conditions, to the conditions which existed in this country prior to the war, in 1911, 1912, 1913 and 1914; and I claim that the Government has signally failed in that respect to meet the conditions which confront Canada. The Financial Post of Toronto, of January 22, had a very significant article entitled, "Business outlook after the war." I will not quote the whole of the article, but for the purposes of my argument I read:

Whether or not in the readjustment Canadian manufacturers will be able to obtain business to replace in volume that of making war materials is a problem which the future can best solve, but it would appear conclusive that Canada's best hope will be large agricultural products. Along this line the directors of the Banque d'Hochelaga emphasize the necessity for increased population to offset the lowering of prices when the war ends. The report, after advising caution on the grounds that the present war prosperity is not healthy nor likely to be permanent, continues:

The annual report of the Banque d'Hochelaga contains this statement:

"One may assume that, at the end of the war, Europe impoverished and weakened, anxious to recover and to get back its economic situation, will endeavour firstly to provision itself in greater measure at home, and then at prices as advantageous as possible. It will therefore be necessary for us to see to it that we regain by increased production what is lost through the lowering of prices. To this end, the increase in our population by the colonization of our vast territories, the improvement in methods of agriculture and a special attention on the part of our farmers to the raising of live stock must remain from a material point of view, our greatest natural aim."

When I say, Sir, that it is the duty of the Government to show the people of this country that they have some policy in view by which they hope to meet conditions after the war, I am simply asking the Government, in the name of the people whom I represent, and of a good many people in this country, to give an indication of how they expect to meet the conditions the moment war ceases.

I shall refer for a moment to the Shell Committee, which has been prominently discussed during this debate, and in that connection I do not intend to make allusion to any particular person, or persons. We have heard it said that there is a general demand for an investigation into the operations of the defunct Shell Committee. That demand has come from hon. members in this House, and apparently the feeling is general throughout Canada. It is not confined to those of the political faith to which I belong; it has also come from Conservative sources. My hon. friend from Russell (Mr. Murphy) quoted from the Electrical News in the course of his speech, and I shall cite from the same paper, an article written by a gentleman who said he preferred the Borden Government with all its fault to the Liberal Administration. The article says:

The Shell Committee was appointed by the Government, was representative of the Government and consequently representative of Canada. In so far as our dealings with the British Munitions Board is concerned that committee was Canada. And in this great war, which Lloyd George has said is a war of munitions rather than men, shall it be said that when the Empire, called for aid, when the brave men in the trenches shouted for munitions, Canada rushed to their aid with $1 worth of shell in one hand while the other was held out for $5.15? Shall it be said that while we are wont to twit the United Statesers with their fondness for the dollar our own country has outdone them in the hour of the Empire's peril? It is unjust that Canada should be allowed to rest under any such stigma; it is unjust that the manufacturing members of the Shell Committee should be retired under suspicion of having placed such stigma on their native land. In justice to those men and to justice to Canada the shell contracts and the Shell Committee should be given the fullest and most searching investigation.

Yesterday the hon. member for Carleton, New Brunswick, acting upon his responsibility as a member of this House, brought very serious charges against the Shell Committee. These charges were of such a nature that, it seems to me, the Government, for its own honour, to preserve its dignity, and for the honour and dignity of the people of Canada, should at once grant an investigation. I am not always governed by what appears in newspapers, Grit or Tory, but the Montreal Star, which professes to be a strong adherent of this Government, and which has been a very staunch supporter of my hon. friends opposite, on the 26th of this month, editorially used this language:

It must be increasingly apparent to every well-wisher of the Government that a public and complete investigation into the work of the late Shell Committee and other war purchases cannot be denied. If the consent of the British War Office must be secured to legalize such an inquiry, then it should be asked for by a unanimous Canadian Parliament. Too much has been charged to enable public opinion in this country—deadly in earnest as it is in its determination to win the war—to sit down in patient ignorance as to the real facts of the case.

The charges are far too serious—the questions at issue far too vital. The finest young men in Canada are giving their lives to defend the Empire and the fixed principles of liberty and honour for which it stands before humanity and history. If, while these noble young men have been going out of our homes to die "somewhere in France" ghouls in human shape have emerged from homes of similar outward appearance next-door to pad their pocket books with unfair and unearned profits on the arming and equipping of these young men, then the whole country wants to know it—and to know them— and to know what the Government proposes to do to them.

Every dollar taken unfairly from the money which this nation has to spend in self-defence, is like striking up a rifle aimed at a German. Worse still, it may even be disarming a Canadian lad in the face of a German charge. The whole business must be searched through and through with the vivid light of patriotism and publicity. If the moneys we are literally sweating out of ourselves to save freedom and the flag, are being diverted into traitorous pockets, then there are far worse Germans in Canada than those whom we have interned.

That is very strong language, but it is not as strong as that which was used by the Right Hon. Lloyd George, who, speaking in the British House of Commons last July, said that on account of the very high prices demanded for war munitions in some quarters, delay was caused and in consequence a great deal of sacrifice resulted on the battlefield in France. Where are those quarters? Is Canada one of the quarters to which Mr. Lloyd George referred? The Canadian people are asking that question to-day. What is the reason that is prompting the Canadian Government to refuse this investigation? The Minister of Militia, discussing this subject yesterday, spoke very bravely, according to his view, when he said:

For a double reason, therefore, I do not see that it is the function of this House specially to inquire into any of the transactions in connection with that committee—

That is a question that I will come to in a moment.

—although I should be more than pleased, so far as I am able, to give all the elucidation of the facts, and all the enlightenment as to them which it is possible for me to give.

Hon. gentlemen opposite will say, and I thoroughly agree with them, that the Minister of Militia is a man of such mettle as to stand up in this House and say in effect: I am one man in this Cabinet and I will give all the information I have. Then, I ask the other members of the Cabinet: Why is it you do not hold an investigation and give the Minister of Militia a chance to give to the people of Canada all the information which he has in his possession? The only answer given so far is the answer given by my hon. friend the Solicitor General (Mr. Meighen). The Solicitor General is a very keen reasoner; he has a very nimble political conscience, and he satisfied himself and apparently satisfied the leader of the Government when he said: The Shell Committee is a creature of the Imperial Government; the Shell Committee is responsible to the Imperial Government; the Shell Committee communicates directly with the Imperial Government, and therefore, this Government has absolutely no jurisdiction over it. Has this Parliament no jurisdiction over the actions of the Shell Committee which was dealing with persons and property in this country? Have you ever heard of any man in Canada who could state a fallacy better than the Solicior General and build up an argument upon it just as if it were a truism? He said he was not going to speak for the Shell Committee, although he made as able a defence of it as he knew how, but that he was going to speak in the name of the Government and give the reasons why there should be no investigation. He started out by saying:

I do not know that it is a matter that requires much elucidation that the prices should at first have been higher in Canada than in the United States. It may be that the prices were higher than the conditions warranted; I am not an expert, and I do not know.

Mr. Lloyd George, on the other hand, said in the British House of Commons that on account of the prices being higher there was some sacrifice on the part of the Allied armies. This is, of course, a matter of indifference to the Solicitor General because it has nothing to do with the legal phase of the case. He proceeds to say:

I have said that I have no knowledge that he (the Minister of Militia) was a member, and I would like my hon. friend to get the names of the respective committees and show that the Minister of Militia was a member. The committee, however constituted, and whatever its personnel, was, from the time of its institution, a committee acting under the authority of the Imperial Government.

This country is innocent, this House must be innocent, to believe that the Solicitor General did not know who were the members of the Shell Committee, and did not even know that the Minister of Militia was a member of that committee. He concludes his argument, and this is what I deem to be the best portion of it, with these words:

If we have the right to review part of the moneys that are payable to the Imperial Government we have the right to review all the expenditures in which we are interested. We are interested in the same degree in the money paid by the Imperial Government in the United States as in the money paid in Canada. We have to pay some part of that, and we have to pay some part of the money that has been spent in Japan, and in Great Britain itself, and if there is a duty upon the Parliament of Canada to investigate the expenditure of Imperial moneys for the munitions of Canada, the same duty must apply to all the moneys in which we are interested expended by the Imperial authorities.

Are we interested in the money spent in Japan? If we are, we recognize that this Government, in the exercise if its plenary powers, has no jurisdiction over Japan. Everybody knows that. The Solicitor General says that we would have jurisdiction over the money spent in Japan if this Government had jurisdiction over the money that has been spent in this country and given to persons under the control of this Government.

The Minister of Finance, speaking in Toronto, gave us a further inkling into what was being done in connection with financing the contracts entered into by the Shell Committee. Here is the language he used when speaking to the Toronto Board of Trade:

Now in addition to that the Finance Department has advanced to the Imperial Treasury, in order to make payment for commitments of the Shell Committee in Canada, no less a sum than 63 million dollars.

That 63 million dollars has been repaid to Canada from time to time by the Imperial Treasury. But this is the point to which I want to call your attention. How has it been paid?

I had a statement from my deputy this morning in which he states that it has been paid by gold to the extent of many millions of dollars. In fact to the extent of 15 million dollars actually shipped in to the Finance Department. That is one reason why Canada has more gold to-day than she had when the war broke out, in liquidation for advances made to the Imperial Treasury for the purpose of financing the Shell Committee.

In addition to that, payment has been made by exchange operations, on which there would be a heavy discount, running from 3 to 5 per cent, amounting to over 20 million dollars.

And he proceeds with his very able speech. However, he tells us, and this I want to lay down as one of the premises of my argument, that the money of Canada, over which this Government have absolute control, was expended in payment of contracts entered into by the Shell Committee. We have at least jurisdiction over the money that this Government expends; hon. gentlemen opposite will admit that. Whether that money is paid by way of advances, or by way of loans, or otherwise, the moment the money of Canada has been paid this Parliament has jurisdiction over the expenditure. I think hon. gentlemen who are just will admit that. My hon. friend the member for

[Mr. Devlin.]

St. John (Mr. Pugsley), on the 13th day of April, 1915, asked a question of the Minister of Militia in regard to the following article which appeared in the Ottawa Free Press of the previous day:

Revelations of war purchases on boots, bandages, binoculars and bad horses apparently have crossed the Atlantic.

It looks as if the British Government had begun to sit up and take notice. Soon after the opening of the war the British Government entrusted the Canadian Government with the purchasing of some war supplies in Canada for the use of the British and allied forces. The British Government was to pay the bills.

It is understood that within the last few days the War Office or the British Government has cancelled the buying commissions which it gave to the Canadian Government.

This does not mean an end to the purchase of supplies in Canada by the British Government, as War Office buyers are on their way to Canada and the United States, and hereafter the British Government will deal direct with producers and manufacturers on this continent without the intervention of Ottawa.

My hon. friend from St. John based a question on that article, the purpose of which I take to be that up to date the Canadian Government alone had full control of these purchases, that they had been purchasing for the Imperial Government, if you will, but that it was the intention of the Imperial Government to deal directly with manufacturers in Canada without the intervention of Ottawa. My hon. friend from St. John proceeded to say:

I ask the Minister of Militia if the Government has received notice from the British War Office that they are sending their agents to the United States and Canada for the purpose of making purchases direct from the manufacturers, and are not to continue making them through my hon. friend the Minister of Militia and others who have been appointed by him?

Major General Hughes: The hon. gentleman asks me a question concerning the Department of Militia, and I am in the happy position of being able to answer him. There is not a word of truth in that article, so far as the Department of Militia is concerned. So far as the Government is concerned the Prime Minister is the proper gentleman to ask.

Sir Robert Borden: The statements in the article are absolutely without foundation, so far as I am aware. On the contrary, I know that within the past four or five days the British Government have asked the Canadian Government to act in respect of the procuring of a large amount of supplies in Canada for the War Office.

So that it would appear that up to this date the British Government had absolutely no agents in this country for the purchase of war supplies. I take it that the British Government had asked the Canadian Government to act in the matter, and that the Canadian Government would appoint their agents to purchase any supplies that might be required by the War Office and could be got in Canada. In corroboration of my statement that the British Government had no agents in this country at that time, I refer to a question asked in the British House of Commons on the 15th of March, just exactly one month before the hon. member for St. John asked his question in this House. Mr. MacVeagh, a member of the British House, asked the Under-Secretary of State for War:

Whether the contracts being placed in Canada and the United States, are being placed by special agents, and if so, what is their commercial experience; whether the remuneration is by salary or commission, and if so, how much; and whether the co-operation of the Canadian Government has been invited?

Mr. Baker, who was then Financial Secretary to the War Office, replied:

Messrs. J. P. Morgan & Company, of New York, who are in close touch with all the American markets, have been appointed commercial agents to the Government for the purpose of placing orders in the United States. Their remuneration is by commission, but it is not considered to be in the public interest to give the details of the contract.

The British Government then, had agents in the United States, and their agents were Messrs. J. P. Morgan and Company. But as regards Canada Mr. Baker proceeded to say:

No special agents have been appointed for purchasing in Canada. Close touch has been maintained with the Canadian Government in regard to orders placed in that country.

According to the War Office, then, the Canadian Government had absolute control of all purchases and over all contracts entered into in this country. Now at this time the Shell Committee had been formed by the Minister of Militia, and in the report which was laid on the table by the Prime Minister on the 15th of April last, General Bertram speaks of the Shell Committee as follows:

In addition to the foregoing, the Minister of Militia, through his committee—

Through "his" committee, mark you, General Bertram was supposed to be the chairman of the committee that was supposed to be the go-between with the manufacturers of Canada and the Imperial Government, and he says that the committee was not the committee of the Imperial Government, but the committe of the Minister of Militia of Canada. The committee was formed, then, by the Minister of Militia, who was at that time and is now a member of this Government. The Shell Committee was absolutely under his control and under the control of the Canadian Government, and reported to the Prime Minister or to the Minister of Militia. The fact is, however, that the only report which has been laid upon the table as coming from the Shell Committee was made directly to my right hon. friend the Prime Minister of Canada. General Bertram, in another part of his report, uses this language:

We informed the various officials at the War Office that it was the intention of the Minister of Militia and his committee—

Again it is "his" committee. Throughout his whole report Colonel Bertram spoke of the Shell Committee as the committee of the Minister of Militia, and as the commitee of the Canadian Government. The Right Hon. Mr. Baker, the Financial Secretary of the War Office, made in the British House of Commons the statement that the War Office had no agents in Canada, that the Canadian Government was making the purchases. It appears from this debate, and from what papers we have in our possession, that the Canadian Government controlled every contract that was entered into with the manufacturers, that they had absolute control over the Shell Committee, over the appointment of inspectors, and over every other detail of the committee's work. The Solicitor General, speaking of the Shell Committee, said:

They conducted their business directly with the Imperial authorities. Communications passed from the Shell Committee to the Imperial Government and from the Imperial Government to the Shell Committee. Had they been in a position where we had authority over them, had they been constituted as a committee under a department of this Government—

And you must mark General Bertram's statement that the committee was a committee of the Minister of Militia.

—they would have been answerable to this Government; we would have had authority over them and we would have been reaponsible.

In view of these statements; in view of the statement of General Bertram, the chairman of the Shell Committee, that the committee was a committee under the Department of Militia; in view of the statement of the Solicitor General that the Shell Committee had direct communication with the Imperial Government when it is in proof and in evidence that this communication was directly with the Minister of Militia and the Prime Minister of this country, and in view of the fact that the Solicitor General said that if the Shell Committee had been constituted as a committee under a department of this Government, they would have been answerable to this Government,—when we have the Minister of Militia telling us yesterday that he was the father of the committee, and when we have the evidence that it was a committee under the Department of Militia, I ask this Government and the Solicitor General, what further excuse will the Government give to the people of Canada for refusing the investigation which has been asked by the Opposition, and which is being asked by the people of this country?

I feel that I have spoken at greater length than I had intended, and as I am about to resume my seat I want to say that I believe it to be the first duty of this Government and of the people of this country to see this war brought to a successful issue; but at the same time I want to remind the Minister of Finance, before he puts on any more taxes, that his raising of duties last year has simply had the effect of adding to the burdens of the consumer and of protecting a class already protected in this country, namely, the manufacturers. I would like to recall to him the language used by the Right Hon. Mr. Asquith in the British House of Commons:

> If there is one thing that is axiomatic in fiscal theory and practice, it is this, that you cannot combine in one and the same imposition a revenue and a protective duty.

So far the increase in the duty has failed to give us the revenue we require; so far the increase in the duty has borne heavily upon the consumer, and yet we are obliged, in order to meet the ordinary expenditure, to go out and borrow. I have said, and I repeat that we have in this country untold wealth, agricultural, mineral, and industrial. I want to say to the Government: You should see to it that you do not rely upon your customs duties as your source of revenue. Your greatest source of revenue is in the wealth produced by your agriculture; it is your basic wealth, protect it. You are asking the farmers to produce more. They are the only unprotected class in this country, and yet you are taxing the essentials which they require, and without which they cannot clear the additional land necessary for increased production; they cannot build the additional buildings necessary to hold the greater volume of crops; they cannot till the soil and reap the harvest. You are increasing those burdens already on their shoulders by increasing your duties without thereby increasing your revenue. Now is the time for the Government to lay down a system for securing immediately after this war the best possible class of immigrants. Now is the time for them to lay down a system by which they will perfect the means of transportation by rail and by water. Now is the time for them to develop the mineral resources of this country, to save the forests, to lessen industrial disputes by giving due regard to the grievances of the labouring classes. In the different departments of the public service, now is the time for the Government to abolish the patronage system, and to call to their service the best class of officials obtainable and to pay them a just wage. I have always had unbounded confidence in the future of my country. I believe that our people have awakened to the great possibilities of Canada, and whilst we are assuming tremendous financial obligations, I believe that by a judicious and economic expenditure and administration, in spite of the awful strain upon this country caused by the depression through which we have passed and by the war, we shall again be able to travel upon that road upon which we had made such headway before 1911, in building up this country and bringing it on towards nationhood.

9 p.m.

[Mr. Devlin.]

Mr. J. W. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Mr. Speaker, if you will allow me, I would like to add my congratulations to those which have already been offered to you on your elevation to the high and honourable position which you occupy with so much grace and dignity. I would like also to offer my congratulations to the mover and to the seconder of the Address on the able and eloquent manner in which they discharged their duties.

Speeches in Parliament on the Address and on the Budget may be taken as giving a fair index of the popular mind on questions of public interest. At this particular time, when the liberties of mankind are in the balance, and when the very foundations of civilization are being threatened, the utterances of public men are of more than ordinary interest. Many of the speeches which have been delivered in this debate have been free from partisanship. That does not, in my estimation, indicate by any means that the members who delivered those speeches are less party men than they formerly were, but if they have had grievances, they have felt that at the present time and under existing circumstances they had better hide those grievances or grieve inwardly, so to speak, and wait for another opportunity of attacking the Government on matters in regard to which, in their opinion, the Government should be attacked. But all the speeches which have been delivered in this House have not been free from partisanship. So far as the speech of my hon. friend (Mr. Devlin) is concerned, I have no fault to find; in fact, I most cordially agree with many of his utterances. I do not agree with his views on some matters, and I will briefly refer to a few of the points on which I am at variance with him.

In his remarks on the purchase of the submarines, he stated that his complaint was that the price paid was too high for obsolete vessels. He did not question the necessity for these vessels and therefore did not question their usefulness. We have the statement made by a responsible minister of the Crown from British Columbia, that these vessels were of the greatest use in protecting the coast cities of Victoria and Vancouver. It does seem to me that when we consider the situation of Victoria and Vancouver at the outbreak of the war, we must see that the knowledge on the part of the German Government—and I think we may assume that Germany had that knowledge—that these submarines had been purchased, would have a very strong effect in preventing Germany from sending any of her cruisers so far away from their base of supplies. For my part, I am willing to leave the matter of the submarines to the consideration and judgment of the people of this country. I do not think the Government will be blamed; on the contrary I think the greatest credit will be given to those who effected the purchase of these submarines at that time.

The hon. member for Wright (Mr. Devlin) said that a few years ago hon. members on this side of the House declared that we "should not have truck or trade with the Yankees." That statement has often been made in a general way, but it has not been attributed to any individual. That was not the position taken by the Conservative party in 1911. We have never taken a position that we did not want to "truck or trade with the Yankees," but we did take the position—and which was diametrically opposed to the position taken by the right hon. leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) and his friends—that we were not prepared to allow this country to become a mere adjunct to the United States, and we were not prepared to hand over Canada to the United States. We were prepared then, and we are prepared to-day, to trade with the people of the United States or any other people on a fair basis, but we are not prepared to give away this country. as hon. gentlemen opposite have been disposed to do on more than one occasion.

As to my hon. friend's criticism of the expenditure of money on post offices in small towns, I would remind him that previous to the advent to power of the party which he supports in 1896, there was a generally understood, though unwritten, law that these buildings should not be constructed in towns of less population than about five thousand, and previous to the coming into power of the Laurier Government there were very few deviations from that general rule. If that rule was departed from, and if buildings were put up in small places at enormous expense to the country, that policy was introduced by the party which my hon. friend (Mr. Devlin) supports.

The hon. gentleman made a statement with regard to the farmer, which, if I heard it correctly, I heartily endorse. He said that the farmer should not be the only unprotected man in this country; that if the manufacturers were protected the farmers ought to be protected also. If I am not giving correctly the substance of his words I hope he will correct me. Understanding the statement in that way, I heartily agree with it. But what was the position the hon. gentleman and his friends took in 1911 with regard to the farmer when they proposed to this country their policy of reciprocity with the United States? They proposed by that policy to throw open the doors of Canada to every country of agricultural production on the face of the globe. That is the proposition they offered then and that is the policy that the country rejected. What would be the position of our farmers in Canada to-day had that policy been carried out? With the products of the various countries practically excluded from the markets of Europe, those markets being made very dangerous of access by the war, we may be quite certain that if there was a low price for any farm product in any part of the world, that low price would be given to the farmers of Canada, for if our prices here at any time fell to a figure that would attract the producers of other countries, our farmers would have no protection, but the agricultural products of these other countries would be thrown into our market to the injury of our farming population.

Now, a word as to the hon. gentleman's observations concerning the transactions of the Shell Committee, and his observations on this subject were almost in the same words as those used by other hon. gentlemen on the opposite side of the House. I wish, first, to make one or two quotations. At the time of the South African war, the good offices of the Laurier Government then in power, were given to Britain in the purchasing of supplies in Canada for the use of the British Government. In 1902 a resolution was moved in this House asking for an investigation in regard to these transactions. The investigation was refused on the ground that the war was in progress. Next year, 1903, the same request came up, and I will quote briefly to show the grounds on which that request for an investigation was then refused. The Minister of Finance of that time, Hon. W. S. Fielding, used these words:

> If we loaned the good offices of any of the officials of Canada, I cannot admit that we thereby are liable to account to this House for any expenditure of Imperial money which may happen to have been made in that connection.

And here is a brief extract from the speech made by the Prime Minister of that time, now the leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier):

> We have had no complaint from the British Government and I therefore see no reason why this House should inquire into the expenditure of money which does not concern it.

That was the position taken by two of the most prominent members of the Liberal Government, and that position was endorsed by every member on the Liberal side of the House at that time. I cannot see that the position to-day is any different from what it was then. I might use the very words used by the present leader of the Opposition and say: We have no complaint from the British Government in regard to the whole business. And if fair consideration be given to the facts stated here yesterday by the hon. Minister of Militia (Sir Sam Hughes) I think it will be seen that there is no cause for hon. gentlemen opposite to make the complaint that they do. In the course of the speech of the hon. member for Carleton, N.B. (Mr. Carvell) I asked a question of that gentleman. He was discussing the giving of a shell contract to some firm in St. Catharines. I asked him a very proper question, simply when the order was given to this company. I got no direct answer to that, and I repeated my question. Then the hon. member for Carleton appealed to the Chair and refused to give me an answer. Of course it is the privilege of any member to answer or not to answer a question that is put to him. The reason the hon. member for Carleton did not answer the question was because, if he had answered it, it would have done away with the argument he was trying to advance, in so far as that one firm was concerned, because, as a matter of fact, that firm was not given an order for shells at that time, but an order for cartridge cases, and so did not come within the line of argument the gentleman was pursuing.

My hon. friend from Carleton has told us that he does not allow the Ottawa Free Press to speak for him. The Free Press is to be congratulated in that it does not have to speak for the hon. member for Carleton, or to endorse what he says. The hon. member left out one thing in his speech this year. Last session he rang the changes on two men whom he called Bill and Dan. In future, I expect, it will be Sir William and Sir Daniel with the hon. member for Carleton. Why? Because during the past summer Sir William and Sir Daniel gave the hon. member for Carleton a free ride across this continent, and he came back so extremely mellowed that it is now Sir William and Sir Daniel, and he is ready to swallow one-half or two-thirds of what he said about them in this House last session. The Government has no right to complain of criticism; and although at this time, with the war in progress, they might expect that some of the harsher criticism should be postponed, yet they naturally do expect to get an occasional shot from the other side. But while they may be willing to submit to a little political sniping from some hon. gentlemen opposite, I do think, and I am sure the country will agree with me in this, that they have a right to expect that hon. gentlemen opposite should not use poison gas in their attacks. As far as the hon. member for Carleton is concerned, when his hand grenades or rather his mouth grenades, his shrapnel and high explosives and his sniping failed to make a hit, he undertook to make use of the poisonous gas of misrepresentation; and, a very short time after he had started that gas in the direction of the Government, the wind changed and it was blown back in his own face, and he has gone away now, pretty sick. So far as his very wild statements concerning shell contracts, etc., are concerned, the speech of the Minister of Militia is the fullest and most complete answer. In so far as his equally wild and reckless statements concerning the purchase of hay are concerned, I should think that the hon. member for Carleton, N.B., would never mention hay again. He was very much concerned about the farmers of his county. Contracts for hay had been let and the farmers had been paid $11, $12.50, $13 a ton for the hay; and he said they were being bled in the interests of favourites of the Government. He shed very copious tears for the farmers in his county. He told us that not only were they prohibited from exporting by an embargo on the export of hay but, worse than that, hay was being brought by the schooner load from the Annapolis valley of Nova Scotia in competition with the product of the farmers in his part of the country. He said:

> The whole intention is to show the farmers of New Brunswick that they can get the 15,000 tons of hay without them, and make them accept the price they are willing to pay.

In other words, we see the reason for the action of the hon. member for Carleton when he was buying hay to ship over to England at the time of the Boer war, because he admitted that he brought in several carloads from Quebec for the express purpose, unquestionably, as he puts it here himself, of showing the farmers in his part of the country that it was possible for him to get the hay elsewhere, and thus forcing them to accept the seven or eight dollars a ton he was kind enough to give them. Not only that, but he himself made a binding contract with the sub-contractors, holding them down in such a way that they dare not buy hay from the poor farmers at a higher price than he wanted to pay, or otherwise the punishment clause in the contract would be invoked, and they would be subject to a penalty. Never since I have had the honour of a seat in this House have I seen any person make such reckless statements as the hon. member for Carleton made, statements which, if applied to his own conduct a few years ago, would meet the condemnation from his own mouth which he was trying to place on members on this side of the House. Not alone in regard to hay did the hon. member speak; he also had something to say about horses. He said: In regard to fifty horses which were offered by Mr. Cox:

> When Sir Adam Beck was put in charge, for some accountable reason, I do not know why, he refused this gift; he sent around other veterinary inspectors, and they refused to accept every one of these fifty horses. Then the man who had charge of these horses—I think that perhaps Mr. Cox may have had a little finger in the pie as well—decided to test the sincerity of those who were acting for the Government in this matter. Mr. Cox said: We will see how serious these men are in their rejection of these horses.

And so on. I have in my hand the Toronto Daily Star, of Wednesday, January 26, and, since the hon. member for Carleton introduced the name of Mr. Cox in this matter, I want to quote what Mr. Cox himself says in regard to this transaction, and then leave it to the judgment of the House how far they can rely upon statements made by the hon. member for Carleton. The Toronto Daily Star is a Liberal paper. The article to which I refer is headed:

> H. C. Cox Drops Thousands on Horses.
> Came back on his hands because Mounted Units went as Infantry.

This is what Mr. Cox has to say in regard to this matter:

> If there is any insinuation that the horses were unfit, or that there was anything irregular about the transaction in regard to these horses, in all fairness to the Government and myself it ought to be cleared up, though ordinarily I do not care to add anything in debates of this kind, where politics are to some extent involved. I am honourary colonel of the 9th Mississauga Horse, of which H. D. Lockart Gordon, now at the front, is the colonel. He was very anxious to have the regiment go to the front as a mounted unit, and so I bought fifty horses for the boys to take out to camp at Long Branch for training purposes, and the city bought them fifty more. The bodyguard also were furnished with fifty horses by the city and fifty by Mr. Aemilius Jarvis, the honorary colonel of that regiment. These horses were brought in with the regiment when they went into winter quarters at Exhibition Camp but when these troops finally were ready to leave for the front the Government decided not to send them as mounted troops, but as dismounted cavalry, or infantry, until such time as conditions at the front warranted the use of horsemen as such. Consequently I was left with fifty horses on my hands, horses which had cost on the average of $200 each. I sold some of them at Grand's stable, and some—I do not know how many; it may have been twelve, as stated—were sold to the Government Commission's Purchasing agent for remounts, or for whatever purpose they were required. I dropped several thousand dollars over the matter from first to last, but I only mention it now to clear up any misapprehension that may be raised by the discussion in the House of Commons yesterday.

Mr. Cox, who is a well known Liberal, whose sympathies are naturally with the party on the other side of the House, makes the statement that he does not wish any insinuation to be made that the horses were unfit, or that there was anything irregular in the transaction; and he makes it as a matter of fair play, not only to himself, but to the Government as well. Now, Sir, that is certainly a very different attitude from that taken by the hon. member for Carleton, N.B., and conveys a very different impression. Why is it that the hon. member for Carleton took the course he did? Why is it that he plainly misrepresented the facts in regard to the horses, in regard to the shells, and in regard to the hay? What is it for, if it is not for this: That he believes that by circulating such reckless statements in the press they will have some political effect.

The hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Burrell) stated this afternoon that he had had certain talks with the hon. member for Carleton, who asserted that the Minister of Agriculture had requested him for God's sake not to bring up the matter of the purchase of the hay. That does not seem reasonable on the face of it. It is apparent, however, that there were some confidential talks between the Minister of Agriculture and the hon. member for Carleton. The only explanation I can think of is to be found in the statement of the minister himself, that he had been sick for some time. He was not exactly himself, and was thrown off his guard a little; for surely the Minister of Agriculture has been long enough in this House, and has had sufficient opportunity of judging the calibre of the hon. member for Carleton to know that a man, who would have no regard for his country at a time like this, would not be persuaded even for God's sake not to bring up a matter if there was any political capital to be made out of it.

In regard to the matter of shells and the profits on shells, however, I observe that there was one company which the hon. member for Carleton handled very lightly indeed. That was the company which bears the name of the Canada Foundry and Forgings Company, a company in which the hon. member for South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) is very deeply interested. The hon. member for Carleton was not so anxious to have an inquiry regarding that company, not so anxious to know how it was that the stock of that company rose within ten days from 30 to 260, unquestionably making some person very wealthy. He passed very lightly over that and went on to make reckless statements regarding other companies.

In regard to the matter of exorbitant profits on war materials, I wish to state, Mr. Speaker, that I endorse the words of the hon. member for Wright (Mr. Devlin); and I will endorse the words of any hon. gentleman in this House who takes the position that at this time of stress and strain no man, or firm, should make large profits out of munitions or anything else that is being furnished for the prosecution of the war. The people of the Dominion of Canada have responded nobly to appeals in support of the Red Cross, the Patriotic Fund, the Belgian Relief and other funds, and I say that no greater shame could attach to any man in Canada after this war is over than to be pointed out as one who had made hundreds of thousands of dollars out of exorbitant profits on anything furnished for the prosecution of the war. That is the position I take; that is the position which I understand the hon. member for Wright (Mr. Devlin) took in his speech, which statement on his part I thoroughly endorse.

At present there are millions of poor Belgians who have been driven out of their own country, refugees who are being taken care of in foreign lands; there are others in that country huddling around the ruins of their shattered villages, waiting for their turn to get a meal that will keep them alive from one day to the next; women in tattered garments, with little children hanging to their skirts, standing in the snow waiting for the free meals; and I repeat that nothing could be more shameful than for any man in the Dominion of Canada to go through this war making excessive profits while those conditions obtain.

I believe that, since this great task was thrown upon its shoulders, the present Government has done everything in its power to try to prevent profiteering, if I may use that word. The burdens thrown upon this Government have been enormous. That fact has been recognized by many hon. gentlemen on the opposite side who have spoken. Mistakes have unquestionably been made, but I believe that if you put the question to the people in the Dominion of Canada, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, ninety-nine per cent. would say that, in its conduct of this war, the Borden Government has been actuated by the desire to do the best that Canada could possibly do, and by a desire to prevent any grafting or exorbitant profits. They have given ample evidence of that in the past, day after day, and month after month; and the attacks which have been made by one or two hon. gentlemen on the opposite side of the House, especially by the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) and the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Carvell), are not to the credit of these gentlemen. It has been shown that these attacks were made recklessly, and without that due regard for the truth which ought to characterize the remarks of these hon. gentlemen, and of every other hon. gentleman in this House. I am quite confident that, when the proper time arrives, the people of this country will mete out to these hon. gentlemen the condemnation which they richly deserve.

The hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) informed us that he had been asked to address a recruiting meeting in St. James Methodist church, Montreal. I am sure that the hon. member for Rouville has advertised that so thoroughly himself throughout the country that he will not object to a reference to it by myself. He should be very grateful to the Methodist church in general, and to St. James Methodist church in Montreal in particular for giving him the splendid opportunity of letting the world know his breadth of vision, how broad and loyal he is and how fearless. He told us that he addressed that meeting and that he was enabled to say that all churches should be recruiting tents. A so-called religious paper took him to task for making such a statement as that. I commend the hon. member for Rouville for his splendid courage, for we must suppose that he exhibited courage. He spoke himself as though he had, anyway. But I want to tell the hon. member for Rouville that in the province of Ontario we wonder at him mentioning the thing at all, because in Ontario every Protestant church since this war started has been thrown open as a recruiting tent, and every Protestant minister in Ontario—I do not speak for the other provinces, but I suppose it is the same—has been in the forefront of all movements for advancing the cause of Great Britain in connection with this war, as we would wish to see it, whether in connection with recruiting, getting money for patriotic funds, or for relief funds, or in connection with other such movements, and, to their honour be it said, that they have taken a very active part in this respect. The hon. member for Rouville, the hon. Postmaster General (Mr. Casgrain), and the hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Paquet) quoted some very noble utterances of certain of the higher clergy of their church. I have no fault to find with that; it is quite proper that they should take pride in their church and in what their church is saying, but if we were to quote the splendid and noble words which have fallen from the lips of Anglicans, Methodists, Presbyterians and members of other denominations in this country, I am afraid we would spend several days and take up needlessly a great many pages of Hansard. It is true that religious denominations will be judged in this war to a certain extent by what the adherents of these denominations have done in the way of recruiting; and it is true that a great deal of consideration will be given to the remarks of bishops, archbishops, and clergymen in general at the heads of these churches. That is as it should be. We expect, not only the clergy of the Protestant denominations, but we expect the priests of the Roman Catholic faith, and we expect the Pope himself, the head of that great body, to be on our side in this war. Why it is necessary to call particular attention to their utterances I fail to see inasmuch as certainly no person has made any charge to the contrary. No person has charged them with lack of loyalty or of zeal in this House or, as far as I have heard, in the country.

But after all, the men who are most deserving of our praise and admiration are not really the bishops and clergy who have expressed noble sentiments in Canada, but they are the hundreds of Roman Catholic priests and Protestant clergymen who today are sharing the trials and dangers of the men in the trenches in Flanders. They are the men to whom I take off my hat every time, and I ask not what denomination they belong to, but I pay them the highest tribute that it is possible to pay those men for their heroic self-sacrifice.

The right hon. the leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) referred briefly to conscription. He quoted from a paper published on the other side of the line to show that some of those Americans, who had come into the Northwest in hundreds of thousands, had, since this war started, gone back to the United States, and the right hon. gentleman deplored that. The only thing I have to say in regard to that is, "good riddance." If they left this country because they were afraid that they would have to fight for the country in which they lived and went back to the United States, I say: good riddance, let them go and stay away. This country has not lost very much if they go there and stay there. The leader of the Opposition uttered this sentence which caught my eye: The only complete victory which has been won during this war has been won by the British navy. I think that statement is literally and absolutely correct. This is not the first time, Mr. Speaker, that the British navy has been a guarantee of the liberties of the people of Europe. It is not the first time that the British navy has prevented some powerful European monarch from realizing his ambitious ends. Phillip of Spain, Louis XIV of France, and Napoleon, all were checked in their ambitions by the navy of Britain, and, as in the days gone by, the task is forced upon Britain to-day of preventing a tyrant from grinding democracy beneath the iron heel of militarism.

The fate of the democracies of the world rests upon the British sea power. It is not England alone whose existence is at stake. I make that statement because once in a while we hear some person say that this is "England's war." This is not England's war any more than it is Canada's war. It is not only the freedom and rights of the people of the British Islands, or of the British Empire, that is at stake, but it is the freedom and rights of the democracies of the world. When the curtain falls on the last act of this great war, it will disclose the faces,—the joyful faces—of those who are sure of their freedom; or it will disclose the solemn and sad faces of people who have been bereft of everything they hold most dear.

This is not merely a fight of England against Germany; it is a fight for supremacy between two irreconcilable principles—democracy on the one hand, as represented by England and France, and autocracy, or militarism, on the other hand, as represented by Germany and her allies. It is a struggle for freedom against slavery, and against a slavery worse than that which bound the negro to his master. This is a struggle to maintain democratic rights and true Christian principles against a country which has accepted the teachings of Treitsche and Bernhardi as being more infallible than the teachings of Christ, and which deifies and worships naval and military power as the most sublime of all religions. If it had not been for the British navy, France would, long ere this, have been crushed, Russia's power would have been broken, and the British Empire would have been shattered. The British fleet has swept the seas clear of German merchant vessels and has driven the German war vessels behind their line of forts for safety. It has adequately protected ten billion dollars of Empire trade and $160,000,000,000 of Empire wealth; it has kept free from invasion, over 14,000,000 square miles of British territory and it has kept free of fire and sword the homes of over 400,000,000 people within the British Empire.

The British navy has preserved Canadian homes from destruction, Canadian women from outrage, and Canadian children from mutilation. Canadian commerce has been safeguarded, and Canadian liberty guaranteed by the British navy, which has been assisted by Australia, by New Zealand, by Newfoundland, and by all the overseas dominions except Canada. The fault or blame for the fact that Canada has not also assisted that navy lies not with men on this side of the House, but with hon. gentlemen opposite, and their servile and subservient Senate across the way. It has been said that Canada's first line of defence is in Flanders, but Sir, Canada's last line of defence, Canada's bulwark, Canada's guarantee, is that mighty, silent, ever-watchful fleet in the North Sea, which hon. gentlemen opposite refused us the right to strengthen and make more effective. Those are the facts, and no one in this House can refute them. But these facts do not appeal to all men in this country. This protection of Canada's rights and of Canadian women and children does not appeal to the callous heart of Bourassa and Lavergne. It stirs their blackened blood to no quicker beat. Loyalty is not an abstract principle like truth, or honesty or charity; it depends upon the ideal, the motives by which one is actuated. The British idea of loyalty, for instance, forced King John to sign Magna Charta, took the head off Charles I, and replaced James II with William and Mary. The people of the United States in 1776 considered loyalty a crime and disloyalty the greatest of virtues. So it seems that loyalty is a virtue or a vice according to circumstance, and that a man may be a rebel or a patriot according as he backs a winning or a losing cause. But, by whatever standard you judge Bourassa and Lavergne there is nothing that can be said in their defence. The right hon. leader of the Opposition had occasion to refer to them in his speech the other day. While he did not mention them by name, I think he unquestionably was alluding to these men. He said:

> There has been a minority which has always protested against our attitude, and that minority is the Nationalist party in the province of Quebec, who took the position from the start that it was a crime for the Canadian people to participate in this war. Not only did they use that strong language, but again and again in the Nationalist press they have asserted, and still assert, that we have taken our present position simply because we are subject to the imperious dictation of the British authorities.

Further on he says, and I wish to place his words on Hansard:

There may be and often is servility to a master; there may be and there is servility to passion and prejudice. And if to-day there is servility anywhere it is not with those who have taken the attitude which we have maintained, and will maintain in this House, but it is with those who, blinded by passion and prejudice, would deny us the liberty of being humane and generous, would deny us the liberty of following the instincts and promptings of our minds, and our hearts, and our consciences; would deny us the liberty, when we see France threatened with dismantlement, when we see Belgium actually under the foot of the conqueror, of helping in the defence of France and of Belgium. It is not because they hate France, it is not because they hate Belgium, but because we cannot in this way help France or help Belgium without at the same time helping England. Sir, the case of France and the case of Belgium is the case of England. The case of England is the case of Belgium and France. Away with such sophistry. It is nothing but an attempt to conceal the hatred of empty minds. But, that is not all. These men also tell us that we may be fighting for an idea, as they say, and we may be fighting for the fate of the Empire, as they say, but that Canada has no direct or material interest in this war. And, every day we read in their press that if Germany were to triumph it would be of no material injury to Canada, that Canada would remain just in the position that Canada is in to-day.

Coming from a man who for fifteen years was prime minister of this country, a man from the province of Quebec, and who for practically his whole life has been the leader of a great party in this country, those words of his should give serious thought to every one of us in this House. He has made charges which are stronger than any that have ever been made against any party or sect in this country. A few years ago, I ventured to say from my place in this House that I believed there was ample evidence from the utterances of certain so-called leaders of the province of Quebec, to believe that there was in that province an anti-British or anti-Imperial sentiment, and I was taken very severely to task for that statement. I did not charge them, nor do I charge now, nor have I ever charged, the mass of the people of Québec with being disloyal. I made that as clear as words could make it, but I did charge that there were certain men who had assumed the positions of leaders in that province who had been guilty of disloyal utterances and of taking a course which was inimical not only to the best interests of the people of the province of Quebec, but to the best interests of the country as a whole. Within a few months after I made that statement a by-election took place in the province of Quebec and the Government candidate was defeated. When the House met again a bitter discussion took place between members on both sides of the House from the province of Quebec, and if I had wanted any corroboration of the charges I had made in the previous session, I got that corroboration from gentlemen on both sides of the House. The right hon. leader of the Opposition, the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) and the Hon. Mr. Brodeur, who was then in the House, hurled charges against men on the opposite side of the House, accusing them of using disloyal language throughout the province of Quebec. Gentlemen on this side of the House charged the supporters of hon. gentlemen opposite with using disloyal language, and quoted from their speeches in proof of it. When these hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House got through, one thing at least was clear; and that was that in the province of Quebec there was a certain number of men who thought that the best way to win an election in that province was to pound England and everything British, that the worse the things they said about England and everything British the more likely they were to get votes. But nothing that has been said in former sessions compares in severity with the language used by the right hon. leader of the Opposition the other day in regard to what are called the Nationalists in the province of Quebec, and I commend the right hon. gentleman for speaking out so openly in regard to these so-called leaders of a party. The right hon. gentleman stated—and he is a man whose words ought to receive more attention than mine, and that is why I quote them—that from day to day the Nationalist press in the province of Quebec is making use of language that is a disgrace to the press in general, and to the province of Quebec in particular. and, Sir, when a paper makes use of such disgraceful and disloyal language it should be suppressed. I take it that the duty of suppressing it falls upon the Postmaster General, although I may not be correct in that regard. I presume he has carefully looked over Le Devoir, which, I believe, is the most offending paper; and if what is stated in regard to that paper is true, or if only a small portion of it is true, then it is the duty of the Postmaster General to suppress that paper. If it is right to deny the use of the mails of this country to certain publications from the other side of the line because they are pro-German, and I say it is right; then it cannot be right to allow the publication in our own country of language which should not be used here, particularly at this time. Before suppressing any paper the Postmaster General should consider the matter very carefully. We must be tolerant and very careful in taking action against any paper; but we are engaged in a struggle at the present time when every man is required, and if there is being published in the province of Quebec or elsewhere in this country, papers which tend to prevent the recruiting of that accumulation of men on which the very life of this country and this Empire may depend, then even while we may run the risk of being regarded as intolerant, there is a time when tolerance becomes cowardice.

I have not very much to say in regard to Mr. Bourassa. I would not mention his name at all were it not for the fact that at one time he occupied a seat in this House as a follower of the right hon. gentleman who at present leads the Opposition.

Mr. PARDEE: How was he last time?

Mr. EDWARDS: Well, I was not in as close touch with him as the hon. member was, and I could not say, but I think there is pretty good evidence that he will be shaking hands with hon. gentlemen opposite in the next election.

Mr. MICHAUD: How do you like him now when he is supporting your party?

Mr. EDWARDS: I am not aware that he is supporting our party. On the contrary, it seems to me that his opposition has been very pronounced against our party. He has done everything a man can possibly do against the successful conduct of this war. How, the hon. gentleman can draw on his imagination to such an extent to say that this man is a supporter of the present Government, I cannot understand.

Mr. LAMARCHE: He will probably have a seat in this House in the next Parliament.

Mr. EDWARDS: It may be that the gentleman to whom I refer will have a seat in this House in the next Parliament, but if that is the case, it will remain as an everlasting blot and disgrace on the constituency that gives him that seat in the next Parliament.

[Mr. Edwards.]

Mr. GAUVREAU: He will not be any worse than the ministers you have got on your side now.

Mr. EDWARDS: Apparently supporters of this gentleman to whom I refer are not confined to this side of the House. My hon. friend across the way seems quite warm in his regard for this man who has published treason from one end of the country to the other.

There is another man to whom I wish to refer, who bears the name of 10 p.m. Armand Lavergne, and I would not refer to him, were it not for the fact that he had a seat in this House behind the present leader of the Opposition of whom he was a supporter. All that I have to say in regard to that gentleman is this: he holds, I understand, the rank of colonel in the militia of Canada, and I want to say, speaking for myself alone, that I regard it as a disgrace to the Dominion of Canada that a man of the stamp of Armand Lavergne should be allowed to retain his rank in the militia of Canada. I regard it not only as a disgrace to Canada, but as a distinct insult to every man who wears the King's uniform to-day, and I ask, Mr. Speaker, neither the gentlemen on this side of the House who apparently support Mr. Bourassa and Mr. Lavergne, nor the gentlemen on the other side whether they agree with me in that statement or not; but I am confident that most of the people of this country agree with me, and I would be very sorry to think that most of the people of the province of Quebec did not agree with me, because I have talked with many people from that province who, to their eternal credit be it said, resent the conduct and language of these two men just as strongly as I do. Mr. Armand Lavergne's uniform should be taken from him; he should not be allowed to disgrace it. No man should be allowed to wear the King's uniform who uses the language that he has used. He has stood up in the legislature of the province of Quebec and defied his King and country. That is a disgrace to this country; it should not be tolerated in this country, and I ask the Government why it is tolerated. Why is he allowed to wear his uniform?

Mr. GAUVREAU: Ask your minister.

Mr. EDWARDS: The only reason that I have thus far heard is this: Oh, if you take the uniform away from him, it is just what he wants; he wants to make a martyr of himself. Again I will express my opinion—I am not presuming to express an opinion for others—that that excuse is nothing more nor less than an excuse of political cowardice. If he wants to be made a martyr of, then he should be made a martyr of. At all events he should not be allowed to disgrace the uniform which he has disgraced while holding the rank of colonel.

Although only a humble member on the Government side of the House, I will make this suggestion to the Government, that they open up negotiations with Germany through the mediation of the United States or China or some other neutral nations for an exchange. Let them propose to give Bourassa and Lavergne in exchange for Dr. Béland, and let them throw in one or two of the senators over the way, notably Senator Choquette. They can make the proposition to Germany.

But I tell you, Sir, that if the proposition were made in all seriousness to Germany to give Lavergne and Bourassa, with Choquette thrown in, in exchange for Dr. Béland, Germany, bad as she is, vile as she is, would indignantly refuse; because if there is one thing that Germany detests more than another, it is treachery to the country in which a man lives.

I wish to refer to some remarks made by the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) in his speech in this debate. The hon. gentleman quoted some words of Edward Blake. They were not the words of Edward Blake in regard to the unrestricted reciprocity campaign of 1891, but they had reference to another matter. The words quoted were to the effect that a majority in dealing with a minority should give measure full, heaped up and running over—that is the measure to be given by the strong to the weak. And the hon. member for Rouville, commenting on these words says "May we not expect that there will arise another Blake to protect the Ontario minority?" I fully endorse those words of Edward Blake, but I want to tell the hon. member for Rouville that there is no necessity for an Edward Blake in Ontario for the purpose indicated by him. If there is any portion of the people of Ontario who need some person to champion their cause it is not the minority but the majority.

The hon. member for Rouville on several occasions has referred somewhat sneeringly, or slightingly—perhaps "slightingly" is better than "sneeringly," not so harsh at least—to the Orangemen of this country. I want to say to the hon. member for Rouville that a gentleman who has occupied the position he has occupied in this country should be above such things. And I want to remind him of this fact—that there went in the first contingent from Valcartier more Orangemen than have been enlisted up to date in the province of Quebec, outside the city of Montreal.

Mr. LEMIEUX Does the hon. gentleman refer to anything in my speech in this debate, or what expression of mine concerning Orangemen is it to which he refers?

Mr. EDWARDS: I did not quote the words of the hon. gentleman.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Where did I speak in that way about the Orangemen? Where did I say anything about them at all?

Mr. EDWARDS: On many occasions.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Let the hon. gentleman cite one.

Mr. EDWARDS: Well, it was not a use of the word "Orangeman," but the other day, referring to events which took place in England on the 15th of July, when asked with regard to the date by a gentleman near him, the hon. gentleman turned, and with a queer smile, said: The Fifteenth of July, not the Twelfth of July.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Is that all?

Mr. EDWARDS: That is all in that particular case, but there are other cases.

Mr. LEMIEUX: There are none. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Edwards) has stated that I have on several occasions referred in a sneering way to the Orangemen. I declare to the House that I never made any reference to the Orangemen either from my place in this House or elsewhere in this country.

Mr. SPEAKER: After that declaration on the part of the hon. member (Mr. Lemieux) I think it is the duty of the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) to accept the explanation.

Mr. EDWARDS: I cheerfully accept the hon. gentleman's explanation. I do not just know what reason he had for saying, "not the Twelfth of July" in the way he did. I have not at present under my hand words that he has used on former occasions, therefore I accept his statement.

Mr. LEMIEUX: You will never find them.

Mr. EDWARDS: We will see about that later on. At all events, in view of the statements that have been made in various parts of the country, I think I may be excused for pointing out that one-quarter of the recruits who went overseas with the first contingent from Valcartier were members of the Orange order, and, further, the members of that order, not only through their lodges, but in many other ways, have contributed funds and have been the means of raising funds for the relief of the Belgians and other good purposes; that thousands of them are to-day in Flanders fighting, and many of them have already laid down their lives fighting on behalf of a people whose religion is not their own.

There is another remark of the right hon. leader of the Opposition to which I wish to refer, a remark to the effect that in the matter of participation in the wars of the Empire there was a distinct line of cleavage between himself and the present Prime Minister. I am very sorry that the right hon. leader of the Opposition reiterated that statement of former years; I am sorry that he still thinks it politically advisable to occupy an equivocal position as regards the future of this country and its participation in the destinies of the Empire. I cannot refrain from asking if "the goal of independence" to which he has sometimes referred is still his great aspiration. What does he mean when he says that there is a great line of cleavage between himself and the Prime Minister in regard to Canada's participation in the wars of the Empire? If his words have any meaning they presuppose that Great Britain, or the Empire, may be engaged in a life and death struggle about something of which Canada might not approve. The minor troubles of Great Britain would not affect Canada, as the right hon. gentleman knows. If our assistance was required it could only be in some trouble which might pull the Empire down, and whether we wished it or not, Canada would stand or fall by the result.

The right hon. gentleman made it clear that his policy is still the policy of semi-detachment. There can be no other meaning to the words he has used. He would ask Parliament for its judgment in regard to our participation in any war in which the Empire might be engaged. What position would the right hon. gentleman be in if, in an emergency such as we have at present, he had behind him men like Bourassa and Lavergne who would, unquestionably, if they did as they have been doing outside of this House, do all they could to delay and prevent any measure which he might bring down providing for participation. Suppose he had in this House such men as Myers, Farrer, Goldwin Smith, and others, who formed the Continental Union Association in 1892, the object of which was to bring about continental union, union between Canada and the United States. If he had such men as those who were in this country in 1892, an association whose representatives in the province of Quebec as the firm of Mercier, Gouin, and Lemieux, carrying on that particular propaganda at that time, writing across the line to moneyed men there, as the head of that firm did, for funds to assist him in carrying on that work, I think he would find himself in very serious difficulty in carrying out the ideas to which he has given expression. Therefore, I say, that in this matter of cleavage between the right hon. leader of the Government and the right hon. leader of the Opposition, I range myself alongside of the Premier who has given us to understand what his position is in regard to the Empire. I quote the words of the Prime Minister: :

> So long as Canada remains in the Empire, Canada is at war when the Empire is at war. So long as the English flag floats above Canada, Canada is at war when that flag is attacked. The moment a shot is fired or a blow is struck at that flag, Canada is at war with the nation or country which fires that shot or strikes that blow.

That is the position taken by the Prime Minister of this country, and I have only to say that if there is a line of cleavage, which I very greatly regret, I want it to be understood on which side of the line I stand. I believe our destiny is inseparably connected with the Mother Country, that if we are to work out what is in the best interests of the Dominion of Canada this country must remain a part of the British Empire.

I believe I am expressing the sentiments of the people of this country when I say that they are prepared in the future to throw in their lot and stand or fall with the Mother Country. It means a lot more to be a Canadian to-day than it did a year and a half ago, because of the position that Canada has taken in this war. All classes of the country have done their part well.

I want, in conclusion, to place in Hansard a few figures. I find that the male citizens of Canada between the ages of 18 and 45, as shown by the last census returns in each province, and the enlistments up to December 31 from each province, were as follows:

	Eligible 18 to 45.	Enlisted to Dec. 31.	per cent.
Ontario..	565,397	81,752	14
Quebec	380,827	24,257	6
Maritime provinces...	178,497	20,765	11
Manitoba & Saskatchewan. ..	275,577	38,955	13
British Columbia	153,978	21,703	13
Alberta...	120,264	20,136	16
	1,674,540	207,568

In this table it is assumed that all males between the ages mentioned are eligible for military service, which, of course, is an exaggeration, because we have to take into account the foreign element, and the mentally or physically defective. But the figures and the percentages I have given tell their own story. I was very glad, indeed, to hear the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) assure this House, as he did in his speech the other day, that within a very few months, when the people of his province were thoroughly educated as to the needs and requirements of this war, at once there would be a very much larger enlistment from that province than we have had up to the present time. I believe that is correct, and I want to say that we should give very careful consideration, before expressing very strong adverse criticism, of rural conditions, especially rural conditions in the eastern provinces. For instance, in Ontario, and in fact all of the eastern provinces except Quebec, the rural population is very much smaller now than it was ten years ago, and the addition in the province of Quebec is so very slight that we might almost say there has been no gain in the rural parts of that province. The only gains have been in the western provinces. In my own county, for instance, the population in 1911, as shown by the census, was 2,800 less than it was ten years before. There had been a loss in every township in my county, excepting one. To show you how this works out, I know, for instance, of one very small municipality so far as population goes, very rough country, where the land is very much broken. I know that at the present time eighteen men who were born in that municipality are enrolled, not one of whom enlisted from that municipality. They had joined the migration to the West, and every one of those men enlisted from the West. This should be taken into consideration when we are sizing up the matter of enlistment throughout the country. I wish to say this also, in defence of the rural municipalities. In my own province, and I think the same thing will apply also in Quebec and the Maritime Provinces, this migration to the Northwest and to the cities means that, at the present time, the farmers of our rural districts are exceedingly short handed. To take, for instance, the figures showing enlistment from such and such a rural municipality, and to come to the conclusion from those figures that the county or township was not as loyal as it should be, would be to make a very grave error. Again, it is quite true that in the rural districts the people have not the same opportunities of becoming posted regarding the war as the people in the cities and towns, who every day pass to and fro along the streets, read the bulletins, and hear the war discussed. I was glad, therefore to hear the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) say that in the province of Quebec, which, according to the figures available, has not recruited in the same proportion as the other provinces, the heart of the people was with Britain and France in this war. That, I firmly believe, and endorse. I am very glad to concur in his statement that when the people in the outlying districts, who have not the same opportunities of being posted as the people in the cities and towns, become aware of what this war really means to this country, they will flock to the standard just as the men from the cities and towns have done. There is no question, and cannot be any question, as to their bravery. Those who have gone from Quebec have demonstrated their bravery on the battlefields in Flanders just as much as those who have gone from Manitoba, Alberta, Ontario, or any other part of the country. There has been no distinction, there can be no distinction, as regards creed or race, in that respect. We have nothing to be ashamed of in the record which has been made by the men who have gone to the front, no matter what church or race they belong to; as a Canadian, I am proud indeed of that record. I never felt so much right to be proud of being a Canadian as I do to-day.

Now, Sir, I just want to say a word or two regarding the Royal Military College, and I will ask your permission to place on Hansard a list of names without reading it.

Mr. GAUVREAU: Will you allow me a question before you pass from that subject? Will the hon. gentleman send a copy of his speech to the newspapers in Ontario which are all the time attacking the French-Canadians in reference to the war?

Mr. EDWARDS: Do I understand that the hon. gentleman pays me the compliment of thinking that my feeble remarks would have some effect upon those newspapers? If so, and he gives me a list of the newspapers, I will be pleased to send them copies.

Mr. GAUVREAU: You have been fair enough to Quebec.

Mr. EDWARDS: I will also undertake to send copies to the papers in Quebec if he will give me a list of them. I cannot be fairer than that. I have no apologies to make for what I have said; the words I have uttered are my own. Many hon. members in this House may not feel like endorsing what I have said; I cannot help that. They have every right to their views, and I have a right to mine; and so long as I occupy a place in this House or on this terrestrial sphere, I intend to express my own views, and in that respect I do not think I am unlike many other hon. gentlemen in this House.

Last session I put on record a list of the students at the Royal Military College who had enlisted for war service, and I may be excused if I place on Hansard another list, because the Royal Military College happens to be situated in the county of Frontenac, which I represent, though its students are drawn from all parts of the Dominion. I am sure no one will object to my placing such a list on record.

Grand total, 87.

The list I placed on record last year was for 1914; that which I place on record now is for 1915. Colonel C. N. Perreau, the acting Commandant of the college, writes me:

> Every cadet here at present is taking a commission in the near future, so you see the fine spirit is still flourishing as much as ever.

The students of the Royal Military College have brought very great credit to that institution and to all parts of the Dominion, inasmuch as they come from all parts of Canada. In 1914 the number of commissions taken in the Imperial army by the gentlemen cadets of the college was 50; in 1915 it was 22. In the Canadian Permanent Forces 29 commissions were taken in 1914, and 39 in 1915. In the Canadian Overseas contingents, 24 commissions were taken in 1914 and 26 in 1915; or a total in 1914 of 103, and in 1915 of 87; or a grand total of 190. These figures represent the totals for a period of 16 months, and the percentage of cadets taking commissions for that period works out at 98 per cent of those available. I think, Mr. Speaker, that is a record of which this country may well be proud, for I repeat that these students are drawn from every province in the Dominion. They have brought honour to every province, and their record at the front is certainly one of which we may well be proud.

That is all I have to say, Mr. Speaker, in this debate. I am very sorry indeed if any words of mine in regard to the two men to whom I referred have hurt the feelings of any person in this House. If it had not been for the fact that they occupied at one time seats in this House, that they are unquestionably prominent men in the country to-day, and men to whom the right hon. leader of the Opposition gives credit for having at least some influence, or who are trying to exert some influence in their province, I would not have referred to them at all. But I am impressed by the fact that this is a time when every nerve and sinew of the Empire is being strained, when we are up against a crisis which means either liberty or slavery; that this is a testing time for our country, not only for the men who have been recruited from the various parts of the country, but for the men who have been placed by the people in the positions which we occupy to-day. It is our business as public men to draw lessons and inferences from what we see happening around us, so that we can take our stand as public men and express our disapproval of language of an unpatriotic or disloyal character uttered in any part of this country, no matter by whom the words are uttered.

Mr. W. F. CARROLL (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, at this late hour I hope that I shall be very brief in the remarks which I have to offer to the House. My hon. friend from Frontenac has made some very strong statements, with some of which, I must say, I fully agree. The burden of his speech had to do more or less with a certain group in the province of Quebec known as the Nationalist party. We were told by the hon. member that the leaders of that party—Mr. Bourassa and Mr. Lavergne—at one time had seats in this Parliament and were followers of the right hon. gentleman.

who now leads the Opposition in this House. He stopped there, however. He did not tell us where these gentlemen had been located since the summer of 1908, who their leader was, and where they were attempting to carry this country. May I remind the hon. member for Frontenac and this House that, somewhere around 1908, these men transferred partially, if not totally, their allegiance from my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition to the right hon. gentleman who is now the Premier of this country. The first indication I had personally of the transference of that allegiance was during the Drummond-Arthabaska campaign. If evidences are wanting, there are many to be found in the general campaign of 1911, because these two gentlemen went up and down the province of Quebec and supported to the full the right hon. gentleman who now leads the Government and the party who are behind him in this House. May I be permitted to recall something more to the House which the hon. member for Frontenac forgot—I hope not willingly or purposely—that both of these gentlemen have made the boast that when the Prime Minister was forming his Government in 1911 they were offered portfolios in the Cabinet. I have not seen the assertion of either of these gentlemen contradicted, either by the Prime Minister, or by any gentleman authoritatively for him.

Mr. BURNHAM: The Prime Minister contradicted it absolutely.

Mr. LEMIEUX: No, nothing of the kind.

Mr. CARROLL: I want to say that my hon. friend in the corner (Mr. Burnham) is absolutely wrong. He had a splendid opportunity only four or five days ago in this House to contradict that statement, because, the day before he rose in his place to reply to my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition, Mr. Lavergne proclaimed to the province of Quebec, to the Dominion of Canada, to the world, that the Premier of this country had offered him a portfolio.

Mr. ROGERS: I think my hon. friend (Mr. Carroll) is incorrect in his statement. I do not believe that Mr. Lavergne ever made the statement that my hon. friend credits him with.

Mr. CARROLL: There are people in this country who can read and there are people who can understand as well as the Minister of Public Works can. I submit that if Mr. Lavergne was wrong in the statement he made in the Legislature of Quebec, a few days before the Prime Minister made his last announcement in this House, it was the duty of the Prime Minister to contradict that statement.

Mr. BURNHAM: I say that the Prime Minister did contradict it.

Mr. CARROLL: My hon. friend does bob up very often. Where and when did the Prime Minister contradict the statement of Mr. Lavergne?

Mr. BURNHAM: Some months ago.

Mr. CARROLL: Where?

Mr. BURNHAM: It ill-becomes the Prime Minister to run around contradicting all the little brats in the country, but, he has contradicted this.

Mr. CARROLL: Where?

Mr. BURNHAM: In the press.

Mr. CARROLL: In what press?

Mr. BURNHAM: I cannot tell that exactly.

Mr. CARROLL: The hon. gentleman cannot tell me in what paper that has appeared, nor can he tell me when. I read the papers of this country just as intelligently as the hon. member for Peterborough—I admire him in a good many ways and he knows it—and I have yet to see, and I believe there is no man in this House who has seen, where the Premier contradicted that statement. If there was a time, and if there was a place, where the right hon. the Prime Minister should have made that contradiction, it was in his speech on the floor of this House some three or four days ago. I am not finding fault at present in this connection with Mr. Lavergne or Mr. Bourassa although I do not see eye to eye with them. The hon. member for Frontenac has left the House, but I would like to say that there are other things he did not tell us. Does he remember the other evening, when my hon. friend from Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) was making his speech, that he read a resolution which was moved in the provincial Legislature of Quebec a few years ago protesting against Canada taking any part in the Empire's war, and is he aware of the fact that the seconder of that resolution, and a gentleman who made a very strong speech in the legislature in favour of it, now occupies the portfolio in this Cabinet of Minister of Inland Revenue? These are some of the things that the hon. member for Frontenac failed to tell this House in regard to the political history and traditions of Lavergne and Bourassa.

Mr. DEVLIN: Was he called to the Cabinet after he made that speech?

Mr. CARROLL: He was called to the Cabinet a few months ago and this speech was delivered two years ago. It was moved by a gentleman who has since passed away, and seconded by the present Minister of Inland Revenue (Mr. Patenaude). My hon. friend from Frontenac is perfectly right no doubt, in calling upon the powers that be to strip this man, Armand Lavergne, of the King's uniform. I agree with him in that to a certain extent. When we have a man in Canada who will stand up in a public place, especially in one of our legislatures, and say that Canada should not participate in this war, above all wars, and that we have no right or authority to participate in it, and when that man happens to wear the King's uniform, the uniform of a colonel in the Canadian militia, I believe there should be some steps taken to remove his name from the roll of Canadian colonels and also to strip him of his uniform. Who gave Mr. Armand Lavergne the name of colonel? Was it one of those nasty, disreputable, disloyal Liberals? No, Mr. Speaker, I understand that Mr. Armand Lavergne was appointed a colonel in the Canadian militia by the present hon. Minister of Militia (Sir Sam Hughes). I understand that he was offered a command some time ago by the same gentleman. Notwithstanding the fact that Mr. Armand Lavergne has gone up and down this country uttering loud protestations against Canada going into this war, notwithstanding the fact that he has gone up and down the province of Quebec since the year 1909 hurling loud and vicious abuse against British institutions, the Minister of Militia, in this loyal Government, has decorated him as a Canadian colonel and offered him a command to go overseas.

These are some of the things that the hon. member for Frontenac did not tell in connection with the propaganda of these two gentlemen in Quebec. He did not tell us some things that he might have told us. But he tried to insinuate in various ways, although he was rather broadminded in the winding up of his speech, that there were men on this side of the House, including our revered leader, who were not just as loyal to the cause as he considered himself to be and he mentioned some words of our leader in connection with his speech the other day. But is it not one of the ironies of fate that the only persons who hope and believe that this man whom he was speaking about—(Bourassa)—will take a seat in this House in the next Parliament, are the friends of the hon. member for Frontenac. It would seem to me that if there are any adherents of Bourassa and Lavergne in this House, they have seats on the other side.

Many of the followers of Bourassa and Lavergne have been gathered to the bosoms of their fathers, or, should I say, to the bosoms of their friends, and the friends to whose bosoms they have been taken are the friends of the hon. member for Frontenac.

I do not find fault with them for that. I am glad to see them converted, even if it brings them within the Conservative fold. So much for the Nationalists, Bourassa and Lavergne.

I am one of those who believe that the manhood and womanhood of Canada have their hearts in this struggle, hoping and praying for the success of the allied arms. The other day the Postmaster General made a very nice and loyal speech in this House, but it struck me that it contained an apologetic note for the French race in this country. As the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) has said, I believe the heart of Quebec is sound in this cause. I do not make that statement because of anything that has transpired in this war. As a student of Canadian history, I am bound to say that the French people of this country have time and again given every indication, every proof, if proof were needed, that their hearts are British, that they love the British flag, British traditions, British institutions, and the justice they get under the Union Jack. If proof were necessary, I should only have to turn back the pages of history to the American Revolution. In those days a standing offer was made to the French people along the St. Lawrence in the province of Quebec to join the American revolutionists. The French people spurned that offer. They remained true to the British flag, under which they have received more freedom than they could ever get under the flag of old France. If further proof were necessary, I could recall the other wars in which Canada has been engaged. I might refer to the war of 1812. Where, during that war, could you find throughout the length and breadth of Canada men more loyal to the cause of Britain than those French people who inhabited the banks of the St. Lawrence, Quebec. It is unnecessary for me to mention any names or regiments. I am not here championing the cause of Quebec, or apologizing for the French-Canadian people; for they need no apologists.

It is not necessary to prove that they are loyal either to this war or in any other. Their hearts are sound, as are the hearts of all English-speaking Canadians, and they are for the cause of the Allies and will stay with that cause. And people of all creeds, people of all denominations, and of all classes in this country are giving and will give this Government every reason to believe that it will get all the support that is necessary in so far as Canada's participation in this world war is concerned.

I admit freely that this Government is doing well as regards recruiting in this country. They are doing well because the hearts of young and old Canadians are with the Government in sending overseas every available man and every man who will be necessary in order to win this war. Canadians, young and old, are with this Government in voting every cent and every dollar which is necessary for this purpose. While that is a fact, I deem it the duty of this Opposition to find fault with the Government if they think the Government has erred, or made mistakes in judgment, or anything else. I do not believe in abusing, or in criticising from personal motives, any hon. gentleman who occupies a portfolio in this Government, but I do say, in all sincerity, as a man who represents one of the largest constituencies of working men in this country, that it is incumbent on hon. members of this House, whether they sit behind the Premier, or behind the leader of the Opposition, to criticise where criticism is necessary. We are engaged in a world struggle. We are engaged in a war that has caused more devastation in the few months it has been going on than any other war in history. We are engaged in a struggle the end of which no man knows, and in which every available man and every available dollar may have to be used to bring it to a successful completion. That being the case, I say that we should conserve in all possible ways not only the health of the recruits we are sending overseas and those stationed in Canada, but every possible dollar as well; and we should see that every dollar that is voted in this House finds its way into the proper channel. If members of the Opposition have reason to believe that the people's money is being diverted from the proper channels, if they believe that some of the $150,000,000 which this Parliament voted in the last two sessions is not being properly expended, if they believe they have some proof that the Government of this country is placing the expenditure of money in the hands of improper parties, if they believe that this money which was voted for the war is being given to contractors as rewards for political allegiance, then I say it is the duty of this Opposition to criticise and bring this state of affars to the attention of Parliament and the country.

In the course of his speech the other day the Solicitor General dealt somewhat severely with members on this side of the House who dared to rise in their place and say that the Shell Committee in this country had in their opinion done wrong, that certain of its transactions would not stand the light of day, and who demanded an investigation into its dealings. I take it that the Shell Committee spent the money which they had in their hands honestly or dishonestly, whether the money belonged to the Imperial Government or, as was pointed out by the Minister of Finance the other day, to the Government of this country. If the shell Committee spent that money honestly, what fear has this Government of an investigation into the transactions of the Committee? If the Government does not wish the Shell Committee to be investigated, am I to believe that that committee spent the money dishonestly?

Hon. gentlemen opposite have protested loud and long against the charges which have been made against the Shell Committee. If the Government has no connection with the Shell Committee, if the Shell Committee is not responsible to this Government, not being its creature, if the committee was not bound to report to the Minister of Militia holding a portfolio in this Government, why then does the Government attempt to defend them? On the other hand, I think it has been fully demonstrated that the Shell Committee—I am not speaking of the Imperial Munitions Commission which is at present doing business in this country—was appointed by a member of this Government; that three of its members are in the Militia Department and representing that department, and that before the Imperial authorities knew there was such a thing as the Canadian Shell Committee, one of the members of that committee went over to England in order to show to the English people what we were capable of doing in this country. If my hon. friend the Solicitor General is right in his contention that the Shell Committee has done no wrong, it is a fair proposition for the Government to show to Parliament and to the country that this committee is all right. But what are the facts? Hon. gentlemen opposite protest loud and long that the Shell Committee has been honest in its administration of public funds. Last year charges were made by hon. members on this side of the House alleging that there was corruption and jobbery in connection with military purchases in this country. Then we heard protestations of honesty as loud and as long from the hon. gentlemen opposite who were interested, shall I say, in those transactions, as we hear to-day. The Government appointed an investigating committee, and the men who made those charges followed them up in the Public Accounts Committee. I do not want to be personal nor to mention the name of any man who had a seat in this House and who was unfortunate enough not to know to the full what his duties were as a member of this House, but hon. members know the result. Now, to-day is it or is it not the duty of this Government to investigate the charges that have been made? I do not say they are true; but, surely, hon. gentlemen who not only occupy prominent positions in the Liberal party but who have occupied prominent positions in the government of this country, are not going to make charges in Parliament without having some foundation for them, and it is a duty that the Government owe to themselves to grant a commission, and to show either that the Shell Committee has handled its funds properly or that it has not done so, and if the members of that committee have not administered properly the public funds of this country and those of the Imperial authorities that were placed in their hands, then it is the duty of this Government to investigate further and to prosecute them if there was wrong doing—I do not care who the members of the Shell Committee were. I have not the proof that the Shell Committee did wrong nor that there was corruption or jobbery in connection with it, but it strikes me as strangely peculiar that after Mr. Thomas, representing Lloyd George, the Minister of Munitions, had come over to this country and had spent a few weeks here, the members of that committee were removed from office. If they were spending properly the money entrusted to them to spend for England and for Canada, why should they have been removed at that time? I hope, Sir, for the honour of Canada, for the honour of this Parliament, and for the honour of these gentlemen who occupy these positions in the Government of to-day, that an investigation will be granted. If there was no wrong doing, no harm is done; if there was wrong doing, it will be corrected and righted, and the people of this country will see that the public men on both sides of this House are willing to do right and not to shield the wrongdoer, be he Conservative or be he Liberal.

I have said that this Government has done well in the matter of getting our young Canadians to join the standard and to go overseas to fight the battles of the Empire. If we take the words of the hon. Minister of Militia—and he should know—we have enlisted 250,000 men in this country to join the military forces of Great Britain; that 60,000 of those men are in or near the trenches in Flanders; that 60,000 are making preparations in England, and that the balance of 130,000 are in Canada training. A call has gone forth for an additional 250,000 men, making in all 500,000. I believe that our young Canadians will be recruited and that in less than a year that call for 500,000 men will be filled. Credit is due to the Government for having recruited these 250,000 men, and more credit will be given them if they succeed in recruiting the other 250,000 men. Let the Government be sure that they have the fullest co-operation of the Liberal party—at least of Liberals in the portion of the country from which I come, and that is the only part for which I desire to speak—in getting those recruits, as they have had ever since this war began. But while I am willing to make that statement, I am not willing to admit that the ministers of the Crown in this Government have done all that could be done in the matter of giving aid to the Mother Land and our Allies in this life and death struggle in which she is engaged. The hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) the other evening pointed out that all the other overseas dominions, Newfoundland, New Zealand, Australia and South Africa had contributed to the military forces of England not only as many men proportionately as Canada had done, but that they had also contributed thousands upon thousands of their young and best manhood to fill up the gaps in the British navy. My hon. friend the member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) this evening commented on this fact, and by some curious device, by some sort of devilish sophistry, may I say, or by some sort of magnificent logic, came to the conclusion that the fact that this country was not represented by young Canadians in the navy of Great Britain, was to be placed at the door of the Liberal party. Let us follow that up.

This Government had a policy in naval affairs a few years ago. It was a policy of contribution—they proposed to contribute $35,000,000 to build three dreadnoughts for Great Britain. But has any member of the Government or any of its supporters ever said that the Canadian people were to contribute men as well as money to that navy? Such a policy was never enunciated. But the Liberal policy—we need not go into that in detail at this time—was to contribute ships for home defence and to participate in the wars of the Empire when necessary. These were not to be empty ships, but were to be commanded, manned and maintained by young Canadians. What has the Government done to contribute to the naval defence of Canada since this war began? Much was said a few years ago about the Niobe and the Rainbow; they were described as a "tinpot navy" by hon. gentlemen of Conservative persuasion. There was on the statute book of this country an Act known as a Naval Service Act, commonly known as the Laurier Navy Act. That Act, contrary to the views expressed by hon. gentleman opposite and contrary to the policy propounded by this Government, is still on the statute book and is still in full force and effect. Under that Act we had when the war broke out, and had had for some time previously, two war ships, one on the Pacific and one on the Atlantic. Those ships were allowed to go into disuse and disrepair. But immediately on the outbreak of the war the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Hazen) undertook to put these ships into commission, and we had it from him last session, that these ships, the Rainbow and the Niobe, were doing splendid work in coastal defence and in the transportation of soldiers and supplies. I would like to ask the Minister of the Naval Service (Mr. Hazen), if he was right last year in so expressing his opinion of the Niobe and the Rainbow, why it is that the Niobe is dismantled and lying idle to-day in Halifax harbour? Why has not the minister sent out a call to the men of our seacoasts to fill up the gaps that have been caused in the British navy? I think the answer is that members of the Cabinet and their supporters told us a few years ago in this House that we could not get any such recruits in this country, and they do not want to be given the lie. Because we can get such recruits in this country if we call for them. We can certainly get as many in Nova Scotia as were contributed by the little colony of Newfoundland; we can get as many on the Pacific coast as were contributed by Cape Colony in South Africa. But it was not the policy of these hon. gentlemen opposite, and they do not want it to be thought that they knew nothing of the temper of the people in Canada who go down to the sea in ships, whether for fishing or for other purposes, on the Atlantic seaboard or on the Pacific coast. Much discredit, I am sorry to say, might be thrown upon the hon. gentleman who has charge of naval affairs, but I am not going into that just now. In our part of the country the state of affairs is rather too disgraceful to be dwelt upon in this House. But when the Minister of the Naval Service brings down his estimates we shall have something to say with regard to the vessels he sent out from certain ports in Nova Scotia to do patrol service along our coast—motor boats from ten to fifteen feet long sent down to the island of Newfoundland at a cost to this country of some $75 a day, to scare off German invaders who might come across in their armoured ships or submarines. For the present, we will let that matter rest.

The Minister of Militia and Defence (Sir Sam Hughes) yesterday tried to make this House believe that his department was absolutely divorced, since the war began, from any political affiliation and would so remain during the war. Perhaps the hon. minister does not know all that is going on in his own department. He may be able, I will not say to mislead the House, but to make the House believe this, but he is certainly not going to make the people in the county and province from which I come believe it, for they have too much evidence to the contrary. I will submit that perhaps most of the plums in this crisis—if there are plums to give—under our system of Government would naturally go to the friends of the party in power—

Mr. BURNHAM: Not during war time.

Mr. CARROLL: —that is, when conditions are equal and the applicants on either side of politics are equally qualified to fill the positions—perhaps that will suit my hon. friend (Mr. Burnham). But when the Minister of Militia says that there are no politics in the Department of Militia, I believe that every person in the province of Nova Scotia who reads that statement, both his own political friends and those who are not his political friends, will blush for very shame. They will smile at the ignorance—if I may be permitted that word —of the Minister of Militia in connection with the doings in his department. I do not say there were not some eminent acts of independence by the Minister of Militia. I do not say that some Grits did not find their way into commissions and into fairly good positions in the Militia; but what I do say that in the county from which I come the Militia Department is being used by the Conservative party as an addition to the party, as a caucus room, and that wherever recruiting stations are held in the county of Cape Breton there appears the agent of the Conservative candidate in that county. There was a time— I am glad to say it has gone by now—when recruits were not accepted in that county until they had received the imprimatur of certain Conservative politicians in that county.

Mr. ROGERS: Give us some names.

Mr. CARROLL: Yes, I shall give names. The Minister of Public Works is strong on names, I shall give him names. Mr. Speaker, there is in our town a gentleman named Wm. McKinley. The very first man who enlisted from that county, and who is now in the trenches in Flanders, and has been since the first Canadian expeditionary force went overseas, was the only son of this gentleman, Wm. McKinley. There is in the town of Glace Bay what is known as the Marconi tower. Around that tower, since the outbreak of war there have been congregated 120 or 150 of Canada's militia. This man, Wm. McKinley, had a contract for supplying the Canadian militia at Marconi tower in Glace Bay with certain refreshments, mineral waters, tobacco, cigars and cigarettes. For some time he supplied these as cheaply as any other man in the town of Glace Bay could. You will be surprised to know that within a few weeks the captain in charge at Marconi tower was approached by a gentleman who holds a lucrative position in the Customs Department at Glace Bay, and told that if he did not cease to purchase from Wm. McKinley he would hear more about it; with the result that Mr. Wm. McKinley, whose only son is fighting and has been fighting in the trenches of Flanders ever since the first Canadian expeditionary force went across, was deprived of that simple, small way of helping to earn a livelihood. Does the minister want some more names?

Mr. ROGERS: You have not answered me at all yet. My hon. friend perhaps misunderstood what he said himself. He said that applicants would not be accepted unless they were Conservatives.

Mr. CARROLL: If there is any way of misunderstanding, you would misunderstand.

Mr. ROGERS: The hon. member made a statement and said he would prove it.

Mr. CARROLL: Yes, I have made a statement,and I can prove it to the full.

Mr. ROGERS: Give us some names?

Mr. CARROLL: If my hon. friend wishes names I will give them to him but I will not give them to him here.

Mr. DAVIDSON: I would like to get them now.

Mr. CARROLL: You will not. I may reply as the Minister of Militia replied to a question I asked yesterday. I asked for the regiment from Nova Scotia which was captained and officered wholly by Liberals. He said: I will give them personally, but they are not the same regiment to which my hon. friend belongs. I will make the same answer to my hon. friend from Annapolis (Mr. Davidson).

In the town of Louisburg there is also a Marconi cable station, and around this station there are 100 or 150 soldiers. That town is some 14 miles from Glace bay. It happens that the only men engaged in the meat business in Lewisburg are Liberals, Peters Bros., I think the name is. They wanted to sell meat to the soldiers but they could not sell to the militia because they were Liberals; and all the meat eaten by the Canadian militia at Louisburg is carried all the way from Glace bay, some 14 miles distant, and the contract was not obtained by tender. In every little house that was made for the accommodation of the soldiers in the town of Glace bay and the surrounding districts there was not a nail driven, not a door put up, by any man who was ever suspected of voting Liberal. Yet the Minister of Militia tells me there is no politics in his department! Perhaps the minister does not know it. I take this opportunity of bringing it to his attention and telling him that it is time he did know it and that it is time this sort of thing was remedied. I believe that the Minister of Militia would remedy it, and that he is the kind of man who would abolish such methods if he knew the facts of the case.

Mr. DAVIDSON: Is my hon. friend not aware that the contract for supplying the troops quartered in Sydney was awarded to a very staunch Liberal, and that all supplies of food, meat, etc., are supplied by that Liberal contractor?

Mr. CARROLL: I do not know that such is the fact; I do know that the very contrary is the fact.

Mr. DAVIDSON: I can assure him that it is a fact and I can give the name.

Mr. CARROLL: The hon. member does not know as much about Sydney as I do, and I want to assure him that that is not the case in Sydney or elsewhere in the riding of South Cape Breton.

I believe that those things should be remedied. I bring to the attention of the Minister of Militia also the case of a young man who has been a lieutenant in our county in the Canadian militia for some nine years. When war broke out he wanted to enlist, and desired, of course, to keep the rank to which he was entitled. Notwithstanding the fact that since the war broke out until, I think, October, at least fifty men from Cape Breton were given commissions (men who had never carried a gun or donned the uniform of a Canadian militia man), after having taken some course in Halifax, and perhaps they are good men, but this young man was unable to obtain a commission. Why? I do not know of any other reason except that he would not bow down to the Conservative nabob in politics in Glace Bay and go and make his application through him. Hundreds of such cases exist, but I hope the time has come when the Militia Department will do away with this method of doing business and use better judgment and tactics.

There will come a time when the present European conflict will be declared ended. There will come a time when this war of blood and murder will be followed by a treaty of peace, which we all hope will be as enduring as any human institution is enduring, and our loftiest hope and highest ambition is that the end will be satisfactory to the Allies, and in accordance with the principles for which we battle. But this will be followed by another war, not of blood, not of murder, but a war of commerce, a war to capture some, at least, of the business of the countries against which we are fighting, a war for commercial supremacy. Business will be diverted to new channels, the fields of trade which Germany and her allies have been exploiting will be opened to the allied countries. What preparation is Canada making, what is the Canadian Ministry doing, in order to capture some of this business? It is true that the time of many of the hon. gentlemen who occupy cabinet positions is taken up by the war, but surely the Minister of Labour, for example, who tells us, through the medium of his paper, that there is nothing to do in his department, that there are practically no strikes to settle, and no labour difficulties, can give some little time to a question of this kind. This trade will not be captured by the Government putting up high tariff walls around Canada north, south, east and west. I believe it will be captured by the country whose resources are best fitted for the work, by the people whose technical training has not been overlooked in this time of stress. In the past German supremacy in certain trades, and in the manufacture of certain goods was due to the fact that the national revenues had been abundantly used in the establishment and maintenance of technical institutes, trade schools, and other institutions whose chief object was to keep the national industries supplied with an army of skilled artisans. Other countries did the same to a lesser extent; England did the same, and so did the United States and Switzerland.

Some years ago there was appointed in this country a commission to investigate technical education. This commission did splendid work, they investigated the conditions, not only in this country, but in the United States and Europe as well. Some two years ago they made a very voluminous report recommending certain things. For one thing they recommended that this Government and this Parliament should spend some three or four million dollars annually in assisting technical education in this country. During the session of 1914, in answer to the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. E. M. Macdonald) the Minister of Labour said in connection with what the Government intended to do with that report:

> The Government while having given the matter some consideration have not reached a conclusion as to what course we shall take and will not be in a position to reach such a conclusion until we have heard from all the local governments in Canada.

That was in 1914. In 1915, on page 494 of Hansard, I asked a question about technical education. The answer of the Minister of Labour was:

When the skies are clear we can make satisfactory arrangements with the provincial governments to render material assistance in respect to technical education.

I say, Mr. Speaker, that when the skies are clear, it may be too late in this country to give the required assistance to technical education. When the skies are dark is the time to prepare, and if we wish to capture some of the trade which comes from the hands of expert artisans and labourers, it is absolutely necessary that this Government should at the very earliest possible moment take up the question of technical education and contribute towards the training of expert artisans in the various provinces.

Last year my hon. friend the Minister of Labour replied to a question concerning the jurisdiction of this Parliament in that matter. I do not see how the question of jurisdiction affects the matter at all. The Provincial Legislatures have, of course, control of education in the various provinces, but let me point out that they also have control of agriculture. Two years ago this Government granted a sum of $10,000,000 to be spent in encouraging agriculture in the various provinces, and if they had jurisdiction to do that—and I think they had; there is no doubt about the matter—if they had jurisdiction to contribute that sum of $10,000,000 to be used in agricultural colleges and schools, which are maintained out of the provincial revenues, they have the same authority to contribute to technical colleges in the various provinces. I bring this matter in all seriousness to the attention of the Government. They may tell us that our revenue is not very buoyant owing to the war, that they have not very much money to spare because we are giving millions of dollars to the cause of the Empire. May I point out, however, that of the $150,000,000 that have been voted for the cause of the Empire, not one dollar comes from the ordinary revenues of the country. Surely, therefore, the Government must be in a position, and is in a position now, to give the required assistance to technical education.

Then there is the question of the report of the commission—I think it was also a creature of the Minister of Labour—which was appointed some three years ago, I think, or two years ago at least, to investigate the high cost of living in this country. Last year I asked the Minister of Labour:

Has the Commission on the High Cost of Living made a report?

Before giving the minister's answer I wish to say that the stress and strain and hunger which prevail to-day in Canada, owing to the high cost of living, are more severe than they have ever been since the war began, and if ever there was a time in the history of this country when the Government, or somebody else, should investigate and try to ameliorate the conditions of the labour people, as regards the high cost of living, it is to-day. What did the minister say? He said:

They promised me a couple of weeks ago that their report would be ready before the end of the month, I think it is about ready now, and I think my hon. friend and other hon. gentlemen will find it a very able report, and a very satisfactory one, especially the work in connection with it, which was done in my department, and of which I am very proud.

That was over a year ago, and would it surprise the House to know that that report has not yet come down, that it is not even ready, notwithstanding the fact that if there is any department of this Government whose time is not occupied by the duties of this war it is the Department of Labour, controlled by the Minister of Play. Last year, when the people of British Columbia were shivering with fright at the possibility of German warships approaching the coast, our Minister of Naval Affairs and his department were concerned in issuing a pamphlet to the people of this country showing them how to cook fish properly. Perhaps the Minister of Labour and his department have been busy for the past year or so, trying to prove to the people of Canada that three of the fish which the Naval Department taught us to cook properly would be sufficient to feed forty people. I do not see what else they could have been doing during that time. I think it is time that the Minister of Labour should exert himself and do something in regard to the matter of technical education, and also in regard to the report on the high cost of living, which he promised a year ago.

Now, Sir, the hour is getting late, and in conclusion I wish to say that while there are some pessimists in this country, as there are in England, who believe that the war is not being properly carried on; while there are some pessimists in this country who are afraid of every little obstacle that comes in the way of our armies, and think that they mean disaster and obliteration, I believe that the grand old Union Jack, which has floated over this country for well nigh two centuries, the flag which has "braved a thousand years the battle and the breeze," will continue when the final issue has been settled in this war to wave over not only this country, but a larger Empire for a thousand more years to come.

On motion of Mr. Burnham, the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Rogers, the House adjourned at 11.35 p.m.

Friday, January 28, 1916.

The House met at Three o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

THE GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH.

ADDRESS IN REPLY.

Consideration of the motion of Mr. Alfred Thompson for an address to His Royal Highness the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, resumed from Thursday, January 27.

Mr. J. H. BURNHAM (East Peterborough): Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to detain the House farther than to make a protest in the name of the young men of the country, and, if I may so presume, of the people generally, against the conduct of the members of this House who are endeavouring to stir up party acerbity, party hatred, and all the contemptible politics which attach themselves to the prejudices of party politicians, especially at this time. I am shocked, Mr. Speaker, indeed, I am terrified, to find this House being turned into a political shambles. I do not purpose to excite further controversy by saying which side is to blame; I leave it to an impartial public to judge when they have understood thoroughly how this debate was begun, and how it has been carried on. Some time ago I noticed that there was gradually arising in the party press a feeling of disturbance which boded no good to this young country at this crisis in this historic struggle. For a time such papers as the Globe maintained their mental equilibrium. They protested against the idea of an election, and everybody that I know joined them in the hue and cry to stop those people who would sacrifice the well-being of the country for the spoils of office, or even the remote prospect of them.

Now, however, I find the scene is transformed. I came to this House filled with the ardour of the men from the country who have been working with their political foes, shoulder to shoulder, in a united spirit, harmonious, strong. We had forgotten the question of politics; we were not thinking of politics; we were thinking of conquering the Germans, of standing true to Canada and to Canadian manhood now sacrificing itself so nobly in the trenches. We find the women of Canada working might and main. They have dropped their tea-tattle gossip for a time; they have ceased to transport even with the charm of dress; they have got down, if I may use the phrase, to their knitting, and are working hard, night and day, for the purpose of providing comforts for the men at the front. Speaking more particularaly for my own constituents and the district I represent, I was amazed, charmed, delighted and elevated in spirit by the unanimity of feeling and of thought prevalent in that district. I was more than charmed to find, not that it was rent in twain, not that it was being disturbed, not that it was being poisoned, but that it was growing in strength and beauty from day to day. I had to come to Ottawa to learn that the whole business was a fraud. I had to come to this House to find that the poison which would destroy the life of this country was being distilled in this very Chamber. I turned in amazement to look at the record, and I found the noble words of the right hon. the leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), which should have given the keynote to the whole discussion and the future conduct of the members of this House. In that short war session which followed the declaration of hostilities he said:

> This session has been called for the purpose of giving the authority of Parliament and the sanction of law to such measures as have already been taken by the Government, and any further measures that may be needed, to insure the defence of Canada and to give what aid may be in our power to the Mother Country in the stupendous struggle which now confronts her. Speaking for those who sit around me, speaking for the wide constituencies which we represent in this House, I hasten to say that to all these measures we are prepared to give immediate assent. If in what has been done or in what remains to be done there may be anything which in our judgment should not be done, or should be differently done, we raise no question, we take no exception, we offer no criticism, and we shall offer no criticism so long as there is danger at the front.

That statement thrilled Canada. It also assured to the Government the steady and honest support, as one might reasonably suppose, of the Opposition. But whatever has got into them I am sure I do not know. It seems all to have turned to poison, and now even the journals at large are attacking the individual members of this House. Even the hon. member for South Renfrew (Mr. Graham), a man who, I believe, devotes himself heart and soul with a single mind to the advancement of this country, is treated like a common felon. On February 8, 1915, we find in Hansard these remarakable words of the right hon. the leader of the Opposition:

> Let me say at once that we who sit on this side of the House, and who represent His Majesty's loyal Opposition, took our course at the outset of hostilities when we declared that we would support the Government in their war policy.

Then, a little farther on:

> But whilst we are prepared to believe, as indeed we do believe, that mistakes have been made in the manner in which the money has been expended, that errors of judgment have been committed, of those mistakes and of those errors of judgment we are not disposed to be critical.
> It would be hardly possible to expect that in the case of the expenditures of some fifty million dollars no mistakes would arise; it is perhaps more than we can expect from human nature; but we cannot close our eyes to the fact that not only have mistakes been made, but frauds have been committed which have resulted in injury to the health of our troops, and impairment of their efficiency. These frauds have been regarded as so gross and so criminal that the Minister of Militia himself, not more than two or three weeks ago, stated, not once but three or four times at different places in the country, that if he knew the man who supplied the boots, which have been the cause of so much disease, and sickness, and suffering to our soldiers on the Plains of Salisbury, that man would deserve to be shot. The honour of the minister is at stake, and so is the credit of the country. It is not impossible to discover the responsible parties. Up to the present the minister is responsible, and it is for him to take the necessary measures to vindicate himself. We have been told that a commission of three members has been appointed by the Government to investigate this particular matter, and not later than ten or twelve days ago it was stated that the minister himself, not satisfied with this inquiry, had instituted a departmental investigation to ascertain the true facts. I do not know if this is all that is intended to be done by the Government; but let me say that the fullest light should be thrown upon this matter, so that the people of Canada may know where the responsibility lies. No member on this side of the House intends to be critical, and for my part I certainly have no such intention; but assuredly we are all gravely concerned that the health and comfort of those brave men who are risking their lives in the cause of the Empire shall have every protection that we can afford.

We have there the very best keynote to the proper conduct of an Opposition, or, indeed, to the conduct of the people of this country in general. But we have witnessed, during this past week, an extraordinary transformation. The hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley), skilful and serene as he is, has not hesitated to lay a train that would destroy the Government by a terrible explosion if he could so arrange it. He has been followed by the hon. member for Carleton, N.B. (Mr. Carvell), who in turn has marshalled all the vitriolic sarcasm and invective he could possibly think of, and has blown it, like the German gas, at the Government side, in order, if possible, to asphyxiate them before they could arise in in their own defence. Then, we have a Daniel come to judgment in the person of the hon. member for North Cape Breton (Mr. McKenzie), who, with all due respect, Sir, did himself little credit in an hour's speech that really would not have done credit to a child in the nursery. I listened patiently for one solitary noble thought, and really it was an extraordinary performance when you think of it. He said:

> I realize that in rising in my turn to address the House I am taking a great responsibility, although that responsibility may not be of my seeking.

Who, then, is responsible? Certainly he did not sound as if he were at all responsible. But when I quote his words I ask: Who, then, is to be considered responsible? The leader of the Opposition had turned in his seat and was listening to him and looking at him with amazement. Nevertheless, the hon. gentleman contrived to say things that in no way could be considered as decent, let alone conciliatory.

> But I do charge,—

he says,

> —in the presence of the Prime Minister, who is a Nova Scotian of whom we are proud, that in the county of Halifax, where I hold him responsible for the patronage, the vilest sort of partisans are put at the head of battalions, in the highest positions that they can be given.

No proof is offered, and what time, pray, is this for proof? Is this not a debate on the Address in reply to the gracious speech from the Throne? Every suggestion is connected with an investigation. Who has denied that there may be an investigation? Who has pretended that he will set aside the rules of the House and that whatever may be done, or may have been done, shall not be referred to the committees that are constituted for the purpose of investigating? Nobody. Not a single soul has said: If there are frauds or shortcomings, if there has been misspent money, the thing shall not be investigated. That is not denied at all. No one pretends for a moment that these things will not be investigated. The cold fact is that for some reason, that used to be occult but that is no longer so, the Opposition are bound to get this stuff before the country. What their purpose is the country is beginning to divine; and the Lord help them when the country gets hold of them! Then this Daniel come to judgment says further on:

But the government of which he is a member,—

He refers to my hon. friend the Minister of Militia and Defence (Sir Sam Hughes), a man who surely has borne the burden and heat of the day, a man who has been able to gather together nearly 250,000 Canadians who hardly knew the meaning of war before, who has despatched them to the front, who has provided them with such materials of war that, come what may, bad as some of it may have been, they nevertheless have been able with it to do themselves and the Empire the greatest possible credit. Is there, in these speeches, one word of commendation from beginning to end? None. These gentlemen are not large-hearted enough to give a member of the Government credit for one single good act. Are we to understand that all that has been done is as nothing, and that some little trifling charge, which may or may not be true, and which yet, in the words of the leader of the Opposition, may, in the weakness of human nature, be to some extent true, is to be a ground for condemnation? Is it possible that the Minister of Militia and Defence, that the Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White), that the balance-wheel of this Dominion, the right hon. Prime Minister himself (Sir Robert Borden) are not to be given any credit whatever? It seems almost as if jealousy, envy, hatred, and all uncharitableness have taken possession of the back benches of the Opposition to the exclusion of the last ray of common sense or pity. You will not find throughout the country any such spirit. Why, then, pray, should it be found here? I am terrified that the people in the constituencies, thinking that some colossal crime has been committed by the Government, may turn their attention, not to the things of war, to which they are devoting their thoughts at the present time, but against each other, and that Canada will be irretrievably ruined. If this ruin should befall her, who is there who will deny that the cause will lie at the door of a recreant Opposition?

But the Government of which he is a member,— says the hon. member for North Cape Breton, referring to the Minister of Militia—himself and the whole outfit,—

That is a patriotic reference, surely!

—if I may use the expression, will learn, not many days hence, that there is a people in this country and that it is the people that speak.

Why these promiscuous and repeated threats of an appeal to the people? For what purpose are we to be threatened with an election in the very midst of a war which gives no sign of a settlement, and which will strain our resources and energies to their utmost? This conduct is without parallel on this earth. In no other country will you meet people so utterly devoid of patriotism as to seek to make political party capital at the expense of the good name of their country. A little further on this gentleman says:

I said, Mr. Speaker, that I was going to put to you, in the form of a few questions, certain propositions that came before the Minister of Militia and Defence in regard to the running of his department. After he had received the warning which I read a moment ago he was asked by his party heelers: "Can we send the soldiers to the trenches with improperly made shoes, practically with paper shoes, and with bare feet?" The answer was: "So far as the department is concerned, yes if you can make money out of it, and can conceal it, I have no objection."

What could have induced any respectable man to utter such a sentiment as that in this House of Commons of Canada, where he is supposed to represent a portion of the people? Throughout what may, perhaps, in a spirit of extravagance, be dignified as that speech, we find the same thing from beginning to end. Not a word of commendation or a word of credit, but everything that is calculated to infuriate the Government side of the House and have the effect, if possible, of turning this House into a seething cauldron of riot and discontent, to be paralleled possibly only by the naval debate of a few years ago, when the people at large got the idea that we had suddenly turned this House into a raving lunatic asylum.

I wish to warn these gentlemen. The Grain Growers' Guide says:

> There are too many men in the front rank of the Liberal party of Canada to-day who have absolutely no conception of the true principles of liberalism and democracy.

For once I agree with a western man. Again, I find in glaring type on the front page of the Citizen this morning, "Election talk being revived." My heart sinks within me.

Mr. TURRIFF: I do not wonder.

Mr. BURNHAM: Of course, you do not wonder, being like-minded with the rest. There is nothing surprising to hon. gentlemen opposite in the fact of election talk being revived, for they all expected it; but it is a surprise to the Government side of the House, and it certainly is to me. It is most deplorable. If there is one thing likely to minimize the value of our energies at this time in the carrying on of the war, it is the reviving of election talk. In the Free Press the other day I saw another complimentary reference to the Conservative party. It said, speaking of the caucus:

> The consensus of opinion on this point was that, while it might not look well to refuse an investigation, still if an investigation were allowed by the Committee on Public Accounts there might be disclosures which would be even more injurious to the interest of the Government.

There is your malicious innuendo. There is a lie in cold type. No one of us ever said or thought of any such thing. The truer spirit, to be found in the better part of the Opposition, is contained in the speech of the hon. member for South Cape Breton (Mr. Carroll) last night. He was trying to work himself up into a becoming fury, but he could not do it. His heart is too honest to vibrate responsively to any such appeal as is being made. He said:

> Now, to-day is it or is it not the duty of this Government to investigate the charges that have been made? I do not say they are true.

All the diatribes of the gentlemen about him had failed to convince him that there was a particle of truth in these charges, and I am sure I do not wonder at that. Further on he says:

> I hope, Sir, for the honour of Canada, for the honour of this Parliament, and for the honour of these gentlemen who occupy these positions in the Government of to-day, that an investigation will be granted. If there was no wrong-doing, no harm is done; if there was wrong-doing, it will be corrected and righted, and the people of this country will see that the public men on both sides of this House are willing to do right and not shield the wrong-doer, be he Conservative or be he Liberal.

Are we to understand that on such a flimsy excuse as this hon. gentlemen would hurry us in Canada to the brink of civil war? Would any man with a clear sense of duty presume to say that he was not committing a crime, let alone a wrong, in seeking to inflame the members of this House and the peole of this country? Whether there is anything in these charges or not, hon. gentlemen opposite want the Government to promise that the charges will be investigated before the extension measures come up. It is hardly likely that the Government will do such a thing as that, because if the life of Parliament is not extended they could not carry out such a promise; but if the term is extended they can and must, and certainly will do it. It is therefore the duty of the hon. gentlemen opposite to vote for the extension measure first, and after that will come the realization of their hopes. For my part I would be quite content to allow a few choice spirits of the Opposition to remain here for the rest of the year if they want to, taking note of all the graft, of which I regret to say my countrymen are sometimes capable. Let us agree on some margin of depravity. Let the margin be whatever you like, as the leader of the Opposition has said, but for God's sake let us set our faces towards the rising sun some time, and let us not always be turning our backs on every bright prospect, in order to glory in the ruin and depravity of our country. It is not that spirit which actuated the men who went to the front. They went there trusting we were fair and square and honourable men, who might be left to garrison this country and look after the base of supplies. They had no idea that the little game of politics was being played, and that on the very first measure, so to speak, brought before the House, there would be a prolonged debate of the most acrimonious kind. Why do not hon. gentlemen opposite say, in the words of their leader, that whatever faults or frauds may be committed they will suspend judgment till the proper time. Now is not the proper time to fight this matter out. Why do gentlemen opposite not lend us a hand? I do not say that the Government is infallible: they may have made mistakes: but I have yet to find any minister condoning in the slightest degree fraud or anything of that kind, or refusing to give any official record and every explanation of any record asked for. I believe in my heart that this Government is absolutely honest. I am not prepared to say why, because I do not care to dig into the motives of any man. But, whether it be from a natural impulse or from necessity, I believe that it is absolutely honest and that everything done on its part has been correct. What representative of a constituency will say that he has not had some narrow escapes from even the rascals in his own party? What representative of a constituency can say that some of the things he has had to do or to leave undone might possibly require invidious explanations, if not worse, were it not for the fact that it is not within the power of men sometimes, limited as they are by the usages, the regulations, the customs of Parliament and parliamentary procedure, to rectify those wrongs? They have to grin and bear in silence, and thank fortune that they are not successfully pilloried in the outcome. But no margin or allowance is made for all that. Condemn "the whole outfit." A man who at one time I understood occupied a position on the bench of this country condemns this Government at the very height of this crisis as an "outfit," and he is not ashamed to use the word.

I want to warn hon. gentlemen against the very serious damage which they are doing to recruiting. When men go out and speak heart to heart with their countrymen upon the necessity of going to war, when they may be met by the statement: "You are a lot of political sinners; you are a lot of political rascals; the Opposition at Ottawa say so"—what hope is there for that union in which is strength? What hope is there for the carrying out of the magnificent scheme conceived and managed by the Minister of Militia? There is a danger in all this that is so imminent and so great that sometimes I feel as if it would be impossible for me to describe it. There is not this danger in Great Britain or in Australasia. The people of Australasia are bearing their burdens and some grievous disappointments with a dignity and a patience which do them so much honour that not only do we admire, but we wonder; and when we turn our gaze back upon Canada and find that we are at the mercy of a lot of political tricksters bawling for an election, really it makes my heart sick. The impression of all this upon recruiting will be bad; throwing the apple of discord amongst the people of Canada will be worse; but the impression made upon our enemies will be a thousand times more detrimental to us. Instead of a united and cheering House of Commons, ignoring the shortcomings, the depravities, if you like, of the members of the Government, we have men sulking in their tents who cannot find it in their hearts to force their tongues to utter one syllable of commendation. A boast was once made of a truce. Why, the truce has been torn to pieces long since. It was evidently initiated and concocted only as a pretense, and it has barely served that purpose. It has long since been thrown to one side. Has a member of the Opposition uttered the word "truce" this session? Not one. Truculent they are, but as for a truce, hon. gentlemen opposite do not want one.

The other evening, in listening to some of the remarks of hon. gentlemen opposite, which made me for a time low-spirited at the prospect before me of a disunited and a frenzied Canada, I thought, "can there be something else that is disturbing these gentlemen? Is it that the prohibition resolution is bothering them and they want to get to the country to avoid it for fear they may lose Quebec and irritate Ontario? And yet I said to myself, cold water could not have that effect. Possibly there may be prospects in that regard." But I will not transgress; I will stick rigidly to my text; I will not throw one particle of suspicion on the Opposition; I will not insinuate nor use innuendoes; if I have anything to say about the Opposition I will say it as straight and as clear as I know how. Hon. gentlemen opposite cannot accuse me of doing otherwise. Last night the debate, if it may be so designated, ran into all sorts of channels, into the little byways, the eddies, up the little streamlets and into the foul waters. Amongst other things, the Prime Minister was charged with having agreed to give Mr. Armand Lavergne and Mr. Bourassa positions in the cabinet. These gentlemen opposite have pointed with pride, and reasonably so, to the success of the right hon. the leader of the Opposition in harmonizing the discordant elements in Canada. Why should no credit be given to the present Prime Minister of Canada for gathering in Jew and Gentile, bond and free, Nationalist and Liberal, and anything else, and blending them into one harmonious whole? We read in the Scriptures that the stone that was once rejected has become the very greatest in the building. Repentance never should convict. There is no Nationalist in the Conservative party. If any man was a Nationalist at any time before he entered the Conservative party, when he entered that Conservative door he left all Nationalism behind him. There is not one of them who does not deny that he is a Nationalist; they all say that they are Conservatives. Then I say: give the Prime Minister that which is his due, which you would certainly ascribe to the right hon. leader of the Opposition; give him credit that he has, with an iron hand, with a strong, firm grasp, with a dignity and a gentleness which blend so well, taken the erratic elements of our population and spanked them properly into line, put them where they belong, and where they are turning out to be some of our best citizens. When we have had another term of office, possibly there will not be a single Nationalist left in Quebec. Even the wildest and most disloyal of them will find that in the Conservative party there is not only strength and reason, but that patriotism which is an unction and a holy oil to all reasonable souls.

On December 4, 1912, in the session of 1912-13, the following question was put by Mr. Lemieux and answered by the Prime Minister:

Mr. Lemieux: 1. Is the right hon. the Prime Minister aware of the statement made by Mr. Armand Lavergne, ex-M.P., at a meeting held in the county of Quebec on the 1st of November ult., and reported as follows in the Montreal Star of November 2, 1912:

"Then Mr. Lavergne proceeded with his version of how the French-Canadian members of the Cabinet had been selected by the new Premier after his victory of last fall.

"The first names proposed," Mr. Lavergne said, "were those of Messrs. Monk, Tellier and myself. I declined this offer of a portfolio in the Cabinet, and at Mr. Pelletier's request, I did my best to make Mr. Monk accept him in my place. He objected at first. Mr. Forget at the same time was working in favour of Mr. T. Chase Casgrain, but I refused to agree to that choice.

"It seemed understood then with the Premier and Mr. Monk that Mr. Pelletier would be the Quebec representative in the Cabinet. Later I learned that Mr. Borden's intentions were to have only two French-Canadian ministers in his Government, and it was at this juncture that I went to Montreal on a special train, paid for by Mr. Cahan, to impress Mr. Borden with the necessity of following the tradition, giving three Franch-Canadian representatives in the federal Cabinet, which point we finally gained."

2. Is the above statement true?

Mr. Borden:

1. No.

On the same day the following question was put and answered by the Prime Minister, as reported at page 589 of Hansard of 1912:

Mr. Lemieux:

1. Is the right hon. the Prime Minister aware of a statement by Mr. Armand Lavergne, ex-M.P., at a meeting held in the county of Quebec of the 1st of November ult., and reported as follows in the Montreal Star of November 2, 1912:

"Mr. Lavergne made the affirmation that before entering the Conservative government Mr. Monk had received the assurance from Mr. Borden that a plebiscite would be taken before any kind of contribution to the British navy should be decided upon. The Prime Minister also promised his colleague that the Government would do something, Mr. Lavergne did not say what, for the Catholics of Manitoba and Keewatin. It was because Mr. Borden failed to carry out these pledges that the Hon. Mr. Monk sent him his resignation."

2. Is the above statement true?

Mr. Borden: No.

I trust, therefore, that those who created the little scene last night, trying at a late hour—it was half-past eleven—to cast on the Prime Minister in his absence the odium of having given way to Bourassa and Lavergne, will now repent it and acknowledge that when I said these statements had been contradicted by the Prime Minister, I was right.

Other questions were asked in connection with this matter and were answered, but it is unnecessary to go over these also; I have given only those that arose in the debate. I saw in the newspapers a short time ago what was, possibly, a reprint of these things, though I took it to be a report of an interview with the Prime Minister. But it is unnecessary to quote that; the questions and answers quoted from Hansard are sufficient. And I am glad indeed—if there is still anybody who doubts the stand taken by the Prime Minister—that this question has arisen, because the matter is so easily, so completely and, I may say so, opportunely, settled.

In conclusion, let me once more appeal to these gentlemen. If this agitation is for an election, say so and in God's name let us go to it and work it out before the country is ruined; if it is not for an election, drop it, and let us do what we can for the men at the front.

Mr. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Kamouraska): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend from West Peterborough (Mr. Burnham) opened his address with very strong words, but those words were fully justified by the speech of the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) last night. I have no fault to find with the tone of the remarks of my hon. friend from West Peterborough. Strong as those remarks were at times, they were certainly a great improvement on those of the hon. member for Frontenac. I hope to refer in a later part of my address to some statements which the hon. member for West Peterborough has made.

I do not think I should have taken part in this debate, had it not been for one or two remarks made by my hon. friend the Postmaster General (Mr. Casgrain) in the very able speech he delivered in this House on the 18th January. Some parts of that speech ought not to be left unanswered, and this duty is made still more imperative by editorials which have been published in the leading Conservative organ of the city and district of Quebec which is supposed to reflect the ideas and opinions of the Postmaster General. Those editorials threaten the members of this House and the electors of Canada with an immediate dissolution of this Parliament and a general election unless we, the representatives of the people, agree to sit still and content ourselves with registering the wishes of my hon. friend and of the Administration. To this I do not intend to submit, and never shall. The policy of the rulers of the country during a great national crisis is not their private property, and the people are entitled to discuss it and judge those who are responsible for it.

With that part of the speech from the Throne relating to the effective participation of Canada in the great war which Great Britain and her Allies are now waging, I heartily agree. All the measures that can be necessary to sustain the honour of Canada and protect the most sacred interests of our country, should be taken. It seems to me, however, that the figure of 500,000 men is rather large and will be very difficult to reach, though I would not like to use the language of the Toronto Saturday Night and say that it is a "somewhat hysterical figure."

With regard to the financial requirements, under the circumstances, our duty, difficult as it may appear, is to grant all the money that is asked for by those who are entrusted with the responsibility of national defence; but we must require, as we have done before, a proper, effective and honest use of the sums placed at their disposal. We owe that to our countrymen who have left their farms, offices and shops in answer to the call of the Government and the country. It is our duty to see that they are provided with the best military training, with the best military organization, with the best military equipment; and we should not be fulfilling our duty, were we to agree to a general conspiracy of silence and refuse to expose wrong-doing or to investigate the acts and omissions of those who are responsible to this Parliament for the military operations of the country. I believe that the interests of the Canadian people must be placed over and above the tranquility of the Government. Our share in the present conflict we must accept not only with a high sense of duty, but in a generous and cheerful spirit. It was said last week in the other Chamber, as an argument against our making further and larger sacrifices to help the Mother Country in this war, that Great Britain was somewhat responsible for the war, and was to be blamed for not having declared herself earlier in favour of the Allies. Quite naturally, those words were severely criticised, and Conservative newspapers like the Toronto News and the Toronto Telegram have tried to throw the responsibility of Senator Choquette's speech on the Liberal party. But Senator Choquette has always been opposed to the policy of the Liberal party with regard to naval defence and the participation of Canada in any war undertaken by the Empire. In 1911, his speech in the Canadian Senate against such a policy was circulated and distributed in every home in the constituency of Kamouraska, which I represent, and which is a part of the division which my hon. friend Senator Choquette represents in the Senate; and the Conservative party paid for that circulation. Sir, nothing could be more at variance with the facts than the statements of my hon. friend Senator Choquette, which I have mentioned. It is true that the British statesmen endeavoured strenuously to avoid a conflict and to preserve the peace of Europe. To the very last Sir Edward Grey tried everything that might call a halt. As late as July 31, 1914, Sir Edward Grey suggested to Germany that the four outside powers should unite in suggesting to Austria that they would undertake to see that she obtain a full satisfaction in her demands upon Serbia, provided that these demands would not impair Serbia's sovereignty and the integrity of Serbia's territory. Under date of August 1, he wrote to the German Ambassador as follows:

> I fully believe that it might be possible to secure peace if only a little respite in time can be gained before any great power begins war.

On July 30, Sir Edward Grey replied to the proposition from the German Government that England should remain neutral, under the condition that Germany should not annex any of the territory of continental France. I shall quote only the last part of that reply—and I commend these words to the attention and admiration of the Canadian people, and more especiallly the people of my own province:

> It would be a disgrace for us to make this bargain with Germany at the expense of France—a disgrace from which the good name of this country would never recover.

On August 2, war broke out between Germany and France. On August 3, the German troops invaded Belgium, in defiance of the protests of the Belgian Government. The British Ambassador then demanded his passports, and on August 4, war was formally declared between Great Britain and Germany. In the face of these facts, how can any hon. gentleman say that Britain should be held responsible in any degree for this horrible war?

When, on July 30, it became apparent that France could not avoid a conflict with Germany, many people in my own province, especially those who could remember the dark and painful days of 1870, were watching with anxiety what Great Britain would do. During these days of expectation feelings of uneasiness were expressed in many quarters. Would England stand aside and let Germany crush Belgium and invade France? Finally, all efforts towards the securing of peace having failed, the voice of Britain was heard on the side of right and justice against might and tyranny. A feeling of relief was experienced everywhere; enthusiasm replaced anxiety, and from that day, Mr. Speaker, I have favoured and supported all measures that would help the Mother Country in this war. I have supported them as a national duty and as a profound expression of gratitude. I believe that if England had refused to declare herself in favour of the Allies and to unite her efforts with those of Belgium, France and Russia, many of those who now criticise our participation in the war would have raised indignant voices against the attitude of Great Britain.

I claim that under the circumstances, notwithstanding what has been said elsewhere, the province of Quebec has done her duty. Her people have contributed their full share, and they are still willing to contribute their full share. But there is a certain subject upon which I must speak frankly—though I should not like to hurt anybody's feelings. Our people resent very deeply the aspersions and the insulting remarks of a certain press. The hon. member for Frontenac, whom nobody in this country will accuse of being too broadminded, and who seems to be unable to deliver a speech in this House without directing a few mild and tender words to the unfortunate province of Quebec, was more prudent in his remarks yesterday, although there were some insinuations which he could not help indulging in. Certain articles which have appeared in Ontario newspapers have been a far greater obstacle to recruiting in Quebec than all the speeches of the gentlemen who are denounced and branded as traitors by the same press. Let those Ontario journalists apply themselves to their own shortcomings. I believe—and I am glad to see that my opinion is shared by such a newspaper as the Ottawa Citizen—that the field for reform in their own province is wide enough to require all their activity and to satisfy their eagerness to work for the common good. I do not object to some people having a very high estimate of themselves—there have been such people since the days of the Pharisees; but I protest against the unjust, inaccurate and odious comparisons which they are trying to make. Again I repeat that those charges and insinuations in the Tory press of Ontario have hindered the work of recruiting in Quebec to a far greater extent than all the speeches of the Nationalists who are opposed to Canada's participation in this war.

Having referred to the Nationalists, allow me to make a few comments on an incident which occurred recently. The people of this country have been aroused by certain words uttered by Mr. Armand Lavergne in the Legislature of Quebec. Only yesterday I read an article in a newspaper which demanded that poor Lavergne be court-martialled and shot with the least possible delay. I think the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) went almost that far last night. Well, I am not here to defend Mr. Lavergne. His words should have been left unsaid, and it is to be regretted that in this Dominion such statements should have been made. But, Sir, to those who have been so highly scandalized over this matter, let me recall that, unfortunately, similar and even worse statements were made only four years ago by certain hon. gentlemen who were friends and associates of Mr. Lavergne, and who were subsequently rewarded by the present Administration. Some are occupying the highest positions at the disposal of the Government, in the judiciary and elsewhere, and at least two of them are on the Treasury benches, members of the Government which is entrusted with the sacred duty of supervising the participation of Canada in this war. Yes, Mr. Speaker, and the financial means for the carrying on of their nefarious campaign were supplied, and as my hon. friends from Quebec on this side of the House know only too well, abundantly supplied, from the treasury of the ultra-loyal party in Ontario. I have a right to say these things. You are assailing the Nationalists who are outside of the House; I wish to include in the reprobation those who are inside, and those who are members of the Government. Here let me state to the credit of my province that she did her duty nobly in spite of that violent and demagogic campaign. In spite of the money provided by the Tory loyalists of Ontario, she elected thirty-eight Liberal members, pledged to stand up in this Parliament and vote for a Canadian navy and for the voluntary acceptance by Canada of her share of the burden in time of danger, whenever the Mother Country should be called upon to fight for the rights of the oppressed and the liberties of the world.

The right hon. leader of the Government has called to his councils some of the leaders of the Nationalists. Mr. Lavergne has even stated that he was invited to accept a portfolio. Let me remark in answer to my hon. friend from West Peterborough (Mr. Burnham) that the statement which Mr. Lavergne has made time and again is that he was offered a portfolio, not by the Prime Minister, but by the late Mr. Monk. That was the statement he made when the regretted Mr. Monk was not alive, and it has never been contradicted. We have had successively in the Government Messrs. Pelletier, Nantel, Coderre, and the present Secretary of State (Mr. Blondin), and the present Minister of Inland Revenue (Mr. Patenaude). Would you like to know, Mr. Speaker, what the relations of those gentlemen were with Mr. Lavergne? I will take the words of the most prominent of them, the former Postmaster General of this country, and for a time, too long a time, the high executioner of the Government. Here are the words he uttered at St. Gregoire on the 18th of September, 1911. I quote them from L'Evenement, the great Conservative journal of the city of Quebec. In order to be more accurate, I will read them first in French, and then translate them into English:

[Mr. E. Lapointe.]

Le peuple vous aime Lavergne, parce que vous l'avez aimé. Bourassa et vous avez écrit une page unique dans l'histoire de notre pays. Je me suis présenté parce que j'avais l'appui de M. Armand Lavergne, et le 21 septembre vous aurez à chanter la victoire de Pelletier et Lavergne....

The people love you, Lavergne, because you have loved them. Bourassa and yourself have written a page unparalleled in the history of our country. I have accepted nomination because I have the help of Mr. Armand Lavergne, and on the 21st of September you will be cheering the victory of Pelletier and Lavergne.

Mr. WILLIAM CHISHOLM: Who said that?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Hon. L. P. Pelletier. I think the House is well acquainted with the words uttered formerly by my hon. friend the Secretary of State. Those of my hon. friend the Minister of Inland Revenue are not so well known in this House. I would like to supplement the information given the other night, and I will read a few extracts from an article signed by Mr. Bourassa in Le Devoir of October 15, 1915, after the appointment of my hon. friend. The article is entitled: "Is Mr. Borden again becoming a Nationalist?" and Mr. Bourassa says—I will read it first in French and then in English:

M. Borden redevient-il nationaliste?

M. Patenaude était plus nationaliste que tous nous autres. A l'assemblée de Saint-Rémi, organisée par ses soins, il s'écriait le 4 septembre 1910:

"Nous sommes à l'aise aujourd'hui pour discuter cette politique, parce que nous sommes détachés des deux grands partis... Mais j'ai encore confiance dans la population canadienne française, car je crois qu'elle est encore plus loyale au Canada qu'à l'Angleterre, aux traditions de la province qu'aux désirs d'un gouverneur général ou d'un premier ministre....

"Il existe une autre voix: celle des honneurs et des titres. C'est celle qui a perdu Laurier et Borden, qui a perdu le Gouvernement canadien et les députés moutons qui en sont la grande majorité."

Et M. Bourassa, après avoir constaté que le premier ministre choisissait tous ses ministres de gauche dans les rangs nationalistes, à part M. Casgrain, écrivait:

"Au lendemain de 1911 ce choix s'appliquait. M. Borden savait bien qu'il devait son succès à l'agitation contre la loi navale, menée par M. Monk, avec l'appui des nationalistes. Il avait alors résolu de faire abroger la loi navale. Mais aujourd'hui? M. Borden songe-t-il à revenir bientôt à la politique nationaliste? Compte-t-il sur M. Blondin pour faire de nouveaux accrocs au drapeau anglais? Garde-t-il M. Patenaude en réserve pour une nouvelle élection de Drummond-Arthabaska?"

Mr. Patenaude was more Nationalist than any one of us. At the meeting of St. Rémi, organized by himself, he said, on the 4th of September, 1910:

"We feel at ease to-day to discuss that policy stand, as we are free from the two great parties.... But I still have confidence in the French-Canadian people, because I believe that they are more loyal to Canada than to England, and to the traditions of the province than to the wishes of a Governor General or a Prime Minister.... There exists another voice—that of honours and titles. It is this that has been the doom of Laurier and Borden, the doom of the Canadian Government and the sheep-like members who form the great majority."

It is interesting to know the opinion the minister had of the members of this House before he became one of them. Mr. Bourassa, after finding that the Prime Minister had selected all his Quebec ministers from the Nationalist ranks, except Mr. Casgrain, said:

"On the morrow of 1911 that choice could be explained. Mr. Borden knew well that he owed his success to the agitation against the Naval Bill, led by Mr. Monk, with the aid of the Nationalists. He then decided to have the Naval Bill repealed. But to-day does Mr. Borden intend very soon to adopt the Nationalist policy? Does he rely on Mr. Blondin to tear new rents in the British flag? Does he keep Mr. Patenaude in reserve for a new election in Drummond-Arthabaska?"

Much can be done by the distribution of patronage, but the Prime Minister seems to have forgotten that leaders and generals lose their usefulness and worth as soon as they abandon their army. However, the prodigal sons have come back, and the thanksgiving banquet is still going on under the eyes and with the participation of the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards). Personal ambitions have been satisfied, but we are sure that opinions and convictions have been changed? Have these gentlemen retracted, or withdrawn, or repudiated, one of the statements which are still ringing in the ears of the electors of that province? I am not aware that they have and until they do so, and until they apologize to the people whom they deceived in 1911, their appeals for enlistment cannot be very effective and cannot carry much weight. I protest as strongly as I can against my hon. friend the Postmaster General mentioning the names of his two ex-Nationalistic colleagues and asking the people of the other provinces to judge my province and my countrymen by the actions and expressions of these ministers. I believe in political morality. The loyalty of my hon. friend to his colleagues deserve admiration, but the respect he owes to his province and to the people he represents should have been more binding upon him than ministerial loyalty.

I shall now refer to another part of the Postmaster General's speech. He said that he and his colleagues have refrained from all political activity in the province of Quebec, and have devoted all their time and energy to recruiting and addressing patriotic meetings.

Mr. CASGRAIN: That is not what I said. I did not say that we had not devoted any of our activities to political life.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I understood my hon. friend to say that they had not indulged in political activities.

Mr. CASGRAIN: No, I did not say that.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Well, I accept the statement of my hon. friend.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Read my statement in Hansard.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I will look up Hansard again. That is the impression that was left on the minds of those who listened to the speech of my hon. friend. Then, my hon. friend said—and I would not have taken the trouble to contradict him if he had not said it—that some Liberal members at least had not followed the example of their leader and had indulged in the discussion of political questions. He even stated—my hon. friend will find it in Hansard—that on a later occasion—I think he said on a less dignified occasion—he would perhaps discuss that matter. Does my hon. friend remember that?

Mr. CASGRAIN: Yes, and I will keep my promise.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Before my hon. friend keeps his promise I will give him some material. Of course, I will keep some in store for the occasion when my hon. friend will come back. I do not know to whom my hon. friend referred, but I purpose to say to this House that if any hon. members on this side did discuss political questions, they had to do so to protect themselves or their party against the attacks and political speeches of the ministers of the Crown in the province of Quebec since the last session of Parliament. Let us look at some of these thoroughly patriotic utterances of the members of the Government.

"A tout seigneur, tout honneur"—I begin with the master, the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Rogers). The Minister of Public Works came to Montreal—and here, I am afraid, I am going to scandalize my hon. friend from West Peterborough (Mr. Burnham). The Minister of Public Works came to Montreal and delivered a speech on May 3, 1915. Here are some extracts which I take from the report of the Montreal Gazette of the Minister's speech, so that the House may be made aware of the patriotic declarations uttered by that hon. gentleman on that occasion. He speaks of the Prime Minister and says:

But the fact that he has so honestly and so honourably discharged these great responsibilities apparently means nothing to a certain horde of designing Grit grafters and simpletons—grafters that are strong and powerful by reason of the wide scope given them in their field of operations during the fifteen years of Liberal reign. For example, who will deny the strength of the press of Canada to-day that represents Grit graft, Grit loot, and Grit plunder? A press that in its desperation descends to the very lowest possible level; and when I make this statement I frankly acknowledge I am thinking of the Montreal Herald, the Toronto Globe and the Winnipeg Free Press—all papers that have prospered in one form or another by the purchase and sale of influence with Liberal leaders, by the purchase and sale of Liberal principles, or by pure and unadulterated graft during the reign of the late Administration.

Allow me to make the remark that when that hon. gentleman was speaking so loudly and so earnestly about graft, he was exchanging telegrams with his friends in Manitoba and telling them that he was looking around Eastern Canada to get the best counsel available to send to the rescue of the grafters of Manitoba. He proceeds:

It is true, for a time they were temporarily silent, nursing in shame their remorse of conscience for their conduct of the year previous, through which they were obliged to witness their own most ignominious downfall in the eyes of every good Canadian, and for months and months they were treated by the Government and by the people generally with the reverence and respect that is always due to a political corpse.

I might read his reference to the ministers of religion in the country, but I do not think it is necesary for me to do so. A few weeks later another minister—he was not a minister at that time; he was Solicitor General; but he is now a member of the Cabinet. The Solicitor General came to Montreal and made a patriotic speech. I take the report from the Montreal Gazette of June 11, 1915:

A strong fighting speech was made last night by the Hon. Arthur Meighen, Solicitor General, before the Westmount Conservative Association, at Victoria Hall.

[Mr. E. Lapointe.]

Here are some extracts:

"Can you call that anything but party trickery?" asked Mr. Meighen. . . . "The Liberals showed they were blind to the facts on the naval issue, as they now show themselves blind. Do you think that, knowing what the leader of the late Government has done and what has been achieved by the present Government, the people of Canada would wish to restore Laurier to power?" It was there, as a monument over his political remains. . . . There will be immense deficits without a doubt.

I will now quote from a speech delivered by the Minister of Finance at Durham, and reported in the Montreal Gazette of June 19, 1915:

The Liberal leaders had acted like a lot of bad children, rather than responsible statesmen seized of the gravity of the crisis.

Further on he says:

It was true that public expenditure had been increasing. In a country like Canada it always will increase, but by far the greater part of the increase in recent years has been due to the policy of wasteful extravagance of the late Government in enterprises such as the National Transcontinental.

Further on he says:

In all their actions they have displayed a wilful and perverse blindness which has resulted greatly to the detriment of the Empire in the day of trial.

I now come to my own province. My hon. friend the Secretary of State (Mr. Blondin) made a speech at Louiseville, in Maskinongé county, on July 12. That speech was reported in La Patrie on July 13, and I will quote the following extracts:

Sir Wilfrid has received everything from the province which has bestowed all things upon him—confidence, power, and a halo of glory. Why has he accomplished so little for her? The Conservatives have but twenty seats in the House of Commons, and yet more than under any previous administration they have acquired the recognition of the rights of the French language. The future looks forward to a great many efforts. But give us your help, grant us your confidence. One can hardly explain the reason why certain Liberals, the Hon. J. E. Caron especially, so persistently criticise new taxes at the creation of which the Liberals have unanimously applauded. That small boot scandal has fallen through. These boots had been manufactured by Canadian firms. The inquiry has been closed. Why have the members of the Opposition discontinued to push it forth after they had obtained so little out of it? The evidence was that one fourth of one per cent of these boots had been found defective. The sole conclusion is this: Praise be given to the Canadian manufacturers! Praise be to the Government! Following all the financial disasters, wheat shall be the essential wealth, and that of prime value. The Government has been far-sighted and has established a protective tariff which will prove efficient.

Mr. BLONDIN: Will my hon. friend admit that this is a very incomplete report of my speech?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Perhaps it is, but I have read the report as published in La Patrie, which represents Conservative views, and so far as I know the report has never been repudiated.

Mr. BLONDIN: I am not repudiating it. I say it is incomplete.

Mr. LAPOINTE: My hon. friend did not respect the truth in this speech of his.

Mr. BLONDIN: I was answering the Hon. Mr. Caron, and my hon. friend will not deny that Mr. Caron was attacking us at the time.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Will my hon. friend state in this House that the Liberals voted with the Government on the new tariff brought down by the Minister of Finance last year? He will say so at Louiseville, but he will not repeat the statement in this House. Mr. Cousineau, leader of the Opposition in the province of Quebec, was on the same platform with the Secretary of State, and spoke a few words about the Dominion subsidy:

Since the Conservative Government is in power in Ottawa it is very difficult to reach an effective understanding between the federal and local governments. Should the Conservatives acquire the confidence of the majority in the province of Quebec, the re-adjustment of the federal subsidy will be an easy problem to solve.

I now come to the Postmaster General, and I regret to do so, because I have the greatest personal regard for him.

Mr. LEMIEUX: He is not a bad fellow.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Unfortunately, even saints have weaknesses, and the Postmaster General is not above reproach. At one of his so-called patriotic meetings my hon. friend said at Notre-Dame du Lac:

I am told that there is here a large Conservative majority. I congratulate you, gentlemen, and I hope that you will increase it further, in order to send to us in the House of Commons a Conservative member upon whom we shall always be able to rely.

I am quoting from l'Evenement of October 11, 1915. My hon. friend the Postmaster General will have to admit that he was trying to recruit Conservatives as well as soldiers. The following day the Postmaster General spoke at a Fraserville meeting, and l'Evenement of October 12, 1915, in reporting this speech, says:

Dubé Hall proved too small to contain all the good Conservatives who flocked in yesterday to hear the speech of the Hon. Mr. Casgrain, Postmaster General in the Borden cabinet.

Really, his speech was a patriotic one on the whole. The only statement which I did not like was this one:

Compare the line of conduct followed by both governments in the inquiries held regarding the scandals. Whilst the Liberals endeavoured to conceal everything, the Conservatives have established complete light and chastized the guilty parties. This is proven by the act of Sir Robert Borden in expelling from the party Garland and Foster, found guilty of theft and graft.

My friends from Nova Scotia will be able to use that speech of my hon. friend. My hon. friend complained that those meetings were described as political meetings. If he has been wrongly interpreted he has been so interpreted by those who participated in the meetings and even by the organizers. Every hon. member knows that Mr. Charles Beaubien, of Montreal, was appointed to the Senate in December. Mr. Beaubien is a clever and highly estimable gentleman, and as long as a Conservative has to be appointed his appointment deserves approval. My friend Mr. Beaubien was known, if not as the principal, as one of the principal, organizers of the Conservative party in the province of Quebec. After his appointment he gave an interview, which was published in the Montreal Gazette of December 3, 1915. Here is what he said:

He especially wanted to say that in his opinion the war policy of the present Administration is endorsed by 95 per cent of the people of this province. Neither did he think that the political situation could be called anything but hopeful in Quebec. Hard work would, of course, be necessary—

I believe that.

—on the part of the ministers and their followers—

Here is the sentence to which I call the attention of my friend:

—and he thought that the activity they had displayed during the past few weeks was a safe promise for the future.

I have some more extracts, but I will keep them in store for that happy occasion when my hon. friend discusses that matter, as he has announced his intention of doing.

The right hon. the Prime Minister, speaking in this House on the last day of the last session of Parliament and referring to the appropriations voted for the war, said:

It will be the duty of the Government to see that not one single dollar of it shall be lost or wasted, so that we may be enabled at another session of Parliament to give an account of our stewardship.

We now ask the right hon. gentleman and the Government to give that account to us and to the people of Canada. From one end of the country to the other there are rumours and charges of wrong-doing against men for whom the Government is responsible, more especially the Shell Committee, which was the creature of the Government. Specific instances have been mentioned by hon. gentlemen in the course of this debate. That Shell Committee, under the eyes of the Government, and certain departments of the Government, seem to have allowed and encouraged combinations in which patriotism and financial cupidity are amalgamated in very discernible doses. The interest of Canada and Britain seems to have been mixed up with the interests of a few rings of selfish financiers. It is up to the Government to clear the atmosphere. I regret to say that since the speech of my hon. friend the Solicitor General the Government of Canada stands in a humiliating position before the country. By their hesitation, their quibbling, their resorting to technicalities for the purpose of avoiding investigation, the members of the Government are assuming the part of the accused instead of being the accusers. They should have been willing and anxious to grant an immediate and thorough investigation in order that those unworthy speculators who are trying to enrich themselves unduly out of the blood of our soldiers and the misfortunes of our country should be discovered and dealt with most severely. The honour of the Government and this Parliament is at stake; the honour of the people of Canada is at stake; and on behalf of those whom I have the honour to represent in this Parliament, I ask the right hon. the Prime Minister of my country to do full justice, and not to allow himself to be carried away by the sentiments which seem to animate some of his followers and his colleagues. The noble actions of the sons of Canada in the battlefields of Europe have covered the name of this country with glory. They have written with their blood one of the finest pages of Canadian history. We owe it to them to leave intact and untarnished this great page which they have written, and we can do so by divorcing it from the unfortunate condition which has been shown during the last few days to exist in our internal affairs. We owe it to those who have died for their King and country; we owe it to those who are still upholding the honour and interest of Canada; we owe it to those who will come after us. This is the wish which I sincerely hope may be realized, and by such an achievement we shall leave unblemished the glorious history of our national participation in this great war.

Mr. J. D. TAYLOR (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, may I add to the general expression my felicitation that so worthy a representative of my native county has attained the dignity of presiding officer of this House. It is always a pleasure to me to associate myself with felicitations of any kind connected with the province of Quebec, just as it is a matter of perennial regret that long absence has dissociated me from the picturesque politics of the province which to my Irish instincts are attractive in the proportion that they are strenuous.

The outstanding feature of the sessional programme as indicated in the speech now under discussion, is a request for authorization of the increase of the Canadian Expeditionary Force to 500,000 men, an enrollment calling for the serious attention of every member of this House whether with regard to his personal interests or with regard to his influence upon his own constituency. That from this call the members of this House do not consider themselves exempt is abundantly evident from the fact of the many places vacant by attendance of members at the front or in serious training, and also by the presence here of so many officers in the King's uniform whose participation in the affairs of Parliament is yet made possible because their enlistment is only in the earlier stages. For myself, it is a matter of pride that I have been granted a command in the draft called for a few months ago to bring our first enlistment up to two hundred and fifty thousand. And, as in the thirty-seven years since I first had the privilege of assuming the Queen's uniform, I have passed through all the stages from private and gunner to the rank of commanding officer, I trust it will not be imputed to me as it has been imputed to others connected with the public life of this country that I secured the privilege of commanding an overseas regiment for any political reason or for any reason other than that it was the position naturally coming to me because of my rank in the militia and the only one for which my years make me eligible.

I desire to pay a tribute to the splendid executive courage of the Minister of Militia (Sir Sam Hughes) in the conduct of Canada's share in this war. Criticism is inevitable, and so far as that criticism is based on truth or on honest belief, it seems to me that it should not be resented. Irregularities are to be expected in the conduct of affairs on so huge a scale and eternal vigilance is necessary to prevent these irregularities developing into scandal. But, the business of the present hour being the prosecution of the war, the minor consideration of dealing adequately with those who seek to traffic indecently in the country's difficulties may very well be put in the background for the present. It is my hope, however, that at the proper time the searchlight will be turned on all questions connected with the commercial side of this campaign; and I have no apprehension that the Conservatitve party or any one in authority in it will be found shielding in any degree any person to whom censure or penalty should be accorded. In my opinion, however, the duty of the hour is not investigation or recrimination, but rather the exercise of every possible means to supply the men necessary—first to encourage and then to reinforce our advance guard at the front, and to supply to them promptly and adequately the munitions without which the personal bravery of our soldiers must end only in sacrifice.

Fortunately, the splendid spirit of the Canadian people makes it unnecessary to discuss seriously in this Dominion how our legions may be secured, and it is a matter for regret in my opinion that the bogie of the word "conscription" has been introduced to cause discord in the minds of free citizens to whom any form of compulsion is distasteful. It seems to me that the word "conscription" is most unfortunately chosen to represent the idea involved, and that since the temper of the Canadian people is to regard service for the Empire as a privilege to be coveted rather than as a duty irksome and only to be assumed of necessity, the work of selection might well be presented as the drawing of a prize rather than as a penalty. In that sense, I am heartily in favour of a ballot for positions in the military service to award to each citizen in proper turn in time of emergency the rank for which he has fitted himself in time of peace. Under such circumstances no man of self-respect, in my opinion, would wish to assert the chief privilege of citizenship, the franchise, while opposing or shirking the duty of serving; and the manhood of the country, making, on enlistment, personal sacrifices which in many cases bear severely on their dependents, would be freed from the worry of the thought that the gratification of their desire for service had left their mothers and sisters, or their wives and children, under conditions less favourable than those of their acquaintance who disregarded the call of duty when it came to them. I would give opportunity to those who had not the privilege of personal service to compensate themselves by making the most generous provision possible for the dependents of soldiers serving in the field or who have answered the last roll-call, as well as those who return to us unfitted for ordinary pursuits. I am pleased that the subject of more adequate pensions has been introduced, since, though the Canadian scale is comparatively liberal, it was not made for conditions such as those of this war, where the magnitude of the numbers engaged makes it idle to expect that the ordinary offices of philanthrophy in the several communities can provide for any deficiency in the scale for the dependents of disabled or returned invalided soldiers. So that the mind of the volunteers should be set at ease, I think it most advisable that authoritative announcement that steps to increase the pension scale should be made as early as possible.

In following Imperial example and seeking an extension of the life of Parliament, in my opinion the Government interpret properly the will of the Canadian people. How can we be united in the preparation for warfare and in every patriotic endeavour at home while the desire to secure party supremacy is allowed sway; and when, an election being supposed to be imminent, our citizens are armed to the teeth politically, each watching with jealousy the movements of every rival? But of what avail is an armistice in the matter of an actual ballot if the campaign is not interrupted? That is the German idea, as I see it, of an armistice to bury the dead, used for the purpose of placing the big guns in better positions.

Observations of some hon. gentlemen opposite while this debate has been in progress make the situation well capable of illustration by picturing the members of this House as invited to an entertainment, say to promote recruiting or to enlarge the Patriotic Fund, to which some of the members who addressed this House recently would proceed in a spirit anything but philanthropic. For example, there is the hon. member for Cape Breton North (Mr. McKenzie), who, I am sorry to see is not in his seat. I can very well picture him on the approach to this gathering arguing that the motor cars bearing the guests were not coming along what he considered the proper road, and as resenting this I can conceive him strewing tacks along the way of these erring motors. Then, take the hon. member for St. John city (Mr. Pugsley), and I have in my mind's eye his progress along the pavement from the street to the meeting place, having distributed along the walk a collection of banana peels, and then standing at the door and watching the downfall of the unwary guests, but offering an urbane welcome to those who had escaped the pitfalls. Then there is the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald), who also is absent. After listening carefully to his address the other night, I saw in my mind's eye his early and furtive entry into the tea-room and his carefully anointing with vinegar the jugs of cream. I pictured next another absent critic of the Administration, the hon. member for Carleton, N.B., (Mr. Carvell) whose role, it seems to me, would be having asked permission to dry a small bundle of hay in one of the stoves on the premises, to mix with the hay a noxious perfume in order that he might make his influence felt on the olfactory nerves of his audience, if he could not impress them by any other means. It seems to me that the result of the various performances of these absent critics would do anything but make for the peace and harmony of a patriotic gathering. Under these circumstances the threat, if it were threat—the promise, or sinister suggestion, whichever it was—of the hon. member for Carleton, that Canadians, because of his criticism and the criticism of those like him, should refrain either from enlisting or from subscribing to the Patriotic Fund, would be very likely to receive some attention.

The cream of the present campaign undoubtedly had been the efficiency and the overwhelming superiority of the navy. Yet the hon. member for Pictou puts this to the acid touch of his complaint that Canada has neglected to gild the refined gold in that she has not offered what he thinks should have been the proper assistance to the Imperial Navy in the shape of strengthening their naval brigade. I will deal with his remarks practically in so far only as they affect conditions on the Pacific Coast, although he had a good deal to say about conditions at Halifax also. Take first the steamship Rainbow, the protection bequeathed to us by the late Government. The hon. gentleman informed this House that that ship was dismantled and useless at the beginning of the campaign. But on the contrary, so reckless was the hon. gentleman in his assertions and so little care did he take to have ground for the criticism that he levelled against the Government, that the fact is quite the opposite. At the opening of the war the Rainbow was in full commission. In the spring of 1914, Canada had undertaken to send a ship to the Behring Sea Patrol to replace the Algerine and the Shearwater of the Imperial Navy, which were detained on the Mexican coast by the trouble arising in that country. The Rainbow was fitted for this service, and was prepared to leave when war broke out. The ship was immediately placed at the disposal of the Admiralty, and has been at such disposal ever since. The complement of the Rainbow was completed by the addition of a number of Royal Naval Canadian Volunteer Reserve ratings who had been training at Esquimalt, and the ship put to sea immediately to protect the Canadian coasts. A report in British Columbia at the time which caused great apprehension, was to the effect that the German ships Leipzig and Nurnberg were off the American coast. The Rainbow went south to meet these ships, and, by so doing, enabled the little Imperial ships Shearwater and Algerine to regain Esquimalt in safety; and also deterred the German vessels from entering the Canadian harbours without at least a serious conflict.

The hon. gentleman also complains of inattention on the part of this Government to requests from British Columbia for the formation locally of a branch of the Royal Naval Reserve. In this case also he is mistaken. During the year before the war the question of the organization of naval reserves was taken up by the Department of the Naval Service. In the fall of 1913, authority was given to organize a company in Victoria, B.C., in a preliminary manner, and facilities were given for drilling in the Esquimalt dockyard, the direction of the movement being undertaken by the naval officers at that station. During the winter of 1913-14, a scheme for organization was drawn up, which was put into effect by Order in Council. In the spring of 1914 arrangements were made with the Admiralty to obtain officers for the training of a corps of volunteers to be distributed throughout the country.

5 p.m. A company was organized in Victoria and another in Vancouver, and the organization was being perfected when war broke out. The Admiralty stated that they were unable to send out the officers who were to have undertaken the training of these bodies. It was, therefore, necessary to postpone the projected organization, but the measures which were authorized were utilized for the purpose of enlisting volunteers to serve for the period of the war on the Niobe and Rainbow, to man patrol vessels and to take part in other defensive measures on the coasts of Canada. These men have been extremely useful and have done good service—service which has been recognized by the Imperial officers who have been associated with those two vessels since the outbreak of the war. While the German vessels were patrolling the Pacific, some 450 men were enlisted in the province of British Columbia and were divided into various patrol services along the coast. After Admiral Sturdee's victory at the Falkland islands, it was no longer necessary to keep such a large number of the volunteers on service, and all men wishing to join overseas forces were allowed to resign, and a number of other men who wished to rejoin their families were also allowed to leave the force. A number of these volunteers are still serving on the Rainbow, the Shearwater and the submarines, and employed on patrol and other duties as well.

The hon. member for Pictou seems to be under a misapprehension as to the requirements, if not the functions, of the Royal naval brigade. At the beginning of the war the Admiralty called out the Royal naval reserves, composed of men engaged in mercantile marine, but trained to a certain extent in the Royal Navy. When these men responded to the call, the Admiralty found themselves with a large body of trained seamen, from which they manned the ships ready to put to sea, and still had a considerable number of men over. The naval brigade. thus organized, while formed of reserve seamen, was partly officered by naval officers and partly by army officers. The men were trained as a military unit and given the uniform of the land forces; they were armed and equipped in exactly the same way as the infantry regiments, and took their places in the trenches alongside of the latter. The point of this is that as Canada was already sending land forces in quite as large number as the Imperial Government could handle, it made no difference to that Government whether we sent those forces under the name of a naval brigade, as the hon. member for Pictou suggests we should have done, or whether we enrolled them as infantry and sent them over under the name, as well as to perform the duties, of land forces.

A feature of the early part of this debate was the submarine warfare of the hon. member for St. John city (Mr. Pugsley) who, when taken to task from this side of the House, excused himself on the ground that his periscope was the press of Vancouver and Victoria. I am sorry the hon. gentleman is not present, because I would have liked in his presence to remove from him the last vestige of protection or excuse for having, with the product of the peculiar state of mental exaltation in which he must have been on his visit to the coast, given so inadequate and distorted a report of what he learned from his perusal of the press of Victoria and Vancouver. Since the hon. gentleman spoke in this House, I have been looking up the press of Victoria and Vancouver to which he had access, and which, he says, he carefully perused. I find that that press contradicts him in every particular, that there is no manner of complaint that he has alleged here and that is dealt with by the evidence as read by the Solicitor General, which was not adequately covered by the press of Victoria and Vancouver at that time; and that there are no facts which, to a man with any interest in the subject, would not have been disclosed by the perusal of that evidence. I find a statement by the hon. gentleman, for instance, that there was no explanation of the division of the submarine money into three drafts. On the contrary, we read in the newspapers an exact explanation, first by the manager of the bank as to the nature and amounts of the drafts; next by Mr. Paterson, the agent of the Company, as to why those divisions were made, and as to what disposition was made of each draft. Further, I find that the receipts from the recipients of those drafts, showing the purpose of them, were produced before the Commission, and are on file with the other documents.

I find in the statement made by the hon. member for St. John the reiteration that he was justified in supposing that Captain Logan should have known something about the price of the submarines by reason of the fact that, as shown by his bill which forms part of the record presented to this House last session, he was engaged for fifteen days in this business. On reading the Victoria press for my own information, I find that that is most carefully and thoroughly dealt with, that Captain Logan's evidence was to the effect that his first connection with the submarine business was on Sunday, August 2, the declaration of war being on the 4th, and that the greater part of the fifteen days, for which he has put in a bill to the Government, was taken up, not by negotiations for the sale of those submarines, as the remarks of the hon. member for St. John would lead this House to believe, but, as plainly stated by Captain Logan himself, in the endeavour to secure torpedoes and other supplies for the craft after their purchase and delivery to Esquimalt dockyard. So, Mr. Speaker, we have an addition to our cause for amazement that an hon. gentleman should have attempted to inform this House as to the facts of an incident, facts which he said reflected severely, not only upon the politicians whom he connected with the transaction, but upon a most esteemed retired member of the judiciary engaged as a Royal Commissioner, and that he should have presumed to cast reflections, with no warrant at all in fact, so far as his own statements as to where he procured these facts admit of investigation of his allegations to this House.

Then, again, Mr. Speaker, so far as the participation of counsel for the Liberal party in British Columbia is concerned, I would like to add something to what has gone upon record, something which, when I was perusing the press of the Coast for the purposes intended, I saw very fully set forth. I find that when Commissioner Davidson refused the counsel for the Liberal party the right to appear as such, on the ground that one party could not be represented without the other, at the same time he extended to him a most cordial invitation to attend at the sessions of the Commission, and to give Mr. Thompson, the official counsel, all the assistance in his power.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Did the counsel for the Liberal party stay?

Mr. TAYLOR: No, I regret to answer that the newspaper records set forth that counsel thereupon left the meeting place of the commission. I find also that Sir Richard McBride, who was present, personally urged on the commissioner that he had no objection to the attendance of counsel representing the Liberal party. In fact, it was only a sense of duty on the part of the commissioner, his sense of what was regular in the proceedings, and his conviction that it would be irregular that he refused, even when requested by the accused, for Sir Richard McBride was virtually in that position, to allow the Liberal counsel to appear.

I find, in addition, that not only did the commissioner at the outset of the investigation issue the most comprehensive invitation to every person concerned to attend and give evidence, but that this invitation was emphasized at the close by a leading editorial in the Victoria Colonist, which called attention to the fact that, the commission having been sitting for three days and being about to adjourn, no persons from Victoria had volunteered to give evidence. There had been a great deal of rumour in Liberal political circles in Victoria, and the local Liberal newspaper had been the vent of these rumours, and the editorials in the newspaper indicated that the editor of the paper believed he had warrant for the insinuations which had been printed. The Colonist pointed out the advisability of any person having any information of that kind at his disposal attending before the commissioner, or suggesting to him the names of some persons who should attend. To all these invitations there was no response, a fact which it seems to me, Mr. Speaker, can lead to no other conclusion than that there never was any ground for the insinuations of any graft in connection with the purchase of the submarines which, so far as British Columbia was concerned, would have been cheap at many times the price paid for them, which saved us treasure, if not lives, and which would not have been secured but for the outstanding enterprise of the Government of British Columbia. I am indebted to my hon. friend the Solicitor General for the suggestion that the commission not yet having been dissolved and the commissioner not having made his report, the invitation is open to any person, from the hon. member for St. John down, who knows anything, or has any ground for suspicion, to appear before the commissioner, state the ground and have it investigated.

Before closing, I wish to refer to only one other incident of this debate. I wish to allude to the following remarks of the hon.

member for North Cape Breton (Mr. McKenzie), to be found at page 321 of Hansard:

> I need not tell you, Sir, what has happened in the province of British Columbia. You know that the people there are rising in their might to have clean government and clean administration and to have back again the condition of things which we brought to them when we put the Conservatives out of house and home before, and the time will come when our old grand chieftain will once more give clean government to the people of this country, and when we shall all rally around him and the old conditions will prevail.

Mr. Speaker, for the province of British Columbia, I wish to say that there is not the first atom of foundation for any of the insinuations contained in that paragraph. I am sorry that the hon. gentleman is not present, after having made so foul an accusation against the government of my province, and I regret that he should not have remained in the House until some representative from that province had had an opportunity of asking him the source of his information, what details he had, and if he had any sense of responsibility as a member of this House when he has no ground for so base an insinuation as that which he has put before it. I am proud to say that graft is not indigenous to the soil or climate of British Columbia, that political scandals are an exception, and that, in so far as the Provincial Government is concerned, during the twelve years in which it has been in office, there has been no scandal in connection with it, or the slightest insinuation that one cent of public money has been diverted in the way of graft. I am proud to say also that, as far as my information goes—and I am pretty well informed as to Federal affairs in British Columbia—I know of no beginning even of graft in connection with the Federal Administration in that province since the change of Government.

I dislike recalling the acrimonious events of the closing years of the late Government; but when you find an hon. member, such as the hon. member for North Cape Breton, who is thoroughly familiar with the record of his party, who heard British Columbia affairs discussed at length in this House in the last Parliament, and scandal after scandal promoted by his party ventilated here, it seems to me that patience ceases to be a virtue, and that we, the representatives of British Columbia, would be justified in opening up to a very large extent the sordid chapter of the closing years of the Federal Liberal Administration there, in face of baseless insinuations such as those which have been put forward by the hon. gentleman.

I may say that if any of these hon. gentlemen, who have gone so far afield as to traverse the entire continent for matters for comment against this Administration, had been in their seats at the present time, I would have had some further criticism with regard to the matter to offer to them; but when hon. members make accusations of this kind and fly the coop, as these hon. gentlemen have done, what is the use of beating the air?

Mr. GRAHAM: I think that is hardly fair. There are no hon. gentlemen who stay in the House as steadily as one of the hon. gentlemen to who my hon. friend is referring. This is Friday, some of these gentlemen may have been called away, and we do not know why members cannot be in the House. My hon. friend may be a sinner in that respect himself at times.

Mr. TAYLOR: I grant I am very often out of the House, but I would feel it my duty to remain if I had gone so far afield as to make accusations against a province with which I had no personal concern. Had I made such accusations, had I dragged in affairs so extraneous to my own personal duty, I would have felt some responsibility to attend while an opportunity was given for the answers to be delivered.

Mr. GRAHAM: He stayed long enough for the answers to be given, but they were not given.

Mr. TAYLOR: Two of these hon. gentlemen were present when I commenced my remarks; so that, as to the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) and the hon. member for North Cape Breton (Mr. McKenzie), their absence from the House at this moment is purely voluntary and is not occasioned by any circumstances over which they have no control.

Mr. A. B. McCOIG (West Kent): Mr. Speaker, in rising to say a few words in this debate, I wish to join with previous speakers in extending to you, Sir, my most hearty congratulations upon your promotion to the high office which you now occupy. I feel satisfied that I am only expressing the sentiments of hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House when I say that I feel confident that you will discharge the duties of this high and honourable position with that ability and impartiality which have characterized your distinguished predecessors.

I regretted very much to hear some of my hon. friends on this side of the House make the complaint that in the selection of regimental officers, and other officials of the Militia Department, in their respective constituencies, discrimination was shown against those of their friends who might be of the Liberal persuasion. I am glad to say that in the county of Kent, a portion of which I have the honour to represent in this House, appointments such as have been described have not been made. When companies were formed by the Militia Department, the officers were selected from the very best men regardless of their political opinions.

I am proud to say that when the first contingent left Canada we sent a couple of companies from the county of Kent, and the man in charge was Major George Smith, a Liberal in politics. He fought at the front with his men behind him on many occasions, and I am sorry to inform the House that in the last great battle in which he was engaged he was killed while attacking a third trench after he and his men had already captured two. I wish to extend to the Prime Minister of this country and to the Minister of Militia the most sincere thanks of my constituents, as well as my own, for the kind letters of condolence that they extended to Major Smith's wife and orphan son. I am glad to inform the House that since that time many of the brightest young men in the county of Kent have left for the front to do battle in defence of their country—not only men in the humbler walks of life, but sons of our wealthiest families in the city of Chatham, and in the municipalities and in the whole county. I am also glad to say that the ladies of Kent county have at all times endeavoured to do their duty. Whether in connection with the Red Cross Society, the Daughters of the Empire, or some other patriotic association, the ladies of my county, like the many ladies we see at different times in the galleries of this building, are providing comforts for those who have gone to the front, working from the time they get up in the morning till they go to bed at night. The ladies in the country districts in the county of Kent went so far last harvest as to can hundreds and hundreds of quarts of peaches and forwarded them to the front, and the boys at the front have expressed their appreciation not only for the fruit that has been sent them, but for the many other acts of kindness which have been extended to them by the industrious women of Kent. The fund which was provided to look after the boys at the front from the county has, I am glad to say, on no occasion been exhausted. I see by the Patriotic Bulletin, issued under the direction of the hon. member for St. Antoine (Sir Herbert Ames), that Kent county raised $85,000 in three days for the Patriotic Fund. Furthermore, Mr. Harry Collins, the local treasurer of the fund, has assured Sir Herbert Ames that the city of Chatham and county promised $150,000 for the year 1916. I think we all admire Sir Herbert Ames. He has given much of his time and attention to the Patriotic Fund, and as its secretary enjoys the confidence, I believe, of all members of this House and of the people as a whole. When he visited Chatham he was received there in the most unpartisan way imaginable, and he said that the county had contributed even more generously than the figures showed, as they had previously spent the sum of $15,000 for the use of the wives and dependents of the soldiers who had enlisted at an earlier date.

I am also glad to inform the House that the Minister of Militia has given instructions to form a Kent battalion, known as the 186th, for overseas service, and they have already obtained some three or four hundred splendid fellows. The man at the head of that battalion is Lt. Colonel Neil Smith, a Liberal. The Minister of Militia appointed him because he knew that he was the best man that could be found for the position, not only in the county of Kent, but possibly in the whole of Ontario. The Minister of Militia knew him personally. Lt. Colonel Neil Smith is such an expert marksman that he was chosen for the Bisley team which went to England some years ago, and he did honour to the county of Kent while he was there, for he carried off some of the highest prizes. He was selected to go with the Bisley team on another occasion, and I am proud to say that in competition with the greatest marksmen in the Empire he was second in the competition for the highest prize awarded. He not only brought honour on himself, and on the Minister of Militia who appointed him, but upon the Dominion of Canada, the county of Kent, and will say, also, on the new battalion which is now being formed. When the day comes for this battalion to leave Canada, Lt. Colonel

Smith will have associated with him as officers some of the brightest young men that ever breathed the breath of life, Liberals and Conservatives, and I doubt whether a finer fighting force will be found than the 186th Kent Battalion. When the occasion presents itself at the front I know that the 186th will do themselves proud, and do the Empire proud. I say this in all seriousness; in the county of Kent we fight elections as keenly as in any other section of Canada, but when the elections are over politics are forgotten, and we work for the very best interests of the county. As far as great industries in the city of Chatham are concerned, if the Prime Minister were in his seat he would bear me out in saying that Chatham has the very best industries of any city of its size in the whole Dominion. I remember well the Premier paying us a visit during the elections of 1911. On that occasion I had the privilege of hearing the right hon. gentleman address one of the largest meetings ever held in the county, and he paid one of the highest compliments to our industries that has ever been paid by any statesman or leader of any great political party. I do not remember his words exactly, but he was so impressed with our industries and the agricultural district surrounding the city of Chatham that when he came back to headquarters in Ottawa he insisted upon the Minister of Finance paying us a visit, also the Minister of Trade and Commerce, the Minister of Labour, the Minister of Justice, and, as regards members on the back benches, the hon. member for East Lambton (Mr. J. E. Armstrong), the hon. member for East Peterborough (Mr. Sexsmith), and the hon. Mr. Goodeve, who represented Kootenay at that time, but has since been promoted. All these gentlemen came to see the splendid industries established in the city of Chatham and the splendid agricultural sections surrounding it. After they had done their part in paying compliments to our splendid city and county, we also had a visit from Sir Clifford Sifton and Mr. Arthur Hawkes, who also paid their respects to the people of the county of Kent, and I am sure that all these hon. gentlemen will bear me out when I say that no honest Government could conscientiously, if they considered for a moment the industries in the county of Kent, let contracts as they have done by the hundreds of millions of dollars and overlook that county and city of which they said they were so proud, when they paid us those complimentary visits at that particular time. Contracts for shells and boxes have been let not only in the city of St. Thomas, which the hon. Minister of Labour (Mr. Crothers) has the honour of representing, but in the city of London, in the town of Ingersoll; but when the Shell Committee came down the Grand Trunk line, they missed the city of Chatham, jumped over to the town of Walkerville, and gave that town a big contract. As we had some industries that were lying idle, that could manufacture shells or other goods required by the Militia Department for the carrying on of this war, we sent deputation after deputation of the very best citizens of the city of Chatham to wait on the different members of the Government and on other men connected with it who, we thought, might persuade the Government to give our manufacturers some work, because a number of our factories were closing down and a number of men capable of doing work along this particular line were anxious for employment. As proud, however, as all these ministers of the Government and their colleagues were of the city of Chatham, not one dollar's worth of shells or boxes was given to that beautiful city. Seeing that they had visited the city, I thought that it would be well for me to write the Minister of Labour, believing that he would have the patronage of the south-western part of Ontario. I received from that hon. gentleman a very kind letter in which he asked me to write to Colonel Bertram. I took advantage of his suggestion and wrote to Colonel Bertram, and I received a reply from the colonel assuring me that the contracts were all awarded for the shells that were needed at that particular time, but that he would not overlook Chatham at the very earliest opportunity when there were any shell contracts to be let, and that our manufacturers could be sure that they would get their share. While at that time we were in need of work for our labouring men, who are as good a class of mechanics and labourers as are to be found in the province of Ontario, we were unable to get work for them, and all I have to say is this, that thanks to the progressive board of trade and the council and certain intelligent citizens of the city of Chatham, those factories which at that time were in need of contracts to make shells and boxes are going to be working full blast, and our labouring men will be employed without any thanks to the present Administration. We enjoy to-day the proud distinction of being one of the cities that have not gone back at this time of financial stress and trouble, and our city is going to go ahead. In the near future a large sugar plant will be erected which will mean the expenditure of about a million dollars, and other industries are being established at the present time. And I simply want to assure this Government that as far as the city of Chatham is concerned, even if they cannot see their way clear to give us any contracts or any work, the labouring men as well as the manufacturers throughout the county will do everything in their power to put up money and to send men to assist this Government in bringing to a successful conclusion the war which is now raging.

I was particularly pleased to hear the hon. Minister of Militia the other afternoon when he addressed this House make the following statement, as reported on page 304 of Hansard:

> Let us take up next the Militia appointments. Two divisional commanders out of three are good staunch Liberals. I refer to General Currie, of Victoria, and to General Turner, of Quebec, two of the finest fellows who ever stood inside jackets, and two of the best men to be found in the Dominion.
>
> Sir Wilfrid Laurier: Hear, hear.
> Sir Sam Hughes: Not a solitary Conservative in the Whole Dominion objected when I nominated these men for brigadiers long ago. The other one is General Mercer. As regards the politics of the brigadiers, I understand they are about half and half. I do not know what my own son's politics may be, but I know he will vote straight anyway. As regards the lower commanders, I am told by those who have looked up the matter—I have not looked up myself, it would make no difference anyway—that three-fourths of them are Liberal and one-fourth Tory.

It is gratifying to me as one of the younger members of this House to hear the Minister of Militia give not only to the members of this House but to the people throughout the length and breadth of Canada, the assurance that the Liberal party is doing its share in sending men and officers to assist in this great struggle. There are some who make invidious comparisons, men who we sometimes say belong to the flag-waving party. These men, in the face of this announcement, will never again dare to say that the Liberal party in this great struggle is not doing its duty in the way of supplying officers, when we already have three out of four commanding the different companies and regiments.

On this and on other occasions there have come up matters to which almost every speaker has referred, and there is one which is certainly very amusing.

Speakers on the opposite side, and on this side, are all referring, Sir, to two gentlemen from your native province, Mr. Bourassa and Mr. Lavergne, and they all seem to be trying to drop them like two hot coals. In the constituency which I represent, one of the great points made during the campaign at the last general election was that all that the Conservatives needed was to win twenty-two seats. In the Conservative paper of my city, on the night when the hon. Minister of Finance addressed the electors in my riding, there was quite a long article saying that twenty-two seats would win the election for Sir Robert Borden, and in the report of that meeting in the paper there was given a summary of how it could be accomplished; that is, that Mr. Bourassa would carry many seats in Quebec, because the fight was not on the reciprocity issue, but the great issue was that the people of Quebec were opposed to Laurier and his navy. This was the argument they were putting up—that they would carry so many seats in Ontario, so many seats in the Maritime Provinces and the West, and Bourassa would carry so many seats in Quebec, and this would put the Conservatitve party into power. Let me assure hon. gentlemen that, so far as the county of Kent is concerned, on patriotic lines we are a united people, and will do everything possible to assist this Government in carrying on our share of the war.

Many references have been made to the speech of the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Carvell), especially in the speech of the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Burrell), whom I am glad to see in his place. I feel that I speak for every hon. member on this side of the House when I assure the hon. minister that so far as he is personally concerned we regard him as one of the finest gentlemen we have in this House at this time. I believe the member for Carleton rendered a great service not only to this Parliament but also to the agriculturists of Canada in placing before this House the charges he made with regard to the contracts in his own province. It is greatly to the credit of the hon. member for Carleton that he at last woke up the Minister of Agriculture to deliver a speech with the fire and vim that the minister displayed. If the minister would only follow up his great agitation of a year ago for "Patriotism and Production" with the same force and energy that he displayed in his abuse of the hon. member for Carleton, it would be a great blessing for the agriculturists of Canada. What has the hon. minister been doing the last two or three sessions? I put that question to the respected colleagues of the hon. minister. The charge is made that a contract has been entered into for 15,000 tons of hay at $23 a ton. I cannot understand why the members on the Conservative side of the House, particularly those from the province of Ontario, elected by the agriculturists of that province, will sit in their places and pound their desks when the minister announces a contract of this kind, when there are tons upon tons of hay in the province of Ontario for which we cannot get more than $12 or $13 a ton. No person knows better than I do that if one cannot get a market for his products it is mighty little use to grow them. But if the minister wished to contract for 15,000 tons of hay—I put this to hon. gentlemen on the other side who are interested in agriculture—would it not have been better to divide that up into two or three contracts of moderate size and give to the farmers of Ontario—of whom we are so proud at election times particularly, and to whom we always appeal for support—an opportunity to supply the requirements? In the southwestern part of Ontario we have the best hay-producing section in this whole dominion.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Except Rouville.

Mr. McCOIG: Out of respect to the hon. gentleman (Mr. Lemieux), I will revise that, and say that we can produce hay equally good and in equally large quantities with any other section of the Dominion. But if we can not sell our hay to the Government or to the people of our own large cities, then, if we see a market across the line, we want the privilege of sending our hay to that market. But what has happened? This contract is let at $23 a ton to friends of the Government—that is not denied by the minister—and the very minute that contract is let an embargo is put upon hay so that it can not be sent out of this country. That simply means that the Minister of Agriculture was neglecting the men whom he is alleged to represent in this House.

In the same way, on the first day of May last, a very similar thing was done by this Government when it passed an order in council placing an embargo on wool. The Minister of Agriculture—

Mr. WILCOX: Will the hon. gentleman allow me—

Mr. McCOIG: I appeal to you, Mr. Speaker—you have been one of my old friends on the ball ground. The hon. member for North Essex had his innings the other day, and I think the House will allow me my innings to-day. I say that on the first day of May last an embargo was placed upon wool, and I appeal to the Minister of Agriculture if that is not so. This was in the warm season when the farmers were shearing their sheep—at any rate that was the case in my own constituency. Now, naturally, farmers in humble circumstances do not know the minds of this Government and of the Minister of Agriculture. They naturally thought that this embargo was put on for keeps. They would not suppose that it was done for a joke. These farmers assumed that this was a business act by business men. And so they went on and sold their wool. At the time the embargo was put on the price of wool was 30 cents a pound. On 8th May it was 20-25 cents; on 15th May it was down to 20 cents, and the same on 22nd May. But the agricultural papers of the province of Ontario put up such a fight that the minister could not stand it, and so he put the embargo off. Immediately the price went back to 25 cents, and by 25th June it was 35 cents. The difference in price between this date and the time when the embargo was on was 15 cents a pound, and who was the loser? The loser was the man in humble circumstances, wherever he may live throughout the length and breadth of Canada, who was engaged in the sheep industry. The loss of the average man in this matter was enough to have paid his hired man for the season.

At six o'clock, the House took recess.

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

THE GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH.

ADDRESS IN REPLY.

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Alfred Thompson for an Address to His Royal Highness the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session.

Mr. McCOIG: Mr. Speaker, when the House rose at six o'clock I was endeavouring to draw to the attention of the Hon. Minister of Agriculture some of the reasons why I felt that he should look into many parts of his department and try to make some alterations which would be greatly to the benefit of the farmers whom he represents in this House. I had finished my references to the question of placing an embargo on wool. There is now another matter which I should like to draw to the attention of the House, and that is the tobacco industry.

We have in the county of Kent, and also in the adjoining counties, a great number of farmers who have been encouraged to go into the tobacco industry, and who have spent large sums of money on the advice of the Government of this country. About two years ago, after the farmers had invested large sums of money in that industry, and had endeavoured to put it on a paying basis, and give employment to a large number of labouring men who were looking for work in the different counties, I drew the attention of the Minister of Agriculture to the fact that the farmers, who had grown the tobacco, had been unable to dispose of it and that they felt that the purchasing of that particular crop had been left too much in the hands of one buyer. In fact, it was alleged by these producers that there was a combine, so far as the purchasing of tobacco was concerned, in the different southwestern counties of the province of Ontario. I drew the attention of the Minister of Agriculture to the matter, feeling that he would be interested, or at all events should be interested, in the different agricultural industries which are carried on in all parts of the Dominion, and that he should endeavour to do something to assist the farmers in that particular industry.

The reply I received from the minister, I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, was very cold consolation for the farmers to whom I referred. If I remember rightly, his letter referred me to the Minister of Labour, and told me that if there was a combine, the farmers could take the matter up under the Combines Act and possibly get some redress from that source. Whether the Department of Agriculture could do anything or not, it certainly did very little at that particular time in trying to assist the farmers who were engaged in the tobacco industry, or in endeavouring to find markets for the crops which they could not dispose of in that particular section of the country.

Time went on, things grew worse, and the farmers, feeling that they could not possibly continue in that industry unless something was done, made up their minds to come to Ottawa. They came to Ottawa and were received by hon. ministers of the Government. The Minister of Agriculture was absent, possibly unavoidably, at any rate he was not present, but I have never heard that he got any information from the ministers who received that delegation, or that he took any steps to assist them in the work in which they were interested. I can assure you, Sir, that on that occasion the deputation, which numbered between 200 and 300, and the members of which had paid their own fares from extreme points in the province of Ontario to Ottawa, and included many from the province of Quebec, went away after their courteous reception feeling that they would have some assistance from the Government of this country.

I remember the arguments that were advanced. They asked if the Government would change the excise duty to a customs duty. It was contended by the Minister of Finance, and by the other gentlemen who spoke on that occasion, that there was practically no difference so far as that was concerned. They asked for other concessions. I remember well that some of the farmers argued that there was a great difference between an excise duty and a customs duty, and that if the Government said that their request would be granted they would go home perfectly satisfied, feeling that they had accomplished something as a result of their trip to the capital of the Dominion.

Shortly afterwards I remember the Minister of Finance summoned some manufacturers of this country to meet him. The manufacturers, who numbered possibly four or five, had an interview with the minister, but the Government has done practically nothing since; certainly, nothing has been heard so far as assisting the tobacco growers is concerned.

After their visit to Ottawa the Ontario producers met Quebec consumers, and were able, by their own efforts, to dispose of a portion of their crop which they had in their barns at that particular time. The position is this: If the farmers cannot depend upon the Minister of Agriculture taking an interest in the crops which his department encourages the farmers to produce, to whom are the farmers to go for assistance in important matters of that kind? I understand that the people who are interested in this great industry are coming back to Ottawa to wait upon the Government again, and to see if there is not some possible way of assisting them. I hope that when they do return the Minister of Agriculture will be able to join his colleagues in receiving such an important body of men, and will see his way to give not only encouragement but some substantial assistance.

There is another matter to which I wish to call the attention of the Government, particularly the Minister of Agriculture. There are many matters of importance connected with his department in which he seems to take very little interest. A year ago the farmers, not only of my county, but of other counties in the province of Ontario, were threatened with an epidemic of hog cholera, which threatened to wipe out the hog industry. At that time the farmers connected with one of the farmers' institutes in my county wrote to the minister and asked him to come and wait upon them and discuss the situation with the view of suggesting measures which would save those interested in the hog industry from great financial loss. What happened on that occasion? The Minister of Agriculture replied to those farmers that he was too busy to come and meet them. He was too busy at that time to go to the county of Kent and discuss that important question which was causing financial loss, but he was not too busy a short time before that to go and address a Conservative convention in the city of Chatham. The farmers took the matter up and one of the veterinaries came to the city of Chatham and heard the arguments of the farmers, and he left with an entirely different view of the situation from that he had formerly held. When the matter was brought up in this House, the Prime Minister made a note of the matter, and I believe he insisted upon the Minister of Agriculture taking steps to assist the hog industry. I repeat if you cannot depend on the Minister of Agriculture to look after the industries connected with his department, whom can we depend upon? A year ago the minister and his department, recommended the farmers to go in for wheat extensively. A few weeks ago I read in one of the Toronto papers an interview in which the deputy minister advised them not to go into wheat-growing extensively, but to curtail their wheat crops and go into cattle raising extensively. The result is that to-day in the province of Ontario, and particularly in the section I come from, we have not one-half the acreage in wheat which we had twelve months ago. What followed? The farmers curtailed their crops, and when the market opened they were receiving $1 a bushel for their wheat. A few farmers at that time disposed of it. I was one of the few who were fortunate enough to do so, and I got a dollar a bushel for a thousand bushels of wheat. But after that wheat began to drop; it went down from $1 to 95 cents, then 85 cents, then 80 cents, and finally as low as 75 cents a bushel. The men who were in humble circumstances in the province of Ontario had to dispose of their wheat at the smaller price. On the 24th November this Government commandeered 15,000,000 bushels of wheat. If my hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture has the confidence of his colleagues he should have known that this wheat was going to be commandeered in November. The minute that announcement was made by the Government the price of wheat began to go up until to-day we see that May wheat is quoted at $1.35 a bushel. The farmers who, after threshing, were forced to sell their wheat to pay their taxes, their rent, the interest on their mortgages, the notes that they had given for the things which it was necessary for them to procure to enable them to conduct their business, and generally to meet their liabilities, had to dispose of their wheat, and these men who were unable to hold it for the reasons I have enumerated, had to take a smaller price than that which the wealthy farmers, millers and elevator men were able to demand for the wheat which they had in store. We had a larger acreage of wheat in the province than usual, largely because of the campaign which had been carried on in 1914. The farmers should have been advised that there would be this demand for wheat by the Minister of Agriculture, whose duty it is to give information to the people who are depending upon him. I was glad that my hon. friend from Carleton, N.B., (Mr. Carvell) woke up the Minister of Agriculture the other day to new life and vigour in this House, and I hope that an equal energy will characterize his administration of the department over which he presides.

Not only did the farmers in humble circumstances sustain a loss by the disposal of their wheat at this particular time, but the farmer has even a greater grievance against the Government than this. I refer to the scandals which have arisen in different parts of the country in connection with the purchase of horses for military purposes. The question of the purchase of horses by the Government was brought prominently before the House twelve months ago. After the late member for Kings, N.S., had been read out of the party by the right hon. the Prime Minister, we expected that we would hear no more about members or supporters of the Government taking a prominent part in the purchasing of horses. A year or two ago, when a great many horses of an inferior quality were thrown upon the market, it was advertised in the press of the country that this was the class of horses that was being shipped from Canada for war purposes. As far as the purchase of horses is concerned, we care not how much was made by certain men down in Kings county, N.S., but we do complain that, as a consequence of these men throwing an inferior class of horses upon the market, in order to make a few dollars, the reputation of Canadian horses has, to a certain extent, been ruined, to the great injury of our legitimate farmers, who, for many years, on the advice not only of the present Government, but of previous governments, have been endeavouring to make the horse industry one of the most important in this Dominion. But what do we find? We find that the same practices which occurred in Nova Scotia were repeated in Ontario. Considering the high regard that we all have for the hon. gentleman who represents the constituency we would scarcely expect that a similar ambition would manifest itself there; but in the constituency of the hon. gentleman who represents the county of Peel (Mr. Blain) we find that the Conservative member of the Provincial Legislature gets a contract and goes into the horse-buying business also.

Now, let us see what the press of the country says about these particular transactions. First, I shall read from the Toronto World, a good Conservative paper, which, I am sure, my hon. friends opposite will not object to me quoting. The World says:

> Tells Sir Charles Davidson, Royal Commissioner, of Sale of Horses for Army—Some Rejected Sold—Albert Kee, Brampton Liveryman, Says Horses Turned Down, Accepted After.
>
> Brampton, Dec. 1.—As a result of rumours that have been in circulation here for some time, an investigation regarding the buying of army horses in Peel county, dating back to August, 1914, was opened before Sir Charles Davidson, Royal Commissioner, here yesterday afternoon, John Thompson, K.C., of Ottawa, conducted the examination.
>
> The first witness called was E. J. Jones, a horse dealer of Brampton. He had, in partnership with James E. Fallis, also of Brampton, sold 360 horses in August, 1914, to the government agents, Col. Hall and Capt. McDonald. Fallis financed the business and received two-thirds of the profits, one-third being his share.
>
> To Mr. Thompson's inquiry as to the profits out of this sale of horses, Jones replied:
>
> "About $3,200. I received $1,000 and my partner about $2,000."

This Mr. Fallis was a member of the Legislature, and he received $2,000 and his partner $1,000. That is where the trouble began again.

What did the Toronto News say about the investigation? I will just read the headlines. As every hon. member of this House knows, this is one of the leading Conservative papers in the province:

Fifteen-Year-Old Horse sold at Brampton for the Army—Sir Charles Davidson continues investigation into Purchases—Deny Payments of Commission—One horse said to have been "fixed up" by Shoes.

I have another from the Toronto Star:

Davidson Probe at Brampton Wednesday—Too many Middlemen in the Horse Purchases for Government—A man who "helped"—Evidence not sensational, but "influence" was apparently a Requisite.

Then follows the report, which states that:

Twelve others were rejected. Some of these had been sold for war purposes later.

Witness declared that an inspector named Hall had first rejected and later purchased some of the horses.

Four or five of the rejected horses—possibly the whole 12—had been sold through Fallis.

Asked if he had paid any commission to anyone, he said he had given $110 in cash to E. J. Jones, a previous witness. This was after the rejected horses were purchased.

Here is another heading from the Toronto Star:

Jack-Spavined horse sound "in a sense"—Sold as Four Years Old, Although Age couldn't be estimated—Another was lazy—Would Balk when Heavily loaded—Royal Commission Investigates Purchases.

The Mail and Empire states practically the same thing:

Albert Kee, of Brampton, said that he had purchased 22 horses, but had only been able to dispose of eight of them at the outset to the Government. Subsequently five or six of the animals which had been at first rejected were accepted and sent to the Union Stock Yards in Toronto. He admitted that he had given E. J. Jones $110 after the inspection was over. Pressed for his reason for making the payment, he said that he thought Jones "had earned it."

"How had he earned it?" he was asked, and he replied, "He helped get the inspectors to our stables."

The Toronto Star again has a large headline:

Peel County War Horses not up to Standard—Local Veterinary says many could not stand up to the Work—Were bought by J. R. Fallis, M.P.P.—Conflicting evidence given as to Price asked by a Bolton Vendor.

I have a long editorial from the Toronto Globe. It is headed: "A Disgrace in Public Life." Many hon. members of this House have no doubt read this article. I have also a few clippings from the Conservative press which it would be in order to read to the members of the House. But I find that the Globe, on December 11, 1915, says:

J. R. Fallis, M.P.P., for Peel, confers with Premier.

What is to be done about Mr. J. R. Fallis, M.P.P., for Peel, who made handsome profits buying horses and selling them to the Government for military purposes? The question is taking up some of the time of Premier Hearst. Mr. Fallis had a lengthy conference with the Premier yesterday. Mr. Richard Blain, M.P., for Peel, was the third party in the conference, and was there presumably to assist Mr. Fallis in presenting his case.

Mr. Fallis greeted the newspapermen amiably, but said, holding up his hand, "I have nothing for you," and left with Mr. Blain. "I have nothing at all to say regarding the conference," said the Premier. No other member of the Cabinet was present with the Premier.

The Toronto Telegram of December 6, 1915, also has a strong editorial demanding the resignation of Mr. Fallis from the Provincial Legislature. The Toronto News strongly condemns the action of this gentleman. I could go on reading clippings to the same effect from leading newspapers throughout the country, but it is hardly necessary. I should just like to call attention to the following from the Toronto World of July 28, 1915:

Shipment of Horses on way to the War.

Two Grand Trunk railway trains loaded with army horses passed through Toronto yesterday en route from Chicago to Montreal. One of these trains had 50 cars, and the other 19, so that in all there were about 1,400 horses. At West Toronto the cars were unloaded the chargers to be exercised and watered, and horsemen who saw them were surprised at the quality of the selection. The horses were bought by the British military authorities in Chicago, and were rounded up in all the Western States.

A Grand Trunk railway official stated that since the declaration of war more than 80,000 horses have been shipped through Toronto on their way to the front.

Since that date many thousands more horses must have passed through this country from American points. The farmers of this country have a right to expect the Minister of Agriculture and the Prime Minister to help them dispose of the large surplus of horses we have in this country, particularly in Ontario. But what do we find? Instead of helping the farmer, the Government imposes an embargo which prohibits the farmers of Ontario from shipping their horses just over the line to the State of Michigan, where, after paying $10 duty, they could dispose of these horses to the army buyers in the States. The Government did nothing to help the farmer until practically the very day before Parliament met, when an order in council was passed removing the embargo. I tell you, Mr. Speaker, the farmers of this country are discouraged, and it is incumbent on the Minister of Agriculture or some other member of the Government to announce to this House and the country whether they intend to give any assistance to this great industry, or are going to follow the same unfortunate policy they have pursued in the past. Unless the horse industry is stimulated and encouraged, and the Government finds some way of disposing of the surplus horses we have on hand, the farmers will not raise so many horses in 1916 as they did in 1915. I think I have shown that the Government is neglecting this great industry.

You will remember, Mr. Speaker, that we were told some time ago the Cockshutt Plow Company were not going to raise their prices on agricultural implements because they were too patriotic. In conversation with a farmer the other day who had endeavoured to purchase a Cockshutt machine, I learned that he had been told by one of the Cockshutt agents that their prices had gone up all along the line. This hon. gentleman, who was so patriotic a year ago that he was complimented by the Prime Minister on his stand, has fallen from grace and is raising the price of agricultural implements to the farmers of this country. It is now rumored that there will be another increase in the tax on agricultural implements. I hope this will not take place. I appeal to the Government to be satisfied with the taxes they are already levying upon the farmers of this country, and in this connection let me quote from a speech made by the Minister of Labour in the city of Chatham during the Reciprocity campaign of 1911. I am quoting from the Chatham Daily Planet of July 31, 1911. The minister said:

> If the farmers went down (to Ottawa) they would get the same answer as the fruit growers got. The duty will remain on binders though. In other words, the duty will remain on everything the farmer buys, because Sir Wilfred says the duty will remain on manufactured goods. The duty—in other words, the taxes—will be removed in all things you produce and left on all things you have to buy. Is that fair taxation? Why, this agreement is directly in favour of the manufacturer instead of the farmer!

If the question of raising the duty comes up again, I hope the Minister of Labour will practice the same thing that he preached before the Conservative convention at Chatham on that day.

We have been told by different gentlemen in this House that questions of a contentious nature should not be brought up in the House at the present time. I contend that the matters I have had the privilege of bringing before the House are not contentious in any sense of the word. I have brought these matters to the attention of the ministers of the different departments, because if they give them their serious attention, it will be of great benefit to the farmers of my county and of Canada as a whole, and will greatly assist the manufacturers of my city, and labour generally. We shall then be in a better position to bear our share in the great war that is now going on. I appeal to the Government to give these matters their earnest consideration, and I feel satisfied that if they do so it will greatly assist us in doing what we are all interested in, that is to carry this war through to a successful conclusion.

Mr. F. B. McCURDY (Shelburne and Queens): Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to participate in this debate, and should not have done so had it not been for an unfair and, to my mind, most unwarranted attack made by an hon. member of this House upon an officer in His Majesty's service.

As you can understand, the people of the province which has given to public life in Canada a Howe, a Tupper, a Thompson and a Borden, are jealous of the reputation and standing of their public men. They rejoice when these public men achieve distinction, and are disappointed when they fail to measure up to the full stature of a man in public affairs. It was, therefore, with extreme regret that I heard from the lips of an hon. gentleman representing a Nova Scotia constituency such remarks as on Wednesday were made by my hon. friend from North Cape Breton (Mr. McKenzie.) And I venture to say that his unseemly attack will similarly bring the blush of shame to the cheeks of those of his own political friends in the province of Nova Scotia and outside of it who are concerned in the effective prosecution of the war.

When the war broke out one of the very first to volunteer from the province of Nova Scotia, and to place his services unqualifiedly at the disposal of his King, was Major Muirhead. He had served for many years as an officer in the active militia. He had spared neither time nor effort to secure military instruction, and on the outbreak of war he was well fitted to render military service to his King and country. He possesses a long and honourable record in the active militia; and, holding at that time the rank of major, so anxious was he to participate in the war that he offered his services in any capacity, and was willing to go as a private, if necessary, in order that he might have an opportunity of reaching the front and confronting the enemy.

For nine months Major Muirhead has been in the trenches, and for the last four months of that period he has been a member and in charge of a bombing party, which you know, Sir, is the most dangerous branch of the service. Because of the gallant character of his services at the front and by reason of merit alone he has been appointed major in the 112th regiment now being mobilized in Nova Scotia. The hon. member for North Cape Breton (Mr. McKenzie) says that Major Muirhead has been promoted. A major he was in the active militia, a major he is in the overseas force. I will agree with the hon. member that a transfer from the active militia force to the overseas force is promotion, but of a different character perhaps from that which my hon. friend had in his mind. Muirhead still retains the rank of major which he had before.

It is this soldier with this sort of a record that my hon. friend shows the extreme patriotism and courtesy to attack, sheltered as he is by the privileges of this House and with the safe distance of 800 miles intervening between him and the object of his spleen.

As the House may have surmised, this matter is connected with an election trial, which took place in Victoria county, N.S. Unfortunately it would appear that irregularities were practised in this contest on both sides. Unfortunately some friends of the Conservative candidate thought it necessary to fight fire with fire, and were led to combat the political methods with which the friends of my hon. friend had so well familiarized the constituency with practices of a similar character. With that canniness which so eminently characterizes my hon. friend from North Cape Breton, legal proceedings were not pressed by his friends until the time had elapsed during which, under the Nova Scotia Act, personal actions for bribery might be brought against Liberal workers, who, I may say, were under the direction of my hon. friend. The hon. gentleman was himself present at this election trial in question; in fact, he acted as one of the counsel. He had every facility for being correctly advised on the matters with which he attempted to deal when he attempted to speak on Wednesday. It would be unparliamentary for me to say that the hon. member deliberately and maliciously misled the House in respect to the matters to which he referred. I am, however, bound to assert that notwithstanding the facilities for knowledge of the facts which he had at his disposal, the statements which he made to the House are absolutely and patently incorrect and untrue.

Mr. McKENZIE: I rise to a point of order. The hon. gentleman states that I made statements which were absolutely and patently untrue. Will he please repeat what I stated and what he says is untrue?

Mr. SPEAKER: I think that the point of order is well taken, and I would like the hon. member to withdraw the expression "untrue."

Mr. McCURDY: The hon. member for North Cape Breton has asked me to state in what regard his statements are absolutely and patently incorrect and untrue, and with your permission, Sir, I shall have pleasure in doing so. On page 316 of the Unrevised Hansard, we have the following statement by the hon. member for North Cape Breton:

> If the Prime Minister, or anybody else who cares to look the matter up, will turn to the files of the Halifax Herald—the organ of the right hon. gentleman—of a few days ago, they will find on the front page the picture of a distinguished gentlemen who some time ago fled the country on the pretext that he was going to the war. He will find that this gentleman is back in Nova Scotia with the title of major, and that he is going to be given a battalion in the province of Nova Scotia and sent back to the front. Why was he sent away? Why did he leave the country? He left the country, Sir, because the Supreme Court of Nova Scotia was entering upon a trial at that time, in which trial he has been found guilty of forgery; in which, in not less than eight cases, he has been found guilty of being an accessory before and after the fact to perjury. He was blacklisted and disqualified by the Supreme Court of Nova Scotia, and under that cloud he left the country.

Mr. McKENZIE: That is all true.

Mr. McCURDY (reading):

> But he came back—he came back promoted to the position of major, and he is to-day honoured and petted and advanced in the county of Halifax, where the patronage belongs to the Prime Minister, and with the knowledge that the records of the Supreme Court of Nova Scotia prove to the hilt everything that I say in respect of him.

Was it fair, was it honourable, was it truthful, for the hon. gentleman to assert that Major Muirhead fled the country on the pretext that he was going to the war? The hon. gentleman cannot deny that when Major Muirhead enlisted for service at the front, there was no charge against him of any kind, and that it was only after he had been gone for months that his name incidentally figured in an election trial begun many weeks after he had gone overseas. What does the hon. gentleman mean when he says:

> Major Muirhead fled the country on the pretext that he was going to the war.

Does he wish to intimate that Major Muirhead has not actually participated in the war? Will he deny that the major has for the last eight months faced death in every form in the defence of the rights and privileges which my hon. friend to-day enjoys in ease and without privation? When the hon. gentleman says:

> Major Muirhead left the country, because the Supreme Court of Nova Scotia was entering upon a trial at that time, in which trial he has been found guilty of forgery; and in which, in not less than eight cases, he has been found guilty of being an accessory before and after the fact to perjury.

The hon. gentleman says something which he has every facility for ascertaining is absolutely and patently untrue.

Mr. McKENZIE: As a member of this House I have a right to protect myself. I was quoting a matter of record of the Supreme Court of Nova Scotia, and I consider that the record is open to my hon. friend, and the record will show that I was not wrong at all.

Mr. McCURDY: I have not the honour of being as familiar with the practices of that court as is my hon. friend. I have not had the privilege of being a practicing barrister before the courts of Nova Scotia, nor of being a judge of the County Court of Nova Scotia, but I do affirm and my hon. friend cannot controvert my statement that the record of the Supreme Court of Nova Scotia gives no warrant for my hon. friend's assertion that Major Muirhead was ever disqualified by that Supreme Court. Furthermore, at that trial Major Muirhead was not found guilty of perjury; he was not even charged with perjury; he had no notice before he enlisted, nor before he went overseas that he would figure in any way in the trial, and consequently he had not the slightest opportunity of rebutting references to him which were disclosed as the trial proceeded. I have the personal assurance of the major himself that had he been present he could have absolutely absolved himself from any blame in connection with the election in question in any way whatever, and I accept his statement without the slightest reserve.

The hon. member for North Cape Breton has also deemed it his duty to attack an officer of the 85th Battalion now quartered at Halifax, Dr. Joseph Hayes. He states that Dr. Hayes was made a colonel by the present Minister of Militia. Once again the hon. gentleman's statements are at absolute variance with the facts. He has not even taken the trouble to look up the militia list which is available to every member of this House and to every citizen of this country. Like some other members on the opposite side of the House, he satisfies himself with making assertions although the proof that these assertions are unfounded is open to any person who will take the trouble to seek it. Dr. Hayes received his commission as colonel while the Liberal Minister of Militia was in office six or seven years before 1911. Does the hon. member for North Cape Breton question the truth of that statement? Furthermore, Colonel Hayes received his appointment with the 85th Regiment, with which he is now connected, on the recommendation of the officer now commanding that regiment. The name of that officer was mentioned in the House the other day by the Minister of Militia. It is no secret that this officer stated that in the election of 1911 he went from Ottawa to Halifax and personally marshalled the members of the force there to vote against the present Prime Minister of this country. Colonel Borden has himself stated that he, and he alone, was responsible for the appointment of that officer. Furthermore, Colonel Borden has assured me within the past two weeks that he would not know where to look for a more efficient officer than Colonel Hayes. He says that no more satisfactory and capable officer could possibly be found.

The hon. member for North Cape Breton criticises Dr. Hayes' appointment as medical officer of the 85th Regiment on the ground that he is a Tory. Why did he not criticise the appointment of Dr. J. A. Sponagle as medical officer of the 25th Battalion on the ground that he is a Grit?

Mr. Speaker, I am gratified to be able to state that no Conservative member in this Parliament, and I believe no Conservative in the country, has ever been guilty of attacking Colonel Sponagle or any of the numerous other Liberal officers who have received just recognition and promotion on the ground of their party affiliations. It remained for statesmen of the stature of my hon. friend from Carleton (Mr. Carvell) the hon member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald), and the hon. member for North Cape Breton and Victoria (Mr. McKenzie) to introduce a discordant and unprovoked element into a branch of the service, which, of all others, should be immune from such attacks.

The hon. member for North Cape Breton states that in the county of Halifax, to quote his own words, "the vilest sort of partisans are put at the head of battalions in the highest positions that they can be given." Who are these "vile partisans" of whom he complains? The last battalion to complete mobilization in the province of Nova Scotia is the 85th. Colonel Allison H. Borden, to whom I have already referred, is the first in command of that regiment. Who is the second in command? Colonel N. H. Parsons, one of the strongest and most active Liberal workers in the county of Kings, a gentleman who quite recently has been addressing Liberal clubs in the Annapolis valley. As to Paymaster Morrison, who, I think, comes from the hon. gentleman's own part of the country, is he to be branded a "vile partisan"? The third officer in command of this battalion is Major Day, whose residence in the United States has removed him from close connection with party associations in this country. He is a splendid type of the expatriated Canadian who in this great emergency have returned to Canada to offer their lives and their all to defend the land of their birth and to ensure the triumph of the cause of civilization.

Mr. Speaker, I wonder what the sturdy soldiers who compose that regiment, particularly those from the county which the hon. member represents, would say to the hon. gentleman, who would state, on his responsibility as a member of this House, that the officers in command of this regiment—Colonel Borden, Colonel Parsons, Major Day, Paymaster Morrison and the other officers of this popular and efficient staff—are "the vilest sort of partisans." I take the responsibility, in their absence and on their behalf, of publicly branding that statement as one absolutely untruthful, unfortunate, and regrettable, one that should not have been made either in this House or out of this House.

Mr. McKENZIE: I never made the statement at all.

Mr. McCURDY: I will refer to the hon. gentleman's statement as reported at page 316 of the unrevised Hansard:

> But I do charge, in the presence of the Prime Minister, who is a Nova Scotian of whom we are proud, that in the county of Halifax, where I hold him responsible for the patronage, the vilest sort of partisans are put at the head of battalions in the highest possible positions that they can be given.

Mr. McKENZIE: That is absolutely true.

Mr. McCURDY: The highest position in the battalion is that of colonel. The latest battalion mobilized in Nova Scotia is the 85th, of which Colonel Borden is the respected, efficient, and honoured commanding officer.

Mr. McKENZIE: I had no reference to Colonel Borden.

Mr. McCURDY: If the hon. member for North Cape Breton does not refer to Colonel Borden, I would ask him to whom he does refer. There are only two regiments quartered in Halifax—

Mr. McKENZIE: If the hon. gentleman wants to know, I had two men in mind, two men blacklisted and condemned by the Supreme Court,—Muirhead and Hayes. These are the only two I had in mind, and I have the record of the Supreme Court to back me up.

Mr. McCURDY: I would suggest to my hon. friend from North Cape Breton, in view of his confession at this time, that he can properly be more particular in the statements he makes in this House. It is not too much to expect that hon. gentlemen who make statements in this House reflecting upon the character of others should be most particular as to what they say. But apparently my hon. friend has imbibed the spirit which has been characteristic of some hon. gentlemen opposite during the course of this debate—that of being ready to make charges and assertions without having the proofs to back them up. The language which my hon. friend used was most explicit. He said that those who hold the highest commissions in these regiments are the vilest sort of partisans. That narrows the case down to the highest officers of the regiment, and, necessarily, so far as I can see, includes the colonels of the 85th and 64th regiments.

I think it is extremely unfortunate and most regrettable that any reference should be made to the politics of the men who are fighting for their country at the present time. I believe, furthermore, that the references that have been made in this connection are most repugnant to them and most repugnant to the people of the country at large. If there is to be no truce in this Parliament, if there is to be no truce upon the hustings, hon. gentlemen opposite should at least afford to declare a truce with regard to the army itself. Surely men may be allowed to go to the discharge of their duties without being attacked for political affiliations one way or the other.

I can fully appreciate the fact that the provincial by-election, which so emphatically pronounced against Grit methods in the province of Nova Scotia, should be a point of extreme soreness on the part of my hon. friend. More than once has this House listened to the lamentations of this modern Jeremiah, who quotes so glibly from Holy Writ. There is a reason for the hon. gentleman's woe. Victoria county is a part of his own constituency, and in the election referred to a Liberal majority of 500 was converted into a substantial Conservative majority. It would appear, therefore, that this election points with unmistakable finger to the goal of political oblivion to which my hon. friend is fast hastening.

Mr. McKENZIE: I shall be glad to meet the hon. gentleman if he wants a test in Victoria county.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. McCURDY: My hon. friend would be glad to meet me or some one else there; my opinion is that he will have sufficient opposition without me.

In his speech the hon. gentleman pretended to see indications that the country was returning to the Liberal faith. But I noticed that he had to go a long way from home for consolation. Why does he go so far afield? Why does he not pay attention to his own county of Victoria? Why should he look to the politics of British Columbia, of Manitoba, of even Prince Edward Island, or New Brunswick, for consolation? Why does he not cast his practised eye on the political situation in the province of Nova Scotia? Since the last general election in that province four local contests have been held in counties which have been looked on as having strong Liberal proclivities; to quote the classic language of my hon. friend, they are known as "Grit hives." In every one of these cases—Liberals had represented three of the four of them previous to the by-elections—the electors pronounced strongly and unmistakably against the party to which my hon. friend belongs.

The political mentor of my hon. friend in the province of Nova Scotia, the Hon. George H. Murray, years ago had a slogan: "Trust the people." The result of the elections to which I have referred has evidently convinced him that he is not altogether safe when he trusts the people. In fact, they say in Nova Scotia that he has changed his motto from "Trust the people" to "Safety first." Would it surprise you, Mr. Speaker, to know that the riding of Victoria has been vacant over a year; that my hon. friend's own constituents were denied the privilege of representation in the last session of the Provincial Legislature, and will be denied that privilege in the coming session, because, forsooth, acting possibly on the advice of the hon. member for North Cape Breton and Victoria, the Premier of that province feels that it is unsafe to trust the people to fill the long existing vacancy in the local House for the county of Cape Breton.

With a splendid show of public spirit the hon. gentleman pretended to take great pride in the fact that "from the start to the finish of the present war the yeomanry of Canada were ready to sacrifice their lives and property and everything near and dear to them for the general advancement of our country, and to lay everything within their reach upon the altar of our country." I would respectfully commend to my hon. friend the advisability of his profiting by this splendid example set by the yeomanry of Canada. But while this attitude is being assumed by our yeomanry, what is to be said of those who from their position should be regarded as leaders in this country? It is to be said that, while the yeomanry of Canada are making such splendid and heroic sacrifices for the liberties that we enjoy, the only people to refuse to make sacrifices are those to whom the people ought to be able to look for leadership in Canada? While the yeomanry of Canada, as my hon. friend says, are sacrificing their all for their country, and brave soldiers like Major Muirhead are holding life itself cheap that the interests of the country may be advanced, a small critic gives us the spectacle of being unwilling to forego the opportunity of venting his personal spite and spleen for one moment in the interests of unity and national strength.

Mr. ARTHUR B. COPP (Westmorland): Mr. Speaker, since the opening of this, the third war session of this Parliament a great many admirable addresses have been delivered by gentlemen on both sides of the House, addresses which, I am sure, as showing the strong feeling of loyalty and patriotism with which members of this House are imbued, must appeal to the country as a whole. I am sure, Sir, that no one could listen to or read those addresses without feeling that every member of this House, on which ever side of the Speaker he may sit, is prepared, as he has been prepared since the beginning of the war, to do his part to bring this world conflict, which is shaking the British Empire to her very foundations, to a successful and triumphant conclusion.

My hon. friends opposite have, at least to a certain degree, questioned the right of hon. gentlemen on this side of the House to offer criticism, or to make charges in regard to the administration of the affairs of this country, offering as a reason for taking this course that, because the country is at war, we should not offer criticism and thus embarrass the Government. Now, I am sure that the hon. member who has just left the chamber, and who addressed the House a few moments ago (Mr. F. B. McCurdy) will pardon me if I do not attempt to answer anything personal he has said in regard to my hon. friend from North Cape Breton (Mr. McKenzie). That is a matter in which I do not care to join, even if I had the facts to discuss it intelligently, which I have not, as it is a matter apparently of veracity between the members who represent Nova Scotia on the other side of the House and the hon. members who represent that province on this side.

But I would like to refer to one remark which my hon. friend made. He said it was an unfortunate thing that reference should be made to the politics of men who were engaged in this war. I agree with the sentiment expressed by my hon. friend, but I would remind him, and other hon. gentlemen opposite, that it can be no greater crime to refer to the politics of men who are engaged in this war than it is for hon. gentlemen opposite to select men because of their politics to fill places in the army service during the war.

My hon. friend spent some minutes in discussing the recent elections in the province of Nova Scotia. Is it possible that my hon. friend has a nightmare in regard to elections in Nova Scotia or elsewhere at the present moment? Nothing has been said in the debate on the address about elections in the province of Nova Scotia, or in the Dominion of Canada, so far as I have heard, and when the hon. member takes up the time of this House to tell us what has happened in the province of Nova Scotia I should just like to point out that my hon. friend's friends in that province and elsewhere have proved very poor prophets indeed in the past.

I wish to refer for a moment or two to the question of our right to criticise the actions of the Government in regard to what we consider questions of great public importance. I lay down the proposition that fair criticism is in order and proper at all times. My hon. friends opposite say that we are offering unfair criticism, and thus embarrassing the Government. My hon. friend from West Peterborough (Mr. Burnham) this afternoon, and other hon. gentlemen opposite during the progress of this debate have said, Cannot you find something of which you can say some words of commendation in regard to the Government? Why do you always find fault? Surely some little thing may be said to encourage the Government in regard to public matters on which they are occupied at the present time. Well, Sir, I would not for one moment detract from any member of the Government; but surely the hon. gentlemen who occupy the treasury benches at the present time should be satisfied with the congratulations showered upon them by their hon. friends who sit behind them, and not expect so much congratulation from hon. gentlemen on this side of the House. I am bound to say, Sir, that in many respects the Government have conducted the affairs of this war in an energetic way, and they are entitled to all the credit which their actions may bring to them. But I desire to say to my hon. friends opposite, who claim that we on this side of the House are showering upon them unfair criticism, that it is just as incumbent upon them to put up a fair defence to their actions as that we should criticise fairly, which we hope to do.

When the other day my hon. friend from the city of St. John (Mr. Pugsley) in the few quiet, well considered remarks which he made to this House, offered the suggestion that some things had not been right, and that the business of this country under the control of the present Administration had not been properly conducted, a terrible wave of disturbance affected our hon.

friends opposite. My hon. friend the Solicitor General (Mr. Meighen) went so far as to say that the hon. member for St. John had isolated himself. He did not say from whom he had isolated himself—whether he had isolated himself from the affections of hon. gentlemen opposite or from the public. But let me say to my hon. friend that the remarks and suggestions offered by the hon. member for St. John in regard to the administration of the public affairs of this country were made fearlessly and straightforwardly from his place in this House, and hon. gentlemen opposite have not yet answered the charges he made; they have never attempted to answer them. What was the reply of my hon. friend the Solicitor General to the hon. member for St. John in regard to the manufacturing of shells in this country? He said: "I am not here to defend the Shell Committee; I am not here to say anything good, bad or indifferent in regard to the Shell Committee; they were a creature of the Imperial Government; they are answerable for their actions to the Imperial Government, and this Government has nothing at all to do with them." Well, Mr. Speaker, I take issue with my hon. friend in regard to that matter, to which I will refer a little later.

Meantime, I wish to refer to the unfair defence made by my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Hazen). When my hon friend from North Essex (Mr. Wilcox) spoke the other day, I was not surprised to hear him read from Hansard some of the remarks that fell from the lips of the right hon. gentleman who leads the Opposition during the war session of Parliament in August, 1914. I was not surprised to hear him quote the statement of the right hon leader of the Opposition that he was not here to oppose, not even to criticise, the actions of the Government in regard to this war. I was not even surprised to hear my hon. friend from West Peterborough (Mr. Burnham) make a similar reference this afternoon; but I was surprised at the manner in which my hon. friends the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, a man from my own province, and having the experience he has had in the Parliament of New Brunswick and for a time here, dealt with that speech of the right hon. leader of the Opposition, a speech that will remain in the memory of the people of Canada for all time as a loyal and patriotic utterance. I say that when the hon. gentleman made these remarks he blazed a trail that those who come after him will follow for many years all over this great Dominion, and it will be a very good example for them to follow. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries attempted to make this House and the country believe that my right hon. friend had announced that, irrespective of how long this war lasted, and, irrespective of how many sessions of this Parliament might have passed away, our mouths would be at all times closed and criticism would be forced back even if we saw that wrong was being done by the Government in regard to this war. That is the stand I take before the House in regard to this matter. The hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries made other arguments in support of the defence which he attempted to put forward in answer to my hon. friend in regard to other matters to which I will refer later.

Now, I will take a few moments to refer to the war. The war question has been uppermost in the minds of the people and the members of this House since this Parliament opened. To enable us to do our part in this war there are certain general requirements that are absolutely necessary: First, we must have money; second, we must have men; third, we must have proper munitions and equipment; and fourth, we must have proper control and direction of the men on the field of battle. I now propose to discuss the subjects in regard to the war which I have placed under these four headings.

First, in regard to the money. I would like to lay down this proposition, that under our Constitution, Parliament is responsible for providing the money required for this or any other public purpose, and the Government must be responsible to Parliament and the people for the proper expenditure of the money provided and the manner in which it is expended. I think that is a fair proposition, and I believe it is one that every hon. member will agree with. I want to ask any hon. gentleman in this House or any man in this country, where he can place his finger upon any question, any objection, any criticism, that any hon. member on this side of the House has raised in regard to the voting of money that the Government required for the carrying on of the war? Not one word of opposition has been spoken. Every dollar of the money that the Government have asked for has been voted freely and cheerfully for this purpose.

The next question that naturally follows, after you have the money provided, is that of the proper expenditure of this money. I contend that it is not only the privilege but the duty of every hon. member of this House to see to it that the money is properly expended; and, if he believes that a mistake has been made, it is his duty, his bounden duty, to bring it to the attention of Parliament and the country.

I feel it to be my duty, under these conditions, to refer to some expenditures that have been made and to the way that the business has been carried on in regard to the war. The first question that I shall discuss briefly is the question of the Shell Committee. My hon. friends opposite say that they had no connection with, and no responsibility for, the Shell Committee. This Shell Committee was appointed by the Government, they claim, at the request of the Imperial Government. The hon. Solicitor General (Mr. Meighen) claims that the Government was in no way responsible for what that Committee did. The hon. Minister of Militia and Defence (Sir Sam Hughes) took the opposite ground, and when he found that the Shell Committee had been divorced by the Solicitor General, and after my hon. friend from Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) had reminded the House that it was a baby left on somebody's doorstep, the Minister of Militia stepped in and claimed the honour of the parentage of the Shell Committee, and said that he would stand behind the committee to the last button on its jacket. There are many good reasons for the Minister of Militia being loyal to the Shell Committee, as it was he who organized it, it was his creation. But the other members of the Government are not so anxious to stand behind the Shell Committee. They are prepared to throw it aside. They say: we have no further use for it; the Government has divorced it. The statement of the Solicitor General that he had divorced the Shell Committee from the Government is an admission that they have been very closely allied at some time during their existence, or there would be no reason for a divorce one from the other. So it seems to me that this Government must be held absolutely and solely responsible for the actions of the Shell Committee in regard to giving contracts for the manufacture of munitions of war during the time that it was in charge of these operations.

My hon. friend from Carleton (Mr. Carvell) the other day mentioned many of the manufacturers to whom contracts were given for the manufacture of shells by the Shell Committee, travelling almost from the Atlantic to the Pacific. I want to refer to a few in my own province of New Brunswick, and I want to draw the attention of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries to the unfair way in which he attempted to defend the Government in regard to the giving of contracts for shells in that province. He referred to the McAvity firm, which had received a contract, and, when my hon. friend from St. John was addressing this House the other day, the minister threw across the floor the statement that the Liberal party had no right to offer criticisms in regard to the giving of contracts to Messrs. McAvity because, forsooth, they were Liberals.

I am not here to enter into a personal discussion. There is no business house in the province of New Brunswick that I would sooner see get a contract than Messrs. McAvity, because the Government may depend upon it that they will deliver the goods in a workmanlike manner. But I take issue at once with hon. gentlemen opposite who say that we must not criticise because a certain Liberal got such and such a contract. I care not one jot whether the man who gets the contract is a Liberal or a Conservative. If he has been paid too much, the Government or the Shell Committee are to blame, and not the man himself. If the price paid has been excessive, this Government is to blame, because the Shell Committee is of its own creation, and this Government has to bear the responsability.

My hon. friend in the course of his remarks, travelled to my county, and you will remember with what a smile he looked across at me when he spoke of the contracts let in the county of Westmorland. He mentioned that the Record Foundry and Machine Company got a contract. He told us that Clifford Robinson was president of that company, and F. E. Dennison, treasurer, and then he almost whispered that the hon. Governor Wood was also a large stockholder. But he did not tell the House that Mr. F. W. Sumner was also a large shareholder, or that when the president of the company went to meet the Shell Committee in Montreal last spring he took Mr. Sumner with him to help secure the contract. If my hon. friend would have this country believe that the contract was given to that company because Mr. Robinson was a Liberal, and that therefore we on this side of the House must keep our mouths closed, let me say that if there is any man in the province of New Brunswick to whom my hon. friend owes allegiance, it is Governor Josiah Wood, who is also a very large stockholder in this concern. It was through that gentleman's resigning his position in the Red Chamber here to accept a more lucrative position that my hon. friend was given easy entrance into this House. Would it not have been better if my hon. friend had frankly told the House the names of all the persons interested in that Record Foundry and Machine Company? That company was promised a contract of 20,000 shells at the price of the first contract, but when they had prepared their plant they were given a contract for only 10,000 shells. Was that because Mr. Robinson or some other gentleman in the company was a Liberal? It is well that we should know the whole facts of the case.

I now come to the Charles Fawcett Manufacturing Company in my own town. While these gentlemen are political opponents of mine, and always have been, there is no concern in the whole province of New Brunswick or even further afield that is better equipped to carry out a contract than this firm. The Minister of Militia has told us that he had great difficulty in getting manufacturers to embark in this business of manufacturing shells—that the Government had almost to go to the banks to get them to finance the manufacturers. That may have been true of some shell-makers, but on behalf of this organization, let me say that they did not need anybody to finance them, as they were well able to do it themselves. They have been turning out shells now for some considerable time. I am glad that the Fawcett Manufacturing Company got that order. My objection is that no one has a right to get a contract for making shells at a higher price than is reasonable.

I have a short statement which shows that in the province of New Brunswick the following firms had contracts for shells: Cornwall and York Cotton Mills, St. John, N.B., 25,000 shrapnel shells, at $3.80 each; Charles Fawcett Company, 20,000 4.5 howitzer shells at $6; James Fleming, St. John, N.B.,—— 4.5 howitzer shells at $6; Maritime Foundry and Machine Company, Chatham, N.B., 20,000 howitzer shells at $6; T. McAvity and Sons, St. John, N.B., 10,000 4.5 howitzer shells at $6.70, and 20,000 at $6; the Smith Foundry Company, Fredericton, N.B., 20,000 4.5 howitzer shells at $6. The Cornwall and York Cotton Mills got $3.80 apiece for machining and assembling these shells. About the same time another firm, the Electric Steel and Metals Company, of Welland, which I understand is largely controlled by Mr. Carnegie, a member of the Shell Committee, got an order for 25,000 shells at $5 apiece; that is an advance of $1.20 over the other firm. The Canadian Car and Foundry Company of Montreal, of which I believe Senator Curry is president and one of the largest owners of stock, also got an order at the same time for making shells at $5.15 apiece. I should like to know why all these firms were not paid the same price for manufacturing shells. At Sackville the Charles Fawcett Company got a contract for 20,000 4.5 howitzer shells at $6 apiece. The Canadian Car and Foundry Company got an order for 50,000 shells at $6.70. Why the increased price? I claim that that is absolute evidence that there was some influence somewhere that caused the Shell Committee to give these contracts out at these different prices. We go a little further and we find that the James Flemming concern of St. John, N.B., got a contract for shells at $6 the same prices as the Fawcett Company received. The Montreal Locomotive Company of Montreal, Que., got orders for 10,000 shells at $6.70 and 150,000 at $6 per shell. The Maritime Foundry and Machine Company of Chatham got a contract for 20,000 shells at $6. The Macdonald Thresher Company of Stratford got a contract for 16,000 shells at $6. We find Messrs. McAvity and Sons of St. John, N.B., supplying 10,000 of the same size of shell to which I have referred at $6.70 and 20,000 at $6, and the Nova Scotia Steel and Coal Company of New Glasgow, owned by a member of the Shell Committee, got their first contract for 25,000 shells at $6.70, and a second for 25,000 at $6.50 at practically the same time that these other concerns were being paid $6. I draw the attention of the House to these facts, and with these facts before us we naturally expect explanations why different prices have been paid to different manufacturers of shells getting contracts at the same time.

Mr. RHODES: Can the hon. member tell us whether the delivery points in all cases were the same? Does not that fact account for the difference in price?

Mr. COPP: I do not know. I have the facts before me that these were the contract prices.

Mr. RHODES: Quite so.

Mr. COPP: The freight charges are not added on to the prices.

Mr. RHODES: You should have the delivery points.

Mr. COPP: I have not the delivery points. Does my hon. friend say from his knowledge in regard to this Shell Committee, that the difference in the delivery points explains the difference in the prices?

Mr. RHODES: I have not particular knowledge of the shell contracts to which the hon. member refers; but I have information, not from the Shell Committee, but from those who have contracts for shells, that prices vary according to the circumstances.

Mr. COPP: Will my hon. friend tell me where these different shipments are to be delivered for shipment to the Old Country?

Mr. RHODES: I do not know.

Mr. COPP: Then my hon. friend does not know much more than I do about this subject in regard to point of delivery.

Mr. RHODES: I am not discussing it; you are. I want to know how much you know about the matter.

Mr. COPP: My hon. friend asked me a question. There is enough Scotch in me to ask him one in return. I shall be very glad if my hon. friend can give me some good reason why the delivery points should make the difference in the price.

Mr. ROGERS: Were the contracts all entered into at the same time?

Mr. COPP: Practically at the same time.

Mr. RHODES: It would cost more to tranship shells from Sackville to New York than from Montreal to New York.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Shells could be sent around the world for seventy cents.

Mr. COPP: My hon. friend says that it would cost more to pay the freight on a shell from Sackville to New York than from Montreal to New York.

Mr. RHODES: There is the cost of transportation of steel, and there are many other considerations which cause variations in the prices.

Mr. COPP: I grant there are many considerations, and there were many considerations in regard to the letting of these contracts by the Shell Committee. The Fawcett Company is at Sackville, which is a small place, and it is not so closely in touch with the Shell Committee as the Canadian Car and Foundry Company, of which Senator Curry is president. If we get down to brass tacks, that is the condition, and that is why these gentlemen are getting more for their contracts than are the people in Sackville, St. John, Chatham and Fredericton.
