PROPOSED REVIEW OF SEASONAL TARIFFS ON FRUITS, VEGETABLES AND FLOWERS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity relating to the signs of spring, delayed this year by the heavy snows and other storms in the east, which have been so little in evidence in the nation's capital but which are manifest in the daffodils of my riding of Esquimalt-Saanich, made available in the lobby to all hon. members. With your indulgence I seek unanimous consent of the House to move the following motion:

That the Minister of Agriculture, in consultation with his colleague, the Minister of Finance, undertake a review of the regulations relating to the imposition of seasonal tariffs affecting fruits, vegetables and flowers imported into Canada so that the fruit, vegetable and flower growers in the garden riding of Esquimalt-Saanich, and elsewhere in the garden belt of Canada, shall be able to continue their commercial operations and provide those of us who have to spend so much of our lives under the snow in the east with the symbol of spring which the daffodils now available to honourable members so graphically provide.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Such a motion, if it were to be debated, would require the unanimous consent of the House pursuant to Standing Order 43. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

SUGGESTED USE OF SURPLUS MILK PRODUCTS IN EXTERNAL AID PROGRAMS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43, I request unanimous consent of the House to present a motion on an important and urgent matter, and I am sure that no member will dare refuse such a motion.

Considering that the Canadian International Development Agency manages a budget of about $950 million; considering that current foreign assistance programs maintain underdeveloped countries in their underdeveloped position; considering that Canada has a responsibility towards underdeveloped and poor countries; and considering that, according to the latest statistics, industrial milk surpluses for the present campaign will reach 1.5 billion pounds, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Matte):

That this House enjoin the government to take all the required steps in the nearest future to increase the distribution of milk products and by-products in underdeveloped countries, through the Canadian International Development Agency, with a view to avoiding as much as possible that the Canadian government use the quota system and thus refrain from penalizing overproducing milk producers on the pretext that we now have milk surpluses.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Under the provision of Standing Order 43, the motion requires unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: As there is not unanimous consent, the motion cannot be put.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

SUGGESTED DISCONTINUANCE OF NEGOTIATIONS WITH LOCKHEED AND CONSIDERATION OF OTHER TYPE OF AIRCRAFT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under Standing Order 43. I refer to the proposed purchase of Orion patrol aircraft from the Lockheed Aircraft Corporation. In view of the fact that the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Richardson) has stated that the Canadian government is considering raising a loan of $300 million from banks to help finance the production of Orions, and in view of the fact that the Lockheed Aircraft Corporation, because of its wasteful expenditures on bribery and similar methods of securing orders, is in a shaky financial position and is unable to raise the necessary financing in the United States or elsewhere, and, further, in view of the fact that the necessity of purchasing such expensive patrol aircraft has never been demonstrated to the Canadian public, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That this House directs the government to discontinue forthwith its effort to raise such loans, and further directs the government to reconsider whether a refitting of the Argus or purchase of a less sophisticated patrol aircraft at a much smaller cost will not meet the need to protect the sovereignty of Canada's waters.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Such a motion can only be presented with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

SUGGESTED DISCONTINUANCE OF NEGOTIATIONS WITH LOCKHEED PENDING DETAILS OF BRIBERY ATTEMPTS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Andy Hogan (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the fact that Dr. Arthur Burns, Chairman of the Federal Reserve Board in the United States, has said that the United States was exporting a corporate Watergate through the Lockheed Aircraft Corporation when it paid $24.4 million in bribes to various persons throughout the world, and in view of the fact that the Deputy Secretary of State for the United States, Mr. Robert Ingersoll, has announced that the State Department will supply the Lockheed data to other countries, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Symes):

That the Canadian government break off contract relations with this corrupt corporation until all the data of Lockheed's bribery attempts are made known.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Such a motion, pursuant to Standing Order 43, can only be presented with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

REQUEST FOR COMMITTEE STUDY OF EFFECT OF MILK PRODUCT IMPORTS ON PRODUCERS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I ask the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion dealing with an important matter of pressing necessity.

Considering the contradictory statements made by the federal Minister of Agriculture and by government members concerning dairy product imports and exports which determine the level of income of the industrial milk producers of Canada, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Gauthier):

That this House ask the Standing Committee on Agriculture to examine very carefully what Canada's actual requirements for dairy product imports have been these last two years, as well as the implications of these import policies for the industrial milk producers of Canada.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Under the provisions of Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there such consent?

[Mr. Brewin.]

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent; the motion therefore cannot be put.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

LOCKHEED CONTRACT—POSSIBILITY OF REPRESENTATIONS FROM REISMAN AND GRANDY

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Prime Minister, the government House leader and the Minister of National Defence, to whose department my question relates, I address my question to whoever is the Acting Prime Minister in that ramshackle government over there.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: Shame, shame.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I pulled in a lot of big fish with that one, Mr. Speaker. Yesterday the Minister of National Defence said that he was satisfied that the Lockheed Company "made no payments or commissions to any Canadian". I assume the minister was not referring to the contract the consulting firm of Reisman and Grandy Limited has to help Lockheed Limited win and hold the LRPA contract. Would the Acting Prime Minister tell the House whether, in the course of the current negotiations concerning the Lockheed contract, he or the Minister of Supply and Services received representations, directly or indirectly, on behalf of that company from Messrs. Reisman and Grandy?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I should advise the hon. member that the Prime Minister, who is presently having a meeting I believe with the Premier of Prince Edward Island, will be in the House shortly. In the meantime, I can assure the hon. member I have no information with regard to the representations he has suggested.

PUBLIC SERVICE

SUGGESTED PROHIBITION AGAINST RETIRED EMPLOYEES WORKING FOR CORPORATIONS WHICH MIGHT USE THEM TO INFLUENCE GOVERNMENT

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I have a supplementary, Mr. Speaker. In light of the immense influence this firm of former deputy ministers has that could have been used to give Lockheed the inside track on this contract which could cost the federal taxpayers twice as much as the St. Lawrence Seaway cost, is the government now going to bring in guidelines on the freedom of retired public servants to go to work for corporations precisely in order to lobby in areas of their intimate government expertise and with former colleagues. I ask this question in view of the fact that even customs and excise officers of the Department of National Revenue are prohibited for two years from setting up customs brokerage houses. Why, at least as a stricture, ought such a regulation not apply to these men who are by no means poor as a result of their service to the Government of Canada.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the hon. member would agree that both gentlemen to whom he has referred have set a high standard of ethics during their period of service to the Government of Canada. Surely, I am certain that that same approach would be followed in their private life. I recognize with the hon. gentleman that he has raised a point of some importance, but to my knowledge no jurisdiction has yet succeeded in directing the behaviour of persons who have left the public service and who have become private citizens. That applies not only to members of the bureaucracy but also to Members of Parliament and ministers.

POSSIBILITY MR. GRANDY HAD CONSULTING CONTRACT WITH PRIME MINISTER'S OFFICE OR GOVERNMENT AGENCY SINCE WORKING FOR LOCKHEED

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I have a final supplementary, Mr. Speaker. I suggest that some governments have the moral and ethical standards to at least try, Mr. Speaker. My final supplementary is this: Since this consulting firm went to work for Lockheed Limited was Mr. Grandy also working on a consultation contract for the Prime Minister's office or any other central agency of the federal government, and if so when was that contract terminated or completed if it was so terminated or completed?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will have to take that question as notice. I have no information on that point.

FINANCE

LOCKHEED CONTRACT—POSSIBLE REPRESENTATIONS FROM MR. REISMAN CONCERNING FINANCING—MINISTER'S VIEW OF GOVERNMENT-BACKED LOANS

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. Has the former deputy minister of finance, Mr. Reisman, since his employment by Lockheed made any representations to the minister or to his officials concerning the financing of the Lockheed LRPA contract and in particular concerning guaranteeing bank loans? Also could the minister tell us whether he supports in any way the concept of the government backing such a loan.

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): With regard to the financing, Mr. Speaker, I met personally with the new management of Lockheed when they were in town some few weeks ago but the question of interim financing was not discussed. Indeed, it was merely a meeting on our part to ensure they would continue to be in a position to perform on any contract. With regard to my officials, I would have to make an inquiry as to whether they were directly involved in the discussions in this regard. My recollection is that the discussion has been conducted by the Department of Supply and Services' officials.

● (1420)

On the question of the financing arrangement, that is a matter that is now before the government and upon which a decision will have to be taken.

MR. REISMAN'S ACCESS TO OFFICE FILES SINCE RETIREMENT

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): I do not think that the minister stated whether or not Mr. Reisman was involved in these discussions. Perhaps he would do so in answer to my first supplementary question. Since Mr. Reisman's retirement as deputy minister of finance, has he had access to his former office files, and if so when?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): I have not met Mr. Reisman in this or indeed in any other business context. I will have to take notice and report on either the contracts that he may have had or indeed on the more specific question which the hon. gentleman has asked. I will do so and be glad to report to him.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

SUGGESTED CONSIDERATION OF OTHER AIRCRAFT THAN THE ORION

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Prime Minister. In view of the confusion and maladministration by the government of this very large contract and the question of conflict of interest, is the Acting Prime Minister now willing to open the negotiations and consider options other than this $59 million aircraft? I ask this question in the absence of the Prime Minister.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the answer is no.

DEFICIT RESULTING FROM CANADA-UNITED STATES AUTO PACT—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. In view of the figures which were released today indicating that Canada has a $1.9 billion deficit in Canada-U.S. automotive trade, the largest in the eleven year old history of the auto pact, and a 50 per cent increase over the deficit for last year, what plans does the government have to turn this deficit around to one which would at least put Canada on a basis of parity with the United States?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): The government of Canada, principally under the responsibility of my colleague, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, is examining the current operations of the auto pact and the most recent performance under the auto pact and would anticipate some time later in the year being in a position to make some decisions with regard to the future of the arrangement. At the moment, I cannot be any more enlightening to the hon. member than to say that this is receiving very active study within the government.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, would the minister confirm that, according to figures which have not yet been released, for the first time in the history of the auto pact we are running a deficit for the first three months in 1976 in vehicle trade with the United States which, if it continues, will mean that the situation in terms of the over-all trade for this year will be considerably worse than it was even last year?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I will be glad to check that figure.

CANADIAN SHARE OF INVESTMENT RESULTING FROM AUTO PACT

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Can the minister tell the House why the government has not insisted up to this point—or why it is going to wait for a few months perhaps—that Canada get its share of new investment in that industry which is at least proportionate to the amount we consume in terms of the output, the most recent figures indicating that Canadians consume about 10 per cent of the output in the industry but we only got something less than 6 per cent of the investment last year?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): I can say to the House that the former minister of industry, trade and commerce had insisted on just such a recognition of Canada's role in the auto pact. Our proposal is to make a full analysis of the facts leading to some further decisions as to what we would do about this arrangement.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

PROPOSED ABOLITION OF REGULATION DISQUALIFYING THOSE WHO WORK MORE THAN FOUR AND LESS THAN EIGHT WEEKS

Mr. Armand Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, I would like to put a question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration.

Would the minister tell us if he plans to make an early proposal regarding the abolition of the disqualifying practice which makes a recipient of unemployment insurance not eligible for four consecutive weeks. I believe we call this "card breaking"; it consists of disqualifying recipients who are in their extension period if they work more than four but less than eight weeks, given the fact that this procedure is considered inefficient and unfair even by Unemployment Insurance Commission officials.

[English]

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, that very issue is being examined with considerable interest. I cannot make a commitment now as to if or when the change will be made, but it is one of the major suggestions we are examining with considerable interest.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

UNEMPLOYMENT—MEASURES TO ASSIST YOUNG PEOPLE—ESTIMATE OF NUMBER OF JOBS TO BE CREATED

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. I had a question for the Minister of Public Works regarding the ganging up theory, but in light of the fact that recent unemployment figures are in and around the neighbourhood of 7 per cent, affecting some 800,000 people, and in light of the fact that this summer will be a very difficult one for our young people in terms of employment, I wonder if the Minister of Finance could advise whether he is aware of this and whether we can expect some new, imaginative and bold steps—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Alexander: —in order to reduce this unemployment, and in particular, to assist our young people this summer?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am aware of the difficult situation and the unemployment figures. I am particularly concerned about the fact that through much of this year we will continue to be in a difficult situation in that regard. Of course, any program proposed by the hon. gentleman would involve a very substantial increase in government expenditure, and I have listened equally carefully to the hon. gentlemen when they have said the federal government should reduce its present rate of spending below 16 per cent.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Alexander: I reject that cop out by the minister and indicate that there are certain priorities.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Alexander: All I can say to the minister is that he is off the track somewhat. However, I will ask him another question. The former minister always indicated in this House in a gentlemanly way the number of jobs he expected to be created in any particular year. Would the minister give us the benefit of his wisdom in this regard and indicate just how many jobs he expects will be created this year as a result of the programs of this government.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): It seems to me that if there is any cop out, it is by the hon. gentleman.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Out of one side of his mouth he says cut down government expenditure, and out of the other he says increase it.

With regard to the unemployment figures, the hon. gentleman will have noticed that these were given in the course of a budget statement, and I have indicated I will be making that in the month of May.

IMMIGRATION

REASON FOR DEPORTATION ORDER AGAINST MR. DUDZIAK

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland-Colchester North): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. Is the minister aware that a deportation order has been issued in the case of Boguslaw Dudziak, that he will be picked up by immigration officers at 3 p.m. on Thursday, March 25 and returned to Poland, even though Mr. Dudziak immediately contacted immigration officials upon his arrival in Canada on August 15, 1975, having left his ship in Halifax, and claimed refugee status because he had remained a Roman Catholic during his life in Poland and sought refuge in Canada because he was not a communist?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I believe I have heard representations with regard to that particular case very recently, and we are examining it. Claims for refugee status are examined very carefully, usually at two levels. One is interdepartmental committee, and if its answer is favourable, that settles it. If it is not, the person claiming refugee status has access through the appeal system to the appeal board. If he has been through those two stages and still the decision indicates he is not a refugee and a deportation order has been issued under a special inquiry, then my hands are somewhat tied. However, I am aware of the representations, and I am looking into the case.

Mr. Coates: The minister says he is looking into the matter but the individual has only about a day and a half left in this country unless the minister takes some action. Can the minister explain how a deportation order could have been issued without any contact with me by either himself or his department officials and even though I forwarded all available details to him by hand at his office on March 4 and March 9 and spoke to him privately asking that he examine the case in the hope that he could take action which would prevent this calamity from occurring?

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member should understand that once the process has reached the stage where a special inquiry has been held, I do not have jurisdiction. It would probably be improper for me to have jurisdiction once a deportation order has been decided upon. The exact time frame the hon. member refers to I would think, without having had an opportunity to confirm, would fit here at post inquiry stage.

Mr. Coates: A further supplementary, Mr. Speaker. Can the minister explain to this House how a young man who sought refuge in this nation because we stand for freedom of choice in both politics and religion, who has a firm offer of employment, who has received support from the citizens of the town of Truro as well as from myself and the hon. member for Halifax, on his files, can be forced to return to a communist country while the notorious General Quang is allowed to receive sanctuary in this nation?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, I expect to settle the issue on the second part of that question very soon. The circumstances are quite different and I think the hon. member will understand that it would take too much detail to explain at this time. In so far as the first part of the question is concerned, it all hinges on the validity of the claim of the applicant to refugee status. Criteria are clearly established as to how that is judged. Unfortunately, ship desertion from countries behind the iron curtain does not necessarily influence the decision about the validity of refugee status. Those are very carefully looked at. There are circumstances in this case that I will have to look at, but I think it is probably past the inquiry stage and beyond my jurisdiction.

Mr. Gus MacFarlane (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I should like to associate the hon. member for Parkdale and myself with our two colleagues opposite in this matter and indicate that I have been writing concerning this matter well before—

Some hon. Members: Question.

Some hon. Members: Order, order!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

AIR TRANSPORT

INCREASE IN LANDING FEES FOR PRIVATE AIRCRAFT—REQUEST FOR RECONSIDERATION

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. Would the minister take this opportunity to tell the House how he will be responding to the many submissions of protest against the government's decision to impose landing fees for private aircraft at Department of Transport airports, and whether consideration has been given to people in the frontier areas, mainly northern Canada, to whom the private aircraft is an indispensable mode of transportation rather than a luxury?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, as I indicated on an earlier occasion the proposal in relation to landing fees is a rather modest one having regard to the lack of increase for many years. We have been having discussions with owners and pilots associations and others, however, and I have been having discussions with members of the Liberal caucus who have a great interest in flying.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lang: Rather than terminate these discussions abruptly and reaching a decision before we have been able to consider all the circumstances, we have decided to tolerate some modest postponements while we are looking at the question of whether the objective is sound and is generally accepted, that is, imposing user fees and obtaining money from those who have the advantage rather than from the general taxpayer. While that objective is being agreed upon, we are looking at alternative ways of collection so that we can minimize administration problems.

Mr. Oberle: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Can the minister tell the House if he will use this interim period to discuss with his officials and people who are interested in flying—apart from the Liberal caucus—whether it would be advisable to establish a system that would apply to people living closer to the metropolitan areas and larger international airports and not those living in remote and frontier areas of our country? Would the minister also tell the House whether it is the intention to establish a system by which the Department of Transport airplanes will pay to land at air strips not under its jurisdiction?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, we are trying to look at all the circumstances in determining the best means of collection. I can assure the hon. member that I always get the best arguments from the Liberal caucus.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

KNOWLEDGE OF PRIME MINISTER OF REQUEST OF MR. DRURY BY MR. OUELLET FOR INTERVENTION WITH JUDGE

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. On Wednesday, March 17, the Prime Minister told the House that he did not learn about the request for an intervention until Monday, March 15. The Prime Minister stated, as recorded at page 11866 of Hansard:

> Mr. Speaker, Mr. Ouellet told me about that precise request he made to the minister on Monday of this week.

Is the Prime Minister telling this House that he did not at any point before March 15 ask the Minister of Public Works if the former minister for consumer and corporate affairs had made a "precise request" for an intervention on his behalf?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have already answered that question.

INQUIRY WHETHER PRIME MINISTER REPORTED ALLEGED INTERFERENCE WITH JUDICIARY TO QUEBEC ATTORNEY GENERAL

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, for the Prime Minister. I am sure this one has not been put to him. In light of the fact that the Minister of Public Works said at the beginning of this situation on March 3, as reported at page 11457 of Hansard:

> Indeed, the only intervention that would be contemplated by me would be one to see that he—> —was in full knowledge of the facts and did his duty.

Meaning the judge.

In light of the fact that the government seems to be supersensitive to the words "improper", "wrongful" or "illegality", may I ask if the Prime Minister would advise the House whether he has reported the facts told to us by the government, unknown to us, known to them, to the attorney general of Quebec to determine whether there was an offence.

An hon. Member: Go back to school.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, may I put that question again.

Mr. Paproski: A little slower.

Mr. Woolliams: May I ask the minister if he has reported to the attorney general of Quebec the matters told to him by the former minister of consumer and corporate affairs and the admission I just read with reference to the Minister of Public Works?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think it is related to the preamble of the question about us being sensitive to words like "illegality" or "impropriety". The answer is we have admitted— the minister has admitted some impropriety and has apologized for it. Illegality is something else again. If there is illegality or we have cause to believe there is illegality or hon. members opposite have cause to believe there is illegality, first of all the hon. member for York-Simcoe would not have withdrawn his statement if he had some evidence of it. He does not seem to have any evidence of it and we do not have any evidence of it. If we had we would, of course, turn it over to the attorney general of the province who would be entitled to prosecute.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

PRESENCE IN GALLERY OF PREMIER OF PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND, HONOURABLE ALEX CAMPBELL

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Before recognizing another questioner may I call the attention to the presence in our gallery of a very distinguished visitor, the premier of the very important province of Prince Edward Island, the Honourable Alex Campbell.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

ENERGY

SYNCRUDE PROJECT—APPLICABLE EMISSION STANDARD FOR PLANT

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources? In view of the fact that the governments and the companies participating in the Syncrude agreement have overcome one hurdle in respect of the rate of return for the pipeline and utility plant built by the government of Alberta and since this brings us one step closer to a final agreement, does the government intend to insist that there be inserted in the final agreement a provision for a standard of emission—which at the present time is projected at 287 long tons per day—and insist that the 40 tons per day recommended by the Department of the Environment be enforced in an agreement with Syncrude?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): No, Mr. Speaker.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

MINISTER'S VIEW OF EMISSION STANDARDS FOR SYNCRUDE PLANT

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, a supplementary question. Since the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources does not seem to be at all interested in the health and welfare of the people who live in that area may I direct my supplementary question to the Minister of the Environment who on January 29 at page 10425 of Hansard in answer to a question from the leader of this party said:

● (1440)

Mr. Speaker, I can assure the hon. gentleman that I will insist on having this present emission reduced.

Answering a supplementary question, the minister said in part:

I think what the hon. member suggests is something the department of energy is ready to do.

Since the minister indicated that the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources is not prepared to insist on emission standards for sulphur dioxide, does he intend to fulfil the commitment he gave the House on January 29 and insist on emission standards much lower than the 287 long tons per day envisaged by Syncrude?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I shall stick to the commitment I made previously. We are insisting on the reduction of sulphur dioxide emissions in the air at Syncrude and trying to convince the government of Alberta as well as the Syncrude company. I know the hon. gentleman knows that I have no legal power to compel the company or the government of Alberta to do this.

Mr. Broadbent: But you are the minister.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. What figure has the minister in mind for emission standards? Also, since the government is represented on the management committee, will the minister use his good offices to persuade the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources to insist that figures the Minister of Environment thinks are reasonable for emission standards will be inserted in the Syncrude agreement?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, not only is the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources interested in this; the Alberta government also has an interest in, and power to establish, emission standards at Syncrude. I am ready to talk to my colleague. I hope that somebody on the other side of the House will talk to the government of Alberta and convince it to act.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

LOCKHEED CONTRACT—POSSIBILITY OF REPRESENTATIONS FROM REISMAN AND GRANDY

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of National Defence having entered the House, may I ask him if, in the course of current negotiations concerning the Lockheed contract, he, the Minister of Supply and Services, any member of their departments, or departmental agencies received representations, directly or indirectly, on behalf of Lockheed from the consulting firm, Reisman and Grandy Limited?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Not to my knowledge Mr. Speaker.

POSSIBILITY MR. GRANDY HAD CONSULTING CONTRACT WITH PRIME MINISTER'S OFFICE OR OTHER GOVERNMENT AGENCY

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): Mr. Speaker, as the Prime Minister is present may I direct my supplementary question to him? Has Mr. Grandy, of the consulting firm of Reisman and Grandy Limited, worked on a consulting contract for the Prime Minister's office or any other central agency of the federal government since this consulting firm went to work for Lockheed limited? If so, when was that contract terminated or completed?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, this is the first time the matter has been drawn to my attention. I shall certainly look into it.

Oral Questions

NATIONAL DEFENCE

LOCKHEED CONTRACT—TOTAL COMMITMENT OF GOVERNMENT

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Minister of National Defence. What is the total proposed Canadian government commitment to the Lockheed Corporation?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, there is no commitment other than that we have begun negotiations to lead to a contract under which we shall agree to purchase 18 Lockheed long-range patrol aircraft for $953 million. We have not entered into a final contract. We are still negotiating the final terms of the contract.

Mr. Paproski: Is that the total commitment? I notice that the minister nods his head, as if to say yes.

AGRICULTURE

SUBJECTS DISCUSSED BY MINISTER AT MEETING WITH PROVINCIAL MINISTERS—DETAILS OF NEW DAIRY POLICY

Mr. Yves Caron (Beauce): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture.

After his meeting this morning with his provincial counterparts, would the minister tell the House which questions have been discussed? Has there been an agreement concerning the dairy policy for 1976-77? If so, when will the minister announce this new policy? Moreover, will the minister take into account the recommendations made by the Quebec members, and will this policy be equitable for all Quebec industrial milk producers?

[English]

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, meetings with officials of my department are continuing. Every aspect of industrial milk production in Canada has been discussed. According to law, a policy must be announced or a statement made by April 1. All representations are being considered. At present we are in a difficult position, as there is a surplus not only in Canada but throughout the world.

SUGGESTED USE OF SURPLUS DAIRY PRODUCTS IN EXTERNAL AID PROGRAMS

Mr. A. D. Alkenbrack (Frontenac-Lennox and Addington): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question to the Minister of Agriculture concerns the same subject. We need to turn milk deficits into cash and foreign charities into trade. Will the minister examine, for policy purposes, the sale of surplus Canadian dairy products to CIDA at cost price, under our present subsidy system, and consider distributing those products at the same prices, as carried on our books, to needy countries now receiving cash by way of CIDA charitable donations?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

[Mr. Trudeau.]

REDUCTION IN BUTTERFAT QUOTA FOR PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND—REQUEST FOR RECONSIDERATION

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Agriculture? Has he received the interim report of the Prince Edward Island legislature's committee on agriculture, which was unanimously adopted by the legislature and forwarded to him, and which deplores the fact that the Prince Edward Island quota for butterfat has been reduced from 6.7 million pounds to 4.8 million pounds, a reduction of 28 per cent? It asks the minister and the Dairy Commission if an additional, upward adjustment can be made to the much reduced quota for Prince Edward Island.

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Veterans Affairs and the premier of Prince Edward Island met with me last night to discuss this matter. The very important document alluded to was delivered by hand from the legislature of Prince Edward Island. We discussed the matter. I point out that the Dairy Commission and the supply management committee set quotas for each province, not the Minister of Agriculture. They agree on what the quota should be for the whole country. They are discussing this and will discuss it further, because they realize the difficult position of Prince Edward Island producers, who are isolated and cannot produce other commodities. Other parts of Canada are in the same position. It is not easy to decide whose quota shall be cut, and by how much.

Mr. MacLean: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Was the minister able to give encouragement to the premier of Prince Edward Island who must have made representations to show the special case of Prince Edward Island, where only about 10 per cent of provincial production is used as fluid milk; therefore, the quota proposal will have a much greater impact on the industry of the province than it will in other cases. Bear in mind, Mr. Speaker, that the Maritime provinces are only about 40 per cent self-sufficient in the production of dairy products.

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, provincial ministers of agriculture, including the minister of Prince Edward Island, have made these representations to me. Of course, other ministers of agriculture feel the same toward producers in their provinces. They are all concerned about how much quotas will be cut, for whom, and who will be affected. It is safe to say that not many ministers of agriculture want to cut the production of their own dairy producers. It is unrealistic to say that we should not cut production; because, if we do not cut production, we shall be wasteful.

THE MINISTRY

PUBLIC DISCUSSION OF CASE AGAINST STATION CFCF MONTREAL BY SOLICITOR GENERAL—VIEW OF PRIME MINISTER AS TO PROPRIETY

Mr. Jake Epp (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. This morning on radio station CJOB, Winnipeg, the Solicitor General openly and freely expressed an opinion concerning station CFCF of Montreal, the station which has been charged with failing to conform to CRTC regulations concerning broadcast laws. Does the Prime Minister consider it proper that a minister of the Crown, who is responsible for seeing justice is done, should discuss publicly important questions presently before the courts?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I will have to take note of the question. I am not sure what the matter before the courts is to which the hon. member is referring.

Mr. Epp: A supplementary question. I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether the action taken by the Solicitor General in Winnipeg this morning violates the guidelines the Prime Minister has stated are to be observed by all members of the cabinet and, if this is the case, what action does he propose to take.

Mr. Trudeau: As described by the hon. member, it does not violate the guidelines; it may be incorrect for some other reason but the guidelines, as I described them some days ago, were not infringed.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CANADIAN POSITION ON INVOLVEMENT OF CUBA IN AFRICA

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. Having regard to the right hon. gentleman's reported statement following his visit to Cuba that Premier Fidel Castro was sending troops to Africa with a great deal of thought and feeling, could the Prime Minister tell us whether he has received any new information concerning the Cuban involvement and, if so, what is the current position of the administration with respect to this unhappy situation?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I must point out that the hon. member has grossly and inaccurately misquoted me.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stevens: If I am grossly and inaccurately misquoting the Prime Minister so did the Globe and Mail this morning.

Some hon. Members: Oh!

Mr. Stevens: Bearing in mind that Cuba is now involved in eight African countries with some 12,000 troops or other personnel, would the Prime Minister inform us whether the government has registered any official protest concerning this war involvement on the part of Cuba and, if so, what was the form of the protest?

Mr. Trudeau: I am informed that the misquote in the Globe and Mail was a quote from some American paper, so the hon. member is twice removed from the truth by two very big barriers.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: As to our position on the presence of Cuban troops in Angola, our position was made very clear by the Secretary of State for External Affairs before I went to Cuba, it was made clear again when I was in Cuba and it has been made clear since. We are opposed to that kind of intervention.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

NATIONAL DEFENCE

DATE OF DECISION ON CLOSING BASES

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): My question is directed to the Minister of National Defence. In view of the extensive unrest and uncertainty prevailing in all parts of Canada in connection with the rumoured closing of military bases and reduction to nil strength of certain units, could the hon. gentleman indicate by what date he anticipates making a definitive announcement concerning this whole question so that if things are to happen people will know just what is going to happen?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): I cannot say more than I have said on other occasions. I will be making recommendations to cabinet in the very near future, probably within the next two or three weeks, but I do not know how long cabinet will take to consider those recommendations.

OLYMPIC GAMES

USE OF INTERPRETERS—ALLOCATION OF FUNDS FOR INTERPRETERS

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Secretary of State of Canada.

Given the fact that in a few months Montreal will play host to many visitors from various countries and that interpreters will be needed to help those various nationalities communicate with each other, can the minister tell the House whether COJO officials have made a request for this interpretation service? If so, how much will be earmarked for this service?

[English]

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Secretary of State): I am not aware of the request but I will look into it and report to the hon. member.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

REQUEST FOR MORE LOCAL PROGRAMMING—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock): A further question to the Secretary of State, Mr. Speaker. In view of a growing number of representations concerning the cen-tralisation of the CBC has the Secretary of State re-examined the position of the Corporation with a view to allowing greater latitude for local programs within the Corporation?

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Secretary of State): I think the hon. member should update his information. One of the more significant things the Corporation has done in the last two years has been to decentralise, and this is manifest by new buildings in Vancouver, prospective buildings in Regina, etc. all designed to support local programming.

Mr. Friesen: I should like to update the information in the possession of the Secretary of State: I received complaints yesterday with respect to farm programs which have been deleted from CBC programming, and this is one area of local representation which has been lost.

FISHERIES

ALLEGED INTERFERENCE WITH SEAL HUNT—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Albert Béchard (Bonaventure-Îles-de-la-Madeleine): Mr. Speaker, I want to ask a question of the Minister of State for Fisheries. I wonder if he has read the question I put to him last week which was answered in part by the Minister of the Environment. If not, I can put it again. It appears at page 11901 of Hansard and reads as follows: Has the minister or his officials now any control over the members of the Greenpeace Foundation or other characters of the same kind who are at present engaged in illegal interference, this time on the ice of the Atlantic and the Gulf of St. Lawrence where the seal hunt is taking place?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of State (Fisheries)): Mr. Speaker, I believe the measures which were taken proved effective since both protest movements seem to have given up. In the meantime, I would invite them to read scientific reports and refrain from publishing half-truths as they do.

POSSIBILITY OF WORLD FOOD SHORTAGE

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I am aware that all my colleagues are pleased that I ask a question of general interest. My question is directed to the Minister of Agriculture.

I view of the fact that the Minister of Agriculture has just said a moment ago that the problem of industrial milk producers is connected with a world surplus, could the minister tell the House whether the world population is saturated with this product and that there is no need to meet, or whether there is a lack of consumer purchasing power, either at the national or the international level?

[Mr. Friesen.]

[English]

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, it would be difficult to say there would not be some place in the world where there would be a need for this product but it is not at all easy to distribute unless those countries want it, because they have the sovereign right to say what they want for their people who happen to be in need; you just don't throw it at them and hope they accept it like some scraps we are distributing. The world price of skim milk powder is little over one third of what it was two years ago. Under our CIDA program and our other aid programs we have offered assistance to distribute this product in any fashion as long as it can be put to proper use.

WORLD CONFERENCE ON FOOD NEEDS—DISCUSSION OF CANADIAN MILK PRODUCTS

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): On a supplementary, Mr. Speaker.

As once against this year the Minister of Agriculture attended a world conference on food needs, can the minister tell the House whether milk was discussed, with regard to feeding the peoples of the world and whether possible exchanges of dairy products on the one hand, and various products from other countries, on the other, excluded milk products, or whether the discussions dealt with exchanges capable of meeting the needs of humanity as well in Canada as in other countries of the world?

[English]

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Yes, Mr. Speaker, the nutritional aspect of food aid was certainly discussed at great length and one of the ways in which people can get proper nutrition is by being in a position to feed themselves. Canada is doing a tremendous job in helping them set up their own dairy herds and other production entities in those countries.

CENSUS

TABLING OF CENSUS COMMISSIONERS' APPOINTMENTS

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 41(2), I have the honour to table copies, in both official languages, of the 1976 census of Canada Census Commissioners' appointments.

● (1500)

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order with respect to the tabling of documents. Yesterday, the Secretary of State for External Affairs signed an important extradition treaty with the American ambassador. I would have assumed that because of the nature of the material and its importance to our country it would have been tabled today by the Secretary of State for External Affairs or by the Minister of Justice who will have responsibility for administering this important treaty.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, the treaty which was ratified yesterday was tabled last October.

Mr. MacFarlane: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I realize it is sometimes very difficult to assess whether a member is putting a preamble to his supplementary question. The reason that I mentioned the four members concerned was clearly to indicate to the minister concerned that interest in this case ranged all the way from Toronto to Hamilton, to Halifax and to Truro. I thought the supplementary was fairly important in that in a letter I have in my possession one of the officials indicated that perhaps the parties concerned are in another country. My supplementary was, if he could not go to his own country, did it not indicate that there was some concern about returning to that country?

Mr. Speaker: The more the hon. member is persuaded of the importance of his supplementary, the more important it might be to him to put his supplementary without a preamble.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

HOUSE OF COMMONS ANTI-NUISANCE ACT

MEASURE TO PROVIDE DISINCENTIVE FOR MEMBERS TO DELAY BUSINESS OF HOUSE

Mrs. Simma Holt (Vancouver-Kingsway) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-428, to amend the Senate and House of Commons Act.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mrs. Holt: Mr. Speaker, this is an act to be cited as the House of Commons Anti-Nuisance Act. The purpose of this bill is to amend the Senate and House of Commons Act to put an end to members attempting wanton delay and disruption of the House of Commons by proposing dilatory motions which they know to be unlikely to carry. According to the main estimates for 1976-77, it costs $109.11 per minute to operate the House of Commons. That is the penalty set, $109.11.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mrs. Holt: The annual cost—

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I wonder whether the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. Holt) might be given sufficient attention to add one other sentence of explanation.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): This is not explanation; it is argument.

Mrs. Holt: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. That is the cost per minute to keep this House operating, under the current estimates. The annual cost is $57,347,185.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. In the circumstances, I would think the explanation given by the hon. member is sufficient to enable hon. members to understand the nature of the bill. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, before we give our consent to this motion, I rise on a point of order. I hope the hon. member realizes that if she is objecting to dilatory measures that waste the time of the House, she is in fact referring to most government bills which are introduced.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Marshall: On the same point of order, Mr. Speaker, may I state to the hon. member that I timed her, and she wasted $218.22.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): On the same point of order raised by the leader of the NDP, Mr. Speaker, I would simply point out that the remarks he made about government bills apply to interventions from the NDP.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I think the House should understand clearly the question before it. At this stage it is solely the question whether or not the bill should be read the first time and printed, so that it can be circulated. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

SOCIAL SECURITY

PRESENTATION OF PETITION TO INCREASE OLD AGE PENSION TO $350 PER MONTH AND LOWER ELIGIBLE AGE TO SIXTY

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I desire to lay on the table of the House a petition signed by 4,860 senior citizens from 58 different points in Saskatchewan. The petition contains nine points. I shall not ask the leave of the House to read them all—I might have trouble getting leave to do so—but may I say that among other requests the petition asks that the basic pension be raised to $350 a month, that the pensionable age be lowered to age 60, and that there be a special department to deal with senior citizens. I present this petition, Mr. Speaker, on behalf of those who have signed it, their representatives being with us today, and I commend its proposals to the consideration of the government.

FUNDING OF MULTICULTURAL PROGRAMMES

Question No. 3,512—Mr. Forrestall:

By department and agency, what has been the funding provided for multicultural programmes and activities in each year since 1971?

Miss Coline Campbell (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State):

Secretary of State Department Fiscal year		National Film Board Fiscal year
1971-72	$ 617,000	1971-72	$129,000
1972-73	1,465,000	1972-73	315,000
1973-74	5,376,000	1973-74	390,000
1974-75	5,307,000	1974-75	390,000
1975-76	5,260,000	1975-76	300,000

National Museums of Canada Fiscal year		Public Archives Fiscal year
1971-72	$ 91,000	1971-72	$ NIL
1972-73	525,000	1972-73	NIL
1973-74	1,450,000	1973-74	215,700
1975-76	1,450,000	1975-76	340,000

In addition to its general services, which are available to all Canadian libraries, the National Library of Canada provides funds for two multicultural projects. These are its programme to purchase and microfilm Canadian ethnic newspapers, and the Multilingual Biblioservice, which acquires and makes available on a long term loan basis books in non-official languages to the provincial library systems. They in turn distribute these to the public libraries which service ethnic communities. The funds spent for these projects since 1971 are as follows:

CANADA COUNCIL GRANTS—PRIVATE INCOME

Question No. 4,038—Mr. Schellenberger:

Is the private income of individuals taken into consideration in the assessment of applications for Canada Council grants?

Miss Coline Campbell (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): I am informed by the Canada Council as follows: No, except to establish the amount of leave fellowships for university scholars and the amount allocated for subsistence under the explorations program.

REFLECTIVE MARKINGS ON RAILWAY CARS

Question No. 4,054—Mr. Hnatyshyn:

Is the government giving consideration to requiring more visible markings on box cars and flat cars so they can be seen more easily at night at uncontrolled level crossings?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): The application of reflective markings to the sides of railway cars is provided for by Section 202 (1)(c) of the Railway Act and an Order of the Canadian Transport Commission. Work on this program, which began with the issuance of Order No. 97799, dated May 1, 1959, is progressing, with contributions made from the Railway Grade Crossing Fund. As of June, 1975, 125,523 cars have been equipped with reflectorized discs, with a total grant from the Fund of $504,321.68.

CN—IMPROVEMENTS TO RAIL LINES IN NEWFOUNDLAND

Question No. 4,062—Mr. Marshall:

1. Regarding the 1975 CN improvements to rail lines in Newfoundland, what is the status of the (a) installation of new rail and upgrading of two bridges and the location of each (b) 33 mile, 100 pound rail between Deer Lake and Kitty's Brook (c) 12 mile, 100 pound rail between Badger and Millertown Junction (d) topgrade ballast between Gambo and Gleenwood and preparation of the roadbed (e) replacement of the 175 foot span on the Flat Bay Bridge (f) upgrading of the bridge at Cape Ray?

2. What are the details of the progress of the (a) $900,000 in new buildings (b) $750,000 in new track laying equipment (c) $250,000 in new machinery (d) $50,000 in new equipment (e) 360,000 tie plates (f) 205,000 rail anchors (g) 45,000 track ties (h) 33,000 board feet of treated bridge ties?

3. What were the total freight handlings in (a) 1974-75 (b) 1975-76?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): The Management of Canadian National Railways advises as follows: 1. (a) Installation of rail complete. Flat Bay Bridge complete. Cape Bay Bridge complete. (b) Complete. (c) Complete. (d) Complete with exception of four miles. (e) Complete. (f) Complete.

2. (a) Corner Brook Express Building complete. Corner Brook Maintenance of Way Building now nearing completion. (b) Delivery completed. (c) Delivery complete with exception of one machine expected to be delivered first quarter of 1976. (d) Delivery complete with exception of one unit expected to be delivered second quarter of 1976. (e) Complete. (f) Complete. (g) Complete. (h) Complete.

3. (a) Calendar Year 1974—1,418,900 revenue tons. (b) Calendar Year 1975—1,036,930 revenue tons.

HEALTH AND WELFARE—DEPARTMENTAL CONTRIBUTION TO UNITED NATIONS DRUG ABUSE FUND

Question No. 4,087—Mr. Matte:

1. Has the Department of National Health and Welfare contributed for the past three years to the United Nations Drug Abuse Fund and, if so, does this contribution amount to $1,000,000?

2. Does the Department plan to continue contributing to a similar programme and, if so, in what amount?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): 1. For each of the fiscal years 1973-1974, 1974-1975 and 1975-1976, the Department of National Health and Welfare granted* $200,000 (for a total of $600,000) to the United Nations Fund for Drug Abuse Control.

* Please note the distinction between amounts "contributed" and amounts "granted" by reference to the Treasury Board's Authorities Manual, Chapter 30, 0.3.11.3.

2. The Department of National Health and Welfare does not intend to grant funds to the United Nations Fund for Drug Abuse Control in the 1976-1977 fiscal year.

CANADIAN PENITENTIARY SYSTEM—PSYCHIATRIC, PSYCHOLOGICAL AND SOCIAL WORK RESOURCES

Question No. 4,097—Mr. Coates:

1. Are psychiatric, psychological and social work resources available to the Canadian penitentiary system at (a) William Head (b) New Westminster (c) Drumheller (d) Prince Albert (e) Archambault (f) St. Vincent de Paul (g) Dorchester (h) Millhaven (i) Kingston and, if so, what are they?

2. In each case, how many staff are (a) full-time (b) part-time?

3. In each case, how many prisoners receive psychiatric, psychological and social work treatment on a (a) full-time (b) part-time basis?

4. How many prisoners were treated at each Penitentiary during the period 1973 to 1975?

Mr. Hugh Poulin (Parliamentary Secretary to Solicitor General): 1. Psychiatric, psychological and inmate classification services are available to all inmates at all of the above mentioned institutions except as follows: (i) There is no psychologist available at William Head. (ii) Psychiatric services are available within the following institutions: New Westminster, Drumheller, Saskatchewan and Dorchester Penitentiaries. (iii) Psychiatric services are provided to the following institutions from the adjoining Regional Psychiatric Centres operated by the Canadian Penitentiary Service: Archambault, Laval (St. Vincent de Paul), Millhaven and Kingston (Regional Reception Centre).

2. There are eleven full-time psychiatrists and three part-time psychiatrists employed by the Canadian Penitentiary Service. Full-time psychiatric services are available to inmates at New Westminster, Archambault, Laval (St. Vincent de Paul), Millhaven and Kingston (RRC). Part-time psychiatric services are dispensed at Drumheller, Saskatchewan and Dorchester Penitentiaries. All psychologists and classification officers are employed on a full-time basis. They are employed as follows:

Institution	Psychologists	Classification Officers
William Head	0	7
British Columbia	3	19
Drumheller	2	16
Saskatchewan	3	16
Archambault	2	10
Laval (St. Vincent de Paul)	2	7
Dorchester	3	12
Kingston (RRC)	4	10

3 and 4. The only inmates who could be considered as receiving psychiatric treatment on a full-time basis are those on register at the three Regional Psychiatric Centres operated by the Canadian Penitentiary Service. The number of inmates considered to be on full-time psychiatric treatment are as follows: (i) Regional Psychiatric Centre (Quebec), 64; (ii) Regional Psychiatric Centre (Ontario), 86; (iii) Regional Psychiatric Centre (Pacific), 95. No statistics are maintained on the other inmates not hospitalized at the Psychiatric Centres who occasionally receive psychiatric treatment on an out-patient basis. No inmates receive psychological or social work treatment on a full-time basis. No statistics are kept on the number of inmates receiving psychological or social work treatment on a part-time basis. Such treatment is given on request, if needed, and when it is appropriate (or on the basis of need identified by diagnostic testing and given to all inmates on admission and when required during sentence) or in relation to observed abnormal behaviour. All inmates receive the services of classification officers from the beginning to the end of their sentence on a part-time basis.

RESEARCH DATA ON ZOONOSIS

Question No. 4,122—Mr. Robinson:

Does the government have research data on "zoonosis"?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): The Department of National Health and Welfare has available to it the most up-to-date data on infectious diseases transmissible under natural conditions between vertebrate animals and man. (Zoonosis)

CAPITAL EXPENDITURE AND OPERATIONAL MAINTENANCE ASSISTANCE FOR COMMUNITY AIRPORTS

Question No. 4,130—Mr. Forrestall:

What was the combined total of capital expenditure and operational maintenance assistance for community airport project developments for each year 1960 to 1975 in (a) Yukon (b) Northwest Territories (c) British Columbia (d) Alberta (e) Saskatchewan (f) Manitoba (g) Ontario (h) Quebec (i) New Brunswick (j) Prince Edward Island (k) Nova Scotia (l) Newfoundland?

CBC—COST OF FRENCH TELEVISION PROGRAM "MONSIEUR B. EN TUNISIE"

Question No. 4,132—Mr. Lapointe:

What was the cost of the CBC French television program "Monsieur B. en Tunisie" of December 7, 1975?

Miss Coline Campbell (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): I am informed by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation as follows: It has not been customary to require the CBC to provide information about the costs of individual programs. The background of this custom is explained in detail in the reply to Question No. 2530, May 22, 1975.

FUNDS TO QUEBEC SCHOOLS UNDER BILINGUALISM PROGRAM

Question No. 4,138—Mr. Matte:

Since 1974, has the government directed funds to Quebec schools, as part of its bilingualism programme, for the learning material improvement programme and, if so, in what amount?

Miss Coline Campbell (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): The Department of the Secretary of State has not directed funds to Quebec schools for the learning material improvement programme.

RCMP—SERVICES TO MUNICIPALITIES IN THE CONSTITUENCY OF CHAMPLAIN

Question No. 4,581—Mr. Matte:

Did the Royal Canadian Mounted Police offer its police services under contract to some municipalities in the Constituency of Champlain in 1975-76 and, if so, what was (a) the total cost for such services (b) the number of police officers, by municipality (c) the name of the municipality concerned (d) the salary of the RCMP officers?

Mr. Hugh Poulin (Parliamentary Secretary to Solicitor General): No.

PUBLIC SERVANTS TRAINING PROGRAMMES

Question No. 3,259—Mr. Orlikow:

1. As of December 31, 1974, what was the number of public servants on temporary training programmes (a) Language Training (b) Special Assignment Pay Plan (SAPP) (c) Career Assignment Programme (CAP) (d) Career Orientation Programme?

2. What was the number of public servants in each programme for each incumbent level of the occupational groups in the administrative and foreign service category and the administrative support category, as of December 31, 1974?

3. What was the average length of time public servants were expected to spend on each programme for those enrolled as of December 31, 1974?

Return tabled.

ALLOTTED DAY S.O. 58—ALLEGED GOVERNMENT PROLIFERATION OF NUCLEAR WEAPONS BY RESUMING ASSISTANCE TO INDIA

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham) moved:

That this House condemns the government for increasing the threat posed to mankind by the proliferation of nuclear weapons, and in particular by its present negotiations to resume nuclear assistance to India.

He said: Mr. Speaker, there is something wrong when the only way we can have a debate on the most critical man-made problem facing the future of mankind, namely, the growing proliferation of nuclear weaponry and the major part this country plays in its continuance, is for the opposition to force a debate against the wishes of a reluctant, tight-lipped, secrecy-prone and grouchy government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lawrence: This is another facet of the secrecy syndrome infesting official Ottawa today—and if it does not stop, and stop soon, I warn our Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacEachen) that the long tradition and history of a bipartisan foreign policy for this nation will come crashing down around his ears. Things are changing here in Ottawa. Things are changing across the country, and if fresh winds do not start blowing through that architectural monstrosity on Sussex Drive that looks like an old-fashioned fortress, and is guarded like one, called the Pearson Building, then those winds will not only blow the minister and some of his advisers away but they could help to blow away this government as well.

We have drafted this short, blunt and pointed resolution with four thoughts in mind: to initiate a debate on the lack of nuclear safeguards in the world today and the failure of the world community to stop the spread of nuclear arms; to examine and, hopefully, force our government and this particular minister to explain and defend Canada's policy of selling nuclear power generating plants to other countries; to drag out of the minister, if we can, for the first time some rational explanation, if one exists, for the intended resumption of nuclear assistance to India; and finally if, as I suspect, there is no rational explanation, to embarrass those government members who are either unthinking enough or partisan and disciplined enough to vote willy-nilly for the government's resumption of nuclear aid to India, the timing of which, the circumstances of which and the merits of which are simply incomprehensible to the people of Canada and to the nations of the western world.

Make no mistake about it, sir, we in the official opposition are going to take special steps to make sure that the nature of the vote of government members on this particular resolution is communicated back home to the people in the constituencies, and we intend to point out those members who endorse this senseless policy of the government. Members can take that as a threat if they want, but if an appeal such as we are making today to government members to stop this give-away of the very means to manufacture nuclear weaponry to either untrustworthy or unstable foreign governments is not halted, if they themselves do not revolt against the policies of this minister, and especially his departmental advisers, and change the course of events which surely is leading us to a world holocaust, then we have no other course but to emphasize to the electors in the constituencies that their own MP voted in favour of this policy. We will do it, and they will hear of it. Vote with the government on this one, not only at your own political peril but, in the name of the future of mankind, at your own personal peril.

Others from the official opposition will be dealing today with the general world situation which is sadly deteriorating. Others will deal with the Middle East situation which is quickly deteriorating. The Argentinian tinder-box is about to ignite, with one Canadian reactor working and another being built at a time, in a place and by financial and legal means which to say the least are extremely shaky. The South Korean transaction will be examined and our conclusion will be that a worse example of Canadian participation in this whole nuclear industry simply could not be found anywhere.

Each of Canada's contracts in these and other nations will be exposed, not as being for the general benefit of world peace, understanding or development—and certainly not for the benefit of Canada nor, in some cases, of the other country itself—but, instead, as a giant hand-out or give-away of resources, technology and manufacturing capability, at direct cost to the Canadian taxpayer, under the subterfuge that somehow, somewhere, this is going to be paid for by others when actually we in Canada will be paying for these installations. My part in the debate is simply to introduce it and to try to goad or to pry out of the minister, or even his Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), some rational explanation of why we, as a country, are doing what we are doing.

May I also give a short history of India's nuclear connection with Canada. In 1945, Prime Minister Nehru of India, in the tradition of Gandhi before him, proposed an end to the testing by anyone, anywhere, of any type of nuclear device. That was in 1945. On May 18, 1974, at a site in the Rajasthan desert east of New Delhi, the Indian department of atomic energy exploded a nuclear bomb, it cannot be called anything else—the yield of which was between 15 kilotons and 20 kilotons which is approximately the same force as the bomb which was exploded over Hiroshima. Canada supplied the original materials, the original financing, the original knowledge and the original technology. These contributions, inescapably and inevitably, led to the Indian development in that desert almost two years ago.

In 1956, Canada established, as foreign aid, the Canada-Indian research reactor at Trombay, India. It produces no power, but it can, and does now, produce annually 10 kilograms of weapons' grade plutonium and it has produced in the ten-year period from 1964 to 1974 at least 50 kilograms—enough plutonium for at least ten fair-sized nuclear bombs. The Cirus heavy-water reactor was built at a cost of $70 million. Of this total, $35 million in credit financing was accepted by the Canadian Export Credit Insurance Corporation, with an additional $5 million in nuclear technological information transferred to the government of India without cost or deduction from the Colombo plan or other aid assistance.

In addition to the Cirus reactor, another reactor based on the Douglas Point power reactor has been built, with Canadian assistance, at Rama Pratap Sagar in Rajasthan state. It was to be the first of two Canadian-aided plants of 200 megawatts each. But completion of the second plant is currently being held up by Canada's decision not to supply further nuclear assistance without assurance that the plutonium coming from that plant will not be used for nuclear explosions. That is enough plutonium for 50 nuclear bombs in India. Financing by the EDC for the Rajasthan projects has amounted to $47 million over four contracts dating from April 27, 1964, to May 5, 1971. While India is a member of the International Atomic Energy Agency and both a signatory and ratifying member of the partial test-ban treaty of 1963, she has neither signed nor ratified the non-proliferation treaty. Moreover, her actions of May, 1974, are pretty clear indications as to the stand of Mrs. Gandhi and the congress party on nuclear explosions.

One further reactor at Narora in Uttar Pradesh, and another at Madras, are planned to come into service by the mid-1980s. These plants will be modelled on the Rajasthan reactors, but 80 per cent of the project will be built from Indian resources. Reactors already in operation include two boiling water reactors of American design at Tarapur, near Bombay.

That is the situation today. Is Canada blameless in all of this? What part, really, did Canada play so far as the entrance of India into the nuclear club is concerned? In the last issue which came to my desk last week of the slick, in-house departmental organ called "International Perspectives", another academic apologist for the government infers that the Canadian government was as appalled and surprised as the rest of the world when the Rajasthan bomb went off.

What are the facts? Not once, but many times during the disarmament conference from 1965 through to 1970, and perhaps even beyond, the Canadian delegation was specifically warned by other nations of the use the Indian plutonium from the Canadian reactor was being put to. Indeed, in the United Nations itself at least once in May, 1965, and later in July, 1965, at Geneva, the Indian representatives themselves hinted that India's only alternative to the Red Chinese threat was to build the bomb. In October, 1965, Mr. Shahi, the Pakistan minister of foreign affairs, specifically detailed that India was building a nuclear arsenal from Canadian plutonium—publicly, not privately.

In April, 1967, the Indian external affairs minister, Mr. Chagla, came out in the open and threatened that his country had to develop and explode the bomb. In 1971, our Canadian Prime Minister went to New Delhi armed with these reports and came away docilely, trustingly, on the assurance of Prime Minister Indira Gandhi that the Canadian aid was not in any way going to be misused. Well, whether it was misused or not, Canada stood by, assisting, providing, co-operating—not warning, threatening or cutting off aid.

In May, 1974, the Indians blasted their way into the nuclear club and blasted away not only the ineffectualness of the non-proliferation treaty, not only the façade of the Vienna-based International Atomic Energy Agency, but also, I would hope, the physical and mental stagnation of our own Canadian policy respecting nuclear assistance. For ten years the Canadian government had aided and abetted the proliferation of nuclear arms in India, and all the time they must have known what was going on and did nothing. They had full inspection and control powers in respect of what went into and came out of Indian reactors.

As in the case of the judges' affair, the Prime Minister of Canada should have known what was going on. I suspect he did know what was going on but, like in the judges' affair, he kept quiet; he did nothing. Surely, now, we are entitled to ask the government, "Why didn't you pay attention to the warnings? Who did you have doing the inspections? Where are those inspection reports? What did you do to stop this mad rush to world disaster? Why didn't you cut off assistance when India's policy became obvious? Did you even threaten to do so?" And, above all, "Why, in heaven's name, with the same minds in even greater auocratic, if not dictatorial, control in India today, is India any more trustworthy in 1976 than it was in 1974?"

Mr. Speaker, when conditions in the Far East and in the Middle East are more jittery now than then, when there has been a systematic destruction of parliamentary and democractic institutions as we know them in India, and when India herself is making deals to supply nuclear material and knowledge to other countries in the Arab bloc, which surely cannot be looked on anywhere with satisfaction, considering the potential, and when India's competitors, such as Pakistan, openly admit they are in a nuclear race on the subcontinent, the question has to be asked: Why now? Or, better still: Why ever? Why, when no one has devised a remedy, sanction or penalty when a nation does develop a bomb?

What do you do if India, Iran, Israel, Pakistan, Brazil, Argentina, Korea, Chile, South Africa, Egypt, Spain, Taiwan and Indonesia develop atomic bombs? Do you slap their wrists? Do you make them pay up on their UN appropriation? Surely, you make sure they do not have the means to make them in the first place. We are rapidly leaving behind that "first place" option. What are you going to do if India makes a hydrogen bomb, as Prime Minister Ali Bhutto openly declared they are doing in Madras when he was here in Ottawa last month? What is this government's answer? This government now says they are negotiating to resume nuclear assistance. Mind you, it is not the minister who said that, but Canada's version of Kissinger, Mr. Ivan Head. Perhaps he could be more fairly described as Canada's version of Chester Bowles. In any event, on March 10 Mr. Head announced that success had been reached so far as an agreement with India for resumption was concerned.

The only small detail left, of course—and I gather Mr. Head did not give too much importance to this merely routine item—was that it still had to be approved by the cabinet. This was done at a time when the International Atomic Agency had only 47 inspectors to report on well over 200 nuclear facilities worldwide. This was done at a time when we had already provided a country such as India with a developed nuclear arsenal which Canada itself would not dream of acquiring for herself. This was done at a time when Canada's own manufacturing and technical capability is to be strained to the utmost over the next ten years to provide our own nuclear power plants for our own nuclear domestic needs without in any way adding to the stress and strain of providing CANDU reactors to others, and when we had the sneaking suspicion that our reactors were wanted so that those nations which acquired them could more easily make weapons' grade plutonium from a Canadian reactor than from the American light water reactors. Surely, if this is so and if the suspicion exists—and I assure the minister that the suspicion does exist—this places an even greater burden on Canadians generally.

Finally, this deal was concluded at a time when Canadian government expenditures are at an all time high and must be cut down. Each one of these assistance programs, each one of these CANDU reactors in foreign lands, costs the Canadian taxpayer directly, at the very minimum, 55 per cent of the capital cost of each one of them—and usually much more than 55 per cent because of the man years and the expenditure of Canadian knowledge and Canadian experience with them. I merely ask this: Are our priorities straight? Is our thinking correct? Is the government right when we siphon so much effort, so much time and so much money into a program which in India's case has been misused and will likely be seriously abused in the future? The time to stop this type of transaction and this type of deal is now.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lawrence: And the way to do it is not to send Mr. Head on any more expeditions. The way to do it is to reprimand the government in the vote in this place tonight.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence) has done a commendable service in introducing a motion which will provide an opportunity for a public debate regarding a matter which is of vital concern to all Canadians and to the peace of the world. The nuclear bomb represents a greater threat to human survival than anything that has occurred in the history of mankind. With the development of every new weapon, man has increased his power for destruction. For the first time in all the long history of man on this earth, we now have the power not only to destroy cities or to lay waste countries but even to destroy all forms of life on this planet.

From 1945 to the present time this threat has mushroomed. In 1945, the United States was the only possessor of a nuclear capacity. Today, some 14 nations either have the nuclear bomb or have the capacity to produce one. Moreover, there are over 650 nuclear plants in 38 different countries, all of which produce radiation waste from which plutonium can be produced. In this situation Canada has greater special responsibility than any other country. The reason for that is that we have managed to produce the CANDU reactor which produces twice as much plutonium as does the light-water reactor which is used in the United States and in most of the countries of western Europe. Not only that, but the spent-fuel rods from the CANDU reactor will produce plutonium daily, whereas the light-water reactor can produce plutonium only at a scheduled refuelling shut-down which occurs only every 12 or 18 months. The CANDU reactor has some advantages, but there is no doubt that its greatest danger lies in the ease with which its radiation waste can be recycled into plutonium, the most dangerous substance known to modern science.

How has Canada discharged this great responsibility in handling the CANDU reactor? In my opinion we have discharged our responsibility shamefully. The Canadian government, through the Atomic Energy Commission, has gone around the world peddling the CANDU reactor whether or not the proposed customer is either reliable or stable. We have made a very heavy investment in producing CANDU reactors and the government is anxious to secure sales so as to get its money back. As a matter of fact, we have gone so far as to lend great sums of money to prospective customers. In the case of Argentina, we sold them a reactor on such generous terms that unless the contract is renegotiated we stand to lose over $100 million. In the case of the sale to the Republic of South Korea, we lent them $300 million and, if my memory is correct, I believe that in the case of India we actually gave them a CANDU reactor as a gift.

Who are these countries to whom we are either selling nuclear reactors or providing nuclear technology or nuclear fuel? We have India, to whom we sold a nuclear reactor; we have Argentina, to whom we sold a nuclear reactor; and we are now carrying on negotiations, since the visit of the prime minister of Pakistan to this country, with his nation. Not one of those three has signed a non-proliferation treaty. With reference to South Korea, with whom we have already entered into an agreement, they have signed the non-proliferation treaty but they have not ratified it. Do you see what happens? Every time we sell a nuclear reactor, nuclear technology or nuclear fuel to any nation, we start all its neighbours on a shopping expedition. Give India the capacity for a nuclear bomb, and immediately Pakistan is in the market. Make an agreement with Argentina to sell them a CANDU reactor, and now Brazil is in the market. Of course, with reference to South Korea, where there has been merely an armed truce for several years, there is no doubt that this has strengthened the hand of North Korea in securing some nuclear capacity from its allies.

What ought to disturb the government and this House is that almost every one of these countries with which we have been carrying on these negotiations has been, is now or is planning to procure recycling or reprocessing plants the only purpose of which can be to take the radiation waste from the CANDU reactor and produce plutonium. The production of plutonium, of course, means that with only a few pounds of it they are capable of producing a nuclear bomb.

In the case of India, India produced its own separation plant. In the case of South Korea, though they ordered one from France they agreed to cancel the order, but there is no guarantee in the agreement that if they change their mind in the near future the agreement is null and void. Argentina already has an experimental reprocessing plant which is just as capable of producing plutonium as India's plant.

[Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands).]

Brazil, the neighbour of Argentina, is now negotiating with West Germany to get a recycling plant. Surely, no country could do anything worse for the peace and safety of the world than to sell nuclear reactors into areas which are trouble spots, such as India and Pakistan, Argentina and Brazil, or North Korea and South Korea, particularly when those countries have expressed an interest in, and in many cases have acquired the technical facilities for, extracting plutonium from the radiation waste which will come from our nuclear reactors.

The motion moved by the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham makes special reference to India. The negotiations with India have been carried on under a cloak of secrecy and evasion. When we first began to see the newspaper reports from New Delhi of a delegation there, of whom the main spokesman seems to have been Mr. Ivan Head of the Prime Minister's office, we asked the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacEachen) what sort of proposals were being made and what was the purpose of the meeting between the Canadian delegation and the government of India. We were stonewalled. The Secretary of State for External Affairs said that the delegation was in India and until it returned he was not in a position to say what agreement it might be discussing.

Did the minister not know before the delegation left Canada what it was authorized to discuss and what type of preliminary agreement it had authority to sign? Was Mr. Ivan Head acting under the direction of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, or was he taking his orders directly from the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau)? We have not been able to find out. When the delegation did get back from India, we asked questions of the minister and he said that the matter was before cabinet and he could not discuss it until a decision had been made. This means that parliament and the people of Canada will be told nothing until an agreement has been signed and we in parliament are faced with a fait accompli.

Surely, if the Canadian delegation in New Delhi could tell people there what proposals were being advanced, and if the Indian government could disclose some of the suggestions it was making to the Canadian delegation, could not the Canadian people and members of parliament also be told what the proposals were—not as to a final decision, but what proposals were being put forward—so that we could discuss them and the Canadian people would know what was going on? For instance, is the ban on nuclear weapons to India to be lifted only for the purpose of supplying some important components to the reactor at Rajasthan? And when that is over, are we making any commitments with reference to supplying nuclear fuel for the reactor? The report which came from New Delhi is rather interesting. It appeared in the Ottawa Journal of March 8, 1976 and contains this very enlightening sentence:

—one informed source here indicated it contains at least an oral commitment by India to refrain from any further nuclear explosions while the Canadian assistance is under way.

What happens after the Canadian assistance is completed? We received a pledge from India that none of the nuclear capacity we were giving it would be used for making an explosive device. That pledge was broken in 1974. Is there any reason to think that it will be kept now? There is an old saying that if they fool you once, shame on them; if they fool you twice, shame on you. Surely, the minister has a responsibility to stop playing this game of hide-and-seek. He has a responsibility this afternoon, in the course of this debate, to tell the Canadian people whether we are thinking seriously of lifting the ban which we very properly placed on India after it broke its pledged word. Also, if we are going to lift that ban, to what extent, and for what purpose?

Let us not allow the minister to tell us, as he has done so often, that we are insisting on the very highest safeguards in the world. Safeguards are worth nothing unless the people who give them are the kind of people on whom we can reply. Certainly, none of the safeguards the government has been able to produce to date have been worth the paper they have been printed on.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): What we in the New Democratic Party have been demanding is that there be a moratorium on the sale of nuclear plants, technology and fuels until such time as the seven producing nations have been able to formulate a treaty which will place a ban on nations which have not signed the non-proliferation treaty and all those nations which are not prepared to forgo purchasing reprocessing plants. No single nation can enforce provisions like that. Only the seven nations which sell nuclear technology and nuclear plants are able to do that if by treaty they agree that when any nation breaks the safeguard agreement, that nation will not be able to purchase from any of the supplying countries either plants, repairs, parts, uranium fuel, heavy-water or anything else which they require to carry on their nuclear operations. Until we get that kind of agreement, and until the producing nations are prepared to institute that kind of treaty which will enable the producing countries to impose sanctions and to enforce their safeguards, then I say that we ought not to be selling nuclear reactors outside this country.

When this was suggested to the minister on the day on which he announced the sale of the nuclear reactors to South Korea and Argentina, I thought the reply of the minister was one of the most damning indictments I ever heard any minister make of himself and of the government to which he belongs. As reported at page 10493 of Hansard of Jauary 30, 1976, the minister said, with reference to a moratorium:

> Probably it would result in Canada's losing sales to other nuclear suppliers, and we would also lose whatever influence we are exercising—

That it would result in Canada's losing sales is a significant statement. Josh Billings once said that when a man says, "It ain't the money, it's the principle of the thing—it is the money." I think it is very significant that the monetary consideration seems to have taken precedence over moral considerations in the matter of the sale of nuclear reactors. Of course the people of Canada want to trade with other countries; of course they want to develop export sales. But I submit that the great majority of the Canadian people are not willing to pay the price of endangering the peace of the world in order to enable the government to sell two or three nuclear reactors in the trouble spots of the world.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): I hope that the minister will today make a full and detailed explanation to this House of the negotiations that have been going on with India. We are not asking the minister to tell us what will appear in the final agreement; but when he sent, or somebody else sent, the delegation to New Delhi they must have had some idea of why the discussions were going to be carried on. They must have known whether Canada, under certain conditions, would consider raising the ban on nuclear sales to India. We ought to know what those considerations are. Surely this House ought to know that long before an agreement is signed.

We are dealing with something that is far too important, in terms of human survival, to follow the old, diplomatic conditions of the nineteenth century which say that a government has power to sign an agreement then toss it on the floor of the House and give members ten or fifteen minutes to express an opinion on it. Surely the time has come, on so crucial a question, that these matters ought to be discussed in this House and in the standing committees of the House. Members of this parliament ought to have some input before the government makes a decision which could bring the world into a conflagration.

I do not think the Canadian people are going to accept the idea that all these negotiations regarding nuclear sales should be carried on in the hush-hush of diplomacy and that parliament and the people of Canada should be kept in ignorance of something which may well affect them, their children and their children's children for generations to come. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, we want the minister to come clean; to tell the House what is going on, and whether he is willing, in view of what happened with India and in view of the reprocessing plants that have been bought by some other countries with which we have been negotiating, to consider a temporary moratorium until such time as the seven supplier nations, who have been meeting and making some progress, are able to devise an arrangement by which we can guarantee that sales of nuclear reactors will not increase the nuclear capacities of countries which may use them to disturb the peace of the world and threaten the survival of mankind.

[Translation]

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, the motion now before us makes us think very seriously and very deeply, indeed. As a matter of fact, a country such as ours, known first and foremost for its peaceful role, as an example for all nations of the world, how can such a country justify nuclear aid to a country such as India?

I want to commend the mover of this motion because, in my view, we must act in a logical manner and with what is known as good horse sense. Mr. Speaker, geographically Canada is in such a situation that we wonder ourselves why we accept to have nuclear weapons. We are even wondering why we accept to have all kinds of weapons we could do without because between the United States on the one hand, our neighbours to the south and the Soviet Union on the other hand, our neighbours to the north, it is quite obvious that with our small population, we look like a pygmy between two giants, and it is absolutely ridiculous to have any kind of weapons to try to compete wth them.

I hope I can be excused for digressing a little bit but I happen to think I should emphasize the fact that we could radically alter our position by cutting down on defence expenditures, and this might even prove very successful in curbing inflation. Now, to come back to what I was saying, I would say that the government is definitely to blame for providing nuclear assistance and we must change our policy. We must give the example and not take advantage of opportunities to encourage the proliferation of nuclear arms. Is it not particularly illogical, Mr. Speaker, for us to provide such assistance to a country where almost one third of the people is undernourished and where thousands and thousands starve to death every day?

When we hear the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) declare over and over again that we have food surpluses, in particular milk and powered milk, but cannot systematize our food assistance to starving countries while we find ways to help them out in a useless and dangerous area like this one, which could lead to its destruction. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that this flagrant contradiction must be denounced with the utmost vehemence. There is no getting away from the fact that mankind is now living under constant threat.

And newspapers were again reporting last week how it could even be possible that the Guatemala earthquake had been caused by American nuclear tests in Nevada. Mr. Speaker, I am not saying that such is the case, but there are hypotheses leaning in that direction.

There is no doubt that our role is certainly not to act in such a way as to encourage anyone along those lines. That is why, Mr. Speaker, we fully support the motion. We hope the government will recognize the necessity of changing its policy in that field so that Canada can keep its role and its reputation as a pacifying country and not as a country capable of contributing, even indirectly, to practices that simply can generate conflicts throughout the world.

Mr. Speaker, I hope the government will bear in mind the remarks we are making, and I hope this House will vote as it should to show clearly that Canada is a peaceful country which does not want human life to be destroyed.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity provided by the motion to comment on Canadian policy with respect to nuclear sales abroad and to underline the dedication and interest of the Canadian government in the cause of non-proliferation. As hon. members have said, nuclear proliferation is a danger in the world. It is a broad, political problem which arises from the transfer of one state's nuclear technology to another and also from the vertical proliferation in the arsenals of the superpowers of the world. It seems to me hon. members took a limited view of Canada's role in coping with the problem, particularly of the reasons for Canada's transferring nuclear technology in certain cases to other countries of the world in discharge of treaty obligations.

The subject is extensive. I should like to deal with it under the following headings: first, why are we in the business of transferring nuclear technology, nuclear material and nuclear equipment; second, what effect would the moratorium which has been advocated by all previous speakers have internationally and domestically; third, there is the safeguard system, what it can do and what it cannot do; fourth, what is Canada's role in the London club and what were the recent conclusions of the suppliers' group which the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas) mentioned; and, finally, there is the special case of India.

As a country and as a signatory to the non-proliferation treaty we have undertaken to transfer technology to other countries for peaceful purposes. We all know that at present throughout the world nuclear power is the major alternative to hydro resources and fossil fuels. We also know that a number of developing countries and developed countries require nuclear power to further their economic and social development. So far in this debate not one speaker has mentioned the cry of the world's developing countries for access to nuclear technology. Most developing countries have adhered to the non-proliferation treaty. They say, "We have undertaken these obligations but developed, industrialized countries of the world are failing in their responsibilities to make available to us nuclear technology." That technology is urgently needed in certain developing countries as a source of power. It is not urgently needed in all of them, though it is in some.

When the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands recited our association with countries such as India, Pakistan, the Republic of Korea, and Argentina, he failed to underline that each of those countries is a developing country urgently in need of additional power resources in order to maintain their development and inch forward a bit in humanity's struggle for an improved standard of living. About this aspect not one word was said. Every spokesman on the other side ignored it totally. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) put the matter clearly when he said in his speech to the Nuclear Association, in Ottawa on June 17, 1975:

> It would be unconscionable under any circumstances to deny to the developing countries the most modern of technologies as assistance in their quest for higher living standards. But, in a world increasingly concerned about depleting reserves of fossil fuels, about food shortages, and about the need to reduce illness, it would be irresponsible as well to withold the advantages of the nuclear age—of power reactors, agricultural isotopes, cobalt beam-therapy units.

In Canada we have developed this high technology. It is one of the show pieces of Canadian industry and has application throughout the world. This afternoon hon. gentlemen are saying, "Sit on it. Look inward. Keep this technology in Canada because we do not want to be as other countries and take risks". We take some risks, admittedly. They say, "We prefer to withdraw than to confront the dilemma proposed by our policy, namely, how can we share this technology with the rest of the world and at the same time avoid the proliferation of nuclear weapons?" That is the dilemma.

The hon. member said it was a moral issue, but he ignored the moral question which we, as a rich, developed country would face if we did as he proposed and refused to take risks which other developed countries take—and there are risks—in sharing this technology with the rest of the world. The hon. member mentioned trouble spots. Of course there are trouble spots in the world. I wonder which parts are trouble free. Is there any part—the United Kingdom included, which has troubles with Northern Ireland—of which it could not be said that because of internal difficulties our most cautions policy would be to withdraw entirely from participating with that part of the national community.

Hon. members spoke about a moratorium. They were explicit: we should stop making available nuclear power reactors, nuclear materials including uranium, the fuel for power reactors and nuclear technology. Previously I presented the position to the House honestly. It was a statement of fact. The hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands said it was an indictment. If we were to cease our participation, sales of the CANDU reactor would be picked up by other countries. That is a fact. It is also a fact that whatever influence Canada has exercised, and continues to exercise—and it is considerable—in upgrading standards among the nuclear suppliers of the world would be less. The policy advocated by the hon. member would totally eliminate the considerable influence which Canada possesses at the present time.

I wonder whether hon. gentlemen opposite have thought through their proposals. They would affect indiscriminately the power programs of both industrialized and developing countries. Accepting the proposal they advance would constitute an abrogation of Canada's responsibility both in the field of international co-operation and in the area of adequate nuclear safeguards that would be part of our obligation under the NPT. Hon. members asked why this country did not join the NPT and take on these responsibilities. We have taken on these responsibilities, and one of them is to share our expertise and materials in this field with other countries of the world. Such a policy as advocated by the opposition would not only mean the cessation of sales of the CANDU reactor; it would have grave consequences domestically and internationally.

The power requirements of Canada's nuclear partners would be seriously jeopardized in the case of CANDU which in each instance is an integral part of the power program of those states. Pakistan is a good example. The hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence) would presumably want us to throw our weight around in Pakistan. That is a possibility; we could cease co-operation and we could black out the city of Karachi by denying them their power source. That is a possibility which could be considered. In the case of uranium sales, the vital energy situation of some of Canada's most important trading partners, such as Japan, the Federal Republic of Germany, and the United Kingdom, among others, would be jeopardized. I suggest, too, that a moratorium, if it is said we exclude uranium, would bring about a radical dislocation of Canada's uranium mining industry which, following the downturn demand over the past decade, is only now able to develop its full potential and play the important role in the economy of which it is capable.

I was in the House of Commons in the sixties when the bottom fell out of the international uranium market, resulting in the dislocation of the industry at Elliot Lake and a consequent need for immediate compensatory action on the part of the federal government. So if we cease to participate in these developments, if we cease to supply equipment, technology and fuel, the consequences would be both domestic and international. In addition, we would lose whatever influence we have as a partner in this business of upgrading general nuclear standards. It is a policy which I do not recommend to the House of Commons, and I doubt whether anyone on this side of the House will find much difficulty in voting against the ill-conceived motion put forward by the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham.

Mr. Beatty: Your speech is bombing.

Mr. MacEachen: As long as it is not a nuclear bomb, I am all right. Hon. members opposite have been complaining about secrecy; they say they have been kept in ignorance and do not not know what is going on. Mr. Speaker, on January 30 I tabled the agreements we signed with the Republic of Korea and with Argentina. I have also tabled a comprehensive statement on Canada's nuclear safeguards policy, the total background for the benefit of hon. members who wanted to be enlightened, who wanted to be in possession of more facts, who wanted to dispel the ignorance in which they have been so deeply immersed by members of the government. I notice that in the three speeches made, not a word was said about the safeguards policy; not a word was said about the agreements. No suggestion was made as to ways in which we might improve, if possible, the system of safeguards we have in effect.

The safeguards as reflected in those two agreements are extremely important. Hon. members clamoured for those agreements; they were clamouring for an opportunity to study them. Today we find ourselves engaged in a debate on the subject, and I have been waiting for some enlightenment as to means by which those safeguard agreements might be improved. None was forthcoming. Maybe hon. members across the way would like a moratorium on those, too. Perhaps they believe we should stop making these agreements and get out of the international field entirely. I want to tell them that safeguards are an extremely important aspect of the international non-proliferation system. There are others, of course. It must be recognized that proliferation is a political problem, one which stems from inequalities and imbalance within the international community.

If we want to succeed in the task of ensuring non-proliferation, we must cast the net wider. We must consider the causes of international tension and do something about the disparities which exist in the world. We must do something to bring about a better and more equitable international economic system. The safeguards constitute a system of legal commitments and a system of verification. The recipient state undertakes, legally, to observe certain preconditions and in particular commits itself not to undertake any explosive activity. In every negotiation in which we engage we attempt to add to the strength of this legal commitment.

As hon. members know, adherence to this legal commitment is verified by an international inspection system. Unfortunately, that system was downgraded by the hon.

member in his speech. It is being constantly improved. It is implemented not only by personnel but by mechanisms. No one has ever said—and the Prime Minister made this clear in the speech to which I referred a few minutes ago—that it is a 100 per cent foolproof. But the degree of statistical certainty is high and there is a high level of inhibition against diversion. We have recently completed a series of meetings with other nuclear suppliers in an effort to improve our system of international safeguards.

Mr. Stanfield: What are those safeguards?

Mr. MacEachen: I will outline them a little later, for the benefit of the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stanfield). International standards, as hon. members will realize, are not static. They have been in evolution since the first agreements for co-operation in the peaceful application of nuclear energy were concluded in the 1950s. The trend in safeguards evolution has been one toward increased stringency both in the legal commitments and verification mechanisms which are required.

The most significant development, of course, that has taken place in the evolution of the safeguards system was the entry into effect of the non-proliferation treaty in 1970. Nuclear suppliers, who have certain generally defined obligations under the NPT, met for a number of years in order to define these obligations to a satisfactory working level. In August, 1974, countries that shared or were about to share these obligations, including the United Kingdom, the U.S.S.R., the United States, the Federal Republic of Germany, Japan and Canada, reached a basic consensus, one which was notified to the International Atomic Energy Agency on August 22 of that year, setting out their interpretation in some detail.

The policy of the countries which accepted this consensus required, as a minimum, that in transfers of certain nuclear equipment and materials to non-nuclear weapons states not party to the NPT the safeguards system of the IAEA applicable to individual projects be applied. The participating countries, which were later joined by others, also stated an undertaking by the recipient not to use the supplied items for any explosive or other non-peaceful purposes as a prerequisite for the transfer. Recognizing the non-proliferation treaty as the keystone for international safeguards, Canada participated in these discussions and accepted the norms which were already consistent with Canadian policy as a basic standard for the safeguards it required. We did, as a country, go further than this particular consensus to which I refer; we went beyond the breath of the "trigger list", which is fully outlined in the background paper that I tabled in the House on January 30. The details of that policy are clearly set out in that document.

In line with the argument that has been made today by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands, the government was acutely conscious of the fact that one supplier cannot succeed unilaterally in raising the international safeguards standard and that Canada's forward position on safeguards and exports would only have real value and significance if the other major, significant suppliers also agreed to a similar set of policies.

Accordingly, a number of bilateral discussions have been initiated by Canada since the end of 1974 both on the level of officials and in the context of meetings held by the Prime Minister and myself. In part—and I think in significant part—as a result of these initiatives meetings among the officials of a number of countries have been held over the past year to examine the question of safeguards in great detail. There were diplomatic discussions of a sensitive nature, as the hon. member pointed out earlier, and in such cases it is up to the participants, if they wish to do so, to outline their role and policy. I should like to do that today on behalf of the government of Canada. I might say that all major suppliers presently on the international market shared these consultations, and more may do so. Let me only say this, that as a result of these international meetings Canada has notified certain other interested countries of the standards of safeguards required under its national policy pursuant to the consensus. This was also done by other participants.

This position reflects much, though not necessarily all, of the policy set out in the background paper I have tabled. It is, however, fully consistent with that policy, stipulating, as it does, that transfers of certain equipment, materials and technology will only be authorized on the basis of a formal governmental assurance from recipients to exclude uses which would result in any nuclear explosive devices. These transfers would also trigger the application of the safeguard system of the IAEA, and their retransfer to any third country could only be done on the basis of the consent of the government of Canada.

It is also stipulated that safeguards should apply to the items covered for their useful life as well as to the subsequent generation of nuclear material produced. It refers to the desirability of imposing provisions for mutual agreement between supplier and recipient on arrangements for reprocessing, storage, alternative use, transfer or retransfer or any plutonium and highly-enriched uranium that is covered. The observance of recommendations and standards for the physical protection of nuclear materials and facilities forms part of this undertaking. The standards also call for safeguards to be triggered by the transfer of technology for heavy-water production enrichment and reprocessing. Canadian policy, I should say parenthetically, places safeguards as well on reactor technology, which as I understand it was not agreed to for various reasons by the group suppliers.

It also sets out some of the areas where the government considers progress necessary for promoting non-proliferation, such as the promotion of regional fuel cycles. These are described in the background paper. The standard does not, as Canada would have wished, stipulate that safeguards be applied to the full nuclear program of the recipient country. Such a requirement is not, however, precluded and achievement of a consensus on this question may be a future result of efforts in the suppliers' group.

I have just given an exposition of Canada's position. This position, or policy is, of course, shared by the other supplier countries concerned about the problem. As the Prime Minister has stated, however, there has been no secret agreement or binding international treaty enforcing this standard. What there has been, as a result of consultation among senior technical officials, is a consensus decision expressed in unilateral form by a number of countries to accept certain safeguards principles in all cases of nuclear exports to non-nuclear weapon states, whether party to the NPT or not. More countries are likely, on the basis of review, to make such a decision.

The Canadian government has pressed, in its discussions, for the highest possible level of safeguards to be applied to all nuclear transfer. We are satisfied that much progress has been made as a result of this effort and that further progress can be made. It is one further stage in the evolution of the international safeguards system. The London club conclusions, as the suppliers' meetings have been called, have been a success and, I believe, in line with the reasoning put forward by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands. We have covered one of the difficulties that is encountered by a single country acting alone.

May I say a word about India, because it has been a matter of—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I regret that I have to interrupt the hon. minister, but the time allotted to him has expired.

Some hon. Members: Carry on.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is there unanimous consent to allow the minister to continue.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Stanfield: Come clean in your extra period of grace.

Mr. MacEachen: I have been invited to come clean in my explanation, and indeed I will be quite prepared to oblige because the situation with regard to India, or the question posed by our negotiations with India at the present time is a clear and easily understood question. The basic attitude I have taken in these negotiations is, in effect, what policy to be pursued by the government of Canada is in the best interests of non-proliferation in respect of India? I was going to make a political comment, but I had better not do so as my time is short. I will keep to the substance of the subject by saying that following the explosion in May, 1974, discussions have been held with the Indian government to ensure that existing safeguards on the RAPP reactor be strengthened, that the withdrawal of Canada from nuclear co-operation with India should not produce a collapse of the safeguards, and that India should carry out a responsible policy as a potential exporter of nuclear technology, material and equipment.

Mr. Brisco: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I regret very much to interrupt and intrude upon the time of the minister. I only wish to point out that there seems to be an open microphone in the booth over there, and I am getting a personal conversation rather than the scintillating words of the minister.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am sure that our technicians will look into the matter immediately.

An hon. Member: Is it a good conversation?

Mr. Brisco: I am still getting this personal conversation and it is getting more delightful by the minute.

An hon. Member: What channel are you on?

Mr. MacEachen: Following the explosion that occurred in India in May, 1974, Canada suspended its nuclear co-operation with India. It did so because in our view the carrying out of that explosion was in clear violation of the understanding that had been reached between Canada and India. In my view, no amount of argumentation can conceal the fact that the Indian government knew perfectly well that any kind of explosion would be contrary to the understanding that had been reached between Canada and India. That is clear to me.

The other argument has been put by India to the effect that you can have an explosion for peaceful purposes. We claim that the technology required for a so-called peaceful explosion is the same technology that leads to nuclear weaponry. No valid distinction can be drawn between an explosion for peaceful purposes and an explosion for weapons' purposes. That is our position, and it has continued to be our position up to the present time, although studies apparently have been launched, or are proposed to be launched under the auspices of the NPT respecting the suggestion that you can have an explosion for peaceful purposes.

We suspended our nuclear co-operation with India. The power reactor is not completed, but the shipment of materials has been suspended. Under the agreement with India that we entered into, we have an obligation to complete the shipment to the reactor, both of material and fuel. That is the obligation that is now in suspense. It is suggested, I believe, by the hon. member very clearly that at this stage Canada should put into a permanent state its suspension of co-operation with India. That is a possible line of policy. But I ask the hon. member, has he considered the risk that might result if India then allowed the safeguard system at that reactor to disappear entirely?

They have, at the present time, on that reactor a safeguard system and part of our objective, if we continue our relationship with India, would be to upgrade the existing safeguards on the RAPP reactor. That is a question hon. members have to consider, and it is a question that I am presently considering. We have no intention of staying permanently in India. The purpose of our negotiations is to get out, and get out we will. The question is, do we get out now, or do we get out when we complete our current obligations; and in completing our current obligations, are we doing more for the non-proliferation system; and if we do get out now, do we leave that RAPP reactor unsafeguarded? Basically, this is one of the main questions that is now under consideration.

The hon. member has asked me to come clean with the House. I should like to put before the House some of the questions I am presently considering before making a final recommendation to my colleagues as to whether we ought to complete this particular aspect of our co-operation with India prior to terminating it altogether, because that is the total objective of our policy in the long-run.

What would be the consequences of making permanent the suspension of supplying nuclear co-operation to India? What would be the consequences on the safeguard system? Would the Indian government consider that the co-operation obligations of Canada had been breached, and that the safeguards—which are an integral part of the co-operation agreement—should be removed? To what extent should co-operation be resumed in order to permit an upgrading of existing safeguards on the RAPP reactor? Is the proposed agreement effective in ensuring that spent fuel from the RAPP reactor will never be used for explosions? To what extent does the proposed agreement represent new and significant safeguard obligations for India which would bear on the development of its nuclear policy? How would any upgraded system relate to this particular reactor about which we are concerned? How would such an upgraded system compare with Canadian and other suppliers' standards? Would our completing this single, particular program by which we might upgrade the safeguard system, lead to an over-all upgrading in the situation which other suppliers could accept and respect?

Other questions are: Would the completion of our particular project with India be an inhibiting or delaying factor regarding a further explosion in India? Would we have any effect or, indeed, would a second explosion be delayed or be out of bounds in India? These are some of the main questions that are now before me. They are questions which have been considered by the negotiators in India who have been acting under my instructions and have reached an understanding with their India counterparts.

I have not reached any conclusion on these understandings because there are further questions I want to ask and further refinements I want to achieve in respect of the interpretations of various terms that are being employed. But the simple test, really, is which is best for non-proliferation? Is it to get out, as the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham suggests, or to complete our particular single project and thereby achieve an upgrading of the safeguards system on an important nuclear reactor which, in the absence of the completion of our program, might be left unsafeguarded long into the future? That is the basic issue we face in so far as the India situation is concerned.

It has been a great disillusionment for Canada and the Canadian people that this unhappy and tragic explosion did take place in India. It certainly was against the understandings that we had reached and it had a serious effect upon all of us, I believe, in an attempt to reassess and reagonize over the dangers in respect of proliferation which exists in any transfer of nuclear technology, nuclear materials or nuclear equipment. We have reached the conclusion that even though there is a very difficult balancing to be made between the objective of sharing and the objective of non-proliferation, those two objectives can be pursued simultaneously and, as a responsible supplier, we probably, as a country, will do more to reach the objectives put forward this afternoon by participating energetically with principles rather than by withdrawing within a Canadian cloister.

Mr. Lawrence: Mr. Speaker, would the minister permit a question?

[Mr. MacEachen.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the minister prepared to answer a question by the hon. member?

Mr. MacEachen: Yes.

Mr. Lawrence: Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the minister would add a few questions to the list he is asking his officials.

Mr. MacEachen: I am asking myself.

Mr. Lawrence: Then I will ask the minister right now whether the safeguards, for instance, in respect of the original reactor we provided for India are retroactive? Will the safeguards, for instance, cover the new reactors near Madras in which Canada will have very little input? A third question might well be: If, for instance, India exported some of its own technology and material to a country, let us say like Iran, and the deal is being made now, do these safeguards cover the whole nuclear industry in Iran, rather than just the small portion which may come from India? There is one other thing: would the minister please remember the old saying, "Once bitten, twice shy"?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Not this minister.

Mr. MacEachen: I believe these are extremely pertinent questions. The hon. member asks whether the original reactor, the research reactor Cirus, would be subject to safeguards.

Mr. Lawrence: One even before that.

Mr. MacEachen: This is the one from which the plutonium was produced, the RAPP reactor. These are questions we are now examining. I would ask the hon. member, if I may, rhetorically, whether he would prefer to have all of them, or would one or two be better than none?

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, there seem to be a few smart alecks around today. I think most of us recognize we are discussing perhaps the most serious question that confronts any of us in the world today. The minister, during the course of his remarks, said that the Indian experience had been a great disillusionment to the government and the Canadian people. I have no doubt that is so. However, I am concerned today that the minister and the Canadian people may have some even further disillusionment as a result of the policy he and his government are pursuing.

I think we are all agreed upon the importance of the question. This represents one of the great challenges of our time. I think we are all agreed on the very obvious danger to mankind. We have learned, in a way, to live in a certain balance of terror between the two superpowers. But proliferation, to other countries, smaller countries and countries which may react with fear and desperation, obviously greatly heightens the menace to mankind. We, the opposition, have been addressing ourselves mainly to the minister and to the government today. I want to make clear that so far as I am concerned, this problem is not the responsibility just of the government of Canada.

I do not think we can be very happy about the behaviour of the international community generally with regard to the nuclear threat and the threat of nuclear proliferation. The countries which have nuclear technique want to retain it and use it for their own purposes. Some manufacture bombs for their own purposes and some, like Canada, use these techniques for peaceful purposes. The countries which have the technique are trying to persuade those which do not to accept the fact that half a dozen countries or so have the technology and the others do not.

The means of persuading these other countries to accept this fact is the sharing of the technology which the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and his Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacEachen) emphasize so frequently. They emphasize that this is part of the obligation Canada undertook in signing the non-proliferation treaty; that is, the obligation to share. But the Secretary of State for External Affairs almost took the position today that one is either for or against sharing. That is not the point we are making.

I do not want to overemphasize the importance of the development of power by nuclear technology. I do not want, necessarily, to subscribe to the view expressed by the Secretary of State for External Affairs that the development of nuclear technology is necessarily the main alternative to the development of power from fossil fuel. He may be right. However, I notice that the Economist, for example, questions this. The Economist is quite critical of the fact that the AIEA, which is supposed to be an international control and inspection agency, is spending two-thirds of its budget on promoting the development of power from nuclear sources around the world. But even if the Secretary of State for External Affairs is right in thinking that nuclear power is the main alternative to power developed from fossil fuel, do we have to accept one or the other alternative that he has put before us today? Are we prepared to sit here and be embarrassed by the fact that he chastises us and suggests that because we are critical of the conditions under which Canada is sharing its knowledge, and under which it is entering into contracts, we want to be isolationists; we want to simply sit on our knowledge and we do not want to share anything—in fact, that we want to be inward-looking? I reject that.

● (1650)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: I like and admire the Secretary of State for External Affairs, but I have to say to him that it is a cheap debating manipulation to suggest that those who were criticizing the government for the deals it is making are simply inward-looking, dog-in-the-manger people who are not prepared to share advanced technology with the rest of the world.

The question is: Can we not work out methods under which this technology can be safely shared? Those who are urging a moratorium are, I am certain, not taking the position that they want to be dogs-in-the-manger, nor that they want to prevent the development of underdeveloped countries; but they think it is wiser to take a little more time in the international community, particularly among those nations which have the technology, working out, in co-operation, a safe method of sharing this technology.

So it is not just a question of sitting on it; it is not a question of members in the opposition parties either being in favour of the government's programs or against any kind of sharing at all. What we are concerned about, and what we are prepared to face and confront, is the great challenge that is not put fairly before the House or before the Canadian people by a minister who suggests it is either a question of sharing they way this government is sharing, or simply taking a narrow, inward look.

I say that Canada has particular reasons to be careful in discharging its responsibility, for two reasons. First, there is the fact, as has been pointed out frequently, that the CANDU reactor generates more plutonium than the alternative methods of developing power from nuclear sources. Second, there is the bitter experience in India to which the minister referred this afternoon. Yet Canada seems to be prepared to run risks to make sales of its reactors.

Let us look at the customers. South Korea is in a very unstable part of the world. It is in the process of negotiating a deal for a processing plant. It is said that it has no longer the intention of acquiring a processing plant; but so far as I know, the government of Canada has not received an assurance, for whatever it might be worth, from the government of South Korea that it will not acquire a reprocessing plant during any definable term of years. Argentina is not a signatory of the non-proliferation treaty. Terrorism is rampant there and there is instability in the country. Yet Canada is now negotiating the contract and it has very quickly entered into a contract for nuclear technology without any real care about ensuring an adequate standard of safeguards.

Then there is the Italian deal under which Canada was licensing an Italian company to manufacture CANDU reactors and re-export that technology. What has happened to that deal? Where does it stand? What assurances can the minister or anybody give us about safeguards with respect to that arrangement? Then there is Pakistan which also is not a signatory to the non-proliferation treaty. There must be a great temptation for the government of Pakistan to try to develop a bomb in response to what has happened in India. Then there is India itself which has used Canadian technique and resources to achieve a nuclear explosion.

I think it is right, and I think it is our duty to ask ourselves whether we should be in this business on these terms, taking these high risks. The minister admits that there are risks involved, and I suppose there will always be some risks. But is it good enough simply to boast that our safeguards are the highest in the world, when he admits that there are risks and everybody can see that? Has the minister any real confidence that these safeguards are adequate? Has he any real confidence that these safeguards can prevent happening in other countries what has happened in India? Why does the government want to impose this kind of a risk on the conscience of the Canadian people?

The minister says we want to enter into a moratorium. A moratorium does not mean that we will forgo all this business for all time; it means that we will not make any deals until we are satisfied that we have made a real effort to get an international mechanism that really works. He says we will forgo sales. I think the Canadian people would be prepared to forgo sales to permit that kind of effort to be made. Far from that causing us to lose influence, I think the fact that Canada is prepared to forgo or postpone these kinds of deals will increase our moral influence.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: The minister and others have said that we do not provide any aid to customers who have not signed a non-proliferation agreement. We may make a deal with a country that has not signed a non-proliferation agreement, but we will not provide any aid. I have to say to the minister that I do not believe that because the government is not prepared, for example, to disclose the terms under which these loans are made. It was not prepared to do it in the case of South Korea, and I do not think it will be prepared to do so in the case of Argentina. How can the government expect any of us to believe that these loans are made on purely commercial terms and that there is in them no aspect of aid to countries which have not signed a non-proliferation agreement when they want to enter into a deal with us?

History has indicated that Canada has been pretty anxious to make sales. I do not want to be unfair. I think that Canada has been sufficiently anxious to make sales, but it has not been sufficiently anxious to provide adequate safeguards, not in the case of India nor in the case of Argentina. I wonder if the government and those who are advising the government are not acting on the premise that these potential customers are going to get the bomb anyway, and Canada might as well get the business.

An hon. Member: Come on, you can do better than that.

Mr. Stanfield: I might be able to do better than that, but that is doing pretty well: that is putting it pretty bluntly.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hees: Merchants of death!

Mr. Stanfield: This government has certainly adopted a very lofty attitude toward this House and, despite what the minister says, a highly secretive attitude. The one thing which disturbs me is not just that this government is very secretive about the whole thing, but that the so-called London club, the club of the countries which have nuclear technology, is being exceedingly secretive. The minister did not disclose the terms of the consensus today. I suppose he is not authorized to do so. Those countries which reached consensus have been so secretive that I understand even the IAEA, which is supposed to enforce these things in so far as they are enforced, has not been told the terms of the consensus reached by the London club.

What is going on here? Are we back in the days of Maeterlinck and the Congress of Vienna; or are we living in the latter part of the twentieth century, trying to deal with one of the gravest problems which has confronted mankind? How does the minister justify coming into the House of Commons unable to disclose what Canada has agreed to? I understand there was an exchange of letters in January incorporating this consensus. How does the Secretary of State for External Affairs justify this highly secretive approach? This consensus is either so inadequate that it will not stand the light of day, or there is something wrong with it. While the Secretary of State for External Affairs is certainly not responsible for all the deficiencies of international relations, or for all the deficiencies of international efforts to secure some agreement on this subject, surely he can come into this House and tell its members why members of the suppliers' club are ashamed of publishing the consensus they claim they reached.

We would like to see the consensus so we can judge whether it is in any way adequate, so we can see to what degree it is inadequate so we can see the total context, and so we can get a picture of the situation in which Canada is entering into contracts bilaterally; so we can assess the risks Canada is taking and so we can assess the risks to which the government of Canada is exposing the world and the possible shame and humiliation to which our government is exposing the Canadian people in making these deals.

Can we not have a little openness? Even if the government of Canada thinks, because it is elected to government, that it has to keep the opposition at a distance, even if it feels it has to keep the opposition in its place and exercise its traditional right to enter into an agreement and then place it before the House for ratification—even if it feels it has to maintain that kind of relationship, surely the government of Canada can insist, before its associates in this club, that it must be able to come before this House and the people of Canada and tell us precisely what the consensus is so that the people of Canada have the facts.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: Apart from anything else, the Secretary of State for External Affairs is not discharging his duty to this House or to the people of Canada by being unable to come before this House and tell us what this consensus is so that we know what the facts are.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Oh, oh!

Mr. Stanfield: Let us not have any more confusion thrown around by the government whip or by anyone else. I have read the safeguards put forward by this government. They are not the same thing—

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Oh, you did?

Mr. Stanfield: Let the hon. member keep quiet for a minute. If he would listen to me, or even to his minister, he would know that the safeguards proposed by the government of Canada is one thing, and the safeguards agreed to by this club of exporters is quite a different thing—and the people of Canada are entitled to know the safeguards agreed to by the exporters. Surely, even the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Guay) can get through his head that the people of Canada are entitled to know that, because it would enable them to assess to some degree the risks the government of Canada is taking, the risks to which the government of Canada is exposing the people of Canada in exporting nuclear technology and nuclear reactors to South Korea, Argentina and all these other countries.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: I suspect that my time is getting short. I did not really rise to preach to the minister. However, before I sit down I should like to say to him that in this desperately important area of trying to control nuclear proliferation, we are seeking the same kind of international fumbling and bumbling which we have seen in the past and which has led to international disaster. This time, the government of Canada cannot shrug its shoulders and say that this kind of international bumbling is something undertaken by the great powers, over which we have no control or with whom we have nothing to do. This is not a mess being imposed upon us by others; this is a mess in which Canada and its government are participating. I warn the minister that this is what is going on. It is not a matter of Canada not having any part to play, because the members of this government are right in there pitching—and "pitching" is a pretty good word to use, because the sales pitch is obviously a very important part of their thinking.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Maurice Dupras (Labelle): Mr. Speaker, at the beginning of his comments, the mover of the motion, the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence), indicated to the House that there was no opportunity to launch a debate on the role of the Canadian government in the sale of nuclear equipment and that it was as a result of an allotted day that he could question the minister on the matter. I would like to point out to the mover of the motion, Mr. Speaker, that he had some opportunities and that he took advantage of them. He had two opportunities on March 6 or 7, 1975 and on March 13, 1975. He had another opportunity on May 22, 1975 and his last opportunities were on December 2 and 12 last when indeed he directed some questions to the minister about Canadian policy.

Mr. Speaker, I wish first of all to commend the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacEachen) for his excellent speech and the clarity with which he delivered it and I hope that this time all opposition members have understood what is the Canadian policy governing the sale of nuclear material to countries which signed the non-proliferation treaty.

Mr. Speaker, within the next 15 minutes that are allotted to me, I would like to refer in particular to that part of the motion which deals with the sale of nuclear material to India. I wish to refer as well to the nuclear explosion that many of us—and I see that the mover has made the same mistake—consider as an atom bomb explosion. There is a huge difference, Mr. Speaker, between exploding an atomic bomb and a nuclear explosion.

What happened in Ragasthan in 1974, Mr. Speaker—and it was told to me by Indians and not by Canadians—is that first of all this explosion was not a bomb and second, the Indian people could have used their expertise, their ability to detonate a nuclear bomb well before 1974.

What I am trying to say, Mr. Speaker, is that people from India are telling us that they had no need whatsoever for our expertise or our equipment for the 1974 explosion. They could even have released that bomb before the Chinese, that is to say almost ten years ago.

Therefore I wonder what prompted this hysterical crisis which caused huge problems to the Indians, particularly if you recall the co-operation program we have been pursuing with India for almost 20 years, since they got their independence, and especially for the past few years.

And if one considers the importance, the amount Canada contributed for these unfortunate people and the importance they attach to the Canadian contribution, one will easily understand that they may wonder about the future of our cooperation program and about the way India is using the nuclear material Canada sold her. Surely it is not to fulfill the ambition to produce atomic bombs and use them. The Indians were a pacific people. They have been much more often under occupation or attack than they were either occupants or attackers. These people need the assistance of Canada, it is not endowed with natural resources as we are in Canada. As everyone knows, industrialized countries helped them by building a system of irrigation channels contributibg to make the unproductive land a little more fertile, but there are still other needs. Energy is one of the great needs the Indian economy is faced with, and this is why, Mr. Speaker, we insist so much on the participation of Canada for the maintenance of this co-operation program in which we have been involved for such a long time.

There is not a single Indian I met who believes for one minute that his country has any ambition to develop and produce an atomic bomb or even to deliver it. I do not know this simply from speaking to from the man on the street, Mr. Speaker. Like other delegates in India last November, including some from the motion sponsor's party, I had the opportunity to meet India's Secretary for External Affairs of India Kamas Singh who assured us, Mr. Speaker, that in no way were there any ambition to develop atomic bombs and spend fabulous amounts in that area. Quite the contrary, it is that expertise, that knowledge they want to develop, mainly to foster economic development in a country which has such a need for it. They also wish to help generate rather cheap power. They are not the only ones to do so, because in the last few months this has become the less costly, the most economical way to produce power. Already at the end of 1974, there were no fewer than 170 reactors in 19 countries around the world. Those 170 reactors were producing at least 73,000 megawatts of electricity, and it is estimated that by 1980 some 28 countries may produce 185,000 megawatts.

Should we Canadians deprive a developing country, a country in dire need, should we deprive Indians of the right to use that economical form of energy, capable of being installed anywhere in their vast country? Clearly, India's intention is not produce the atom bomb. As I said, there are assurances from the major part of the people, from those who are in places of responsibility.

I believe some of my colleagues who were acting as delegates in India November last were exposed to comments by the leaders, by the Indian parliamentarians who entertained us. Of course they convinced some of us of the urgency for Canada to continue its negotiations as fast as possible so that India may continue to benefit from the Canadian assistance program.

This faith that we Canadians gave to the Indian statements is shared by almost, I would even say all members of the delegation which also included Progressive Conservatives. A member of our delegation even said in a public speach—and to be charitable I will not mention his name, my colleagues who were with me are here to confirm it—that he understood the Indian government for having produced a nuclear explosion; he believed that India had no ambition to produce a nuclear bomb and that he wished—this Canadian delegate is a Progressive Conservative—that our negotiations and our agreements with India would continue.

So, the views of the members of this party on that subject are very different. They went to India and had the opportunity to study on the spot what the production of cheap energy represents for that country. We are not in a position to evaluate what it could represent for India as we are excessively wealthy when it comes to hydroelectric power and, traditionally, in some area of the country, we have always produced our electricity through other means than those at India's disposal. When a country like India depends almost exclusively on oil and coal to produce its electricity it is obvious then since 1973 this country is at grips with tremendous difficulties and the enormous costs that it might represent for India is certainly much more important than what it could represent for instance for the province of Nova Scotia that had to raise its sale tax by one cent effective Monday morning to compensate for the rising cost of oil used to produce electricity.

Yet, Mr. Speaker, I know that there could be some arguments about the moral issue whether or not Canada should decide if a nation should have its own nuclear bomb. I do not think we wish to play this part. We expressed it repeatedly to our parliamentary colleagues in India when we met them on this touchy subject. We told them it was not fair from some countries to make us play this part. We put trust in some countries as they accepted like us to sign a non-proliferation treaty.

Who will determine who can come into power, and who can obtain and produce a nuclear bomb, Mr. Speaker? I do not believe that the Canadian people would be interested. However, we cannot remain indifferent to the very great needs that are apparent when we visit the large country that India is.

Mr. Speaker, I said that I only wanted to attack the part of the motion of the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence) that concerns the continuation of our agreements with India. I hope, Mr. Speaker, that my speech will have succeeded in convincing some of my colleagues, those who did not have like me the opportunity to see for themselves the great sincerity of the Indian people and the threat with which these people, who are surrounded by hostile countries, have been living for so many years. I invite those who have not done so to read for instance the book entitled Cette nuit la liberté and to see with what mentality, with what philosophy the Indian people can accept the reluctance of people like ourselves, like Canadians, to resume an assistance program which is valuable for them, and which, in many cases, is essential for their survival, Mr. Speaker. Of course, there is no question of wanting to produce expensive nuclear devices, it is simply a matter—and I hope that I have succeeded in convincing some of my colleagues of this—it is simply a matter of the wish to produce energy less expensively and as quickly as possible to continue the industrialization program which India introduced a few years ago and which is, in fact, very successful.

For my part, Mr. Speaker, I hope that the question of our agreement with India can be settled as quickly as possible and that our agreements can be continued.

[English]

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, today we are debating perhaps the most important subject ever raised on an opposition day. This government's attitude to its international responsibilities and continued nuclear assistance to India rank high on the list of moral decisions which the government must make and the people of Canada must accept or reject. I was amazed to hear the position of the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacEachen), for whom I have great respect. Although many countries involved with nuclear technology and the production of nuclear materials and equipment are re-evaluating their positions, the minister apparently, despite his well-known sensitive, political antenna is not re-evaluating his position in considering domestic aspects and international responsibilities.

I was also surprised at what the minister said about safeguards and obligations under the non-proliferation treaty. Apparently he considers continued negotiations concerning treaty obligations as sacred as the Holy Writ. Certainly, his relating of obligations to the ultimate terms of the non-proliferation treaty is surprising. The minister no doubt recalls the evaluation of William Epstein, assistant director of the United Nations Disarmament Division, at the five-year review session on the non-proliferation treaty which took place last year. According to Mr. Epstein, the conference results were "poor" and confirmed the opinion of many non-signatory nations which observed the proceedings that signing the treaty was not worth it. Mr. Epstein said this to remind us of the dangers of proliferation and to show that the problem will not be solved merely by entering into new, extended treaties. The solution involves complex factors relating to the economic field, not just technical safeguards. The mere ratification of the treaty alone is not enough to ensure that India, for instance, or other countries receiving nuclear assistance will not again explode an atomic device.

The International Atomic Agency has indicated that by the year 2000 the annual rate of the world's plutonium production will be about one million kilograms, enough to make 100,000 nuclear explosive devices. Needless to say, Canada's contribution to this potential is significant and disturbing. At present, 30 countries are capable of producing nuclear materials which can be used for weapons. By 1985 it is said that 50 countries will possess at least one nuclear plant capable of producing plutonium for weapons.

We must face the fact that an increasing number of nations of various political stripes and of varying responsibility will acquire the capability of producing nuclear material. Not all of it will be used for the production of electrical energy. We must also consider the increasingly large stockpiles of radioactive wastes in the world. These will increase at an exponential rate. Before long, 120 tons of plutonium will be lying around in the world.

The question is not so much how we are to deal with the situation today, which seems to concern the Secretary of State for External Affairs: it is, what are the long-term implications of this build-up and is there an alternative?

Dr. Frank Barnaby, writing in the New Scientist, estimates that in ten years the 120 tons of plutonium will increase to about 1,400 tons. Testifying on United States nuclear non-proliferation policy before a Senate committee of the United States, Secretary Kissinger said:

—we support the worldwide goal of finding alternative sources of energy to reduce reliance on oil.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs alluded to this. Secretary Kissinger went on to say:

Yet a progressive pattern of proliferation could set back, if not cripple entirely, the continued growth of peaceful nuclear energy to service mankind's needs, as exporters and importers alike came to lose confidence in the ability of the international system to find effective techniques for realizing the peaceful benefits of nuclear energy while eliminating its inherent security risk—

Mr. Kissinger, whose country is involved with the exporting of nuclear technology and materials, has expressed far greater caution than that expressed by the minister in giving the sort of assurances he gave us this afternoon.

Miss Bégin: My goodness; what is that? You are wrong.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): My goodness; I am right.

Miss Bégin: No, you are wrong.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): I hope we shall hear the views of the parliamentary secretary later in this debate.

Miss Bégin: Be assured, you will.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Perhaps she can correct her mentor, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, and give the kind of assurances he could not give this afternoon. Unlike a few other countries, we are not exporting nuclear weapons per se. Yet we are certainly trafficking in the nuclear hazard and the potential for destruction. Proliferation does not merely mean that there is to be a spread of nuclear weapons to more nation states who to a varying degree have a stake in the present international system; proliferation means that there is a greater likelihood of such weapons falling into the hands of disenchanted individuals or terrorist groups. I did not hear the Secretary of State for External Affairs allude to this fact which is of growing concern to many countries—not merely to those directly involved in the export of nuclear technology, materials and equipment. He did not speak about the danger which would arise if this technology were to fall into irresponsible hands.

An hon. Member: Sheer rubbish.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, an hon. member opposite says, "Sheer rubbish." He is ridiculing the views of responsible scientists who know the possibilities of misuse.

An hon. Member: What responsible scientists?

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Surely hon. members opposite cannot ignore the views of increasing numbers of responsible people who have been involved in nuclear development. Surely hon. members will not fly in the face of established facts. Increasingly, we face the situation in which the spread of nuclear technology increases the likelihood of nuclear terrorism and blackmail.

An hon. Member: Come off it.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): The October, 1975, conference sponsored by the Stanley Foundation listed five consequences of proliferation. First, there is the possibility of theft of nuclear weapons. I did not hear the Secretary of State for External Affairs give assurances to alleviate our fears about the possibility of nuclear theft. If hon. members opposite think this is not a danger, I hope they can provide better assurances than were provided by the Secretary of State for External Affairs and his officials to set at rest the concern of many countries about these matters. In recent years we have become only too familiar with acts of terrorism. In years to come, nuclear materials will become more plentiful. Stockpile depots will become more abundant. If there is no effective control with respect to security, the likelihood of these materials falling into irresponsible hands is obviously that much greater. I would have thought that, in addition to the possible use of nuclear technology and materials for terrorist activities, the prospect of the theft of plutonium for contamination purposes would in itself be serious. In addition, I do not think any attention has been paid to the possible sabotage of nuclear powered plants or to waste storage facilities being properly established to prevent the release of radio activity, or to the growing threat of pollution problems which have been a matter of concern even in this country, one which has taken the lead in developing this whole technology.

It strikes me as ludicrous, if it were not so tragic, that on the one hand the minister can argue that we have in a sense led the field in the development of nuclear technology, while on the other we are apparently not really concerned about adequate standards in the long term for the safe disposal of waste products in countries which have little sophistication in the nuclear field.

Some three or four weeks ago I asked the Secretary of State for External Affairs a question with respect to one specific safeguard which might, on an interim basis at least, offer some protection. I understood from the answer I received that either the government was unaware of the suggestion or that it was not under active consideration. I was referring to the suggestion by U.S. Secretary of State Kissinger that regionally controlled nuclear fuel centres might be established, to include centres for fuel classification, plutonium reprocessing, waste management and storage.

In the comments the Secretary of State for External Affairs made with respect to safeguards it was obvious he avoided dealing with the most basic element in any effective safeguard system, which is the question of enforcement. He did not tell us what, if any, sanctions or penalties existed for non-compliance with the safeguards. He did not refer to any sanctions or to any penalties, or to any means whereby the safeguards might be enforced. He seemed prepared to rely on assurances, verbal or otherwise, that he might receive from the countries involved. In the case of India, for example, I find it strange that the hon. gentleman would be prepared to accept an assurance from a country which at the present time, if one examines the domestic situation there, appears in no way to be able to offer the kind of long term assurance which is obviously desirable if the time period involved is to make any sense.

The suggestion of Mr. Kissinger with respect to the establishment of regional fuel centres seems to me to offer an interim means of assuring the kind of workable safeguards which very much concern members of this party and which should very much concern the government. Such a system would remove control from the hands of any single nation state with respect to reprocessing of the spent fuels, a question of great importance when it comes to the development of a weapons device. In addition it would reduce our dependence on individual assurances, assurances which in some cases would in no way be satisfactory. It would also mean the involvement of all states; it would remove the tension related to the intentions of individual states.

Another matter which was hardly touched upon by the Secretary of State for External Affairs this afternoon was the kind of regional dispute in which we seem all too ready to involve ourselves, for example, that between India and Pakistan.

One does not have to know a great deal about international politics to realize there is a long-standing dispute between India and Pakistan. One has to reflect that by resuming nuclear assistance to India we are encouraging the government of Pakistan to think that either with our assistance, or with the assistance of another supplier, it will be obliged to compete in similar terms with Indian technology which is also capable of producing some kind of explosive device. Has the Secretary of State taken this into account when considering whether he will offer the same kind of package to Pakistan? The establishment of regional centres would at least offer an interim solution in terms of controlling the number of sites, the movement of nuclear materials and possible proliferation.

With respect to the position of India, I should like to remind the Secretary of State for External Affairs that it was his predecessor, the present President of the Privy Council (Mr. Sharp), who said in a release following the Indian detonation:

> We cannot be expected to assist and subsidize directly or indirectly a nuclear program which in a key respect undermines the position which Canada has, for a long time, been firmly convinced is best for world peace and security.

I ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs: what happened to that perception of responsibility? Does he intend to wait for a similar event to take place, after which he will tell us, wringing his hands, that he did not expect to be let down by the government of India? I might say at this point that I am not more critical of the government of India than I am of other countries which are attracted toward developing a nuclear device. I do not think India is any more wrong than some other countries which have the same end in mind.

It is interesting that a year ago an organization known as the Gandhi Peace Organization insisted that only the most gullible would believe that the detonation which was effected with those devices was done for a peaceful purpose. When the minister says we have a moral responsibility I am not sure where he has been taking his moral training. It seems that what he is saying to a number of countries, both those which are recipients of nuclear technology and those which are suppliers, can be construed as a green light. Bearing this in mind, the present position of the Canadian government, as reflected in the statement of the Secretary of State for External Affairs is one not of moral responsibility but of moral irresponsibility.

The minister was specific in chastising previous speakers in the debate for neglecting to say that one of the moral issues at stake here was our responsibility to provide alternate sources of energy to the developing nations. He suggested we must be very concerned that they have alternate energy sources apart from those of a petroleum nature. Indeed, in this respect he quoted the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau).

With the situation in the world today, I ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs is it understandable, or even commendable, if our government is so concerned with guaranteeing lower priced and dependable energy sources for these countries that are hoping to develop domestic industry, that we should saddle these nations with such expensive and often difficult to control power sources? I do not think the Secretary of State for External Affairs has made the case at all with respect to the economies to be gained by this kind of alternate energy technology.

Surely a much more logical approach would be to assist those nations with research into forms of renewable energy which are already available, and there are a number that have not been mentioned. In fact, Mr. Speaker, if you look at the actual power that will be supplied to these countries by nuclear reactors, with respect to RAPP 1 which is now operating, it provides in the order of .1 per cent of India's total energy needs. RAPP 2, which the minister has been talking about this afternoon, will provide together with RAPP 1 .25 per cent of the needs of India for energy.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I have to interrupt the hon. member as the time allotted to him has now expired. Unless there is unanimous consent for him to continue I will have to recognize the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin).

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): I will conclude very quickly, Mr. Speaker, because I know there are other members who wish to speak. Let me just quote the other figures so they are on the record and we will not be at cross purposes in our mathematics. As far as India is concerned, both RAPP 1 and RAPP 2 supply one-quarter of one per cent of India's energy needs. With respect to the KANUPP reactor in Pakistan, .6 per cent; with respect to the one contemplated in Argentina, nine-tenths of one per cent; and with respect to the South Korean reactor, about 1.1 per cent.

Therefore when the minister talks of alternate energy and the development of nuclear power, he is not talking about solving the great energy crisis with which these developing nations are faced. In this regard the minister has introduced a very large red herring. It would have been much better for him to talk frankly and seriously about the lack of research in this country. I have a number of figures, which I will not bore the minister with today, with respect to this matter. These figures indicate the kind of low level of priority that the government is giving the matter. It is really locked into a kind of archaic kind of technology at the moment.

I feel sorry for the minister who has had to defend a very weak case. Sometimes he does it very well, but I felt particularly sorry for him this afternoon. It will only be a brief matter of time before he or his successor comes back to this House and reverses himself. There is no question in my mind that history is not on the side of the minister, and I think he knows that. History is on the side of the angels, on the side of those who increasingly realize that the kind of major sales plan we have got ourselves locked into with our nuclear bag of tricks is now an anachronism, a point of sorry history for us.

The sooner the government comes to its senses and realizes that it is only endangering hundreds of thousands, indeed millions of people by this kind of foolhardy program, and the sooner it presents a policy that promotes sensible and sane alternate energy development, the sooner it will receive the support of all members of the House. At the present time, with respect to its nuclear assistance to India and the other countries mentioned, it is in a most foolhardy position.

ELECTORAL BOUNDARIES READJUSTMENT ACT

OBJECTION TO COMMISSION REPORT RESPECTING ONTARIO

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. Before recognizing the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin), it is my duty to inform the House that an objection signed by the hon. members for London West (Mr. Buchanan), Middlesex-London-Lambton (Mr. Condon), Bruce-Grey (Mr. Douglas), Kitchener (Mr. Flynn), London East (Mr. Turner), Lincoln (Mr. Andres), Windsor-Walkerville (Mr. MacGuigan), Burnaby-Seymour (Mr. Raines), Niagara Falls (Mr. Young), Hamilton Mountain (Mr. MacFarlane) and Halton (Mr. Philbrook) has been filed with me pursuant to section 20 of the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act, Chapter E-2, RSC 1970, to the report of the Electoral Boundaries Commission for the province of Ontario.

If the House agrees, I would suggest we follow past practice and print the text of the objection as an appendix to this day's Votes and Proceedings. Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY S.O. 58—ALLEGED GOVERNMENT PROLIFERATION OF NUCLEAR WEAPONS BY RESUMING ASSISTANCE TO INDIA

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Lawrence:

That this House condemns the government for increasing the threat posed to mankind by the proliferation of nuclear weapons, and in particular by its present negotiations to resume nuclear assistance to India.

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, we in this party have made it clear that we warmly approve of the opposition motion that condemns the government for increasing the threat of proliferation of nuclear weapons. The motion refers to nuclear assistance to India, but it should not be forgotten that other countries with which Canada has either entered into agreements for sale of nuclear weapons and materials or is discussing such sales include, in addition to India, Pakistan, Korea and the Argentine. Of these countries, three out of four have not subscribed to the non-proliferation treaty which by many is thought to be a highly important part of the whole attempt to secure safeguards.

I want to make my protest, as others have, against the degree and measure of secrecy that we have had in this highly important matter. The minister made a lot out of the fact that he issued the text of the agreements between the Government of Canada and the Government of Korea, and between the Government of Canada and the Government of the Argentine. In addition we have had made available to us extracts from "Safeguards", a document published by the International Atomic Energy Agency. Furthermore, we have had a background paper on nuclear safeguards and Canadian safeguard policy prepared by the Department of External Affairs. But these documents are extremely vague. They fail to reveal the details of the agreements in question; they fail to reveal the real nature of these safeguards. Certainly they do not constitute an adequate disclosure.

There may be some things in this field that cannot be disclosed, but the government has fallen far short of anything in the nature of full disclosure. Indeed, though the minister seems not to understand this, a careful examination of these documents which he has produced and which he has accused us of not reading clearly reveals the dubious efficacy of these safeguards systems in which he apparently puts his reliance.

In addition, the recent conference of states which export nuclear equipment made an attempt to tighten the safeguards so as to prevent the potential diversion of nuclear materials, but the details have been kept effectively secret. We do not know what was discussed. I do not understand why the peoples of the world, in this day and age, are not allowed to know clearly what efforts are being made to prevent the disaster that faces them. The government has failed to refer these agreements to parliament for ratification, notwithstanding the fact that it used to be the policy that when any serious, important international engagement was entered into the ratification of parliament was sought. A mere debate like this is not equivalent to the ratification of parliament.

Even more than that, the government has failed to refer these documents to the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence where we could have heard witnesses such as General Burns, a distinguished Canadian expert on disarmament, and David Lilienthal, first chairman of the U.S. Atomic Energy Committee. Both these men have warned against the sale of nuclear devices. They could have explained to the Canadian people what is involved in the sale of nuclear reactors. No such explanation has been given. We have not had one single distinguished scientist quoted to us to justify the statement that these safeguards are in any way adequate. I dare say there are some who could do that, and if they could do so it might be very reassuring to the Canadian people. But that we should be left without an opportunity for a proper scientific investigation into what is involved here is, in my opinion, a shameful dereliction of democratic duty.

It somehow seems that the Canadian government is more interested in the financial aspects of these nuclear sales than the frightening potential that they may lead to disaster. David Lilienthal, to whom I have already referred, one of the best known scientists of my generation, and I think of the present generation, spoke of the "impending disaster" in the international proliferation of nuclear bombs. He is a careful scientist and not the sort of man who uses loose rhetorical phrases. He talks about the impending disaster. I got no feeling whatsoever that the minister, or the government for which he speaks, had appreciated the impending disaster, and I notice even now that he prefers to engage in a private conversation with his colleagues rather than listening to the debate.

Mr. David Lilienthal went on to say:

I am glad I am not a young man and I am sorry for my grandchildren.

The government keeps repeating that it has worked out within various agreements the best safeguards available, but we are given no details of what these safeguards are. The question obviously arises at the present time as to whether these safeguards are sufficient. Maybe they are the best, but the real question is, are they sufficient to give reasonable assurances that our nuclear material and the reactors we sell and make available to others will not be diverted to weapons material? The strongest opinion seems to be that the effectiveness of the so-called safeguards depends upon the reliability of the governments entering into or administering the agreements.

The minister said just a few months or weeks ago that there is no safeguard where there is a will to disregard these safeguards. Mr. Kenneth Fasick, who is the director of the International Division Accounting Office of the United States, in the New York Times, on January 31 of this year, said that the U.S. and international experts had "generally confided that the country could circumvent safeguards if it was willing to assume the risk of detection, incur the expense and take the trouble to do so". He says that the IAEA has 40 inspectors who keep track of nuclear materials and 400 nuclear facilities.

[Mr. Brewin.]

The Canadian background paper on safeguards, recently prepared by the Department of External Affairs, states that within the IAEA, the division of safeguards and inspection, there is a total staff of 186 people, 74 of whom are professional staff members. It is perfectly clear if you read the IAEA paper that it recognizes the limitations of policy in the enforcement of safeguards. In the extract from this publication at page 7 it says there is no single solution to the problem of nuclear weapons. Technological control, in the absence of genuine political commitment, is inadequate, and political willpower is likewise insufficient without an effort at the technological level. "The avoidance of nuclear war depends on the ability of nations to act co-operatively—and by adopting measures that limit and reduce the availability of such conflict. Neither effort is entirely feasible or credible without the other."

What the energy agency, the people who are expert in this field, is telling us is that we cannot depend on technological safeguards; we must also be able to depend on political willpower. Where the political circumstances are not stable any political commitment creates a situation where feasibility and credibility of safeguards are in doubt. I am not suggesting that all of the countries involved and that have been under discussion are of the same degree of political reliability. Frankly I do not think they are. However, in the choice we have made we certainly seem to have included two questionable countries. I was reading of a military coup anticipated in Argentina even today, and anybody who does not know the situation in South Korea should look into it if he thinks there is any stability in that country.

The IAEA goes on to say at page 10 that the risks of detection by the verification process are substantial. They may be substantial, but how substantial? They have to be substantial enough to be effective; if not 100 per cent in all cases, at least in a very high percentage. Yet even the IAEA says that the risks of detection are substantial. I suggest this is a very guarded way of saying that the safeguards system will not necessarily work.

Again at page 36 the IAEA states:

Cooperation between the agency and national personnel is the crucial intangible in safeguards application.

I invite somebody to look seriously into "the national personnel" in such a country as South Korea and tell us whether they find that crucial intangible satisfactory for the safeguards applied or accepted by that country.

Precisely the same message emerges in the Canadian background paper with which we have been furnished. It was prepared quite recently by the Department of External Affairs. It refers to the IAEA safeguards as an "open-ended" system whose intention is not to lay down rigid rules for safeguards implementation. On page 15 it says:

In this way the Agency endeavours to ensure the maximum effectiveness of safeguards—

I like the choice of the word "endeavours". It does not say it succeeds or there is a reasonable prospect of success, but it endeavours to do so.

On the same page it is stated that the agency's safeguards system or the NPT safeguards system "cannot prevent clandestine diversion of safeguarded nuclear material to military or explosive purposes, they can inhibit a state from such action by posing a high risk of detection". I ask why we should put our faith in a safeguards system which we are told by the Canadian government, or by the department the minister is in charge of, cannot prevent clandestine diversion of nuclear material to military purposes? This is a clear indication that the whole case the minister has built up in this matter is a house of cards that falls over immediately you look at his own documents.

In the same paper it goes on to state:

In the event of such unauthorized diversion of nuclear materials or facilities to proscribed purposes by a state, international sanctions may be applied to that state.

● (1800)

Let us look again at the dubious language "may be applied". Some of us have made a study of international sanctions and know very well that seldom in history have they been adequately applied.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. If the hon. member requires only a few minutes, perhaps the House would allow him to complete his speech so that the Chair might recognize the hon. member for Wellington (Mr. Maine) after dinner. Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Brewin: The House will be pleased to know I am approaching the end of what I have to say. I said "approaching". I am not right at it. Again, on page 15 we find:

... the recipient member may be asked to return the materials and equipment made available to them.

I have forgotten my grammar, but I can say that I believe the phrase "may be" means remote and unlikely. That is precisely the situation.

Finally, page 17 refers to Canada's new policies requiring a binding assurance that Canada-supplied nuclear material and technology will not be used to produce a nuclear explosion. A state cannot develop a nuclear explosion devised for peaceful purposes without acquiring a capability to produce nuclear weapons. The minister made that very clear. I ask, what is left of the binding assurance if it is given by a militaristic undemocratic, unstable state? What is the deduction to be made from this material? It is surely that at least a temporary embargo should be put on the export of all nuclear material as suggested by Dr. Lilienthal.

We understand as well as the minister the dilemma involved. We have seen the problems in respect of technological development and the transfer of technological resources, but we urge that the common sense answer, until we have greater assurance than we have today about safeguards, is that we adopt Dr. Lilienthal's advice. I urge the government to have a full inquiry into this and other fields in the production of nuclear energy so that this generation and this country shall not have laid upon them the guilt of enhancing the prospect of world-wide destruction.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being after six o'clock I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock tonight.

At 6.06 p.m. the House took recess.

Nuclear Proliferation

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Frank Maine (Wellington): Mr. Speaker, the motion before the House today reads:

That this House condemns the government for increasing the threat posed to mankind by the proliferation of nuclear weapons, and in particular by its present negotiations to resume nuclear assistance to India.

This motion has two parts to it and I would like to deal with each part separately. First of all I wish to deal with the part which refers to increasing the threat posed to mankind by the proliferation of nuclear weapons.

I should like to differentiate between nuclear weapons and power reactors. They are not the same, they are not interchangeable. Let us go into that a little further. There are technical reasons why the CANDU does not contribute to the proliferation of nuclear weapons. The CANDU is a system that uses natural uranium which is made up of .71 per cent of the uranium isotope U-235, the balance being the uranium isotope U-238. This is very important because it is a unique system in the world. It is different from the U.S. system which uses enriched uranium, and it is also very different from the environmental aspect and the hazard it presents. When one is talking about the importance of the CANDU system one should be aware of the fact that one cannot generalize about power reactors as do many people, especially members of the opposition.

Why is it important that we use natural uranium with a high content of uranium 238? Uranium 238 under irradiation in a power reactor, where it gets 6,000 megawatt-days per tonne irradiation converts a lot of that uranium 238 into plutonium 239 and plutonium 240. These two isotopes of plutonium are very different. The importance of plutonium 239 is that it is used primarily to make the bomb, but not plutonium 240. As a matter of fact it is plutonium 240 from which they do not want to make material that can be made into a bomb. The longer you leave fuel in the reactor, the more plutonium 240 you make.

Therefore if one wants to make fissionable material for a bomb one would not leave it in the nuclear reactor for 6,000 megawatt days per tonne, one would irradiate it for 600 megawatt days per tonne, which is a factor of one tenth. This is quite a different situation, from a practical and economical point of view, when you are considering the making of electricity. The CANDU system is a total design. It is designed to be fed the fuel continuously, and the fuel feeding of the reactor is such that the uranium will be irradiated to the 6,000 megawatt days per tonne level. If you change it by a factor of ten, either you have to redesign your system completely—and since Canada has designed the CANDU system it would mean a foreign buyer having to ask us to redesign the system—or else you will have to shut the system down to take out the fuel.

The CANDU system is designed to make electricity. If you happen to shut the electricity down more than you use it, the system will not be generating electricity. For these very practical reasons, if you want to generate electricity you use the CANDU system, but if you want to make bombs you do not use the CANDU system.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Somebody is going to learn something tonight.

Mr. Stanfield: I hope so.

● (2010)

Mr. Maine: If you want to make plutonium 239 for a bomb, you use an NRX type of reactor, which the Indians already have in the CIRUS reactor and which already makes 80 pounds of plutonium per year. I think the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stanfield) mislead the House when he used plutonium in a generic sense and said we were contributing to the over-all massive increase in the production of plutonium, as if all plutonium were the same and as if there is no difference in the types which are generated and the uses to which they can be put.

CANDU is not an efficient or useful way to make effective weapons. An air-cooled graphite-moderated reactor should be used, which is much simpler and easier to run than the power reactor, or another approach could be used such as the approach of the Chinese. They used a centrifuge to concentrate uranium 235 for their weapons programs to produce bombs. This would be smaller, much easier to conceal, and is one tenth of the cost, approximately $50 million as opposed to $500 million.

I agree that it is not impossible to produce bombs with CANDU plutonium, but it is not practical. The value of electricity to the Indian economy is much higher than that of producing bombs, and we should weigh our foreign aid as to the possible abuse of it in weapons versus the aid we should be giving to the poor, starving nations of the world. We are not giving them new technology, just the capability to produce nuclear electric power, and even without the safeguards we would not be helping them one iota with any ideas they may have about a weapons program. Indeed, we had an international obligation when we signed the non proliferation treaty not only not to pursue a weapons program ourselves, but to help undeveloped and underdeveloped nations with peaceful developments of nuclear energy.

Why is there this interest and concern about energy? In this world today there are three major problems; over population, lack of food, and shortage of energy, and they are interrelated. We face an energy problem in this country as all countries around the world do. As the poorer and less developed nations of the world ask for a new international economic order, they are also asking for a higher standard of living which is derived from the utilization of energy. Where can we get that energy today? In the short term there are only two possible solutions where technology is already available, and they are using coal to generate electricity, and nuclear fission to generate electricity. The technology is here. It is a matter of economics and transportation. Those are the key problems to be resolved.

Our product mix of energy of the past is changing, and will change in the future. We have come from an era where wood and coal were primary sources. We are presently in an era where petroleum, both oil and natural gas, are significant contributors to our sources of energy, and in the short term future, coal and nuclear fission are great hopes because of increasing demands for energy.

[Mr. Maine.]

By the middle of 1980's there will be contributions from the Alberta tar sands followed by contributions from Arctic and Atlantic offshore areas of oil and natural gas, and by the year 2000 we should be getting our energy from solar and possibly nuclear fusion. There will be no significant contributions before that time from new technologies such as the wind, geothermal, tidal and other such novel techniques which are presently being investigated. For this reason research is being done in the nuclear fission area, but several things are needed.

What is the future program and the ongoing program for deriving electricity from fission after the present CANDU system with its pressurized heavy water reaction? The next generation will see plutonium used as a fuel in a boiling light water reactor. After that, as it becomes more expensive, we will see plutonium used to transform thorium into uranium 233, which is fissionable. It is more expensive to do, and we will not be doing this until our present supplies of uranium and more expensive uranium in the lower concentrations in ore are exhausted, but there is more thorium around than uranium, and this certainly will see us off into the future.

When those two technologies have been developed and utilized, we see the possibilities of nuclear fusion. India has the CIRUS research reactor it got from Canada. It got its heavy water from the United States and its reprocessing plant from France, which is needed to separate the plutonium and which will be used for the fuel cycle, which uses plutonium, as well as for the generation after that which will use the plutonium thorium cycle which makes uranium 233. Unfortunately some of the plutonium was sidetracked from their research reactor for a detonation. This is regrettable and should be safeguarded against, and as the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence) mentioned this afternoon, these safeguards should ensure against that in the future.

In addition, with India signing these new safeguards, which have been and are being signed by such countries as South Korea and Argentina, it is certainly not acceptable internationally to have one standard for South Korea and Argentina and another standard for countries such as India. They should all be following the same rules and getting the same help.

I should like to make a few comments in reply to some of the remarks made by hon. members of the opposition.

[Editor's Note: A power failure extinguished the lights in the Chamber for 15 seconds.]

Some hon. Members: What happened to the lights?

An hon. Member: You are ruined, Frank.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Maine: Hon. members should really appreciate how important energy is to us today. We just cannot get along without it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Maine: If we do not do something about it, we will not have it in the future. We will have blackouts and brownouts, and we will not be able to carry on our business.

The hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald) made several points this afternoon.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. The hon. member for Wellington (Mr. Maine) has the floor.

Mr. Stanfield: I thought he was better in the dark.

Mr. Maine: Hon. members of the opposition get very excited about a blackout. The hon. member for Egmont was not happy that the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacEachen) did not deal with several questions he raised. One of the reasons I think these were not dealt with was that they did not deal with this motion at all. However, let me respond to some of the questions the hon. member raised. He raised the question of terrorists, which has nothing directly to do with the problem of nuclear proliferation in the lesser developed countries of the world. Certainly it is a very unrealistic comment to make that a terrorist is going to come into possession of a nuclear weapon. Let us think about this for a moment.

Is a terrorist going to rush into Pickering and grab a fuel bundle which is radioactive? He would not get out of the plant before he would be killed, so if we were going to get any nuclear weapon at all, he certainly would not steal the material from a power plant and reprocess it. There is only one possible way he could get the material, and that would be to steal a weapon which is already made, and Canada does not make nuclear weapons. If he wants to steal a weapon, he would not steal it from this country or from the countries with which we are dealing.

Mr. Stanfield: Famous last words.

Mr. Maine: He would steal them from a country like the United States. If he was to steal them, there would not only be the possibility of a nuclear explosion, but also of a delivery system to go along with it.

An hon. Member: There go the lights again.

Mr. Maine: There is a lot of power in my remarks.

Mr. Epp: Give us more light and less heat.

Mr. Maine: It is unrealistic to think of a terrorist stealing a nuclear weapon just to blow it up in his own backyard. He would want to deliver the system, and by stealing a nuclear weapon from a country like the United States he would have the capability of both exploding the device and of delivering it. So the problem is not one of a terrorist in our country at all. It is a problem of a terrorist in the United States, which the Americans have to deal with, and it has already been conceded that it would be very difficult to stop the most determined efforts of terrorists to obtain a nuclear device in this manner. However, I am quite confident that several steps have been taken to try to ensure against this possibility.

Another comment made by the hon. member for Egmont was that plutonium contamination would be terrible if anyone were to come into the possession of some plutonium and just spread it around. Plutonium is a chemical and there are many chemicals equally as toxic or much more toxic which are in everyday use right now. You have heard of some of the problems we have when we do have accidents—when a chlorine tanker is derailed or when a tanker of sulphuric acid is derailed and it is spilled, or when we have an ammonia leak. These chemicals, certainly in high concentrations, are just as toxic as plutonium. We live with these problems of chemical contamination. We have contingency plans to try to nullify any disaster that may result from an accidental contamination. Plutonium contamination is certainly no worse than some of the problems we deal with in everyday life in the chemical industry.

A comment was made about sabotage and what a terrible threat it is. This is again extremely unrealistic, Mr. Speaker. There was Dr. Morton Shulman with his crazy idea of dropping three sticks of dynamite in at Pickering. That would do absolutely nothing. If you were able to get the dynamite to the actual fuel bundle itself the most you could hope to do is rupture the fuel bundle and thereby expose an increased surface of nuclear contaminant. The increased contamination in that area would be minimal and would not extend any further than the immediate environment of the fuel rod. The only way to create a serious problem of sabotage is to use an atomic bomb to explode these expended fuel rods. There would be more problems with the atomic bomb than there would be with the result of the sabotage. This is another red herring that the opposition has dragged out to confuse the issue.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Maine: There was another comment about the great stockpile of plutonium—

Mr. Epp: Do you understand it, Joe?

Mr. Maine: —and how we are producing more plutonium. The problem gets worse and worse every day, they say, because we have tons and tons of plutonium. But as I mentioned earlier, plutonium is the fuel of the future; our future energy. We need to store it now and use it when we have the technology to harness it. We are developing that now. Plutonium 239 has a half life of 24,000 years; plutonium 240 has a half life of 6,000 years, so by stockpiling it and protecting it, as we are doing, we will have the fuel to meet our future energy needs and any programs to harness energy in the future. Not only is it not a shame but it is very necessary that we produce and store this plutonium for our future energy needs.

The hon. member for Egmont made a comment about alternate energy forms available. Mr. Speaker, they are not available to be utilized right now. In the short term we are depending on electricity generated from coal and electricity generated from nuclear fission. This will satisfy our immediate increase in energy requirements. There are no other options. The sooner the people of Ontario and of this country wake up to that fact, the sooner we will come to grips with the whole energy conservation problem in order to satisfy the increased needs of the future.

The hon. member also commented that India only derives a quarter of one per cent of its energy from nuclear fission. Well, Mr. Speaker, only 1 per cent of Canada's energy is derived from nuclear produced electricity. By the year 2,000 that will be in the order of 25 per cent. There is no reason for us to stop our nuclear program now and say it is not an important amount.

Another comment was to the effect that energy research and development are not being carried out in this country as they should be. This is erroneous, Mr. Speaker. The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie) only a month ago in this House announced an extra $10.6 million to be expended on energy research and development with respect to our needs for the next decade or two. The kind of energy options we are talking about, geothermal, tidal, solar and so on, are being worked on now but we will not see the benefits for ten, 20 or 30 years.

The hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin) also made some comments which I believe were misleading and incorrect. He talked of a prominent scientist saying that we have an impending disaster. Any impending disaster in the nuclear weapon area is not going to be from Canada supplying the less developed countries with CANDUs.

An hon. Member: The disaster is over there.

Mr. Maine: Mr. Speaker, the disaster is on the opposite side of the House—with the New Democratic Party.

The hon. member also raised the question of the conditional statement that governments may be asked to return expended fuel, and asked why this was a conditional statement, and the reason for it. There is no reason to force ourselves into the possibly uneconomic proposal of having to repatriate any expended fuel. It may not be necessary, it may not be essential or economic—it may not even be possible. Why force ourselves into a commitment whereby we have to bring every ounce of expended fuel back?

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I should like to summarize by saying that I think the opposition in some of its generalities has misled this House by contending that the course we are taking is the wrong course; it is not the wrong course, it is the right course, and I fully support it.

Mr. Douglas Roche (Edmonton-Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Wellington (Mr. Maine) gave us the viewpoint of the scientist. I am sure he would not have us believe it is the only scientific point of view. I shall be quoting a few other scientists whose views are diametrically opposed to his, some of whom have given us the following scenario to consider.

I ask you to consider a band of terrorists in a developing country who steal some plutonium—which is not hard to do—from a newly constructed reactor, and build a nuclear device which, while amateurish, is effective. They load the device in a plane and fly it over London or New York city, any major city, and demand an astronomical sum of money. Not only the New Yorkers or Londoners, but the whole world knows that the dreaded moment of annihilation has come—and no one, anywhere, is safe.

I used to think this scenario was a bit too alarming but events are moving so fast in the specialized world of nuclear technology that I now believe people must be shocked into waking up to the grave dangers mounting throughout the world.

Canada is very much involved. We have become one of the leading exporters of nuclear material—primarily uranium, nuclear equipment, specifically CANDU reactors, as the motion before us brings to the forefront, and nuclear technology.

At the end of this year there will be 650 nuclear reactors operating in 38 countries. In addition to the principal nuclear powers such as the Soviet Union, the United States, Britain, France, and China, about a dozen more are on the threshold of nuclear strike capacity. Some countries have not ratified the non-proliferation treaty; of course this is a larger problem than Canada's involvement, but this country is obviously and admittedly in the race to export nuclear technology.

The former minister of energy, mines and resources who is now the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) said in this House on December 20, 1974, when unveiling the nuclear policy of the present government, that Canada is in the race to enjoy the economic gains from sales abroad of major high technology components and services. I wish that the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacEachen) had quoted from that speech this afternoon as justification for Canada's policy. I regret that he laid so much of the motivation for the pursuit of Canada's nuclear export policy on what he advances as a moral argument, the argument it would be helping developing nations. If he were going to lay such emphasis upon our responsibility to help developing nations I wish he had thought at the same time about realistic ways in which Canada can further that responsibility.

I waited for the minister to couple his arguments with, for example, the conference on the Law of the Sea being held in New York at the United Nations. Surely that would be a much more realistic way of helping developing nations—through the exploitation of mineral resources at the bottom of the sea including those on the continental shelf extending beyond Canada's 200 mile economic zone. The utilization of those mineral resources under an international authority or a concrete plan of revenue sharing would be a genuine move toward helping the developing nations. That would be a much more realistic way for us to take our responsibility, and a much safer way.

I could not believe my ears when I heard the minister lay such emphasis on our responsibility to help the developing nations through exporting technology. I hold in my hands Canada's official policy for helping developing nations, called "Strategy for International Development Co-operation 1975 to 1980" as outlined by the minister at the seventh special session of the United Nations General Assembly which reconfirmed the new economic order to which Canada gave its support. As I go through all 21 points I cannot find one item that deals with the export of nuclear technology.

When the government presents to us the rationale for the export of nuclear technology under the guise of helping developing nations I say that is a cover-up for the real motivation unveiled by the former minister of energy, mines and resources on December 20, 1974 when he said that we want to sell CANDU reactors. I wish the government would get its story straight. We are doing this either because we want to help developing nations, or because we want to recover our substantial investment in CANDU.

If the government were to raise the sales argument in the House and allow us to discuss sales of nuclear technology in terms of the revenue we will gain from the sale of CANDU reactors, its approach would be more forthright than it presently is. Now it argues that it is doing this to help developing nations. Why does the government say this when our official policy makes no mention of it? I hope hon. members on the government side will respond to this point. Hon. members opposite answered questions raised by opposition members earlier today. I believe the point I just made very much needs answering.

I wish the Secretary of State for External Affairs had explained how we can help developing nations through vigorous participation in the commodities policies to be raised at UNCTAD IV, to be held in Nairobi in May of this year. What will Canada's policy be to help developing nations stabilize the prices of 18 primary commodities, prices which are controlled by the developed nations, Canada included? They have been the subject of rhetorical negotiation at United Nations special sessions, and will be the subject of hard negotiation at UNCTAD IV, in May.

I wish the minister had referred to his commendably valuable work as co-chairman of the conference on International Economic Opportunities, commonly called the North-South Conference, operating out of Paris. The Secretary of State for External Affairs has been co-chairman of that conference on behalf of the developed world. He knows how important Canada's role is in helping developed nations become involved in our international commerce and trade, and in the work of the North-South Conference.

So far we have not heard discussed the work of UNCTAD IV, the North-South Conference, or the Law of the Sea. We have not heard about the views of those organizations regarding the export of nuclear technology. So I say, Mr. Speaker, with respect, that the government's argument is a red herring, presented to us as justification and rationale.

I recognize that we face a terrible moral dilemma. We can overcome the dilemma only with honest talk in this House. On the one hand the Third World is undoubtedly pressing for access to nuclear technology available to developed nations. On the other hand sales of uranium and nuclear reactors raise the danger and probability of proliferation of nuclear weapons.

Thus we are asked to weigh the goal of achieving equity with regard to energy sources against the spectre of nuclear holocaust. And, make no mistake: as we have seen in the case of India, any country which has available to it a supply of uranium and reprocessing technology can construct a nuclear bomb with plutonium derived from a CANDU reactor.

We have considered the expansion of our sales, sales undertaken despite the experience in India, to which my colleagues alluded earlier and which I will not repeat. Now we come to the case of South Korea, Argentina, and Pakistan.

Let me say a word about South Korea. Several times in the House, and in committee, I have protested against the sale of a CANDU reactor to Korea. I protested on two grounds; first, the international safeguards are not there; second, the current South Korean régime is not stable. This afternoon the minister chided us for not knowing the policies he had tabled in the House. Well, I have copies before me, have read them, and wish to ask some questions concerning the agreement he tabled on January 30, 1976, following the signing of the agreement with South Korea, an agreement which, in my judgment, leaves three main areas open to question. They are the root of the present debate. There is still time for the government to act before it reaffirms its nuclear arrangements with India. There is still time to put some hard questions to the government. That, of course, is the purpose of the motion we are debating.

I am now concerned about South Korea. The agreement has been signed and the documentation tabled. I suggest to the minister that, apart from suspending nuclear assistance and supplies, Canada has no effective sanction against Korean abuse of nuclear technology. Second, spent fuel rods are not to be returned to Canada. Thus over a period of time South Korea will acquire a large inventory of unprocessed plutonium. All who have studied this subject know how little plutonium you need—it can be leaked or stolen—to make a nuclear device.

Third, the South Korean agreement was signed one day before the seven supplier countries, referred to as the London Conference, implemented a new agreement. I ask, is the South Korean agreement in accord with the safeguards agreement of the London Conference? These are important questions which the minister ought to answer.

As I said, the government completed its sale to South Korea. I regret this. If any country in the world is politically unstable, it is South Korea. I pleaded with the minister in committee to consider carefully with what sort of government in Korea we are dealing. It is one of the most repressive régimes in the world today. The Park administration is accused by international observers of economic injustice, corruption, and increasing violation of human rights.

An Amnesty International mission to South Korea said this:

> The mission found torture is frequently used by law enforcement agencies both in an attempt to extract false confessions and as a means of intimidation.

Other secular human rights groups have criticized the régime, including the International Commission of Jurists and the International League for the Rights of Man. The World Conference of Religion for Peace has publicly expressed its deep concern about the political repression in South Korea, especially for those who, out of their religious conscience, have expressed their stand against the violation of human rights by the Park government and who are now in jail. This is the administration the Canadian government says it will trust.

I am unwilling to trust the South Korean government. Unfortunately the agreement is now a fait accompli. There is not much you can do. We were not able to debate the South Korean agreement before it was signed because the government had some spurious notion that we do not debate international agreements in the House before they are signed. What legal precedent is there for that position, since the contrary has been our experience time and again? For instance, former Prime Minister Mackenzie King said that before international agreements are ratified, they ought to be debated in this House.

Why was this House deprived of the right of debating and voting on such an international agreement before it was entered into? We ought to consider that question as we consider circumstances relating to India. The opposition to the government's stand of members of this House, of the media, and even of distinguished experts, some of whom I shall mention, has been fruitless. The government was determined to sell the $500 million CANDU reactor to South Korea even though that régime was unstable and international safeguards inadequate.

Anybody who knows anything about IAEA knows how inadequate is the staff of the organization. Indeed, IAEA in large part is devoted to the promotion of nuclear energy, not to inspection where treaties are in force and not to the preservation of safety. I conclude that again money has triumphed over morality. It happened in the case of South Korea, and the case of India brings into sharp focus exactly what has happened.

We now find that the rapid escalation in the number of nuclear reactors is resulting in the production of more plutonium than can be effectively monitored. Even when reactors are being used for the peaceful production of energy, the danger grows that plutonium will be diverted for the creation of nuclear bombs. That is why this evening I must raise a question of concern to many scientists. What would happen if plutonium were stolen? As India proved, you need merely a small laboratory staffed with experts in order to make a bomb. No wonder scientists themselves are worried. As British physicist Dr. Amroy Lovins said, "Any country with a power reactor can make atomic bombs if it wishes."

Three high level engineers recently resigned from the General Electric Company protesting that "Nuclear power has become a technological monster, and it is not clear who, if anyone, is in control." David Lilienthal, chairman of the U.S. Atomic Energy Commission, sees "impending disaster" from the international proliferation of nuclear bombs.

Lilienthal calls for a moratorium on nuclear sales, something the government has laughed at every time we have proposed it in the last several months. I well recall the hon. member for Halifax last June proposing a moratorium on nuclear sales. The government paid no heed. That is the very approach taken by General E.L.M. Burns, respected head of Canadian disarmament teams for many years. General Burns insists that it is the Canadian government's duty to do nothing which may lead to the proliferation of nuclear weapons and that this obligation, which is explicit in article III of the non-proliferation treaty, takes precedence over Canada's desire to assist, through nuclear technology, the underdeveloped nations of the world.

There is a ray of hope. In his concluding comments this afternoon the Secretary of State for External Affairs said that he was not sure in his own mind if the export of nuclear technology and materials to India ought to be resumed. There were some questions he was still asking himself and he posed the dilemma in these terms: would it be better for us to suspend completely the nuclear negotiations with India, as we have done on a temporary basis, or should we go on to complete the present deal applying to it the strictest sanctions we could? Which would be the better choice? If we are to adopt a moral approach to this question I think the answer is to be found in the advice General Burns has given us—Canada ought to do nothing which might lead to the proliferation of nuclear weapons. And this takes precedence over Canada's desire to assist developing nations.

The minister told the House that the new agreements represent juridical assurances of high order. All we can do is pray that he is right because we have not seen the proof, and the questions I have posed indicate there is every reason to think that the safeguards are anything but adequate. What we are left with are documents which the receiving country can ignore if it wishes to do so. This calls into question the trustworthiness of South Korea, it calls into question the intentions of India, it calls into question the intentions of any state with which we conclude an agreement.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired. He can only continue with unanimous consent. Does the hon. member have unanimous consent to carry on?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Roche: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I know there are many who wish to take part in the debate so I shall not abuse the courtesy of the House.

I shall conclude by returning to the principal argument advanced by the Secretary of State for External Affairs this afternoon in favour of the policy he is pursuing. He says this is the way in which we should be helping the developing nations. I say again that this is a serious argument. If we are to advance an argument based on moral grounds in favour of exporting nuclear technology I believe Canada should stand up in favour of action based on a sounder moral premise, that is to say, a much more vigorous expansion of trade economic co-operation with the developing nations, such as those nations are now demanding so urgently, and which they need far more than they need nuclear technology.

Mr. Peter Stollery (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, it is always difficult for most of us average Canadians who do not pretend to be experts in the field of nuclear technology to address ourselves to such complicated questions as, for example, whether or not we should sell nuclear power stations to the third world nations.

I do not pretend to be an expert on nuclear technology, and when I read some of the names which are used in the manuals to describe these pieces of machinery I find the subject even more difficult. They talk about CANDU, about advanced gas-cooled reactors, steam-generating heavy water reactors, breeder reactors, and that sort of thing. I certainly am no expert—

Mr. Epp: You have said that three times now, so you must believe it.

Mr. Stollery: Nevertheless, there are a few points which I understand as well as most Canadians. I think it is fair to say that today in the Canadian House of Commons the Conservative Party has launched anti-India day.

Some hon. Members: Oh!

Mr. Stollery: It says right in the motion—

Mr. Paproski: Shame on you!

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Right on!

Mr. Stollery: I don't want to appear to be on the side of the people who ignore the fact that there is a world energy crisis, that the cost of energy in the undeveloped world has increased by a factor of eight since 1970. I would certainly not want to associate myself with the concept that we in Canada are so comfortable that we shall decide who shall get energy and who shall not.

I find it offensive that the hon. member in whose name the motion stands should have bullied the undeveloped countries, bullied the emerging world in his motion, and, in his bullying manner, told us he is going to make sure the people in our constituencies know how we vote on this issue. That is what he said. I am happy to inform him that the people in my constituency will be pleased to know that I shall not take up his stick to beat people, many of whom live outside a cash economy, because the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence) feels that Indians and others in the undeveloped world do not have the right to energy at reasonable prices.

I must say the former leader of the opposition adopted a more reasonable attitude inasmuch as he expressed a genuine concern about this business. I notice that much of it seems to have been lifted from an editioral which appeared in the Economist on November 3, 1974. I would say to members on the other side that I too read the Economist from time to time and I hope hon. members opposite will continue the habit of trying to make themselves a little knowledgeable about world events.

Earlier today we heard talk about whether we ought to sell nuclear technology to unstable countries. Anyone who can read a newspaper knows that what members opposite are really saying is that from a comfortable Canadian point of view we should not sell nuclear technology in circumstances which might cause us the slightest embarrassment.

Where are all these tremendously stable regimes for which hon. members are looking? We all know that much of the world is in turmoil as a result of colonialism. There was an article in the The Economist about Africa, and I detect an anti-black, anti-African sentiment in this motion. How unstable is Africa!

An hon. Member: What about Algeria?

Mr. Stollery: We do not sell Algeria anything. They have had two heads of government and one unsuccessful coup in the last 13 years. We sell nothing to Nigeria because in 16 years they have had five heads of state, three successful coups, one unsuccessful coup, and one civil war. Since the average Nigerian has an annual income of a couple of hundred dollars we do not want to sell them any of our technology or give them the opportunity to compete industrially. It might mean they would be able to produce power at a reasonable price and possibly avoid the eight times energy cost factor facing most countries in the world today. So we cannot deal with the Nigerians, Mr. Speaker. As for dealing with Uganda, no way. Somaliland has had three governments and one coup. The same can be said of Ethiopia, Sudan, Chad and the Upper Volta Republic.

The only African countries to which we might sell nuclear technology which would satisfy the opposition would be the Republic of South Africa and perhaps Rhodesia, because they have a stable background. Therefore it would be perfectly all right for the Government of Canada to enter into some form of agreement with the Rhodesians!

Many Canadians are concerned about the problems created by nuclear power. The hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Roche) made a couple of points that had no reference at all to the motion but rather referred to the problems caused by nuclear power. What the motion asks, in effect, is: do we sell technology to the third world, India being the example used? The hon. member also made mention of American scientists who had a problem coming to terms with the ecological consequences of nuclear power. It seems to me these two points are utterly different and in no way go together.

I think it is unfortunate that the motion reads the way it does. It is blatantly aimed at one country, at one sector of the world. I think the real question that we should be discussing is: is nuclear power in fact a practical and safe kind of power? Unfortunately the motion does not address itself to this.

As I recall some of the speeches of hon. members opposite, their concern centres around Indians, Pakistanis, South Koreans, Iranians, all of them people who live life a little differently from us. Most of their comments had to do with how we know what is better for these people than they do themselves. They could not possibly know what is best for them because they are not advanced enough! This is the point the opposition is making, and I think it should be made clear that that is the point.

Mr. Paproski: That is Liberal philosophy.

Mr. Stollery: I acknowledge that I am a Liberal and I am not ashamed of it. Members of the opposition have been very careful not to mention the American undergraduate in Boston who explained on educational television how to build a nuclear weapon. Boston is all right; it is a little different from India. India is a long way away. Hon. members opposite also very conveniently did not discuss some of the problems with European nuclear technology.

I would ask them, what would happen if you built a nuclear power station in California where there is an earthquake fault and the whole bloody thing could blow up? We heard nothing about that. All we heard were hon. members standing up and telling other people who live in the Third World that they know better what is good for them than they know themselves. I shall certainly be voting against this motion tonight, and I hope my colleagues will do the same.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the hon. member rising on a point of order?

Mr. Beatty: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: This can only be done with consent.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Beatty: The hon. member made reference to anti-black sentiment in the motion today. I wonder whether he would clarify his remarks and indicate to the House whether he is imputing racism to hon. members on this side of the House?

Mr. Stollery: No, Mr. Speaker, I was not imputing racism. I was just taking note of the fact that the motion mentions India and that all the debate today has centred on the Third World. That is not racism.

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I rise to take part in this debate as a concerned Canadian and a concerned parliamentarian. It truly appalls me to think that there has been so little continuing discussion, analysis, and concrete information about the government's nuclear policy given not only to parliamentarians but to the public generally. If I may say so, I am even more appalled to hear the remarks of the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Stollery), who lowered a debate on a question of such magnitude and importance to this country and the world to the level of racism. His remarks were both stupid and offensive.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Miss MacDonald: Why is it that we in the opposition have raised this matter today, Mr. Speaker? The reason is that there has been secrecy about this issue. There has been secrecy about nuclear development in this country for the past 30 years. Such secrecy may have been justified during the second world war, but I submit that now, with the escalation of this country's investment in nuclear power, both domestically and internationally, there should be wide open debate on this matter with the people of Canada so as to let the people of Canada decide whether to accept a commitment that has implicit health and environmental hazards and the danger of nuclear holocaust—an open, honest debate with all the relevant information put straighforwardly to the country. By not doing so the government is shirking its responsibility in this nuclear age, an age unlike any other in the history of mankind.

Many governments in other countries have recognized their responsibility to present the necessary information to their people. I think in particular of Sweden where an intense public debate on nuclear energy has resulted in a pronounced reduction in plans to expand Sweden's nuclear capability. I think of the United States where a Senate committee holds continuous hearings on all aspects of nuclear development, and it has the right to call upon witnesses to appear before it, witnesses who have detailed information to provide to the public through that committee.

Furthermore, in the United States before any nuclear deal is completed abroad the government must present the terms to Congress where members have a chance to discuss it, to raise objections, and to have their questions answered. Such a thing never happens in this House. No minister feels he has to come before the House and present the terms of agreements before they are signed. They just hide it in a blanket of secrecy. That is the practice here in Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Miss MacDonald: There is a constant refusal to provide legitimate information when requested, and you only have to look back over the records of this House to see that day after day, question after question, we get the same kind of answers from the minister. The minister says "I will consider tabling the information after it has been agreed to," or "I do not consider this proper parliamentary procedure," or a number of other excuses. Does the minister think in giving this kind of answer that Canadian people are not concerned about this issue? Does he think they are not capable of understanding it?

The government lightly signs agreements that could lead to a nuclear holocaust without consultation with parliament or with the people of Canada. What excuse does the government give? What excuses do the ministers give when questions are put to them? The only excuse I have heard so far is that it is up to the opposition to raise this matter for debate. Today the opposition has raised the matter for debate and the government still is not prepared to provide information. I would say to the minister that this is not a matter for a one-day debate initiated by the opposition. This is a matter of such importance that it should be a continuing national debate with the government shouldering the responsibility to sustain it. I feel this way because of the terrifying situation we are in and in which we are placing the world. Just think back over our nuclear development for a number of years.

The nuclear reactor which marked Canada's entry into the atomic age is now 30 years old. It was on September 5, 1945, that the country's first reactor, a very small one and part of a wartime weapons development program, went into operation.

There was no hint of ultimate destructive purpose in Canada's coming of atomic age. As early as June, 1946, the federal government in a deliberate policy action made the decision that it would not develop nuclear weapons although it was in a favourable position to do so. That decision made Canada one of a special breed of nations—a major nuclear power which is not a nuclear weapons state.

As a country we pledged our nuclear technology to peaceful purposes. Canadian scientists have made major contributions to the world's knowledge of how atomic energy can be used to the benefit of mankind, and Canadian statesmen over these 30 years have established reputations for themselves and for this country through their work to prevent the outbreak of a nuclear war.

They have made contributions in other fields. Radioactivity through their efforts has proved important in cancer therapy, in the use of isotopes as tracers in medicine, in metallurgy and agriculture, and in the treatment of food for long-term storage.

Considered in this way, Canada's commitment to the development of nuclear power for peaceful purposes reads like a success story. Yet there is a flaw in the narrative, an ugly twist in that line stretching over the past 30 years. Its source can be traced to the ominous smoke which rose over Hiroshima and Nagasaki in August, 1945. It is now generally accepted that material for these first atomic bombs came from the Eldorado Mine at Great Bear Lake in the Northwest Territories.

Implicit in its beginnings, 30 years ago, we have Canada's nuclear dilemma of the 1970's, and it is this: can we as a nuclear power disclaim responsibility for its application? Can we export resources and technology with no concern for their ultimate uses? Can we implicate ourselves in the processes which threaten destruction of society without ourselves being destroyers?

One of the earliest Canadian post-war research projects was to examine the possibility of using nuclear energy to generate electricity. With rich supplies of uranium available, Canada developed the CANDU reactor which uses natural uranium as its fuel. Then the federal government through its Crown corporation, Atomic Energy of Canada Limited, began to seek markets for these reactors in countries throughout the world. But as Robert Reford pointed out in an article published last May by the Canadian Institute of International Affairs, there is one fly in the ointment, and it is this:

> One of the by-products of all nuclear reactors is plutonium . . . which can also be used to make an atomic weapon. Thus a purchaser of a CANDU reactor inevitably becomes a potential nuclear weapon state. It is a step on the road to proliferation.

We know that nuclear weapons are relatively easy to make if the right materials are available.

David M. Krieger, a political scientist and former director of the International Relations Centre at San Francisco State University, has said of the whole question of terrorists and nuclear technology:

> The danger is great; the question is not whether the worst will happen, but where and how.

The memory of the 1974 so-called peaceful nuclear explosion in India can only constantly remind us of what David Krieger said:

> The danger is great; the question is not whether the worst will happen, but where and how.

The bomb that was exploded in the Rajasthan Desert was the same size as those which destroyed Hiroshima and Nagasaki. It was developed with the aid of plutonuim obtained as a by-product from a nuclear research reactor purchased from Canada. The CANDU reactor as well, is ideally suited to the production of weapons-grade plutonium. Thus with each CANDU reactor it exports, Canada exports extension of the nuclear hazard.

The government has stated that its new safeguards introduced in 1974 are the toughest in the world, requiring the promise of the buyer not to use the materials or the technology to manufacture weapons, and to allow inspection to ensure that the agreement is followed. While these safeguards are, according to the minister, more stringent than those which we required India to sign as a condition of its purchase of nuclear materials, nevertheless they are far from fool-proof. It is strange that the government's faith in such safeguards hardly seems to have been jarred by that blast which opened a crater in the Rajasthan desert in India. I would remind the minister of the words I used recently when I said, "Acceptance of a country's word that it will not use our technology to create weapons is a show of confidence which conditions in today's society do not warrant.

"Faith in a country's avowals of its peaceful purposes, avowals which can be withdrawn at any time, for any reason, amounts to naive gullibility. Trust that any country will prevent materials and knowledge from falling into the hands of criminals and lunatics is suicidal stupidity." The time to set policy, to draw up new safeguards and conditions, is not while a sale is in progress. In fact there should be no sales, no further exports until the international community has developed the most stringent measures possible to prevent use of reactor fuel in the manufacture of weapons.

Even the London group has not been able to bring about that kind of safeguard. The strongest safeguards in the world are no good when experience has proved them not strong enough. One wonders really if, in the final analysis, any safeguards can be guaranteed to work. Let me quote William Epstein, for many years director of the Disarmament Division of the UN Secretariat, on the subject in particular as it concerns Canada:

> In the field of safeguards, while they . . .

The nuclear powers

> . . . were interested in tightening international controls and improving the IAEA safeguards system, the nuclear powers and other supplier states such as Canada would not undertake to supply nuclear material and equipment only to non-nuclear states that agreed to place all of their nuclear material and nuclear activities under IAEA safeguards. By refusing to go that far, they preserved the absurd situation whereby non-parties to the NPT are in a more advantageous position than are parties . . . unless safeguards apply to the entire fuel cycle they leave a loop-hole large enough through which to drive a nuclear bomb. This extraordinarily shortsighted position is due almost entirely to commercial rivalry and the competition for markets. It is likely to facilitate rather than curb the proliferation of nuclear weapons to additional countries.

That was Mr. Epstein's analysis and I contend that that has been Canada's approach.

It is argued that with the depletion of international oil preserves we must explore alternate forms of supplying our energy needs. I agree. But we must not solve one problem by creating another and possibly a worse one. I consider the nuclear dilemma one of the most vitally important issues before the Canadian people today. But it is one which I believe has not been presented to us honestly by our leaders, in all its naked ugliness and destructive potential. Some would say, as the hon. member for Spadina has said, that this is too complex for ordinary people to understand, that it is fraught with implications and counter-implications.

Surely there is no difficulty in understanding the basic issue which underlies the nuclear question and it is this: we cannot, as a country, pretend to stand above and apart from those conflicts and terrors which we ourselves have permitted, even helped to grow and spread in the world. We are, in the end, responsible, however we may attempt to rationalize away the knowledge. The government, by its current policy on export of nuclear technology, is leading the country in a dangerous and self-destructive charade.

When it suits his convenience the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) talks of sharing, of making do with less so that more disadvantaged parts of the world may have more. We have heard him state that over and over again. But what a reversal takes place when his Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacEachen) attempts to defend our indefensible policy on the sale of nuclear reactors. Here the talk of sharing or self-denial is replaced by the promotion of hot deals and cold cash. Here the pose of humanism is swept away and we see a different philosophy, one of cynicism, hypocrisy, and criminal short-sightedness.

It is unthinkable that the government should be permitted to do what no government before it has dared to do, to offer the integrity of Canada for sale on the open market. It is insupportable that the government should be listened to seriously when it talks pious cant about safeguards and assurances while knowing that the higher the price offered, the fewer the demands for safeguards our negotiators feel they need to make.

A conspiracy of silence promoted and sustained by government is keeping Canadians ignorant of exactly where we are being led in this matter. The government must level with the people. It must honestly state exactly what it has been doing in negotiating the sale of nuclear reactors to countries which have refused to give assurance that they will use them only for peaceful purposes or which have shown by their past behaviour that their word of assurance is not to be trusted. Above all the government must stop talking of safeguards when it knows full well that no foolproof safeguards exist at present and that any safeguard which is not demonstrably 100 per cent effective is worse than useless.

It is absurd to practise secrecy in the delicate negotiations which precede nuclear sales abroad. There is no delicacy about an exploded nuclear device. There is no secrecy about the method of making such a device once the necessary materials, the materials which we are spreading in the world through our sales policy, have been obtained. There is only a great finality. If we are to avoid rushing toward that fate ourselves, dragging hundreds of thousands of others with us, the government should immediately place a ban on all nuclear sales until adequate, universally accepted safeguards have been established.

We have nothing to lose. Our resources and technology will not disappear because of the delay. The demand for them will not disappear. Only the fatal cloud which the government, by its nuclear policy, has placed over Canada and over the world community of nations will disappear. And that cannot happen soon enough.

Miss Monique Bégin (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, "we have nothing to lose". That is what I have just heard from my préopinant, the person who spoke before me. "We have nothing to lose", of course, because the ban or the moratorium will apply to others and not to us. That is exactly the point I would like to develop. Once more today we have discussed transfer of nuclear technology by way of sales or by way of aid to development.

[Miss MacDonald.]

Once again the minister, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, Dr. MacEachen, has been explaining with great care—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

● (2120)

Miss Bégin: Mr. Speaker, I am sorry. I have heard so much about Dr. Kissinger in this Chamber this afternoon that I thought if hon. members have not read the biography of our Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacEachen) then that is too bad.

He has been explaining with great care and deep concern Canada's attitudes and active role in upgrading security measures and safety standards for any form of nuclear development—not only with fellow nations of the Third World but, what is far more difficult and far more significant, with business partners, the other industrialized supplier countries.

Once again the opposition parties through their major spokesmen—that means women—applied the credibility their seniority and personal reputation have given them to exploit the natural and understandable fear of Canadians regarding nuclear proliferation. I am sorry to say that I think the speech of the speaker who has just preceded me was a perfect illustration of that.

Miss Bégin: This, in my view, is totally irresponsible and badly misleading.

Starting with the former leader of the official opposition, who indicated recently that he would apply himself to the field of foreign policy, which all of us welcomed, he abused this afternoon the stature he had gained with many, many Canadians by quoting from older magazine articles on nuclear technology, which is probably the fastest developing technology in the entire world. He then went on to challenge the Secretary of State for External Affairs to tell us about the so called London Club consensus, although the minister had just stated very clearly the seven points emerging from the nuclear suppliers' meetings. He then asked what Canada intended to do!

Let me say that it is Canada who had initiated these meetings which led to a consensus as a result of which the situation improved all over the world. Canada had given her competitors the very text on the safeguards we require bilaterally in addition to the international standards required to ensure maximum peace and security in the world. The hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stanfield) concluded by calling all that "a sales pitch". Bad salesmen we are, very bad indeed, when we state to our competitors the tough terms and conditions under which we make our sales or transfers, thus making us the "highest bidders" in that market!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Miss Bégin: I ask, Mr. Speaker, does the hon. member for Halifax or the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas), who is also a former premier, or the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence), who was once a cabinet member in a provincial legislature, or the hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald) really believe what they say—in which case they have not done their homework—or do they play very dangerous partisan politics—in which case I would be justified, in the name of my constituents, in accusing them at least of "impropriety"?

Mr. Stanfield: Keep the judges affairs out of this.

Miss Bégin: What sense of responsibility is that in a person of the high standard of the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald), who spoke of "criminals and lunatics" when speaking about the Indian government in the context of our current negotiations to honour our commitment to continue nuclear aid for that nation? Am I to conclude that such language is fine because that particular debate on March 8 took place at 10.31 p.m. when there was just a handful of members in the House?

Miss MacDonald: What has that got to do with it?

Miss Bégin: Double standards all the way through, that is what I suggest, Mr. Speaker. The more I listen to the debate, the more I think it might not even be a double standard, it might be that hon. members opposite do not know the procedures of the House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Miss Bégin: I am tempted to explain—going back to my former role as a teacher—that when the minister tables some document in the House it means that every member has the duty, if he has any sense of priority, to obtain a copy of that document and acquaint himself with the Canadian policy on nuclear safeguards. The document in this case was tabled on January 30, not yesterday. Several bilateral agreements have also been tabled, but nobody seems to even know of their existence. I know why. It is difficult to read and it takes time to read, but let me tell you it is worth it if we want to be responsible.

Is it fair to talk about Dr. Kissinger and what he told a U.S. Congressional committee when every member in the House—but not every Canadian we have the responsibility to represent—knows that U.S. cabinet ministers are not elected and therefore are not accountable to the electorate the way we are, and the way the Secretary of State for External Affairs is, and demonstrates it every day?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Miss Bégin: Again, is it fair that we should hear so much about Dr. Kissinger's proposal when all members of this Chamber know it to be an unquestionable fact that Canadian safeguards are the highest and the toughest in the whole world?

Pseudo-scientific facts are stated today—because very few of us are scientists—let us face it and say the truth at least once. Hon. members pick these pseudo-scientific facts here and there, and state them out of context. They hide behind that smokescreen and try to frighten fellow Canadians whom we are supposed to represent and for whom we are responsible. To me that is absolutely unacceptable.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Miss Bégin: There are Canadians who are very concerned about world peace and security, and no matter from what platform they speak or what voice they raise to express these preoccupations, these are very well taken because the government knows how strongly the vast majority of Canadians feel about nuclear dangers of different sorts. The majority of Canadians know how well our Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) is aware of these dangers—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Miss Bégin: —but they feel secure with him and they return him to office. They know that he, and in particular the Secretary of State for External Affairs, have an understanding of people here and abroad. They do not accept double standards. What is good technology for us here in Canada, which is converted to around 25,000 jobs here with an annual turnover of around $1 billion for the construction of the CANDU program, must also be good for others, those anonymous faces of people in Asia or elsewhere who live on less than $200 a year per person.

Canadians know that their government is a responsible one which will not sell or give nuclear technology to, for example, a country blessed with a good water system since their natural energy technology should be in hydro electricity, not in the nuclear business.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Miss Bégin: Study your dossiers and we will talk after that. I did not hear any facts from over there, only demagoguery. When you understand facts, we will talk of particular cases.

● (2130)

Canadians know that in our country of great natural resources we are lucky and have been able to research and develop in every one of the energy industries. In each of the energy industries we have specialists for industrial and personal needs. We can assist other countries because we have a particularly wide experience. This puts us in a unique position and gives us a unique responsibility. We are assuming both to the fullest.

Mr. Speaker, it is important—

Mr. Lavoie: Hear, hear!

Miss Bégin: Thank you. At least, there is one Quebecer opposite who understood something!

Mr. Speaker, it is important to consider a matter concerning the peace and stability of the world. It is important to consider an issue representing for Canadians a domestic industrial program, and I refer to the CANDU program that could easily reach, according to experts, $5 billion before 1983. If Canadians reject this they must tell it frankly and directly. I did not hear it yet today.

We always have one law for the rich and another for the poor. We are good, we are clever, we are developed and the others must shift for themselves. We are not going to lose our reputation, we are not going to take that risk! However, I think it is the responsibility of governments and of hon. members from all sides of this House, on such an explosive issue—I say it without playing on words—to provide their constituents with objective information.

It is also the responsibility of mass media to explain clearly and readily what is done and what happens. It is not difficult, the papers are constantly tabled. There are also many questions put in this House. Maybe hon. members opposite do not know there exits something called the "late show" in which they would find thousands of concrete data. To go back to media, I find very interesting, for instance, the special issue of March 75 of Le Monde, No. 19 on nuclear power. This is the type of non-partisan contribution, the only one which is valuable in such an important and dangerous debate as this one.

This is what the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacEachen) did today as well as my colleagues on this side. I think it is also what the Prime Minister did when he raised the issue of a "New Society". And I conclude on this, Mr. Speaker, maybe it is true that the happiness of Canadians and the less privileged people, even if we do not like it or if it disgusts some overly candid minds in this House, their happiness is measured in kilowatts.

[English]

Mr. Bob Wenman (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, from time to time in this House it seems we are preoccupied with many relatively unimportant matters. Seldom, however, are we in this House faced with an issue of the magnitude of the issue before us today. This is one of Canada's first real opportunities to play a significant role in shaping the future for the inhabitants of this planet.

Five months ago I had the privilege of serving as a delegate to the Commonwealth Parliamentary Conference held in New Delhi, India. While there I came to realize the deep-seated historical animosity felt by that nation toward China and the widespread and real fear of the nuclear capacities of China. Likewise, the mutual hostility between India and Pakistan was clearly evident, as was the distrust felt in each country about the intentions of the other in rushing ahead in the development of nuclear energy and potential nuclear armaments.

I suggest to this House that given the context, both historical and current, of the Indian nation, it is inevitable that that country will seek and successfully develop a nuclear weapons capacity. I think the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Stollery) sunk to a new low in a recent speech. The Third World is fed up with this kind of perverse paternalism displayed by the hon. member for Spadina.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Wenman: India has too often been portrayed as a poor, helpless, downtrodden nation. India is a strong, proud nation which has practised and has strong historical and traditional diplomacy, the kind of diplomacy Canada would do well to match. I am sure the Indians must have been laughing quietly at our fledgling attempts as our new minister stepped into the international arena trying his new wings. I am concerned about the feathers of this new minister. I am concerned that they are being plucked. The new minister's naivete seems to be greatly evident, and as he makes these international thrusts I have great concern because of the understanding I have gained about India and its intention.

While I do not condemn India for seeking this power, I condemn Canada for giving it the means to attain this power. Even with the possibility that non proliferation could be guaranteed, there exist other and perhaps ultimately more significant reasons to declare an immediate moratorium on such exports. I refer particularly to the potentially devastating environmental consequences of nuclear proliferation as a result either of accident in nuclear facilities or of inadequate safeguards attendant upon the storage and disposal of nuclear radioactive waste products.

A recent book called the "The Nuke Book", which was presented by Pollution Probe of Ottawa, states a few rather frightening facts. The United States Atomic Energy Commission sponsored Brookhaven Report was assigned to show the risk or lack thereof in the operation of a nuclear power plant. It outlined the damage which could be caused by a major accident in a 200 megawatt plant located 30 miles from a major city. It is interesting to note that the Pickering plant is a 2,000 megawatt station—ten times that size—and is located not 30 miles, but 20 miles, from the core of Toronto.

An accident in the smaller plant could kill up to 3,400 people, injure 43,000, and create up to $7 billion in property damage. Radioactivity might contaminate up to 150,000 square miles. What is the chance of this kind of thing happening? The study shows that there is a chance of an accident factor which could actually be as high as one in 25. Plutonium 239 can cause cancer of the skin, bones, lungs, and thyroid, and is one of the most lethal poisons known to man. Genetic damage by radiation for generations yet to come can be a result of radiation. The Brookhaven Report asks all foreseeable generations of human beings to guard this element from accident, sabotage, or act of God not for a generation but for 240,000 years for one expedient term of atomic energy.

Then we ask, what is the reaction of the government to this? As I consider the reaction of the government, I am appalled. I am appalled by the Minister of the Environment (Mr. Marchand). The Minister of the Environment, given the authority, given the responsibility to protect the environment of Canada and to show responsibility and leadership as a developed country in environmental matters, is not very helpful. On a previous occasion I asked the minister if he would agree that with the export of nuclear material comes the moral responsibility to provide technological information on environmental protection. What was his answer, Mr. Speaker? Is he going to provide environmental protection along with that kind of energy technology? Not at all. He replied that if we do not have it we cannot export it. Mr. Speaker, why do we not have environmental technology that is equivalent to the energy technology we are exporting from Canada?

Mr. Wenman: Not only do we not have it but we have the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacEachen) taking an irresponsible stand—we will export it, it does not matter about the environmental effect, that is up to the country we are exporting to, let them look after it—that is his attitude. Not only do we export that kind of technology and tell them to look after it themselves but we do not even tell them how. We are one of the most developed countries in the world and we do not have the environmental technology to match our energy technology. That is a shame, Mr. Speaker; it is a damning indictment of the efforts of the government.

There are so many things we could talk about, but there is only one minute left so I must conclude. It is clear from what has been said here today that nuclear technology, and specifically the byproducts thereof, pose a tremendous threat to the well-being of our environment. It is equally clear that the government and the Minister of the Environment have not formulated or implemented adequate safeguards in this area. Given this situation we have an indication of the moral bankruptcy of the government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Wenman: It continues to export nuclear capability to countries even less equipped than ourselves to handle these potentially disastrous problems.

As the leader of my party has stated on many occasions, it is not enough simply to point out the mistakes and omissions in government policy. I would therefore add my voice to those of my colleagues in demanding four points: first, a moratorium on the export of nuclear material, at least until such time as adequate safety and environmental standards are in effect; second, House of Commons ratification of all future sales; third, the repatriation to Canada of spent fuels from our exported reactors, and fourth, as a prerequisite to future sales the signing by the recipient country of the nuclear non-proliferation treaty.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Wenman: In the name of the morality of this country, before the government commits us and commits Canada to its first and greatest international misdirection, I urge the minister to reconsider.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. It being 9.45 p.m. it is my duty, pursuant to section 9(a) of Standing Order 58, to interrupt the proceedings and put forthwith every question necessary to dispose of the motion before the House.

The question is on the motion in the name of the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence). Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion? All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those opposed to the motion will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Call in the members.

The House divided on the motion (Mr. Lawrence) which was negatived on the following division:

At 10.18 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Wednesday, March 24, 1976

The House met at 2 p.m.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

[English]

TRANSPORT

SUGGESTED COMMITTEE STUDY OF AIR-SEA RESCUE FACILITIES IN BRITISH COLUMBIA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. John Reynolds (Burnaby-Richmond-Delta): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43 I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity regarding the air-sea rescue facilities in British Columbia. I move, seconded by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath):

That the Standing Committee on Transport be empowered to investigate the air-sea rescue facilities in British Columbia and that it report to the House its recommendations as soon as reasonable after a thorough inquiry.

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 43 such a motion can only be presented with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

PROPOSAL THAT KGB AGENTS POSING AS PART OF SOVIET DIPLOMATIC STAFF BE NO LONGER ACCREDITED—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): Mr. Speaker, I, too, rise to propose a motion on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity affecting the security of Canada and its North American air defence partner and ally, the United States of America. At least half of the so-called diplomats accredited to the Soviet Embassy in Ottawa are agents of the KGB, the Soviet spy service, some of whom are known to have taken part in illegal and clandestine operations. The assistant air attaché, for example, was expelled from Lebanon in 1969 for plotting to steal Mirage airplanes from the Lebanese airforce. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence):

That the Minister of External Affairs be instructed to advise the Soviet Embassy immediately that KGB agents posing as part of their diplomatic staff can no longer be accredited to Canada as members of the diplomatic corps and that they be forthwith recalled.

Mr. Speaker: Standing Order 43 requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

REQUEST FOR PUBLIC INQUIRY INTO ACTIVITIES OF REISMAN AND GRANDY IN CONNECTION WITH LOCKHEED CONTRACT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I ask leave of the House to present a motion under Standing Order 43 on a very serious matter. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters):

That this House calls for a public inquiry into all of the activities of the firm of Reisman and Grandy Limited in relation to the negotiations between the government of Canada and Lockheed Aircraft Corporation over the proposed purchase of Orion aircraft.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Pursuant to Standing Order 43 such a motion can only be presented to the House with its unanimous consent? Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

POSSIBILITY MR. GRANDY HAD CONSULTING CONTRACT WITH PRIME MINISTER'S OFFICE OR OTHER GOVERNMENT AGENCY

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Prime Minister. Yesterday the Acting Prime Minister said he would look into the question as to whether Mr. J. F. Grandy personally has had a consulting contract with the Prime Minister's office or any other central agency of the government since his firm of Reisman and Grandy Limited went to work for Lookheed Limited and, if that is the case, when any such contract with that individual was completed or terminated. I wonder if the Prime Minister is now in a position to satisfy the House on this matter?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I have received the question from the Acting Prime Minister and I have had it looked into. I can answer that no such contract has been entered into by the Prime Minister's office or by the Privy Council office. There have previously been several departments to which they were under very short-term contract essentially in order to wind up the transition period, that is a get files in order and so on. I think there is no difficulty with that. There was one contract with the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce in an advisory capacity. I am looking at the nature of that contract. I am afraid I cannot reply to the House today on that. I see the minister is not in the House, but this is a matter we are considering very seriously with a view to finding out the facts.

NEED FOR GUIDELINES ON RIGHT OF RETIRED EMPLOYEES TO WORK FOR CORPORATIONS DEALING IN AREAS IN WHICH EMPLOYEES HAD GOVERNMENT EXPERIENCE

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Thank you, sir. I appreciate the answer of the Prime Minister. I wonder whether the Prime Minister will review the question of the guidelines in respect of what I see now as virtually an untrammelled right of senior public servants to work for corporations in those areas where they have government experience.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I cannot talk about reviewing guidelines because I do not think such guidelines have existed in the past. Indeed, I do not think the practice was prevalent and probably that is why there were no guidelines. I can say, however, unequivocally that it is a practice which leaves me somewhat uneasy. I am not sure of the extent of the facts. As I indicated in my first answer I am having them looked into, but certainly I am concerned about the possibility of former high level civil servants lobbying or approaching people, who until very recently were under their jurisdiction and authority, in order to make representations. I am concerned with the practice insofar as it may exist and I would want to see that guidelines are promulgated.

I cannot for the time being see how the practice could be made illegal. We do not want to attempt to direct the conduct of people who are no longer with the government, but it might be possible to have some contractual arrangement, perhaps under their pension arrangement or somewhere else, under which at least a period of time would elapse before any type of lobbying would be permitted. I take it this would apply to the senior level and not necessarily to all levels of employees who might have been in the public service. I think it would apply to the policy-making levels essentially. I confess I do not have a complete report on the facts. I am looking at them with a view to establishing policy.

Mr. Clark: Once again, Mr. Speaker, I thank the Prime Minister and commend him for his willingness to look into this matter fully. I suggest that, in looking at the question of guidelines, he might look at the practice of the British government which has found a way to deal with this problem and also consider the precedents in our own public service dealing with employees at a very much lower level, namely, to the customs officers. Would the Prime Minister give us an undertaking to move quite quickly in respect of the promulgation of guidelines and make those available to the House of Commons for review at a quite early date?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I am aware of the British practice to which the hon. member has referred. But he is probably aware also that, in fact, it is rather customary for former civil servants in the British public service to go to the private sector. What their relations then are is something we will need to look into, but it is not an unknown practice any more than it is in other European countries. As to the urgency, I agree with the Leader of the Opposition that we must have some guidelines for practice in these areas very soon.

LOCKHEED CONTRACT—POSSIBILITY OF REPRESENTATIONS BY REISMAN AND GRANDY

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence. Yesterday the minister told the House that to his knowledge no representations had been received from the consulting firm of Reisman and Grandy by himself, the Minister of Supply and Services or any member of those departments or departmental agencies. Would the minister now inform the House whether he has taken any steps to investigate the possibility of such representations and if so what has been the result of such investigations?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Yes, Mr. Speaker. I have made inquiries. I have discussed this matter with my deputy minister and others in the Department of National Defence. I did not discuss the matter with officials or ministers in other departments. To the best of my knowledge no representations have been made on behalf of the Lockheed company. I believe there have been some conversations concerning the contract, but there have not been representations made on behalf of the company to any official in my department.

Mr. McKinnon: Then, Mr. Speaker, perhaps in answer to this question the minister could clarify his own position in respect of these conversations and whether he indeed had conversations with Mr. Reisman. Mr. Grandy said: "We have tried to help the company find financing for their shortfall." Last night the Minister of National Defence certainly indicated in committee that he was seeking financing aid for the same company to the extent that DND was willing to pay the interest. Are we now to assume that these two seekers of financial support for Lockheed did so without ever talking to each other about it?

Mr. Richardson: Mr. Speaker, I have not seen Mr. Reisman or Mr. Grandy even to say good morning or good afternoon to them for several months.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Richardson: I have had no conversations of any kind with either of these gentlemen for many months. There have been conversations by telephone on the subject mentioned by the hon. member with my deputy minister. I do not believe there have been any other representations to any other personnel involved with the Lockheed company.

Mr. McKinnon: I hope that the minister and Mr. Grandy are not both lucky on the same day and borrow twice as much money as we need.

FINANCE

CONSULTING CONTRACTS HELD BY MR. REISMAN AND HIS ACCESS TO DEPARTMENTAL FILES

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Minister of Finance. He stated yesterday that he would take notice and report to the House on either the contracts held by Mr. Reisman or his access to the Department of Finance files. Is the minister in a position to report to the House on the second part of that promise, that is Mr. Reisman's access to the Department of Finance files?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, may I say in answer to the second part of the question that I have made the inquiry and been advised that Mr. Reisman, as former deputy minister, would have no right of access to departmental files, either in relation to matters now on hand or in relation to his former responsibility.

With regard to contracts, I am advised that there was a contract outstanding with Mr. Reisman for the period from April 1 to April 30, 1975 for the purpose of winding up some of the items that he had under particular consideration in the department before he left, and that indeed Mr. Reisman occupied, on a part time basis, some space in the department until June 27 of last year.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

NATIONAL DEFENCE

LOCKHEED CONTRACT—REASON FOR OBLIGATION TO PAY $111 MILLION IN INTEREST

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Defence. Since the minister indicated in the House on March 2 that the reason for the cost escalation of the Orion purchase by some $111 million over a two month period was due to the cost of interest on interim financing payments, I should like to ask the minister if he is telling the House that the government did not know in advance that it was obligated to pay this additional $111 million, in which case it is incompetent, or is he saying that the government was not obligated previously to pay this amount and, if so, why has it decided to do so?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I have explained this point to the House before on earlier occasions. The cabinet decision which was reached in November included a decision to purchase the Lockheed Orion at a cost of $950 million, and also allowed for the interest charges for financing the payments over the production phase of the contract. This was in my statement which I made in the House in November. The exact dollar amounts for interest were not stated because we did now know them at that time, but the statement indicated very clearly that there would be additional financing charges over and above the $950 million.

Mr. Broadbent: Is the minister saying that that reference to interest charges pertains specifically to front-end financing of the project and, more specifically still, did it pertain to the $111 million for just a two or three month period? Was that clearly understood by the cabinet last November?

Mr. Richardson: It was not related to very short-term financing in the sense that we are talking about three years. Full payment is provided for by my department at the end of the life of the contract and on delivery of the aircraft. But the need for financing over the production phase, which is about three years, was always contemplated by the government. The interest payments were authorized and were so stated in my statement, and are in fact in the estimates which are now before the House.

LOCKHEED CONTRACT—POSSIBILITY OF OBTAINING INFORMATION ABOUT PAY-OFFS FROM UNITED STATES GOVERNMENT

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): On Monday of this week the minister indicated that the government was accepting Lockheed's response to the question about the possibility of bribes being offered by that company to anyone in Canada with regard to purchases of aircraft from that corporation. I should like now to ask the minister if the government thinks it appropriate to follow the examples of the governments of Holland and Japan, and specifically to request the United States government—not Lockheed—to provide the government of Canada with its confidential information concerning pay-off payments which have been made by the Lockheed Corporation to various government officials around the world.

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): We have had conversations with senior officials in the United States government, and there has never been any indication whatsoever that there were any improper payments made to Canadians by Lockheed. In addition, in the Senate hearings which were held and in which the other revelations were made concerning Japan and other countries, there was no mention at any time of payments to Canada. There has been no evidence anywhere that there have been improper payments in this country, and a few months ago I read into the record a statement by the chairman of Lockheed confirming that in writing.

LAW REFORM COMMISSION

REQUEST FOR NAME OF NEW PRESIDENT

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, I would like to put a question to the Minister of Justice.

I would like to ask him if he intends to appoint the new chairman of the Law Reform Commission in the near future. And, if so, who will be the appointee?

[English]

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I appointed a new chairman some time ago, Mr. Justice Antonio Lamer of the Superior Court of Quebec, who is the present vice-chairman of the commission and will become chairman at the expiration of the present chairman's term of office.

CONTENTS OF JUDGE LAMER'S EVIDENCE BEFORE CRIME COMMISSION—KNOWLEDGE OF MINISTER

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, I would like to put a supplementary question.

I would like to ask the minister—to protect the integrity of the Bench, whether he is aware that Justice Lamer has appeared in camera before Justice Réal Brunet of the Commission of Inquiry on Organized Crime and whether he knows the contents of the evidence given by Justice Lamer?

[English]

Hon. Ron. Basford (Minister of Justice): I am not aware of the giving of the evidence, and obviously if it was in camera I would not be aware of it.

Mr. Matte: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a final supplementary.

Can the minister explain how it is that he is not aware of such an important matter? If someone is appointed chairman and this person will be called upon to direct the new legislation relating to the law, can the minister tell the House whether he will investigate this matter to know the content of Justice Lamer's testimony to the commission of inquiry on organized crime?

[English]

Mr. Basford: The chairman designate was appointed vice-chairman some four years ago, and apparently the matter was examined at that time by my predecessor.

COMBINES

ALLEGED CHARGES AGAINST THOMCOR HOLDINGS LIMITED

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, whoever he may be today. Can the acting minister confirm for this House that, as a result of the diligent work of the hon. member for Central Nova and members of the caucus research staff, his department has seen fit to lay charges in the provincial court at Montreal relating to Combines Investigation Act violations committed by Thomcor Holdings Limited, the operator of duty free shops at both Dorval and Mirabel?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Acting Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the Acting Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs is the same person today as yesterday, will be the same gentleman tomorrow, and will be until someone is appointed on a permanent basis.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Are you tired of the Post Office?

Mr. Mackasey: In the meantime, he has inherited a very capable parliamentary secretary who can answer these questions.

Mr. Art Lee (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, in answer to the hon. member's question, I think he well knows that it is not the policy of the department to comment on whether investigations are being undertaken by the director of the anti-combines branch.

Some hon. Members: Charges.

An hon. Member: What are you hiding?

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, for the information of both the acting minister and the parliamentary secretary, there was in fact such a charge laid in the provincial court on March 17. I give that information to those gentlemen gratuitously.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

SKY SHOPS INVESTIGATION—REQUEST FOR REPORT

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Solicitor General. Now that the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs has led the way, so to speak, when it comes to investigating and then acting on information placed before it by the hon. member for Central Nova, I wonder if the minister can tell us when we are likely to see the results of the work of his department?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, as I have mentioned many times before, the RCMP were investigating this matter long before the hon. member for Central Nova raised it in this House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Allmand: Almost one year before, Mr. Speaker.

An hon. Member: Come off it.

Mr. Allmand: The investigation is continuing, and when there is enough evidence we will present it to the attorney general of Quebec.

RESEARCH

MEETING WITH MEDICAL RESEARCH REPRESENTATIVES—REQUEST FOR REPORT

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Public Works. Did the minister meet yesterday with members of the Canadian medical research community and if so, what was the nature of their representations and the minister's response to them?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, yesterday I was in Kingston at a funeral and did not meet with the members.

Mr. Grafftey: Mr. Speaker, maybe the Minister of National Health and Welfare—because of the noise from the other side I did not hear the reply of the hon. Minister for Public Works.

● (1430)

Mr. Speaker: The reply of the hon. minister was that he was at a funeral in Kingston yesterday and did not attend any such meeting.

Mr. Grafftey: Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare or the President of the Treasury Board. Did either minister meet yesterday or this week with members of the Canadian medical research community and, if so, what was the nature of the representations and the minister's response to them?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I met these persons yesterday. We discussed the situation and I informed them that I agree with the opposition party in trying to restrain government expenditures.

[English]

SUGGESTED RECONSIDERATION OF FUNDING OF MEDICAL RESEARCH

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): A final supplementary, Mr. Speaker. Maybe the government should change its priorities in this regard.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Grafftey: Because the quality of medical research in Canada directly affects the costs and quality of medical and health care services, and because as a result of current government funding policies many research scientists are ready to leave this country and many projects have been cancelled, will the hon. Minister reconsider government funding policy and give the Canadian research community new and deserved hope?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, we had granted a very substantial increase to the Medical Research Council the previous year. Unfortunately, in view of the government restraint policies, we have not been able to do the same this year. However, the doctors who made representations to me yesterday did not describe the situation as being as bad as the hon. member is doing today in the House.

ANTI-INFLATION BOARD

BUDGET OF ADMINISTRATOR—EXCESS ALLOWED TO LAPSE

Mr. John Roberts (St. Paul's): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the President of the Treasury Board. In view of the statement by the administrator of the Anti-Inflation Board that he requires no more than $100,000 to meet his budgetary commitment to the end of March and in view of the impossibility of procedurally amending the recommendations of the House of Commons for a sum much larger than that, will the minister assure the House that the sum in excess of $100,000 will be impounded, allowed to lapse and not spent?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I can assure the hon. member that the money which has been or will be voted will not be allowed to be spent and will be turned over to the government's Consolidated Revenue Fund, as is the case with every budget. In any given fiscal year, we tell the House that about 2 per cent of the credits have not been spent at the end of the year and are turned over to the Consolidated Revenue Fund; this principle will hold true for the administrator and for other departments.

POST OFFICE

REQUEST FOR CONSULTATION WITH PUBLISHERS BEFORE DOMESTIC RATES INCREASED

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Postmaster General—if he still is Postmaster General. It arises from the 400 per cent increase in postal rates imposed on January 1 on Canadian periodicals mailed to points outside Canada, an increase which violates the guidelines of the government's anti-inflation program and which was imposed without prior consultation with Canadian publishers. Will the Postmaster General comment briefly on criticism contained in the brief submitted to him by the Canadian Periodical Publishers Association and the Canadian Community Newspaper Association and give assurance that there will be consultation with the industry before the government imposes increases in domestic postal rates on Canadian publications?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman is making statements which are not factually correct. As far back as in 1971, in order to protect the Canadian industry, we prevailed upon the United States government to raise their postal rates for publications coming from the United States to Canada. We did this to protect the Canadian industry and, in response, we had an obligation to raise the rates in this country. I have on file correspondence from both associations to which the hon. member alluded, dating as far back as 1974, plus the notification in October, 1975, that the rates were to go up. I suggest, when they go to the Anti-Inflation Board to check the new rates, they should also submit to that board their new advertising rates which went up on January 1 of this year.

SUGGESTED REDUCTION OF RATE INCREASES ON PUBLICATIONS GOING TO UNITED STATES

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Since the Postmaster General referred to 1971, a time known as the bad old days in the Post Office service—I recall the Prime Minister saying in those days that everybody knows the postal service is lousy—would he, in view of the decision of the associations I mentioned to refer the recent increases to the Anti-Inflation Board for adjudication, consider rolling back increases already imposed, so that they will meet the government's anti-inflation guidelines?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I am surprised that the hon. gentleman questioned the service of 1971. I said that in 1971 we made representation in order to protect the Canadian publishing industry. Obviously, he feels we should not have done that. By asking the United States to raise postal rates, since for every 100 publications coming into Canada from the United States one Canadian publication only goes to the United States, we protected in a tangible way the Canadian publishing industry against the influx of United States periodicals. We did that, as I say, by raising domestic rates in the United States. I thought the hon. gentleman would be pleased about that. The associations are perfectly free to take the new postal rates to the Anti-Inflation Board, just as I am free to take to the Anti-Inflation Board their new advertising rates which went into effect on January 1 and which also exceed certain guidelines.

ALLEGATION SOME MEMBERS OF KGB ARE ATTACHED TO SOVIET DIPLOMATIC STAFF—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Solicitor General. Is the minister aware that a great number of personnel at the Soviet embassy in Ottawa, listed falsely as part of the Soviet Union's diplomatic corps, are actually Soviet spies and members of the KGB? If so, what steps, if any, is the minister taking to expel these individuals?

[Mr. Dinsdale.]

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, the RCMP are aware that certain members of the Soviet Union embassy staff, in Ottawa, are with the KGB. They have known it for some time. I cannot say more about what they are doing. That would be counter-productive.

Mr. Paproski: But you are doing nothing.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

ALLEGATION SOME MEMBERS OF KGB ATTACHED TO SOVIET DIPLOMATIC STAFF—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Is it government policy to allow known KGB spies to be active under the noses of the government? Further, as it was the minister's position, in the answer to my leader's order paper question No. 3,336, that the government has no information that any accredited diplomat in Canada has been expelled from another country, and as Major Vladimir Vassiliev, presently serving—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member put a clear question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Perhaps he ought to answer that clear question.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, in reply to the clear question, if the activities of any members of the embassy staff are inconsistent with their diplomatic status, they would be asked to leave the country.

Mr. Woolliams: Well, ask them to leave.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

REQUEST FOR AMENDMENT OF GUIDELINES FOR TEACHERS' SALARIES

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. As salaries for 200 Saskatchewan Indian guidance counsellors, language teachers and associate teachers in Saskatchewan have been frozen for three years, in some cases at levels below the minimum wage, will the minister amend the guidelines controlling those salaries, to permit those workers to get cost of living increases retroactive to 1972-73?

Hon. Judd Buchanan (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure if this group was included in the recent negotiations we conducted with teachers and allied groups. I understand an increase was negotiated which is acceptable and going before the Anti-Inflation Board.

Mr. Nystrom: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. According to what members of the group said yesterday, when I met them, what the minister suggested does not appear to be the case. Will the minister look into the matter? How can he justify guidelines which allow salaries in programs administered by his department, both provincially and federally, to be below the minimum wage? How can he justify such guidelines?

Mr. Buchanan: Mr. Speaker, I do not understand that that is the case. I do not think the hon. member is correct. The settlement negotiated was in excess of the guidelines. That is why it has been referred to the Anti-Inflation Board.

HOUSING

REQUEST FOR REPORT ON NEGOTIATIONS WITH QUEBEC CONCERNING GRANTS TO MUNICIPALITIES

Mr. Jacques Olivier (Longueuil): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs about the Housing Action Program?

Considering that under the provisions of Quebec chapter 15, municipalities are not allowed to negotiate directly with the government of Canada or its organizations, considering that this delay of the Quebec government in finalizing an agreement with the government of Canada deprives Quebec municipalities of important amounts in capital and interest and in view of the fact that by February 29 the city of Longueuil had already qualified for $814,000, could the minister report progress of the negotiations with the provincial government and tell us whether he thinks an agreement will be reached very soon with the Quebec government?

[English]

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, there is to be an exchange of letters. It is not covered in a formal agreement. There is an understanding between Dr. Goldbloom in Quebec and our regional director in Montreal, Mr. Guilbault, that all building permits which fall within the criteria passed by this House since November 1, 1975, I believe, will be honoured. The applications will pass through the Quebec Housing Corporation. The funds will be paid directly to the municipality by CMHC, retroactive to November 1, 1975.

AIR TRANSPORT

REPORTS OF ALLEGED INCIDENTS RESULTING FROM BILINGUAL AIR TRAFFIC CONTROL—REQUEST MINISTER MEET WITH PILOTS

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. In a release of February 25 to do with bilingual air traffic services the minister stated that allegations of problems concerning bilingual air communications were without foundation and that not one alleged incident had been validated. We now find that The Canadian Air Line Pilots Association has submitted evidence of 20 incidents of close calls in Quebec to the director general of Civil Aeronautics. Were those incidents reported to the minister?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I have not yet received a report on them. The officials would, in the ordinary course, determine whether there was any foundation to them, as in the past such reports have proved to be without foundation.

Mr. McKenzie: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. May I ask the minister this: Why was not the report of these close calls from CALPA acknowledged? Will the minister make the details of these incidents public and meet personally with CALPA officials, to clear up the matter?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, there is not much point in acknowledging something like this until one has checked, to see whether there is substance to the allegations.

PROPOSED ELIMINATION OF TRANSPORT SUBSIDY ON FLOUR TO EAST COAST PORTS—ALLEGED CONFLICT IN MINISTER'S STATEMENTS

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): Mr. Speaker, my question is the first ever to a Minister of Agriculture. I hope he will be kind to this city fellow. Since the Minister of Transport has told me that the subsidies on flour and grain movements through east coast ports will go shortly, and since the Minister of Agriculture replied very kindly to the hon. member for Vegreville that studies are underway into this sensitive matter, may I ask which represents government policy, ruination by Transport or rumination by Agriculture?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, that all depends on what my studies show.

REPORT ON LOSS OF LIFE AND FISHING BOATS ON WEST COAST—REASON FOR FAILURE TO IMPLEMENT RECOMMENDATIONS

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, two more fishermen were lost at sea the night before last in Queen-Charlotte Sound. I wish to ask the Minister of Transport whether he was able to ensure that the recommendations of last year's report on life and fishing boat losses on the west coast were implemented before the herring fleet set out to sea this season.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, a number of steps were taken to try to minimize the danger. Some further regulations have been put forward for discussion. It was our intention to implement them, requiring fairly major changes in the nature of construction and other safety matters relating to vessels. There was general concern that any very abrupt implementation of those regulations would cost fishermen the use of their vessels completely for a period of time. Therefore, those discussions as to how we can best bring about those standards are still going on.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, since the failure to implement the regulations has cost lives and not just ships, will the Minister of Justice inform the House about the correspondence he has had with the British Columbia authorities in relations to this report and, in particular, to the conflict between federal and provincial jurisdication over the fishing fleet as those conflicting jurisdictions affect provincial regulations relating to workmen's compensation.

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, that, of course, is another question which concerns the fishermen. They are concerned if they are faced with two sets of regulations and each one imposing different standards upon them. As a result, discussions have commenced with the appropriate provincial minister. It will be our endeavour to seek to coordinate the regulations so there is no duplication, quite apart from the jurisdictional issue.

FISHERIES

INQUIRY AS TO REPLACEMENT OF "CAPE FRIELS" PATROL VESSEL

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of State (Fisheries). As a result of the loss of the Cape Friels patrol vessel, which was so important with regard to patrolling the fisheries zones and air-sea rescue surveillance, has the minister been in touch with his colleagues in the Department of Transport to ensure that the Cape Friels will be replaced as soon as possible? What action is being taken in this regard?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of State (Fisheries)): Mr. Speaker, there is a vessel replacing the Cape Friels at the moment. We are looking into a permanent replacement for the vessel which was lost. While I am on my feet, I should like to pay homage to the men of the armed forces. It was their plane which found the survivors and which, at their own risk, stayed very close to the lifeboat until the survivors were safe.

PROPOSED EXPANSION OF LIFEBOAT STATIONS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, I acknowledge the fact that the air-sea rescue tracker plane in St. John's was the first to assist in the incident. Will the minister indicate what plans there are with regard to expanding air-sea rescue surveillance, particularly with regard to lifeboat vessels and stations which apparently do not have the capability to apprehend or intercede?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of State (Fisheries)): Mr. Speaker, the different departments involved—Transport, Defence, Environment in terms of atmospheric service, Fisheries and others—are working together. We are pulling together the coordination that is required. It is really a question of getting people in the regional offices to pull together and we are working on this question now.

ALLEGED CLOSING OF CERTAIN SHIP REGISTRY OFFICES ON WEST COAST—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Hugh A. Anderson (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. In the Vancouver Province of March 18 an article stated the Vancouver registry office for ships was to remain open but the Prince Rupert and other customs offices were expected to be closed for ship registration. Can the minister advise the House whether there has been any change of policy under Bill C-61 as was discussed in committee where custom offices such as Port Alberni and Prince Rupert would continue registering ships?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): No, Mr. Speaker, there has been no such change in policy. There may have been a misunderstanding because certain offices will be designated as deputy-registry offices along with the registry office at the central registry. It will still be the intention to receive documents and offer such services at a variety of customs offices.

HARBOURS

PROPOSED REPAIR OF CERTAIN FACILITIES ON ST. LAWRENCE RIVER—SUGGESTED AGREEMENT WITH QUEBEC

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Public Works.

As an agency has been delegated to negotiate with the Quebec government the abandonment by the federal government of wharves located along the St. Lawrence River, can the minister tell the House whether those negotiations are progressing or whether they are at a standstill? If there is no progress, can he tell the House when he will finally decide to spend the required public moneys on the maintenance of those wharves which, all in all, are still useful to the public?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I must tell the hon. member that his question should be addressed to my colleague the Minister of Transport. The wharves in question are used for passenger ferries, and they fall under the jurisdiction of the Minister of Transport.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, on a supplementary.

As the Minister of Transport is a colleague of his, may I ask him to get in touch with the Minister of Transport so that an agreement can be signed as soon as possible with the province of Quebec, so that those wharves can be kept in good shape and that the Quebec government, if it takes over the wharves, can accept that responsibility at the earliest possible date, and to avoid their becoming useless within the next few months?

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, I am in favour of an agreement and I shall take up the matter with my colleague at the first opportunity.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

SAMSON COMMUNICATIONS PROJECT—REPORTED CANCELLATION OF CONTRACT OF COMPUTING DEVICES

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence and has to do with the reported cancellation of the Computing Devices contract for the Samson communications project. Can the minister confirm whether or not that cancellation has taken place?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I can confirm that Computing Devices were not able to complete their work under the contract. The contract is handled by the Department of Supply and Services and I do not know if in fact it has been cancelled.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the interest of the minister in obtaining Canadian input into this kind of defence project, and in view of the statement made yesterday by the president of the company to the effect that Computing Devices had offered to start delivering the terminals in May, 1976 and that Supply and Services had refused to accept that offer, before any action is taken by the government or before the government permits any action to be taken can I have an undertaking from the Minister of National Defence that he will intercede with his colleague the Minister of Supply and Services to see whether there is any way in which the contract can be restored? Because it is important, Mr. Speaker, not only to the people employed at Computing Devices, but also to the whole commitment of the Canadian electronics industry to supply our own Canadian forces.

Mr. Richardson: Mr. Speaker, we have, of course, wanted to see the maximum amount of Canadian content in the Samson project. I think it is true to say that the government has been very long suffering with this particular contractor. We have been delayed many months but we have made every possible attempt to have the contract completed by them. However, at some point we are going to have to go to another contractor to supply the essential parts for the Samson project.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CAMBODIA—INQUIRY AS TO CANADIAN PROTEST AGAINST VIOLATIONS OF HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Douglas Roche (Edmonton-Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In regard to the previous questions put to the minister concerning the cruel tragedies and tortures that are taking place in Cambodia, documented in the Toronto Star of March 10 in an on-the-spot report by Jack Cahal, can the minister add to what he said before and tell the House in what way Canada is protesting this massive violation of human rights, and specifically whether Canada has yet launched a protest with the United Nations commission on human rights?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member may be aware, as I am, that it is very difficult to get information out of Cambodia at the present time. There is an almost total lack of information on the situation in Cambodia at the present time, but we are following up the question of violations with the UN commission on human rights.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

REQUEST FOR REPORT ON NEGOTIATIONS CONCERNING FOREIGN OWNERSHIP OF LAND

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, may I direct my question to the Prime Minister. It has to do with foreign ownership of land in Canada. Can the Prime Minister advise the House what progress is being made with the provinces with respect to the establishment of measures to deal with the ownership of land by foreigners in Canada? I realize the government has introduced an enabling amendment to the Canadian Citizenship Act which will assist in this regard, but I understand that there are other matters that require resolution, such as the application of the Foreign Investment Review Act, particularly as it applies to agricultural land. Can the Prime Minister bring the House up to date on negotiations in this regard with the provinces?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I would have to check whether there has been any new development since I last reported to the House on this. There was a study by the federal and provincial governments on this very subject and certain conclusions were reached which I believe were tabled in the House. I believe I tabled at the time the letter that I wrote to the various premiers getting their reaction to the report.

The amendment to the Citizenship Act is one of the recommendations that is within federal jurisdiction and on which we can act. There have been objections to the federal authority acting in that area under the Foreign Investment Review Agency. The position that I have taken is that this agency was set up by federal law and that it will continue to operate.

I will see whether there is some occasion on which to table further correspondence. I believe I have brought the House up to date on the matter as it stands. The provinces have taken the view, which we understand, that much of this is within their jurisdiction. The Citizenship Act amendment was an exception and we are prepared to amend that act in co-operation. I think the matter rests where it is now, and the provinces and the federal government will each have to act within their own jurisdiction to make sure that ownership and zoning of land in Canada is properly dealt with.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

MEASURES TO ENSURE THAT NATIVES GET JOBS ON MACKENZIE VALLEY PIPELINE

Mr. Wally Firth (Northwest Territories): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development in connection with his promise of jobs for northerners on the proposed Mackenzie valley pipeline. In view of the fact that a master labour contract now exists between almost all pipeline contractors and four trade unions giving the unions control of hiring for pipeline construction, and in view of the fact that these unions will allocate jobs on the basis of seniority to unemployed members, including 2,000 members fresh from the Syncrude project, what steps will the minister take to ensure that northerners get the jobs he and the industry have promised us?

Hon. Judd Buchanan (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): First of all, Mr. Speaker, a conclusion has not been reached vis-à-vis the pipeline. Secondly, in the granting of the right of way application which will come to me this will be one of the conditions upon which I intend to insist, that it guarantees employment for native people.

Mr. Firth: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is the minister aware that similar government promises were changed by union action on the Alyeska pipeline in Alaska?

Mr. Buchanan: Mr. Speaker, I was not aware of that but I will happy to do my best to see that the same does not happen here.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS—POSSIBLE RE-ESTABLISHMENT OF INTERMINISTERIAL COMMITTEE

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs and relates to the call yesterday by Ambassador Thomas Enders with respect to new forms of co-operation between Canada and the United States. In view of the considerable disquiet raised by his predecessor Ambassador Porter in December and the comments in January of the Senate committee studying Canada-U.S. relations regarding the need for the re-establishment of the Canada-U.S. interministerial committee, what action is being taken by our government to head off being in a reactive position with respect to new U.S. initiatives?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I read with interest the speech made yesterday by the United States ambassador to the Canadian Club, and I must say that his approach to the management of Canadian-U.S. affairs is commendable and obviously will be constructive in the months and years ahead.

With respect to the suggestion of the hon. member that the interministerial committee be revived, it is not one of the forms of co-operation that we presently find useful in view of the very frequent bilateral conversations that take place between United States and Canadian ministers and the difficulty of bringing together all the players who are required for a successful interministerial meeting.

REQUEST FOR NAMES OF PEOPLE MR. DRURY CONSULTED ABOUT APPROACHING JUDGE HUGESSEN

Mr. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Public Works. On March 18 the minister admitted that he "consulted a number of other people" on the question of confrontation which he raised with Mr. Justice Hugessen. Would the minister tell the House whether any of the "number of other people", with the exception, of course, of the former minister of consumer and corporate affairs, are members of the cabinet?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I have no very clear recollection but I thought I probably did mention this to some of my other colleagues in cabinet.

Mr. Fraser: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of that I would ask the minister to examine his memory carefully and to tell the House with how many and which members of the cabinet this matter was discussed. I do not have to remind the hon. minister that without an answer in this regard he leaves a very grave suspicion of conspiracy to commit an impropriety, namely, to touch a judge.

● (1500)

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, I do not think the hon. member wants to be threatening. I have replied that I have no particular recollection of discussion concerning an event which I myself felt to be a baseless rumour. I will try to see if I can get some precise recollection.

Mr. Fraser: Mr. Speaker, I would remind the hon. minister that the baseless rumour was the ganging up, and not the confrontation. I would invite the hon. minister to clarify his memory and advise this House just what went on.

Mr. Roche: I have had occasion before, Sir, to draw to the attention of the Chair the lack of clarity about who can ask supplementary questions and who cannot. I wish respectfully to draw to the attention of the Chair today the continuing lack of clarity, for again today I was denied the opportunity of asking a very important supplementary question of the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I raised in my first question the matter of what Canada would do to protest the terrible tragedies that have taken place in Cambodia with regard to the violation of human rights. That, Sir, was the preparation for the question I then intended to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs concerning what Canada would do about the long awaited ratification on the part of Canada of the UN declaration on human rights.

Some of us will be representing our country at the forthcoming meeting of the Inter-Parliamentary Union where the question of human rights is going to be foremost on the agenda. We are going to be asked at that time what Canada is doing in respect of ratifying the UN declaration on human rights which was approved in principle between Ottawa and the provinces last December 11. I believe I should have been given the opportunity of following up my question to the minister in this regard, especially since some of my colleagues did have the opportunity of asking supplementaries following my denial. I only want to respectfully—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Surely the hon. member does not seriously contend that, in order to prepare himself for participation in an international conference on behalf of our country, the only avenue of information for a proper preparation for that event is the question period.

There are members I can name here who for two days now have been attempting to get the floor. The Chair has always found this difficulty. Indeed, there are seven or eight members who tried to get the floor yesterday and still could not get the floor again today. Surely there must be a judgment left to the Chair when a question relates to a very general subject, such as the one put by the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona, and in turn by the hon. member for Egmont, anticipating his point of order, in which the Chair must exercise some discretion, not related necessarily to the importance of the question put by the hon. member, but really to the importance of the questions that fail to get put each time a question of that sort is followed by one or two supplementaries. This is a balancing act that the Chair has to do every day, and it is such that really gives me no pleasure.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I will not repeat some of the arguments that were put by the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona in respect of the same question, but I do think you put members in a somewhat difficult position, Sir, in terms of the question period. I am one of the members you referred to who stood all day yesterday and today in order to catch Your Honour's eye. It is somewhat difficult for this hon. member, who has been in the House for a few years, to determine the basis on which the decision is taken.

If indeed there is to be a rule in respect of the asking of second and third supplementaries I think it should be clear to all hon. members in this House in order to avoid the very situation which has arisen, on this and on previous days, of a number of members not being recognized and getting a suitable opportunity to do so. Otherwise it may fall to some members to consider that Your Honour is making decisions which are really not based on anything other than a very subjective judgment.

Mr. Speaker: I welcome that intervention because that, indeed, is in fact the case. If there is a way the hon. member or other hon. members could suggest that would cause it to be otherwise, the Chair would welcome such comments.

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the House that the Clerk of the House has laid upon the table the twenty-sixth report of the Clerk of Petitions, stating that he has examined the petition presented by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) and finds that it meets the requirements of the Standing Orders as to form.

Supply

SUPPLY

PROCEDURE TO DEAL WITH SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES AND INTERIM SUPPLY

On the Order: Government notice of motion:

March 22, 1976—The President of the Privy Council:

That, notwithstanding any Standing Order, on the penultimate allotted day in the present supply period, at fifteen minutes before the ordinary time of adjournment, proceedings then in progress shall be interrupted and every question as may be required by section (9) of Standing Order 58 shall be put forthwith successively, without amendment or debate;

That, immediately thereafter, any other question or questions as may be necessary to dispose of any item of supplementary estimates, the restoration or reinstatement of any item in the supplementary estimates, or any opposed item in the supplementary estimates, and for the passage of any bill based thereon shall be put forthwith successively, without amendment or debate;

That, immediately thereafter, the questions on a motion to grant interim supply and for first reading of a bill based thereon shall be put forthwith successively, without amendment or debate; and

That, on the final allotted day in the present supply period, the business taken up shall be the second reading, consideration in committee of the whole, report stage and third reading of the bill based upon the motion for interim supply and that, at fifteen minutes before the ordinary hour of adjournment on the said day, proceedings then in progress shall be interrupted and every question necessary for the disposal of the said bill shall be put forthwith successively, without amendment or debate;

Provided that, on both the aforementioned days, the House shall not adjourn until all business referred to in this Order is disposed of.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, since this motion for a special order is couched in rather arcane language, perhaps the House would appreciate a brief explanation in what might be called lay terms. This special order has, of course, been discussed among the House leaders of the various parties, who I understand have recommended its support by the members of their various groups.

The purpose of this motion is to facilitate debate on the bill authorising interim supply for the first quarter of fiscal 1976-77. Interim supply is the last item of the business of supply taken up during the winter portion of allotted days and, consequently, it has not in recent years been reached in time for debate. Under this proposed special order a full day's debate would be provided.

Under this proposed special order the business for the next two days will be as follows. Today we will debate the opposition motion in the name of the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens). At the conclusion of that debate we will take up the motion relating to Supplementary Estimates (B) and will then proceed to pass at all stages the required bill. The motion for concurrence in interim supply will then be reached and the required bill will be introduced. The proceedings relating to estimates and interim supply must be taken up not later than 5.45 this afternoon. When orders of the day are reached tomorrow, the interim supply bill will be taken up at second reading. After receiving second reading the bill will be considered in committee of the whole. The bill must be disposed of not later than 9.45 tomorrow evening.

In our continuing efforts to iron out procedure relating to supply there have been suggestions from several quarters that it would be helpful if provision were made for debate on supply bills. Our experience tomorrow will help us assess this proposal.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I want to say that I welcome this proposal as a niche in the heretofore closed door. I hope the door will be flung open much wider to let the rays of the sun shine on a proper and real examination of government expenditure by the representatives of the people. I am very pleased to have participated in the discussions with the House leader and to say that the measure has our support as a beginning.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, it is correct, as the government House leader pointed out, that the terms of this motion have been discussed among the House leaders and that we have recommended to the members of our parties that it be supported.

● (1510)

Under normal conditions if members of the opposition were to put down motions for debate for both today and tomorrow we would end up at 9.45 tomorrow night having to put through two bills, the supplementary estimates and interim supply, without debate, in an atmosphere that sometimes is not exactly pleasant. Under the terms of this motion, as we understand it, we will pass the supplementary estimates bill tonight without any debate, and that may not be exactly pleasant, but we will have all day tomorrow for second reading, consideration in committee of the whole and third reading of the interim supply bill. We hope, as some members have said, that tomorrows' debate on the interim supply bill may result in a desire for more such days.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The motion is in the name of the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Sharp) seconded by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald).

Mr. Sharp moved:

That, notwithstanding any Standing Order, on the penultimate allotted day in the present supply period, at fifteen minutes before the ordinary time of adjournment, proceedings then in progress shall be interrupted and every question as may be required by section (9) of Standing Order 58 shall be put forthwith successively, without amendment or debate;

That, immediately thereafter, any other question or questions as may be necessary to dispose of any item of supplementary estimates, the restoration or reinstatement of any item in the supplementary estimates, or any opposed item in the supplementary estimates, and for the passage of any bill based thereon shall be put forthwith successively, without amendment or debate;

That, immediately thereafter, the questions on a motion to grant interim supply and for first reading of a bill based thereon shall be put forthwith successively, without amendment or debate; and

That, on the final allotted day in the present supply period, the business taken up shall be the second reading, consideration in committee of the whole, report stage and third reading of the bill based upon the motion for interim supply and that, at fifteen minutes before the ordinary hour of adjournment on the said day, proceedings then in progress shall be interrupted and every question necessary for the disposal of the said bill shall be put forthwith successively, without amendment or debate;

Provided that, on both the aforementioned days, the House shall not adjourn until all business referred to in this Order is disposed of.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

COPIES OF ALL DOCUMENTS RELATING TO FEDERAL COST SHARING FOR MARINE SERVICE CENTRES

Motion No. 79—Mr. Marshall:

That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency praying that he will cause to be laid before this House copies of all minutes of meetings, letters, telegrams between the government and the Province of Newfoundland as it relates to federal cost sharing on the current construction programme for marine service centres.

[English]

Mr. J.-J. Blais (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, almost every activity the Department of the Environment and the Department of Regional Economic Expansion are involved in includes some sort of discussion with one or more of the provinces during the course of development or implementation of policies and programs. The release of documents exchanged during the preliminary discussion phase related to policies and programs would very probably be detrimental to the future conduct of federal-provincial relations. I would therefore request that the hon. member withdraw his motion.

Mr. Marshall: Transfer for debate.

Mr. Speaker: Transferred for debate.

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY S.O. 58—ALLEGED CONTRADICTORY ECONOMIC POLICIES OF THE GOVERNMENT

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe) moved:

That this House deplores the contradictory economic policies of the present administration, which have failed to enhance the growth and stability of Canadian employment and industrial production, which have not encouraged investment in industry and which have permitted a serious decline in our competitive position in international markets.

He said: Mr. Speaker, there is a growing lack of confidence in the country. Under the present administration confrontation rather than co-operation has become the custom. Labour is uncertain; it is bewildered. Why else would some 15,000 union people come to Ottawa in protest, the largest demonstration in history? Businessmen have tried to maintain hope, but they hesitate to make the necessary capital commitments needed to ensure prosperity in the country.

Consumers have learned to spend today, and even to borrow in order to spend today as they have little confidence in what tomorrow may bring. Can such consumers, such businessmen and such labour be blamed for this attitude when in a very basic sense the administration has done little to defend our currency?

During the last eight years the value of the dollar as measured by the Consumer Price Index has fallen by 40 per cent in Canada, a direct result of the most prolonged period of inflation in our peacetime history. To maintain a strong dollar we must assure a vibrant inflation-free economy. The value of our dollar at any particular time is based on the condition of our domestic economy. Yet in the past eight years the administration has followed fiscal and monetary policies which have built strong inflationary forces into the structure of the economy itself. They have discouraged savings and capital investment in the private sector. Consequently, capital investment in Canada during this period has been one of the lowest of any major industrialized nation.

Rationalizations for administration failures have become more and more commonplace. It is only appearance which seems to count, not reality. Gestures are the order of the day rather than effective action. Policy in respect of the making of decisions is preferred to decision.

We are now told that as a result of the administration's approach to the economy, including controls, inflation may drop to 8 per cent this year. Why only 8 per cent? Certainly the Americans are doing better. Why can our target not be 5 per cent or, certainly, 6 per cent? With responsible economic planning at the federal level we could have significantly less than 8 per cent inflation in Canada this year. In fact until recently it was widely forecast that we would do much better than the administration now predicts.

In the summer of 1975, prior to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) taking office, prior to the Prime Minister's (Mr. Trudeau) control program, prior to the Liberal leader's musings at Christmastime, concerning a new society, and certainly prior to the so-called tight money policy, independent forecasts by eight of our most reputable financial institutions, including the Bank of Montreal, the Bank of Nova Scotia, and Woods, Gordon and Company, predicted that inflation would be down to the 6 per cent range this year. And now the government is saying that 8 per cent is the target.

On that point I think it is interesting to review what the winter forecasts are of the institutions which were optimistic about a 6 per cent range of inflation for the current year. The Conference Board is now predicting that for 1976 our inflation might be as high as 10.5 per cent. The Bank of Montreal, instead of its summer prediction of 6 per cent inflation in 1976, is now stating it may be 9 per cent to 9.5 per cent. The Bank of Nova Scotia is now predicting an 8.8 per cent inflation, Woods Gundy are predicting 9.3 per cent inflation, Woods, Gordon and Company are predicting 8.1 per cent.

What went wrong? Why should we be faced, after so-called government action with an 8 per cent inflation when nine months ago such reputable institutions anticipated a 6 per cent level? Why should we be tolerating the administration's vague hope of less inflation when William Simon, the counterpart to our Minister of Finance, who is Secretary of the Treasury in the U.S. is confidently predicting a 2 per cent inflation in that country within the relatively near future?

The administration has consistently fallen short of its real growth projections. In November of 1974 we were told there would be a real growth of 4 per cent in the economy in 1975. It turned out to be barely zero. That 4 per cent loss represents $5.3 billion of a loss for the Canadian public, or $220 for every man, woman and child in this country. Last summer the Conference Board in Canada and the Bank of Montreal, for example, were confidently predicting that our growth this year would be 6.3 per cent. Already the government is conditioning us to less, stating it hopes we will reach 5 per cent this year. In this context our motion today deals with five deficiencies in the administration's approach to the economy.

First, its economic policies have been contradictory. I cite three examples. While we have been subjected to the wage and price control program designed to contain inflation, the administration has followed a counter productive fiscal and monetary approach.

The present administration preaches restraint, yet its own spending will increase this year by 20 per cent when main estimates are compared with main estimates annually. The money supply increased by 16.5 per cent in the 12 months ended January 1976, and the Minister of Finance now tells us it will be difficult to hold this year's increase to 13 per cent. The minister's approach seems to be to anticipate inflation and thus adjust the money supply to accommodate it rather then to contain inflation. With such an approach how could any control program work effectively?

Again, while the Foreign Investment Review Agency attempts to regulate foreign investment, we have found out that more than $4 billion in foreign capital was encouraged to enter the country in 1975 to finance our trade deficit. This capital was attracted by Canadian high interest rates and as a result of a change in the government's attitude to such borrowing. While debt is preferable to equity, the extent of Canada's obligations to foreign lenders is alarming. On this point governor Bouey of the Bank of Canada stated in the bank's annual report that such borrowing "could at some point prejudice a healthy expansion of the Canadian economy".

Not only do these borrowings run contrary to the spirit of the foreign investment review legislation, but we find that these heavy borrowings abroad have driven the Canadian dollar above parity with the U.S. dollar. If the exchange rate remains at this level serious damage could be done to our economy through the overpricing of our exports and the underpricing of our imports. With a trade deficit of $5 billion it is time the administration stopped aggravating the situation.

Second, in our motion today we deal with the administration's failure to ensure meaningful employment growth. This is especially so in the manufacturing field. On average there were 65,000 less jobs in goods-producing industries in 1975 than in 1974. This decline came about because of a massive 73,000 jobs lost in manufacturing industries over the same period. On a 1974 to December 1975 basis there were 99,000 fewer jobs in manufacturing. The 1,905,000 employed in manufacturing industries in December, 1975, means there has been lower employment than in any month since March, 1973, and the year average employment has not been lower than this level since 1972.

Industrial production in Canada is the third disappointment. Canada's performance in industrial production is significantly worse than in most other industrialized nations. In a comparitive table found at page 67 in the March 19 issue of the Economist, Canada is listed with a sad 6 per cent decline in production last year, the worst record of the ten industrialized nations shown. More than that, our record was even worse than the record of the beleaguered United Kingdom which had a 2.5 per cent decline, and much worse than the United States increase of 4 per cent and Germany's jump of 5 per cent in the same period.

Our fourth point is that investment has been weak over the past several years, reducing Canada's employment generation capabilities and productivity. Investment capital has been difficult to raise, in part because of federal government actions in the area of the capital gains tax and the federal cash requirement of over $11 billion between 1975 and 1976, but it is mainly due to the government's inaction in not giving direction and leadership to the country.

As a result of such indecision, investment as a per cent of the gross national expenditure is now lower than in 1966. This confusion in government was highlighted last night when officials from Dome Petroleum told us of their nine year delay in receiving approval to start drilling for oil in the Beaufort sea, an area they were encouraged to develop almost a decade ago. This case is unfortunately typical of government frustration of business. Can we be surprised if many businessmen choose to go elsewhere than remain in Canada? The government should streamline its decision-making process.

In the case of Dome Petroleum, in spite of the fact that over $150 million of invested funds is at stake, that company has been required to deal with three ministers of the environment, each one requiring himself an education as to what the project is all about.

I would suggest that the administration should also review the effectiveness of the capital gains tax which the government is not even willing to estimate so far as its revenue production is concerned. Dealing with that I think it is important to note that an unofficial estimate of the total revenue in the last full year with respect to the total capital gains tax was only $70 million. Think of the red tape and the frustration to which the business community is being subjected for that type of revenue, for $70 million.

I believe the government should also consider measures to encourage the private sector to raise capital domestically. Employee stock ownership plans may be part of the answer. The administration should review this approach, which is really a democratization of our capital ownership system. It could well be that our income tax system should be changed to facilitate the development of such plans.

● (1530)

The government must take steps to reduce its impact on our capital markets. Speaking on this subject, Andrew G. Kniewasser, president of the Investment Dealers' Association of Canada, said this month in Guelph, and I quote:

> Last year, savings were channelled through our capital market in the following ways—debt financing for governments $13.8 billion, debt financing for corporations $4.3 billion, preferred equity with call features $300 million, new permanent capital (equity) $700 million.
> In other words, of the $19.1 billion of savings flowing into the Canadian capital market last year, governments absorbed 72 per cent, leaving 28 per cent for the private sector. The pattern of financing is remarkably unbalanced in that debt financing accounted for 96 per cent leaving only 4 per cent available for permanent capital to launch new businesses or to strengthen the financial base of existing firms.

Obviously governments should take less, and less should be channelled off in the form of bonds and debentures. New incentives should be offered to equity financing and existing disincentives removed.

The impact of the federal invasion of our capital markets is reflected by the staggering interest cost now carried by all Canadians. In 1977 it is estimated that this cost will be $4.7 billion, or $202 for every man, woman and child. The cost has jumped in the past two years more than the entire interest cost on federal debt when the Prime Minister first assumed his post. At that time the cost was $1.3 billion, a $63 load for every Canadian. As we just stand still, the cost of debt for previous spending sprees at the federal level is now 50 per cent of the total federal budget 10 years ago.

But what is $4.7 billion? None of us really can comprehend such a sum. I am reminded of a story which I believe appeared in Reader's Digest in which a man with $1 million gave his wife the money and told her to spend $1,000 per day. He found her back on his doorstep in less than three years. It was then pointed out that, if he gave her $1 billion, she would not be back for almost 3,000 years.

Mr. McCleave: That's what he had in mind.

Mr. Stevens: The fifth point in our motion deals with the serious decline in our position in international markets. We are fundamentally lacking in price competition in the manufacturing sector. In 1968 our merchandise trade had a surplus of $1.2 billion. Last year we were $1.7 billion in deficit. Most alarmingly, our manufactured goods were $6.5 billion in deficit compared with $900 million in 1968. In 1975 it was mainly our primary products which helped minimize our manufacturing deficit.

Wage inflation has undoubtedly played a key role in the deterioration of our manufacturing export trade. Canadian earnings as a percentage of the United States were 79 per cent in 1968 when the present administration took power. The percentage rose to 95 per cent in 1973, and last year it went over the American level and now stands at 105 per cent, based on last year's figures.

With this background, as I have outlined, it is discouraging that the response of the government is one of justification, not one of rectifying the problems. Worse still, judging from the utterances of the leader of the Liberal Party, it is we who should conform to a lagging economy, not that the economy should be made more vibrant and prosperous to serve the people better. We Canadians are being conditioned to accept a standard of living less than our capability. It is a subtle conditioning, but it is there.

With no real growth in the economy, a per capita income now eighth in the world compared with second six years ago, and with the highest combined inflation and unemployment levels since Confederation, those in power would like to talk of other things. The new approach is: if you cannot reach your goals, then change your goals.

We are now told there is a limit to growth in Canada. The Prime Minister's control program is designed to whip us into line. Our Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) advises that we should use more powdered milk, for example, to offset the rising price of the fresh stuff. Our Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) adds that we are eating too much meat and should shift to cheaper spaghetti and macaroni. Our expectations are said to be too high, and our natural resources are now found to be finite.

But to live is to grow, and as we lower our expectations so will we lower our achievements. Certain resources may be finite, but man's ingenuity is infinite. Canada, with its relatively small population and vast area, is unique in the world. We have the potential to be the wealthiest people on earth if we allow our resources to be harnessed through individual initiative.

To prosper, a nation needs fresh water, food, resources, energy and an educated population. We have them all. Canada has more lakes than the rest of the world combined, and about one third of the world's fresh water supply. In relation to our population we have more arable farm land, natural resources, and energy reserves than any other country. We certainly have a highly talented people. So why have we slipped? In my opinion we have slipped as we have subjected ourselves to undue bureaucratic control. Our growth in employment has been more in the unproductive sectors of the economy than the productive.

Most bureaucrats are quick to regulate, but slow to innovate. Left to government, our oilfields, our gas reserves and our potash industry would never have been developed to their present levels. Yet governments, in the name of progress, now stifle further advances through heavy taxation and regulation, and there are even plans to nationalize certain of our industries.

The greatest thing government could do is to stop expanding and to be explicit as to the future for those who wish to innovate and create. The people of Canada can create a vibrant economy once again, but government cannot do it for them. Such an economy would create jobs for Canadians in productive sectors. What a relief that approach would be compared with the present drift. But the worst may be yet to come.

Recently I was shown a paper which is now being reviewed by the Liberal caucus. It contemplates the substitution of a new, and I quote, "gross social product" index for the present gross national product figures. In future it is suggested that we calculate the contribution of the unemployed in our society, not just the employed. When we visit our neighbour it is suggested that that should be recorded in the new scale as a contribution to Canada. And of course, when we take a holiday, that in turn should be duly recorded as a plus for the nation. It is strange what some academic, bureaucratic and so-called liberal minds will turn to. It is even stranger that they are paid for their efforts out of our taxes. Canada was not built with such thinking, nor will such thinking help in the building of our future.

The nation has now reached a crossroads where we must decide between a more competitive, more open society or accept, perhaps irrevocably, a society in which the large decisions about our economic and personal welfare are made by a central government.

The past demonstrates that a system of free enterprise, despite its many flaws, is the most compatible with the protection of rights and liberties, as well as the most productive of material goods. Equally so, recent history shows that government, despite its splendid intentions, is incapable of matching the vitality, the wisdom, and the ingenuity of free men. Let us hope the present administration learns this simple truth soon. If it does confidence will return and we will have significantly less inflation and unemployment, with a higher real growth for all to share.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo-Cambridge): Mr. Speaker, I am glad we are not having a vote on this particular motion. While I agree with the content of the motion to the effect that the government does not know what it is doing, etc., the remarks I have just heard do not persuade me that the alternative is any better.

I think I have heard that speech before. It seems to me it was given in the late sixties or early seventies when the Liberal rump sat on this side of the House. This is the sort of criticism the Conservatives were making of the then government whose dollar had gone away up, a government that was in the grip of a high interest rate policy from the Bank of Canada, and was following a contradictory policy in that the monetary expansion was coupled with an easy fiscal policy. "Everything changes and yet nothing changes."

The subject matter of the motion is a very important and serious one, however, and should command our attention. This party has been formally committed to the idea of planning. I wish I had the same kind of faith that the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) has in the free enterprise system and its ability to do all the right things to get our economy going.

We do not very often get examples of the problems with the free enterprise system because newspapers and critics generally, certainly the financial writers, love to point out that the waste that takes place in our society is almost entirely government waste. Their annual horror story is the Auditor General's report. More copy comes out of that when writers point out with glee all the errors committed by the government.

It is not very often that we read about the things that happen in the private sector and learn how costly they can be. Recently, however, there has been quite a spate of stories about the kind of waste that takes place in the private sector, and about what happens when you have the kind of economy where people are allowed to pursue their own ends. If, as Adam Smith thought, the pursuit of those ends leads to some kind of intelligence and while the methods might not be desirable the objectives might be worth while, one would have some sympathy. But you find that people who are engaged in building shopping centres, for instance, are sighing with relief because money has dried up. They have had to build and yet have so many empty spaces in their shopping centres that it is hard for them to stay alive.

A headline in the Globe and Mail of March 19 reads: "Industrial leasing vacancies greatly exceed demand". All kinds of facilities have been built that are not being used, and all kinds of capital has been put into these things and it has now gone down the drain. Of course we will use them in the future. As the country grows I am sure these facilities will be required. In the meantime, and while the hon. member for York-Simcoe is complaining about the great inrush of capital and the resultant high interest rates that need to be maintained in order to get this capital, it is being wasted.

Another horror story appeared in the Toronto Star of March 23 relating to empty hotels. Under the heading "Empty hotels: a look at the biggest losers", the article says that in the city of Toronto in recent years three major hotels have been completed—Plaza II, The Prince, and Harbour Castle. The Harbour Castle is described thus, "Is the site a plus or a minus?", The Prince "The trial balloon didn't soar", and the Plaza II as "The hotel that hardly anyone knows about".

I do not have the exact figures on the other hotels but apparently The Prince cost $23 million. The city of Toronto does not need the hotels. The occupancy rate is something like 20 per cent or 30 per cent in these new hotels. Those are just a few reports that have appeared in the newspapers. Here we are talking about $50 million or $60 million when we cannot get enough money for housing, enough money for the manufacturing industries if we require to expand them, yet we are putting up these kinds of hotels.

I should like someone to explain how the private sector with all that comes to it through investors, is increasing the productivity of this country, or how putting up hotels that stand with empty rooms is increasing productivity. You might call it private waste and say it is their money and they can spend it as they will, but today it is everybody's money, Mr. Speaker, to the extent that when one group of people in our society use capital they are taking it away from some other use; to the extent it is important to the country when it has an effect on the exchange rate. These people are not islands, and what they do affects others.

If waste takes place it is not just the individuals involved who suffer or lose on their investments. Governments are deprived of revenue, and very often a loss of one commercial enterprise is written off against the profits of another. In fact the taxpayer becomes a partner to these losses and waste just as surely as he is to some of the things the Auditor General discusses in his reports. Waste is waste, Mr. Speaker, and it is one of the problems we run into today. I do not see how any modern society can proceed on the basis that the individual entrepreneur can handle the situation if he is left alone.

In the case of the Beaufort Sea the hon. member for York-Simcoe deplores the fact that environmentalists are entering the picture. But, Mr. Speaker, we have to take the environmentalists into account; they have to be heard. People are entitled to make representations. I should like to see these things expedited, but there was a time when we used to do things the way they were done in regard to the pipeline—a minister made up his mind, rammed legislation through parliament, and did not care about the consequences for the economy or the people affected by it. We know a little better today; it takes a little more time to get things done.

When it comes to the question of planning in the field of energy, private enterprise has demonstrated how totally bankrupt it is to meet the needs of the country. Then we talk about over investment. One of the reasons that interest rates are so high and ruinous to small businessmen is that we are talking about billions of dollars needed to provide energy in the future. This is a fine argument—we are running out of energy, and therefore the industry needs more profit in order to provide energy in the future.

A few years ago we were being told that we would never have to worry about energy supplies in our lifetime; we had so much that it was a sin to keep it in Canada. The total effort of people in the energy industry was directed toward persuading the government to allow them to increase their exports of gas and oil. They said we had so much energy to spare that it was an embarrassment to us. The government bought the idea. We exported fuel we ought not to have exported. We permitted overdevelopment in the industry. That should not have happened.

Let me remind the House of what happened in the early days of oil development and why we exported vast quantities of our oil. It was not enough that oil had been discovered in western Canada. We were not satisfied with letting one or two companies rationally service the Canadian economy. No, that was not good enough. People thought money could be made, and they rushed into the industry. The result was tremendous over capitalization in the oil industry, particularly in Alberta. The government of Alberta was forced to prorate production; at one time it prorated production at 35 per cent of well capacity, to restrict the amount of oil an individual operator could take out. You can see what caused the tremendous pressure for exports.

People had invested huge sums in our oil and gas industries. They had over invested. The capital was sitting there, not bringing the return people thought it should bring. They wanted to sell our oil and gas as quickly as possible, just to recover the excessive capital which should never have been invested in the industry in the first place. It was over developed.

To hear people talk, you would think this country suffers from a shortage of capital. This country does not suffer from a shortage of capital. In this country there is not enough rational use of capital. From that we suffer. The people of this country are known to save more money than the citizens of any other country, except Japan. We have a reputation as savers of money. Surely we cannot carry on in future as we carried on in the past. If, in future, our people are allowed to invest huge sums of money in any industry haphazardly, without heeding the needs of other sectors of society, our goals will not be reached. There just is not enough money in the world for doing what we want if we take that kind of haphazard approach to energy development.

Energy is being developed in this country. At the moment Quebec is embarked on a multi-billion dollar hydroelectric project in northern Quebec. Manitoba has embarked on a somewhat smaller hydroelectric development. One hears talk of pipelines being built for oil and gas. Every time you turn round pipeline costs increase by millions of dollars. If we are spending all this money in these areas, how then can we expect to find enough capital to meet all our other requirements? We need to plan for the future. At present there is no such planning.

Let me show hon. members how capital is wasted in this country. This country is not short of capital. It misuses capital most criminally. If we are to meet future needs we shall require the government to plan the use of capital. Why do I say that? Some years ago we began a government enterprise known as Trans-Canada Air Lines. The government went into the air transport business because private entrepreneurs felt it was too risky, or would bring small returns. That government airline grew until it became Air Canada, one of the finest airlines in the world.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Saltsman: That was too much for the government. Here was a government enterprise operating successfully. It was more than the federal government of the day could stand. It looked for some way to correct the situation, for some way of killing the airline. Well, a previous Conservative government found a way of killing it. It allowed a competitor to compete with Air Canada, the government-owned airline which was doing a fine job, returning money on investment and providing suitable service across this country. A competitor was allowed. What was the result? Air Canada did not make as much money. Aircraft were used inefficiently. Now, both Air Canada and CP Air have an overcapacity of seats.

The situation has degenerated; now CP Air magnanimously says, "We do not mind embarking on joint efforts with Air Canada so that we can rationalize our purchasing, flights, and use of capital." But capital was used rationally when only Air Canada was the large operator in Canada. Introducing a competitor in the air served no useful purpose. Probably in the end we shall need to take over both airlines and operate them as one airline.

We did much the same with our railroads. One railroad was not good enough. We needed two, one to compete with the other, in order to preserve the myth that one is privately, the other publicly owned. The publicly owned railroad has to bear the costs of passenger service, whereas the CPR is not under that obligation to the same extent. It is free to carry more profitable cargoes. The CNR, being saddled with higher costs, is forced to apply for government loans. The CPR, which does not carry as many passengers, is said to be more profitable. People should remember that.

[Mr. Saltsman.]

The point is that Canada is a large country, and transportation is important in holding it together. That has always been true. Therefore why do we need competition in our modes of transport? Or why should one mode be forced to compete with another? Why do we need two airlines, one competing with the other? When we disembarked from one mode, say at a station, why must we travel to another part of town to embark on another mode? Arrangements of this kind destroy confidence in the utility of transportation.

People talk of our great capital requirements in the future. We do not want to import large quantities of capital. Surely, therefore, we ought to co-ordinate our transport systems, to make sure that one system does not duplicate the efforts of another. We do not need two modes of transport doing the same thing, carrying the same goods. These things ought to be done by co-ordination and co-operation, not by competition. Really, competition in transportation brings few benefits.

I know that businessmen like to think that competition in transport is good. Some of them think that any government-run operation is not worth a damn; therefore when they travel by private carrier they please their ego, their own philosophy. Such attitudes are not based on fact. Some businessmen insist on travelling by private carrier. But the majority of our people are quite satisfied with Air Canada service. The vast majority must pay the shot so that a few in this country can choose to satisfy their vanity or ideology. That is madness.

The United States has concluded that competition between similar modes of transport is not beneficial. It was harder for the people of that country to reach that conclusion. Now they know that, no matter if people travel by train or air, the transport system must be planned rationally. They are moving in the direction of the planned transport system and away from the private enterprise pattern advocated by the hon. member for York-Simcoe.

I do not disagree with much that the hon. member said. In many areas of society private enterprise can perform a most valuable service. In many areas of society private enterprise is useful and should be encouraged. My argument does not constitute a blanket condemnation of the private sector. I say to the hon. member for York-Simcoe that we shall not meet the challenge of the future if we permit the anarchy of the market place. Many things benefit from competition, but many things are destroyed by competition. That is the kind of choice we have to make. I was hoping that in his well prepared and sincerely delivered address he would have shown a recognition of that fact, that what we need today is planning.

Planning does not mean that you do every little thing in the economy, that you plan everything to the last detail. The mind of man and the computers at his disposal are not of such accuracy that all these things can, should or need to be done. One of the jobs of planning is to know which things are important and of such magnitude to the economy that they should be part of government and public responsibility, and which things can be safely and more efficiently left to competition in the market place. That is the first job of planning, to say which things are which,

and not to undertake everything. You can then get the benefits of both systems. You can have competition where competition has some merit and provides some benefits, but you also get the benefit of planning public ownership and coordination, where that is obviously the way in which we have to go.

I guess I should have not been surprised. I should have anticipated that my colleagues on my right feel that our tax system has been too onerous for businessmen, that we should get rid of the capital gains tax and that the whole Carter report was a mistake, even as little of it as the government implemented. In fact it was most unkind of the hon. member for York-Simcoe to degrade the government over its lack of response to businessmen. I cannot think of any government that has been more generous to businessmen or has given more away than this government in the last number of years.

Because it said we had to make our business in Canada more competitive, the government brought in two main tax measures. It reduced the corporation tax to one of the lowest in the western world. It gave valuable concessions in the way of depletion and depreciation allowances. Those were very, very generous concessions. When successive ministers of finance answered why they were giving these great benefits to business in Canada, they said it was in order to be competitive, to provide jobs, to provide the investment and capital that are needed to create employment.

We have now gone through two or three years of this corporate bum era. Where is the great prosperity that was promised this country as a result of these tax concessions to business? Where is the employment the government said would be created if we would only let business hang on to its profits, and be generous with depreciation allowances? Where is it? We do not have the employment and we do not have the investment. It is not that they have not made the money, it is that they have not used the money.

We argued that if you want to stimulate the economy you should give the money to the people who want to buy things and let business respond to that, instead of giving the money or concessions to business. There are times when in fact concessions to business may be valuable, but not in the period of time we have gone through when most businesses have idle plant capacity. The idle plant capacity in Canada is something around 20 per cent. There is hardly a factory in this country that could not increase its production by 20 per cent if there were the demand or market for its products. That demand or market only comes from people making the purchases they want to make.

The government promised there would be a survey of the consequences of those tax concessions. It did a survey. It asked something like, "Would you like to have these concessions continued?" One would have expected unanimous agreement from the people involved saying "Of course, we want these continued", giving a story about how great the benefits have been from these tax concessions. Instead, the results of the survey that came back were unfavourable. Of 1,014 companies surveyed, only 67 bothered to respond. A follow-up survey indicated the companies which failed to respond had a zero impact on their operations as a result of these tax measures.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I regret I have to interrupt the hon. member, but the time allotted to him has expired. He may only continue with consent. Does the House agree that the hon. member may continue his remarks?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Saltsman: Mr. Speaker, I will not take up too much time of the House. I know there are other members who wish to speak. I will conclude my remarks by summing up the point I was trying to make.

I agree with what the hon. member for York-Simcoe said about the chaotic state of our economy, the absence of planning, and how everything is going off in different directions. However, I also disagree with the hon. member. I call upon this House to recognize that we cannot go back to the kind of situation that got us into the present mess.

The fault of the government is that it has in fact listened to the kind of advice that the hon. member for York-Simcoe has been giving, namely, "keep your cotton picking hands off the economy and leave it to those of us who know more about running it than you". That has been happening, and it has made a mess of things.

The government has interfered in the economy to some extent. I do not think its efforts have been all that great. Ministers really do not have that much confidence in government interference. That is probably the reason why none of these things have worked. It is as though the government had a death wish about its own creature, not wanting it to work.

I do not think we can go back to the simple model of an eighteenth or nineteenth century economy. Our resources are much too scarce for that. The challenges facing the country are much too great. Therefore if the government is to be condemned, and I think it should be condemned, it is because it has been derelict in its duty, not using its brains to anticipate the problems, and not doing intelligent planning to make the best use of our resources.

● (1610)

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, again I have the great pleasure to intervene in this debate and congratulate the sponsor of this motion who denounces anew a reality that is unfortunately very obvious. In fact there are so obvious inconsistencies in government policies that we really wonder how such policies can be seriously established.

But, Mr. Speaker, when we study the matter in depth to find out for what actual motives or reasons this government formulates such policies we realize that those inconsistencies are created by the obstination of the government to maintain a totally inadequate system as a basis for those policies. So is it not surprising that we wish to fight inflation and that we accept higher unemployment as a consequence of this fight against inflation.

Of course, we do so without mentioning it as it would not be politically profitable. But facts are facts. We also accepted escalating prices developing into real inflation because a few years ago the problem had nothing to do with our production capacity or the quantity of products we could have at our disposal. The problem was rather the disposal of our products but, systematically, through inconsistent economic policies we artificially created inflation and it became a fact.

Recently the Bank of Canada anounced a rise in interest rates which, of course, will be reflected in all chartered banks in the country. Mr. Speaker, as I said earlier, production should be increased but we design a policy that will systematically prevent industry from producing; we notice the same inconsistencies in all areas because the government's economic experts never even dreamed of getting off the beaten track to find out why the system did not work. How is it that we have to face inflation every two or three decades? How did this come about? Is it because the country has less potential? Is it because Canada has run out of natural resources? No, I do not think that there is a single hon. member in the House who would question Canada's potential, its productive capability, the availability of its natural and human ressources which are plentiful.

In fact we have 800,000 unemployed persons. Are not those 800,000 jobless workers prepared to participate in the production which we require? No, they are not, because, once again, governmental measures are conflicting with one another. We import goods that we could manufacture here. My hon. friends opposite ought to check on their shirt collars if their garments were made in Japan, Korea or China. Mr. Speaker, is not Canada capable of producing clothes for Canadians?

An hon. Member: Where does your necktie come from?

Mr. Matte: Clearly this is contradictory. Instead of enquiring about the origin of my necktie, the hon. member opposite should address himself to my objection. How in this country larger than the United States with their 250 million people, how in a country larger than the whole of Europe but with only 24 million people, how can we have 800,000 unemployed? This is a scandal. A government that accepts such a situation dwells in contradiction.

Let us reform the system, let us produce neckties when we need them. It is as simple as that. And let us simply ask the questions that are pertinent: First, do we have what is needed to produce food? This evidently is the first question. The second question is: What do we need for clothing? The third question is: What do we need for housing. If we have the materials, the manpower, the know-how to compute, plan and coordinate the whole thing, it is stupid to say we have no money. No engineer will ever say that bridges are built with money. They are built with steel, with concrete, with cement, with stone. You build a bridge with all that and with labour, but not with money.

We therefore say that a system must face bankruptcy if it gives money some other value than the one it has or should have. Because we hold on to the same system, we are regularly confronted with the ups and downs of the vicious circle of inflation, unemployment, high interest rates.

Obviously the more you prevent industry from developing, the more unemployment there is. And the government go on floundering in this, simply because they will not consider changing the system.

Obviously when it is realized this does not work, why not try another way? I therefore feel the motion is up to the point, except maybe for the last suggestion "which have permitted a serious decline in our competitive position in international markets." I have some reservations about that, because we should stop explaining everything through world trends. Everytime there is a problem like inflation, for instance, the government say, it is is a world problem.

At this point, they say: why not do this or that? Oh, the international market, that must be closely watched. In other words, instead of saying: let us produce what we can produce, when that is impossible because we do not have what is necessary to produce, let us call in the international market, but only then. We should not believe those who say that everything must be based on the balance of trade, on international trade, and that we should be willing to sacrifice ourselves for others. To those who think that we should always watch that trade balance I would ask what that thing is made of.

Mr. Speaker, I would like them to answer the following question: why do Communist China and the USSR buy wheat from Canada? Because of the trade balance? It is because they need it; because they have not produced enough cereals in their own countries to feed their people. They do not buy our wheat just to please us. That is certainly not the reason. And why do Americans buy our pulp wood? Because they have newspapers with circulations in the millions, and they need paper to do that. That is all. They do not buy our paper to please us. And when one argues about inflation seen as a world phenomenon, we must protect our international balance of payments. That, we must protect. Let us buy butter from New Zealand while penalizing our own producers in Canada. What a lot of contradictions!

The member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) denounces these contradictions and he is right. But to find a remedy to these problems, which I understand, the government will have to change the system otherwise we will be facing the same problems. We know we can change it and our party leader (Mr. Caouette) has been saying so for 40 years. This reminds me that when I was a teacher—I was a teacher for 13 years—I learned that one had to repeat the same thing over and over but when a pupil still did not understand, we knew we were dealing with a "dummy". It seems that some people are so stupid they cannot understand such elementary things.

I suggest that the economic policy must be developed in such a way as to enable us to ask ourselves: What are the requirements of Canada? What is our physical capacity to meet these requirements? And the third point is self-evident: The problem only lies in financing. Well, we only have to vote the necessary supplementary estimates to meet this financing. It is as simple as that. But the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Trudeau) answers me that if we grant interest-free loans to foreign countries, there is no such thing as interest-free loans, and in order to make such loans to India, Ceylon, Bangladesh, we must make borrowings that bear interest.

Well, when a prime minister speaks in such a way without being ashamed of himself, I say he is "stuck" in his own contradictions, his own system. This is why he is being blamed today. It is true, I know, that there is nothing the government can do. Even my friends on my right could not do anything about it if they had the power, unless they recognized it is necessary to start right now reforming and restructing the economic system. Only then shall we logically fight against inflation, otherwise we will continue to flounder in contradictions, like those mentioned in the motion before us today.

[English]

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, in responding to the motion this afternoon I should like to address myself to a number of points; first to a view of recent Canadian economic performance and government policies which have been involved in that; second, to talk about Canada's competitive position; third, to pass under review some of the statements of the official opposition in the same time period that we have set out these various policies; and then, as a fourth element, to talk about the post-controls period and address some remarks in particular to the decision made by leaders of the Canadian Labour Congress yesterday not to participate in the very necessary role of planning that we would have to do for future policy change in the post-controls period.

First, with regard to the Canadian economic performance and government policy I would call, in response to the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens), on a number of economic authorities, private and public, Canadian and foreign, who have commented favourably on a comparative basis on the course of economic events in Canada in comparison with the situation in a world which has generally been in economic turmoil.

It has been demonstrated, beyond any shadow of doubt, by countless numbers of independent economic bodies, both at home and abroad—for example the OECD, the Howe Research Institute, the University of Toronto's Institute for Quantative Analysis, the Economic Council of Canada, and most recently in the annual report of the Governor of the Bank of Canada—that in recent years this country has out-performed virtually every other industrial nation in terms of employment, output, and capital investment.

Indeed the most outstanding fact that emerges from developments of the past few years is the extent to which Canada, despite its vulnerability as a major trading nation, has succeeded in maintaining relative economic stability at a time when the rest of the world was plunged into the worst recession of the post-war period.

As the Governor of the Bank of Canada has noted in his annual report for 1975, real gross national product in Canada during this period declined by only 1½ per cent during the course of the recession, a decline which compared to a fall of 5¼ per cent in West Germany and more than 6½ per cent in the United States.

The Governor also noted that:

> Canada and Japan were the only major industrial countries in which the over-all output of goods and services at the end of 1975 appeared to be as high as it was before the recession began.

I would refer the hon. member for York-Simcoe to the charts on pages 24 and 25 of the bank's annual report where he will find a graphic illustration of the extent to which Canada has out performed the United States in terms of maintaining output, employment, and business investment in recent years.

In its 12th annual report the Economic Council pointed out that few countries have escaped the adverse impact of inflation and unemployment in recent years. But as the council pointed out:

> The Canadian economy managed quite well under the circumstances, with better price and growth performance than most other industrial countries.

In its economic outlook last December the OECD forecast that the "path of recovery in Canada is likely to follow that of the United States, but by end-1976 the level of activity, in relation to the previous peak, may be higher for Canada than for other major OECD countries".

As I have had occasion to emphasize on other occasions, the fact that output, employment, and business investment held up better in Canada than in practically any other country, notwithstanding the seriously adverse effect on our economy of a sharp decline in critically important export sales as a result of deep and prolonged recession, is not something that just happened. To a very considerable extent it has been the result of a whole range of government policies and programs aimed at preventing the real personal income of Canadians from being seriously eroded by the impact of rising prices and unemployment. May I just say here I refer to the indexing and cuts in personal income taxes, sales tax cuts and tariff reductions, indexing and increases in old age security and guaranteed income supplements, family allowances, veterans pensions, subsidies on some basic foodstuffs and imported oil, and the automatic stabilizer provided through generous benefits provided under the Unemployment Insurance Act.

These measures were reinforced by changes in corporate taxation policies, and other measures which have been aimed at sustaining business investment and housing construction at a high level.

While I would concede there was virtually no growth in Canada's real GNP in 1975, that was the result almost entirely of the slump in export sales because of recession abroad, a development naturally over which we had little or no control. The impact of the policies initiated by the government to sustain the economy are apparent in the figures relating to final domestic demand here in Canada for goods and services which rose last year by 3.5 per cent.

As the central bank's annual report noted in comparing the Canadian and U.S. performance during 1975:

> The major difference between the two economies was the extent to which final domestic demand was sustained in Canada. Here, the volume of domestic spending on final goods and services continued to advance, whereas in the United States it fell by over 4 per cent.

Despite the slowdown in the economy brought on by recession abroad, the rise in unemployment in this country by comparison with most other nations has been relatively small even though in absolute terms, in the view of the government, it is still at an unacceptably high level.

I think it is important to emphasize at this point that, for reasons of the age and structure of our population, Canada has the fastest growing work force of all industrial nations. There are more young people coming to working age in this country than in any other industrialized country. Our relatively better performance on this front is due to the fact that employment has continued to grow relatively strongly despite the adverse circumstances confronting the economy. In February, for example, the number of Canadians with jobs was up by nearly 300,000 over the level a year ago, which is an increase of 3.2 per cent, somewhat above the long-term trend of growth we have experienced over the past decade.

Now, I should like to address just a few remarks to the question of Canada's international competitiveness. What about the allegation that our so-called contradictory policies have contributed to a decline in Canada's competitive position? I do not for a moment deny that our international competitive position was in danger of becoming seriously jeopardized. That, of course, is why the government moved last October to launch a major national anti-inflation program with the co-operation of the provinces, to bring under control the domestically generated cost-price spiral that threatened to undermine our competitive position at home and abroad.

The developing problem of a domestically generated cost-price spiral, which by last year was rapidly becoming the primary source of inflationary pressure in Canada, was in no small measure the result of the success of government policies and programs aimed at minimizing the impact on the Canadian economy and the Canadian people of inflation and recession abroad.

Had Canada followed the course of a number of other countries and allowed inflation and recession abroad to erode the real income of Canadians and their real power to purchase goods and services, we in this country would also have suffered a massive recession and a massive increase in unemployment. In those circumstances we undoubtedly would have experienced substantially less upward pressure on costs and prices. But we, for our part, were determined to search for a means which would enable us to bring prices and incomes in this country under control without the imposition of severe hardship on the Canadian people in terms of output, employment, and real incomes.

I hope that during the course of this debate the official opposition will let us know whether the Conservative party believes we should have resorted to severe recession as a means of preventing the build-up of domestic cost-push pressures. As the House is aware, we sought over a period of many months to develop a consensus among the major groups in our economy in support of voluntary restraint of prices and incomes. When that effort proved to no avail, we finally found ourselves with no choice but to impose mandatory restraints on the major groups in the economy in order to bring inflation under control without at the same time jeopardizing our prospects for the revival of healthy economic growth.

I should like to address myself now to one of the phrases in the motion of the hon. member in which he refers to "contradictory economic policies of the present administration." I should like to cite some of the policies he and his colleagues have advocated over the same period of time which I passed under review with regard to the economy to see where the contradiction lies.

[Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale).]

Where, for example, does the Conservative party stand on the broad thrust of fiscal and monetary policy? Does it believe it should be more expansionary, or more restrictive? Let us take a few random declarations by various Conservative spokesmen to see if we can how they approach this question.

First, almost exactly a year ago, on March 26, 1975, the hon. member for York-Simcoe, who moved the present motion, was quoted in the Toronto Star as complaining that the November, 1974, budget produced by my predecessor did not provide "sufficient stimulus to the economy and a new budget is needed—It's needed now more than ever". Then we find that the same member, speaking in the debate following the budget of June, 1975, a budget incidentally which did add to the net stimulus being injected into the economy, had completely reversed his position. He contended that major cuts should be made in government spending to reduce both the government's budget deficit and its cash deficit, the effect, of course, being to reduce rather than add to the stimulus of the government's economic policy.

On October 25, 1975, the Conservative financial critic was again quoted by the Toronto Star on the occasion of his entry into his party's leadership race, and at that time he warned that his fellow Conservatives would vote against the government's price and income restraint program unless it was accompanied by more monetary and fiscal restraint.

What is the position of the Conservative Party? Well, a new note of confusion was injected by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain (Mr. Hamilton), one of the intellectual leaders of the group on the other side and a privy councillor on the front benches, on December 19, 1975, when he warned that the economy was heading into recession and urged the government to adopt more expansionary policies. But on January 6, 1976, another front bencher, the hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies), the former financial critic, appeared to reverse the field when he indicated that he was in favour of more restrictive economic policies, particularly in his advocacy of a balanced federal budget.

On March 1, 1976, the hon. member for Rocky Mountain (Mr. Clark), now the leader of that party, was quoted in the Financial Times as demanding during the course of his own leadership campaign that the government must set a dramatic example of restraint by sharply reducing the rate of growth of the money supply and the growth of government spending.

On the basis of those remarks a reasonable man might reasonably conclude that the Conservative Party now believes, in contrast to the position—and the hon. member for York-Simcoe supports this—of the hon. member for York-Simcoe of a year ago, that the government should have adopted highly restrictive fiscal and monetary policies, reflected in a balanced budget and money supply growth trimmed to the long term growth potential of the economy of around 5 per cent. Were we today following such a policy prescription, the Canadian economy today would still be in the grips of a critically severe recession. Output would have fallen to catastrophic levels, unemployment would likely have risen to the double-digit level, the real incomes of Canadians would be very much lower than they are today, many more companies would now be in bankruptcy than has been the experience, and the profits of other Canadian firms generally would be very much lower, and business capital investment would be very much lower indeed.

Those are the certain and inevitable consequences of the fiscal and monetary policies—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order, please. Is the hon. member rising on a point of order?

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the minister would permit a question.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I would be delighted to do so, but since I have only 30 minutes I think I should be entitled to finish my speech and then entertain a question.

I would just remind the House that this policy prescription, which I consider a prescription for disaster, is directly contrary to the course that almost every other industrial nation has adopted over the course of the past several months, namely, that of expanding their fiscal and monetary policies in an effort to pull their economies out of the deep recession into which they plunged.

What of the Conservative position on the question of price and income restraint? I am sure it is not necessary to recount that story of conflict and contradiction at any length. But I might briefly recall the official opposition's advocacy of comprehensive wage and price controls early in 1973 at a time when they clearly would have been totally ineffective in holding back the tidal wave of inflation sweeping around the globe.

Indeed the election campaign waged by the Conservative party in favour of controls in 1974—and incidentally the restrictive monetary, fiscal and consumer credit policies also advocated by the Conservative leader—was at a time when the world was heading into a recession. Then we have the incredible admission in a speech to the Toronto Kiwanis Club on September 3, 1975, by the Conservative architect of controls, the hon. member for Don Valley, that the proposal had lost any validity it might have had when world oil prices were quadrupled, but the party refused to alter its position despite its obvious absurdity.

Finally, we had the spectacle of the official opposition having voted in this House for the bill on second reading and then voting against the third reading of the Anti-Inflation bill because it would have been in effect some months longer than originally proposed by the Conservative party during the 1974 election campaign.

I suggest that this motion condemning the government for failing to follow policies which enhance growth and stability, coming from a party which has urged the adoption of measures that would have had the certain consequence of plunging the economy into severe recession, and coming as it does from a party which has opposed the present national undertaking to restore Canada's competitive position, cannot have been made seriously by the hon. member.

They cannot have it both ways. They cannot stand in this House and on platforms across the country and advocate drastically restrictive fiscal and economic policies which would cripple output, employment, and real incomes in Canada, and at the same time argue with any credibility that the expansionary policies we have pursued have hampered the growth and stability of the Canadian economy. They cannot at one moment stand in this House and demand that the growth of the money supply be sharply curtailed, as is so often heard in this House, and at the next rise to deplore rising interest rates which are the inevitable consequence in the short term of efforts by the central bank to moderate the growth of the money supply. They cannot deplore the current level of unemployment and at the same time advocate restrictive economic policies that would drive it infinitely higher.

The final point I should like to make is with regard to the withdrawal of the Canadian Labour Congress from federal consultative bodies such as the Economic Council and the Canada Labour Relations Council. What this will mean is that the formal leadership of the Canadian labour movement will not participate in the discussion on policy making at the critical point when we are considering what policy changes are appropriate for the post-controls period.

The chairman of the CLC at the meeting 72 hours ago suggested that the labour movement looks forward to further consultations on the question of the post-controls period, and we would welcome further consultations. We suggest to him that he and his colleagues should reconsider the decision to withdraw from the federal consultative bodies, which would facilitate that kind of consultation on the changes to take place. Indeed we found it rather contradictory that just 24 hours after the chairman of the CLC had complained that labour was not being consulted sufficiently, or had complained that the consultations which were taking place were not occurring with the business community there, after those two expressed complaints made 300 feet away in the Railway Committee Room of this House, we found the council as a whole retiring from two important groups, the Economic Council of Canada and the Canada Labour Relations Council.

The French have a very wise maxim that "les absents ont toujours tort", those who are absent are always wrong. In discussions in the coming months leaders of organized labour risk putting themselves in a position of not being able to participate in these discussions and not being able to add their experience to these discussions. That is not to say that organized labour will be without representation in these discussions.

I myself and my colleagues who represent members of organized unions will have a full opportunity to participate, in our weekly contacts with our constituents, with the thousands of members of the labour movement with whom we meet on a regular basis. Indeed it is clear that the leadership of individual unions will be continuing to seek contact with the Government of Canada on these important questions. But I say—and I say it not in anger—that the country and the over-all membership of organized labour stand to benefit from the participation of their leaders, talented leaders in this field, in the kind of decisions that we as a country have to agree upon, and therefore it is important that we should have the opportunity again of being able to consult effectively with them. I hope they will reverse their decision.

I should like to say a final word with regard to the efforts of my colleague, the Minister of Labour (Mr. Munro), with regard to the Canada Labour Relations Council. He embarked on this endeavour of trying to bring together the two sides of the collective bargaining equation to attempt to reverse the trend which has existed in Canada of a great number of work days being lost in the last several years. There were close to 10 million work days lost in 1975 and a very serious record of work days lost in 1974. I think that anybody involved in these particular discussions would have to acknowledge that neither the working man himself, nor his family, nor those who live in his community and provide him with services, nor the industries for which he works, nor the economy of the country generally will benefit from a continuation in Canada of that kind of collective bargaining environment in which 10 million work days a year are lost. That is not only lost income to the individuals in question, it is a loss to the economy of the productive services of these many Canadians.

We are a well endowed country both in resources and in the talent of our people, but we cannot afford continuing to lose 10 million work days a year. This is too much for any economy to bear. Therefore measures have been taken by the minister of Labour to try to change the environment in which these discussions take place and try to change the structure of these discussions. This can only be for the benefit not just in the broader interest of Canada but of the working man himself, and it is for that reason, I hope, that we may again resume these discussions within the Canada Labour Relations Council.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. J. H. Horner (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, in rising to take part in this debate I must, first of all, comment on the remarks of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald). Basically I was disappointed by the hodge-podge of new and old statistics which he called to his use in defense of the mismanagement of the Canadian economy which we have witnessed in the past year and a half or two years.

I was surprised by his remarks, toward the end of his speech, regarding the collective bargaining process. Perhaps one could gather from these remarks that some time in the future we will be seeing substantial changes in the collective bargaining process in Canada. Were I a union leader or one deeply involved in the trade union movement, I would be very concerned and I would want to know a great deal more about the government's intentions in that regard because the action which the government takes can either lead to further disharmony within our labour force or, perhaps, bring about greater harmony. But certainly if this misunderstanding continues for very long it is apt to lead to a worsening situation rather than an improvement. If we lost 10 million labour days last year, we may well have more days lost in the months ahead, particularly if the impasse continues much longer.

The motion before the House deals with the contradictory economic policies of the government. The minister dealt lightly with that in attempting to embarrass the Conservative party. He asked how one could have low interest rates if there was a tight money policy. That has been the complaint on this side of the House. We have had high interest rates and a high rate of growth of the money supply, and we have not benefited. If we are going to have a high rate of growth of the money supply, then the country should benefit from low interest rates. But the government has chosen the deliberate policy of having high interest rates, not because of any curtailment of the money supply, and that is the error in the minister's remarks and in the contradictory figures which he used.

Mr. Saltsman: It is not an easy thing to do.

Mr. Horner: It is the deliberate policy of the Bank of Canada to have high interest rates. The hon. member from the NDP made a speech and you would think his party was the mother of planning. If you took the word "planning" out of his speech, not much would be left in it. I am not much of a capitalist but I believe that anyone who has tried hard to earn capital does a little planning about how to spend it.

I look at some of the failures in the government's planning—and here one does not have to look only at Canada, one can take a look at Great Britain where the master planner of all master planners threw his hands up in the air and said "I am quitting". He has left the scene of action completely. We could take a look at some of the socialist provinces in Canada to see how their planning has got them out of trouble, but I do not think that we in this House have to go that far.

We have a master planner in the Department of Transport. Formerly he was in charge of the Wheat Board and he brought in a planning program called operation LIFT, which cost the prairie farmers around $600 million. That was his master planning. We have also seen master planning in CEMA to cut back production in Ontario to 62 per cent of capacity. I suppose that overproduction would be wasteful in the eyes of the minister. We have seen master planning in the dairy industry, and we have seen excessive build ups of wrong products. No, planning alone is not the answer.

● (1650)

In order to control inflation we must recognize the fact that we must increase productivity, manage our money supply with a great deal of care, and cut back on wasteful government expenditures. The Minister of Finance talked about people in the Conservative Party wanting the government to cut back on government expenditures. We want the government to cut back on wasteful, unnecessary and excessive government expenditures.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Horner: That will not in any way greatly harm economic conditions within Canada, but it will lower the debt load, lower the demand upon the capital market by government, and allow private enterprise to use more of the money which should be available to it to do the things which will provide more and more jobs for Canadians. Last year our country had to bring in something like $4 billion. This year it is estimated that government borrowings will cause an input of foreign capital into Canada at the rate of $5 billion, and this has the tendency to keep our dollar above par with the United States. Many may think that is a good thing, but it is very detrimental to the possibility of our trading in manufactured goods, and this is what this motion deals with today.

The Financial Post of March 13 clearly spelled out big deficits, calling for retooling of trade policies. It pointed out that Canada's slump on the manufacturing trade front is getting worse. Canada ran up an $8.2 billion deficit last year, $1 billion worse than the year before. The article goes on to describe the difficult position in which Canada finds itself. How will we get out of that difficult position? Rather than the dollar increasing in value in relation to the American dollar, it should be decreasing. That might increase the cost of foreign goods, but it would allow our Canadian manufactured goods to search out and find markets which are available.

The Minister of Finance blamed the slump in our trade picture on world economic conditions. World economic conditions are not as bad as he suggested they might be. In fact the economies of Europe and the United States are improving at a much more rapid rate than that of Canada right now, and yet our trade picture, particularly with regard to manufactured goods, is not at all encouraging.

On the question of contradictory economic policies, the government has come out with high interest rates, a high growth money supply, and a high growth in government spending. On his famous telecast the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) suggested that the government is going to cut back on the growth of government spending. It will be limited this next year to 15.2 per cent. Government spending contradicts other policies and encourages inflation.

The government has come along with a poor application of what I call wage and price controls. It is a poor application because these controls do not freeze food prices, the cost of housing, the cost of energy, the cost of transportation, the cost of money, or the cost of imported goods. These are the six major commodities which fall within what we might call the desires of the average consumer in purchasing and carrying on a business or livelihood within this country. The cost of living for the average person may well continue to rise because of the things the government is doing and the things the government is not doing.

We certainly will have a freeze on wages, and it does not take a financial genius to realize that somewhere down the road, perhaps in the middle of 1976, the ordinary, average worker, whether unionized or not, will find that he cannot keep pace with the cost of living, and he will find himself financially worse off than he was the year before.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Horner: There are steps the government could be taking. There could be a cutting down on federal and provincial government borrowings outside Canada. I think borrowing outside Canada is only being done because to some extent interest rates are too high in Canada, and it is less expensive to borrow outside Canada. Foreign countries are prepared to invest in Canada because of our high interest rates, which are artificially held so high because of the action of the Governor of the Bank of Canada.

I think we must also concern ourselves with our energy picture and our energy needs. What has the government done to encourage further development of our energy resources? We are now a net importer of oil. We are still exporting something in the neighbourhood of 500,000 barrels per day, but we import about 700,000 barrels per day. We are a net importer, but the sale of that oil still does help our balance of payments and our trade picture.

The minister stated how well Canada's trade picture compares with other countries. Our trade picture did as well as it did in the last year purely because we were able to export our raw materials, our agricultural products, oil, gas, minerals and lumber. If we had not had a market for raw materials we would have been in a severe economic recession. We were able to export those raw materials through no good policies of the government. In fact many of the policies of the government made it even more difficult for those products to be exported.

What we need is for the government to create a climate where business can operate with some degree of confidence that conditions will remain the same for the next year, the next six months, or even the next three months. There has not been that degree of confidence in the government in the past couple of years. Business has become edgy, hesitant, and worried about investments.

The minister brought in an anti-inflation program under which he was going to freeze dividends, and then the next week he took that freeze off dividends. He brought in a tax on export profits, and then somehow or another that was negotiated away. Business does not know where it stands. Canadians are taking their savings out of Canada and investing them in the United States. That is not a healthy thing to see. They are forced to do that because they have no confidence in what the government is planning economically for the country.

It is the duty of the government to create a healthy economic climate. This climate cannot be created if economic policies are contradictory. A climate of growth and stability cannot be created when governments are changing their minds every other day.

The Minister of Finance quoted out of context some of the suggestions made by the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens). He only has to look at his own cabinet ranks to see the difficulties in which the Canadian business world finds itself. There have been changing and contradictory policies over the past two years with regard to the whole question of energy and energy development. There have been contradictory policies with regard to investment within Canada, and the situation became so bad that the former minister of finance had to resign and leave the government completely. That must have shaken the business community—to have the minister of finance leave the government without saying why, without fully disclosing the differences of opinion he was having with the cabinet.

Since that time another minister has resigned, and there is one who should have resigned. These conditions do not create a climate of confidence or contribute to the growth and stability of the Canadian economy.

Yesterday a great confrontation took place between organized labour and the government. This does not create confidence and stability within the union movement, nor even on the management side. Management sees greater unrest in that confrontation. In the summer of 1976 labour will try to exert itself to break down the impasse government has placed upon the old well worn collective bargaining system.

This motion is timely because the government must make a clear and sharp appraisal of its actions and do something about them. We as a parliament must encourage Canadians to produce more and perhaps to consume less—to save more and invest more in Canada. The attitude of the government in not saying when the wage and price controls or economic controls will be removed, although we are now led to believe they will be removed sooner than the three years first mentioned and we hope this will be the case—this attitude must be improved upon. Controls have never been envisioned as an economic instrument; they are a psychological tool—in fact they are inflationary in themselves. They encourage Canadians not to reinvest in their own industrial plants, and they discourage Canadians from producing more. All they have done is increase the size of the government as we have seen in regard to the Anti-Inflation Board.

Another subject I should like to touch upon is our trade with our major trading partner, the United States. Something like two thirds of our exports go there, and something like one job out of every two in our industry is concerned with the export of goods to that country. In order to improve our economic climate and our competitive position in international markets the government would do well to improve its relations with the major trading nation to the south. It worries me greatly to see the erosion and breakdown of what was once considered a good neighbour policy—to see it becoming what might be considered a poor neighbour policy.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Horner: If that were improved I am certain it would help us reach a competitive position with other trading nations.

Mr. Alan Martin (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity this afternoon to speak on the motion put forward by the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) in which he deplores what he refers to as the "contradictory economic policies" practised by the government; in which he further complains of the so-called failure to "enhance the growth and stability of Canadian employment and industrial production" and, presumably in order to complete his all encompassing and one shot sweep of the horizon, he talks of a failure to encourage investment in industry. He wraps the entire effort in a backward sweep in which he condemns the government for permitting "a serious decline in our competitive position in international markets".

The very nature of the motion is, I would suggest, somewhat indicative of the practice of the hon. member for York-Simcoe—if you throw enough stones in the general direction of the barn door, sooner or later you are likely to hit something. So far we have seen the stones flying through the air, but the barn door remains unscratched. Sometimes one must wonder whether he becomes confused about barn doors and aims his stones in more than one direction. Certainly I find it confusing to be aware of the 180 degree switch in his attitude from time to time on major factors relating to the economy. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) referred to some of these in his address earlier.

The hon. member speaks of contradictions. May I bring to his attention, and that of the House, his recent vote against the government's inflation policy through which the government was attempting to come to grips with the serious inflationary trends prevailing in the country last summer and last fall?

Over and over again I have heard the hon. member express concern about the seriousness of our economic problems—of a too large increase in the monetary expansion—in essence, showing his concern over the serious effects of high rates of inflation. Mr. Speaker, he cannot have it both ways; either he is in favour of containing the operation of the Canadian economy within reasonable bounds under which we can all survive, or he is not.

Mr. Epp: That is not logical.

Mr. Martin: I should like to quote the Governor of the Bank of Canada who in his statement, at the time of the recent rise in interest rates, was firmly committed to an increase in monetary expansion within moderate limits. It seems to me the hon. member for York-Simcoe was rather keen on this at one time. Frankly I do not know where he stands now, and I doubt if other hon. members are much wiser.

My point, Mr. Speaker, is simply this: an hon. member with the business and financial background of the hon. member for York-Simcoe should, in my view, be in a position where he can put forward positive and constructive views relating to the operation of the Canadian economy and the government's role in it—

An hon. Member: He did.

Mr. Martin: —rather than continuing on a negative and, to use his own terminology, contradictory course. Surely as chief financial critic of the official opposition this House and the Canadian public can expect more from him.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): You would not listen.

Mr. Martin: The hon. member complains of the failure—as he sees it—of the government to enhance the growth and stability of Canadian employment. But let us look at some of the facts. I wonder if the hon. member is aware of them.

In Canada the statistics for 1973 indicate that 7.2 million people were employed; in 1975 the figure stood at 8.6 million. It is true that unemployment is at a higher than desirable rate, but this is the case in the United States, and in a number of other industrialized countries as well. It is well known that the big swing came at the end of 1974 and the beginning of 1975. The increase since then, however, has generally tempered and it is anticipated that 1976 should show little or no increase—yet it will remain high. This is a problem with which the government is faced, as well as the governments of other industrialized nations.

Again, by comparison with our giant neighbour to the south, it is still expected—I am referring to the rate of unemployment—to continue at a somewhat lower rate in Canada than in the United States. Whereas at the end of February the unemployment rate in that country stood at 8.3 per cent, Canada's rate of unemployment is not anticipated to exceed 7.5 per cent in the current year. So much for stability of employment in this country vis-à-vis other industrial areas at the present time.

As for industrial production to which the hon. member also made reference, I wonder if he is aware of the predictions by experts in the private sector that the real increase in the Gross National Product will be in the range of 5½ per cent. This compares with some 6 per cent being predicted in the United States; and experts for a long time had said that the recession in that country bottomed out long before it bottomed out in Canada.

While I am on this topic I suggest that it must be acknowledged that productivity in this country is still a real problem. Yet here again there is a clear indication that a low point has probably been reached, and improvement may be anticipated in this area in 1976.

The hon. member in his motion speaks of what he calls the failure of the government to encourage investment in industry. Is he aware—

Mr. Whiteway: The hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) knows what he talks about.

Mr. Martin: Are hon. members opposite aware of the various tax incentives provided both federally and provincially to stimulate investment in new plants? Is the hon. member familiar with federal and provincial incentives to support and stimulate various industries establishing in the less well developed areas of the country? Is he familiar with the direct investment the government has made to prop up the teetering project known as Syncrude, in order that this vital undertaking may proceed? That it shall proceed is in the interest of the many industries associated with the project, and of the Canadian public in general.

Is the hon. member familiar with the incorporation of Petro-Canada, a corporation which alone will stimulate much new, essential investment by the private sector in various industries associated with the exploration for and development of new oil and gas resources? Does this constitute a failure to encourage investment?

As the hon. member well knows, stimulation of new industrial investment has been one of the cornerstones of the government's policies in the last 30 years and, undoubtedly, will so continue in the years ahead. Obviously one must do one's best to ensure that stimulation, when provided, is effective, both as to method and area of the economy selected for stimulation. The real problem in the immediate years ahead will be to find the tremendous sums of capital which industry will require. It will not be difficult, as the hon. member suggests, to stimulate investment. It will be difficult to find the capital which will be needed for investing. How right is the hon. member's thinking. Is he aware of just how much capital business in this nation needs? Does he know what the businessmen of this nation are saying? One wonders.

The hon. member wraps his argument in what I called a backward sweep. He condemned the government for permitting a serious decline in our competitive position in international markets. Let us consider some aspects of this comment.

First, as the hon. member well knows, governments neither allow nor do not allow serious declines in competitive positions on international markets. The hon. member knows well the factors affecting the ups and downs of international trade. I am surprised that one with his business acumen should suggest, that the swings, up and down, occur mainly in response to specific acts of a national government. Perhaps he is referring to current difficulties having to do with the auto pact agreement which was entered into by Canada and the United States.

Let us look at this situation. Yes, we experienced a $700 million trade deficit in our merchandise trade in 1975. The auto pact and trade in auto parts have had a great deal to do with this deficit. At present we are seeing, I suggest, a rationalization process in the United States designed to counteract, in part, substantial U.S. deficits which occurred under this agreement a few years ago. Yes, the swings are there. The point remains that the swings will remain, no matter what governments do. They are independent of specific government involvement.

Hon. members, including the hon. member for York-Simcoe, are familiar with the general decline in the rate of growth of industrial activity in most countries of the western world. Without doubt, high wage and salary settlements in Canada in the last few years have hurt us. The point to bear in mind is that all these are factors involved in the over-all operation of the economy. Certainly they do not arise from any specific government action. Actually, Mr. Speaker, because of the leadership shown by the government in introducing its anti-inflation policy, a policy which the hon. member for York-Simcoe does not support, Canada, generally, has come through this economic period in somewhat better shape than a number of other countries.

It is also predicted that our exports of raw materials and semi-processed goods will rise as the economies of other countries improve. In this regard we must consider both the value and the volume of exports. In my view we ought to be more concerned about the value of our exports, because a relatively small rise in volume in the export of certain valuable raw materials and semi-processed goods could significantly affect over-all values of exports.

The hon. member spoke of interest rates. As the Minister of Finance said, it is clear that the Bank of Canada acted as it did in recent days in order to keep the rate of monetary expansion within moderate limits. Surely this moderate increase in the money supply indicates an increase in economic activity in this country. There have been substantial increases in bank borrowings in the last several months. Borrowings are up about 15 per cent. Does the hon. member for York-Simcoe not agree that this clearly shows that our economy is fast being stimulated? The rise in rates is consistent with the professional opinion of the Governor of the Bank of Canada with regard to future trends. He, unlike the hon. member, is obviously able to see encouraging developments as they take place.

Allow me to make passing reference to housing. There was a big upswing in house building in the last half of 1975. Some professionals in the private sector now predict a further increase in the rate of starts for 1976.

Let me also say a word about inventory investment. There was some evidence of disinvestment in 1975. It is anticipated that there will be a major upswing in this area in 1976. Growth in inventory investment may reach the figure of $350 million.

To conclude: generally, Mr. Speaker, the outlook for the coming year should be one of optimism. That is the thinking which I am pleased to see reflected on my side of the House. We do not support the pessimistic, confused, contradictory and aimless views on the Canadian economy held by hon. members opposite and epitomized in the motion moved today by the hon. member for York-Simcoe.

Mr. Jim Balfour (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, I want to address my remarks today to the manner in which economic policies of the present administration have failed to encourage and sustain investment in Canadian industry. I think, in dealing with a matter such as this, that it is essential to reflect on the present situation and ask ourselves why it is the way it is.

It was obvious in 1974 that Canada and its economy were in a major economic and financial crisis which was likely to worsen before it improved. Inflation during 1974 ran between 11 per cent and 14 per cent depending upon how it was measured, and for the first half of 1975 it was still running around 10 per cent. Increases in wage settlements, which in 1973 were under 10 per cent, were 17.4 per cent at the end of 1974, and 18.5 per cent in mid 1975.

Meanwhile unemployment rose from 5.4 per cent in 1974 to 7.2 per cent in mid 1975, strikes were causing major disruptions in the economy and exceeded one day per year for every member of the labour force, real GNP and industrial production had been falling for almost a year, and the value of the Canadian dollar had declined by over 6½ per cent during the preceding year. All in all it was a pretty grim picture, and inflation was correctly identified as the villain.

Unfortunately the government refused to recognize that this situation existed until late 1975, and then in complete contradiction to its stated policies of only a few months previous, it imposed upon Canada, as a solution, an ill-defined, hastily organized, and so far ineffectual program of wage and price controls.

Economists offer a variety of explanations for inflation, ranging from cost or price push explanations to sociological explanations. According to Lawrence B. Smith, writing in the January-February, 1976 "Tax Journal", and I quote:

> There is really only one explanation for our present inflation, namely that there has been too fast an increase in the rate of growth of the money supply. In fact the money supply, regardless of how it is measured, has been increasing at an astronomical rate for the last five years, and in 1974 alone it rose 20 per cent. In the first three-quarters of 1975 it rose at an annual rate of 17.5 per cent, and during the three months ending November 30, 1975, it rose at an annual rate of 21.9 per cent.
> Since real output in Canada has been increasing at an annual rate of under 3 per cent during this period, there has been annually an extra 15 per cent to 17 per cent more money available to purchase every unit of output.

[Mr. Martin.]

> Thus, either people must increase their savings very considerably or else prices must rise rapidly to absorb this extra purchasing power.

Rather than display restraint, however, the government allowed its own rate of growth and spending to sky-rocket. Between 1965 and 1974 government expenditures as a percentage of GNP rose from 29.9 per cent to 39.1 per cent or, stated differently, government expenditures rose approximately 65 per cent faster than expenditures in the rest of the economy. This type of uncontrolled spending is especially harmful because to a very large extent the financial resources for this expansion were raised internally.

By borrowing from the Bank of Canada, that is to say, by increasing the money supply, or by borrowing abroad under a fixed or managed exchange rate, the government generates inflationary pressure.

Since the Bank of Canada's holdings of government securities rose at an annual rate of 13.5 per cent over the last five years while holdings in the private sector rose at an annual rate of under 1.0 per cent, excluding Canada Savings Bonds, and since increases in the Bank of Canada's holdings of Canadian government securities were the primary way of meeting federal government dollar financing requirements, it is clear that a massive increase in the money supply financed the increase in government expenditures.

As Lawrence Smith says, and I quote:

> Consequently, in the sense that the need to finance the growth of government expenditures was a major reason for the excessive expansion of the money supply, the growth in government expenditures directly contributed to the accelerating inflation.

There are few members here who do not realize that there is one essential ingredient in all plants to start up a new business, to expand an existing one, or take on new lines, and that is capital. If we cannot find the capital for investment in productive Canadian business enterprises in sufficient quantities, in the right form and at a reasonable price, then we will simply not grow as a nation, and the miseries of unemployment, inflation, and human disappointment will certainly jeopardize our society.

There are four basic forms or sources of capital: first, savings from individuals; second, savings by business, normally in the form of retained earnings; third, savings by government; fourth, foreign investment in our country, either in the form of debt or equity.

Since we must concern ourselves with government and its effect on business investment, we must direct repeated attention to the inability of the government to save. All levels of government, as we have learned, tend to be dis-savers. All governments, and especially this government, tend to develop extravagant habits. To finance their extravangance they draw on the savings of business and individuals, with the result that these savings do not reappear in the economy in the form of capital for investment. Governments in Canada at all levels last year dissaved over 4.5 billion to finance their budgetary deficits.

Andrew G. Kniewasser, President of the Investment Dealers Association of Canada, in a recent speech said:

> Indeed, Canadians are going to have to save enough or import enough of other people's savings to finance unprecedented levels of capital expansion all over this country. The agreed figure in constant dollars is $500 billion between now and 1985, and in current dollars, close to $900 billion.

Mr. Kniewasser adds:

> I am using GNP deflators of 6 per cent over the next five years and 5 per cent over the following five years in making these estimates. Gross capital formation will have to rise from 22 per cent to 26 per cent of GNP, an enormous shift in financial management. We will have to produce more, consume less, save more and invest more in our country than ever before in our history. We will also probably have to persuade foreigners to divert their savings from their own countries to Canada as never before in our history.

Canada has become one of the most highly capital-intensive countries in the world. Some sources say that more than $130,000 in new business investment is needed to create the average new job in Canada. High taxes and continued inflation prevent the public from saving and investing as much as is desirable, and the situation for business savings is also difficult.

Governments and perhaps the public, including labour unions, which have a direct stake in the prosperity of business, appear to have little interest in the capital-formation problems of corporations. Two decades ago Canada was among the leaders in the industrialized world in terms of fixed capital investment as a proportion of total output. By 1973 it was estimated by at least one source that Canada had fallen to sixteenth position on this scale among 23 industrially advanced countries.

One very graphic example of how government has shown little interest in this problem appears in the undervaluation of inventories problem. In 1974 Canadian industry earned $4.3 billion in inventory profits and paid an extra $1.5 billion in taxes that would not have been payable under stable price conditions. Total taxes paid in that year were $6.4 billion, so the taxes on inventory profits added 20 per cent to the corporate tax bill. This was a welcome windfall for government, but it was a serious drain on corporate cash flow. The result is that inventories account for an increasing proportion of current assets and firms need a lot more cash in order to finance these inventories. Inflation also has the obvious effect of making new development more expensive and therefore less attractive to business.

The results of inflation on business decision-making in Canada can be summarized in four basic points. First, the risks involved in investment in new productive capacity are increased because of the wide disparity between the prices at which existing plants can be operated profitably and the prices needed to make new plants profitable. This diminishes the incentive to invest.

Second, the illusion of prosperity created by understated costs may have encouraged firms to accept higher wage settlements and to take greater risks with inventory accumulations than they otherwise would have done.

Third, the concern about the inadequacy of cash flow, in contrast, has encouraged firms to raise their prices by more than they otherwise would as a way of replacing the savings that are not being generated by depreciation and that are being drained away by taxes on inventory profits.

● (1730)

Fourth, the over-all liquidity of the corporate sector has been reduced, with the result that corporations have less resilience in confronting new challenges. The situation, simply stated, is not healthy and it is obvious something must be done.

It is not my purpose, Mr. Speaker, to conduct for the benefit of the members present a one man inquiry into Canada's economic situation and I shall simply conclude my remarks at this point with some thoughts on what I believe must be done to improve the situation.

First of all, individual savings must be encouraged by winning the attack on inflation and by reducing taxes. In order to do this all Canadians must help by reducing their demands on all levels of government. Too many people still believe that when the government does something it is free.

Secondly, corporations must be encouraged to save more. This means a better environment for the development of retained earnings within the firm, lower levels of corporate taxation, greater opportunities for true profits, and the acceptance by the tax authorities of more realistic accounting techniques for the replacement of assets.

Third, government must save, not dis-save, for if it continues to skim off the cream of the savings of individuals and business it only drives up the cost of money for business and seriously impedes new business investment.

Fourth and finally, foreign investors must be encouraged to divert a portion of their savings to Canada rather than to use them at home.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I quote from Judith Maxwell's excellent study recently published by the C. D. Howe Research Institute entitled "Challenges to Complacency in our Society":

> 1976 will be a time of transition and of adjustment. The really wrenching adjustments will have to be made by institutions—government, business and labour—adapting to the tougher environment of the late 1970's. Now is the time to stop the confrontations and get on with the job.

Mr. D. M. Collenette (York East): Mr. Speaker, I was not sure whether I would get the opportunity to speak this afternoon, but I am sure I can fill up the next five or ten minutes with some comments about this very interesting motion.

The motion before us is a prime example of how the official opposition seeks to mislead the Canadian public. The hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) really amazes me by his criticisms in view of the obviously difficult world economic climate in which Canada has been forced to operate for the past two years.

Mr. Gillies: Same old trash.

Mr. Collenette: It may be the same old trash but it got us elected two years ago. I should now like to show in the next few minutes, if hon. members opposite will permit me, how despite the general inflationary and recessionary climate experienced by all industrialized countries Canada has maintained a relatively healthy economic environment. This relative stability is due to the policies of the federal government.

The hon. member for York-Simcoe appears in many ways to profess—I do not want to be too harsh—a profound ignorance of an essential economic fact today, and that is that it is not possible to isolate the performance and workings of one country without regard to economic conditions in other countries, especially without regard to the United States with whom we do some 60 per cent of our total trade.

Not only must we in this country concern ourselves with the inter-relationship between personal incomes, consumer expenditures, output, employment, capital investment, prices, profits, savings and interest in an analysis of our own economic health, but we must also look at each of these items as they relate to our major trading partners. There is also the additional variable, when we take this more global view into account, of analysing the impact of exchange rates.

This world-wide inter-dependence of economic conditions was the principal reason why the Liberal party fought extremely hard, and as we know very successfully, against the policy of a wage and price freeze as proposed by the official opposition in 1974. Because Canada is one of the world's major trading nations we were very vulnerable to the inflationary pressures that swirled around us in 1973 and 1974. In effect we were inporting inflation, and no degree of price and wage freeze would have isolated us from the effects of the most serious bout of inflation since the second world war, 30 years ago.

However, I do not want to flagellate the opposition too much, Mr. Speaker, because they paid their price with interest two years ago for the errors of judgment they made. A freeze at that time would have been iniquitous in its effect upon the Canadian people. Perhaps the official opposition would have preferred this iniquitous solution. Perhaps they would have preferred a solution which was really put into effect by our American neighbours to the south, but maybe I can come to that in a moment. I do not believe that the Canadian people would have appreciated that kind of policy.

Repeatedly over the past year we have read reports from august economic bodies such as the Economic Council of Canada, the Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development, and others, which laud the policies pursued by the Government of Canada during this period. In order to refute the implications of the motion before us, let us look at some of these policies, since this is the essence of the criticism that is made in the motion.

The hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner) dealt extensively with the subject of energy, but the one price oil system has for two years provided a balance in this country. It has meant that all Canadians have been forced to shoulder the burden of the increased world price of oil. In addition to the one price policy we have kept the domestic price below the world price. This has not only benefited consumers who have had a chance to adjust themselves to higher fuel prices and scarcity of supply, but more important, certainly in terms of the motion before us, Canadian industry has benefited from a lower than world price for oil and natural gas. There is no doubt, Mr. Speaker, that the results of this policy have been to keep more Canadians in work than would have been otherwise possible. It has kept industries operating at a healthy capacity.

The subsidization of one price oil has resulted in a net deficit to the treasury. With the decline in export tax revenues from the sale of crude oil to the United States, the deficit in the oil account had to be met from general revenues. This, of course, placed additional cash demands upon the government and has contributed to inflation.

But, Mr. Speaker, think of the alternative. Think of the industrial havoc that would have been wreaked in Canada, especially in Ontario. It is interesting that the hon. member for York-Simcoe is one of my neighbours in Ontario, and I ask him to think what could have happened in Ontario had the government not pursued this policy. Perhaps he does not appreciate the number of jobs saved as a result. Certainly the industrial workers in my constituency and in other industrial areas of this country appreciate the effect of this policy.

We have been attacked for our expansionary fiscal and monetary policy over the past two years, but we had little choice. A government that is Liberal, that is responsible but compassionate, had no option but to expand the monetary supply, to pay for existing government programs hit by inflation. Is the hon. member for York-Simcoe telling this House and the Canadian people that he was against cushioning the effect of inflation for the elderly, the poor with children, the unemployed, and the veterans? That is what the government did. It indexed old age pensions, family allowances, unemployment insurance benefits. Is the hon. member for York-Simcoe against this, and are the members of his party?

The government also indexed personal income tax and reduced personal taxes as well as corporate and commodity taxes so that incomes could keep pace with inflation, consumer demand could be sustained, and capital investment encouraged. As a result we were able to keep Canada's productive capacity in manufacturing and other areas stimulated at a time when the rest of the world crumbled into recession.

Mr. Elzinga: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I wonder whether the hon. member would entertain a question?

Mr. Collenette: Well, Mr. Speaker, I might have been disposed to answer a question had the hon. member sat in his seat for the last two hours awaiting his turn to speak, as I did. With only two minutes left I feel compelled to continue.

I am sure hon. members on the other side would argue that we have encouraged inflation in Canada, and I suppose to some degree we have. But look at the alternatives, Mr. Speaker. The hon. member for York-Simcoe talked about the United States. Is he saying that his party would have liked to inflict upon the Canadian people the heartless and, indeed, almost ruthless policies of the Ford administration in the United States? Has the hon. member paid many visits to the United States over the past couple of years? Has he seen the swarms of unemployed in the major cities; has he digested the tremendous increase in the welfare rolls, especially in the northern American states; has he been to Buffalo, Detroit or any other northern city and seen how an insensitive government has almost ground the economy to a halt?

Sure, the inflation rate in the United States last year was well below ours. The hon. member for York-Simcoe is correct in saying this, but at what cost to the dignity, the self-esteem, and the economic health of American citizens?

A couple of percentage points more in the rate of inflation are fine with me if it means that the old will not go hungry, the young will not be poorly clothed, and the worker will not end up in a lineup at an unemployment insurance office.

If we had decided to limit government expenditures, if we had kept tax levels at previous levels so that we might have had a balanced budget, as is often advocated by hon. members on the other side, what would have been the result? I shall tell you, Mr. Speaker, and members on the other side. It would have meant lower personal income, lower personal spending, lower national output and lower profits, but substantially higher unemployment. Is this what members on the other side want?

I see that my time has almost expired. I do not really want to review the very excellent summary in the 1975 Bank of Canada Report which detailed the health of this country, but I do suggest that the hon. member for York-Simcoe might do well to read it.

Hon. members opposite would do well to generate their talents and energies into thinking about the type of society we want in the post-controls period rather upon government policies of the past. It is coincidental that the hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) said at a convention recently, "We want to tell Canadians what the Progressive Conservative party is for and not what they are against." I suggest that hon. members opposite might heed their own leader's advice.

OBJECTION TO COMMISSION REPORT RESPECTING ONTARIO

Mr. Speaker: It is my duty to inform the House that an objection signed by the hon. members for Essex-Windsor (Mr. Whelan), Hamilton Mountain (Mr. MacFarlane), Nipissing (Mr. Blais), Thunder Bay (Mr. Penner), Welland (Mr. Railton), Stormont-Dundas (Mr. Lumley), St. Catharines (Mr. Parent), Kitchener (Mr. Flynn), Scarborough West (Mr. Martin), Peel-Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Milne) and Glengarry-Prescott-Russell (Mr. Ethier), has been filed with me pursuant to Section 20 of the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act, chapter E-2, R.S.C., 1970, to the report of the Electoral Boundaries Commission for the province of Ontario. Is it agreed that the said objection shall be appended to today's Votes and Proceedings?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

SUPPLY

MOTION FOR CONCURRENCE IN VOTE 10B, DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL REVENUE

Mr. Speaker: It being 5.45 p.m., pursuant to order made earlier this day, it is my duty to interrupt the proceedings and put forthwith every question necessary to dispose of the business of supply relating to Supplementary Estimates (B), and all stages of the bill based thereon, together with interim supply and first reading of the bill based thereon.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (President of the Treasury Board) moved:

That Vote 10b, in the amount of $298,000 of the Department of National Revenue for Taxation—Office of the Administrator—Anti-inflation—Programme expenditures in Supplementary Estimates (B) for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1976, be concurred in.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. This is a matter to which reference has been made in the past, and it is one to which I would take great exception, particularly in respect of the nature of its appearing on the order paper.

Standing Order 58(4) reads as follows:

Forty-eight hours' written notice shall be given of motions to concur in interim supply, main or supplementary estimates, to restore or reinstate any item in the estimates. Twenty-four hours' written notice shall be given of an opposition motion on an allotted day, or of a notice to oppose any item in the estimates, or for the purpose of setting down any item or items in the main or supplementary estimates for consideration in a committee of the whole.

The hon. member for Halton-Wentworth (Mr. Kempling) gave notice at precisely 6 p.m. yesterday, just at the limit of the 24 hours, of his intention to oppose an item in the estimates. That was written notice of intention to oppose or, in other words, to reduce the item. How is it now that there appears ahead of it a motion restoring the item? I see that Mr. Speaker is shaking his head, but the motion in respect of Vote 10b involves the restoring of the item.

There was a motion put down by the hon. member which complied with the rules requesting approval for a reduction of a particular item. Now the procedure, and I suggest it is quite erroneous procedure of this House, which has become the practice is that the motion is never put, but there is a prior motion which appears somehow out of thin air. How did it get there unless it was by an arrangement with the Clerks at the Table? There can be no other way.

An hon. Member: Collusion.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): I do not suggest there is collusion because there is no time for that. On previous occasions, as on this occasion, it is 24 hours' notice. The rule says specifically that 48 hours' written notice shall be given.

What I am concerned about is an expression of the House with regard to the motion of the hon. member. Your Honour was a member of the procedure committee when these rules were devised and you will know it was clearly indicated at that time, and this was followed for a period in this House, that an hon. member can oppose an item in order to allow for the expression of an opinion by the House either in respect of the reduction of the item to $1, or to a specific amount, or in opposition to it entirely.

Then there was a change, notwithstanding protests from this side of the House. Former Speaker Lamoureux decided that somehow a procedure could be followed whereby automatically out of thin air there appeared a motion under the name of the minister of the department with which the item is concerned to restore the total amount.

This caused a great deal of difficulty in the House because in many instances when there are main estimates the House is being asked to vote on an omnibus item when there is no procedure whereby the House can be asked to express its opinion on the item that is posted.

These rules were put in for a particular purpose, namely, to allow an individual member of the House to get an expression of the House on an item in the estimates. This is now totally impossible.

First of all, I say it is irregular for this motion appearing in the name of the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Chrétien) to appear on the order paper. I find no authority whatsoever for it in the rules. Secondly, I find no authority whatsoever, whether it is Standing Order 58(9), (10) or (11) which governs the procedure as to how the item shall be disposed of, and appropriation bills shall be considered, namely, the motion on behalf of the President of the Treasury Board to restore the item.

Mr. Speaker: I hesitate to interrupt the hon. member, but I think we should be clear about the terms we are using. I will permit the hon. member to carry on in a moment. The motion to which he is referring in the name of the President of the Treasury Board is not a motion to restore an item. That would presuppose that the House had made a disposition to reduce it.

The motion in the name of the President of Treasury Board is a motion for concurrence in the item, and it is there because there is a blanket motion in the name of the President of Treasury Board for concurrence in all of the items in the supplementary estimates. They are not listed individually, because it is not felt necessary in the practice followed by the House over many years to list the items individually unless there is a notice of opposition. Therefore, in the face of a notice of opposition, in order to accommodate that vote, the motion is separated by practice—and by no other reason—in order to see to it that the notice of opposition by the hon. member is on the order paper together with a specific aspect of the general notice for concurrence. But it is not a motion to restore the item; it is a motion for concurrence.

If there were notices of opposition on every item contained in the supplementary estimates, presumably the House, for the purpose of recording that, would have to separate the general, blanket, omnibus motion for concurrence by the President of the Treasury Board into each item so that it would face opposite an item of objection. But it is not a motion to restore the item. A motion to restore the item could presumably only be made after the House had addressed itself to a notice of objection and had accepted it in some way.

[Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West).]

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): By your own words, Mr. Speaker, you have drawn my attention to what is contained in 58(4). It provides that 48 hours' written notice shall be given to motions to concur in a supplementary estimate. Where was the compliance of the 48 hours' requirement with regard to this particular item? There was no 48 hours' notice. There was undoubtedly a general 48 hours' notice for the motion which appears on the order paper to concur in Supplementary Estimates B. That I am not disputing. That item I am not disputing.

But I do find it singular, and I do object, that any hon. member on either side of the House who wishes to post a single item within the 24 hours is confined to the 24-hour rule, comes to the deadline, and finds that there suddenly appears on the order paper a counter-motion and, particularly, that the counter-motion takes precedence in being put. The net result is that there is no vote, there is no opportunity for opinions to be expressed by the House on the particular motion of an hon. member who has complied with the rules. That is the frustration, and that is where I suggest that in the past the Chair has misdirected itself.

I am not suggesting that ultimately, if a vote on the motion of the hon. member for Halton-Wentworth is not carried by the House, the general motion therefore takes precedence. I am not questioning the general motion which I shall accept was filed within 48 hours to concur in Supplementary Estimates B, the same way that yesterday there was filed a notice to concur in interim supply. But nothing has been done with regard to this particular item appearing as 10(b) with regard to the Administrator of the Anti-Inflation Board.

How else is the House to proceed but to follow the procedure which I insist is the right one? It is my contention that the motion which should be put is that which stands in the name of the hon. member for Halton-Wentworth.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): The other motion, I suggest with respect, is both irregular and not according to the rules. What happened to the 48 hours' notice? It was not on the order paper; it has not complied with the 48-hour requirement, and on the side of the government there has to be compliance. There cannot just be a general motion put down which can then be translated somehow by the Chair into a particularized item on the order paper.

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. member for Edmonton West will permit me, in accordance with the rules the hon. member for Halton-Wentworth has filed a notice of objection; it is not a motion. There is no question to which the House can address itself. There is, in fact, a notice of objection which, in accordance with the rules, notified the House that the hon. member insists on a separate vote on the particular item.

There must be a question to which the House can address itself, and the notice of objection by the hon. member is not a question. Therefore the House has nothing to which it can address itself. It is therefore necessary that some question be put on the order paper which identifies the area of objection, and which permits the House to address itself by a vote to a question.

If one reads the notice of objection by the hon. member for Halton-Wentworth it is clear that the House could not address itself to such an item under the present rules unless the hon. member had put down a motion that the House direct that something be done in respect to that item. But that is not what has taken place. Therefore this seems to be the only feasible practice. If there is a better one, we certainly would welcome any suggestions which would clarify the position. At the moment, however, this is the only course which seems feasible.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): With respect, Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to appear argumentative, but what the hon. member for Halton-Wentworth did was in effect give notice to reduce item 10(b) from $298,000 to $100,000. Now, how this is expressed by the officers at the Table, I cannot say, but that is the intent of the motion. The intent is to reduce the item from $298,000 to $100,000. That is all.

Mr. Kempling: May I just clarify a point, Mr. Speaker? I approached the Table and asked for guidance on the proper form to use in order that I could register my objection. It was my assumption, perhaps wrongly, Sir, that by following their advice this matter would result in a vote. I took the advice of the Table and I was given an example, as a matter of fact, of a similar motion which had been put down in 1972. I followed that example and altered it only as to the particular circumstances and filed it with the Table at six o'clock. I assumed that with that direction the matter would then be brought to a vote.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Halton-Wentworth was correct in his course. The advice he received was right. As a result of the action taken by the hon. member, the method he used may in fact result in a vote taking place in the House on that separate item. But instead of it being a vote on a motion in the name of the hon. member for Halton-Wentworth to effect the item, it will be a motion by the President of the Treasury Board to concur in the item. But that is as close as the House can come under present practices.

I say the point of order is well taken; it is well understood, and it is one to which we have addressed ourselves many times. If there is a better and more direct procedure for achieving this goal I am sure the House would be happy to hear it. However, with all due respect, I do not believe the time to solve the problem is in this particular instance. The procedure followed with respect to this instance is precisely the same as that followed the last time around on supply.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): On the same point of order, if I may, Mr. Speaker, I came to this House—

An hon. Member: Too bad!

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): —in the belief that there was some democratic procedure we could follow in this House.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Disposition of Supply Motions

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, I have a point and I wish to be heard. There have been two supplementary estimates brought before us. I cannot understand why it is not possible, first of all, to have all the estimates required at one time. There have been As, now there are Bs. Next year there will be Cs. There will be three or four supplemental estimates.

The only alternative to the proposal put forward by my hon. friend from Halton-Wentworth is an amendment to the unopposed items in the estimates of March 22, which are here. We should be able to register our disagreement with certain items in the estimates, to have them withdrawn or removed. I will vote against them. But there must also be a method.

● (1800)

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): I have a right to stand on my feet!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am prepared in these circumstances to listen to the point of order, but I think something should be made clear. The Standing Orders of the House provide a procedure whereby estimates are studied in the committee, amendments moved, and so forth, and if effective the estimates would be reported back to the House with amendments and then would have to be reinstated. I do not challenge the interest of the hon. member in raising this point of order; however the process has gone on for some time now. Undoubtedly there can be suggestions to improve the procedure, but it is a procedure that has been used several times in the past as a result of points of order.

The supply bill will be introduced today instead of tomorrow at the hour at which it is expected to be voted on. Furthermore, the supply bill will be debated in all stages tomorrow. This is moving further and further in the direction of getting away from the procedure we followed in the past. However, I wanted to be clear that at this moment the Standing Order is specific, that the duty of the Chair is to intervene and to put without debate or amendment all questions necessary to decide on the supplementary estimates that are before us.

The hon. member seeks the floor on a point of order. I have given three hon. members the floor on a point or order. Let us be clear that we should not be debating what we are doing, but continuing to speak about order, and if we are talking about improvements in the procedure for supply, these are procedures that have been not only in use for some time but in effect, in respect of these supplementary estimates which have been before standing committees, hon. members from all parties have been present there, have discussed them, have moved amendments to them, and so on, and at this point the final step is being taken.

The hon. member's point is well noted and continues to form part of the study which is going on to try to improve these procedures, but again I say that we cannot solve the problem entirely at this moment.

Disposition of Supply Motions

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, my point of order is that the motion put forward in the name of the President of the Treasury Board has an order in advance, although posted later, than the order put in the name of the hon. member for Halton-Wentworth (Mr. Kempling). That is the order in which they should be. The motion put by the hon. member for Halton-Wentworth should be first and should be followed, if necessary, by the motion put by the President of the Treasury Board. This is not order, this is disorder. The government motion, although posted later, has taken precedence over the other motion.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Let me say again that the points which have been raised are points to which the Chair has addressed itself in the past. The suggestion is a valid one. Unfortunately, the implementation or execution of the idea contained in the suggestion is not as simple as it appears. The alternatives have been examined, and this has been felt to be the only feasible way to proceed as a result of an objection by an hon. member to the singling out of an item which must be voted on separately. This is the best procedure up to this point. If hon. members who have intervened have a better suggestion, the Chair would be delighted to receive it.

The question is therefore on the motion in the name of the President of the Treasury Board relating to the particular item. The motion has been read. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Speaker: Call in the members.

The House divided on the motion (Mr. Chrétien) which was agreed to on the following division:

● (1830)

Mr. Speaker: I therefore declare the motion carried. The question is, therefore, on the motion of Mr. Chrétien, seconded by Mr. Sharp:

That Supplementary Estimates (B) 1975-76 laid upon the Table, Tuesday, March 2, 1976, except the item previously disposed of, be concurred in.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: On division.

Motion agreed to on division.

Mr. Chrétien thereupon moved that Bill C-90, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending March 31, 1976, be read the first time and be printed.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Chrétien moved that the bill be read the second time and referred to the committee of the whole.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Laniel in the chair.

The Chairman: Shall Clause 2 carry?

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): On division.

Clause 2 agreed to.

The Chairman: Shall Clause 3 carry?

Some hon. Members: On division.

The Chairman: Shall the preamble carry?

An hon. Member: On division.

Preamble agreed to.

The Chairman: Shall the title carry?

Some hon. Members: On division.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. Chrétien moved the third reading of the bill.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

Interim Supply

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Pursuant to order made earlier this day, the question therefore is on the motion of the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Chrétien) with respect to interim supply.

INTERIM SUPPLY

Hon. Jean Chrétien (President of Treasury Board) moved:

That this House do concur in interim supply as follows:

That a sum not exceeding $4,970,732,370.57 being the aggregate of:

(a) three-twelfths of the total of the amounts of the items set forth in the Estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1977, laid before the House of Commons on February 18, 1976, $4,424,625,940.25;

(b) an additional eight-twelfths of the total amount of Energy, Mines and Resources Items L50 and L55, Finance Item 20, Regional Economic Expansion Item 25, Transport Item 110, Urban Affairs Item 20(Schedule A) of the said Estimates, $8,407,333.33;

(c) an additional six-twelfths of the total amount of Urban Affairs Item 10 (Schedule B) of the said Estimates, $3,315,906.00;

(d) an additional four-twelfths of the total amount of Industry, Trade and Commerce Item 55 and Urban Affairs Item 15 (Schedule C) of the said Estimates, $150,479,333.33;

(e) an additional three-twelfths of the total amount of Energy, Mines and Resources Item L45, Regional Economic Expansion Item L35, Secretary of State Item 90, Transport Items 40, 50 and 90, and Treasury Board Items 5 and 10 (Schedule D) of the said Estimates, $133,618,375.00;

(f) an additional two-twelfths of the total amount of Finance Item 5, Indian Affairs and Northern Development Item L65, Industry, Trade and Commerce Item 75, Transport Items 65 and L75 (Schedule E) of the said Estimates, $51,615,199.33;

(g) an additional one-twelfth of the total amount of Energy, Mines and Resources Items 1 and 70, Environment Item 15, Indian Affairs and Northern Development Items 5, L60 and L85, Manpower and Immigration Item 10, Post Office Item 5, Privy Council Item 25, Secretary of State Item 15, Solicitor General Item 1, and Supply and Services Items 1 and 15 (Schedule F) of the said Estimates, $198,670,283.33; be granted to Her Majesty on account of the fiscal year ending March 31, 1977.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Chrétien thereupon moved that Bill C-91, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending March 31, 1977, be read the first time and be printed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

Mr. Speaker: When shall the bill be read the second time?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Tomorrow.

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to order made earlier this day, at the next sitting of the House. Agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: It being six o'clock—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: —this House stands adjourned until two o'clock tomorrow.

At 6:39 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

ANTI-INFLATION BOARD

REQUEST THAT BOARD BE ABOLISHED AND CRÉDITISTE PRINCIPLES APPLIED—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Armand Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

Considering that in spite of the government's anti-inflation measures, inflation continues to play havoc with the economy of every region of this country, especially in the food sector, considering also that the Anti-Inflation Board's decisions contribute to reducing the purchasing power of Canadian workers faced with soaring prices, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Gauthier):

That this House consider the advisibility of abolishing the Anti-Inflation Board, which will cost more than $13 million in 1976 while jeopardizing the social peace of our country, and consider the implementation of measures proposed by the Social Credit as expounded in Bill C-328, An Act to provide for emergency measures to deal with the inflation of prices.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the hon. member's motion. Pursuant to Standing Order 43, such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent; the motion cannot therefore be put.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

REQUEST FOR PROVISIONS IN NEW AGREEMENT WITH QUEBEC FAVOURING SOUTH SHORE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43, I request unanimous consent of the House to present a motion on an important and urgent matter.

Considering the very alarming unemployment increase in Quebec, particularly in the eastern area of the province, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Gauthier):

That this House recommend to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion that at the time of the Ottawa-Quebec agreement, account should be taken of the disastrous economic conditions in the South Shore area, and that the economic needs of this area be mentioned in this agreement in order that the area might benefit from it and the number of its unemployed people be reduced.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Under the provisions of Standing Order 43, the motion requires unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: As there is no unanimous consent, the motion cannot be put.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

LOCKHEED CONTRACT—REQUEST FOR SUBSTANCE OF CONVERSATION BETWEEN REISMAN AND DEPUTY MINISTER

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, my questions are for the Minister of National Defence. I wish he would get here on time. In any event in his absence I will direct them to the Prime Minister. Yesterday the Minister of National Defence told the House that there have been conversations by telephone "with my deputy minister" on the subject of financing the Lockheed LRPA purchase contract. Outside the House the minister appeared to be rather confused over the substance and nature of those conversations but indicated both inside and outside the House that the telephone conversations involving his deputy minister concerned financial aid to the company as well. Would the Prime Minister confirm the substance of these conversations; that is, would they constitute an attempt on behalf of Reisman and Grandy Limited to establish financing terms for the LRPA contract.

● (1410)

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I was not a party to these conversations. I think the best thing would be to take note of the question on behalf of the minister or to ask him a little later when he is in the House.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I would have hoped that, as a result of the minister's statements yesterday, he would have made himself aware of what those contacts were. In any event, the minister stated outside the House that he believed the other party to the conversation was in fact Mr. Reisman. That was a statement made downstairs. I wonder if the Prime Minister would be in a position to confirm that Mr. Reisman was in fact the other party in the conversations with Deputy Minister Nixon and, further, which party initiated these calls?

Mr. Trudeau: I will inquire.

LOCKHEED CONTRACT—DATE OF CONVERSATIONS BETWEEN REISMAN AND DEPUTY MINISTER—REQUEST FOR TABLING OF CONTRACTS WITH REISMAN AND GRANDY

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, in view of the importance of these matters, and in view of the effect that such communications might very well have on a purchase contract such as the one which we are talking about, would the Prime Minister also confirm whether these conversations took place before the contract was announced on November 27, 1975 or was it during the period immediately following the announcement in which the financial difficulties emerged, and further, would the Prime Minister table all the contracts Reisman and Grandy had with the government since they retired and, as well, whatever additional correspondence or documentation there is which spells out the terms of reference of these contracts?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I answered that question yesterday in so far as the departments were concerned. I also said that no such contract had been entered into. I indicated yesterday that there had been two very short term contractual arrangements with two departments, and that is the extent of my knowledge. I also stated to the Leader of the Opposition that the matter was being looked into and that I would report when I had the facts.

PROPRIETY OF RETIRED EMPLOYEES BEING DIRECTORS OF CROWN CORPORATIONS AND ACTING AS CONSULTANTS TO GOVERNMENT

Mr. Bill Kempling (Halton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. While the Prime Minister is looking into the matter of former senior civil servants being employed shortly after retirement as consultants to the government, would the right hon. gentleman also consider the propriety of retired civil servants acting commercially as consultants on government matters, and who are at the same time directors of Crown corporations?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I will look at that also, Mr. Speaker.

[Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton).]

LOCKHEED CONTRACT—POSSIBILITY OF OBTAINING INFORMATION FROM UNITED STATES ON PAYMENT OF BRIBES

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address my question to the Minister of National Defence. Yesterday in the House, and I think on other occasions as well, the minister was questioned with regard to requests to the United States government for detailed information on bribes offered by Lockheed with regard to purchases of aircraft. The minister replied that he had had conversations with senior officials of the United States government. I should like now to ask him whether he or any other representative of the government have adopted or will adopt the procedure indicated by the justice department of the United States, namely, that foreign governments should negotiate with the justice department to obtain information gathered by U.S. agencies such as SEC in regard to so called "overseas pay-offs" by U.S. concerns?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I have said that I do not believe we should have an investigation until there is something that we should be investigating. The hon. member is suggesting a kind of witch hunt—

An hon. Member: Not a witch hunt, fact finding.

Mr. Richardson: In the Senate hearings there was a full disclosure of the improper payments that the Lockheed company had made. The countries in which these payments had been made were named, and Canada was not mentioned at any time in those full hearings. I think that is all that we should expect. I do not think it is right to assume that there is wrongdoing when there is no evidence.

Mr. Brewin: I should like to say to the minister that I for one am getting a little tired of these cover ups.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Brewin: Many other countries have adopted the procedure suggested by the U.S. authorities, namely, they have gone to the justice department and are seeking information. What is the reason that this minister is not prepared to do the same as they are doing? He could keep the answer confidential, as far as I know, but why does he not find out what the facts are?

Mr. Richardson: The other countries which are seeking information were named at the Senate hearing, and they had a reason to investigate.

Mr. Brewin: I had slipped in a question which I had not expected to ask, but I will now go on to my last question.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Did you get an answer to it?

Mr. Brewin: No answer.

Mr. Nystrom: I wish he would slip in an answer.

LOCKHEED CONTRACT—SUGGESTED TERMINATION OF CONTRACT AND PURCHASE OF OTHER MAKE OF AIRCRAFT

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): I should like to ask the minister whether, in view of the total history of this matter and the fact that no agreement has actually been made—and there is no assurance of delivery if an agreement is made—the government will terminate negotiations with Lockheed and seek the necessary long-range patrol aircraft through refitting the Argus or in some other manner.

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): That is not our present intention.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

REQUEST FOR PROVISIONS IN NEW AGREEMENT WITH QUEBEC FAVOURING SOUTH SHORE

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion, I shall put my question to the right hon. Prime Minister.

As last night over the CBC's French network news bulletin the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion stated that the Ottawa-Quebec agreement on the eastern part of Quebec would lapse on March 31, 1976 but would be renewed any day now, can the Prime Minister tell the House whether the south shore between Lévis and Rimouski will be included in this agreement or whether it will be covered by special agreement, as requested by municipal councils and other groups?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, in fact the minister is in the process of discussing with his colleagues renewal of this agreement due to lapse soon. When an agreement has been approved by cabinet, its terms will be announced to hon. members.

PROPOSED DECENTRALIZATION OF INDUSTRY TO FAVOUR UNDERDEVELOPED REGIONS

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the Prime Minister for his answer and put a supplementary to him.

As several political personalities have expressed, these last few years, a wish for industrial decentralization, may I ask if his government intends to encourage it further to the advantage of the underdeveloped or developing regions where skilled labour already exists to meet the needs of new industries?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, to the extent where the question deals with industrial decentralization, I shall convey to the minister the representations and arguments of the hon. member. With regard to the decentralization of government services, that matter concerns the President of the Treasury Board who has already made very helpful decisions for the province of Quebec in that regard.

REQUEST FOR NAMES OF PEOPLE MR. DRURY CONSULTED ABOUT APPROACHING JUDGE HUGESSEN

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works following up questions regarding the confrontation issue raised by the hon. member for Vancouver South. Yesterday the Minister of Public Works admitted that he had consulted some of his colleagues in cabinet on the question of confrontation which he raised with Mr. Justice Hugessen. He stated further that he would try to get some precise recollection about whom he talked to before he approached Mr. Justice Hugessen. Has the minister succeeded in recollecting with whom he discussed this matter, and will he now give us the names of his colleagues?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I have read over the question and answer of yesterday, and it is apparent that there was some confusion in my mind as to whether we were talking about the rumour or the confrontation. I have been endeavouring to recollect where I had heard or might have heard this rumour, which I gave an undertaking to do. In so far as the hon. member for Vancouver South was seeking from me the names of my cabinet colleagues with whom I had discussed the issue generally or the nature of the law case, I think I cannot do better than repeat my previous position, that conversations as between cabinet colleagues should not be disclosed in answer to questions during the question period.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, I submit that is a lot of nonsense—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Alexander: —because yesterday the Minister of Public Works stated, regardless of whether he is talking about confrontation or ganging up, in no uncertain terms:

> Mr. Speaker, I have no very clear recollection but I thought I probably did mention this to some of my other colleagues in cabinet.

I just want to tell the minister that the hon. member for Vancouver South—

Some hon. Members: Order, order!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

ALLEGEDLY CONFLICTING STATEMENTS OF MR. DRURY CONCERNING GANGING UP ON FRENCH SPEAKING MINISTERS

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, my second question and I hope the minister will be able to answer this, is that on Thursday of last week the Minister of Public Works stated:

> . . . it is difficult to ascribe a precise source to baseless rumours.

He was referring to the alleged ganging up of the English-speaking establishment against prominently placed

French-speaking persons. However, La Presse of March 17 stated—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Would the hon. member please put his question?

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, apparently in the House, regarding the ganging up, the minister advised that this was a baseless rumour while outside he stated, according to La Presse, that the matter came from the hon. member for Papineau, which is a contradiction. Can the minister explain this obvious contradiction between statements inside the House which describe the rumours as baseless and statements outside the House which pinpoint the precise source of such rumours as the hon. member for Papineau?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of the so-called statements outside the House.

Mr. Alexander: A final supplementary, Mr. Speaker. Can the minister now advise this House whether in fact the question regarding the ganging up stemmed from the hon. member for Papineau or not? Can he assure the House of this or not?

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, I am not quite sure what the hon. gentleman is driving at.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): He is driving at the whole truth.

Mr. Drury: He is asking me, it seems, to reveal the substance of a conversation with a cabinet colleague. On a number of occasions I have stated—and I think I am right—that those conversations should not be disclosed, should not be published.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Drury: If he is asking me something else I do not quite understand what it is.

SUPPLY AND SERVICES

LOCKHEED CONTRACT—ARRANGEMENTS FOR INTERIM FINANCING

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Supply and Services regarding the LRPA contract. Could the minister indicate to the House whether interim financing has been arranged as of today and if so, in what amount? If not, can the minister give us some indication whether it will be achieved before April 1?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, this question is still under discussion.

[Mr. Alexander.]

LOCKHEED CONTRACT—POSSIBILITY OF PRICE INCREASE AFTER APRIL 1

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Can the minister, who is responsible for the writing of this contract, give some indication to the House of what the situation will be on April 1 should the contract not be signed? In other words, will the price of the LRPA program increase by about 15 per cent after April 1?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, I am afraid I cannot answer the hon. member's question, which is purely hypothetical. I think I cannot give more details to the hon. member at the moment.

INDUSTRY

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON MEASURES TO INCREASE PRODUCTIVITY

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister? As the Prime Minister told me on October 30, in the House, that he would refer to the Privy Council and the Department of Finance for study my suggestion for paying productivity incentives in direct proportion to productivity gains, as incentives for greater productivity in industry, which would make our products competitive; and as, on February 4, nearly two months ago, the Prime Minister promised to make a statement soon, but has not made a statement in the House on the matter, may I ask if he has lost interest in this important matter, particularly as most economists agree that there can be no real recovery, and the AIB program will not succeed, unless industrial productivity increases substantially. Will he tell the House if he intends to make a statement, and when?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I agreed at the outset that the hon. member was asking an important question, one to which we made explicit references in the white paper published on October 14. Since then a few studies have been progressing and the committee I referred to, the interdepartmental committee, is looking at a whole series of proposed programs. One has to do with the nature of Canadian productivity problems, another is on opportunities for productivity improvement; another is for the preliminary identification of policies and programs to exploit those opportunities.

Other studies have been initiated in other areas. They include the Canadian historical record of productivity growth; the improvement of the measurement of productivity; the measurement of productivity in the public service; regional development programs and productivity performance.

Studies have been undertaken in other areas which are directly related to productivity, such as—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Hees: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. As I am aware that these studies are not expected to be presented to cabinet for consideration for at least another six months, which means that one year will have passed since I brought to the Prime Minister's attention the need for productivity incentives to increase industrial productivity, which is the key to the whole matter, and as it is obvious that the Prime Minister, who is delaying, is determined to take over Sir John A. MacDonald's title, "Old tomorrow", may I ask—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Northumberland-Durham.

Mr. Hees: —if the Prime Minister does not realize that since our convention of a few weeks ago, and in view of the government's recent bad performance, his "tomorrows" are disappearing at a rapidly accelerating rate?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

NATIONAL DEFENCE

LOCKHEED CONTRACT—REQUEST FOR DETAILS OF CONVERSATION BETWEEN REISMAN AND DEPUTY MINISTER

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): Mr. Speaker, as the Minister of National Defence is in the House, may I direct a question to him about the Reisman and Grandy affair. Yesterday the minister suggested that no representations had been made on behalf of the Lockheed company but that there had been conversations concerning the contract. In fairness to the minister, the matter may involve semantics rather than an attempt to mislead the House. I am sure that, in fulfilling his responsibilities, he knew specifically and definitely what was said by whom to whom. Will he now tell us exactly what those conversations were about? Who said what to whom?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the conversations with my deputy minister, which took place by telephone, were in the new year and they took place after the decision by cabinet to purchase the Lockheed long-range patrol aircraft. As far as I am aware, they concerned financing and how that financing might best be achieved. I do not think it is possible to provide details of these conversations without a much more careful examination of the individuals concerned.

LOCKHEED CONTRACT—KNOWLEDGE OF MINISTER OF APPOINTMENT OF REISMAN AND GRANDY AS CONSULTANTS

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. It seems that we are drawing a fine distinction in language between representation and conversations. May I ask the minister if either he or the Prime Minister knew that Mr. Reisman—and I gather Mr. Reisman was on the other end of the telephone line talking about the announcement of this particular contract—was actually on a retainer from the Lockheed company.

● (1430)

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I did not know of the conversations, as you would know from my reply a day or two ago. I had no personal knowledge that conversations had taken place. I was aware, because it was not in any way a secret, that the firm of Reisman and Grandy had been appointed as consultants to Lockheed. I was aware of that as of a fairly short time ago, but I was not aware that any conversations had taken place.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

INCREASE IN PRICE OF COPPER—GOVERNMENT MEASURES TO COUNTERACT

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo-Cambridge): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the Minister of Finance. It arises out of recent reports that four major copper companies in Canada have raised their prices by about 5 per cent from 63 cents to 66 cents a pound. In view of the indications that the rise in price is the result of increases in the international price for copper rather than an increase in costs, and in light of the fact this increase in price is likely to work its way into the cost structure of the economy as a whole in coming weeks, what action does the minister intend to take immediately rather than wait for the Anti-Inflation Board to examine the quarterly reports of these companies which may take weeks or months, especially with the huge backlog facing the Anti-Inflation Board?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, we indicated with respect to certain of the basic commodities, copper being the example, which trades, as it is said on a sawtooth market, that we were not applying the same criteria with regard to cost pass through that would apply with respect to other commodities. Indeed, 53 cents a pound was the price that had been prevailing for much of the early part of this year. Most of the copper in Canada was probably being sold at less than the cost of production. We should indeed look at the returns in the industry over a longer period and not apply strictly the cost pass-through formula. In that sense, the copper industry and other base metal industries would be treated in a different form than other companies in Canada with, however, the over-all restriction on profits that would apply, but over a longer period.

Mr. Saltsman: In view of the fact that in 1974 Noranda, for example, had earnings of $155 million whereas in 1975 it had earnings of $50 million and in 1973 of some $121 million, if it is subject to a proviso that earnings will have to be 95 per cent of the average for the base year, it will be able to raise copper prices sky-high before being caught by any form of regulations the minister is setting up. Can the minister assure the House that when he comes to looking at the permissible profit and price levels of companies like Noranda, he will take into account the result of unjustifiable windfall profits over the last couple of years rather than use that as a way of determining what their profit should be in the future?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, that is the purpose of an averaging formula, to try to average out the different years and different experience.

REPORT OF CONSULTING GROUP ON RELATIONS WITH AFFILIATES—REQUEST FOR REFERENCE TO COMMITTEE

Mr. Jean-R. Roy (Timmins): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State. Following the completion of the Canada Consulting Group report concerned with the CBC and its relations with its affiliates, will the minister ensure that this report will be made available to the House and that the Standing Committee on Broadcasting, Films and Assistance to the Arts will be asked to study it and make recommendations in this regard in order that members of parliament may have at least minimal participation in the elaboration of the general CBC policy as it applies to its affiliates and as it affects its monstrous budget?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I have to take under advisement the status of the report. However, that certainly does not prevent the hon. member and other members of the broadcasting committee from discussing with the president of the corporation its affiliate policy. I know the CBC would be quite willing to discuss the matter.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

ARGENTINA—SAFETY OF CANADIANS FOLLOWING TAKEOVER OF GOVERNMENT BY ARMED FORCES

Mr. Claude Wagner (Saint-Hyacinthe): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In light of the takeover of the junta in Argentina, can the minister advise the House if he has received a report from the Canadian embassy as to the security of Canadians in Argentina and the protection of property owned by Canadians?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Yes, Mr. Speaker. We had a report yesterday from our ambassador who has informed us that our chancery is operating in a normal way and that there has not been any report of danger to Canadian citizens or Canadian property.

ARGENTINA—POSSIBILITY OF RECOGNITION OF NEW GOVERNMENT—STATUS OF SALE OF CANDU REACTOR

Mr. Claude Wagner (Saint-Hyacinthe): Can the minister advise the House if the government is in the process of granting recognition to the military government now in power in Argentina? Also, in view of the obvious dangers of the unstable political situation, does the government still wish to proceed with the sale of a CANDU reactor to that country?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the embassy of Argentina has been in touch with us advising us of a new government of Argentina. Obviously, the question of recognition by Canada was in the mind of the Argentinian authorities. We have not yet extended recognition and we will do so when the normal criteria are fulfilled. With regard to the sale of a reactor, which is the subject of an intergovernmental agreement, these intergovernmental agreements are binding even though there may be a change of government.

CUBA—SUGGESTED REQUEST FOR WITHDRAWAL OF ARMED FORCES FROM AFRICA

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the Prime Minister. In light of the breakdown of talks in Rhodesia, plus the statement by Secretary of State Henry Kissinger that further aggression in Africa was unacceptable to the United States and the buildup of Soviet and Cuban forces in Mozambique which could lead to the outbreak of all out conflict in Rhodesia and other countries in Africa, will the Prime Minister express to Premier Castro of Cuba the concern of Canadians over the continued participation of his 12,000 troops in African conflict and will he request their withdrawal to Cuba in the interest of world peace?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not hesitate to repeat publicly once again that we are opposed to all outside armed intervention on the African continent, whether it applies to Cuba or any other country.

Mr. Crouse: I can appreciate the Prime Minister's concern. I can assure him it is a concern that is shared by all Canadians, according to correspondence which I and members of my party are receiving. I simply ask at this stage if the Prime Minister will express that concern to Premier Castro by asking him, in the interest of world peace—to withdraw his troops from Africa so there will not be a continued threat of aggression in that part of the world.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crouse: Some members apparently are in agreement with this type of policy. I ask the Prime Minister whether he will give that request consideration.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows that I made such representations to Premier Castro a couple of months ago. I made them to him personally. I will give consideration to the hon. member's suggestion, but I think he flatters me if he thinks I can get Premier Castro to change his mind just by sending him a message when I was not able to do it by talking to him personally.

TRADE

CONFERENCE BETWEEN COPPER PRODUCING AND CONSUMING COUNTRIES—REQUEST FOR REPORT

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. It deals with the conference going on in Geneva between the copper producing and copper consuming countries. Has the minister any report on the conference this week? In particular, will he inform the House who is the person representing Canada?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): On the second part of the question, I apologize. I meant to get this for the hon. member because he asked me privately the other day. I have not got the names of the participants. As to the first part of the question, I can say that the UNCTAD, or United Nations Conference on Trade and Development, has convened its meeting in Geneva and that we are taking an active part—that is to say, Canada is in the conference. In answer to an earlier initiative by the hon. member, let me tell him that the report I have says it is not likely a commodity agreement will be reached at this particular meeting, but it is expected considerable progress will be made toward a more rational approach to the production and supply problem. I will undertake to find out who the representatives are.

SUGGESTED RESTORATION OF INTERNATIONAL WHEAT AGREEMENT—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): In view of the minister's answer which, I presume, means that the government is in favour of international commodity agreements, would the hon. gentleman, as the minister of trade, join with the United States and Australia in trying to restore the International Wheat Agreement because the grain farmers of the world have had no floor protection, now, for eight years?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): I hope I did not convey the wrong impression, Mr. Speaker. I said the objective of the meeting was to discuss commodity agreements. The Canadian position on this subject is that there ought to be a producing as well as a consuming nation arrangement. This might be somewhat different from what the hon. gentleman has in mind. As to the question concerning the International Wheat Agreement, I should like to have some time in which to find out what is the current status of the agreement before trying to reply in detail.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): It ran out.

HEALTH

MEASURES TO ENSURE ADEQUATE SUPPLY OF SWINE 'FLU VACCINE—CONSULTATIONS WITH PROVINCIAL MINISTERS

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare? In view of the possible imminent danger of a worldwide "swine 'flu" epidemic and the decision taken by the President of the United States in that connection I should like to ask what steps are being taken to ensure supplies of vaccine for the immunization of Canadians.

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, we have been in communication with the American authorities for several weeks on that subject, as well as with the World Health Organization and health services in Great Britain. Unfortunately the vaccine as such does not exist now. It will have to be manufactured. In Canada, we have the capacity to produce a maximum of about 300,000 doses until next fall. We would have to get the surplus from abroad. We are currently in consultation with other countries to study this whole matter and I shall perhaps have something to add on that subject early next week.

[English]

Mr. Rynard: Has the minister been in touch with the provincial ministers of health who are awaiting his announcement before deciding what to do?

[Translation]

Mr. Lalonde: The officials of my department should already be in communication with provincial authorities; they have already been in communication with provincial authorities on this subject. If they have not, they will be before the end of the day.

POSSIBILITY OF PROGRAM SIMILAR TO UNITED STATES TO DEAL WITH SWINE 'FLU

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, considering that this illness can affect Canada as well as the United States, can we expect in Canada an announcement similar to the statement the President of the United States made yesterday?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): I would like to remind the hon. member that no case of this illness, of this virus, has been identified in Canada to date. As for the announcement I shall have to make on this subject, the hon. member should show some patience and wait till early next week. Even if I made an announcement today, this would change absolutely nothing. There is no vaccine at the present time.

Mr. Grafftey: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask another supplementary of the minister.

Unless I am mistaken, the minister is telling me that this does not affect Canada as gravely as the United States. I assume this epidemic will stop at the 49th parallel.

Mr. Lalonde: I am afraid the hon. member did not understand my reply and I suggest that he read it carefully. He will then realize that all I said was that there has not yet been any identified case of that illness in Canada. The illness, the virus, is so far limited to a very restricted area of the United States, around Fort Dix, in New Jersey.

Oral Questions

BILINGUALISM

PROPOSED REFERENCE TO COMMITTEE OF CARTWRIGHT REPORT

Mr. Serge Joyal (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct my question to the President of the Treasury Board.

Considering that the conclusions of the research which was carried out by Professor Cartwright of London's Western University, Ontario, on behalf of the Bilingual district Advisory Board, were released by the Secretary of State Department on March 23, 1976, and considering that in the five year census which will be taken in May, the working language will not be on the list of questions asked, against the recommendations of the B and B Commission, will the President of the Treasury Board tell the House whether or not he intends to refer the result of Professor Cartwright's conclusions to the Standing Committee on Broadcasting, Films and Assistance to the Arts so that the issue of the survival of French minorities in Ontario and New Brunswick may be discussed?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, this question was considered within the government during the present study on the report of the commission, although it has not yet been decided to proceed immediately with bilingual districts. We hope to do so very shortly. Of course, we shall then take Professor Cartwright's comments into account.

TRADE

CRITERIA USED TO SELECT DEALERS TO IMPORT EGGS

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question, if I may, to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. As a result of the government decision to double the number of United States eggs imported into Canada, a situation appears to be developing in which the egg import regulations will allow a number of selected egg importers in Canada to share in an annual profit of between $600,000 and $1,000,000. Can the minister describe to the House the criteria used to select the Ontario dealers who will share in this profit? It is understood that at present these licences are approved by one individual, this individual being an official in the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): I, too, saw the news report and have asked for a detailed explanation. I understand, from a casual explanation which has been provided to me, that permits are allocated on the basis of the historic trade pattern to importers who have been in the business in the past, and that there is a surplus wich is allocated on a first come, first served basis. I shall let the hon. member have the details. I might add, though, that I am looking into this whole arrangement. If the quantity is substantially higher, then, conceivably, we ought to increase the number of people who participate.

SUPPLY AND SERVICES

CONTRACT WITH COMPUTING DEVICES FOR SAMSON PROJECT—DATE FOR DELIVERY OF TERMINALS

Mr. Paul Dick (Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Supply and Services or to the Minister of National Defence—it is supplementary to a question asked yesterday by the member for Grenville-Carleton. In view of the fact that Computing Devices of Canada have allegedly lost a contract for supplying computer terminals can the minister advise whether or not the officers in the Samson program office had advised Computing Devices of Canada that they did not need any terminals until September of this year, although it was later?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, the contract entered into by Computing Devices of Canada was cancelled because the company did not fulfill its obligations with respect to both the date of delivery and the price indicated in the tender, which it wanted to have revised, a request which is absolutely unacceptable.

[English]

Mr. Dick: I appreciate the details which the minister has been able to provide. I am inquiring as to whether or not the Samson program office at any time, even though there may have been a delay in the contract, said to Computing Devices: We do not need the terminals until September, 1976?

[Translation]

Mr. Goyer: Mr. Speaker, I shall inquire about this situation.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

UNITED NATIONS RESOLUTION OUTLAWING TRADE IN NAMIBIAN GOODS—CANADIAN POSITION ON RATIFICATION

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the fact that the United Nations have passed a resolution outlawing trade in Namibian goods and in view of the fact that these goods are still entering Canada legally, since Canada has not ratified or consented to the UN motion, may I ask when is it Canada's intention to concur in the UN motion—or is it the intention to continue to permit entry of Namibian goods?

● (1450)

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the only sanctions that Canada had accepted within the United Nations system, of course, are the sanctions that applied to Rhodesia, and there have been no such sanctions applied with regard to trade with Namibia.

INCOME TAX

WRITEOFFS GRANTED FALCONBRIDGE NICKEL—REQUEST FOR REPORT

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, my question is supplementary and is addressed to the Minister of National Revenue. I understand that a couple of weeks ago at a meeting of national church leaders with the Prime Minister concerning tax writeoffs being granted to Falconbridge Nickel as a result of investments in Namibia it was decided to refer the matter of these benefits to the Department of National Revenue for review and decision. I wonder whether the minister could report when we may have some action in respect of Falconbridge?

Hon. Jack Cullen (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I will discuss it with my officials and try to get back to the hon. member sometime today and give him an exact time.

GRAIN

FEED GRAIN—POSSIBILITY OF PLEBISCITE ON MARKETING SYSTEM IN VIEW OF MINISTER'S PROMISE

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board. In view of the promise he made in May, 1974, that he would have a plebiscite on marketing of domestic feed grains within one year of the inception of the program, and in view of the fact that the Minister of Agriculture yesterday said he was not aware of that promise, and that the promise is now one year overdue, I would ask the minister whether he is going to keep the promise and, if so, when are we going to have the plebiscite?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I have indicated prior to this time to farm organizations and farmers that not all parts of the feed grain program are in place yet and, in addition, the very unusual marketing conditions for grain have made it somewhat difficult to assess the program. I have not, therefore, arrived at a decision as to the time it would be appropriate.

POSSIBILITY OF MARKETING ALL GRAINS THROUGH WHEAT BOARD—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the Food Prices Review Board has commissioned a study on the futures market and has concluded that the marketing of grain on the open market means lower prices for producers and higher prices and costs to consumers, I wonder whether the minister is reconsidering the policy and now intends to bring all grains under the purview of the Canadian Wheat Board?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): No, Mr. Speaker, I do not agree with the premise of the question.

BARLEY—LOSSES RESULTING FROM WIDE SPREAD BETWEEN PRICES FOR TWO GRADES—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO COMPENSATE

Mr. Craig Stewart (Marquette): Mr. Speaker, last Friday I asked the acting minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board the following question which he took as notice, and I wonder if the minister can answer it for me today:

Many farmers are annoyed at the fact that in the 1974-75 crop year when they shipped cars of barley for malting, one car would be graded 2CW and the next No. 1 feed, yet both cars ended up for malting. Then, this year the final payments of 99 cents per bushel for 2CW and 18 cents for No. 1 feed were announced. Can the acting minister tell the House what the government plans to do to compensate the farmers for this unrealistic spread in the final payments between 2CW barley and No. 1 feed which amounted to losses of $2,000 per car for many farmers?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I believe the hon. member has in his hands a two-page letter which details the situation and which indicates that there are two parts to the problem in respect of the differences in final payments last year. One of these problems, it is hoped, will be cured by the creation of a separate malting barley pool, and a bill to amend the Canadian Wheat Board Act is before the House. The other problem relates to the fact that the barley originally selected is reclassed as feed and goes into the regular feed pool, and then later on, as the Wheat Board sells barley, it may well sell that barley for malting in a year when there is a great shortage of malting barley. This is a matter of internal Wheat Board distribution of grains. Those farmers who received a final payment for additional barley shared in the amount that was available from that barley sold as malting.

Mr. Stewart (Marquette): Mr. Speaker, hopefully Bill C-88 will correct this situation in the future, but could the minister tell me what his plans are to compensate the farmers for the severe losses they suffered in the 1974-75 crop year?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I have no plans at all. For a number of years I had discussions with farm organizations on the question of a separate pool for malting barley, but they were generally not very receptive to the idea and, therefore, we did not move to create a separate pool. About a year ago when they indicated they had changed their position and would accept a separate pool we immediately made a move in that direction and put a bill before the House.

DATE OF DECISION ON NEW TRIAL FOR KEITH LATTA

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I gave notice to the Minister of Justice of this question regarding a matter I have asked about before, namely, the Keith Latta case. Now that the meeting with departmental officials of both the federal Justice Department and the Attorney General of Alberta, on March 10 last, has been held in reference to the Latta murder case, when will the minister be in a position to make a ministerial decision regarding a new trial for Mr. Latta, particularly in view of the fact that he may have been wrongfully convincted because of a signed statement by Miss Sylvia McCauley, who later married the jury foreman, which statement was made in 1972 and corroborates Latta's version as to the facts? I wonder now if the minister can tell us when he will be in a position to make a decision on such an important matter of justice, particularly in view of the fact that this man may be wrongfully incarcerated?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): I would hope very soon, Mr. Speaker. However, since the hon. member last asked a question on this matter, we have had very considerable difficulty interviewing the witness involved and, in fact, have had to proceed without interviewing her. We are now awaiting the formation of a final decision and report from the Alberta Attorney General's office.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the evidence may have been known to the Crown but not presented at the trial, and may have influenced defence counsel at the time not to call the accused to give evidence on his own behalf, and if this evidence had been heard by the jury the verdict may have been one of acquittal and not one of guilty, will the minister not take these facts into consideration, particularly the fact that this was not known to defence counsel?

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, without accepting entirely that version of the trial, in making a decision either to refer the matter back to the court of appeal or to have a new trial we will take all factors into account.

THE MINISTRY

PUBLIC DISCUSSION OF CASE AGAINST STATION CFCF MONTREAL BY SOLICITOR GENERAL—REQUEST FOR REPORT

Mr. Jake Epp (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct my question to the Solicitor General and it relates to a question I asked on Tuesday regarding his conversion on a Winnipeg radio program which led him to comment at the end that he hoped his comments were not in contempt of court. In view of his statements regarding a case presently before the Quebec courts involving CFCF radio station, Montreal, I would like to ask whether he has discussed this matter with the Prime Minister, as the Prime Minister gave me his undertaking would happen, and has he anything to report about this rather unusual conduct of a minister of the Crown?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I did discuss this with the Prime Minister and the Minister of Communications. As the hon. member points out, I was on a hotline show and was asked what I thought about the CRTC investigation into radio station CFCF. I was asked if I thought this was an infringement of the freedom of the press. I said I felt the CRTC had an obligation to investigate this complaint, but I did not know what the outcome of the investigation would be. I also said I had objected to Bill C-22 and that as far as I knew I did not see anything wrong with doing that.

COMMUNICATIONS

CABLEVISION—POSSIBILITY OF GRANTING NEW POWERS TO PROVINCES FOLLOWING CONSULTATION

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I wish to put a question to the Minister of Communications.

During a conference last week in Montreal, the minister stated that in the near future Quebec could very well exercise some quite legitimate powers over many local but very important aspects of cablevision. In view of the cultural impact of cablevision on all small communities whose vitality she deems essential to the cultural integrity of Quebec, in the present circumstances and given the quite different but very encouraging attitude of her predecessor, I would ask the minister if she intends to put forward, as soon as possible, some propositions corresponding to the spirit of her conference last week so we will know the powers she seems willing to leave to the provinces?

Hon. Jeanne Sauvé (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member is racking his brains to find significant differences between the propositions put forward by my predecessor and mine. Basically, in my speech last week I tried to summarize all the propositions already made in rather broad terms, I admit, but I also submitted them to the provinces in broad terms because the negotiations will not be initiated with the same provinces. I said it was necessary, in my opinion, particularly for the province of Quebec if it is to maintain its cultural integrity that it regain some authority over the cable system which undoubtedly has a local impact and which can have a great effect on the culture of small communities. Consequently I reiterated this offer which was never withdrawn, and the terms of this offer will get more precise as I grow more aware of the provinces' claims and needs.

Mr. La Salle: Mr. Speaker, in view of the answer of the Minister, who always seems very cooperative, may I ask her if she intends to meet the provincial ministers involved in this issue and to inform the House of the decisions by way of propositions?

Mrs. Sauvé: Mr. Speaker, no meeting of Ministers of Communications has been arranged for the near future. However, next week I will initiate a visit of the provinces to get in touch with my provincial counterparts.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I might ask the government House leader, although the business for the day is pretty well confirmed, what the business is for tomorrow and the beginning of next week.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, tomorrow we will resume consideration of the second reading of Bill C-89, the amendments to the Anti-Inflation Act. If second reading should be concluded tomorrow—which seems to be the prospect—and any votes are required, I believe there would be a disposition to put them off until the first order of government business on Monday. When the second reading of Bill C-89 is concluded, we will call Bill S-31, the third reading of Bill C-61, and consideration of amendments made by the Senate to Bill C-71. That business, if not concluded tomorrow, will be continued on Monday, and we will then return to the second reading of Bill C-83.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, there is one further matter which arose during the course of the question period. I wonder, because the Prime Minister did not want to offend the rules of the House and he did not answer or comment in respect of my question concerning the tabling of the contracts with Reisman and Grandy tomorrow, whether the government House leader, as part of the House business, might review the question I asked and inform the House tomorrow whether or not there would be this submission. At the same time, would he undertake overnight to speak to the Minister of National Defence and give him a lecture in respect of his cabinet responsibility in knowing what his deputy ministers are doing.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre on the same point of order.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I realize that Thursday will not seem like Thursday if I do not have to ask again the question I have asked every Thursday since last October. May I assume that before next Thursday we will have the bill respecting Canadian Veterans who were prisoners of war?

Mr. Sharp: Yes, it is my intention to bring down notice of that bill either tomorrow or very shortly.

ELECTORAL BOUNDARIES READJUSTMENT ACT

OBJECTIONS TO COMMISSION REPORT RESPECTING ONTARIO

Mr. Speaker: It is my duty to inform the House that an objection signed by the hon. members for Spadina (Mr. Stollery), London West (Mr. Buchanan), Rosedale (Mr. Macdonald), Halton (Mr. Philbrook), York Centre (Mr. Kaplan), Windsor West (Mr. Gray), York East (Mr. Collenette), Sarnia-Lambton (Mr. Cullen), Trinity (Miss Nicholson), Hamilton Mountain (Mr. MacFarlane), Welland (Mr. Railton), St. Catharines (Mr. Parent) and Scarborough West (Mr. Martin) has been filed with me, pursuant to section 20 of the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act, chapter E-2, RSC 1970, to the report of the Electoral Boundaries Commission for the province of Ontario.

If the House agrees, may we appendix these objections to today's Votes and Proceedings?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Further, I have received an objection signed by the hon. members for Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton (Mr. Dick), Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence), Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker), Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo (Mr. Beatty), Prince Edward-Hastings (Mr. Hees), Oxford (Mr. Halliday), Lambton-Kent (Mr. Holmes), Halton-Wentworth (Mr. Kempling), Victoria-Haliburton (Mr. Scott) and Simcoe North (Mr. Rynard), which has been filled with me pursuant to section 20 of the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act, chapter E-2, RSC 1970, to the report of the Electoral Boundaries Commission for the province of Ontario.

Again, may we agree that these objections be made an appendix to today's Votes and Proceedings.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

OBJECTIONS TO COMMISSION REPORT RESPECTING QUEBEC

Mr. Speaker: May I also inform the House that an objection signed by the hon. members for Chambly (Mr. Loiselle), Sainte-Marie (Mr. Dupont), Levis (Mr. Guay), Beauce (Mr. Caron), Longueuil (Mr. Olivier), Argenteuil-Deux-Montagnes (Mr. Fox), Saint-Michel (Miss Begin), Gaspé (Mr. Cyr), Compton (Mr. Tessier), St. Boniface (Mr. Guay), and Duvernay (Mr. Demers), has been filed with me pursuant to section 20 of the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act, chapter E-2, RSC 1970, to the report of the Electoral Boundaries Commission for the province of Quebec.

If the House agrees, we will make this an appendix to today's Votes and Proceedings.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

LIFT PROGRAMME

Question No. 3,526—Mr. Hamilton (Qu'appelle-Moose Mountain):

1. What was the total amount paid under the LIFT Programme?

2. What was the cultivated wheat acreage in (a) Saskatchewan (b) Manitoba (c) Alberta in (i) 1963 (ii) 1969 (iii) 1970?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): 1. $63,106,576.

Saskatchewan	17,910,000	16,600,000	8,000,000
Manitoba	3,153,000	2,500,000	1,400,000
Alberta	5,933,000	5,300,000	2,600,000

USE OF X-RAY BY CHIROPRACTORS IN CANADA

Question No. 3,701—Mr. Orlikow:

1. Has the Minister of National Health and Welfare information on the extent of the use of X-rays by chiropractors in Canada and, if so, does he, or the Health Protection Branch, medically agree with the use of total body chiropractic X-rays on the Canadian public?

2. Has the Minister information on the extent of treatment of children by chiropractors?

3. Does the government extend official recognition to the practice of chiropractic in any way, for example, the signing of passports, workmens compensation, etc.?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): 1. The Radiation Protection Bureau of Health Protection Branch has recently initiated a computer program for collecting and analyzing data on the radiation doses received by Canadians in the course of medical and para-medical diagnostic procedures. Discussions are proceeding with provincial health departments at the technical level with the object of incorporating data from provincial X-ray surveillance programs into the central pool. However, the study has not yet proceeded to the point where the extent of use of X-rays by chiropractors can be evaluated. However, based upon utilization data of those provinces that pay for chiropractic and chiropractic X-rays under their medical care plans, and other related data, it is estimated that some 584,000 chiropractic X-rays were taken in Canada during 1974. As chiropractors are free to bill patients for additional services not covered by provincial plans, and since Workmen's Compensation Board cases were not included, the foregoing estimates likely understate the case. It appears that in practice, chiropractors generally do not use either total body or full spinal X-rays as a matter of routine, but use X-rays for selected areas of the spinal column. Chiropractors use X-rays essentially for diagnostic purposes and not as a selective screening process or as a routine evaluation of new patients. The Health Protection Branch regards X-rays as an essential diagnostic tool, although their use involves some risk to the patient and should, therefore, be used only for valid medical reasons. Full spinal chiropractic X-ray examinations are not regarded by the Health Protection Branch as medically justifiable and this view is shared by the Canadian Medical Association.

2. Based upon the utilization data and other factors mentioned in Part 1, it is estimated that some 144,000 services or 2.1 per cent of all chiropractic services rendred during 1974 were for children 14 years of age and under. Of these 144,000 services, 4.4 per cent involved the use of X-ray. When children 15 of 19 years of age are included, the number of services increases to 332,000 and the percentage of services involving the use X-ray increases to 5.2 per cent.

3. The signature of a chiropractor is considered satisfactory for certification of federal employee sick leave (Form NHW-500). Subject to certain conditions chiropractic reports are accepted by the Department of National Health and Welfare medical officers who review Unemployment Insurance Commission medical assessments. Chiropractors are excluded from the list of passport guarantors. The Royal Canadian Mounted Police has added chiropractice as a benefit under its employee benefit plan. The Group Surgical Medical Insurance Plan for federal employees provides chiropractic benefits beyond those provided by the provincial insurance program. Several provincial health insurance plans cover chiropractic care on a limited basis, although the federal government does not share in these latter benefits as an insured service under the Medical Care Program. Workmen's Compensation Boards in all provinces except Quebec and Newfoundland have authorized workmen to receive chiropractic care.

POST OFFICE—ELECTRONIC SURVEILLANCE EQUIPMENT

Question No. 3,989—Mr. MacKay:

1. Has new electronic surveillance equipment been installed in post offices and stations across Canada and, if so, which ones?

2. What is the actual or estimated cost of having such equipment installed in a (a) large (b) medium (c) small sized postal station?

3. To what extent will such equipment be used to monitor postal sorters and other inside workers and will the surveillance be daily?

4. Will letter carriers and wicket workers also be monitored?

Mr. Paul E. McRae (Parliamentary Secretary to Postmaster General): 1. No electronic observation equipment installations have yet been completed.

2. It is not contemplated that such equipment would necessarily be considered for all post offices in the various categories questioned. (a) The estimated cost for an equipment installation in a large post office (Grade 10 and up) is $250,000 plus, depending upon actual size. (b) The estimated cost for a medium post office (Grades 8 and 9) is an average of $70,000. (c) The estimated cost for a small post office (Grade 7 or lower) is an average of $40,000.

3. The equipment will be used solely by postal inspectors, only when there are reasonable grounds to believe that criminal activities are taking place in a postal facility. It is not proposed to use such equipment on a daily basis nor for productivity or staff control purposes.

4. Equipment will be used to observe any person located in a postal facility where there is reason to believe criminal activities may be taking place. No such observation equipment will be used in employee rest rooms or cafeterias.

MAIL REPORTED MISSING OR STOLEN

Question No. 3,990—Mr. MacKay:

1. In each of the past five years, how many pieces of mail were reported missing or stolen and how many were eventually recovered?

2. For the same years, by province, how much money was paid from the Post Office budget as remuneration for lost mail?

3. From what part of the budget was this remuneration taken?

4. Are monies for the remuneration set at a certain limit in each fiscal year and, if not, is the amount limitless?

5. For the same years, did the Post Office Department recover any money from persons convicted or dismissed for mail theft and, if so, which section received the money?

Mr. Paul E. McRae (Parliamentary Secretary to Postmaster General): 1. Customer Complaints Received by District Offices for Ordinary Letter, Parcel and Special Delivery Losses.

Fiscal Year	Total
1970-71	55,231
1972-73	68,856
1973-74	72,932

NOTE: Our recording system does not include such information as the number of items reported stolen or the rate of recovery of articles said to have been lost.

2. Provincial indemnity payments made for all classes of Domestic losses over the past five fiscal years are shown on the attached sheet. We are unable to give separate payments made by N.B. and P.E.I., and B.C. and Yukon, as combined reports are submitted. Payments for uninsured items are only included in provincial totals for the fiscal years 1973-74 and 1974-75.

3. Indemnity payments for losses of registered, insured and C.O.D. items are paid out of postal revenue in accordance with the provisions of Section 5 (1)(C)(i), (ii) and (iv) of the Post Office Act.

4. By gazetted regulations, the amount of indemnity payable on individual claims is limited and the Department may authorize payment of claims within these limits.

5. On a number of occasions in the past five years, the Post Office Department has recovered monies from persons convicted or dismissed, and in each instance the monies recovered were either returned to the rightful owner(s) or deposited to the Post Office account. Such monies were recovered as a result of voluntary restitutions by offenders or pursuant to orders issued by the Courts.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

INTERIM SUPPLY ENDING MARCH 31, 1977

Hon. Jean Chrétien (President of Treasury Board) moved that Bill C-91, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending March 31, 1977, be read the second time and referred to committee of the whole.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order to express the hope that we might come to some understanding about today's arrangements. We, on this side of the House, would like all the debate on Bill C-91 to take place in committee of the whole. I am not sure the government is in full agreement with that, but perhaps we could have some statement from the government House leader so that we could have an understanding as to how we are to spend the day on this bill.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, following upon what the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has said, I think there is the same disposition on the part of the official opposition. I think it would be best, in what is a rather unique procedure, that we go right into committee of the whole for consideration of the bill. I hope the government House leader will agree. I think there will be ample opportunity for the statement someone would normally make on second reading to be made at the committee stage.

Mr. Sharp: On the same point of order, Mr. Speaker, it is not the government's intention to have a long debate on second reading. However, I think it would be desirable for the minister to present the bill and if, of course, there should be a disposition on the part of members on the other side of the House to contribute to the debate on second reading, we could not stop them if they wished to participate. However, on this side of the House I have an understanding that the minister will be the only speaker.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, under the Financial Administration Act, the government is requesting from the House, through this second bill, an appropriation of funds, the authorization to spend approximately $4.971 billion during the fiscal period 1976-77, which is slightly more than one quarter of the disbursements I submitted on February 18. By the same token, the government is asking for the authorization to borrow up to $6 billion to finance public works and other projects during the fiscal year starting April 1, an amount unchanged from 1975-76. It goes without saying that the government will not necessarily make use of this entire borrowing power. And my colleague the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) has assured me that if such was the desire of the hon. members, he could personally come to a committee of the House to explain that borrowing policy for 1976-77.

As indicated yesterday by my colleague, the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Sharp), the changes made to procedure governing the passing of this bill give members the opportunity to express their opinion on the spending policy and the borrowing policy of the government.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I will take the opportunity offered me by this intervention on second reading to comment on and refute some of the criticisms directed toward this policy since the submission of the main estimates last February 18.

[English]

Hon. members are aware that many Canadians are concerned about the scope and effectiveness of public spending at all levels of government. We share these concerns which have been promoted by the abnormally high increase in federal and provincial expenditures during the last two years. Accordingly, we have taken a series of measures to limit the growth of expenditures, to curb the expansion of the public service and to improve productivity throughout the government.

Costs can be, and have been controlled; productivity gains can be, and have been, achieved in the federal public service. This is very much the business of the Treasury Board and its secretariat, and they have been far from inactive. Ministers and senior executives will testify—even complain, occasionally—that over the years the budgetary controls administered by the secretariat's program branch have become much more rigorous. The administrative policy branch has kept regulations and guidelines constantly under review and tightened them whenever feasible and justifiable.

The personnel policy branch had managed to keep the salaries and wages of federal public servants at levels comparable to the average remuneration of other Canadians in similar occupational categories. The planning branch, apart from conducting, each year, effectiveness and efficiency analyses in major policy areas, as well as government-wide managerial studies, has developed and begun to implement systems of operational performance measurements and methods of benefit-cost analysis applicable to government operations.

Judging from the accusations they make right and left, it is not unwarranted to remind hon. members of the opposition some of our recent initiatives in this field.

On January 22 of this year, a Treasury Board circular informed federal departments and agencies of reductions they have to make in administrative practices of the government, to comply with the Prime Minister's undertaking to reduce government spendings, as part of the fight against inflation. These reductions affect in particular the purchase of photocopying equipment and of motor vehicles, the participation of public servants in non-government conferences, office furniture, travels and the use of taxis.

I do not believe these measures will enable us to save huge amounts. However they will generate necessary restraint in the public administration and put an end to abuses which, though not too frequent, rightly concerned Canadian taxpayers.

In February, I urged the Treasury Board officials, in the memoranda they were sending to deputy ministers and managers of federal agencies, to remind them of the announcement made last December by the Prime Minister, who emphasized that the budgetary restraint policy of the government was not to be applied in the current year only, but had to be maintained for several years in order to be efficient.

In early March, following the review by the Auditor General on financial management and control within the federal government, I announced the creation of a new branch of the financial administration within the secretariat of the Treasury Board. On the same day, I announced to the Standing Committee on Public Accounts that we fully agreed with 22 out of 34 recommendations by the Auditor General, that we accepted with some reservations 10 other recommendations and that only two were unacceptable to us. It has been argued by some people, when hearing of this new branch, that the government had finally decided to appoint a "watchdog" for federal spendings. It is not so, Mr. Speaker. As I said earlier, the Program Branch of the secretariat has been examining the estimates of the various departments for a long time, just as the Planning Branch has been assessing their efficiency and output and the Administrative Policy Branch has been reviewing their practices in many areas, including financial administration. The re-structure now under way is rather designed to strengthen and tighten financial controls that have existed for many decades.

[English]

To complete this review of some of our recent initiatives toward better spending control, I might add that the secretary of the Treasury Board, at my request, tabled this morning in the public accounts committee the new benefit-cost analysis guide which is being issued to all departments and agencies. As you know, the Treasury Board has been actively involved in fostering the use of this modern management technique by individual government departments, while carrying out itself a number of benefit-cost studies of major expenditure programs.

Put simply, benefit-cost analyses can provide ministers and public administrators with some rough and ready measures of the social usefulness of a project or program by considering all the benefits to society arising from it—even the less tangible one—and comparing them with the total cost of the project. It is not a substitute for administrative, common sense or political judgment, but it provides a more concrete basis, more economic facts, on which to apply such common sense or judgment. The new guide prepared by the planning branch of the Treasury Board secretariat lays down the conceptual framework for benefit-cost analysis, discusses the methodological problems which government analysts must resolve, and gives them practical advice on how they should proceed.

Finally, I would like to announce a further measure to trim down operating costs and raise productivity levels within the federal public service. At my request, the Secretary of the Treasury Board wrote last week to all deputy ministers and heads of agencies to inform them of the government's decision to establish a senior interdepartmental committee on administrative improvements. The terms of reference of the committee are as follows: first, to identify those areas in which improvements can be made in the management and control of administrative inputs; second, to establish priorities for the review of those areas; third, to establish or redefine the study objective and the organization required to develop solutions to each of the identified areas in which improvements can be made; fourth, to make recommendations to the cabinet, as required, through the Treasury Board, on the administrative improvements proposed as a result of the studies; fifth, to recommend to the Treasury Board the most effective means of implementing and monitoring the administrative improvements approved by cabinet as a result of the studies; sixth, to report semi-annually to the Treasury Board and, if appropriate, to the cabinet on the progress of the committee.

A number of departments and agencies will be permanently involved in the committee because the scope and complexity of their operations require attention on a continuing basis; others will be invited to participate whenever the committee deems it useful to review operations under their responsibility where efficiency could be improved and savings made. But I suspect that this is far too complicated to discuss in detail in the House with hon. members of the opposition. They are not really interested in a more efficient public service or in more effective government programs. What they want is blood on the floor and a knife in the financial gut of every department, even if its operations are vital to the Canadian economy; even if thousands of people are thrown out of work, and even if economic and social progress is brought to a halt.

Mr. Paproski: Shame on you, Jean.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Towers: Mr Speaker, I take strong exception to the remarks of the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Chrétien) because of the hours of toil members of the public accounts committee have put into the committee and in working on this type of program. While we may have doubts as to the agreement of the President of the Treasury Board to go along with the recommendations of the Auditor General, I certainly take exception to his comments.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member will admit that this is a question of opinion and has no relation to the procedure of this House. The hon. member can intervene at a later time in committee of the whole.

Mr. Chrétien: I think that is a good illustration, Mr. Speaker, of why the people of Canada decided that we should sit on this side—because hon. members opposite are not able to face any criticism. They spend days and days criticizing. I read three or four lines from my speech, and they blew up. Obviously, they are not ready to take the responsibility of running the nation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Call an election: we'll show you.

An hon. Member: What do you think this is—a hockey game?

Mr. Chrétien: If you want a good fight, okay, let's go.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Chrétien: All we hear from hon. members opposite on expenditure policy are contradictory and irresponsible statements, constant bickering and politicking to confuse and mislead Canadians.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Chrétien: Our Conversative opponents, for example, profess to be shocked by the recent rise in federal spending.

An hon. Member: Who wrote that speech?

Mr. Paproski: Is that an $800 speech, or a $1,600 speech?

Mr. Chrétien: We have a good government. We are well organized and we have good speeches.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Chrétien: It is unbelievable how they lose their control. They profess to be shocked, even if additional expenditures are mainly attributable to policies which they urged upon us and supported, such as subsidies to oil importers in the eastern provinces. The official opposition misses no opportunity to call for spending cuts, but always in general, never in specific terms. Hon. members opposite sneer when we point out that it is difficult to limit outlays on statutory programs, but they make it even more difficult with their stalling and filibustering when we try to do it.

There was an example of that shameless double-talk last week during the debate on the medical care legislation. Conveniently forgetting the mindless calls of their colleagues from Don Valley (Mr. Gillies) and Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) for austerity and more austerity, the Conservative members from Huron-Middlesex (Mr. McKinley), St. John's East (Mr. McGrath), Joliette (Mr. La Salle) and Prince George-Peace River (Mr. Oberle), did their best to delay passage of that bill, as if the government could live indefinitely with runaway medicare costs. They have been consistent. We are here every day, and there is not a single question period in which some of them do not get up and ask for more expenditures.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The debate in this House on second reading of Bill C-68 is over. This is no time for the minister to revive that debate.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

An hon. Member: It was stopped by closure, remember!

Mr. Chrétien: Okay.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Tell us about Bill C-91.

Mr. Chrétien: The expenditure policy of the government between 1968 and 1973 can be considered as the continuation of post-war Liberal economics which have been so beneficial for Canada. Federal expenditures were allowed to grow at a rate which varied from year to year depending upon the needs of federal programs and the requirements of the economy as a whole. Because we introduced new programs and expanded many of the existing ones, the share of national output, absorbed by federal expenditures, increased slightly—by less than 1 per cent on average, but the growth of real GNP remained above 5 per cent during that entire five-year period, with the single exception of 1970. Moreover, the surpluses accumulated during the good years, on a national accounts basis, more than offset the deficit incurred in 1971 and 1972. What happened, then, in the past two years? Why were we not, in 1974 and 1975, able to maintain the balanced policy of the previous five years? Why has the increase in federal expenditures been higher than usual? Why was it necessary to absorb a sizeable deficit last year?

My colleague, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald), will have much to say on these questions in his forthcoming budget speech. However, the short answer is that the four-fold increase in oil prices, compounding years of chronic inflation and instability in international markets, plunged the world economy into its worst slump since the end of the Second World War—and, confronted with declining exports and sluggish domestic demand, our government simply rejected the Bennett solution. We refused to make matters worse by savage cuts in federal spending, even when slower growth cut into our revenues and when inflation bloated our expenditures.

[Mr. Chrétien.]

With the support of all provincial governments, including those of oil producing provinces, we refused to let the oil importing provinces of eastern Canada bear, without relief, the full burden of higher energy prices. But that cost a great deal of money. Had it not been for oil compensation payments, the over-all increase of federal expenditures—measured on the public accounts basis—would have been about $4.2 billion less in the last two fiscal years as well as the one beginning on April 1, but the private sector would then have been saddled with a huge financial burden which would have depressed the economy even more. The fact that the recession was relatively milder in Canada than in most other industrial countries, and much milder than in the United States, bears testimony to the basic soundness of our economic policies. We have managed to avoid a contraction in real output even in 1975, a year when only half a dozen members of the OECD group were able to achieve any real growth.

In conclusion, I should like to remind our critics that the main estimates of expenditure are only one half of the government's budgetary policy. They must wait for the budget speech proper to learn about the other half, namely, the government's policy and expectations concerning revenues, borrowings and general economic conditions during 1976 and the early part of 1977. I am sure my colleague, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) will greatly enlighten them on that issue.

Unlike Conservatives and New Democrats, Liberals are not dogmatic about public expenditures. We believe that the government should not hesitate to spend more when the state of the economy and the general welfare of Canadians require it. But we also believe that the government should not hesitate to trim its sails when conditions change and the private sector provides adequate impetus for economic growth. In addition, whatever may be the level of expenditures, the government constantly tries to ensure that funds are spent efficiently and that Canadians are provided with effective public services—and I mean all ministers, not just the President of the Treasury Board. I am so enthusiastic about my job that I sometimes get carried away.

Mr. Paproski: Like this afternoon.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Chrétien: A few weeks ago I said that I am the only one who has an incentive to control public spending. I was speaking, of course, for the Treasury Board of which the Minister of Finance is also a member and on which nine other ministers sit either as permanent or alternate members. But even then I was perhaps unfair to my colleagues. They are responsible for programs which are all essential, one way or another, for the continued economic, social and cultural development of Canada. It is, therefore, natural that they should constantly strive to improve and expand these programs, and such improvements usually cost money. Since resources are always limited, the Treasury Board must, unfortunately, intervene at this point to implement the over-all expenditure policy previously set by all ministers.

I can assure the House that the overwhelming majority of submissions made by ministers to the Treasury Board stay within the financial guidelines and the social priorities set by cabinet, but I must emphasize that the few submissions that are beyond these guidelines are not rejected out of hand. The responsible minister then discusses the matter with his friendly treasurer; sometimes he manages to convince me that the projected expenditure is indeed an essential and urgent one, and sometimes I manage to convince him that the project can be delayed or phased over several years.

I wanted to make these few comments, Mr. Speaker. I have cut out the middle of my speech because I am so involved in the technology of the government that I did not want to lose my natural instinct to be a little bit of a politician—because that is what this House is all about. I am certain that if I did it would annoy my friends opposite. I do not want them to look too bad for the public, because they are so thin-skinned that the public might think they will never be able to form a government. Of course, I do not want to be part of the government for generations and generations.

An hon. Member: Speak for yourself, Jean.

Mr. Paproski: You won't be, after 1978.

An hon. Member: In 1978 you will be on this side of the House.

Mr. Chrétien: I love to have this kind of debate, Mr. Speaker, with a little bit of life in this House of Commons—and my good friend from Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) is in complete agreement. I think that on occasion we have to debate some aspects of interim supply because we want to have the money to operate until the end of June. In committee, of course, members will have occasion to review all the expenditures. There is a good procedure for that, but we must have authority to spend on an interim basis until June 30. All members on the various committees of the House will have occasion not only to question me but to question all ministers about their estimates and the operation of their departments.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I want to say that this bill is a new procedure. I was a bit caught by surprise because I thought it was to be a long debate on second reading. It is obvious that I have worked very hard on this speech—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Chrétien: —just to accommodate my hon. friends. But I have cut many pages from it. Many of them were to be very political, and I know I should not be political so let us go back to the figures. I am always willing to co-operate with members of parliament and give them all information possible. I have taken many of their recommendations into account. I am glad to say that members of the public accounts committee have developed good working relations. In fact, the other day we set a precedent; the chairman of the committee is a member of the opposition, the Auditor General was there, and so was I, and the three of us were in complete agreement. I think that is the way we should go about controlling expenditures within government. In fact, it is not a question of being on one side of government or on the other side—we have a collective responsibility to make sure the money is well spent. I am not a member of the Social Credit party, and it is too bad no one from that party is in the House.

An hon. Member: That is nasty.

Mr. Chrétien: We do not print the money; we collect it from taxpayers, and that is why we are careful with every penny.

Mr. Alkenbrack: A point of order, Mr. Speaker, may I ask the minister a question regarding part of the schedule of Bill C-91?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. This will have to be done when we are in committee of the whole. The motion in front of us is for second reading of the bill. We cannot debate the bill at this time unless we do so on its principle. This is not the time for the calling of questions.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I think there was a general understanding that the minister would be permitted to make the statement he did and then we would immediately go into committee of the whole and take care of those matters. I understood that to be the case. The government House leader is not here, but I think that was the understanding.

Mr. Chrétien: That is the understanding.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. There is no definite order, but there seems to be an understanding.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Laniel in the chair.

On clause 2.

Mr. Stevens: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Chairman. If I understood the President of the Treasury Board correctly, I believe he indicated that the Minister of Finance would be willing to appear and give us an explanation concerning the borrowing requirements as indicated in clause 5 of the bill before us. I was wondering whether we could have the minister take up that suggestion and request that the Minister of Finance so appear.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Chairman, I discussed this matter with the Minister of Finance during the question period and he said that he would be available, when requested by the House, to come and deal with the borrowing authority requirement in this bill. I think that is an improvement on the rule, because I know the frustration of members with the strict rule we had before: it was not satisfactory.

Mr. Stevens: Eight o'clock?

Mr. Chrétien: I will check and report to the House.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Chairman, it is always a pleasure to have the bureaucrat, turned politician return to the chamber and hope to find blood on the floor. I found it particularly interesting that he stabbed himself in the course of his own speech. Perhaps the blood on the floor is his own! I am glad he changed his tune somewhere after the middle part of his speech, because I had assumed that this procedure, which was a special procedure, was brought about because of the absolutely ridiculous ways in which this parliament, representing as we do the people of the country, is without the ability realistically to review the estimates and expenditures of government.

A few minutes ago the minister suggested that standing committees can review estimates. I tell the minister that I and other hon. members, including government supporters, have attempted to do this elsewhere, and I tell him that our rules of procedure do not permit us to examine in depth the details of government spending.

Many years ago, when I was a student at Carleton University, I used to sit in the gallery and watch the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and others consider the estimates in committee of the whole. Then the House exercised control over government spending. We watched committee of the whole deal with the estimates of each minister. The consideration of estimates was not restricted by time. The quality of ministers' answers determined how long estimates were given consideration. Only after the minister had answered all questions were the estimates passed. Some ministers were candid with the committee, others were not so candid. When ministers were candid, no matter how complex their estimates were, the estimates were passed. If ministers did not answer fully, or refused to answer, or evaded questions—as ministers have been known to do from time to time—the estimates were held up.

The rules were changed in 1969. The review of estimates was made the responsibility of standing committees and the rights of members restricted. It became difficult for members to determine the real cost and purpose of various provisions in the estimates, and almost impossible to see if they were sound. It is one thing for any minister to tell the House he has embarked on a program, but quite another for parliament to be satisfied that the program is operating properly as the minister may claim. At present, the representatives of this country's 23 million people are given little right to examine the estimates. Certain things, nonetheless, are apparent. The government claims that it has no control over the growth of certain expenditures, but it is evident that it is responsible for increased spending in certain areas in which there is no evidence of diminution of costs.

Let me quote some figures. About 45 per cent of the increase in government spending is attributable to grants, contributions and transfer payments. Yet in other areas, significant savings could be made. It is clearly evident that the bulk of the increase in spending is accounted for by spending in areas where the government exercises a high degree of control. Consider the following categories of increases: salaries and wages have increased 13.6 per cent; other personnel costs, 18.4 per cent; transport and communications, 12.4 per cent; information, 16.5 per cent; professional and special services, 9.9 per cent; rentals, 18 per cent; purchased repair and upkeep, 15.1 per cent; utilities, material and supplies, 13.5 per cent; capital, land, building and equipment, 11.9 per cent; capital, machinery and equipment, 24.4 per cent; public debt charges, 23.1 per cent; and all other expenditures, 36.4 per cent.

Clearly, the minister's claim that the government is exercising restraint is unfounded. The facts are to the contrary. Members of the government talk a great deal about fighting inflation and about the white paper on inflation, but the government does not intend to follow its own guidelines when increasing wages, salaries and other personnel costs. I suggest that an examination of the estimates will show I am right. If the government is sincere in what it says about restraint, let it practice that restraint. It alone must decide if it will follow its own policy. It cannot look to the opposition for guidance; it must look to itself. It alone can determine if it will follow its own policy. The government is basically responsible for establishing short-term as well as long-term priorities for expenditures, and it has not done so. For instance—

Mr. Chrétien: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I raise a point of order. I am a little confused by the procedure. I have nothing against the way the hon. member is proceeding but I had understood that if we were to proceed in such a way, we would have to go in committee and, generally, when we are in committee it is not to deliver as long a speech as this one but to answer questions. It is something of a general debate that the hon. member has just launched because normally I should be invited to answer several points he has made. I cannot possibly make any remarks if he delivers a 20-minute speech. I do not mind. It will still be possible on second reading.

The Chairman: Order. To inform the hon. minister, I must state that it is a fact that in committee there is time for questions but each member is entitled to use his 20 minutes as he sees fit. The minister may speak as often as he wishes to answer questions which have been raised. He also has 20 minutes each time he takes the floor to answer objections or points put forward by hon. members.

[English]

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Chairman, I respect that. Questions will be asked. The difficulty is that the minister is most reluctant to answer questions asked in committee of the whole or elsewhere. I was talking about the government's restraint program and spending priorities. What has happened? Ministers are beating their breasts, telling us they practice restraint. But what, actually, are they doing? In these times of restraint, the government has launched a program for decentralizing government. The cost is not less than between $50,000 and $60,000 per employee involved. Is that restraint? How much is the government spending on information? According to my information, the total cost of information services and staff is at least $138 million. If we make reasonable allowance for the cost of accommodation and support services, that figure rises to about $150 million.

● (1550)

What do we have? What do we get for it? Does anybody feel well informed? Government press hand-outs are considered by the press as a bad joke in terms of number and quality—glossy publications, overproduced, underread and poorly created. What has the over $5 million budget of external affairs done to our image abroad? What will the planned increase of over $1 million in 1976-77 add? There is the first question.

The $14 million spent by the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce will be increased by over $4.5 million in 1976-77. While tourism seems to be doing well with its $834 million, what is the other $10 million going to do for us? It, visibly, has not done much for our exports recently. Why does Statistics Canada need almost $4 million more in 1976-77? What does the $10 million, plus, spending by national defence do to improve our defence posture when we have not even made up our mind which way we are going? These are the matters to which this government should direct itself—and not in terms of its restraint program, a program that, as a matter of fact, is not a restraint program at all.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): There is one other matter which affects every member of the House of Commons. It is the ability that we, as parliamentarians—not just ministers or government supporters, but all of us—have to examine expenditures of government. What is the attitude of a bureaucrat toward committees of the House of Commons? I have a quote from a retired bureaucrat, Frank Howard. He was a communications officer, and is now a writer. He tells us what he thinks of the parliamentary system and the ability of committees to find out how the Queen's money, the money of the people of this country, is spent. This is what he had to say about his job as a communications officer, and I quote from the March 7 edition of Saturday Night:

> I came to worry about what I was doing to the press. My job was to manipulate it. The simple truth was that it was easy: the press didn't know how to ask the right questions, so you went out and fed them the answers you wanted.
> With parliament we operated the same way. We figured out a way of getting off easy with Commons committees. At the first opportunity possible we'd get the top scientist in the department to speak. He'd come across with a whole lot of stuff about gigahertzes and geostationary orbits and if some MP asked a question, he'd say no, they hadn't quite understood and come back with more jargon, and so the MP would give up and none of them would come even close to understanding the real problems of communications.

Here is what he had to say about the right of parliamentarians to know:

> In the end, you come to view information as something you put out when it's to your advantage. By your advantage, I mean the advantage of the system. People within the system who don't understand that information is a commodity, to be used and exploited for the system's advantage, don't get along.
> Parliament can't control government. MPs don't know what questions to ask, and even if they asked them, there's no way of forcing the government to give answers. Even ministers don't control the bureaucracy. Ministers spend their first year trying to get into their department, and then they're co-opted by the department. For people outside trying to represent the public interest, it's even worse. Ranged up against them is a bureaucracy that amounts to a vast information processing machine with years and years of experience.

That says something to every member of parliament. It says something to those who want to see the rules reformed. The government is always talking about shortening the length of debate. The government House leader talks about television in the House. There are much more important things to be done. Forget about the cosmetics. Give us the tools. Give us the means to ask the proper questions. Give us the answers to our questions. Make our committees independent. Give us those tools and we will show this or any other government what ought to be within the power of a parliament, properly equipped, to inquire. We would not use these tools to obstruct, as we are accused of doing, but honestly and objectively to look at the estimates of each department. We do not have that power, and that is what we require.

When the government House leader raises in this House the necessity of reforming the rules, I completely agree with him. However, I want the government House leader to understand that if we are going—

An hon. Member: Do you want a soap-box?

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Apparently the hon. member does not care if the regulations are changed. If we are going to make the legislative machinery move more quickly, the price for that change is going to be a heavy one indeed. The price will be to give to parliament assembled here and in the various committees a revision of the committees' system so there can, at long last, be something that we have not had since the rule changes were pushed through this parliament by closure in the sixties; that is, the right to know and the right to examine.

Mr. Blais: You cannot ask questions.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I have something to say about asking questions. The man who wrote the article I quoted had the following to say about that matter:

> The people who are interested in finding out things have to be given the means of finding things out. There's a rough rule of thumb in government that you spend about two to three per cent of the budget of a program on information relating to the program. Why not insist that, say, one-tenth of one per cent of a program's budget be channelled into research by the opposition parties. If you put down $80 million for LIP this year, then you put down $80,000 for research into LIP. And so on. Now if you started that tomorrow, the opposition wouldn't know what to do; they'd still concentrate on the horror stories. But over time, they'd build a competent research staff. This might turn into a bureaucracy. At least it would be a counter-bureaucracy.

If these suggestions were taken, we would see, for the first time in many years, an honest examination of government expenditures. It would not only serve parliament, which it should serve first, but the government as well. The government would know that committees were a well-informed, articulate sounding board for their programs. After the programs were considered by the committees, they would be acceptable without suspicion—and this is something that is very important. The knowledge that we have, in terms of the operation of government, is vested in the bureaucracy, the government. In terms of parliament and its operation, access to knowledge has become overweighted on the government side.

I ask the President of the Treasury Board, as the keeper of the public purse, whether he is prepared to recommend to his ministry, as a first priority in terms of spending, and to the commissioners of internal economy of this place—of which he is one—a substantial increase, on a negotiated basis, with respect to funds for the operation of research offices of all political parties represented in this House.

● (1600)

I make this request so that the work of this parliament can determine the examination of the estimates, the study of the government's legislative program, the study of its priorities, the questioning of its objectives, finding out whether those objectives are being met, and discussing whether the offices, in terms of cost analysis, cost-benefit work referred to by the minister, are being carried out. We in this parliament should be able to examine that work. You are an officer of parliament, Mr. Chairman, and you must care about it as well. If this kind of thing does not start now, we will see a continuation of the ability of the government to stonewall not only in this chamber but in the committee. Those things which should be exposed will not be exposed, and as to those things for which the government ought to get credit, we will not know about them in a way in which we can honestly accept them. If this is done, this institution will take on a new life of its own. I hope the minister will consider the propriety, the rightness of asking for an amendment to the rules of this House so that we can bring back, once more at least, some departmental estimates into the committee of the whole in the old way.

Some people look upon this public institution with some cynicism. From what we have seen in the last few days, I can understand that. But what I suggest would constitute a great improvement.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, like the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton, we welcome this day during which we can spend some time on the estimates for the year just ahead of us. We shall all discover very soon that the day will go very fast, and my contribution to avoiding that will be to speak for less than the 20 minutes I am allowed.

I was interested in the reference the previous speaker made to the days when he sat in the gallery as a student watching some of us who were already on the floor dealing with estimates in the committee of supply. I was a member of the committee which changed all that and put the estimates into the various committees. We were involved in quite a struggle when that was done in 1968, but I am prepared to say that we did win certain gains though we also suffered a very real loss. I think we had very much more control when the estimates were on the floor and there was no time limit. I know we cannot go back to that system. The number of departments, the amount of money which is spent, the items on which the money is spent—all these things have multiplied so much that we cannot go back to that earlier arrangement. However, I think that when we reform the rules with respect to the handling of expenditures we ought to make provision for bringing back to the floor of the House of Commons two or three departments a year, picked by the opposition, and discussion on those estimates when they are on the floor should be without time limit. If it is done the other way, ministers can just sit it out, members on the government side can exercise their right to use up some of the time, and any sense of control by the House of Commons over expenditure of money is gone. However, I do not want to be guilty of using this day, when we have estimates before us, in discussing procedure, though I welcome the comments the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton made in that direction.

[Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton).]

I welcome the speech made by the President of the Treasury Board. I enjoy him when he deals with the technicalities of his position. I enjoy him just as much, perhaps more, when he launches into a political tirade. He is good at it. I have seen him grow into quite a politician since he first came here some 14 years ago. But I want to say to him there is one taunt he may think he can throw at the Progressive Conservative party but he cannot throw it at us. He likes to say to the Progressive Conservatives that though they call for restraint, though they call for cuts in expenditure, they also demand new expenditures. He knows he cannot throw that charge at us because we have said many times that we realize that civilization costs money. He knows that we do not look upon government taxing and spending as a form of highway robbery but as a means of redistributing the wealth which is created in this country.

Our quarrel with the government is not with its level of spending but with its order of priorities. Right now, if the government wants to talk about restraint, about cutting expenditures, the way to implement such a program is not just to cut everything by a certain percentage, not for the President of the Treasury Board to become "Mr. No" to every one of his colleagues, but to make cuts where they can be applied without causing suffering, and to realize that in some cases the circumstances call for increases.

We have before us today an interim supply bill which provides for three-twelfths of all the estimates for 1975-76 and some more twelfths for certain of the departments. This being so, discussion can cover virtually an unlimited range of subjects. We regret very much that the estimates are such that they carry out the government's announced intention to freeze family allowances at the 1975 level. Even in a period of restraint, even when cuts are being made, it is the responsibility of the government to face up to the difficulties of those who are in need, and we contend that failure to escalate family allowances in 1976 in accordance with the rise in the cost of living is a gross piece of unfairness.

By the same token, I regret that no provision is made in the main estimates for an increase in the basic amount of old age security payments. Provision is there for an escalation corresponding to the rise in the cost of living, and this applies not only to the basic amount but to the guaranteed income supplement. However, the government takes the view that nothing more needs to be done in connection with that issue, and says—especially to hon. members on my right, "If you want expenditures cut, you cannot be asking for further expenditures at the same time." I say, again, that what concerns us is the scale of priorities, how the money is spent.

I cannot join in all the complaints the previous speaker made about government spending, but I suggest to the President of the Treasury Board that there is cause for complaint when the number of public servants in the SX category has risen from 400 a few years ago to over 1,000. I would remind the minister that between 1969 and 1974, while he was minister of Indian affairs and northern development, the number of public servants in that category in his department—these are the highest paid public servants—rose from 16 to 47. This is hardly restraint: it is a sample of what the government does.

Then there are these huge expenses on buildings for the defence department, some of which may not be necessary; and there is the kind of expenditure we seem to be facing in connection with the Lockheed contract or agreement. The people of Canada wonder what is going on, and have reason to be cynical. Our position as a party is not that the government is doing the wrong thing in raising money by taxation and in spending it. Our contention is that the money is being spent, in many cases, on the wrong things—and that where money is needed, this government does not come through. We think it is wrong for the President of the Treasury Board simply to stand up with confidence, because he is saying "No" to everybody else, and say "No" to those on family allowances, those on old age pensions, and so on.

Initially I said I would try not to use the 20 minutes that is allotted to each of us because I hoped that during the day a number of members could take part. Some of my colleagues have specific points they want to speak about, and since I probably will not get a chance to speak again in the day, I should like to say now that I welcome the fact that the Minister of Finance is going to come in to deal with the borrowing business. I will not go into the technicalities of that, but I hope when he comes he will answer some questions in relation to the "Orion" which Lockheed is trying to sell us. My colleague, the hon. member for Greenwood, was asking questions about this "Orion" business today. Most of us feel that the whole situation is such a mess that the government should walk away from it right now.

What bothers me, in terms of this borrowing authority, is that under clause 5 of this bill the government will have the authority to borrow the sum of $6 billion—$6,000 million. I should like to know whether that will include the authority to borrow money for front-end financing of the "Orion" aircraft. The minister shakes his head. I hope that is the position; but I trust we will get a clear answer on that from the Minister of Finance when he comes in.

I could go on, Mr. Chairman, but in all fairness to others I shall not. We welcome this day and we want more days like it, but we do not want days that end the way this one will, with the clock telling us it is 9.45 p.m. and we have to quit. We want more days like those we used to have when we could put the ministers on the spot in respect of their expenditures and get something done.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order. I understand that a few members on this side of the House would like to intervene in the debate. Hon. members have asked me several questions and I would like to be sure that if I reply to those questions it will take away from the right of hon. members on this side of the House to reply.

An hon. Member: Tell them to say something, if they are going to speak.

Mr. Chrétien: We are supposed to have a question period here.

An hon. Member: We are in committee of the whole.

Mr. Chrétien: The opposition House leader did not ask too many questions, but he made a speech. I think that some of the points he made will be answered by my parliamentary secretary in a few minutes.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, would you instruct the President of the Treasury Board what it means to be in committee on a bill? We are here, not just to ask questions but to express views in respect of the bill which the government is asking us to pass. It is not for the President of the Treasury Board to tell us that all we can do is ask questions; we have the right to express opinions, and that is what we are doing.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

The Chairman: Order, please. I do not think the Chair is here to give lessons or courses in procedure. I will do my best to direct the proceedings of this committee. The minister has the floor now, and I think he has the right to answer at least the two speeches that have been made. After that, I will go to the opposition and the hon. member who follows the minister will do as he wishes, ask questions or make a speech, and then I will go to a government member. I hope that after a while hon. members will appreciate that I am going in the right direction.

Mr. Chrétien: That is exactly the point. If I get up and take away from the right of hon. members on this side to take their turn, I will sit down and not reply. I think members on this side of the House have exactly the same rights as anybody else.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Chrétien: My long experience in the House tells me that they ask questions, and this is a question too.

[Translation]

Mr. Chairman, must I understand that when I am finished with my remarks you will return to the opposition or give the floor to a government member? I would like to have your opinion before I reply.

The Chairman: The minister has the floor, he has 20 minutes to address the committee. As I said, the Chair intends to alternate from one side to the other, but if the minister speaks after each intervention, it will be difficult to do this.

Of course, nothing prevents the minister from taking part in the debate as often as he wishes, but perhaps he can limit his interventions or group his answers so that from time to time a government member can be recognized.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Chairman, I shall speak for a few minutes and I hope that my remarks will not deprive my colleagues on this side of the House of their right to take part in this debate, because I think a minister must be in a position to answer members from both sides of the House.

[English]

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): I rise on a point of order, Mr. Chairman. Let us get the rules of the game straight. The President of the Treasury Board and members on the Liberal side are not going to take up most of this day by the President of the Treasury Board answering every intervention and not having that counted as a Liberal member speaking. If the President of the Treasury Board speaks, that is a speech to be—

The Chairman: Order, please. I would hope that the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands would listen to the Chair. I have explained that and I have laid down the procedure I intend to follow.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

The Chairman: The hon. President of the Treasury Board.

Mr. Chrétien: Well, he has the floor. If I have the floor, I will reply.

The Chairman: I would hope that the hon. minister would look at the Chair, not at the opposition, and speak to the Chair.

Mr. Chrétien: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I am a bit too polite, and that is why I hesitated. I would like to answer a few of the points that were raised. Of course, I cannot deal with all the points. I would like to point out, for example, to the hon. member for Winnipeg South, who said we had neglected some segments in our priorities—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): "North Centre."

Mr. Chrétien: "South Centre?"

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): "North Centre."

Mr. Chrétien: "North," all right.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): "North Centre."

Mr. Chrétien: Well, Mr. Knowles, all right!

Some hon. Members: Order, order.

Mr. Chrétien: True, we have decided in the current restraint exercise not to index family allowances on the cost of living. But if the hon. member looked at statistics instead of dealing with generalities he would realize that family allowances have increased threefold during the past few years. From a $616 million budget in 1969, they were increased to $2.07 billion in 1975-76. This means that the government of Canada have always shown great concern in the area of social security, much so that we are now allocating 35 per cent of government expenditures to health and welfare, as compared to a mere 26.8 per cent in 1961.

The hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker), the House leader for the official opposition, raised some points. He referred to statistics in the blue book pointing to a 20.3 per cent increase in salary expenditures. Only, he implied we have no intention of remaining within the guidelines we issued as the controls program was established on October 14, 1975. I said so in this House, but the hon. member chose to ignore that.

[Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands).]

This year however, 130,000 public servants are renegotiating their collective agreements with the federal government. At the end of February, we had signed contracts with upwards of 80,000 of the 130,000 public servants, and all such contracts remained within the guidelines of October 14. The 20.3 per cent figure, if the hon. member wants to use it includes certain factors. But as far as salaries are concerned, we were always within the guidelines. Only there has been an increase in the number of public servants over last year, and also the natural promotions within an agency. And there is nothing I can do about that. It must be that our public servants are well treated because they live longer and longer, they get their pensions longer and this is reflected in the cost of public service.

When we spend money for the well-being of retired public servants, this cannot be considered as expenditures on the current force.

● (1620)

[English]

He spoke about the increases in the government. Of course there was a great increase in some departments.

Mr. Orlikow: All departments.

Mr. Chrétien: Yes. But I want to say that since I have been President of the Treasury Board in the last two years we have reviewed the increases that we had in 1971, 1972 and 1973 which were at a level of something like 24 per cent—and the result is that they have been 4 per cent or 5 per cent in the last two years.

An hon. Member: Tell us what you did when you were minister of Indian affairs.

Mr. Chrétien: We increased expenditures in Indian affairs when I was there, and I am not ashamed of that. It is true that I spent a lot of money when I was minister of Indian affairs, but we had a very difficult situation. For the first time in our history, this nation gave money to the Indians in order to help them get organized. We have given their associations money to give me hell and to bring forward their problems. When I became the minister there were only a few Indians attending university. This year, I think there will be 3,000 Indians at university level in Canada. Mr. Speaker, I have been obliged to give this assistance. I am not ashamed of that, because I think our Indians have gained greater respectability in our nation—and the hon. member is not contributing anything to the achievement of that.

Mr. Yewchuk: Mr. Chairman, perhaps before we get into my comments I might suggest to the minister, in view of the fact that he has asked the Minister of Finance to come in to listen to some of the debate when our members speak on finance, and since we on this side of the House also wish to make some comments in respect of the Department of National Health and Welfare, it might be advisable to have the Minister of National Health and Welfare here. He does not listen very well, but if he is here physically, perhaps some of it might sink in.

I was somewhat interested in the minister's comments with regard to giving the Indians money "to give him hell". I think he would be better off if he gave them money to enable them to have a decent living in this country. But this is not the area to which I want to dedicate most of my comments. I wish to touch on a subject of great importance which, according to the government, does not have too much political sex appeal. I refer to the subject of medical research. It seems to me that the attitude of the President of the Treasury Board to this subject has been inexcusable insofar as his policies may result in the decimation of the research community in this country.

I do not wish to sound as if I am speaking contrary to what other members have been saying, which is that as a whole the minister and the government have failed to make cuts in expenditures. As a general rule, that is true: they have not made the required cuts in government spending in keeping with the times in which we live. However, the research field is a strange place in which to have cuts. Cuts in expenditures in respect of research are, indeed, not cuts at all, but the fact. The minister is getting a little excited. I wish he would pay attention to what is being said. He has intervened to say there were not any cuts. The fact is that the budget has been frozen. Since inflation has been very rampant in this country, and in so far as medical research is concerned it has been running somewhere in the vicinity of 18 per cent, when the budget is frozen in the face of 18 per cent inflation this is the same as cutting it by 18 per cent in practical terms.

What we are seeing here is a government which is trying to ride to political glory on the back of the research community of this country. This is just as shameful as riding to glory on the back of the poor, which the minister has been doing by putting a freeze on family allowances and thereby making things difficult for the children and mothers of our nation. The minister has challenged our party to say where he should be making cuts where he has not done so. I could give him a long list. One place is in respect of the Canada Development Corporation. That could be cut out completely. The other is Petro-Can. It is unnecessary. Then there is the Prime Minister's office and the Privy Council office. The extravagant expenditures by the government are completely unnecessary, but nothing is being done about that.

Then we come to something closer to the minister's heart. How about the bilingual program? How necessary is that in so far as our social and economic structure is concerned at a time of restraint? We know that the bilingual program not only has failed in unifying Canada but has divided Canada very substantially. What this boils down to is that the minister is saying to the people of Canada that he does not mind if they die of a heart attack so long as on their death-bed they can speak in both official languages.

Mr. Chrétien: Nonsense.

Mr. Yewchuk: That is the kind of priority we are being faced with. The minister does not like to hear these facts, but the fact is that if he would look at the total budget of the bilingual program he would see that there is a somewhat mixed-up priority on his part, and not on my part.

I should like to bring to the attention of the minister a little information about the Medical Research Council, because I do not think he knows what it does. I want to read some of the objectives so that he will realize it is a rather important program for the health of this nation and its future. These are the objectives for which the grants of money have been made. The first objective is to expand the scientific and technological base for health care. Does the minister say that is a good objective, or does he say that it should be cut?

Mr. Chrétien: There is no cut.

Mr. Yewchuk: I have already explained that there has, indeed, been a cut of 18 per cent, which is what the inflation rate has been in the research area. That 18 per cent inflation rate is there, and it is real, not imagined. People have had to face up to it and make substantial cuts. As a matter of fact, I am glad to hear the minister shouting that there is no cut, because I have a letter here, produced by his own department, called "newsletter from the Medical Research Council." I will read to him a little later what cuts have been ordered, because obviously he is not aware of them.

● (1630)

I would like to conclude by stating the objectives of medical research. The second objective was to improve the application of scientific principles to health care. I do not think anybody can argue with that. It is a good objective, and it should be upheld. The third objective is to ensure an adequate research base for education in the health sciences. I think that is the area which is being severely damaged by the short-sightedness of this minister. The fourth one is to support the training of research investigators in the health sciences. That follows the broad field of education. We are not training our research investigators any longer, and we are asking them to go into other fields of employment because there are no funds in this field. The final objective is to support research contributing to new knowledge in the health sciences. I know that the attitude of this government was that it did not want to be confused by knowledge and facts. Perhaps that is why we are faced with these cuts.

Mr. Chrétien: Excuse me, Mr. Chairman. Just for clarification, may I give some information to the hon. member?

Mr. Paproski: No, he is not ready.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Béchard): Would the hon. member allow the minister to clarify a point? If so, the chair would have no objection.

Mr. Yewchuk: No, Mr. Chairman, the minister has already spoken three times. I listened very carefully while he was speaking, and I hope he will do the same while I am speaking.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Yewchuk: We have only 20 minutes each in this debate.

An hon. Member: The minister wants to hog the floor.

Mr. Yewchuk: Yes, I know, he likes talking. I know hon. members on the other side do not like to hear the truth. Every time it comes up in the House they seem to be upset and they start to shout.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mrs. Holt: Would you like to know the definition of truth? Would you like a dictionary?

Mr. Yewchuk: The hon. member for Vancouver—I am not sure what her constituency is, I think it is Vancouver-Kingsway—needs a dictionary to know the meaning of the word "truth". If she wants to leave the chamber for a few minutes to find out the meaning of that word, we will forgive her.

To get on with the business at hand, I have information here with regard to the record of grants since this minister became President of the Treasury Board. We have information about projects which have been approved for April 1, 1976. The information is that the renewal rate for programs which have been going on for some time—research projects which are now in process—is 60 per cent. This means that 40 per cent of ongoing projects have been eliminated. Does the minister say that is not a cut?

Mr. Chrétien: No, that is not a cut.

Mr. Yewchuk: But 40 per cent of the projects have not been approved for renewal.

Mr. Chrétien: The hon. member is asking a question. May I reply to it?

Mr. Paproski: Mark it down, Jean. Answer it later.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Béchard): The minister will have an opportunity to answer the question.

Mr. Chrétien: I object to that ruling, Mr. Chairman, because one of our members has been prevented from speaking. I will reply only in opposition time, not in our time.

Mr. Paproski: Thin skin, eh?

Mr. Chrétien: It is a fact.

Mr. Yewchuk: The minister's skin is thin.

Mr. Chrétien: Don't ask me questions if you don't want my answers.

Mr. Yewchuk: I hope the minister has a pen and will take note of all the questions and answer them all at once. I have many questions to ask, and perhaps it would be easier if he would simply answer them later. I want to compare the renewal rate for April, 1976, of 60 per cent with that of last November when it was 75 per cent. So the minister can see the difference. Last November, 25 per cent of the projects were thrown out; but in April, 40 per cent of ongoing projects will be cut.

In terms of new applications—and research is not simply intended to carry on programs which were started, two, three or ten years ago—if we want to satisfy one of the objectives to which I have referred, that is, to contribute new information in the research field, we must also accept new applications for entirely new programs. Starting in April, 345 such applications were filed, of which only 10 per cent were accepted, or only some 35. That means that the other 300 were simply turned away. If the minister is pleased and proud of that kind of record, let him rise in the House and say so. If I were in his boots, I would be ashamed of such a record. The argument which he has used from time to time has been that this is going to save money.

Let us look at the people who are in research. I am inclined to think that a significant number of them, perhaps 30 per cent or 50 per cent, are medical doctors. I do not have the exact figures, but I am sure the minister will be able to find them. Once these people are rejected, in terms of applications to do research, they will not go and dig ditches, drive a truck, go on welfare or on unemployment insurance, which the minister perhaps would like them to do: those medical doctors will go into practice. We know that a busy physician in active practice not only draws a salary above that of a researcher in a health insurance program footed by provincial and federal governments, but generates substantially higher costs in terms of expenditures in hospitals, laboratories, X-ray departments, and so on. Indeed, it has been estimated that an active, practising physician generates a total cost of perhaps a quarter of a million dollars.

So we may be rejecting a research project which may cost $50,000 a year, if we say, roughly, that a researcher's salary is $20,000 a year and he may require another $30,000 for equipment, staff, and so on. Even from the short-term point of view, there is no saving at all. In fact, it will create a higher cost to the taxpayer than if this budget had not been cut and these people were kept in the research field. I do not believe, either from the short-term point of view or the long-term point of view, that cutting costs in medical research will in any way save money to the taxpayer.

The minister became a little excited when I said he was cutting costs. I have here the newsletter to which I made reference previously. It indicates a substantial number of things which have been cut from the usual program and have been followed by the Medical Research Council. The first one was the cut respecting the planned heart research project. I thought it was rather strange and ironical to see the Minister of National Health and Welfare, on television a week or two ago, doing the three-step test to check his cardiac fitness while at the same time he cancelled the heart research program which had been planned by the Medical Research Council.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Yewchuk: It is typical of the kind of priorities by which this government lives. I think we, as a people, as a country, and a parliament, should have some explanation for this ridiculous state of affairs. Just to get back to the cuts, the Medical Research Council "Newsletter," volume 6, No. 2, of January 15, 1976, indicates that for the fiscal year 1976-77 the programs of the Medical Research Council are altered as follows: no visiting scientists awards will be made for the coming year; no funds for summer undergraduate research scholarships will be made available to the deans of the medical, dental and pharmaceutical faculties for the summer of 1976; and the awards which are normally made in June for grants are cancelled completely for 1976. They are completely cancelled, not just cut back, and in this case perhaps several hundred projects will not get a chance to be considered at all. That is what the minister calls not cutbacks. I notice he left the House because he could not listen to the truth.

● (1640)

An hon. Member: He couldn't listen to you for long.

Mr. Yewchuk: I should like to quote from that same "Newsletter:"

At three per cent cut will accordingly be made in the operation component... of all MRC grants for 1976-77... A similar reduction will be made in the operating component of 1976-77 funds provided to MRC groups...

The new program of one-year research professorships announced by council in its April 1975 Newsletter has, with regret, been shelved for the time being.

I think, in plain English, "shelved" means "cut".

The allocation for symposia will be held to the amount already committed for 1976-77.

That will not be changed. There is another one—

—the general research grants to deans of medicine, dentistry and pharmacy will be continued during the coming year, but at two-thirds the amount for 1975-76... No provision has been made for an increase in the number of MRC groups. Program grants, announced in April 1975, will be initiated but on a more modest scale than had been planned.

Finally, in the awards section—

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Boulanger): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired.

Mr. Francis: Mr. Chairman, I want to reply to some of the points made at the beginning of this debate by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton, who I regret is not in the House at the moment, and by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

Mr. Paproski: Walter will be right back. You can go ahead with Stanley.

Mr. Francis: At the beginning of every debate of this nature there is an almost routine reference to the good old days. The allegation is made in the days of committee of supply, parliament did some great and wonderful things, and that this place has somehow degenerated into an institution which has no control whatever over estimates any more.

An hon. Member: That is right.

Mr. Francis: I sat in a parliament which was alleged to have been so great—and so did you, Mr. Chairman, as I think back—and I recall what happened in the parliament of 1963-1965 in which I served. It is true that the estimates procedure was in committee of supply and committee of the whole House, and hon. members who sat on the other side eventually had to face their own consciences. I know the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre was one who did. It was not an examination of estimates, it was a procedure of obstruction which took place, and I remember very clearly that over 20 days were used on a very small item of supplementary estimates involving a single department. It was passed eventually without even a dollar being changed, and that was alleged to have been the great democratic procedure of the House of Commons in those days.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Francis: All the members of this House came to the conclusion that parliament was being disgraced by the procedure, and that it was not what it was alleged to be by those on the other side who spoke. They realized that the people who voted us to this place expected us to do a job and not to go through the kind of sham which took place in committee of the whole. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre was attempting to say things in, I think, a fair and impartial way. He said that when the changes of 1968 were introduced, from his point of view there were certain gains and certain losses. He admitted that there were improvements, and the strengthening of the committee system is, I am sure, one of them. The attempt to deal in a more fundamental and honest way with the question of estimates has probably plagued more than just this parliament. The British parliament has grappled with this question, and if I may suggest, with even less success than this parliament.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Francis: On an inventory of gains, I wish that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre had catalogued a few more of the gains which actually did develop, because there were very definitely some. One of the gains which did not come right away, but which came a little later, as referred to by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton, was the development of research services in this House of Commons. Research services were made available to every party. It is for hon. members of the parties to answer for the use made of these research services. If they are used well, this House is a better place: if they are used poorly, this House is not doing its job.

The hon. member for Grenville-Carleton said the remedy was to give more and more money. I have been trying to find out just what would be an appropriate sum. His answer is that of the old Samuel Gompers and the American Federation of Labour, just give us more and more. He does not quantify what he wants; he does not offer any standards; he just says we have to have more. In one breath he says, "don't spend as much," and in the next breath he says, "Give us more research services." In fairness, we have to come to some understanding of the goals and objectives of the elected representatives and parties in this House and how they are going to deal with the problem.

Mr. Paproski: Just remember, you may be in opposition some day.

Mr. Francis: No doubt. I hope to see more than one change in government before I am through. I hope I will be able to survive as long as my friend, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, although that would be a very long time indeed.

Mr. Paproski: You will be in opposition in 1978.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Francis: Let us look again at what has to be done by way of innovations in an attempt to come to grips with the problem. Just about a year ago a package of new rules was introduced into this House, and I think everyone agreed that the rules introduced were steps forward; for example, the termination of the question period at three o'clock, the reduction of the number of Standing Order 43 motions which could be introduced, and so on. However, I wonder how many hon. members opposite recall that one of the items in the package which was offered was the ability to call departments before the House, in committee of the whole, on supply days. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is looking at me, and I am sure he remembers that. It was part of the package and there were hon. members on this side of the House who looked on this with some trepidation. They were concerned that this was giving a great deal. But I must say that the one or two rather feeble attempts to use that particular item in this House were not very impressive. Hon. members in the House gave up even trying.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Oh, oh!

Mr. Francis: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre intervenes, but he was one who not long ago said in the House that he hoped to bring individual ministers and individual departments back into committee of the whole again so that there could be some control over them. I think that is almost a complete paraphrasing of his words. When the opportunity was offered in the rules' package of a year ago, I suggest that no good use was made of that opportunity by hon. members opposite.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Francis: Virtue does not reside just on any one side. We are all members! We all carry out our responsibility and we are all aware of the problems of estimates. There is too much money, government is too big and it is hard to come to grips with it. The amount of knowledge which individual members can assimilate and use effectively is limited. We are aware of this, so there is a real attempt being made today by the Auditor General before the public accounts committee. It was looking at the estimates book, looking at the procedures, looking at the changes made as a result of an investigation by an outside group which examined the question of estimates some years ago and offered suggestions for reform. There is an honest difference of opinion amongst representatives of the Treasury Board who have maintained with a good deal of conviction before the committee that the new form of estimates is an improvement. A group of independent accountants was brought in by the Auditor General; they made the argument that the changes were not an improvement and tried to suggest a better format.

● (1650)

Hon. members opposite said that we were not doing the right things on estimates. It is like a ritual, Mr. Chairman: they have an obligation to go to the public accounts committee, make representations to the Auditor General, tell him how the estimates can be improved and make suggestions for improvement in the means by which hon. members of this House can exercise their ancient and democratic right of voting supply.

[Mr. Paproski.]

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Francis: It is not enough just to bitch about it, to just say time after time that parliament has lost something, that in the good old days we did great things and that now we are a sad reflection of what we were before: that is not the way to deal with the question. Some very good and diligent members from the other side sit on the public accounts committee. There is a definite lack of partisan atmosphere in the examination by the public accounts committee, and I think it is to the credit of hon. members on all sides to recognize that we have a problem.

I have just made these observations because I hoped that when the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton, for whom I have the greatest personal respect—he represents a riding adjoining mine, and we have known each other for 20 years—would do more than talk about the good old days, the great things that were done and our democratic right. He referred to articles by a former member of the public service, Mr. Frank Howard. Mr. Chairman, I served nine years in the public service and appeared before committees to answer questions for my minister. I had to go through the whole exercise, and I cannot share the view that this parliament has in any way lost any of its democratic rights.

There are just one or two other things I should like to add. I listened to the hon. member for Athabasca and I should like to set the record straitht on some of the things he said. He repeated allegations of cuts to the Medical Research Council. Mr. Chairman, I am informed that the actual money voted for medical research in the fiscal year 1974-75 was $42,800.000, in the fiscal year 1975-76 it was $47,400,000, in the fiscal year 1976-77 the amount indicated in the estimates is $48,400,000.

I know there are hon. members an all sides of the House on the public accounts committee who are more competent than I am to review the heroic efforts of the Auditor General to come to grips with the basic problem of how an elected legislature should deal with estimates of the magnitude on which we have to vote. I hope they will intervene in this debate.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Chairman, my time is limited and I want to spend most of it dealing with the question of medical research. Let us get the record clear when this minister, who has designated himself "Mr. No", boasts so loudly. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre put some of the figures on the record in so far as we have them. It is not always easy for us to get answers. If a member of parliament does not ask precisely the right question—and it is difficult to know all the titles and categories—he gets an answer only to the question he asks.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Sometimes, not even that.

Mr. Orlikow: There is one small, but important group that I am concerned about—the senior executive officers, the people who earn from $30,000 to $66,000 a year. According to the figures supplied by the minister's department, in 1968 there were 381 of these people; by 1974 there were 1,062. I will leave it to the minister to calculate the percentage increase. In the Treasury Board alone, the increase was from 20 to 47. So when the minister says he is "Mr. No", he is "Mr. No" with a good deal of reservation. I think he knows he is being unfair when he critizes us or suggests that we object to the increased expenditures on the native people of this country. What we object to is the tremendous increase in the amount of money that has gone to senior bureaucrats.

I am not going to take much time to expound on this theme, but I suggest to the minister and to the parliamentary secretary that if they are honest and want to look at the situation realistically, they should look at the current issue of Saturday Night which contains an article by Douglas Hartle who for some time was a deputy secretary of the Treasury Board. I think Mr. Hartle knows what he is talking about, and his article shows how far out of whack the system is. As the hon. member for Athabasca was talking about the plight of medical research, one might have thought it a figment of the imagination of the opposition. We heard the usual rude and loud interjection of the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway. If she could read—which I sometimes doubt—I would suggest that she should take advantage—

Mrs. Holt: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order—

The Acting Chairman (Mr. McCleave): Order, please. The hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway, on a point of order.

Mrs. Holt: Mr. Chairman, I should like to suggest to the hon. member that not only can I read, but I have written and I have achieved a certain degree of success, where the hon. member seems to have failed. As a matter of fact, I have just discovered that his colleague, who is the great expert, cannot read: he does not even know of a simple bill that was introduced the other day, and has been misquoting it.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. McCleave): Order, please. Would the hon. lady resume her seat?

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Chairman, I know the hon. member: she interjects, and hon. members on this side know how often she interjects. I want to put a few things on the record so there will be no misunderstanding of what people in the scientific community have to say about the fact that the government has frozen the amount of money given to medical research in the current fiscal year. I should like to read from a letter sent out by Dr. Malcolm Brown, chairman of the Medical Research Council of Canada, a government agency. The letter is dated January 16, 1976, and is addressed to the deans of the medical colleges in this country. It reads in part:

● (1700)

The visiting scientist, research professorships and summer undergraduate research scholarships programs have been suspended for 1976-77.

The June, 1976, grants competition has been cancelled.

A number of new programs about to be announced have been shelved for the time being.

Program grants, announced in April 1975, will be initiated in a modest way.

General research grants have each been reduced by one-third for 1976-77.

A 3 per cent cut will be made in the operating component (exclusive of support provided for approved trainee and professional assistants) of all MRC grants for 1976-77 except term grants in their third year and terminal awards, as well as in the operating components of funds provided to MRC groups, development grants and program grants. A number of terminal awards which would in the past have been of eight months' duration will be reduced to three months.

The number of new scholarships to be offered for 1976-77 will be 15.

The intake to the fellowship program has been reduced from 75 in 1975-76 to 50 in the post-MD, DDS and DVM category and from 55 to 44 in the post Ph.D category—

I understand that the Prime Minister, the Minister of National Health and Welfare and the minister responsible for science received close to 500 letters from people in the scientific community. Some scientists were good enough to send copies of letters to members of the opposition. May I quote part of the letter written by Dr. Victor Chernick, professor and head, department of pediatrics, at the children's centre in Winnipeg, and sent to the Prime Minister on March 1, 1976. Dr. Chernick said, in part:

The level of funding for medical research in Canada on a per capita basis is approximately $2 (MRC budget of $50 million) while that in the United States is approximately ten times this rate. Thus, we are in danger of losing our best people, scientists who would compete very favourably in the U.S. funding arena.

May I quote from another letter sent to the Prime Minister on January 29 by Dr. J. C. Haworth, professor of pediatrics, director of clinical investigation and research at the health sciences centre, Winnipeg. He said, in part:

Reduction of our research programs will have the following results . . . Since about 70 per cent of our research funding is used to pay salaries, the reduction in the value of research funds will inevitably require the discharge of some technical staff. Quite apart from the personal hardship this will cause, it must be recognized that many of these people are highly trained and skilled in their work and it will take years to train others to the same level of competence when research funds again become more plentiful.

Allow me to quote from another letter which Dr. William A. Bridger, secretary of the Canadian Biochemical Society, sent to the Prime Minister on January 15, 1976. He said, in part:

I wish to express my dismay and frustration, shared by the over 800 members of the Canadian Biochemical Society, which arise from your recently announced freeze upon the budget of the Medical Research Council. The freeze results in a cut of about $7 million from a budget that was already inadequate to the extent that the very survival of a viable medical research establishment in this country was threatened. This cut, together with inflationary pressures upon research budgets which have accumulated over the past few years, can be guaranteed to have profound deleterious effects upon the activities of the Canadian medical research community, with widespread, irreversible ramifications for future medical care that I am sure all thinking Canadians would wish to avoid.

Writing to the Prime Minister of January 26, 1976, D. G. Scraba, associate professor of the department of biochemistry, University of Alberta, said in part:

While I support your government's intention to control its spending, I seriously question its priorities for restraint. Surely the saving of $7 million from the total federal budget cannot justify the harmful immediate and long-term effects upon medical research in this country.

On January 14, 1976, Alec Sehon, Ph.D, D.Sc., F.R.S.C., professor, head and director of the medical research group, University of Manitoba, wrote to me as follows—

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Did he not send a copy of his letter to the government?

Mr. Orlikow: I do not know. The government agreed to table it. Professor Sehon said, in part:

This funding has amounted to less than $50 million for 1975-76. By comparison, the cost of the Olympic Games in Montreal this year—which is of little, if any, long-term consequence to the nation—is predicted to be in the order of $1—$2 billion!

I quoted part of the letter Dr. Bridger sent to the Prime Minister, a copy of which he sent to me. Dr. Bridger wrote another letter. I raised the very question I am raising at present in the adjournment debate on March 4. The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of State for Science and Technology answered me. I sent a copy of that day's Hansard to Dr. Bridger. Dr. Bridger wrote to the parliamentary secretary. I did not ask him to write; he sent me a copy of his letter. I shall put part of it on record as he, being an expert in the field, can express the concerns of the scientific community more adequately than I can. Dealing with the parliamentary secretary's answer, Dr. Bridger, who was obviously concerned about the effects of the government's freeze on medical research, wrote in part, in his letter dated March 17, 1976, as follows:

You state that "scientific research cannot be an exception" in the effort to reduce inflation. In fact, research councils have been singled out for devastating cuts. While the rest of society is given a ten per cent guideline, the research council budgets for the coming year have been frozen at the fiscal 1975-76 level. Surely you can appreciate that this results directly in a decrease in our research capacity which is precisely equivalent to the rate of inflation, estimated to be nearly 20 per cent in recent surveys of research laboratories. Although excellent cases can be made for expansion of Canada's research effort, we are at the moment falling away behind. And then, you have the audacity to say that—

Dr. Bridger then quoted the words of the parliamentary secretary:

—it certainly does not mean that there will be a dismantling of our research teams.

That is the end of the quotation. The letter goes on to say:

It means exactly that! By 1974 the level of support of research had reached a critically low level; all mediocrity had been weeded out. The present freeze means that about 7 per cent of the research teams in this country, employing over 1,000 highly trained scientists who have survived in the fierce competition until now, will be forced to shut down. Your allegation that the freeze would not have this unavoidable consequence is utterly preposterous.

Allow me to put on record two brief excerpts from the letter sent to the Minister of State for Science and Technology on January 16, 1976, by Keith Yates, professor and chairman, department of chemistry, University of Toronto. He said, in part:

I am writing to you, both as a practising scientist and as chairman of one of the largest university chemistry departments in Canada, to express my grave concern over the steadily deteriorating position of basic science in this country.

He went on to say:

One has only to examine the budgetary treatment of the National Research Council over the past six years to realize that support of basic science in this country has occupied a very low position in terms of federal government priorities. This council, which plays a crucial role for all Canadian university scientists engaged in fundamental research, has received budgetary increases over the period 1970-75 which have fallen far short of increased costs due to inflation. In a period when the Consumer Price Index increased by well over 50 per cent, the NRC budget received cumulative increases totalling only 5.5 per cent. In the forthcoming budget year (1976-77), when the CPI will probably again increase by more that 10 per cent, the NRC budget will be frozen at the already inadequate 1975-76 level.

The minister suggested that it is not enough to criticize: we ought to show where we can make cuts. Need I remind the minister how much the government spent on Mirabel and of the tens of millions spent on Pickering airport, not needed and not be proceeded with? Each year this government has been in power the Auditor General has listed a tale of horrors. One would hope the government would pay some attention and that some year there would be a lessening of his criticism. After all, it can no longer be said that the Auditor General is a political enemy of the government, that he was appointed by a Conservative government. This government has chosen the Auditor General. He may not be a Liberal, but I am sure they knew when they appointed him that he was not against the Liberals. However, the tale of horror continues about waste, poor management, poor planning and an escalation of senior civil servants, with all that means in the way of salaries, extra secretaries and fancy office space costing hundreds of thousands of dollars which is unused each year because they are not ready for it.

The minister tells us that this is a firm budget and they are determined to hold the line, to show restraint and to make cuts. I hope that from the few remarks I have made it will be obvious to everyone that we in the opposition have every right to say that we are still skeptical about the minister's words.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Chairman, I wish to take this opportunity of the debate on Bill C-91 to make a few representations to the cabinet and underline once more the needs of the province of Quebec, in particular the region I have the honour to represent. I would like as well to emphasize the fact that in a few areas, the province of Quebec has not reached the level it should have reached in view of the efforts that were made and the propaganda broadcasted on the news both on the CBC network and private stations.

Mr. Chairman, the economic situation of eastern Quebec is such that it requires immediate action from the central government. I am really staggered when I hear entirely contradictory news, as I did yesterday on the CBC. The Quebec Minister of Industry and Commerce, on one hand, was asserting that the province of Quebec is experiencing a real growth and that the economy of the province has never been so flourishing. A moment later, the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Lessard) whom I respect for his frankness, after looking at his department's report, deplored the fact that the province of Quebec is lagging behind other provinces, that its per capita income is lower and that industrial development is slower than in the other provinces.

I will take this opportunity to make a comment that I wish to be as kind as possible. I heard in the House from some of my colleagues comments to the effect that the federal government is in the hands of the French power. The French power would mean that the federal cabinet is governing first and above all according to the interests of the province of Quebec, the only French-speaking province in this country. And yet, if one looks at statistics, one sees that this French power is not acting only in the interests of the province of Quebec since the latter is lagging behind other provinces.

At any rate, Mr. Chairman, it is not my intention to raise a debate which might jeopardize or eliminate the unity that must exist in our country. We are first of all Canadians. We also have different cultures. We have two official languages: English and French. Both have the same rights in this country and in this Parliament, and I think we would be wasting very precious time if we were to discuss those questions which were settled many years ago and to which we should not come back. But still there are economic problems, and the interests of the French-speaking or English-speaking people are absolutely the same in this country. I have never seen a $20 bill speaking either English or French; the $20 bill speaks both languages.

We also need an income, both in the east and in the west, to enable each Canadian to meet his obligations, to buy the things necessary to satisfy his personal needs at the individual, family and community level.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I find inacceptable these glaring contradictions between the statements of a French-speaking minister of the Parliament of Canada and those of a minister of the National Assembly of Quebec on the same subject, who analyzed the situation and came to completely opposite conclusions. And if I consider the budget of the Canadian government, the budget allocated to each province of our country, I find it equitably distributed, but still it remains the duty of the Canadian government, of the Canadian Parliament, to see if there is an equitable distribution among the regions of Canada, whatever the province in which they are.

The Gaspé peninsula, the south shore of the St. Lawrence, the Quebec City area, and the province of Quebec within Canada, deserve as much attention from the Canadian government as the Vancouver or Victoria areas, or the Maritime provinces. To my mind, our role consists in administering funds without consideration of race or religion. We must see to it that the budget of the Canadian government is shared equitably, taking into consideration the needs of each area, whether it is inhabited by Francophones or Anglophones. That is how I see things, Mr. Chairman.

Now, this is what happens: the province of Quebec has transportation problems that may not exist elsewhere. That is what brings me to speak of the wharves located along the St. Lawrence river which help communications between those who live out on the islands and those who live on the mainland. At the present time, Mr. Chairman, there is a quarrel going on between the federal and Quebec provincial governments, about whether the wharves located in the province of Quebec, along the St. Lawrence, should be considered part of the highway network of the province. If so, responsibility for their maintenance should fall to the province. The federal and provincial governments have set a body to look into the matter and share responsibilities; according to my information, the Quebec government is quite willing to accept the responsibility for the maintenance of those wharves as part of its highway network conditional upon the central government's first repairing them before handing them over to the province for future maintenance. That is the bone of contention, Mr. Chairman.

This afternoon I communicated with the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Drury) and I asked him some clarification about the items contained in Bill C-91 which request a borrowing power of $6 billion. That is quite a lot of money, Mr. Chairman. Can we hope that with these $6 billion, the central government, through the Department of Public Works, will make improvements to the wharves along the St. Lawrence and on the islands of the St. Lawrence which need maintenance work to remain operative? I am not talking about wharves which should be maintained because of their history, for instance, but about those that have to be used regularly to maintain constant communications between the islands and the mainland.

The minister, who is an intelligent and an honest man, did not want to give me any definite answer. He simply gave me a note saying that he would review the program and that if the wharves in Bellechasse—and Bellechasse is part of Canada as far as I know—are included in the estimates, part of the budgetary items will be used to upgrade the wharves which need it, and this would come under this borrowing power of $6 billion.

Mr. Chairman, if this is the case, I shall be glad to support this bill. This money is needed to effect these improvements, to upgrade the wharves. There should be an agreement with the Quebec government for these wharves to be properly maintained, and come in the future under the jurisdiction of the Quebec government as part of the Quebec network. I am in complete agreement on this point. However, it matters little where these billions of dollars come from; this is something that must be discussed. I hope that this year, when Parliament studies the legislation giving chartered banks the power to create credit and to loan money to the population, we shall discuss this issue. However, for the time being, Mr. Chairman, it is my duty to support this budget item if they agree to use that money to solve a problem which has been swept under the carpet for too long. I very much hope that the Minister of Public Works will take into account the representations I am making now so that this matter can be solved once and for all.

A second point I would like to make in this debate is the federal-provincial agreements on the economic development of our country. There is an absolute necessity for the central government to sign agreements with the governments of all provinces, because the provinces are regional administrations closer to the people and they are in a better position to determine the real priorities for Canadians.

I wish that the central government could speed up all forms of negotiations. Not that the central government should impose its views on provincial governments but negotiations should be conducted on a meaningful basis. People appointed by the government or by ministers of various departments—civil servants, the senior civil servants of our administration—should understand once for all how urgent it is for Canada's unity to expedite those negotiations as people become impatient. The public at large cannot understand in every detail the various forms of negotiations and it gets impatient.

Sometimes, Mr. Chairman, some elements of our population take advantage of the slowness of negotiation to raise linguistic, racial and regional issues likely to divide Canadians further instead of uniting them so that all together we could work seriously and efficiently toward the development and prosperity of our country.

Mr. Chairman, within our parliamentary duties we sometimes have the unique opportunity to visit other countries as delegates. Mr. Chairman, in countries we only know by name and whose customs are unknown to us, we can see that people of all races are living there, black, white, orientals, Indians, people who speak several languages and who succeed in living and working together.

I wish to mention Mauritius that I visited last fall. Those people succeed in working together for the prosperity of their country.

Mr. Chairman, I would be very glad if we could do the same in this country. Whether we eat in French, in English, in German or in Italian, whatever the language we use, we must always keep in mind that we are first and above all Canadians.

Mr. Chairman, in my opinion, Canada is the most beautiful country in the world. In spite of our hard winters, of our snow, we still have four seasons we should be proud of. If Canada is to continue its development and growth for the profit of all the people who live in it, we must of necessity cooperate. We must work together and, as Canadian parliamentarians, we must always keep in mind that we must administer the revenue of our country by distributing it equitably.

Mr. Chairman, I make these remarks so that we can have a fair distribution in Quebec.

It does not matter whether we are Liberals, Conservatives, members of the Social Credit Party or members of the New Democratic Party. What matters is that we can say to the Canadian people that we made what we could to have a fair distribution of incomes between Canadians so that each area of the country has its shares and that we can say proudly: Canada is developing all its areas, regardless of our language.

[English]

Mr. Holmes: Mr. Chairman, I am sure those members who know me in the House will recognize that I will not be partisan during this debate. I do want to indicate my very grave concern about this science policy for Canada, and particularly that component that deals with medical research.

The minister in his comments which, if I may say so, were of a highly political form, has indicated a program of restraint. I have no difficulty in identifying with that. I think he should also note the importance of research and development in terms of the productivity about which he talked. Of course, whether it be in economic terms or in human terms, research and development in my opinion, and I think in the opinion of many, are an investment in the future.

[Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse).]

If one wanted to dramatize the importance of medical research I think all he would have to do is point to the questions which were raised in the House today, and I am referring specifically to the problem of swine influenza and the recent announcement of the President of the United States, who indicated his administration will be introducing a comprehensive program to prevent the outbreak of this particular disease. I only need to refer to the great epidemic of 1916-18 in which 15 million to 18 million lives were lost. May I simply say that without medical research and without the bio-medical community, that type of commodity and that type of progress would not be with us today.

At the outset I want to quote, if I may, from an article which states:

> It is difficult to realize at such short range just how important an influence the work of Dr. Banting and Mr. Best has been in stimulating medical research in Canada, and indeed throughout the civilized world; but it seems likely that history will view the discovery of insulin, not only as a valuable contribution to the science of medicine but of peculiar significance in as much as the efforts of several ancillary sciences were focused upon its discovery. In a peculiar way, therefore, the work of Banting and Best represents medical research at its highest. So far as Canada is concerned we may be forgiven our special pride, in that our owns sons, in our own country, have produced something so worthy of the noblest traditions of our calling, and that their discovery was given freely to the whole world. We are well aware that Canada has produced many exceptional men of science, but only too many whose contributions have brought renown alone to the countries of their adoption, rather than to the land of their education and birth.

That editorial appeared in the CMA Journal in 1923, and it depicted the spirit of our pioneers in the bio-medical research community. It also, of course, outlined the successes of that particular day. We have seen that spirit throughout the 1960's, but I want to say with all sincerity that in recent years we have seen the strangulation of that pioneering spirit, with a very demoralizing effect on the medical research community in Canada.

I have followed with great interest and concern the Ministry of Science and Technology, and in particular the Medical Research Council. I have done this, as I indicated, with great concern since my arrival in Ottawa as a member of parliament in 1972. I think one can best describe the system, in my experience, as one of action, reaction, confrontation, and innumerable committee reports; in fact, a constant upheaval regarding the funding of research and, in particular, medical research in Canada, something that is most undesirable where stability is required.

I was prepared at the outset today to argue that the Medical Research Council requires an additional 15 per cent to 20 per cent in funding for the coming fiscal year, and I believe I would have no difficulty in presenting that argument. However, after hearing the President of the Treasury Board speak I have no intention of entering into the numbers game at this particular time, which in my view would be counterproductive when the government is employing political tactics to give the impression that it is actually introducing measures of economic restraint but without any consideration of priorities.

Let me make it very clear, and I want to make this very clear so there is no misunderstanding among hon. members in this Chamber, that if in fact the federal government had a national policy for science, and if in fact the federal government had a national policy in respect of health research, and medical research in particular, then I would suggest to you in all sincerity that this debate would not have been necessary today. It would have been redundant and, indeed, the scientific community would have had adequate funds to carry out its particular disciplines.

As the scenario of government inaction in developing policy and the demoralizing confrontation with the scientific community have unfolded, one fact has become perfectly clear. The scientists for their part have a good deal to learn about policy and the political process; and the government and, I say in all sincerity, the bureaucracy of mandarins associated with it, have a great deal to learn about science. I have no doubt that if dialogue between the two parties I have mentioned had been better, and if the government has seen fit to establish a mechanism for an ongoing exchange of views, a realistic and effective science policy would have been established. As I indicated previously, this debate would have been redundant and unnecessary.

I indicated that scientists have a good deal to learn about policy and the political process. Frankly I have some degree of sympathy with that section of the scientific community which believes they must devote their efforts to their primary work rather than being involved in the political arena. However, the recent experience of representatives of the Canadian Society of Clinical Investigations at their meeting in Quebec, and their dealings with the press, are an example of an unfortunate communications gap that can occur and be very detrimental to their cause. Without attempting to defend their action I believe that many scientists are afraid of the media and have found the political process to be frustrating, time-consuming, and non-productive.

On a more positive note I wish to emphasize the importance of good communications and to state that this was demonstrated very ably by a Dr. John Bienenstock of McMaster, and Dr. Charles Schriber of Montreal, when they appeared as witnesses before the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs, and articulated in a positive manner the concerns of the research community.

I submit to the government, Mr. Speaker, that this is the type of dialogue that is extremely important. I indicated that the government and the mandarins associated with the government have a great deal to learn about science. I wish to take a moment or two to mention briefly a few principles I feel are important, principles which I believe the government has not grasped and does not understand in the whole field of scientific endeavour.

In the area of health I do not think anyone would argue that the ultimate goal of all health research is to improve the health of each Canadian. Society expects, and we have the responsibility to assure high standards of medical education, health services, and health care. Research is linked to the training of professional manpower, to learning, and to a high quality health care system, and is therefore dependent on a viable research base. I find it inconceivable that the government cannot understand this very simple fundamental principle that medical research is interrelated with medical education, which in turn is related to the quality of medical care that is given Canadians.

If I may, Mr. Chairman, in relation to this particular aspect I should like to quote from an article by Dr. J. B. Armstrong entitled "Quality Teaching, Care Depends on Research". I should point out that Dr. Armstrong is Chief Medical Adviser to the Canadian Heart Foundation. The article states:

> Scientific research is a part of the culture and has a role not unlike creative activity in the arts. But it has an additional function, a dividend if you will, in the expansion of knowledge as well as experience. Scientific research is thus a learning experience, of asking questions and seeking answers. Research in the humanities tends to rely on interpretation of the work of others, that is, library research as distinct from the bench research of the natural sciences. My point is that scholarly research is a creative learning experience for the worker and at the same time adds to the general fund of knowledge.
> The learning aspect of research is a most important component of university activity, where most of the organized higher learning now takes place. Medical knowledge is no exception. It is growing very rapidly, almost certainly doubling in less than every five years. To keep abreast of this rapid expansion, the learning process in Canadian health centres requires that our imaginative teachers be learners also, at the threshold of their particular fields of endeavour. This form of learning in our medical schools is medical research. The recognition of this learning component by MRC and other health agencies has meant that the distribution of grants and awards has offset, to a degree, regional disparities. It is essential to the continued development of health care in Canada.

Again I must re-emphasize the very fundamental principle, which has not grasped by the government or by the ministers on the opposite side, that medical research and medical education are involved with the delivery of quality health care. I have no intention of developing the arguments in respect of basic or pure research versus applied research or mission oriented research since I believe there is an important role for each of these areas. I think it is clear that we must establish some priorities which require urgent attention, and therefore there must be appropriate research programs for this. However, I must also point out that in my opinion we must ensure an adequate freedom for the researchers in our community.

In this regard I was particularly disturbed by a recent article which appeared in the Globe and Mail of Thursday, March 18, 1976. It is entitled "Scientists Come Out Fighting as Research Money Frozen". I wish to quote the article as follows:

> Science Minister C. M. Drury recently told the Senate science policy committee that science and technology should be supported 'to the extent that it can serve to resolve the problems we face, social or national problems. The extent to which it would exist for and in itself is, in my mind, a great deal more doubtful.' Mr. Drury argued against a 'blind faith' in science as 'a good thing'. If science and technology can be helpful 'it should be supported,' he said, 'and if it can't it shouldn't.'

I realize that newspapers at times have been known to misquote, but I want to remind hon. members that in the throne speech of 1973, at which time the science policy was espoused, on that day there was no doubt in my mind, or in the minds of these who followed it closely, that the decision of the government was in fact to make certain that the various research councils and the various granting bodies should more directly serve its own policy objectives.

I know there are many individuals in all parts of this House who believe there is no room for basic research or for curiosity research. However, I want to suggest this is a very dangerous assumption. I would simply refer to the present classification that is used in terms of grants. As I understand it there are three classifications. There is type

I, referred to as curiosity-oriented research. There is a type II, which is real research for support of departmental goals. Finally, there is research for the support of national objectives. If one looks at this very carefully one will see there are certain dangers.

I want to emphasize that I believe in theory there is some merit to this type of approach. For example, I know that curiosity-oriented research or so-called pure research can be and is evaluated by the peer review mechanism guaranteeing scientific excellence. The danger, of course, is when the politician or bureaucrat, or some other individual raises the priority rating of a scientifically inadequate type of program and is prepared to make it fundable under a type II program. Of course we have the situation where the pure science will be pursued for political reasons, and of course in such an instance, in my opinion, everyone will lose.

Before closing I should like to quote what I think is a very worthwhile comment by Albert Szent-Gyorgyi in an article on research grants which appeared in "Perspectives in Biology and Medicine—Autumn 1974". I should point out that Albert Szent-Gyorgyi was the Nobel Laureate for the discovery of Vitamin C. It states:

Scientific research is, in many ways, related to art. If one wants good music to be produced, one looks for a good musician and not for a project. Projects have no meaning and value anyway, because there are only two kinds of science: good and bad. Good science is made by good scientists, poor science by poor scientists, and the most brillant project is worthless in the hands of a poor scientist, while, conversely, a good scientist has a good chance to come up with something valuable whatever he touches, because "die Welt rundet sich im Tautrophen" (Goethe) which could be translated by saying that all the great laws of nature are represented in a drop of dew. Pasteur went to Germany to study brewing beer and came home with the discovery of optical isomerism.

It is easy to find good scientists, because the good scientists are mostly those who have produced good science. Find them and support them, enable them to work. That's all there is to it. Don't torture them with senseless projects.

Let me simply say in conclusion that the entire problem related to medical research, to the science policy in Canada, is, in my opinion, more than the need for a temporary transfusion of funds. I believe it requires an understanding, a grasp of the problems of science and its importance in our community, and a recognition on the part of the government of the importance of science in our community and to Canadian citizens. Finally, it requires a commitment to develop that type of science policy.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. McCleave): Order, please. Before I recognize the hon. member for Scarborough East (Mr. O'Connell), the Chair should receive two reports. Therefore, I ask leave to rise, report progress, and request leave to consider this bill again later this day. Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Progress reported.

ELECTORAL BOUNDARIES READJUSTMENT ACT

OBJECTION TO COMMISSION REPORT RESPECTING ONTARIO

The Acting Speaker (Mr. McCleave): It is my duty to inform the House that an objection signed by the hon. members for Ottawa Centre (Mr. Poulin), Ontario (Mr. Cafik), Thunder Bay (Mr. Penner), York West (Mr. Fleming), Hamilton Mountain (Mr. MacFarlane), Mississauga (Mr. Abbott), St. Catharines (Mr. Parent), Trinity (Miss Nicholson), Fort William (Mr. McRae), and Glengarry-Prescott-Russell (Mr. Ethier) has been filed with me pursuant to Section 20 of the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act, chapter E-2, R.S.C., 1970, to the report of the Electoral Boundaries Commission for the province of Ontario.

OBJECTION TO COMMISSION REPORT RESPECTING QUEBEC

The Acting Speaker (Mr. McCleave): It is also my duty to inform the House that an objection signed by the hon. members for Pontiac (Mr. Lefebvre), Mercier (Mr. Boulanger), Bonaventure-Îles de la Madeleine (Mr. Béchard), Papineau (Mr. Ouellet), Rivière du Loup-Temiscouata (Mr. Gendron), Lévis (Mr. Guay), Frontenac (Mr. Corriveau), Labelle (Mr. Dupras), Lapointe (Mr. Marceau) and Longueuil (Mr. Olivier) has been filed with me pursuant to Section 20 of the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act, chapter E-2, R.S.C., 1970, to the report of the Electoral Boundaries Commission for the province of Quebec.

If the House agrees, I would suggest we follow past practice and print the text of the objections as appendices to this day's Votes and Proceedings. Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

INTERIM SUPPLY ENDING MARCH 31, 1977

The House resumed consideration in committee of Bill C-91, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending 31 March, 1977—Mr. Chrétien—Mr. McCleave in the Chair.

Mr. O'Connell: Mr. Chairman, may I call it six o'clock?

The Acting Chairman (Mr. McCleave): Is it agreed that it is now six o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

At 5.55 p.m. the Committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Chairman, I ask the indulgence of the hon. member for Scarborough East. There were some discussions earlier today with respect to the presence this evening of the Minister of Finance, and I think at some inconvenience he did make an arrangement to be here sharp at eight o'clock in order to answer some questions to be asked by one hon. member. I wonder if it would be agreeable to the hon. member for Scarborough East if that could be done so that the minister could be questioned, and then we would carry on with the normal course of things.

Mr. O'Connell: Mr. Chairman, I would be glad indeed to co-operate with the suggestion made by the hon. member.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I wish to thank the hon. member.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Boulanger): There still must be unanimous consent of the committee. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I wish to express my thanks to the hon. member for Scarborough East for yielding the floor, and also to the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton for his courtesy with regard to the arrangements which were made.

My statement is with respect to clause 5 of the interim supply bill which, as hon. members know, seeks new statutory borrowing authority of $6 billion and would serve the purpose of cancelling all outstanding and unused borrowing authority.

As hon. members are aware, the Financial Administration Act, section 36, requires that no money shall be borrowed or security issued by or on behalf of Her Majesty without the authority of parliament. This refers to new money only, because there is a continuing authority in the act for the government to borrow funds to repay maturing debt. Authority to borrow sufficient new money to cover estimated financial requirements, together with a margin for contingencies, is normally sought and granted in one of the first appropriation acts of any fiscal year.

Hon. members might find it helpful if I begin by reviewing the situation in fiscal 1975-76, which will come to an end in a few days time. It will be recalled that a borrowing authority of $4 billion is provided in Appropriation Act No. 2 for 1975, and a further $2 billion in the Supplementary Borrowing Authority Act 1975. Under this total authority of $6 billion we have obtained net new money of $4.6 billion this fiscal year, and a further $214 million will be obtained from the April 1 bond issue. Thus the unused authority which will be cancelled by the passage of the bill will amount to about $1.2 billion.

In sum, by March 31, 1976, the increases in debt issues will be as follows: treasury bills, $865 million; Canada savings bonds, $2,600 million; marketable bonds, $1,175 million, making a total of $4,640 million. The amounts offered at the 90 day and 180 day treasury bill auctions were increased, starting a year ago, at the rate of $10 million per week, and this subsequently increased in July to $15 million, and in October to $20 million.

After a pause during the Canada Savings Bond campaign the program was reinstituted with a weekly offer of $20 million, and this figure is now $25 million. The one year bills were auctioned four times during the year, with increments totalling $150 million over the period.

In fiscal 1975-76, $1,774 million in marketable bonds matured, and in exchange $2,550 million worth of bonds were sold. In August a gap in the maturity schedule was used to raise a further $400 million of new money. Emphasis was placed during the year on raising money on the long term bond market, and it proved possible to build up a $600 million single issue maturing October 1, 1995.

The 1975-76 Canada Savings Bond program was most successful with gross sales of about $3,700 million, while redemptions over the fiscal year totalled about $1,100 million. It will be noted that the Canada Saving Bonds total has been maintained at approximately 39 per cent of the total government debt.

The ownership of the debt has changed slightly over the year. The chartered banks own about $100 million more, while the Bank of Canada has increased its holdings by $800 million. The public has purchased about $1 billion of marketable securities and treasury bills as well as $2.5 billion of Canada Savings Bonds.

The $4.6 billion we borrowed has been more than sufficient to meet our requirements. Our cash balances amounted to $3.2 billion at the beginning of the year and stood at $3.7 billion as of yesterday, an increase of $500 million. Thus our total financial requirements have amounted to $4 billion. Excluding foreign exchange transactions which have, on balance, been a source of funds, our financial requirements have been $4.3 billion.

We expect a substantial rundown in cash balances in the remaining few days of the fiscal year. A number of large payments will be made, and the volume of tax refunds is building. I cannot be precise about the final figure for the fiscal year but it seems likely that the total financial requirements will be at the lower end of the range of $5 billion to $6 billion.

I would remind hon. members that the books remain open for a period of time after the end of the fiscal year and thus some months will elapse before the detailed accounts showing the breakdown between budgetary and non-budgetary transactions will be prepared. I will provide the House with preliminary estimates in my budget in May.

Turning to the fiscal year 1976-77, my colleague, the President of the Treasury Board, has indicated that total outlays for the fiscal year will be $42,150 million, an increase of a little less than 16 per cent. The main estimates have of course been tabled in the House and are being examined in detail by the standing committees. It seems likely that our revenues will grow by broadly similar amounts as our outlays, on the basis of the existing tax structure and the widespread expectation that real growth in the economy will amount to about 5 per cent and the rate of inflation will decline.

On this basis, the total financial requirements will be of the same order of magnitude next year as in 1975-76. I will of course be providing more precise and detailed forecasts in my budget, taking into account the latest information available on the economy and any policy tax changes to be announced at that time.

As in 1975-76, we may be able to meet some of our requirements by running down cash balances, since they are likely to be at a comfortable level, even after the drain of the next few days. I can thus visualize a public debt program for 1976-77 of broadly similar magnitude and composition as in 1975-76.

The borrowing authority of $6 billion being sought by the government under this bill is the same as that obtained in 1975-76, and provides the necessary margin for contingencies. The financial requirements excluding foreign exchange transactions may be larger than can now be foreseen. Foreign exchange transactions are impossible to predict. If the Canadian dollar is strong in the exchange markets, our ongoing policy of intervention in order to maintain orderly market conditions can add significantly to our cash requirements as they have done recently. It is of course also the case that the sale of foreign exchange can provide a source of money for us when the value of the Canadian dollar is declining.

Finally, I would note that we cannot control with great precision the amounts of Canada Savings Bonds which the public will buy each year. Successful campaigns as in the past two years can exhaust the borrowing authority if no margin is provided.

That is a review of the use of the borrowing authority in the fiscal year just closing and some perspective on the borrowing authority now being sought on an interim basis in this bill.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Chairman, I wonder if the minister could tell the House what the cumulative borrowing authority to the government is at the present time, bearing in mind the two appropriation bills he referred to which were both passed in 1975?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Chairman, in my remarks I just indicated that it came to an aggregate of $6 billion—$4 billion provided in Appropriation Act No. 2 of 1975, and a further $2 billion in the Supplementary Borrowing Authority Act of 1975.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Chairman, I think the minister misunderstood my question. The wording of the two appropriation acts that I referred to is that the government has the authority to negotiate loans, etc. to the extent of the $6 billion that he refers to, but in addition they can also carry all the debt that is on the books. What I want is a figure of the total debt, plus the additional authority made available to the government.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Chairman, the figure of the total outstanding debt was given in the standing committee. I do not have it with me this evening. Both the government's funded debt and other liabilities—as up to date figures as were then available—were given to the hon.

member in the standing committee. I would have to check the debt review to give that exact figure. To repeat my answer, however, the authorization for 1975-76 was $6 billion.

Mr. Stevens: I take it the figure that the minister is referring to is the one given at the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs on March 18.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Yes, Mr. Chairman. The last time the hon. member and I addressed this issue, and I am not sure of the exact date, my officials were there and made the calculation as near as one can do at the moment, on the outstanding debt. My recollection is it was as of March 31, 1975, and the more up to date figure of March 31, 1976 which was necessarily an estimate, and the estimated average between the two figures.

Mr. Stevens: Further on a point of clarification, Mr. Chairman, the debt figures given by the minister at that committee meeting are the debt figures in relation to interest bearing debt. Do I take it that clause 5 gives authorization only in reference to interest bearing debt and does not include the total gross debt of the country which at March 31, 1975, for example, was $62.6 billion?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Clause 5 provides authority to borrow on such terms either by interest or discount as may be arranged in the market by the Bank of Canada as agent for the Government of Canada. Other debts that the government may have under the Canada Pension Plan, armed forces superannuation and other plans are not included in this authority to borrow. This is authority to borrow for the purpose of government expenditures.

Mr. Stevens: May I take it from the minister's remarks that liabilities that are reflected on Canada's balance sheet in a liability and assets sense, liabilities that are not interest bearing, are not included in the gross debt figures that are contemplated in clause 5?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): There are liabilities of various kinds in regard to various departments. What we have been talking about are the liabilities for which I am responsible as Minister of Finance under the Department of Finance. Other outstanding liabilities, either on current terms or otherwise, would have to be found from the various departments themselves.

For example, if the hon. member is referring to unliquidated claims that might be recovered against the Government of Canada under the Crown Liability Act in the Federal Court of Canada, of course one cannot make any estimate in advance of what damages the courts may award against the government for motor vehicle negligence or other liabilities. We are talking exclusively of authority to borrow funds for the purpose of the Crown meeting the expenditures of the Government of Canada in 1976-77.

Mr. Stevens: If I may refer again to the meeting of the standing committee to which the minister has referred and the figures given by the minister that day, as of March 31, 1976, the interest bearing debt of the nation was $53,667 million. To come back to my first question: assuming that is a correct estimate, $53,667 million, is it fair for the committee to assume that upon the passage of this $6 billion authorization contemplated in clause 5, the total debt outstanding plus the additional authorization will be $59,667 million?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Chairman, as was indicated to the hon. member the amount involved is an estimate. I would have to check and see whether he has read the figures into the record correctly but, subject to that, that is the estimate of the liability in relation to outstanding treasury bills, Canada Savings Bonds, and funded debt of the Government of Canada. We are considering authority for $6 billion more. At this moment no part of the $6 billion has been issued. If it were issued the figure would be as estimated, or very close to it, plus the additional $6 billion, as indicated in the clause.

● (2020)

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Chairman, to be specific, I gave the minister a copy of the minutes of that finance committee meeting. He may check the $53,667 million figure. Am I correct in assuming that that $53,667 million, plus the $6 billion contemplated in clause 5, will be the total authorized debt outstanding?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): No, Mr. Chairman. That is an estimate only as of March 31, 1976, which has not arrived yet. The officials were estimating the figures for the purpose of the hon. gentleman's question.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Chairman, may I ask another specific question? If one assumes that the estimate is correct, is the government requesting authority, over all, with respect to $6 billion, plus $53,667 million?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): No, Mr. Chairman. We are requesting authorization for $6 billion. There is already an outstanding, significant allocation with regard to treasury bills, funded debt, and Government of Canada Savings Bonds. No authority is being sought at this time for that $53 billion-odd, because authority already exists with respect to that money.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Chairman, the minister said that two appropriation bills were passed last year, one for $4 billion, another for $2 billion, for a total of $6 billion. On the basis of his own figures, given at the finance committee meeting, it appears that the government will have borrowed $6.156 million, or $156 million more than was authorized by the two appropriation bills to which he referred. Can the minister say why this over-run occurred?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Chairman, if I may refer again to the remarks I made when introducing the item for the benefit of the hon. gentlemen, section 36 of the Financial Administration Act requires that no money shall be borrowed or security issued by or on behalf of Her Majesty without the authority of parliament. The hon. member's reference is to new money, but there is continuing authority under the act for the government to borrow funds in order to repay maturing debt. You do not need fresh authority under the Financial Administration Act to pay maturing debt. That authority is already provided by the Financial Administration Act.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Chairman, I am sorry that the minister misunderstood me again. I shall try to be more specific. According to his own figures, as of March 31, 1975, total federal government interest bearing borrowings stood at $47,511 million. The government's estimated borrowings, which must, by inference, mean new borrowing as well as existing borrowing, as of March 31, 1976, exactly the same year with which the two appropriation bills mentioned dealt, had risen to the figure of $53,667 million, which represents an increase of $6,156 million, or $156 million more than the $6 billion authorized. Could the minister comment?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Chairman, borrowings during the year did not quite equal the $6 billion figure, but the money would have been partly used for re-funding existing debt, as I suggested to the hon. gentleman.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Chairman, according to public account figures, as of the end of March, 1975, the total, gross federal debt stood at $62,696 million. Yet this evening, and also during the finance committee meeting, it was mentioned that the total interest bearing debt of the nation stood at $47,511 million. Can the minister explain how the difference of $15,185 million arises? That is the difference between the figure respecting this country's gross debt as mentioned in the committee, and as mentioned in committee of the whole this evening.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, the figures for the purpose of government borrowing on March 18 were estimates, of course. The estimate as of March 31, 1976, is for $53 billion. But here we are talking not about other liabilities; we are talking about the government's borrowing, pursuant to its borrowing authority, which is what this item is about. As I said to the hon. gentleman, I do not pretend to give all the other liabilities of the Government of Canada, only the liabilities on funded debt.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Chairman, to refer to the estimates, the minister is asking for an increase of $875 million in debt servicing costs. To be specific, I am referring to the estimate for the fiscal year 1977, item 8-16. The minister suggests that government spending to cover debt servicing charges, interest, etc., will rise from $3,775 million, to $4,650 million, an increase of $875 million. Why is this staggering amount required, if he proposes to borrow in the current year an additional $6 billion at the outside? Even if we adopt the highest interest figures the minister quoted in committee, if the government borrowed $6 billion extra at 8.2 per cent, it cannot justify a jump of $875 million in extra interest costs. Apparently the government is seeking authority for that amount under this bill.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Chairman, I would have to say that that is the estimate of liability which will occur. Of course the over-all interest cost to the Government of Canada will be averaged out as lower cost debt is retired and new debt issued.

Mr. Martin: Mr. Chairman, may I mention two things happening which are directly related to the subject we are debating and connected with the public accounts committee. It is important for the committee and the Canadian public to know of three important studies undertaken during the last several months under the auspices of the public accounts committee. The first of these concerns the study of the independent review committee which, I understand, will lead to the introduction of a new auditor general act. The President of the Treasury Board has recently said he intends to introduce this bill fairly soon.

The second study dealt with the review of the public accounts of Canada. This was a particularly important study because it will lead ultimately to measures which will enable people to measure the year by year, or even month by month financial performance of the $40 billion corporation known as the Government of Canada. This important topic has been debated in the public accounts committee several times. Ultimately it will have far-reaching effects on the way in which the financial activities of the government can be measured, and the financial performance in one year will be compared with what has been suggested in the budget that year. One year's performance will also be compared with another year's.

I suggest that recommendations concerning the public accounts of Canada will result eventually in a system of accounts the significance of which will be recognized beyond the confines of Parliament Hill. In other words it will be a form of financial reporting that will be recognizable in terms of modern day financial management reporting. This is an extremely important matter. It is one to which the government has been anxious to address itself for a considerable time.

A study was conducted with the benefit of considerable outside expertise in the form of professional guidance. The study will, of course, be ongoing. We have been given assurance by the President of the Treasury Board that the 41 recommendations emanating from that study will indeed be implemented as quickly as possible. It is important to understand that some of these recommendations are far-reaching in terms of the accounting and financial reporting systems in use in the government, and it may take several years before they can be implemented in whole. The main thing is that a start has been made.

The other important point is that the Auditor General has assured us that each year from now on he will give an accounting to the Public Accounts Committee of the way in which of these recommendations have been implemented, how far they have been implemented, and what recommendations still remain to be implemented. In view of the extensive nature of these recommendations, this is an important point. Indeed we may cover one or more parliaments before all the recommendations can be implemented. This is very reassuring to a member of parliament, who after all has no particular tenure in the position he occupies in any particular parliament, to know that even if he should leave this House these kinds of important recommendations will come into force in due course.

The third report I would like to speak about tonight, and perhaps this is the most far-reaching of all these reports, has been labelled the financial management and control study. This particular report was the result of a study that was initiated by the present Auditor General, shortly after his appointment some two years ago, in conjunction with Treasury Board and the President of the Treasury Board to undertake the most comprehensive review of the financial management and control operations of the government that has been undertaken since the days of the Glassco Commission.

I am sure many of us will recall the excitement among the Canadian public that accompanied the appointment of the Glassco Commission some 15 years ago, and the excitement with which we reviewed its recommendations. I am happy to note that over the past 15 years the government has implemented many of those recommendations.

However, it is important to note that a number of the recommendations in the area of financial management and control have yet to be implemented in whole. I say this because they have been implemented in part. To some of us who were examining the current report, that part is not nearly adequate. In fact it is missing a great deal. This is the area to which this current financial management and control study has addressed itself.

I would also like to note that this particular study is only about half completed. The current report being reviewed in the public accounts committee deals principally with matters related to government departments as such. It is my understanding that there will be another part of this study which will result in another report, perhaps next year or in the foreseeable future, that will deal Crown corporations and the many agencies of government.

It is perhaps important to note some of the terms of reference given to this particular group when their study was to be undertaken. One of the key areas is the recommendations which came out of this study dealing with the manner in which estimates should be placed before parliament. This is a very key point. I wish to enumerate the directions given to the study committee when it was appointed.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Boulanger): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but he will recall that it was unanimously agreed to discuss clause 5. When I recognized the hon. member I thought he was either going to speak or ask a question on clause 5 rather than engage in a general debate on clause 2. I have recognized the hon. member and I cannot ask him to yield the floor, but I suggest that he address himself to clause 5.

Mr. Martin: Mr. Chairman, I would be happy to yield the floor. However, I wish to reserve my right to speak on clause 2 at another point.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Chairman, if I may take another run at the minister, perhaps I can get an answer to my first question if I try again. I refer the minister to the actual wording of clause 5. It reads:

> The Governor in Council may, in addition to the sums now remaining unborrowed and negotiable of the loans authorized by Parliament, by any Act—

My question is, how much is the amount remaining unborrowed and negotiable under previous authority which could be added to the $6 billion now being requested?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Chairman, I already responded to the hon. member, both in committee and here. One cannot give an actual figure outstanding as of the moment. An estimate was given as of March 31, 1976, by my officials in committee. The figure for that was $53,667 million. That is the amount they estimated as of March 31, 1976.

Mr. Stevens: I come back to my basic third question. Assuming the estimate the minister referred to, the $53,667 million, is a correct figure, is it correct to say that on April 1, coming into the new fiscal year of 1977, the government may then borrow the existing $53,667 million, plus another $6 billion, in short, almost $60 billion—$59,667 million? Am I correct?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): No, Mr, Chairman, the hon. member is not correct. The government has borrowed an amount of approximately the estimate. The government is authorized to borrow, starting April 1, a further $6 billion and that is all.

Mr. Stevens: Assuming the minister's estimate given at committee is correct, that on March 31 the total government borrowing will be $53,667 million, is it correct to say that what the government is asking for is an additional $6 billion which, if it is utilized during the next fiscal year, will mean that its total borrowing will be $59,667 million?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): That very much depends on redemptions, the extent to which the $53,667 million is reduced. One can only guess at it. I suppose one could say that the outside aggregate of both borrowing authority and outstanding, the debt would be the sum of two figures.

Mr. Stevens: Finally we got it; the sum of the two figures would be a total debt and authorization of $59,667 million.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Chairman, the hon. member asked if the government is being authorized to borrow in the coming year $53,667 million, plus $6 billion, and my answer to that was no. The government is being authorized to borrow $6 billion only. There is an estimated $53 billion outstanding.

● (2040)

Mr. Stevens: If we could assume that we could return to April 1 of the current fiscal year, in other words, to April 1, 1975, is it not correct also to say that the figure the hon. gentleman has given us for total government borrowing of $57,511 million could only be increased by $6 billion as a result of the two appropriation bills to which we have referred, which allow a further authorized borrowing of $6 billion? In short, if one adds the estimated figure the minister has given us it appears we have gone $156 million over the authorizations in the two appropriation bills.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): The figure given was as at March 31, 1975. I cannot be certain of the figure as at April 1 without inquiry. Perhaps I could refer again to my statement that there was net new money in the fiscal year of $4.6 billion and that a further $214 million would be obtained from the April 1st bond issue. So, if the same event had occurred in the previous year, of course the March 31 figure would have been exceeded by April 1.

Mr. Stevens: I shall not delay the proceedings. It appears the authorization has been exceeded and perhaps we shall have more to say about that later in the proceedings. May I ask the minister this question? In view of Governor Bouey's attempt to be a little more restrained as far as monetary growth is concerned, would the minister indicate whether his new financing plans have been discussed with Governor Bouey and has he indicated that the hon. gentleman's fiscal stance in connection with the federal government's cash needs is acceptable to him? Does the governor feel he can live with it and yet retain the relatively restrained monetary growth he has been suggesting?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): The governor does not, of course, pass judgment on fiscal policy; that is the responsibility of the department. But I think I can refer to the statement of the governor in the annual report of the Bank of Canada indicating his approbation in general terms of the fiscal policies of the government and also of the anti-inflation policies we are pursuing.

Mr. Stevens: Bearing in mind the governor's statement that he felt government would have to be less demanding as far as cash requirements are concerned, has the minister specifically discussed with the governor the cash needs of the federal treasury in the coming year, and has the governor indicated that the monetary stance he is proposing is sufficient to cover the fiscal needs outlined by the minister?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): We have not discussed any specific cash figure. We have talked about it on a broader economic basis. The governor shares the government's concern that a too tight fiscal or monetary policy could have the effect of retarding recovery and risking much higher rates of unemployment, and it is for this reason he has given his approval to the government's fiscal stance and to the economic policy we have followed with regard to the anti-inflation program. That is why we agree, of course, on the appropriateness of the monetary policy being followed.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, I want to speak on clause two. I do not wish to interrupt the interesting line of questioning which the hon. member for York-Simcoe is carrying on, but in view of the fact that the Chairman this afternoon held everyone down to 20 minutes I should like to have some idea how long the hon. member is going to be.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Boulanger): The time allotted to the hon. member for York-Simcoe is very close to expiring. If the hon. member could wait a few minutes we might be able to carry clause 5. I will allow the hon. member for York-Simcoe one more question.

Mr. Stevens: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I thank hon. members also for their patience. My final question is this: of the $6 million which may be borrowed, does the minister contemplate any of this sum being placed outside Canada, in the United States, or in other foreign capital markets?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): If I might correct the hon. member again, it is $6 billion which is to be borrowed, not $6 million. It is difficult to say where it will be placed. In all probability it will be placed in Canada. The Canada Savings Bond issue will, of course, be entirely confined to Canadians. It will depend very much on the state of the market at the time. The great probability is that it will be placed here. It has been quite some time, a period of years, since the Government of Canada placed a bond issue outside the country.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Boulanger): Shall clause 5 carry?

Some hon. Members: Stand.

Clause 5 stood.

On Clause 2.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order. I would like to point out an error in clause 2. We read $198,670,283.33 in the English text and $199,670,283.33 in the French translation. As you know, the French side is always more generous than the English side but this should not occur in this bill. Therefore I should like to inform the House, on a point of order, that on page 2, clause 2, subclause g), the French should read $198,670,283.33 instead of $199,670,283.33.

[English]

Mr. Towers: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Chairman. I base my point of order on Standing Order 69 which states that "no bill may be introduced either in blank or in an imperfect shape." I wanted to bring that to your attention. Perhaps the President of the Treasury Board would tell the House what he was trying to do—whether he was trying to confuse the Auditor General or members of parliament, or whether he has joined the C.D. Howe club whose motto is "What's a million?" In any case, I raised this point on the basis of the provision clearly set out in Standing Order 69.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Boulanger): We are now on clause 2. The hon. member for Scarborough East.

On clause 2—$4,970,732,370.57 granted for 1976-77.

Mr. O'Connell: Mr. Chairman, I realize time is running out so I shall be brief. During this discussion of the estimates of the President of the Treasury Board I wish to call attention to a pay practice which I consider to be unfair to those employees of the government known as casuals. I am addressing this point to the minister in his capacity as representing the government as employer. It is somewhat in the nature of a grievance felt by many people in my constituency, and undoubtedly by constituents of other members. The grievance arise from the regulations administered by Treasury Board relating to the retroactive pay of casuals. The problem can be simply stated.

First, as members well know, casuals are not included in the collective bargaining process nor do they enjoy certain other benefits available to permanent employees of the government. The question I want to raise for hon. members is this: should these differences in the status of casuals and other employees justify the present rule that casuals do not qualify for retroactive pay when, for example, they have worked during a period after a collective agreement has expired and before a new one is negotiated? I do not think they should be excluded from retroactive pay because of their different status.

For example, let us assume that an agreement expired last November and that the new agreement was ratified in February, with a three-month period following termination of the agreement. Those who are classified as permanent employees, or even as term casuals, will receive retroactive pay for the three months' period after the agreement terminated. This is not the case with casuals unless a casual had worked in an uninterrupted fashion for the preceding six months.

It is this six-month formula or rule that I wish to raise as a grievance before we pass the estimates. I believe this produces an injustice, and what I am doing is making a representation to the President of the Treasury Board, asking him to consider changing the formula. Let us consider perhaps a typical case, and then I should like to suggest to the minister an amended formula.

Consider a casual during any given year who works for perhaps three weeks and is then laid off, comes back on the payroll for two months and is then laid off, comes back on the payroll for a few weeks and is laid off, and comes back on the payroll for six months and is laid off. That is a typical pattern under which casuals operate now.

These are valuable employees if only in that they give flexibility to the employment needs of the government. They assist the government in its work during peak periods and they are not employed at other periods but in effect are on standby. This is of benefit to the employees who wish to be in the casual category, and is of benefit to the government, particularly to certain departments which have seasonal loads, for example National Health and Welfare, the Post Office, the Unemployment Insurance Commission undoubtedly, as well as other departments where there is an unsteady rhythm of employment needs.

The pay for these casuals is in fact related to that of a permanent employee in a similar category. Let us say it is to the second level or the minimum level of a clerk, grade 1, 2 or 3, whatever the cross-reference is. When the pay of one of these permanent employees is raised and there is a retroactive feature, that permanent employee receives retroactive pay, but the casual employee who is linked in a pay fashion to that level does not receive the retroactive pay for the same period. This is a grievance. This is unfair, in my view. It is unjust, and it is more keenly felt during a period of inflation.

My suggestion to the minister would be that the six-month rule be changed. There may be various formulas for the change, but the one I should like to suggest for his consideration is that a casual employee be entitled to retroactivity if the casual employee has worked for a six-month period, whether or not interrupted, in the 12 months preceding the termination of the agreement.

That would be a definite improvement because it would mean that the casual could accumulate six months over the year preceding termination. The employee might accumulate three months, then break off, then three weeks, and so on. There may be other formulas but this is the principle I am seeking, that these people be entitled to retroactivity on a less restrictive and more just formula than the one now existing.

This is not a great change to ask. The principle of retroactivity is already granted for casuals provided they have six uninterrupted months. I am only suggesting that the formula be changed to broaden it in its reach to other employees. I will say no more. I put this as a representation to the minister, and I am sure there are other hon. members who would be glad to support it.

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: I wish to thank the hon. member for Scarborough East (Mr. O'Connell) for bringing this problem to my attention. I was not aware of this apparent difference in the compensation methods of our casual employees. Obviously I cannot accept right away the hon. member's proposition because, first of all, there is a dogma in the relations between the government's employees and the government itself whereby we do not bring any changes without consulting the union representatives. So I take good note of these recommendations. There seems to be a discrepancy; the hon. member makes a concrete suggestion which I will be glad to consider with a view to finding a remedy to what seems to be an injustice.

[English]

While I am on my feet I should like to come back to a subject which was discussed at some length today regarding the Medical Research Council. I just want to say that this is a very difficult situation because there are a lot of good causes in the land. This is another illustration of the fact that the government's money is not always wasted. I would point out to the hon. member that the funds of the Medical Research Council have not been cut back, an not even frozen. The amount in 1974-75 was $42,860,000. The year after that we gave the council what I consider a substantial increase, to $47,434,000. In this fiscal year it will be $48,434,000 rather than $47,434,000, or an increase of $1 million. Of course I agree with everybody that this does not meet all the requirements of the council.

One hon. member tried to create the impression that I did not know anything about this at all. I must inform him that my own brother is a medical researcher and he gave me hell for this, even more than the hon. member. This is not my money but the money of all the taxpayers, and I have to do the best I can with it. We all know that there are pressures on members of the House; I always welcome suggestions from everyone, but we do have to make these difficult decisions. We hope that next year we will do better. I want to point out to the hon. member that there was no cutback at all, and not even a freeze. I must admit it was a very modest increase, but it is not a cutback when you give an extra $1 million. For me a million dollars is a very big amount of money.

Mr. Towers: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order. I have been waiting for your ruling on my earlier point of order. I am wondering how you are going to correct the error in this bill. There are many members who are not here tonight and they will not be aware of the error.

The Chairman: Order, please. The Chair took notice of the point brought to the attention of the committee. The hon. member asked a question concerning the purpose of this mistake. However, a mistake is a mistake, and in the mind of the Chair this is the type of error which I think we should correct by unanimous consent. Is it agreed?

● (2100)

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Chairman: The hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Martin: Mr. Chairman, a short while ago I was in the middle of my speech in connection with matters relating to clause 2 when it was pointed out to me by the Chair at the time that we were actually dealing with a different clause. I asked that my position be preserved once we reached the discussion of clause 2. I would appreciate knowing where I stand now.

The Chairman: Order, please. I think the hon. member is just losing valuable time. We will come to him in due course. The hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Chairman, I consider it somewhat strange that the government should boast so loudly about the substantial cuts in expenditures in respect of its guidelines aimed at inflation.

Mr. Blais: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman—

The Chairman: Order, please. If the parliamentary secretary wishes to raise a point of order about the fact that the hon. member for Scarborough West has not been recognized, the decision has been rendered by the Chair. The only alternative is to challenge my ruling. The Chair has the authority to recognize members in turn. The hon. member for Scarborough West had yielded to another member, for whatever reason. It is not his choice when he will be recognized. It is a prerogative of the Chair. The parliamentary secretary knows that. The Chair has recognized the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Chairman, before I was interrupted I was saying that the government should not be boasting about this. If we look at the facts, this is a very hollow boast. Let us look at the government expenditures over the past eight years, according to the figures in the book of estimates. In the 1968-69 fiscal year the estimates amounted to $10.8 billion while the current estimates stand at $38.4 billion. The figure has almost quadrupled in eight years.

Between 1975-76 and 1976-77 the figure increased from $28.2 billion to $38.4 billion. It was calculated about a year ago that if the government went on increasing its spending at the rate it was then, successive governments headed by the present Prime Minister would be spending by the end of this current year as much as was spent by all preceding Canadian governments combined. That is an example of restraint.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Mr. Chairman, I wonder whether the hon. member would permit a question.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): No. I will accept a question at the end of my remarks.

This is a strange record on which to base such a boast. The $38.4 billion is the figure in the main estimates only before any supplementaries have been added. When the supplementaries are added I am sure the figure will be over the quadruplicate. My prime interest, aside from deflating some of this inflationary talk or deflationary talk, is to concern myself with some of the defects in the planning over the last umpteen years by the government in the matter of air-sea rescue on the west coast.

Last year ten fishermen were lost during the herring-fishing season off the west coast. There were 14 vessels lost and six more seriously damaged. That was in March, 1975. With some prompting the Department of Transport set up an inquiry in mid-April. By July, after further prompting, a report was finally tabled in this House. It was a good report. It contained some excellent recommendations. Some were for immediate application, certainly before the next herring fishing season which began earlier this month.

Were these recommendations ever implemented before the fishing fleet set out to sea earlier this month, because four more lives already have been lost this season on the herring fishing grounds? Two of these lives were lost on Monday night this week. Against this background the following facts have a great relevance.

There are three service helicopters for air-sea rescue on the west coast, in addition to the one single coast guard helicopter. Of the three service helicopters, as of this morning only one was serviceable. In other words, two helicopters are in service at this moment to be available on call for the fishing fleet at sea composed of hundreds of small vessels spread up and down the coast.

What is more, the helicopter situation is not better this year than it was last year. This brings up the subject of today's debate—the lack of foresight by the government which places us in this perilous position of having too little in the way of air-sea rescue capability on the west coast. I am inclined to think the situation is not much better on the east coast, but we will hear about that shortly.

There is another element in this situation which deserves some comment. The three service helicopters, the three normally available at Comox, are by priority assigned to land search or to sea search for an aircraft downed at sea. They are not necessarily available for air-sea rescue for fishermen in distress. This means that on the west coast only one helicopter with hoist capacity is available, when serviceable, for the saving of life at sea in the Pacific in respect of the fishing fleet.

I should like to revert for a moment to the Fishing Boat Casualty Report which I mentioned earlier. In that report dated March, 1975, but not released to parliament until well on into July, and only then because of continual prodding by me, the officers of the Department of Transport inquiring into last year's accidents made a number of far-reaching recommendations. These recommendations related to training for skippers and mates, the publication of a fishermen's safety pamphlet for seamen generally, as well as weather forecasting, stability and load restrictions and arrangements.

I have had occasion to review these recommendations during the past few days because of the accidents that took place. I wonder how many of these recommendations were ever implemented. I found them all to be excellent and practical recommendations, but were they implemented? That is what I want to know. If they were not implemented, what was the reason. We lost 14 men and ten vessels last year, and four more men early this year, partly I suspect because these recommendations were not implemented.

Early in January the fishermen made representations to B.C. members of parliament about the forthcoming fishing season. I have a copy of those representations as conveyed to the Minister of Transport by my colleague, the hon. member for Victoria. Some of the recommendations made by the fishermen are identical to those made by the committee of enquiry. These include stability testing, loading arrangements and so on. Aside from this there was a call for improved air-sea rescue facilities for the fishing area. Was any heed paid to this call for help? How much heed was paid to the recommendations that were presented to the minister in January?

The first of the fishing boat disasters this year occurred off Cape Beale, the southern lip of Barclay Sound. Who came to the rescue? The United States Coast Guard. I believe one of their helicopters—and this I find distressing—crashed into the sea in its attempt to rescue some of our Canadian fishermen. We are fortunate in having neighbours of that kind. Two fishermen and the helicopter crew were saved as a result of the activities of a lifeboat crew which put out to sea. Most of the helicopter itself was eventually salvaged, but one seaman was lost and more would have been lost had it not been for the U.S. coastguard. Is there any better way of pointing out the deficiencies of the Canadian coastguard and the Canadian air-sea rescue facilities on the west coast?

I have said it before and I say it again now, hopefully for the last time, that we do not have an effective air-sea rescue on our coast. What is at issue here is a combination of the improper assignment of priorities in budgeting over the last eight or ten years, lack of foresight, and a confusion in the co-ordination of command. If these shortcomings had not been allowed to occur four, five or six years ago, we would not be in the position we are in today, that is, of asking the government to re-examine its priorities so that everything necessary is done to protect the lives of our fishermen.

Strengthening the air-sea rescue capability will cost a lot of money, but lives are at stake. Implementation of the recommendations of the Department of Transport will cost less money, but lives are still at stake, and the recommendations deserve to be implemented. This failure of the government to assign priorities properly adds to the growing fund of lack of confidence which marks the history of the government. Unfortunately this lack of confidence also reflects on parliament and on its members.

The government's credibility is in question, not only as a result of its failure to take the necessary steps in time vis-à-vis air-sea rescue. It has also been considerably shaken, I suggest, as a result of the failure of normal ethical standards of conduct to exercise their expected effect on all members of the cabinet, leading to the commission of what has come to be called impropriety. Now we have the sight of former senior public servants exercising functions in the private sector which at least causes one to ask oneself whether some conflict of interest is not at issue.

The experiment in which we are engaged today as a means of re-examining the estimates is long overdue. It is not absolutely clear whether it will be effective, but something effective has to be worked out to restore the credibility of parliament and of governments in general.

Last evening, for example, as we were asked to approve supplementary estimates we found it absolutely impossible to amend in any way the sums proposed by the government. There was one sum in particular which did not need to be there at all, yet we could not remove it. We were told that we should have had it removed in committee and brought forward to the House as an amendment when reporting the estimates to the House. That had been tried, Mr. Chairman. An opposition motion was put in the committee aimed at dropping that particular sum from the estimates. It was a sum which a senior public servant said he would not need, a matter of some $186,000 to be dropped. What happened? The government members voted to a man to oppose that deletion. As a majority their will prevailed, and as a result we passed in the supplementaries last night a sum of $186,000 which will not be needed.

It was maintained at the time that the unused funds would be returned in the normal course of events to the consolidated revenue fund. This is not necessarily so because in another committee, one on which I sat, some $858,000 of funds voted by this parliament to cover capital costs were admitted to have been diverted to the payment of services. When we questioned this improper procedure we were told that permission to cover this diversion was actually being asked at that moment. But if you examined those supplementaries, those funds had already been spent. So we cannot be absolutely certain that the $186,000 which was overestimated would be returned to the consolidated revenue fund automatically. This is one of the reasons why we are having this particular experiment in procedure tonight.

We want to devise methods of improving control by parliament over expenditures by government of whatever kind. What we want to know is where the government places its priorities in relation to expenditures of public funds, and in particular in the case of which I spoke, in relation to the safety of life at sea. There has been no evidence over the past three or four years, even after the tragedies of last year, that priorities in this area have been adjusted to meet altering demands.

In the matter of co-ordination of effort to bring together the activities of all the departments concerned, such as the Department of Transport, the Department of the Environment, the Department of Fisheries, the Solicitor General's Department, the RCMP, the Department of National Defence, and even Customs, little has been done to meet these crying needs. I am disturbed that the government is so bankrupt in the matter of governing that it will permit this parliament and the whole democratic process to become so eroded that we will have to start again at the beginning to restore parliament and all its institutions to the respect and honour which an effective performance alone can produce.

Mr. Flynn: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order. The hon. member said that when the controversial bill came up "the government to a man . . .". I would like to correct him. It was "the government to a person".

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Martin: Mr. Chairman, I should like to terminate my comments which I started a little earlier. I yielded my place to allow the discussion to continue on clause 5. I was discussing the terms of reference given some two years to the committee which appear in the report of the Auditor General on financial management and control practices within the government. I should like to read these terms of reference into the record because of their new application to the estimates process which we are now going through.

The committee was asked to examine:

(a) Statutes and Treasury Board regulations, policies, directives and guidelines relevant to financial management and control, and the extent of compliance therewith in departments and agencies;

(b) Financial systems and procedures in departments and agencies including budgetary controls, accounting for revenues, expenditures, assets, liabilities, commitments, and financial reporting systems;

(c) Integration of the departmental and agency accounting processes and systems with the central systems;

(d) Extent to which the financial systems and procedures are monitored and audited by internal or operational audit groups;

(e) Type, accuracy, timeliness, purpose and use of financial information and reports currently prepared;

(f) Extent of decentralization following on the recommendations of the Royal Commission on Government Organization and its impact on over-all financial control, and

(g) Duties, responsibilities and functions of financial and accounting managers and staff with special reference to the system of financial and accounting control and the relationships of their function with central financial and accounting agencies.

I think it is important also that these terms of reference, as I mentioned earlier, were very encompassing and provided the largest investigation into financial management and control within government organization that has taken place since the Glassco Commission was appointed some 15 years ago.

In the time available to me tonight I should like to cover one or two of the major recommendations from that study, and I emphasize again that the study is only half completed. I will be brief because I know others want to participate in this debate. To the present time the study has only dealt with individual government departments. The next part of the study will deal with Crown corporations and their many agencies operated under the government.

One of the key recommendations from this study is that no longer is it recommended that three departments continue to hold the joint responsibility for the financing, management, and control of accounting procedures and procedures relating to preparation of estimates in the government. Indeed up until now it has been the practice that this responsibility has been shared by the Department of Supply and Services, the Treasury Board, and the Department of Finance.

In large industry—and government is a large organization—it is accepted that there must be centralization of financial control at some point. This particular study in its report recommends that this responsibility pass entirely to the Treasury Board. In future—and this is the recommendation which the President of the Treasury Board has unequivocally indicated will certainly be accepted by the government—there will be one department in government, the Treasury Board, which will assume this central responsibility for financial management and control.

I think it is important also to note that there has been a recommendation by this committee that there be more consideration in the formation of estimates, starting at the top and working down. This is not intended to take away the incentive of the people working out in the field and at the lower levels of government to come up with the kinds of programs which they think it would be proper and desirable to implement. What it does say, however, is that at some point there is to be a cap put on. In other words, that cap will be put on at the top, and individual ideas being worked upon from the bottom up will have to be sifted at some point so that indeed they can fit into the over-all total which can be ascribed to that particular department. I think this is important because there has been a tendency in the past, in the massive growth of government bureaucracy we have seen, for programs to come up from the bottom, and it has been difficult to ascertain just what cap has been applied. This is an important recommendation.

Another important recommendation on which there may still be some difference in interpretation is the matter of the appointment of a chief financial officer with the government. I believe it is the idea of the study group that a person should be designated chief financial officer at some point, just as we find is done in large corporate undertakings. Regardless of the total number of people who have financial control, somewhere in a corporate entity there is one chief financial officer who ultimately must answer to the brass, as it were, for what is happening in terms of the financial operation of that undertaking.

I believe that at the moment the Treasury Board is of the opinion that the Treasury Board as a collective unit is the chief financial officer, and I think this is something which needs to be explored still further.

Of the three studies I mentioned earlier I think this study is being put before the Public Accounts Committee and is the most important in terms of over-all purview of government financial operations in years to come. It will take many years to implement in its entirety, and the understanding of those of us in the Public Accounts Committee at the present time is that there are only two recommendations with which the Treasury Board tends to disagree. There are perhaps seven or eight recommendations with which the Treasury Board agrees, and a number over which there is substantial agreement.

For the purposes of the record, the recommendations in the study are contained in chapter 10 of the report of the Auditor General for the year ended March 31, 1975. This particular chapter is so significant that I believe for the first time in recent years the Auditor General found it necessary to bring out a supplement of some 300 pages to back up strictly that one chapter of his report for the year ended March 31, 1975. This supplement deals completely with the many recommendations made to date by the financial management and control study group. I emphasize to date, because the importance of this matter is so great that indeed, it will be continued in the current year with relation to Crown corporations and their related agencies.

There are many other recommendations I should have liked to talk about because I think they form a very essential part of the over-all role of parliamentarians in their review of estimates which are put before them. In the recommendations there is a real endeavour to give parliamentarians more concrete information which will enable them to do their job in committees and to make their examination of the various estimates put before them in a much more rational and meaningful method than is currently possible under the existing system.

Much more could be said about this very important subject, but I just wanted to put these points, in relation to chapter 10 of the report of the Auditor General for the year ended March 31, 1975, on the record at this time.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Chairman, in the few minutes which are left I should like to ask the committee to give some thought to a matter which is of grave concern to quite a number of people in my constituency, to a large number of people on the coast of British Columbia, and to an even larger number of people who live in the Atlantic provinces. I am referring to the search and rescue service of the government.

The men who go down to the sea in ships and do business in deep waters deserve the very best kind of protection this country can provide. The men who sail our ships in the coastal trade, and the fishermen who go out to bring food back for the people of this country, are entitled to a very good, adequate, and efficient search and rescue operation. They are not getting it. The service has been both inadequate and inefficient. The hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich has given some of the figures, and there is no need to weary the committee with more.

The fact is that on the Pacific, coast when the herring season is on, some 1,600 fishing boats go out into deep water. Last year we lost 14 men and 13 ships, and already in this season, which has not by any means finished, we have lost four men and five ships. On the east coast there has been a steady series of losses of both ships and men.

I have in my hand the report of Mr. Justice P. Lloyd Soper, who made an inquiry into the loss of ships on the Atlantic coast and made his report to the Minister of Transport, and to the best of my knowledge not a single one of the recommendations made to that minister has been implemented.

What is the reason for the poor service which is being provided on both our coasts? I want to say that it does not lie with the men who man the coastguard or who are trying to provide the service. These men are doing the very best they can with inadequate equipment. and with a hopeless administrative structure. The main problem lies in the fact that we have divided jurisdiction. The Department of Transport, the Department of National Defence, and the Department of Fisheries are all in the picture; the RCMP also has some part in it, as has the coastguard. In addition, the United States coastguard comes to our rescue very frequently, thank heaven!

Mr. Richardson: We help them, too.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): On March 18 as reported at page 11902 of Hansard I asked the Minister of National Defence about the serious losses we have suffered in the last few days both in men and boats on the Pacific coast. The minister replied:

I should point out also that maritime rescue is the responsibility of the Department of Transport. The Department of National Defence does not have a maritime rescue capability but we have a very effective air-search capability.

I asked the minister at that time how you could have a search and rescue operation in which the Department of Transport is responsible for the rescue function and the Department of National Defence is responsible for searching. That is exactly why we have had such serious losses. Moreover, we have to depend on the United States coast-guard service. The minister said:

We tend to assist the U.S. more on the east coast; they assist us more on the west coast.

This may be a very good arrangement on paper but the fact remains, Mr. Chairman, when the storm hits the coastline, east or west, it hits both the American coastline and the Canadian coastline. The result is that the United States has to look after its own people. We cannot expect them to neglect servicing their people in order to meet our needs.

It seems to me this is a hopeless situation. Not only have we got a divided jurisdiction but we have inadequate equipment. The rescue operation does not have night equipment. The search operation can go out and find the ship or men clinging to a life raft, but there is no way until daybreak that the rescue operation can be effected.

What needs to be done, Mr. Chairman? I suggest the first thing is to order equipment which would make it possible to carry on both search and rescue operations 24 hours a day. We need night lights on helicopters, proper landing facilities, ships that are able to go out in stormy seas and which can fire a life line, and are strong enough to tow a stricken ship back to port.

The other thing we need is a single agency which will be responsible for the entire search and rescue operation. This divided jurisdiction has created a monstrosity. It is for the government to decide which department such an agency should come under but there certainly ought to be one agency for search and rescue, maritime and aerial, with all the facilities it needs. It should be able to go into action on both coasts. We should not have to depend on the generosity of our American friends. The men in the coastal trade or those who go out to catch fish should know that, in the event of a serious storm or running on the rocks, they have a reasonable chance of being rescued.

The other thing that needs to be done is for the government to accept the recommendations made by the Department of Transport, by the Department of Fisheries, and by committees of inquiry like the Soper committee and put those recommendations into effect.

The Minister of Transport was asked about this matter yesterday. As reported at page 12095 of Hansard he admitted that he had received recommendations from his department that fundamental changes were needed in the regulations but these had not been made. This has been put off year after year. In the meantime brave men drown, good ships are wrecked, and ministers of the various departments pass the buck from one to the other.

The Minister of National Defence says his department is responsible for the search but the Department of Transport has to effect the rescue. The Minister of Transport told the House yesterday that these regulations are going to be promulgated later and then we will get around to doing something. Despite the fact that ministers have had the recommendations on their desks for several years nothing has been done.

It has always caused me some amusement that the Liberal party, while admitting it may not be the most innovative organization or the most imaginative in the world, has claimed to be the most competent. They believe they are the people who can be trusted to manage the affairs of Canada. But what do we see? Since the end of World War II the Liberal party has been in office for 36 out of 41 years.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Since the Tories left office the Liberal party has been in power for 13 years, eight of them in an administration headed by the present Prime Minister. Hon. members who pound their desks overlook the fact that those years will haunt them for their failure to do anything about the appalling search and rescue conditions in this country. With all those years behind them why have they not done something about this problem?

What has happened as we sit in this House has become more and more apparent. We listen to ministers say they are going to do something about the problem. They talk about appointing a task force or having a study or a report made. Then when they get the report they say the matter has to go to cabinet and that in the next six months the government will take a decision. Those are the phrases they use, Mr. Chairman.

Instead of living up to their claim as efficient administrators the government is increasingly becoming inefficient, is showing administrative incompetence. It is a bureaucracy that has grown bigger but not better, a bureaucracy that daily is becoming more insensitive to the needs of the people and less responsive to the requests of the Canadian people for action.

The President of the Treasury Board, who is a very hard working minister and a friendly person, has a duty to do more than watch the expenditures of the government. Surely he has a responsibility not just to audit the books but to audit the programs. How has it been possible that in the years he has sat on the Treasury benches nothing has been done about the divided authority and the hopelessly inefficient search and rescue operation?

For years the fishermen's union have asked for regulations which would provide for fish to be treated as cargo, so that it would be necessary to insert bulkheads in boats, to prevent fish from sliding, and ships capsizing during a storm. This was not done. They proposed to the Department of Transport regulations concerning Plimsoll lines so that fishing boats cannot be overloaded. Nothing was done. They asked for regulations to stimulate standards for the construction of bulkheads, particularly in the stern, to make ships more seaworthy. Nothing was done.

I say that the government has a responsibility to listen and to act on the matter. The Prime Minister has a responsibility. Perhaps it is time for him to get rid of some of the extinct volcanoes on the treasury benches and replace them with young men and women—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): —who might bring to cabinet, imagination, competence, and new ideas.

Mr. Andras: You are being mischievous, Tommy.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): I urge either the President of the Treasury Board or the Prime Minister, since only they have real authority in the matter, or consider my representations, to institute new search and rescue operations, to do something with regard to equipment, and to establish a single agency with responsibilities in this area in place of the divided, hopeless monstrosity with which we are now saddled. Above all, they should implement recommendations their own civil servants have proposed.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order, in order to clarify something briefly. I had some conversations with the hon. member for York-Simcoe. He was asking questions about estimated interest bearing debt as of March 31, 1976. We discussed the figure of $53 billion. That figure represents an aggregate of funded debt, plus other liabilities of the Government of Canada. The authority sought here is with regard to funded debt; therefore the question he raised earlier as to whether we had exceeded the $6 billion authorized for 1975-76 is explained by reason of the fact that the funded debt between the two periods he talked about, March 31, 1975, and the estimate as of March 31, 1976, is the difference between $33 billion and $37.6 billion, or the $4.6 billion mentioned in my earlier remarks. In other words, although the total interest bearing debt is $53.6 billion, that figure includes other liabilities such as pension contributions. We are talking here about funded debt only.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Chairman—

The Chairman: Order, please. I do not think there ought to be debate at this point. The minister sought the floor to rectify an earlier statement. I do not think the matter ought to go beyond that.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order. It is true that according to the rules you ought to bring this debate to an end at 9.45. Since it is generally understood that no one will force a recorded vote—which is the purpose for the 15 minutes—I wonder if we could not agree to carry on for another ten minutes and let the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East contribute to what has been discussed.

[Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands).]

The Chairman: Order, please. Of course the committee has no authority to do as the hon. member suggests, but the Chairman perhaps could not see the clock for another five minutes.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Forrestall: Mr. Chairman, I shall take only a few minutes. I thank my colleagues in the House, particularly the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, for extending this courtesy to me. I think the remarks I am about to make will reflect the thinking of the hon. member for South Shore, the hon. member for St. John's East—

Mr. McCleave: The member for Halifax-East Hants.

Mr. Forrestall: —the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants and, indeed, all hon. members coming from the Atlantic provinces who, time and again in recent weeks, indeed in the last ten or 15 years, have spoken in this House about the inadequacy of search and rescue operations on the east coast, Gulf of St. Lawrence, on our Great Lakes and other inland waters.

The hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands described this service as inadequate. It is. I suggest to the President of the Treasury Board that not one of the points raised this evening in connection with search and rescue involves the spending of more money. This evening we talked about the better organization and utilization of the facilities available in the Canadian Armed Forces, Department of Transport, the marine branch of the RCMP, the Department of Fisheries, our oceanographic vessels, and so on.

The Canadian government has at its disposal the fourth or fifth largest navy in the world; yet we cannot adequately protect our fishermen, including our coastal fishermen. We cannot give to coastal seamen the protection they require. I shall allude to a long list of rescue operations to make clear the magnitude of the problem. Let me make clear once more that I am not talking about the spending of more money. I am talking about the need for a better organization of existing funds and of facilities already in being and at our disposal.

The four regional search and rescue control centres last year dealt with 6,349 incidents. These search and rescue operations were co-ordinated by the four centres, in Halifax, Trenton, Edmonton, and Vancouver. Of those 6,000-odd incidents, 2,538 involved air incidents, 3,120 marine incidents, 637 were what you might call humanitarian incidents, and 55 involved aid to the civil power.

Let me say a word about the Atlantic region covering 1.8 million square miles—half the Atlantic. It runs westward to a line approximately half way down the Quebec coast, covers all the maritime provinces and goes as far north as 70 degrees north, or about 350 miles north of Frobisher Bay. Last year alone in this area we dealt with some 1,525 incidents, of which 731 were air, 619 marine and 160 were medical evacuations, or so-called humanitarian operations. We saved 210 lives. If there had been slightly more efficiency, if the available facilities had been used better, we could have saved 231 lives. That is what we are talking about. We are talking about the lives that are lost.

Two men lost their lives 150 feet from the shore of Halifax harbour because no boat or helicopter could get to them to save them. Clearly there is something desperately wrong. In Halifax harbour there are fisheries vessels, oceanographic vessels, naval vessels. These two men drowned less than a mile and a quarter away from people who might have been watching from the side of a hill. The helicopter squadron in the area could not do anything; therefore the men drowned. We mourn the loss of our seamen.

We need operational helicopters on the east coast, but at present they are not capable of operating after dark. Why, Mr. Chairman? The government will not give the Canadian military enough money to buy enough fuel so that the men flying those helicopters can maintain a night flying proficiency. They need training. You cannot send an untrained man out at night and ask him to take somebody off a pitching, foundering boat. He must be proficient. He needs training. He must be safe at what he is doing. Our personnel cannot operate safely because they have not been trained. They do not have their night flying licences. These things could be achieved without the expenditure of additional money. It involves better co-operation and utilization of existing facilities.

I shall sit down with this comment, Mr. Chairman. This will not happen in this country until there is a single, paramount authority responsible for all search and rescue. We can no longer have a divided jurisdiction. It has not saved us money. It has cost us lives. Canadians cannot afford that when we have the facilities to avoid such loss of life. I suggest that the President of the Treasury Board should consult with his colleagues in Transport, Defence, Fisheries, the coast guard, and the RCMP. They should be forced to get together and choose among them what will be the paramount authority, assuming full responsibility for all search and rescue operations in Canada. Let that single authority pull together in the most efficient way our facilities, capacities, and capabilities so that our seamen and those involved in air indicents will have the type of search and rescue operations to which they are entitled. I appreciate Your Honour's indulgence.

The Chairman: Order please. It being 9.45 p.m., it is my duty, pursuant to the order passed on Wednesday, March 24, 1976, to interrupt the proceedings and put forthwith every question necessary to adopt the said motion now under consideration.

[English]

Clauses 2 to 6 inclusive agreed to.

Schedules A, B, C, D, E, and F agreed to.

Clause 1 agreed to.

Preamble agreed to.

Bill reported.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (President of Treasury Board) moved: That Bill C-91, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending March 31, 1977, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to order made Wednesday, March 24, 1976, Mr. Chrétien, seconded by Mr. Sharp, moves that the bill be now read a third time and do pass. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I was going to rise earlier, but the rules do not provide it. All I would like to say is that we on this side of the House welcomed the opportunity of the debate today. It was by way of experiment. It may not have gone 100 per cent, but I think we have made some progress.

I hope that on other occasions when we have appropriation bills we can have a debate that is more open-ended without the ten o'clock rule so that all hon. members who wish to participate may do so. I know that members opposite were just bursting forth with inspiration, as were members on this side. I hope it will not be limited to that. However, we will see what progress can be made in the future.

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Speaker, I missed some of the proceedings of the last moment or so because of certain sounds. However, I believe there was a small amendment made in committee that, for technical reasons, should be concurred in at this stage before third reading is given.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the point is accomplished by the Chair making note of the fact that a figure in the text was changed during the course of the committee proceedings. That should be noted. It has been treated as an editorial change. In any event it is appropriate that it be brought to the attention of the House so that it can be properly noted as having taken place.

With respect to the point of order raised by the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert), there are occasions on which points of order raised by hon. members related to the procedures, particularly to supply procedures, cannot be accepted by the Chair. However, it is obvious that the spirit of those points has been recognized in the proceedings that were adopted by the House today. Indeed, much of the anguish experienced by hon. members who conscientiously endeavoured to participate in a meaningful examination of the supply process has been given effect to today. The point of order of the hon. member for Edmonton West is well taken.

It being ten o'clock, the House stands adjourned until eleven o'clock tomorrow morning.

At ten o'clock the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

REQUEST FOR REINSTATEMENT OF CONTRACT WITH COMPUTING DEVICES IN CONNECTION WITH SAMSON PROJECT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 with respect to the matter of Computing Devices of Canada and the cancellation of the Samson contract and their participation in it. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald):

That a thorough investigation be undertaken by the Department of Supply and Services as to the fairness in the evaluation of the product of CDC in light of the conditions of unprecedented security that are the cause of the delays and were beyond the control of the company by reason of, first, lack of U.S. security information as promised; second, lack of Canadian government security information as promised; and third, the fact that this was therefore the first Canadian company to undertake the development and establishment of tempest technology.

Further, that pending the investigation, the Crown reinstate the contract on the basis that the company can meet the delivery requirement of September 1976 for the prearranged testing and implementation of the system.

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to the standing order, the motion can only be presented with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

LOCKHEED CONTRACT—REQUEST FOR TABLING OF DATA ON BRIBES RECEIVED FROM UNITED STATES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Andy Hogan (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of the fact that yesterday in the House the Minister of National Defence, in reference to the Lockheed Aircraft Corporation, said that there was a full disclosure of the improper payments by that corporation in the Senate hearings in the United States, and Canada was not mentioned at any time in those full hearings, and in view of the fact that the deputy Secretary of State for the United States, Mr. Robert Ingersoll, has announced that the State Department will supply the Lockheed data to other countries, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Symes):

That the Minister of National Defence table the data received from Mr. Ingersoll in this House.

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43 such a motion can only be presented with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

REQUEST FOR ADDITIONAL FUNDS FOR LOCAL INITIATIVES PROGRAM—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43, I request unanimous consent of the House to present a motion dealing with an important and urgent matter.

As unemployment is increasing at an alarming rate in Quebec, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Gauthier):

That this House recommend that additional credits be allotted to LIP to promote a better use of our manpower through the creation of new jobs.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Under the provisions of Standing Order 43, the motion requires unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

HOUSE OF COMMONS

TRIBUTE TO MEMBER FOR PRINCE ALBERT ON THIRTY-SIXTH ANNIVERSARY OF ELECTION AS MEMBER

Mr. Speaker: Before commencing the question period I know all hon. members of the House would want to join with me in taking just a moment to mark the significance of this occasion in celebration of an anniversary of an event which took place on March 26, 1940, some 36 years ago. I refer, of course, to the first of an unbroken succession of elections to the House of Commons of the Right Hon. Member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker).

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: The incidence of an unbroken succession of elections to this House is a remarkable occurrence, appreciated perhaps no more clearly than by the other members of this chamber. In addition to the success the right hon. member has enjoyed during that time at the hands of the electors and the honours which have been heaped upon him by Canadians in every walk of life as well as from every corner of the country, perhaps the highest honour the Canadian citizenry can pay to any one of us is to elect a person to be Prime Minister and first citizen of our country, which is at the pinnacle of those great honours and distinctions.

However, to add to that achievement, and as a recognition which I think all of us share with immense pride, the right hon. gentleman will leave Canada tomorrow for the United Kingdom where he will be received by Her Majesty the Queen and recognized as a Companion of Honour, a recognition which is shared by only 65 members of the Commonwealth, and perhaps most significantly the motto of which is, "in action faithful, in honour clear". It is in that expression of the record of service of the right hon. gentleman that all of us, and I am sure all Canadians, share with great pride and wish him well on that journey, in receiving that honour, and in continued devotion and work on behalf of this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I am very deeply touched by your words and by the reception of my hon. colleagues. From the bottom of my heart I thank you all. Nothing honours one more than to be a person in the House of Commons who receives the warmth of reception which I always receive. Thank you, sir.

REQUEST FOR DETAILS AND TABLING OF CONTRACTS WITH REISMAN AND GRANDY

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: —my question is to the Prime Minister. On Wednesday the Prime Minister said that he would look in some detail at the consulting contracts involving Mr. Reisman and Mr. Grandy. I wonder if the Prime Minister is now in a position to provide the House with further information, whether he will as well give us now a clear commitment to table all of the contracts involving these gentlemen and also to table whatever additional correspondence or documentation there is which might spell out the terms of reference of these contracts.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I see no difficulty in the latter part of the question. Of course, it would be subject to the usual procedures and, presumably, the consent of the contractees at the other end, but I see no problem in that. I will look into the matter.

On the first part of the question, I have nothing to add. I think there was some misunderstanding which resulted in the belief that I had said that the Reisman and Grandy company had had contracts with the government. I reread Hansard, and I never said anything of the kind, although it seems to have been reported in that way. I did say the individuals had contracts, both of them in the early period after their resignations, merely to clear up the files in the transitional period. Both of them had it with their former departments as individuals. There was an additional contract with the Auditor General on the part of Mr. Grandy. That is what I had in mind the other day in saying that I did not have all the facts, but I have no knowledge of this third contract. I will see if it is within the rules to table these contracts Monday or Tuesday.

GUIDELINES FOR ACTIVITIES OF RETIRED SENIOR EMPLOYEES—DATE OF PUBLICATION

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the Prime Minister can tell the House now whether guidelines are being prepared by his government which will have to do with the activities of retired senior public servants after leaving the public service, and if he can give us some indication when and in what form these guidelines will be presented to the House?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I already gave that assurance. As to the time and form, I indicated that the subject is a difficult one and I cannot give any guarantees or assurances as to time and form. I would welcome suggestions from all parts of the House. At this point I think it would probably be by way of an enunciation of principle rather than a whole series of individual guidelines, Mr. Speaker, but I would make that statement with the hope that the House itself would see fit to improve upon it in any way. I repeat, it is a difficult area and one which has not been faced before in Canada except by custom. It will take some time to see the practices in other parliamentary or democratic governments and if we want to do a thorough job it might not be immediate. In the meantime, I repeat my statement of the other day; it does cause some uneasiness to the government and we will have to ensure there is no conflict which is a disservice to the government or to the people.

SUGGESTED REGISTRATION OF ALL LOBBYISTS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I take it from the Prime Minister that some action will be taken in the interim prior to the development of some sort of guidelines to ensure that no conflict exists. I wonder if the Prime Minister might also tell the House, in light of the fact that Canada has a mixed economy and an increasing number of agencies are being established by the government which involve an interface between the private and the public sectors, whether the government will give active consideration to a formal policy which would require the registration of all lobbyists or all persons whose occupation or profession involves attempting in a formal way to influence the decisions of government or activities of government agencies? Is there any present intention to give consideration to the registration of lobbyists in Canada?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, there is no consideration of that policy and none of which I am aware. I think the difficulties of it are obvious as there are many forms of lobbying and some can be quite indirect. I am not sure how the registration of some of them would achieve the purpose which the hon. Leader of the Opposition has in mind. I will take note of the suggestion and perhaps in the studies that are being made I will bring that aspect of it into consideration.

SUPPLY AND SERVICES

LOCKHEED CONTRACT—KNOWLEDGE OF NEGOTIATORS OF AMOUNT OF MONEY NATIONAL DEFENCE HAD AVAILABLE

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Supply and Services. The Minister of National Defence told the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence on Tuesday night that when these officials discussed the purchase of the LRPA with Lockheed, that company was aware of the fact that the Department of National Defence had only $30 million available for payments in the first year of production. Since most of the negotiations for the actual contract were conducted by officials of the Department of Supply and Services, was the minister aware, and were his officials aware, that when the contract was being negotiated DND had only $30 million available?

● (1120)

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, the financing is still under the responsibility of the customer department and not under mine.

[English]

Mr. McKenzie: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. If the minister was aware of this situation, since the contract which was negotiated between his department and Lockheed called for first year payments of more than $100 million, how did he expect production to get started?

[Translation]

Mr. Goyer: Mr. Speaker, in effect, the contract has not been signed.

[English]

LOCKHEED CONTRACT—REASON FOR LACK OF WRITTEN UNDERTAKING FROM COMPANY TO PROVIDE INTERIM FINANCING

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): A final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. If Lockheed gave a verbal undertaking to provide interim financing, why did the department not seek to have this commitment expressed in writing before it began to negotiate the contract?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, in such a negotiation I do not think that promises have any great value. I simply believe that negotiations ought to be written and it is on this understanding that it will be possible to determine whether or not the provisions of the contract were met.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

LOCKHEED CONTRACT—REASON FOR MISUNDERSTANDING IN CONNECTION WITH FINANCING

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of National Defence? The press quoted the minister a few months ago as saying that, at an earlier stage, the government had been misled by Lockheed Aircraft. Later he said that statement was not correct and there had been some misunderstanding. As it is obviously important to understand clearly the financial arrangements required—and we heard about the striking increase in the amount of total contract—can the minister explain exactly the nature of the misunderstanding, and how it came about?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I have done that in this House and before the standing committee. There was a difference between the amount of funds available in the national defence budget and the progress payments required by Lockheed. We explained this and were told by Lockheed that the difference could be financed by them. Subsequently they told us they could not do it. That is all there is to the misunderstanding. It is serious, but easy to explain.

LOCKHEED CONTRACT—REASON FOR CLAIM FOR DAMAGES IF CONTRACT CANCELLED

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. At one stage the minister said that the agreement should not be cancelled, or he was not in favour of cancelling it because the government might be liable to damages. If there was no agreement but a misunderstanding between the government and the company, how does the minister anticipate the possibility for a claim for damages if the contract were to be repudiated?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I do not think I expected a claim for damages. I said there might be costs which we should pay. I am not, however, at present trying to find ways of not completing the contract. We are trying to find ways to complete it. I wish hon. members opposite would realize that my objective is to obtain better equipment for the Canadian Armed Forces. That is what we are trying to do. I do not know what the hon. member's objective is in trying to raise all the difficulties rather than finding a solution.

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Speaker, I am trying to discover what happened. Does the minister not appreciate that when you are dealing with billions of dollars of Canadian taxpayers' money, you should look into these things carefully, not merely push them forward.

POSSIBILITY OF AGREEMENT FOR QUEBEC SOUTH SHORE—REPRESENTATIONS FROM REGION

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I would like to put a question to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion.

Considering that the Canada-Quebec agreement on eastern Quebec will expire on March 31, and that it has been announced another agreement would be signed shortly, would the minister advise whether a special agreement of the same nature will also be concluded concerning the south shore between Lévis and the Rimouski area east of Lévis?

Hon. Marcel Lessard (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, indeed the Ottawa-Quebec agreement concerning the lower St. Lawrence and Gaspé areas will come to an end within a few days. Discussions are being held between the two levels of government in view of reaching another agreement to replace the present one but it certainly will not be identical to the former. It will cover other much more specific areas. Within a few weeks or months, I expect to conclude the negotiations with the provincial government and my colleague, the minister in charge. As for the latter part of the question, I think the hon. member is referring to his own constituency and to that part of Quebec which lies between Quebec City or Lévis and what is commonly known as the Rivière-du-Loup or Gaspé area. I must admit there are no specific projects geared to that area in the programs which are now under discussion at the two levels of government. They will be included in the sectorial agreements which were signed and in others which are about to be signed and which necessarily affect the whole province generally. But there are no specific programs for the area mentioned by the hon. member.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary question. Has the minister received representations from the municipal authorities of the south shore area and from agencies to ask specifically that a special agreement be concluded to enable the south shore area to develop more quickly and make further use of available manpower?

[Mr. Brewin.]

Mr. Lessard: Mr. Speaker, I understand the concern of the hon. member. Indeed the department has received not only recently but during the past months, not to mention previous years, some instances from public groups, more particularly from municipalities to have that area included within a special agreement. Up to now, Mr. Speaker, I must say that it has been impossible for both levels of government to answer affirmatively as expected to the representations of those municipalities or public groups. I hope, however, and I am sure, that avenues will not be closed and there will still be some opportunities for those areas during the months if not the years to come. There are some plans under consideration which, without being under a specific agreement, would surely have a beneficial effect on the area to which the hon. member referred.

LOCKHEED CONTRACT—POSSIBILITY OF LEGISLATION TO PERMIT GUARANTEEING OF LOAN

Mr. Bill Kempling (Halton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Defence. The Department of National Defence is now approaching banks on behalf of Lockheed seeking a loan to enable the LRPA project to start, but to date it has met with little success. We hope they are successful. Since DND is prepared to pay the interest on this loan, which we understand amounts to $111 million over the term of the contract, does the minister intend to bring forward legislation authorizing the government of Canada to guarantee this loan to a foreign national?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has spoken of just one of the options we are considering at the present time. However, we have not completed the financing arrangement. Until we do, the other parts of the question are hypothetical.

LOCKHEED CONTRACT—POSSIBLE OBJECTION FROM UNITED STATES IF FINANCED THROUGH CANADIAN BANKS

Mr. Bill Kempling (Halton-Wentworth): Bearing in mind that the minister at the Defence committee on Tuesday night said he did not anticipate any difficulties with the United States government if these funds were made available through Canadian banks, can the minister state that the United States government unequivocally would have no objection to such a move, bearing in mind the difficulties Lockheed are having?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, obviously the United States government and their officials must speak for themselves.

However, we will have written communication from them before the contract is completed.

PENITENTIARIES

ALLEGED CURTAILMENT OF RIGHT OF EMPLOYEES TO INFORM PUBLIC OF CONDITIONS IN INSTITUTIONS

Mr. Doug Neil (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Solicitor General. On February 25, 1976, Dr. D. R. McGregor, Acting Regional Director, Pacific Region Canadian Penitentiary Service, sent a letter to the Pacific Regional Representative of the Public Service Alliance of Canada. The letter stated that an investigation would commence regarding statements about Dragon Cernetic given to the press by members of the PSAC and also that any further statements would lead to disciplinary action. Will the Solicitor General admit that this letter from his officials is curbing the civil rights of the individuals working within the Canadian Penitentiary Service to inform the public of the atrocious conditions that exist within the maximum security institution?

● (1130)

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): No, Mr. Speaker. The report on the most recent incident at the B.C. Penitentiary will be made public shortly as well as the Farris Commission report on the earlier incident. As I mentioned on a previous occasion, we have been asked by the judge not to make the report public while proceedings were still under way against the three individuals involved in the hostage taking incident, but we are taking steps to make it public shortly.

Mr. Neil: Is this practice of censoring statements made by members of the PSAC implemented on a national basis and, if so, is it to continue?

Mr. Allmand: All I can say is that members of the PSAC frequently make very critical statements directed not only against the Commissioner of the Penitentiary Service but also against me. I am not aware of any hesitancy on their part.

REQUEST FOR INFORMATION ON MEASURES TO INCREASE PRODUCTIVITY

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. As the Economic Council of Canada, in its latest reports, has stated that industrial productivity in Canada is the second worst of all industrialized nations and is decreasing steadily, I would ask the Prime Minister whether the government intends to introduce productivity incentives based on increases in productivity? Since the Prime Minister expressed great interest in this suggestion five months ago, when I first made it, and referred it to the Department of Finance and to the Privy Council for study, I am sure he must have had those reports back from the departments many weeks ago.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): No, I have not, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Hees: Then, I will ask the Prime Minister, since he is obviously not making the slightest attempt to get these reports which could have been in his hands a long time ago had he wanted them, whether he is content to satisfy himself by philosophical musings on this important matter, or whether he intends to do something to try to put this country back on its feet again?

IMMIGRATION

ELIGIBILITY OF ATHLETES FOR ADMISSION—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Gus MacFarlane (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. In the case of Stephen Badger I notice that as early as a week ago there was a remark by one of the hon. gentleman's departmental officials to the effect that Canadians were the most important people to swim in the Olympics. Today, an official comments that we do not consider who they are when they go into the Olympics and in the same article he mentions he received representations from Winnipeg saying that only Canadians should swim in the Olympics. Does, really, the fact a person is an athlete play any part in the immigration process or is the official in error in both cases in saying it would play any part in the person not being admitted and it might be effective in admitting him?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): I have not seen the reported comment by an immigration official. The question of the Olympics is really not, in that sense, anything to do with immigration. We would judge applicants strictly on the basis of whether they were eligible to enter Canada under the immigration laws.

LOCKHEED CONTRACT—POSSIBILITY OF SECURING FROM UNITED STATES AND TABLING DATA ON BRIBES

Mr. Andy Hogan (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of National Defence or to the Minister of Supply and Services. In view of the fact that the Deputy Secretary of State for the United States, Mr. Robert Ingersoll, has announced that the State Department will supply the Lockheed data on bribery to individuals in other countries, will the hon. gentleman say whether Mr. Ingersoll has supplied to Canada information about the Lockheed bribes and, if so, will he table the information in this House?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): No such data has been provided.

Mr. Hogan: Will the minister seek from the Deputy Secretary of State, Mr. Ingersoll, this information on the Lockheed bribes so that we may be sure no Canadian officials or intermediaries are involved?

Mr. Richardson: Canada has not been named and if there is any accusation, then it should be brought forward.

CUSTOMS

DATE OF APPOINTMENT OF OFFICER AT RIVERPORT, NOVA SCOTIA

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the Minister of National Revenue. In view of the fact that the minister's own statistical report on Riverport, Nova Scotia, dated March 15, 1976, indicates that last year some 300 vessels reported in and out of this port requiring 280 entries for exwarehouse deliveries plus long room entries, small collections, export entries and postal shipments, and since the position of customs officer at this port has been vacant for over a year, following the death of the resident officer, I should like to ask the minister when he intends to advertise for a full-time customs officer at Riverport instead of downgrading the port as an outport under a vessel clearing station officer with a proposed salary of only $600 a year.

Hon. Jack Cullen (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, in one breath we are talking about saving money and in the next we are talking about spending it.

Some hon. Members: Oh!

Mr. Cullen: The statistics which the hon. member quotes are, of course, all relative to vessel clearings which take place in other areas. It is true there has been no customs officer there for a year and a half; we have made the port a vessel clearing station and the salary of the individual who handles that post on a part-time basis is negotiated by the Treasury Board and the Public Service Commission. We have to look at the statistics here in the light of the availability of other ports. As the hon. member knows, Lunenburg is also available. They have been operating at Riverport without a customs officer for about a year and a half. I think the Lunenburg people have done a great job in this area. But in accordance with the hon. member's representations we will look at the proposal. I think his figures should be judged in conjunction with the other figures we have.

Mr. Crouse: The minister implies that we are not interested in saving money. I would point out to him that there are some 20 ships sailing from Riverport, vessels approximately 150 feet in length and costing in excess of $3 million, and that to delay a sailing for one day would cost more than the $6,000 or $7,000 that a customs officer would receive. So, when one is faced with a penny wise and pound foolish proposal, one must ask a supplementary, and it is simply this: in the light of the minister's program of restraint which is costing Nova Scotians dearly, will he assure the House that he will apply the same restraint to his entire department by offering to pay all his other employees a salary of $600 a year?

EFFECT OF RESTRAINT PROGRAM AND RISING INTEREST RATE—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. As the budgetary deficit for February is higher than it was in the same month last year, and as the level of federal government spending shows no signs of moderating, to the extent we have a budgetary deficit of $3.3 billion in the first 11 months of this fiscal year as opposed to a surplus of $219 million at this time last year, can the minister tell the House when his much-publicized so-called restraint program will show any effect upon government spending and rising deficits?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Perhaps I could refer the hon. member to the last question which was asked.

An hon. Member: Cheap shot!

Mr. Stevens: Considering that chartered bank general loans increased by half a billion dollars in the week following the raising of the bank rate, perhaps the minister can tell us a little more explicitly than last time when we may hope to see the effect of the rising bank rate upon the expansion of our money system bearing in mind the half billion dollar increase immediately after the increase in the bank rate.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): The governor has always pointed out to those who follow monetary policy that the changes to be effected by changes in the cash reserve system would not result in immediate responses but that they would be in effect over longer swings. The bank is of the opinion that the change in the reserve policy, which was signified by the change in the bank rate, will bring about a restriction in the growth of monetary aggregates in Canada but he does recognize that from week to week there may be intermediate swings.

EFFECT OF GOVERNMENT SPENDING ON RATE OF INFLATION—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Would the minister indicate whether a contributing factor to Canada's relatively high inflation rate is high government spending including the heavy borrowing required by the government, $6 billion being required last evening alone, bearing in mind that our inflation is now half as high again as it is in the United States where they are forecasting lower unemployment in the coming year and higher real growth than in this country?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, we are concerned about the level of government expenditures and that is precisely why we sought the co-operation of the hon. gentleman in measures such as Bill C-68 in order to reduce the level of government spending.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CAMBODIA—POSSIBILITY OF SENDING SPECIAL ENVOY TO INVESTIGATE CONDITIONS

Mr. Howard Johnston (Okanagan-Kootenay): Mr. Speaker, I had intended to put my supplementary question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs, but since it arises out of the communication from the acting minister alluded to by the minister on Monday I will direct it to the acting minister. I can understand the difficulties the government has in communicating through the normal channels with the Republic of Cambodia, but considering the history of special missions to the Indochina area during the decade of the Viet Nam war, would the acting minister consider sending a special envoy to Cambodia to ascertain the situation, if necessary to offer aid and plead for tolerance for human life?

[Translation]

Miss Monique Bégin (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I think that this question ought to be put directly to the minister. The situation has not changed and I am not in a position to give a positive answer.

[English]

CAMBODIA—POSSIBILITY CANADA ASKED TO TERMINATE AID PROGRAM

Mr. Howard Johnston (Okanagan-Kootenay): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, which perhaps the parliamentary secretary or the minister may be able to answer. In the letter alluded to by the Secretary of State for External Affairs on Monday, the acting minister mentioned several international agencies which were asked to leave Cambodia. He made no mention of the small but growing contribution of CIDA to the Khmer Republic. Was Canada asked to terminate its aid program to that country?

Miss Monique Bégin (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Would the hon. member please repeat the last part of his question?

Mr. Johnston: There has been in the last three years a small but growing contribution through CIDA to the Khmer republic or Cambodia. Was Canada asked to terminate that aid program?

Miss Bégin: Not to my knowledge, Mr. Speaker, but I will ask the minister.

TRANSPORT

POSSIBLE ABANDONMENT OF RAIL SERVICE IN PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO AVOID CRISIS

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport and relates to the report tabled this week by his colleague the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion in the Standing Committee on Regional Development, a report which comments on the economic situation in the various provinces. With respect to transportation in Prince Edward Island, the report stated that the problems involved in transporting commodities using existing facilities are expected to be extreme by 1977. In view of the comments yesterday in the provincial legislature by the minister of highways about the likely abandonment of rail service by Canadian National Railways and the difficulties this would obviously create, can the minister indicate what steps are being taken, either by himself or his officials, to head off this impending crisis referred to in the report I have just mentioned?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, we always attempt to analyse trends in traffic and to look ahead to the steps that have to be taken to accommodate them, and this is what we are doing in this case.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I am somewhat surprised because I understand that the minister had a meeting with the provincial highways minister about two week ago on this problem. Yesterday the minister of highways indicated that he did not know what steps would be taken. When will the minister be able to give the House a report, or can he tell the House whether a special committee has been struck? Because this involves the complex of transportation facilities in Prince Edward Island, not only rail but highways as well.

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member's first question was very general, but he now appears to be referring specifically to the question of highway strengthening, which was the issue in a meeting that I had with the highways ministers from the Atlantic region. I had a long brief from him on this subject and I did undertake to have a further look at the brief before responding to it. I have no further comment to make at this stage.

BILINGUALISM

REQUEST FOR PUBLIC MEETINGS BEFORE NIAGARA DESIGNATED BILINGUAL DISTRICT

Mr. W. C. Scott (Victoria-Haliburton): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the President of the Treasury Board and it deals with the designation of the Niagara region of Ontario as a bilingual district. In view of the minister's admission on Wednesday that the people of the Niagara district had not been sufficiently consulted by way of public hearings on this matter, would the minister give his assurance that such meetings will be held before his department proceeds to designate the Niagara region as a bilingual district?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I have been there myself. I met people who made objections. We had an excellent and very lively meeting. I think I cannot have better public hearings than those in which I take part myself. I said that before proceeding in this area I was going to consult the people's representatives of this area. We have already established a subcommittee of hon. members from the area and we hope that by the time we do proceed there will have been enough exchanges with the population.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

ARGENTINA—SUGGESTION AGREEMENT ON NUCLEAR REACTOR BE DISCUSSED WITH NEW REGIME

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Prime Minister and is based on the incredible response yesterday by the Secretary of State for External Affairs that he feels that the intergovernmental agreement regarding the CANDU reactor in Argentina is binding even though there has been a change in government. Given the terrifying implications for world security if nuclear agreements are not adhered to, does the government not feel it is necessary to discuss this agreement with the new regime and gain the firm assurance that at the very minimum the accord announced on January 30 of this year will be honoured?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I regret I did not hear the answer of the minister yesterday, but I see no likelihood that the new government would not also be looking at the contract which binds their country since the contract is ongoing. There may have been something I missed in the question or in the answer, but as to the desirability of the new government being conscious of that contractual arrangement, obviously the answer is yes.

Miss MacDonald: A supplementary question for the Prime Minister with regard to a Canadian initiative to undertake to achieve a reconfirmation of this agreement from the new regime. Can we have the Prime Minister's word that this initiative will be undertaken by the government?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether this will call for a particular reconfirmation. We will want to make sure, even before recognizing the new government, that it undertakes to discharge its contractual and treaty obligations.

INDUSTRY

DOUGLAS AIRCRAFT, MALTON—MEASURES TO SAVE JOBS—DATE OF ANNOUNCEMENT OF AEROSPACE POLICY

Hon. Stanley Haidasz (Parkdale): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Finance whether he would inform the House of any federal government proposal or solution to save the jobs of several hundred workers at the Douglas Aircraft plant in Malton, and when can we expect an announcement about a sound Canadian aerospace industry policy?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I have been having some discussions with my colleague, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, who in turn has been in close consultation with Douglas Aircraft (Canada) regarding some possible extension of work opportunities at the Malton plant. I am hopeful, as I know the hon. member is, that notwithstanding the drop in the international market for DC-9 and DC-8 aircraft, we can find some means whereby we can assure that this Canadian production will not only be kept at the present level but, indeed, increased.

MEASURES TO RELIEVE NOVA SCOTIANS OF HIGH COSTS

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister who will be well aware of the concern in Nova Scotia about the increase in power rates as a result of the heavy dependence of that province on oil in terms of power generation. May I ask the Prime Minister whether the premier of Nova Scotia has made any specific proposals to the government of Canada, either in respect to a global approach to the problem or a selective approach to ease the pressure of power rates in that province, particularly on certain industries and Nova Scotians of low income?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, if I might answer that, I discussed this question again with the premier of Nova Scotia this morning and am looking forward to the participation of the minister of finance of that province, Mr. Nicholson, at the finance ministers meeting next week, at which meeting the question of the costs being assumed, particularly by Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island, as a result of the oil price increase will be a specific agenda item. In other words, we would expect to have a rather intensive discussion of this question at the meeting next week.

FINANCE

POSSIBILITY OF CHANGE IN FORMULA FOR EQUALIZATION PAYMENTS TO PROVINCES

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. May I ask the minister whether the government has notified the provinces that the federal government will be changing some of the regulations under the equalization formula, specifically the income tax guarantee formula?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I should like to thank the hon. gentleman for giving me notice of his question. I should explain that it is not so much a change in the regulations as the fact that the fiscal arrangements act, which provides for equalization, the revenue guarantee, revenue stabilization and post-secondary education, will expire on March 31, 1977. There have already been discussions at the official level leading to the conference next week which I anticipate will be the first of a number for the purpose of indicating the federal government's intention with regard to equalization and the other programs and seeking to get provincial agreement on this. We have indicated we are proposing changes in a number of these programs and that is the subject for discussion next week.

Mr. Nystrom: Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the minister can tell the House at this time in general what the intentions of the government are in this area so that the provinces will know ahead of time.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, the provinces have been advised in general terms. We have indicated to them that the revenue guarantee proposal which arose out of the tax change in 1971-72 would not be continued beyond the present program and that indeed we would propose to them a change in the method of calculations. Our view is that we are now in a better position to determine the extent to which the revenue which we would have had under the old tax system has been affected by the new tax system, and with this greater precision we feel we can make it clear to them why the formula should be changed. As I indicated, these have been set out at the official level and we expect to discuss them at the ministerial level.

REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE FEDERAL RESPONSIBILITY FOR POST-SECONDARY EDUCATION NOT CHANGED

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, can we be assured that in any new formula the national responsibility for post-secondary education will not be allowed to be eroded.

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): I think, Mr. Speaker, in the most general sense, yes. The question is of course—and again we get back to the very important question of fiscal responsibility—as to who should bear these costs and how the system should be structured. On post-secondary education, my colleague the Secretary of State has been involved in more detailed discussion. Mine has been in relation to the formula itself and some of the financial consequences.

HEALTH

SWINE FLU—SOURCE OF VACCINE

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Yesterday he indicated that Canada has a maximum capacity to produce 300,000 doses of swine influenza vaccine by next fall and indicated that we should have to purchase large numbers of it from other countries. Could he clarify from which country he is expecting to obtain this vaccine?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): This would most likely be the United States, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Yewchuk: Mr. Speaker, that is a matter of some concern to me. I do not know whether the minister is aware of the fact there is a possibility there will be no exports from the United States until November, and when one considers the time it takes to vaccinate the Canadian population this alternative would appear to be unsatisfactory. Would the minister indicate what else he plans to do.

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, traditionally we have been able to obtain between 7 per cent and 9 per cent of the production of American companies for this type of situation. I have already been in touch with the American companies and the American federal authorities on the subject and discussions are taking place at the present time.

REQUEST FOR REPORT ON DISCUSSION WITH QUEBEC ON DONOHUE PROJECT

Mr. C.-A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. I apologize for failing to send him notice, I did not have enough time.

It has to do with the Donohue project at Saint-Félicien, with which the minister is well acquainted Since the Quebec government has made it a priority matter, considering it as the project of the century, since private, provincial and federal sources of capital are grouped together, could the minister tell the House whether he considers this project in a specific agreement or in a general agreement, that is within the framework of a general agreement with Quebec? Further, where do the discussions now stand?

Hon. Marcel Lessard (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, it may very well be the project of the century for the Saguenay-Lac-Saint-Jean region, but likely not for the whole of province. It is true, Mr. Speaker, there have been discussions for some time on this project, as the hon. member knows very well. If there is an agreement, it will be within the terms of the general development agreement which has been concluded with Quebec as well as with every other province, and it will be the subject matter of a special agreement, that is a subagreement. One cannot intervene in such an area in any other way than by subagreements. We do hope that our discussions will come off presently and that a decision one way or another could be announced eventually.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

ALLEGED DENIAL BY UNIONS OF FREEDOM OF ASSOCIATION—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. It is related to the discussions he recently had with labour leaders here in the capital, particularly that portion of the discussion that led the Prime Minister to suggest that serious adjustments will be necessary in our society before the anti-inflation program can be phased out. Would the Prime Minister tell us whether it is his intention to insist on that adjustment which would restore some of the basic freedoms of individuals such as the freedom of association which most trade unions, with the sanction of our government, have denied their members.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Well, Mr. Speaker, I can put this on the agenda if the hon. member wishes. I had not contemplated discussing this matter with the unions.

POSSIBILITY OF LEGISLATION GUARANTEEING RIGHT TO WORK

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct my supplementary to the Minister of Labour. In light of some of the recent actions in the United States, has he considered the preparation of legislation which would restore the right to work for some people who feel they have had this right eroded as a result of some of the powers the unions have in our country?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, we have not given serious consideration to this because we have not perceived it as a major problem in any of our discussions between the unions and the government.

TRADE

PROPOSED GENERAL TARIFF CUT OF SIXTY PER CENT—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. What response has the Government of Canada given or is planning to give to the reported initiative on the part of the United States government in respect of the GATT agreement that tariffs should be cut on an average of approximately 60 per cent in world trade?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): If I might answer, Mr. Speaker, the initial response on behalf of the Government of Canada is that the United States' proposal does not in our view equitably meet the interests of Canada in this particular negotiation. We have sought a sector by sector approach, and there obviously will be some differences between the United States' position and that of Canada. We would seek from them greater precision on the position they will be taking, but prima facie this does not seem to meet the objectives we would have at the meeting, so we would hope that they might agree to modify the proposals.

Mr. Gillies: Mr. Speaker, do I understand the answer of the minister to mean that the government is moving away from the traditional position of a multilateral cut in tariffs to a bilateral arrangement among countries and by commodities?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Not so much bilateral because of course under the most favoured nation clause they would immediately under GATT be transferred to the benefit of others. We have, however, been advocating a sector by sector approach which would be of particular value to those areas in which Canada, either in the United States or in the European Economic Community, has had difficulty in getting market access.

WILDLIFE

BUFFALO—METHOD OF PREVENTING WOLVES FROM DEPLETING HERD

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question was for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development but since neither he nor his parliamentary secretary are here, might I direct my question to the right hon. gentleman. Wildlife officials have blamed wolves for the serious decline in the Fort Smith buffalo herd. The herd which numbered 2,000 head in 1971 is now down to about 900 head. A wildlife official said that about 100 wolves would be capable of eating 730 buffalo per year. Would the Prime Minister advise the House what method he plans for the control of the number of wolves or is he capable of giving the House an answer today.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

PROPOSAL FOR ACQUISITION OF TANKS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Dean Whiteway (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence. I should like first to compliment the minister for accepting the opposition's suggestion that Canada acquire tanks on the hire purchase plan. I wonder if the minister could now indicate to the House whether or not he would accept our suggestion as well to have an open-ended agreement until the Leopard Mark II tank is available.

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): No, Mr. Speaker. At the present time we are negotiating with the Germans for the purchase of the Leopard I as one of the options, the other option being, of course, the refit of the Centurions.

INDUSTRY

TEXTILES—INVITATION TO ONTARIO PLANT TO RELOCATE IN TUNISIA—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Bruce Halliday (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I have a question which touches on the responsibilities of three different ministries. In the absence of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, perhaps I could direct my question to the Prime Minister since it concerns government policy. Recently I received a letter from the president of a textile plant in Ontario who is concerned about an invitation he has received from the Tunisia Trade Commission, supported by promotional material from CIDA, inviting him to establish or relocate his plant in Tunisia. In view of the present adverse balance of trade situation, is this a policy that Canada is now advocating?

● (1200)

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I would have to look to see whether this particular case is an example of a general situation. There are obviously attempts by CIDA to enter into joint ventures with other countries so that Canadian industrialists can share with industrialists of other countries opportunities existing in developing nations.

POSSIBILITY OF INDUSTRIES RELOCATING IN OTHER COUNTRIES—CONTINGENCY PLANS TO TAKE CARE OF UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. Bruce Halliday (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. In view of the fact that CIDA has offered to pay part of the travel and other expenses for any industrialist who wishes to consider establishment in Tunisia, in view of the attractive labour rates which exist there, and in view of the potential dislocation of hundreds of workers in Canada, does the minister have contingency plans available to look after the situation in Canada if many people are left without jobs?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, as I indicated to the hon. member when he raised this matter in the standing committee the other day, I have not been aware nor do I have any details as yet on the subject, but based on that comment I have requested my officials to check this out thoroughly to see what the facts are. If there was any displacement—and I rather suspect that there may be some variation in the approach from that which the hon. member's information would indicate—then most certainly we will take measures to help anyone displaced by such action. But I want to check it out before I give a definitive answer.

TRANSPORT

POSSIBLE MODIFICATION OF SYSTEM OF BOX CAR ALLOCATION—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister in charge of the Wheat Board. It has to do with the review of box car allocations and the procedures and recommendations which were advanced by J. F. Monts, an economist from Agriculture Canada. Can the minister advise the House what action the government is contemplating with respect to the recommendations that have been advanced by Mr. Monts, and can we assume that arising from the report there may be some modification in the present system of box car allocation?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Yes, Mr. Speaker, the steering committee, which was recommended in the second recommendation of the Monts Commission, has been set up after receiving general approval from all concerned. A number of other comments on the recommendations are coming in to me and will come in to me from the steering committee. I will propose a date in the not too distant future to indicate the nature of the implementation that will follow therefrom. I may say that two of the recommendations, particularly Nos. 8 and 9, are not being generally approved in the comments, and indeed do not sit favourably with me.

AIR TRANSPORT

METHOD OF COLLECTING USER FEES AT AIRPORTS NOT STAFFED BY DEPARTMENT

Mr. Arnold Malone (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, my question is also directed to the Minister of Transport. I should like to ask him whether or not it is the policy of the Department of Transport to collect user fees at MOT airstrips where there is no staff looking after those airstrips at present and, if so, what would be the method of collection, and would the collection take place even if the department had to hire staff specifically for collection purposes?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): We would certainly want to avoid any additional administrative expense in the course of the collection. Together with the association, we are looking at such questions as this and in order to have more time for the consideration of these matters we have temporarily delayed the implementation of landing fees.

POST OFFICE

PROPORTION OF PROCEEDS FROM SALE OF OLYMPIC STAMPS GIVEN TO AID ATHLETES

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Postmaster General. It concerns the $12 million of $1 and $2 commemorative Olympic stamps issued two weeks ago. In view of the Postmaster

General's statement released on February 12 in which he said:

We need to show our young Canadian athletes that we care about them—that we are aware of the tremendous effort and the sacrifice they are making for Canada. One way you can give your support is by buying this commemorative stamp issue for your collection at philatelic outlets.

What portion of the procedures from the sales of the new $1 and $2 stamps will be given as aid to our Canadian athletes?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, my answer was quite ambiguous and I appreciate the opportunity to be more specific. There are two types of Olympic stamps: the surcharge stamps where the surcharge goes directly to the Olympics, and the commemorative stamps where the net proceeds, after cost of production, are turned over to COJO. But the arrangement we have in writing with that organization is that 3 per cent of all moneys turned over are turned over to the Canadian Olympic Association which in turn distributes that money, as it does the 3 per cent of the money turned over from the Olympic coins, among various organizations responsible for amateur sport in this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. Because of the interest shown by several members on both sides of the House, I am happy to say that the Minister of the Environment yesterday swam, non-stop, 100 lengths of an Olympic swimming pool—which is the equivalent of over 1½ miles—in one hour and ten minutes, using the crawl stroke. The money earned for the Canadian Amateur Swimming Association was over $2,000. The instructor was Aimé R. Brazeau.

ANTI-INFLATION ACT

MEASURE TO ADD NEW DEFINITIONS

The House resumed, from Monday, March 22, consideration of the motion of Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale) that Bill C-89, to amend the Anti-Inflation Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, this is my first opportunity to speak on second reading of this bill. I hope that Your Honour will hear me out, because I am raising a point of order. It is a rather detailed point of order for which I ask Your Honour's indulgence for about five minutes so that I can put it before you. I am satisfied that Your Honour will have to reserve opinion on it, but here it is. It comes back, basically, to the point I have raised time and time again with regard to bills, and that is that some bills go beyond any recommendation made. In this instance, to come down to a nub, there is in this bill, as there was in Bill C-73 which Bill C-89 attempts to amend, provision, under sections 20 and following in Bill C-73 and in clause 6 of this particular bill, for the government of Canada to enter into an agreement with the provinces with respect to the enforcement of the guidelines and all the consequent provisions.

● (1210)

On January 9, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) filed a model agreement and in paragraph 9 of that model agreement there are the following words:

"Payments to the province". Canada hereby agrees, with respect to the aggregate amount paid to Her Majesty in right of Canada pursuant to any order made by the national administrator under sections 20 and 22 of the federal act—

That is now chapter 75 of the statutes of 1974-75-76.

—against a person in the provincial public sector, to pay to the province an amount equal to such part of that amount as may be determined on the basis of a formula to be agreed upon between Canada and the province.

That provision was incorporated as paragraph 9 in an agreement made January 13, 1976, between the government of Canada and the province of Ontario. Basically, there is a situation where revenues resulting from orders of the administrator are paid into the consolidated revenue fund of Canada. Then there is an agreement by the minister, with the approval of the governor in council, to pay moneys out of the consolidated revenue fund to the province, calculated on a proportion of an amount paid into the fund. But under our constitutional and procedural requirements there are two conditions which apply to such payment out of the consolidated revenue fund. First, His Excellency the Governor General must recommend the payment for that purpose in his message to this House. Second, the legislation based upon the message must authorize the payment. We already have had one amendment to the recommendation preceding Bill C-73, and neither the original recommendation nor the amended recommendation says anything about payment of such funds to the provinces. The recommendation is limited to administrative expenses.

Bill C-89, which amends the appropriate clauses of Bill C-73 with regard to these agreements, has no recommendation. I should like to refer Your Honour to clause 6, subclauses (1) (2) and (3) of Bill C-89, and it is my submission that these subclauses, relating directly to payments to Her Majesty in the right of Canada, put this constitutional and procedural defect right at issue. I will summarize briefly. It is a combination of Bill C-73, which has no provision for payment of funds from Canada to the provinces, and the model agreement tabled by the minister and entered into by some minister, on the part of the government of Canada, with the province of Ontario—and, strangely enough, to show that the government is conscious of this fact, in the agreement with the province of Quebec there is no mention of payments from the government of Canada to the province of Quebec, because Quebec does its own administering.

In the case of New Brunswick, the money the administrator directed that the Irving Paper Company pay to the government of Canada is subject to an agreement and is shared between the government of Canada and the government of the province in question. However, there is no authority for that sharing in any recommendation or in Bill C-73, which we have passed, and there was no model agreement. The model agreement followed the passage of Bill C-73 and, as I say, Bill C-89, clause 6, refers directly to these agreements and to the payments thereunder. Since there is no recommendation, it is my view that the bill as prepared is defective, imperfect and requires an amendment by the bringing in of an appropriate recommendation that this House will authorize the payment or the sharing of these moneys paid under the order of the administrator with a province.

I am not going to hold up the legislation, but in my submission this will have to be done. That is my submission to Your Honour for this purpose at this time.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I have had no notice of this objection, so obviously I have not been able to consider it in detail. I do not know whether it is well-founded, and I would very much like to take advice from the advisers of the Crown and also to ascertain the position of the Law Clerk of the House on this question. I do not know whether we can continue, therefore, with this bill, or what the suggestion should be. Obviously, I cannot respond now, but I would like to do so in due course.

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, on the same point of order, I should like to consider this matter. I should like to make representations with reference thereto. I welcome the remarks of the hon. member for Edmonton West to the effect that he does not want to delay this legislation. He is fully aware that in the event there should have to be an amendment to the royal recommendation, and in the event that his point is accepted by the Chair, such recommendation could be obtained. Perhaps it might be in order to proceed with the legislation, with the understanding—

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): With no second reading.

Mr. Blais: —that the debate is to be continued until such time as the question is ready to be put, but the question would not be put until this point has been disposed of.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, as I understand it, the hon. member for Edmonton West indicated that he was rising to correct a procedural error.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): It goes much farther than that.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Of course, it goes to the root of the matter, but it ought not in any way to impede the business of the House. I think that is our feeling, and the feeling expressed by the hon. member for Nipissing, and I think it would be in order for us to proceed on that basis. However, as the hon. member for Edmonton West has said, I think it would be inappropriate for us to give second reading, in a formal sense, to the bill until the point has been cleared by Your Honour. With that in mind, I think the business of the House could carry on. I hope that suggestion is acceptable to the government House leader.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): We had some assurance that there would be second reading today. If, however, we have to keep talking until a ruling can be made on this point, it seems to me rather unconstructive to keep talking just for the sake of expending time. I put myself in the hands of the House leader, but it seems to me that because of this objection we will probably be compelled to move to other business, which seems a more sensible use of the time of the House.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, in reply to the question raised by the Minister of Finance, could we not have an understanding that if the debate on second reading comes to a conclusion, it will at that point be adjourned until there has been a ruling? The minister does not want the House just to talk until four o'clock to keep it going. Can we not have an understanding to that effect?

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Why not?

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): That is all I want.

● (1220)

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair was under the impression that there was an indication that debate on second reading would likely conclude some time later today and that in any case the second reading vote would not come until Monday. If that is the situation, it might be appropriate for the House to proceed to finalize discussion at second reading stage on this measure and then withhold the putting of the question until such time as the Chair has had an opportunity to rule on the point of order.

At the moment there is nothing, it would seem to me, that would prevent the discussion coming to a conclusion at second reading stage and then, before the question is put, the debate would have to be adjourned in order to hold the matter open until such time as further argument can be heard from both sides and until the Chair has had an opportunity to consider the matter and make a definitive ruling in the circumstances. If that is agreeable, the House might proceed on that basis.

[Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West).]

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, as government House leader, I might say that that procedure is quite agreeable to us.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Agreed, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I was not clear whether the hon. member for Edmonton West was seeking the floor to intervene on a point of order, or to speak on the bill.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, my point was purely a point of order.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Dauphin.

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, I just want to say a few words on this bill and to add my comments to what I think is a very important problem. There is a growing number of people and organizations in Canada who are joining in the chorus that wage and price controls are essentially wrong, and that they should be removed as soon as possible before too much harm is done for the future. Last Monday morning, the cabinet listened to the highly-selective and well-prepared brief of the Canadian Labour Congress which feels that the bill deals unfairly with organized labour. Page 9 of that brief gives an indication of what they think:

> Your government's program was supposed to be equitable. Canadians were told that the same degree of sacrifice would be required from all sectors of the community. The legislation and the regulations have made a mockery of this principle for we fail to find adequate controls on dividends, interest rates, professional fees and land speculators. The removal of the special levy on export profits is a clear demonstration that workers in these industries will not benefit from the profits which they worked to produce. Neither is there any guarantee that these profits will be reinvested in Canada to create badly needed jobs. The inequities are becoming clearer with the passage of each day.

While I do not agree that things are as bad for organized labour as this brief states, I do think the inequities are there. Certainly, when the leaders for large numbers of well-organized unions make presentations, we cannot dismiss them and the anti-inflation program must be looked at carefully. The congress listed injustices that they feel were perpetrated in this country by the Anti-Inflation Board. I think it is significant that they have carried out their threat to withdraw from the Canada Labour Relations Council, amongst other bodies. When I consider how the Minister of Labour (Mr. Munro) for a long time was seeking ways to reduce labour strikes and increase consultation between government, labour and business, I am concerned about this withdrawal. Now we are back to square one as far as concerns the government's attempts to bring peace to labour-management problems in this country. Other voices are being heard. Last Monday, the Ottawa Journal reported that the Canadian Economic Policy Committee of the C. D. Howe Institute had this to say:

> Forecasts indicating little if any improvement in the rate of inflation, a further rise in unemployment and only modest gains in over-all productivity do not constitute an outlook for the Canadian economy in 1976 that can be viewed with equanimity.
> They stand in sharp contrast to the performance expected in a number of other major industrial economies, particularly the United States economy where the need for greater discipline in its policies was recognized sooner and implemented faster than in Canada.

I think it is important to note that the government has backed off the export tax. In effect, what they have said is that we will now have a two-price system for Canadian goods—what the company can get in Canada, and what they can get in the export market. Almost certainly, the export market price will be higher, which means that shortages will develop if the controls are allowed to continue. That raises the possibility of an attempt by the government to direct into the domestic market a portion of the production of the various companies.

The C.D. Howe Institute went on to say that at present the government has an opportunity to implement sound economic policies. They recommended that the growth of money supply be limited to 10 per cent, and that government spending be restrained while import barriers and government subsidies are reduced. They also urged the government to remove its wage and price controls at the earliest possible date, and said that in their view, any long continuance of the controls increases the risk that government will delay the adoption of a sound package of basic economic measures. The real crisis lies in inadequate leadership and a failure to make full use of the market system, they claim.

The government is faced with the possibility of keeping controls on too long and using them as a means of dealing with inflation rather than getting the economy into shape. We will get the worst of both worlds. As has been pointed out many times, during the election campaign of 1974 the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) stated that wage and price controls did not work and he would not use them. The Prime Minister is quoted as having stated on February 28, 1974:

> Income controls risk hurting the small and the poor more than they do the big and the rich; and while that may be of minor concern to the more conservative governments and political parties, it is of great and fundamental concern to this government.

The Canadian Labour Congress brief aptly pointed out that the government had degraded the political process in Canada and spread cynicism in the public about government and politics in general. This turnabout by the Prime Minister stands as one of the greatest political turnabouts in the history of Canadian politics. Also, in this bill the government indicates that it is merely tinkering with the process of the functioning of the Anti-Inflation Board without making it in reality any more effective than it was before. The hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) put it very succinctly when he said that Canada and Canadians are living through an economic experiment. Even with all the wage and price controls being tried in other countries with economies somewhat similar to Canada, such as the United Kingdom and the United States, controls were shown up to be only superficial in attempting to cope with inflation. Speaking on November 14, 1975, on the New Democratic Party motion, I had this to say:

> What about inflation? The latest consumer index showing inflation at just over 10 per cent does not come into the category of "good tidings of great joy" but neither is it runaway inflation. It is down from last year. The declining rates of inflation in wholesale prices and commodity prices can be expected to work their way down through the grocery shelves. For instance, the wholesale price index for September announced this week was 6.1 per cent up over a year earlier and the price of raw and partially finished goods was up only 2.5 per cent in the year. The enormous and bumper crops in the United States of grain have pushed down the basic price of corn, wheat, oil seeds so that at the present price the farmer is producing the level of return of 1972 before the devaluation of the American dollar.

I think this indicates that the stage was set long before the anti-inflation bill was brought in to have a reduction in the price of many goods. We were saying that Canadian wage settlements were being reduced. I think we have to remember that with the devaluation of the American dollar by 40 per cent two years ago, much of the increase in wages can be attributed to the readjustment that this would inevitably bring. In the third quarter of last year, before the government decided on wage and price controls, wage settlements in the commercial industry averaged only 13 per cent over the life of the contract. This is certainly not far behind the 12 per cent allowed under the guidelines for workers who have fallen behind because of inflation.

The government can point out that the consumer price index, whatever its value as an index of inflation, has dropped considerably. The rate of increase of the money stock has slowed, and the average rate of increase in major wage settlements improved in the fourth quarter of 1975. This might indicate that these key economic indicators have all shown substantial improvement, but the link between the improvement and the controls is almost nonexistent. The consumer price index is down because of declines since October in the price of beef, pork, poultry, fresh fruit, cereal and bakery products, fats, oils, and airline fares. Of all these, only air fares come under the Anti-Inflation Board's purview. Further, the board has only just begun monitoring price and profit margins in a formal way.

On January 28, the board took its first formal step requiring 6,500 companies to provide information by February 27 on prices, profit margins, dividends and compensation. In March, the net was extended to cover a further 9,500 companies in construction, shipping and other industries where small firms conduct joint bargaining with their employees. It will probably take a considerable time for the true effects of the guidelines on prices to become apparent, although the board relatively soon may identify and publicly punish firms which contravene the guidelines.

Although some of the moderation in wage rates during the fourth quarter is attributable to the operation of the guidelines, I am of the opinion that most of the decline would have taken place in any case. The guidelines do not apply to settlements below 10 per cent, or 12 per cent in special cases. In cases where the board has intervened, many of the settlements allowed were only marginally below the previously negotiated increases. Since its first decision of November 27, the board has ruled only on about 160 settlements: another 340 await approval. Of the 160 settlements dealt with, 26 were rolled back an average of 3.9 per cent. The average first-year increase allowed in these settlements was 16.2 per cent. The average wage increase in all approved settlements so far has equalled about 14 per cent.

Wage settlements in this period have moderated, primarily because of high unemployment, falling inflation rates and mounting employer resistance to high claims. This could have been forecast last March, long before the controls were initiated. The controls program very likely will have little effect on the average rate of increase in wage settlements as the months go by. The controls program will have some effect, but only through supervision of price increases which in any event would have come about through stable or rising profit margins in current economic expansion. In other words, in the long run, the board may depress allowable profits and there will be considerable trouble down the road.

The deliberate sacrifice of profit margins cannot be allowed to continue for long without causing undesirable distortions in the economy. A restraining monetary policy, together with a move away from net stimulus in fiscal policy, is now evident. Together, these policies will be responsible in large part for preventing a price explosion when the controls are softened or lifted. The government will not find it easy to manage the period of transition. There will be a tendency for prices to rise when the controls are lifted. Some companies are not raising prices at present because they are not sure exactly what the guidelines allow. Most people want to remain within the guidelines; few want to break the law. Once people know how much extra they can charge under the anti-inflation guidelines, they will charge as much as they can. I am afraid that the minimum increase will be the maximum allowed under the guidelines.

In summary, at this stage it seems as if the country will meet the government's inflation targets for 1976 and 1977, December to December increases in the consumer price index of 8 per cent and 6 per cent respectively. To date, the effect of the controls program has probably been minimal, but its effects will cumulatively be more important as time goes on. It will be necessary for fiscal and monetary policies to be sufficiently restraining during and after the controls period to make certain that no price explosion occurs when the distortions caused by controls are worked out in freer bargaining after the program's end.

It is increasingly evident that the problems of our controls are just beginning. Mr. Pepin, head of the Anti-Inflation Board, has warned that prices will rise as soon as business people realize what they are entitled to charge under the plan. Actually, the controls program indexes inflation at around 10 per cent. It is quite likely that inflation will rise at this rate and the program will make things worse rather than better. The period of control obviously will be extremely unsettling. The longer decontrols stay on, the worse the period of decontrol will be, and the stronger will be the desire of certain groups—perhaps the government included—to see permanent controls remain. These could further distort the economy. Undoubtedly the government has made poor decisions in the past few years; the results of these are going to show up. In our major markets, the United States in particular, there has been a greater tendency to allow market forces to make their way. These economies will be the stronger for it.

I find one aspect of this bill unsettling, namely, the attempt to bring into the ambit of the AIB many small companies which have hitherto been exempt, especially construction companies. There is no obvious reason for this. There has been no public demand for it and no evidence that these people were upsetting the balance which the controls were designed to achieve. This aspect of the bill seems to be based solely on a recommendation of the former prices and incomes commission. The worthy chairman of that commission advanced no reasons for his recommendation. Frankly, I think it is a mistake to do this. After all, it is in direct conflict with the Prime Minister's theory of government, the Galbraithian theory, which holds that small firms cannot be monopolies and cannot create distortions in the marketplace because they are too small. In other words, small companies respond to the discipline of the marketplace and competition holds down undue gains. Perhaps the moral is that once you start controlling, you must control everything.

May I now deal with the Anti-Inflation Board's decision relating to bilingual civil servants. The Anti-Inflation Board has ruled that bilingualism bonuses for civil servants are not compensation increases subject to wage and salary guidelines. According to newspaper reports, these will cost the federal government $60 million or more in the next year or two. It has been argued that provision was made for such compensation before the controls program was instituted.

I point out that the board did not hesitate to criticize the government's wage settlement with the postal workers. It seems to me that it ought to have rolled back the proposed bilingual increases. Of course, it is up to the government to decide if such roll-back is fair, if the extra $60 million should be paid under government policy. If the government were to so decide, well and good. I submit that the government was responsible for making a decision with regard to bilingual employees, not the Anti-Inflation Board. I raise this matter since it is apparent that we are operating under a double standard. The Anti-Inflation Board has favoured public employees over private employees. If it is to function effectively, it must be objective. It is the government's responsibility to decide what policies it wishes to implement with respect to the bilingual program, or what it wants to pay postal workers.

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, I am especially pleased to participate in the debate on Bill C-89, an act to amend the Anti-Inflation Act, because I did not participate in the debate on the original bill, C-73, passed on December 3 last. Although I attended nearly every meeting of the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs during the consideration of the original bill and was prepared to contribute to the debate, I thought it was better to defer to my colleagues on this side of the House who had not been able to put their views on record before the government imposed closure once more.

I was greatly surprised, however, that less than four months after the passage of Bill C-73 the government proposed an amending bill. Already, through the regulations, the minister had effected certain changes; for example, dividends for small companies, although the public companies still have their dividends frozen. Under the original rules, one area of inequity was that dealing with dividends. Recognizing the effects of inflation, wages were to be allowed to increase 8, 10 or 12 per cent in certain circumstances. However, dividends were frozen at the levels paid in 1974 or those declared in 1975. Furthermore, this not only applied to the largest companies, but to all companies, including small businesses which rely on their dividend policy as part of their remuneration plan. Exceptions, the minister says, were to be allowed if they could get through the Anti-Inflation Board line-up of cases of corporations needing higher dividends to attract new capital or those for which the base rate was unusually low. It is not hard to imagine the effect this policy had on investors. Many of them probably went to United States markets in the meantime.

The government attack apparently ignored the fact that many retired Canadians rely to a greater or lesser degree on dividend income. These thrifty Canadians who are now to have their dividend income frozen are the very ones the government should be encouraging so that more and more Canadians will want to save and invest instead of spending every last nickel today.

The minister was unable to explain, during the committee hearings, how the pensioner was to get along with a frozen income at the same time that wages were to be allowed to rise. You may say, yes, but government pensions are indexed and that will take care of the pensioner. Although most government pensions are indexed, the private schemes with which they are often co-ordinated usually offset the government increase with a reduction of the private portion, so that the number of dollars paid remains constant. This, of course, works a great hardship on pensioners in these days of high inflation rates.

The government has also overlooked the plight of the ordinary pension funds, the mutual funds and insurance companies. These companies invest the hard-earned savings of low and middle income Canadians, giving nearly every working Canadian some kind of interest in dividends. Every little guy who has an insurance policy, pension plan or any kind of savings has an interest in the dividends of Canadian corporations. But look at the financial attacks being made on the ordinary pension fund today. For one thing, pensioners are living longer and therefore are making greater demands than were predicted when these funds were set up. Of course, the drop in value of the dollar means that more demands are being made on pension funds for increased pensions. In the period since 1965, wages have gone up 126 per cent, but dividends have gone up only 32 per cent, further curtailing the pension funds and stimulating demand for higher pensions. Falling markets have in many cases resulted in capital losses for these pension funds. The government proposes to continue this freeze on dividends. Many pension funds are having great difficulty remaining actuarially sound as a result of all these forces. I suspect that more serious trouble will lie ahead.

I often refer, in my remarks, to the little guy, the little investor and the widows and orphans who have substantial interests in Canadian corporations. Others, particularly those to my left, make frequent reference, with scorn, to the corporate welfare bums. It is significant to see how far into the Canadian corporate structure the individual shareholder has penetrated. To give an example, I point to the International Nickel Company of Canada Limited, which has 55,000 registered shareholders in Canada. Undoubtedly, there are many more who are beneficial owners through trusts and other vehicles. This 55,000 is three times the total number of hourly workers employed by the International Nickel Company of Canada, Limited. These 55,000 shareholders have had their dividends frozen, while the wages of one-third that number of hourly workers are allowed to rise 8, 10 or 12 per cent in certain cases.

Before government members say to me that we in the official opposition proposed this kind of a plan, I wish to refer to one or two statements that have been made by government people and others. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald), in the House on October 17, 1975, denied that there was any relationship between his plan and our plan. He said:

> As I anticipated, the leader of the opposition could not resist the temptation to characterize the program now being put forward by the government as a vindication of the mandatory, comprehensive prices and incomes control program he advocated during the last election campaign and for 15 months before that. It is, of course, nothing of the kind.

I wish to refer as follows to the words of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) given to the accountability session of the Liberal party in Ottawa on November 9 last year:

> And we are not the Tories, for instance, who say in one breath that we are stealing their program against inflation and who say in the next, it can't work because we did not follow their program on inflation. We are not following their program on inflation.

During the committee hearings there was another reference that tended to show there was no similarity between the programs. I wish to refer to a question I directed to Mr. Hughes, the executor director of the Canadian Chamber of Commerce. I asked:

> Do you see any major differences between this program and the program that was proposed by the Progressive Conservative Party in 1974?

Mr. Hughes replied:

> Yes, sir.

He went on to explain the differences that he saw.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the hon. member would permit a question on that point.

Mr. Clarke: Certainly, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): The hon. member might be expected to know whether, in the program he advocated in 1974, dividends would have been exempted from restriction under the controls.

Mr. Clarke: My recollection was that there was nothing in the program put forth by our leader that would have had a direct effect on dividends.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Exempting them.

Mr. Clarke: I do not believe there was any mention of it, Mr. Speaker. Long before this bill was introduced certain changes were announced by the minister. The changes were to include, as I remember, 41,000 new companies or firms that would be covered by the guidelines. They were to include all firms in the construction, trucking, grain handling, longshoring and shipping industries. Just last week the minister also said he was considering including the insurance industry in the control program.

● (1250)

Originally, the bill was only to apply to large companies. A number of organizations appeared before the committee.

At that time the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, which claims a membership of 4,500 companies and 9,000 individual members, stated that only 350 of their 4,500 companies would be covered and that none of their individual members would be covered. The Canadian Chamber of Commerce estimated that of its 125,000 members in Canada, some 1,500 would be covered—just over 1 per cent.

Then we heard from the Canadian Federation of Independent Businessmen that probably none of its 30,000 members would be covered. The Canadian Construction Association made an estimate that close to 10 per cent of the firms engaged in the construction industry would be made subject to the guidelines. In the labour sector, the CLC indicated that although the proportion in their case would be higher, less than half their members would be covered by the guidelines. It is interesting to note that the Employers' Council of British Columbia, a noted organization in the field, was refused the opportunity to appear before the standing committee to present its views and ideas.

Then, of course, before the amending bill was presented we were able to hear the Prime Minister's year-end address delivered only a few weeks after the passage of the original bill. Even though the opposition had mounted a vigorous attack on the length of the control period, the Prime Minister indicated in his address that our society was not working to his satisfaction and that we might be faced with a permanent variety of controls. Last week, after all this, the minister took more than 30 minutes to explain the amendments to the three-months' old bill, C-73. The most significant, he told us, were those related to the appeals system. He also proposed the broadening of the right to appeal, and changes in the rules regarding increases in compensation in excess of the guidelines. Then, of course, the all-powerful administrator would have his power broadened in compensation and dividend cases.

The minister also claimed that significant progress was being made in slowing the rate of inflation. As to that, I can only echo my hon. friend from York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) who quoted the report of the conference board which stated that the recent moderation in the rate of inflation was due almost entirely to a decline in the food component, and that it would be erroneous to give credit to the control measures. Certainly, the Liberal government does nothing to help when it introduces a so-called cutback budget showing estimates 16 per cent higher than those of last year. These proposed amendments do nothing to relieve the plight of the pensioner who relies on dividend income, or to ease the raising of capital so as to encourage investment by Canadians in Canadian enterprise. Nor do they solve the problem of raiding or transfers between companies with the object of circumventing the rules. Still awaited, also, is some relief from the mountain of forms and interminable extra work required to be done by the business community. These are all reflected in pass-through costs, and it is the taxpayer who pays in the end.

Some firms are still trying to understand why they are not entitled to the protection, as they perceive it, which is being given to the larger firms. It is obvious to me that the scheme is never likely to be accepted readily by the Canadian people, principally because it is so confusing to the community at large and because the government cannot make it appear to work equitably. I suppose we shall be looking for more amendments to the legislation as the days go by.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Prince George-Peace River (Mr. Oberle).

Some hon. Members: One o'clock.

Mr. Oberle: May I call it one o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

At one o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

Mr. J. Robert Howie (York-Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, my words on this occasion will be relatively brief, but I should like to cover a few points that concern me about this bill. My original understanding was that the Anti-Inflation Board rulings would apply to some 1,500 firms. This has now been extended to cover some 20,000 firms. The number of people employed to perform this function appears to me to have been increased by about 2½ times the original number. I find this somewhat inconsistent with the original philosophy of the Anti-Inflation Board and I hope that in his concluding remarks the minister will deal a little more fully with this particular point than has been the case up to now.

One favourable feature of the legislation is the expansion of the right of appeal to unions. Originally, the appeal structure was limited to the party that considered itself aggrieved, the government and the party being privy to the ruling. The paying party, the payer of the salary or wages, originally was the only party that could launch an appeal against the ruling of the board. This right has now been extended to the unions, and this is as it should be since a person who receives a salary or wage is as much interested as the person who pays. Wherever possible, it is most undesirable to interfere with freely negotiated agreements as to wages arrived at between employers and employees, but in cases that do exceed the guidelines it is extremely important that both parties to the agreement have the right to appeal the board's ruling to a superior tribunal. I think this is a very good feature of the bill.

Significantly, Mr. Speaker, this change seems to have been brought about as a result of a ruling affecting the Irving enterprises and the paperworkers in New Brunswick. In his concluding remarks, I hope that the minister will have the opportunity of dealing with this particular case. The woodsworkers of New Brunswick too, are in a very difficult position. Our forests, particularly in the northeastern part of the province, are in a very high state of irreversible decay. When these trees are cut, some go to the sawmill and others go to the pulp and paper factories. The original concept of the sawmills was an extremely good one and flowed from our forest products royal commission study and report. The report recommended, among other things, that we use the best part of the tree for quality products. For example, we use the trunk of the tree, the best wood, to make finished lumber, furniture or hardwood components, whereas the balance of the tree could be turned into porridge and possibly commercial paper or a more finished form of paper. This recommendation is one that I strongly support. As a result of DREE participation a pilot project sawmill was erected in New Brunswick to perform this very valuable function.

A great deal of difficulty has been encountered with this lumber due to the high degree of decay. One of the major reasons for this decay is that the spruce budworm attacks our forests in New Brunswick and over $5 million of federal money has been allocated to deal with the problem. Indeed, the province has put up even more money than that, as have the industries of the province. So that although we have a three-pronged attack on the budworm, all that our attack on the budworm can do at this point is to control the damage it does. Scientists, particularly in agencies of the federal government, are working on the ultimate solution.

To return to these woodworkers, with this high degree of rot an extensive amount of sorting has to be done in New Brunswick which is not the case with woodsworkers elsewhere. I hope that full weight was given to this fact when the decision affecting the Irving company was taken: Irving is the only firm in New Brunswick that made it a requirement that after the trees are cut, reforestation should take place. They are one of the leaders in North America in this field, and I give them full credit for it. I hope this point was taken into consideration in the wage settlement arrived at between the Irving company and its employees and that it was looked at from a regional point of view.

I should also like to refer to a rumour I have heard from New Brunswick which I hope the minister will be able to shoot down. I understand that in granting the wage increase that was disallowed, the Irving firm, in effect, brought its wage earners up to the national level. I would be very unhappy if I felt that this government has in any way impaired the opportunity of anyone in Atlantic Canada reaching wage parity with Canadians in the central provinces.

Much hard work has been done in this House to reverse the trend whereby not all but some people in Atlantic Canada are paid two-thirds the national wage rate. I would hope this board would not be allowed to operate in such a way as to bring about a freeze in respect of New Brunswickers, maritimers and the people in Quebec because of the disparity in which they find themselves. The minister partly dealt with this matter in committee. I hope he will have an opportunity to do so again. I would appreciate it if he would deal with it again.

Another thing which concerns me is whether this program can be terminated by resolution of the House. If I read the regulations correctly, the resolution would also have to be dealt with by the other place, as my learned friend to the left refers to it. I should like to reflect on that a little further. Perhaps we might conclude that a limit should be placed on the amount of debate in the other place so that this program could be very quickly brought to an end if that should be the decision of parliament.

Another thing we should realize, in dealing with this matter—and perhaps the board should realize it in dealing with applications from New Brunswick—is that there are great problems in that province in respect of transportation. Transportation rates have been increasing in respect of our primary products. This has caused very considerable concern. The province came up with a very dramatic, far-reaching and enlightened program of highway construction over a period of four years. Regrettably, the federal government has not seen fit to join the province in this $400 million undertaking. It has approved some badly needed road construction with regard to arterial highways in northern New Brunswick, but has completely deleted the program for southern New Brunswick.

In answer to my question which appeared on the order paper, it is suggested that no specific request was made for any particular project. However, the whole proposal was before the DREE people and only part of it was approved. I do not know what the Premier of New Brunswick must do in order to ask his federal counterparts to deal with this problem. I know he was here in Ottawa in December, at which time he did everything possible to bring it to the attention of the people concerned. If New Brunswick workers must travel on less favourable roads, or on a less favourable transportation system, then surely wage considerations should involve such concepts. This is in line with what the Irving firm did in dealing most favourably with the matter of wages. This seems to be a move in the direction of what I hoped would be encouragement rather than discouragement, as has been the case in respect of this policy. I am not sure the board has adequate regional representation in order to take into account regional problems.

I shall conclude my remarks by saying I certainly do not expect the minister to deal with all the points I have raised, but I must say he certainly made an effort to deal with all the points I raised previously. If he has an opportunity, I hope he will give some consideration to these points also.

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I will not indulge in reiterating what some of my colleagues have said during this debate. They went back to before the last election and indicated how the government brought in a program which it had so vigorously opposed before the 1974 election campaign.

I should like to refer to this in another way. When the government finally structured its anti-inflation program, it was no surprise to me that there was a system of wage and price controls in Canada. I said this to my Liberal opponent during the election campaign. I felt sorry that he had to tell political untruths to the people during the campaign. We both knew that our economy was in trouble and that something would have to happen in tune with what other countries have done to bring the flood and spiral of inflation under control. What I am upset about is that when the government finally decided enough time had expired since the last election campaign, and that it was safe to go to the Canadian people and say, "While this was not a good program in July, it is a good program now," the government also applied, for the first time, this innocuous thing we have heard throughout the debate, that the program is substantially different. In other words, the anti-inflation program with which the Minister of Finance burdened the people had to be substantially different from the well thought-out plan of the former leader of the opposition.

What did the members of the government do? They sat in the backrooms and went through the Conservative anti-inflation program. They must have told themselves, first of all, that they could not have a 90-day freeze because that would look too much like the Conservative program. They decided not to have a time limit of 18 months or 12 months, because that was what the Conservatives discussed during the 1974 election. So they ended up with a program that was substantially different from that worked out and thought out by some people who worked on the problem over a long period. They did not bring in an anti-inflation program that would have worked, a program which indeed did work in the United States and a program that has worked and has helped to bring the economy under control in other parts of the world.

I do not wish to give too much credit to our friends in the fifth estate, but recently a reporter for a local paper said that a government shows its decay never more clearly than when it begins to spend more of its time saving face than fulfilling its mandate. Truer words have never been spoken about this government. This anti-inflation program has been nothing but an effort to save face. It is nothing more than a program that is substantially different to something that might have worked in Canada. At no time did we say that our program was a cure-all or a solution to all the economic problems we face in Canada. We did say, however, that it was a program that was needed to combat the inflationary cycle and bring it under control.

A short while ago the minister asked permission to ask a question of one of my colleagues who spoke about this matter before we recessed for lunch. He asked what the Conservative program would have been. Well, Mr. Speaker, perhaps I can save myself the trouble of responding, if the minister should feel the urge to ask me the question, because I would tell him to ask the former minister of finance who in Toronto recently laid out exactly what he thought the anti-inflation wage and price control program should be like. He said that the open-ended program in effect now could lead to totalitarian government. This is the minister who has just left the cabinet, the former minister of finance. He was also involved in the 1974 election campaign, when he said that the program should have started with a 90-day freeze. I wonder where he got that from, and I wonder why he left the cabinet.

This program is doomed to failure even if the amendments are brought in. When the minister first introduced the program in the House of Commons, and his colleagues spoke on it, great care was taken because it was being said that he would build a monstrous bureaucracy. We were under the same attack in the 1974 election campaign. With regard to the anti-inflation program, we were told that only 200 people in total would administer the program throughout the country and that it would be a kind of self-liquidating program. I invite anyone to travel throughout the country to see how many adjudicators, arbitrators, communicators and instigators are travelling around trying to make this program work, trying to earn the respect of labour and the business community, and trying to explain the inexplicable; in other words, trying to explain something for which there is no explanation.

My colleagues have spoken about the monstrous forms which small firms have to hire armies of consultants, lawyers and accountants to fulfil the new requirements which the government has placed upon them. What about this business of the jurisdiction of the anti-inflation program? When the program was introduced, my colleagues will recall that the minister said—and I made an issue of this in the House—that basically certain sections of the Income Tax Act would be used by the Anti-Inflation Board in exercising their power to intervene. Generally speaking, anyone who falls under the jurisdiction of the Income Tax Act would fall also under the jurisdiction of the Anti-Inflation Act. We know that that did not work out the way it was intended, because none of the current operations of the federal government or of the provincial governments—and those are the ones affected by the Income Tax Act and considered different from ordinary departments of the government—is attuned to the anti-inflation program.

The provinces did not fall over themselves to rush to Ottawa and sign the agreements provided for under the act, because first they had to get their own house in order. They wanted to be the first to introduce increased rates for hydro and increased insurance rates such as in British Columbia, which has increased these rates by 120 per cent and 150 per cent in some cases, and all the other costs which make up the cost of living of Canadians. Some provinces found themselves in a pinch with regard to the professional salaries of nurses, teachers, and so on, so they decided it was time to go to the federal minister to sign the program and to refuse to grant the increases which some of these professional groups are demanding.

With a program like this, how can you ask a private sector, the Canadian Labour Congress or the man on the street to practice restraint, to fall in line? These agreements with the provinces have not worked out, and the reason they have not worked out is that the federal government should have shown some restraint. As a matter of fact, we are faced in this House with a 20 per cent increase in federal spending at a time when everybody is being asked to restrain their demands to 10 per cent. On top of that, the government saw fit to shift some of its own responsibilities to the provinces by announcing the phasing out of its participation in certain health programs and the curtailment of some of its contributions to health care over a number of years. Recently, the provinces were faced with the decision of the federal government, reached without any consultation with them, to slow down spending when it comes to policing. The formula is being adjusted, without consultation. The provinces were told they had to accept the greater share in the cost of monitoring the program.

The Unemployment Insurance Act is a perfect example of this. I am referring to the recent adjustments to the Unemployment Insurance Act whereby a qualifying period of six weeks was brought in under the legislation. I challenge any member of the House to show me one working person in our country who could live for six weeks without income. What has been achieved by that change is that the burden to maintain families with no income is now shifted from the federal government to the provincial governments. So why should the provinces be so excited about the anti-inflation program, and why should they act in a different way from the federal government? The provinces had every justification to do what they did through their Crown corporations, to increase hydro rates, the cost of energy, the cost of transportation and all the other essential components in the budget of the average Canadian, particularly those Canadians who can least afford these increases.

When he goes to the bargaining table, the first thing the employer tells the working Canadian is, "We understand you have fallen behind, but you must understand that we are bargaining under some restraints. After all, we want to be responsible Canadians and we do not want to exceed the guidelines that have been set by the federal government." This is the main topic of discussion across the bargaining table today. Unions are charging that no one else is living by the guidelines. Corporations are not following the guidelines, particularly those exporting their goods and who are being paid on international markets.

The minister has announced that their profits, which may be in excess of the guidelines, are allowed under the program. I do not argue with him. I am part owner of a small company which exports all its productive capacity to another part of the world, and I welcome the minister's decision. But I should like to hear from him how he will monitor these excess profits and ensure that they will be funnelled back to the company to be reflected in the increased capacity of the individual plant. It is an exercise in futility. It is impossible to have that kind of transfer of money.

One of my big objections to the program is that it will do nothing in the first year but guarantee us a 10 per cent inflation rate. I can substantiate that argument with the experience we have gained in monitoring the cost of houses and rents in the two major metropolitan centres of Toronto and Vancouver. My colleagues will recall that in British Columbia the socialist government there in 1973 and 1974 had a rent control program: landlords were not allowed to increase rents by more than 10.6 per cent a year. Everyone in the House knows that the cost of housing and rents is the highest in the country in Toronto and Vancouver. The effects of the rent control program in British Columbia were monitored in this way and resulted in rents in Vancouver increasing 3 per cent more in that one year than they did in Toronto. Everyone asked how that was possible, because there was a ceiling on rent and no one was allowed to increase it by more than 10.6 per cent.

The answer is very simple and obvious. Every landlord in the city of Vancouver, whether he wanted to or not—or needed to or not—would have been a damned fool had he not increased his rent by 10.6 per cent, because he did not know what was coming the next year. So every landlord and everyone who rented anything to anyone increased his rent by 10.6 per cent. In the city of Toronto there were some people who did not need an increase that year and they did not operate under those restraints. They knew that if they needed an increase the next year, they could increase rents by 6 per cent, 8 per cent or 15 per cent. The result was a 3 per cent differential.

I have operated several small businesses in my business career. If I was in business right now—and there are thousands of small businessmen throughout this country—every time I would walk through my plant I would look at this and that and make little notes. The Anti-Inflation Board tells me I cannot increase prices more than four times a year, so every three months I would automatically increase my prices. Every day I would look very closely for what I could find to demonstrate to the Anti-Inflation Board a legitimate cost increase as a result of which I could increase my prices. So the effect is this: instead of increasing one's prices once a year or not at all, which was the practice before, one now increases prices four times a year. The effect will be monstrous. Unions will also bargain for the maximum. They will have to, knowing how the anti-inflation program applies to the business sector and the public sector, and knowing how the intrusion of the anti-inflation program into the private enterprise system has affected the economy. Private enterprise will also have to bargain for the maximum in order to protect its skin.

We have not broken the inflationary cycle; we have accelerated the process. Unions will have to try to achieve the maximum because their employers will try to keep them down, and the Anti-Inflation Board will probably roll them back. Recently we have seen settlements in excess of 20 per cent. Unions are shopping all over for these historical relationships. Nobody seems to be able to explain this thing. Some have it, some do not. If you have it, do not fight it. What is an historical relationship? What do you have to catch up to historically? These are some of the questions unions and business people ask themselves, and until some almighty administrator tells them whether they have it or not, nobody will know.

This program does nothing to battle the problems we are facing in our industrial relations. The government is stimulating industrial warfare: the labour movement is more divided today than it ever was as a result of this massive intervention, and the adversary system which exists in labour negotiations is more prevalent today than it was before the program was introduced. We hear voices from every corner and from every sector of our society—and every knowledgeable economist has offered his views on this matter. The C.D. Howe Institute recently published a little booklet which was distributed amongst all my colleagues: it laid out, in no uncertain terms, what the effects of this anti-inflation program would be, even after the amendments are discussed and implemented—if they are implemented as a result of this debate.

As I mentioned before, the former minister of finance has finally broken the silence and entered the public debate, warning the government where the program will lead. This is why we are getting the reaction we are to some of the other legislation that is now before the House. There is an uproar among honest, hard working citizens throughout the country. There is reaction to some of the peace and security legislation, and so on, because people are beginning to think that the great intellect which is within the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has a master plan and that the anti-inflation program might lead us to a destination for which we have not bought our ticket. We are concerned about the recent announcement of the Prime Minister respecting dealing with unions, and his talk about the massive intervention which is required to decontrol and phase out the anti-inflation program, if indeed that will be possible after a three-year or four-year period.

I hope the former minister of finance will be more vocal and will tell us just how this program came about and why it was necessary for him to leave the cabinet and disassociate himself from the obvious dilemma which was being cooked up in the back room by people who obviously had not given any thought to the problem at hand.

The Prime Minister met with the labour unions just recently, as my colleagues know, and told them that their meeting here—there were only about 15,000 of them marching up and down in front of this building—really would be of no consequence because they would be naive to think that the government would reconsider its program, and that it would be naive for them to think that the government would reconsider the duration of time over which the program should operate. So they went away peacefully and they have embarked upon certain actions.

The Prime Minister has indicated that he is prepared to sit down with labour and talk about the new society and the adjustments which will have to be made in our society before the program can be phased out. We all know about the year-end message of the Prime Minister which caused so much anxiety amongst Liberal backbenchers. They found it necessary to sit down with their leader over a whole weekend and have him explain to them what he meant by this new society and this massive intervention in business and labour and the Prime Minister now says to labour that he is prepared to sit down with them, but with them only. He is not prepared to sit down with them and business people to talk about the the anti-inflation program, about further changes which need to be made, or about the decontrol period; however, he is willing to sit down with labour and talk about how it will be affected by the new society and what kind of intervention into labour he will be planning before he considers this society prepared to live without these controls.

Then I assume he will tell the corporations, chambers of commerce, manufacturers' associations and the people who come to Ottawa to lobby and consult with him, that he will be prepared to carry on this consultation process with them as well, and perhaps he will share with them his views about the new society and how the intervention will affect them.

However, we can rest assured—I know my hon. colleagues will agree with me—that the Prime Minister will never get all these groups into the same room, because that could be dangerous. That would be a departure from his tradition to divide and conquer and to do away with this consultation process where everyone gets into the same room and tries to reach agreement.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Oberle: That is not the method our Prime Minister will use in bringing the previous imbalances within our society under control. I fear what the outcome of this program will be. Unless the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacDonald) responds to the request of people in every part of society and makes the controls program more equitable, makes it apply equally to all, the Prime Minister's prediction may prove right: the system may well be doomed. Our time-honoured, free enterprise system as we have known it, the system which has worked so well for Canadians for so long, will indeed be doomed.

● (1440)

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I agree with the hon. member for Prince George-Peace River (Mr. Oberle). Incidentally, I was sorry to see the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stanfield) leave the chamber. The government must feel relieved at his departure this afternoon because in the last election campaign he told the country what we must do to put our economy right. He was farsighted enough to see what needed to be done to put right our economic difficulties and inflation.

I congratulate the hon. member for Prince George-Peace River on what he said. He spoke excellently. I join him in indicating to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald), who is present in the House, my concern about the operation of the controls program. As I have said, my former leader had the courage to tell Canadians during the last election campaign what needed to be done. We would have done it if this party had formed the government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Frankly, the program suffers because the government lacks credibility. Its difficulties began when the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) announced it in his famous message on Friday, October 14, and gave us all great indigestion on Thanksgiving eve. It would not have mattered so much if the government had brought forward a reasoned, reasonable program of wage and price controls. Unfortunately, that was not the case. The government adopted our program. Unfortunately, it ignored its best features and adopted instead some of the worst features of the program we brought forward in the last election campaign. I am under the impression that the present controls program constitutes the sole attack upon inflation. Ignoring action long overdue for curbing inflation, the government has failed to implement concurrent fiscal and monetary policies for slowing down and halting inflation. The controls program, as I say, is the sum and substance of the government's attack on inflation. As the hon. member for Prince George-Peace River has said, this government has reneged on its responsibilities with respect to certain programs, medicare being an example. On the whole, the government has adopted a slapdash approach in its attack on inflation.

Some people question the constitutionality of important parts of the program, and belatedly the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford) has said that he may seek direction from the Supreme Court. He, too, wants to know if certain aspects of the program, particularly agreements with the provinces, are constitutionally valid. If the Supreme Court finds that parts of the program, agreements with the provinces especially, are not constitutionally valid, there will be chaos piled upon chaos in this country. Various groups in society, teachers included, will make salary demands the like of which we have not seen for a long time. As I say, this government's approach to the whole question has been slapdash. It patches here, fixes there, and introduces an amending bill only weeks after this House passed the original bill. Although the government was thinking of controls before October 14, it had no clear idea where it was going. Now it will take the matter to the Supreme Court of Canada for judicial decision on the constitutionality of the agreements with the provinces.

Controls are disrupting our lives. Let me give a personal example which no doubt could be repeated many times. A couple of weeks ago, late one Sunday night when I returned to my apartment after visiting my constituency I was surprised to find attached to my door a pamphlet on which was printed, so to speak, the modern-day equivalent of Martin Luther's thesis. In so many words, the pamphlet told me that the landlord wanted to apply to the rent review board for a substantial rent increase made necessary by increased costs. I can tell you, at one o'clock in the morning that was a shock to my system.

I discovered, after asking questions, that many landlords in Ottawa—indeed, landlords all over Ontario—are asking for rent increases. Rent increases are to be limited; hence they are asking for the maximum rent allowed. Part of the problem is that the government's control program was without a termination date, and according to all indications, restrictions will be in force for a long time. People were putting pressure on provincial governments to control rents even before the government introduced its anti-inflation program. The matter was made worse when the federal government introduced its wage and price control program but without a termination date. Landlords say to themselves, "We must protect our investment and apply for the maximum rent increase or we shall be left out in the cold. We will apply for it and pass on as much as possible the cost of the increase to the unfortunate consumer." I know that in my province of Saskatchewan there is concern because of the pressure placed upon the availability of rental accommodation. More and more owners of apartment buildings are making application under the provincial condominium act to turn existing apartment buildings into condominiums. Rather than renting space within the building, they will be able to sell each apartment.

An hon. Member: Shame!

Mr. Hnatyshyn: It is a shame, for the reason that if this practice continues and is widespread there will be a very great shortage of rental accommodation. People who have the resources will buy accommodation to protect themselves from increases in rent brought about by pressure being placed upon them by landlords. Unfortunately, with the rent control plan in effect there is a natural discouragement to people investing in building new rental accommodation. Therefore, a person seeking rental accommodation is being squeezed from both ends.

The question is whether this government is going to give us any indication within the reasonably near future as to the direction it proposes to take us down this road of wage and price controls. It is not sufficient for the Minister of Finance to bring in this bill to amend existing legislation, Bill C-73 that was just passed by this House a few weeks ago, without making a major statement on the aims and goals of this government with respect to wage and price control and the anti-inflation program. I ask the minister to give serious consideration to giving a candid assessment in the very near future so that the people of Canada will understand and be able to make specific plans. They should know the duration of the plan, rather than each and every one of us speculating on it, compounded from time to time by the philosophic musings of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) over television.

As I said earlier, this government has not taken the best, but the worst parts of the plan put forward by our party at the time of the last election, advanced at that time and alluded to by the leadership of our party over a period of years as being an essential attack that must be embarked upon with regard to the problems of inflation.

As has been pointed out by many of my colleagues, the Hon. John Turner, recently departed from the cabinet and now in private life, acknowledges that one of the problems of this plan is that there is not a hiatus during which there is an absolute freeze on wages and prices to allow the federal government to come in on a more orderly basis. However, the program was evolved in the minds of the Prime Minister, the Minister of Finance and those involved in financial matters within the cabinet in a matter of hours or days. They came forward with a quickly-conceived plan without the kind of consideration that we ought to expect in our country as far as economic matters are concerned. The minister and the Prime Minister have spent a great deal of time trying to justify the success of this program. I do not think they have been successful. I say, sincerely, that I do not wish them any bad luck. In fact, I wish them all the luck in the world so that they will in fact be able to deal with the problem of inflation in an effective way.

I canvassed my constituents on the question of wage and price controls. The result probably applies across this country. The people of Canada are concerned about the economy and the future. They are concerned about it to the extent that they support in principle an anti-inflation program. However, once you get that acknowledgement from them, they express the same sort of apprehension that has been expressed by my colleagues throughout this debate and which we will continue to express with regard to the effectiveness of the plan. The government is really not sincere in its anti-inflation program. This is evidenced by the fact that they themselves have not given the leadership with regard to government expenditures to which we in this country are entitled. Therefore, when we have an announcement by the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Chrétien) that he is going to make gigantic cuts in government spending—

Mr. Nystrom: You are ragging the puck; you are repetitive.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: I am sorry, I did not get the hon. member's remark. Let me put it this way: if it is sentimental, I will be glad to look at it in due course.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hnatyshyn: The fact is that we have this great pizzazz and fanfare announced by the President of the Treasury Board about the cuts to be made in government spending, and then we find that a very large portion are really paper cuts. It is paper doll time in the affairs of our country. To categorize the situation I will make the analogy that I will reduce my spending next year by $5,000 because I am not going to buy a new Ford automobile. That is the kind of cut announced by the President of the Treasury Board. We were not told of any effective cuts. We were not given an analysis of spending in this country. Rather, we were given a con job to give the impression that the government is really serious about exercising restraint as far as its own expenditures are concerned.

There is concern about the effectiveness of this anti-inflation program that has been with us now for some five months. On the basis of my observations, there is a general feeling across the country that there should be an accounting, not in some informal television interview with the Prime Minister, but a candid accounting on the part of the Minister of Finance with regard to where we are now and where we will be headed in the following months or years. Is there any hope of this program being terminated within a reasonable period of time, so that we can get back to our affairs and away from the prospects of a system in which there is massive and continuous government intervention in the everyday affairs of the average citizen?

I indicated earlier that when this bill was brought in I was concerned about the size of the administration and the cost to be involved in giving it effective control and monitoring anti-inflation and wage and price controls such as the government has involved us in. I stated that there seemed to be danger signs on the horizon. Already there are increases in the number of people involved in this operation. Parkinson's law started to operate within a very short period of time. Not only do we have the Anti-Inflation Board involved here, but other departments and people seconded from other departments. We are looking not only at the 200 or so employees directly involved in the program, we are looking at people in other departments such as the Department of National Revenue, who are spending substantial amounts of time and effort trying to put this program over.

Unless we see, in a reasonably short time, the end of the policy now being followed we shall find ourselves locked into a permanent system of government intervention and control from which it will be difficult to extricate ourselves.

As far as government spending is concerned, I have lately detected during the question period a tendency on the part of government spokesmen, whenever a member on this side suggests some money should be spent, to say, "You members on the opposition side have been asking for restraint in government spending, so we do not intend to spend any money carrying out whatever suggestions you may make." It is not responsible to answer our inquiries in these terms. It is true that members of my party are deeply interested in having the government exercise restraint, but we are also interested in getting the government to carry out a basic review of its spending priorities. This has not been done.

Treasury Board is chopping away at the funds of various departments and agencies, directing its efforts particularly toward programs with a high profile, actions which produce press coverage for a few days. Information Canada, everybody's scapegoat, has been suspended. They say, "Look, we have cut out the CYC." But in terms of the total amount of dollars spent, cuts such as these are not significant. They have not involved a basic re-examination of spending priorities or a new view as to the direction in which the country is going. I am suggesting that the people of Canada are becoming impatient with the government and impatient with the course it is following.

[Mr. Hnatyshyn.]

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hnatyshyn: I wanted to say much more—

Mr. Hees: Carry on.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: I appreciate that invitation, Mr. Speaker, but I am satisfied to have expressed in these terms some of the concern I feel with respect to the operation of the program we are discussing.

Mr. Fred McCain (Carleton-Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, for altogether, too long, Canada has been under the direction of a Liberal government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McCain: It is a government which has been extremely slow to acknowledge realities and devise its programs accordingly. Some of us have the questionable privilege of having spent a fair portion of our three score years and ten. I am envious of those who have not spent so much. But having spent those years one does develop the power of recollection, the ability to draw from the past an element of personal experience in the way some of the younger members cannot do. We can remember, for instance, that there was a time when a Canadian considered it virtually a right in the economic structure to own a home of his own, or to look forward to the day when he would do so. And he could justifiably entertain such an ambition as part of his expectations in life.

Mr. Drury: You are talking about the homesteaders, are you?

Mr. McCain: We would only be going back to the years when there was a division of government between Liberals and Conservatives, when Liberal administrations did not dominate and did not sell this country's heritage for a mess of potage.

An hon. Member: Heady stuff!

Mr. McCain: The opportunity for the individual to own his own home probably reached its peak immediately after the second world war. The government recognized that to compensate for the diversion of the activities of citizens who had enlisted to protect their country the provision of "something extra" was in order. Various programs were accordingly enacted, designed specifically for veterans but oriented, in some instances, toward people with low incomes generally. This stimulated a great many people who, although they did not have the rights of veterans and were living on low incomes, to build their own homes, sometimes with the help of a loan from friends or, maybe, from a bank—to build them, possibly as the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Drury) has suggested, in the fashion of the homesteaders, with the help of co-operative community loans.

In the little business I operated for some time there were four individuals in that crew who bought or constructed and owned their own homes, though at that time they were receiving little more than the minimum wage as their source of income.

Under Liberal leadership we have gone from one economic catastrophe to another.

Mr. Hees: Throw the rascals out!

Mr. Paproski: Resign!

Mr. McCain: In the Diefenbaker years at least there was incentive, there was a promise of business opportunity, there was a promise for the well being of the individual, and a recognition of the welfare requirements of the nation, while at all times keeping the long term interests of the nation at heart. This cannot be claimed by those on your right today, Mr. Speaker.

An hon. Member: Remember the Arrow!

Mr. McCain: I suppose the Liberal government dumped money down the aeronautical drain for years during its administration, and having proceeded along a comparable course it has yet to demonstrate that it can run an airline.

Mr. Crouse: They can't run anything. They cannot even run the St. Lawrence Seaway.

Mr. McCain: We find ourselves now, after a long period which has certainly not been characterized by leadership, in a position in which it has been suggested through various sources that there should be a wage and price control program. Mr. Speaker, this is a sorry reflection upon the administration of the Liberals over the past decade. They have brought us to a position in which our leader recognized, during the election of 1974, that such a policy was essential. The Liberals denied it was called for, yet today, without a mandate from the electorate to do so, they have brought in a hodge-podge program purporting to control wages and prices. This has created a very unjust burden for a great many people in Canada.

● (1510)

I would ask Your Honour to bear in mind that the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stanfield), our then leader, said that there should be a 90 day freeze. As has been mentioned before in this House, the man who was then the minister of finance for Canada has since said that if wage and price controls were to be brought in there must be a 90 day freeze. Is this why he left the cabinet, Mr. Speaker? Or did he leave the cabinet because of some of the other ulterior, behavioural patterns existing in cabinet at the time with which he must have been familiar? It must have been one of the two.

We now find ourselves with a program that began by making many exceptions and which—I think this is quite justifiable criticism on the part of the labour sector of our society—has not been effective in controlling prices, and cannot be effective in controlling prices as the program presently operates. The government has created, perhaps intentionally—and that is what alarms me—friction within our society by allowing exceptions to be made to the program, and by exercising no active control over prices other than in cases legislated to the provinces by agreement. As the hon. member for Prince George-Peace River (Mr. Oberle) said, the program does control rents.

Was it intended to stir up a furore? Was the plan intended to be criticized by those who said it would not work? Because if that were intentional the government could have devised no better way to engender criticism of the government and doubt among the people of Canada.

Let me give the House an example of how one person feels who has felt the brunt of this program. I want to read to the House a letter addressed to me:

Dear Sir:

I am writing to you to express my disapproval to the present anti-inflation program. Being a proud Canadian I would be the first to agree something had to be done to stem the tide of economic disaster that our country is headed for. Wage and price control I am not against, but I am definitely against the present system where our present government freezes the income of the wage earner (not the prices) and segregates one Canadian from the other, because one is from the east and one from the west, when they say the west has always been ahead of the east. Is this democracy? They didn't do this to us when world war II started; when we were mixed up in the forces at that time we all had one common denominator, our love for Canada.

We tradesmen at Irving Pulp and Paper were given a 25 cent increase to adjust our wages to come closer to our western paper workers. We lost that. We fought for our COLA clause. We lost that. We negotiated for N.B. day as most New Brunswickers now enjoy. We lost that. Other things we lost, along with a large per cent of our wages, but most of all we lost our bargaining rights. I love Canada and I love freedom. That is why I am writing you, appalled at the dictatorial tactics taken by Mr. Trudeau and his cabinet.

The really significant thing about that letter, Mr. Speaker, is that the writer, who is prepared to accept wage and price controls, is a union member and a victim of the administration of the Anti-Inflation Board. Yet he is still prepared to accept wage and price control because of the economic situation that he recognizes is Canada's mess of pottage today. It is not that labour is against wage and price control as such; it is against the plan as conceived and administered by the government.

It is incredible that before people can appeal a government decision they must first break the law. This is precisely what happened in the city of Saint John to people who had bargained so long and so well in good faith, and who historically have had such excellent relations with their employer, with a minimum of strikes interrupting the progress of business.

I think one has to recognize the way in which both the company and the union were prepared to face the situation. Both parties, law-abiding groups, agreed that the law had to be broken after a fine had been assessed in order to appeal the decision. How they feel about the situation has been pretty clearly stated in their presentation to the cabinet. For instance, one point they made was that they felt they should remain in the same relative earning position as their fellow workers, the woodlands workers. The agreement signed by the paper workers and the paper mill would have brought the wages of the paper workers up to those of the woodlands workers. An historic relationship had existed between them for years, and historic relationships were to be recognized in Anti-Inflation Board decisions.

When the decision was made these workers got one third of their historic entitlement, which I suggest is a very poor recognition of historic relationships. After the white paper was issued and after the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) had said that wage and price control would be enacted into law, there were 60 days during which there was no regulation or legislation. The Anti-Inflation Board called for and obtained documentation of and representations on the CPU-Irving agreement before the regulations were published. In fact the decision of the board on the CPU-Irving agreement was handed down on the same day that the regulations were announced. What were the guidelines upon which the decision was based?

Needless to say, the paper workers were shocked and dismayed at the ruling of the board. And well they should have been since it was a breach of faith as well as a breach of the philosophy supposedly part of the program. As I have already said, they were alarmed that there was no way in which they could appeal. Secondly, if they had wanted to initiate proceedings and appeal the decision on December 19, the day after the board's ruling, they had nowhere to go since the government had not bothered to appoint the administrator to whom the appeal would be directed. When finally they had an opportunity to meet with the administrator, they stressed the point it was not their wish to violate the law, but in terms of the pursuit of justice there really was no alternative.

This goes on, Mr. Speaker, like a Cinderella story; it has to be a fairy tale. Surely the Liberal government would not have created a situation such as this unless it had intended to engender criticism and prove the failure of the program that it had derided so severely in the 1974 election campaign. I do not believe that the government wants the program to succeed. I believe it wants to keep Canadians in a state of confusion, indecision and anger, so as to prove prior to the next election that wage and price controls will not work. I believe it wants to prove to Canada that one can bungle, disturb, incite, that one does not have to govern well; that you need only keep the people stirred up but that you try to keep them on your side.

I mentioned that these workers received only one third of what they should have received in order to preserve the historic relationship. They got a very dirty deal. I say that on two grounds; first, because historically they were not receiving equal pay vis-à-vis their western counterparts; secondly, because historically they did not retain the relative position of one group of workers compared with another. Both these things should have been allowed in respect of the ceilings under the program of the government. Yet they were not allowed.

When we couple that with the justifiable complaint of labour that the effectiveness of the control of prices has been virtually negligible, then I think we understand why very many people in the union structure of Canada would say, as this man said to me in his letter, that he is not against wage and price controls in the economic chaos in which we find ourselves, but he is against the inequitable and relatively disgraceful pattern of administration that has been applied to a program in which the government has no heart.

An illustration of the fact that the government has no heart in the program is that it cannot live within its own spending guidelines. The areas in which it chooses to make cuts are the productive areas. There is no expansion in agricultural research or in fisheries research. There is a reduction in the research expenditures in respect of medicine. I submit these are the productive and necessary expenditures of the country today. There is no expansion in research for energy. These are the areas in which research moneys could be spent for the increased productivity of all Canadians, but they are the areas in which we are pinching pennies.

I do not believe the government is sincere in its approach to wage and price controls or economic guidelines. It certainly cannot be other than hypocritical when it says to the provinces, to labour and to industry, that they must observe these guidelines but that the government will not. This is a sad illustration of the sterility of economic capability as far as the government is concerned.

Mr. Howard Johnston (Okanagan-Kootenay): Mr. Speaker, this is the first occasion on which I have participated in any debate in respect of the government's anti-inflation program. However, I welcome this opportunity this afternoon to say a few words in this regard.

My memory is very clear concerning the election campaign of June and July of 1974. I remember particularly the impassioned speeches made by my Liberal opponent during the campaign when, on platform after platform, and at candidate forums he equated controls with every aspect that was foreign to Canadian life. He equated freedom, particularly the brand that was to be provided by the Liberal government, with everything that was true and equal to Canadian life. Had he been elected in that campaign and sitting in this House last Thanksgiving Day he would have had to resign the next day because there would have been no possibility of his living with the moves being made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and his cabinet ministers.

It amazes me still how this program we are debating today could have been set at play at any point without mass resignations from the other side. I will never be able to understand how it could have passed through caucus, through cabinet, and into parliament after the campaign of the summer of 1974. I and millions of other Canadians watched breathlessly as the grab bag of goodies was unloaded across the country. One day there would be reference to a transportation bill, and another day to a housing bill involving billions of dollars. This gave the people a hope for expansion in the future. Unfortunately for the country those promises were taken as being true. That assumption has been shattered.

In this debate I should like to pay tribute to my colleague, the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain (Mr. Hamilton), because he saw the situation as it was developing. He sounded a warning, well in advance of Thanksgiving Day, because he knew what was coming. The hon. member is not in the House and I know he is too modest to regard himself as even a minor prophet, but I am sure his judgment as to what was coming out of government offices was solidly on the line.

It was interesting this afternoon to hear the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Hnatyshyn) use the word "terminated". During his address it occurred to me that the program of the government has been "Turner-rated" in the last week. The former minister of finance rated it a solid zero and indicated what should have been done.

It might be some solace to the official opposition, and certainly to the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stanfield) to know that what they proposed was what the former minister of finance sees now as what should have been, and was, the only possible road to follow in entering this delicate and important question of controls. That must have been quite a cabinet meeting at which he told his colleagues the only way they could go was to follow the plan suggested by the leader of the opposition. Obviously that was not possible for the government opposite, so that minister of finance resigned and is no longer in this House. Instead of accepting what was not palatable to the Liberals, the government embarked upon a policy of wage and price controls which must by its very nature tighten down, tighten down, and tighten down.

The possibility of easing up becomes more remote every day. The inequities that have been introduced, which this bill attempts in some way to overcome, grow larger and larger day by day. There have been some statements in the press suggesting that the rate of inflation has slowed and that the scheme is working. I suggest seriously that those figures are illusory, and that if there has been any slowing down it has been at the expense of the farmers who receive lower prices for their produce, and at the expense of the companies that are going out of business at fire sale prices across this country because of the program put in place by the government, and because there are very few areas of the Canadian economy that are allowed to fluctuate freely any longer. There will be an even lower percentage of the economy that will be able to fluctuate in any way. The program that is before us will not assist very much in that regard.

I would like to bring to the attention of the minister one example of the kind of frustrations that have been brought to my notice. I have here an invoice from a hospital in my constituency. On January 19, 1976, it had an invoice for a shipment of Macbick flasks, 3,000 ml. 12 at $87.90. On February 19, 1976, it had an invoice for Macbick flasks, 3,000 ml. 12 at $182. It is at that point that it raised the matter with the Anti-Inflation Review Board. The reply was that the company employed fewer than 500 people and therefore does not come under the guidelines of the Anti-Inflation Board, so nothing can be done about this.

One hopes that possibly what we are doing under Bill C-89 will provide the Anti-Inflation Review Board with an opportunity to bring some equity here because this is the missing element in the approach taken by the government. I am not an economist, but when the program was announced I heard it would be restricted to those corporations that employ 500 employees or more and it struck me then that there was not a shred of hope that the program could succeed on that basis. I believed that it would only be a matter of time until we were presented with the bill that is before us today because nothing as inequitable as that can hope to succeed.

But the government in all its efforts has endeavoured to make the suggestion that it was really going after big business, even though it has been in the hands of big business for a long time. There was a hope in the announcement that some popularity could be bought at the expense of the larger corporations, but in these days of automation a great deal of manufacturing can be done with far fewer than 500 employees.

There was a false hope that the government was really going to take some firm action and do something about inflation. We know that initially the response across the country was good, and that in the year during which the former minister of finance endeavoured to persuade the various sectors of the Canadian economy to get together and form a consensus, public opinion began to harden on the whole question, and there was a growing realization that the program presented by the official opposition would have been the wiser choice in 1974. It is regrettable that the prime minister of this country was not the hon. member for Halifax, as he should have been.

I am concerned about the decision recently taken by the representatives of labour who were consulted during that search for consensus. I wonder if the former minister of finance had set up an all encompassing board—I do not know what power it would have had because of course it would not have had any power until some legislation had been presented to parliament—a board where all the sectors of the economy met and talked together, whether the representatives of labour would have taken the chair that was reserved for them at such a board.

I regret the intransigence and the separation of that very important part of the Canadian economy from various boards, because certainly if the scheme which has been presented to us—with all its errors and shortcomings, its inequities and confusions, with a board that does not know what it is doing and is not likely to know for many months ahead, with the emphasis on wage controls and the apparent inability to do anything about prices—is to be successful, it will require the co-operation of every sector of the Canadian economy. Only then can the inflation rate in Canada be slowed down.

I know how many institutions in this land, which are absolutely vital to the country, are bedeviled at present by inflation. All kinds of voluntary and church organizations, schools and hospitals, almost every institution that holds together the fabric of this country, are threatened now as they never have been since the great depression of the 1930's.

It is important that an equitable incomes policy be arrived at, but I do not see any hope that this method of approaching case by case individually will ever produce anything like a recognizable policy, and even as the cases are decided one after another a feeling will be left that justice has not been done. The situation will grow darker rather than lighter even if we pass Bill C-89.

Mr. Dean Whiteway (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, it is always a pleasure to follow my colleague, the hon. member for Okanagan-Kootenay (Mr. Johnston), because if you compare his delivery with that of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) you find that the Prime Minister is often found sniffing at thin air surrounding the metaphysics of political intellectualism, always dealing with peripheral issues, and never getting down to the centricity of conceptual thought. If you compare that to my colleague, the hon.

member for Okanagan-Kootenay, you find that his speech is steeped in honesty and delivered with humility and conviction.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Whiteway: I want to say to my colleague this, that although there were very few if any on the government side who were listening, there were many of us here who heard and who took heed of his speech and who took his thoughts to heart. When we are on the other side we will implement some of those truths and suggestions offered by him.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Whiteway: Here we are on a Friday afternoon. An hon. member across the way was calculating the other day the cost per minute of running the House of Commons. I think the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) should have been the first one to count the cost of debating this amendment in Bill C-89. So far as I am concerned it has been a waste of time.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): It sure is.

Mr. Whiteway: Oh, the whip on the other side has just woken up. My colleague, the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Guay), speaks well in both languages but says nothing in either.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. The only thing that I want to bring to your attention, in view of the comments made by the hon. member, is the fact that he is never here to hear us, and that is why he does not know whether we speak or not.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Whiteway: That remark is a reflection on the hon. member's attendance in the House.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): I never missed a day yet.

● (1540)

Mr. Whiteway: The hon. members' tongue flaps around more than a hundred pollack just out of the water. There is a little proverb which the people who process fish in the hon. member's riding use and which the hon. member ought to take to heart, "Even a fish would not find himself on the hook if he kept his mouth shut.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Whiteway: To get down to the matter at hand, Bill C-89, as many of my hon. colleagues have pointed out many times inside this House and outside, and during the last election campaign—and particularly my former leader—any anti-inflation program, any wage and price control program is designed for one purpose only, and that is to provide a period during which other policies can be put into place which will fight inflation and which will have an effect on the rate of inflation.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Oh, oh!

[Mr. Whiteway.]

An hon. Member: Have some manners, Joe.

Mr. Nystrom: Who is speaking here anyway?

Mr. Whiteway: If the hon. member wants a debate, I challenge him to a debate in any forum outside this House which he wants to choose, but until then I will speak, and if he has something to say I will sit down at three minutes to four and give him a chance to give his two cents worth.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Sit down.

Mr. Whiteway: I will not sit down as long as I have the mandate of the people of Selkirk, and I will meet the hon. member's candidate head on in the next election.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Whiteway: The hon. member is the whip for the other side of the House, not this side.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Nice to see you in the House for a change.

An hon. Member: Have some manners, Joe Guay.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Whiteway: If the whip on the other side will give me an opportunity, I will go on to more important things than his rudeness.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): You wouldn't know the difference.

Mr. Whiteway: I was saying that any wage and price control program should only be designed to give a chance to the government to get into place real programs which will actually get at the root of inflation. It has been pointed out by some of my hon. colleagues on this side of the House that we need a new fiscal policy. If Milton Friedman has anything to say about inflation which is worth while, it is his dictum that inflation is always and everywhere a monetary phenomenon, and that the money supply must be put in order if there is to be any other program of validity and credibility in place. There must be a responsible monetary policy. Notwithstanding the effects of an over supply of money which will cause in international trade an inverted J curve, we need a new fiscal policy.

Rather than reiterate the kinds of arguments we hear from this side of the Chamber so often it might be interesting to note why this debate is a waste of time. There sits the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) fretting and fuming that we on this side of the House are holding up Bill C-89, the amendments to Bill C-73, the anti-inflation program. Yet it was his own party which held up procedures for the amendments we proposed.

When Bill C-73 was in committee witnesses were not allowed. My party wanted to bring in public input and witnesses from all sectors of the economy, from labour, business, and small business. That was denied by the majority Liberal members on that committee. There was no advertisement or soliciting from the minister for public input. There were unusually long sessions voted on, not by this side but by the majority government side. The committee would not adjourn until the bill was railroaded through committee. Had the Liberal members taken their time and listened to what we were saying they would not have to be back in this Chamber with these amendments today.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Whiteway: You cannot on one hand stifle the opposition and on the other hand say that you want co-operation when you find out in the end that the opposition really had something to say and was right.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Whiteway: However, the thrust of my remarks is to centre on the morality of the anti-inflation program and these amendments. Why is it that by legislation Canadians have to adhere to a guideline of 8 per cent or 10 per cent with reference to their incomes? Why is it that wages are controlled and yet the services offered by all levels of government are not within the confines of this legislation? It is morally wrong to lock in the incomes of Canadians and on the other hand to let all levels of government, particularly the federal government, remain free of controls. We are talking about the expenditures of the federal government. Hon. members opposite stand in their places bursting with pride and announce that this year the spending of the federal government will be up only between 16 per cent and 20 per cent, yet the costs at all levels of government, particularly the federal government, are passed on to every taxpayer in this country and are at least double the increase allowed the average income for the average Canadian.

Why is it that Manitoba Hydro is allowed to go up 20 per cent, school taxes by 20 per cent, all property taxes by 20 per cent, gas by 25 per cent, and yet incomes are allowed to increase only 10 per cent, and that is supposed to be enough money to pay for all these things?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Whiteway: Where is the morality of the government when it expects this kind of schoolboy arithmetic to make any sense to ordinary Canadians in Manitoba? If I had one single criticism written to me more than any other by people in my riding and all over Manitoba it was that they cannot understand how they can make ends meet when the government passes on all these costs and yet their incomes are locked in by legislation at the 10 per cent level.

I want to allow some time for others to wrap up the debate, and we have only ten minutes left. Out of courtesy—which is something the whip on the other side does not understand—I will wind up my remarks by saying that if I asked the Minister of Finance or the government to resign, I would not expect them to do so, but I can tell the minister one thing, and that is that the people of this country not only want inflation wrestled to the ground but they want him wrestled right out of office.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the courtesy of the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Whiteway) in cutting his remarks short so I might say just a word in this important debate.

It is not astonishing that the matter is back before the House because the need for an amendment asking for an extension of the coverage of this operation was quite clear from the time the government first brought in controls because it brought them in in an incorrect fashion. Everyone said that an incomes policy should cover everyone. It should be universal, fair, and should have started with a 90-day freeze. We now have the statement of a former minister who, presumably, was responsible for some of this program, saying in retrospect that that is the way it should have been started. The fact that it did not happen that way means we are back with the kind of amendment we are talking about today. I expect that as time goes by we will find there will be further amendments as the government finds that the way in which it has approached this program is not working.

A couple of days ago the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald), speaking in this debate, seemed to suggest that controls will be instrumental in curbing rising expectations and that they are capable of solving this country's inflationary difficulties. I say to him, as many others have said—and this should be repeated constantly—that controls will not solve inflation. They cause distortions in the economy and inequities, and we are reaping the results today of some of those inequities in terms of the response of the labour movement of this country to the way in which the controls program has been operating.

If the government had followed the advice of the opposition, and of most economists who have spoken on the subject, and adopted an across-the-board freeze, many of the problems we are seeing at present would have been avoided. I rather hoped, when the present Minister of Finance was appointed, to see an improvement in the country's economic policies. I thought no one could be as bad as the previous minister of finance. However, having heard the present minister speak, and read his speeches, it seems to me that we are not yet out of the woods.

I find it absolutely astonishing that the Minister of Finance should have spent considerable time accusing the opposition of lacking consistency in its approach to the controls program. Does the government not realize that controls, like any other economic policy, must be designed to solve a specific problem? In some circumstances controls are not proper and correct; in some circumstances they are. The position of the Minister of Finance that, regardless of economic circumstances, we shall face controls for another one and a half or two years, is fraught with difficulty.

I am also worried because the minister is still talking about a trace-off between inflation and unemployment. Surely if one thing has become clear in the last two or three years in the developed countries of the world it is this: the trade-off between unemployment and inflation does not exist within reasonable limits.

We know that Canada's economic policies have been bad. Nobody can be proud of a no-growth year, double digit inflation—it is getting slightly better now—and 7 per cent unemployment. When you say that there is less inflation in the United States and hear the minister respond, "Yes, but their unemployment rate is up," you know the Government of Canada still believes in the old trade-off principle, a principle rejected all over the world because it is not valid.

It was also startling to hear the Minister of Finance say that we should cavalierly adopt an expansionary policy and not worry about deficits. If there is one thing that is certain and on which there is almost total agreement, it is that the cause of inflation in western industrialized democracies is the enormous deficits governments have continued to run. The Minister of Finance seems to suggest that when members of my party, and economists, say that our long term goal should be a balanced budget, without which there will be no recovery, our approach is reactionary. Unless the government realizes that it must balance expenditures against revenues, we are in for a lot of inflation for a long time.

We have 50 per cent more inflation than the United States because we have not introduced the right monetary policies and have done nothing about our deficit. That is why we suffer from our present inflation. The view that we shall solve the country's inflation with this ill-conceived, poorly run incomes policy, and not with the proper fiscal and monetary policies, is most discouraging.

In his last speech the minister quoted the Governor of the Bank of Canada. That governor came before the parliamentary committee in the spring of 1973 saying that we do not need any sort of incomes policy to restrain our economy. That same governor was in favour of an expansionary policy, when everybody said we needed a policy of contraction. That same Governor of the Bank of Canada today is talking about a roughly 10 per cent expansion in our money supply, when the United States is talking about a 2 per cent expansion of its money supply. It is regrettable that the Minister of Finance should depend at this time on advice of that sort.

It is apparent that the economic outlook for Canada in the next year or so is dismal because the government is again saying, as it always has said, that what happens here depends on what happens in other countries.

As we approach four o'clock let me say this: the remarks of the Minister of Finance made the day before yesterday reveal that there is no change in the way the Government of Canada is approaching economic policy, no change in its understanding of the fundamental causes of inflation in the country. There is no evidence that it recognizes that high interest rates are no solution to inflation. We are still clinging to the old trade-off idea, to the theory that you can trade off inflation against unemployment. Therefore the economic prospects of the country in the immediate future are dim indeed—unless we can reduce our deficits, borrow less through the public treasury and introduce sound fiscal policy. Otherwise inflation will continue. We may be pleased at the recent drop in inflation rates, caused by what happened recently in the agricultural food industry, but the point is that it was an aberration. Statistics show that we shall face a difficult time for the balance of the fiscal year.

Many hon. members were discouraged last Thursday when they heard the Minister of Finance speak on this bill. We had hoped for something better, for more understanding. We lived through the difficult times of the former minister of finance, and thought there would be some improvement. But what the minister said on Thursday was most discouraging. May I call it four o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

[Mr. Gillies.]

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Earlier when we discussed procedure with respect to the bill we are debating there was some indication from the opposition of an agreement to complete debating this bill today and vote on it on Monday, subject of course to disposing of the argument raised by the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert). The hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies) called it four o'clock; apparently he received no communication from the opposition House leader.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order too. According to my understanding, House leaders today discussed the length of the debate. I understand that the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) raised a point of order. The Chair reserved decision on the point of order until this first day of next week. We therefore undertook not to debate this matter beyond four o'clock. I cannot presume what the Chair will decide with respect to the point of order. At any rate that was the understanding, and the hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies) called it four o'clock in accordance with the undertaking.

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, with respect, that is not my understanding of the exchange which took place. It took place in the House and will be recorded in today's Hansard, which hon. members can consult. If there is to be some adjustment in the terminology used by the opposition House leader, perhaps he may wish to make that adjustment.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I rise on the same point of order. I do not think the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Blais) should press so hard and be indiscreet in the matter. Thus far matters between House leaders have gone along well. I want to maintain that relationship. I suggest the hon. member is doing nothing to help it.

OBJECTIONS TO COMMISSION REPORT RESPECTING QUEBEC

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is also my duty to inform the House that an objection signed by the hon. members for Laval (Mr. Roy), Charlevoix (Mr. Lapointe), Lévis (Mr. Guay), Matane (Mr. De Bané), Portneuf (Mr. Bussières), Chambly (Mr. Loiselle), LaSalle-Émard-Côte Saint-Paul (Mr. Campbell), Labelle (Mr. Dupras), Hamilton Mountain (Mr. MacFarlane) and Lincoln (Mr. Andres) has been filed with me pursuant to section 20 of the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act, to the report of the Electoral Boundaries Commission for the Province of Quebec.

Another objection signed by the hon. members for Westmount (Mr. Drury), Lachine-Lakeshore (Mr. Blaker), Verdun (Mr. Mackasey), Maisonneuve-Rosemont (Mr. Joyal), LaSalle-Émard-Côte Saint-Paul (Mr. Campbell), Laval (Mr. Roy), Dollard (Mr. Goyer), Saint-Jean (Mr. Smith), Saint-Michel (Miss Bégin) and Portneuf (Mr. Bussières) has been filed with me pursuant to section 20 of the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act, chapter E-2, R.S.C., 1970, to the report of the Electoral Boundaries Commission for the Province of Quebec.

Another objection signed by the hon. members for Charlevoix (Mr. Lapointe), Portneuf (Mr. Bussières), Laval (Mr. Roy), Matane (Mr. De Bané), Lévis (Mr. Guay), Chambly (Mr. Loiselle), Ottawa-Vanier (Mr. Gauthier), Argenteuil-Deux-Montagnes (Mr. Fox), York West (Mr. Fleming) and Glengarry-Prescott-Russell (Mr. Ethier) has been filed with me pursuant to section 20 of the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act, chapter E-2, R.S.C., 1970, to the report of the Electoral Boundaries Commission for the Province of Quebec.

Another objection signed by the hon. members for Berthier-Maskinongé (Mr. Yanakis), Beauharnois-Salaberry (Mr. Laniel), Saint-Boniface (Mr. Guay), Nipissing (Mr. Blais), La Salle-Émard-Côte Saint-Paul (Mr. Campbell), Saint-Jacques (Mr. Guilbault), Maisonneuve-Rosemont (Mr. Joyal), Matane (Mr. De Bané), Chambly (Mr. Loiselle), Charlevoix (Mr. Lapointe) and Labelle (Mr. Dupras) has been filed with me pursuant to section 20 of the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act, to the report of the Electoral Boundaries Commission for the Province of Quebec.

Emergency Telephone Number

[English]

If the House agrees, I suggest we follow past practice and print the text of these six objections as appendices to this day's Votes and Proceedings. Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. With all of these objections being filed, I should like, with the support of the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Guay), to indicate that we in Manitoba are registering no objections.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being four o'clock p.m., the House will now proceed to the consideration of private member's business as listed on today's order paper, namely, notices of motions, public bills, private bills.

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Agreement has been reached through the usual channels to deal with order No. 52 on page 32 of Monday's order paper, Bill C-252, standing in the name of the hon. member for Toronto-Lakeshore (Mr. Robinson).

Mr. Paproski: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it agreed that all bills preceding Bill C-52, appearing in the name of the hon. member for Toronto-Lakeshore (Mr. Robinson), be stood at the request of the government and that we proceed with that bill immediately?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' PUBLIC BILLS

NATIONAL TRANSPORTATION ACT

AMENDMENT TO ESTABLISH EMERGENCY TELEPHONE NUMBER

Mr. W. Kenneth Robinson (Toronto-Lakeshore) moved that Bill C-252, to establish a universal emergency telephone number, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to amend the National Transportation Act by adding immediately after Section 22(1)(i) the following:

(j) provide for the establishment by all Canadian telephone companies of a universal emergency reporting telephone number.

My purpose for proceeding with Bill C-252 this afternoon is not so much in the expectation that the bill will be passed, a rare occurrence in this House for legislation initiated by private members, but rather in the hope that hon. members will see fit to allow the subject matter of the bill to proceed to committee for detailed study and discussion.

Such discussion, I believe, would serve useful purpose in arousing public interest at the local community and municipal level, which is virtually a prerequisite if a universal emergency telephone number system is to be successful. Indeed this was the goal of the former member for Surrey-White Rock, Barry Mather, who for many years introduced the same type of bill we are debating today. He was known as a member who introduced legislation not so much in the expectation that it would be adopted, but as a prod to the appropriate officials through debate in the House of Commons to move more quickly. On the subject of a universal emergency telephone number, more prodding is needed and, in this regard, I am pleased to take up where the former member left off.

The establishment of a single emergency number through which people can summon police, fire or ambulance help in any city, not only in Canada but in all of North America, and progress in the United States has been very impressive, would be a very important step in the field of public safety. The idea is not new.

An article in the New York Times of Saturday, January 13, 1968, by David Burnham, entitled "U.S. Code Planned for Phoning Help" reads in part as follows:

A plan to establish a national emergency telephone number—911—with which police, fire and ambulance services could be summoned from any telephone in the United States was announced yesterday by the American Telephone and Telegraph Company.

Under the plan, a person needing emergency help would dial 911. His call would be switched to a unified dispatching office established in each community by the police, fire and other emergency services, such as hospitals, and appropriate help would be sent.

The establishment of such a number was recommended last year by the President's Crime Commission.

At least one other country, Britain, already has a simple three-digit number—999—with which to summon emergency help.

Almost since its inception, the telephone has been the primary means for reporting an emergency. For years, people have been either dialing the number of a required safety agency or going through an operator for help. Of course, such methods have had inherent disadvantages.

In an emergency, dialing "zero" for the operator or finding the number of a particular agency involves several steps. A call to a telephone company operator requires a second call by the operator to an emergency agency, and this involves time. Fluctuations in the volume of traffic handled by operators sometimes can delay the immediate response to a call. Also, unless one has a keen memory or a handy reference, there is an unavoidable delay in finding the number for an agency.

To anyone who has required emergency assistance, the number of minor problems and nuisances which can make the situation very agonizing are well known. Perhaps just finding a telephone book can be difficult. Often attempting to pick out which police or fire number should be used, in a list of many, requires an in-depth knowledge of municipal boundaries, something many long time residents do not have, let alone visitors. Of course, there is the problem of the pay phone, difficult enough when the person trying to call first had to find a ten cent coin, doubly so now when you need two such coins. Finally, there are the numbers themselves each with a different mind-cracking combination of seven digits, almost guaranteeing that nobody will be able to remember them when they need them most.

I believe the value of one emergency telephone number is obvious. The existence of a single emergency telephone number makes it quicker and easier for anyone to acquire emergency assistance. The three digit code "911" was chosen because it is a brief and easily remembered number, and because it is compatible with the long range numbering plans and switching configurations of the telephone companies. It has now been reserved as a universal emergency number so that there will be one standard North American emergency service code.

The 911 number is designed to be used, at no charge to the calling party, for direct reporting of emergencies to an answering bureau serving a given area. The answering bureau is staffed and controlled by the major emergency agencies in the community—fire, police, and ambulance services.

The 911 service provides for a faster response to time. The centralized answering bureau where 911 calls are handled, is staffed by specialized personnel who know how to react. Priority calls can be identified and the proper agency sent out on call. An additional and often overlooked benefit is that by co-ordinating all emergency services in the one bureau a community can collect data and analyse the effectiveness of its emergency services and take immediate steps to correct any deficiencies.

The successful implementation of the single emergency telephone number systems has produced a growing awareness of 911 by many communities in North America. I mentioned the great progress which has been made in this regard south of the border. There are now more than 900 "911" systems operating in the United States, ranging in size from 2,000 to 8,000,000 telephones and estimated to be serving more than 30,000,000 people in all.

As for Canada, progress has been steady if not so noticeable. In 1959 Winnipeg became the first North American city with a three-digit emergency reporting system when it cut over to 999. Brandon has a similar service also utilizing the 999 code. Both of these communities have plans under way to convert to 911. Now there are eight operational 911 systems in the communities of Calgary, Edmonton, Lethbridge and Red Deer in Alberta; London and Kitchener-Waterloo, Ontario; Fredericton, New Brunswick, and St. John's, Newfoundland.

I do not feel that a single emergency telephone number system is the be-all and end-all in the field of public safety. It is only one part, and there are a number of problems which still must be resolved. Perhaps the most important of these problems relates to municipal responsibility.

The concept of 911 is a new idea for most local governments. For the first time, the total emergency resources of a community must be coordinated into a total communications network. This is not achieved by simply changing over to a new telephone number. When a municipality considers 911 it must evaluate the existing procedures and systems for handling emergency calls and be prepared to tackle two basic problems.

First, jurisdictional boundaries of emergency agencies seldom coincide with either telephone exchange boundaries or municipal boundaries, but to avoid confusion agencies must be prepared to serve all those within an individual exchange, or in exchanges having local calling with a core exchange where they may not have jurisdiction. Second, all three major emergency services should be included—police, fire, ambulance. Sometimes individual agencies are reluctant to change their autonomous status because agency administrators may consider command and control of their field resources as a process too important to be shared or delegated to another agency. But regardless of individual agency reluctance to cooperate, an agreement has to be reached at the local level on the establishment of a common answering arrangement.

Free emergency calling and 911 are naturally associated since both provide the public with improved telephone service in time of emergency. The 911 system in London, Ontario, has 73 yellow call boxes located strategically around the city. The call box caller picks up the receiver and gets the answering bureau immediately. No dialing is necessary.

Bell Canada is converting coin telephones across Quebec and Ontario to allow free emergency calling. "Dial-tone first" for coin telephones will enable the user to have access to the operator without a coin in case of an emergency.

In a community offering 911 service the calling party will be able to dial 911 without the deposit when "dial-tone first" is provided. The time-saving advantage is obvious; it will make every public pay telephone a signal box.

Technical innovations and the concentration of sophisticated telephone equipment can greatly enhance emergency services. Techniques are available on order like, "call-hold-and-trace" which holds up the line, the 911 caller uses; the line is frozen and there is a "ring-back" which allows the emergency bureau to ring back a caller. With these features, false alarms and errors can be virtually eliminated thereby increasing public confidence and respect.

I know some will argue that because of jurisdictional and technical problems the subject matter of this bill would best be left with a particular department which has the appropriate expertise to study this subject, rather than to a committee of the House composed of laymen. However, I believe this is an important public matter, one in which the public should have some input. All too often services and programs are structured and designed behind closed doors, and the intended beneficiaries have no say until the services or programs are operational.

There are a number of questions, such as the role of the telephone company and the role of the federal government in the implementation of a universal emergency telephone number, which a committee of the House could and should look into. It may be suggested that this legislation should more properly be an amendment to the Railway Act. However, regardless of this argument the subject matter could still be sent to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications.

I therefore urge hon. members to allow the subject matter of the bill to proceed to committee.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to commend the hon. member for Toronto-Lakeshore (Mr. Robinson) for bringing this bill forward. In my own view the House could well give the bill second reading and send it to the standing committee. Its sponsor seems to have some perception, however, that this is not likely to happen, so if there is a motion to send the subject matter to the committee that motion would have our support.

I would also like to thank the hon. member for giving credit to my former colleague, Mr. Barry Mather, who was the member for Surrey-White Rock, for having made this proposal among a number of imaginative ideas he presented to the House from time to time. Since I am in a grateful mood I thank the hon. member also for drawing attention to the fact for some years we have had a 999 system in Winnipeg and also in Brandon. The hon. member is correct in saying the Manitoba telephone system is prepared to make the change to 911 if the proposal can be accepted universally throughout Canada.

As the hon. member pointed out, this is not the be all and end all of public safety, but it is a move in the right direction. I think the proposal he makes does create a situation in which something could be done to establish this universal emergency telephone number. I commend him for the part he has played, I have given him our support, and we hope that during this hour either the bill or the subject matter will be sent to the standing committee.

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise in this debate, as I did back on September 14, 1973, when the then member for Surrey-White Rock, Mr. Mather, advanced his bill for consideration by the House. At that time I said something to the effect that the principle of the bill was so sound in terms of public safety that it ought not to founder on the rocks of any technological difficulty.

I understand there are some jurisdictional difficulties with respect to the measure in terms of the interface of the government with the regional municipalities, and perhaps provincial authorities in the laying out of areas. That is my recollection of some correspondence I have had. This is not to say parliament ought not to take action with respect to the bill, and along with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) I believe that if the bill does not go to the committee then the subject matter should go before the committee for discussion.

I want to say something else with respect to my old friend the hon. member for Toronto-Lakeshore (Mr. Robinson), who advanced the bill today. I have known him for many years. I trust his friends on that side of the House will not hold that against him, and I do not want my hon. friends to hold it against me, either.

If this bill goes to committee today, then perhaps the hon. member will have established a record for himself in that he will have been successful with two bills in the same session of parliament, under a government that has not been known to allow such bills to proceed.

In any event, I think the principle of the bill is sound. The technology is available. There may be some jurisdictional difficulty in terms of the telephone system, but I am informed that the difficulty is not insurmountable. I think the bill ought to go to committee and I commend the hon. member for advancing the principle of the bill. It is a bill which, by the way, has been advanced on other occasions by members of the opposition, but without the same success that I hope he will enjoy today.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, I want to join with other members in commending the hon. member for Toronto-Lakeshore (Mr. Robinson) on bringing the question of the adoption across Canada of a universal telephone number before the House. I believe it was Bell Canada that in 1968 took the initiative and chose a number to be set aside to serve the whole of North America for emergency use only, the number 911. The value of such a number is obvious. In an emergency people sometimes have difficulty finding the proper number to call. The idea of a central switchboard that would direct calls to the police, firefighting services, drug intervention centres, and poison control centres is a very good one.

Any legislation that we would pass would primarily apply to Ontario, Quebec, and British Columbia in view of the jurisdiction we have over the principal telephone systems in those three provinces. Naturally legislation would have to be passed relating to other provinces that have their own telephone systems. I understand that most telephone companies in Canada are co-operating completely in establishing such a system. For example, Bell has new equipment in place to accommodate this single number emergency call.

There is one area in my riding where I hope within the next 12 months new equipment will be put in place to handle not only emergency calls but regular telephone calls. I refer to the Silver Water exchange at the west end of Manitoulin Island where, when equipment is out of service, a person has to drive 25 or 30 miles to re-establish contact, let alone call someone such as a doctor in cases of emergency. I am glad to know that Bell Canada is co-operating, and I hope they will continue to co-operate to the extent of establishing good, workable equipment in all areas, but especially in those rural areas of Canada that still lack proper telephone service.

I understand there is a problem with the bill as presently framed in that it should be an amendment to the Railway Act rather than the National Transportation Act. At the hon. member's suggestion perhaps the subject matter of the bill could be sent to committee rather than the bill itself, if it be the case that the provisions of the National Transportation Act are inappropriate.

To make adoption of this number successful the co-operation of the municipalities and regional governments would be required. It is not merely a case of passing federal legislation approving adoption of this number; there would have to be co-operation with the various municipal agencies such as fire departments, police, drug and poison control centres, and so on. However, any leadership that we would give at the federal level would surely only expedite matters.

I understand that the city of Vancouver has already ordered equipment to handle this universal emergency number, and installation of such equipment is also under consideration in the Cranbrook area. In Alberta, Calgary, Edmonton and Red Deer already have this kind of service under consideration. There are no cities in Saskatchewan that have this service available, but the Saskatchewan telephone system is prepared to offer the service if the municipalities will make a commitment. Negotiations were under way to serve Regina and Saskatoon in 1973.

The hon. member for Toronto-Lakeshore mentioned that in Winnipeg and Brandon this emergency service is available. In the province of Ontario it has been available in London and Kitchener, covering the services of the fire department, police, poison control centre, ambulance dispatch and so on. So some progress is being made, and any leadership given at the federal level would only speed the process across the country. It would also clear away any additional legislative red tape that might be holding things up. I conclude with those few comments. The hon. member has my support in bringing the matter before parliament so that it can be fully aired.

Mr. Rod Blaker (Lachine-Lakeshore): Mr. Speaker, may I commence my remarks by saying that the hon. member for Toronto-Lakeshore (Mr. Robinson) has, in my view, introduced an excellent bill. I disagree with some of the criticisms of it made in various documents made available to us.

What interests me most about this bill is that we have reached a point where a good idea is being lost because of the way our system works. Virtually every Friday afternoon we go through this ritual. The hon. member who proposed the bill has rather limited hopes of it ever reaching the transport committee. He is not quite sure whether it will be a member of the opposition or a member of this party who will contribute to talking it out. I am not quite sure of that either, but possibly we might devolve that duty upon the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Communications (Mr. Fleming) whom I see returning to his seat in a fit of panic lest he is called upon to stand up within the next few minutes to speak to the bill.

The point I want to make is that we have gone beyond common sense in terms of this ritual we use to dispose of private members' bills. Unless we can be assured through the means of the Procedure and Organization Committee that this type of destruction of a good idea is stopped and an end is put to the abuse of the proceedings of this House in this way, I suspect at least in my own case this will be one of the last times I will ever again contribute to the disposal of a private members' bill by talking it out or even using up the available time.

I want to point out for the benefit of hon. members, who may have some interest in how we deal with this system, precisely what happens. Every session something like 150 or 200 private members' bills are put down by members. About 50 of these are drawn out of a barrel in the Clerk's office. Those 50 bills are put forward in the order drawn and are brought forward for first reading. Of the 50 I do not recall the actual number but I would doubt that more than three or four ever reach committee. Right from the start no distinction is made between bills that are improperly drawn and perfectly good bills.

If one looks at the British system one will see the contrast. What happens there is that when a member's name comes up or is drawn, he is entitled to go to the government and look for such legislation as might be supported by the government. Then he can go to the community and invite the community or the country to put forward ideas which he might be able to incorporate in that particular piece of legislation. What happens at the end of the process is that he has access to the government and the departments thereof in the preparation of his bill, instead of what we have today.

The hon. member for Toronto-Lakeshore has put down a perfectly worthy bill. I would refer to the fact that a similar bill was brought forward a few years ago by Mr. Mather of the New Democratic Party. Instead of the government being of any assistance to the hon. member we find that the government, both in the departmental sense and in the conduct of its members in this House, does everything possible, including the provision of argument against this bill, to stop it.

An hon. Member: They do not have to.

Mr. Blaker: The hon. member says that they do not have to. The difficulty we are faced with is that naturally for the opposition it has become an amusing tradition to suggest that all such bills go to committee. The committee system and the House are already so jammed with legislation, because of the terrific slowing down of the pace by the opposition, that additional legislation cannot be handled.

An hon. Member: That is not the reason.

Mr. Blaker: I do not intend to instruct the hon. member, but this is common knowledge. The hon. member knows full well that the function of the opposition is to delay legislation. I would suggest to him that he not shake his head, because that is precisely what he is here for.

Let us look at some of the benefits of this piece of legislation we have before us, and some of its history. This 911 system was made the subject of an executive decision of Bell Telephone throughout North America and of British Columbia Telephone back in 1968.

Mr. De Bané: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Matane on a point of order.

Mr. De Bané: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) is drinking a glass of milk, and I think he is not giving a good example. It is not the place for it.

An hon. Member: He just hid it in the drawer. He has to withdraw behind the curtains.

[English]

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): It is only tea and I am halfway out of the Chamber.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I think the point of order is valid. Really the hon. member whose name was mentioned should withdraw a little further behind the curtains.

[Translation]

Mr. Prud'homme: Mr. Speaker, on this same point of order, I would like to point out to you that there is not any representative from the NDP in the House at the present time.

[English]

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): On the same point of order, Mr. Speaker, I should like to bring to your attention the fact that even though the hon. member might have been drinking something other than water, he is in this House all day every day, and he is also a Manitoban and a good parliamentarian, so I side with him.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I must say to hon. members that it is not the responsibility of the Chair to take a roll call of the House. I recognize again the hon. member for Lachine-Lakeshore (Mr. Blaker).

Mr. Blaker: That was a very interesting interlude, Mr. Speaker. I am sorry the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) has been so heavily attacked for drinking tea in the House when we all know that not too long ago in the days of Sir John A. Macdonald it was the habit to replace the water in the glass with another fluid equally clear, but more powerful than tea. However, those days are gone.

I want to stress what I said earlier about the validity of this bill. One of the first arguments we get against the bill is that it is redundant in that the principal telephone carriers that are subject to federal jurisdiction, Bell Canada and B.C. Telephone, already have expressed willingness to co-operate with the municipalities in this regard. That kind of argument further suggests that if we were to pass legislation in the face of their willingness this would somehow irk the two telephone companies and that it would be better if we did not pass the legislation because we would get the 911 system faster. I do not think it is very difficult to point out not only the fallaciousness but the absolute naiveté of such a silly argument. The argument that these two companies are prepared to go into this business and therefore we ought not to pass the legislation is a completely useless argument.

The next argument we get against the bill is that there are jurisdictional or constitutional difficulties. Well, we cannot pass any piece of legislation in Canada without some kind of jurisdictional difficulties. I think the citizens are fed up listening to that argument, and as a member of parliament I am getting fed up with that argument.

The 911 system is a perfectly valid idea. There are 45 million Americans being served in that way now. I think a red herring is being dragged across the face of the hon. member's bill. At the very least it can be argued that the bill should be referred to the Transport Committee so that the jurisdictional aspects could be considered and reviewed. Instead of that we have this attack in which no one makes any valid representations.

The final argument I have heard—and I should mention that these arguments appeared three years ago—is that it should be under the Railway Act rather than under the National Transportation Act. That is neither here nor there. The hon. member has pointed out that nothing under the procedures of this House prevents us sending the subject matter to the relevant committee. That argument, rather interestingly, goes on to suggest that in any event the governor in council may soon be authorized by regulation to put in a 911 system. This is another insanity. If the governor in council may be authorized to put in that type of system then obviously the 911 system is valid, and obviously a solution will be found to the constitutional and jurisdictional difficulties.

What we get during the private members' hour is a situation in which a particularly good suggestion made by the hon. member for Toronto-Lakeshore now must be dealt with through a lot of circular and fallacious arguments, to the effect that the tradition has grown up that a private member's bill will not be allowed to go to committee.

● (1640)

Members may or may not be aware that the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization has recently established a sub-committee, headed I believe by the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. MacFarlane), on this subject of private members' bills. I would point out to hon. members my hope that we will adopt the British system according to which, when members come in with a good idea, instead of their own party and hon. members opposite fighting the idea, we all get together, agree it is a good idea, and send the bill in question to committee.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Go ahead and tell your colleague that.

Mr. Blaker: I just did. We have spent three years on this emergency No. 911. Going back, we find the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker)—who left the House for a moment, I suppose—spoke three years ago on September 14 on this subject. Mr. Barry Mather, who was the member for Surrey-White Rock, spoke on the same subject. The hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McRae) spoke on the subject. He raised arguments about constitutional problems.

The hon. member for Sarnia-Lambton (Mr. Cullen), now Minister of National Revenue, spoke on the subject and expressed concern about a universal emergency telephone system not being feasible without the co-operation of municipalities that must agree to consolidate in emergency services. We are hearing all this again today.

The hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert) also spoke on the subject. He said that this should be put under the Railway Act rather than the Transportation Act. We are hearing the same arguments today.

The hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Reid) spoke on the subject. He did not spend too much time on the No. 911 issue but he spent a fair amount of time trying to define what emergency is. We are hearing that again today.

None of these arguments validate the practice we have developed in the private members' hour of rejecting a bill which, on the face of it, every member who has yet spoken, has suggested we should send to committee. In the normal process, we hear members speak for 20 minutes—I did not notice the time at which I started. This means that after I conclude speaking some other member of the House will have to rise and face the unpleasant duty of having to repeat the same arguments. Than, when we come to five o'clock, if things go as they usually do 99 times out of 100, the bill will be talked out.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): How about letting it go to committee? Move the motion right now.

Mr. Blaker: That may be a good idea. The hon. member knows as I do, that the moment I sit down, another member will get to his feet and will go through the same procedure; possibly it will even be the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Communications who has been the object of some of my needling in that regard this afternoon.

I would like to conclude by saying that I think this process could change. I am hopeful that hon. members the parliamentary secretaries, as well as the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Drury) who I know takes a great deal of interest in procedural matters, will hear what I am saying and give us a reform of procedures so that ideas such as the one in the bill of the hon. member for Toronto-Lakeshore can be sent to committee and will no longer be talked out in this improper and completely silly fashion.

Some hon. Members: Question!

Mr. Marcel Prud'homme (Saint-Denis): Mr. Speaker, I will try not to be the one to which my hon. colleague from Lachine-Lakeshore (Mr. Blaker) has alluded when he spoke before me, and not to be responsible, as we say in the usual parliamentary language, for "killing" the bill, that is to try to make the discussion last till five o'clock with the result that unfortunately, the bill would be put off undefinitely.

I simply want to make some remarks and warmly congratulate my hon. colleague and friend, the hon. member for Toronto-Lakeshore (Mr. Robinson), the representative of this beautiful and great City of Toronto which, as we know, is going through a tremendous expansion in the social and economic field as well in the culinary and artistic ones. I am proud, as a Montreal representative, to take every opportunity which comes my way to consolidate a little more the friendship between the City of Montreal, one of whose riding I represent, and the City of Toronto he is representing with such dignity.

Mr. Speaker, needless to say that, Toronto—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Prud'homme: Of course my hon. colleague applauds with some delay because he has just heard my remarks, since with interpretation you have to wait a little and not talk too fast so that the nice compliments I made to the beautiful city of Toronto can arrive to the other end of the House.

Mr. Speaker, I could speak for a long time about Toronto which, as everyone knows, is certainly one of the most progressive—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I must remind the hon. member that the bill before us proposes the installation of a universal telephone number which Canadians could use in emergencies and, in my opinion, the moment is not appropriate to praise the city of Toronto or talk about the Olympics in Montreal.

Mr. Prud'homme: Mr. Speaker, I recognize that I am at fault and accept your call to order. You, who know me so well, know that I take every possible opportunity I am given in the House to try, through my remarks, whatever the subject, to show that people from another part of the country, who speak another tongue, also like to take advantage of those opportunities to indicate that there can be unity in our country. I therefore did not hesitate to go slightly beyond the subject before the House and take advantage of that opportunity.

Mr. Speaker, I do thank you for having called me to order. It is your duty to do so and you do it with so much spirit. This is one opportunity of saying so because we know presiding over this House, especially during Friday's private members' hour, is no simple task. I see nothing out of order in congratulating you in passing, while we are studying this bill.

Mr. Speaker, this bill is really serious. Unfortunately, my hon. colleague for Lachine-Lakeshore—I do not know whether there is a connotation between Lachine-Lakeshore and Toronto-Lakeshore—but he is right in saying that hon. members can take this opportunity to use it ill-advisedly, frivolously, in thoughtless remarks that have nothing to do with the subject before the House.

But as long as we will persist in this House in refusing to change the orders, and I regret that my good friend the President of the Privy Council is not in the House at the moment because I wish he could hear this, as long as we will persist, and more particularly the opposition, in refusing to change the orders of the House, we will unfortunately always be forced to study legislation such as this—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Toronto-Lakeshore (Mr. Robinson) on a point of order.

[English]

Mr. Robinson: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. In view of the fact that everybody in the House is for the bill because they realize it is an important bill, I wonder if we could not have unanimous agreement to have the bill sent to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Hon. members have heard the suggestion. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Fleming: I simply want to point out that I said "no" in case there is any question as to unanimous consent, and I hope later on to have the opportunity to address myself to the reasons why.

Some hon. Members: Filibuster.

Mr. Prud'homme: Mr. Speaker, I would like to use the other official language of this country to reassure my friend, the hon. member for Toronto-Lakeshore, that I do not intend to kill the bill. There are still a few minutes left and if the bill is killed it will not be by the hon. member for Saint-Denis.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): You are not giving it the guillotine treatment.

Mr. Prud'homme: If the hon. member from the great, beautiful island of Victoria has anything to say, I am ready at any time to sit down and listen to his views, but if he does not want to participate I do not see why he should interrupt me.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Prud'homme: It is obvious that time after time we come back with good proposals which we either suggest be sent to committee or which we kill here during these private members' hours. I was saying that as long as we refuse to change the rules of this House, I intend to use them to show, perhaps by not being too serious, how important it is now to change the rules of the House so that the House can be more productive. There is no way—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Prud'homme: I will go back to the subject matter.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The House was very understanding when the hon. member for Lachine-Lakeshore (Mr. Blaker) spoke about this aspect of the problem, but in all his comments he did succeed in expressing at least one valid opinion about the bill. I hope that the hon. member will also have the opportunity to speak about the subject of the bill before closing.

Mr. Prud'homme: I shall do so immediately, Mr. Speaker. Of course, we have all recognized the speeches that were made in 1973 on this same subject, and especially that made on September 14, 1973 by our distinguished colleague, Mr. Barry Mather, former member for Surrey-White Rock, who unfortunately no longer sits in this House. As the hon. member for Lachine-Lakeshore said, we could use nearly the same arguments today.

However, I would like to tell my hon. friend from Toronto-Lakeshore not to get discouraged. I have myself introduced the same bills for several years before the government accepted the facts and decided to enact them. I am speaking about Bill C-20, amending the Citizenship Act, which will soon be enacted, and which will, I hope, reduce from five to three years the period of residency required before becoming a Canadian citizen.

Mr. Speaker, it is obvious that among the major arguments that have been used today, there is one which is more striking, that is the one stating that we shall need the co-operation of municipal authorities. By saying municipal authorities, we mean the creatures of the provincial governments, which means that we shall therefore need the co-operation of provincial governments.

I therefore wonder why we could not deal with the provincial authorities which, in fact, are constitutionally responsible for municipalities, so that they may together find an effective way to act as quickly as possible on this excellent idea of the hon. member for Toronto-Lakeshore.

When one considers the number of bills which are at present involved as a result of the hon. member's suggestion, one realizes, for example, that the city of Calgary and the city of Edmonton, those large metropolises of the Canadian West, Lethbridge in southern Alberta, an extraordinary city which I urge all hon. members to visit some day, Red Deer in Alberta, Toronto and London in Ontario, this bastion of the great other Canadian culture—I emphasize those words—Kitchener, Waterloo, in Ontario, Fredericton in New Brunswick, St. John, all could benefit by this, which means the hon. member should not be discouraged, since the idea which had been brought to the consideration of the House in 1973 by our good and distinguished colleague from Surrey-White Rock has been gradually making its way and we are now moving in that direction.

But I would not like this initiative to be exclusively federal. I would like my hon. colleague . . . I will not say any more after that, Mr. Speaker, I would like all of us to realize that we are dealing primarily and above all with an issue under another political jurisdiction and a marvellous idea such as this one could become the centre of idle controversies. Therefore I urge him to keep fighting to broadcast this idea, which is intrinsically good, while remembering to seek federal and provincial participation. Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, since everyone seems to be for this bill but there are one or two more who want to speak, could we not have unanimous consent to sit until 5:30?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: There does not seem to be unanimous consent.

Mr. Paproski: Who said no?

Mr. Jim Fleming (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, in the events of the last few moments I am not sure who said no and who said yes to what, and where, and when. I recall saying no several times and yes several times, and I will try to sort it out later and let hon. members know on which side I was yes and on which side I was no.

I hope in the several minutes remaining that I can make it clear, as Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Communications, that while I too commend the spirit of this private member's bill, and I understand the point made by the hon. member for Lachine-Lakeshore (Mr. Blaker) about the system, the fact of the matter is that I am not convinced that it would be practical to refer the subject matter, much less the actual material, to committee. I say that for reasons which I think to some degree have already come out in debate, but principally because too often people look to the Government of Canada, the senior level of government, as the cure all for their problems.

Here is a proposal to do something which would be of real benefit to all Canadians, to establish by passage of this legislation, as put forward, an emergency number for all Canadians in Centres across our country which is not only a common number across Canada but which would be common to all North America. We have great numbers of tourists coming back and forth, but the fact is that passing this law will not mean a blamed thing as far as carrying it out and making it effective is concerned, whether we pass this on in spirit or in fact, because we have jursidiction over only four of the ten provinces in Canada, and therefore we cannot force the telephone companies in six of our ten provinces to do a blamed thing about it.

For practical purposes, discussion and bringing this subject forward are worth while. I can appreciate the frustration of the hon. member for Toronto-Lakeshore (Mr. Robinson) in not seeing something developed more quickly because of the very nature of Canada and the division of authority, but I would be very disappointed if hon. members on all sides really believed, when we have so many problems day to day in trying to explain to our constituents the misunderstanding of where authority lies for what problem, that today on this issue we would try to convince them that we can solve it through simply passing this off to committee. Mr. Speaker, may I call it five o'clock?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hour provided for the consideration of private members' business has now expired. It being five o'clock, this House stands adjourned until Monday next at 2 p.m.

At 5 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

CRIMINAL CODE

PROPOSED REFERENCE TO COMMITTEE OF REPORT OF LAW REFORM COMMISSION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the latest report of the Law Reform Commission which recommends the abolition from the Criminal Code of such offences as incest, abortion, drug offences, obscenity, pornography and acts of indecency, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander):

That this report on our criminal law be referred immediately for study to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs due to the ramifications of these proposals and the fact that the Minister of Justice has stated that he intends to introduce legislation to implement some of the Law Reform Commission's recommendations.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The presentation of such a motion pursuant to Standing Order 43 requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

SUGGESTED PUBLIC INQUIRY INTO COMPANY'S OBJECTIVES IN NEWFOUNDLAND—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, I too wish to move a motion under Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. The evidence of a deterioration in rail freight and express service in the province of Newfoundland prompts the need for an investigation into the terms of union between Canada and that province.

I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath):

That this House order a public inquiry be initiated into the CNR's future objectives to ensure adequate service in that province and to allow for the province's participation in over-all transportation policy for Canada.

Mr. Speaker: A motion under Standing Order 43 requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

SUGGESTED SETTLEMENT OF NEGOTIATIONS WITH AIRCRAFT SAFETY INSPECTORS AND CHECKING OF PILOTS' LICENCES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43 I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion on an important matter of pressing necessity.

In view of the fact that aircraft safety inspectors walked out at major airports in Ontario and Quebec last Friday as a result of a breakdown in wage negotiations and that this is a possible first step toward a nationwide work stoppage which could affect airline service, and furthermore, since the Department of Transport is aware that 11 Air Canada pilots are flying with invalid licences as a result of unauthorized company check flights, which not only contravenes section 400 of the air regulations but also creates a safety hazard, and in light of the fact that commercial airline licences are expiring at the rate of 100 per day, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Hnatyshyn):

That the President of the Treasury Board become personally involved in the negotiations between the aircraft safety inspectors and the Ministry of Transport, that the Minister of Transport take the necessary action to guarantee that no pilots are flying with invalid licences as a result of unauthorized checks and that section 400 of the air regulations is strictly enforced with no extensions.

Mr. Speaker: Before presentation of such a motion the provisions of Standing Order 43 require the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

NATIONAL DEFENCE

LOCKHEED CONTRACT—REQUEST FOR DETAILS OF CONVERSATION BETWEEN MR. REISMAN AND DEPUTY MINISTER

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence. In the telephone conversation concerning the LRPA financing which was held between the Deputy Minister of National Defence and Mr. Reisman, did Mr. Reisman suggest to Mr. Nixon how financing could be arranged?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the conversation on the telephone between the deputy minister and Mr. Reisman did concern ways in which the financing could be achieved. That was its purpose, but I do not have the details of that conversation. I expect that they discussed more than one option.

Mr. Paproski: I guess so.

Mr. McKinnon: Mr. Speaker, it is rather surprising the minister would know now, when formerly he was in ignorance about it, that they did discuss financing. I would have thought the first question he would have put to his deputy minister would have concerned the details of the conversation. Could the minister tell us if the deal suggested by Mr. Reisman is substantially the same as the arrangements the minister has proposed or is proposing to the cabinet?

Mr. Richardson: Mr. Speaker, the Deputy Minister has made clear to me that there were no representations made on behalf of Lockheed and that there was no attempt to persuade him to take any particular course of action. They were both looking at the matter in a very constructive way in an attempt to find a solution to the problem and achieve the purchase of the aircraft so badly required by the Canadian armed forces.

Mr. McKinnon: Mr. Speaker, could the minister in his next answer tell us who initiated the conversation between Mr. Nixon and Mr. Reisman and perhaps at that time he would clarify how he can consider a conversation, suggesting how Mr. Reisman's employer could close a contract with the government, could be anything but a representation from Mr. Reisman?

Mr. Richardson: Mr. Speaker, as I indicated previously in the House the deputy minister is not certain. He cannot recall in his own mind whether he instituted the call or whether it came from Mr. Reisman.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Richardson: But there were altogether three telephone conversations. However, I cannot confirm whether Mr. Reisman called Mr. Nixon or whether Mr. Nixon first called Mr. Reisman.

Mr. McKinnon: Mr. Speaker, would the minister undertake to seek an interview with his own deputy to find out what he and Mr. Reisman talked about and whether it was very similar to his findings?

Mr. Richardson: Well, Mr. Speaker, I have done that. I will have further conversations with the deputy minister, but I think the conversations he had with Mr. Reisman were essentially constructive. As I tried to say, they were attempting to solve a difficult problem.

[Mr. McKinnon.]

LOCKHEED CONTRACT—TERMS AND DATE OF CONTRACT WITH REISMAN AND GRANDY

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, again this question is addressed to the Minister of National Defence. In view of the answers he has just given with regard to his own lack of knowledge and, laying those answers against his statement to the House a few days ago that there was no impropriety in respect of the contract, I think at least his earlier statement implied that he had made a thorough review of the contract and his statements today indicate that he really does not know the answer with regard to any arrangements. Could the minister inform the House at what date Lockheed retained Reisman and Grandy Limited, and the terms and conditions of their employment by Lockheed, particularly the size and the terms or particulars of any retainer that was paid to them and the financial arrangements that may have been made between Lockheed and Reisman and Grandy in view of the importance of these representations of which the minister is not now so sure?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, with respect may I say that I think those are questions which should be asked either of Lockheed or Reisman and Grandy. I do not ask the Lockheed Company who their lawyers are or what arrangements they have with a lawyer or any other professional.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): The minister is quite right. That should be asked of the company. I suggest he should ask them.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): In view of the ongoing relationship between this government and Reisman and Grandy, this House is entitled to know when the firm of Reisman and Grandy was established, and when it was retained by Lockheed. Was it before or after the date on which the government announced its decision to buy the LRPA. I submit that the government ought to answer these questions.

Mr. Richardson: Mr. Speaker, I have already made it clear that the government's decisions in principle to purchased the long-range patrol aircraft was made in November. To the best of my knowledge, the telephone conversations between my deputy minister and Mr. Reisman, all took place in the new year, in January.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): A final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. The extent of the minister's knowledge about this contract disturbs the House, Mr. Speaker. Will the minister review in Hansard my previous supplementary question to him, in which I asked when the firm of Reisman and Grandy was established, and when it was first retained by Lockheed. I asked this because there are many unanswered questions concerning relations between the firm and the government.

LOCKHEED CONTRACT—POSSIBILITY OF OBTAINING DETAILS FROM UNITED STATES CONCERNING BRIBES

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I, too, address my question to the Minister of National Defence. Last Thursday, when I questioned him about pay-offs by Lockheed connected with the purchase of aircraft, he suggested I was inviting him to engage in a kind of witch hunt and that there ought to be no investigation until there is something definite to investigate. I understand that the minister is seeking information in writing from Washington. Can we now assume that there is something definite to investigate?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, of course, we are holding conversations with senior officials of the United States government. As indicated previously, we want their assurances about the financial stability of the Lockheed company. We are also talking about industrial benefits to Canada and about moving production tooling and equipment to this country. We want assurances on those things. As I said only last week, I wanted written confirmation from the United States government before proceeding with this contract, but I did not say that, in those discussions, we were trying to find out if improper payments had been made. We are dealing with at least three departments of the United States government and if improper payments have been made, or there is something about which they want to tell us, I am sure they will tell us. But that is not the basis on which we are approaching them, and not the kind of information for which we are asking.

Mr. Brewin: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Will the minister follow the procedures suggested by the American authorities, namely, apply to the Department of Justice for full information about this matter, including, if there is such information, information relating to any impropriety in Canada. Will he ask for all documents to be made available to the Canadian Department of Justice, so that after they have been studied the Canadian people can be assured there is nothing to be concerned about? I suggest that is important.

Mr. Richardson: Mr. Speaker, perhaps it might help if I were to quote from a press article, something I do not do often. It might be helpful in these circumstances. According to the Toronto Star:

> A legislative aide to Senator Frank Church, whose Senate subcommittee is investigating the Lockheed bribery scandals, has been kept busy lately dealing with queries from foreign correspondents anxious to know if their countries were involved in bribe attempts.
> 'There is no evidence,' the aide said yesterday, 'that Canada was the subject of any bribe attempts to sell airplanes. Or Australia. Or any Commonwealth country, for that matter.'

● (1420)

LOCKHEED CONTRACT—POSSIBILITY OF REDUCING COST BY PURCHASING AIRFRAMES

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, the minister would be well advised to get it officially and not just from a single Senator, however distinguished he may be—in fact, an aide to the Senator. That is very inadequate evidence to deal with a billion dollar contract. I want to switch a bit. Has the minister given consideration to the prices paid by Australia for Lockheed airframes and has he considered whether the same method of dealing with the problem might cut down the overall cost substantially?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Yes, Mr. Speaker. I am certain that we can cut the cost at any time and have an aircraft that does not do the job. When this aircraft has been completed, we will have the most effective long-range patrol aircraft in service anywhere in the world. I might say, as a result of my recent visits to Norway and with our NATO partners, this aircraft is needed in the North Atlantic. I think we should get on with this purchase.

POSSIBILITY OF ADVANTAGEOUS POLICY FOR INDUSTRIAL MILK PRODUCERS

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I want to put a question to the Minister of Agriculture.

Given the statement just made today on Parliament Hill by the minister to the milk producers who had come to meet him, in which he told these milk producers, and through them all Canadian milk producers, that he agreed with them that they should continue to produce milk on a profitable basis, can the minister tell the House if he is expecting sure profits for these industrial milk producers during the dairy year 1976-77?

[English]

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, if they produce within the quota allocated to them, they will have a profit.

[Translation]

Mr. Beaudoin: Mr. Speaker, I want to ask a supplementary question.

Since part of the surplus of fluid milk ends up as industrial milk and thus increases the industrial milk surplus, could the minister tell the House if he accepts that this surplus from fluid milk producers be penalized in the same way as the surplus produced by industrial milk producers?

[English]

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, we have a supply management committee made up of producer organizations from the Atlantic to the Pacific. They are the ones who decide on how the quota should be allocated. I want to make it clear that I said outside the House what I said in this House before, there is a limit to production. They should not produce a product that is going to waste.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Oral Questions

LOCKHEED CONTRACT—DATE MINISTER AWARE LOCKHEED RETAINED REISMAN AND GRANDY

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, my question to the Minister of National Defence is supplementary to that asked by the hon. member for Victoria. Notwithstanding the affirmation the minister made in the House on March 22 when he said in reply to the hon. member for Victoria that no payments or commissions had been made by Lockheed to any Canadian, and we now know that that statement was not true because of the fact that they retained the firm of Reisman and Grandy—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. McGrath: —when did the minister determine that this firm, representing two former senior deputy ministers, was retained by Lockheed and what did he do when he came into possession of that knowledge?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, as I believe I indicated in an earlier answer, I first heard that the firm of Reisman and Grandy had been engaged by the Lockheed Company sometime last month. In other words, it was fairly recently. When one refers, Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member did in his question, to payments and tries to compare a payment for a professional service with an improper payment or a bribe, I think we should be very clear we are talking about two different things. Of course, Lockheed makes payments. I suppose they pay their hotel bills when they are in Canada, too.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Richardson: No doubt, as other corporations are entitled to do, they engage professional advice, whether lawyers, accountants or consultants. This is quite different from bribery and I think that should be made very clear.

LOCKHEED CONTRACT—INQUIRY WHETHER REISMAN AND GRANDY MADE PAYMENTS TO INDIVIDUALS

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): When the minister did learn that this firm was representing the Lockheed company did he then contact the partners in the firm, given the public knowledge that the Lockheed company has been involved in pay-offs in other countries in connection with similar contracts? Did the minister contact Messrs. Reisman and Grandy to determine whether or not they had made any payments for any reason whatesoever to any individual in Canada, and, if not, why not?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I think we are dealing with two separate issues. There is the question whether or not senior civil servants should become consultants shortly after their retirement. The House has addressed itself to that issue and the Prime Minister has responded. Until that question is further defined and guidelines have been established, it is not practical or appropriate for me to suggest that the Lockheed company cannot use consulting services any more than any of the other major corporations which are clients of this firm and other consulting firms.

[Mr. Whelan.]

Mr. McGrath: Since this particular firm happens to consist of two former senior deputy ministers—the deputy minister of finance and the deputy minister of industry, trade and commerce—and since it now represents the interests of the Lockheed company in Canada and is involved with the Government of Canada in determining a way out of the financing difficulties, is it now the minister's intention to meet with the principals of this firm to determine exactly what their interest is with the Lockheed company and what their interest is with any other Canadians, including those in the Government of Canada?

Mr. Richardson: No, Mr. Speaker. I do not intend to talk to this company about all the other arrangements they have with other clients. There is a long list of Canadian corporations which are clients of this firm. I do not consider it my job to talk with the company about that.

Some hon. Members: Oh!

LOCKHEED CONTRACT—POSSIBILITY CONTRACT WITH MR. CRUTCHLOW DELAYING SIGNING OF CONTRACT

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Might I direct a further question to the Minister of National Defence and ask him whether or not Mr. Crutchlow or any other individual in his department or in the Department of Supply and Services entered into any contract calling for the expenditure of any funds up to this point in time which was not properly authorized and if that is the situation, as has been reported, is this a factor which is holding up the signing of the final contract with Lockheed?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): I do not know of any authorization of that type.

Mr. Forrestall: Is the minister telling the House that he has no information with respect to Mr. Crutchlow entering into any contract or undertaking with Lockheed for the expenditure of any funds prior to the actual signing of the contract? If this understanding is correct can the minister indicate on what basis Lockheed has gone ahead and spent, up to this point, something in the nature of between $10 million and $12 million in work-up expenditures before the contract has been signed?

Mr. Richardson: I was not referring to the current expenditures which I said are taking place on engineering studies. I was referring specifically to the question about Mr. Crutchlow. I do not know his part particularly. But the Department of Supply and Services did accept the offer which was made to us by Lockheed; that offer was accepted in principle following the decision of the government to purchase these aircraft. As I have indicated before, there are some costs related primarily to engineering and design. There are no production costs at the present time. There are some costs which have been incurred which no doubt would have to be negotiated in the event of termination of the contract, but as we are still proceeding to complete the contract that is a rather hypothetical question.

● (1430)

LOCKHEED CONTRACT—REASON FOR ARRANGING FOR DESIGN STUDIES BEFORE CONTRACT SIGNED

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, I hate like the devil to pose hypothetical questions to the minister because I know he is so precise in his responses, so might I direct my supplementary question to the Minister of Supply and Services. Upon what authority did the Minister of Supply and Services enter into any arrangement whatever with Lockheed for the commencement of any engineering, design or work-up studies prior to the signing of a final contract?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, we told Lockheed Aircraft Corporation that we intended to contact it, and of course this came after a requisition from the Department of National Defence. There is at present no formal contract with this company. Since his question does require an answer, I would ask the hon. member whether he would agree to grant me one or two days to answer with more precision so that the interests of Canada and of the government are better protected.

LOCKHEED CONTRACT—SUGGESTED REFERENCE TO STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the minister which follows from the answer of the Minister of Supply and Services. In view of the interest in this contract and the very large sum involved, and in view of the very legitimate questions that have arisen as a result of problems that are outside the minister's domain, I wonder whether the minister would talk to the House leader and, either through the guise of estimates or some other procedural method, have this whole matter referred to the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence, so that very detailed questions can be asked and very definite answers given by the minister in order to help explain the situation, and so we will not take up the whole question period over the next few days asking questions and trying to get answers?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, this subject was before the standing committee last week when numerous questions of a detailed nature were asked and answered.

Mr. Nowlan: A further supplementary question. I appreciate in part the minister's answer, but in view of the fact that some of Lockheed's problems arose out of either public or private meetings of some committees in the States, I would ask the minister to consider a public meeting, or is there a possibility of exploring the matter through a private meeting of the external affairs and national defence committee so hon. members can ask questions and get answers from the minister? As far as I am concerned, I do not want to see an LRPA jeopardized because of some corporate problems of an international company.

Mr. Richardson: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to know that the hon. member is trying to find ways to purchase these aircraft rather than ways of not doing so. I would be prepared to meet with the committee or anyone else who wants to discuss the subject. Of course, I think that the calling of a committee meeting is the responsibility of the committee concerned.

SUPPLY AND SERVICES

LOCKHEED CONTRACT—KNOWLEDGE OF MINISTER OF FUNDS AVAILABLE AT NATIONAL DEFENCE TO FINANCE PRODUCTION

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Supply and Services. Since the minister has said he would do some further investigating of the Lockheed contract, would he also check this out. The Minister of National Defence stated that Lockheed was aware of the fact that the Department of National Defence did not have sufficient funds available to proceed with the LRPA contract and that Lockheed gave a verbal assurance that it would provide the interim financing. On the other hand, the Minister of Supply and Services is saying that financing is the responsibility of DND and he will not say whether he knew that DND had only $30 million available or whether he knew about Lockheed's verbal assurance to provide interim financing.

In an effort to clear up the confusion surrounding this contract once and for all, I should like to ask the minister whether he was aware that DND had only $30 million available to start production of the LRPA, and was he aware that Lockheed had made a verbal agreement with DND to provide the interim financing itself?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): No, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

Mr. McKenzie: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Does the minister think that it was wise of the Department of Supply and Services to proceed to negotiate a contract with Lockheed which required first year payments of more than $100 million on the strength of nothing more than a verbal assurance?

[Translation]

Mr. Goyer: Mr. Speaker, I said that my department received a requisition from the Department of National Defence and under the Financial Administration Act, when we receive a requisition from a department, we are assured that the financing is provided.

[English]

NATIONAL DEFENCE

LOCKHEED CONTRACT—DISCUSSION OF FINANCING WITH EMERGENCY LOAN GUARANTEE BOARD OF UNITED STATES

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of National Defence. Is the government aware that a $300 million borrowing by Lockheed for the Orion program would require approval by the emergency loan guarantee board, a United States agency; and in view of the suggestion that Canada should be the guarantor, has the government discussed this matter with the emergency loan guarantee board of the United States and, if not, why not?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Yes, Mr. Speaker, the government has discussed this matter and is, of course, aware that their authorization is required.

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, my question is supplementary to the last question put to the Minister of National Defence. In the negotiations that the minister entered into initially, did he make those inquiries of the United States concerning the emergency loan guarantee board in order to determine whether there were any problems in connection with the Lockheed Corporation?

Mr. Richardson: No, Mr. Speaker, to the best of my knowledge my officials did not do that. They talked with the Lockheed Corporation, which indicated to them that they could arrange the financing.

LOCKHEED CONTRACT—POSSIBLE REQUEST FROM REISMAN AND GRANDY TO BE RELEASED FROM OATH CONCERNING SECRECY OF INFORMATION—SUGGESTED INQUIRY

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): A further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. The provisions of the Public Service Employment Act provide for a certain oath of secrecy. That oath specifically provides, and I quote, "that I will not, without due authority in that behalf, disclose or make known any matter that comes to my knowledge by reason of such employment". Has the minister or any member of his government had authority requested by either of Messrs. Reisman or Grandy, or their consulting firm, to release any information that they have acquired as a result of their duties with the government?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Not to my knowledge, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Leggatt: A final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the answer the minister has just given, and in view of the fact that it is unlikely that any specific authority was requested, would the minister now consider establishing an inquiry to ascertain if information has been released in violation of Schedule III, the oath of secrecy under the Public Service Employment Act, in view of the contractual relationship existing between Lockheed and the two former deputy ministers?

Mr. Richardson: Mr. Speaker, I would think that that matter would normally come within the wider considerations which we discussed a moment ago, which have been addressed by the Prime Minister, concerning guidelines for senior servants, which is of wider scope than this particular relationship with one company.

LOCKHEED CONTRACT—REASONS FOR DELAY IN SIGNING, OTHER THAN FINANCING

Mr. Leonard C. Jones (Moncton): My question is directed to the Minister of National Defence. I should like to know what other items are holding up the transaction with Lockheed apart from the question of interim financing.

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, it is the interim financing or short-term financing that is the primary problem. As is widely known, shortly after that problem emerged the Lockheed company got into difficulties as a result of accusations concerning improper payments in other parts of the world. This had or appeared to have some effect on their financial stability and their ability to carry on, so that became a secondary problem. We are trying to solve both problems, first of all the production phase financing and, secondly, our conviction supported by a statement by the United States government that the Lockheed is financially viable and can in fact complete the contract. I believe we are working successfully towards a solution.

TRANSPORT

REQUEST FLOUR AND GRAIN RAIL SUBSIDIES BE REMOVED ONLY AFTER SEAWAY TOLLS INCREASED

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): Mr. Speaker, I direct my question to the Minister of Transport. Will he in the interest of retaining the balance of competition between Halifax and Saint John on the one hand and Montreal on the other remove the flour and grain rail subsidies only after seaway tolls are increased, and not before?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, a bill dealing with the subject is before the House. I do not think the two items need to be directly related.

INCOME TAX

PROPOSAL TO INCREASE ALLOWABLE EXPENSES FOR VOLUNTEER FIREMEN—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. R. E. McKinley (Huron-Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. Because of the fact that under the Income Tax Act volunteer firemen are only allowed a total of $300 annually to cover all expenses, would the minister give consideration to raising this allowance so it will better reflect present day costs? This $300 allowance has not been upgraded for many years now and these volunteer firemen do a tremendous service to many municipalities throughout the country.

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, after the suggestion of the hon. gentleman I will take it under consideration.

OLYMPIC GAMES

REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE LOTTERY WILL BE CONDUCTED IN ACCORDANCE WITH ADVERTISING

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): Mr. Speaker, because the government continues to see fit to operate without a Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, which in fact may be an improvement, I am forced to put my question to the Postmaster General. In view of the fact there were numerous incidents in past Olympic lotteries where some winning tickets were unsold, thus making the preceding advertising campaign misleading vis-à-vis the outcome, would the minister assure this House, particularly since he is supposed to be so closely related with COJO, that all future Olympic lotteries will in fact comply with the advertising campaign and, if not, will he take immediate steps to have them altered accordingly?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I understand that the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs has checked into the advertising concerning the lottery and found nothing improper. It provides, in fact, for the precise number of prizes promised providing all tickets are sold.

Some hon. Members: Provided.

Mr. Mackasey: It is obvious that because of the computer type of operations in the selection of winning numbers, when certain tickets are not sold there is the possibility that certain prizes may not be drawn but are added to the next particular draw. I might add that I do not know if I am any closer to COJO, Mr. Speaker, than the hon. gentleman who I see most Sunday afternoons on CTV talking about the Olympics.

Mr. Jelinek: Very plainly, Mr. Speaker, can the minister or the government assure the House that there will be as many prizes awarded in the Olympic lotteries in future as there are advertised, which has not been the case in the past?

Mr. Mackasey: Mr. Speaker, I think we have that assurance. Changes have been made in the method of distribution. I am not in charge of the lottery, however, I am in charge of the coins.

MANPOWER

SUGGESTION BY EMPRESS HOTEL TO MISS POULIOT THAT QUEBEC OUTSIDE CANADA—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Claude Wagner (Saint-Hyacinthe): Mr. Speaker, has the Minister of Manpower and Immigration been informed of the response given to Miss Danielle Pouliot, a resident of Valleyfield, Quebec, and a student at the Sherbrooke University, who had sought employment at the Empress Hotel in Victoria, British Columbia; a response which was dated March 8 and made public in the Montreal press over the weekend which stated in part, and this was underlined in red: "Unfortunately, we are not in a position to offer employment to those residing outside of Canada"?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the verbal notice the hon. member gave me of this question just before the question period. I think the most charitable explanation would be that the hotel, and I am not apologizing for them because it is their responsibility, must have made an error, because that kind of answer, of course, is both incorrrect and unacceptable.

Mr. Wagner: Mr. Speaker, in view of this excellent answer of the minister, for which I thank him, will he undertake to have his officials contact the chairman of the CPR or CP Rail in order that all personnel of these companies are clearly told that Quebec is, until further notice, part of Canada and that such a display of silliness is unacceptable?

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member will supply me with copies of the correspondence I will be glad to take it up with Mr. Sinclair and let him know how we feel about it.

PENITENTIARIES

BRITISH COLUMBIA—SUGGESTED NEED FOR REORGANIZATION OF STAFF—CONFIDENCE OF MINISTER IN ADMINISTRATOR

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock): Mr. Speaker, since a high turnover rate has been usually accepted as one indication of poor morale, and in view of the fact that 33 of the 43 members of the socialization division of the British Columbia Penitentiary resigned or transferred in 1975, and 75 per cent of the custody division are in the service less than six months, will the Solicitor General not agree that the administration of the B.C. Penitentiary requires some immediate and undivided attention to bring about radical reorganization of the staff structure as well as philosophy?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, the same rules apply to the B.C. Penitentiary as apply to many other penitentiaries. There are problems at the B.C. Penitentiary but I have doubts as to whether they are due to the administration of that particular penitentiary. I think this will become more clear when the reports of the two recent incidents are published.

Mr. Friesen: Mr. Speaker, as an aftermath of the second hostage taking at the B.C. Penitentiary a month ago the staff unanimously voted no confidence in the administrator while the Solicitor General wrote to him expressing his confidence. Can the minister tell the House whether he still has unqualified confidence in the administrator and what steps he has taken to bring unity to the administration of the British Columbia Penitentiary?

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, I still stand by that statement, and I think when the hon. member sees the reports to which I referred he may be ready to change his ideas as well.

AGRICULTURE

POSSIBILITY OF REDUCTION OR INCREASE IN CHEESE IMPORTS

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, I shall put my question to his parliamentary secretary.

In view of the demonstration held by the producers of industrial milk of Canada at noon today, and bearing in mind the representations they made about their problems with regard to their product, I should like to ask, first, whether the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce works in conjunction with the Department of Agriculture with regard to cheese imports, and second, whether those imports will decrease or increase in the coming dairy year? If so, could the minister tell the House why this should be so?

Mr. Marcel Roy (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, this morning I met representatives of the Agricultural Producers' Union and industrial milk producers. We reviewed the whole policy of cheese imports and I assured the producers that there will be no increase in the import of cheeses already produced in Canada, especially cheddar. In addition, we looked into the possibility of meeting at some time to study production techniques of cheeses that could be made here in Canada, so that after having established our manufacturing potential, we can adjust an import program instead of our Canadian production.

I am pleased to tell the hon. member that we are working in close co-operation with the Department of Agriculture for we have announced a cheese quota of 50 million pounds for the current year, as was announced by the Department of Agriculture. Before closing, I wish to assure the producers that the imports of any type of cheese manufactured in Canada will not be increased in the next few years.

POSSIBILITY OF PROTECTING PRODUCTION OF NEW VARIETIES OF CHEESE

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the parliamentary secretary for the excellent answer he has just given me, and put the following question to him.

Considering that the dairy producers in Canada are becoming more interested in producing different kinds of cheese, would the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce help the promoters of those products and provide them with financial assistance and support by ensuring that their products will be protected on the home market and that other products will not compete with those new cheeses?

Mr. Marcel Roy (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, at present we import 210 different kinds of cheese, the majority of which are not made in Canada. In answer to the hon. member's question, I wish to point out that a meeting will be held shortly to determine manufacturing techniques in order to ascertain the cheese manufacturing potential in Canada, in view of eventually limiting the importation of those which are not made in Canada.

MINISTER'S VIEW OF RESPONSIBILITY OF TRADE AND COMMERCE FOR ENCOURAGEMENT OF CHEESE PRODUCTION

Mr. Bill Jarvis (Perth-Wilmot): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Minister of Agriculture. Is the minister satisfied that the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce will be responsible for the encouragement of cheese production in Canada, particularly when they do not know a darn thing about agriculture in the first place?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that the responsible Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, with my guidance, will remain responsible.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Jarvis: That is exactly what I am concerned about, lack of guidance.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jarvis: If there had been any guidance, there would have been a reduction in imports. The parliamentary secretary just gave an answer about the upcoming meetings of cheese processors with officials of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Has the minister or have his officials been invited to those meetings?

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, very rarely is there a meeting involving agricultural production at which either I, my parliamentary secretary or one of my officials is not present. I would doubt in these instances that we would not be invited. I am not aware of whether or not we have been invited.

THE CANADIAN CONSTITUTION

MINISTER'S VIEW OF METHOD OF PATRIATION— ACCEPTABILITY TO PROVINCES

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Justice. In view of the minister's statement last week in an interview that the government intends to make the BNA Act more Canadian but that in theory and in law it would remain a British Statute, how does the minister feel that this action would constitute the repatriation of the constitution?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the article referred solely to methods of patriating the constitution. No decision has yet been taken on whether it would be patriated or how it would be patriated. One method, of course, is to patriate it by way of passage in the U.K. parliament accompanied by a proclamation of the Governor General of Canada which would include an amending formula to the BNA Act which would make it part of the constitutional law of Canada.

Mr. Ritchie: Mr. Speaker, in view of the so called second option which seems to be favoured, the use of a mechanism for constitutional review similar to the failed Victoria conference, what makes the minister feel that this mechanism would be any more acceptable to the provinces now than in 1971?

Mr. Basford: I do not think it was on that aspect that a conclusion was not reached at the conference in Victoria on the constitutional charter.

FINANCE

EFFECT OF INCREASED INTEREST RATES ON AVAILABILITY OF FARM IMPROVEMENT LOANS

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. As the result of the recent increases in interest rates, has the government had any consultations or does the minister intend to have any consultations with the banking authorities to determine whether in fact the increase in interest rates heralds a new era with regard to the availability of farm improvement loans, because what happened in the past is that the banks have tightened up on the availability of farm improvement loans to farmers? Has the minister had any consultations or does he intend to have any to determine whether banks will continue to make these loans available as they have in the past?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I have every reason to believe that the banks will continue to make farm improvement loans. There have been a number of questions in the past with respect to the lending policy in 1975. I do not have the exact figures with me at the moment, but my recollection is that the volume of loans was up rather than down during the year, as suggested by a number of questioners. Therefore we would anticipate that the farm improvement loan program will continue. The hon. member must bear in mind, of course, that under the system the banks reserve the right to choose as to who would or who would not be a good lending risk, in accordance with good banking principles.

Mr. Korchinski: In view of the fact that statistics might prove that farmers take out more loans but do not necessarily differentiate between farm improvement loans and demand loans which they may be forced to take as a result of action which banking officials are taking with regard to the borrower who in fact has been a good risk for many, many years, can the minister differentiate between these two separate loans?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Speaking from memory, my recollection is that the figures I referred to were figures for farm improvement loans, but I could confirm that.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

DATE OF HALL REPORT ON RAILWAY PENSIONS—REQUEST FOR EARLY CONSIDERATION

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Labour. In view of the interest of many thousands of Canadian railway workers, including those retired as well as those still in service, in the report of Dr. Noel Hall on railway pensions, can the minister now say when the government expects to receive that report? Can the minister also assure the railway workers of Canada that when the report is received the government will consider it immediately?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I would advise the hon. member that I have been in touch with Dr. Hall. He has indicated to me that because of the delays involved in getting all the actuarial studies done and because he wishes to have it done very thoroughly, it will not be ready until the end of April. As soon as we receive it, I can assure the hon. member we will certainly act on it as quickly as we can.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

POSSIBILITY OF REDUCTION IN CIVILIAN EMPLOYEES—REQUEST FOR REPORT

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland-Colchester North): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Defence. Is he in a position to indicate to the House or when will he be able to tell the House the degree of cut backs of civilian employees at armed forces bases across Canada, and especially the areas where civilian employees will be affected? I am getting all kinds of rumours from my constituents that there will be a substantial cut-back in firefighters. I should like to know the score.

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, this is part of the infrastructure study which should be going to cabinet within the next two weeks. As I have indicated before, I cannot prejudge how long cabinet will take to consider these recommendations.

AUDITOR GENERAL

REASON FOR DELAY IN INTRODUCING NEW LEGISLATION

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the President of the Treasury Board, who is affectionately known amongst his colleagues as the "abominable no man." I should like to ask him, in light of the fact that it is more than a year since the review committee brought in strong recommendations for a new Auditor General's act and the minister has made commitments to bring in the act which he has not kept, whether he would advise the House if this is so because too many senior civil servants have objected to the passage of the act, and will he produce and table copies of the correspondence ha has had with other departments indicating their unwillingness to accept this new legislation?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, we have already agreed on a policy on this matter. The government's policy was adopted by the cabinet and it is being considered by the Department of Justice for the wording of the legislation. It is a pleasure for me to inform the hon. member that developing this policy took us quite a long time, but I am satisfied that the measures we proposed as to the role of the Auditor General are wholly acceptable to the Auditor General himself.

AGRICULTURE

ANIMAL FEEDS CONTAINING MILK PRODUCTS—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO RESTRICT IMPORTS

Mr. Arnold Malone (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture. What action is he taking in respect of milk products in animal feed products coming in from the United States illegally, in view of the fact that there is an embargo on any products containing more than 40 per cent milk solids and quite a number of them are coming across the border at present?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, a certain amount of prepared feed is allowed to come in if it has a higher percentage. I cannot remember off hand the exact amount which it is supposed to be. I am waiting for a full report which I have not received as yet, but I do not think the amount is as large as some people think it is.

TRANSPORT

ATLANTIC REGION—MEETING WITH PROVINCIAL MINISTERS ON HIGHWAY PROGRAM—TRANS-NEWFOUNDLAND CORRIDOR STUDY—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. In view of the fact that there is evidence of a deterioration in the whole transportation system from Vancouver to Halifax, I wonder if the minister would indicate the results of the discussions with the Atlantic region transportation ministers as a result of their request that the highways improvement program be implemented, and also as a result of the trans-Newfoundland corridor study with regard to rail freight and rail express service, which is deteriorating to the point of no return.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the discussions I had with the transport ministers related more to issues like support for movement of freight within the Atlantic region and possible new programs to use that freight assistance more adequately to improve development in the region. It was with the highways ministers that I had the more detailed discussions on highway strengthening, and I was presented with a fairly detailed brief. I made the point that highway strength anywhere else in the country had been rather more in response to the assistance we were giving to the Atlantic region rather than to the signing of a new program, but I did undertake a further examination of their brief before responding.

COMPENSATION FOR FORMER PRISONERS OF WAR ACT

MEASURE TO PROVIDE FOR COMPENSATION FOR FORMER PRISONERS OF WAR AND THEIR DEPENDANTS

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-92, to provide for compensation for former prisoners of war and their dependants and to amend certain other statutes in consequence thereof.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

Mr. Speaker: When shall the bill be read the second time?

Some hon. Members: Now.

Some hon. Members: Next sitting of the House.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, would the House agree to call this bill for second reading later this day, once we have seen it?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, it was my intention to make a statement on motions about House business, and perhaps I can deal with it then.

Mr. Speaker: On the question as to when the bill should be read a second time, at the next sitting of the House is the response which ought to be recorded. However, at any time the House is at leave to give its unanimous consent to alter that arrangement.

ELECTORAL BOUNDARIES READJUSTMENT ACT

OBJECTION TO COMMISSION REPORT RESPECTING ONTARIO

Mr. Speaker: It is my duty to inform the House that an objection signed by the hon. members for Hastings (Mr. Ellis), Huron-Middlesex (Mr. McKinley), Oxford (Mr. Halliday), Regina East (Mr. Balfour), Okanagan Boundary (Mr. Whittaker), Hamilton-Wentworth (Mr. O'Sullivan), Battle River (Mr. Malone), Halton-Wentworth (Mr. Kempling), Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker), and High Park-Humber Valley (Mr. Jelinek), has been filed with me, pursuant to section 20 of the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act, chapter E-2, RSC, 1970, to the report of the Electoral Boundaries Commission for the province of Ontario.

If the House agrees, I would suggest we follow past practice and print the text of the objection as an appendix to this day's Votes and Proceedings. Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, on Thursday last I suggested the business of the House for the coming period, and I should now like to announce one or two alterations. It had been anticipated last Thursday that we might have reached the conclusion of the debate on Bill C-89 on Friday. We did not do so. It is anticipated that that will happen very early in this afternoon's proceedings.

I think the Chair has a judgment to make on a question raised by the hon. member for Edmonton West, but if that is disposed of and we are able to go ahead with the bill, it is my understanding that second reading will be completed, and there is an understanding that any votes on the bill will be postponed until tomorrow at three o'clock. We would then proceed to Bill S-31, Bill C-71 and Bill S-10 on which I gather the Chair has now reached a decision as to whether the bill is proper form to be considered; the information I have is that that is probably so. We would then be able to take up that bill. When we have concluded that business, it would be my intention to revert to second reading of Bill C-83.

I should like to have an opportunity to speak with the House leaders about the bill which has been given first reading today. We have no desire to hold up its consideration; however, it is not a simple bill and I think there should be an opportunity for hon. members to see the bill before they are asked to pass judgment on it.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, with respect to the business of the House, and particularly the comments of the government House leader with respect to Bill C-89, I thought it had been made reasonably clear that so far as we were concerned the debate was finished at four o'clock last Friday. We are awaiting a ruling with respect to this matter.

Mr. Speaker: The Chair certainly will be awaiting argument from the government side with respect to the bill and on the point of order raised by the hon. member for Edmonton West. Depending on what the argument may be, hopefully, having done some study and research on the matter over the weekend, the Chair will be in a position to bring in a ruling immediately. However, that depends on the remarks made later this afternoon. That is as much guidance as the Chair is able to give at this moment.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I was wondering whether, having perused my remarks of Friday afternoon, I may be allowed to make an additional point. It is in clarification of what I said. I hope I will have an opportunity to do so in the course of the remarks that will be heard this afternoon.

FISH AND FISH PRODUCTS—TRADE AND TARIFFS

Question No. 3,917—Mr. Marshall:

Has the government taken action on the recommendations of the Food Prices Review Board report on fish and fish products on (a) government assistance to the industry (b) domestic consumption (c) trade and tariffs and, if so, in what manner?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce and the Ministry of State for Fisheries as follows: (a) On April 23, 1975, the Hon. Roméo LeBlanc announced a $50 million program leading to long term measures to strengthen Canada's fishing industry. $41 million had been authorized to provide assistance to groundfish fishermen for producing first quality fish and to processors who produced groundfish products and maintained July 1, 1974 prices to fishermen. $10 million was authorized to help solve marketing problems encountered by other segments of the industry throughout Canada. (b) Since the beginning of 1975, the Canadian fishing industry and the federal and provincial governments have jointly undertaken a national promotional program under the title of "North Atlantic Seafood Association" aimed at increasing the consumption of fish in Canada. This program is initially of three years duration. The Consumer Services Division, Fisheries and Marine Service of the Department of the Environment has strengthened its programs, subject to budgetary constraints, aimed at educating Canadian seafood influentials in order to promote greater seafood awareness among consumers and the merits of specific types of seafood in diets. (c) The current GATT Multilateral Trade Negotiations (MTN) provide Canada with an excellent opportunity to improve access to world markets for Canadian fish and fish products. In developing our position in the MTN on these products we are, of course, taking into account the views of the Canadian fishing industry and Provincial Governments. We are being particularly mindful of Canada's general objective in the MTN of increasing processing prior to export where this is economically viable through the reduction of foreign trade impediments to more processed products.

NATIONAL REVENUE EMPLOYEES

Question No. 4,146—Mr. Matte:

1. From 1974 to date, how many employees have worked annually for the Department of National Revenue in Ottawa?

2. How many are (a) French speaking (b) English speaking (c) bilingual?

Hon. Jack Cullen (Minister of National Revenue): 1. Taxation: As of July 1975: 2,550; As of December 1975: 2,811; As of February 1976: 2,817. Customs and Excise: As of July 1975: 1,272; As of December 1975: 1,358; As of February 1976: 1,364.

2. Taxation	(a)	(b)	(c)
As of July 1975	192	1615	743
As of December 1975	204	1714	893
As of February 1976	200	1695	922
Customs and Excise
As of July 1975	59	804	409
As of December 1975	56	818	484
As of February 1976	55	806	503

NOTE: Statistics for term employees at the Taxation Data Centre are not included in this reply. See our answer to Question No. 4,150. Figures are only available on a monthly and not an accumulative basis. Records prior to July 1975 were not kept in such a way as to enable us to give a complete reply to this question.

NATIONAL DEFENCE—TOW WEAPON SYSTEM

Question No. 4,149—Mr. McKinnon:

With reference to the answer to Question No. 3,782, on what dates will the (a) first (b) final TOW weapon system be issued to Armed Forces troops?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): (a) and (b). The following table outlines initial and final delivery dates by components.

Component	Initial Delivery	Final Delivery
Launchers	August 76	June 77
Missiles	April 76	June 77
Field Test Sets	December 75	October 77

ADDITIONAL STAFF OF TAXATION DATA CENTRE

Question No. 4,150—Mr. Matte:

1. Did the Taxation Data Centre employ additional staff from January to June for each year 1973 to 1976 and, if so, how many?

2. How many were (a) French speaking (b) English speaking (c) bilingual?

Hon. Jack Cullen (Minister of National Revenue): 1. Yes. Numbers of additional term staff employed at the Taxation Data Centre in the years 1973 to 1976 were as follows: 1973, 11,345 temporary employees were hired but at no time did the total number of temporary staff on strength exceed 4,852. The difference represents turnover throughout the year. 1974, 11,783 temporary employees were hired. Peak temporary staff did not exceed 6,921. 1975, 10,098 temporary employees were hired. Peak temporary staff did not exceed 6,589. Information for 1976 is not available as all temporary employees have not yet been hired.

2. This information is not available from any source which would enable the Department to extract readily and without inordinate work, time and cost details of the linguistic status of term employees at the Data Centre. Because the Data Centre has been temporarily exempted by Treasury Board, until decentralization of the Data Centre is complete, from the requirement that incumbents appointed to term positions must meet the linguistic standards of their position, temporary employees at the Data Centre are not therefore recorded in the Official Languages Information System. QUEBEC REGIONAL PSYCHIATRIC CENTRE

Question No. 4,164—Mr. Hnatyshyn:

What is the number of individuals committed to the Quebec Regional Psychiatric Centre by Provincial Orders in Council and upon discharge, how many are (a) discharged to another institution (b) discharged to a residential centre (c) released upon their own recognizance on parole?

Mr. Hugh Poulin (Parliamentary Secretary to Solicitor General): Nil.

ONTARIO REGIONAL PSYCHIATRIC CENTRE

Question No. 4,165—Mr. Hnatyshyn:

What is the number of individuals committed to the Ontario Regional Psychiatric Centre by Provincial Orders in Council and upon discharge, how many are (a) discharged to another institution (b) discharged to a residential centre (c) released upon their own recognizance on parole?

Mr. Hugh Poulin (Parliamentary Secretary to Solicitor General): Nil.

PACIFIC REGIONAL PSYCHIATRIC CENTRE

Question No. 4,166—Mr. Hnatyshyn:

What is the number of individuals committed to the Pacific Regional Psychiatric Centre by Provincial Orders in Council and upon discharge, how many are (a) discharged to another institution (b) discharged to a residential centre (c) released upon their own recognizance on parole?

Mr. Hugh Poulin (Parliamentary Secretary to Solicitor General): Two. (a) to (c) Nil.

NATIONAL DEFENCE—SCHOOL CONSTRUCTION

Question No. 4,577—Mr. Matte:

1. Did the Department of National Defence, as part of the Federal Assistance Programme to municipalities, grant loans for school construction or other projects in the Constituency of Champlain and, if so, in what amount?

2. What was (a) the name of the project (b) the municipality involved (c) the amount of the grant?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): 1. No.

2. Not applicable.

ANTI-INFLATION ACT

MEASURE TO ADD NEW DEFINITIONS

The House resumed, from Friday, March 26, consideration of the motion of Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale) that Bill C-89, to amend the Anti-Inflation Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

Mr. Speaker: When this bill was last before the House, the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) raised a point of order. It was indicated by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) and by the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Blais) that they would like an opportunity to consider the matter. Indeed, the Chair was seeking an opportunity to consider the matter in order, first, that argument on the other side of the question might be presented and, of course, that the Chair would have time to examine the matter to see whether the point of order was in fact valid. It might be appropriate at this time if the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council made a contribution to the argument, or the Minister of Finance, as the case may be. Then we could hear the hon. member for Edmonton West, and then perhaps I would try to make a decision.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, in due course will I have an opportunity to reply to the reply?

Mr. Speaker: I suppose, in fairness the hon. member for Edmonton West who seeks to clarify something he said on Friday last, he might conclude remarks.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I think this might help clear up the situation. The question arises concerning the point I raised about the power of the Minister of Finance to enter into an agreement to disperse funds paid into the consolidated revenue fund. This question arises out of this particular bill and has reference to Bill C-73. This matter was not considered by the House, it was not raised and Bill C-73 has been passed by parliament. However, I want to point out that the agreement with the province of Ontario signed by the Minister of Finance was tabled only in mid-January after the bill had been passed. Parliament had no opportunity to determine what kind of model agreement could be entered into by the minister. There is nothing in Bill C-73 which applies to the share of any revenue.

Now I come back. Does parliament at this stage have the opportunity to authorize the minister to enter into such an agreement providing for the payment out? There is no doubt the minister is empowered under the bill to enter into an agreement with a province with regard to the anti-inflation measure, but the minister has no power whatsoever to pay out moneys under any formula, to any province, out of the consolidated revenue fund.

If that power is to exist, it must come by way of a recommendation from His Excellency. That was not provided for in the recommendation to Bill C-73. I do not care whether the minister claims he has power under Bill C-73. There is nothing in the recommendations concerning payment of the funds to a province.

Does this bill relate at all? Yes. First of all, this is a bill to amend the Anti-Inflation Act. Second, Bill C-89 has direct reference to section 4 of the Anti-Inflation Act, Bill C-73. There is, under section 4 of the Anti-Inflation Act, the power to enter into agreements. I refer to page 6 of Bill C-73, particularly to section 4(3). May I say I am not relying upon the first minor amendment that appears in the present bill. However, let us look at clause 6 of this particular bill which amends section 20 of the Anti-Inflation Act. May I say, Mr. Speaker, that there we are right into the heart of the matter. Section 20(4) of Bill C-73, the Anti-Inflation Act, provides:

> Where a person has contravened the guidelines by paying or crediting as compensation in the course of a business or as a dividend, an amount that exceeds the amount that he was, under the guidelines authorized to so pay or credit, the administrator may, if he is not satisfied that there are circumstances that, based on the particular facts of the situation, justify the person in so contravening the guidelines, make such order as he deems appropriate to accomplish either or both of the following objectives:

Then paragraph (b) states:

> —where no order has been made by him pursuant to subsection (5) arising out of the same circumstances, to require the person to pay to Her Majesty in right of Canada or to withhold out of subsequent payments or credits of a like nature and pay to Her Majesty in right of Canada, an amount stated in the order equal to the whole or any portion of the excess payment or credit as estimated by the administrator.

That is the amount required to be paid to the government of Canada under the order of the administrator. Then there is the model agreement signed by the minister with the province which takes the amount paid under the order of the administrator and divides it with the province on some formula. This formula, this amendment in Bill C-89 is directly connected with that matter. As a matter of fact, section 20(4)(b) is repealed, and in addition sections 20(5)(b), 29(6) and 20(7) are repealed and replaced by sections of clause 6 in Bill C-89. It is precisely under these subparagraphs that the administrator's orders are made.

I ask: How can there be any greater and more direct connection between the two bills? Therefore, it is at this point there should be in the amending bill a provision that any moneys paid to the account of Her Majesty pursuant to such an order may be divided between the government of Canada and a province according to whatever agreements exists. For that there would have to be a recommendation from His Excellency. That is precisely the point I make. There is no recommendation. There is no power to share those moneys with a province under the amendments contained in Bill C-89 which amends Bill C-73. I think I have established the argument to make the connection between Bill C-89 and Bill C-73.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It may not be necessary for the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) to contribute to the point. As I understand the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert), whenever an agreement is made between the federal government and the Minister of Finance with a province, it may be without statutory authorization.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): No.

Mr. Speaker: If I understand the point correctly, it might have been authorized in Bill C-73, but in any case it is not dealt with in Bill C-89. The hon. member for Edmonton West, if I understand his point correctly, indicates that the provisions he has just referred to, which I have read very carefully, do not authorize the establishment of any agreement for the sharing of revenue.

● (1520)

It is a matter of fact. Surely, therefore, since they do not propose to do such a thing, no recommendation is required in the statute. The point raised by the hon. member for Edmonton West, that the purported agreement is without statutory foundation, may be valid. The argument that there is no statutory foundation for it in Bill C-73 and, therefore, that there cannot be any foundation for it in the amendments, may be valid; I do not know. Yet the amendments contained in Bill C-89 do not in any way touch on provisions which would relate to any such agreement. I have read these provisions carefully. I would welcome it if the hon. member for Edmonton West could indicate any instance in which such agreements are affected and, if so, in what way they are affected by this particular statute so as to require the royal recommendation.

The hon. member argues that if this statute proposed authorization for the entering into of such agreements, it would require the royal recommendation. In fact, it does not do that and the act does not do that. However, if it were proposed that it should do so, a royal recommendation would have to accompany the act.

I do not have to judge whether the entering into of agreements with provinces is, first, authorized by statutes which in turn must be accompanied by a royal recommendation, but I have to decide, first, if Bill C-89 concerns itself with those agreements; and, if so, does it concern itself in such a way as to require the royal recommendation? It seems to me, on the argument advanced so far, that the answer to the first question is no. Therefore, the answer to the second question does not apply.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, with the greatest respect—

Mr. Speaker: With the greatest respect, I am ready to hear the hon. member on that point.

Anti-Inflation Act

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, section 4 of Bill C-73, the original act, without question empowers the minister to enter into agreements with the provinces but does not authorize the minister to enter into an agreement to pay to a province funds paid into the consolidated revenue fund. Bill C-73 did not provide that. Paragraph 9 of the model agreement the Minister of Finance filed in January says as follows:

Payments to the province: Canada hereby agrees, with respect to the aggregate amount paid to Her Majesty in right of Canada pursuant to any order made by the national administrator under sections 20 and 22 of the federal act against a person in the provincial public sector, to pay to the province an amount equal to such part of that amount as may be determined on the basis of a formula to be agreed upon between Canada and the province.

I referred to that paragraph of the model agreement last Friday. Under section 20 of Bill C-73, the administrator is to make orders directing those payments to the government of Canada. I am referring to payments referred to in paragraph 9 of the model agreement. But, Mr. Speaker, Bill C-89 amends section 20. Actually, it deletes whole sections which refer to those orders and it substitutes new sections. Those are to be the orders under which moneys are paid into the coffers of the government of Canada. Therefore, if money is to be paid in under Bill C-89 because that will be the applicable law, the money will be paid into the coffers of the government of Canada in accordance with the terms of the amended sections of the act which will be in force after the passage of Bill C-89. Surely there cannot be any payment out unless there is authority.

Bill C-89 goes to the very heart of Bill C-73 in amending the powers of the administrator. Once this bill passes, if it does pass, the administrator's orders will be governed by the amendments the House is now considering. They will be governed by the provisions of Bill C-89, not of Bill C-73. With the greatest respect, I cannot see how there can be any argument that Bill C-89 is tied integrally to Bill C-73. I do not see how any payment to a province of moneys paid under an order made pursuant to the provisions of the bill now before the House would not require the royal recommendation.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Before I call on the Minister of Finance, may I say this. It seems to me that the hon. member for Edmonton West says that any bill which seeks to amend a statute which was accompanied by a royal recommendation must also be accompanied by a royal recommendation whether or not it amends those provisions of the original statute which required the royal recommendation.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, no, with respect.

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, there is no argument as to whether or not both Bill C-73 and Bill C-89 authorize any payments out of the consolidated revenue fund for the purposes contained in the agreement. The provisions of both Bill C-73 and Bill C-89 would authorize payment into the consolidated revenue fund of funds which might be assessed against some person as a result of a provincial, public sector agreement. That would authorize payment into the consolidated revenue fund but not out. The critical point to be understood is this: the agreement with Ontario or the other provinces referred to by the hon. gentleman do not purport to be agreements to pay out to the provinces. At this point there is no appropriation of funds for that purpose. The agreements are merely agreements to enter into negotiations for establishing a formula which might be followed if any payments of this kind are to be shared with a province. In other words, it is an agreement to enter into an agreement.

Various things would need to happen if there were such negotiations. If the administrator ordered payments to be made into the consolidated revenue fund, and if there were negotiations between the government of Ontario and the government of Canada about the division of such payments, then I, as Minister of Finance, would have to bring before parliament an appropriation act to appropriate such part of the consolidated revenue fund as might be necessary to cover the payment. In other words, I would have to bring forward legislation with the imprimatur of the royal recommendation in order to make such payment out. As you said, Mr. Speaker, neither Bill C-73 nor Bill C-89 authorize such payments out. Indeed, the agreement itself is only an undertaking to enter into discussions to negotiate such a formula if such a payment should be made.

On the broader basis, this seems to me the sensible way of going about it. Obviously, a considerable process of negotiation will need to be embarked upon. Until we know what the amount is to be, it makes no sense to bring in an appropriation bill in advance.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): But you agree to pay.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Yes, amounts to be negotiated.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. During the weekend I tried to consider carefully the argument advanced by the hon. member for Edmonton West. I gave him an opportunity to clarify today and I questioned him today about the matter of primary concern to the Chair. During the weekend I examined the sections to which the hon. member for Edmonton West referred and read them today as he was referring to them. The question the Chair must decide is much less complicated than the questions which have been raised in argument, and it is this: When does a bill which comes before the House require a royal recommendation? A royal recommendation is required when the government seeks to introduce a statute which would provide the government with power to draw upon the revenues. I must find that the provisions of any statute, with respect to which it is argued that the royal recommendation is necessary, contain that possibility.

I have examined carefully Bill C-89 which proposes to amend Bill C-73 and listened carefully to the arguments advanced by the hon. member for Edmonton West. I do not see, in the bills referred to, that kind of power which would reside in the government as a result of passage of the statute. Whether or not it would reside in Bill C-89 is an argument which should have been raised in the past.

Whether or not the model agreement tabled and referred to by the hon. member for Edmonton West is an agreement without statutory authority is another matter. It is an interesting and valuable argument. But there are other remedies. That argument is not, essentially, an attack on Bill C-89. It may be an attack on the government's position and authority vis-à-vis that particular agreement or its power to enter into an agreement specifically with a province along the lines of the model agreement.

If I may speak on the specific provisions of Bill C-89, I cannot find that the bill ought to be impeded at this stage by an insistence on the royal recommendation accompanying any provisions which I have been able to examine and study during the weekend. I therefore find that the bill is procedurally acceptable at this point.

I believe the hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies) had the floor when this matter was last debated on Friday.

● (1530)

[Translation]

Mr. C.-A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I want to comment on Bill C-89. I do not know whether I am out of order but I am pleased to have this opportunity because last Friday, while we heard some ten members speak on this bill, we had no opportunity to do so. I do not want to blame the Chair, but I think it is quite reasonable that we have our turn today. Besides, my colleague the member for Bellechasse was supposed to speak on Friday, but as the opportunity was not given him, I hope we shall have a few minutes to express our view today.

Again a few moments ago I heard hon. members discussing some legal points. What we understand about this matter of legality is always the same. I even heard Mr. Speaker say that even if there has been a royal recommendation, the government can do anything, it can act as it sees fit. It is the same thing when we approve a bill. We kill ourselves trying to make the bill as clear as possible and to propose better amendments. But at the end of the bill there is a small line which kills everything else and allows the minister to use the bill as he pleases. I think that this somewhat sums up this afternoon's discussion. Moreover, it is the same with all our bills. This is why I do not want to miss this opportunity, the second reading debate of Bill C-89 to amend Bill C-73 which established the Anti-Inflation Board.

Only four months after, the government feels the need to amend its Anti-Inflation Act whose lack of precision surprised everybody. Panic-stricken by the vertiginous price escalation which occurred these last three years, the best the government could do was to draft Bill C-73 in a hurry not to lose face.

Of course, it was hard for the Prime Minister after his 1974 campaign to control prices and wages. The government did not want to make a fool of itself by accepting the temporary freeze proposed by the Progressive Conservatives during the last election campaign. That is why they brought in this strange so-called control legislation which in fact only controls the workers' wages. Today, they move an amendment which does not actually change much in the incomes of wages earners. Bill C-89 will enable at least workers to appeal the decision of the AIB. In the Anti-Inflation Act of December 1975, only the party who felt aggrieved by a decision of the board could appeal. As the main responsibility for wages lay on the employer, the latter could appeal the commissioner's ruling. The best example is the case of the Irving workers.

The board fined the paper company for signing an agreement with its employees exceeding the guidelines authorized by the board. The company welcomed the fine because that board decision allowed it to save millions of dollars in the years to come. But the workers saw their wages cut without even being able to protest, whereas this amendment would at least allow them to appeal against the AIB's rulings. In brief, if they are not satisfied with the ruling, they will at least be able to complain loudly about injustice, even though nothing will be changed, Mr. Speaker.

Now I take to witness the remarks of the Prime Minister who, following the demonstration staged by more than 15,000 CLC members on Parliament Hill on Monday, March 22, 1976, is reported to have said that it was all useless.

Labour was right in stating that, as days pass by, inequalities become ever more obvious. When the government launched its anti-inflation program last fall, everyone without exception expected a firm and universal policy. We even expected the right hon. Prime Minister to take as a basis the temporary freezing advocated by the Conservatives during the last electoral campaign.

It is true that the Liberals took a stand against freezing prices and salaries but the government could even have improved upon that freeze but it was afraid to lose face among its own supporters. That is why it could not afford to be realistic. So, finally, it gave birth to this partial freezing, which is so partial indeed that it cannot even be considered as such except by the wage earners.

If the government had been in earnest, it would have, first of all, controlled its own expenses by freezing its own budget. I think this is the first control which was expected in Canada: the freezing of the federal government's budget.

Some will say that expenditures had to be increased in certain areas. Yes, in certain areas, but that is precisely what is rediculous, Mr. Speaker. The expenditures in some of those areas have been reduced, for example, medicare assistance to the provinces. Expenditures have been reduced in essential areas and increased in areas where they never should have been. For instance, I have already mentioned in the House the millions of dollars appropriated by the federal government for the opening or the construction of new income tax offices in every area so as to increase the number of inspectors who will check up on everyone in order to collect income tax or other charges. The government is ready to vote millions of dollars to harass people and to take what little is left of their savings.

When I say that expenditures in some areas should have been frozen, this is one where they should have been frozen until the economy recovers. I believe that we could have kept income tax collectors in their present offices. They have quite enough room to check on every workers. Let nobody tell me that this is to serve the people better, Mr. Speaker. They want to spy on the people and check into the family budget. Today the government starts by accepting a budgetary increase of 20 per cent while asking the workers to limit themselves to an increase of 10 per cent the first year, 8 per cent the second year and 6 per cent the third year. The government is well aware that the inflation rate will be above 12 per cent in 1976, but it is still freezing the salary increase of the small wage-earner at 10 per cent. No wonder therefore if today the whole labour movement is waging an open war against the anti-inflation legislation.

In fact, the unions are not against a complete and temporary freeze of government revenue and expenditures, and even a wage freeze, provided that the freeze be universal and in discriminate. Then, the government should sit down with representatives of the federal and the provincial governments, representatives of the employers and of the employees, and look fully into the situation together in order to find a solution.

Mr. Speaker, this would be acting in a realistic way, as should be the case toward other groups and other men. People are made to discuss and not to fight each other all year round. We will not revive our national economy if we stand apart and hold our neighbour as an enemy. This is no longer the time to behave as champions and play the political game for one's group's sake. Sure enough, the easiest way for the government to rule is to create division among the groups, to provoke national and international strifes, disputes between the provinces, the groups, the blue and white-collar workers, and to make everybody stand up against each other so that it can rule as a master.

That is how we are governed today. Mr. Speaker, if the government does not finally give serious thought to the security and welfare of the entire population, then the disastrous situation we know today will persist. Although all this wrangling, all those fights were politically useful to the government by maintaining it in power, I think it would be dishonest to keep up this masquerade any longer.

And I agree with the unions when they say that the present government has a double standard policy, that we are heading towards authoritarianism, for this may be how a dictator rules. It seems to me that this may be the new society we hear so much about these days, the new society advocated everywhere.

And in support of my comments, Mr. Speaker, here is an excerpt from the CLC brief to the government concerning the government's double standard policy. I quote Le Devoir of March 23:

> When a union has managed in its last agreement to keep ahead of the consumer price index and secure for its members a 2 per cent productivity premium, those grains can be cancelled in the new agreement by the so-called experience adjustment factor. On the other hand, a corporation which has made excessive profits during the five years prior to October 14, 1975 is allowed to maintain its profits at 95 per cent of that level. There is no experience adjustment factor in the case of profits.
> If inflation exceeds the increase allowed under the guidelines for the first year, we are prevented from making up for our losses before the second year of our contract. On the other hand, any cost increase by a corporation is immediately reflected in a price increase; in other words, the corporation does as it always does.

The Anti-Inflation Act has no effect whatsoever on large corporations. And then, further down, the union members' brief says:

> TOWARD AUTHORITARIANISM
> More than that: they policy applied through your anti-inflation program, as can be seen from what is happening and the prevailing mood, is leading our country straight down the road to authoritarianism. Act C-73 and its regulations are turning every employer into an agent responsible for imposing the will of the State upon the workers and their unions.

[Mr. Gauthier (Roberval).]

That is authoritarianism, Mr. Speaker. Someone on the other side said that the unions are experts in authoritarianism. I believe that, in this regard, they have the best example right here with this government. And if we are going on with this kind of dictatorship, I repeat what I said previously, we will be introducing more and more disorders in our society, and among social groups and tomorrow we will be faced with total anarchy unless the government wakes up in time.

We must hope—and I am looking forward to it with all my heart—that the government will become aware of these facts and stop being the servant of financial groups. It is a fact that it was elected by them, that it is here for them but if the government is sincere or wishes to restore the peace that everybody expects in this country, it should momentarily forget financiers and financial interests and devote itself for a while to social concerns.

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I think the House is extending, as it is difficult to see each other now. In any event, I would like to say a few words about this bill. Last Friday I wanted to make a few comments.

Mr. Speaker, once more I would like to be the spokesman for low and average income earners, such as workers in general and farmers who have irregular incomes and who too often have to operate at a loss for certain productions. When this anti-inflation policy was announced, I declared that it was impossible to support current government measures because low income earners would be most affected and big corporations would go on making profits and even too often, excessive profits. We now have the evidence which has been published in newspapers that Dominion stores' profits have risen by 28 per cent since the announcement of the anti-inflation policy, which means that unfortunately the projections I made at the time have been proven right.

I said that these measures would contribute to perturbate the social climate in our country. The ensuing events have shown I was right once again, as we can see by the various outbreaks of opposition that this law has provoked all across Canada. We only have to hear the sometimes violent words uttered by those who feel they are victims of these controls. I do not approve of violence nor of violent words, but when there are groups who feel their rights have not been respected and that they are being done an injustice, the violence of their reaction is understandable.

Let us have a look at the disputes which oppose the Ontario and Quebec governments to the public service employees and related categories. We see that the situation is in a state of complete disorganization which is likely to affect the students considerably: in Quebec the school year is on the verge of being a complete failure because of a dispute concerning money. In each news bulletin from my province we hear of schools which are closed, either by the school boards, or for study sessions, or because there is no more transportation or because children refuse to go to school or are going when there is no authority to let them get into the buildings. We are in a complete state of chaos. I do hope that these conditions will be corrected in any event but meanwhile, people who are concerned are worried to see the late development of these events in our country.

The Trudeau government does not deal with the cause of the evil; on the contrary, it attempts to lessen the effects of the true cause with the expectation that our corrupted economic system will survive and let the millionaire club continue to control the economic and political life of our country. I hope that such are not the objectives aimed at, but anyhow such are the results. They are rich Canadians who know that our economic system is furthering the interests of a minority of financiers despite what is suggested by some politicians who have become stooges and who quite often maintain that our economic system enables many Canadians to be affluent.

Those great characters, most of them unknown to all nevertheless rule the economic life of the country. Indeed they control our financial institutions. They steer our economy from deflation to inflation periods. In this connection, it would be beneficial to read over again the remarks of His Holiness Pope Pius XI, in his encyclical on economic and social problems published in 1931. I will quote a very interesting excerpt:

It was in 1931, but the situation remains the same in 1976.

"What first strikes us nowadays is not only the concentration of wealth but the building up of a huge power, a discretionary economic power, in the hands of a small group of men who are not usually the owners but just act as trustees and managers of the capital they administer as they wish. This power is particularly great among those who, holders and absolute masters of money, govern credit and grant it at their discretion. In so doing, they somehow distribute its blood to the economic body whose life depends on them, so that without their consent, no one can any longer breathe."

Mr. Speaker, let us ask one of these men, whose power has become greater than all the governments of Canada, how much he is worth in dollars and cents. This would amount to asking of these people to tell us in what position he prefers to make love. He surely has a preference but will not dare tell us and will then answer in the same way.

Our debt-credit system for the financing of the public sector is obsolete and constitutes one of the main causes of inflation and unemployment. That is why Bill C-89 is now before us, in an attempt to find solutions to such situations. It costs too much to this government, to provincial and municipal governments to finance public utilities. The more we go ahead, the deeper we plunge into the abyss; the more we run into debts, the more it costs to pay the interests on these public debts. The more taxes we levy, the less money the government has to do something else, to proceed with the building of piers and merchant marine vessels, and with the construction of public buildings which are needed by the people.

For instance, let us take the Jacques Cartier bridge in Montreal whose initial cost Canadians have paid up to now three times in interests alone, and the capital has still to be paid back. Let us look, in the province of Quebec, at the James Bay. This project is supposed to cost $12 billion, of which $6 billion are in interests alone. It is disgusting, Mr. Speaker, to see how money-capital is so well rewarded and how we fail to reward work-capital.

Again this year, the most important item in the federal budget is the debt service: $4 billion a year in interests. If this is not inflation, I wonder when we are going to find a real example of it. Again last week, the Bank of Canada increased the bank rate from 9 to 9½ per cent, which will enable the banks to increase once more their interest rates. The burden will fall therefore on borrowers, which will result in an increase in operating costs.

And as a consequential effect, prices will rise further. In the end, once more, consumers will have to shoulder this price increase due to increased interest rates. In that regard, the government is doing nothing. I ask the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) whether the Governor of the Bank of Canada consulted with him last week before authorizing an increase in the discount rate of ½ per cent. If we are really serious about fighting inflation, we will have to ask each and everyone and every organization in Canada to do their share and not only ask for it, but require it. We require restraints from labour but we let the door wide open to big business, charted banks and multinationals.

According to a press report, the minister announced that he "was giving up the idea of a special tax on export profits"—I read that in La Presse and I quote:

> The Federal government has just provided organized labour with a new opportunity to howl at the inequity of the anti-inflation program.
> Yielding to pressures that have been building up since the program was announced last October, the Cabinet has decided not to implement its planned 100 per cent tax on part of the export profits of Canadian businesses. Instead, the Anti-Inflation Board will merely monitor the profits of export companies and the way such profits are reinvested.
> In other words, export companies may, theoretically make unlimited profits on their export market transactions, without being bothered by Mr. Pepin's Board. On the other hand, their Canadian employees will not be allowed to share this manna: they will remain subject to wage controls, which are more than ever the basis of the anti-inflation program.

Those are, Mr. Speaker, two examples which show that the anti-inflation legislation and regulations are not really implemented in all fairness with repect to every Canadian, whatever his occupation in society.

With regard to the interest rate increase, the governor of the Bank of Canada has stated that it was intended to slow down the rate of growth of the money supply. The authorities of our central bank intend thus to maintain a rigid credit policy. This may surprise financial quarters who would expect, to some extent, a lowering of the rate that serves as a barometer for money rental in Canada.

Even financiers do not agree. How can one give good advice to the government on its financial policy, on its economic policy, that might ensure greater well-being of the people and allow low-income workers to upgrade their confidence not only in Canada but in the government that manages the affairs of this country?

Last week, the right hon. Prime Minister, in reply to a question I raised in the House, asked me whether the hon. member had a formula that would enable the government to finance the public sector more adequately. I took good note of his question and I want to advise him that there is a formula which, to my mind, would deserve to be tried out and which certainly could not give worse results than the ones that are advocated and applied by this government.

Mr. Speaker, there is a way the government can raise the standard of living of all Canadians, without increasing anything at all, without taking anything from anyone, without paralyzing the economy, without bringing about inflation or deflation. And that would be to have public capital financed by means of interest-free credit advances, issued by the bank that belongs to all Canadians, known as the Bank of Canada. The government would now have a wonderful opportunity of applying that policy and I mean with regard to the construction of the building at the corner of Wellington and Bank that will house the offices of the Bank of Canada.

This will be quite an experience; it is so close to this Parliament and so if the experience is successful, as I am convinced it will be, all hon. members will have a chance to visit our bank, our institution in our own building, paid by us and not financed by New York financiers, who are leading New York City to bankruptcy.

Such a measure would result in lower taxes, those taxes which the government collects to pay the interest on the public debt or the borrowings he makes, and would correspondingly increase the money supply available to consumers to buy the goods they need. Although it is true that Social Crediters do not find much support for their ideas on the setting up of a national dividend or a minimum guaranteed annual income, some people on the other hand are in favour of the creation of new interest-free credit to finance public capital.

An economist named Theobald considered this problem of government financing. He came to the conclusion arrived at by the members of the Social Credit Party a long time ago, namely the financing of public capital through new interest-free credits. This economist goes on to say, and I quote:

> A government has three methods of obtaining the funds necessary to meet its obligations. First they can tax the people and the institutions to get possession of their money . . .

—this is the method used in Canada—

> . . . Secondly, they can borrow money from the people and the institutions and pay interest on the borrowings. Thirdly, they can simply create money and use the funds created for their purchases.

This is the formula we advocate for public financing of long-term capital expenditures. I continue:

> One thing everybody agreed on in the years 1936 was that the government should never create money. This opposition to the creation of money was based on the belief that the demand for goods should always equal supply as long as the government did not interfere with economy. Another economist, Keynes, destroyed this belief by demonstrating that demand and supply were not necessarily always equal in wealthy countries.

Keynes, the economist, inspired many governments in the last years.

There are several methods to fill the gap between supply and demand. It would be possible, Mr. Speaker, to lower the supply level without affecting materially the demand by paying the same salary for shorter hours. It would then be possible to increase the demand by telling the people that more gooods are necessary for a decent life and a better standard of living.

[Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse).]

> This government could simply fill the gap between the actual and potential production by building wharves, clearing slums, controlling pollution because untapped ressources would be found in the economy. The government would not have to raise its revenues through taxes and borrowings; money could be simply created out of additional funds without imposing any inflation since, by definition, there would be no shortage of goods.

This is, Mr. Speaker, the testimony of American economist Robert Theobald who thinks it is possible to democratize money and use new interest-free credits for the development and capital goods of our country. To this end, I suggest that the government use the Anti-Inflation Board to educate the people on the government financing system and see to it to make everyone understand the simple facts and the functions of money, whether it be coins, paper money or bank credits under various forms.

This does not mean that endless studies on economic and monetary policies are absolutely necessary; it means that everybody should be able to understand, first, that money is a means of exchange, a payment method in itself: it is without any value and does not cost anything. Intrinsically, it has no value at all. Second, the control and regularization of the volume of money required must be materially improved to meet the needs of modern progress and of change due to an economy of capitalization.

In the past few years, there are projects under way with a view to improving energy resources, extending the heritage, improving shipping and port facilities, and finally all public utilities needed by the Canadian people. All these projects would become important assets for society and would furthermore create a great number of jobs. These projects would cost hundreds of million dollars, but it would be less than nothing compared to the advantages for the Canadian people. It would be applying, I think, Keynes' theory who advocated so strongly the fact of making financially possible what is physically workable.

But in order to do so, we should set up a national credit bureau which would provide the necessary funds for the production of goods and services which would benefit the whole of society. This would create jobs as long as natural ressources remain plentiful. In a peace time free society the over supply of labour cannot be forced into various occupations but with education, retraining, good wages and proper housing, it can be enticed into accepting other jobs. We must remember that the gross national product can and should be increased if we wish to ensure a reasonable standard of living for all Canadians.

Never before, Mr. Speaker, has our ability to produce, to move and to communicate been as great as it is now, yet this government's demands and requests that we tighten our belts are inevitably conducive to controls that producers impose on themselves in various ways. Let us consider, for instance, the case of the dairy producers who must necessarily decrease their production if they do not want to be penalized.

As a matter of fact, representations were made today asking the government to take steps to prevent that their annual revenues be decreased by 19 per cent compared with last year's. All those Canadians who participated today in the demonstration on Parliament Hill do not ask for the impossible, they only want that justice be done. They do not want charity.

If the government in its wisdom decides before Wednesday to reduce the production quotas of industrial milk producers, it has in turn to increase the subsidies to allow them to get at least the same revenue as last year's. Generally the government's anti-inflation legislation provides for a 10 per cent increase in the wage earners' revenues and, as regards this group of Canadians called industrial milk producers, if the policy is not improved within two days, those producers will suffer, in 1976-77, a decrease of about 19 per cent in their revenues.

Those figures are proven by accurate calculations of production costs, operation costs, sale prices and revenues that may be obtained by the operators. I therefore believe the government should show some of its teeth to those neglecting to pay their taxes. The Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Cullen) recently answered a question under my name on the Order Paper. He informed us that multinational and national corporations had income tax arrears in the order of $223 million as of March 31, 1975, on which they pay 6 per cent interest. There is no mention of whether they pay a penalty as do private taxpayers who are penalized for late filing. And if income tax officers in the Department of National Revenue so decide, because they have every power, even under Section 152 (7) of the Income Tax Act which provides, and this I checked once more yesterday to answer a taxpayer, even when returns are filed in time, even if the taxpayer acted in good faith; if the tax officer decides not to accept his figures and assess him as he is empowered by the act, the statute allows them to blow hot and cold. I feel this is utterly unfair.

I would urge the government to show some firmness in respect of those big corporations neglecting to pay their taxes in time, and give part of the taxes so recouped to the Canadian Milk Board so that industrial milk producers may remain in business and hope to go on serving the people of Canada. I feel that within two days the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) together with his colleague the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) and other members of cabinet should review that policy, in all fairness to industrial milk producers. I believe it is in the interest of every Canadian that the policy be more adequate and take into better account the representations by industrial milk producers.

For these reasons, Mr. Speaker, I feel Bill C-89 does not include many significant improvements to the Anti-Inflation Act. True, some provision was made for appeal in certain circumstances, but basically the large organizations will still be all powerful. They will go on doing as they wish, because clearly accounting procedures give them all kinds of legal ways to come down with balance sheets that fill their needs and allow them to go around the act, to make more profits notwithstanding anti-inflation legislation such as the one passed in Parliament in December.

I hope the government will take heed of representations by hon. members in this House. I realize that my representations on behalf of low or middle income people have probably less weight than those made by persons contributing generously to election funds, but nevertheless I think it is my duty and that of all hon. members to stand for something which, in my opinion is a just cause.

And if after a while we realize that these people take advantage of their representives or of the situation, it would still be time to come up with another law to bring them back to their senses. But so far I admit that this Anti-Inflation Act does not treat fairly low income earners and does not provide sufficient enforcement to make large commercial organizations or big corporations realize that we in this country are faced with a crucial issue which we must straighten out all together, that is inflation.

If we succeed in putting our economy back on its feet, I hope we shall be able to allow our workers, the labour force of Canada, to work and earn a living. If the government and the cabinet really want to fight inflation, we shall have to use a lot of money to put everyone to work, to increase our gross national product so that we may say in the very near future: The gross national product has increased, unemployment is down. If we can really say those things honestly, we shall be able to say that we have done something to fight inflation, money will once more play its true role and the dollar will regain its real value.

However I am convinced—and I would like to be wrong—that the action we are taking to try to fight the problems caused by an unbalanced economic and financial system will not succeed in meeting this objective because it does not go at the root of the problem. This is the monetary system, milk which is in the hands of private agencies which exploit this system as if it were a commodity instead of using it like a service. This is the difference. A monetary system is a service and not a commodity. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I close by asking once again that something effective be done in the next two days to help industrial milk producers in Canada.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Is the House ready for the question? Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

[English]

Mr. Paproski: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I believe it has been agreed to allow this bill to go to the standing committee on division.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Is it agreed, on division?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

QUARANTINE ACT

AMENDMENT TO EXTEND APPLICATION TO DANGEROUS DISEASES

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare) moved that Bill S-31, to amend the Quarantine

Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I would like today to move second reading of Bill S-31, an Act to amend the Quarantine Act. The intent of the substantive amendments proposed is to provide the legislative authority for prompt and appropriate action at Canadian ports of entry to prevent the importation into Canada of dangerous diseases in addition to the four infectious and contagious diseases named in the Schedule to the Quarantine Act.

The Quarantine Act is at present contained in Chapter 33, 1st supplement, of the Revised Statutes of Canada and was proclaimed in force on January 1, 1972. The act of 1972 was then a recasting of the original Quarantine Act which had been in effect for over one hundred years. Indeed, the orginal act was passed in the very first session of the Canadian Parliament in 1868, and, except for two amendments introduced in 1918 and 1919, remained in force until the 1972 revision.

There is an old proverb that goes: "There are three things done well in haste: flying from the plague, escaping quarrels and catching flies". A strange combination, but undoubtedly words of wisdom in their days. However, social medicine has made tremendous advances and we no longer deal with a plague by fleeing, but rather try to contain it and prevent it from spreading to new areas.

In the early nineteenth century in London, for example, cholera would periodically be brought in by travellers from abroad and a fresh epidemic started. This situation could have been prevented by effective quarantine laws. The concept of quarantine is not new however. The word "quarantine" dates back to at least the 14th century and was ascribed to that 40 days of isolation imposed by the local government on travellers arriving in certain European ports in an attempt to prevent them from infecting the local inhabitants. The proposed amendments, however, do not prescribe a period of isolation as drastic as 40 days.

The present Quarantine Act is designed to minimize the risk of importation into Canada of the four major quarantinable diseases. At the time of the last revision of the act these major diseases of concern were smallpox, cholera, yellow fever and plague, all highly contagious and infectious diseases. Fortunately, these diseases have been eradicated in Canada.

Great improvements in global health have unquestionably resulted from preventive health measures applied in Canada and in other countries throughout the world. For example, smallpox, I am glad to say, appears to have been all but wiped out. The latest bulletin on the subject issued by the World Health Organization shows the existence of only 61 reported cases, confined to one small area of the world, of this once dreaded disease. However, until major quarantinable diseases completely disappear from the world, legislation which provides the authority to inspect, examine and, if necessary detain, international passengers and international carriers entering Canada must be retained. This is particularly true in the light of the present jet age, when high capacity aircraft can transport over 400 people to Canada from any corner of the globe within a single day. As I mentioned, the present legislation provides Canada with quarantine powers only in respect to the four scheduled diseases-cholera, plague, smallpox and yellow fever.

The diseases—and only these diseases—are recognized by the World Health Organization as requiring quarantine control. Through its adherence to the International Health Regulations, Canada has quarantine control only over these four infectious diseases.

The present act is quite specific with regard to the four scheduled diseases and measures are currently being taken to safeguard Canadians against them. For example, quarantine stations have been designated at all major ports of entry and at the present time, there are 17 of these across Canada. Of this number, six relate to maritime traffic and the remaining 11 to air traffic. However, recent international experience and new developments have demonstrated that a vacuum exists in the present act. New and highly communicable diseases, such as Lassa fever and Marburg virus disease, have appeared in some countries.

[English]

It may be recalled that last December, in response to a question from the hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Rynard) I mentioned that I proposed to introduce into the House during the current session a number of changes to the Quarantine Act. These changes are now before the House and are intended to deal with such dangerous exotic diseases as Lassa fever.

A few words about this disease might help to put things into perspective. Lassa fever was first recognized after two American missionary nurses died of a mysterious, undiagnosed illness, in the town of Lassa in northeastern Nigeria, in 1969. Subsequent laboratory investigations revealed that Lassa was a dangerous, acute, infectious disease caused by a virus which was isolated, incidentally, only about six years ago. There is evidence to suggest that the disease is not actually new, but that it has been indigenous to certain countries in West Africa for many years. It is, however, only since 1969 that it has been recognized by specific, medically accepted nomenclature. Subsequent outbreaks of the disease in West Africa have confirmed its very high mortality rate.

It is the tendency for the virus to be passed from person to person and the concern that it could be spread across continents by rats carrying the virus that makes the disease so potentially dangerous in the world. This fact, along with the increase in the speed, volume and worldwide scope of international travel, results in a potential threat to Canadian public health. Approximately 40 million travellers pass through Canadian ports of entry annually. Should any one of these be a carrier of a new or heretofore unknown dangerous disease, there is not sufficient provision for emergency authority in the act at present to detain or isolate that person, even if the disease is confirmed as presenting a grave danger to public health. Authority does exist in the present act to permit quarantine control of diseases other than the four now listed in the schedule, but only through the passage of an order in council adding the new disease to the schedule.

Our problem with the provisions of this section is twofold. In the first instance, addition to the schedule of, for example, Lassa fever as a disease subject to regular quarantine control would not accord with Canada's obligations under the international health regulations. I mentioned earlier that the four diseases listed at present were the only ones currently recognized by the World Health Organization as being subject to the international health regulations. These regulations stipulate that adequate control of these diseases justifies appropriate routine quarantine action being taken by signatory countries, of which Canada is one, with no reservations.

I have used Lassa fever as an example of the type of disease that is causing some concern, but the same situation applies to other dangerous diseases both known and, as yet, unknown. It is obviously impossible, in advance of an emergency, to list a disease that, while widely accepted as highly dangerous, has not yet achieved international identification nor consensus as to its medical name.

It is, therefore, necessary to honour the international protocol while at the same time providing the means whereby, during an emergency, quarantine control can be exercised over all—and I repeat, all—dangerous diseases. If a dangerous disease does enter Canada, that disease will be added to the schedule by means of an order in council and will remain on the schedule until the danger has passed. Thus, the disease in question will not—I repeat, will not—be subject to routine or regular quarantine control, but merely to emergency control for a limited period.

This leads, naturally, to the second problem which is one of time. There is simply not enough time between the appearance at a port of entry of a new suspect disease and the passage of an order in council to ensure that appropriate protective measures can be taken. Immediate detention and isolation is imperative in such cases; thus, the method provided for in the present act is obviously inadequate for the purpose of meeting such an emergency. What this bill before us will do is allow immediate detention of persons suspected or known to have a dangerous disease which is not on the schedule until measures are taken to add that disease to the schedule. Again I emphasize that this would be an emergency control for a limited period only.

Other countries, such as the United States and Great Britain, have had for several years emergency quarantine powers for diseases other than the four recognized by the international health regulations. It is, in effect, similar emergency powers that are now being proposed for Canada but with the added provision for judicial review of any detentions ordered in such circumstances.

What, specifically, is being proposed, Mr. Speaker, are two major changes. The first is to ensure a means within the provisions of the Quarantine Act whereby a quarantine officer at a port of entry may, in an emergency situation and with the approval of the Minister of National Health and Welfare, order the dentention of a person arriving in Canada whom that quarantine officer reasonably believes to be the carrier, or to have been recently in close proximity to a carrier, of a contagious or infectious disease not listed in the schedule to the act.

Such unlisted diseases are referred to as "other diseases" and are, intentionally, not listed in a separate schedule to the act in order to provide needed flexibility. This detention will be for a period of time not to exceed 14 days. An important feature of the amendment is the reflection of the government's concern that the Canadian Bill of Rights be fully respected in any detention so ordered. Proposed subsection 8.1(6) makes it necessary for the Minister of National Health and Welfare to justify, within 48 hours, the detention order to a judge of the superior court of the province in which the person is detained. In such instances, the judge is required to hear the case within one day and is empowered to revoke, vary or confirm the detention order.

The second major change would provide for detention in those cases where it is definitely determined, as opposed to being suspected, by a quarantine officer that a person arriving in Canada has a disease considered dangerous to public health. Detention in these circumstances would, again, require ministerial approval.

In addition to the two major amending clauses that I have outlined, there are six further amendments the purpose of which is either to clarify the existing act or to make changes consequential to the substantive amendments.

[Translation]

Before concluding, Mr. Speaker, I should like to make it clear that the proposed amendments before us now form just a part of the overall contingency provisions which are being developed and revised on a continuing basis. For example, in response to the December question from the hon. member from Simcoe North, I also mentioned that a working group had been formed to look into isolation facilities. Because the interest of provinces in the provision of adequate isolation accomodation at strategic locations across Canada parallels that of the federal government, the participation by provincial officials is an important aspect of the discussions of the working group. Recommendations can be expected from these discussions on the type of facility needed to treat the most virulent of diseases.

To summarize, Mr. Speaker, the amendments proposed are both logical and essential if all due precautions are to continue to be taken to preserve the health of Canadians—particularly in the light of ever changing world conditions. I expect and hope the bill under discussion will be regarded as akin to insurance protection against a potential threat but, like many such contingency provisions, will be rarely if ever utilized.

For example, under the present act, there have been no involuntary detentions within the last 15 years, though, of course, there have been routine medical checks performed on ships and planes a number of times.

[English]

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I should like to thank hon. members opposite for their agreement to proceed with the speedy consideration of this bill.

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, at the beginning of my remarks I wish to say we do not have any intention of trying to block this bill. We do, however, have a number of reservations to express because this bill will not only affect visitors to this country in the near future but in fact will become permanent legislation affecting all Canadians who come and go from this country.

It was interesting to note the minister indicated that the first Quarantine Act was passed in 1868. That act, which was introduced by the Conservative government of the day, lasted for 50 years. The government at that time had so much foresight that no changes were required for a period of 50 years, as opposed to the present administration which passed some amendments four years ago, in 1972, which are now no longer adequate. I think this is a clear indication of the type of legislation lacking in foresight which the present government might bring forward.

One thing that has concerned me somewhat during the past week or so is the great degree of pressure applied on this side of the House by the other side to try to shoot this bill through the House as quickly as a bullet would go past one's nose. I do not like passing, with such haste, bills which have such far reaching results. In addition, we as an opposition party have an obligation to the people of Canada to ensure that anything that passes this House with such haste is not legislation which in some way may be harmful to the country. We are very much interested in seeing good laws passed through this chamber and we must ensure that all the facts are on the table before passage is approved.

One suggestion I heard as a reason for this bill—I am sorry the minister did not refer to it—is the fact that we will be hosting the Olympics in the summer of 1976; and we need this bill to take appropriate precautions. But the minister chose to talk about Lassa fever instead. We know Lassa fever has been around for some time—even before the last changes were made to the Quarantine Act. The minister did not indicate whether the Olympics had anything to do with the desire to speed though parliament legislation, or whether it would make any difference in terms of how we receive Olympic athletes from areas where these exotic diseases exist or from areas where other diseases not mentioned in the Quarantine Act might exist. Perhaps the minister could clarify this matter, as the point is significant.

The minister suggested that we must pass this bill in order to control the spread in this country of Lassa fever and other virus fevers, including those at present unknown diseases which may come up in the future. He shows commendable farsightedness in the concern about diseases yet unknown. Perhaps this bill will fare better than the previous bill passed in 1972 which was in force only four years. This one may be in force longer, as it covers diseases known and yet unknown.

The minister is asking for far reaching quarantine powers to be extended to himself and his officials. Before we grant such far reaching powers we must make sure they are needed. Under the provisions of this bill, athletes coming to this country from West Africa or Europe, and Canadians who have been visiting those areas, could be quarantined for lengthy periods. Therefore, we should know specifically to what use he will put the powers the minister seeks. The bill does not specify how these powers are to be used and is, therefore, deficient in that regard. As this bill will affect people so directly, it would be useful if we could see the regulations which will be in force under this law before we pass the bill so that we may know exactly what we are passing.

We do not yet know how widespread Lassa fever is. According to some authorities, only about 100 cases have been confirmed, world wide. I am told that there could be many more unconfirmed cases. Perhaps we are over-reacting to a potential threat to Canadians which is very small. That is how it seems at first glance. Appearing before the standing committee of the other place when this bill was being considered there, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Health and Welfare said recently, in 1976, that the World Health Organization had rejected an application Canada had made two years earlier to have Lassa fever added to the list of notifiable major quarantinable diseases. The parliamentary secretary said:

> The application was rejected on the grounds that not enough was known at that time about the disease, and that it was doubtful that including Lassa fever in the international health regulations would be effective in controlling the spread of the disease.

Since the World Health Organization obviously has not changed its mind about the utility of listing Lassa fever among quarantinable diseases and since Lassa fever is the only disease to which the amendments to the Quarantine Act might apply, it is fair to ask if there is any point to this bill at all. The members of the World Health Organization are experts possessed of information. If they question the inclusion of the disease in the list of quarantinable diseases and our present methods of controlling the spread of the disease, should we not examine the matter further?

In short, although the bill, ostensibly, is designed to control the spread of diseases like Lassa fever and the Marburg virus, it does not mention them specifically. Why not? Is the minister afraid of international repercussions? Does he think that some countries, particularly West African countries, those sending Olympic athletes to this country, will accuse us of detaining their citizens under the pretext that we are controlling the spread of Lassa fever in this country? If the government wants to avoid such accusations, it should be more frank about the intent of the bill, and we could deal with this matter more easily.

The minister referred several times to it, as do the explanatory notes to the bill, that these extraordinary powers are needed to deal with emergency situations. So far, no one has defined such emergencies or what action is contemplated in these emergency situations. This omission raises questions about the minister's sincerity in dealing with this question. He ought to tell the House what emergencies the government has in mind and how the government proposes to deal with them. In the past, the quarantine officer made decisions regarding quarantine. This made sense, as quarantine officers were either physicians or nurses working under the direction of a physician. The minister proposes a different approach. Apparently he does not trust physicians to make the right decision: he, himself, wants that authority. Why does the minister want this authority? Why is he taking this power away from physicians who are trained experts in the field and can be relied on to make the right decision? He ought to explain that matter as well.

Health authorities agree that it is difficult to intercept carriers of quarantinable disease at their point of entry to this country. It is almost impossible to do this, as 40 million travellers cross our borders every year. I do not see how this bill will be effective in preventing the entry to this country of carriers of disease. In today's world of rapid travel, an infected disease carrier can travel from foreign parts to Canada very quickly. Hence, would it not be better not to insist on controls at the border and to insist on more stringent examination of travellers coming from areas of known infection or in which disease is endemic? The minister suggests that we will tighten border controls. He did not refer to more stringent physical examination of people coming from areas rife with infection or where disease may be endemic. He did not indicate what kind of authority will be given to officials at the ports of entry, or specifically how they are going to detain people. It comes back to the same thing: under normal circumstances we have 40 million travellers coming through our ports of entry and with the Olympics there will perhaps be a few million more.

If the minister is concerned about Lassa fever it would be logical for him to instruct the quarantine officers specifically to watch for and perhaps even require people coming from areas in West Africa, where this disease exists, to be examined. If he is concerned about Marburg virus fever, perhaps he should look at the possibility of examining people from those areas, the athletes and indeed the fans coming to watch the athletes in action. Perhaps they, too, should be examined at the ports of entry. However, the minister does not say they are going to do that. We are left in a complete vacuum as to what the government will be doing. Greater powers are being asked for without our being told how they will be used.

The minister also indicated there were some 17 quarantine stations in the country—six maritime stations and 11 air stations. I have a document before me entitled "The Canadian contingency plan for Lassa fever" which states that at this time there are no safe facilities in Canada for isolation of patients or for the protection of attending staff and the avoidance of laboratory bio-hazards from this disease.

The minister has not told us what he is going to do about that. It is fine to isolate them, but the fact is we do not appear to have safe facilities in which to isolate them; by that I mean safe from the point of view of spreading the disease to people who work in the quarantine area. If it is a laboratory which will have to be involved in confirming what the disease is in fact, we do not have laboratories that are sufficiently safe to protect the laboratory workers from the disease in any of these 17 areas to which the minister referred. He has not given us any assurance that we can indeed handle these isolation cases with safety as far as our own workers are concerned. On page 5 it is said that the existing facilities admittedly do not meet bio-hazard safety standards in dealing with such dangerous communicable diseases, and a definitive contingency plan for Canada must await the availability of a purpose-designed isolation facility and maximum security laboratory.

It sounds from that as though the contingency plan with which we are now dealing is perhaps a little premature. We do not have the kind of designed isolation facilities which are secure, medically speaking, that are required.

With those comments and reservations, I again ask the minister to give us answers to these questions and inform us before trying to ram this bill through committee. We will, of course, object to any attempt to ram it through the committee. We will insist upon hearing a number of witnesses whom we believe are experts in this area, in addition to the experts provided by the minister's department.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, both the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) and the hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Yewchuk) have made reference to the history of this legislation; therefore, I need not say anything in that respect.

It is interesting to note that we are dealing with an act that has been on the statute books of Canada, in one way or another, since the year one. Even though it has not been amended very many times during a century or more, it is understandable that in these days of new diseases and new viruses, coupled with the speed of transportation, a new look at our quarantine provisions could well be necessary. Speaking generally, we concede the need for this legislation. Although there are questions we may want to ask when the bill gets to committee, we are prepared to give it our support.

Like the previous speaker and his colleagues, when this bill was put into our hands one of the first approaches we made to it was from the standpoint of civil liberties. We wanted to know whether any rights, either of Canadians going abroad and coming back home or of visitors or immigrants to this country, were being set aside.

As I say, we have looked at the bill rather critically from that point of view. I must say that we do not see it as a curtailment or denial of civil liberties. Canadians are not, by this bill, being denied the right to come back to Canada. Immigrants or visitors are not, by this bill, being denied the right to come into this country if they qualify under the Immigration Act, and so on. What is being done is that if persons are suspected, not only of the four diseases that are already listed but of new diseases whether known or unknown, they will be subject to quarantine for a time equal to the incubation period of that disease, or sent to their destination under certain agreements to meet with medical authorities, and so on. On that basis we do not see it as an interference with civil liberties.

I had hoped that I might be able to finish before five o'clock. However, I will need another four or five minutes. Therefore, I had better call it five o'clock.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. McCleave): It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Gilbert)—Fisheries—Seals—request for tabling of report on decline in population and need for decreasing quotas; the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski)—Agriculture—Effect on export trade of removal of transportation subsidy on flour—Government action; the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay)—Regional Economic Expansion—Inquiry whether there are any plans for port of Pictou, Nova Scotia.

It being five o'clock p.m., pursuant to order made Friday, February 27, 1976, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private member's business as listed on today's order paper, namely, notices of motions. I understand it is the wish of the House that we proceed to motion No. 37 in the name of the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Roche). If that is understood, notice of motions No. 2 in the name of the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander), No. 15 in the name of the hon. member for Hamilton-Wentworth (Mr. O'Sullivan), No. 19 in the name of the hon. member for Laprairie (Mr. Watson), and No. 20 in the name of the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Diefenbaker), shall stand at the request of the government.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

THE CANADIAN CONSTITUTION

SUGGESTED FEDERAL GOVERNMENT CONSIDERATION OF COMPREHENSIVE PLAN OF DECENTRALIZED GOVERNMENT

Mr. Douglas Roche (Edmonton-Strathcona) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider a comprehensive plan of decentralization, as envisioned by the Special Joint Committee of the Senate and House of Commons on the Constitution of Canada, with special emphasis on, (a) the constitutional division powers, (b) decentralizing the decision-making process within federal government departments, (c) improved intergovernmental relations.

He said: Mr. Speaker, in conclusion—I have found this a good way to begin a speech—decentralization may not be a glamorous word but it is one of the most important words in the political lexicon today. In its fullness, it provides a bold, exciting new way to restore the vitality of Canada. For it is through decentralization that the country can be pulled back from overdependency on federal government officials and Canadians across the land provided with a way to develop their opportunities.

I hope to show why, and how, the federal government ought to press vigorously a decentralization policy in a way that will enable municipalities today to cope with the explosion of social problems brought about by urbanization. Before long in this debate a government spokesman will be telling us that the federal government is already committed to decentralization. Actually, the present policies of the federal government make decentralization a game of musical chairs adding to the proliferation of government. I am arguing here that decentralization, first of all, depends upon a determination to slow down and control the haphazard growth of government in Canada.

This goal is all the more important when we grasp the implication of two basic trends in Canada: first, government spending now accounts for 40 per cent of the gross national product; second, 19 per cent of Canada's work force, two million people, are on the public payroll. What this means is that government at all levels is growing faster than the economy. The Economic Council of Canada has warned us about this escalation. Unless it is slowed, the spending of the three levels of government will exceed 50 per cent of the GNP before the end of this decade. Provincial expenditures are rising fastest of all. This is principally because of delivery programs in the social security area which are direct offshoots of the state of the economy and the federal government's economic and social policies.

[The Acting Speaker (Mr. McCleave).]

The trend toward a dominantly governmental economy is now a chief characteristic of our society. That trend must be broken, because the increasing intervention of the state in economic and social life will substantially change—for the worse—the character of our society. Increasing tax burdens on private economic activity will inevitably lead to the elimination of that activity, and the increasing dependency of people on government programs will result in diminished initiative in the much-needed further development of Canada.

Around the world people are asking: Can democracy cope with the complex problems of a modern, interdependent global community? There is a "crisis of political faith" in the ability of democratic governments to respond, according to the distinguished social scientist, Robert Heilbroner—"All the polls indicate a serious dropping off of public belief in the efficacy and trustworthiness of government." Canada is by no means exempt from this voter disenchantment. Distrust of a large, powerful and faceless bureaucracy in Ottawa is intensifying. People are paying higher taxes than ever to support an ever-growing government—and yet the problems of transportation, housing and safety in society are getting worse. Decentralization is not a magic answer to all this, but without decentralization the problems of the municipalities, the level of government closest to the people, will become chaotic.

The rate of urbanization is nothing short of a phenomenon. Before the end of this century, 94 per cent of Canadians will be urbanized and three-quarters will live in 12 major cities. Urbanization is caused by an interlocking set of developments spawned by exploding technology. Government efforts must be directed toward managing the process of urbanization. The special problems of urbanization—public assistance, transportation, environmental management, leisure, recreation and housing—interact on one another and demand more money which municipalities have no way of raising, thus exacerbating their dependence on provincial and federal government grants.

The quality of life in urban centres is diminishing, despite local efforts; the institutional framework of government was established long before the social impact of urbanization was ever dreamed of. As the role and level of government in Canada has expanded, each level—federal, provincial and municipal—has become involved in areas in which the other levels previously had a special or exclusive interest. Complexity and fragmentation of government has followed. This has resulted in a proliferation of duplicative, autonomy-seeking special agencies in each level of government and hence has highlighted the problem of a decision-making mechanism which can no longer respond to the needs of a society in an era of accelerating social change.

Thus, a new philosophy at the top is needed to meet the super problems of big government and urbanization. Only a new philosophy can counter the mounting evidence that government is big, rather than strong; flabby, rather than powerful—that it costs a great deal and doesn't achieve very much. More tinkering with government will not be enough. That is why the present federal government's policies on decentralization are inadequate. They are focused on spreading out certain government departments such as DREE, Revenue, and Supply and Services, and diversifying the sources of federal purchasing, as the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Chrétien) said on September 3, 1975, when he announced a task force on decentralization of government. This approach is too narrow a concept of decentralization. A comprehensive plan based on a philosophy of streamlining is urgently needed—not more piecemeal solutions to mounting problems.

Mr. Speaker, there are three basic areas of decentralization I wish to touch on, first, the constitutional division of powers. Decentralization is a theme running through the report on the Constitution of Canada produced by the special joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons in June, 1972. I see in the chamber this afternoon the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville (Mr. MacGuigan) who was co-chairman of that committee. I would welcome his contribution to the debate. After recommending a new constitution, the committee's second recommendation was as follows:

> A new Canadian constitution should be based on functional considerations, which would lead to greater decentralization of government powers in areas touching cultural and social policy and to greater centralization of powers which have important economic effects at the national level. Functional considerations also require greater decentralization in many areas of government administration.

The principal way in which constitutional decentralization can be brought about is contained in recommendation No. 50 which sets the division of powers in a more modern context as follows:

> Concurrent powers which predominantly affect the national interest should grant paramountcy to federal parliament and those which predominantly affect provincial or local interests should grant paramountcy to the provincial legislature.

Therefore, a complete policy on decentralization begins with full support of the constitutional committee's recommendations on decentralization and a commitment to implement them. A more functional allocation of governmental powers will benefit all regions.

As the President of the Treasury Board has himself noted: "Alienation exists in other parts of Canada, especially in the west. The reason for this is that the federal government appears insensitive and unresponsive, just as it used to seem to Quebeckers." In every area of Canada people feel that the constitution is preventing their governments from doing what they would like to see them do.

The committee proposes an expansion of provincial powers in such areas as income support, criminal law, marriage and divorce, educational TV, taxing powers and international arrangements. The committee supports limitation of federal powers with respect to appointments to the Senate and the Supreme Court and with respect to federal spending in fields of provincial jurisdiction. Correspondingly, greater centralization is necessary in the regulation of the economy. Hence, there should be a transfer of some existing provincial powers to the federal parliament, for example, an increase in federal jurisdiction over air and water pollution, international and interprovincial trade and commerce, incomes, securities regulation, financial institutions, unfair competition and foreign ownership.

The constitutional committee made a major recommendation concerning decentralization in the field of social security: the federal government would determine over-all spending in such programs as old age pensions, supplements and family allowances, and the provinces would determine how this total was to be distributed within limits to preserve national standards and maintain the principle of redistributing income.

There is today a great deal of confusion over jurisdiction and increasing political rivalry in promoting bigger social benefits. Integrated economic-social planning between the federal and provincial governments is imperative to prevent the escalation of universal benefits into a welfare state. Strategies for growth, housing and transportation are but three of the items in which the people will best be served by the three levels of government working closely together.

In considering ways to decentralization it should be reaffirmed that the federal parliament must retain the primary responsibility for general economic policy in the country. Thus, decentralization does not rule out centralization in primary areas. The federal parliament must have sufficient economic powers to regulate and influence the economy. However, in fulfilling this constitutional responsibility of centralization, the federal government should explore more ways of decentralizing its operation so that federal policies can be regionally adapted.

It is not satisfactory to leave this matter to the new committee of officials dealing with federal-provincial relations under the terms of Bill C-38—for the authority and role of the House of Commons should not be diminished. As the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) has said, "There is an inexorable danger that these new processes we are developing will bypass parliament and will mean that decisions are taken at some other place; and it is this place where, under our system, decisions are supposed to be taken."

● (1710)

I come now, Mr. Speaker, to the second item under the general heading of decentralization; that is to say, decentralizing federal government departments. Here the news is not quite so good. The importance of our policy reference to the constitution should not be diminished, for complete reform of present incompatibilities takes us directly to the constitution. However, a new constitution cannot be achieved overnight. On the other hand, we do not need a new constitution in order to improve administration, but only a new outlook. The injection of the judgments and feelings of Canadians across the country into a more regionalized government service would be tangible proof that the central government wishes to reach out to all Canadians.

Historically, 25 per cent of federal civil servants work in the Ottawa-Hull area, with three-quarters dispersed throughout the rest of Canada. The United States appears to do a better job of decentralizing, since only 12 per cent of the American public service is in and around Washington, D.C.

More importantly, in Canada the decision-making process is still clearly centred in Ottawa; only 14 per cent of senior executives are located outside the national capital region. Most executives have had no field experience and they do not want to go to regional centres because they believe their prospects for career advancement reside primarily in the national capital region. How can the federal government be made more sensitive to the needs and aspirations of Canadians when ambitious public servants consider field assignments to be equivalent to exile?

How, indeed, can we believe that the federal government is serious about decentralization when we see in the 1976-77 estimates that the federal public works department will spend more money on new capital construction in the city of Ottawa alone, $65 million, than in the entire four western provinces and the northern territories combined, $43 million? In fact, there will be more federal capital spending in Hull, $70 million, than in the entire west and north.

As an Albertan, I note that of the 74 capital construction projects to be carried out next year, only two new ones are found within Alberta—government buildings in Calgary and Lethbridge, with nothing, incidentally, in Edmonton. In addition to the Ottawa-Hull national capital region, Quebec will get 16 high-priced projects worth almost $93 million. Surely, I tell myself, there can be no connection between voting patterns and the awarding of public works projects in a government of such high principle that serves all the people!

That is why the present federal government's announced policies on decentralization give an illusion of improvement without ensuring the reality. Only a start has been made. Recent steps by the federal government have been the relocation of the Royal Canadian Mint in Winnipeg; announced intention of having 70 per cent of the staff of DREE in regional offices and 30 per cent in Ottawa, reversing the present proportion—only 270 Ottawa civil servants affected; the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce extending business counselling assistance to three new areas and delegating, on an experimental basis, to regional offices some granting authority. Since the government has determined that we must have Petro-Canada—our party voted against it—at least it is in Calgary and not Ottawa.

The government points with pride to the move of the supply department's cheque redemption control division to the Gaspé town of Matane, providing 250 jobs and a $2.3 million payroll. What happens to the civil servants who do not want to move? Why, they are given the option of finding jobs elsewhere in the civil service. No wonder we have a hard time distinguishing between decentralization and duplication. As the Montreal Star has noted, as long as decentralization is seen as merely a synonym for pork-barrelling, public confidence in a necessary and overdue program is likely to be weak.

The last annual report of the national capital commission suggests that "it may be possible" to reduce the percentage of the federal public service in the capital from 25 per cent to 20 per cent. This 5 per cent shift could involve 25,000 jobs. But the Ottawa civil servants aren't worried. The report says it will take 25 years to attain its objectives. Yet the Treasury Board President has said that decentralizing it to get "the highest priority". What does the government's decentralization committee have to say about this contradiction? And, by the way, of whom is this committee composed, when do they meet, and when will they report?

Decentralizing the decision-making process is of far more value than redistributing a handful of civil servants. The joint committee on the constitution of Canada recognized this and stated:

> Most Crown corporations could have their headquarters outside Ottawa, as many already have. Federal departments like agriculture, energy, mines and resources, environment, national defence and transport could have their principal offices elsewhere, and many other departments could give their regional offices more authority. Even when Ottawa must remain the effective centre of administration, a greater effort can be made to encourage regional input.

The western premiers, at the Western Economic Opportunities Conference, called for the establishment of industrial "centres of excellence" throughout the various regions of Canada. These centres would be based on natural and human resources, supported by research and marketing assistance to develop a vital economic unit capable of serving national and international markets. Such a program concept suggests clear initiative on the part of the federal government in the establishment and support of new centres of industrial activity in Canada. It would involve decentralization of the technical expertise of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce to plan and support the development of such centres, and the major funding of research activities and new industrial enterprise in cooperation with other departments of the federal government.

We can see, now, the necessity of the federal government permitting the provincial governments and various local organizations to participate in the planning of broad economic development policies, in establishing regional industrial priorities, and in the development and implementation of programs. There should be, in short, decentralization of decision-making power on assistance programs, and strengthening of regional offices.

I come now, Mr. Speaker, to the third and last item, intergovernmental relations. We have seen that constitutional reform is a long-range goal. Decentralization of the administration, while attainable in the near future, still requires structural changes. What can be accomplished immediately is more inter-governmental co-operation. A fresh spirit of federal government co-operation and consultation will do wonders in achieving decentralization of the decision-making process.

The municipalities, especially, will be helped via this method, since there is little hope for the entrenchment of expanded municipal rights in a revised constitution. Facing the crushing super problem of urbanization, the municipalities must negotiate a better tax position with the provincial and federal governments. Recognizing the plight, indeed the trap, of municipalities, the federal government could find a structural way for the inclusion of local government in the federal and provincial decision-making process. In this way, local officials would be sharing more directly in the management of urbanization—a complex social problem—rather than merely finding ways to cope with the effects of urbanization.

The joint municipal committee on intergovernmental relations which reported a couple of years ago told us, in short, that the role of local government today no longer satisfies the needs of society experiencing the process of urbanization. In brief, the federal and provincial governments cannot solve the problems of an urbanized society without the link to the community provided by local government. The municipal governments must have expanded methods of increasing their tax revenue. That is the nub of the problem, Mr. Speaker. Therefore, the municipalities want a restructuring of revenue-generating capacity and involvement in the federal and provincial decision-making process. Their demand for more participation is supported by the joint committee on the constitution. Their recommendation No. 67 says:

In the light of the injustice done municipalities by their having to rely on the property tax for the bulk of their revenue, there should be a sharing of tax fields between governments that would allow municipalities direct access to other sources of revenue.

A three-level task force of representatives from Ottawa, the provinces and the municipalities have been studying for nearly two years the problems of public finance. The report, which will soon be completed, was commissioned by the last national tri-level conference in Edmonton in 1973. It is easily predictable that the report will insist that the cities are running out of money to build and service the structures needed for an additional urban population of 12 million in the next 20 years. The property tax is a hopelessly outmoded method of revenue-raising, incapable of providing the gigantic amounts of public capital needed to continue building our cities.

I see my time has practically elapsed, Mr. Speaker, if it has not already, and I would ask the permission of the House to continue for a few minutes so I can conclude my remarks.

● (1720)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. McCleave): Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Roche: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and my colleagues. True, decentralization calls for massive changes in the financial system of Canada so that municipalities can provide the public transportation, housing, water and social services demanded by urbanization. Grants by senior governments that want the political credit for handing out money are not the answer; today there are so many millions of dollars of transfer payments being issued from one government office to another that it is impossible to keep track of it all, let alone provide accountability to the people.

Despite the constitutional inadequacies, the federal government has basic urban responsibilities that can only be exercised by partnership, not paternalism. A national urban strategy is desperately needed. But, as Toronto metro chairman Paul Godfrey, who is also president of the Canadian Federation of Mayors and Municipalities said:

"I fear the national urban strategy will be a long time coming, and that when it comes it will be revealed as having been developed by a group of civil servants peering blankly at the rest of the country through the smoke of their campfires on the Ottawa River."

Nowhere is a fair-minded federal policy more urgently needed than in the funding of rapid transit, which is the backbone of urban growth. In the 1974 election campaign, the federal government promised a significant contribution toward urban transportation capital investment. This was good news to Edmonton in the process of constructing Canada's third subway system. But the government reneged on this promise by imposing a specious definition of "commuter system" that excluded rapid transit systems that operate within municipalities. So much for any financial aid to Edmonton. This promise was fulfilled in the same manner that the promise of federal assistance—made by the Treasury Board President—for the Edmonton Cultural and Convention Center was fulfilled. That is to say, nothing. Is it any wonder that out west we no longer trust this overly-centralized federal government that is making such a mockery of the aspiration to better intergovernmental relations?

As far as we in Edmonton are concerned, the federal government's policy in urban transportation is deficient in funding, scope, timing and concept and has discriminated particularly against Edmonton. Now, when we learn of proposals to terminate the CNR transcontinental passenger service through Edmonton, we are understandably upset as well as fighting mad at a federal government that refuses to recognize the importance of Canada's fifth largest city as a key distribution and terminal centre in western Canada. The industrial growth of northern Alberta is dynamic; 90 per cent of all projects proposed or under construction are north of Red Deer. All modes of transportation, including rail passenger transport should be developed and improved, rather than eliminated.

Mr. Speaker, my conclusion has admittedly been lengthy. But true decentralization is both vast and deep. Last week, the Edmonton area members of parliament met with the city administration in Edmonton and the chamber of commerce. It is clear to me that the leaders of our community want to see implemented a new philosophy of government that will meet modern social pressures. For the quality of life at the community level will continue to be impeded unless the anomalies and pressures faced by the cities are alleviated.

Above all, decentralization demands a willingness by the federal government to implement a new system of revenue-sharing to help community leaders all over Canada cope with urbanization.

Mr. Mark MacGuigan (Windsor-Walkerville): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Edmonton- Strathcona (Mr. Roche) was quite correct in saying that the word "decentralization" is a key word in our lexicon today. I think we would all agree with this, whatever our political philosophy may be, but I do not necessarily agree entirely with the context in which he puts it. It seemed to me, particularly at times that he was getting close to the Progressive Conservative party philosophy that the less government, the better.

An hon. Member: The more government, the better, is yours.

Mr. MacGuigan: Generally speaking, I find I am in agreement with him more extensively than I am in disagreement. I want to state at the beginning, for the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert), that liberal philosophy is, more government where necessary and where it is beneficial to the people.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): No, the more government, the better the government; that is your philosophy.

Mr. MacGuigan: No, that is NDP philosophy. I am not going to speak about their philosophy today. I may have something to say about it sometime, but not in this context.

I should like to make clear one concern I have at the very beginning, and that is the enormous emphasis the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona placed on municipalities. I find this very curious, because surely decentralization is a lot more than, and not only, that. Also, the municipalities and their problems involve a lot more than this matter of decentralization. Perhaps I might make this a little bit more specific. In the province of Ontario the problem, in many respects, has been the fact that the provincial government in recent years has created, as a kind of emanation from Queen's Park, where the provincial government is located, a further centralization. The system of regional governments has been very badly worked out, as a result of which the costs of government have actually increased, yet the services to the people have not. There have been two competing bureaucracies set up in the same localities.

I do not think one can simply consider the problems of cities in the context of decentralization. There are a lot of things involved. I agree with the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona that the property tax is not a suitable tax, but this surely is not a matter of decentralization but, rather, a question involving the form of taxation you are going to use. I think we all would like to see some changes made.

The end result of the suggestion that this is to be all laid at the door of the federal government will be a perpetuation of the idea that no provincial government, like that of Ontario, has any authority or responsibility in the area, particularly if people think it is the federal government that should change the plight of our cities in Ontario when in fact it is the provincial government that has the primary responsibility. I do not think we do a service to the cause of decentralization or of reform if we do not recognize that it is the provincial governments in Canada which ought to clean up this bloody mess. I will come back to that issue in a few moments, Mr. Speaker.

I want, first, to refer to the Special Joint Committee On the Constitution of Canada which presented its report just a little over four years ago. That committee recommended both more centralization and more decentralization; more centralization, generally speaking, in respect of economic powers, and more decentralization in respect of social powers and the administration of federal government powers, and more decentralization in the federal powers which are retained in the interim before any changes can be made.

I want to quote briefly from that report. The hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona has given a pretty good summary of the committee's report, but I should like to bring it together in two or three sentences. I quote from the committee report at page 2:

> We have spoken of the need for an increase in both centralization and decentralization, depending on functional considerations. In our view greater decentralization in areas of culture and social policy would benefit all the provinces. We propose such decentralization for reasons of functionalism and flexibility, and to meet the regional differences which became obvious to us in the course of our hearings.

The committee went on the specify some of the areas in which decentralization should occur. The hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona has already referred to these. Again quoting from the report:

> On the other hand, greater centralization is necessary in the regulation of the economy. Hence there should be a transfer of some existing provincial powers to the federal parliament.

Again there are some examples to which the hon. member has already referred. Then my final quotation from that report:

> At the same time, we favour considerable administrative decentralization in the operations of the federal government. This change of administrative direction requires no change in the constitution. It does require a change of heart. It involves the recognition that geographically Canada is a very, very large country.

● (1730)

Although parliament recognizes that the considerations of that committee were constitutional ones, and no constitutional changes have taken place which reflect its recommendations, it is nevertheless fair to say that there have been many changes in federal policy as a result of the recommendations of that committee. The process of regular intergovernmental consultation has been set up, and especially the tripartite consultation between the federal government, the provinces, and the municipalities—not without considerable difficulties, I might add, in the case of this latter form of consultation because of continuing provincial objections to any formal meeting in which the federal government actually meets face to face with the municipalities. Of course we have disregarded that kind of objection which the provinces continue to make.

In other areas as well, even in the matter of the appointment of senators from the Yukon and the Northwest Territories, which creates a greater regional balance in the Senate, there was a fulfilment of the recommendations in the committee's report, as well as the very significant movement which occurred in the federal government's family allowance program, which was again the carrying out of the recommendations which the committee made with respect to income support measures.

I would like to quote again from the committee's report, recommendation 84, paragraph (3), which reads:

> Demographic grants (old age pensions, family allowances and youth allowances) and guaranteed income payments (guaranteed income supplements) should be matters of concurrent jurisdiction with limited provincial paramountcy as to the scale of benefits and the allocation of federal funds among these income support programs.

This kind of limited provincial paramountcy was written into the Family Allowance Act as a simple federal statute. It could be changed subsequently, but for all practical purposes the result is the same as if it were a constitutional change because no government is likely to change it without giving it careful consideration.

I could go on to talk about the multicultural program and other ways in which the government has implemented the report at a non-constitutional level, but I merely want to sketch the fact that there has been a considerable change in government policy as a result of the recommendations of the committee.

Not the least important of those changes has been that with respect to the general decentralization of administration which has been occurring. Partly this is just a question of giving better service to people in various areas to make sure that they are adequately served by federal offices in their areas, but I think it is more important than that; it is a chance for open decision making and shared decision-making. The hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona has referred to this and I agree thoroughly with what he had to say on it. I think this is the primary advantage of decentralization, and decentralization at the decision-making level is the most important kind. I suppose that sharing economic benefits from decentralized government offices across the country is another advantage which may occur, but I do not think that this pork-barrel aspect, if I may refer to it that way, is anything like the main reason for decentralization.

I think we should also recognize that modern technology itself does not necessarily require centralization. We should take the unemployment insurance program as an example of this. When the Unemployment Insurance Act was changed, and also computers were used for the first time in putting the whole system on a recorded basis in one central place, it was thought that the new system would be that there would be one office—in Ontario it is Belleville—and that all the operations of the Unemployment Insurance Commission which affect clients would be in Belleville. That is where the computer was to be, and from where everything was to work.

After two or three years' experience it came to be realized that this type of centralization was one which gave very poor service to the clients, and indeed was one which did not adequately take into account the kind of varied decisions which have to be made with respect to particular clients' cases. About two years ago the present minister instituted a new program of decentralization in which the regional offices which had been disbanded were upgraded, the local offices were re-established, and new local offices were established.

In addition to that there is a program for the establishment of computer terminals at most of the offices across the country, so that when the program is completed across the country the client in a particular office who goes to the wicket will be able to get very complete information as to the status of his claim right there through the use of computer terminals, and he will be able to get a decision right there from the insurance officer, which is reflected at once in the computer, and on the basis of which payment is made immediately. In other words, he gets first-quality service and he gets it face-to-face from the people who make the decisions, but because of the computer he gets it much more quickly. He would not get this if the system were centralized in Belleville and not plugged into the local community through the local unemployment insurance office.

That is an indication of the way in which government programs can reflect a desire for decentralization, and one in which the benefits are not only for the individual but also for the system because the system functions better, and even a systems specialist would see that, if he is not one whose basis is entirely mathematical.

I think that there is considerable agreement between the positions that the hon. member has advanced and those I am here enunciating, but again I should like to repeat my concern over the fact that for him this seems to come down to the municipal question. I think that the person whom decentralization should serve is the citizen. It is primarily for the purpose of giving him input into decision-making, and the proper service, as well as a regional share in his government's services. I think that any benefits that may occur to municipalities as a result of this are really incidental, and I do not think that they are primarily the responsibility of the federal government, certainly not under this kind of program.

We have to put the responsibility for municipal problems where it properly belongs, and if we do not do that, as I mentioned before, we are going to perpetuate a false impression of our provincial governments, which are not doing their jobs, because we are creating the impression that it is the federal government, which should be solving these problems.

Municipal problems today are indeed staggering. I am most familiar with those in Ontario where I see, as a result of the half worked-out and badly worked-out system of regional government, that the system has been made worse. We have a government in Ontario which is handing over to the municipalities the costs which the provincial government should be absorbing. The provincial government is saving money by making municipalities pay more, seemingly without any regard for the position in which the municipalities find themselves, and all this is being done without any relief from a proper tax base. That is a very serious problem in the province of Ontario, but it is an Ontario problem, one which the people of Ontario should solve. I dare say they should solve it by changing the government, but that is not a problem which we can solve in this House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): But Stuart Smith is supporting the government.

Mr. MacGuigan: If I may say to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), we may at least have some common ground in our attitude toward the government of Ontario.

I just want to say that I think we must be careful not to make this kind of mistake, not to think of these problems which are provincial as being federal.

The hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona is quite right in saying that there has to be a federal urban presence. The federal government itself is present under probably some 30 programs in cities, and it has a great duty to co-operate with the provinces and with the municipalities in planning, especially in the area of urban transportation. It should be co-operating more than it is, and I agree with the hon. member on that point as well, but the fact is that this responsibility of the federal government toward the municipalities is still primarily a peripheral responsibility. It is not peripheral in respect of transportation, but the heart of the municipal problem is a provincial problem, and it is only the provinces which can solve that problem. We have to keep the focus where it belongs.

● (1740)

I think it has been useful for us to have had a chance to look at the problem of decentralization. The general recognition of the need for decentralization is one of the most striking phenomena of today. This is true of business as well as of government. I do not think we should consider this as anything which is peculiar to governments alone. It is something which is a general part of human life today. As the hon. member himself suggested, it is nevertheless compatible with greater government at the international level, but only to the extent that it carefully preserves the independence and the right to make decisions which various countries around the globe have. I certainly join the hon. member in saying—and I think he did say this—that decentralization does not necessarily mean less government in the world; it means more careful government, government which is more carefully tailored to the needs of the people.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Roche: I should like to pose a question to the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville (Mr. MacGuigan). He said that I put a great deal of emphasis on having municipalities accept their own responsibility for property which they have on their doorsteps. I did dwell on that. I should like to ask the hon. member if he agrees that, without a new revenue sharing formula in this country, the municipalities are handicapped and cannot solve the problem of urbanization; that that is precisely the reason a national urban policy is needed with an initiative by the federal government which will help the municipalities to find a way which will be proper under the constitution for revenue sharing; and that it is not, consequently, correct to say that it is only the problem of the municipalities when in fact the power to tax at the principal levels in this country is held and maintained by the federal government.

Mr. MacGuigan: Mr. Speaker, if I may briefly reply, I agree with the hon. member that the problem is with respect to revenue sharing, but it is revenue sharing by the provinces. I do not think that it requires any changes between the provinces and the federal government. It requires a willingness on the part of the provinces to share their revenues with municipalities. It requires the provinces to share their income tax resources with the municipalities, but as I kept repeating it is the provinces which have the responsibility.

[Translation]

Mr. Herb Breau (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased that the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Roche) raised the question he brought before the House through notice of motion No. 37, which I do not need to read now. It is a motion which deals first with the constitutional relations between the provinces and the federal government i.e. the constitutional separation of powers, or the division of powers secondly, with the decentralization of the decision-making process among the federal departments and, lastly, with the improvement of intergovernmental relations.

Of course, this is an opportunity to speak in detail of any subject pertaining to the constitutional problem. Before raising the question of the division of powers as such and that of the powers which should remain within the provinces or those which the federal government should retain, I would simply like to add a few words about the question of the patriation of the Canadian constitution which the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) raised a few weeks ago.

I just want to say that I am happy to see that our Prime Minister has decided once again to contact the provincial premiers and ask their consent in order to repatriate the Canadian Constitution. For that is what the Prime Minister has done. He has contacted again the provincial first ministers and asked them to agree to the repatriation of the Constitution. However, the Prime Minister said that this time there should not be any obstacle in the way of the agreement, as was the case for Quebec and Victoria, in 1971. After numerous concessions by several provinces which granted certain demands from Quebec, this province refused once again to agree to the Victoria Charter and to the patriation of the Constitution.

Quebec has been acting in this manner for many years. I do not have the document in hand, but it is a fact that Quebec has always refused to give its agreement because it demanded certain a number of constitutional concessions from the federal government in the areas of immigration, of communications, and of social security, at least before 1971. Since then, there have been some administrative arrangements and apparently the question is more or less settled. But Quebec has always refused its consent to the federal government and the other provinces for the repatriation of the Constitution unless the other provinces and the federal government made concessions in those areas.

I believe that Quebec, an important province of this country, has the right to demand certain things, perhaps because of its peculiar cultural characteristics. I believe that the interests of the entire country are equally important here. I was deeply disappointed, especially in 1971, because for the first time we seemed to have reached an agreement about the repatriation of the Constitution as well as on a amendment formula, and furthermore, the Victoria Charter provided some safeguards for the French language in the country.

And for a French-speaking Canadian living outside Quebec, this is important. However, it is the province of Quebec who rejected that safeguard.

In my opinion,—

An hon. Member: Thanks to Quebec.

Mr. Breau: Yes, my friend tells me that Quebec influence has ensured the survival of the French fact. I would like to say that the Acadians and the French-speaking Canadians outside Quebec acknowledge that the linguistic, cultural and political influence of Quebec has really been beneficial to them. However, an Acadian who represents the first Frenchmen who came to North America and Canada will never accept that his language depends on Quebecers. Acadians have always maintained their language, and they were Frenchmen who settled in North America, in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick many years before other Frenchmen settled in Quebec.

Miss Bégin: Many years before? Be more precise!

Mr. Breau: Many years before! I shall look up the history books for the benefit of the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of External Affairs, and I shall report to her. I merely say that Champlain came to Nova Scotia before going to Quebec.

I would like to say that by systematically objecting to the repatriation of the constitution, Quebec takes a position that smacks of blackmail. It is saying to the rest of Canada, perhaps to Anglophones or to the Ontario people who want to repatriate the constitution, that between them, Ottawa and the provinces, they are trying to find a way to amend the constitution that would be suitable to all concerned. And, in my opinion, to insist on obtaining some constitutional concessions even before accepting the patriation itself without amendment is almost blackmail.

And I can say that I am proud that our Prime Minister has indicated he would again contact the provinces and ask their consent, and that this time he would urge Parliament to act unilaterally to bring home the Canadian constitution since is has never been here before, and then we would try with the provinces to find some means of amendment which would protect Quebec as well as Ontario or British Columbia, which also had certain reservations in 1971 about an amendment formula.

Once the constitution is back home, and this is my opinion not necessarily the government's, if Quebec still wants to frustrate an agreement on an amendment formula, both Houses will have the responsibility to see to it. There must be an amendment formula attached to the Canadian constitution once it has been brought back. That is not to say that the federal Parliament should unilaterally amend the constitution, but it should, for example under the 1971 formula, give Quebec and Ontario a right of veto, and I think it should even give one, under certain circumstances, to British Columbia. I am no expert in constitutional law, but I think that such a mode of amendment could not be considered as unreasonable.

In my opinion the federal Parliament, the government, should, when the constitution is repatriated, consult with the provinces regarding an amendment formula and try to win their consent, but even then, the federal Parliament ought to assume its responsibilities and try to obtain an amendment consensus. I emphasize that we should not amend the constitution unilaterally; this would not be acceptable even though it would be constitutionally sound but it would be most unwise politically. We have the responsibility to deal with issues such as the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Roche) is bringing up here. Unless the constitution is repatriated and a consensus is reached regarding the amendment, we in Parliament, and Canadians in general, will not be able to amend the constitution. I am aware that other hon. members wish to speak. To conclude I shall say that I have been extremely surprised to note the position taken by the premier of my province when he recently announced that he would side with Premier Bourassa, in a very intricate official statement. It was rather difficult to understand clearly what his intentions were but we inferred that he was going to enter into an agreement with Mr. Bourassa in order to take a stand agains the Prime Minister because, apparently, he was concerned that the Prime Minister would do that within the context of partisan politics.

Naturally, that is not true; I feel his own remarks smell far more of party politics than anything else because there is not much logic in his release unless it is political logic. And I feel that the expression "political logic" is a bit contradictory in itself because, as we know, in politics there is often very little logic or reason. I merely want to say that Mr. Hatfield wants to join a strange partner because where the linguistic question was concerned, Bill 22, they certainly were not allies. In fact, Mr. Hatfield came quite close to intervening at the Supreme Court of Canada. At least; he sent observers.

We wondered what we had to say to Quebec concerning the linguistic question, within the province, in its own sphere. But I find it strange that Mr. Hatfield should have decided on that strange alliance. Perhaps patriation of the constitution and some amendments to it, might give linguistic rights to the Francophones outside Quebec, on the one hand, and on the other, reaffirm the linguistic rights of the Anglophones in Quebec, and give Canada the possibility of amending its constitution: that might, in turn, give certain advantages to New Brunswick as well as other provinces.

I must say then that I am happy the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona brought up the matter of the constitution, because it gave us the opportunity of discussing it.

• (1750)

[English]

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I listened very carefully to the remarks of the hon. member who just spoke. I am prepared to concede that the question he raised and discussed in respect of this motion is a matter of great difficulty. The difficulty perhaps is not something that has come about quite recently.

The problems in respect of the provinces are matters which have been with us for many years. While none of us condone obstruction, all of us on the other hand must recognize the legitimate partnership which exists, a partnership of democratic consultation, between the federal Government of Canada and the provincial governments. Perhaps the premiers to whom he addressed his words rather harshly are the people who are very much concerned about the details of this issue of patriation brought up under rather suspicious circumstances by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). This issue is couched in terms of confrontation rather than consultation. The hon. member should not forget this. It is unfair of him to single out the Premier of Quebec, the Premier of New Brunswick, or any particular provincial premiers in respect to this whole matter of consultation. The very essence of the federal process is that consultation must take place.

The patriation discussion that has been going on in the last little while is an example of confrontation which certainly is not in accordance with the great traditions of this country. I can understand in some respects the difficulty in which the provincial premiers find themselves.

Mr. Breau: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member accept a question?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. McCleave): The hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Breau) on a question.

Mr. Breau: Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the hon. member finds it normal that after years of consultation, when nine premiers are in agreement or perhaps eight, because we do not know where Mr. Hatfield stands, someone somewhere should look at the situation and solve the problem. We could go on for another 100 years because one province does not want amendments.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Naturally there is no person in Canada who would not like to see a resolution of this problem, but I, and I am sure the people of this country are not either, am not interested in any resolution or attempt to solve this problem which would create many other problems in the country. I think that is the issue.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. McCleave): The hour for the consideration of private members' business has now expired. I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock this evening.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

QUARANTINE ACT

AMENDMENT TO EXTEND APPLICATION TO DANGEROUS DISEASES

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Lalonde that Bill S-31, to amend the Quarantine Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, when debate on the second reading of Bill S-31 was interrupted at five o'clock I had indicated our readiness to support it. As I said, in line with what had been said by the minister and the hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Yewchuk), we live in an age in which new diseases and viruses turn up unexpectedly. In this age of fast, mass transportation the Government of Canada must be able to cope with persons or vehicles which might bring new or strange diseases to this country. The bill deals not only with persons; it deals also with vehicles of all kinds, whether they travel on land, by sea, or in the air.

[Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton).]

As I said, we asked ourselves some questions about the bill when we first saw it. First, we wanted to be sure that it does not interfere with basic civil rights, or does not do things which might be done under the Immigration Act and thus deny certain rights which would otherwise apply. We cannot find that there is any unwarranted interference with civil liberties. The bill does not deny a Canadian the right to come back to this country, or a visitor's or an immigrant's right, under the Immigration Act, to come here. It provides for a person suspected of having a certain dangerous disease to be put in quarantine for the time it takes that disease to incubate. I need not spell it out. As I say, we looked at the bill with the question of civil rights in our minds and find nothing objectionable in it on that score.

As I say, the bill requires certain persons to be quarantined for the length of time it takes a strange or dangerous disease to incubate. After all, even the astronauts, heroes though they were, who came back to the United States from the moon were put in quarantine lest they had picked up some strange disease in that part of the universe.

The other question we asked ourselves was if the bill provides for powers too wide for parliament to give to the executive. I notice that the hon. member for Athabasca expressed concern on this point. We can deal with it when the bill is in committee. It seems to me that the bill contains protections. Quarantine officers are given certain rights and powers. If a quarantine officers feels he must do more than is permitted by the legislation he must get an order from the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde). If the aggrieved person feels that the order is unfair, there is provision in the bill for an appearance before a judge within a matter of hours. It strikes me, therefore, that there is a reasonable balance between the situation which can develop if someone is found to be the carrier of a new virus or strange disease and the rule of law. In other words, we do not want to give the executive unlimited power. I do not find this bill offensive on that score.

I echo the concern raised by the hon. member for Athabasca when he mentioned that about 40 million persons cross our borders every year and wondered if we can solve the problem of disease control simply by passing a bill. I also echo his concern about our limited facilities for checking strange diseases and for putting people in quarantine. But the bill seems to make the kinds of amendments to the Quarantine Act which are called for in these times; therefore, Sir, we are prepared to give the bill second reading so that it can go to committee where witnesses can appear and where we can ask any further questions which ought to be answered.

Mr. J. R. Holmes (Lambton-Kent): Mr. Speaker, my comments on Bill S-31, an act to amend the Quarantine Act, will be brief. Some questions I had anticipated asking were answered by the minister this afternoon, or raised by the hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Yewchuk) and by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles).

I acknowledge receipt of three documents from the department which I found extremely useful. I shall allude to them in discussing this bill. Some aspects of the documentation are paradoxical, in that they raise certain questions. Although I have no intention of going through these documents in detail, I want to make one or two references to what in each document I think is somewhat of a paradoxical situation.

One document is rather intriguing. It is entitled "International Health Determination of Lassa Fever Problem". It is particularly pertinent. It was written, I gather, by Dr. Sprenger of the department, a senior consultant, Quarantine and Regulatory Medical Services Branch, Department of Health and Welfare. It is an excellent document outlining Lassa fever.

● (2010)

As I understand it, this particular document on Lassa fever and Marburg disease is really the proto-type of the type of problem that brought about the implementation of the particular piece of legislation we see at this time. As I indicated, there are some aspects of this document about which I am concerned. I want to quote one section. It reads:

> In contingency planning against Lassa fever, the new international dimension we are facing is not so much control of one of the scourges of the past as it is taking steps to prevent the emergence of a new plague in Canada and in countries of the world with which we have direct transportation air links.
> Vivid illustration of the inadequacy of relying on any voluntary system of control to curtail international transportation of patients was the self-arranged return earlier this year to London by commercial airline from West Africa of a doctor stricken with Lassa fever. The public has a right to expect compliance powers to exist for the effective enforcement of quarantine control. Urgent action is vital when faced with such an inadvertent importation, in order to minimize the risks. The risks when dealing with diseases caused by the dangerous pathogens can be considerable.

With the legislation before us it seems that we are embarking upon a whole new era of quarantine. There is no question that there are great powers given to the minister and, indeed, to the quarantine officer. At some appropriate time I hope the minister will respond to this whole new line of progress in terms of quarantine, particularly when in the past we have had essentially a voluntary system other than those entities to which the minister referred. This is important. We must recognize that we are embarking on a new area in terms of quarantine and new disease entities.

I received a document earlier today entitled "Canadian Quarantine Manual". This is particularly pertinent. I wish to quote from Section 4.2.1. which reads as follows:

> The Federal Quarantine Act was promulgated the 1st of January 1972—

The minister made reference to that earlier this afternoon.

> —and is an Act to reduce the hazard of introduction into Canada of infectious or contagious diseases. It will be noted that the format of the Regulations has been changed from the previous specific type of format applicable to Maritime trade to a discretionary type of format more applicable to the speed of current international air travel.

What concerns me somewhat is that the minister indicated that we had dramatic changes to the Quarantine Act in 1972 which was promulgated January 1 of that year. We now have new amendments to the act with the prototype Lassa fever and Marburg disease being given as the reasons for them. I find this strange. As the minister indicated, Lassa fever was a well recognized entity in 1969. It was recognized as being a very virulent type of organism with a high morbidity rate. The same can be said of Marburg disease. If one refers to the document I mentioned earlier entitled "International Health Dimensions of the Lassa Fever Problem", it is well illustrated that both these disease entities were well known to medical circles and in the international community as being a deadly serious virus.

The minister has some explaining to do as to why we are seeing these amendments at this time. If in fact that concern existed in 1972 when it was promulgated, I cannot help but think we should have seen the amendments at that time.

The last document concerns the Canadian contingency plan with respect to Lassa fever. The hon. member for Athabasca referred to this earlier. For those who are interested, it gives an excellent introduction on the disease itself and situations in which the virus organism can present itself. In addition, it deals with the principles underlying the federal government's participation in the program.

This implies two things to me. It seems to be somewhat in contradistinction to what the minister stated later today. I assume the minister implied that at this time there are only four disease entities—cholera, plague, smallpox, and yellow fever—that are part of the Quarantine Act and in fact no other disease has been listed. However, as I read this particular contingency plan it is implied that Lassa fever may in fact be on this list. This is a specific question which could be asked at a later date.

As was indicated earlier, it is not certain from the documentation whether in fact we have a capability to carry out the particular principles enunciated in this document. At any rate I want to recognize and acknowledge the importance of these documents. I plan to study them in more depth. I have additional questions related to these documents that I would like to ask at a later time.

We are a global community that has become much smaller with the passage of time, particularly with the jet age. Because of that we are far more vulnerable to contagious and infectious disease. I agree in principle with the minister that we need the capability to prevent certain infectious or contagious diseases that may prove to be very detrimental to the health of Canadians. They may be highly communicable and have a high degree of morbidity.

As I interpret the legislation, there is a necessity to be able to provide the facilities and also to have a contingency type of plan to look after Canadians returning to Canada, who may well have a contagious disease, for treatment and diagnostic purposes.

There are several questions that, in my view, have not been answered. One particular area is with regard to federal-provincial jurisdiction. It is well recognized that the federal government has a responsibility in terms of the Quarantine Act. This was alluded to earlier today. It is also an accepted fact that the traditional health care system is a provincial responsibility.

I wish to pose a hypothetical question because I am not clear as to the jurisdiction in this area. In the great number of cases one would see, in terms of contagious or communicable disease, that type of individual who has been visiting, in this instance, let us say West Africa, and who has returned home to his particular province. Four or five days later he develops symptoms that are consistent with the particular disease entity, in this instance Lassa fever. I am not clear in my own mind where jurisdiction now falls, whether this is a matter strictly under the jurisdiction of the province itself or whether the federal government has a direct responsibility and can intervene if it feels it has information at its disposal which would suggest there may well be a health hazard to Canada.

● (2020)

As the minister outlined earlier in his comments this afternoon, the four diseases listed in the Quarantine Act at present are cholera, plague, smallpox, and yellow fever. I am not certain as to the means the minister and his department would use to determine what other pathogens would be listed under the Quarantine Act. I am not even sure how they would be determined. Do we really have the epidemiological capability to make this type of determination? We need far more information about the staff within the department and the follow-up capability which exists. It is important to know what consultation has gone on between the provinces and the federal government and, of course, it is extremely important to know what has happened in the international context. Has there been input from the World Health Organization?

The minister did indicate, if I understood him correctly, that if a particular pathogen is thought to be dangerous enough it would be listed by order in council. And if I understood him correctly, that listing could be terminated at any time by order in council. Is that correct?

I am also interested, and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) has alluded to this, in the possible infringement of civil liberties involved. This is another important area which should be looked at carefully during the committee stage. I alluded to that earlier in my comments.

There is one other aspect on which I should like to spend a moment or two because I had hoped, when this quarantine bill was introduced, that the minister was implying a greater concern on the part of the government with respect to tackling the various contagious and infectious diseases which presently exist in Canada.

I know the minister has received various representations in the past regarding the positive role the federal government could and should be playing in combatting these diseases. To give one example, I should like to talk for a moment on the subject of tropical diseases and parasites which are increasing, frankly, at a substantial rate in Canada.

We must recognize that Canada, like many other temperate countries such as England, Sweden or New Zealand, is really faced with these exotic-type diseases because of the global age and because of the jet travel which is now so common. The danger is compounded by the great degree of tourism. Figures were quoted earlier; the figure of 40 million was mentioned in connection with the Canadian tourist industry. And, of course, we are seeing a migration of people from all countries of the world.

The other thing we must recognise is that there have been disturbing reports principally from ports of entry, from major cities including Halifax, Montreal, Edmonton, and Vancouver. Certainly the Toronto General Hospital with its tropical and parasitic disease clinic could show a very alarming increase in the incidence of tropical and parasitic diseases. I think we must recognise, and I quite agree with the minister in principle, that because of this type of setting and the facility of communication we see today it is highly unlikely that Canada will ever again be free of exotic diseases in the future.

If we look carefully I think we would find it startling that there is no school of tropical medicine within the confines of Canada. I have seen estimates that probably less than one per cent of physicians in Canada have any education or particular experience in the area of tropical or parasitic diseases. It is unfortunate that there seems to be such an indifference at times within the profession and the medical schools. There are so many of these diseases, many of them common to tropical countries etc., and little knowledge is actually imparted through the medical schools and, indeed, by nursing schools. I find this most unfortunate.

We must also recognise that at government levels there has been lack of funding for some of the post-basic education and the training of physicians and nurses, as well as for the training of the technical personnel who are extremely important in this particular specialty of tropical and parasitic diseases.

I hate to come back to the word research because I have talked about it so many times, but it is another area of medical research where the government has really not given the type of support needed to deal with tropical and parasitic diseases. I have also received representations from various people within the profession and within the pharmaceutical industry stating that on occasions we have had difficulty obtaining certain of the drugs, what one might call exotic drugs, necessary to treat some of these tropical diseases which, I want to assure you, Mr. Speaker, do occur and have occurred in Canada. I should also indicate we have many examples of lengthy delays before patients reach the specialized clinics which are at a premium in the Canadian context.

I also want to indicate that we have very little knowledge when we come to discuss the subject of multiple infections, the toxicity of drug reactions, the conditions which can cross the placental barrier, to name just a few of the perplexities associated with the study of tropical and parasitic diseases. I have no intention of lecturing on the issue of tropical and parasitic diseases. I suspect the average individual probably thinks of tropical or parasitic diseases as mainly confined to pinworms. I suspect that anyone who has raised children is well aware of that particular condition.

I want to assure you, Mr. Speaker, there are other threats to health in this area, for example, amoebiasis. If one looks carefully it is endemic in an area such as Toronto. Studies in the province of Saskatchewan have indicated that approximately 30 per cent of the native population in that province have anti-viruses in an endemic form. We must recognise that we escape epidemics in these instances because we do have hygienic facilities and the type of practice in this area which have prevented epidemics up to this point. But we must also recognise that it may lie dormant for life. It is not uncommon at the time of autopsy to find that many patients have suffered from this particular disease. I think this is true of every province across the country.

You might find it of some interest, Mr. Speaker, that malaria was at one time endemic in parts of Canada, in the Kent and Essex counties specifically. I am rather interested in the fact that the anopheles mosquito is still present here—it was reported two or three years ago in Oregon. A soldier returned from Viet Nam—his malaria had not been diagnosed at that point—and visited a picnic area. Mosquitoes in that part were infected, and later a group of nurses who visited the area came down with malaria within a short period of time. This is an indication that some of these diseases which we think of as being extremely rare, which we think could not occur in Canada, do occur.

Many hon. members will recall the Peterborough Petes of the Junior A League who visited Leningrad two years ago. Half the team came down with a severe parasitic infection.

I am simply saying that I hope the minister, in bringing this quarantine bill before us, is thinking beyond the act itself and is paying some recognition to the importance of tropical and parasitic diseases and to some of the other exotic diseases to which he has referred. I am quite concerned that we do not have the capability at this point to handle these diseases despite the importance of the issue and despite the implications of the bill.

● (2030)

May I reiterate that I support the principle of quarantine for certain infectious diseases and in pathogenic cases; but I also suggest that there are many unanswered questions, and that we need greater leadership from the federal government in areas such as tropical and parasitical diseases.

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, I have only a few comments to make in connection with these changes. In general I agree with them. Much has been said before about the need for changes in the present Quarantine Act. The need to cover so-called dangerous diseases is self-evident. Fortunately these diseases are quite rare and hopefully will remain so.

I presume that certain additions may be made to the list by order in council. However, I think it is most important that any additions of so-called dangerous diseases to the list be along the lines of those suggested by the World Health Organization. In other words, I hope we will not act unilaterally in adding so-called dangerous diseases to those already on the list.

Much has also been said about people moving around the world these days, and it is a fact that it is almost impossible within a short period of time properly to screen the average visitor, immigrant or person returning to Canada from abroad.

I should like to make mention some of the changes regarding the handling of suspected cases. At the present time under the Infectious and Contagious Diseases Act the period of detention is not to exceed the prescribed incubation period, and on the authority of the quarantine officer an appeal can be made to the deputy minister of the health service.

There are some significant changes in the new subsection (8)(1)(c) under which a person can be detained up to 14 days under the authority of the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde). In other words, a quarantine officer must get authority from someone higher up the ladder. On weekends, holidays, and so on I wonder about the chain of command in this regard. Presumably a quarantine officer would have to telephone or communicate in some way with Ottawa.

Knowing what it is like at times to get decisions, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me there may be some trouble in implementing this provision. I would be interested to know what will be the actual mechanism used to enable a quarantine officer or customs officer who suspects someone is suffering from a dangerous disease to take prompt action. I suggest there would be a good many cases that would take three or four days, perhaps even a week, to deal with.

With regard to the provisions dealing with a judicial review the minister must justify to a Supreme Court judge detention in excess of 48 hours unless within that period the suspected case is confirmed. This seems to me to be pushing the time element to the extreme and I have some doubt whether this process could be completed within that period. Any person who is detained can ask the minister to justify before a Supreme Court judge of the province the reason for his detention, which seems to me could lead to delay.

As far as the new section 9 is concerned I have no great problem. I presume that the regulations will be along the line of what is considered reasonable in medical circles and customary throughout the world.

I think some questions can be raised in regard to subsection (7) in that a quarantine officer may act not only when he suspects a person has an infectious and contagious disease, as was the case before, but when he suspects a person has any other disease which may, in the opinion of the quarantine officer, constitute a grave danger to public health in Canada. This immediately raises in my mind the question whether the quarantine officer will be given guidelines, or will he be allowed considerable latitude in deciding what constitutes a grave danger to public health in Canada? A quarantine officer is not a person trained in medicine and presumably will have to rely heavily on guidelines. As the bill is presently written the situation is not too clear. It seems to me possible, as the bill is presently worded, that a quarantine or customs officer acting on his own could in certain instances detain a person unjustifiably.

The amendment to subsection 8(1)(d) is a slight broadening of the original act. In the original act this provision applied to a person who had been in close proximity to someone who was a carrier of a contagious disease or who is in close proximity to someone who is infested with insects. Under this change the person in question need only have been in close proximity to a person who may have, or may be the carrier of an infectious or contagious disease, and this includes people arriving in or departing from Canada. This tends to broaden the area of jurisdiction of the quarantine officer and enables him to work a little more effectively in cases of doubt. He will also carry more responsibility and will have brought into his area of jurisdiction considerably more people. This leaves the situation open to abuse and could cause the zealous quarantine officer some unhappiness. I think some guidelines will have to be formulated carefully in this particular area.

Under subsection 8(2) the scope of a quarantine officer's jurisdiction is extended to people arriving in or departing from Canada. I presume that Canadian citizens will be covered by this provision. The third part of the amendment represents a change in the original act, Section 8.2. This extends the act so it applies to anyone arriving from a place outside Canada. That means all visitors will be subject to the same rules as any resident of Canada who has been abroad.

The main issue I think involves the fact that the act is considerably broader. The number of diseases that are involved is quite limited, but they are important to those who might be afflicted, and important to the health of our people. The act seems to give more latitude to the quarantine officer. Undoubtedly it will cause some unhappiness and a fair amount of conflict when visitors are held under the act. Therefore I think it is important that, when we review the bill at the committee stage, we get answers to some of the difficult questions which may arise. Some of these questions have international overtones, particularly as the measure applies to visitors and immigrants from abroad. Those few words are all I have to say in respect of this bill, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I find it rather difficult to follow three of my colleagues, each of whom is a doctor, and I refer to the hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Yewchuk), the hon. member for Lambton-Kent (Mr. Holmes), and the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Ritchie). When the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) introduced this bill we were treated to a rather fascinating lesson on the history of the Quarantine Act. It brought to our attention a concern regarding the possibility of contagious and infectious diseases becoming more prevalent in Canada. If this is the fact we should be extremely concerned.

I was very interested to learn of the role the World Health Organization plays in respect of this matter, particularly when it comes to a desire on the part of the federal government to add contagious diseases by way of order in council. I should hope that the minister does consult the World Health Organization before moving in a unilateral way.

The hon. member for Lambton-Kent brought home the necessity of medical research in this area. He pointed out most vividly the necessity for continuing co-operation and the continuing provision of funds in order that we might have the best medical research possible.

What I have found most fascinating about this whole matter is that in his introduction the minister made no mention of the Olympics being held in this country this year. I find this strange, particularly in light of the fact that about a month and a half ago the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Andras) also brought forward a bill because of a concern about the possibility of terrorists coming into the country at the time of the Olympic Games.

[Mr. Ritchie.]

This is perhaps also the concern of the Minister of National Health and Welfare, but rather than coming clean he completely ignores this possibility in his introduction of the bill, and says nothing about this means of keeping people out of the country.

Perhaps this bill is part of an Olympic package. The first bill dealt primarily with terrorists and now we have this one which primarily deals with diseases. I hope the minister will enlighten us in this regard, if not here in the House then at the committee. At that time I hope he will be honest with us. I am not suggesting he is less than honest now, but there are some questions that should be answered in order that we may determine why the government is bringing a bill of this type before the House.

Considerable emphasis has been placed on Lassa fever and Marburg disease. Both of these infections have been isolated for some period of time, as pointed out by the hon. member for Lambton-Kent. I wonder why these diseases have been emphasized at this particular time. I suggest the answer is that this is the second part of an Olympic package.

The hon. member for Athabasca in a brilliant speech said that he agreed with the bill in principle, but pointed out there are many questions that have to be answered. The two diseases I mentioned have been known of for some time. That being the case, I wonder why they have not been brought within the Quarantine Act before now. Instead, the minister has waited until almost the time of the Olympic Games and then says he is concerned about the health of Canadians.

What we have here is an extremely powerful bill which actually restricts the movement of people. Some concern has been registered regarding its effect on civil liberties. There is no doubt but that it does have an effect. The explanation to clause 3 states:

> The purpose of this amendment is to empower a quarantine officer in emergency situations to take certain action, subject to the approval of the Minister and, where the action involves detention for a period in excess of 48-hours, subject to review by a judge of a superior court, in order to prevent the introduction into Canada of dangerous diseases not presently covered by the Act.

That is the purpose of the main change to this act. It will broaden the section, and I suggest it is a change that we should look into thoroughly when we are considering the bill in committee. As I have suggested, this change affects the freedom of movement and the civil liberties of people. This does not stop with the actions of a quarantine officer. He now has this right when he suspects a disease may be brought into the country. This is peculiar wording and I suggest it defies definition. We will have to look into the definition of the word "suspects". When the quarantine officer has suspicion about a dangerous disease being brought in he has the right to detain individuals.

What is even more important, and this has not been mentioned, but has been alluded to, is the fact that a collector of customs will also be in the same boat. He will also have the awesome power that before now only rested with a quarantine officer. If a customs officer suspects there is a dangerous disease being brought into the country he too can stop the individual and contact the quarantine officer. The quarantine officer must in turn contact the Minister of National Health and Welfare in writing, and the minister must then proceed within 48 hours by way of a superior court judge who will determine the rightness or wrongness of this particular detention. Therefore these matters are of some concern.

I listened to my friend, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), a very respected gentleman in the House, who spoke about the possibility of loss of freedom of movement and also loss of civil liberties. Of course this matter will be looked into more thoroughly by the members on the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs where that concern will be registered, but in keeping with what the government is trying to do because of the Olympic Games which will take place this summer, we all want co-operation. This does not mean to say that we will give the government a blank cheque. It is not the role of the opposition to give governments blank cheques, and particularly this government. I do not want to be partisan on this bill because this bill is for the benefit of all Canadians, and hopefully it will enhance the role played by our country in support of a city which is hosting the Olympic Games.

I believe that we should proceed with caution. We all want to co-operate, but with co-operation comes the necessity to say, "Stop, let us look at what the minister is attempting to do." If we have to ask questions, let us ask what is the opinion of the World Health Organization regarding the procedure proposed by the minister in this bill. What do they think about Lassa fever and Marburg disease? Should it be spelled out by order in council and brought into the bill? I think we must determine whether this is the practice. I believe it is. If the minister can convince our colleagues that it is not, then this matter has been standing for some time because the government does not have the required answers and that is why it was impossible to bring in this bill before now. The minister will have to tell us that.

We must have answers describing how one determines a dangerous disease. How does the customs officer determine this, and how does a quarantine officer determine it? Can the minister give us answers in that regard? We want to know what other criteria will be set to determine a disease, and will this information be passed on to those who have the authority to detain or quarantine people entering the country at ports of entry? This bill is supposed to deal with emergencies, but nowhere in this bill is it spelled out what an emergency is. That is another question which should be answered by the minister once this bill goes to committee.

I heard there is some question as to whether there are enough places with suitable quarantine facilities. I believe the hon. member for Athabasca voiced some concern in that regard. He is of the opinion that there are not enough such places.

Mr. Yewchuk: There are none.

Mr. Alexander: The bill specifically refers to "other places having suitable quarantine facilities". What does the minister have in mind? Where are they and how many are there? I think these are important questions.

I do not wish to take much more time of the House on this bill except to state in conclusion that the hon. member for Athabasca, the hon. member for Lambton-Kent, the hon. member for Dauphin, and I all say that we accept this bill in principle but that many questions remain to be answered. The minister, who is usually open, fair, and honest, will give the answers, I hope, in order to satisfy the curiosity of the opposition.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

CRIMINAL CODE, CROWN LIABILITY ACT, IMMIGRATION ACT, PAROLE ACT

JURISDICTION GIVEN TO CANADIAN COURTS TO TRY PERSONS FOR CERTAIN OFFENCES COMMITTED OUTSIDE CANADA

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (for the Minister of Justice) moved that the amendments made by the Senate to Bill C-71, to amend the Criminal Code and to make related amendments to the Crown Liability Act, the Immigration Act and the Parole Act, be concurred in.

[English]

Mr. Francis Fox (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the Senate has now completed its study of Bill C-71 and I am hopeful that the House this evening will concur in the amendments proposed by the Senate.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, I should like to rise on a point of order which might save time. The Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford) was good enough to advise me, and I have checked it through with members of our committee on this side, that apart from one amendment all these amendments are in reference to translation and are to clean up a few things of a technical nature. Only one amendment is a fairly major one. I wonder whether we could not move one motion to approve all these amendments. Someone might insist on procedural grounds that we cannot do so, but the House can make its own rules. This would save time because there are so many small amendments with regard to language and translation that I hope the House will see fit to save time and pass them altogether.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): That is what the motion does.

Mr. Fox: Mr. Speaker, I think that is the way the motion is drafted and I hope the House will concur in that motion. I should like to point out to hon. members that these amendments in general are minor ones, and for the most part quite technical in nature. Some deal with punctuation and changes of certain words and expressions in the French version. As such they ensure a higher degree of precision and agreement between the French and English texts of the bill. Hon. members will be interested to note, however, that one of the amendments proposes that credit card offences, which as contained in the legislation passed by the House were indictable ones, be made punishable on summary conviction as well. Having regard to the wide range of activities covered by the section on credit cards, some of which could be minor in nature, we believe it is appropriate to provide for the alternative as proposed.

Bill C-71, which was introduced on July 17 last, has been given detailed and careful study in both Houses and in their respective committees. Several worth-while and substantive amendments were made to it in the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs, amendments which I believe strengthened and added significantly to the original bill. The further amendments referred to us by the Senate are but another step in the process by which legislation, as its progresses through all stages of parliament, can be improved and perfected. I believe we have before us now a bill which will be an important and worth-while improvement to the criminal law and part of what I earnestly hope will be an ongoing process of updating the law in order to make it a flexible, realistic, and responsive tool for dealing with criminal offences in our society.

In conclusion I would like to thank members of the Senate for the worth-while suggestions made. I hope all members of the House will wish to concur in the amendments proposed by the Senate which would permit the Department of Justice and the Minister of Justice to work toward an early implementation and early proclamation of Bill C-71, after having consulted the provincial attorneys general.

● (2100)

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I will be very brief. The other place is often criticized with reference to amendments, but once again it has proved that in accordance with the jurisdiction it has, besides taking care of minority rights, it must take a second look at bills which are of a technical nature. In this case it has done so, not only on an important point in reference to the theft of credit cards but also in reference to translation. The Senate was set up to protect minorities and to act as a sort of court of appeal for this Chamber on matters which must be approved expeditiously, such as Bill C-71.

I am glad that the parliamentary secretary said that there is some responsibility and duty on this House to get on with this bill and get it approved because of the attitude today of those who wish to impose distress and evil on society. There is a feeling of what I call the permissive society, and the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford) has said that he is endeavouring to tighten up the law.

I am not criticizing either the Minister of Justice, the parliamentary secretary or the government, but a situation arose where two people were given bail. One was charged with murder, and the other with attempted murder. Just a short time ago they came from Vancouver to Calgary and murdered a police officer. They then took two females as hostages for 45 hours. It was only due to the good work of the Calgary police force that those hostages were freed and the matter was settled.

I endorse exactly what the parliamentary secretary says: let us get on with the job.

I should like to say one last word with reference to the Senate. Too often in this place we hear that they have no function, no real jurisdiction, and they are not doing their job. The purpose of the Senate was to set up a group of fairly wise men who could look at the technicalities of legislation received from this House, and I think the Senate is functioning in that regard. We have a large volume of legislation, and we do not have time to examine it carefully. The Senate has done an excellent job in bringing these amendments before the House of Commons, and this proves that we need the Senate and that the constitution has operated for the benefit of Canadians in this regard.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: Oh, oh!

Mr. Woolliams: I hear someone to my left, and I am glad he had something to say because I well remember Mr. Hazen Argue, who is now a Senator, every year from 1958 to 1962 moving bills every year to abolish the Senate. The only thing I could say about him is that he has arrived there.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I know it is against the rules of this House to impute motives, but I wonder if my friend, the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams), did not make that speech just to provoke me.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): When we are told by the government that there are some Senate amendments to a bill and that they are just a few technicalities which need not take any time, I have learned from experience that one should look at those amendments to be sure that something is not being slipped through. Indeed, on some occasions I have found that to be the case. However, in this instance when we were told that these amendments to Bill C-71 were on the list, I made sure that I read carefully the amendments as they appeared on page 1125 of Votes and Proceedings for March 17, 1976, and it is correct, as the parliamentary secretary has pointed out, and as has been confirmed by the hon. member for Calgary North, with one exception they are corrections in translation from English into French, corrections in grammar or construction, or what have you.

The only amendment of substance has to do with credit card wrongdoings, and I think we all agree that there should be the options of summary conviction or indictment.

So these amendments present no problem to us, as sometimes happens with Senate amendments, and therefore we are prepared to support the motion for concurrence in these amendments.

I am really surprised at the enthusiasm with which it is suggested tonight that we should maintain 104 full paid

Senators in the other place so that if our translators do not do a good job, their translators will do it for us. Is that the function of the Senate?

An hon. Member: Come on, now.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Come on, now, yourself. Or go on, now, to the Senate if you want, but to suggest that these amendments justify the existence of that other place I suggest is really as ridiculous as I think the hon. member felt it was, because of the smile on his face. As far as I am concerned the other place is still for the birds, but we are prepared to vote for the amendments it has given us tonight.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the hon. member would permit one question. I wonder if he has checked the amendments dealing with theft of credit cards where the Senate reduced it to a summary conviction which, of course, is an option to the Crown. I think that is very important because any one charged with an indictable offence cannot leave the country and go to another nation. This way, basically if a person is charged under summary conviction he could go elsewhere. Often a youth might be able to pick up a Chargex, and in that regard I think it is a good suggestion.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): In response to the question of the hon. member I can only assume he was not doing me the favour of listening when I was speaking. He probably listened to what I said about the Senate, but I pointed out that there was the one issue of substance in their amendments. I have to correct the hon. member. The change does not reduce the charge from an indictable offence to a summary conviction offence. It leaves both options open to the court, and I think that is a change the members of the committee of this House ought to have made.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

FEEDS ACT

AMENDMENTS TO BROADEN DEFINITIONS AND CONTROL OVER MANUFACTURE, SALE OR IMPORTATION

The House resumed, from March 4, consideration of the motion of Mr. Whelan for concurrence in an amendment made by the Senate to amendments made by the House of Commons to Bill S-10, to amend the Feeds Act.

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, the purpose of my speaking at this time on this particular amendment is to try to put on the record some of the unusual things which have happened to this bill.

The bill was a straightforward housekeeping bill introduced in the Senate, brought into the House, amended in the House and sent back to the Senate, and the Senate sent it back here amended. All I can say is that to any person who is a member of the public—and I might even say a member of this House of Commons—trying to keep track of what is happening to this bill this is an exercise in profundity which can only be described as asinine.

Let me explain what I mean. This bill was a straightforward bill introduced in the Senate. It came to the House, the House amended it and passed the bill. Since both the Senate and the House passed the bill, under the rules of this place and the other place neither House could consider the bill. They could consider just the amendment. I am hopeful that what I am complaining about can go into the record as a suggestion that there should be some way whereby the records of the various members of parliament and of the people across the country trying to follow these debates could be clear enough that we all know what is happening.

All we have before us at the present time is a bill passed out of the Senate on March 6, 1975. That is all we have in the form of a printed bill. However, in addition we have a report from the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford) saying that the bill passed out of the Senate on March 6 is contrary to the Bill of Rights. Those of us who follow what happens in this House understand that the minister took this back to the committee and amended the bill so that it would be within the terms of the Bill of Rights. Because this was an amendment of the bill from the Senate, we sent the piece of paper back to the Senate saying that we had amended the bill so that it would be in comformity with the Bill of Rights, and the Senate took it under advisement. The Senate then made their amendments.

The only way to check what the House did on the amendments and what the Senate did on the amendments is to read Votes and Proceedings. I simply say that for those who are much wiser than I who represent just a simple constituency and try to follow what goes on in this House, I think there should be a little better system of co-ordinating the program between the two Houses of parliament so that the public, including members of parliament, would know what is going on in respect of this very involved system in attempting to follow the procedure on this bill which has been before parliament for over a year.

I sympathize with the minister. It must have been a dreadful experience to follow all the ramifications of what went on concerning what this House and the Senate did. I would simply say that the system is cumbersome and crude. We know that our counterparts in the United States have a meeting which allows both their Houses to get together and bring a matter back so that a common bill may be passed by both Houses. I ask in these short remarks, Mr. Speaker, that you recommend to those who know more about the rules and procedures than I do that they try to get a better system so that members of parliament will know what is happening with regard to their legislation. Unless one knows what happens in this House and its committees and in the other place and its committees one does not really know what is going on.

It takes a pretty good student to follow the procedure in respect of this bill. I am not the only one who has found this confusing. Several weeks ago the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Towers) explained that he did not understand it. When it came to the House the members did not understand it either. I should like to register my complaint neither to the government, the opposition, nor the other place, but in respect of the cumbersomeness of the rules dealing with matters concerning amendments passing from one House to the other.

Basically, when a bill is passed by this House we cannot debate it again. When a bill is passed in the other place they cannot debate it again. We need a simple flexible system whereby the two Houses of parliament can get together and produce some type of amendment for both Houses so that we both have something in front of us and know what we are dealing with. I should like to register these criticisms of what on the surface seem to be a housekeeping bill but actually is a mess when one tries to follow the procedures of this House.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, in effect I am raising the point of order that was raised some time ago. I wonder whether there is to be a ruling from the Chair on the point of order raised by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Towers). It seems to me the situation ought to be cleared up procedurally.

What happened, as I understand it, is that the Senate passed the bill and then sent it to this House. Then in this House amendments were made, then we passed the bill on third reading and sent the bill in reprinted form back to the Senate. Then the Senate made amendments, not to the reprinted bill we sent back to them but to the bill in the form in which it was passed by the Senate in the first place.

I suggest that what we are doing at this moment will end up being ridiculous. This washes out the tributes paid to the Senate by a couple of hon. members a few minutes ago. I understood there was to be a ruling by the Chair on the matter raised by the hon. member for Red Deer.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the hon. member rising on the point of order?

Mr. Schellenberger: Yes, Mr. Speaker. Before I speak on the bill I should like to speak on the point of order. I understand the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Towers) did question whether or not the Senate had amended the proper bill. I was under the impression that Mr. Speaker would rule on that. I ask the same question that was asked by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). Would Your Honour rule on that at the present time?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I must say to hon. members that the point raised by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain (Mr. Hamilton) follows directly the point of order raised by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Towers) on March 4, at which time Mr. Speaker said he would look into the matter. He really did not say he would resolve it by making a ruling.

After looking at the whole matter it seems that the problem arises mainly from the fact that both Houses have not based their work on the same document. This more or less causes some confusion because the amendments that were moved by the Senate and referred back to this House were made to amendments made by this House to the original bill. In the House of Commons when we reach the report stage on a bill we reprint the bill if required.

In this case the lines do not correspond. I am advised that whatever amendments have been sent back from the Senate to this House for its approval at this time do not contradict anything in the bill or in the decisions that were made in the House of Commons. The only difficulty is that of placing the amendments in the right place in the original version of the bill. This difficulty can be circumvented. I am advised by the Law Clerk of the House of Commons that the matter is clear.

Although I am not in a position at this time to analyse the situation and make my own evaluation of it, I do have the advice of the Law Clerk of the House of Commons who feels that there is no difficulty regarding the amendments that are presented to this House by the Senate. I am taking into account the fact that the legal branch, the Clerk and the staff of this House know exactly where these amendments apply and will make the necessary changes. This means that the amendments adopted by this House may not apply to lines 7 and 29, let us say, on page 3 or on another line of the report stage reprint of the bill.

I submit to hon. members that the question of amendments is more important with regard to the text and content than to which exact line the amendments apply. I would hope that the House would agree on this unless some hon. member feels we should delay or postpone a decision on these matters until and unless we have some kind of institution such as suggested by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain by which both Houses could come to an agreement. In the present circumstances I do not see a way to prevent such minor difficulties which the Chair believes can be overcome. I do not know how we can resolve the confusion unless both Houses meet and discuss the Senate amendments. I see the hon. member is rising to his feet. I welcome his intervention.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I support what you said. On behalf of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition I have read these amendments carefully. I want to be sure that we are all talking about the same subject. I do not think there is any quarrel between the government and ourselves. I know that the presentation of the amendments is sloppy, and I suppose we can do little about that, short of sending the matter back. I suggest that the opposition accepts your interpretation, Mr. Speaker, and we understand that it is agreeable to the government. Therefore, why can we not deal with it tonight? After the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Schellenberger) speaks, we are prepared to accept the amendment.

Let me make it clear that we are not debating a bill. We are debating the first item appearing in issue 229 of Votes and Proceedings of Friday, December 19, 1975, on page 965. The House is considering an amendment made by the Senate to amendments made by the House of Commons to Bill S-10. The matter is set down, as I say, on page 965 of Votes and Proceedings. If the government agrees that we are discussing that item, I foresee no difficulty. There will not be opposition from my side of the House.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I do not know if hon. members want the Chair to read the amendment. The point raised by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain (Mr. Hamilton) is well taken. The message from the Senate of December 18 was printed in Votes and Proceedings of December 19, 1975. I do not know if I should read the amendment for the sake of those hon. members who do not have readily available their copies of Votes and Proceedings. Actually this House is requested by the other place to concur in an amendment the other place made to a bill. It will be the responsibility of the Senate to incorporate our amendments into that Senate bill. It may be difficult to do more, to give instruction to the Senate as to how it should implement any amendments made to the bill. That would have to be done elsewhere than in this House.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I assure the House that I will not be difficult. I have a suggestion to make. I must say that this is a sloppy way to deal with these amendments. The House is asked to amend the bill in certain lines, but that is not at all that is to happen. Those lines to be amended are now somewhere else in the bill. If any member of the opposition brought in a motion asking for some bill to be amended on page 3, line 10, and he put down the wrong line, on the wrong page, he would soon be told he is wrong.

I think the Senate should have amended the bill in its latest reprinted form, but it did not. I will not press the matter; I will not be difficult, but I do say to Your Honour, and through you to the Table, that we should have the right to see a reprinted version of the bill incorporating all the amendments before the bill gets to the next stage, Royal Assent. Stopping it at that point is difficult. In effect we are approving a pig in a poke. We are approving amendments which are to be put in, and which are not as set down in Votes and Proceedings.

I will not object further. I think we should be assured that at some point the bill will be reprinted in proper form and that we shall see it before it is given Royal Assent.

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, if I may speak on the same point of order, I agree that there is some confusion as to where substantive amendments in the various pieces of legislation are to be included, but I think everyone agrees with the substance of the amendments being discussed. There is no confusion about the substance of the amendments or about the words used by the Senate and House of Commons. I do not think anyone disputes that. Therefore I think we ought to hear the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Schellenberger) who wishes to deal with the amendments as now worded.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I do not wish to argue with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) but I think it will be difficult, even with all the good will in the world, for this House to so correct these amendments that they will appear in a reprinted copy of the bill which can be discussed at this stage. We are discussing this bill in its final stage before this House. These amendments are to be sent to the other place, where they can be incorporated in the bill.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Send the whole thing back. It's pretty sloppy.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Perhaps this is a good time to suggest that the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization should look at this matter in order that we may avoid further difficulties. Perhaps we can find some other way of dealing with the problem.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I rise on the same point of order. The hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain (Mr. Hamilton) made a suggestion, and gave an undertaking on behalf of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition. He wants to be satisfied about the problem that has arisen before we finally deal with the bill. I do not suggest that we should hold up the bill. I wonder if the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Blais) will consult with the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain. If the hon. member is satisfied, we shall be satisfied. We do not wish to hold up matters.

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, if I may speak on the same point of order, I shall consult with the hon. member, so long as it is agreed that we shall deal with the matter with due dispatch. We are considering a motion to concur in an amendment.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): That is right.

Mr. Blais: I understand that not many hon. members wish to speak. Perhaps we could deal with the matter in the next 15 minutes or so.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): In the meantime debate can continue.

Mr. Stan Schellenberger (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, I rise to express my concern about the bill. My concerns were initially expressed before the standing committee which amended the legislation, and which later was amended by the Senate. If hon. members feel they are confused, how do they suppose a new member feels, a new member who is trying to learn the rules and is concerned about the mix-up between the House of Commons and the Senate? We amended parts of the bill. Then the Senate amended parts of the bill and sent them back to the House of Commons for concurrence.

Initially I expressed concern about the position of the small farmer who might have incorporated his farm and who, if found guilty of contravening certain provisions of the Feeds Act, could be fined a stiff fine by the courts. We spend a good deal of time discussing such questions in the Standing Committee on Agriculture.

• (2130)

I want to congratulate the hon. member who is chairman of the Standing Committee on Agriculture for being so patient as we wrestled with this amendment, attempting to break it down in such a way that the small corporate farm would not be treated in the same manner as the larger corporation. It seems that in our amendments we eliminated the large corporation from any fine other than the maximum of $2,000. This was noted in the Senate and an amendment was made. It was passed back to us in Votes and Proceedings.

Reading from the Senate Debates, Senator Argue said and I quote:

> Here we are narrowing it down to corporations found quilty of an indictable offence, and providing for a smaller penalty for a corporation found guilty on summary conviction.
> One of the worries of the members of the other place was that by providing for two types of fines, one for an individual and one for a corporation, a farmer who operates a corporation, for example, that mixes feed in the name of himself and perhaps his family—in other words, a very small family corporation—might be caught twice; he might be found guilty as an individual, and then found guilty as a corporation, so that he might perhaps even be placed in bankruptcy.

When one goes across this country he finds various reasons why many small farms have incorporated. Mainly it is for tax reasons or estate purposes. Because of that, there is a great deal of concern. Many of these small family farm operations and corporations today put in their feeds, in their own mix mills, various drugs and proteins, proteins such as urea which requires a thorough mixing. The labelling must be such that it regulates the mixing of urea into feeds in order that only cattle of at least five months or over 400 pounds should use the protein mixture. As well there are such drugs as aeromycin, terramycin, penicillin, arsenline acid and, at one time, DES mixed in foods for a long period of time so that they are thoroughly dispersed.

Under this legislation an inspector of the Department of Agriculture can go on a farm at will, take a sample of the feed, and have it analysed. Upon analysis it is possible he will find the feed has been improperly mixed. If he feels it would endanger the animals on the individual farm or a neighbour's farm, he could place the individual or corporation under indictment. This is of great concern to me.

I hope the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) will clarify this position and that, even with the Senate amendment, the small corporate farmer will not be treated in the same manner as the large corporation. As I read the amendment I am not sure that is so. I have read it over a number of times. We dealt with it in the agricultural committee. I still feel there is some concern.

The other concern is for small corporations which may only have a staff of one or two individuals. The manager of the corporation may also be involved in the mixing of feed. If his feed is tested by an inspector, analysed, and something is found to be deficient, the inspector can say to the manager of the corporation that there is a problem, and for some reason or other it involves a number of firms and a charge is brought forward.

Under this act, we are zeroing in on managers of corporations. This is all well and good for large corporations such as Swift and Purina, but it is of serious concern to the hundreds of small feed mill operators in western Canada, Ontario, Quebec, and the maritimes. I want to raise this query before we allow the bill to pass. I hope the Minister of Agriculture will relate this to his officials and, in the regulations, they will adhere to the difference between the small corporate feed mill or farm as compared to the large corporation which the Senate is attempting to get at when it amended our amendment wherein we limited the fine to $2,000. That is the intervention I wish to make tonight before the bill passes on and is given Royal Assent.

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I want to make a short reply. Our concern is to be fair when drafting the regulations. Regardless of how small a feed operator may be, our main concern is to ensure that the product he is offering for sale does not contain ingredients that will do damage to animals or humans. The byproducts from the animal, whether a dairy cow or swine, that will be used for human consumption must be as safe as possible. That is our basic concern.

If I may, I want to say one thing about the discussion that took place earlier. I do not think you will ever see this minister sending a bill to the Senate first.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, before we deal with this bill, regardless of whether we deal with it in an orderly, proper manner which would take time, or suit the convenience and time of the House of Commons, I want to point out that we are not dealing with something small.

The point raised by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Towers) and the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain (Mr. Hamilton) is extremely important. The matter we are touching on in the amendments deals with fines and imprisonment with respect to offences created by the statute. If I were the minister I would be very concerned about it.

I assume those sanctions are in the bill so that the ministry and the Crown can enforce compliance with the law. I suggest there is some grave doubt as to whether there are any sanctions in the bill if we follow the procedure suggested for the convenience of the House, a procedure I indicated I would go along with for the sake of convenience. However, speaking for the official opposition, we do not regard this nor do we accept this as a precedent for the manner in which we should deal with these matters.

If I were the minister I would be very much concerned that the bill being dealt with by the House tonight really has no teeth in it. I caution the minister. I do not think that is the intention of the government as expressed by the legislation. I ask the minister to review the amendments.

I ask the parliamentary secretary to consider the procedure very carefully, to consider what was said by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), and perhpas read Hansard. This is important.

I do not think there would be any objection from any member to put this legislation aside overnight so that it could be looked at during the morning to ensure that these matters are being properly dealt with and that the intent of the legislation, which this House has dealt with and is agreeable to, has been followed. That is the only caution I have.

I want to say to the Chair and through the Chair to my friend, the Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council (Mr. Blais), that it is a dangerous matter. I would not be opposed to allowing whatever time is necessary in his judgment.

• (2140)

Mr. Whelan: I, too, am concerned about this. The Senate amendment of the bill referred to it by the House contained only one modification of substance with respect to the bill as amended by the House on November 26, 1975. That modification will remove the penalty limit of $2,000 which may be applied to a corporation if found guilty of an offence on conviction by indictment. The limit is replaced by provision for a fine at the discretion of the court. We have asked our legal advisers for an opinion and I gather that this does not change the intent—the Senate amendment preserves the general intent of the House amendment and allows the court to levy a heavy fine on a corporation if found guilty of very serious offences. As I say, the Senate amendment has been examined by the department's legal advisers in consultation with the officials of the Department of Justice, and it is acceptable in this form.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I am not quarrelling with the opinion of the advisers with respect to the amendment. The question we face is whether we ought to bring into law in this way the amendment which the department's advisers say is proper. That is the issue to which I am addressing myself. However, it is the government's bill. If the government wants to proceed in this way, that is fine. I do not know whether it is really the intent of the government. In any event, if we appear to be agreeing with this procedure I do not wish either the government or the Chair to feel it is intended by us to be taken as a precedent.

Mr. Blais: I think the House leader of the official opposition has made his position very clear. If I understand him correctly he approves of the substance of the amendment and feels it can be concurred in. However, he does not wish to be tied down; he does not wish the procedure now being followed to be taken as a precedent. I am content to have the hon. member's comments on record in Hansard, and perhaps we might now move on by indicating concurrence in the amendment.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): As I said earlier, Mr. Speaker, I do not want to be difficult. I shall not stand in the way. I think the whole process is sloppy, and I am glad the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) has suggested that if we do go through with this it must not be regarded as a precedent. Some of us will not stand for this again.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Perhaps I might say a word at this point. The Chair has not taken this question lightly and I wish to reaffirm this to the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker). As I said before, the legal branch of the House of Commons has looked at the matter and there does not appear to be much difficulty, though it is suggested the procedure should be improved or modified in order that the House might not end up in a like situation, the object being to ensure that any decision, whether by the House or by the Senate, is a clear decision. Members would then know where they stood and what kind of legislation was passed. Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question!

[Translation]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: On division.

CRIMINAL LAW AMENDMENT ACT (NO. 1), 1976

MEASURES FOR BETTER PROTECTION OF CANADIAN SOCIETY AGAINST CRIME

The House resumed, from Thursday, March 11, consideration of the motion of Mr. Basford that Bill C-83, for the better protection of Canadian society against perpetrators of violence and other crime, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to speak in favour of the amendment presented on March 9 by my hon. friend from Calgary North respecting Bill C-83. His motion is certainly deserving of the consideration and approval of the House. It asks that the bill not be read a second time, but that its subject matter be referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs for study.

The hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) pointed out most eloquently that the 76 page bill should be split, as 39 pages of the bill deal with new gun laws. This is another case of the government bringing in an omnibus or umbrella bill with a mixture of good legislation and bad, and hoping to sneak the entire package through by serving it all up on one platter.

This bill with its gun controls, broader wire-tapping powers for police, and tougher prison provisions, overlooks the real crime problem. When I compare the opening remarks of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford) on March 8 with the substance of Bill C-83 I find it difficult to believe that he and I are talking about the same thing. The minister opened his remarks with the statement that this bill represents major legislative initiative on the part of the government. I suggest that the minister's attempts to rewrite the dictionary have had the same unhappy result as the government's attempts to deal effectively with rising crime in our country.

Bill C-83 is a mish-mash, a hodge-podge, and a patchwork quilt of every conceivable sort of dodge that the minister could come up with in order to avoid facing this issue head on. The excellent rebuttal of this bill by my able colleague shows all too clearly that the Minister of Justice has given us a mixed bag of tricks calculated to throw us off the scent. He and some of his fellow ministers are so determined that no murderer shall hang, or even suffer any real hardship, that they are prepared to sacrifice principle, and even to chip away at the rights of the law-abiding citizen to accomplish that purpose.

The minister went on to say that this bill is designed to ensure the adequate protection of the safety and security of the law-abiding, and the legal rights and dignity of those charged with offences. This is the best indication we could have that the minister has not changed his stripes. He is just as determined as ever to place his own personal convictions above those of the majority of members of parliament and above the wishes of the majority of Canadians. By all means, he says, let us ensure that the rights and dignity of offenders are protected. This is not the same as saying that the rights of all Canadians to full protection of the law should be preserved and protected. The minister should have said that this legislation is designed to protect the safety, security, and legal rights and dignity of the law-abiding.

My sympathies are, and have always been with those who are law-abiding and with those who are the victims of crime. I consider the dignity of the law-abiding to be infinitely more important than the dignity of those who are convicted of crimes, especially those who are convicted of violent crimes. If we can ensure that the dignity of all Canadians will be served by a particular piece of legislation, then let us by all means consider that possibility. But, Mr. Speaker, let us not place the cart before the horse. Let us first do what we must to protect the dignity of those Canadians who respect our system and our laws and who abide by our laws.

The Minister of Justice tells us that the safety and security of law-abiding Canadians will be enhanced by making it more difficult for law-abiding people to obtain and keep rifles and shotguns. In the same breath the minister urges us to approve legislation making it more difficult for people to obtain and keep automatic weapons, pistols, and such weapons as sawed-off rifles and shotguns. For the life of me I cannot make the connection between those weapons designed purely for criminal use, and those designed for, and used by, hunters and sportsmen. I am not talking about the types of pistols used by sportsmen for target shooting or by our Olympic shooting teams. These guns are required to be registered, and it is my understanding that permits are only issued for these pistols to persons known to be of good character and who do not have records of criminal activity.

What I am talking about is the registration of every person in Canada who wants to own a shotgun or rifle. In the first place it is a matter of record that no country in the western world has been able to prevent people from owning guns simply by outlawing them. It is also well known that one of the first things that a communist government does when it takes over a country is to outlaw the ownership of guns, any kind of gun, and the penalty for owning a gun in most of those countries is death.

History has shown that oppressive laws only breed lawbreakers. In some countries like Sweden, Israel, and France, oppressive tax laws have served only to develop a nation of tax cheats. A story in a local paper recently pointed out that the government of France collects only about one half of taxes actually owed, and it noted that the Frenchman and Frenchwoman who is not a tax cheat is a rarity. The same syndrome can be detected in countries where there are oppressive laws concerning the ownership of guns. A veteran police official in Britain, where gun laws are extremely strict, said that there are millions of unregistered guns in Britain, and he also said that there simply was not any way that anyone could ferret out these illegal guns.

The city of Detroit probably has the strictest gun laws on this continent, yet I need not point out that Detroit is the murder capital of North America and that the majority of murders in that city are committed with guns, restricted guns—outlawed guns, if you will. By comparison, in the deep south of the U.S. where anybody can own a gun of any type, except for automatic weapons, the per capita murder rate with guns is significantly lower than in cities where restrictive gun laws are in force.

May I just put some statistics on the record, Mr. Speaker. In 1973, 474 murders were committed; in 1974, there were 545 murders. Less than half this number in each year were committed with guns. I point out that in 1973, 56 murders were committed with a handgun; in 1974, the number was 71. There were 114 murders committed with a rifle in 1973 and 122 in 1974. Sawed-off rifles accounted for two murders in 1973 and six in 1974. Sawed-off shotguns accounted for three murders in 1974 only, none in 1973. Shotguns were used in 31 murders in 1973, and in 55 murders in 1974. In 1973, 11 murders were committed using a gun of an unknown type; in 1974 the number was 15. In other words, in the majority of murders some weapon other than a gun was used—for example, beatings, stabbings, strangulation, suffocation, drowning, axing; and in some cases cause of death was unknown.

What I am trying to say is that we in Canada cannot outlaw the instruments of death any more than we can outlaw death itself. If we could outlaw violent death, then I would suggest that the government use its majority in this House to do just that. That would be more reasonable and just than to use its majority to push this bill through the House. The Minister of Justice takes liberties with our intelligence when he suggests that we are in the process of outlawing the instruments of death by agreeing to impose licensing requirements and restrictions on all law-abiding Canadian gun owners.

A friend of mine, when I was speaking to him at a banquet last Saturday night and happened to mention the possibility that this very important and contentious gun control legislation would be before the House this week, stated that he could make a weapon, which I presume could be classed as a gun. He described how he could make it out of a piece of pipe and this, that, and the other thing, at a cost of 75 cents, and that he could make it in less than an hour. This is further proof that anyone who has the desire to murder will be able to do so using some type of weapon.

Let us take the various aspects of this part of the legislation and apply hypothetical situations to them and see just how ridiculous they appear in the clear light of day. I refer hon. members to the first step, the establishment of a nation-wide bureaucracy of gun licensing agencies employing thousands of persons. These people will be given a frightening degree of latitude by this legislation to approve or reject applications from citizens who want to keep the guns they now own or to obtain new guns. I am talking about rifles and shotguns only.

Then pile on top of that the mountains of paper work that must be processed and forwarded to central record offices. In addition we must have an elaborate appeal procedure to protect the rights of citizens from arbitrary decisions made by bureaucrats. This begins to get more and more expensive, Mr. Speaker, and will enable the government to reward more and more of the party faithful, defeated candidates, and friends ad infinitum. Perhaps this is the way that the Minister of Justice plans to justify the enormous expense.

May I call it ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

FISHERIES—SEALS—REQUEST FOR TABLING OF REPORT ON DECLINE IN POPULATION AND NEED FOR DECREASING QUOTAS

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, on March 1 I asked the Minister of State (Fisheries) (Mr. LeBlanc) two questions concerning seals and sealing on the east coast of Canada. The questions related to the tabling of an interim report to the minister from the committee on seals and sealing, and the studies by his department on alternative employment for persons who would be affected by a phasing out or stoppage or serious curtailment of the seal hunt. The minister's answers to these questions, is the reason I am debating the issue this evening. I wish I had 70 minutes, Mr. Speaker, instead of the seven minutes limitation that is imposed upon me.

In the July, 1974, election campaign many Canadians obtained a written or oral commitment from most political candidates that if they were elected they would ask the government to find ways and means of stopping the senseless slaughter of the seals and, at the same time, find alternative means of income for those who were affected by such stoppage. The concerned Canadians who opposed the seal hunt had three main reasons—first, the serious depletion of the seal herd; second, the method of killing the seals; and third, the minimum income obtained by the sealers.

The interim report of the committee on seals and sealing, which was composed of representatives from the animal welfare, scientific, and industrial communities, and was not aligned with any government agency, studied the seal hunt in Canada with regard to conservation aspects and humane killing methods. May I quote from the report regarding some of its findings. Having regard to the conservation aspects the report states at page 2:

> The one definite conclusion based on scientific analyses of available data between 1950 and 1970 is that the stock of harp seals has been halved. The original size of the seal population although of interest statistically, is immaterial in considering this point. The population trend towards decrease is continuing. This decrease in population has been supported by observations made by vessel-borne sealers, landsmen, government officials, casual observers, and biologists. There has been some difference of opinion on the effect of reducing the size of the annual kill on the recovery rate of the seal herd. Only continuing research can ensure the herd is not eradicated.
> If the seal hunt is maintained at the 1972 level there will be a total elimination of the one year old animals in 2014. The harp seal would then move toward extinction as the older animals die off. A decrease in the annual exploitation of the harp seal is therefore indicated if the species is to survive.
> A moratorium in 1973 on the taking of seals, except for those taken by the aboriginal population (native human populations of the Canadian Arctic and Greenland), would allow the herd to start its recovery in 1975. If the seal hunt is phased out, by all but aboriginals, over the period 1972-1974 then the herd will start to substantially recover in 1976. The phase out is preferable as it has obvious advantages to the sealer, as well as to the government in allowing the latter to implement economic support for these changes.

On page 6 of the report this committee summarizes by a number points as follows:

> 1. The majority of the Committee on Seals and Sealing supports a phasing out of the Canadian and Norwegian harp and hood seal hunt . . .
> 3. The phase out must be accompanied by an economic evaluation of the change in income to the sealer, vessel owner and operator and the processing plant operator, so as to prevent individual hardship.
>
> 4. Intensified research, through contract and governmental laboratories, must be carried out to ensure satisfactory guidelines for protection of the harp and hood seal population, if these species are ever again exploited.
> 5. The sealer, when advised, has made every attempt to act humanely in the killing of seals. There is no reason to believe he is in any way different in his attitude to the killing of animals from any other human being.

What has been the response of the minister? There has been no real phase out with regard to the seal hunt. There has been a slight reduction from 150,000 to 125,000 for the 1976 seal hunt. There has been no evaluation of the incomes loss to the sealers or the finding of alternative employment. There has been no research as to other methods of killing seals. There has been no research as to the effect of the eating habits of the seals on other marine life, and there has been no indication of the termination of the sealing agreement between Canada and Norway, and the necessity of giving three years notice with regard to its termination. In other words there has been no real response by the minister to these very vital issues.

What has been the response of most Canadians? There has been disappointment at the continuation of the senseless slaughter of seals for the maximum profit of the Norwegian industry which caters to the vanity of European women in a luxury trade. There has been concern that the government should pit sealers against other Canadians regarding loss of income to sealers, instead of finding alternative methods of earning income for the sealers. There has also been the necessity of the Greenpeace Foundation to dramatize the problem to the government, instead of the government and members of parliament finding ways and means to solve the problem.

I am asking the minister to stop dividing Canadians on the social, moral and financial issues and to direct his mind and manpower to finding a solution to the conservation of the seals, alternative humane methods of killing, and the protection of income and the safety of the sealers. If he does this he will gain the respect and admiration of all Canadians.

Mr. George Baker (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, there is no single report directed to the subject of current population levels of the seal herds. There are many recent scientific reports by Canadian and Norwegian scientists on the harp seal populations. These differ in content and conclusions.

It should be noted that at least four species of seals on the Atlantic coast are being hunted. The status of the various seal populations and the regulations under which they are harvested differ for each species.

The harbour seal and the grey seal are resident in Canadian waters the year round, and their activities in destroying fish and fishermen's gear are a serious problem in some areas. For this reason the department operates a bounty program to encourage the cropping of harbour seals, and itself undertakes and annual cull of grey seals, that is, the latter herds are thinned out by departmental officers to keep their numbers in check.

The species which are hunted commercially are the harp seal and the hooded seal. The abundance levels and population biology of the hooded seal are not well known, and the harvest has been held at a maximum 15,000 for the past five years. In 1976 Canadian hunters were allotted 6,000 and Norwegian hunters 9,000.

The species which is in greatest abundance is the harp seal and the main commercial harvest is directed toward this animal. It is a significant predator of fish and thereby a significant competitor of fishermen. At current population levels it is estimated to consume about one million tons of fish and smaller marine animals annually, including a quarter of a million tons of capelin—itself a significant food item of other fish species, and also of our people.

Like the hooded seal, the harp is not present year round in Canadian waters, but is present during its breeding season in late winter and spring. During this period it consumes 10 to 15 thousand tons of herring in the gulf of St. Lawrence alone.

The harp seal has been hunted commercially for hundreds of years, not only in the Northwestern Atlantic, but in the White sea and other places near Spitzbergen in the Northeastern Atlantic. All these herds have fluctuated in size over the years, and have, at one time or another, experienced over-exploitation. In the Northwestern Atlantic the harp seal is hunted in spring by ship-based hunters from Norway and Canada, and by land-based hunters in Newfoundland and the Magdalen Islands. At other times of the year it is taken at Labrador, the Canadian Arctic, and West Greenland by resident fishermen and hunters.

The harp seal appears to have been over-exploited at several times during the long history of the seal hunt in the Northwestern Atlantic, most recently in the 1960's. The hunt came under international regulation, International Commission for the Northwest Atlantic Fisheries—ICNAF, in 1967. An initial quota of 245,000 in 1971 was reduced to 150,000 in 1972 to 1975, and to 127,000 in 1976.

Excessive exploitation in the 1960's and earlier has resulted in declines in pup production in the 1970's. Lower levels of pup production may be expected until the beneficial effects of the quotas from 1972 onwards become evident in 1978 onwards, since the seals mature at about age six. Meanwhile the hunt is being regulated to prevent further decline in the herds. The herd is now estimated at about one million animals.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his time expired some time ago.

AGRICULTURE—EFFECT ON EXPORT TRADE OF REMOVAL OF TRANSPORTATION SUBSIDY ON FLOUR—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, my question directed to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) on March 19 concerned the impact of the removal of the transportation subsidy on grain and flour shipped from east coast ports which constitutes a serious threat to an important industry and is a policy decision which, I believe, should be reconsidered by the government.

The minister in his answer left the impression that the flour milling industry for export purposes is a dying enterprise. He implied that it is better for us as a nation to ship the raw product, in this case wheat, rather than worrying about processing it in the form of flour. I must advise him for his information that some markets for grain can only be met by the export of flour. For example, Africa, and the nations in the West Indies do not have any flour milling capacity, and so therefore the exports we ship in the form of wheat have to be made in this case in the form of flour.

It is interesting to note that Canada mills approximately 90 million bushels a year. In the face of this the sort of shallow attitude of the Liberal government has led Canada into a major slump in manufacturing trade which is now causing us to slide into a major crisis. This attitude has resulted in our country facing a very serious trade deficit. In 1975 there was a deficit of some $8 billion in the so-called higher technology manufacturing field. That was $1 billion worse than it was the year before, and more than three times the sum of what it was in 1970. This means lost jobs, lost economic activity, lost investment activity, lost potential for technological achievement and, in short, lost opportunities for present and future generations of Canadians.

I am told that the elimination of this subsidy could mean a loss to Canada of something in the order of $28 million worth of value added processing activities, or a total economic spin-off of something in the order of $65 million.

Let us look at the flour trade and what has happened in Canada relative to the world position, and let us examine for a moment what effect this government decision will have upon its future.

First, world demand for flour has expanded from 65 million hundredweight in 1954 to 95 million hundredweight in 1974, an increase of 50 per cent. Canada's share, meanwhile, declined from 31 per cent to 11 per cent. In 1954 Canadian millers were exporting 20 million hundredweight. In 1964 we exported 24 million hundredweight on an annual basis, and in 1975 our exports dropped by more than 50 per cent from the 1954 figure, to a figure of 8.5 million hundredweight, and by 65 per cent since the 1964 figure.

The minister suggests that more and more countries are milling their own flour. Well, for his information, only Canada and Australia have experienced substantial declines in exports of flour. The U.S. share has not fallen appreciably from its level of 1954. As a matter of fact, until 1972 it was well above its 1954 level. The European Common Market, meanwhile, has expanded its exports over a period of ten years from 15 million hundredweight to 64 million hundredweight in 1974. Therefore it is categorically wrong to suggest that world export demand for flour has fallen. As I pointed out earlier, some countries have no flour milling capacity so the only way our grain can enter those countries is in the form of flour.

The actions which are proposed by the government in abolishing this freight subsidy will only serve to worsen an already deteriorating Canadian industry and will result in further declines in our share of the export flour trade. In this instance I do not believe that the government has carried out an accurate cost benefit analysis, and I suggested that it do just that before proceeding further. The result of this action by the government will increase freight costs to Canadian millers by 212 per cent. This cost will have to be added to the export price of flour.

We are told by the Canadian National Millers' Association that while the U.S.S.R. has indicated requirements for 375,000 tons of Canadian flour during 1976, it has insisted that further negotiations be conducted in the event of freight costs are to be adjusted upward. The U.S.S.R. representatives have stated further that Canada is no longer competitive in world markets and that further price increases will require them to look for alternative suppliers.

The Canadian National Millers' Association sums up its observations as follows:

> Eliminating the subsidy and the «hold-down» will visit disaster upon Canadian millers and damage a substantial export market for Canadian wheat in the form of flour. We cannot believe that these and other foreseeable consequences are in the public interest.

I urge the minister to persuade his cabinet colleagues to reconsider this policy. I suggest that an immediate cost benefit analysis be undertaken, and if it is revealed that such a subsidy should be discontinued, something which I doubt, then I suggest that it be discontinued in a phase out period over the next four or five years so that the industry can adjust over a period of time rather than be disrupted by a spontaneous government action.

I do not believe the action which is contemplated by the government in the form of restraint program is in the public interest at this time. I believe it will only serve to accentuate the speedy demise of Canada's already shaken and eroded flour industry. I must say in conclusion that the whole restraint program which has been advocated by the government plays too harshly with agriculture. I think agriculture under this restraint program is getting short shrift.

Mr. Irénée Pelletier (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, part of the initial rationale for the "At and East" subsidy was to keep an all-Canadian route competitive with the American alternative. American rates have increased significantly since that time and current indications are that a full compensatory level in Canada would be preferable to other alternatives. However, as the subsidy has been in effect for some time its removal will result in some adjustment for Canadian flour exporters.

As the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) mentioned, there has been a general movement in most countries toward milling their own wheat. To the extent that Canada has replaced some of our flour exports with wheat exports these markets have not been lost. The world export market for flour has been stagnant since the late fifties with an increasing share of the market going to lower quality, subsidized EEC flour. In spite of substantial PL480 activity even American sales have dropped dramatically.

Canadian flour exports fall into three categories: first, commercial; second, government; and, third, Russia-Cuba. The bulk of these sales are made to Cuba under the Russian sales agreements for Canadian grain. The removal of the subsidy will not affect sales in 1976. In the longer run it is expected that Cuba will move toward a higher degree of self-sufficiency in wheat milling. Until that time the government will continue its efforts to maintain this market.

Commercial sales and sales to the Canadian government together accounted for the balance of flour exports—about 25 per cent. Sales to the government will likely continue at present levels regardless of the subsidy. Commercial sales may be effected. However, a strong case has not been made by the Canadian National Millers' Association as to the magnitude of these effects. The Department of Agriculture is keeping a close watch on this situation and if other aspects arise appropriate action will be taken.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION—INQUIRY WHETHER THERE ARE ANY PLANS FOR PORT OF PICTOU, NOVA SCOTIA

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I should like to pursue further the question I raised earlier this month with the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Lessard) concerning whether or not DREE has any concrete plans or projects, either by itself or in concert with other federal agencies in the province of Nova Scotia, for development assistance for the port of Pictou.

I know that we are in a time of restraint in government spending, but that, I submit, does not or should not apply to essential infrastructure projects. I realize that priorities must be constantly re-examined. However, I submit that there is a good case to be made for more DREE involvement in developing the port of Pictou. At least we must begin some systematic efforts to improve matters.

This once busy and still strategic port is immediately adjacent to a heavily industrialized infrastructure including Hawker Siddeley, pulp and paper mills, Scott Pulp, Michelin Tire, Ferguson Industries, shipbuilding and so on, together with several small industries. These are important industrial components of the complex which ships all over the world and needs proved access to salt water in order to realize its full potential.

This is not the first time I have pointed out to the minister and to his predecessor, now the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Jamieson), that Pictou county in general and the port of Pictou have been neglected, and that DREE by itself and in conjunction with other federal departments such as Public Works and Transport ought to and indeed must make a meaningful effort to upgrade this port for the good of the area and its people.

This month the minister, in response to my request for support in my representations to the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Cullen) to keep open the customs office in Pictou, stated that he was advised the volume of business would not justify my request to the Minister of National Revenue being granted. This is indeed a retrogade step because now the port of Pictou can no longer act as a ships' registry. Surely this ought to give the minister and the government an additional reason for improving the port. Once it is improved, the business will come to it.

● (2220)

Earlier this winter I got in touch with civic officials, business executives, and other prominent and interested persons in Pictou county, to ask for their opinions and support in making the government in general and the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion in particular aware of the need for better marine facilities at Pictou. I received that support from the mayors of several towns, and received an offer of assistance from the Pictou County Research and Development Commission.

In the limited time available I wish to put on record some excerpts from communications sent to me by some of the mayors of towns which, together, make up this important industrial area.

Mr. R. J. Murae, Mayor of Stellarton, wrote in part:

> I wish to assure you of my complete co-operation on your endeavour to improve port facilities in Pictou. It is something that is long past due. I propose to have a resolution passed by our council and forwarded to you immediately.

Walter Duggan, Mayor of Westville, wrote:

> It is our feeling that any development to the port facilities would not only benefit the town of Pictou, but the county as a whole.

M. A. Harquail, Mayor of New Glasgow, wrote:

> Pictou county has a great need for industrial and economic expansion. Industrial expansion without ready access to markets, is, as you are aware, a case of putting the cart before the horse. For this reason I endorse your efforts and offer my support.

The mayor of Pictou, Mr. Clarence McCarthy, sent out many detailed examples of how Pictou would benefit from and is entitled to more funding to increase its capability as a port. I forwarded his excellent letter to the minister as I did with the other letters. I wish to put part of his representation on public record in Hansard so that people of Pictou will see where he stands on their behalf. The mayor said in part:

> Mention is made of the ice locked condition of the harbour during the winter months as being a deterrent. To counteract this one should look back to the war years when the port was a most important repair depot for the Royal Canadian Navy every month of the year, and Foundation Maritime Limited were building . . . 2,400-ton steel freighters and sending them to sea, once each month, 24 in all.
> If we consider the freeze-up as a reason for non-use of the harbour by our Pictou county manufacturers it could be an argument that storage sheds with enough capacity to carry over this freeze-up period are needed; incorporated as well could be capacity for at least . . . 12,000 tons of feed grain which would be transported from the Lakehead before freeze-up. Surely this would allow for cheaper feed than the present method of storing a rail shipment of only . . . 200 tons at Scotsburn.

It is obvious that we are not using the port of Pictou to its best advantage.

Pictou county has recently received assistance in the form of DREE grants made to businesses in the area. We recognize this and appreciate it. As member for the area, may I, too, express my appreciation. But unlike the "grand centres" encompassing the Halifax-Dartmouth area, or the strait area of Nova Scotia, we have received little if any of the type of infrastructure aid to which we are entitled. For example, $20 million was committed in 1972 for the Metropolitan Area Growth Investment Organization in the Halifax-Dartmouth metropolitan area. To date this investment has produced little if any benefit because of the delays arising in handling. The interest paid on this money in three years would be more than enough to pay for the facilities which the port of Pictou desperately requires.

In conclusion I ask the minister to make a commitment to provide more infrastructure aid in Pictou county and to improve the port of Pictou. This will bring quick rewards in promoting a better way of life and expansion of business. The people of Pictou county have always shown an ability to respond to opportunity. They deserve a more equitable share of federal moneys spent in Nova Scotia for infrastructure assistance.

I hope the minister will give my representation favourable consideration. I repeat that this important area of Nova Scotia has not received its fair share of infrastructure aid. It has not received that kind of assistance to which I referred in my question earlier this month.

Mr. Cliff McIsaac (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, as usual the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay) ably delineated his concern for his region. He was able to quote from letters sent by people in Pictou and neighbouring communities which support his position.

I am aware that Pictou has a great tradition as a shipbuilding centre and as an active port over the years. To my knowledge, the Department of Regional Economic Expansion was not directly approached by the government of Nova Scotia about further planning or funding for port development at Pictou.

As I am sure the hon. member is aware, the development of port facilities falls under the jurisdiction of the Ministry of Transport. I am not offering that to dodge any responsibility from the point of view of DREE. DREE has provided industrial incentives to a number of firms in Pictou. It is my understanding also that our officials anticipate a further proposal from a firm in that area in the fairly immediate future.

It is certainly the intention of DREE to make full use of all of the development instruments available to provide co-operation and full support for initiatives undertaken by the province, by other federal departments, or by the private sector to help the port of Pictou achieve its full potential and at least some of its former greatness, of which the hon. member is well aware.

SUGGESTED INVESTIGATION OF CONDITIONS ON RIDEAU RIVER AND COMPENSATION FOR DAMAGES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. I would move, seconded by the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald):

That the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development undertake a complete investigation of the flood conditions in the Rideau River with particular emphasis on:

(a) precautionary measures that were taken by his department and the machinery for interjurisdictional co-operation;

(b) any improvement thereon that might be made in such procedure; and particularly any immediate action that can be taken;

(c) the question of compensation for damage suffered by property owners and recommendations for action by the government alone or in concert with other governments.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Pursuant to Standing Order 43, such motion can only be presented with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

MANPOWER

SUGGESTION GOVERNMENT HIRE CASUALS THROUGH MANPOWER RATHER THAN PRIVATE AGENCIES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to ask the unanimous consent of the House to deal with a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the fact that as an austerity measure the government has dropped a program which would have saved millions of dollars by eliminating the government's dependence on private employment agencies to provide casual labour in the government; in view of the fact that as many as 2,000 people a day are hired through these agencies to provide casual labour for the government; and in view of the fact that these people are viciously exploited by these private companies to the extent of 20 or 30 per cent of their salaries being paid to these companies who do no more work than accepting and making a phone call, this labour arrangement looking more like feudalism and indentured labour than anything else, I move, seconded by the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt):

That to protect people from exploitation at the hands of private employment firms and to save the government millions of dollars, the government immediately initiate a policy of hiring casual employees only through Canada Manpower.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The said motion can only be presented with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

INDUSTRY

PROPOSED DEBATE ON PROBLEMS CAUSED BY IMPORT OF TEXTILES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43, I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to discuss a matter of pressing and urgent necessity.

Considering that the federal government is duty-bound to protect the Canadian textile and garment industry, in particular against low cost imports, and considering that the American policy of import limitations is proving highly successful and deserves our full consideration, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert):

That the House initiate immediate discussions on the situation of this Canadian industry in the light of the U.S. experience and at the same time strengthen the mandate of the Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce so that department officials responsible for the implementation of this policy may be asked to testify and bring forth all necessary clarification on this issue.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the motion by the hon. member. Pursuant to Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent, therefore the motion may not be put.

ENERGY

EFFECT OF ENERGY COSTS IN THE ATLANTIC REGION ON FEDERAL DEVELOPMENT PROGRAMS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I rise to present a motion of urgent and pressing necessity. I think all hon. members know the devastating effect that recent large increases in costs of energy have had on the Atlantic provinces. As 90 per cent of the energy used in that part of Canada is derived from petroleum and as energy costs in the Atlantic provinces are two or three times greater than energy costs in Ontario and Quebec, I would move, seconded by the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East (Mr. Forrestall):

That the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion report to this House forthwith on the negative impact on federal programs of regional development which present and increasing energy costs have; and, further, that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources indicate at that time what interim programs and assistance are being provided so as to ensure the effectiveness of present federal development policies and programs.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The motion can only be presented, pursuant to Standing Order 43, with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

PROPOSAL TO IMPROVE FERRY SERVICE BETWEEN PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND AND MAINLAND—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I rise on a matter relating to ferry services between Prince Edward Island and Nova Scotia, and the urgent and pressing necessity of relieving the congestion and delays which hinder commercial and tourist traffic between these two provinces each summer. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald):

That the Ministry of Transport implement the recommendations of the P.E.I.-mainland ferry transportation study steering committee which recommended weeks ago that: "A group should begin work to remove the ferry M.V. Confederation from Borden to Wood Island in time to carry traffic this summer": and further, that the Minister of Transport instruct those officials in the marine and ferry division of his department to proceed with all haste so that the operator of the service between Wood Island, P.E.I. and Caribou, N.S., may finalize plans for the hiring of a crew and the refitting of the ferry Confederation without any further delay.

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 43, the motion requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

PROPOSED PROHIBITION OF RETIRED EMPLOYEES FROM DEALING WITH GOVERNMENT FOR A CERTAIN PERIOD—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Andy Hogan (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the fact that the proposal by Canada to purchase from Lockheed Aircraft Corporation 18 anti-submarine planes at a cost of $1.1 billion is under a cloud, I move, seconded by the member for Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Symes):

That civil servants should be "quarantined" for at least three years after retirement from dealing directly or indirectly with government on any subjects for which they once were responsible, especially in view of the fact that top retired Canadian civil servants have the most generous pension scheme of any people in the nation.

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 43, such a motion can only be presented with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

THE PERFORMING ARTS

WINNING OF ACADEMY AWARD BY CRAWLEY FILMS FOR DOCUMENTARY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of great importance to Canada. For many years we have recognized that great reservoir of talent in Canada for production in the film industry. Yesterday, for the first time in the history of the Academy Awards, a Canadian feature length documentary film produced by Budge Crawley of Crawley Films in Ottawa was not only nominated but went on to win an Academy Award. In view of the great encouragement this is to all other Canadian film producers and directors, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker):

That this House send its warm congratulations to Mr. Crawley for his landmark achievement which has so greatly enhanced Canada's reputation in the creative arts.

Mr. Speaker: Within the terms of Standing Order 43, such a motion can only be presented with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: The House having heard the motion, is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion, moved by the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock (Mr. Friesen), seconded by the member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker)?

NATIONAL DEFENCE

LOCKHEED CONTRACT—POSITION OF COMPANY ON FINANCING

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of National Defence. Yesterday the minister indicated that during the initial contract negotiations the government had been told by Lockheed "that they could arrange the financing". Is the minister saying that Lockheed, which already owes $595 million, did not tell the government that it could not incur any new debt or even be a technical borrower without permission of the United States Emergency Loan Guarantee Board?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the Lockheed Corporation on earlier occasions, and again at the last of the negotiations, indicated they had these types of problems. They also indicated they could solve them and that they could, in fact, provide the financing for which we were asking. We were under no doubt about that, that they could provide the financing.

Mr. Clark: Could the Minister of National Defence tell the House precisely what information he had from Lockheed at that time as to guarantees they would be in a position the minister apparently believed they would be in? Can he give us precise information as to the guarantees he received concerning the time frame within which they would be in the position in which the minister apparently presumed they would be in?

Mr. Richardson: At that time we were negotiating with two companies, the Boeing Company and the Lockheed Company. They both indicated very clearly to officials of the Department of National Defence and, in particular, to General Allan who was in charge of the project office that they could provide the interim financing or the bridge financing to complete the difference between the funds which were available in my department and the payments set out in the payments schedule. That word was brought to us by General Allan following his conversations and we assumed it was accurate. It subsequently became apparent that the Lockheed Company was not able to provide this financing.

LOBBYISTS

REQUEST FOR TABLING OF STUDY ON REGISTRATION—REASON FOR LACK OF ACTION

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): I have a supplementary for the Prime Minister. Yesterday, the Minister of National Defence could not answer any questions as to the date on which Lockheed retained the firm of Reisman and Grandy Limited or the terms and conditions—which was precisely my reason for raising the matter of the registration of lobbyists on Friday. In the light of the Prime Minister's indication that this matter may be brought into consideration during the course of the study on guidelines for retired public servants—I am referring to the registration of lobbyists—would the Prime Minister review and then table the study on the registration of lobbyists which was carried out for the former minister of consumer and corporate affairs, now Minister of Justice, and would the right hon. gentleman tell the House why no action was taken in connection with that study at the time?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I would have to refresh my mind with regard to that study; I do not, honestly, recall its conclusions and I therefore cannot say why it was not, to use the hon. gentleman's phrase, acted upon. I would point out to him, in connection with this matter of the registration of lobbyists, by way of confirming my questioning the other day the efficacy of such a course, that Messrs. Reisman and Grandy claim they are not lobbyists and that in fact they are not lobbying the government for anything.

Mr. Clark: However the Prime Minister tries to define it, we obviously face a problem here arising from that situation. Would the right hon. gentleman give immediate consideration to the registration of those firms and individuals which make money by making representations to the government or to its agencies?

Mr. Trudeau: The suggestion is far too vague to have any validity at all. I am sure every member of the House, including those on the government side, find that representations are made to them practically every day of the week. They may come from so-called lobbyists; they may come from lawyers who are passing through town, they may come from economists, they may come from university professors. A lot of representations have been made to me in the last little while by members of the Canadian Medical Association. So, surely, the Leader of the Opposition does not think it is that simple—just to ask everybody who wants to talk to the government to give their names.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

ROLE OF MR. GRANDY IN SELECTION OF "ORION" AS LONG-RANGE PATROL AIRCRAFT

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is directed to the Minister of National Defence. Yesterday, outside the House, the minister confirmed that the government, and I quote, "spent three years selecting this particular aircraft". Would the minister tell the House what role the former deputy minister of industry, trade and commerce, Mr. Grandy, played in those deliberations?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Grandy was the deputy minister of industry, trade and commerce during part of that period. I cannot say which committees he sat on. I presume he must have had some contact with the discussions which were taking place. That is to be expected in view of his position. But I have no details of his work schedule during that period.

LOCKHEED CONTRACT—VIEW OF PRIME MINISTER ON NEGOTIATING CONTRACT WHEN SUFFICIENT FUNDS NOT AVAILABLE TO ENSURE PRODUCTION

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is for the right hon. Prime Minister. I wonder whether the right hon. gentleman would comment on the fact that his Minister of National Defence was apparently authorized to announce the purchase of the Lockheed LRPA when he did not have sufficient money; further, that his Minister of Supply and Services negotiated a contract apparently without knowing that the Department of National Defence were unable to provide the necessary financing; and further, that the deputy project manager from supply and services prepared a contract calling for the Department of National Defence to provide the money although he surely must have known that they did not have any? Would the Prime Minister now indicate what steps he is taking to ensure that this utter shambles will not occur again?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, that is, of course, a rhetorical question which is based on a misunderstanding, a serious one, of the facts.

LOCKHEED CONTRACT—KNOWLEDGE OF MINISTER OF FACT COMPANY COULD NOT FINANCE CONTRACT WITHOUT APPROVAL OF UNITED STATES EMERGENCY LOAN BOARD

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Defence. Considering that any Canadian who is going to buy something makes sure, first, that the company can provide it and, secondly, finds out in advance what the terms of payment are going to be, can the minister assure the House that he was aware last November that the provisions of the 1971 United States emergency loan guarantee act were on public file with the U.S. securities and exchange commission, and that these provisions, according to the secretary of the emergency loan guarantee board, Alan Vinick, make it very clear that Lockheed was not in a position to consider financing a contract such as the LRPA without the permission of the board and the 24 creditors?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I am certain that my officials were aware of that last November and I have seen evidence to that effect in writing. But they were also told, as I have said on a number of occasions, that those restraints could in fact be overcome and that Lockheed could provide the financing.

Mr. Broadbent: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Would the minister mind expanding on that last statement. If he is about to commit the people of Canada to spending millions of dollars, indeed billions of dollars, did he not take steps to find out just how Lockheed was going to be able to get around what seems to be a clear requirement in terms of U.S. law and regulations?

Mr. Richardson: Mr. Speaker, I can only repeat that at that particular stage in the negotiations we had to accept the word not only of the Lockheed company but the Boeing company, both of whom said they could finance these interim payments. We then made our decision and entered into detailed negotiations. It was in the final negotiations that it became apparent that what Lockheed had told us they could do they were unable to do.

[Mr. Richardson.]

LOCKHEED CONTRACT—REASON FOR CONTRADICTORY STATEMENTS ABOUT FINANCING

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): A final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is the minister aware that the vice-president of marketing for Lockheed, Mr. William Wilson, specifically denies what the minister has just said, and that he has said that the Lockheed corporation all along left no impression with the government of Canada that it could provide the financing that the minister says was the government's understanding? If so, how does he give any account for this flat contradiction between what he is telling the House and what a senior official of that corporation is saying? In answering that, to what did he refer in past answers in the House about a month ago when he said that there was some confusion between the government's understanding of the financial arrangements and Lockheed?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, as recently as this morning, and on numerous earlier occasions, I talked with the officials who were negotiating with Lockheed and they were very clearly of the belief that Lockheed could provide this financing. They were so told and they so reported to us, and it was on that basis that we continued—

An hon. Member: By Lockheed?

Mr. Richardson: Yes, by Lockheed.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

AGRICULTURE

NEW DAIRY POLICY—POSSIBILITY OF AGREEMENT ON QUOTAS FOLLOWING MEETING WITH PRODUCERS

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Agriculture, I shall put my question to his parliamentary secretary.

As the minister is soon to announce the dairy policy of the government for the year 1976-77, may I ask him if the minister has had talks with the management committee since yesterday's meeting with the industrial milk producers? If so, can he tell us whether some consensus has been arrived at that is acceptable to the producers with regard to the provincial quotas?

Mr. Irénée Pelletier (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the minister met the committee in question this morning. He is now holding discussions with them and I can say absolutely nothing at this time about what proposals may have been made by the provinces.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, on a supplementary.

May I ask the parliamentary secretary whether sometime today, after the talks have come to an end, a statement could be made in the House, if it is indicated, to inform hon. members about the conclusions arrived at by the members of the management committee, the Canadian Dairy Commission and the Minister of Agriculture?

Mr. Pelletier: Mr. Speaker, I cannot guarantee the hon. member that this can be done today but one thing is sure: the minister is supposed to announce his policy within the next two days. According to the law, it must be done each year before April 1.

CONFLICT OF INTEREST

ALLEGED CONFLICT BETWEEN COMMERCIAL ACTIVITIES OF MR. REISMAN AND APPOINTMENT AS DIRECTOR OF CROWN CORPORATIONS

Mr. Bill Kempling (Halton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. Will he confirm that Mr. Reisman of Reisman and Grandy was elected to the board of directors of the Canada Development Corporation as a voting director on April 1, 1975, and prior to that was a non-voting member as the deputy minister of finance? He is still a director of Telsat, which dates back to December of 1970. Does the right hon. gentleman feel there is a conflict of interest in this appointment in view of the present commercial activities of Mr. Reisman?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, perhaps the Minister of Finance could confirm the exact dates, but I do know the first part of the facts to be as stated, that Mr. Reisman is a member of these two boards and that he was retained on these boards after he had ceased being a member ex officio by virtue of his position as deputy minister. As to the conflict of interest aspect of it, Mr. Speaker, I told the House the other day we were going to look into these matters. As stated, I am somewhat worried about the activities of upper level civil servants in the years after they leave the service. I do not see a conflict of interest just on basis of the fact that a man, now in private life, is seconded by these corporations to sit on their boards.

ALLEGED CONFLICT IN MR. GRANDY'S POSITION AS DIRECTOR OF DE HAVILLAND WHILE ADVISING LOCKHEED

Mr. Bill Kempling (Halton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, does the Prime Minister see a conflict of interest in the appointment, until September 19, 1975, of Mr. James Grandy of Reisman and Grandy as a member of the executive committee and director of de Havilland—I understand he is in no longer in that position—while at the same time his firm was advising Lockheed Aircraft on the LRPA sale to the Department of National Defence? There seems to be a conflict there.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, once again I cannot confirm the dates, but it seems to me that the question is in reference to Mr. Grandy's position in advising two non-governmental corporations, and I do not see how that would be in conflict with the government. It is advice that those corporations are asking him to give them. There may be a conflict between the two corporations; there is none with the government beyond, once again, the serious question I raised about activities of deputy ministers after they leave the public service.

GOVERNMENT ADMINISTRATION

REQUEST FOR TABLING OF DOCUMENTS RELATING TO CONTRACTS WITH REISMAN AND GRANDY

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the answer given by the Prime Minister to the previous question would he consider tabling all documents involving Messrs. Reisman and Grandy and the federal government and whatever additional correspondence or documentation there is which might spell out in detail the terms of reference of these contracts? Is he now in a position to provide the House with this material or has he investigated? If not, will he do so and make a statement with respect to the matter and table the necessary documents?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I intended at three o'clock under the provisions of Standing Order 41(2) to table in both official languages copies of the contracts with their former departments, contracts between Mr. Grandy and Mr. Reisman. If the House would give permission to do it now that would save the time of the House.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Does the Prime Minister have the consent of the House to table the documents forthwith?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Agreed and so ordered.

ENERGY

REASON FOR MINISTER'S STATEMENTS ON HIGH ENERGY COSTS IN ATLANTIC PROVINCES

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines, and Resources who will recall that on Friday last the Minister of Finance indicated the response to requests from the government of Nova Scotia on the question of power costs resulting from higher oil prices, would be on the agenda this week. In view of this why does the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources feel it necessary to take a rather negative attitude toward any such requests in public? Does he feel that the government of that area has failed to take advantage of all previous suggestions made by the government of Canada?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I was asked some questions yesterday by members of the press referring to the serious situation in the Atlantic provinces. I answered them to the best of my ability and I think I gave a fairly accurate assessment of the situation. I think it is important that hon. members opposite recognize that the federal government has taken a very large number of steps already to assist consumers in the Atlantic region.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Fairweather: Let them freeze in the dark.

Mr. Gillespie: While recognizing the difficulties of consumers in the Atlantic provinces, let us not forget there are consumers all across Canada—

An hon. Member: Thanks!

Mr. Gillespie: —who are having to face increasing energy costs. This government made it very clear in 1973 that the days of cheap energy were over.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Play it again Sam!

An hon. Member: No, but it is a cheap government.

Mr. Gillespie: We also took a number of steps at that time to cushion Canadians against the new oil prices.

Mr. Stanfield: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I should like to indicate to the minister that he may not be fighting so much with members on this side of the House as with the governments of those provinces. I should like to ask whether he has taken this attitude toward what is obviously a very severe problem for Nova Scotians and the islanders whose case is not like that of consumers in other parts of the country because of their heavy dependence on oil? Does the minister base his attitude in part on the feeling that the governments of those provinces have not been responsible in taking precautionary measures to the problems facing the people now?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, I was alluding to the fact that there are many consumers of natural gas in other parts of the country who have found that natural gas prices increased at about the same rate and the same standard as electric rates in the maritime provinces. I think this is sometimes overlooked. The other point is the federal government placed a number of proposals before the provinces in Atlantic Canada and some of those are still on the table.

CONSULTATIONS WITH NEWFOUNDLAND ON DEVELOPMENT OF GULL ISLAND SITE—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, a supplementary question to the same minister. In view of the fact that the development of the Gull Island site in Lower Churchill could provide the power that is needed throughout the maritimes and parts of the United States, could the minister inform the House what progress the government has made with regard to consultations with the province of Newfoundland on the question of development of that site?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, there has been a good deal of consultation. I met with ministers from the province of Newfoundland. There are several problems involved, one having to do with the retention and proposed buy-back of some of the power, which has been generated in Newfoundland, from the province of Quebec. Recently there have been meetings between Newfoundland and Quebec ministers. The federal government told the Newfoundland government that our offer of $343 million is on the table for them to develop an interconnection between the Churchill Falls site and the province of Newfoundland. We are very hopeful that the province of Newfoundland will be able to work out some arrangement with the province of Quebec and include us in the financing of that interconnection.

LOCKHEED CONTRACT—INQUIRIES INTO FINANCING BY TREASURY BOARD

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the President of the Treasury Board and concerns the Lockheed-Orion matter. As I understand normal procedure, before an agreement in principle is announced, the proposed purchase would routinely go before Treasury Board which would examine the financial viability of the purchase. Can the minister advise the House in this particular case whether, before the November 27 announcement of the agreement in principle of the purchase, the Treasury Board made any inquiries into the financial viability of that purchase or into the question of loan restrictions on the Lockheed Corporation?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, the financial aspects of the program had been submitted to the Treasury Board and to the cabinet before the final decision. The Department of National Defence budget had been established for several years taking into account the payments to be made for the Lockheed project but obviously the problem which occurred since then which we thought to be part of the financing made by Lockheed Aircraft Corporation Limited seems not to have been understood as such by the company.

[English]

Mr. Leggatt: Mr. Speaker, I presume the answer of the President of the Treasury Board is that no inquiry was made. Under the Emergency Loan Guarantee Board was a certificate of some kind granted by Treasury Board to the effect that the proposal for purchase in principle was correct and that the proposal was financially viable? Was any inquiry whatsoever made of the United States authority by the President of the Treasury Board?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: The negotiation of the contract terms is never done by the Treasury Board itself. We set the financing parameters and it rests with the minister concerned to assume responsibility for the contract terms within the prescribed financial parameters.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

LOCKHEED CONTRACT—POSSIBILITY MESSRS. GRANDY AND REISMAN RECOMMENDED PURCHASE OF "ORION"

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, a final supplementary directed to the Minister of National Defence. In answer to the hon. member for Victoria, the minister indicated that he could not be specific about the committees that Messrs. Grandy and Reisman sat on. Can the minister be specific about whether either of these gentlemen recommended to cabinet, approval of the purchase of the Lockheed Orion? Was there any recommendation made to cabinet by either of these gentlemen for purchase of the Lockheed Orion?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): No, Mr. Speaker. The responsibility for that decision rested first of all with the project office, then through my deputy minister to me and from me to cabinet. That was the chain of recommendation.

LOCKHEED CONTRACT—AGREEMENT ON FINANCING SHOULD BE WRITTEN RATHER THAN ORAL

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, a supplementary question for the Minister of National Defence. As someone who had considerable business experience before entering cabinet, would the minister not agree that it is against all accepted business practice to deal with such an important part of a potential contract as financing by word of mouth rather than having it committed to paper and thereby knowing exactly what is being dealt with? Is this not particularly so in view of the fact that there is such a very large amount of money involved and that the financing of this deal is a tremendously important part of it?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, it should be apparent to the hon. member that until the contract was signed there was not a piece of paper that was in fact negotiable with the banks. It could not be finalized until after the contract had been completed. But there were very, very full discussions with both of the companies which were competing for the contract at that time, and both of them very clearly indicated that financing was possible. The terms of that, of course, had to be worked out after the contract.

● (1440)

LOCKHEED CONTRACT—PROPRIETY OF NEGOTIATING WITH COMPANY WHICH IS UNDER INVESTIGATION

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have one supplementary for the Minister of National Defence. Does the minister think it is proper for the Government of Canada to enter into contract negotiations with a firm whose activities are now under investigation?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, we have made it clear in earlier answers that following our decision in principle to purchase the Lockheed, that company did run into serious difficulties because of improper payments or accusations of improper payments in other countries, and for that reason we wanted to have assurances from the United States government with regard to the viability of the company. As I indicated to the House before, we intend to have those assurances in writing before proceeding.

PUBLIC SERVICE

ALLEGED FEAR EMPLOYEES WILL NOT RECEIVE PAY—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Supply and Services or the President of the Treasury Board, or perhaps the Prime Minister might want to respond because it involves the Public Service of Canada. I wonder if the minister can give some assurances to allay the widespread fears circulating this morning, particularly aroung Ottawa but also in other centres in Canada where there are large concentrations of public service employees, that they will not in fact receive their pay cheques tomorrow.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (President of Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I would like to reassure the House if a mistake was made yesterday. The bank misunderstood the rules of the House: the cheques presented at the Bank of Montreal yesterday were entirely valid. However, the bank does not understand well the procedures of this House and I think that there are a few members who do not understand them either.

[English]

Mr. Forrestall: I am not at all sure that I understood the response of the President of the Treasury Board. It was not at all clear whether the public service will be paid tomorrow. Will the Prime Minister, to whose attention this matter was drawn this morning, indicate to the House and the public servants of Canada that they will in fact be paid tomorrow?

Mr. Chrétien: If the cheques are dated prior to April 1, the cheques will be honoured; if they are dated after April 1, they would have to wait for the Senate to pass interim supply. I am informed that the Senators will be very diligent and that the bill will be passed tonight.

Mr. Forrestall: I wonder if I could then ask the minister if he could indicate how many people are about to fall into the category whose cheques will be dated April Fool's Day, because this is a serious matter and there is widespread concern right across the country.

Mr. Chrétien: In so many words, what I wanted to say earlier was that everyone will be paid according to the cheque they receive either today, tomorrow or the day after, because interim supply will be passed by the Senate tonight.

Oral Questions

PUBLICATIONS

SUGGESTION "MACLEAN'S" REDUCING RURAL CIRCULATION WHEN LEGISLATION ON "TIME" AND "READER'S DIGEST" INTRODUCED

Mr. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State, and although I recognize it will be slightly lengthy, I ask your indulgence. I ask the minister whether he had an opportunity to read the advertisement placed by Maclean's magazine in last Wednesday's Globe and Mail, which reads in part as follows:

> ... we wanted our small-centre and rural circulation cut, bringing us to a nicely honed, grand total of 675,000. Problem is, those readers are not dropping us quickly like hotcakes. They're dropping us reluctantly, like handshakes.
> We've tried, God knows we've tried. We doubled our subscription price. We dramatically changed our editorial appeal, slanting it directly at the city folk. We stopped all minor market circulation efforts.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. If the hon. member has a question, would he put it.

Mr. Beatty: I was just coming to a conclusion there.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Beatty: I ask the minister whether he has seen the advertisement indicating that Maclean's magazine intends to curtail its editorial content with respect to rural issues and also its rural circulation. If so, may I ask the minister, at the time he was proposing his legislation to put Time and Reader's Digest in Canada out of business, had Maclean's magazine indicated that it intended to cut back on rural editorial and rural circulation?

May I further ask the minister whether the government has any—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I hope that by now the hon. member has included whatever proposed supplementary he had.

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I have not seen the ad. The purpose of Bill C-58 was not to drive Time and Reader's Digest out of the country.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hees: Smile when you say that.

Mr. Faulkner: That is the kind of myth hon. members opposite have been trying to perpetuate for a year and a half.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Faulkner: Given the rather nasty comments made about Maclean's during the past year and a half by hon. members opposite, I am surprised they are concerned about the drop in its readership.

[Mr. Chrétien.]

ENERGY

SALE OF NUCLEAR REACTOR TO SOUTH KOREA—POSSIBLE BARTER ARRANGEMENT FOR PAYMENT

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In an authoritative report done for the United States energy research and development administration it is indicated that South Korea will pay for some of the cost of its new Canadian CANDU nuclear power plant with textiles. I think the minister and I would agree that if such a report is true, it should be denied immediately—I am sorry. If it is true—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lawrence: It has been pointed out that the government normally denies what is true, but the question is, if it is true, I wonder if the minister would give us an explanation; and if it is not true, I wonder if he would deny it immediately.

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, payment will be made in money.

Mr. Lawrence: To be more specific, is there any arrangement, subarrangement or subcontract relating to the CANDU reactor in South Korea whereby it will be paid for directly or indirectly by the importation into Canada or the export to Canada of textiles?

Mr. Gillespie: No barter arrangements have been negotiated of which I am aware.

HOUSING

INQUIRY WHETHER CERTAIN INFORMATION CANNOT BE CONVEYED BY TELEPHONE

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of State for Urban Affairs.

I have here with me a letter which reads as follows:

> In reply to your letter of March 2, we would ask you again to get in touch with us by telephone.
> We need some information which cannot be confirmed by letter. Therefore, we hope to hear from you as soon as possible.

This letter was sent by a high official of the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, at the Department of Urban Affairs.

My question is this: is the minister aware that certain questions are asked by telephone which are so important that they cannot be put in writing? If so, why do high officials use that procedure?

[English]

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I would have to look at the letter itself and go into the matter with the hon. member. I do not know the precise circumstances involved, but I would certainly be interested in following through.

ENERGY

FEDERAL PREDICTIONS ON OIL PRICES—ALLEGED FAILURE OF NOVA SCOTIA TO ACCEPT FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE ON POWER GRID

Mr. Andy Hogan (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Today's Halifax Chronicle-Herald in a lead story on escalating power costs in Nova Scotia suggests that the federal government intends to give no special help to the province of Nova Scotia when crude oil prices are raised on July 1. The story says that Energy, Mines and Resources officials warned the premier of Nova Scotia—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I do not want to interfere again with another hon. member posing a question, but all hon. members are aware that very few have had access to the question period, I think, primarily as a result of rather long preambles to questions in general, and I do not want to try to enforce a regulation against one without making it uniform.

● (1450)

Mr. Hogan: Mr. Speaker, I wish to tell the minister that the story says that the premier of Nova Scotia was notified years ago about the inevitability of rising fuel costs. Does the minister know that the premier of Nova Scotia said that a document entitled "An Energy Policy for Canada" issued in mid-1973 by the minister's predecessor predicted that foreign oil prices would not reach $7 per barrel until the year 2000, and in 1976 would be less than $4 per barrel?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether the premier of Nova Scotia made that statement, but he quoted correctly. It goes to show how rapidly and dramatically the oil picture changed in this country.

Mr. Hogan: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. The same story referred to energy, mines and resources officials as saying that Nova Scotia has not taken up the federal government's offer to help finance an eastern power grid. Does the minister know that in 1971 the Nova Scotia government asked the Department of Regional Economic Expansion for financial assistance on this matter?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of that particular request but I do know that we offered the province the opportunity to participate in a regional nuclear reactor. That offer was not taken up.

SALE OF NUCLEAR REACTOR TO ARGENTINA—REQUEST FOR ESTIMATE OF AMOUNT OF LOSS

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In view of reports that Canada has renegotiated the financial terms of the nuclear reactor sale to Argentina and the contract still involves AECL assuming a substantial loss on the sale, will the minister say exactly how much this project will cost the Canadian taxpayer?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I cannot give that information now. I suppose we will not know until after the contract has been fully completed. I know that substantial progress was made on renegotiating the terms of that contract.

SALE OF NUCLEAR REACTOR TO ARGENTINA—REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE OF ADHERENCE TO SAFEGUARDS AGREEMENT

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. As the minister said outside the House that he sees no problems in proceeding with the sale to Argentina even after the change of government last week in Argentina, whereas the Prime Minister said in the House that he would want to make sure the new Argentina government will discharge its contractual and treaty obligations, has the minister received assurance in these renegotiations that the military junta will honour the terms of the safeguards agreement?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I see nothing inconsistent between my statement and the statement of the Prime Minister.

Mr. Hees: Alastair, you never see anything inconsistent between what you say and reality.

SUGGESTED STUDY OF EAST BRAINTREE SITE OF RADIOACTIVE DUMP—REQUEST FOR PUBLICATION OF RESULTS

Mr. Jake Epp (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and has to do with the East Braintree radioactive site. As the minister said previously that the site was in a desolate, remote area, whereas it is but 100 feet from a well travelled road, will the minister now undertake to cause a complete study of the site, determine why it was chosen and make the study findings public, so that the people of the area may be assured that their present fears are unfounded?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, action on the matter is being taken.

Mr. Epp: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. If the site is found to be radioactive, will the minister undertake to transport the radioactive materials to a waste management site, in accordance with the recommendations of AECB officials, who suggest that is the only way to deal with such material?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, I assure the hon. member that every action necessary will be taken to preserve public health and safety.

Oral Questions

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

IMPLEMENTATION OF MARIN REPORT RECOMMENDATIONS—POSSIBILITY OF RETROACTIVITY

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Solicitor General may I direct my question to the Minister of Justice? Since Judge René Marin's commission of inquiry into various aspects of the RCMP was tabled several days ago, can the minister indicate if any policy decision has been made as to when, and by what means, some of these excellent recommendations will be brought into effect? If not, when will such a decision be made?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I think the Solicitor General would prefer to answer the question at the first opportunity when he returns to the House.

Mr. MacKay: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Can the minister tell the House if some past inadequacies and inequities respecting internal RCMP procedures will be corrected in future and on a retroactive basis, so that some members of the force recently discharged or disciplined may have the benefit of more just and enlightened treatment in the form of hearings into their particular circumstances? I think particularly of officers like Don McCleery and Gilles Brunet.

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, I would prefer the Solicitor General to answer that question specifically.

ANTI-INFLATION BOARD

ORDER AGAINST ATLANTIC SUGAR REFINERY EMPLOYEES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Hees: Donald!

Mr. Fairweather: Mr. Speaker, my legislative assistant is helping me again.

How can the government justify the fairness and equity of a system whereby the Anti-Inflation Board ordered employees of Atlantic Sugar Refineries of Saint John, New Brunswick, to pay back part of a wage settlement arrived at in September, seven months ago. It is to be rolled back. Does the minister not think that this is retroactivity carried to extremes?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am struck by the elegance of the hon. member's legislative assistant.

Mr. Hees: Thank you, Don. I shall say something nice about you, too.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I would have to discuss the matter further with the Anti-Inflation Board, to learn their reasons. I remind the hon. member that the concept of payment back is included in the legislation. The board obviously exercised careful judgment in this case.

[Mr. Gillespie.]

EFFECT OF DECISION IN ATLANTIC SUGAR AND IRVING PAPER CASES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland-Colchester North): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Finance? What action will the government take to offset the obvious impression created among Atlantic province workers after the Irving paper decision and, now, this decision, that Anti-Inflation Board decisions relating to wage agreements in the Atlantic area will maintain, indeed exaggerate, the regional disparity between the economy of the area and the economy of the rest of Canada, and confirm the second-class citizen syndrome of the residents of the area, because that effect is inherent in the board's decisions.

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I would have to say that that impression is totally unfounded. I will take the hon. member's question as a suggestion to stress that, in future, when there are opportunities to discuss this program in the Atlantic provinces. I stress that this is a national program, with national application.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

GOVERNMENT MEASURES TO CURB DETERIORATING INDUSTRY—LABOUR RELATIONS

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Labour. Responding to an earlier question I put to the minister about the advisability of enacting legislation designed to restore individual freedoms and rights of workers to members of Canadian unions, the minister said there was no problem. Can the minister indicate today if the government has long-range or immediate plans to curb deteriorating industrial and labour relations in our country which are causing irreparable damage to our competitive position on world and domestic markets.

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, we embarked on wage and price controls in order to, among other things, correct the very difficulty implied in the hon. member's question. We hope the program will be successful. There is already evidence that it has been successful. In the meantime, we intend to carry on discussions with the labour movement, to ensure their maximum co-operation even though they have withdrawn from some federal bodies. The hon. member may be aware that the President of the CLC left the door open for multilateral discussion at other levels.

Mr. Oberle: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the special difficulties created in British Columbia as a result of the railway shutdown, will the minister tell the House if his department is attempting to identify essential services and find a solution which will curb the number of strikes and shutdowns in those services by way of legislation designed to return responsibility to the labour scene?

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, we hoped to work out an acceptable formula with the labour movement. Progress along those lines was being made with the Canada Labour Relations Council. We shall now have to devise other techniques for achieving those ends.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order having to do with the business of the House for today. It is a point I have discussed with the government House leader, the House leaders of the other two parties on this side, and with several other hon. members. I dare to hope there will be agreement to the suggestion I should like to make.

There is a general desire in the House to get on with the second reading of Bill C-92 having to do with former prisoners of war. The government is finding it difficult to provide government time for that bill. However, at five o'clock today the private members' hour is one that has been assigned to me to deal with one of my public bills. I should like to make the offer to surrender that hour, which happens to be set aside for my bill, on the condition that it be used, instead, for government order No. 92, in other words, Bill C-92. Some of us would be quite prepared to deal with the bill entirely in the hour, but I do not make that a condition. I would just like to suggest that we agree to a House order that at five o'clock today we proceed to Bill C-92.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I welcome the desire of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre perhaps to make up some of the time we lost a few weeks ago when he moved the adjournment of the House.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Sharp: I am sure that was not his purpose and that he had very good intentions in mind. I would like to say, however, that it is the intention of the government, if the bill is not disposed of in that hour, to call it on Thursday.

Mr. Knowles (Norfolk-Haldimand): On the same point of order, Mr. Speaker, I would like to say that we in the official opposition attach the highest priority to the welfare of veterans in this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Norfolk-Haldimand): We certainly welcome the generous offer by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre to proceed with second reading of Bill C-92. We also give our assurance that we will not delay passage of this bill and will ensure that it will be dealt with within the hour.

[Translation]

Mr. Beaudoin: Mr. Speaker, given the great importance of this bill for the veterans, we also agree to have second reading on Thursday. In no way do we want to delay the passing of this bill.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: It is not easy, of course, to at this moment draft an order covering both provisions, the giving over of the hour and the consideration of the bill, with the provisions attached to it. The House has certainly indicated its position. I would think the most orderly proceeding would be to make the arrangement at five o'clock, unless the House is now prepared to agree that at five o'clock private members' hour will be given over to government business on the understanding that Bill C-92 will be dealt with at that time.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: It is so ordered.

[Translation]

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the President of the Privy Council whether certain times have been set aside for any debate on the objections submitted concerning the revision of the electoral map of the province of Quebec?

[English]

Mr. Speaker: We have not yet reached the regular Thursday period of time for House business. However, the hon. member has put a question about whether any arrangement is envisaged at the moment to take care of the debates under the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, there are some discussions now going on, having in mind setting aside a couple of days to deal with all the objections that have been registered with respect to redistribution. I understand that the form of the order is now being drafted. I hope to put it on the order paper within the next day or so.

ENERGY

TABLING OF CORRESPONDENCE RELATING TO URANIUM ENRICHMENT STUDIES IN QUEBEC

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 41(2) I am tabling copies, in both official languages, of correspondence relating to uranium enrichment studies in the province of Quebec. Similar correspondence is being tabled in the Quebec legislature.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

STATEMENT OF MINISTER ON FLU VACCINE

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I would like to inform the House that my department has accepted the recommendations of the National Advisory Committee on Immunizing Agents for a selective immunization of high risk groups of Canadians against the A/Swine strain of influenza.

The Committee recommended that:

1) Bivalent A/Swine and A/Victoria influenza vaccine be made available to those of all ages who have such chronic conditions as heart disease, chronic bronchopulmonary disease, chronic renal disease, diabetes mellitus and other chronic metabolic disorders, and to all persons over 65 years of age.

2) Monovalent A/Swine influenza vaccine be made available for persons between the ages of 20 and 50 (highest risk 20-40 years of age) with priority being given to those responsible for maintenance of essential services.

3) A/Swine influenza vaccine is not recommended as a routine for infants and children because of the increased incidence and severity of adverse reactions to the vaccine in those under the age of 16 years.

All provinces have accepted in principle the recommendations of the National Advisory Committee. Discussions are continuing with various manufacturers and the United States government on the availability of vaccine supplies.

In discussions with the provinces, my department offered to take responsibility for locating vaccine supplies and negotiating purchases. Because of a limited domestic capability to produce flu vaccine, it is anticipated that Canada may have to import the majority of doses.

While it is impossible to say for certain that an epidemic of A/Swine influenza will occur in the fall of 1976, the National Advisory Committee was of the opinion further A/Swine influenza virus infections in humans are possible and even likely to occur in the next year. On all previous occasions when a major new strain of influenza A virus has become established, epidemics or pandemics have resulted.

In mid-February 1976 a virus strain of A/Swine influenza was identified from four men at Fort Dix, New Jersey. This virus strain is similar to that which is suspected to have been responsible for the 1918-19 influenza pandemic which infected an estimated 500 million people worldwide, including one of every six Canadians, and resulted in approximately 20 million deaths, including 45,000 in Canada. Since the first isolation at Fort Dix, one of the four men has died and there is now laboratory confirmation that 21 per cent of the total personnel have been infected with this virus.

Officials of my department have been in close touch with their American counterparts and are fully informed of the situation in the United States. Contact has also been made with the World Health Organization in Geneva, the WHO World Influenza Centre in London, England, and U.K. health authorities on this matter.

Vaccines to prevent influenza have been available for 40 years, and with technological advances, their efficacy has increased. A specific vaccine will provide maximum protection only against the virus strain from which it is prepared, and less protection against closely related virus strains. Protection commences approximately three weeks after vaccination.

During the past winter, influenza B, which is considered to be a less severe illness than influenza A, has been common in Canada, and is, therefore, not anticipated in epidemic proportions in the 1976-77 season. However, clinical illness due to A/Victoria/75 is currently being experienced in Canada, and it is too early to determine how many will have been infected, and conversely, how many Canadians remain susceptible. For this reason it is likely that a further outbreak of A/Victoria influenza may be experienced in Canada during the 1976-77 influenza season. It is therefore important that those high risk population groups for whom influenza vaccine has been recommended in the past, should be offered protection against the A/Victoria strain.

Similarly, the apparent absence of A/Swine influenza infection in humans in Canada since the 1918-19 pandemic has led to the development of a large population susceptible to the A/Swine virus. The New Jersey experience has demonstrated that this virus now has previously unrecognized capabilities of human-to-human transmission.

Influenza vaccine is prepared from fertilized chicken eggs infected with influenza virus. The virus in the vaccine is inactivated with formalin and thus the vaccine is known as a "killed vaccine". Immunization with a killed vaccine does not involve injection of live virus into the recipient. In the past, adverse reactions to influenza vaccine have occurred with some frequency, particularly in infants and young children. Although these reactions have been considerably reduced by new production methods, it is not advisable to recommend large scale routine immunization in this group.

In the light of the 1918 influenza pandemic experience in which individuals 20-50 years of age experienced the highest mortality rates, such persons are again considered to be at similar risk to infection from A/Swine and in need of protection.

The elderly and chronically ill require routine protection annually against the prevailing influenza strain—in this case A/Victoria. In addition, the elderly, who either escaped infection in 1918-19 outbreak, or whose immunity levels are inadequate, should receive protection against swine influenza. Hence the recommendation for the use of bivalent vaccine in this group.

A selective immunization program for high risk groups of Canadians should provide adequate protection for the public and, in addition, help to reduce the potential of worldwide spread of influenza A/Swine virus. The high degree of cooperation already evident in federal-provincial discussions on this matter indicates that the immunization program should be successful in achieving these goals.

Mr. Speaker, with the permission of the House and in view of the exceptional circumstances of this case, I would like to table in English and in French, a copy of the report of the National Advisory Committee on Immunizing Agents.

● (1510)

[English]

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, before I get into the meat of this statement I want to express some displeasure about the fact that the minister provided a copy of his comments only very shortly before the sitting began. It is impossible to make a detailed study of the announcement in such a short space of time. Further, it is rather strange he should have chosen not to let us see the report of the National Advisory Committee on Immunizing Agents, but that he should simply have tabled it at the end of his comments. The minister points to the report now, but he sees I am on my feet and obviously I cannot look at the report or study it.

Having said that, I agree that a vigorous national immunization program should be undertaken. I am somewhat confused by a number of statements the minister has been making on this subject in the past few days as well as today. He tells us a selective program was chosen, but he does not give us the reasons for making this choice rather than opting for the innoculation of the total population as the Americans have decided to do. Had I seen the advisory committee's report in advance, I might have got the answer from that report. But since I did not have that opportunity I shall have to make my comments on the basis of the statements which the minister made.

On March 25, in response to a question from my hon. friend from Simcoe North (Mr. Rynard) the minister told the House that Canada has the capacity to produce 300,000 vaccine doses by next fall. That number coincides, incidentally, with a press report suggesting that the Armand Frappier Institute, University of Quebec, is capable of producing that number of doses. The minister also suggests that the majority of the vaccine to be used here would have to be imported from the United States. Yet in a telephone interview with Dr. Salk, the man famous for having developed the polio vaccine—he is now the director of a large U.S. government viral research establishment—expressed the opinion that the United States would not have any of this vaccine available for export until November, which would be too late for us. Another press report suggests that the United States might find it difficult to find enough vaccine to meet its own needs.

Further to this, I have information from Connaught Laboratories suggesting that if the department of national health gave them the go-ahead, so to speak, they would be capable of obtaining machinery which could produce between five million and ten million doses in this country by the end of the year. It is strange the minister chose not to mention anything about that. Perhaps we can conclude from his utterances in the past few days that he only went to the Armand Frappier Institute and did not bother to ask Connaught what they could do. Apparently Connaught has an option on some special machinery which could produce these large numbers of doses for us; this machinery could be purchased. They had some reservations about the availability of eggs, and we could possibly enlist the help of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) as far as eggs are concerned; he has recently had some problems disposing of them.

The statement made by the minister is woefully lacking with respect to certain information. Additional information must be provided in order that the House might appreciate the problem the hon. gentleman is facing. Perhaps we could then understand why the figure he has given us seems to be at such variance with the figures I have been able to obtain with respect to our production capability. The minister suggests that those between the ages of 20 and 50 would be given A swine vaccine and that those who are suffering from debilitating illnesses, and all those over 65, would be given a combined vaccine of A swine virus and A Victoria virus. This leaves a substantial segment of our population unprotected—all those between the ages of 50 and 65 and all those under the age of 16.

In the same statement the minister says the vaccine is not being given to those under the age of 16 because of the possibility of adverse reactions. Yet children under the age of 16 who are ill will be given it. This suggests to me that perhaps the danger from an adverse reaction is less than the danger of the disease itself. Maybe an explanation should be given us with regard to this point. We know from past experience, from the experience in New Jersey, that this virus is transmittable from human to human, and it is therefore important that all who live in this country should be protected to the best of our capability. We find in the minister's statement the suggestion that there is a large reservoir of susceptible people, a situation which calls for the placing of greater emphasis on a more comprehensive immunization program.

One of the questions I want to put to the minister is this: Who is to bear the cost of the administration of this program? I believe the minister told us earlier that the federal government would pay for the vaccine and that perhaps the provincial governments would bear the cost of administration and distribution. But he made no further comment on that aspect today. He told us, however, that in addition to those in the various age groups who would be protected, those responsible for the maintenance of essential services would also be vaccinated. I wonder what he means by that, precisely.

When we talk on other subjects and try to determine what essential services are, the government always pleads total ignorance. I am interested in finding out what these essential services are. I wonder whether members of the government of Canada will be included. It occurs to me we might find the country runs much better without the government of Canada than with it. In any case, we shall have an opportunity to question the minister a little later. In the meantime, perhaps he will give serious thought to the questions I have raised so he can deal with them in a few minutes' time.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to express our approval of the decision the government has made, and in particular our approval of the announcement being made at this time, so that the necessary preparations can get under way for the immunization which is anticipated. I suppose that this is one of those occasions when a member ought to declare his interest. I happen to be one of the millions who suffered through an attack of swine flu in December, 1918, but I was one of the lucky ones; I survived. Perhaps I should say, luckily for this House I survived!

● (1520)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): That halo is hanging heavy.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I am glad to know some hon. members are listening. My other interest, of course, is that now that I am over 65 I am in the group that is to get this vaccination universally. However, having declared my interest, may I go on to say that we were hoping that there would not be undue delay in making and announcing this decision. We hope that suggestions such as have just been made by the hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Yewchuk) will be considered, particularly with respect to finding sources in this country for producing the vaccine so that the program can go ahead.

I note that there have been consultations with the committee referred to whose report has been tabled. I note there has been consultation withh the provinces. I should like to suggest to the minister that even though relations between the government and the medical research community of Canada may not be of the best at the moment in view of what is being done to grants for medical research, perhaps there should be close consultation on this matter with those of that community.

We anticipate the possibility that some of the decisions in this announcement might have to be modified, and I hope close study will be given to that. There are a great many people in the left-out group—all those between 50 and 65, a considerable number of those between 40 and 50, and even those between 20 and 40 are not covered on a universal basis. When you leave out all those below 16 except those who have the disease, it means that this program is far from universal. So it is really only a step in the right direction. But it is being taken early enough in the year so that plans can be carried out. However, we urge that the program be reviewed, not with the thought of cutting it back at all, but with the thought that perhaps it should be extended.

Like the hon. member for Athabasca, I would be interested in a firm statement by the minister as to who is paying the cost of this program. Obviously, if it is to be of any use to the people of Canada it will have to be paid for at the government level. Is it being paid for by the federal government, or by the provinces; or is it being divided, with the federal government providing the vaccine and the provincial governments providing the services?

I think nothing more needs to be said at this time. As I say, we welcome the fact that this announcement is being made early. The minister and his department can be assured of the support of this House in proceeding with this program so that an epidemic in Canada of either of the kinds of influenza referred to by the minister, in the latter months of 1976, can be avoided.

[Translation]

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, in reply to the statement that the minister just made, concerning the intentions of the government of Canada as to the A/swine influenza, I wish to point out that I am glad to hear such statements today. This shows that the Department of National Health is concerned at this moment about the problem raised by the reappearance of that virus which seamingly was responsible for the pandemic called the Spanish flu in 1918-19.

The minister points out in thinly veiled terms the possible severeness of the situation, especially if it were to make any progress, since every time there was that A/swine influenza, epidemics occurred whith the terrible effects we know. It must be considered that our bodies no longer have the necessary resources to fight effectively that disease, for it has disappeared for a long time. We know that the virus may be conveyed among human beings, but science still does not know how the disease is conveyed.

For the moment, it seems very difficult to obtain a useful stock of vaccines for Canadians. If we depend on other countries to obtain the vaccines that we lack, what will happen if those countries need them for themselves?

To emphasize the seriousness of the situation, I would like to mention two other facts. The United States have announced their intention to prepare for massive inoculation. The World Health Organization is now concentrating its energies on the problem of the reappearance of this virus. There is certainly no cause for alarm, but before such a situation, which I believe to be even more serious than the minister suggests, we must take some action. It is not unthinkable that it would become impossible to vaccinate everyone who needs it if the disease really took epidemic proportions next fall or next winter. This could certainly greatly worsen a situation which is already difficult in Canada in various aspects.

We must in fact wonder if there are not very specific causes for all this. At any rate, I urge the Minister to continue to examine this problem very seriously and with all the energy required. I believe that our governments, like the rest of Canadians, have to realize that we must unite before this problem and concentrate our efforts and allocate the money required. Later might be too late.

We hope that the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) will study very closely the age and group selection made and recommended by the advisory group whose report has just been submitted to the House and which I have not read. In any event, we are certain that this is not a matter of politics or of saving money. We are all aware that there are much more important things at stake, and that the health of Canadians is involved.

[English]

Mr. Yewchuk: Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the minister can clarify what, in his view, is Canada's capacity in terms of producing this flu vaccine at the moment.

Mr. Lalonde: The capacity is exactly as I said it was, Mr. Speaker—300,000 doses. With the purchase of additional equipment, the Armand Frappier Institute in Montreal could produce perhaps up to a million doses. As far as Connaught is concerned, they have indicated to us in the last few days that by purchasing equipment and running a sort of crash program they might be able to produce between five million and ten million doses. But here again, in both these cases this capacity does not exist at the present time and would have to be developed. We will have to look at this in terms of the supply and the price of what we can get, and at what price from abroad, and what would be the cost and capacity of delivery of domestic supplies additional to the 300,000 doses that we expect it is possible to produce.

Mr. Yewchuk: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that Dr. Salk of the United States has indicated that it is not likely that there will be exports from the U.S. until November, can the minister indicate why he has not given the go-ahead to Connaught to purchase this new machinery and start immediate production, since this could turn out to be a very grave matter for the country?

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, Dr. Salk is not a spokesman for the U.S. government on this matter.

Mr. Gilbert: Would the minister tell the House who is going to bear the expense of this program, whether it will be the federal government, the provincial government, or is it going to be shared?

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, this program is going to be administered on exactly the same basis as any other drug program. Some administration might be eligible for cost-sharing under medical care or hospital insurance; some might not. But there is no different administrative set-up for this particular program than for any other vaccine program in Canada at the present time. It is standard administration. We have been in touch with all the provinces in this respect. There will be no special administrative set-up for this particular purpose.

[Translation]

Mr. Beaudoin: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask another question which is supplementary to that of my predecessor.

Could the minister tell us if he has met provincial representatives to form a medical task force which would look after medication and manufacturing of vaccines in cooperation with provincial health departments?

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, it might be useful to the hon. member to know that the advisory committee is made up of distinguished epidemiologists from all parts of Canada including provincial representatives. For instance, the chairman of the committee comes from the University of Alberta and other members are from the Toronto Hospital for Sick Children, some from my own department, from the British Columbia Department of Health, from the Ontario Department of Health, from the Quebec Department of Social Affairs, from Sherbrooke University and from the Manitoba Department of Health. It is quite representative of various areas in the sector of the scientific community and of different provincial health departments.

Flu Vaccine

[English]

Mr. Yewchuk: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the minister rejects the statement of Dr. Salk who is the leading authority on this subject in the United States, will the minister indicate what information he has, how many doses are available from the U.S. for Canada, and at what time they will be exported to Canada?

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, it would be easier for me to provide the answers to some of these questions if the hon. member did not always distort what I have said. I did not say I rejected Dr. Salk's statement; I said he was not the authority to speak on behalf of the American government. That is a very different thing. In addition, before answering the question I might tell the hon. member that I sent a copy of my statement to his leader at 12.50 today. If he did not get it until a much later time, I am not responsible for that. If it took him more than two hours to read 4½ pages, there is not much I can do to help him understand the issue.

As far as the question itself is concerned, we are in touch with the United States government. Traditionally, we have been able to obtain between 7 per cent and 9 per cent of U.S. production. We have discussed this with United States officials. The question is being raised at a very senior level of the United States administration and I hope to have an answer on the subject in the next few days. There is no reason to believe we will not be able to count on roughly the same proportion of supply as that which we have received in the past. Frankly, there is not much point in the United States immunizing the majority of its population if there are millions of people up north of it who are not immunized at all and who might be subject to this particular influenza. It is to the advantage of all of North America to immunize as many people as possible. The selective approach within Canada has been set out by the national advisory committee on the subject.

Mr. Yewchuk: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact the minister feels there is going to be a sufficient supply if the United States comes across with the amount he thinks it will, will he indicate why he has chosen to be so selective in this program, rather than providing the vaccine to people between the ages of 50 and 65, for example, who are also susceptible, perhaps less so than others but amongst whom deaths could also occur?

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, the reason is very simple. This was the recommendation of the national advisory committee. The announcement I made today is an exact reproduction of the report of that committee, and I hope the hon. member will take the time to look at it.

Order Paper Questions

FOREIGN LAND OWNERSHIP ACT

MEASURE TO PROHIBIT ACQUISITION OF LAND BY NON-CANADIAN CITIZENS OR LANDED IMMIGRANTS

Mr. Peter Stollery (Spadina) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-429, respecting the acquisition of land by non-Canadians.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Stollery: Mr. Speaker, the bill addresses itself to the problem of non-residents of Canada holding land here for investment purposes. The bill is called the Foreign Land Ownership Act and prohibits the acquisition of land by persons who are not Canadian citizens or landed immigrants, except for residential and recreational uses, up to a maximum of ten acres, or for the purposes of a business permitted under the terms of the Foreign Investment Review Act. This is a great problem in urban areas of Canada where non-residents tie up land, thereby increasing housing prices. The bill is addressed to that problem.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

GRANTS TO PROVINCES FOR PROMOTION OF MINORITY LANGUAGE

Question No. 3,604—Mr. Gauthier (Roberval):

1. How much has been granted for the promotion of the French language as part of (a) bilingualism (b) multiculturalism in (i) Newfoundland (ii) Nova Scotia (iii) Prince Edward Island (iv) New Brunswick (v) Ontario (vi) Manitoba (vii) Alberta (viii) Saskatchewan (ix) British Columbia?

2. How much has been granted to Quebec for the promotion of the English language within these programmes?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Department of the Secretary of State and the minister responsible for multiculturalism as follows: 1. (a) Newfoundland: 1970-71, $123,485; 1971-72, $173,-419; 1972-73, $224,891; 1973-74, $193,331; 1974-75, $498,993. Total: $1,214,059. Prince Edward Island; 1970-71, $101,490; 1971-72, $128,905; 1972-73, $227,429; 1973-74, $243,128; 1974-75, $405,845. Total: $1,106,797. Nova Scotia: 1970-71, $733,615; 1971-72, $847,585; 1972-73, $951,235; 1973-74, $794,088; 1974-75, $1,450,149. Total: $4,776,672. New Brunswick: 1970-71, $3,694,660; 1971-72, $6,664,993; 1972-73, $5,769,933; 1973-74, $6,542,304; 1974-75, $6,212,141. Total: $28,884,031. Ontario: 1970-71, $12,164,400; 1971-72, $21,438,234; 1972-73, $18,230,841; 1973-74, $22,240,455; 1974-75, $23,142,093. Total: $97,216,023. Manitoba: 1970-71, $885,557; 1971-72, $1,133,693; 1972-73, $1,189,253; 1973-74, $997,812; 1974-75, $1,721,733. Total: $5,928,048. Saskatchewan: 1970-71, $597,863; 1971-72, $432,-914; 1972-73, $784,269; 1973-74, $570,889; 1974-75, $980,064. Total: $3,365,999. Alberta: 1970-71, $865,359; 1971-72, $1,075,-811; 1972-73, $1,026,007; 1973-74, $884,404; 1974-75, $1,342,045. Total: $5,193,626. British Columbia: 1970-71, $883,558; 1971-72, $1,018,744; 1972-73 $819,857; 1973-74, $1,019,025; 1974-75, $1,669,663. Total: $5,410,847. (b) Direct support for the promotion of the French language is not the focus of this programme's activity.

2. Bilingualism, Quebec: 1970-71, $29,986,813; 1971-72, $42,600,236; 1972-73, $34,165,243; 1973-74; $39,486,575; 1974-75, $50,441,472. Total: $196,680,339. Multiculturalism: Nil.

CONTRACTS AWARDED TO KODAK CANADA LIMITED, TORONTO

Question No. 3,711—Mr. Reynolds:

With reference to the answer to Question No. 1,956, of the over $5,000,000 spent on contracts awarded to Kodak Canada Limited, Toronto, Ontario for 1974, how many dollars in goods purchased were directed to (a) the Department of Veterans Affairs (b) the Unemployment Insurance Commission (c) Statistics Canada (d) the department of the Solicitor General (e) the Department of the Secretary of State (f) the Department of Regional Economic Expansion (g) the Department of Public Works (h) the Public Service Commission (i) the Post Office Department (j) the Department of National Revenue (k) the Canadian International Development Agency?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of the Privy Council): I am informed by several departments as follows: (a) $21,581.00; (b) $134,701.04; (c) $4,583.98; (d) $283,106.78; (e) $2,052.94; (f) $18,864.35; (g) $19,794.00; (h) $620.52; (i) $5,041.39; (j) $158,104.92; (k) $16,043.17. The Department of Supply and Services placed contracts on behalf of customer departments as follows: (a) $7,000.00; (b) $111,000.00; (c) $5,000.00; (d) $19,000.00; (e) nil; (f) nil; (g) nil; (h) nil; (i) $4,000.00; (j) $143,000.00; (k) nil.

NOTE: The Department of Supply and Services also placed Master Standing Offers at the National and Regional levels for the procurement of photographic processing materials such as film, paper, chemicals, etc. These Master Standing Offers are negotiated with suppliers in order to establish a fixed price for commodities and services, against which individual customer departments can obtain their requirements throughout the year. As the Department of Supply and Services does not obtain copies of the customer departments' requisitions, it is not possible to determine the value of procurements made by individual customer departments. Replies submitted by the various departments or agencies mentioned indicate the value of purchase.

PEI COMPREHENSIVE DEVELOPMENT PLAN—FISHING SECTOR

Question No. 3,849—Mr. MacDonald (Egmont):

With reference to the fishing sector of the Prince Edward Island Comprehensive Development Plan, have any experiments been conducted with the use of trawlers possessing an icebreaking capability in order to lengthen the effective fishing season for offshore fishermen in PEI and (a) if so, what are the results (b) if not, for what reason?

Mr. Cliff McIsaac (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): The reply for the Department of Regional Economic Expansion is as follows: Due to a steady stock decline in offshore ground fish, plans for experimentation with trawlers possessing ice breaking capabilities were suspended.

PEI COMPREHENSIVE DEVELOPMENT PLAN—FISHING SECTOR

Question No. 3,851—Mr. MacDonald (Egmont):

1. With reference to the fishing sector of the Prince Edward Island Comprehensive Development Plan, have specific measures been taken since the Plan's inception to increase the aggregate catch for PEI fishermen and, if so (a) what were they (b) on what date was each measure introduced (c) what was its cost (i) per year (ii) in total (d) what affect has it had in terms of increasing the aggregate fish catch?

2. Are new similar measures planned or under consideration for Phase 2 and, if so (a) what are they (b) do they represent a change in objective from Phase 1 (c) for what reason were new measures felt to be necessary?

Mr. Cliff McIsaac (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): The reply for the Department of Regional Economic Expansion is as follows: 1. Yes. (a) The development of aquaculture for the raising of oysters was the only specific measure taken because the aggregate catch of most species of fish traditional to Prince Edward Island inshore fishermen has reached or is approaching maximum yield. (b) 1971. (c) The precise cost of this specific measure is not kept. However, total expenditures for the research and investigation project (which includes oyster aquaculture) were as follows:

Fiscal Year	Total Expenditures
71-72	$118,945
72-73	147,699
73-74	202,947
74-75	326,608
Total	$796,199

(d) The full effects of the aquaculture program cannot be measured until the oysters have grown to market maturity which normally takes five to seven years from the date of seeding.

2. No specific measures are planned or under consideration for Phase II. However, if the search for fish species of market potential is successful then measures can be designed to fit the opportunity.

NEWFOUNDLAND—VETERANS' HOUSING

Question No. 3,971—Mr. Marshall:

1. Has the Minister of Veterans Affairs or the Minister of State for Urban Affairs received the final report on the condition of veterans housing in the Province of Newfoundland?

2. Has either Minister received a proposal from the Newfoundland Command of the Canadian Legion proposing a programme to allow the command to implement a programme to repair or rehabilitate housing for veterans or widows of veterans in the Province and, if so, has it been (a) considered by the Minister of Veterans Affairs (b) brought before the Cabinet?

3. Has any decision been reached by the Cabinet to provide the financial assistance necessary to support the survey of the Provincial Command in the Province and, if so, what was the decision?

4. Has the Cabinet approved such a programme and (a) if so, what are the details (b) if not, for what reason?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Ministers of Urban Affairs and Veterans Affairs as follows: 1. Yes.

2. Yes. (a) Yes.

2 (b), 3 and 4. The inner workings of cabinet, cabinet committees (including membership therein), and the services rendered by support staff are traditionally considered confidential matters. Canadian precedents in this regard flowed from British practice over many years. In response to a question in the House the Canadian Prime Minister of the day on February 4, 1960 in part replied: "The means by which the cabinet conducts its business are traditionally regarded as its own domestic affair, and questions on the subject are normally neither asked nor answered." A detailed answer to the question would be a departure from the traditional position that has always been taken that meetings of the cabinet are private and no information is given.

TOTAL COST TO GOVERNMENT FOR RENOVATIONS—CAE AIR CANADA BUILDING, WINNIPEG, MANITOBA

Question No. 4,021—Mr. McKenzie:

1. What was the total cost to the government for renovating the CAE Air Canada building at 570 Ferry Road, Winnipeg, Manitoba, which houses the Department of National Revenue Tax Data Centre?

2. What are the details of the amount the government is paying to lease the building (a) per year (b) per square foot?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Public Works): 1. Contract cost for renovations: $1,355,684. Expenditures for current year to January 31, 1976: $1,283,230.

2. (a) $384,000 per year. (b) $4.82 rent per square foot.

LES JARDINS DE LA RÉPUBLIQUE, NEW BRUNSWICK

Question No. 4,053—Mr. Corbin:

1. Has the government contributed financially, by way of loans or grants, directly or indirectly, to the termination of work and acquisition of lands and material for the tourist project Les jardins de la République, near Edmunston, New Brunswick, and, if so, in each case (a) through which departments (b) under what programme or agreement (c) in what amount (d) during what financial year?

2. Does the government intend to make other contributions to the project, either directly or through agreements with the Provincial Government of New Brunswick?

Mr. Cliff McIsaac (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): The reply for the Department of Regional Economic Expansion is as follows: 1. Yes. (a) Regional Economic Expansion; (b) Agricultural and Rural Development Act III (ARDA III); (c) $150,111; (d) 1973-74, $148,309; 1974-75, $1,802.

2. No.

NUCLEAR STIMULATION DEVICES

Question No. 4,770—Mr. Symes:

1. Has the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources at any time held discussions or exchanged correspondence with Mr. Don Moore, or any other company official of Phoenix Canada Oil Co. Ltd., in connection with the nuclear stimulation (the use of nuclear devices) in the tar sands and, if not, does the government intend to carry out such discussions or exchange of correspondence?

2. Has the government ruled out the possibility of using nuclear stimulation as a means of expediting the production of oil from the tar sands and, if not, since Phoenix Canada Oil owns the patents for nuclear stimulation devices, who would produce such devices?

3. Has the government carried out or is it carrying out or does it intend to carry out any (a) feasibility studies of nuclear stimulation (b) environment studies in the tar sands?

Mr. Maurice Foster (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): The Department of Energy, Mines and Resources and the Atomic Energy Control Board report as follows: 1, 2 and 3. The Atomic Energy Control Board received a letter dated May 30, 1974 from Mr. S. D. Moore, President of Phoenix Canada Oil Co. Ltd. seeking approval to detonate a nuclear device in northeastern Alberta. The Board replied to Mr. Moore in a letter dated January 8, 1975 that after due consideration and on the advice of other government departments which were consulted, the Canadian government was not prepared at that time to approve test nuclear explosions in the Athabasca Tar Sands. The government's view has not changed in the intervening year.

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

Mr. B. Keith Penner (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, if question No. 4,919 could be made an order for return, this return would be tabled immediately. I ask, Mr. Speaker, that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

LIP—SUBSIDIES GRANTED IN CONSTITUENCY OF TÉMISCAMINGUE

Question No. 4,919—Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue):

1. Since the inception of the Local Initiatives Programme, were any subsidies granted to the Constituency of Témiscamingue and, if so, in what amount?

2. For each approved project, what was the (a) name of the project (b) amount (c) year of approval (d) number of jobs generated (e) name of the municipality involved?

Return tabled.

CRIMINAL LAW AMENDMENT ACT (NO. 1), 1976

MEASURES FOR BETTER PROTECTION OF CANADIAN SOCIETY AGAINST CRIME

The House resumed, from Monday, March 29, consideration of the motion of Mr. Basford that Bill C-83, for the better protection of Canadian society against perpetrators of violent and other crime, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

[Mr. Symes.]

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, when we reached ten o'clock last night I was speaking on the amendment to this bill and had pointed out that in order to administer certain parts, a great number of bureaucrats would be required both for the purpose of administration and for registration of gun owners.

At this time I should like to point out that an applicant for a gun licence must obtain the signatures of two people of good character and reputation who will vouch for his or her character and undertake to provide sort of a guarantee that the gun or guns will not be used for criminal purposes. I suggest there will not be many people who will want to go that far out on the limb even for a very good friend. We have already set out the rationale for the secret possession or illegal registration of guns by those who cannot obtain such guarantees from two citizens in their community. I am sure the minister has already thought of the difficulty this could pose for a large percentage of law-abiding Canadians who will be dependent on friends or relatives regarding a gun application. The effect will be severely to limit the application of the law.

North Americans will simply not abide by a law they consider to be oppressive or against the rights of the majority. Let us take a hypothetical case of a gun owner who has his house burgled and his gun stolen and used in a subsequent crime. This happens frequently, or at least it happens often enough for us to know that criminals do not abide by gun registration laws any more than they abide by laws concerning break and entry, theft, assault, or any other law. Criminals steal weapons from police cars, police stations, armouries, and even from policemen. Requiring law-abiding citizens to register guns will not have any effect on this type of crime or this type of acquisition of guns.

Responsible gun owners do not leave their guns around for people to pick up or steal; they keep their guns secured. I do not believe anyone would object to laws concerning the safe and secure storage of guns when they are not in use. However, criminals are not respecters of that kind of security. They pick locks, knock down doors and windows; they use axes, crowbars, screwdrivers, hammers and many other tools available in every hardware store. If a housebreaker came upon a gun cabinet or closet, or guns secured by chains, he would simply use the tools of his trade to obtain the guns, just as is done to obtain money, jewels and other kinds of loot.

● (1540)

Chains and locks can be sawed through with a hacksaw, closets can be chopped open with hatchets and axes, doors can be forced in a variety of ways by the expert criminal. My experience as an insurance underwriter convinces me that experienced and determined housebreakers or safe crackers simply will not be stopped. The only way that I can think of to stop them is to convince them that they will be caught, convicted and imprisoned and that they will not be allowed to go out for weekends.

Mr. Speaker, in my area there are a great number of summer cottages. Many of the owners leave rifles and shotguns there, probably because they do not want to transport them back and forth to their principal residence. Even if these are well hidden, they are the things that burglars seem to find and steal. The Ontario Provincial Police have pointed out that burglars are not interested in furniture but are usually looking for guns, whisky or any other type of alcoholic beverage.

Mr. MacDonald (Cardigan): What about rum?

Mr. Darling: Rum, too. A few weeks ago there was a news item on a television news program about an upsurge in gun sales in one of the western provinces since this gun control legislation was tabled. This is a natural reaction by people who feel that their rights are being transgressed, and I would not be surprised to find that the same thing is happening right across the country. If this legislation is passed, I would also suggest that a large number of guns will not be registered.

In the Ottawa Journal of March 10 there was a supplement put out by the Canadian Tire Corporation. It was advertising a special price on a Winchester repeating rifle of $38.88, and also a special price for a rifle-scope at $10.88. That can be a pretty dangerous weapon, Mr. Speaker, if it falls into the wrong hands. I believe the same advertisement was run by Simpsons-Sears.

The gun manufacturers and their sales outlets are making capital out of this proposed legislation. Everyone that I have talked with concerning registration of gun owners has been in agreement, almost without exception, that some type of registration would be acceptable and even desirable for these weapons, but why should we set up an enormous bureaucracy to administer a registration process when we already have tens of thousands of police stations and detachments across the country? The police are responsible for public safety and security, and they would be better suited for the task of administering a gun law than an appointed official with no training or background in law enforcement.

On March 8, the member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt) mentioned that the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford) had stated that crime in Canada is under control, and the hon. member pointed out, astutely, that nothing could be further from the truth. Crime is not under control. It is on the rise in Canada, as elsewhere, and we cannot just sit by and say smugly that it is not as bad in Canada as it is somewhere else, Mr. Speaker. I am not interested in crime somewhere else. I am interested, and I am concerned about the rise in crime, particularly violent crime, here in Canada.

The hon. member for New Westminster pointed out that there is no mention in this bill of the serious problem of hard drugs, of how the Minister of Justice proposes to control the importation, sale and use of hard drugs in Canada which is, incidentally, one of the chief causes of all types of crime today. It is a point well taken, Mr. Speaker. I have to ask, why there is not some mention of this serious aspect of crime in this bill? Why do we not find some slight clue that the government is as interested in the causes of crime as it is in coddling criminals after they are convicted. I do not suggest that we get as tough as some countries in the world where the death penalty has been imposed for mere possession in an effort to stamp out this insidious and pernicious practice.

More money, more personnel and more support of every type must be put at the disposal of those charged with preventing the importation of hard drugs into Canada and to those charged with tracking down drugs and drug peddlers within our country. The penalties for trafficking and importing drugs must be made severe enough to deter the most hardened and skeptical criminals. I say skeptical because this government has earned the unenviable reputation of being soft on criminals. I do not believe that the criminal in our country today really expects to be kept in prison very long if he is convicted and sentenced. We must remove the skepticism and replace it with respect for the law and our law enforcement agencies. That respect will only come with the knowledge that we in Canada are determined to stamp out crime whenever and wherever we find it.

One provision of this bill that the majority of members will object to is the one concerning wiretapping. I believe this provision should be modified. There is no doubt that wiretapping, or the interception of telephone communications, has been and will be a most important tool in the hands of law enforcement agencies, especially in their efforts to control organized crime. Those of us who live in rural areas are quite used to having our communications intercepted, as anyone familiar with a party line telephone can attest. We are not concerned one way or the other with wiretapping legislation, but in congested urban centres it is another matter.

As long as this practice is engaged in judiciously by law enforcement agencies, with the consent of the courts as prescribed by present law, then I cannot think of any reason why the law should be relaxed. I do not think it would do much in the way of hindering investigations if the persons whose conversations are intercepted are notified of this fact within a reasonable period of time after the investigation has been completed. Perhaps we can work out some plan whereby persons who have been found to be engaged in criminal activity as a result of such taps will not have to be told of the taps while the investigation is under way.

It seems to me that within a period of 90 days the police should be able to determine whether a person is using his or her telephone in the commission of criminal activities. This requirement to disclose the use of wiretaps will limit, and possibly even prevent, indiscriminate use of this practice. While I am certainly in favour of giving our police every advantage over criminals, I also want to protect citizens' rights.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask why the government did not see fit to include some provisions in this bill to deal with the problem of alcoholism and its related abuses, and to comment on a couple of other problems areas. Alcoholism and drug addiction have been combined as a general problem area by most, if not all, of the agencies dealing with these problem. Like my colleague from New Westminster, I am appalled that the Minister of Justice has not seen fit to tell us that the federal government is at least as concerned about these problems as the rest of us.

Measures Against Crime

I have some startling figures with regard to the rise in the number of collisions on our highways, many of them fatal or resulting in disabling injuries, where teenage drinking drivers were involved. In 1967, in Ontario, there were 1,089 collisions on the highways involving teenage drinking drivers. The figure rose gradually for the next four years until 1971 when it almost doubled to 2,277. In 1972 it rose to 3,623. In 1974, the last year for which complete figures are available, the figure was 5,385, almost five times the number of collisions involving teenage drinking drivers in 1967.

While I realize that these figures are for Ontario, this is not something which is limited to Ontario alone. It is a national problem and as such it deserves some attention from the Minister of Justice and possibly the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand). At least we in Ontario realize that it is a serious problem, on the basis of statistics, namely, that the age of drivers involved in collisions when impaired has dropped to the 17 and 18 year old group. The provincial government is reassessing its decision to drop to 18 the legal age for drinking. However, as I have said, this is not only an Ontario problem and I should like to see some indication that the federal government is concerned about it. It has been known for many years that every conceivable kind of drug, soft and hard, is available in our schools almost on demand, not only in high schools but in schools where the average age is from 10 years to 13 years. This is certainly an area in which the federal government could do more than it is now—but there is nothing in this bill dealing with drugs or alcohol.

Violence on television is another problem area which has not been explored or examined in depth by the federal government, despite the fact that at least 90 per cent of these violent programs are available only on the two national television networks. It has been suggested, rightly or wrongly—and I am not an expert in these matters—that violence on television can often trigger a response on the part of people who are deranged and can be encouraged to act a violent scene portrayed on a television show. This does not apply in the case of television dramas. It is believed by many competent psychiatrists and socialists that when news programs dwell unnecessarily on the gory details of a particularly horrible crime, a deranged person thousands of miles from the scene of the crime might be tempted to emulate the crime to the last detail.

I believe that the whole question of the portrayal of violence on television, in all its forms, needs to be examined in depth by a competent individual or group. We should have more information and more opinions on this subject than are available to us at the present time. I would hate to have to weigh the merits of a proposal as to how we should deal with this matter on the basis of the scant information available of the effects or possible effects this type of thing could have on the minds of the young or on the minds of deranged adults.

I recently had the opportunity of meeting, with some other hon. members, the president of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, Mr. A. W. Johnson. I asked him for his views on this contentious subject. He admitted he had no direct solution or answer to this problem as there were arguments on both sides. Therefore, he let the matter go on that basis. But I certainly feel that this is worth investigating further. In the February edition of Canada Gunsport there is an article headed "Gun control fails in the United Kingdom; chief inspector admits 50 years of controls useless." In the article which follows it is stated:

> We wonder if we are not asking the wrong questions. The rise in the criminal use of firearms does not appear to have been influenced in any significant way by changes in the system of firearms control.
> The criminal knows that for a professional robbery the chances of detection are low and the rewards high. The maximum penalty is life imprisonment and he knows that if proven guilty he is likely to receive a substantial prison sentence. The odds against him being caught may be something like 7 or 10 to 1 in his favour. When the death penalty is applied he is not prepared to accept 7 or 10 to 1 odds on a chance of being hanged.

The article goes on—not attributing this to Chief Inspector Colin Greenwood of the West Yorkshire constabulary—to say that in Holland, where television programs such as CTV's "W-5" has held gun control up as a solution, the recent events with that train in Beilen and Amsterdam have shown that gun control has been a failure. Austria has strict firearms controls, but the attack on the OPEC meeting by terrorists in which three people were killed supports the suggestion that we are asking the wrong questions. The chief inspector also made this statement:

> Guns were always available to any criminal who chose to use them. Firearms controls do not appear to stop this class of criminal from obtaining a gun when he felt that he could use one.

Then there is another reference which is certainly of interest. Meeting on December 18, the Massachusetts police chiefs' association, comprising 200 police chiefs, unanimously went on record opposing a petition being circulated to ban hand-guns, and they gave as their reason that criminals would not turn in hand-guns because the supreme court had ruled that illegal hand-guns do not have to be registered as that would amount to self-incrimination; that the majority of law abiding citizens would turn in their guns and would then be at the mercy of criminals; that the law would make criminals out of law-abiding persons who did not turn in their guns; that crime had increased dramatically and the police cannot protect everyone; and that therefore a citizen should have the right to protect his family and himself.

As a personal observation, I point out that people tend to identify with the police force and the fire department. Apparently we are good citizens if we have fire extinguishers in our homes, because we know that firemen cannot be there instantly. Apparently we are bad citizens if we have guns in our homes, although the police cannot be there instantly. The fire department does not show up until after the fire has started, and the police do not start showing any interest until after a crime has been committed.

Along with a great many other members of parliament, I have received a tremendous amount of correspondence with regard to gun control, most of it highly critical of the proposed legislation, and some of it in favour of some form of control, so it cannot be stated that we are against any form of control whatsoever. I have here a letter from a former member of the RCMP who might take a rather stronger and more severe attitude than would be acceptable to people today, but he states very strongly the importance of police departments having the facilities, manpower and everything else available for dealing with hard drugs. He also states, in no uncertain terms, that youth and alcoholism are very important items responsible for a great deal of crime, and violent crime. He says he has reservations about wiretapping. He states:

While I never approved of wiretapping, much, RCMP did some during the second war. It is O.K. for interception of top criminals, evidence, but to me appeared a weakness, a crutch. I secured my evidence the hard way.

● (1600)

I do not know what he meant by that. He went on to emphasize that our soft tactics must stop; we must go after habitual criminals, see they are put away and remain put away.

Firearms control cannot even be justified with the excuse that it will reduce accidental injury and death. In Ontario, accidental hunting deaths fell from 71 in 1961 to eight in 1970. This favourable statistic is probably the result of hunter safety courses run by local anglers and hunters' associations. Nationally, our accidental death rate due to automobiles was 26.4 per 100,000 persons in 1973. Although it is estimated that there are between five million and ten million firearms in Canada, the accidental death rate due to them is so low that neither the Canada Year Book of 1973 nor the Canadiana Encyclopedia even mention it in their accidental death rate tables. The rate must be less than the last entry in the table, which was one per 100,000.

All the above information and more indicates that gun control has little or no effect on the criminal. However, gun control does severely limit the legitimate ownership and use of firearms in the hands of everyone else. Presumably, these facts are well known to the Solicitor General and the Minister of Justice.

It seems, Mr. Speaker, that criminals will always acquire weapons for crime, whether they be stolen, purchased, imported to the country or assembled in back-room workshops. Many first class firearms have been manufactured by hobbyists for legal purposes.

The Minister of Justice has stated that the availability of firearms is the major cause of crime. This has proven false. As an example he took gunless Japan, which has a low murder-arrest rate, but said nothing about Ireland which has the toughest gun laws in the world. He also said nothing about Switzerland, which has an extremely low crime rate. There it is the law that every male of military age shall keep a government-owned firearm in his home. We could solve our crime problems relatively easily, not by punishing and restraining law abiding citizens but simply by taking trouble-makers out of circulation. We can impose capital punishment on the worst offenders, and mandatory minimum prison sentences for the rest without chance of parole. They should be released when their sentence is completed.

Mr. Lloyd Francis (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I listened with great interest to the hon. member who preceded me. This bill contains a good many provisions for combating crime. I propose to restrict my remarks to one small part of the bill, and in response to representations made to me by my constitutents I will talk about the problem of gun control.

Let me make it clear that I support the principle of this bill. I shall vote for it on second reading and hope it will be referred at the earliest possible date to committee. It is my sincere hope that at the committee stage there will be extensive hearings which will deal with the very matters raised by those who feel they will be unfairly treated by the provisions of this bill. I am referring particularly to gun clubs and gun collectors. I am confident that the committee hearings will lead to greater acceptance of the bill because we shall recognize more clearly the problems which Canada faces.

On January 26 of this year I presented a petition to this House signed by 7,486 high school students of the city of Ottawa calling on this House to enact legislation as soon as possible to restrict the availability of firearms, so as to avoid another tragic incident similar to that which took place in an Ottawa area high school on October 27, 1975, and in Brampton on May 4, 1975. The fear of the possible recurrence of such events has created tension in the classrooms and schools of this area and has resulted in deterioration of the learning atmosphere. The petition which was organized and circulated by the students themselves called on the government to "act as quickly as possible" in enacting the necessary legislation. I am relieved to see the measure now before the House, as are many of my constituents who made their feelings known during the Christmas period by responding to a questionnaire which I circulated on a household basis on the subject of gun control.

The results showed that 83 per cent of those who responded—which is about 15 per cent of all households which received the questionnaire—favoured the registration of rifles and firearms; 88 per cent favoured the registration of hand-guns. Eighty three per cent favoured tests to satisfy reasonable standards of competence and safety for everyone owning a gun. There was virtually no opposition to the need to restrict ease of availability of firearms.

I recognize that I represent an urban constituency, and know that in many parts of Canada the tradition of ownership and responsible use of firearms is different from that in some of our larger cities. I can only speak in this House for the people who elected me and express views that I believe they would want me to express. At the same time, like other hon. members I have received a number of well prepared briefs from organizations representing gun clubs and hunters arguing that any new legislation should not violate their rights, namely, the rights of those individuals who have traditionally demonstrated respect for the proper use of firearms in the enjoyment of sport.

Responsible collectors maintain that they may be penalized by the new legislation. Collectors say they will be forced to give up all their operative automatic rifles and machine-guns under the new prohibited weapons clause. Many collections include museum pieces worth a great deal of money to their owners. Collectors have maintained to me that the firing mechanisms, if kept separate from the weapons, are almost impossible for potential thieves to obtain or duplicate. Actually, criminals invariably steal either hand-guns or high-powered rifles which they prefer to machine-guns. I shall return to that in a minute.

Some automatic rifles will not be covered by the prohibited weapons clause. It has been brought to my attention that semi-automatic rifles can be converted to automatic guns with relative ease by people with only limited training. I am referring specifically to the M-1 semi-automatic rifle which can be obtained at many locations across Canada. I have in my possession a number of catalogues advertising semi-automatic rifles available both through mail order and for personal shoppers. For example, I have before me a supplement distributed by the Ottawa Citizen earlier this year. In it, a well known local store advertises a .22 calibre target pistol. You can go and pick it put. It suggests that a B-B gun is a nice present for a teenage son.

I am looking, as well, at a Sears' catalogue containing a section on rifles, including automatic rifles, which can be readily purchased. The advertisement says that guns and ammunition will not be sold to persons under 17. I suppose that is intented to salve someone's conscience. Yet it is clear that the public, certainly that part of it which I have the honour to represent here, wants us to restrict the ease with which firearms can be acquired.

I have another announcement in my hand which surprises me. The Globe and Mail of March 4, 1976, reports that the Sudbury police were offering pistols for sale. According to the article, the Sudbury regional police were selling about 100, .32 calibre revolves for about $25 each. The police chief said that the revolvers were originally issued to constables formerly employed by area municipalities. With the amalgamation of the forces into a regional force, the .38 special became standard, so that the .32 calibre became the property of the regional police. They were surplus, and a dollar being a dollar, why not sell them?

It is clear that we have a situation which calls for some kind of legislative restriction. I am not prepared to say that the bill in its present form cannot be improved. It will be the responsibility of hon. members who serve on the committee which looks at this bill to go over it clause by clause, to hear representations from organized groups of citizens and to ensure that the bill represents the best possible protection of the interests of the public.

I am surprised at some of the mail I receive. I have a constituent who is a postman, a letter carrier. He is a man of excellent character. I would have no hesitation in writing a character reference for him at any time. His name is Mr. Wayne Green. Mr. Green has a specialty. He has been collecting machine-guns over the past many years. He has a collection that has cost him approximately $25,000. He described to me in great detail the care that he takes, how he has registered every one of these guns with the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, and how he keeps them in an inoperable form in his home: the firing mechanisms are stored separately.

I am surprised really at this hobby, although I respect the right to a hobby. There has certainly been nothing illegal about this gentleman pursuing this kind of hobby to date. I said earlier that generally, when thieves steal guns, they do not go for this kind of weapon. I think there is a limit in terms of what the public is prepared to endure. If an underground organization wanted to acquire machine-guns, I suspect that with the use of trained people who could be placed at their disposal they could adapt these guns by reproducing the firing mechanisms. If advertised, this kind of collection could be a target for some kind of illegal activity.

The problem of dealing with collectors will be very complicated. It may well be that there should be some phasing-out period, that the trading of guns between collectors will have to be restricted and should take place only between those who are registered and recognized as professional collectors. There may be some means by which the investment and savings of those who have chosen this kind of hobby can be given some protection. However, I have to say that I support the principle of the bill and that the public demands this kind of restriction on the availability of firearms. We have a responsibility, in light of the changing conditions of our cities and the pattern of violence that is emerging, to create for at least these parts of our country an environment in which firearms are not so readily available.

I recognize that this is a big country. I know that in the frontier, the northern areas and rural areas, the use of firearms is a very different thing. However, it is clear that for our large urban areas a measure like this will have to be enacted.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order, please. I see the hon. member for Villeneuve trying to get the floor after he has adjourned the debate on March 9 or 10. Unfortunately the hon. member for Villeneuve was not in the House yesterday when we resumed the debate, and he lost the time alloted to him, even if there were about ten minutes left. He will not be able to get the floor without the unanimous consent of the House.

Does the House agree to let the hon. member continue his speech?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Armand Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, I thank hon. members for allowing me to continue the speech which I began on March 11 last and which I had not finished.

Mr. Speaker, as I was saying, if the minister wants I can give him lots of evidence. I shall read a letter I received from the Hunting and Fishing Association of Malartic:

> We are against the project to control guns. We think that such a measure amounts to a lack of civic consideration towards all our sportsmen.
>
> François Ferron, chairman of the Hunting and Fishing Association of Malartic.

Another group representing hundreds of sportsmen from northwest Quebec is violently opposed to the project of the Minister of Justice.

If the minister wants more, I have other examples to give him. I received a letter from Mr. Jean-Claude Bouchard, of Val-d'Or, the chairman of the Hunting and Fishing Association of this municipality.

In that letter, he asks me to help him fight Bill C-83. I was pleased to answer him that he could count on me.

I could give more examples of representations made by people from Senneterre, Chibougamau, Chapais and Cadillac, all towns where most people hunt big and small game.

And I could list several other municipalities of my constituency.

Mr. Speaker, when I comment on this bill today, I speak on behalf of the great majority of the people I represent. I know that they entirely support my efforts to bring the Minister of Justice to understand what common sense says about this Bill C-83. I speak on behalf of all those who love hunting and outdoor sports when I ask the minister to withdraw his bill and remove from it the clauses concerning the control of firearms.

As do all other Canadians, people in northwest Quebec want to be protected against criminal activity. They want more severe punishment to be given to habitual criminals. I am sure they approve of the clauses of Bill C-83 which deal with the protection of society against hard-core criminals. But they do not want gun control. They know that honest citizens will be the only ones to suffer from such a measure. They ask that the residents of urban areas, where there is no hunting, make an effort to understand and respect their wishes to practice their favourite sports without being subjected to a thousand and one controls by officials.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I appeal to this House on behalf of all sportsmen and hunters. I ask hon. members of all parties to forget their party differences and vote against this bill which, in my estimation, will not contribute in any way to the protection of honest citizens.

Our fellow citizens are following with great interest the debate on this bill and I can assure hon. members who vote for gun controls that they will have to give accounts of their conduct in this regard. I shall be pleased to let their electors know they voted for this bill and constituents will take note of their vote.

● (1620)

Their constituents will not forgive them for that vote, which will penalize the sportsmen and the hunters of their regions. Mr. Speaker, government members are embarrassed at having to support such a bill. They know their voters, particularly those who represent rural constituencies, will not forgive them for supporting a bill which will oblige people to register their firearms, to wait for hours in civil servants' offices, while inspectors will check their past record to determine whether they can get a licence for their rifle or shotgun.

It is not without reason, Mr. Speaker, that many government members have tried to interrupt my speech on March 11, by making noise and putting non identifiable questions. They know I am speaking the truth and I am talking on behalf of the majority of Canadians.

Controlling firearms is not a good means of reducing crime. Let us take for instance Switzerland. In that country, all adult citizens must keep a firearm, it is provided by law. Yet that country's crime rate as regards qualified thefts and homicides is very low. Still, far from controlling firearms, Switzerland requires its citizens to possess guns and rifles.

In England, on the contrary, where gun control laws have been very tough for more than 50 years, a study conducted by Inspector Colin Greenwood of the British police force indicated that gun control did not help reducing the number of crimes involving firearms. As a matter of fact, statistics show that the violent crime rate has increased by 400 per cent since 1963 in England, gun controls notwithstanding.

Once again, Mr. Speaker, it is obvious that such controls will not help reduce the number of violent crimes. This has been proven. The countries where there are no gun controls have very low crime rates, whereas the countries enforcing strict controls suffer increasing crime rates.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to bring forward one last argument at this point in the discussion, that is the excessive cost of this control for Canadian taxpayers. An army of public servants will be needed to register all firearms. Tons of paper will be needed to keep up to date the necessary files. Hundreds of public servants will also be needed to check whether people do have their permit and whether this permit is in fact valid. The government is now suggesting that we have to tighten our belt, and that it will reduce its own expenses. It has even announced the discontinuance of several programs aimed at helping students, old people and the unemployed to take part in useful projects.

Now he is asking us to let him spend millions to set up a program as ridiculous and as useless as gun control. If the government wishes to be consistent, it must revise its position and be aware of the fact that there is an obvious discrepancy between the stated view that government expenses will be curbed and this expensive gun control bill.

In closing, I would like to remind the House that a cabinet minister recently told Canadians that they should give up their usual life style. That minister may be right. One of the habits people ought to get rid of, and I hope for ever, is that of electing a Liberal government in Ottawa.

If the government puts forward more legislation like the gun control bill, it can be sure that Canadians will be cured of the habit they had to vote liberal.

Mr. Ken Hurlburt (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to join my hon. friend from Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Darling) in support of the amendment in the name of my hon. friend from Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) asking that the bill be not now read a second time but that its subject matter be referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs for study.

I should like to preface my remarks on Bill C-83 by making reference to a letter written by Mr. Vair, chairman of the Alberta Fish and Game Association. This letter was sent to the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) and to every member of the House and the Senate. I refer to this letter for one reason only, that is, to draw attention to the arrogance of the government. It will not be necessary for me to read Mr. Vair's letter because all members of the House have received a copy. But I think I ought to bring to the attention of this House the kind of letter which was written to my constituent, Mr. Vair, who, incidentally, represents 23,000 sportsmen. The letter is dated March 3, 1976. It starts out with the words "Mr. Vair", not "Dear Sir" or "Dear Mr. Vair". The letter goes on to say:

Your letter and bumper sticker have reached my office. The impression you intend to leave with the public that guns will be outlawed is the kind of narrow, distorted extremism which spreads nothing but confusion and hatred. Have you nothing better to offer as a positive contribution, or do you know what the word means?

An hon. Member: What a politician.

Mr. Hurlburt: I do not intend to reveal the name of the member who had the nerve to write such a letter. I would have hoped, however, that he would have learned by now that, regardless of political affiliation, it is incumbent to act in a manner becoming a member of parliament.

Bill C-83 embodies proposals to screen out potential misuse of guns and restrict the general availability of firearms. Some of the changes in, and additions to, the provisions of the offensive weapons section of the Criminal Code are as follows: The addition of a licensing system to apply to all persons who possess or propose to acquire firearms or ammunition, other than persons under the age of 18 and those who would be subject to special temporary permit provisions. A general strengthening of the offence provisions relating to the importation, possession, carriage, handling, storage, transfer and use of firearms and other offensive weapons and of related search and seizure provisions. Strengthening and extension of the permit provisions applicable to businesses which deal in firearms or ammunition and strengthening of the registration certificate provisions in relation to restricted weapons.

If this bill is passed, applicants for restricted weapons will in future be required to justify the need for such weapons before a certificate is granted. Police will be able to seize a weapon without a warrant in cases where there is reason to fear danger to human safety. Every possessor of a firearm will require a licence, good for five years. Such a licence will be issued only after the licensing officer finds there is nothing in the applicant's background to make him unfit to bear a weapon. Persons under 18 will require special permits issued only for target practice, game hunting and firearms instructions. One of the guarantors must be a parent or legal guardian. All firearms and ammunition dealers, traders and importers and manufacturers will be required to obtain permits and keep records of all their transactions.

Mr. Speaker, I shall now review our present gun laws with the object of showing they already meet our needs adequately. The Criminal Code lays down the law concerning the use of firearms. Weapons are defined under three categories—prohibited, restricted and unrestricted. Prohibited weapons include certain instruments used in self-defence sports. Also prohibited are silencers, grenades and explosive-filled bottles and canisters, along with weapons that discharge gas, mace or any liquid or spray capable of incapacitating a person.

Restricted weapons include all manner of pistols and hand-guns—basically any weapon that can normally be aimed and fired by the action of one hand—and any firearm that is less than 26 inches in length or that can be adapted to be fired when reduced to a length of less than 26 inches by folding or telescoping. Restricted, also, are automatic weapons.

There are at present a number of methods of regulating restricted firearms. Firstly, with regard to criminal penalties for illegal use, in common with all firearms there are sections of the code attaching a penalty to their improper use. For example, it is an offence to possess any firearm "for a purpose dangerous to the public peace or for the purpose of committing an offence", to use the words of section 83, or while attending or on the way to attend a public meeting—section 84—or to point at another person a firearm, whether loaded or unloaded, as per section 86. Secondly, with regard to prohibiting possession of firearms, another provision applicable to all firearms is section 95 of the code which allows the court to prohibit any person convicted of an offence involving a firearm from possessing a firearm for up to five years. Thirdly, all restricted weapons must be registered. This means that the RCMP commissioner keeps a central registry of all restricted weapons. That provision is made in sections 98 and 99. The commissioner operates through local registrars who, according to the code, have no authority to refuse registration unless there is no serial number on the gun.

The discretion to refuse registration is, in law, exercised only by the commissioner who may refuse to issue a registration certificate where he has notice of any matter that may render it desirable in the interests of the safety of other persons that the applicant should not possess a restricted weapon. This provision is to be found in section 99(4). In practice, however, some local registrars refuse to register an applicant's weapon. Moreover, the techniques of registration also vary across the country; for example, in one city a fee is required.

The mechanics of registration are, in the typical case, as follows. Firstly, a hand-gun is selected at a sporting goods store. Secondly, the would-be purchaser goes to the local registrar of firearms and applies for a registration certificate and a special permit to bring the gun to the local registrar. Thirdly, the purchaser then goes back to the store with the permit and returns to the local registrar with the gun. Fourthly, the local registrar then causes inquiries to be made into the character of the applicant. The gun is often kept by the registrar during this period. Fifthly, the registration application is then sent to the RCMP commissioner with any recommendations from the local registrar. Sixthly, if the commissioner issues a certificate after further checks by the RCMP—the RCMP checks on whether he has a criminal record, whether there is an order of prohibition against him and whether the gun has been stolen—the owner of the gun returns to the local registrar to pick up his gun, if the gun has been held there.

Registration certificates are granted to anyone who wishes to have a hand-gun in his home or business unless, as previously pointed out, the commissioner knows that it is "desirable in the interests of the safety of other persons that the applicant should not possess a restricted weapon". Subject to this condition, a person can keep a hand-gun at home if he wants it for protection, or because he is a collector or is simply starting a collection.

Permits to carry restricted weapons outside the home are much more carefully regulated. Here, the local registrar, assuming he is the person authorized to perform this function under section 97(1) of the code, has discretion to refuse to issue a permit. The section says "may be issued". No appeal can be taken from a refusal to grant such a permit, although an appeal to a magistrate can be taken if a permit is revoked or if a registration certificate is not granted, as set out in section 99(6). The registrar will, of course, consider the character of the applicant. The registrar must also be satisfied, under section 97(2), that the applicant requires the restricted weapon for one of four stated purposes: to protect life or property; for use in connection with his lawful profession or occupation; for use in target practice under the auspices of a shooting club approved by the attorney general; or for use in target practise in accordance with the conditions attached to the permit. The practice varies from province to province. For example, some provinces make it very difficult to obtain a permit to carry a hand-gun "to protect life or property"; others are less restrictive.

A permit is needed to sell, repair or take in pawn a restricted weapon. Again, discretion is given to the registrar to refuse to issue a permit, as provided in sections 97(4) and 99(3), if he "has notice of any matter that may render it desirable in the interests of the safety of other persons that such a permit should not be issued to the applicant". In this case, if a permit is refused an appeal can be taken to a magistrate. Unrestricted weapons refer to all shotguns and rifles of a kind commonly used for hunting or sporting purposes. Neither registration certificate nor permits are required for these weapons, although a provincial licence is necessary in order to hunt game.

The aim of more gun control as advocated by the government and certain groups is to make Canada a better place to live in by reducing the violent crime rate. In this regard, the following extract from the Canadian Association of Chiefs of Police position paper on gun control is interesting to note:

> Few authorities will dispute the statement that crime with violence is generally on the increase virtually throughout the world. Such crime with violence is identified with the use of explosives and weapons of all kinds, particularly firearms. For this reason, governments and individuals have shown increased interest in the control of firearms as one remedial measure probably because reported crime frequently associates the use of firearms.
> What is identified today as being "the problem" is the number of violent crimes that are being committed and with which wrongly or rightly a firearm is being identified. There is no doubt that revolvers, pistols, "sawed-off" shotguns and "Saturday night specials" as well as any other kind of firearm imaginable have been involved in the commission of violent crime. The traditional sporting rifle whether suitable for high-powered shell or shot has also been involved. It must not be forgotten that violent crime is also committed with stilettos, butcher knives, chains, hammers and lead pipes, to name but a few other instruments.

● (1640)

> The problem at hand is the high incidence of crime and the search for the methods of reducing it. If this can be achieved by the elimination of a weapon from the market then so much the better but this approach can be discarded from the very beginning because violent crime can be committed with any number of weapons.
>
> Any restriction or control of firearms may in effect lessen the safeguards of society.
> It is claimed that registration, control, prohibiting the sale of firearms or, as a most drastic step, stopping the manufacturing thereof would prove to be a safeguard to society. In the first instance a good proportion of legitimate users would be deprived of a rather enjoyable pastime; secondly, the firearms manufacturing industry would suffer considerably and the armed forces as well as security services would have to establish other means of procuring weapons in any case; thirdly, the highly desirable training facilities for the younger element, which facilities are yet grossly underdeveloped, would be eliminated thereby depriving society of a potential reserve of qualified marksmen.
> The strongest support of this point can be found in Switzerland where is no restrictive legislation whatever to curb the general use of firearms of any kind. In no country of Europe is the use of firearms more common and general. Every able bodied adult male is required by law to possess and know how to use military rifles. In addition, he may own as many pistols as he likes. In no country of the world is rifle and pistol shooting more universally indulged in by all classes of people. In spite of all these facts in no country in Europe, with the possible exception of England, are crimes of violence so rare as they are in Switzerland. This fact must give pause to the advocates of pistol prohibition as a crime preventive. Inanimate objects such as pistols, knives, axes or clubs do not and cannot cause crime. They do not and they cannot supply the motive or the impulse. The causes of crime must be sought elsewhere, in greed, hatred, jealousy and general moral depravity—and the remedy—if there any be, is more likely to be found in morals and education in improved police methods of detection, and in the more prompt and certain imposition of punishment. This is safeguarding society.

Although gun control proposals pretend to be directed toward the laudatory objective of reducing the incidence of violent crime, they tend in fact to aggravate the very conditions fostering crime by diverting attention away from the dismal failure of the criminal justice system to adequately cope with criminality. In point of fact, as a society we have simply failed to provide an efficient means whereby criminals can be apprehended, speedily prosecuted, reliably convicted, jailed and kept in jail.

The glaring failure of gun control laws significantly to affect the criminal element, as well as the reasons therefor, can be graphically portrayed by examining the experience of the city of Chicago. It has been estimated that there are presently some 20,000 gun laws in the United States, a number of which are operational in Chicago. The national federal firearms acts were on the federal books since their enactment in the 1930s, and the federal gun control act of 1968 eliminated interstate mail order sales of guns. Since 1968, Illinois has required a licence to purchase or possess either firearms or ammunition; additionally, Chicago residents have been required to register with the city authorities every firearm they own.

In 1965, before there was either a city registration ordinance of a state licensing law, 395 persons were murdered in Chicago. In 1973, five years after the enactment of those two new laws to "control guns", a record number of 864 persons were murdered in Chicago, and 1974 recorded nearly 1,000 murders. Anti-gun proposals are based on the faulty assumption that the increased sale of firearms in recent years constitutes, in and of itself, a basic cause of crime, when it would be far more rational to conclude that the sale of guns is to a significant degree merely an effect of the public's fear of rising crime.

The public has become increasingly alarmed and apprehensive over what it perceives as the open and notorious contempt shown by lawless elements, not only toward the law but toward the police and even the courts, all of which contributes toward the determination of law-abiding citizens to restore to themselves the means of doing that which they fear government either can no longer, or will no longer, do for them, namely, protect the safety and lives of their families as well as their property. Criminals will always manage to find guns. Stricter gun control laws may only provoke the existence of a black market for guns used for criminal ends.

The views of generally decent and law-abiding citizens are easy to describe. People have the right to bear arms for pleasure and self-protection, without interference from big government. Criminals will get guns, despite gun control laws. All gun control proposals—whether they advocate registration, licensing, record-keeping or anything else—are undesirable because they will inevitably lead to other, more restrictive measures.

As we have noted, Canada does have sufficient legislation already in existence to regulate legitimate firearms' use and traffic, and the police have interpreted and enforced the laws in a manner consistent with the attitude of the Canadian public. Because of the discretion of the police forces, relatively few Canadians are actually aware of the comprehensive manner in which firearms' usage has already been legislated. The present system regarding restricted weapons appears to be working reasonably well. Most police forces conduct a careful examination of the applicant before forwarding a recommendation to the RCMP for a registration certificate. The RCMP themselves make a routine check. Moreover, many local registrars tend to make it difficult for a person to obtain a permit to carry a hand-gun unless he is a bona fide target-shooter. The very fact that relatively few hand-guns are used in crimes in Canada, in comparison with their use in the United States, is some indication of the effectiveness of the system. The number of hand-guns in Canada is still relatively low.

● (1650)

Since we in Canada already have so many laws governing the use of offensive weapons, one must be reminded that no matter what possible strategy for control may be suggested, any further registration would require a considerable increase to an already overburdened administrative structure and would further tax the capabilities of police forces and the judicial system. Thus, it is emphasized in the Canadian Association of Chiefs of Police position paper on gun control laws that if there is to be any further legislation instituted for restricting the use of firearms even more than presently exists in Canada, its administration must be given first consideration, and if it be found that it cannot properly be administered, then it is far better to remain with the legislation that presently exists.

What effect would this compulsory licensing system have, for all persons who possess or propose to acquire firearms or ammunition, in keeping firearms out of the hands of criminals? The effect would be so insignificant that it would not begin to compensate for the expenditure of police time. Furthermore, good citizens, hunters, farmers, trappers and competitive marksmen would be forced to comply with an irritating, time-consuming and useless regulation.

It is contended by some that registration of rifles and shotguns, and the application of a permit system, would reduce certain types of manslaughter or murder such as those arising from domestic quarrels, property disputes and the onset of insanity. But it should be pointed out that people involved in such killings are usually those who have not been looked upon or recorded as criminals. They would have had no trouble in registering their firearms and securing permits to carry them.

In conclusion, the questions surrounding firearms and the correlation of violence are extremely complicated and often ambiguous. The available literature on the subject indicates that research results often have been conveniently misinterpreted to suit the needs of those holding opposing points of view. The relationship between firearms and violence, however, does tend to obscure two other important facts bearing on the firearms question. First, it must be recognized that the vast majority of gun owners recognize the desirability of the proper use of firearms. It is indicated in the literature that most gun owners are law-abiding sportsmen and exemplary citizens who deplore the criminal use of firearms; and this being the case, their needs must sensitively be taken into account. Second, one must never lose sight of the fact that the root causes of violence may well go much deeper than mere widespread gun ownership. It must be recognized that firearms merely facilitate, rather than cause, some forms of violence.

[Mr. Hurlburt.]

Mr. Peter P. Masniuk (Portage): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to take part in the debate on a very important government bill, Bill C-83, to introduce the Criminal Law Amendment Act (No. 1), 1976. This is an important bill because it is a law bill, specifically the criminal law, and it affects matters of a highly emotional nature. In fact, this is precisely what is wrong with some of these amendments—they are long on emotion, but short on logic.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Masniuk: This afternoon I would like to give some of my observations on the amendments in the bill which deal with gun control. It is interesting and revealing that the major portion of this bill is actually called "gun control." The government literature on this legislation calls it "gun control." I think that reveals a great deal of the government's real intentions on this subject. Maybe "gun control" sounds better than "people control", which is what this bill is really about. But it is odd that the advocates of gun control of one sort or another hardly ever talk about crime control or criminal control. This bill and this debate is really about gun control, even though the government has tried to pretend that it is about measures to protect society from crime. The gun control provisions make up 39 of the bill's 73 pages and actually constitute a new gun control law. Therefore, I am gcing to talk about gun control for a few minutes.

The fact is that Canada has some of the toughest gun control laws of any country in the world for certain categories of firearms. Nor are they new. Gun registration was introduced in Canada in 1935. The notorious hand-gun is a restricted weapon in this country and it is difficult to imagine how it could be any more controlled. A hand-gun must first be registered with the RCMP. This registration is not automatic, and can be refused. To remove the gun from the place of purchase, the owner must next obtain a "convenience permit" which only authorizes him to transport the gun to his home or the place of business for which the gun is registered. To transport the gun, again he must be issued with a "carrying permit" which will only be issued under strict provisions such as that the gun is necessary to protect life and property, that its use is in connection with the applicant's lawful profession or occupation, that it will be used on the premises of an approved shooting club, or that it will be used for target practise in accordance with the conditions attached to the permit.

These types of provisions governing certain restricted weapons, including hand-guns, were written into our Criminal Code over 40 years ago. At that time, so we are told, those who instituted this program had high hopes, although it is not exactly clear just what the hopes were for. Maybe they were negative hopes. Maybe they hoped that these controls would prevent the emergence of a Canadian John Dillinger or Ma Barker; I do not know.

May I call it five o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Rynard)—Health—Measures to ensure adequate supply of swine flu vaccine—Consultations with provincial ministers; the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants (Mr. McCleave)—Agriculture—Proposed elimination of transport subsidy on flour to east coast ports—Alleged conflict in minister's statements; the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock (Mr. Friesen)—Canadian Broadcasting Corporation—Request for more local programming—Government action.

It being five o'clock, pursuant to order made earlier this day, the House will now proceed to consideration of government order No. 92.

COMPENSATION FOR FORMER PRISONERS OF WAR ACT

MEASURE TO PROVIDE FOR COMPENSATION FOR FORMER PRISONERS OF WAR AND THEIR DEPENDANTS

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs) moved that Bill C-92, to provide for compensation for former prisoners of war and their dependants and to amend certain other statutes in consequence thereof, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs.

● (1700)

He said: Mr. Speaker, it is with considerable pleasure that I speak today on a bill designed to improve the lot of those members of the armed forces and certain civilians who were unfortunate enough to have been prisoners of war during and after World War II. All members of this House agree that Canada owes a debt of gratitude to those men and women who answered the call and served so gallantly for the preservation of our freedom. We are all agreed that Canada has some of the world's most advanced veterans' legislation. I consider it a privilege, and it gives me great personal satisfaction, to speak to this bill which puts Canada in the forefront in providing compensation to former prisoners of war.

Hon. members will remember that in 1971 the Pension Act was amended to provide special benefits of the equivalent of a minimum of 50 per cent pension to former prisoners of war of the Japanese because of the long-term after-effects which they suffered as a result of their imprisonment. Prisoners of war of European powers in World War II also suffered indignities and maltreatment and many of them have residual disabilities which cannot be recognized or identified. A study was made by Dr. J. D. Hermann and he reported on the deleterious effects of prisoner of war incarceration. His report, in turn, was studied by the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs which was unanimous in its recommendations to this House.

The bill as put forward will adopt, almost in their entirety, the recommendations of the standing committee related to prisoners of war. Hon. members will be glad to know that the principles of this bill have been discussed with veterans' organizations and that they support it fully. The basic principles of the bill provide that former prisoners of war of the Japanese who were captives for one year or more will receive compensation equivalent to a 50 per cent disability pension and that they will receive any disability pension to which they may be entitled, as well, to a combined maximum of the equivalent of a 100 per cent pension. For those who were incarcerated from three months to one year, the rate of compensation will be the equivalent of a 20 per cent pension.

It is recognized that the current problems of former prisoners of war of the Japanese are worse than those of other prisoners of war. It is for this reason that the recommended compensation for those who were captured by other powers during or after World War II is on a sliding scale related to the length of time of incarceration. On this basis, the men captured at Dieppe would be compensated at the next highest amount. The bill establishes the following rates for these groups: in captivity for 3 months to 18 months, 10 per cent; 18 months to 30 months, 15 per cent; over 30 months, 20 per cent. Like the others, this compensation will also be added to any disability pension payable, subject to a ceiling equivalent to a 100 per cent pension.

The legislation provides that in the case of death, compensation will be available to dependants on the same basis as under the Pension Act. For example, if the combined compensation and disability pension totals 48 per cent or more, widow's pension would be payable and other dependants benefits would be available.

I must point out that prisoner of war experience does not relate to any other civilized kind of incarceration. It is a mixture of inadequate food, exposure, disease, physical abuse and emotional torment. In some instances it entailed being shackled for long periods, having to undergo forced marches and being forced to suffer personal indignities. The relative intensities vary from man to man and time to time, but it is impossible to separate any one aspect of this complex indignity and experience from the whole.

I am sure that the measures proposed in this bill will be welcomed by every hon. member of this House as further evidence of Canada's awareness of the special contribution made by our veterans to their country. I also want to pay special tribute to all those who have been involved in the studies which led to this bill: the veterans' organizations, Dr. J. B. Hermann, the members of the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs, other hon. members of this House, officials of the Canada Pension Commission and of the Department of Veterans Affairs.

I am very pleased today to have this opportunity to respond to the many interested requests which I have received from former prisoners of war, both of Hong Kong and other powers, and also veterans' organizations and many members of parliament, on their behalf, with the interest at heart of those who served.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. William Knowles (Norfolk-Haldimand): Mr. Speaker, naturally, it is with great pleasure that we have an opportunity today to debate second reading of Bill C-92 which has been introduced into the House. It was given first reading yesterday, March 29, and we certainly welcome it. We welcome it because of the long delay which occurred before the report of the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs could be put into legislative form. There were questions on points of order and questions to the minister dating back, I suppose, to October of 1975 by hon. members on all sides but by opposition members particularly, and more particularly by the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall) and myself who bear the responsibility of veterans' legislation for the official opposition, and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) as we all continued to press for an early introduction of this bill and to have it printed so that we would know at least what we were talking about. Prior to the introduction of this bill the minister made a statement a few weeks ago indicating that the legislation was ready and would be introduced soon. The word "soon" became a bit of a headache over the weeks and months, and that is why I say we welcomed the introduction of this bill yesterday.

In fairness, I suppose I should say that hon. members on the government side who are veterans were equally concerned about this, but they just did not have the opportunity to express themselves, perhaps, with the same freedom that we have. Perhaps that is the reason they should move across to this side of the House, so they can have greater freedom.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Knowles (Norfolk-Haldimand): From the sound of it, I think we have some offers to come over. Today, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre made an offer which the government—or at least the House leader—simply could not refuse, and that was to set aside private members' hour which was to be considering his topic and devote it to bringing in this bill. We have to give credit to the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. MacDonald) for being prepared and willing to come forward at such short notice. We welcome his statement at the opening of this debate on second reading.

[Mr. MacDonald (Cardigan).]

Perhaps it might be well just briefly to recapitulate what has gone on prior to today. To do that we must go back to Dr. Hermann's report which was studied by the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs in great detail. In addition to that, there were numerous witnesses representing veterans' organizations who appeared before the committee to give their views on how the Hermann report should be implemented and what they thought the legislation should contain. I refer to the Hong Kong Prisoners of War Association, the National Prisoners of War Association, the Dieppe Prisoners of War Association, the Royal Air Force Escaping Society—not to mention the legion, the army, the navy, the air force, and so on. The views and beliefs of all these people were invaluable in assisting the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs in preparing a report to present to this House. Then, of course, there were the long sessions of the standing committee in an attempt to bring about a consensus as to what the government should bring forward. There were wide variations of opinion. Some wanted everything included; others, strict limitations with regard to the recommendations. We must give credit to the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Cullen) who is present today and wants to speak to the bill. He was instrumental in bringing about the consensus which led to the report on which this legislation is based.

● (1710)

We must not forget the work done by the officials of the Department of Veterans Affairs in bringing forward this legislation. They stood behind the minister and helped him to look good in committee and in the House. Some of them now sit in the gallery. We ought to pay tribute to them for their work in bringing forward this legislation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Norfolk-Haldimand): The minister outlined the contents of the bill. It contains many provisions which the standing committee recommended ought to be included. The committee said that Hong Kong veterans ought to be treated more fairly. When last we gave them a 50 per cent across the board pension, we forgot to say that added to that pension should be any other permanent disability pension they might receive. That omission has been corrected.

I shall not mention in detail the sliding scale of benefits available to prisoners of war of European powers. These are based on the time of incarceration and benefits received are to be added to other disability pensions which the veteran might be in receipt of, up to the maximum of 100 per cent in the case of Hong Kong veterans.

The bill omits important recommendations. One concerns those who escaped from prisoner of war camps, evaded recapture and found their way back to the allied forces. The committee recommended that they should be included in the same category as that applying to prisoners of war of European powers. The government saw fit not to do that, for reasons which have been explained and accepted. In the not too distant future we should consider including this category.

I think the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre in a previous debate said that the hon. member for Malpeque (Mr. MacLean) escaped from a prisoner of war camp. After being shot down over Europe he was captured, then escaped and, using the European underground system, finally returned to the allied forces. His story is well documented in a book called "The Evaders". An entire chapter is devoted to the hon. member's exploits. He is particularly interested in that recommendation of the standing committee. For that reason we ought to keep it in mind.

The government also did not accept our recommendation suggesting that pensions should be paid to widows of veterans whose disability pensions were assessed at less than 48 per cent. The minister explained why that provision could not be included this time. We accepted his explanation in the all-party discussion of a few weeks ago. We know that it would entail the spending of several millions of dollars, money which the government claims it does not have at this time. If its priorities were different, I am sure that money could be found.

I will not infringe upon the time of others who want to speak on second reading. I said earlier that I want to expedite passage of this bill, and I know that colleagues on my side and hon. members opposite also want to speak on it. I commend the minister for finally bringing forward this bill. We all sincerely hope that it will receive early passage so that veterans will not have to wait long before receiving benefits.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, although it has taken us a long time to reach this day, we are delighted that it is here at last.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The first word I wish to use in my brief comments is "unanimity". Hon. members have heard some of us ask many questions about this matter and have heard some of us pressing for this legislation to be brought down. But the real story behind it has been one of unanimity, particularly on the part of the members of the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs.

A long time ago we requested an inquiry into the experience of Canadian veterans who were prisoners of war in Europe. That request led to the appointment of Dr. J. D. Hermann who was to undertake that task. When we made that request it was unanimous. Later, the Hong Kong veterans appeared before us and asked for certain improvements in their status. The committee supported their request and that decision was unanimous. Likewise, when the standing committee, on June 12, 1975, tabled the seventh report, which in part is now being implemented, that report was unanimous. As the hon. member for Norfolk-Haldimand (Mr. Knowles) said, that report was in the nature of a consensus: we compromised between two extremes. The unanimity of the members of the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs provided the pressure which helped the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. MacDonald) to get his cabinet colleagues to agree to the introduction of Bill C-92.

That unanimity was also shown when my colleague and namesake on this side of the House paid tribute to various veterans' organizations, those directly representing prisoners of war and others, for the part they played in this and when he thanked the deputy minister and other officials in the Department of Veterans Affairs, the chairman of the Canadian Pension Commission and the other officials who worked with him for the work they did in drafting the legislation and bringing it before the House.

The second thing I want to say is this: I think the time has come to shorten speeches, or to eliminate them altogether, and pass the legislation. The minister and the previous speaker cut their speeches short. I shall keep mine brief as well. After all, it is almost 34 years since the raid on Dieppe. Those of us who come from Winnipeg well remember that day. Men we knew were involved in the raid. It is even longer than that since the Hong Kong experience, which included many men from my city. So let us not lengthen the time which survivors of Hong Kong or other prison camps in Europe must wait before getting the compensation they deserve. I hope that hon. members who will not get the opportunity to speak, especially members of the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs, will feel that they have been spoken for by those taking part in this debate.

Like the hon. member for Norfolk-Haldimand, I regret that some things were not put in the bill. We had recommended that in the case of prisoners of war in Europe the lowest rate, 10 per cent, should apply to those who were prisoners for any period from one day to a year and a half. The provision in the bill before us starts at three months. In other words, the lowest rate will apply to incarceration for between three months and a year and a half. I am a little concerned about the numbers that may be cut off by that three months requirement, but we can deal with that later. I am also disappointed that the recommendation we made regarding escapees and evaders has not been included. However, if we get the legislation on the books and the case is a strong one for them to be included, perhaps later on we can get the government to bring in an amendment.

● (1720)

Also, I am disappointed that our very worth-while and, I thought, very humanitarian recommendation about widows is not in the bill. As the previous speaker pointed out, we asked that in the case of widows of veterans where the disability pension of the veteran was less than 48 per cent, a pro rata widow's pension should go to such widows. I understand the battle there was in cabinet to get this legislation through and we have to accept the bill as it is. However, I hope that after this is out of the way and the smoke of this battle has cleared, we can have another one to win yet a better provision for the widows of veterans where veterans' disability pensions were below 48 per cent.

Having indicated my disappointment that those things are not there, and my dedication to carry on the struggle to get them, that does not detract from my pleasure that this bill is now before us. It will mean a great deal to the Hong Kong veterans that the change that is in this bill is being made. Instead of getting just a 50 per cent basic and having that include any disability pensions that were less than that, they will now get the 50 per cent plus any assessable disability, except that there is a ceiling of 100 per cent. It will mean a great deal to them.

It will mean a great deal to Canadian veterans who were prisoners of war in Europe and have waited all these years for consideration to get even the amounts of compensation that are involved in this bill. When you add these percentages to the percentages that some of them may have for disabilities, there will be protection for widows that may not be there at the present time. As the bill and the schedule point out, we are making provision not only for widows but for children, dependents, and so on. This is a long overdue step. However, this is not the time to complain about the time that has been lost or to complain about the things that are not there. I am just glad that this bill is before us. Coming, as I do, from Winnipeg where we have many who were involved both at Hong Kong and Dieppe, I speak particularly for the people of my city in saying that we are glad this legislation has been brought in.

With all that I have had to say about this matter over the past many months, I certainly do not need to make the point that I could go on. I have already said that the time for speeches on this matter is over. The time has come to get the bill passed and to get it into effect. I am a little concerned that there is not a date in the bill. I had hoped there would be a reasonable period of retroactivity. The date is to be fixed by proclamation. I am afraid that means an effective date that is after the bill gets passed. Therefore, I would like to see the bill passed right now, today.

[Translation]

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Just a few words, Mr. Speaker, to congratulate the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. MacDonald) for having introduced Bill C-92 now before the House, at the express request of several government members, and of course, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles).

I congratulate the minister who has obtained quite a few things for the Hong Kong veterans and Dieppe prisoners. I am sure that my brother, who disappeared at Dieppe in August of 1942 and who saw several married fellow-soldiers fall at his side, if he can hear me now, will be happy to hear—though it did take a long time—such a good ending.

However one thing worries me in this bill. I know the committee members did their share, everything they could, as well as the government, to achieve a reasonable objective. But, once again, one thing troubles me: I would like to see the amounts given on pages 7 and 8 indexed on the cost of living. If the cost of living increases—

[English]

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Yes, they are in the main bill.

[Translation]

Mr. Beaudoin: They are. I am sorry. I was not a member of this committee but if they are indexed, it means that the long nurtured dream of these families has been fulfilled, in particular these widowed women and these men who, as the minister said earlier, lost most of their joy of living after a 24, 30 or 35 months confinement.

Finally I wish to congratulate the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre in particular whom I heard at each meeting of the House leaders to which I had the honour to assist. He never missed a single opportunity to push for introduction of this bill. This is a concrete example of the concerted action of the opposition parties with the party in power do something in favour of veterans and of the people for whom life had hardly any meaning. I think this is all to the credit of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and of the minister.

[English]

Hon. Jack Cullen (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, this a great day for parliament. It is one of the days when politicians of whatever political stripe can be proud of the fact that they are members of the House of Commons, and to indicate that when the chips are down and there is something well deserved we can all work together without any friction.

I do not wish to single out too many people. However, I think it is appropriate to say to the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. MacDonald) that we all feel this legislation is long overdue and we are particularly proud that at this time of restraint he was able to overcome even that. This is one battle that is not going to be fought on the backs of the veterans as the minister has brought forward a piece of legislation that is long overdue. Most assuredly, it is needed.

On the other side of the House, I had the pleasure of serving with many of the members of the veterans affairs committee. In particular I think of the hon. member for Humber-St. George's—St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall), the hon. member for Norfolk-Haldimand (Mr. Knowles), of course the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) and the hon. member for Rimouski (Mr. Allard). We all worked together to find a compromise, a solution. We would have all liked more. We would like to have seen a lot of things happen with this particular bill. We worked together in an in-camera session. We were able to resolve this matter to the satisfaction of the Dieppe prisoners of war, the Hong Kong veterans, the Legion and other organizations which made representations before us.

It may be necessary for Mr. John Mellor to change the title of his book "The Forgotten Heroes". That book spells out, probably as clearly and precisely as possible, the difficulties faced by the prisoners of war in Europe. I do not think I have read a better book. I read "The Shame and the Glory". It probably has more length and more individual statistics, but in so far as putting it all together, I think Mr. Mellor in his book "The Forgotten Heroes" has told the story very graphically.

There is one other thing I should like to say. It comes out of the book and is one of the things about Dieppe veterans. When the men were taken prisoner they were put in railway cars and moved inland in France. They had just come out of the shock of the terrible tragedy of Dieppe and were herded into these railway cars and taken long distances without any food. Finally, they were given some very meagre rations.

The Vichy French, for whatever reason, thought they could alienate the French Canadians from the English Canadians by offering additional food and benefits to the French Canadians. To Canada's eternal pride, the French-Canadians said, "We are one as Canadians, and that is why we fight". And they shared the additional food which was given them by the Vichy French. There was no question then of French and English being divided. They set a standard then and I believe that we, in peacetime, should look back and remember what the French-Canadians were telling the Vichy French at that time.

● (1730)

It is a real honour and pleasure for me to take part in this debate. I know there are others who would like to speak, and that there are some who are not here today but who would like to speak on this bill. This is an effort of the House of Commons, not of any political party.

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, I need not add many words to what has already been said this afternoon. I would only commend the minister and his staff, all the service organizations, and all members of the veterans affairs committee.

This bill will help those who are on partial pensions, those who may be in receipt of war veterans allowances through pre-aging; it will give them a few additional dollars to help compensate for the increasing cost of living.

There are only two or three points I wish to make now because of my interest in allowing others to take part in the debate. One concerns the clarification of compensation and pension arrangements. This is a subject to which we ought to address ourselves in committee. Suppose a war veterans is in receipt of war veterans allowance and will qualify for 10 or 15 per cent. How will that affect his war veterans allowance? There is nothing in the bill to say that it will not affect the allowance and therefore the extra money might be of no benefit to a WVA recipient who is already getting the maximum.

Second, take the case of veteran who is over 65 and who is in receipt of GIS. If he qualifies, will the compensation affect his GIS? Again this is a point to which we might well address ourselves in committee.

One of the good features, and this may have been overlooked, concerns the 48 per cent maximum for qualifying for widow's allowance. If the compensation is included, if the disability pensioner, for example, is getting 40 per cent and gets 20 per cent compensation it will bring him up over the 48 per cent line so his widow would indeed benefit.

As the hon. member for Norfolk-Haldimand (Mr. Knowles) and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) have pointed out, it is too bad that escapees were not included. It is obvious from the experience of those who escaped that in some cases they suffered more than those who were incarcerated in prisoner-of-war camps.

In closing I would once again commend the minister. He keeps us in suspense a lot but he always comes through in the end. I should congratulate him, his officials who do the detailed work, and all the members of the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I have reserved to myself, I trust, possibly the last word other than those of the minister in reply. First of all, as I have indicated in the past, I have an interest in this legislation. It is possible I am the only one in this Chamber who has a personal and direct interest in it and for that reason, of course, I have had to lie back at times and let others get to the forefront on this particular issue.

I recall private legislation going back eight or ten years, trying to get ministers of veterans affairs subsequent to myself—predecessors of the present minister—to look at this situation and bring the men in for treatment. It was not so much that I was interested in monetary compensation as it was to get the men in and study the effects of what everyone has been speaking of, but from a medical point of view. There would have been many other benefits. I did not think solely of my confreres in the prison camps whether of Dieppe vintage or whether of longer-term Navy or Air Force personnel; I was considering primarily the non-Hong Kong or non-Japanese prisoners of war.

I was not happy about the settlement reached with regard to the Hong Kong prisoners. There is one fundamental point which has been lost sight of, as is evident from the restrictions in the bill before us, and it is that we have since the first world war granted war disability pensions up to 100 per cent in compensation for war wounds or injuries arising out of war service. It is inviolate, not subject to tax, not assignable, not attachable. In certain cases survivor benefits accompany it.

As far as Hong Kong people are concerned, unfortunately there was the 50 per cent ceiling put on which mingled both disability and compensation for the privation they had suffered. It was unfortunate it was done that way, and I believe it was right of the departmental officials on this occasion to insist that the question of POW compensation be taken out of the service disability legislation entirely and that it be recognized as POW compensation. I must say, though, I find it disappointing, even though I realize and speak with gratitude on the part of thousands of my colleagues who were prisoners of war that this action should now be taken. But I do find that having recognized the injustice, the inequities which were imposed on Hong Kong prisoners of war who were really entitled to between 75 per cent and 80 per cent disability pensions, they were cut by the 50 per cent or else they gave up the 50 per cent.

If they were in receipt of a disability pension in excess of 50 per cent there was no compensation for the Hong Kong veterans category. That is a matter of fact and that was where the rub came. I know some prisoners of war who are 90 and 100 per cent pensionable. They made the sacrifice and the country gratefully granted them this disability pension. Now, when we go on the other side and deal under another heading entirely with prisoner of war compensations, this legislation unfortunately tells those men that if they have, both in the Hong Kong category and in the non-Japanese POW category, a disability pension of over 50 per cent their compensation is going to suffer and that if their compensation were upgraded as a result of a re-board in future their compensation will go down. This is because the limit under the act is 100 per cent.

I have spoken to the minister privately about this, and in committee I hope we can agree that the continuation of this inequity should be removed. There is one head of compensation. There is another head of disability benefit. Surely we are not going to continue this inequity to the bitter end. No man will get in excess of a 100 per cent disability pension. He will get a 100 per cent disability pension if he is entitled to it; he will then get, in addition, compensation for being a prisoner of war.

● (1740)

There are other provisions of the act which I think could stand some improvement. However, on behalf of those from Hamilton, Toronto, Windsor, Montreal, Winnipeg, Weyburn, Calgary, Red Deer, Stettler, which I think are the principal areas the troops who took part in the Dieppe raid came from, including prisoners of war who died, such as Sandy Shusterman, who was, shall I say, the moving spirit or founder of the Dieppe Prisoners and Veterans Association, as well as many others who pioneered outside of parliament a strong movement that has culminated in this measure, I say thank you to the government and thank you to members of the House. Naturally they have said thank you many times to the members of the veterans affairs committee.

While attending last year's national conference of prisoners of war in Red Deer I had expressed to me, by all prisoners of war and their dependants who were there, their heartfelt thanks for this consideration that was being given and which hopefully will now come their way.

I also hope that the provision that this legislation shall come into force on a date to be proclaimed is not just a matter of deferral. I would have thought that a generous gesture to these men would be to make it retroactive to the date on which the minister made his announcement that the government had accepted the principle of this measure and that preparation of legislation was going forward. That was the date of the cabinet's decision and it was the date the minister made the announcement. To me, it is only fair under the circumstances to have the legislation made effective from that date.

I note that there is the question of a supplementary estimate or something like that, but why do we always have to look at administrative convenience if we want to make things tidy from the bookkeeping point of view? We are dealing with compensation paid to men, and perhaps to women too who were prisoners of war since the measure will apply to civilian war prisoners. Yet we clutter up our gratitude by bureaucratic tidiness. It would have been far better for the minister and all of us had this legislation been effective from the date of the announcement of this favourable decision that has been taken by the cabinet.

I also regret that there could not be included those who are called escapers. They too went through very trying times, possibly more difficult than others who were prisoners of war. It is hard to measure the relative degree of suffering and privation they endured. Monetary compensation is a very poor measure, but it is the best we can give those who managed to survive, both prisoners of the Japanese, and others. Looking at them today, Mr. Speaker, you wonder how on earth they could ever have been prisoners of war and have suffered any privation at all.

On the other hand, there are people living in Canada, men and women, who went through the horrors of Dachau, Auschwitz and Buchenwald. Some came out from there less than skin and bone and today are not the same people. You would hardly believe that they could have gone through such privation and cruelty, and yet survive. They managed to keep their minds, and apparently that is the best thing.

[Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West).]

It may be said of some that they may get stout. They may round out. But so long as they do not get fat between the ears, that is what counts. I hope that this House will not be too fat between the ears and will compensate these people justly, and that the minister will accept some of the kindly suggestions made by various members in their comments on this bill.

[Translation]

Mr. Gérard Loiselle (Saint-Henri): Mr. Speaker, I would not want at this stage to be accused of trying to kill the bill. I only want to offer my best wishes to the members of the committee; among all the House committees on which I sat, this is one of the most interesting because there is not political partisanship. All parties cooperate in order that veterans be better understood and protected by the government.

I also want to congratulate the members of all parties sitting on the Committee on Veterans Affairs for their devotion and their willingness in discussing the veterans' problems and I would also thank the various associations which submitted briefs. There is also the department officials from Ottawa and Montreal with whom I discuss veterans' problems from time to time. I wish to thank them for their comprehension and their diligence in discussing and understanding the problems put forward. On befalf of the veterans, I would like to thank them and assure them of my devotion.

I would like to mention what happened to me last spring when I had the opportunity to visit the cemetery in Hong Kong. The brother of a friend of mine lies buried there. I visited the burial grounds and can vouch that it is impeccably maintained. I was with a colleague and I was astounded on seeing how beautifully cared for that place is. I spoke, with the help of our guide who acted as interpreter, to one of the maintenance staff. He was very dedicated to his task, it is almost a vocation which urges him to work in the cemetery. I took a snap of the grave stone of my friend's brother.

To all of you, hon. members of this House and departmental members, I offer my thanks and I am sure everyone will cooperate—there is no doubt about that in my mind—so that this legislation may be passed as quickly as possible for the benefit of our returned soldiers.

● (1750)

[English]

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, I have had very little time to peruse this bill, but I pretty well know what it contains and I want to say a few words about its effect or lack of effect on a certain group of ex-servicemen.

Generally speaking, in Canada and in most western countries we go to a great deal of national expense to see that justice is not only done but appears to be done, even in individual cases. We have a very elaborate and expensive system of justice.

I know of several cases regarding a governmental attitude where bureaucrats look at things in the bureaucratic way, with the result that very rough justice is done. They take the attitude that if there are only a few exceptions to the general rule, or relatively few that do not fit into the general pattern, there must be some very exceptional circumstances before they can be accommodated.

The few I am talking about in relation to this bill are those people who, in some cases because of luck, or their own efforts, succeeded in avoiding capture and becoming prisoners of war. More important still is that small group who were prisoners of war for a period of time and escaped and made their way back to allied territory. I do not know what the number is of those who served in the navy or the army of Canada, but those who served in the air force and escaped successfully number perhaps 150 or 200 at the outside. They are the exceptions, and are not covered by this bill. They should be covered, and I hope when the bill goes to the committee this matter will be looked into with the possibility of amending the definition of a former prisoner of war to include those who had been prisoners of war, escaped, and were in enemy territory on occasion for long periods of time.

I have a friend who was in the RCAF, was shot down, was captured, and became a prisoner of war. He escaped three times from prisoner of war camps. The third time he avoided recapture. The only way he could do this was to move to the east. He eventually arrived in Poland and commenced fighting with the Polish underground, and continued to do so for some two years. As I read this bill he would not qualify unless he was a prisoner of war for a certain length of time before his escape.

There are many others who were never prisoners of war for very long but escaped and avoided recapture. Many were shot down and were never captured. They were in enemy occupied countries for long periods of time under very difficult conditions, and at very high risk to themselves and to the people helping them. They were often living under very bad conditions when food was minimal. That period of their service is a complete blank as far as their medical documents are concerned.

Some of these individuals were wounded, injured, and stayed with friends in the underground or members of escape organizations, or perhaps with just individuals on whose mercy they had thrown themselves. At very great risk they were nursed back to a sufficient level of health so that they were able to move on.

It is very unreasonable to exclude this small group of people. I do not know how many there would be in all services, but perhaps 500 at the most. In this situation these exceptions should be taken care of by this legislation. They should have been treated in the same way as others who had the misfortune to be prisoners until the end of the war.

After all, as everybody who served in the service is aware, one of your obligations was to try to escape if taken prisoner. That was one of your obligations and duties. We now have a situation in which a fellow is disqualified because he was able to fulfil that duty by escaping successfully, at great risk to himself, and in some cases after months making it back to allied territory to serve again. To me this borders on the outrageous. The very least that can be said about it is that it is an injustice. The only reason I know of that they are not included is that they represent an awkward exception to the general rule. They do not fit conveniently into the category of those who were made prisoner of war and remained so until the war was over.

I see it is six o'clock. That is all I wanted to say on this bill now, Mr. Speaker.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, earlier today the government House leader said that if Bill C-92 were not concluded by six o'clock it would be called again during government time on Thursday. Would he tell us now whether it will be the first item of business on Thursday?

Mr. Sharp: On the same point of order, Mr. Speaker, I would not call any other government bill before this. It will be the first bill, but I cannot say it will be the only business.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I have the honour to inform the House that a message has been received from the Senate informing this House that the Senate have passed the following bills:

Bill C-90, an act for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending March 31, 1976.

Bill C-91, an act for the granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending March 31, 1977.

ROYAL ASSENT

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I have the honour to inform the House that the following communication has been received:

Government House
Ottawa

30 March, 1976

Sir:

I have the honour to inform you that the Hon. Jean Beetz, Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, in his capacity as Deputy Governor General, will proceed to the Senate Chamber today, the 30th day of March, at 9.45 p.m. for the purpose of giving Royal Assent to certain bills.

I have the honour to be,
Sir,
Your obedient servant,
Edmond Joly de Lotbinière, Administrative Secretary to the Governor General.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

CRIMINAL LAW AMENDMENT ACT (NO. 1), 1976

MEASURES FOR BETTER PROTECTION OF CANADIAN SOCIETY AGAINST CRIME

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Basford that Bill C-83, for the better protection of Canadian society against perpetrators of violence and other crime, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

Mr. Peter P. Masniuk (Portage): Mr. Speaker, when I called it five o'clock I was talking about the provisions governing certain restricted weapons, including hand-guns, which were written into the Criminal Code over 40 years ago.

I should like to leave my notes for a moment, however, and respond to some of the comments made by the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. Francis) this afternoon. I was interested in what he said about gun collectors who have invested a considerable amount of money in what were—and will be until this bill goes through the House—restricted weapons. These collectors apparently invested in machine-guns of one sort or another. They went through the process of registering a weapon, removing the firing pin, and placing it in another part of the place where they kept their gun collection. They are now very concerned that passage of this bill would prohibit ownership of these guns.

I am very concerned, Mr. Speaker, about what will happen if the bill goes through in its present form. These machine-guns are only part of a collection. If the owners comply with every phase of the law and then a gun becomes a prohibited weapon which has to be turned over to the RCMP or some other agent of the government which will confiscate them, will the owners be compensated? There are a lot of other things in the bill that I disapprove of, Mr. Speaker, and as I proceed I will show why I cannot vote for the bill in its present form.

To return to my notes, I should like to say that a former commissioner of the RCMP, Mr. L. H. Nicholson, has stated that the registration program failed miserably. This short assessment of the former commissioner merely stated an old truth about gun controls, and that is that one simply cannot control crime or criminals by controlling guns.

● (2010)

What has been the result of almost 40 years of these tough hand-gun controls in Canada? An examination of the statistics with regard to hand-guns used in shootings does not provide much of a recommendation for controls. More than ever the statistics only tend to confirm former Commissioner Nicholson's assessment.

[Mr. Deputy Speaker.]

In 1973, according to the statistics, there were 214 shootings in Canada. Of these the second largest number, next to the rifle, were committed with the restricted hand-gun, 56. There were 114 rifle shootings that year. A year later, in 1974, there were 272 shootings in Canada, a 27 per cent increase in one year. During 1974, however, although the restricted hand-gun was still second to the unrestricted rifle in terms of its popularity for shooting people, the number of shootings committed with hand-guns had risen to 71. The number of shootings with the far more easily obtainable and completely unrestricted rifle only increased by eight in the same one year period.

I know that on the one hand statistics do not necessarily prove anything and, on the other hand, they can be used to prove anything one wants them to prove, but the very least that statistics like these should tell us is that so-called gun controls have no control at all over the use of guns to commit crimes.

An examination of the situation in other countries suggests that their experiences with gun controls are similar to Canada's with hand-gun controls. Anti-gun laws and regulations are actually quite prevalent in most countries of the world. However, crime statistics for practically all of them seem to indicate that gun controls have relatively little, if any, effect on reducing or eliminating crime.

The toughest gun control in the United States is New York State's Sullivan law. In the city of New York, out of a total population of some seven million plus, less than 25,000 qualify legally to possess a firearm of any kind. This law has been in effect for over 60 years. Yet in the 12 year period from 1960 to 1972 the homicide rate in the city of New York increased from 3.7 per 100,000 people in 1960 to 19.1 per 100,000 in 1972. In the one year period from 1971 to 1972 there was an 11 per cent increase in armed robbery, and a 37 per cent increase in aggravated assault.

A mid 1960's Interpol sampling of the murder rate in 30 countries ranged from a high of 177 murders per 100,000 population in the Arab country of Yemen to a low of 0.13 per 100,000 population in Norway. All the countries in the sample had gun control laws of one kind or another, either gun registrations, purchase permits, licences to carry, or various combinations of these. Obviously, however, they have no effect whatsoever on the murder rate.

It is interesting to note that this 30 country sample includes some countries whose gun control laws are not for the purpose of disarming the nation's citizens but, rather, are just for the opposite reason, for ensuring that the nation's citizens are adequately armed. Switzerland is the most well known country in this regard. In Switzerland there are no restrictive laws on the general use of firearms, but every able bodied adult male is required by law to possess and to know how to use a military rifle. Adult males must undergo throughout the year periodic short drills in the use of their military weapons. It is quite possible that it was the existence of this armed and prepared citizen army which caused Hitler to think twice about trying to invade Switzerland during the second world war.

Quite apart from the required military drill, rifle and pistol shooting as sport are quite widely indulged in by the Swiss. Yet in spite of large numbers of all types of guns in the land of the Swiss people and their widespread availability and generally unrestricted use, Switzerland has one of the lowest crime rates of any country in the world. In fact violent crimes of all kinds are rare in Switzerland. The same Interpol sample I mentioned a few moments ago shows that in the late 1960's Switzerland had a murder rate of 0.70 per 100,000 population, one of the lowest in the world.

There is an often repeated and rather trite expression to the effect that guns do not kill people, people kill people. Those in the office of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford) responsible for this legislation must have had this expression in mind when they were drafting this bill. The response of the government to the fact that it is not guns, but people with guns, who kill, is to license people.

Bill C-83 is entitled measures to protect society against crime, but the one major and fundamental measure which the government has come up with, and which takes up more than half of this bill, is one which will have the least effect in protecting society against crime: licensing gun owners. I fail to grasp the logic in this type of legislation, that crime can be controlled by controlling the lawful activities of law abiding people. That is what this gun owner licensing law will really do. It is estimated that there are about eight million firearms in the hands of private citizens in Canada. Yet the number of shooting crimes in the country each year, even if we include those committed by criminals who have previous criminal convictions, and therefore possibly including those shootings committed with illegal firearms, is not more than a few hundred at the very most.

Less than 1 per cent of all the firearms owned in Canada are misused. The simple fact is that gun owners are law abiding people who are no more likely to shoot someone with their guns than they are to stab someone with their kitchen knives or to club someone to death with a garden rake. Yet now we have a government which wants to license all gun owners. Why? Well, because it might prevent someone who might otherwise obtain a gun from doing so and thereby prevent an unnecessary shooting death, the government says. I say possibly, but the number of such cases is too few to justify the massive bureaucracy which will be required for this gun owner licensing scheme.

The apologists for the government say that even if gun licensing prevents one unnecessary shooting death it is worth while. Is it not strange that a government which will not execute a mad dog killer but instead permits him to go free and kill again is now so concerned about the one or two shooting deaths which might be prevented by gun owner licensing?

Crime and shooting incidents cannot be affected by controlling law abiding people, which is what gun controls are for. They are not for criminals or political terrorists who will not obtain licences for their guns. Gun controls must therefore be for the potential, future criminal amongst the law abiding, but how can he possibly be identified in advance? An individual who at some time in his life might commit a murder of passion in most cases could probably qualify in every way for a gun licence. So could someone who was suddenly to go insane; there would not necessarily be a history of insanity which would prevent him from obtaining a gun licence.

Gun owner licensing might have some effect in preventing tragedies like those which occurred in Brampton and Ottawa last year—I say might. On this chance, this possibility, is owner licensing now going to be imposed on perhaps five million law-abiding Canadian gun owners who have no connection whatever with the Brampton and Ottawa tragedies? Where is the government's logic? It now proposes to set up another government bureaucracy, when all previous gun control schemes in this country and in other countries have proved to be unworkable, cumbersome, tremendously expensive, and completely ineffective in controlling crime and shooting deaths.

This new Canadian version of gun control is not really a gun control program at all, of course. It is people control. The government calls it the bill on peace and security. That title alone sounds suspect to many Canadians. It certainly raised plenty of eyebrows in my constituency of Portage when it was announced last month. How anyone on the government side can even say it without wincing, I do not know. Many of my constituents are beginning to feel that their own peace and security are more threatened by the government's people-control schemes than by any criminal element or mentally unbalanced gun owners.

I do not think that it is much of a secret, Mr. Speaker, that this Liberal government does not have much support out west on the prairies. It certainly could not have done more to make itself less popular in the rural areas of western Canada than to introduce this legislation. Gun ownership in rural Canada is high, much higher than in urban Canada. That is something which I know for a fact—I come from and live in a rural area. Most people from the cities who probably do not know the situation very well will very likely accept that as a fact. We know that farmers and rural families are more likely to own one or more guns than are city dwellers. Yet the incidence of crime in rural Canada is very low. Spectacular shootings are not very common in the small towns, villages, and farming areas of our country, This seems to be more of a urban phenomenon.

Gun violence is to a very great extent an urban phenomenon. This bill, in seeking to combat it, will fall most heavily on those innocent people who have nothing at all to do with the problem, the small town and rural dwellers. Here we have a very clear case of a law penalizing the innocent and doing nothing to control the criminal. Most big city dwellers do not own guns. The government, in its frantic desire to appear to be doing something about increasing urban violence, has brought in this bill, which is really a new gun law which will most affect those who have absolutely nothing to do with urban crime.

How will requiring a farmer to obtain a licence for the gun which he uses for killing rodents or shooting ducks or other game affect urban violence? How will requiring a gun collector to obtain a licence for his gun collection have any effect on the muggings or assaults in the dark alleys of our major cities? How will licensing the members of a gun club or shooting federation possibly have any effect on the incidence of armed robbery?

This law will require the statements of two guarantors before an applicant will be able to obtain a gun licence. This should not be a problem for any normal, law-abiding person; but what possible effect can it have on controlling the psychotics and mentally unbalanced individuals in society? How can owner licensing prevent a normal and well balanced individual from shooting a relative or neighbour in a fit of passion during a period of temporary insanity?

This bill makes provision for the establishment of a licensing officer, one of whose functions it seems will be to see that gun licenses are not given to undesirable people. This is absurd. The function of a licensing officer cannot be any more than a bureaucratic function. He should not be given the power, the authority, and the responsibility to make a judgment about something as important and as personal as one's character. This is something which only a psychologist or phychiatrist is adequately trained and competent to do.

This evening I have tried to give some of the reasons why I am opposed to the gun licensing provisions contained in this criminal law amendment bill, Bill C-83. I cannot believe that the defects inherent in any system of gun control or gun owner licensing are not apparent to the government. I cannot believe that the government really believes in the effectiveness of gun control laws. Yet here we have what is in effect a new gun law mixed in with other measures which may be very effective in controlling crime. These include new provisions for the treatment of dangerous offenders, changes for the handling of prison inmates, provisions for establishing special crime inquiries by the provinces, amendments to the wire-tapping laws which might make them more effective in investigating organized crime, and some proposals for the prevention of crime.

I support most of these measures, as do many of my colleagues on this side. But I cannot support these new gun control provisions which establish a new gun law in Canada. In the circumstances, all these proposals being grouped together in this one bill, C-83, opposition to the bill means that one must oppose what may be very worthwhile measures to combat crime. Support for this bill means that one must support an unnecessary, unworkable, and ineffective gun law, which I am unable to do. I therefore support the proposal put forward by the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) calling for the gun control provisions to be separated from Bill C-83 and treated as a new law in a new bill.

In conclusion I say that the deviousness of the government on this legislation is totally unacceptable to our party. The gun control provisions are the major and fundamental part of this legislation. They cannot be treated as just another crime prevention measure. They constitute a major revision of the criminal laws of our country. Gun control is far too important an issue to be treated this way, in this bill, by this government. I urge that the proposal of the hon. member for Calgary North be considered and that the gun law amendments be severed from Bill C-83 and incorporated in a new bill. Only in this way can this House clearly and forthrightly address itself to such a serious and important issue, one which has so many profound implications for the operation of the criminal justice system in our nation.

[Mr. Masniuk.]

Mr. Ross Milne (Peel-Dufferin-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, on May 28 last year, it was my sad responsibility to rise and inform this House about the tragic shooting which had just occurred at Brampton Centennial high school in my riding. In a few brief, shocking moments two people were killed; one a teacher, the other a 17-year-old student. Thirteen other young people were wounded, some so seriously that they were to endure long and painful periods of recovery. Indeed some of them still bear and will continue to bear the indelible physical reminder of this ordeal. Finally and equally tragically, the troubled assailant turned his highpowered rifle on himself, adding his own name to the tragic toll of that afternoon.

That was a terrible time for the bereaved, a most difficult time for the injured, and an emotional time for the people of Brampton and the hundreds of thousands of Canadians who were shocked by the tragedy.

The Brampton tragedy and the later, equally tragic event in Ottawa served as a catalyst in the minds of citizens, police, and governments. It was felt that legislation must be forthcoming to deal more adequately with the increasing proliferation of guns, the rising crime rate involving guns, and the rising toll of domestic and domestic related gun killings.

● (2030)

Over 25,000 people in the Brampton area took the time and effort to drive to the local radio station to sign a petition in support of more effective gun control legislation. I am sure all members were in receipt of letters from all over Canada in support of effective gun legislation. Following the tragedy last July, the coroner's jury charged with the responsibility of investigating the shooting made the following recommendations. If I may, I would like to read them into the record. I quote:

(i) We recommend raising the legal age to 18 years before one can obtain a hunting licence.

(ii) We recommend raising the legal age for a minor's permit from 14 to 16 years of age to be used only in the accompaniment of a person holding a valid licence.

(iii) We recommend requiring the purchaser of a rifle or shotgun to firstly obtain a gun licence which must be produced prior to the purchase of the firearm.

This licence should be issued solely by police departments upon receipt of documents stating the applicant's reason for desiring the licence, training courses taken and a brief certificate of health. The application should be then subject to police approval.

(iv) We recommend that this same licence be produced upon the purchase of ammunition.

(v) We recommend that the vendor record the sale of all firearms and ammunition.

(vi) We recommend that all offences involving firearms come under the Criminal Code and be dealt with severely.

(vii) We recommend that all firearms currently in households be securely locked up within the home.

As I shall show later, it is exactly the spirit and content of these recommendations which the government seeks to put into law through Bill C-83. It is the same spirit, the same plea for action that underlines the words of Mr. Slinger, father of the 17 year old student who was shot at that school. If I may quote a couple of paragraphs from the letter he sent to the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) after the incident, they are:

> Violence is ever present in our society and the contributing factors to its apparent increase may be debated unendingly. Changes in standards and values, pressures of urban living and many other causes are cited, but surely permissive attitudes, which have been so favoured and so common in the last 20 years or so, must be a major contributor to the unacceptable social behaviour of some members of society today. These things cannot be changed quickly by any legislative action, but changes can be made in our laws governing all aspects of the use of firearms and ammunition, the results of which should reduce the use of such weapons in acts of violence, particularly by people who are not generally regarded as criminals.

I would very much like to thank and to congratulate the Solicitor General and the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford) for listening to these ideas and to the many other proposals put forth by myself and, I am sure, by most other members of the House. The result, in my opinion, is an excellent bill, one which deserves the support in principle of all hon. members from all parties in this House.

May I extend a particular and personal note of appreciation to the Solicitor General for the gracious and understanding way in which he discussed the tragedy and the need for remedial action with Mr. and Mrs. Slinger and members of their family. Their trip to Ottawa to discuss their feelings, to relive their experience, to share with officials and with the media the depth of their loss and their hopes for change, was indeed a courageous undertaking. I wish to congratulate them for their reasonable approach to the issue and also for their continuing leadership in this issue.

The need for action is clear. The Brampton incident, while unique in many aspects, is but symptomatic of growing and more general problems. Indeed it will interest the House to know that a teacher at Centennial High School, the same high school, after the tragedy did a survey of surrounding high schools. He found police records of seven other incidents involving guns in those schools.

The need for legislation is vividly demonstrated in the dimensions of the over-all national problem. If we check the period 1965-74 there has been a 115 per cent increase in crimes involving violence. Murder and manslaughter are up 115 per cent, rape 185 per cent, robbery 204 per cent, wounding and attempted murder, 183 per cent, and assaults 113 per cent. The most disturbing factor, however, has been the extent to which firearms have come to be used in crime.

Deaths caused by firearms in murders, suicides, and accidents are up 30 per cent since 1970. Suicide deaths involving guns are up 28 per cent. Guns are now used in over one third of all suicides. Last year 50 per cent of all murders were caused by firearms. Canada now has a gun homicide rate second only to that of the United States. In 1974 firearms were found to be used in two thirds of all armed robberies. The number of robberies involving guns is increasing at almost two times the rate of increase for robberies as a whole.

In fact if you take the first quarter statistics of 1974 versus the first quarter of 1975, armed robberies with firearms increased some 73.5 per cent, armed robberies with other weapons by 44 per cent, and armed robberies with or without weapons 40 per cent. Surely the root cause of these startling trends lies in the increasing number of firearms present in our society and in the proliferation of certain types of firearms which have no legitimate social purpose.

If we look at the inventory of guns we should all be concerned. The number of weapons owned by Canadians is increasing at a rate greater than the rate of growth in population. Over the short period from 1970 to 1974 the average increase has been 3.8 per cent in gun inventory and only 2.2 per cent in terms of population. Canadians are buying guns at the rate of 1,370 a day. In 1960 there was roughly one gun in Canada for every 2.6 Canadians. That is now roughly one for every two Canadians.

We often hear the comment that we hope we will not resemble American society. When you talk about the level of guns, the fact is we are almost a society like that. The United States has about .7 guns per person; Canada has about .5. It is true the United States has about five times more hand-guns per capita, but Canada has proportionately the same number of long guns.

It is an irrefutable conclusion that the rate and number of crimes committed involving firearms are intrinsically related to the availability of guns. When more and more guns are being purchased without stricter controls placed on their use, we can only expect that associated crime rates will continue to escalate. The government, however, can neither condone further increases nor condone the current unacceptable levels of gun related offences.

I am convinced that Bill C-83 will go a long way to reduce the crimes involving guns, to reduce the proliferation of guns where there is no legitimate use for them, and to help ensure that guns are bought only by people who will respect them and use them properly.

The bill sets out provisions that fulfil these three objectives well in terms of reducing crime. There is a proposal for higher maximum sentences for crimes involving offensive weapons, a mandatory one year term and up to 14 years to run consecutively where a person uses an offensive weapon while committing an indictable offence.

There has been a lot of controversy about the seizure of weapons. New authority has been granted to police to seize a weapon, without a warrant, where danger to safety of some person is likely and where obtaining a warrant is impractical. We can all recall reading in the newspapers of situations where this would have been very desirable.

In terms of proliferation of guns the move from a restricted and prohibited firearms class has been expanded to include formerly restricted fully automatic guns, sawed off guns, and "Saturday night specials". I do not happen to be one who believes that people should be collecting operative fully automotive machine-guns.

The tightening of control on restricted firearms is such that applicants would be required to justify the need for such a weapon before being granted a registration certificate. That is one of the key provisions put forward in this bill.

The recall program, again in terms of proliferation, is important. I am pleased that in both Brampton and Ottawa, where the two tragedies have occurred, police forces in both those municipalities are setting up a program so that people can bring guns to them and they will destroy them without any questions.

I do not need to pursue the provisions that will be or are set out for the licensing or legal responsibility. However, I think the legal responsibility is very important. Surely if a person owns a gun he should accept responsibility for the use of that gun while it is under his ownership.

I should like to conclude by making one or two comments concerning the objections raised by some hon. members and shared by sports clubs, rifle owners, and hunters. The basic argument they put forward is that there is really no need for Bill C-83 to involve long guns. When this question was previously discussed many people proposed that individual guns should be registered. Hon. members will note that the bill before us does not propose to follow this course. Instead, the people who own the guns are to be registered.

Many concerned citizens have written to me suggesting a central storage should be set up where all guns would be located; a person wanting to use his gun would have to go there to get it out, and return it there after use. Such a provision was not put into the bill, for good reason, nor was the extreme provision of making the ownership of firearms illegal. Some of the legitimate concerns felt by sportsmen and hunters have been answered inasmuch as those provisions I have mentioned are not in the bill.

The statistics with regard to the relationship between the use of long guns and crime are interesting. For instance, rifles are used in about two thirds of all domestic shootings, which indicates that the need for secure storage of such weapons within the home is important. Rifles were used in well over half of all murders committed between 1961 and 1974. Without doubt, rifles and shotguns are used in the majority of accidental shootings which occur. This would lead to the conclusion that to ignore the need to supervise the use and ownership of long barrelled weapons would be a failure to address ourselves to a large proportion of related incidents, particularly those of a passionate nature involving family, friends, and innocent bystanders. Rifle owners must accept responsibility to stem the misuse of their weapons; they must accept the requirement that all rifle and shotgun owners be duly licensed.

The provisions having to do with the confiscation of firearms will be set out in detail in the regulations. I know there are many who wish that all the regulations could somehow be incorporated into the bill. I do not think there need be any real concern on this score because any regulations which are published will have to go before the appropriate committee. This will provide an open forum at which anyone may review the progress which is made there.

I should also like to deal with the criticism that intervention by the government represents an unconscionable violation of civil liberties. I find it difficult to accept this proposition. I do not think any inherent legal right exists in common law in this country which guarantees free ownership of weapons. It is, however, an irrefutable responsibility of government to provide for the peace and security of citizens while respecting fundamental civil rights, and while providing equitable appeal procedures from any of its decisions or actions.

From the very beginning of this country's history we have always vested responsibility for personal and private security with the police forces. If anything disturbs me, it is the recent trend of people purchasing firearms for their own safety. The greatest hazard in following this practice is to the purchasers themselves, because I believe more people end up victims of gun incidents than would ever need to use them in the circumstances they have envisaged. I often wonder why sportsmen in the gun clubs do not show leadership in talking about gun safety and providing education in the use of guns. If there is any threat to their continuing ability to own guns it is simply the recent tide of public opinion against guns in private hands.

Many people are asking whether this legislation will be, or can be, effective. I would draw attention to the situation in Japan where the law, in effect, prohibits private gun ownership and prescribes a strict five-year penalty for possession. Last year in Japan, where there is a population of 100 million, there were 37 homicides involving the use of firearms. That is about equal to the number in Toronto last year, a city which has a population of about 2.5 million. So Japan has about 1/40th of the gun crime rate that Toronto has. I say this to back up my point that gun legislation can be effective in cutting down crime.

I conclude by calling on members in all parties to support the reference of this legislation to committee. I know there are many groups of people who wish to appear before the committee to express their points of view, and that is fine. But we ought to send the bill to committee as quickly as we can so that we can hear these various points of view and evaluate them thoroughly.

[Translation]

Mr. Charles-Eugène Dionne (Kamouraska): Mr. Speaker, the bill now under discussion recommends the adoption of legislation to provide better protection for the Canadian people against violent and other crimes. In the recommendation to the House I read provide that, quote:

to increase the number of members of the National Parole Board to not less than twenty-six members . . .

Like most legislation introduced in this House, this bill is worded in a very intricate way and if enacted, the implementation procedure would cause delays and hitches in the enforcement of the law.

We all know that many Canadian sportsmen who possess hunting-guns might be searched by officials empowered by law to do so, even if it could be proven that the firearms which they own are used only for shooting during the hunting season.

Obviously criminals will not bother to check whether their guns are registered or not when they decide to use them for any theft or crime. As a result of interviews with many people from my region, I found out they were far from being in favour of these new controls. For instance, a gun collector wrote me a letter dated March 22, 1976 after reading the provisions of Bill C-83 that I had given to him. Here is what he states in part:

> In every country where prohibitive laws have been enacted, they had the effect of reducing the people's freedoms to the advantage of those who could not care less about legal matters.

He adds that controls of this kind would create hardships for a large number of Canadian citizens, and he makes a comparison with the registration of motor vehicles, which does not prevent accidents. It would be more useful, he adds, to stop giving free publicity to criminals, and describing terrible crimes in newspapers, in movies and on television, which cannot but rouse already disturbed minds. He goes on to say that we had better enforce existing laws before drafting others that are still more ambiguous and with which anyway, those who do not abide by the present legislation would fail to comply. In his view, this kind of prohibition will have no effect whatsoever on criminals and he goes on to say that he has never heard of a criminal being arrested in possession of a gun registered in his name.

According to a booklet published by an association responsible for the guidance in the safe training in the use of firearms, I read the following passage which I believe appropriate to quote:

> We know that many politicians today prefer to blame the availability of firearms for the continuous rise in crime, rather than face the economic and social causes which are the roots of crime . . .

I insist on this: rather than face the economic and social causes which are the roots of crime, and I continue the quotation:

> . . . such as the failure of our penal system, the diminishing authority of our police forces, the moral and spiritual decline of our society and the general tolerating attitude prevailing today.
>
> We firmly believe that any gun enthusiast must comply with the law in a responsible manner when participating in these activities. Most firearm fans comply with the law and are prepared to conform with the normal legal restrictions allowing every citizen to use firearms in a responsible way.
>
> We know that the criminal disregards altogether any restriction about firearms.

● (2050)

Under present legislation, criminals can be severely punished, and so they should. Additional restrictions concerning firearms would only increase the pressure already imposed on the law-abiding owner of firearms. In my opinion, this is not the best way to protect the Canadian society against perpetrators of violent and other crimes.

A booklet published by the Law Reform Commission of Canada points out the problem of guilt by asking questions which call for consideration because, in some circumstances, guilt has to be determined. I quote a paragraph from this booklet:

> What does being guilty mean? Most people think a person is guilty of an offence only if he was wholly aware of what he was doing and that he knew it was an offence.

But this is not what the law says. Ignorance of the law is not an excuse but mistake of fact can be one.

For instance, a person accused of selling drugs is found guilty even if he or she ignored that the sale of drug was forbidden by law. But if that person thought he or she was selling something else, sugar for instance, he or she is not guilty. However, the mistake of fact is not always an excuse, especially for minor offences. In 90 per cent of offences where liability is strict, the mistake of fact is not an excuse.

Elsewhere in the booklet, the following question is asked:

> What is strict liability? Strict liability is a liability whether you are at fault or not. The motorist who runs through a stop is guilty even if he cannot see the sign, and so is the butcher who has tainted meat on his stall, even if he did not know the meat was tainted. Guilt therefore is not dependent upon fault.

I bet that a man would not be punished if he could prove that he was not at fault, that the stop sign was not visible, or that the meat deteriorated due to a power failure.

But according to the letter of the law, you should be found guilty. In fact there is a discrepancy between what is stated in the law and the way it is applied. But you could find even worse. The law is so complicated that you do not know when the responsibility is strict, nor do you know what the concept of strict responsibility means. However, each Canadian is likely to perpetrate about 40,000 of this type of strict responsibility offences, which make up about 90 per cent of our penal laws. Each year they account for 1,300,000 condemnations. One person out of 25 in Canada is condemned. This is a tremendous problem, especially when, on top of that, it is impossible to know what the law requires or what it prohibits.

This shows that I have very good reasons to insist that the laws and regulations should be written more clearly so that we may not be likely to condemn people who are not guilty at all.

I should like to make a few remarks on the subject of parole, a problem which is inevitably linked to the lives of the inmates in the penitentiary institutions of Canada.

Having had the opportunity to participate in discussions and work done in the committee which studied penitentiaries, I will say also that this participation gave me the advantage of a group visit to the St.Vincent de Paul penitentiary and the maximum security institution then being built in that area. I made interesting findings and got acquainted with all the responsibilities of those who are in charge of various correctional departments such as practical works, teaching, maintenance, supervising, cooking and clothing. I am not one of those who are prepared to admit that everything is perfect, that we have done all we could possibly do and that everything works wonderfully well. Indeed I would be in danger of being suddenly contradicted by various cases of rebellion and revolt which have already occurred in penitentiaries or cases of evasion which have enabled some reporters on the look out for sensational news to write reports which have contributed to promote the sale of their newspapers, not to mention some cartoonists who have shown in their usual style various ways to flood a rink without considering the weather when hoses are used for other purposes.

It is obvious that there is much room for improvement in the organization of our prisons in Canada and the matter is urgent. First we will have to acknowledge that the prime responsibility of the authorities of those establishments is to keep in their institutions the individuals committed to them and I am convinced that it is not always an easy task. In most cases, the prisoner does not resign himself to accepting a way of life dictated by circumstances. He spends 4/5th of his time looking for ways to escape.

Most are clever enough to invent evasion schemes that sometimes leave the best trained guards out on a limb. For this reason, what is needed is a well disciplined staff, constantly on the lookout. Among other various responsibilities, the people in charge of those institutions must find the most adequate means of using the different methods of rehabilitation, based on the prisoner's position, his background, his good and bad points, his abilities, his preferences. A period of observation must be very closely followed by well trained people. If the rehabilitation service is to produce the results that society can expect, a number of improvements are required, despite all the efforts to date.

There is in my view an essential factor as far as rehabilitation is concerned. That is inmate classification, inmate grouping in small units. The younger and newly admitted ones should not be allowed to remain in contact with the more hardened so they do not get to learn the tricks used by experienced criminals, to prepare while detained new procedures to fool those who enforce the peace that must be maintained in a civilized society. It seems to me this is one of the basic factors that should open a better approach to the rehabilitation exercise.

Inmate grouping in small units offers a means of noting psychological reactions between people who become familiar one with the other. The guards are in a much better position to observe them objectively, and inmates get a clearer perception of it.

Small units also are a very practical work tool when it comes to discussing a particular case. When a guard has to deal with a hundred or so people, he cannot observe and note individual behaviour. When, on the other hand, he knows a small group, he sees each person as a distinct individual. In this kind of situation he is in a better position to state the observed behaviour, to discuss its explanation and the ways to implement changes he feels are needed and useful. This may also help guards find out the nature of and rationale behind the sometimes constructive criticism of their own behaviour towards inmates. This helps them exercise a better control over themselves, to the point they sometimes can use their personal emotions to the benefit of inmates.

Guiding the discussion in such a way that under certain circumstances satisfactory results can be obtained, can replace to a large extent the formal study of psychological techniques many would like the guards to have. After proper schooling, the study of specific cases, added to practical experience, can become truly professional school training. Whoever heads it can give applied instruction.

I should like to say one word about the level of comfort in prisons: it is impossible to indicate, with mathematical precision, what degree of comfort should be given the prisoners. That degree cannot be set: it varies according to the society and time involved. For a prisoner, learning to live in normal comfort is an integral part of his rehabilitation. On the other hand, keeping him in an uncomfortable environment, to which scorn is at times added, can prevent him from becoming aware that he really has a chance of returning to normal life. That can be readily understood. Before going into captivity, the prisonner could resort to all sorts of pretexts to feel hated and rejected by society. During his detention, where he would be subjected to brutality, he would have a sort of proof that he is hated. So he would feel authorized to protect himself by hatred and on the first occasion he would be ready to defend himself with more boldness and personal assurance.

I believe that the inmates must have good food and enjoy facilities to maintain themselves properly. Each and every inmate must comply by health rules. In concluding, I want to say however that the inmates should not expect to enjoy all the advantages they would have if they led a normal life. Of course they are directly responsible for the restriction of their liberty and I think that we must pay more attention to their victims.

When we listen to some supporters of liberation, we tend to conclude that they pay more attention to the criminals than to their victims. We should not reverse the roles by taking into account circumstances which provoked irresponsible actions by some individuals who could not easily adjust to a normal existence.

In the summary for the Minister of Justice or second reading of Bill C-83, we find that there will be stiffer restrictions over temporary releases without escort. Also the detention period required before that privilege could be granted will be extended and the parole board rather than penitentiary authorities will be authorized to grant that privilege.

That is to prevent decisions from being taken too hastily and so avoid the presence in the community of an individual who could be a danger for the security of people who want to live peacefully in an organized society.

[English]

Mr. John Wise (Elgin): I appreciate the opportunity to address the House this evening on this very important matter, Mr. Speaker, namely, Bill C-83. Much has been said already about the controversial nature of this bill and many members have made worth-while contributions to the debate.

I was profoundly troubled at the opening of the debate on hearing the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford) say that crime is under control in Canada. Surely the minister speaks in jest. Crime has been on the increase in this country for several years now, both at the highly organized level among professional gangsters and also at the street level among many of our youth aspiring toward professional criminal careers.

What is especially disturbing to Canadians though, is not only the obvious increase in the crime rate but the violence with which the increasing amount of this crime is being committed.

The government has failed miserably to deal adequately with this very serious problem. If we are to take seriously some of the speeches from the government side of the House it has not yet fully recognized that crime is indeed a very serious problem. The government, realizing it has been unable to deal with crime effectively, chooses to underplay the fact of its very existence. That is an irresponsible and rather ridiculous attitude, and it is one that is condemned by members on this side of the House.

I waited in anxious anticipation for the introduction of this legislation with the mistaken thought that at long last the government was going to embark on a significant course toward protecting better the majority of Canada's law abiding citizens. Bill C-83 is a monumental disappointment to me. I had hoped for better.

The provisions of this bill do nothing to get at or eradicate the real causes of crime. There are no drug related provisions in the bill, for example, despite the fact that the drug trade is responsible for a higher percentage of crime in one form or another, and for criminal activity in Canada. The actual process of drug trafficking and numerous crimes of violence perpetrated by drug users in fact account for over half of the criminal activities in this country. Why is this problem not being attacked?

What answer does the Minister of Justice have to offer to the Canadian public for not guaranteeing their protection? He well knows that these insignificant changes in the law, such as gun control, are totally useless in face of such serious omissions as failure to deal with the drug problem.

I agree that legislation pertaining to dangerous offenders, bail reform, and rules of parole is certainly necessary, but what we have here is a series of regulations which, although not objectionable, are extremely limited in scope. If this legislation is a politically expedient attempt to appease an aroused public it may be moderately successful for as long as it takes the public to realize it has been had.

If by chance, this legislation should be truly aimed at the real maintenance of peace and security, as the government wants to call it, then I am afraid it is a dismal failure. Yet these appear to be the only changes that government is now prepared to offer. In that sense I could reluctantly support some of these provisions, not because they are worthy, but because the criminal situation is becoming so seriously acute that one must grasp at whatever straw of relief is offered, regardless of how lacking in substance it may be.

Despite its obvious shortcomings I could probably support this bill both in principle and in practice except for one glaring deficiency, that is, the complete unacceptability of the provisions relating to gun control. The control of guns is an extremely controversial and complex issue in much the same way as is the issue of capital punishment. Due to this complex nature of the gun control subject I feel that legislation in this regard should be dealt with separately, as is the legislation regarding capital punishment.

My point, Mr. Speaker, and the main thrust of my argument today is that, in order to deal with this so-called peace and security legislation effectively, the bill must be severed. I submit that the bill should not be read a second time but that the subject matter should be sent to committee in order to be severed—the gun control sections to be separated from the rest.

Were we able to deal with this matter apart from the rest, we could better debate and hopefully solve many of the difficulties inherent in the attempted legislative control of firearms. I strongly support the motion put forth by my colleague, the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams).

These provisions related to gun control have clearly been introduced in the name of short term political expediency. It is a sinister attempt to mislead the Canadian public into believing that the government is doing something about crime prevention when in fact it is doing nothing.

There has been and continues to be an outcry from the great majority of Canadians over the ever increasing trend toward murder and violence in this nation. Despite what the Minister of Justice may have to say, it is a known fact that crime is not under control in this country. There is nothing at all in this bill that attacks the root causes of crime, and too little in the way of effective punishment and restraint to give us any real hope that crime may be brought under some degree of control in the foreseeable future.

The government is now attempting to seduce the innocent populace into believing that it is moving in the area of crime prevention by its introduction of gun control. This is a sham argument. There will be no noticeable reduction of violent crime as a result of the measures proposed in Bill C-83. All that will result is another bureaucratic nightmare that serves no useful purpose other than to give the appearance of the government as a law enforcer.

The Canadian Association of Chiefs of Police has taken the position that gun control laws of the nature of those before us now can serve no worth-while purpose. Surely this association must be regarded as expert in this field. Why then has the government totally ignored its views on this matter? Who could possibly be in a better position to comment on the prevention of violent crime and the relative worth of laws affecting the control of firearms than an association of chiefs of police, men and women who all their working lives have been dealing with crime prevention and enforcement?

The problem as seen by the police chiefs is the number of violent crimes that are being committed and with which, wrongly or rightly, a firearm is being identified. There is no doubt that firearms have been involved in the commission of violent crime. It must not be forgotten that violent crime is also committed with knives, chains, hammers, axes, and lead pipes, to name but a few other instruments. There is no doubt there is an increasing concern by society about the nature, extent, and number of violent crimes. It would not be overstating the case to declare that many of society's members now have a feeling of being unsafe.

Three categories of crime that have been associated with violence and firearms have been identified by the police chiefs. One category deals with a socio-political movement associated with the manifestation of anti-establishment thinking that has accompanied the short or long drawn out process of government change. The second category deals with an element of society which will always choose to live off the avails of normal appetites, with minimum personal effort and with total disregard of its effects toward society. This is the category of crime for profit. The third category is, of course, the crime of passion, a usually violent act committed in a moment of passion or temporary insanity.

It is essential to note that in any of these categories those dedicated to the perpetration of crime will not or cannot submit to any law, and already disregard existing legislation. It is equally as fundamental to note that the gamut of violent crimes perpetrated for any of these reasons can be carried out just as easily without the benefit of firearms.

The real problem at hand is the high incidence of crime and the search for methods of reducing it. If this could be achieved by eliminating a weapon from the market, or more specifically in this case, requiring registration of its ownership, then this action would be supported. However, this action can be discarded as ineffective since violent crime can be committed with any number of weapons.

I would now like to focus my attention on another relevant aspect of this complex situation, and that is the role of our courts in the administration and enforcement of this proposed legislation on gun control. We all are aware that our courts are inadequately equipped to deal with the heavy caseloads that are before them now. If there is any one area within the system of Canadian justice that requires priority treatment it is the courts and the trial process. The delays in criminal proceedings from the time of a charge being laid to the ultimate disposition of a case are not only unnecessarily long but grossly unfair to the innocent, and much too favourable to the guilty.

If we are to have a criminal justice system that works effectively and is to be seen to work effectively, it must be a system that is able to handle cases with dispatch after charges are laid, and which will pass sentences or give decisions more rapidly than is the case at present.

I have the greatest respect for the members of the judiciary. In no way are my remarks to be seen as a reflection on their competence except that it is of a very high level. These honourable men and women who sit in judgment are overworked and stifled by a system that cries out to be corrected. The first priority of the government must be to encourage the provincial governments to bring about more uniform and more rapid reform to our legal processes.

The creation of new offences such as failure to license guns will only further encumber the courts and tax the already over burdened judicial system. Furthermore legal contests, particularly in the more serious offences, will inevitably add to the cost of the taxpayer and of the individual as a private citizen. I have grave reservations in this respect with regard to the clauses dealing with owner liability. I can envisage a countless number of non productive court cases tying up the legal processes for long and unnecessary periods of time because of this most contentious and ill thought out piece of legislation.

Having concentrated my efforts on the gun control aspects of this legislation, and I think successfully illustrated why it is inadequate and unacceptable, allow me to offer some constructive suggestions on the same subject. First, I restate my position that these provisions should be severed from the rest of the bill so that the gun control clauses may be dealt with more effectively. The bill cannot be properly debated in this manner due to its complexity, and adequate conclusions cannot possibly be reached.

However, with the limited means which are available to me and to my colleagues in the official opposition, I will attempt to impress upon the government some of the more useful approaches it could be taking with regard to the over-all issue of gun control and all its related ramifications.

[Mr. Wise.]

There are indeed clauses of this bill which indicate that the government intends to take a tougher stance against the perpetration of violent crime. However, these particular measures leave much to be desired if violent crime is to be substantially reduced.

Only recently a policeman was murdered and two hostages subsequantly taken in the city of Calgary by two men, both of whom were out on bail for alleged offences in the city of Vancouver. One of these men had been charged with murder, and the other with attempted murder. Public outrage has once again been expressed over this incident despite the alarming regularity with which such occurrences now take place, not only because another policeman has been shot down while attempting to do his duty in protecting innocent citizens, but also because his murderers were men already free on bail after being charged with serious offences. Registration of firearm ownership would have in no way prevented this tragedy.

I know that the government will say that those released on bail will soon not be permitted to purchase guns, but this will just be another of a continuing series of sham arguments on this subject. Violent men who are planning an armed robbery will secure firearms with a minimum of difficulty regardless of the rule, and every hon. member here knows it. What I am suggesting is that no bail be allowed for offences involving dangerous weapons where there is a previous record of violent crime.

I suggest too that guidelines be prepared in restricting somewhat the latitude allowed for the granting or denying of bail in the case of first offenders where it is obvious that the alleged offender is a potential danger to society. I realize that the inherent difficulty in this proposal is the criteria to be used in determining who is and who is not a potential danger, but surely some cases will offer obvious conclusions.

A bail hearing can differentiate between a case where the evidence is circumstantial and bail must be granted, and a case where reliable witnesses leave little doubt as to the violent nature of the accused. There will be instances where such distinctions are not clear, but that is what our honourable ladies and gentlemen of the bench are for. These decisions must remain in their hands, but some legal guidelines are desperately needed.

At this point I wish to make clear that I recognize the possible danger to the rights of the innocent in these proposals. It ties in with my previous argument, however, that the government is focusing on the wrong aspects of crime prevention and punishment. Were the court processes speeded up to an acceptable rate, it would be much easier to detain obviously violent offenders for a short period of time while awaiting trial. I quite agree that under the present ineffective system it does not seem practical or even desirable to remove such rights to bail from the accused.

With all these vital problems strangling our system of criminal justice and law enforcement, and the government reacting in its usual sluggish manner, it seems ludicrous that such useless and ineffective legislation as this gun control measure should be rammed down our throats by tying it in with the rest of Bill C-83 which, while weak in nature, is not without some merit, and with gun control removed could well be worthy of my support.

Mr. Robert Daudlin (Kent-Essex): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of my constituents of Kent-Essex and, I believe, on behalf of many Canadians ranging far from that constituency, I see in this bill the answer to what has been a public need, and indeed public demand for assurance that there will be protection from those who, for whatever reason, have decided to strike out against society and declare that they have no use for it, no use for the rights of individuals other than themselves, and would deny their co-citizens even the right to life.

Although I am quick to admit that the public is looking to this legislation to determine whether it supplies the assurance of protection it seeks, I am not one who is convinced that past legislation has been grossly lacking in that protection. Rather, I would want to satisfy myself that the bill does not go so far in an attempt to provide the trappings of public protection that, in the process, it denies many of the justifiable and lawful rights our citizens generally have been able to enjoy up to this point.

I might debate, and indeed agree, with some of my friends on the other side that the sheer size of this bill precludes in some small measure a meaningful intervention on all of its many facets. I would not, however, argue that that precludes a meaningful debate and that because of its size it should be broken up into many parts. Rather, I propose to limit my remarks, as others have done, and deal with perhaps two of the issues, gun control, and electronic surveillance.

In principle I am able to agree that the bill, including the measures in those two areas, will indeed have my support. These measures are aimed at strengthening the criminal law and its administration as it applies to crimes of violence. I view as laudable the objective of the measure regarding guns, which is stated to be the screening out of potential misusage, to restrict the general availability of guns without undue harassment of legitimate users for hunting and other sports, to enforce high standards in the safe keeping and proper use of firearms, and to discourage the use of firearms in the commission of crime.

I have no quarrel with the improvisation of a licensing system, as I see this as a far fairer and more productive system of gun control than that of registration of firearms, since it is obviously aimed at the individuals who would own and use guns as opposed to the actual weapons themselves.

The hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Darling) earlier this afternoon was speaking about break and entry thefts in his area, and he felt that even though proper precautions might be taken for the storage of guns, they would be taken when crime was committed. I suggest that in most cases people who break and enter cottages—as described by the hon. member—or a home or a place of business, break and enter not seeking guns but money or other valuables which might be sold. When they fall upon or come upon guns within those premises they use the opportunity, having found those guns, to take them away perhaps to sell or perhaps to use later. When describing this type of occurrence the hon. member suggested that the bill before us would be of absolutely no use whatsoever. Surely the hon. member cannot argue that any law prohibiting the use and ownership of guns is not a deterrent. I cannot agree with him.

● (2130)

Intentionally or accidentally, that hon. member described this legislation as legislation requiring the registration of guns. I think all hon. members present know that people confuse licensing with registration. Many Canadians fear that a registration system will be unproductive and create a bureaucracy. It is known that police forces, hunting associations, and other associations do not support the registration system. Calling this system a registration system is misnaming it. It is a misnomer. This is to be a licensing system, not a registration system, and can be likened to the system of licensing automobiles. I invite all hon. members to consider this bill in its true light, as a licensing system, and ignore the myth perpetrated on the public by the media to the effect that this is to be a registration system. They are different and should not be confused.

An hon. Member: There is to be licensing on what basis?

Mr. Daudlin: Mr. Speaker, obviously on the basis of competence to use a gun.

Mr. Towers: How can you say that?

Mr. Daudlin: I suggest that my hon. friend should look at the legislation.

Mr. Towers: Yes, but who will decide? Will the hon. member not say?

Mr. Daudlin: I believe that it is now well established that it is not the firearm in itself that is the culprit, but the man or the woman who holds it. I believe that there is an obligation on society as a whole to assure that individuals who would use firearms have the physical and mental capacity to use those weapons in a safe and a reasonable manner. Indeed, I would go so far as to say the the hunting and gun clubs in my riding have been champions of the rights of individual Canadian citizens who continue to enjoy the use of firearms for sport, be it target shooting or hunting or, indeed, the collecting of weapons. They were among the first to indicate that a fair licensing law which would have certain safeguards to assure that the licensing officials do not have too much uncontrolled and unobserved authority would be a good thing. Indeed they have offered their assistance in terms of providing training classes and instructors for the express purpose of providing the potential gun owner and handler with the necessary knowledge to handle a gun safely.

I am supporting this provision of the legislation which would propose to put up a licensing provision for firearms, while I would advocate that great care must be taken to assure that the administration of that sort of licensing must not be allowed to become so large and cumbersome that the cost thereof becomes in itself an undue burden for those who would legally pursue the ownership and use of firearms for sport and hunting.

Having said all that, I am concerned about particular subclauses of the bill dealing with gun control, beginning with proposed section 95(1) which reads:

Every one who sells, barters, gives, lends, transfers or delivers any firearm or ammunition to a person who is not the holder of a licence under which he may lawfully have in his possession firearms or ammunition

(a) is guilty of an indictable offence and is liable to imprisonment for two years, or

(b) is guilty of an offence punishable on summary conviction.

The intent of course of this particular provision is at first reasonable, apparently justifiable, and not too apparently onerous, given the thrust of the entire legislation. However, I ask hon. members to consider the occasion of a hunting foursome who agree to attend a given place at a given time in order to enjoy the sport of a rabbit shoot or a pheasant hunt.

A couple of hours and many shots later, one of the four, having expended all of his shells, requires of the other three the loan of some shells in order to complete the hunt with his friends. To complete the scenario, let us suppose that one shot later—the shot having been fired by the person who has just borrowed a shotgun shell—a lands and forest inspector appears on the scene and asks for the appropriate licences for hunting and possession of the guns and ammunition. Let us say he discovers that the individual to whom the ammunition was lent is not the holder of a valid licence lawfully to have in his possession firearms or ammunition, and an inquiry is made into the source of the ammunition. Subsequently it is determined that the ammunition was lent to the culprit by one of the party, who then is charged with an indictable offence or, at the very least, is charged upon summary conviction.

Surely this House would not agree that in setting up the licensing provisions for control of guns we must now make all hunters such as I have described inspectors of the legislation, bound under penalty to inquire whether an individual, friend or acquaintance has borrowed some ammunition. Surely it is not the intent to make them inspectors under the act. We cannot liken this to the licensing provisions of provinces for citizens to drive automobiles. Indeed ministers have themselves on occasion argued that licensing was preferable to registration; that gun licensing was reasonable upon the same basis as the licensing of automobiles. I ask you to consider for a moment whether any of the provincial licensing authorities of automobiles make it an offence to lend your automobile to an individual who is not licensed to drive.

As far as I am aware, it is not a provincial statutory offence or a criminal code offence to knowingly lend an automobile to a person who does not hold a licence. I agree that there are certain civil considerations that come into play, and certain statutory contractual provisions that come into play with respect to the insurance of a vehicle and the loss thereof as a result of an unlicensed driver operating it but we are certainly going a long way, perhaps too far, is suggesting that the individual who knowingly or unknowingly provides ammunition, as in the situation which I have described, is guilty of an indictable, or at the very least, summary conviction offence. I submit this particular provision of the legislation should at the very least require that the individual who lends the ammunition shall have knowledge that a person receiving the ammunition or the firearm is unlicensed; alternatively we should remove that particular provision completely.

I am not so greatly concerned with the individual who is in the business of providing firearms or ammunition, since I believe it is reasonable to expect in the course of a business that the seller shall require a licence to be produced before the ammunition is sold, bartered or transferred for monetary return. I do not believe that the same sort of conditions can be required of a movement of the ammunition and guns between friends.

Let me move on now to proposed section 103 dealing with seizure and forfeiture. The hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay), speaking on this bill just a few days ago, drew attention to proposed section 103. It deals with search without warrant of a person, vehicle, place or permises other than a dwelling house. A peace officer may seize anything by means of or in relation to which "he reasonably believes the offence is being committed or has been committed." This obviously deals with seizure by a police officer of any weapon, used or being used in the commission of an offence. Indeed the first part of the proposed section relates to restricted weapons or firearms, so that I believe the government's position is not so onerous as to be feared, as the police have now the right to seize weapons used in the commission of an offence.

I am more concerned, however, with proposed section 105(2), which now provides:

Where with respect to any person the peace officer is satisfied that there are reasonable grounds for believing that it is not desirable in the interests of the safety of that person, or of other persons, that that person should have in his possession, custody or control any firearm or other offensive weapon or any ammunition or explosive substance and that the danger to the safety of that person or other persons is such that to proceed by way of an application under subsection (1) would be impracticable, the peace officer may without warrant search for and seize any firearm or other offensive weapon or any ammunition or explosive substance in the possession, custody or control of that person.

● (2140)

I recognize that the case of the domestic quarrel upon which the police officer arrives, only to find himself staring down the barrel of a rifle or shotgun, is probably the classic case to which this particular provision will apply. I am concerned, however, that the well-intentioned police officer will now have the right, upon arriving at the scene of a domestic quarrel, whether or not a gun be in sight, to search and seize, regardless of what place and at what time, any and all offensive weapons, firearms, ammunition, etc., thereby putting the individual in a position where he must then make application to an appropriate court for the return of those guns or other articles, whether or not the officer had justifiable grounds for making the search and seizure.

I believe that this is an unjustifiable and unwarranted encroachment upon the individual rights and liberties of our citizens, by putting the subjective decision into the hands of individual police officers; it is in my view overreaction to this admitted problem which has been faced by our law enforcement officers for some time.

I was interested in listening this afternoon to the hon. member for Elgin (Mr. Wise). He said that this bill did not address itself to the real causes of crime. When I listened to him he seemed to say that he would relate the real causes of crime to drugs and the use thereof. He seemed to imply that gun control measures were useless. In fact I believe he went so far as to say they were useless. To argue in that manner is to argue that there is no deterrent effect to any law passed by this House. I really cannot accept that premise.

It may appear to us here that it is impossible to place into the Criminal Code methods of dealing with root causes of crime. However, I suggest to that hon. member, and to the chiefs of police association to which he referred, that what they should not be attempting is to correct, amend or change this legislation through the media or by writing letters. We should be challenging those individuals, be it the chiefs of police, gun control lobbyists hunting clubs or gun collectors, as well as encouraging and inviting them to appear before the committee to state those changes that they see as necessary to this legislation. That, of course, cannot be done until this House puts the legislation before the committee so it can be dealt with there. Therefore I encourage all members to send this legislation on to the committee as quickly as possible.

The hon. member for Elgin described this legislation as being a registration. I suggest to him, as I suggested with relation to the comments made by the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Darling), that it is a misnomer to suggest registration. We are not registering guns, we are not registering owners. We are licensing individuals to possess a firearm.

I suggest there is a deterrent effect. There is the ability to determine whether the individual is the type of person who should or should not have the use of a firearm. There are certain deterrent effects as a result of the imposition of fines and so on if you do not comply with the regulations. To argue it is ineffectual is to argue there is no deterrent effect in legislation. If we argue that, surely we argue that the entire Criminal Code has no effect.

I would now wish to deal very briefly with the subject of electronic eavesdropping or wiretapping and I believe, shortly put, I would argue in the same manner as the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville (Mr. MacGuigan) when he states his concern that the proposed provisions would allow a judge to defer giving notice on the basis of a continuing suspicion when an investigation has, for all intents and purposes, concluded. I, like that hon. member, have substantial reservations about allowing notice to be deferred when we are only proceeding on the basis of continuing suspicion and when the investigation has actually finished.

Members have spoken of the need to balance various and competing factors, the need to protect individual privacy on the one hand and the ability by police to pursue organized crime. In reading the provisions of the bill regarding electronic eavesdropping I am concerned that we not undo some of the best features of the protection of privacy act. I am not convinced, Mr. Speaker, that the power given by parliament in 1973 to the judges to admit secondary evidence has not been working. I fully support the admissability of derivative evidence within the confines of judicial supervision. Such supervision guarantees a rather healthy tension and a proper balance between the right to privacy and the ability to pursue crime.

The hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka made a rather interesting comment today when he spoke of wiretaps. He suggested they appear to be O.K., particularly to those in rural areas who are used to party lines. He spoke of the acceptability of wiretapping, provided it was judicially done and there was consent of the court. He spoke about reasonable length of time and notice being given. I suggest there is a grave concern with which we must look at this legislation, that is, whether in attempting to give police officers increased ability to tap we do not in fact encroach upon the individual rights of citizens to which they are entitled.

In summing up, I am supportive of whatever measures we can reasonably provide to our police and criminal investigative forces while simultaneously assuring the individual of the right to privacy. I would be most zealous in not providing officers of the law with the legal wherewithal to erode the rights of individuals. I believe that this legislation brings with it the substantial potential for what might broadly be termed illegal wiretapping by that element of society which is supposed to be protecting us from criminals. If we cannot be assured that wiretapping is to be done and if in fact it is being done, without taking advantage of us, our position would be untenable.

The minister has made it clear that he is prepared to listen attentively and with an open mind to the submissions which are to be made with respect to this bill in committee, in the House, and I anticipate participating further in the ensuing debate that takes place in committee. May I once again suggest and invite hon. members to ensure that this piece of legislation is made available to the committee as soon as possible.

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, in rising to speak on Bill C-83 we are dealing with a quite emotional subject, with varying beliefs held by citizens, one point of view being to the effect that if there were no guns at all, crime would vanish, and the other point of view being that if guns are controlled, crimes with violence will increase because the criminal element will have the ability to procure guns and law-abiding citizens will have no means to contest the criminal.

It seems as though reports and statistics on murders are based on overstated opinion and overworked emotions. At one end of the interest groups are individuals and lobbies taking the position that stricker gun legislation would have the effect of augmenting the crime rate. Some people at this end of the scale even suggest that the forced registration of all guns would weaken the public and make it the target for violent criminal activity. In the United States this group has gone so far as to form a strong lobby to uphold the second amendment of the U.S. constitution:

● (2150)

A well-regulated militia being necessary to the security of a free state, the right of the people to keep and bear arms shall not be infringed.

At the opposite end of the scale is a group which proposes stricter gun control legislation. Its members base their stand on a belief that tighter legislation would make it almost impossible for a criminal to purchase a gun to use in committing a crime. The fact is that legislation or none, a criminal will obtain any weapon he desires.

To cover the issue of gun control legislation fully we must look at the cause of increased violence and the relationship between that increased violence and the use of firearms. It might be advantageous to examine some of the factors on the basis of which we, as legislators, are now called upon to make decisions. It has been estimated that there are upwards of eight million guns in Canada. Most of the owners of these firearms, probably 99 per cent, use their weapons properly, are law-abiding people, and deplore as much as anyone the use of firearms in crimes. Mass ownership of firearms is certainly not a major cause of increased violence.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

A message was delivered by the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, as follows:

Mr. Speaker, the Honourable the Deputy Governor General desires the immediate attendance of this honourable House in the chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly, Mr. Speaker with the House went up to the Senate chamber.

And being returned:

Mr. Speaker informed the House that the Deputy Governor General had been pleased to give, in Her Majesty's name, the Royal Assent to the following bills:

Bill C-90, Appropriation Act No. 1, 1976.—Chapter No. 89.

Bill C-91. Appropriation Act No. 2, 1976.—Chapter No. 90.

Bill C-85, An Act respecting immigration security.—Chapter No. 91.

Bill C-86, An Act to amend the Veterans Insurance Act and the Returned Soldiers' Insurance Act.—Chapter No. 92.

Bill C-71, An Act to amend the Criminal Code and to make related amendments to the Crown Liability Act, the Immigration Act and the Parole Act.—Chapter No. 93.

Bill S-10, An Act to amend the Feeds Act.—Chapter No. 94.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

HEALTH—MEASURES TO ENSURE ADEQUATE SUPPLY OF SWINE FLU VACCINE—CONSULTATIONS WITH PROVINCIAL MINISTERS

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to see the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) in the House tonight, and to be honoured by his presence. I also want to congratulate him on the speed with which he moved after I drew this matter to his attention last week. His attitude has changed altogether since then, and I can understand why it would, because apparently he did not have many of the facts or the report from the fellows who went down to Washington and met with the U.S. president.

I should like to say a few words about this virus infection and make one or two observations about the minister's announcement. First of all, people are asking what this swine flu is. It is an acute respiratory infection that affects up to 40 per cent or more of the population with headaches, aches, and pains generally in the same area as with other flu viruses. It can swing from the respiratory field to the gastro-intestinal field by mutation. It will keep some individuals away from work for a month or more. If the individual develops pneumonia it is a bacterial pneumonia, or a bronchial pneumonia which can be cleared up with antibiotics. The individual can get a pneumonia which can last from one to two months. As an example we have the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) whom I see sitting down there in the House. He had this viral infection and he can tell you how it makes you feel, and how draggy you become.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I didn't lose a day, though.

Mr. Rynard: The first influenza vaccine was manufactured during the second world war. It is interesting to note that the fellow who worked on that was Jonas Salk who later on developed the polio vaccine. He is now in charge of the Salk Institute doing virological work in San Diego, California. According to reports he has stated very definitely that there is need for mass vaccination.

I want to say to the minister that he is absolutely wrong when he separates the population by age groups. That cannot be done effectively, because you can vaccinate three or four in one household, with two or three not vaccinated. They will bring the disease in and give it to the others if the virus is strong enough. You only get a certain degree of immunity from vaccination, up to 80 per cent. That is why this is wrong. That is why Jonas Salk said that mass vaccinations must be carried out, and he urges speed in this regard.

The swine virus vaccination has a very short incubation period of from 12 to 36 hours, and spreads very rapidly. If it goes according to plan in the next year this will flair up and we will probably have an epidemic.

One interesting thing is that the flu virus is made up of several parts—up to eight. Those parts shuffle around in a process called mutation and form a new strain. Hong Kong flu in 1968 was the last major outbreak. It could be back in the process again recycling itself in 1978. You do not get immunity to virus flu as you do to measles because it mutates like musical chairs. That is why it is very difficult to keep it under control. The virus hides in the body.

I remember after the 1918 flu epidemic, about 1925 and into the 1930's, we saw many cases of people no older than the minister himself contracting Parkinson's disease as a result of the Spanish flu. We believe the virus can hide in the cells of the brain and hide elsewhere in the body, and that it may cause degenerative diseases and cancer. It is one of the diseases we have never been able to control.

It is interesting to note that the first real evidence of virus appeared in 1610. There were two severe outbreaks in Canada in 1889 and 1918. It is a killer disease, and speedy. It is necessary to utilize all the facilities and to have the total manufacturing output of vaccine under scrupulous care. I am certain that if the vaccination were carried out for all viruses it would cut millions of dollars from our health care costs.

I visited a home the other day, Mr. Speaker, and I should like the minister to listen to this. There were 15 deaths there and none of the patients had been vaccinated. I think the minister should keep that in mind.

The common viruses are A, B, and Victoria. I believe the latter killed about 250,000 people in New Guinea. In the United States they have achieved up to 80 per cent immunity through vaccination. The incubation period is between 12 and 24 hours. It is the scourge of mankind and, as I say, we have never been able to control it. As the minister said, we have got to the point where the only way we can settle this is by total vaccination. With Spanish flu there were 50 million infected and 20 million died. Vaccination would take away some of the fear.

I hope the minister has been in touch with the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) about eggs. I am sure he has and I am sure he will get lots of eggs. He must also have the rooster, however, because the eggs have to be fertilized before the virus is injected. When the virus is drawn off it is killed by formalin and then it is ready to inject.

The minister said today that there would be immunity within two or three weeks, but I want to tell him that I have never known this to be the case with a virus vaccine. He may be right, but I wish he would question that point. In the vaccines we have used to date the two shots are given two months apart, and once a year thereafter.

The minister has taken a step in the right direction but I want to prod him tonight to make it universal and in a hurry. He told us that the vaccine costs only 75 cents per person. Mr. Speaker, there is no way a doctor can collect $6 for giving the injection when, under OHIP, his fee is perhaps $3. Even at $3 or $4 it is the cheapest insurance we can buy—even if there is not an outbreak.

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Rynard) for his comments. Not having the privilege of being a medical doctor myself I always attach a lot of importance to his views. He has had a long experience and expertise in the practice of medicine.

I regret that the hon. member was unavoidably absent yesterday and today when we debated the quarantine bill and discussed the announcement on the vaccination, but I am pleased he could be in the House tonight. I made a point of being here to listen to his views.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lalonde: With regard to the suggestion about mass innoculation, I remind the hon. member that I have acted and my department has acted upon the advice of the national advisory committee which is regrouping the best epidemiologists in the country, and we have tried to get the best scientific advice available in this country. We have decided to follow the recommendation of the national advisory committee to the letter. If it can be established that this advisory committee did not go far enough or was wrong, we will certainly be very happy to review the situation, but in the meantime I obviously must rely on what is considered to be the unanimous opinion of the people we consider the most knowledgeable in this field in Canada at the present time.

As I said this afternoon, we are in close touch with United States authorities, the United Kingdom, the World Health Organization, and the centre in London, England, on this subject, and there is to be a special meeting called by the WHO on April 8. Canada will be represented at that meeting, and I am sure we will follow the situation very closely. Any change in the proposed action will be communicated to the House, and particularly to the hon. member with great pleasure.

AGRICULTURE—PROPOSED ELIMINATION OF TRANSPORT SUBSIDY ON FLOUR TO EAST COAST PORTS—ALLEGED CONFLICT IN MINISTER'S STATEMENTS

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): Mr. Speaker, now that the deputy vice regal pen has put the deputy vice regal ink to the interim supply bill—otherwise known as an act for the relief of the Bank of Montreal, Wellington Street division in the city of Ottawa—we may now turn back to a serious state of affairs which will occur unless we in the opposition are able to head it off later this year. That issue is the removal of the flour and grain movement subsidies or rail subsidies under section 272 of the Railway Act. This is not the first time I have raised this matter here. This is probably its second and perhaps third appearance on the late show. I leapfrog with the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski) on this important issue. We are the east and west twins trying to co-ordinate efforts by a great number of Canadians on what I think is an important issue because it affects the export life and the port life of this country.

Before the end of the year I hope that we will have persuaded members of parliament from Montreal that—believe it or not—their port is greatly affected by what Bill C-87 proposes. I hope the hon. member for Saint John-Lancaster (Mr. Landers) will interest himself in the issue because there are many dozens of jobs in his own port and millions of dollars at stake in the future.

I have the support of my hon. colleagues from the Halifax area. As a matter of fact, they deputed this job to me.

I can tell the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Chrétien), when he brings in his restraint bill, that he has to pilot it through parliament, and it has to be passed before section 272 of the Railway Act is gone and the subsidies are gone. There will be many more than the hon. member for Vegreville and myself who will be taking part in this battle. The minister will know what full scale and total war is all about.

Bill C-87 will affect port life and the flour and grain operations of the three eastern Canadian ports. I pointed out last week, and the hon. member for Vegreville pointed out last night, that the milling industry in Canada and the miller, who was much esteemed in medieval times, are becoming part of the dodo legend because big companies are simply taking over their operations, and small milling operations are starting to dry up in Canada.

The measure which is proposed by the government will not do anything to reverse that rather tragic process. However, as I say, until the repeal of section 272 of the Railway Act, the subsidies will remain. I ventured to suggest to the President of the Treasury Board, when we discussed this last night in the miscellaneous estimates committee, that we might enjoy each other's company until Christmas at least.

● (2220)

I ask for the support of Montreal members on this issue, and for the support of the hon. member for Saint John-Lancaster. I am sure he has been working behind the scenes. Sometimes conditions are so desperate that even government members must creep out from behind the curtains and involve themselves in debate on the floor of this House. After all, this is where the action should take place and where the hon. member's voters expect the action to occur.

I request the support of others when this bill comes before the House. I particularly request the support of those hon. members in whose constituencies there are flour mills. I ask them to talk on this important issue. I request the support of western members of parliament in whose constituencies grain is grown. I hope they too will discuss this issue.

I request the support of all who think of Canada as one country in which not only the more fortunate, central parts should receive economic benefits. The area I represent was good enough to serve, as it were, as the front line trench in two world wars. Our people were happy to see Halifax in that position. I think we should also be allowed the benefits of peacetime prosperity.

I wish the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) were here this evening. Sometimes in his homespun way he has a knack for shedding light, good sense, and reason on a subject. I must say that if I had to choose between running to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) or to the Minister of Agriculture, to talk about some crippling injuries, I would be more apt to talk to the Minister of Agriculture and ask for his help. I hoped he would be here this evening.

I suggest that the government's proposal will lead to the ruination of our industry because the transport subsidy is to be swept away. It will either bring about the ruination of our industry, or the "rumination" of agriculture. I say this as the Minister of Agriculture, God bless him, said that studies were being carried on. Perhaps my question involves the most elaborate Latin based pun this House has heard for at least a couple of dozen years. It will be "ruination or rumination".

Are we depending on studies now under way in the Department of Agriculture? If so, what instruction has been given to those carrying out the studies? Will they lead to meaningful action for dealing with a pretty serious problem, one that, as I said a week ago, has ramifications involving $100 million of Canadian economic activity?

Finally, let me ask this: as the Minister of Agriculture has spoken of studies by the Department of Agriculture, should not those studies have come first, and government policy afterwards? Could not the studies have pointed to some method of substituting something for a model program inaugurated by the government of the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) in 1960, and carried on and modified successfully by programs put forward by another prime minister, the late Mr. Pearson?

[Mr. McCleave.]

I ask these questions and am sorry that the Minister of Agriculture is not here to answer. It seems to me that somehow the late show becomes a little debased when answers are put in the hands of people to be read and no meaningful action is taken. I say that sincerely and with regret to the hon. gentleman opposite who, I am sure, is going to answer.

[Translation]

Mr. Irénée Pelletier (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I answered last evening the question just put by the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants (Mr. McCleave). I would like to add that I will convey to the minister the flattering remarks that were made.

I must also apologize for the minister. He is unable to be in the House this evening because, as we are aware, tomorrow he must announce the dairy policy for next year. He is now attending a meeting, and probably at midnight he will still be discussing the dairy policy to be announced tomorrow. Mr. Speaker, I agree with the hon. member. The fact that we already had to answer three questions on the late show concerning the problem raised by the hon. member tends to show how important the matter is.

Since I had to answer it yesterday and the answer has not substantially changed today, I give him yesterday's answer. Hopefully the hon. member will understand that as parliamentary secretary, I must transmit the answers given by the department. I know the minister considered the matter quite thoroughly and he may be in a better position to answer it tomorrow, with a somewhat better knowledge of the question, because he is now involved in the milk problem.

Mr. Speaker, I have no further answer than the one I gave yesterday. At the start, rates to that point or east of that point were intended, among other things, to maintain the competitive position of Canadian exports relative to those of the United States. The American rates have increased substantially since then, and it now seems it would be preferable to have in Canada a totally compensatory level of subsidy. However, since the subsidy has been in force for some time already, its cancellation will require some degree of adaptation for flour exporters.

As the Minister of Agriculture said, most countries try to mill their own wheat. To the extent that Canada tries to replace part of its flour exports by wheat exports, we therefore did not lose those markets. The world export markets of inferior quality flour subsidized by the European Economic Community is taking over an increasingly large part of the world market. In spite of considerable activity on the part of the PL480, even American sales have considerably diminished in recent years.

Canadian flour exports can be broken up in three categories: first, commercial exports, second, government exports, and third, Russian-Cuban exports. As we know, most of our sales are to Cuba. The removal of the subsidy will not affect these sales in 1976. On the long term, it is expected that Cuba will mill an increasing part of its wheat. In the meantime, the government will continue its efforts to keep this market.

Commercial sales and sales to the Canadian government made up the rest of our flour exports, or about 25 per cent.

Sales to the government will probably remain at their present level, whatever happens to the subsidy. Commercial sales could be affected. However, the National Association of Canadian Millers was unable to convince us of the importance of these consequences. The Department of Agriculture is keeping a close eye on the situation and if other developments occur, it will take the necessary action.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION—REQUEST FOR MORE LOCAL PROGRAMMING—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock): Mr. Speaker, on March 23 I brought to the attention of the Secretary of State (Mr. Faulkner) the growing concern across Canada regarding the centralization policy of the CBC. I asked him whether there would be a re-evaluation of that program to allow greater latitude for local programs within the Corporation. The Secretary of State answered with his usual cynical and bombastic brevity, which is the last refuge of the insecure and inept and incompetent. He said, "Does the hon. member not know that we have just finished putting up a brand new building in Vancouver and are planning one for Regina?"

● (2230)

I came across a statement made by the president of the CBC which reads as follows—this is with regard to culture: "That is what the CBC is all about—interpreting Canada to Canadians and contributing to their cultural vitality". That is both encouraging and disturbing. It is encouraging if it means the broad exposure of the various elements which make up Canadian society, that is, the ethnic, cultural, economic, and other factors which compose our society, to other segments of Canadian life. Let the people speak for themselves; let them be exposed to every other sector of the country, and let the audiences see and hear. This ought to be the objective of the corporation, and if this is the goal of the CBC and of its president, it is encouraging. It is discouraging if it means that a few elitist directors and producers in Toronto are to decide what we can see and hear.

I would bring to your attention, Mr. Speaker, a statement made by Mr. Gordon Hill, the President of the Ontario Federation of Agriculture, with regard to the cutting back of the program Radio Noon to 15 minutes from the former length of one hour. He said:

> We are tired of the fooling around by the top brass of the CBC who have allowed the citizen-owned radio and television networks to become a hive of protest for anarchists.

It seems it is the goal of the top echelon of the CBC to replace what in their estimation is the mundane and the ordinary with what is culturally proper. Maybe the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation ought to be renamed the Toronto Broadcasting Corporation.

Recently I received a letter from a farm broadcaster in the prairies who is concerned that they are losing their broadcasts there. As one writer put it, producers who want to put out programs must crawl on their bellies in Toronto; sometimes they get something, but more often they don't.

Those responsible for regional programs are continually being harassed either by interference or by being placed on a pauper's budget. For example, a program on the West Coast called "Klahanie," which is a nature program well received by the public, gets a budget of $2,000. Take the case of "The Beachcombers." Toronto writers are always being foisted on that program in the west, and old John Hirsch in Toronto wants to give that story an editor from Toronto. He even wants to bring in casting from Toronto for that totally British Columbia region program. The final disgrace is that as of April 1, 1977, British Columbia will no longer have a regionally-produced 10 p.m. regional news hour. That will come from Toronto, too. Toronto knows best.

I am sure the Secretary of State has heard of the British Columbia Committee for CBC Reform which has recently been established by friends of the corporation, people who believe in the system, who like what it has done in the past but who are fearful of the trend which is developing.

The people who belong to this organization are not red-eyed radicals but responsible Canadians, and for the edification of the parliamentary secretary who is here on behalf of the Secretary of State I should like to read a few of the names of members of that committee, to mention, for example, Barry Broadfoot, of whom, I am sure, many hon. members have heard. Then there is Roderick Haig-Brown, a writer and naturalist of Campbell River; Barry Leach, director of environmental studies of the Douglas College, New Westminster; Dorothy Livesay, a well-known writer from Victoria; Grace MacInnis, a former member of parliament and supporter of the CBC; Ian McTaggart-Cowan, professor and consultant of Vancouver; Robin Skelton, writer and editor of the Malahat Review, Victoria; Simon Streatfeild, of North Vancouver, a conductor who is very well known in music circles in Vancouver; Victor White, who is director, special projects, of the Vancouver Symphony Orchestra.

These people are not the red-eyed radicals usually associated with protests; they are people concerned about the direction being taken by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. They have succeeded in their work. You can call it local colour if you will, but it is legitimate local colour.

Let me come back to the minister's answer. He said:

> One of the more significant things the corporation has done in the last two years has been to decentralize, and this is manifest by new buildings in Vancouver—

Where in the world did he ever get the idea to decentralize an operation by putting up a new building? Surely even this naive minister ought to understand that the heart of any broadcasting system lies in the producers, the directors, and the casting of each of the individual programs. To think that a new building will fill that role shows the naiveté of this minister.

I challenge him to re-evaluate this "divine aegis" of the members of the staff in Toronto and to let some of the people from the regions act with the wisdom that is inherent in those regions. Let them project some of the idioms, colour and idiosyncracies, values and concerns, of the localities, and let the people of Canada know what they are.

Miss Coline Campbell (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I am informed by the CBC that it is erroneous to say that the CBC is encouraging centralization of production. If it were so, the CBC would not have built a multi-million dollar broadcast centre in Vancouver; it would not be building new production facilities in Calgary; and it would not be planning to build a new production centre in Regina-Moose Jaw. In the next four to five years the CBC will spend $128 million to improve its production facilities outside of Toronto and Montreal. This is all being done in order to improve and increase regional and local programs and to increase regional participation in network programming.

Because of the availability of the CBC's new B.C. broadcast centre, for example, it is planned to increase the production of network television programs in Vancouver from 175.5 hours per year in 1975-76 to 208.5 hours in 1976-77. Local and regional activity can be examined from the point of view of broadcast hours and contribution to the network schedule. The figures for broadcast hours per week on the English AM radio network of the CBC show that 40 per cent of the hours of programming in the schedules of most CBC AM radio stations is local and regional.

The complexity of television is such that it is a much more expensive medium than radio, and requires less flexible scheduling with fewer local periods. Nevertheless, local and regional programming time on CBC English language television stations varies from 18 per cent to 35 per cent of the telecast time per annum of the stations, not all of which, it must be admitted, can be employed for locally produced programs, and this for reasons of budget only.

As for the contribution of CBC owned and operated stations to the national networks, in radio the percentage of network programming from all regions of Canada to the CBC English AM radio network is 44 per cent and in the case of FM radio it is 59 per cent.

In English television an analysis made for the fiscal year 1973-74 showed that the percentage of network programs produced outside of Toronto, including program inserts, came to 32.3 per cent.

In addition, the CBC has for many years encouraged the exchange of local programs between stations and the effect of this exchange is to discourage centralization. In 1975, for example, 79 episodes of four local television series produced in British Columbia were seen on up to 15 other stations across Canada. Conversely, 169 episodes from 15 locations other than Toronto were seen in British Columbia.

● (2240)

In the light of the size and diversity of Canada much has been accomplished, but further decentralization of programming, particularly in the complex and expensive medium of television, can only be accomplished with the availability of more money to be spent on Canadian talent. The CBC is endeavouring to encourage and develop talent in all parts of Canada. If more money were available for the production of quality programs, regional studios could—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please—

Miss Campbell: Mr. Speaker, I know that my time has expired. However, I should just like to say to the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock (Mr. Friesen) that anything further he would like to say on this he can bring to the standing committee when the estimates—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I must interrupt the hon. parliamentary secretary as her allotted time has expired.

PROPOSED COMMITTEE STUDY OF INCREASED COST OF ELECTRICITY IN ATLANTIC PROVINCES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. My motion is prompted by the incredible increase in electric power costs to the Maritime consumer and the callous attitude of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie) to the plight of those who are literally being forced to sell their homes because of this punishing escalation in heating costs. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stanfield):

That this House directs the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works to make a full inquiry into the situation concerning the rapid escalation of electric heating costs to Maritime consumers, and that in the course of these investigations the premiers of the Maritime provinces be invited to give evidence.

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for such motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

SUGGESTED CANCELLATION OF CONTRACT TO PURCHASE LOCKHEED "ORION"—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Considering that the financial position of the Lockheed Corporation is dangerously precarious and considering also that the risks to Canadian taxpayers are immense if the Government of Canada proceeds with its intention to purchase Lockheed Orion aircraft, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That this House instructs the government to cancel an earlier multi-million dollar decision to purchase the said aircraft.

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent, pursuant to Standing Order 43?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

NATIONAL HARBOURS BOARD

REQUEST FOR TABLING OF CORRESPONDENCE RELATING TO RESIGNATION OF MR. GUY BEAUDET—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, I wish to move, pursuant to Standing Order 43, a motion of considerable concern to the ports and shipping communities of Canada. The prospects of the loss of the vice-president of the National Harbours Board and the more than 25 years of service to shipping interests, coupled with the impairment of the National Harbours Board capacity to function in its financial responsibilities in a legal fashion with the resulting problems this will pose for virtually all ports in Canada, give rise to the need for information. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay):

That this House direct the government and particularly the Minister of Transport to forthwith table all correspondence between the Deputy Minister of Transport, the Minister of Transport and any other responsible minister and Mr. Guy Beaudet, leading up to his resignation so that the Canadian people will understand the reasons for this sudden and debilitating loss and that the minister take the first opportunity, later today, to advise this House on motions of the reasons behind this resignation, and of this government's intentions regarding further and necessary appointments to the National Harbours Board.

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 43, the motion must have unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

REQUEST FOR TABLING OF REPORTS ON MERCURY IN FISH—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43, I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion on a matter of pressing and urgent necessity.

Considering that the federal government, through its Department of the Environment, made in its own laboratories analyses on the mercury content of various species of fish from several areas in Quebec and that the Department of the Environment and the Quebec Department of Tourism, Fish and Game can be held responsible for not having made the results public while these indicate, according to some information, that in many cases the fish analyzed contained more than .5 ppm of methyl mercury, which is the limit beyond which the fish become unsuitable for human consumption, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Gauthier):

That the House discuss this matter forthwith and order the Department of the Environment to table all relevant reports they have concerning these analyses.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the terms of the motion of the hon. member. Under the provisions of Standing Order 43, the motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: As there is not unanimous consent, the motion cannot be put.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

POSSIBILITY OF PURCHASING OTHER AIRCRAFT THAN THE "ORION"—VISITS OF REISMAN AND GRANDY TO OFFICE OF GENERAL ALLAN

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence. Several constructive suggestions have been made by the opposition concerning the replacement for the Argus. On each occasion the minister claimed that he was considering several options. Can the minister assure us now that he has kept those options open and that next week, if the cabinet has rejected his choice and if he is still in a position of authority, he will move speedily for cabinet approval of one of the other options?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I thought the hon. member knew the rules well enough to refrain from asking me something hypothetical, if the cabinet does something next week.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. McKinnon: Mr. Speaker, I hope the minister has kept his options open and I wish he would take us into his confidence to the extent of assuring the country that he intends to replace the Argus aircraft. Is the minister aware of any visits made by Reisman and Grandy to the office of General Allen, and can he inform the House of the purpose of such visits or a visit by these Lockheed consultants, bearing in mind that Reisman and Grandy and the minister have denied any lobbying type of activity or any representation made to government officials by Lockheed?

Mr. Richardson: Mr. Speaker, in response to the first part of the question, it is of course our intention to have new equipment for the Canadian armed forces and to meet our commitment to NATO. We are in the process of trying to do that in the acquisition of a long range patrol aircraft.

[Mr. Beaudoin.]

Until we have fully exhausted all of the attempts to achieve that which is the right purchase for the Canadian armed forces, we are not trying to look at alternatives. We spent several years looking at the alternatives and deciding on the right course.

Concerning the other question, I have said before that the relationship between the Reisman and Grandy firm and Lockheed is a matter for those two private companies. It will possibly form the foundation for discussion in a wider sense with respect to guidelines which have been suggested, but it does not in any way affect my contact with the Lockheed company, which is a direct contact between myself, my officials and that company.

LOCKHEED CONTRACT—FUNCTION OF GENERAL ALLAN AS HEAD OF PROJECT TEAM

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): I think it is extraordinary that the minister should answer the second part of the question in that manner. We are in no way concerned—

Some hon. Members: Question!

Mr. McKinnon: —about the relationship between Reisman and Grandy and Lockheed. We are worried about the relationship between Reisman and Grandy and the Department of National Defence. Could the minister inform the House of the precise managerial function performed by General Allan vis-à-vis the representatives seconded by the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce and the Department of Finance to the project team?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): General Allan is the head of the project team. It is an interdepartmental team and included in its membership are officials from other departments. I cannot at this moment name all the other officials but there were representatives of Finance, Industry, Trade and Commerce, DREE and others.

CONFLICT OF INTEREST

ALLEGED CONFLICT BECAUSE REISMAN AND GRANDY WERE GOVERNMENT EMPLOYEES WHEN CONSULTING FIRM ESTABLISHED

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): A supplementary question to the Acting Prime Minister. According to the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, the consulting firm of Reisman and Grandy Limited was incorporated on March 26, 1975. Both Mr. Reisman and Mr. Grandy served in their official capacities as deputy ministers until April 1, 1975. Does the Acting Prime Minister not now consider that the setting up of a consulting firm by two senior public servants while still in office constitutes a serious conflict of interest, indeed, an impropriety on their part?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): I am not aware of all the facts. However, I suggest that if the company was not operating while they were deputy ministers there is no conflict of interest arising.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): That is an important question. But according to contracts tabled by the Prime Minister yesterday, Mr. Grandy was under contract to the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce for a period of one month immediately following his resignation as deputy minister of the same department to advise on the "rationalization of the aerospace industry in Canada". However, Mr. Grandy did not leave the Board of Directors of de Havilland Aircraft, to which he was appointed on June 26, 1974 until December 19, 1975. Considering Mr. Grandy's range of activities, is the Acting Prime Minister now prepared to comment on the rather questionable conduct of a former deputy minister and does he not agree that a conflict of interest situation exists when consideration is given to the fact that de Havilland stood to benefit from the Lockheed contract since Lockheed agreed to promote sales of the Dash-7 if the Orion were selected?

Mr. Sharp: I neither agree with what the hon. gentleman has said, nor differ from it. As the Prime Minister has stated, an unprecedented situation has arisen recently. The Prime Minister feels it is a serious issue and is having it examined. Until that examination takes place, I would hope the hon. member would not attack the reputation of people like Mr. Grandy and Mr. Reisman by innuendo in the House of Commons.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): In view of the rather cavalier attitude expressed by the Acting Prime Minister—

Some hon. Members: Oh!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): In the absence of the Prime Minister, can we assume from the answers we have just received from the hon. gentleman that he does not regard this as a serious matter with respect to the public service and are we to continue to have delay in this matter of guidelines, legislation and other measures governing the conduct of public servants in and out of office?

Mr. Sharp: As I have just stated, the Prime Minister has said he does consider this to be a serious matter. The hon. gentleman is once again making statements in the House of Commons in order to affect the reputation of people like Mr. Reisman and Mr. Grandy. We on this side believe in justice, whatever the opposition might believe in.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

LOCKHEED CONTRACT—DATE OF FINAL DECISION—REFERENCE TO OTHER FINANCIAL CONSIDERATIONS

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Defence. Considering that it was expected that the cabinet would not be making a final decision on the Lockheed Orion purchase till its meeting tomorrow, in light of a report in today's press to the effect that a decision was made last Thursday to proceed would the minister tell the House whether or not that final decision has been taken; and in the context of answering would the minister tell the House what are the further financial considerations that the government has in mind which were referred to in the same article and which will have to be met if the government is to go ahead?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the press report is inaccurate. There has been no decision taken by cabinet. The financial arrangements are of the kind that we have discussed previously. We are working with the Canadian banks and conversations are progressing, but there has been no financial arrangement completed which I can announce at this time.

LOCKHEED CONTRACT—ALLEGEDLY CONFLICTING STATEMENTS ABOUT FINANCING—POSSIBLE DISCUSSIONS WITH U.S. LOAN BOARD

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. The minister said in the House yesterday that he and his officials were aware of the full financial position of the Lockheed Corporation last fall when the negotiations were taking place. Considering that his deputy minister told a committee of this House during the past ten days that he was not aware of the provisions of the United States emergency loan guarantee act which would prohibit Lockheed from proceeding with the front-end financing, would the minister explain this apparently flat contradiction between what he says and what his deputy minister says; and, more specifically, could he tell us whether he or his officials held any discussions with the U.S. officials of the emergency loan guarantee board at the time of the negotiations, or did they just take Lockheed's word regarding their financial position in this matter?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, as I have indicated before, my officials were aware of the emergency loan guarantee board and the fact that the Lockheed company had to get approval from United States bankers before increasing their loans. This was known to my officials, but the Lockheed company indicated to us that they could overcome these impediments and that they could in fact participate in the financing of the difference between the payments required and the funds available in the Department of National Defence.

SUGGESTED BUILDING OF AIRCRAFT IN CANADA RATHER THAN PURCHASE "ORION"

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): A final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Since it is now abundantly clear that Lockheed is not able to live up to the commitment that the minister says they made, even though that has been denied by the Lockheed Corporation itself, and considering that the government of Canada owns and controls the Canadair Corporation and the de Havilland Corporation of Canada, would the minister not now make a commitment not to proceed with the Lockheed deal, and instead build the aircraft in Canada to meet the technical defence requirements, using Canadian facilities that are already under the control of the people of this country?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Definitely not, Mr. Speaker. Apart from the military requirement and the commitment to NATO, there are very substantial industrial benefits to Canada arising out of this contract once it is underway. They are benefits which I think the hon. member would want to see taking place.

FINANCE

REASON FOR RAPID INCREASE IN FINANCIAL INSTITUTIONS

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I wish to put a question to the Minister of Finance.

Considering that for the last eight years Canada has had three times as many foreign financial institutions as before, is the Minister of Finance aware of that situation and can he tell the House for what reasons?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, we have followed the establishment of many such institutions in Canada. The Bank Act, which was passed by Parliament in 1967, included only very strict provisions governing foreign financial institutions. We are now considering amendments that could be made to the Bank Act this year, as well as the possibility of enacting wider regulations concerning these institutions.

REASON FOREIGN CREDIT GRANTING INSTITUTIONS HAVE ADVANTAGES OVER BANKS

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a supplementary question.

I understand the minister is going to introduce amendments about this, but considering that at present those foreign organizations enjoy rights that our own Canadian chartered banks do not have, for instance loans, credit, leasing or account farming, where those financial institutions may extend credit, buy back accounts or open credits which chartered banks are not allowed to do, I wish to ask the minister pursuant to which laws do those financial institutions enjoy more protection, more room for expansion, more facilities than our own Canadian banking system?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker. There are two questions to be considered here, first the matter of competition against Canadian banks, second that of permitting foreign agencies to conduct transactions in Canada.

As I have said, we shall put forward regulations in view of extending to those institutions the same restrictions Canadian institutions have to comply with. I must add there is a problem with some Canadian institutions such as caisses populaires and credit unions which operate very much like banks and which can also engage in many deals which are not open to Canadian banks. Thus we should consider the so-called Canadian "near-banks" as well as the foreign banks operating in Canada.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

ALLEGED PARTICIPATION OF FORCE IN BREAK-IN AT QUEBEC NEWSPAPER—REQUEST FOR REPORT

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, the Solicitor General being aware of the circumstances involving the activities of an anti-terrorist squad's alleged break and entry of the premises of a Quebec newspaper in which it is suggested RCMP personnel had participated, can the Solicitor General now say to the House whether the former Solicitor General was informed in advance of this raid and, if not, who precisely authorized the participation of the RCMP in this venture?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, as soon as we learned about this declaration by Mr. Samson at the trial, where it was brought to our attention, we immediately started an investigation. That investigation is still underway. We do know that there was no notice to either the Solicitor General or officials of the RCMP in Ottawa, but we will have more to announce in this respect when we have more news as a result of the investigation.

Mr. MacKay: I want to thank the minister for his answer, Mr. Speaker, and I understand he will give us further details on this as soon as they become available. In view of revelations made public by a committee of the United States Senate in respect of illegal activities of the FBI in the United States, can the Solicitor General assure Canadians, at least on the basis of his present knowledge of the situation, that no such activities have gone on in the past or are going on at the present time which would cause Canadians to have any concern about the activities of our federal police force?

Mr. Allmand: That is exactly the purpose of the investigation which we have undertaken and which was started as soon as this matter was brought to our attention, so I cannot answer that question right now. However, we are investigating that very point.

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, in view of the very great importance which we all place on the reputation of the RCMP, I wonder whether the Solicitor General when conducting this investigation will either be able to report to the House confirmation or otherwise that the raid was carried out by an anti-terrorist squad consisting of Montreal urban police, Quebec provincial police and the RCMP and whether he will at that time indicate if he is satisfied, on the basis of his investigation, that these break-ins occurred legitimately or under the guise of state security? Would he give us that assurance when he makes that report to the House?

Mr. Allmand: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I hope to give as much information as possible. The hon. member is correct. This raid was organized by either the Quebec provincial police or the Montreal police, and the RCMP assumed an assisting role. However, we are getting as much information as we can, and we will announce further action in the House as soon as that information is available.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

PERSON ORDERING EMBASSY AT BEIRUT CLOSED—COUNTRY RESPONSIBLE FOR CANADIAN CONSULAR SERVICES

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs, if I can have his attention. On the assumption that the news reports about the departure of embassy staff from Beirut is correct, will the minister say whether it was he who ordered the closing of the embassy in Beirut or whether the action was taken by the chargé d'affaires on his own initiative? If the latter is the case the minister must surely know the grounds on which it was done, because it occurs to me that while there are Canadians still in the area, the mission should be maintained.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, Mr. Sullivan, the chargé d'affaires, and I agreed that it was appropriate at this particular time to withdraw the embassy staff. In fact, at a certain point I had given instructions that that decision should be taken at his discretion based on an assessment of the situation. Subsequently, I felt that I ought to give a direct instruction, with which the chargé agreed.

The reason for the temporary withdrawal of staff is that, because of the deteriorated political situation, the embassy could not carry out any of its functions. It was virtually non-operational, as the lives of the embassy staff were in some danger. It seemed to me useless to maintain them in the area when they could not perform any function whatsoever.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Would the minister then say what arrangements have been made to ensure that consular services continue to be available to Canadian citizens who are in the area? Has he handed them over to the Swiss authorities on this occasion as in the past?

Mr. MacEachen: We have been urging Canadians in Lebanon to leave the country. We felt that advisable for some time and have urged them to do that, in their own interests. Whatever consular services are required will be provided, I believe, to Canadians by the British embassy.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Chicken! Shame.

FINANCE

REQUEST FOR DETAILS OF PROPOSALS TO ASSIST ATLANTIC PROVINCES WITH ENERGY COSTS

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. It relates to the answer of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources yesterday in which he indicated that with respect to the high cost of electricity for Nova Scotia, and Prince Edward Island in particular, a number of proposals were still before the provinces and that some of these were still on the table. I wonder if the Minister of Finance could indicate, with respect to tomorrow's meeting with provincial ministers of finance, whether some of these proposals have been developed to the point of proposing in dollar terms to the provincial governments what forms of assistance might be provided by the federal government, and has there been any distinguishing between short-term or interim measures and long-term measures, realizing the length of time it would take to bring in some of the proposals originally suggested?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the proposals which had been put to the provinces were proposals to be operative over a longer period for the purpose of making lower cost hydro or nuclear-based power available, and indeed, the province of Prince Edward Island has gone ahead on one of these programs to set up a cable link with the mainland for this purpose.

As to the question of short-run financing of the two power utilities in those two provinces, we look forward to hearing from the ministers for those provinces. Of course, there is the difficulty that in other parts of Canada energy users, such as natural gas users on the natural gas pipeline system, also have had substantial increases and as Minister of Finance I would have to confess to being most reluctant to get into a large national subsidy program for energy users in general.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): In light of the final comments of the minister, I wonder whether he could indicate whether the federal government has taken a position, or will indicate one tomorrow, with respect to the extent of the differential which will be allowed to exist, in view of its other programs attempting to equalize the hardship created. Realizing that both Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island have the highest electrical cost in the country, will the minister be prepared to put forward a statement with respect to the differentiation the federal government will tolerate?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I take it the hon. member means between energy rates in general and the two provinces in particular. I am not planning on making a statement of that kind, although I hope to have a very full review from the two ministers of their current situation and to get a reaction from ministers of other provinces with regard to whether national funds should be used in this way.

NEGOTIATIONS WITH UNITED KINGDOM ON BEHALF OF OLD AGE PENSION RECIPIENTS RESIDING IN CANADA—REQUEST FOR REPORT

Mr. Gilbert Parent (St. Catharines): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the fact that there are a number of British citizens living in Canada who receive the equivalent of an old age pension from England, and in view of the fact that these pensions are not indexed and in the last six months they have lost the equivalent of $30 per month in buying power, would the minister tell the House how the negotiations with the United Kingdom on this matter are progressing and what action can be expected to alleviate this situation?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I have had the opportunity previously of expressing my regret at the refusal of the United Kingdom to adjust those pensions. The discussions are suspended at the present time because of the requirement of the United Kingdom that there be some different arrangements with Canada, which we are not in a position to provide at the present time under the existing legislation.

However, I am pleased to advise the hon. member that in the next few weeks I expect to make a statement announcing re-arrangements in our system so that we can arrive, I hope, at a satisfactory solution, not just for British immigrants, but also for immigrants from other countries in that respect.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

NATIONAL DEFENCE

LOCKHEED CONTRACT—POSSIBLE GOVERNMENT GUARANTEE OF BANK LOAN AND TABLING OF INDUSTRIAL BENEFIT STUDIES

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Defence. In answer to an earlier question by the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby the minister indicated that he and his officials are presently working with Canadian banks with regard to the difficulty in putting up front-end money. Presumably Canadian banks are unwilling to advance money without a federal government loan guarantee. Even if the U.S. loan guarantee board allows the loan to take place, is the minister asking the House to support a loan to Lockheed which Canadian banks are unwilling to undertake? Is he asking the Canadian taxpayer to undertake a risk which Canadian banks are unwilling to take on the Lockheed deal?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Leggatt: That does not completely answer the question.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Leggatt: My question is this: Is there to be no federal guarantee with regard to proposed lending by federal banks?

And in order to prevent a supplementary, with regard to his previous answer concerning industrial benefits, is the minister willing to table the studies which were done with respect to the Lockheed Orion as compared with other proposals such as refitting the Argus in terms of the advantage to the Canadian economy of either proposal, the number of jobs which would be created and the money invested in Canada? Will he table that in the House so that we can examine the assessment which the minister has made in this matter?

[Mr. Parent.]

● (1440)

Mr. Richardson: Mr. Speaker, in reply to the first part of the question, we are not talking about a guarantee of the federal government to the Canadian banks. The arrangement is now being worded out. As I have said, if it can be completed, the details will be announced. I cannot say more about it at this time. Concerning the industrial benefits, I have already indicated that they are very substantial.

Mr. Leggatt: The alternative benefits.

Mr. Richardson: Again, they will be a matter of complete discussion and will be fully displayed once the contract has been completed. In round figures, we are talking about a guarantee of $420 million of Canadian industrial benefit. We are talking about structural components being built in Canada for 150 aeroplanes, which in round figures is another $160 million. That means some $580 million in industrial benefits. On top of that there is a "best efforts" plan which, if all goes well, could take industrial benefits to Canada up over $900 million, which is almost as much as the total cost of the contract. All of this will be spelled out once we can get the contract signed and get underway with the project.

DATE OF BUDGET—REQUEST FOR COMMITTEE STUDY OF FISCAL OPTIONS OPEN TO CANADA

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): My question is for the Minister of Finance, and I have given him notice of it. Will the minister now indicate the date on which he will present his forthcoming budget, and in an effort to remove some of the secrecy which shrouds the government's economic policy, would the minister consider a prebudget reference to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs to allow that committee an opportunity to review the fiscal options open to Canada in this difficult economic period?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for having given me notice of this question. In answer to the first part of the question, I anticipate the budget will be brought down some time in the second half of May. The actual date has not been selected as yet, but it is within that time-frame.

With regard to the suggestion of a prebudget review, I wish to make two suggestions. The first is that the economic review papers will be available at about the end of April, and I suggest that in the context of the work of the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs we might have a review of the economic situation in contemplation of the budget in early May.

The second comment I would make is that I think it would be very useful if the House in general could give some consideration to the broader question as to whether the procedures that have been followed historically in this parliament and in Westminster with regard to budgets might be reviewed with the object referred to by the hon. member of having a more open scrutiny of the government's economic and fiscal planning, and either in the context of that discussion or perhaps with a special reference to the standing committee it would be of value if we could review the budget procedures and decide whether the time has not come now to make such changes in Canada.

Mr. Stevens: In the context of the minister's reply, I was wondering if the minister would be willing to have his department make available to either members of this House or to a standing committee the actual forecast that they see for the economy in the coming months and years based on various assumptions with respect to alternative taxation and federal spending plans.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): It seems to me that the hon. member may well be asking to a substantial degree for a preview of the budget itself, and for reason of the long standing inhibitions we have had, I would be reluctant to be put in that position. I think the far more sensible course of action, if we want to have more open procedures on the budget—and I think that is desirable—is for the House to decide what those procedures should be and then to make the necessary arrangements, rather than doing it ad hoc.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

REQUEST FOR REPORT ON KEITH LATTA CASE

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Justice a question. I have given him notice of it. Is he able today to give a report on the Keith Latta case?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): Yes, Mr. Speaker. As the hon. member knows, I received some time ago a petition for a new trial for Keith Latta on the basis that new evidence had been discovered by way of a statement from a Mrs. McCauley which came to light after leave to appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada had been dismissed. As I informed the hon. member the other day, we had been endeavouring through my officers to interview Mrs. McCauley but she refused to be interviewed. Consequently I have made an order, signed yesterday, to the Chief Justice of Alberta under 617(c) of the Criminal Code ordering that the Court of Appeal of Alberta or a judge thereof take the evidence of Mrs. McCauley and advise me as to whether the testimony of Mrs. McCauley could be admissible evidence in the trial of Keith Latta and ordering that counsel for the Attorney General of Alberta and for Keith Latta be permitted to appear on such conditions as the court directs.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CUBA—SUGGESTED PROTEST OF ARMED INTERVENTION IN AFRICA

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the Right Hon. Prime Minister. On March 25 I requested the Prime Minister in the interests of world peace, to send a message to Premier Castro of Cuba informing him of the concern of Canadians generally over the continued participation of Cuba's 12,000 communist troops in the African conflict, and the Prime Minister promised to give consideration to my suggestion. Six days have passed since I raised that question and tension in Rhodesia and other parts of Africa has increased. So I now ask the Prime Minister: Has the government of Canada formally protested to Premier Castro the presence of Cuban troops in areas of conflict in Africa and, if so, will the Prime Minister table a copy of his government's objections in this House?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I believe last time when I answered the question I indicated that protests have been made publicly by the Secretary of State for External Affairs and personally by me, in the presence of Premier Castro, to him. I also said I did not see any advantage in sending a telegram repeating what was already known to be the Canadian policy, and having expressed it personally to him I did not consider that an expression in writing of the same idea would be likely to change his ideas very much.

CUBA—PURPOSE OF LEASING DC-8 AIRCRAFT AND TRAINING PILOTS

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): My supplementary is again to the Prime Minister. Has Canada entered into arrangements with Cuba covering the leasing of DC-8 aircraft to that country and the training of Cuban pilots, and what is the purpose of these arrangements?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I answered this question, I believe, in the days after I returned from Cuba and said that there have been some charges of, I believe, Air Canada planes flying to Cuba long before Cuba's involvement in Africa, but when the involvement in Africa became known we modified the agreement to make sure that these planes would not be used by Cubans outside of their territory. In so far as the training of personnel is concerned, I have no knowledge of that. I doubt if there is any, but I will look into it.

Mr. Paproski: Can the Prime Minister say how many Cuban pilots Canada has trained and are they being trained in Cuba or Canada and for what purpose?

Mr. Trudeau: As the hon. member knows, there are trade and tourist relations between Cuba and Canada and charter planes are flying from Canada to Cuba and Cuban planes flying from Cuba to Canada—

An hon. Member: And Cuban soldiers flying to Africa.

Mr. Trudeau: When we sell or rent a plane for money, it is quite conceivable that we also undertake to train pilots to fly these planes. If the hon. member objects to that practice, I should like to know what is the basis of his objection.

ANTI-INFLATION BOARD

REASON FOR REDUCTION OF WAGE INCREASE FOR ATLANTIC SUGAR EMPLOYEES

Mr. Mike Landers (Saint John-Lancaster): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. Has the minister had an opportunity to inquire into the roll-back of wages at the Atlantic Sugar Refineries of Saint John and, if so, what has he discovered?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Yes, Mr. Speaker. The board arrived at the conclusion that it should allow a basic increase of 8.29 per cent on the basis that the previous contract had been reopened during its lifetime. Indeed, there had been an opportunity to catch up with the increase in the consumer price index. The board has indicated that it is meeting with the company today, and is likely to meet with the union tomorrow. It is prepared to consider the question again in light of the facts that either or both of those parties can bring to its attention.

KNOWLEDGE OF MINISTER OF CONTENTS OF JUDGE LAMER'S EVIDENCE TO CRIME COMMISSION

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask a question of the Minister of Transport, following the question I put last week, March 24, to the Minister of Justice who gave me the following answer:

> The chairman designate was appointed vice-chairman some four years ago, and apparently the matter was examined at that time by my predecessor.

As the Minister of Transport was that predecessor, I would like to ask him whether he was aware at that time that Judge Lamer, who was appointed chairman of the Law Reform Commission, had appeared in camera before Mr. Justice Réal Brunet of the commission of inquiry on organized crime and whether he knows the contents of the evidence given by Judge Lamer?

SUGGESTION OF ASSOCIATION OF UNIVERSITY TEACHERS THAT FISCAL ARRANGEMENTS BE EXTENDED THREE YEARS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance and I regret I have not had an opportunity to give him notice. With reference to the forthcoming meeting of finance ministers, will the minister give sympathetic consideration to the position of the Canadian Association of University Teachers that the fiscal arrangements be extended for three years. This is vital to the Atlantic provinces. Will the minister also take into consideration the inflation factor which has a great bearing not only on the College of Cape Breton but on all institutions of learning?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I have had information of a similar kind from those two old friends, the hon. member for St. Boniface and the hon. member for Halifax on the same subject, bringing substantially the same message to my attention. I will take that into consideration and as the hon. member mentioned, this will be a matter for discussion in the next few days.

AIR TRANSPORT

UNIFORM ENFORCEMENT OF SAFETY RULES AT AIRPORTS—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. In light of the fact that new safety regulations limiting the size of carry-on baggage for commercial air flights will be uniformly enforced tomorrow—which indicates to me that safety has been sacrificed for some time—may I ask when the government will ensure that other safety rules are enforced uniformly at Department of Transport airports? For example, on the weekend of March 19 to 21 a member of the P.C. Nationals hockey team was permitted to carry on his skates at Ottawa and Halifax airports but was denied this privilege at Moncton airport. The explanation given was that Moncton airport is the headquarters for security and some officials might have been watching.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

ALLEGED BIAS IN PROGRAM ON TRAPPERS' FESTIVAL AT THE PAS—REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION

Mr. Cecil Smith (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State but in his absence I will direct it to the parliamentary secretary. During the 29th annual trappers' festival in The Pas, Manitoba, the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation prepared a news documentary of the festival. In the opinion of The Pas town council, chamber of commerce, the festival committee, the chief and council of The Pas Indian band, as well as other northern residents, the program was malicious and deliberately distorted as to the actual facts of the festival and its bylaws. Will the minister take immediate action to have this serious charge investigated as the program made it appear to the general public that the volunteer workers of the trappers' festival were guilty of racial discrimination?

Miss Coline Campbell (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I have been informed by the President of the CBC that he has received a number of letters from The Pas and at the present is having discussions with CBC program management. I will take notice of the hon. member's concern and get back to him on it.

REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION BY CANADIAN RADIO-TELEVISION COMMISSION OF PROGRAM "TWENTY-FOUR HOURS"

Mr. Cecil Smith (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, may I put a supplementary question to the Minister of Communications? The town council of The Pas has requested the CRTC to conduct an inquiry into the content of the CBC program Twenty-Four Hours that was aired on February 26, 1976 on the subject of The Pas 29th annual trappers' festival. Will the minister instruct the CRTC to establish whether the people of The Pas and the community in general have been unjustly maligned and accused?

[Translation]

Hon. Jeanne Sauvé (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, I shall make a point of conveying the hon. member's representations to the CRTC, and I hope the hon. member will receive the answers he is looking for. HEALTH

REASON FOR SELECTIVE VACCINATION AGAINST SWINE FLU

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the widespread anxiety and fear felt by parents because of the selective discrimination toward children who will not be vaccinated with the swine flu vaccine, may I ask the minister if it is the time factor that is involved in production which may result in a vaccine not as purified as that to which we have been accustomed in Canada? In other words, the time element might not allow sufficient purification to avoid reaction?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to advise the hon. member that the time element did not play any role at all in the consideration of the National Advisory Committee. The recommendation from the committee, which was endorsed by my department, was based purely on the adverse reaction to the vaccine that was encountered in children under 16 years of age. I would point out to the hon. member that, in a limited study in the United States, 36 per cent of children under five years of age given flu vaccine developed fevers of 103 degrees Fahrenheit or more and 10 per cent showed convulsions. It will be up to the physicians responsible for children, in view of the high risk, to decide whether the benefits of the vaccine exceed the risks involved.

Mr. Rynard: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. May I ask why there would not be a selective classification for children and why ages 50 to 65 have been excluded for no reason that I can see?

Mr. Lalonde: First of all, Mr. Speaker, with regard to the children, this is a matter that will be left to the pediatrician involved. The National Advisory Committee said it was not recommended but it is up to the physician to make that decision in each instance. In other words, the advisory committee recommended against a general mass immunization of children. The committee did not recommend not giving the vaccine to people aged 50 to 65. What the committee did recommend was a certain priority order, the first priority being chronic disease cases and all people over 65; second, people of 20 to 50; and third, people between 50 and 65 and 16 and 20. Many people of 50 to 65 have antibodies from exposure to this flu between 1918 and 1930, and are less at risk than people of 20 to 50. However, these people can also get the vaccine if they are interested in receiving it.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

EFFECT OF INCREASED ENERGY COSTS ON DEVELOPMENT COSTS IN ATLANTIC PROVINCES—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. J. Robert Howie (York-Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. Has the minister made any assessments or does he plan any investigation into the effect that rising energy costs have on economic development projects in the Atlantic provinces and Quebec and does his budget now before us for approval pose an impediment to any remedial action?

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Lessard (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, the department did indicate in the reports tabled last week that the increased cost of energy in the Atlantic region and in Quebec would create some problems for the industrial development and for the general economy in these parts of Canada. With regard to specific studies on the implications for certain industries, analyses have been initiated but we are not in a position to report on direct implications for certain types of operations. Obviously, certain types of operations are more affected than others because they require a larger consumption of electric energy.

For the second part of the question asked by the hon. member, as he is aware, budget cuts apply to all departments. It goes without saying that the Department of Regional Economic Expansion is also affected because there are great needs. If more funds were available, we certainly could undertake more projects in cooperation with the private sector and provincial governments. For the time being, however, I think that we should cut our expenses and be prepared to make a better selection of projects submitted in order to maximize the return on investments.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

INQUIRY WHETHER MR. GRANDY RECOMMENDED PURCHASE OF LOCKHEED "ORION"

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence. Yesterday, referring to Mr. Grandy, the minister said that he was not sure on which committee he sat. He presumed that Mr. Grandy must have had some contact with discussions which were taking place. That was to be expected, in view of the position he held. Can the minister tell the House, precisely and definitely, if James Grandy recommended to cabinet ministers, the committee of cabinet or the project team the purchase of the Lockheed Orion?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): No, Mr. Speaker. I pointed out that the recommendation to purchase the Lockheed Orion was made by the Department of National Defence, and made by me to cabinet.

Mr. Nystrom: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. That, precisely, is why I asked the minister the question. I want to know if James Grandy recommended the purchase of the Orion to the project team or any committee of ministers. I know that the minister himself must recommend to cabinet. Did Mr. Grandy make any recommendation to the project team?

Mr. Richardson: Mr. Speaker, in his capacity as deputy minister, he was not on the project team. I do not know of any recommendation he may or may not have made.

LOCKHEED CONTRACT—REQUEST FOR NAMES OF COMMITTEES OF WHICH MR. GRANDY WAS MEMBER

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): A final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Yesterday in the House, and again today, the minister implied that Mr. Grandy sat on some committees. Can he tell the House precisely on which committees Mr. Grandy sat?

[Mr. Lessard.]

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, no, I cannot. Mr. Grandy in those days was deputy minister; he was not a consultant. I think he was doing his duty as a deputy minister. I do not know all the committees on which he sat.

Mr. Yewchuk: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I intended raising certain matters as a question of privilege, but the information came to me too late and I could not give Your Honour appropriate notice. I now inform you that I intend to raise these matters tomorrow as a question of privilege. One involves disparaging remarks made by the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway about members of parliament who happen to be medical doctors; the other, a charge of conflict of interest involving Tory members made by a CTV newsman, Eric Malling. I intend to raise these matters on a question of privilege tomorrow as such comments affect the ability to do our job as members of parliament.

Mr. Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I know that ministers are given the right not to answer questions. In the interest of the safety of the air travellers of Canada, I want to be sure that the minister heard the question I asked him about air safety, and chose not to answer.

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, if I may speak on the same point of order, I assure the hon. member that I heard his question. It seemed to me that because of the terms in which it was couched it neither needed, nor deserved, an answer. If he had asked a serious question I would have been glad to consider it.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Such arrogance.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order relating to the order or direction which the Minister of Justice has given, and I do this as a courtesy to him. He referred to a witness who is material to the order, Sylvia McCauley. At one time that was her maiden name. She is now known as Sylvia Novick, sometimes known as Mr. Kovack. I hope that no technical difficulties will arise because her name is now Mrs. Novick and not McCauley, alias Le Tendress. I hope that will not affect the order.

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the hon. member's courtesy in raising the matter. The name used is the name at the time of trial. I will check with my officers to make sure that the point creates no impediment to the matter. If it does, I shall correct the order.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES ACT

AMENDMENT TO PROVIDE FOR REVIEW OF REPORTS OF COMMISSIONER

Mr. Serge Joyal (Maisonneuve-Rosemont) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-430, entitled "An Act to amend the Official Languages Act (referral of reports)".

Some hon. Members: Explain!

Mr. Joyal: Mr. Speaker, in Book I of the Report of the Royal Commission on Bilingualism and Biculturalism, the commission recommended that the Commissioner of Official Languages should function as the Auditor General functions respecting government expenditures and property. Now, the Official Languages Act does not allow the House to study the reports by way of a joint committee of the House and the Senate, though the reports are tabled in both the House and the Senate. The purpose of this amendment is to allow Parliament to follow the progress made by the federal administration on every levels in the realization of the Official Languages Act's objectives of equality and justice and the participation of Francophones in every level of the federal administration.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

PRESENTATION OF PETITION BY UNITED GRAIN GROWERS

Mr. Gérard Loiselle (Saint-Henri): Mr. Speaker, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Saint-Jacques (Mr. Guilbault):

That pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 99, the petition of United Grain Growers Limited requesting the passing of an act amending its act of incorporation to increase its capital stock and for other purposes, filed after the time limit specified under Standing Order 90, be referred to the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills and Standing Orders, together with the Twenty-seventh Report of the Clerk of Petitions thereon, presented to the House on Tuesday March 30, 1976, for any recommendations the Committee deems advisable.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

PEI COMPREHENSIVE DEVELOPMENT PLAN—PHASE 2

Question No. 3,539—Mr. MacDonald (Egmont):

With reference to the recent agreement on Phase 2 of the PEI Comprehensive Development Plan, is the Joint Advisory Board satisfied with the amount of public involvement and input that preceded the drafting of the agreement?

Mr. Cliff McIsaac (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): The reply for the Department of Regional Economic Expansion is as follows: Yes.

PEI—FISHING SECTOR

Question No. 3,853—Mr. MacDonald (Egmont):

With reference to the fishing sector of the Prince Edward Island Comprehensive Development Plan, have measures been taken since the Plan's inception to (a) add to clam stocks (b) make better utilization of Whelk stocks (c) expand rock crab catch (d) exploit sea urchin stocks (e) exploit brown shrimp stocks (f) improve inshore catch of (i) flatfish (ii) hake (iii) mackerel (g) improve eel stocks through aquaculture techniques (h) investigate feasibility of trout hatching and farming in PEI and, if so, with what results?

Mr. Cliff McIsaac (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): The reply for the Department of Regional Economic Expansion is as follows: (a) Stocks are being assessed; (b) measures have been considered, but are uneconomic at the present time; (c) stocks are being assessed and markets tested; (d) no; (e) stocks are being assessed; (f) (i) modern gear is being tested; (ii) modern gear and long lines are being tested; (iii) no; (g) no; (h) several salt water rearing stations have been established.

CONSTRUCTION OF TRANSCANADA PIPELINES

Question No. 4,088—Mr. Orlikow:

Did the National Energy Board request TransCanada Pipelines in a letter dated February 14, 1975 to (a) indicate to the Board in writing what measures are being implemented to ensure that poor construction practices do not occur in future (b) provide the Board with a statement of methods used to ensure that the actual welding and quality control practices conform to Board regulations, industry codes and company specifications (c) pay particular attention in its inspections to the area covered by the Phase I loop construction of 1971 and 1972 in its patrol of the pipeline system and, if so, did Trans Canada Pipelines Limited comply with the Board's request in full?

Mr. Maurice Foster (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): National Energy Board reports as follows: (a), (b) and (c) Yes.

SAFETY CONDITIONS OF TRANS CANADA PIPELINES

Question No. 4,089—Mr. Orlikow:

1. Did the Chairman of the National Energy Board issue a statement to the effect that charges, that sections of the Trans Canada Pipelines were unsafe, were without foundation and, if so, on what date?

2. Did the Board request TCP to provide them with evidence of burn throughs and slag inclusions in certain welds in the pipeline and, if so, on what date?

3. Did the Board receive the evidence it requested from TCP and, if so, on what date?

Mr. Maurice Foster (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): National Energy Board reports as follows: 1. Yes, on February 10, 1976.

2. Yes, on January 28, 1976.

3. The Board received radiographs of 6 welds from CTV on February 17, 1976 and an incomplete assessment of 82 other welds prepared by an unidentified person. The Board is conducting its own evaluation of this material.

DEFECTS IN WELDS OF GAS PIPELINES

Question No. 4,090—Mr. Orlikow:

1. Do National Energy Board regulations permit (a) hollow bead (b) slag inclusion (c) excess penetration (d) burn through defects in welds in gas pipeline construction?

2. If such defects are present in the welds of a gas pipeline what is required of the pipeline company by the Board?

3. Has the Board ever ordered a company to correct any such defects?

Mr. Maurice Foster (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): National Energy Board reports as follows: 1. Yes, to the extent permitted in code CSA Z184. There is no defect defined as excess penetration.

2. A defect which violates code CSA Z184 detected during construction is required to be removed by the pipeline company. Previously undetected defects which are revealed by pressure testing after completion of the pipeline, but before placing it in service, are required to be corrected. Defects subsequently discovered are required to be corrected if they affect safety.

3. Yes.

CONSTRUCTION OF TRANS CANADA PIPELINES LTD.

Question No. 4,091—Mr. Orlikow:

1. Did the National Energy Board issue licences to Trans Canada Pipelines Limited for the Phase I loop constructed in Northern Ontario in 1971-72 and, if so, on what date?

2. Did the Board carry out inspection and testing to make sure that the pipeline met its standards for safety before granting the licence and (a) if so, in what manner (b) if not, what evidence of safety was submitted by Trans Canada Pipelines Limited?

[Mr. Orlikow.]

3. Did the National Energy Board take steps to confirm the reliability of the evidence of safety submitted by Trans Canada Pipelines Limited and, if so, what were they?

Mr. Maurice Foster (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): National Energy Board reports as follows: 1. Yes, the National Energy Board issued during the years 1971-72 a total of three certificates of Public Convenience and Necessity dated February 16, 1971, May 11, 1971 and May 4, 1972.

NOTE: The Board issues certificates in accordance with the National Energy Board Act to approve facilities rather than licences as stated in the question.

2. The Board established requirements for the "testing of oil and gas pipelines" on September 17, 1965. Leave to Open Orders were issued with respect to the pipeline constructed under authority of the three certificates referred to above on submission of evidence by Trans Canada Pipelines acceptable to the Board that these requirements had been met. Leave to Open Orders authorize the placing in-service of designated sections of pipeline. Prior to issuance of Leave to Open Orders a 24 hour hydrostatic pressure test at 125% of working pressure was conducted by Trans Canada, the results of which were checked in detail by the Board. It was the Board's practice at that time to conduct field inspections on a selected basis. In this particular case there was no field inspection by Board staff but the Board carefully checked all evidence submitted by Trans Canada including the affidavits of professional engineers attesting to the safety and integrity of the pipeline.

3. Yes, detailed engineering test data which included pressure and temperature charts, dead-weight pressure readings and temperature readings as well as other information was carefully assessed by the Board. In addition Trans Canada filed with the Board affidavits from a professional engineer attesting to the safety of each individual portion of the pipeline. It is to be noted that this line has operated at full working pressure for approximately four years without any failures or significant operating incidents.

SAFETY INSPECTIONS OF PIPELINE OPERATIONS

Question No. 4,092—Mr. Orlikow:

1. Are qualified inspectors of pipelines employed by the National Energy Board to carry out its statutory responsibilities to assure the safety of pipeline operations and, if so, how many?

2. How many were employed in each of the past ten years?

Mr. Maurice Foster (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): National Energy Board reports as follows: 1. Yes, a total of 15.

2. 1966, 4; 1967, 4; 1968, 4; 1969, 5; 1970, 5; 1971, 6; 1972, 6; 1973, 9; 1974, 11; 1975, 16; 1976, 15.

WELDING QUALITY AND SAFETY INSPECTIONS RELATING TO TRANS CANADA PIPELINES

Question No. 4,098—Mr. Beatty:

1. Have field inspectors competent to inspect (a) radiographic evidence (b) hydro-static evidence of pipeline weld quality been employed by the National Energy Board in (i) 1970 (ii) 1971 (iii) 1972 (iv) 1973 (v) 1974 (vi) 1975 and, if so, how many?

2. Did the Board receive from Trans Canada Pipelines copies of correspondence dated June 7, 1972 and June 2, 1972 between them and Mr. Tom Arnesen relating to the quality of welding performed on a Trans Canada Pipeline and, if so (a) on what date was such correspondence received (b) what action was taken by the Board on the letters?

Mr. Maurice Foster (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): National Energy Board reports as follows: 1. Yes, the Board employs field inspectors who have the ability to identify welding problems and who are competent to inspect and assess hydrostatic testing. Moreover the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources has particular expertise in radiography and metallurgy plus the laboratory facilities to conduct any necessary analysis. The Board has used these services to supplement the findings of its field inspection staff when required. The following table indicates the Board's staff members who were available for inspection duties from 1970 to 1975 inclusive.

Year	Personnel
1970	5
1971	6
1972	6
1973	9
1974	11
1975	16

The CSA Z184 requires gas pipeline companies to use radiography in only 15% of field welds. Accordingly this code requirement acts principally as a check on the quality of workmanship. Because radiographic techniques were not sensitive enough to reproducibly find dangerous defects, the Board relied on the pressure test as the principle basis for operating authority for pipelines to be operated. Although the quality of radiography has increased markedly since 1972, it will continue to be the Board's policy to rely principally on the hydrostatic pressure tests to assure itself that a gas pipeline may be safely operated. This hydrostatic test requires a minimum pressure of 125 per cent of maximum allowable operating pressure to be held for a minimum of 24 hours.

2. Yes, copies of these two letters were forwarded by Trans Canada to the Board in June 1972. Similar letters were received by the Board in July 1973. All these letters related primarily to a contractual dispute between the two parties. The Board does not normally involve itself in this type of dispute. The potential significance of the very general references to welding quality and safety made in this correspondence was not apparent until a copy of Mr. Arnesen's report dated December 3, 1973 to the Prime Minister was received by the Board in March 1974. At that time an investigation of Mr. Arnesen's technical concerns was undertaken.

EXPORTS OF FOREST PRODUCTS

Question No. 4,592—Mr. Symes:

1. Since the establishment of the Anti-Inflation Board in October 1975, until the resumption of full operations in the forest products industry, what was the dollar value decline of Canadian exports?

2. What was the loss, in dollars, of tax revenue from exports during the same period of time?

Mr. Marcel Roy (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): 1. In the period from November 1975, the first full month in which the Anti-inflation Board was functioning, to January 1976, the latest month for which data are available, the exports of the forest industries amounted to $1,066 million. This compares with $1,304 million in the comparable period in 1974-75, and with $1,232 million in 1973-74. The level of exports in this period was affected adversely by labour disputes in many sections of the pulp and paper industry and also by weak demand for pulp and paper as well as lumber and panel products. However it is not possible to quantify the impact of these various factors with any precision.

2. This information is not available.

NEW INVESTMENT PROPOSAL

Question No. 4,603—Mr. Nystrom:

1. Was a new investment proposal made by Internote Canada Limited, wholly owned by Internote Financial Holdings of Switzerland, owned and controlled by Paoli Bontempi of Italy to establish a plant in Granby, Quebec and, if so, what is the total and/or per share price of the transaction, including the value of share transfers or other considerations?

2. Who are the principal shareholders of Paoli Bontempi of Italy?

3. Does Paoli Bontempi of Italy control and/or partially own, directly or indirectly, any other businesses in Canada and, if so, in each case, what are the holdings by percent of control and value?

4. What will be the effect of the establishment of this plant on (a) the level and nature of economic activity in Canada (b) resource processing in Canada (c) utilization of parts, components, materials and services produced in Canada (d) exports from Canada (e) productivity, industrial efficiency, technological development, product innovation and product variety in Canada (f) competition within any industry or industries in Canada?

5. How many persons will be employed once the new plant is established?

6. What is the degree and significance of participation by Canadians in the business enterprise or new business and in any industry or industries in Canada of which the business enterprise or new business forms or will form?

7. How will the establishment of this plant be (a) compatible (b) incompatible with national industrial and economic policies, taking into consideration industrial and economic policy objectives of any province likely to be affected by the new plant?

8. What is the significant benefit to Canada of the transaction?

Mr. Marcel Roy (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): In so far as the Foreign Investment Review Agency is concerned: a new investment proposal was made for Internote Canada Ltd., wholly-owned by Internote Financial Holdings of Switzerland, to establish a plant in Granby, Quebec. The proposal was approved by the Governor in Council on February 26, 1976 (P.C. 1976-435). All information with respect to a person, business or proposed business obtained in the course of the administration of the Foreign Investment Review Act is privileged and may not be released except as provided in section 14 of that Act.

Order Paper Questions

DASH-7 PROGRAM

Question No. 4,914—Mr. Mazankowski:

How much has the government paid and promised to de Havilland and its subcontractors for the development and production of the DASH-7?

Mr. Marcel Roy (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): The information being requested with respect to the amount of government development support for the DHC-7 aircraft provided to de Havilland and its subcontractors is "commercial confidential" and cannot be made public. In overall terms the total government support for development of the DHC-7 aircraft and engines at the end of the project will be in the order of $115 million of which approximately $80 million will have been spent by March 31, 1976. With respect to DHC-7 production the government has approved a loan to de Havilland for DHC-7 rate tooling in the amount of approximately $4 million.

STOL DEVELOPMENT

Question No. 4,915—Mr. Mazankowski:

Has the government paid any money to firms other than de Havilland for STOL development and, if (a) to whom (b) in what amount?

Mr. Marcel Roy (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): STOL development funding to companies other than de Havilland Aircraft is as follows during the 15 year period ending March 31, 1976: Canadair, $22,147,000; Pratt & Whitney Aircraft of Canada $11,802,502. The companies subcontracted portions of these amounts to other Canadian companies for the development and production of associated components, equipment and systems. A further $496,103 was provided to a number of Canadian avionics companies for STOL systems development work. No further breakdown of this figure is possible because of commercial confidentiality considerations.

INTERNATIONAL AIR SAFETY SYMPOSIUM

Question No. 4,917—Mr. Jones:

1. Was the Minister of Transport and members of the staff of the Department invited to participate in and attend the special International Air Safety Symposium held in Ottawa on March 2 and 3, 1976 and, if so, in each case, what part did they play in the Symposium?

2. Did the Minister and an official of the Department or some other government official give instructions that members of the staff of the Department were not to participate in or attend the Symposium?

3. Is the Minister prepared to accept full and complete responsibility for any accidents which may occur as a result of the policy of adopting bilingualism in air traffic control service?

4. Is such policy only applicable in the Province of Quebec and, if not, how many positions in Moncton have been designated bilingual and what (a) are the positions (b) is or will be the cost to provide language training and the cost of replacing the members of the staff during absence on language training?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): 1. Yes, I addressed the Symposium on the first morning to explain the Government's policy in phasing in the use of the French language in air traffic services in Quebec.

2. Yes, I directed that my officials should not attend because they were previously committed to participate in the National Civil Aviation Security Conference being held on the same days as the Symposium.

3. I am prepared to accept full responsibility for the safety certification of the procedures being used or to be developed for bilingual air-ground communication, but I cannot be held accountable for accidents therein anymore than I am for other aviation accidents.

4. Yes.

[Mr. Roy (Laval).]

SUBSIDIZING OF MINING EXPLORATION IN CONSTITUENCY OF TÉMISCAMINGUE

Question No. 4,929—Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue):

1. From 1965 to date, did the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources subsidize mining exploration in the Constituency of Témiscamingue and, if so, what was the aggregate amount?

2. In each case (a) what was the purpose (b) who was the recipient (c) what was the amount (d) what was the year (e) what was the result?

Mr. Maurice Foster (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): 1. The Department of Energy, Mines and Resources has not subsidized any mining exploration program in the constituency of Témiscamingue since 1965. The Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act provided some funds to gold mines in the area but there was no provision for exploration in the EGMA program.

2. Not applicable.

COPY OF CONTRACT WITH LOCKHEED AND AGREED FORMULA

Motion No. 97—Mr. McKinnon:

That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency praying that he will cause to be laid before this House a copy of the proposed contract between Lockheed Corporation of Burbank, California and the Government of Canada for the purchase by Canada of eighteen Long Range Patrol Aircraft, including the agreed formula as outlined at page 11617 of Hansard dated March 9, 1976.

Mr. Walter Smith (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, it is deemed inappropriate to table before this House papers relating to negotiations leading up to a contract until the contract has been executed or the negotiations have been concluded. MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER S.O. 26

[English]

NATIONAL DEFENCE

PURCHASE OF "ORION" AIRCRAFT FROM LOCKHEED CORPORATION

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I ask leave, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), to move the adjournment of the House under Standing Order 26 for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter requiring urgent consideration, namely, the serious possibility that the cabinet will decide tomorrow to proceed with the $1 billion order of Orion aircraft from the Lockheed Corporation in spite of the fact that the financial position of this corporation is dangerously precarious and therefore could lead to a major financial loss for the people of Canada.

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 26, the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent) has given the Chair the required notice. I wish to make an observation, first, concerning the importance of the matter.

There is no question that the matter is of considerable importance and is certainly worthy of consideration and discussion. However, the conditions that are contained in Standing Order 26 are quite specific. The language is worth repeating, particularly with regard to the description in that Standing Order of the urgency that is involved. That, of course, is one of the primary questions which the Chair must decide. The Standing Order reads:

Leave to make a motion for the adjournment of the House for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter requiring urgent consideration must be asked immediately before the calling of government orders.

The operative words, therefore, are "requiring urgent consideration". The matter is certainly specific and important, as required by the rule. The question the Chair has to decide is: Does the matter require urgent consideration and, if so, why? In that respect, it is the language of the motion which would indicate the urgency, because it states:

—for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter requiring urgent consideration, namely, the serious possibility that the cabinet will decide tomorrow to proceed with the $1 billion order of Orion aircraft from the Lockheed Corporation.

The matter of urgency, therefore, is the fact that the cabinet may decide and, if so, would decide tomorrow to proceed with that order. The first concern I have, although this is not the ground for the decision, is that the matter has been before the House for some time. It has now, because of the possibility of a decision tomorrow, acquired some urgency. It seems to me that the matter has had urgency all along. It has been before the House. The minister has been before the standing committee with his estimates. I have not, of course, examined the record there, but I would be very surprised if hon. members had not availed themselves of the opportunity to question the minister before the standing committee on this matter. The minister has certainly been questioned in the House.

The concern that I express, and again I say it is not the basis for the decision because I can foresee the possibility in which these circumstances might exist and still a debate ought to be ordered under Standing Order 26, is simply this: the matter has been before the House, having first been raised, if my recollection is correct, before Christmas. It has been before the House for several weeks. It has perhaps acquired more urgency as it has gone along. Is it possible, on the eve of an important development in respect of that matter, to bring in a motion and say that that important development which takes place tomorrow now gives it an urgency it did not have two or three weeks ago and, therefore, the House ought to set aside this evening to discuss it? Again I say it is a concern that I express but not one upon which I base the decision. The one upon which I base the decision is the fact that the matter may be decided by cabinet tomorrow.

I think hon. members realize that if the Chair once accepts that as a definition of the urgency it would qualify as a subject for acceptance pursuant to Standing Order 26, this could cause a problem since, presumably, every matter which is on the regular cabinet a problem agenda for Thursday morning ought to be, and I am sure all members agree, of serious concern— otherwise it would not be there in the first place. Since it is fairly well known that cabinet meets every Thursday morning, if the Chair once accepts an imminent decision by cabinet on Thursday morning as being proper grounds for coming within the rules, then every Wednesday the Chair will have the decision of selecting which items in the forthcoming cabinet agenda ought to qualify for a Wednesday evening discussion.

Certainly, that may be a very desirable practice in the House in terms of relevant debate, but it does not seem to me that was the intention of Standing Order 26 in those matters. Therefore, for that consideration I decline at this moment, in the circumstances, to grant the debate under Standing Order 26.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

CRIMINAL LAW AMENDMENT ACT (NO. 1), 1976

MEASURES FOR BETTER PROTECTION OF CANADIAN SOCIETY AGAINST CRIME

The House resumed, from Tuesday, March 30, consideration of the motion of Mr. Basford that Bill C-83, for the better protection of Canadian society against perpetrators of violent and other crime, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, last night when we adjourned to the other place for royal assent in order to get moneys to pay our civil servants I was speaking about the matter of gun control. I think it can be said that few issues have raised more interest throughout the country, including capital punishment. I have received a much greater number of letters on this issue than on capital punishment. For example, I have here a petition from the village of Gilbert Plains, in my constituency. It reads:

> We, the undersigned, strongly protest the legislation presently before the House imposing undue restrictions upon responsible firearm owners.

When one considers it is signed by 500 people out of a population of 1,000 it shows how important it is. Therefore, I hope there will not be any curtailment of debate on this issue. It is of great importance, particularly to those who live in rural areas. When you examine the legislation you find it will do little, if anything, to reduce the use of guns in crime. However, it will seriously inconvenience sportsmen, legitimate gun owners. In fact, it may make them more susceptible to disturbances in our society.

I mentioned previously that the taking away of guns from the general population could result in loss of the militia effect that has been a time-honoured vehicle for the presentation of liberties in western countries in times past. I have read that in Switzerland there is no restrictive legislation whatever to curb the general use of firearms of any kind, but in no country of Europe is the use of firearm more general. Every able-bodied male is required by law to possess and know how to use military rifles. In addition, he can own all the pistols he likes, contrary to our law at present, and rifle and pistol shooting is universally indulged in by all classes of people. Yet is is conceded that in Switzerland crimes of violence are extremely rare, which obviously indicates that the use of firearms does not promote crimes of violence unless the conditions are conducive to violence.

Regarding crimes of murder, the statistics are most interesting. Based on the Canadian experience, it seems fair to conclude that most murders involving firearms take place in a domestic environment. Most murders are not ingeniously planned, but occur on the spur of the moment. The people involved are not chronic criminals, but husbands, wives, neighbours and friends. I understand that of the 272 shootings in Canada in 1974, 97 took place in a domestic environment—husband and wife—111 took place in a quasi-domestic involvement, and of the balance, 19 were committed during the commission of a crime and 45 remained unresolved.

Because the majority of murders in Canada and the United States have occurred among families, an attempt has been made to classify these so-called intimate murders. It is interesting to note the results of one study by L. A. Rotenberg and R. L. Sodeff which appeared in two journals, "Corrective Psychiatry" and "The Journal of Social Therapy (1970)." The two authors and scientists isolated two distinct groups, an anti-social group and a schizoid group. The anti-social group was the most stable, and while those belonging to it kept guns readily at hand, whenever they committed a crime the weapons were not used unless that crime was contested.

Study of the schizoid group showed that a gun formed an integral part of unpredictable action. It might be possible to weed out the use of guns by those in the schizoid group by a requirement for registration backed by psychiatric investigation. The legislation before us is, I suggest, based on the presumption that somehow the person who issued the licences will be able to spot people with schizoid personalities or anti-social tendencies and prevent their having access to weapons, thus lessening the incidence of homicide. It is difficult to see how this could be done in practice without denying registration to a large portion of the population.

Turning to the other group involved in the study I have just mentioned, the researchers found that before committing a crime there was nothing in their behaviour that would enable them to be distinguished from others. They conformed to normal patterns of behaviour to the extent that they would obviously be able to acquire a firearm through a licensing agency without a great deal of trouble. In other words, a screening program would be almost impossible to administer. Irrational behaviour among members of the latter group mentioned is almost impossible to spot.

Some people have maintained that access to a gun is a prerequisite to crime. But shootings occur in the case of only half the murders committed in Canada, and if guns are unobtainable it is probable that most of the murders which involved shooting would have been committed in some other way. I would point out that, as things stand, Canada's gun laws are already quite restrictive. The premise that even stricter gun laws would reduce the crime rate should be seriously questioned. It seems obvious to me that stricter gun laws will not do much to prevent violent crime. Indeed, they will likely have only a negative impact on the crime rate. For such measures to be effective, it would be necessary to abolish the use of guns completely, and it is doubtful that this could ever be enforced.

There has been some discussion about the right of individuals to be in a position to defend themselves. I would remind hon. members that a police force cannot be in all places at all times. Only a relatively small number of our citizens can be involved in actual police work. When Hitler came to power in Germany, he took away the guns from his people and whenever he occupied a country he took guns away from its population. My information is that the U.S.S.R. private citizens have no freedom to own guns. Even the few who are able to use guns to hunt for food, for example, must return them directly after use to the local equivalent of commissar or military post.

On the other hand, there is the attitude adopted in Switzerland where every able-bodied man is expected to be proficient in the use of guns and where there is extensive private ownership of guns. Surely, there is a moral in this. It is that totalitarian countries largely restrict the use of guns to the police force and the military, while democracies rely on a different approach, one which encourages citizens to use guns and to own them. I submit that in any discussion about the use of guns, this aspect should be considered.

If it is suggested that the restriction of gun ownership would prevent or minimize death by guns, why not consider the case of automobiles, motor cycles and snowmobiles? All these vehicles cause many times the number of deaths that guns do. The way to prevent such deaths would obviously be to ban these machines altogether, but no government would suggest doing so, simply because they are too much a part of modern living.

Turning to the bill itself, let me say there is obviously much to be desired. The role to be played by the local registrar interests me somewhat. Presumably, he will be expected to spot the individual of unsound mind, one who might have a tendency to act irrationally, or one who is known or suspected to be a criminal. This I suggest, is a very exacting and onerous assignment. As usual, the registrar will fall between two stools; either he will be too lenient and give out licences freely, destroying the value of the licence and the purpose to which the bill is directed, or, if he is too strict, problems will be created the other way.

Take the case of a man known to have a criminal record, for instance. It is assumed that such an individual has paid his debt to society, tha he has become a reformed citizen and is consequently entitled to the rights enjoyed by all other citizens. I can well imagine a registrar who takes his work seriously, phoning the local police office to find out whether or not a particular individual has a police record or whether he is known to the police as being a person of unsound mind. In the event, the local police as being a force might well become the ultimate arbiter in deciding whether or not an individual should receive a licence.

Then, again, the provision that an applicant must find two individuals who will permit their names to be used as a guarantee that the individual seeking a licence is of sound mind, and so on, gives rise to some reflection. The legislation describes these guarantors in clause 106.1(3)(c) as "members of a class or classes of person from time to time prescribed by the regulations." They must indicate that they have known the applicant for at least two years, that they have read the application and that to the best of their knowledge and belief there is no reason to believe the applicant is unfit to be in possession of firearms or ammunition. This is much more complex than the situation regarding passports. Furthermore, the local registrar of guns will certainly become a local czar.

There is another aspect of the bill that is not clear and which, presumably, will be dealt with by regulation. I refer to whether or not automatic shotguns or rifles will fall into the restricted class. I have said that fully half the rifles and shotguns that are now sold have an automatic capability, even though, generally speaking, for sporting purposes or bird and game shooting the number of shots that can be fired at any one time is a maximum of three. Many millions of these guns will not become restricted weapons.

Concern has been expressed by gun clubs, and members of clubs dedicated to shooting, that the new regulations will tend to put these clubs out of business. Even if the legislation does not do this, it will certainly make their life more complicated, and understandably they are quite upset and unhappy over this legislation. So often these people are community-minded and in most cases theirs is a worthy activity in society. Another group of individuals that seems to be hard hit by this law is the gun collectors who by and large, so far as I am aware, have not contributed to the crime statistics of this country in any way. Gun collecting seems to be a hobby with many people, a sort of link with the past, and in this day and age it is sometimes used as a hedge against inflation. I am told that the United Kingdom has reasonably sound regulations regarding people who collect guns as a hobby.

There has also been comment about the provisions of the bill removing the 90-day notification clause in regard to wiretapping, generally viewed as a serious infringement of personal rights. Also, in addition to the existing provision relating to search and seizure under the authority of a warrant, the following amendment is proposed to section 105(2):

Where, with respect to any person, a peace officer is satisfied that there are reasonable grounds for believing that it is not desirable in the interest of safety of that person, or of other persons, that that person should have in his possession, custody or control any firearm or other offensive weapon or any ammunition or explosive substance and that the danger to the safety of that person or other persons is such that to proceed by way of an application under subsection (1) would be impracticable, the peace officer may without warrant search for and seize any firearm or other offensive weapon or any ammunition or explosive substance in the possession, custody or control of that person.

This seems to be a very far reaching amendment and places in jeopardy the whole requirement that a warrant is necessary to search a home. The present limitation has been eliminated, namely, the assumption that an offence has been or is being committed as justification for entering premises other than a dwelling-house without a warrant. If approved, this amendment would provide blanket authority for any peace officer to enter any premises, including a dwelling-house, without a warrant, ostensibly to search for and seize firearms and ammunition. Hence, this gun legislation may well be opening up the way to a greater threat to civil liberties than generally thought. I think that this part of the bill contains extremely dangerous provisions and must be looked at very carefully. It seems to me that if this provision is accepted, any policeman who wanted an excuse to enter any building would now have one.

There are also many other interesting clauses in the bill; for example, the provision relating to the carrying of a weapon to a public meeting. Will the farmer who normally carries a weapon in his light truck be guilty of breaking the law when he attends, say, a 4-H club meeting? It would appear that he will. Again, the owner of a weapon who may have for some reason lent another person his gun will, it seems to me, incur severe penalties. I believe this point was made last night by the hon. member for Kent-Essex (Mr. Daudlin). I suggest that a person who is normally a law-abiding citizen could incur such a penalty inadvertently.

If I may bring my remarks on gun control to a conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I should like to refer to the view expressed by the Canadian Association of Chiefs of Police, that cessation of the sale of firearms will not remove them from the hands of those who would do violence. This association came down heavily against gun registration as being unrealistic and administratively unworkable. It does not seem likely to me that an ownership licence will be any more effective than registering a gun. In fact, I think it would be less effective. An ownership would have to be renewed every five years, whereas presumably there is no need to re-register a gun unless the owner wants to sell or dispose of it.

It is obvious, Mr. Speaker, that if the population at large has guns, more homicides will be inevitable. As I have pointed out previously, most murders are committed in the home and many of them would have occurred even without the licensing or registration of firearms. Only if all guns were prohibited would there be a satisfactory or significant drop in the number of gun murders. Various countries around the world, such as Sweden and Switzerland, have a high incidence of gun competence and gun ownership, and these countries are freer of crime than most other countries. In other words, there is nothing to indicate any correlation between the use of guns and the incidence of crime.

Once again, Mr. Speaker, may I reiterate my unhappy feeling about this omnibus bill that gun control has been introduced along with four or five other quite desirable amendments that would contribute, I believe substantially, to the fight against crime. I refer to the provisions relating to parole and those providing that provinces can institute crime inquiries, and so on. It is most important that the House allow the bill to go to committee, in accordance with the amendment moved by the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams), so we can separate the very controversial gun control provisions from the rest of the bill which is generally desirable. In that way better legislation might eventuate. I am sure we will find that, as presently drafted, the legislation will be of no value whatever in curtailing homicides or crimes committed with the use of a gun. In effect, the bill will be detrimental to law-abiding citizens in this country.

Mr. John Roberts (St. Paul's): Mr. Speaker, I want to speak briefly on this proposed legislation in order to reply to one or two of the comments made from the other side of the House, to indicate one or two areas of concern I have about the proposed legislation and also to state my fundamental and strong support for the basic principles of the bill. It is important legislation, and I hope the House will quickly finish its work at this particular stage so we can get the bill to committee where suggestions for change can be made and considered.

The first argument I should like to comment on is one that is frequently made by members on the other side and which, indeed, has been made again by the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Ritchie), namely, that controls do not work, that the attempt through this kind of legislative proposal to diminish deaths which take place through the use of a gun will not be effective. I would suggest to the hon. member that there is one relatively simple fact which throws doubt upon this argument. We know, for instance, that while controls applied to long-guns in Canada are similar to those in the United States, and the incidence of crime when using these guns is roughly parallel, there are much more rigorous controls in relation to hand-guns in Canada than in the United States.

As a result of these controls there is a rather dramatic difference in the possession of hand-guns in Canada and in the incidence of firearm incidents. I believe there are roughly 700,000 handguns in the possession of Canadians, while the number in the United States is 35 million—a ratio of 50 to 1 in comparison to the population, which is 10 to 1; and there is a much lower accident incidence in the use of hand-guns in Canada than in the United States. It is obvious that the stricter controls we have in Canada have been effective in persuading Canadians not to seek to hold hand-guns. Obviously, since 700,000 do hold them, those who feel a real, genuine need to have them do have them, but those who have only a marginal need to have them in their possession, having to meet relatively difficult requirements, have decided not to do so. It seems clear to me from this one example that we have a situation in which gun controls have been effective in diminishing the number of guns within society and the number of incidents in which these guns have been used for violence.

The basis of the hon. member's argument—I hope I do him no injustice in paraphrasing it—is, basically, that if someone really wants to kill another person, he will do so whether he uses a gun or some other means. It may be that those who are determined to kill one of their fellow human beings will find a method for doing so. The fact is that the large number of deaths that occur in Canada as a result of gun use do not take place in situations where there is that degree of premeditation. There are accidental deaths in Canada—about 100 a year—and there are suicides in Canada of about 2,500 a year. There are a large number of deaths that take place, not in situations of great premeditation but as a result of family disputes, periods of passion and sudden anger. There are many deaths which occur because of the mental unbalance, perhaps temporary, of individuals who have access to guns and are able to use them without that kind of long, deep reflection which, say, an organized, contract killer might use.

I think it is significant that of the number of deaths which occur in Canada through the use of guns, about half stem from domestic, family incidents or incidents where close friends are involved, and not in situations where there is a long period of deep-seated determination to do away with another person. They occur in situations of passion that come upon a person suddenly who finds a gun available with which to execute the victim. That is the kind of death which these controls are likely to diminish.

Undoubtedly, murders will still take place in Canada. The fact, now, is that almost half the deaths that take place in Canada occur as a result of gun shootings. It is also the fact that the larger proportion of these could be avoided since they take place in situations of spontaneous passion or anger. This is the kind of incident to which this legislation is directed.

The hon. member for Dauphin cited the case of the automobile. I cannot understand his argument. He said, "Look at the automobile. A large number of deaths take place each year as a result of its use". Is he suggesting, therefore, that we should ban the use of the automobile? Then he dropped the argument at that point. Surely the relevant question is, would he seriously suggest that we do away with licensing of automobile drivers, and would we do away with licensing of automobiles in order to make sure they are in working order and are not a danger to those driving on our roads? Surely, he would not.

Surely, the parallel with automobiles is this: the automobile can be a dangerous instrument, and because it is a dangerous instrument we set tests for those who wish to use it to ensure that they are capable of using it wisely and properly, and we set tests to ensure that the mechanism of the automobile is safe to be on our highways. It is exactly that kind of test that we are proposing to impose in relation to guns, to ensure that those who wish to use them are licensed properly, and to ensure that they will be used safely and wisely and do not fall into the hands of those who may use them unwisely as a result of emotional disturbance, as a result of accidents or as a result of circumstances of passion that suddenly arise. This is exactly what we are applying. We are saying, here is an instrument that is capable of great danger and its use in our society should be controlled through regulation to make sure it is only the responsible who use them. That is what this legislation says.

I cannot, for the life of me, understand why members of the opposition are not able to accept that simple argument and support the principle of the legislation on these grounds. They may argue as they may wish in committee as to the details of how these regulations should be properly applied, but the principle is clear: an instrument dangerous to the person using it, and dangerous to the rest of society, should be hedged around with restrictions and controls that ensure as best we can that such instruments will be used prudently and sagely and not recklessly or irresponsibly.

I am anxious that this legislation should go before the committee. I share some of the concerns expressed by the other side that perhaps the provisions which relate to automatic weapons in the hands of collectors which would, under the proposals, become prohibited, may be too severe. We might, in committee, wish to look carefully at how we can enable collectors to maintain automatic weapons as a collection with the automatic weapon denatured, if you like, from its ability to cause damage. That is a matter which might well be considered in committee.

I should like to turn briefly to a rather different aspect of the legislation respecting which I wish to indicate to the House one or two concerns I have, in the hope that these concerns may result in changes the committee will decide to make. The first of these refers to clause 10 of the legislation which proposes to repeal section 178.23 of the Criminal Code. This is the section which ensures at present that notice will be given in 90 days to those who have been subjected to legally authorized wiretapping after the termination of the wiretap. The proposal in the legislation is to repeal that section so there will no longer be an onus upon police officers and those charged with the administration of justice to inform people who have been subject to wiretapping of what has taken place. I can understand some of the concerns the police may have, that in making a very serious investigation, when they are not able to produce immediate results or results in the short term, the provision as it now exists in the code will cause harm by alerting those people, who may very well be guilty of very serious offences, of the fact that they are under scrutiny and surveillance.

I think very few of us in this House would be happy to accept a proposal under which a police officer or member of a governmental administration would be able to open and examine the mail coming to a citizen's home, close it and send on the message, never even informing, if it were an acceptable practice at all, the individual that he was under this kind of surveillance. We in this House would not accept that. We would regard it as an overzealous intrusion into privacy no matter what the motivation by which it was undertaken.

I suggest the same principle applies to wiretapping. It is a very severe intrusion upon privacy, which I think most of us would consider to be going too far. I would regret very much if we did not wish to ensure, through some sort of mechanism, that those who have been subject to such surveillance be made aware of it, particularly because I believe that without some sort of notice provision it would become much easier for illegal wiretaps to be conducted and not brought to the attention of the authorities.

It is my hope that the committee, when it is conducting its consideration, will look carefully at the proposition in clause 10 to repeal what I think is an important safeguard in the present legislation. It may be that the committee will be able to come up with other safeguards that meet my concern effectively. It may be the committee will decide to return to the original 90-day provision. It may be, for instance, that when applying to the judge, the judge could determine the period within which the citizen under surveillance must be informed of the fact. I suppose these questions of detail should not be disucssed at this stage, but I hope the committee will look very seriously into the concerns I have expressed.

With relation to the wiretapping provisions, my second concern is the proposal in clause 8 to amend section 178.16 of the Criminal Code. The effect of this amendment is to enable indirect evidence, found through an illegal wiretap, to be used in court cases. I can understand the frustration of police officers, coming across evidence which would establish clearly that a person has been guilty of great crime that that evidence is not admissible because it has been obtained as a result, not directly but as a result of further investigatory work, of information brought to their attention through an illegal wiretap. However, I do not see how one can get around the basic problem that if such evidence is to be admissible, it obviously provides an incentive to police authorities to engage in illegal wiretaps knowing that, at worst, the information they are able to collect through them would be available to the court and would be brought to bear against those they wish to prosecute.

There is no incentive in this provision to persuade police officers not to undertake that kind of illegal activity, and because of the nature of wiretapping it is extremely difficult for illegal wiretaps successfully to be brought to a conclusion. Perhaps hon. members could inform me of some, but I do not know of any prosecution or charge which has been made in relation to police officers using illegal wiretaps. I think it would be extremely difficult to bring such charges. Under those circumstances, I think we should do what we can to restrict the incentive for police officers to undertake illegal operations in a way which can lead directly to further information which will help them in the course of their work.

Perhaps I would say, parenthetically, that I do not wish my remarks to be interpreted as an indication that I believe police forces regularly, or as a matter of course, undertake such illegal wiretaps. That is not my argument at all. I have great respect for our police forces. I have on occasion gone out with the police in Toronto in their work at night, and I have tremendous respect for them. That is not my point. My point is that I think it would be wrong to establish, through this legislation, any incentive which might encourage police officers to undertake illegal actions in the knowledge that such illegal actions might be helpful to them in the prosecution of their work.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Roberts: Those are my concerns, and I hold those concerns even though I support very strongly the principles of this legislation and wish to see them implemented. Therefore, I am hopeful that the House will finish its discussions at this stage as quickly as possible so we can get the matter into committee and consider some of these concerns and others raised by hon. members. I hope the committee will see fit to make some changes to take into account the kinds of concerns I have expressed. I hope we will be able to bring this legislation back into the House quickly, have it passed and operating effectively in order to assist in the provision of peace and security for the Canadian public.

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, if hon. members of the House have listened to this debate, or if they listened to any of the discussions which have taken place in the House or in the committee which dealt with matters of justice in recent years, they would have heard calls for toughening up our laws and calls for dealing in a much more strict way with criminals who break the law. One cannot help being struck by the difference in views expressed by many members of parliament who are—and I recognize this—expressing the views of their constituents. However, le us compare those views with the views of every expert group, every expert committee and every expert commission which has been appointed by federal or provincial governments in recent years.

I have before me the latest report of the Law Reform Commission which was published just a week or ten days ago, entitled "Our Criminal Law". The Law Reform Commission is a very distinguished group headed by Mr. Justice Patrick Hartt of the Ontario Supreme Court. It has been studying the questions of criminal law for, I think, five years. I want to put on record just a couple of sentences from its report, as follows:

> In theory the law aims to promote humanity. In practice it is frequently itself inhuman. Canada, it has been shown, is one of the harshest western countries when it comes to use of prison sentences. Many of the terms imposed are too long, half the people in prison should never be there, and so many are in jail that those few needing real care and attention cannot get it. Indeed the whole system resembles a vast machines sucking people in one end, spewing them out the other and then sucking them back in again—a self-generating mechanism, certainly not a human process.

Then it says something which so many have said in this country, both in parliament and outside:

> For all the respect we pay to justice and equality, we still have one law for the rich and another for the poor.

Why is there this fundamental cleavage, not between do-gooders and the ordinary citizens but between experts such as those who served on the Law Reform Commission or those who served on an earlier committee headed by Mr. Justice Ouimet? Why that difference? It seems to me there are several reasons for that: first, because there has been in Canada, as in every other country, both in the eastern world and the western world, a sharp increase in crime in recent year; second, I think it is because every year or two the public reads a report from one of these commissions with recommendations that we should have a different system, that we should have fewer people in jail, that we should have more probation and parole, and that we should segregate first offenders from hardened criminals. The public assumes that because the commissions have recommended these things, we have in fact done them, and that since we have done these things and since crime continues to increase, these recommendations have not worked and will not work. The public is misinformed; the public misunderstands. We have never done most of the things which have been recommended by these committees and commissions which governments have appointed.

Our prisons are overcrowded because our parole officers carry case loads which are so big that they cannot possibly do a good job or as a good a job as they should do in deciding who should get parole and who should not. We do not segregate first offenders who if they were not sent to jail would probably never commit a second crime. We have not really examined the problem of how to deal with the native people who are in our jails and who in western Canada at least make up substantially more than 50 per cent of the jail population. I think with regard to women the figure is probably over 60 per cent of the jail population. We have not really examined the reasons native people commit crimes for which they are sent to jail, almost all of which crimes are associated with the misuse of alcohol. We have not really thought through a method of dealing with native offenders as compared with white offenders who are in jail for entirely different reasons.

It is for all these reasons that our system is not working, and because our system is not working people are asking for tougher and tougher sentencing, which has not worked in the past and which will not work in the future. We need to change our whole approach, and in the two bills introduced—this one and the one dealing with capital punishment—there is no indication that the government has any real intention of changing its approach in a fundamental way other than just changing words and phrases. Because I believe that is so, I do not foresee any real reduction in the number of people who commit crimes and the number of people who will be sent to jail in the near future.

I want to spend some time dealing with two or three specific matters dealt with in this bill. First of all, there is the question of gun control. Let me begin by saying that I doubt if there is a member in the House who has had less experience in the use of guns than I have. So I make it clear that I do not speak as an expert. I speak because it is an important question, and because such a large number of my constituents have written, telephoned or seen me to discuss this matter, mostly to register their objection to the proposal which the government is making. I find it interesting that I am frequently advised by the people who speak to me on these two questions that I should vote for capital punishment—although I disagree with capital punishment—because 80 per cent or more of the people shown in the Gallup poll have been for capital punishment.

People who urge me to vote against the proposals to license guns do not tell me that 83 per cent of the people in the Gallup poll have indicated that they are for some form of gun registration. I will vote for this bill on second reading, and for the licensing of guns, although I believe a large number of questions must be answered in committee before I can be certain that I will vote for this measure on third reading. I will vote for it because I cannot help but be appalled by the large, continuing increase in the number of deaths and injuries as a result of the deliberate or accidential use of guns. Figures given to us in the material prepared by the government are pretty startling. Murders committed with firearms increased from 178 in 1970 to 272 in 1974. There are now probably 10 million long-guns such as rifles and shotguns in the possession of Canadian citizens. More and more guns have been used in the commission of violent crimes. I am appalled by those figures, and if licensing of guns will tend to reduce their use, I have to vote for this bill.

I listened very carefully to the hon. member for St. Paul's (Mr. Roberts) who spoke before me. He put on the record some very interesting statistics showing that the number of deaths as the result of the use of hand-guns is very much lower in Canada than it is in the United States. He said that this was because—and I have to agree with him—for years we have required the registration of hand-guns and therefore we have a much smaller percentage of hand-guns in the possession of Canadian citizens than they have in the United States.

I will not repeat his statistics, but I want to put on the record the comments of the chief of police in Detroit whom I heard on a CBC radio program some ten years ago. Ten years ago Detroit was, as it is now, the murder city in the United States. There are more murders committed in Detroit in one year than there are in all of Canada. The chief of police said, during that radio interview some ten years ago, that thousands of people in Detroit are buying revolvers because they say they want to protect themselves and their families in case there is a race riot. He said that they had had very few race riots and even less deaths in Detroit, but people have the guns. What happens is that some Saturday night, two couples are playing bridge and have had too much to drink: the wife makes a particularly bad bid, and the husband—who in the old days, before he had a gun, might have reached over and hit her across the chin—gets angry, takes the gun and shoots and kills her. That is what is happening with the use of guns in Detroit.

We have avoided that in Canada, and I hope we can avoid it by what they have had in the United States, that is, by licensing guns which it is proposed should be licensed, and therefore cutting down on the use of guns, particularly the use of guns by people who have had no experience and who do not know how to use them. When I say that, I automatically exclude people who belong to game and fish clubs and people who belong to gun clubs. I am not worried about them, because they have had experience and training in the use of guns. Having said I intend to vote for the basic principle of this bill, and particularly this section, I want to raise a number of questions which I think are quite legitimate and have to be answered either in this debate or in committee before I can feel 100 per cent certain that I can vote for the bill on third reading.

I am thankful to the game and fish clubs and to the gun clubs which have raised questions and objections to this bill. Many of their objections and questions are quite legitimate—I will put some on the record—but many, I believe, are exaggerated and have been brought forward by their misunderstanding and lack of knowledge of the bill. What are some of the questions being raised? I am concerned about the difficulties which native people, and indeed all people living in isolated areas of the Northwest Territories, northern Ontario, northern Quebec and northern British Columbia, will have in getting a licence. It will not be difficult—at least, it will be easy—for someone who lives in Winnipeg, Vancouver, Ottawa or Toronto to go to whoever is the licensing authority and get a licence, but for people who live 100 or 200 miles from the licensing authority, who may be an RCMP officer or some other appointee, I think it may be difficult. I want an explanation of how this system will work.

I see some difficulties, also, with the question of age. I am not concerned about the age of people living in the cities, because those who use guns do so largely for sport or recreation. But this law is not good enough for the people I have spoken about who live in the isolated and underdeveloped areas, farm people who have to live with various predators such as skunks, gophers and weasels. You cannot say that such person must be 16, 18 or over 14. I think we must have a good deal of discussion about this question.

I am also concerned about the question of guarantors. It may be easy to get two guarantors in a city, but I think that for somebody living on the edge of the Arctic ocean it may be difficult to get two guarantors. Then, Mr. Speaker, there is the question of the cost of licensing. I am sure the minister will not be surprised to hear that I have discussed this question with the attorney general of Manitoba. He said, "Here is another illustration of Ottawa passing legislation which we will have to administer. We have had discussions with the police, and they estimate that in terms of manpower it will cost them $30 to $40 to get character references and issue a licence to an applicant." That is a lot of money, Mr. Speaker.

● (1610)

Before we vote on this bill, I think the minister should indicate what discussions his department has had with the provinces and who will be responsible for the costs, who will pay the bill. A farm family with three or four people likely to be using a gun would face a stiff licensing bill. At committee stage it is likely that some of my colleagues will put forward a suggestion that provision be made for a mandatory training program for all new applicants for licences, not those who already have a hunting licence or target-shooting licence. Wherever possible, such a mandatory training program should be made available under the auspices of fish and game or wildlife organizations. I intend to vote for this bill, Mr. Speaker, and for this provision but these are the questions that I believe still have to be asked.

I should like, now, to put on the record some of the criticisms advanced by FARO—the Firearms for Responsible Ownership organization. I have a document which was circulated at a large meeting in Winnipeg, and a reply prepared by the Department of the Attorney General. The latter document states on page 1:

> Everyone is responsible for his safe handling and storing of firearms and ammunition. If someone steals your gun and misuses it—you are responsible.

[Mr. Orlikow.]

Mr. Speaker, I cannot believe this is the intention of the bill. I asked the Department of the Solicitor General for comments, and they sent me a seven-page written reply which I have forwarded to the interested parties. This reply is prepared by the co-ordinator of the working group on gun control, Mr. R. D. Gualtieri. The following is what he says on page 1:

> Responsibility for safe handling, storage, etc.—the proposed S.99(2) in the bill does not create criminal or civil liability of the owner for the misuse of a weapon by a thief. It simply makes the careless or unsafe use, carriage, handling or storage of a firearm or ammunition a criminal offence, for which an offender may be liable to up to five years' imprisonment.

I will not go over all the clauses, but the next one says that without a warrant the police can search your house and seize firearms and ammunition. Mr. Speaker, the bill does say that, but it has some very clear limitations. Here is the explanation provided for me which I want to put on the record, again quoting from the letter I received, page 2:

> Search and seizure without warrant—Under normal circumstances, police may search anyone or anywhere (except in a private house), and make seizures, only when they believe on reasonable grounds that a firearm-related offence is being, or has been, committed (S.103(1). In addition in cases of immediate or imminent danger to the safety of any person, police will be empowered to seize a weapon from the possession of a person, where it would be impractical to wait to apply for a warrant for this purpose (S.105(2). Both of these conditions must be met however. The bill does not, therefore, give unrestricted powers of search and seizure to the police, as suggested by FARO's summary.

I am sure that with my record in this House in regard to questions of police and justice no one would suspect that I would favour giving indiscriminate power to the police. I put this on the record to indicate that there are many questions which have been asked and not answered to the satisfaction of a large number of people in the country.

I now want to deal with the proposals with regard to dangerous offenders. When I read the material and listen to the speeches of the minister and compare them with the recommendations made in the Ouimet committee report of 1969, I have to say to the government that, while it seems to be following the committee recommendations to some extent, the committee's main recommendations with regard to the provision of adequate facilities and the need for study of things being done in this field have not been implemented. Let me put on record a few of the recommendations of the Ouimet committee. At page 257 the report reads:

> The committee recommends that the present habitual offender legislation and dangerous sexual offender legislation be repealed and replaced by dangerous offender legislation.

That is what we seem to be doing. At page 262 it says:

> The committee, therefore, recommends the passing of an indeterminate sentence upon persons found to be dangerous offenders, subject to the safeguards hereinafter discussed.

Again, the proposals before us seems to be directed to that end. At the bottom of page 262, this appears:

> The committee recommends that the proposed dangerous offender legislation, if enacted, provide in addition to an automatic yearly assessment and review by the Parole Board, that a person sentenced to preventive detention as a dangerous offender be entitled to have a hearing every three years before a superior, county or district court judge or judge of the court of sessions of the peace, for the purpose of determining whether he should be further detained or his sentence should be terminated if he has been released on parole.

Then page 264 of the report reads:

The committee recommends that government grants be made for research devoted to the development of new and improved methods for identifying and treating the dangerous offender.

At page 265 the report reads:

The committee recommends that further research be undertaken to determine the most appropriate way in which to deal with the persistent petty offender.

As far as I know, Mr. Speaker, most of these recommendations were not followed, and now we are starting again with insufficient knowledge of how to deal with the question. Our institutions are overcrowded. Some people who have worked in and with the institutions and regional centres, such as the one at Abbotsford, tell me the institutions are not working as they were intended to work. The original idea was to segregate special cases such as dangerous offenders. It was intended that prisoners sentenced to long terms for serious crimes could be sent to a centre like Abbotsford where they could receive treatment which, hopefully, would change them and keep them from committing such crimes in the future. But apparently, partly because of tremendous overcrowding, acute cases are being sent to Abbotsford, and I presume other centres, for short terms in order to get the kind of treatment which should be available to them in the institutions in which they are already incarcerated.

● (1620)

Because prisoners are sent to an institution a long way from home, away from friends and family, the chance of successful treatment is lessened. Also, because the staff turnover in institutions like Abbotsford is high, rehabilitation programs are not successful. We have not been successful because we have not studied the problem in the way the Ouimet committee suggested in 1969. Various royal commissions have studied this question. We now know that a certain percentage of prisoners, about 5 per cent, are hopeless cases. On release they will revert quickly to old habits and commite further crimes. If that is so, and I have no reason to doubt it, then instead of labelling these criminals as dangerous offenders and putting them away for a long time, why not recognize them for what they are, criminals incapable of change? Therefore, I submit we should build preventive detention centres where prisoners serving long sentences, say from 20 and 25 years, will be humanely treated during their incarceration. So far we have not done the necessary research and studies to enable us effectively to segregate dangerous from not dangerous offenders. So far our attempts to identify these people and sentence them accordingly have been inadequate.

Lastly, and briefly, let me talk about wiretapping. Obviously, the majority government now wants to do what it could not do as a minority government. In the last parliament, the then minister of justice, who is now Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang), wanted to give the police the wide powers being proposed in this bill. He was unable to do it because New Democrats, Conservatives and even Liberals opposed him. I remember that the hon. member for Fundy-Royal (Mr. Fairweather), the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) and others were against the proposal, as were some government backbenchers who believe in civil liberties and the right of Canadians to privacy. Not even they could swallow the proposals of the then minister of justice. Now it is different. Now the government has a majority.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The Senate tried to do what the then minister of justice could not do.

Mr. Orlikow: As my colleague from Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) reminds me, the Senate tried to do what the then minister of justice could not persuade the House of Commons to do. We let the Senate know it could not overrule the House of Commons. Now the government proposes, again, essentially what the then minister of justice proposed. The bill provides, first, that in certain circumstances the police shall be allowed to use, at trial, illegally obtained evidence; second, that persons whose conversations had been intercepted need not be notified of the surveillance during surveillance; and third, that the priod of surveillance is to be extended from the original proposal. We oppose this. There is no evidence showing the police lack powers to control crime. There is no evidence showing wiretapping is a successful tool. According to my information, evidence in only 18 of 550 authorized wiretapping cases was actually used at trial. By itself, wiretapping does not do the job and can be a dangerous weapon. I remind hon. members of the powerful testimony the former attorney general of the United States, Ramsay Clark, gave before the justice committee several years ago.

I shall now mention something that happened in my city a few weeks ago. The police and the provincial attorney general's department of my province had reason to believe that a certain judge in Winnipeg was doing things which were either illegal or improper. The police went to the attorney general for authorization to conduct electronic surveillance of that judge's conversations. They did this quite properly under the law. I am not criticizing the police. I note a Conservative member shaking his finger at me as if suggesting that I ought not to be saying these things. I tell him that I have discussed what I am about to say with the attorney general of Manitoba and have his permission to speak.

The attorney general signed the application giving permission to wiretap telephones at any address used by the particular judge under suspicion. As I say, the attorney general gave that authority. The police, who were not acting illegally, put the tap on the trunkline which went into the office of the particular judge whose conversations were to be wiretapped. Unfortunately, that telephone line was part of the trunkline serving two other judges. Under the present law, the police were required to notify the other two judges of the electronic surveillance. They learned that the police had listened to their telephone conversations, and lo and behold were annoyed, to say the least—even flabbergasted. One was so upset that he wanted to move his office, which I can well understand. He did not want anyone listening to his telephone conversations.

Wiretapping is a potent instrument and a dangerous tool. It should be used with great care only in exceptional circumstances. I presume we do not want the police to break the law. Surely we should encourage the police to obey the law and act in accordance with the law. Therefore, allowing the police to use illegally obtained evidence, or to wiretap indiscriminately, is a mistake. In all cases involving surveillance of a citizen we should require the police to act honestly. I am not sure this new law will encourage them to act openly. It does not require the police to notify people that they are being surveyed while the surveillance is continuing; they are to be notified only at the conclusion. The previous intention of a limited period and immediate notification at the end of that period is being abandoned. We consider this to be a real danger to our civil liberties. We therefore intend to propose amendments on this and other clauses.

Having said that, I and most of our group if not all, will support this bill on second reading. In closing, I want to say that it is our intention to be very tough. We will ask all the questions which we believe need to be asked in connection with all clauses of this bill before agreeing to its passage at report stage or on third reading.

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, may I say at the outset that I welcome the opportunity to participate in this debate on Bill C-83. I find it very amusing, listening to some members on the other side and members to my left. They go on at great length citing their misgivings and apprehensions about the bill, but still intend to vote in favour of it. I refer particularly to the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow) who has just resumed his seat. I hope that gun owners in his area read his speech. I am sure they will not be very impressed with the vigour with which he has pursued his argument on behalf of gun owners in Canada.

This bill touches on a number of sections of the Criminal Code. I want to deal primarily with the section pertaining to firearms and other offensive weapons. This has commonly been referred to as the gun control part of the legislation. It has precipitated the amendment advanced on behalf of our party by the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams). As my colleague stated in his remarks, this particular section of the bill dealing with gun control constitutes the major part of this legislation. There are very few other measures that have been brought before this House that have generated the type and volume of mail which this subject has.

In reading the mail, one finds that the criticism is harsh and the representations are numerous. It is only natural for a member of parliament such as myself, representing a constituency and having received many objections in the form of letters and conversations, to speak on this bill. There are serious misgivings and fears about this bill. I might say that the misgivings and fears advanced to me by my constituents are those which I happen to share. Quite frankly, I can speak on this subject matter in a very objective fashion. I do not own a gun, I have never owned a gun, and I do not ever intend to own a gun. I really have no axe to grind because of my position as a gun owner. I simply want to place on record some of the feelings which I share, feelings about which gun owners throughout Canada have become apprehensive.

Naturally, there are some obvious concerns in the mind of the public with regard to the ownership of guns, their handling, storage, safety, and so on. While there is a general disposition on the part of the public to demand some tightening up and the establishment of control and safety standards, in respect of this bill and to the extent it meets those objectives I must say categorically that I find this piece of legislation exceedingly harsh and very offensive.

I agree with the hon. member for Calgary North who stated we should have a separate debate on gun control and another debate on the assortment of other Criminal Code amendments. To the extent it has been possible under our rules of procedure, the hon. member for Calgary North has moved an amendment on behalf of our party which indeed contains the spirit and intent of that desire. I congratulate him on his motion and commend it to the House for support.

There are—and this is where many of us find ourselves in a bit of a dilemma—a number of provisions contained in Bill C-83 with which I am sympathetic, such as the sections which deal with dangerous offenders, parole, the special crime inquiry section and crime prevention. I think it is fair to say that we on this side of the House have been advocating some of these measures in response to the government in its constant erosion of our laws and the disregard for the obedience and respect of the laws of our land, and in general the over-all gentle stance which has characterized this government in its approach to dealing with crime and the criminal element.

The government now says it recognizes the need for some tightening up. It recognizes that the public is demanding measures which will improve their protection and security. However, in addressing itself to the problem, to a large extent the measures which are being advanced are victimizing the law-abiding and peace-loving citizens of this country. One might be able to accept that if we were convinced that it will indeed reduce crime and violence in this country, or if we could get at the root causes of crime and deal firmly and harshly with criminals and the criminal element in our society. However—and I am sorry to say this—I am not convinced that this piece of legislation will achieve that objective.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mazankowski: This bill will do very little to deter the criminal. The section dealing with gun control is the government's response to the emotion and hysteria of a bewildered and frustrated society. It has addressed itself to that element, rather than engaging in a penetrating examination of the root causes of the chronic problem, that of violence in this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mazankowski: I submit we should be asking ourselves questions such as: What about the impact of television, the violence and filth that we see on our screens day after day and night after night? What about the dramatization and sensationalism of murder, robbing, mugging, rape and other violence on television? A recent survey conducted in the city of Edmonton revealed that more than 25 shows which were dished up on a weekend by Edmonton TV stations depicted violence.

An hon. Member: Not on the French channel.

Mr. Mazankowski: Maybe we should turn on the French channel. Is it not reasonable to assume that those who are emotionally disturbed, immature or very impressionable could be adversely affected by this professionally-packaged violence? Are not our school children prime targets for the glamour of violence? Another survey conducted in a Canadian city revealed that for 72 per cent of the students, in a general way crime had a major impact on their activities and, furthermore, they felt that crime and violence on our television screens should be reduced. The overwhelming majority have confirmed that.

What about the problem of alcohol in our society, and the problem of drugs? They are not mentioned in this piece of legislation. Surely these are integral components of the crime picture, but no mention is made of them in this bill, not even in the slick promotional propaganda which these two ministers have packaged for the Canadian public.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mazankowski: We have been presented with a professional public relations document, and a vast number of the people in this country are simply not buying it. I might go further and say that a lot of the contents of the emotional material are little more than emotional fluff. Moreover, in my view the material is based on biased statistics.

● (1640)

What else is at issue? In the minds of many Canadians there is a genuine feeling of cynicism, a feeling of mistrust about the motive of the government and exactly where it intends to lead us.

Mr. Paproski: We are all worried.

Mr. Mazankowski: Law-abiding citizens are concerned that their rights and freedoms are being whittled away under the simplistic guise of peace and security measures. Why this overkill? Are there sinister motives? Many people are apprehensive. Many are asking this very question. The bill is introduced by a government which has adopted the stance of coddling the criminal. Now we are presented with a package of legislation which would suddenly transpose this attitude into a policy of dealing more harshly with criminals. The government is listening to public opinion in the area of gun control, but not in the area of capital punishment. It disregards the polls which have been taken throughout the country in that connection. There is a glaring inconsistency in the government's approach.

The public is not buying this legislation, and rightly so. The bill addresses itself, not to the criminal but to the law-abiding citizen. In my view, the government is, and will continue to be, an administration which extends its compassion, not to the victim but to the criminal. It is the victims of crime who are being punished by this government, not the criminals. It is the innocent, the law-abiding citizens who will be the victims of this bill.

What is the issue before Canadians today? It is the issue of law and order, and to the extent that this package of legislation addresses itself to peace and order I suggest it is a misnomer. We require positive steps to establish an environment which will create greater respect for the law. Looking at the bill before us, we have to ask ourselves: Will it result in a greater respect for the law? The answer to that question is "No". Indeed, I suggest it will do exactly the opposite.

The latest edition of the report of the Law Reform Commission has been quoted from on many occasions during this debate. Reading through it, one finds such phrases as "The more laws, the more offenders", and "Assembly lines of dime-store justice". On another page the report says "our picture of the criminal justice system bears little resemblance to reality". In my view, those phrases are an adequate description of the legislation before us.

Furthermore, I believe the application of this gun control legislation would be weighted unfairly against the rural population, against the youth of our country and against our native population. In this connection I should like to place on record a letter which was forwarded to the editor of the St. Paul Journal and appeared in the edition of March 24. I should like to quote a section of the letter which outlines the apprehensions felt by the Metis Association of Alberta. The letter is signed by the association's president, Mr. Ambrose J. Laboucane. It reads in part:

> This type of legislation violates our rights as native people and disregards the democratic process that we, the people of this country, are so proud of and fought so dearly for in two world wars.
> I personally feel our government is violating the God-given laws that have been effective for centuries.

I say, further, that the bill will not be enforced fairly in the case of the poor and the underprivileged. Again, we need only look at the document which was tabled here last week, "Our Criminal Law," to find confirmation of this impression.

> In practice, the penalty (for crimes) often depends not on the nature of the crime but on the person who commits it. Our prison population contains a quite unrepresentative proportion of poor, of disadvantaged and of native offenders. The richer you are, the better your chance of getting away with something. Is it that rich men make the laws and so what rich men do is not a crime but simply shrewd business practice? Or is it that position and wealth protect the rich against intervention?

I see the section on gun laws being enforced along lines which bear the least resistance. The easy targets will be those who are underprivileged and unfamiliar with the law. I see the prospect of harassment levelled against innocent people who are caught in the web of this law on legal technicalities because of the difficulty they find in adjusting and altering their sports and cultural habits in line with the imposition of this law, one which is based upon sheer lunacy. This is a form of "innocent guilt" which is unjust, unnecessary and inexpedient.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mazankowski: There are areas where steps could legitimately be taken with respect to the use of firearms; for example, the development and administration of an effective safety program, the development of high standards of proficiency among sportsmen and hunters. In these respects, legitimate sportsmen organizations throughout the country have never been recognized; their recommendations have never been acknowledged; they have not been consulted or requested to provide input into the legislation we are considering. Surely an effective safety program could be worked out jointly between the federal government and the provinces in consultation with gun clubs, hunters' groups and fish and game associations. If this legislation is to command the co-operation and support it will need in order to make work, the minister and the government will have to go to these people and work with them.

For years, fish and game associations across Canada have been asking for some of compulsory, hunter training program or for some form of selective screening process. This limited objective was rejected by provincial government on the basis that it was overly cumbersome and costly. The federal government now comes along and unilaterally imposes a universal licensing and/or registration program that will be cumbersome, costly and complicated.

● (1650)

As far as the use of an offensive weapon while committing an indictable offense is concerned, penalties should be severe and they should be enforced. There can be no doubt, so far as I am concerned, that the courts and enforcement agencies have been overly lenient in this particular area. A general tightening up with respect to the issuance of permits for restricted weapons and the broadening of the prohibited class is a step in the right direction, providing the laws are enforced. However, here again we see the powers that are granted to the governor in council as being overly excessive and broad.

So while we have some very serious misgivings about this piece of legislation, Mr. Speaker, we recognize that there are areas where the government could act, and act in a co-operative fashion, with the hunters, gun owners and sportsmen, and indeed with the provinces. However, to impose the universal licensing and/or registration program that is advanced in this bill is, to me, nothing more than overkill.

We have to ask ourselves this question, Mr. Speaker: Will this law be effective in reducing deaths caused by guns through accident, murder or suicide? I say the answer is "No". As a matter of fact, I think a fair case could be made for saying that if the Criminal Code as it now stands were properly enforced, it would perhaps do more to minimize death and injury caused by firearms than the draconian measures advanced in this legislation.

For example, we have in this country a registration and licensing program for the owners of hand guns. The statistics that have been provided by the minister relating to gun control indicate that as of February, 1976, some 644,481 hand guns were registered and that some 50,000 hand guns were probably in circulation which were not registered. It is interesting to note that in spite of this provision—something that this bill sets out to do for all guns—the incidence of murder involving the use of hand guns has increased by 115 per cent over the past five years. That is a record which is clearly indicated on page 14 of the report.

Further, Mr. Speaker, one notes that armed robbery involving the use of hand guns has increased by 65 per cent over the last five years in Canada—two robberies out of three involve the use of hand guns—while armed robbery involving the use of long-guns has increased by only 17 per cent. What this means is that in spite of the registration and licensing provisions, the incidence of murder is increasing dramatically and the incidence of armed robbery has increased dramatically over the past five years.

So we have to ask ourselves: Why, then, are we imposing a licensing and/or registration system on the owners of long-guns in Canada? Why are they made the scapegoats? Where are the statistics to prove that the licensing and/or registration of shotguns and rifles will reduce murders and robberies in this country?

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether I might ask the hon. member a question. He asked how registration of long guns would have some effect. I would be delighted if he could point out to me any provision in the bill that proposes the registration of long guns and rifles.

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, I am glad the minister asked that question. Section 106(1) is very broad in nature. By government order in council, the powers can be extended to require registration of all guns. I appreciate the fact that the minister is listening to me, but I did expressly say in my comments the licensing and/or registration provisions, and I used that option.

Let me move on to suicides, where the same thing applies. These figures are bandied around in the packaging and merchandising of this gun control legislation, but is the minister really saying that by imposing a licensing and/or registration system for all firearms we are going to reduce the suicide rate in this country? He cannot seriously defend this legislation on that ground. If so, let him bring forth the statistics. If it can be proven to me that by imposing a licensing and/or registration system for all guns he could have saved one or more of the 1,021 lives lost through suicide committed by using a gun, we might be sympathetic and go along with his argument. I believe that by using the suicide statistics in trying to sell this package, the whole question of gun control becomes distorted, cloudy and confused. I submit that suicide has very little relevance to gun control as it applies to the licensing provisions.

Before this debate is concluded, Mr. Speaker, I should like the minister to prove unequivocally that licensing as proposed in this bill will either prevent or impede crimes of murder, robbery or any other form of violent crime involving the use of a firearm. I challenge him to prove to the Canadian people that guns will be kept out of the hands of criminals under the provisions of this legislation. I have yet to see any statistical proof, any projection at all, that does in fact lend some credence to this proposition.

Many members have cited statistics relating to other states and countries. The city of New York, for example, possesses some of the most restrictive firearms legislation on the North American continent, yet has one of the highest crime rates. It has been proven conclusively that registration is an expensive government exercise in futility. In Massachusetts, harsh gun law have been adopted which have proven useless in reducing crime. The Washington Post described the statute as the toughest gun control law in the nation which mandates an automatic one-year prison sentence for carrying a hand-gun without a licence, but says, however, that it has had little effect.

I could cite other statistics. But surely the minister and his colleagues are not so naive as to visualize criminals licensing and registering their weapons before committing a felony. The only people who will comply with this law are the law-abiding citizens of this nation, the very people for whom this legislation is totally and absolutely unnecessary.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mazankowski: There are better ways of getting to the core of the criminal problem than using a sledgehammer on the innocent, law-abiding gun owner of this country. Surely the hunters, target-shooters and gun collectors are not criminals, Mr. Speaker. If we dealt with our killers and criminals in a firm, harsh way, it would be the first positive step in stemming the tide of rising murder and violence. The law dealing with those who have threatened violence or use violence in a criminal act requires tightening up and firmer enforcement, and to that extent I welcome the provisions of this bill. The legitimate gun owner, in this particular case, should not be made the scapegoat.

It seems to me that quite a public relations job is being done here. The government has utilized a kid-glove policy in dealing with the criminal element in this country, and it now attempts to take it out on the legitimate gun owner. It has responded to the emotions of hysteria in relation to some dramatic episodes that have taken place in the last year or so. Had these episodes not involved the use of guns, they may have involved the use of some other weapon such as a bomb. My view is that if a person is bound to kill or has an absolute desire to kill, he will kill in one way or another, whether it be with a gun, a bomb, a sledgehammer, a knife or the fist. That is the core of the problem, and that is the problem to which this bill fails to address itself.

Having regard to accidental shootings, surely there is some need for improvement in this area such as by upgrading educational safety programs. I endorse that, as I endorse the idea of a uniform, countrywide mechanism for the training and testing of individuals in safe gun-handling practices. This should be mandatory, but it is not referred to in this bill and there is nothing in the bill that suggests this will be done. I repeat that what we need is stricter enforcement of existing laws, and less coddling of criminals. Stricter gun laws will not cut crime, but proper enforcement of existing laws will.

Let me deal now for a few minutes with the legislation as it relates to civil rights. The legislation itself constitutes a further encroachment upon the basic individual rights and civil liberties of Canadians. This has been the hallmark of this administration. We have had a form of press censorship, which was debated in the House in the last month or so. We have had a wage and price control program which started out to be selective and has now become universal, with the threat of becoming permanent. We have seen a move away from the free market economy. We have more and more government intervention, more regimentation, more inspectors and more statistics. We have growing confrontation between business and government, government and labour, and we have an increasing tendency toward individual Canadians becoming numbers rather than individuals. We have more licences, more permits, more bureaucracy, and more cost. We are told that the gun registration program in New York costs roughly $100 per person.

An hon. Member: Where did you find that?

Mr. Mazankowski: Those are the statistics. The way this government accelerates its spending, it will probably be more than that here. Civil liberties and individual rights can no longer be policies of the federal Liberal party. A lifelong Liberal, namely, Don Klein of Edmonton—and we have one or two in Alberta—wrote in the Edmonton Journal as follows:

> Such legislation is not gun control. It is people control, and an invasion of civil liberties directed only at law-abiding citizens.

Mr. Sharp: Just like the licensing of the automobile.

Mr. Mazankowski: We can go into that during another safety debate. Mr. Klein goes on to state:

> This endless barrage of useless legislation such as the proposed gun controls, which we are faced with every day of our lives, is breeding a profound disrespect for the law in this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mazankowski: Another man, Mr. E. L. Willson from Tofield, Alberta—I am not sure what his political persuasion is—writes the following—

An hon. Member: And where is that?

Mr. Mazankowski: If you would get out to that great province, I could take you around and show you where Tofield is. Mr. Willson writes:

> It is my unshakeable belief that if this restrictive piece of gun legislation is enacted the government of Canada will have
> 1) Created in one stroke the most expensive and unenforceable law ever written into the books
>
> 2) Created a monstrous new society of criminals (former law-abiding citizens who would balk at unfair legislation)
> 3) Made a giant step towards the creation of a totalitarian state, after all what easier country to take over than a disarmed one.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, this legislation has been described in various ways. It has been referred to as misleading, ludicrous, useless, irritating, senseless, asinine, pitiful, expensive, stunning, and worthless. Those are not my adjectives; they are an assortment of descriptions I have collected from a number of articles appearing in the press on this subject. I submit to you that all these descriptions are suitable and adequate.

This piece of legislation will create a massive bureaucratic network for the government, the police, the dealer and the public. It will cost millions of dollars to administer, but will do nothing to curb crime and violence. Edmonton city police staff inspector Mitchell has said that Canada's gun laws are already stringent and that our law books are already full of such statutes. He states:

> We are taking guns away from people every day and the next day they are back on the street, they are treated too damn lenient.

He goes on to state, as to people being compelled to safeguard guns, that all these safeguards do is to stop an honest man. The crook will get at the guns even if they are chained down in the house. I think that drives home the point very dramatically—and this is what a staff inspector of one of our major police forces in Canada had to say. As far as the requirement of a licence to continue ownership of the privately owned six million long-runs in Canada is concerned, it will do nothing to prevent their use by criminals. Section 106.1, to which I referred in answer to the minister, places in the hands of petty officials broad arbitrary powers. The imposition of regulations to provide such additional information and documentation at the whim of the local registrar can only result in undue harassment. The fees for licensing can be exorbitant, given the intended principle of self-financing of the bureaucracy. We can see that a prohibitive licence fee could be tantamount to an outright prohibition of firearms to the average person. We will end up with only the rich being able to afford the luxury of owning a gun.

The broad scope of powers granted to the governor in council is not clearly defined to prevent back door regulations which could prescribe total gun registration and alter restricted classes of weapons to the prohibited class. This is possible under the broad, sweeping powers granted under this bill to the governor in council. The interpretation of "ammunition" is so broad as to include anything from a lead fishing-weight to a spent cartridge to an atom bomb. Surely that has to be an asinine description. If it is possible for me to drive down the street in my automobile with a spent cartridge in my car and subjected to being charged under this law, surely this bill is overextending in its powers.

The sections dealing with legal responsibility arising from the handling and storage of firearms is something else not clearly defined. Whose judgment will be used, and what constitutes a "careless manner" or "reasonable precaution"? Will this interpretation be left to the regulations, or will it be left to the discretion of the police officer? The same thing applies to section 101.

I think the appeal procedures are overly complex and do not really constitute an effective procedure. I believe that the major thrust of any firearms legislation should address itself to two things: first, to restricting the use of firearms by criminals; second, to developing proficiency standards which will ensure the safe handling of firearms by good citizens in order to prevent harm and injury to themselves as well as to their fellow citizens. This bill fails to include training, testing and certification. It fails to include any sort of proficiency or competence test. Therefore, one can only assume that this bill represents something less than a genuine desire to get at the real root of the problem but is content to mislead the public into believing that severe regulations and restrictions imposed upon gun owners will.

The gun legislation, as it is drawn up, is the product of a government removed from reality, perhaps assisted and abetted by idealistic philosophies of overeducated bureaucrats who insist on imposing their views and solutions upon what they see as an uninformed and irrational public. This condescending approach does not serve the purpose of curbing crime and violence. As a matter of fact, it does not serve the best interests of society. If it is the sincere wish of this government to curb crime and violence, then I submit it should reconsider the proposals in this gun legislation and withdraw them or send this bill to committee for study before proceeding with second reading. That is the thrust of our motion and I support it as wholeheartedly and vigorously as I possibly can.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. McCleave): The hon. member for Ottawa-Vanier (Mr. Gauthier).

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I must say at the beginning that it is very nice to see you back in the chair. Since I first came into the House of Commons I have always had great respect for the way in which you have handled yourself and for the patience and fairness you have shown. For these attributes, I think this House owes you a great deal of thanks.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier): Mr. Speaker, obviously we are at the second reading stage and we are studying the principle enunciated in Bill C-83, an Act for the better protection of Canadian society against perpetrators of violent and other crime.

Until now, the debate has given rise to many comments from concerned organizations particularly about some clauses of the bill and it has also allowed many hon. members to give their point of view.

I receive—and I suppose that goes for many members as well—comments from my constituents and organizations concerned about gun control. The provisions of Bill C-83 are aimed indeed at eliminating those who would misuse guns and at controlling the availability of guns without unfairly prejudicing the legitimate use of guns for hunting or other sports. Those provisions are also aimed at applying severe standards governing the safe and proper use of those guns. They are mainly aimed at diminishing the use of guns in criminal acts by imposing more severe and new penalties.

So it is important that all groups concerned be heard before the House pass this legislation. It is at the committee stage, Mr. Speaker, when this bill will be studied in depth, that associations, organizations and individuals will make an important contribution. They will be able to voice their reservations and offer positive suggestions concerning amendments.

[English]

When the bill is studied in committee we can hear some of these organizations, such as the Ontario Arms Collectors' Association, the National Firearms Association, L'Association de tir de Québec, the Firearms and Responsible Ownership Group, the Saskatchewan Wildlife Federation, and many other groups from which I have received representations. We should seek the full co-operation of all these organizations and all levels of government in establishing rules and regulations with regard to gun control. It is, therefore, very important, if we are to reach consensus, that this bill be given second reading as soon as possible and sent to the committee for study and possible amendment.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I wish to inform the House that it has not been possible to reach an agreement under the provisions of Standing Order 75A or 75B in respect of proceedings at the second reading stage of Bill C-83, an act for the better protection of Canadian society against perpetrators of violent and other crime which is now under discussion. I therefore give notice of my intention to propose, at the next sitting of the House, a motion pursuant to Standing Order 75C for the purpose of allocating four further days for the consideration and disposal of proceedings on that stage of this bill.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

An hon. Member: You are afraid of your own shadow, and afraid of your own legislation.

An hon. Member: It won't stand up to public scrutiny.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. McCleave): Order, please. The hon. member for Ottawa-Vanier (Mr. Gauthier) has the floor. The last minute or so will not be counted against his time.

Mr. Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier): I am always astounded at the word "Shame" which is pronounced by members of the opposition with big smiles on their faces. They smile and yell "Shame". I wonder how serious they are.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier): I should like to have the amendments put into this bill, but hon. members opposite do not want the amendments put in because they do not want to go into committee.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

[Translation]

Mr. Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier): Taking for granted, Mr. Speaker, that my colleagues have all read Bill C-83 and knowing already that my constituents have received the documentation I sent them concerning the public order and security program, I will not deal with the subject as a whole since its factors or components are well known and largely publicized. I will rather emphasize an important element which is not included in the explanatory notes on the program, in the part dealing with the prevention of crime.

The basic principle of the amendment I would like to see examined by the committee would be to prevent any broadcaster from airing before 9 o'clock p.m. any program likely to promote, glorify or justify the use of firearms to settle conflicts. The previous speaker, the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski) talked about violence on television. It is that matter, Mr. Speaker, that I would like to discuss.

At any rate, Mr. Speaker, I was saying that the Canadian society, through its representatives, wants to take the necessary measures to get better protection against perpetrators of violent and other crimes, in so far as protection against crime requires by its very nature that we identify all the measures to be taken to prevent a rise in crime.

One of these factors has not been mentioned, in spite of the undeniable and increasing impact of its social import in our modern society. I refer to television or, in other words, to the daily presence of violence in every Canadian's life and particularly in the education of our youth. This problem is a very important one with which we must come to grips if we really want to prevent recurrence of violence which is often an underlying aspect of television programs.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to quote a few comments from a speech delivered by Dr. Northrop Frye of the CRTC about violence in general. This is what he said:

[English]

I am somewhat disturbed by the fact that the opposite of violence seems always to be non-violence, as though violence was a positive thing and we had nothing to put against it except a negation. Wherever there is one human being there is a very considerable output of mental and physical energy, and wherever there is more than one human being those energies are going to conflict. It seems to me that violence, as we have been using the word here, is misapplied energy. It is to energy what prostitution is to sexual love. As such, it really is a negative force, and controlling violence would be the way to set human energy free for its proper tasks. I quote the following:

● (1720)

Controlling violence means, first of all, raising the level of society. The people who produce and sell socially irresponsible programs are thinking of their viewers as a mob rather than a community. The mob is the lowest form of community: it is a completely homogeneous society organized for hatred, and will not remain a mob long unless it can find someone to beat up, or, failing that, something to smash. When a television program depicts someone being slowly beaten to death, the primary appeal is: "Look at this: isn't fun?" As soon as anyone begins to object that this may be a wrong kind of fun, the violence is immediately rationalized, and turns self-righteous. All rationalized violence has much the same argument, the argument behind all fights on school playgrounds is: he started it. That is, whenever violence is rationalized it is asserted to be counterviolence. Somebody else did something first, and we have to resist it. That is true of the violence of capital punishment; it is true of the violence of Palestinian terrorists. Fictional violence, however, may be rationalized more simply as a refusal to take a positive attitude in a violent world: for example, this is what we're all involved in, whether we like it or not, etc. But the real reason is simply lack of imagination: depicting violence is easy, quick, and profitable. It is easy partly because violence is a mechanical form of human energy: so mechanical that it can even be quantified or classified as "heavy" or "light". As a mechanical cause producing a mechanical response, violence never accomplishes anything: the pendulum of aggression and counteraggression simply goes on swinging all through history.

[Translation]

This quotation from a speech by Dr. Frye with which I agree, is a brief summary of an overall problem. In dictionaries, violence is defined as "intense force". No one would deny that when we use our most developed senses, hearing and sight, we are subject to television and no one would deny the importance and power of this media. Let us not be mistaken about my purpose here.

I do not pass judgement on television as such, but on a significant proportion of its contents. In so doing, I speak for every Canadian who clearly blamed that kind of program for the surge of violence, a radical one to say the least. In the context of a gallup poll, Canadian pollsters ask Canadians to indicate the cause of the increasing rate of crime and violence among six possible factors. Fifty-four per cent of Canadians said television was the third most important cause.

Most human social behaviours are learned through observation and imitation. Because television is vivacious, true to type and ubiquitous, we may conclude that adults as much as children model themselves on behaviours they see on television. Indeed, a recent study by American sociologists showed that the greater the number of violent television programs a child sees, the more aggressive he can be expected to be. It is felt that a teenager just out of highschool will have watched television for 15,000 hours, during which he will have witnessed 31,000 murders. These figures are not far-fetched. They were gathered in the course of a study by Dr. Katz, a psychiatrist, which was published at the 25th Canadian Psychiatrist Conventions held in October of 1975.

Violence on television has sometimes been rationalized in the name of morals and nothing less, on the grounds that the bad boy is punished for his misdeeds. The result is nonetheless that violence is depicted as a solution to problems.

During the summer of 1974, the CRTC Research Branch surveyed 55 entertainment programs broadcast by two Canadian TV stations. A total 108 violent episodes were reported in a 36-hour screening period, a frequency of three murders per hour. Significantly, the great majority of programs and violent acts telecasted were American production.

This is the crucial point: The influence of American culture, which is evident with the multitude of television stations brought in by cable, constitutes a threat for us. The economic factor is greatly responsible for this situation. It seems that programs bought outside Canada subsidize the production of Canadian programs by commercial networks. For instance, series like Mannix, Cannon and Kojak are bought by the American network at a cost of $250,000 per program, while Canadian broadcasters—and all other foreign buyers—can purchase the same series for as little as $5,000, which constitutes a certain monetary advantage.

So-called violent programs are mostly imported from the United States, as I said earlier. If we classify all half-hour segments of television programs shown in Toronto according to their country of origin, and the category violent, non-violent, sports and news, we see that 34 per cent of programs of all origins are violent and that most of them, or 68 per cent, come from the United States. Forty-seven per cent of American programs contain some violence compared with only 3 per cent of Canadian programs. The dramatic series shown on American television are oriented towards crime and violence. This choice of programs is therefore deliberate.

All this suggests, Mr. Speaker, that television can have a negative cumulative effect. It makes the population more concerned about the dangers of society than real life conditions would justify. Such programs constitute the greatest of all threats against human dignity and the respect of life itself.

This is why, Mr. Speaker, I believe that this House and the committee have to seriously consider the possibility of restricting the viewing of violent programs where firearms are used to solve conflicts during so-called family hours.

My aim is to awaken public opinion to the constant threat of television programs where violence is in some way made prestigious and justifiable, and we must stop promoting this misconception in a civilized society.

Mr. Speaker, I hope that I shall have the opportunity to present my amendment properly to the committee and during the report stage of the bill.

[English]

Mr. A. D. Alkenbrack (Frontenac-Lennox and Addington): Mr. Speaker, before I open my remarks on the bill I want to say how shocked I am and how shocked is, I am sure, the whole House at the recent announcement of the government House leader invoking closure on this important matter which we are debating, a matter which is vital to every Canadian citizen and which affects the liberties of all Canadians. I am shocked and surprised at the announcement.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

An hon. Member: They want to muzzle parliament.

An hon. Member: They are muzzling the Canadian people.

Mr. Alkenbrack: Surely it must have been authorized by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). I do not know why the government is in such a hurry and is proposing to slough off and ignore these important items which we are putting forward in defence of the liberty and rights of most Canadian citizens.

I should like to open my remarks on Bill C-83 by congratulating my colleague, the hon. member for Edmonton East (Mr. Skoreyko) on the excellent speech he made over a week ago tonight. Both he and the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams), who spoke on the following Monday, have effectively stripped this bill of any semblance it might have had to what the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford) called the government's major legislative initiative. I give my unqualified support to the amendment moved by the hon. member for Calgary North to have the gun control legislation separated from the totally unrelated material in the rest of this bill.

● (1730)

As the hon. member for Edmonton East pointed out, many of us could be placed in the position of voting against the bill in order to vote against a particular part of it. This is grossly unfair, Mr. Speaker—not only grossly unfair to members who hold those opinions but also to their constituents.

I wonder if the Minister of Justice really believes that there are people who are so naive as to suppose that guns leap out of their cases, load themselves, then rush out and commit crimes. It is not so, but that is what we are expected to believe if we accept the minister's rationale that the way to deal with gun-related crimes is to licence all law-abiding Canadian gun owners. In the game of credibility, the minister is batting zero.

It has been pointed out over the years and in the last few days in this House that guns do not go out and commit murders. People commit murders. Short of setting up a communist state in Canada, there is no way we can legislate against free movement and free activity. As long as we preserve the degree of liberty and freedom we enjoy in Canada, people will be free to move about and commit acts both legal and illegal, sad to say. In communist countries, governments legislate what people may own, what they can do and where they can go; yet communist states are not free of crime. Do we have to go so far abroad to find support for the thesis that crime cannot be eliminated simply by restricting the rights of the innocent? I should think anyone of average intelligence would work that out in his or her own mind without the need to do any more than just think.

In this legislation on gun control, the Minister of Justice, in effect, tells us he has six criminals, figuratively speaking, ans six law-abiding citizens, so naturally he has a round dozen of something or other. The fact is that he does not have a dozen of anything, Mr. Speaker. He has six people of a type that we should be seeking in this legislation to control, and six people of a type who should be left strictly alone. Six apples and six oranges do not make a dozen of either apples or aranges, and I hope that we will not delay too long in separating this bill into its pertinent parts.

I wonder just how much more control over personal rights and freedoms the Canadian people will accept before they rebel. It might be that the gun controls proposed in this bill will push the average Canadian over the line. No doubt some people of uneven temper and certain mental make-up will be pushed over the line as a result of the legislation. I happen to believe that even if we were to spend the millions of dollars it would cost to register all gun owners in Canada, we would not be certain of whether we had in fact registered all gun owners, three-quarters of them or even just half of them.

Experience that other countries have had with gun registration—and that goes for both pistols and long-guns—is that there are eventually more unregistered guns in a given city or country after a time than there are registered guns. In North America, particularly, people have traditionally felt that they had a right to own shotguns and rifles. On this half-continent our whole history and economy is founded on the historic traditional and sensible use of firearms. That is why, today, in millions of Canadian homes there are firearms belonging to the family. They are not used very often, but families have a historic right to them. In the United States they have the right to own long-guns enshrined in their constitution. It is difficult, if not impossible, to convince people in Canada that they should accept gun controls because the federal government has this hang-up about limiting and restricting civil rights.

Mr. Speaker, if I thought for a minute that we could fight crime in Canada by forcing law-abiding people to line up and register as gun owners, dog owners, budgie owners, or any other hobbyists, then I would have to give it a try. I am just as interested as anyone else in controlling violent crime in Canada, and if I match my record of public statements against those of the Minister of Justice and the Sollicitor General (Mr. Allmand), then I have to say that I am more interested in combating crime than they are.

However, unlike those ministers, I do not propose to combat crime by chipping away at the rights and privileges of the victims of crime and the potential victims of crime while ignoring those at whom this kind of legislation should be directed. It would help a lot in our anti-crime campaign—if it can be called by that name—if we could get just a little help from the ministers across the floor. It would help a great deal if the Minister of Justice and the Solicitor General would stop wringing their hands and sobbing over the fate of some poor fellow who happens to be found guilty of a vicious and senseless murder.

I have repeated over and over again, Mr. Speaker, that my sympathies are with the law-abiding citizen and with the victims of crime. When we have a federal minister who opens a speech on a bill designed to control crime with the statement that the bill seeks to protect the rights and dignity of those charged with offences, then I feel inclined to reserve my sympathies for the victims. The rights and dignity of those charged with offences are already protected by legislation existing since the time of confederation. We certainly want to defend those rights, but that is not our paramount concern at this time. The minister's statement at least ran true to form, because we find the minister saying later in his speech that these gun control proposals will assist the government's efforts to control gun-related crimes.

The member for Edmonton East related a few instances of how the rights and privileges of Canadians are steadily being eroded by this government's succession of controls—controls over the economy, controls over the incomes of working people by way of oppressive taxation, the abolition of the right of inheritance, and control of communications. What about the necessity and the right of people in some occupations and exposures to carry a gun, usually a hand-gun? This right, history has shown, has always existed, and it is our duty to see that it is maintained. A licence for use by this section of the law-abiding public should always be available. I will list two or three categories, and I am sure members have others in mind. Some of these categories are: women on late night duty should be able to carry a gun if they wish; nurses and others having to traverse areas not having full-time police surveillance during early morning hours; and messengers and people who carry considerable sums of money in unprotected regions and areas. A licence to carry a gun for these reasons is often the best form of crime prevention.

I will give an example in my own family. It took place long before I was born, but I will always remember the story as told to me years ago by an uncle, R. W. Kimmerly of Napanee who passed to his reward in 1951 at the age of 95. He was engaged as a young man in about 1880 to peddle goods and merchandise. He used a covered wagon and travelled northward out of Deseronto, Ontario, for the Rathbun Company, a large lumber and timber complex of that era. He was badly scared and roughed up one night in a hotel yard in one of the villages along the way, but with help he managed to defend his wagon against the hoodlums who were bent on stealing his goods. Before he began his next trip northward he bought a licence to carry a hand-gun and bought a gun and shoulder holster. When he arrived back at the same village and stopped for the night at the same hotel, he made sure to tell the proprietor that he was now carrying a weapon, and showed him his licence. Word was circulated by the proprietor, and from that time forward the local wild boys ceased their violent antics and treated my uncle with the deepest respect. He had no more trouble; he never had to fire the gun and he never used it. The moral of that old, true story of 1880 holds true today. Outlaws respect one thing only: the naked power of right, rigidly reinforced by a potent deterrent.

Every time this government is engaged in devious activity, or when it finds itself in an impasse over some boondoggle like this attempt to fight crime by impinging on the few rights left to Canadians, the Prime Minister creates a new diversion. Taking this government on past performance, Mr. Speaker, we must assume, when debating these gun control proposals, that this is only the beginning. When the bureaucracy needed to administer this law is in place, we can expect some further action with respect to gun owners. The Minister of Justice knows full well that you do not fight crime by taking away the rights and privileges of law-abiding citizens. Even if we only asume that the minister is an intelligent man, we must assume that he is party to a plan that is broader and more encompassing than the provisions in this legislative proposal.

It has already been pointed out that, like all other legislation pushed through this House by the present government, this bill in its present form is open-ended enough to allow for extension and expansion without end. It has been estimated that it will take at least 6,000 man-years of labour to conduct an initial registration of gun owners in Canada and the cost could run into millions. We have found through bitter experience that this government exceeds all estimates by four or five times and even more.

What is to happen to the bureaucracy after the registration has been accomplished? Again, our experience has shown that these bureaucracies, these temporary agencies remain in place, intact. In fact, like ill-starred Information Canada, it grows and grows with nothing meaningful to do and doing nothing meaningful. With nothing to do, the gun agency will be seeking things to do with its personnel, its time and its power. If my fears are realized, this agency will become even more restrictive. The big bosses in Ottawa will surely find some ways to further harass the law-abiding gun owners. They will have to justify their existence and protect their jobs.

Much has been said about how much the fee should be for gun owners to register their guns. If it gets to that point, Mr. Speaker, I suggest that there should not be any fee. Gun owners are being asked to come forward voluntarily to register and tell the bureaucrats how many guns they own. I own three guns, but do not use them any more. Once I was an ardent hunter. I keep the three guns at home. I think they are serviceable. I do not mind registering them, but that is as far as I want to go.

[Mr. Alkenbrack.]

Since the Minister of Justice cannot show how this proposed law could play any part in helping to control gun-related crime, there should not be any fee for registering. In these days of efficient computers, surely one computer could efficiently register all the serial numbers and makes of the millions of guns in this country. The process would not be costly and would not need a large bureaucracy. Why not take advantage of the computer age? As it is, the government wants to put another burden on the backs of Canadians. The fee will be just another imposition on top of a totally unnecessary and uncalled for restriction. I say to the Prime Minister, give us free registration.

Before I conclude my remarks on the gun control section of this bill I would like to say that it is already an offence under the Criminal Code to own an automatic weapon, a sawed-off rifle, shotgun or unregistered pistol. I suggest that what we need instead of restrictions on law-abiding, long-gun owners, is more severe minimum sentences for those convicted of possessing and using these restricted or prohibited weapons. Some judges today are inclined to apply the slap on the wrist in these cases rather than to impose a deterrent sentence. Perhaps we should demand minimum sentences in some cases.

As I said before, I deplore the restriction by closure which will limit our time for debating this bill. When the bill is in committee, I hope the necessary amendments will be moved so that we can improve the bill and make it more satisfactory and fair to all Canadians.

Mr. Alan Martin (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, before beginning my main comments on the second reading of Bill C-83, may I commend my House leader for showing the essential leadership needed if parliament is to survive as a useful institution.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Paproski: You will live to regret it.

Mr. Martin: After the motion has been put we shall debate for the bill for four more days, which will give more than enough time for members on all sides to make their contributions. It is important to send the bill to committee soon. In committee it will be examined by members of parliament and we may hear contributions from such members of the public as may wish to appear.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: What guarantee is there that you will not impose closure in committee?

Mr. Paproski: You are lucky you can speak today.

Mr. Martin: So far, the discussion on this bill has centred mainly on the two aspects of gun control and wiretapping. Bear in mind, this bill is far more extensive than that and covers much more than those two subjects. Indeed, it is useful to remind hon. members of the title of the bill, an act for the better protection of Canadian society against perpetrators of violent and other crime. The bill encompasses some 73 pages and contains many important clauses. It is, therefore, a mistake for hon. members to suggest that the bill deals mainly with guns and wiretapping. It is an all-encompassing bill and must be so considered.

As was mentioned in the debate by way of background, it is easier to maintain control than regain it. This bill is designed to amend the criminal law, improve this country's administration of criminal justice, come to grips with the increasing incidence of crime in Canadian society, and provide the public with the greater measure of protection which it wants.

● (1750)

Mr. Speaker, I would first like to discuss the aspects of gun control. This was the first matter that was brought to my attention by a constituent after my arrival in Ottawa as a new member of parliament in the summer of 1974. The first item brought to my attention was, indeed, from a constituent who was most concerned about the freedom with which guns could be acquired in this country. I was asked to inform him what was happening in connection with a bill which was referred to as Senator Cameron's bill.

One of my first priorities on arriving here was not to try and find out specific information on a specific bill: however, on doing some research on it, it became evident that this particular senator had put forward, in two or three parliaments, a bill dealing with the subject of gun control. It had gone into committee at least twice and had died because of sessions ending or parliament being prorogued. My understanding is that this particular bill was a sequel to a bill presented to parliament by the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) as a private member's bill when he was a backbench member. There has, indeed, been considerable attention paid to gun control in this country. In fact, I further understand that the omnibus amendments to the Criminal Code in 1969 contained elements relating to gun control.

Correspondence is still coming forward to myself, and I am sure to other members of parliament, asking "What are you doing, as a government? What do you intend to do in relation to gun control? Can you not see the problem that is before the public? When are you going to give us some leadership?" I suggest that this is not new. It is by no means something that is arriving for the first time. It is an area in which the Canadian public is demanding, not requesting, some action by the federal government.

In my own brief reviews of this matter before the legislation came forward I had the opportunity to spend a whole evening with a concerned citizen in the Toronto area who is chairman of the Toronto chapter of the National Firearms Association. This citizen and several others got together some time ago because of their concern over the matter of inadequate gun controls and their inability to work through the bureaucracy to try to get something on their own. They put together a group of recommendations which they were able finally to discuss with the Solicitor General and his officials. I was very impressed with this concerted citizen act. It is my hope, and indeed it is the case, that this bill now incorporates many of the aspects these people brought to light.

In reviewing the many cases involved in gun control we must bear in mind that unnecessary fears have been put into the minds of the Canadian public. This has been done to some extent by the media and to some extent by members of this House, indicating that suddenly weapons are going to be seized and that people will not be able to continue holding on to their collections of guns. We must understand this is not the intention. Rather, the intention of the gun control legislation is to license people just as today we license a person who drives an automobile.

The automobile is presumably considered some sort of lethal weapon, otherwise why did we go to the great trouble many years ago to bring out such things as drivers' licences and automobile licences? Surely, it was felt at that time by governments in all provinces, states and governmental jurisdictions, that this was something new, had certain dangers attached to it and that it was necessary not only to keep control of where the vehicles were and what was happening to them, but to ensure that those who got behind the wheel of those vehicles had some basic qualifications to qualify them to take a vehicle on the road without becoming an undue menace to the rest of the public. Surely, there is an analogy here. It has been suggested across the way that we do not need this kind of licensing, that we have too many licences today. I am sure these people would not want to suggest the elimination of drivers' licences or automobile licences. They are accepted in society today.

I believe that society is now ready to accept some kind of licensing, some kind of assurance that the person who is going to operate a gun of some form of other is going to be qualified to do so. After all, he does possess a lethal weapon, a weapon that can do harm to others. It is the same as when he gets behind the wheel of an automobile. I think it makes eminent sense to look at that analogy in the light of what governments have done in the area of control over automobiles and their drivers.

We are not asking that all guns be licensed; we are suggesting that dealers be licensed. When speaking last spring to an eminent member of parliament in Sweden who was here with his finance committee, I posed the question of gun control. He said that for years it has been accepted that guns can only be sold in Sweden at licensed outlets. He took it as such a norm that he could not understand the point of my question. It is accepted in Sweden that you do not sell guns you know something about the gun business and are a qualified person. This kind of licensing is acceptable.

It is clear in Sweden that a person who has a gun in his home is licensed. This indicates that he is qualified to handle the weapon. I might go a step further and indicate that they are not permitted to leave a weapon in a state where it can immediately be used. In other words, the bolt must be removed. This is the attitude adopted by the military. It is done for one clear purpose, to prevent theft and misuse. That is not recommended in this legislation but it is something that could be considered in the future. It is important to consider how weapons are maintained in the home. There should be an insistence that weapons are maintained carefully and in a manner in which there is a psychological response to a person dashing over, picking up a weapon and running down the street in a moment when he may feel somewhat berserk.

Much more could be said about gun control. It is important that we are imposing a higher maximum sentence in the case of crime involving an offensive weapon. It is important that the police have some power of seizure. It is equally important that the limitations of this legislation be clearly spelled out so that the fears expressed by some people cannot possibly occur.

May I call it six o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. McCleave): It being six o'clock, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow afternoon at 2 p.m.

At 6.01 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

REQUEST FOR DELAY OF BILL C-68—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I ask the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion.

In view of the financial difficulties the provinces will encounter as a result of the passage of Bill C-68; in view of the danger of seeing the quality of medical services reduced; finally, in view of the forthcoming federal-provincial conference of health ministers, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Yewchuk):

That this House unanimously invite the responsible minister to delay the passage of Bill C-68 till after the proposed conference.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent; the motion therefore cannot be put.

FISCAL ARRANGEMENTS ACT

SUGGESTED RETENTION OF INFLATION FACTOR—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to ask the unanimous consent of the House to deal with a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the strong possibility that the federal government will propose at its meetings this week with the provincial finance ministers that the inflation factor in the Fiscal Arrangements Act be removed, and in view of the disastrous effect this would have on the budgets of the provinces which are already faced with the necessity of increasing their taxes to meet their increased costs, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas):

That the government be urged not to remove the inflation factor from the Fiscal Arrangements Act at this time.

Mr. Speaker: Standing Order 43 requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

CRIMINAL CODE

REQUEST FOR REFERENDUM ON CAPITAL PUNISHMENT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Armand Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43, I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion on a matter of pressing and urgent necessity.

Considering that the vast majority of Canadians favour upholding capital punishment in cases of premeditated deliberate murder, that the will of the majority must be respected in a democratic system, and that a referendum is the best way to let the majority express its views, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Rimouski (Mr. Allard):

That this House direct that a referendum on capital punishment be taken immediately across the country so that debates on the abolition of capital punishment take place in the light of the views clearly expressed by the Canadian people.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the terms of the motion of the hon. member. Under the provisions of Standing Order 43, the motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: As there is not unanimous consent, the motion cannot be put.

PROPOSED DEVELOPMENT OF AEROSPACE INDUSTRY IN VIEW OF LAY-OFFS AT DOUGLAS AIRCRAFT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. Stanley Haidasz (Parkdale): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that all hon. members of this House are saddened by an announcement made yesterday by the management of the Douglas Aircraft plant in Malton, Ontario, of the layoff of 150 workers. In view of this urgent and important matter, I seek unanimous consent under Standing Order 43 to move the following motion, seconded by the hon. member for York South (Mrs. Appolloni):

That this House expresses its regret at the announced layoffs of 150 workers at Douglas Aircraft, Malton, and urges the federal government to continue negotiations to save the jobs of these workers and to increase the priority of the government's study to develop a sound policy for the Canadian aerospace industry.

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 43, such a motion cannot be presented without the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

REQUEST FOR TABLING OF DOCUMENTS RELATING TO ALTERNATIVES TO PURCHASE OF LOCKHEED "ORION"—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Dean Whiteway (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the problems surrounding the financing of the Orion LRPA contract that are threatening the early commencement of this essential defence program, and in order to give the people of Canada and members of this House a better understanding of the government's decision, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. McKinnon):

That the Minister of National Defence table immediately all documents of the alternative proposals to the Lockheed P3-LRPA that have been considered by the Department of National Defence including the Cp-107 Argus Refit program proposed by Canadair.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion cannot be presented without the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

SUGGESTED NEGOTIATIONS WITH ONTARIO TO ENSURE CONTINUATION OF FRENCH LANGUAGE TRAINING IN OTTAWA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Hugh Poulin (Parliamentary Secretary to Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I, too, rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter which I consider to be of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the contents of the Fifth Annual Report of the Commissioner of Official languages, and since the government of Ontario is responsible for education in the Ottawa-Carleton area, I ask permission to move, seconded by the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. Francis):

That this House instruct the government to enter into negotiations with the appropriate Ontario authorities in order to ensure the continuation of French immersion language training at the option of each of the four Ottawa-Carleton area school boards.

An hon. Member: Cheap shot!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Under the provisions of Standing Order 43 unanimous consent is required before such a motion can be presented. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed!

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed!

Mr. Speaker: For the purpose of the record, the House should know that the motion was put by the hon. member for Ottawa Centre (Mr. Poulin) and seconded by the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. Francis).

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

REFERENCE OF ANNUAL REPORT OF COMMISSIONER AND BIBEAU REPORT TO COMMITTEE—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I hope the unanimity of the House with regard to that question will continue to prevail now. I should like to ask the President of the Privy Council—excuse me, I should have said "the President of the Treasury Board".

Some hon. Members: Oh!

Mr. Clark: I am not sure to whom I ought to apologize.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: I should like to ask the President of the Treasury Board whether, following the timely and constructive suggestion made yesterday by the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont, the hon. gentleman is prepared to arrange for reference of the annual report of the Commissioner of Official Languages to a special committee of both Houses for early consideration.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, Mr. Spicer's report refers to the bilingualism policy, and Mr. Spicer is basing his remarks on a report we will get soon. I have myself commissioned the Bibeau report on the effectiveness of the public servants training program. The Bibeau report should be submitted to the Treasury Board within a few weeks. We will find a lot of information in this report, and I hope that after we have received the Bibeau report, which I have undertaken to table in the House, we will be able to make a review of the whole problem. I would also like to point out to the House that it is noted in the Spicer report that tremendous progress has been made in recent years with respect to bilingualism in the Public Service.

[English]

Mr. Clark: I believe the House would be anxious to see the Bibeau report referred to a committee in addition to the report of the Commissioner of Official Languages, rather than merely being tabled here. Will the President of the Treasury Board give us a commitment that both of these reports will be referred to a committee either of this House or of the two Houses for consideration?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I have already been questioned on this subject this week before our Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates. I have answered many questions. I am ready to answer any question on those two reports, if necessary, and we will find whether it is necessary to take more specific action with regard to Messrs. Spicer's and Bibeau's reports.

[English]

Mr. Clark: Members on this side of the House share with the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont the view that it is not enough simply to have the opportunity to question the minister on these matters. It is far preferable to have the reports themselves referred and become the subject of joint study. I hope that the minister might follow that bipartisan suggestion.

ALLEGED UNDER-UTILIZATION OF FRENCH BY EMPLOYEES GRADUATING FROM TRAINING SCHOOLS

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to ask the minister this question. Having regard to the reference in the report of the Commissioner of Official Languages to the fact that 83 per cent of Anglophone graduates from public service schools utilize French on the job less than 20 per cent of the time, is the minister prepared to make a full statement to the House regarding the serious allegation of an extraordinary under-utilization of bilingual graduates, as suggested by the Commissioner of Official Languages?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, of course it is very difficult to make the best use of the services in the other language of all those who work in Ottawa. The hon. Leader of the Opposition speaks French very well, but he does not have the opportunity to use it often, so we will have to get the whole system to use both languages as often as possible. I am glad to see that the hon. Leader of the Opposition wants French to be much more widely used in Ottawa.

IMPLEMENTATION OF RECOMMENDATION OF COMMISSIONER—CONSULTATIONS WITH PROVINCES ON LANGUAGE TEACHING

Mr. Claude Wagner (Saint-Hyacinthe): Mr. Speaker, I want to ask a question of the leader of the government.

While recognizing that until now the bilingualism program has been reasonably successful, is the government giving serious consideration to the recommendations of the Commissioner of Official Languages which say that we should prepare a generation of bilingual Canadians before they enter the public service?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, of course we are considering that. It is not only a wish we have expressed, but also something we have told the provinces at various meetings, namely the ones on the constitution, when we were talking about bilingualism. As a matter of fact, many members on both sides of this House wish that the educational system of the provinces would give Canadians more fluency in both official languages. It is our wish, Mr. Speaker. I rather think that this recommendation is addressed to the provincial governments, which are primarily responsible for education.

Mr. Wagner: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary and I thank the Prime Minister for his remarks.

While keeping in mind the question of jurisdiction, would the Prime Minister tell the House if, during the first ministers conference in May, he has the intention of discussing these new propositions concerning the teaching of languages to young Canadians with the heads of the provincial governments?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the agenda of that conference has yet to be established, but if the provinces want to discuss the subject I would be very anxious to do so myself. Generally speaking, however, such subjects are dealt with during meetings between the provincial ministers of education and the Secretary of State who has been appointed by the government to spend the funds for promoting the teaching of the other official language in each province.

LOCKHEED CONTRACT—GOVERNMENT PROPOSALS TO BANKS ON FINANCING—ALTERNATIVES OPEN TO GOVERNMENT

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Defence. An announcement this morning indicated that the option on the Lockheed Orions had been extended for one month. Presumably, therefore, arrangements with respect to financing have not been worked out. The minister indicated to the House yesterday that the arrangements that are being proposed to Canadian banks do not mean a guarantee of any loans that those banks may put up to the Lockheed Corporation. In view of the importance of this matter would the minister advise the House specifically what it is that the government is proposing to Canadian banks and financial institutions to encourage them to take a risk which, in normal circumstances, they would not take?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, it is correct that my colleague the Minister of Supply and Services has done an excellent job in obtaining an option for the government to continue negotiations until April 30. The discussion with the banks are continuing. As I said on earlier occasions, until these discussions are complete I do not intend to discuss the details.

● (1420)

Mr. Leggatt: Mr. Speaker, since the time of the premature announcement of the minister on November 27 concerning the agreement in principle to make this purchase, it is my understanding that some $20 million has been expended on the contract. Will the minister advise the House whether he has received a legal opinion from any source on the government's present legal status as a result of the November 27 announcement in order that the government can make a proper assessment of its position on the Lockheed matter, namely, to get out clean, to cut our losses and get out, or do we have to stay in because our commitment is so high we have no choice but to stay in? Will you answer regarding those three options?

Mr. Richardson: Mr. Speaker, the legal aspects of the contract are the responsibility of the Minister of Supply and Services.

Mr. Alkenbrack: He's the one who bought the oil and lost $14 million.

Mr. Richardson: As I have indicated, he and his department have done an excellent job of protecting the interests of the government. The figure of $20 million that was mentioned is too high, but the details of the legal aspects should be left to my colleague.

SUPPLY AND SERVICES

LOCKHEED CONTRACT—EXTENT OF COMMITMENT AS A FACTOR IN DECISION TO CONTINUE NEGOTIATIONS

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I could turn to the minister's colleague, the Minister of Supply and Services, and ask him whether his department now, in terms of the negotiations he is continuing with the Lockheed Corporation, has a legal opinion from any source, whether the Department of Justice or private, about the legal commitment of the government in terms of the expenditure that Lockheed has already made? Is that a factor in the decision of the government to continue in the negotiations; that is, is the $20 million lost now and therefore we have to stay in because we cannot stand to take that loss? Would the minister answer that?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, it is true that Lockheed Aircraft Corporation Ltd. did some work before the contract signature. It is also true that Lockheed gave us a first delay until March 31 without any change in prices and in the economic advantages for Canada. This is in fact a provision of the letter of agreement we signed yesterday at midnight, to the effect that we are going to pay Lockheed for work done between January 5 and April 30, with a view to preserving the price we negotiated last December, preserving the production schedule which is advantageous for Canada, and preserving the economic impact which is evident for this country since we sign a $614 million contract with Lockheed and we are going to have economic repercussions of about $580 million in Canada.

In consideration of all these advantages, we agreed with Lockheed to pay a maximum of $16 million in case we put an end to our negotiations between now and April 30. This being said, we do intend to sign the contract if possible, because these are the best conditions we can get for Canada to fulfill its role in NATO.

BILINGUALISM

TEACHING OF BOTH OFFICIAL LANGUAGES IN ALL SCHOOLS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the right hon. Prime Minister.

A while ago he said with regard to bilingualism that it was left to the discretion of the provinces to have the second official language taught in the schools. The hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe told us that handing over the teaching of both languages to the provinces was a new suggestion.

I should like to draw to your attention, Mr. Speaker, the fact that for at least 10 years now I have been suggesting the teaching of both official languages in all Canadian schools, and I request the co-operation of the federal government in helping the provinces to do the job properly.

Now, Mr. Spicer said yesterday that teaching a second language to people of 50 or 60 was a waste of time and money. To force someone to learn a second language at 50 does not make sense, whereas by teaching it to children of five, six, seven and eight we would have a perfectly bilingual Canada, from the Pacific to the Atlantic, within five years.

If the provinces were to decide to do so, would the federal government be willing to spend as much money in helping them as it spent, for nothing, or almost, teaching both languages to the civil servants?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it is true that the hon. member has advocated for years the teaching of the second language in the schools. That is an opinion we all share. Naturally, we hope it can be done. However, the question is whether we can wait 25 years for results. That is the figure the hon. member mentioned—

An hon. Member: Five years.

Mr. Trudeau: Indeed 25 years is a little too long after 100 years of waiting—

An hon. Member: No, he did say 5 years!

Mr. Trudeau: No, the hon. member said 25 years. Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Chrétien: He did say five years.

Mr. Trudeau: He did? I am sorry, then. He said five years. It seems strange to me that if the two official languages can be taught in elementary schools, within five years bilingual children will qualify as deputy ministers. That does not seem logical.

As for expenses, Mr. Speaker, the answer is that we already spend around $80 million a year—

Mr. Chrétien: $125 million.

Mr. Trudeau: —$125 million, as the President of the Treasury Board has just mentioned, so that the provinces may teach the other official language within their jurisdictions. It is important for us and for all hon. members to ensure that those moneys are well spent. We now have a Social Credit government in British Columbia. I do hope it will heed the Socred leader and start teaching French in all the schools of that province.

GOVERNMENT INTENTION TO ACHIEVE NATIONAL UNITY BY TEACHING BOTH LANGUAGES

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask a supplementary question.

The Prime Minister can be sure that in many areas it will be easier for him to convince the Socred premier from British Columbia than Mr. Bourassa from Quebec.

I want to draw the attention of the House to the possibility of financially assisting the provinces. I did not speak of a 25-year period, I said that if our youngsters were taught French or English or both from the first school years, in less than five years our young Canadians, both French and English speaking, would use the second language with a surprising flexibility, whereas our civil servants still cannot do so. We cannot blame them, for it is much easier to learn at age five or six than at sixty.

So is the federal government ready to spend, not $60 or $125 million, but the millions necessary to build up national unity through bilingualism?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have mentioned $80 or $125 million earlier. Those sums are considerable. I do not know if the hon. member is suggesting that we should make more money available to the provinces and thereby deprive the official language program of the federal government of that money. I am prepared to consider specific proposals during the forthcoming discussions, but when the hon. member says that it will go faster in British Columbia, only the future will tell if he has succeeded in three days.

LOCKHEED CONTRACT—REQUEST FOR DETAILS OF DECISIONS MADE AT RECENT MEETING WITH COMPANY

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence. Will the minister make a statement on motions today concerning LRPA and any decisions made by Canada and, if not, would he inform the House about the decisions reached with Mr. Wilson of Lockheed last night. Other than the decision which the minister made to give himself 30 days grace on making a decision on the contract and deciding to pay our just debts, what decisions were made?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I think that in view of the fact that I have always believed that the hon. member for Victoria was a supporter of the Canadian armed forces, I will confine my statement to reading his words, as recorded on October 24. He said this problem has plagued the department for many years, that is, too low a percentage of the defence budget being used for capital equipment. He has been an advocate of new equipment for the Canadian armed forces, and that is what we have been achieving in these negotiations.

● (1430)

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. McKinnon: The minister leaves me almost speechless with his attack.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McKinnon: I have been a supporter of equipment while this government has been procrastinating for eight years on this matter, and I still am,—but not at any price.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

LOCKHEED CONTRACT—REQUEST FOR TABLING OF LETTER FROM MR. HEPPE—REASON FOR FAILURE TO CHECK FINANCIAL ARRANGEMENTS

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Perhaps since the minister is unwilling to answer the question I put to him he will answer this supplementary. Yesterday the minister showed the press a letter from Mr. R. R. Heppe of Lockheed indicating that there was a financing problem which arose last summer. Would the minister table the letter from Mr. Heppe, and would he explain to the House why, given the implied warning in Mr. Heppe's letter, he did not check the financial arrangements again until late December? Why was he aware of a minor problem in midsummer and unaware of the enormous problem in November?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): The letter in question has not been discussed in the House and therefore does not need to be tabled.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Just give it to the press.

Mr. Richardson: The department was fully aware of the problems of financing early in the year and toward the completion of the contract. I have explained many times that we were given a very clear impression that Lockheed could assist. I think I will read from that letter, and therefore I will be obliged to table it. I think this will answer once and for all whether the Lockheed company was in fact—

An hon. Member: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am sure the House appreciates the willingness of the minister to table the letter.

However, if I am to exercise some restraint on the length of questions which ought to be put, I equally have to exercise some restraint on the length of answers during the question period. I ask the minister to conclude his answer very briefly.

Mr. Richardson: I will be brief and read only one short paragraph from the letter as follows:

If Lockheed were to finance the shortfall as suggested in item (c), it is estimated that the financial impact would be approximately $800,000. Such an arrangement would, however, be contingent upon Lockheed's ability to secure approval for additional financing with lending banks and would further be subject to approval by the Emergency Loan Guarantee Board.

I ask members of the opposition to listen to the next sentence. This is from a Lockheed vice president.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: We are listening.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. If the letter is important enough to be quoted at length in this House, it is equally important that it be tabled in total.

Some hon. Members: Right now.

Mr. Speaker: The minister has indicated his willingness to table the letter.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Then let's not ruin the question period.

Mr. Clark: The question period will be over before he finishes reading.

Mr. Richardson: The letter went on to say the following:

We believe this approach . . .

That is, the approach to the banks and to the emergency loan guarantee board.

. . . has merit and after due consideration would receive a positive response.

In fairness to the Lockheed company I think I should say that this letter was related to a financing shortfall in the summer which was not of the proportions which we discussed in December. I want to underline that and make it clear. However, in fairness to my personnel and to my officials I also think that this letter is a very clear indication of the willingness of the Lockheed company to assist us with the financing.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

LOCKHEED CONTRACT—DATE OF CABINET DECISION ON SIGNING

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): The minister has given no indication that he will make a statement on motions. I wonder if he could indicate to the House, in a general sense, when the cabinet will make a final decision on this contentious problem and decide either to sign the contract or not to sign it.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Surely, the hon. member has heard that the government now has an option which is good until the end of April, so that presumably before that date or on that date a decision will be reached.

Mr. Speaker: The Minister of National Defence, during the course of his answer to the second last question, made reference to a letter which he is prepared to table. Under the circumstances he is at liberty, I think, without the leave of the House, to table it either now or during tabling of documents. Perhaps it might be more orderly for the minister to table the document forthwith.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

SUPPLY AND SERVICES

LOCKHEED CONTRACT—AUTHORITY FOR SPENDING THE MONEY WHICH HAS BEEN SPENT

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, in light of what we have just heard, I should like to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Supply and Services. It has to do with the money which has been spent up to this point by Lockheed in the develoment of engineering work ups and design—to accommodate other user departments' requirements, I might add. On what authority has money been expended up to this point in time? What parliamentary authority, what governor in council authority or under what aspect of the Financial Administration Act has the $10 million or $12 million been spent up to this point in time?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, everybody knows that we have indicated to Lockheed Aircraft Coporation Ltd. our intention to enter into a contract with them which is nothing but normal if we are to preserve the advantages I stated to this House; it is normal, for the time being that we pay Lockheed for the works done so far, and also to protect the government's interest that we place a limit to the amount to be spent from now to April 30. I believe that it is a good business deal.

[English]

LOCKHEED CONTRACT—POSSIBLE RECOVERY FROM OTHER DEPARTMENTS OF A SHARE OF THE COST OF THE "ORION"

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): The minister has not answered the question at all. We can only assume that there has been no authorization other than a requisition from the Department of Supply and Services for the expenditure of funds or a telephone call or some conversation, in the absence of a contract. Because of the substantial proportions of this $59 million or probably up to $70 million we are going to pay per aircraft, could the minister indicate whether the cabinet committee responsible sought from the other user departments their share or pro rated share of the capital cost of this equipment? I am referring to the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources, the Department of Fisheries and other government departments which will use the Orion. The basic cost of the Orion will be from $30 million to $60 million. Are the other user departments going to contribute their share of the capital cost in order to give the Minister of National Defence and his department access to the funds which parliament has granted for defence spending?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member will understand that I am not responsible for the general administration of the government. I think the question should be addressed to the President of the Treasury Board.

GOVERNMENT ADMINISTRATION

LOCKHEED CONTRACT—POSSIBLE RECOVERY FROM OTHER DEPARTMENTS OF A SHARE OF THE COST OF THE "ORION"

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, the President of the Treasury Board has left the chamber, but because the Minister of National Defence is completely and totally uninterested in this question—

An hon. Member: Here he is.

Mr. Forrestall: I shall direct my question to the President of the Treasury Board in the interests of national defence because the Minister of National Defence does not seem to be too concerned about the availability of funds for spending on capital acquisition.

Has any initiative been taken by the President of the Treasury Board to secure from other government departments who will use the Orion aircraft their share of the capital cost of this program? Judging from other world prices the cost of this aircraft is some $60 million, and 50 per cent of that is attributable to the requirements of departments other than the Department of National Defence. Is there any sharing sought?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, when we prepared the budgetary program dealing with the capital investments for the Department of National Defence, we spread our requirements over a period of several years in the estimates of the Department of National Defence, because I do not think it would be very practical, in the case of a project like this, to divide the capital between three or four departments. If we had done so, the hon. member would probably be inclined to blame us and would say that we are trying to create a state of confusion.

SUGGESTED MEETING WITH PROVINCES ON TEACHING OF SECOND LANGUAGE

Mr. Eymard Corbin (Madawaska-Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Secretary of State a question. In the light of the motion that the hon. member for Ottawa Centre managed to have adopted by the House today, could the Secretary of State widen the rather narrow scope of the talks with the province of Ontario in order to include any provincial government of good will which shows that it is sincerely willing to make language courses available to the greatest number of Canadians, thus avoiding the creation of new linguistic disparities in this country.

[English]

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Secretary of State): Yes, of course, Mr. Speaker, I discuss this question continuously with ministers of education of the provinces. There is a formula in place under which the federal government agrees to pay 9 per cent of the additional cost of any extended French language training program. That provision is available to any province which wishes to take advantage of it. Manitoba recently announced a major extension to that province's French language program. I discussed this matter with the minister of education of that province yesterday. The provinces can do this and we are prepared to respond through our program of financial assistance.

ENERGY

SYNCRUDE PROJECT—REQUEST FOR DETAILS OF AGREEMENT—DISPOSITION OF ATLANTIC RICHFIELD LEASES

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Can the minister confirm if an agreement has been signed relating to the Syncrude project? If so, will he table that agreement? May I also ask, as one item in particular held up the signing of the agreement, what disposition is being made of the six Athabasca oil sand leases which were held by Atlantic Richfield? Are those leases to be turned over to Syncrude? If so, what price will be paid to Atlantic Richfield for those leases?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, may I answer the second part of the question first? The leases are to be turned over. The Alberta government assured the participants that the leases will be turned over to them, that is, to the new participants. As to price, it will be done at no cost to those participants. As to the agreement itself, I must point out that it involved probably 90 documents, agreements and subagreements, etc. It is not one piece of paper that we discussed yesterday. We were trying to hammer out several of the remaining, major outstanding issues. I am pleased to announce that we did just that.

SYNCRUDE PROJECT—REASON FOR FAILURE TO STIPULATE IN AGREEMENT EMISSION STANDARDS FOR SULPHUR DIOXIDE

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Since the Department of the Environment found 287 long tons per day of sulphur dioxide emission unacceptable and said the emission should be reduced to 40 long tons per day, why is there no stipulation in the agreement for reducing progressively, over time, sulphur dioxide emissions? Or, are we to assume that the Department of the Environment is merely a public relations enterprise and that the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources intends to pay no attention to the Department of the Environment and ignore the commitment the Minister of the Environment made to this House on January 29 last?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure that the entire question should be directed to me. It must be clear to the hon. member that the federal government respects the jurisdiction of Alberta in environmental matters. It will be up to the province to set environmental standards.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

ALLEGED DISCREPANCY BETWEEN MANDATE AND OPERATION—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. It relates to the recent report of the Economic Council of Canada which criticizes the inadequacy of the government's current programs and past performance. In its report released yesterday, the Economic Council says that much of the problems of abuse of unemployment insurance could be solved by two methods—by tightening administrative efforts to get persons back to work and creating jobs to absorb them. As these recommendations coincide with the very mandate of the Unemployment Insurance Commission, when will the minister rectify the serious discrepancy between the operation and the mandate of the Unemployment Insurance Commission? Will he make a statement in the near future, giving full details?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I do not agree with the premise of the question. The administration of unemployment insurance is efficient and tight.

REASON FOR FAILURE OF CLAIMANTS TO PURSUE JOB OPPORTUNITIES

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. With respect, the minister may not have read the report. It is a scathing indictment of ministers' programs and the government's attitude to people and jobs. As the report also indicates that 40 per cent of unemployment insurance claimants do not report to manpower centres to pursue job opportunities which present themselves, would the minister care to explain why UIC claimants are reluctant to take advantage of this service and why manpower centres are unable to encourage claimants to attend at the centres? I ask this as there is a problem in this regard.

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, many measures, with which the hon. member ought to be familiar by virtue of discussions in the standing committee, have been taken to increase the number of unemployment insurance claimants registering with manpower offices. Indeed, these measures are increasingly successful. I do not agree with the 40 per cent figure the hon. gentleman quoted from the Economic Council's report.

[Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands).]

ANTI-INFLATION BOARD

PROPOSAL TO BRING PROPERTY AND CASUALTY INSURANCE COMPANIES UNDER BOARD—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): Mr. Speaker, my question was to be directed to the Minister of Finance. In his understandable absence, since it deals with what the philosophy underlying the anti-inflation program can do to companies which operate at a loss, may I direct it to the Prime Minister? Will the right hon. gentleman say what is the government's response to the Anti-Inflation Board's proposal calling for all property and casualty insurance companies to be brought under the mandatory enforcement provisions of the Anti-Inflation Act? I ask this as these highly competitive companies collectively lost $400 million in the last two years.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member will remember that in the policy paper published on October 13 it was indicated that, in cases where entities make a loss, they, of course, would not be bound by the strict application of the guidelines. To the extent that the hon. member asks a precise statistical question, I will take notice of it on behalf of the minister who is attending a federal-provincial conference of finance ministers.

Mr. McCleave: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Since, despite what the right hon. gentleman just said, the Anti-Inflation Board recommended that those companies should be brought under those provisions, is there not a serious conflict with the Prime Minister's philosophy?

Mr. Trudeau: No, Mr. Speaker. The philosophy I stated is as stated in the white paper. I suggested in the last part of my answer that this may be a particular circumstance of which I know nothing. I will look into the decision and refer it to the Minister of Finance for study.

MANPOWER

RECOMMENDED MERGING OF MANPOWER AND EMPLOYMENT OFFICES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. J. R. Ellis (Hastings): Mr. Speaker, my question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration is supplementary to that asked by the hon. member for Hamilton West. As the Economic Council recommended in its most recent review the putting together or amalgamation of manpower and employment offices, contrary to previous recommendations in which it advocated separation of these offices, will the minister now reverse his decision and integrate these two services under one jurisdiction, so that they may provide worth while service?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I think I answered that question recently in the House.

ALLEGED INCREASES IN JOB VACANCIES AND NUMBER OF UNEMPLOYED—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Jake Epp (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the minister? As the report of the Economic Council of Canada tabled yesterday notes a new and unusual phenomenon, rising unemployment and increasing numbers of job vacancies—something which has come about despite the many assurances the minister gave to the manpower committee when he spoke of the various programs now in place for acquainting the unemployed with job opportunities—will the minister step up liaison with the private sector in order to direct Canadians to long-term jobs?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the situation is far more complex than that. The number of vacancies unfilled is, unfortunately, by no means the same as the number of people looking for jobs. As for liaison with the private sector, that has been considerably stepped up during the last two or three years through the job information centres and many other measures we introduced in the last two or three years.

AIR TRANSPORT

THREATENED STRIKE OF SAFETY OPERATIONS GROUP—GOVERNMENT MEASURES TO ASSURE CONTINUED OPERATIONS

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. It is reported that mediation talks have broken down between the aircraft safety operations group and MOT and that a nationwide walk-out has been ordered by the union, leaving no safety supervision or procedure for reviewing pilots' licences. What measures will the minister be taking, since this will eventually ground all commercial air travel in Canada? I would point out to the minister that there are 11 Air Canada pilots whose licences have expired.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, a certain number of steps were taken to extend licences when it was clear that that could be done without any hazard. That kind of action was a limited measure to delay the impact of any extended walkout. However, there is a limit to what can be done with regard to postponing the difficulties.

PUBLIC SERVICE

THREATENED STRIKE OF AIR SAFETY OPERATIONS GROUP—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO SETTLE

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I will direct my supplementary question to the President of the Treasury Board if he will resume his seat. He has certainly been bouncing around today. The talks are over wages and the direct responsibility of Treasury Board. If the walkout is allowed to continue, within a few weeks there will be few licenced commercial pilots left in Canada, as their licences are expiring daily. Will the minister intervene, resume and speed up negotiations before commercial air travel is completely grounded in Canada?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, in that field the workers have the right to strike and it is a right given to them by Parliament.

However, this Parliament passed a legislation last October establishing guidelines within which bargaining must be conducted. We intend to negotiate within those guidelines and if the association concerned would understand our position, we could reach an agreement within those guidelines. The legislation does not allow us to exceed the guidelines.

INDUSTRY

DOUGLAS AIRCRAFT—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO PREVENT LAY-OFFS AND DEVELOP AEROSPACE INDUSTRY

Hon. Stanley Haidasz (Parkdale): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce whether he is aware that the management of Douglas Aircraft in Malton, Ontario, announced yesterday its plan to lay off 150 workers, whether he will endeavour to take immediate steps to help save the jobs of these workers and also approach his cabinet colleagues to accelerate the federal government's study to develop a sound policy for the Canadian aerospace industry?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Yes, Mr. Speaker. I was advised of the plans by McDonnell-Douglas of Canada Limited. They followed a month of very intensive negotiations between myself and representatives of McDonnell-Douglas to see if there was a solution. We responded positively and with two specific proposals which McDonnell-Douglas did not feel they were in a position to accept. I understand that their statement yesterday with regard to the layoffs indicated that the Canadian government had done everything it possibly could in the circumstances, but that the business situation of the company was such that they could not in fact retain the employees any longer.

COMMUNICATIONS

SUGGESTED MEETING WITH QUEBEC TO DISCUSS PROBLEMS

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Communications.

Last week her Quebec counterpart suggested in a public conference the setting up of a bipartite task force made up of officials of both governments whose terms of reference would be to determine the special demands of Quebec for which some constitutional clarifications might be useful. Is the minister willing to say whether she will comply with the wish expressed by her Quebec counterpart?

Hon. Jeanne Sauvé (Minister of Communications): I have not yet received Mr. Hardy's suggestion. I read it in the papers like the hon. member, but I can say that I am in favour of the setting up of that committee and of frequent meetings between federal and provincial officials. However, I would wish, as I have already said, that the terms of reference of that committee were much broader so that we might consider all the problems dividing us presently.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

POSSIBLE RESPONSIBILITY FOR FOREST MANAGEMENT—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Mr. Speaker, in light of the recent statements by the Director General of the Canadian Forestry Service, who is also a policy adviser to the Minister of the Environment, calling for the development of a national forest policy, saying that our forests are not well managed by even the most "permissive and charitable of yardsticks", can the Minister of the Environment inform the House whether he has within his jurisdiction the capacity to respond to these recommendations, and what particular agency will be made responsible to address itself to this challenge?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of the Environment): I have no communication to that effect, Mr. Speaker.

PUBLIC SERVICE

REASON FOR USE OF PRIVATE AGENCIES TO SUPPLY CASUAL HELP—POSSIBILITY OF INCREASE IN NUMBER OF CASUALS

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the President of the Treasury Board. Last year the amount of money spent by this government on casual workers hired through personnel firms increased by 77 per cent. Treasury Board alone more than doubled the amount it spent through these private agencies from $209,000 to $492,000. Considering that these private firms rip-off anywhere from 20 to 50 per cent of the wages of these workers, my question then is why is the government using these private firms rather than using the existing facilities of the Canada Manpower Centres to save the government money and prevent the exploitation of these casual workers?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, this is a mechanism used by many organizations to fill positions on a temporary basis. Every department can do it, but this does not create new jobs. The departments must use the money already appropriated for the number of man-years that they are allowed, and until now, we have found this mechanism rather effective. But we are now looking into this problem with the Public Service Commission to determine whether it would be possible to develop a somewhat similar mechanism within the public service that would not be more costly for the administration.

[English]

Mr. Rodriguez: Was the use of temporary employees included in the announced austerity measures in December which stated that hiring would be held to a 1.5 per cent increase this year and, if they were not, can we then expect to see another doubling of the use of temporarys in the upcoming year?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, the casual employees within the civil service are considered within the guidelines. That means if they are casual employees, they are included in the moneys allocated to every department. Therefore, that will not change the maximum of 1.5 set in the budget.

ENERGY

RESEARCH ON WIND RESOURCES—REQUEST FOR REPORT

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Since the research on traditional oil resources has declined more quickly than the National Energy Board had expected, and because of the threat of an energy shortage in the near future, can the minister tell the House whether his department has developed research programs in the field of wind energy, and if so, can he report on the true potential of wind energy in Canada?

[English]

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, in an announcement that I made about two weeks ago, I indicated that the government was increasing its expenditures for research and development, including research and development in renewable resources, solar and wind energy. The National Research Council is the agency responsible for administering the wind energy program. I invite the hon. member to contact them for further information. If I can be of any assistance, I will be glad to provide it.

AGRICULTURE

MINISTER'S POSITION ON RESIGNATION OF MEMBER OF NATIONAL FARM PRODUCTS MARKETING COUNCIL

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, it is late in the day, but I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Has the minister received a letter of resignation from one of the members of the National Farm Products Marketing Council over a disagreement with the CEMA policy and alleged discrimination in the allocation of birds and quotas to take effect this weekend? If so, what is he going to do about it?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): I am going to accept his resignation, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

● (1500)

Mr. Nowlan: Is the minister going to accept it today and rescind it tomorrow or is he going to accept it completely? What will the situation be, since the member who resigned is an ex-president of the Lambton-Kent Liberal Association and a political appointee of this political minister?

Mr. Whelan: As to the accusation the hon. member has made, I am sure he is not aware it is not factual or he would not have made it. The member he talks about was not appointed by this minister. He was recommended by the Ontario Federation of Agriculture to the minister at that time, who accepted the recommendation. He has a large farm, he has a young family; he has an obligation to them and he wants to return to his farm. Last year he wanted to resign but I suggested to him he should stay one year longer to serve his country and he did stay on to serve his country with distinction.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I wonder whether the government House leader is in a position to announce the business for the balance of today, for tomorrow and for the first of next week.

Mr. Sharp: Perhaps I ought to begin by saying it is the intention of the government that the Easter adjournment shall begin at the end of the day on Wednesday, April 14, and that we shall return on April 26. I say this by way of a preliminary statement before filling in the business for most of the time between now and then. Today, I hope that after disposing of the motion I intend to move, and of which I have given notice, for an allocation of time in respect of Bill C-83—

Mr. Paproski: Shame!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Closure!

Mr. Sharp: —a motion which I hope we shall see agreed to more frequently by the opposition in the future in order to provide for the more orderly disposal of business, we shall then go on to consider the prisoners of war bill, C-92. Following that, in this order, for the remainder of today and tomorrow we shall take Bills C-92, S-32, C-88 and C-20. If the House agrees to the notice which is on notices of motions, we shall on Monday and Tuesday turn to the consideration of objections to the reports of the Redistribution Commissioners. After those have been disposed of, we shall return to the consideration, during the four days which will be provided in the allocation order, if it is accepted, of Bill C-83.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, on the same point of order, may I ask the government House leader this question: In view of the resignation of the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, and in view of the fact that new laws to combat loan sharks and control business monopolies are now sitting in limbo, does the minister consider the situation is important enough to call for the announcement of the appointment of a new minister of consumer affairs in the near future?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, the acting minister is one of the more vigorous members of this administration, and nothing which is in his hands can be described as being in limbo. He is a very active proponent of the principles embodied in that legislation.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the government House leader whether he will include Bill C-81 in the bills to be dealt with before Easter, so that we can amend the legislation and make the freeze on our incomes complete?

Mr. Sharp: There would remain on the schedule which I have announced two days on which business has not been allocated. This is one of the possibilities. I trust we will have the wholehearted support of the hon. gentleman for the proposed law.

PRIVILEGE

MR. YEWCHUK—POSITION OF MEDICAL DOCTORS WHO ARE MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT SITTING ON HEALTH COMMITTEE

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Athabasca on a question of privilege.

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): I was always under the impression, Mr. Speaker, that a question of privilege superseded a point of order.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member will realize that every Thursday it is the practice of the House to clarify the business to be undertaken. The hon. member will understand that this is a general question which is of interest to everyone in the House and that it ought to take precedence in certain circumstances.

Mr. Yewchuk: My question of privilege deals with the position of members of parliament who are medical doctors, and their right to sit on the health committee and examine any and all witnesses who come before the committee in a manner in keeping with their own judgment, free of any fear that their motives will be questioned by other members of parliament, by the press or by anyone else.

On March 25, representatives of the Canadian Medical Association appeared before the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs concerning the subject matter of Bill C-68. During that meeting, the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. Holt) clearly attempted to impute motives to certain Conservative members of parliament by implying that they had a particular pecuniary self-interest to protect, thereby attempting to undermine their credibility as members of parliament and prejudice their right to speak freely in accordance with their conscience before the standing committee. The offending comments are reported on page 20 of issue No. 44 of the committee proceedings as follows:

[Mr. Hnatyshyn.]

It is remarkable from the other side how doctors do stick together. They praise this brief and I would like to say even over a dead body, but I say they are certainly getting together on a dead issue.

Even more offensive is the following comment, also by the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway:

It is better that some people who get the service and who are paying for the service started asking a few questions and I am asking them on behalf of my constituents who seek the medical service and who are paying for it.

Clearly, in the second quotation, the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway is implying that she is suited to ask questions on behalf of her constituents, but that members of the official opposition who are MPs and physicians are not—that these members put a professional interest before their public duty. Personally, Mr. Speaker, I ceased active practice four years ago. I asked the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway to withdraw her comments which I felt were undermining my credibility as a member of parliament trying to do his job. She replied as follows:

● (1510)

My indication is that you were giving evidence as though you were witnesses over there.

In short, she refused to withdraw her comment. In regard to the CTV network and their employee, Eric Malling, he stated the following day, March 26, on the "Canada AM" program at 8.20 a.m.:

The Conservative representation on the committee consisted of four doctors and a more shameless defence of the witnesses I have never seen. The way these doctors stick together you would think they had a sponge in a stiff—the entire lot of them.

Mr. Speaker, there is only one way, in my view, that that comment could be interpreted, and this is that doctor MPs on the Conservative side were not acting in the best interests of the public of Canada, but by sticking together were acting in their own self-interest or the interest of their former profession.

In committee, the chairman, on the question of privilege raised by myself that the member for Vancouver-Kingsway should withdraw her allegations, ruled, in effect, that there was no prejudice. The comment by Mr. Malling occurred, of course, outside parliament and has not been dealt with in any way to date. What is required here, Mr. Speaker, is reaffirmation that doctor MPs are entitled to the same rights and privileges as all other MPs—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Yewchuk: —regardless of their employment before they came to parliament as representatives of the people of Canada, as well as corrective action by the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway and Mr. Malling of the CTV network.

There are many examples of members of parliament sitting on committees related to their original employment—for example, farmer MPs speaking out vigorously on behalf of the rights and needs of Canada's farmers—without being placed under suspicion by other MPs for so doing. Members of Parliament who may have an interest in the fishing industry speak out on behalf of the fishing industry; indeed, any MP can speak of income tax laws, vote against income tax increases, and so on, and not be placed under the suspicion that he or she is acting in their own self-interest. And finally, Mr. Speaker, this applies even to members of parliament voting upon and debating bills before the House dealing with salaries and services of members of parliament.

I move, therefore, that the subject matter of this question of privilege be referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I think there is at this point a very fundamental procedural difficulty in regard to the question raised by the hon. member. There seem to be other hon. members who wish to contribute by way of argument or debate to the intent of the remarks of the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. Holt) which were referred to by the hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Yewchuk). However, the fact is that on the description of the hon. member for Athabasca, the events complained of took place in a standing committee of the House. Indeed, a remedy was sought, or at least according to the description of the hon. member for Athabasca a remedy was sought, in that standing committee and was in some way dealt with at the time by the standing committee.

It has been a very long-standing and clear practice of this House that at no time before any proceedings of a standing committee are reported does this House in any way appeal, examine or scrutinize events which have taken place or decisions or rulings made in a standing committee. Before other hon. members make any intervention in this regard, I would want to make it very clear that this has been a long-standing practice in the House, one from which this incumbent has no desire to depart. However, there may be other hon. members who wish to speak to this question of privilege.

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, my complaint is particularly in regard to the reporting of the CTV network representative, one Eric Malling, who on March 26, on the "Canada AM" program made this statement which is completely false and unfounded. As a matter of fact, I will call as my witness the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. Holt) who stated, as reported at page 44:29 of the health, welfare and social affairs committee, line 28, that she found the hon. member for Simcoe North's evidence very interesting and constructive to the committee.

Mr. J. R. Holmes (Lambton-Kent): Mr. Speaker, I rise on the same question of privilege. It was stated by Eric Malling on CTV, March 26, 1976, that a conflict of interest arose when four Conservative MP physicians were in attendance at the meeting of the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs at which time the Canadian Medical Association presented their brief on Bill C-68. It is my contention that his statements were false and misrepresented my rights, responsibilities and obligations as a member of this parliament. I find his conclusions of the meeting not only unacceptable but illogical. If one is to accept his thesis regarding conflict of interest, then it would preclude farmers from serving on the agricultural committee, lawyers on the judiciary committee, businessmen on the industry, trade and commerce committee, and I could go on to give other examples.

I have been impressed with the board range of interest and knowledge displayed by members from all corners of the House. I am also impressed that each member offers a degree of expertise in various areas which contributes in a very positive way to the operation of the House and its standing committees. I respectfully submit that members of parliament who have been trained in and have practised medicine provide special expertise in questioning medical witnesses which can be invaluable when combined with the questioning of other interested members of the committee.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Holmes: With respect to the standing committee meeting held on March 25 at which the Canadian Medical Association presented their brief, I must indicate that I did not have the opportunity to question the witnesses, as implied by Mr. Malling. This is not to protest the manner in which the meeting was conducted by the chairman, since he was committed to a fixed time schedule. However, Mr. Speaker, I have no doubt that this incident was provoked either intentionally or unintentionally by the final questioner, the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway. In retrospect, I believe that had time permitted additional questioning of the witnesses, the incident might have been defused and this question of privilege made unnecessary.

If the reporter in question had researched his subject matter, he would have found during the second reading debate of Bill C-68 that I made no reference to the Canadian Medical Association, no reference to physicians' salaries or incomes, but was concerned about the future of medicine in Canada and specifically about the quality of medical care. If that reporter had also taken the time to review the debate during private members' hour on May 29, 1975, he would have found that on that occasion I took a position opposed to the official policy of the Canadian Medical Association. Finally, if that reporter had taken the opportunity to read the health paper I had written before the national convention held in Ottawa in 1974, it would have been obvious that my questioning could have been constructive to the proceedings of that day.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Holmes: Mr. Speaker, I wish to make one or two brief comments—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I do not want unduly to restrict the hon. member, but I think he surely must realize that he has gone fairly far afield from the original question of privilege which was raised. I wonder whether he would return to it.

Mr. Holmes: May I make one or two brief comments, Mr. Speaker, regarding politics, development of public policy and the role of parliamentarians, which matters I think are extremely important in this instance. My mandate is to represent all the constituents in my riding of Lambton-Kent irrespective of their political persuasion, vocation, problems or interests. That has been, and will continue to be, my primary responsibility. For an individual to suggest or imply that my purpose is to represent a special interest group either reflects naiveté or lack of understanding on their part of the duties and responsibilities of a member of parliament, or in the extreme must be construed as irresponsible reporting.

● (1520)

Sir, I have been impressed since my arrival in Ottawa in 1972 that the two principal academic disciplines used to prepare the would-be politicians are law and political science. Many students of political science go into the public service, becoming administrators of policy and advisers to those making decisions. Their training may best be described as the art of the possible, not concentrating on idealism but on the practicalities of the political system. The decisions, sir, are made by the legislators, many of whom have studied law on the general principle that—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Again, I do not wish to interrupt the hon. member. Much of what he is saying, of course, has value. It is not that these are not important observations on the role of a member of parliament, whether or not he is also a member of the medical profession, as in this particular case. However, the question the Chair has to decide at the moment is in respect of a rather narrow and confined question of privilege. On the one hand, hon. members are concerned about the proceedings of a standing committee and the remarks of another hon. member. There were certain procedural difficulties involved which I have already exposed. The second point has to do with the comments on the reporting of a journalist vis-à-vis the functions of the standing committee, or the motives of an hon. member of this House.

In both instances there is, and has been, a clear and unbroken line of precedents to the effect that neither constitutes a question of privilege. I am trying to extend to the hon. member as much leeway as possible in the matter, but there are several other members who seek the floor and I wonder if the hon. member might continue on that basis.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I rise on the same question of privilege. If there has been a reflection on any member of this House by another member, there is a privilege. There was an incident not too long ago when this House took upon itself an examination of the very point, only it was regarding a different form of the media. It is important, sir, that this House not sit idly by, letting anyone play with its morals or standard. The duty is upon you, sir, to protect us by allowing members of parliament to speek their piece when they feel their reputations as members of this House have been challenged.

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, I want to make a very brief comment. I am sure the hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Yewchuk) who has raised this issue has given the House a full, fair and responsible report of what happened in proceedings about which I know nothing. I have no intention of saying anything about the conduct of members or persons in this House or elsewhere, whether on CTV or otherwise, but I would ask that if Your Honour's ruling on this matter in any way relates to statements made by or the conduct of the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Miss Holt), your decision be reserved so that she may, depending on your intention in this matter, be heard by members of the House.

An hon. Member: She knew it was coming up and that is why she is not here.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I think the hon. member for Lambton-Kent (Mr. Holmes) was in the process of speaking.

Mr. Holmes: I have three or four short paragraphs, Mr. Speaker, but I will bow to the wishes of the Chair.

Mr. Speaker: I want to make it perfectly clear that I was not trying to stop the hon. member for Lambton-Kent.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: I simply want him to keep his remarks within the narrow confines of the question of privilege.

An hon. Member: Sit down, then, and let him do so.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Holmes: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. You are most gracious, under the circumstances. Perhaps I may just conclude. I was talking about the composition of parliaments and the predominance of lawyers and graduates of political science among those who make the decisions, as we see it. I think all we need do is look at the predominance of lawyers in the cabinet. The same is true of the international political scene, where a great many are trained in the arts of existing political life, which in effect is an adversary system. I want to suggest, in all seriousness, that the adversary system is not always productive and in today's society of turbulence such a system, I believe, in many instances is outmoded.

I am the first to recognize the effectiveness and importance of the academic disciplines to which I have referred in this House, and I know it is not necessary for me to defend their presence. However, many of the problems in today's society, touching not only the lives of Canadians but on all individuals within our global community, should be approached with reasoning and not confrontation and partisan politics. It is my opinion—I believe, shared by others—that there are times when adversary politics could be replaced by an intelligent, unemotional assessment of objective facts combined with a genuine concern for human beings.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Holmes: I would suggest to you, sir, that there are many members in this chamber who approach their duties in this manner, recognizing this may have minimal media appeal, but firm in the belief that such a role can be constructive in our political process.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a few brief words on this question of privilege relating to the conduct of a committee. I would address my remarks specifically to the question regarding the matter not being referred to the House. Standing Order 65(11) is the authority of the chairman in the committee, and it states that he——shall maintain order in the committees; deciding all questions of order subject to an appeal to the committee; but disorder in a committee can only be censured by the House—

The matter before us is not a matter of order, it is a question of privilege, and that is distinctly different from a question of order. Keeping in mind the constitution of our committees, I would suggest that committee chairmen do not have access to the expertise to which the Chair has access, nor do they possess the experience of the Chair. The clerk and the assistant clerks of the House have a great source of expertise instantly available to Mr. Speaker. The Speaker can consult with the clerks, who can research a decision and they can advise him at his elbow. That is not the quality of the clerks of committee, and I say that with the greatest respect. Regretfully, most of the clerks are not well versed in the rules and privileges of this chamber. Therefore, I do not think it is quite right, and I say, with the greatest respect to the Chair, that for Your Honour to suggest that a question of privilege can be disposed of summarily by a chairman of a committee, that being the end of the matter, is not proper.

Members' privileges can be infringed upon just as grievously, and sometimes even more so, in committee as in this House. Committees, being extensions of this House, I fail to see how the rights and privileges of hon. members can in any way be diminished or be less in a committee than in the House. It is my submission that on a fair reading of the Standing Order, part of which I quoted, a question of privilege arising in a committee should always be referable to the Speaker of this House.

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland-Colchester North): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) covered some of the points to which I should like to refer. I am not referring to what went on outside this House after something took place, but to what went on in this House in relation to something that transpired at the committee, a committee which I believe is a creature of this institution. You, sir, have been appointed as the guardian of our rules and privileges. We must refer matters that transpire to you, more or less as the chief justice of a court, just as we do when a lower court makes a decision which in our opinion is not fair and equitable. In this particular case, the hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Yewchuk) has attempted to appeal to you because he is not happy with the fairness or the end result of a decision rendered by the chairman of the committee of which he was a member. I think also, that all of us in the House must expect from our colleagues, regardless of our vocation before we came here, that they would respect what we say and what we do as being done without any particular vested interest, and that what we do is done on behalf of our constituents and, more especially, on behalf of the Canadian people at large.

We should learn not to gang-up in any way, in any type of clique, to try to put a point across. I believe that when any member endeavours to leave that impression, which might result in some newspaper commentator saying something which in effect mirrors what was said in the committee, was objected to and thrown out, then all of us here are in difficulties in trying to determine whether or not we should censor what we say because someone might believe that what we say is associated with something we have done in the past.

We must be very careful to be fully protected against that kind of charge by anyone at any time, and I believe that the only person to whom we can look to give us that kind of protection is you, Mr. Speaker. It may be one of the more difficult responsibilities that you have to assume—but I believe you do have to assume that responsibility. If the precedents are not in our favour, then I say, sir, make new precedents to give us the protection because the law we have today is only the law we have today because judges at some time, somewhere, made a decision which was different from what previous judges said in certain areas.

I do not believe you can ignore the fact that the committee system is a creature of this parliament—and you, sir, whether you like it or not, are responsible for the committee system and for the protection of members within that system as much as you are our protector here in this chamber. I ask you, sir, to give us the same kind of justice in the committee system which you have been willing to provide us with in this chamber, and I think all members in the House would then be happy.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, I rise on the same question of privilege. I have a great deal of sympathy for the point raised by the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert). However, I recognize that the point you made with reference to the question of privilege being raised in committee is one that has been followed in the past. There has been no precedent whereby a question of privilege raised in committee has been referred to the House.

I would point out to the hon. gentleman opposite that presently there exists a committee of which Your Honour is the chairman, dealing with the rights and obligations of members of parliament. Surely that is a topic which should be dealt with by that committee, formed of responsible members from all the parties in the House, and the time of the House should not be spent further with that point, which seems to be the only point of interest before the House.

[Translation]

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, once again the House of Commons has to deal with a problem of improper comments which are misinterpreted. This is not the first time, Mr. Speaker, that the House of Commons must deal with such a matter and I think that the hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Yewchuk) has rightly raised a question of privilege.

Mr. Speaker, a committee of the House of Commons is an integral part of the House. Its power proceeds from the House. The committees have the same powers as the House itself from which its powers proceed. Mr. Speaker, the interpretation of statements is too serious a matter to be taken lightly. Recently, a minister tendered his resignation and the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) accepted it. All this as the result of a statement made outside the House. It is therefore an important matter. There has been in this House during the year 1975-76 a number of instances where a member on either side clashed with a newspaperman, was misquoted by him or gave him an indication that went beyond his thoughts.

Mr. Speaker, I submit our rules in this respect are definitely evasive, inadequate and outmoded. In this respect neither hon. members nor the Chair, if I may respectfully submit, can determine exactly what our privileges are. On the basis of what authority, either in Beauchesne or in May, can we define exactly the rights of the hon. member for Athabasca, or for Shefford (Mr. Rondeau), or Témiscamingue (Mr. Caouette) or Lotbinière (Mr. Fortin)? The rules are very evasive, which leads to very unfortunate situations where for instance newspapermen gleefully report some remarks that seem to have been said in the heat of the discussion during our work.

Mr. Speaker, personally I am convinced of the integrity of the four Progressive Conservative members sitting on the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs. I believe these members work to the best of their ability. The fact they are MD's finally enhances the quality of that committee's work. We have no right to imply that kind of intentions or allegations. But referring to the Chair's earlier remarks, you will no doubt agree, Mr. Speaker, that on the basis of an evasive, inadequate and outmoded rule, as I said, you cannot intervene and efficiently protect the hon. members' rights.

This issue therefore is absolutely basic, because it imperils every member in this House under the heat of action, without practically giving him any protection. Mr. Speaker, in the name of my colleagues I wish that on the acceptability and value on merits of the extremely valid question of privilege raised by the hon. member for Athabasca, your ruling also include very positive propositions for the preparation in 1976 of a modern wording in which the rights of members would be clearly defined, so that we know where we stand once and for all. This would benefit newspapermen or other colleagues that may utter certain indications under the heat of discussion, which is only normal. We were elected to give our views. Let us have the means of expressing opinions.

Mr. Speaker, in conclusion I say this: we have had recently an experience with the former Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Ouellet) who, in the heat of the debate, made a certain statement concerning some sugar companies and a certain judge. This has cost the minister his department and his case is still pending before the courts.

Again all this happened not because the minister was right or wrong, that does not matter to me. But what intrigues me and especially concerns me is the fact that today members of parliament, while doing their duty, if they go a little too far and if they do not accomplish their task, are once more censured by the people. Between the Standing Orders of this House which everyone refers to with great admiration, in the final analysis they do not protect the member, do not convey any kind of privilege since neither the Chair nor any member can spell out truly what these privileges are, how far we can go, what are our rights and our responsibilities.

[Mr. Fortin.]

Mr. Speaker, that is why I will conclude by saying that the Chair should take very seriously the question of privilege of the hon. member for Athabaska (Mr. Yewchuk) since it is only another problem that adds to all these incidents relating to privileges that have taken place for a year or so and because of which this House cannot properly carry out its business, is more or less effective in its proceedings and even less in its measures and, in particular is impeded at given times by the legal aspect.

Mr. Speaker, this matter has gone too far to be dealt with lightly. In view of the fact that the incident referred to by the hon. member for Athabaska happened in one of the creatures of the House of Commons, that is to say in a standing committee, I suggest that this House must not ignore it. It must assume its responsibilities and review the decisions made within one of its creatures, in this case a standing committee. Finally, it must take this opportunity to really determine the rights and privileges of hon. members so that they really be able to do the work for which they are paid.

● (1540)

[English]

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Grenville-Carleton has already made a contribution to this question of privilege. Is he rising on the same question of privilege?

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I was going to make a suggestion as to how we might proceed if no other hon. member wishes to contribute. I think the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford) made an excellent suggestion. I think the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. Holt) ought to be given the opportunity to reflect on what she has said and perhaps done to affect this institution, and be given the opportunity to explain and, hopefully, withdraw remarks which by any stretch of the imagination are at least offensive.

Mr. Speaker: The question of privilege is raised by the hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Yewchuk) further to the notice he gave the House yesterday. The hon. member raises three procedural questions: first, whether in fact the remarks of the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. Holt) constitute a question of privilege, aside from the fact that they were made in committee; whether the remarks of the reporter referred to outside this House, or in fact any reporter's comments on the performance of any member of the House can, or, to be more specific—if it is possible—constitute a question of privilege, and whether the matter, having been dealt with in committee, the Chair ought to attempt—frankly, against all precedents—to sit in appeal on judgments of procedure made in standing committees. However, these questions are valid enough to be considered.

Furthermore, in respect to the first of the three questions, the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway is not in the House at the moment, and it is clearly in the interests of a full understanding of the events which took place, or the events which have been described by the hon. member for Athabasca, and in keeping with one of the clear practices of the House, that in questions of privilege of this sort, whether or not they technically amount to a question of privilege, pending such a decision it has always been the practice of the House, certainly whenever possible, to give an opportunity to the hon. members involved to expose their thinking and to make whatever explanations may be warranted in the circumstances.

Certainly, the Chair would be very reluctant to try to make a final decision on any of the three questions unless and until the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway has either had an opportunity to make an intervention or declines to do so. Accordingly, in the circumstances it would seem the best course for the moment would be for the Chair to reserve any decision, at least until that event takes place, and then after such intervention, if it does take place, further reservation of the matter may be warranted.

I conclude by saying that I think hon. members understand that it is not the desire of the Chair to in any way encourage either a relaxation of the protection of the privileges of any member or to downgrade the quality of respect which is owed by one member of the House to all other members. The practice of this House, in taking most seriously any imputation of motives to any of the members of the House in the conduct of their duties, is one which has been clearly followed in the past. In the eyes of the House an imputation of motives is clearly reprehensible. Whether or not it has constituted privilege, it certainly has been a reprehensible practice, and it is certainly not the desire of the Chair at this time to relax the vigil that the House has always maintained in that regard. However, it might be appropriate to hear from the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway before going any further.

Mr. Rodriguez: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order which arises from an answer which the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Chrétien) gave this afternoon to my question regarding casual and part-time workers in the federal civil service. I am quite sure the minister did not mean intentionally to mislead the House, but he indicated that his announced austerity with respect to growth in the federal service of 1.5 per cent in man-hours involves all workers, including part-time and casual workers.

I spoke with officials in the minister's department prior to asking the question and I was assured by them that the 1.5 per cent growth in the federal civil service included only permanent and term employees, not those who are under contract or who are casual workers. I thought I ought to bring that to the attention of the House in the hope that the minister may be reading this before tomorrow and he may be able to clarify it within his department and to this House.

PROXY VOTING ACT (AIRMEN)

MEASURE TO CLARIFY DEFINITIONS IN CANADA ELECTIONS ACT

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-431, to amend the Canada Elections Act.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Forrestall: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to extend to those employees of commercial aircraft, mainline carriers, regional carriers and any other registered aircraft carriers the privileges which are extended to certain other categories during election time with respect to proxy voting. I commend the bill to hon. members of the House.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

ELECTORAL BOUNDARIES READJUSTMENT ACT

MOTION RESPECTING COMPLETION OF DEBATE

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to the notice of motion I gave yesterday, I should now like to move the motion under Standing Order 75C.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The House knows the terms of the motion, and the House is aware that pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 75C in respect of which the notice was given yesterday, a debate of to hours' duration may begin. There remain only any other motions which might be called pursuant to motions today and questions on the order paper. I wonder if hon. members might agree that it would be in order, before entering into such debate, simply to dispose of questions on the order paper and any other motions, if there are any, in order to complete routine proceedings before putting this motion. Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Translation]

Mr. Beaudoin: We agree, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, hopefully, I will have the agreement of the House to approve a motion which appears under notices of motions at page 13 of today's order paper as follows:

That, on Monday, April 5, 1976, the House shall continue to sit between 6.00 p.m. and 8.00 p.m.;

That, on Tuesday, April 6, 1976, the House shall not adjourn until the completion of the business provided for in this order;

Electoral Boundaries

That, on the aforementioned days, no private members business shall be taken up;

That, on the aforementioned days, the business taken up shall be the consideration of objections to reports of Electoral Boundaries Commissions;

That all objections to any given report be considered at the same time;

That the objections or groups of objections, as the case may be, be considered in the order in which the objection or first objection in the group, as the case may be, was laid upon the table; and

That during the consideration of any objection or group of objections, as the case may be, no member shall speak more than once, nor for more than twenty minutes.

Ordinarily, this would not come before the House until tomorrow. I have had discussions with representatives of the other parties, however, and I wonder whether there would be unanimous consent to deal with it today. I make this suggestion because I announced in the business of the House that on Monday and Tuesday we would deal with these distribution objections; but until we have approved this order the business of the House is a bit uncertain.

● (1550)

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, the government House leader has discussed the matter with me and we are prepared to consent.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Agreed.

Mr. Beaudoin: D'accord.

Mr. Penner: Mr. Speaker, I wish to rise at this time on a point of order relating to the report of the Electoral Boundaries Commission for the province of Ontario which was laid before this House by Your Honour on February 27, 1976. I will explain why I am raising this point of order now. In view of the order referred to by the President of the Privy Council and the other House leaders relating to the debate which is to take place next week, and wishing to assure the President of the Privy Council and the other House leaders—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps there is a lesson to be learned here. If we attempt to depart from the traditional order of events, we may experience difficulty. Perhaps other hon. members will want to contribute to the point of order the hon. member for Thunder Bay wishes to raise. I do not know, as I would not gainsay such a possibility. As things now stand, the President of the Privy Council has proposed an order respecting Standing Order 75C. Questions remain on the order paper. If we depart from the proper order of business we could run into difficulty in attempting to dispose of the point of order now and in the hope that consent for the other matter may be given. I think the safest procedure would be to take matters as they come. I wonder if the House would care to provide some guidance on the point.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I do not think it would hurt if the government House leader were permitted to put his motion and we dealt with the point of order after that. If the point of order is found to be valid, could it not be dealt with in connection with the report concerning Ontario? I understand the hon. member's position. I do not think it would be amiss, procedurally, if we dealt with it in that way.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, would it not be more appropriate for the point of order to be raised when the first Ontario objections are dealt with on Monday? Surely the point of order does not apply to the passing of this procedural motion. Surely it ought to be raised when we consider the Ontario report.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. All this shows the difficulties one can encounter when one tries to depart from the regular order of doing business.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, could we not deal with the matter this way: could we not go ahead with the motion proposing an allocation of time under Standing Order 75C? After that is disposed of, we could call this motion for the business on Monday and Tuesday. The point of order could be raised after the question is put, that is, after we have disposed of the motion under Standing Order 75C.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Questions on the order paper remain. I think we shall run into difficulty if we attempt to reorganize our program. We have called motions. The President of the Privy Council wishes to propose a motion pursuant to Standing Order 75C. Obviously, the simplest course is the direct one. We should proceed with the motion in its proper place in the proceedings of the day.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

TIME ALLOCATION MOTION FOR SECOND READING STAGE ON BILL C-83

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of the Privy Council) moved:

That, in relation to Bill C-83, an Act for the better protection of Canadian society against perpetrators of violent and other crime, four sitting days shall be allotted to the further consideration of the second reading stage of the said bill; and

That, on the fourth of the said days, at 15 minutes before the expiry of the time provided for government business in such sitting, Mr. Speaker shall interrupt any proceeding then before the House, if required for the purpose of this order, and, shall forthwith put, without further debate or amendment, every question necessary for the disposal of the second reading stage of the said bill.

He said: Mr. Speaker, Bill C-83 has now been before the House at the second reading stage on six days. There have been 29 members who have spoken in this debate and, quite clearly, many more also wish to put their views on the record.

The issues raised by this bill are great in number and in complexity. With such a bill there comes a time when general debate ceases to contribute to the resolution of such issues and a more detailed consideration is required. We on this side feel that that time is fast approaching with regard to Bill C-83. We feel that this bill should be referred to the standing committee in the very near future. In my discussions with my counterparts in the opposition I did not find, I think it is fair to say, disagreement with the proposition that the time to send the bill to committee was fast approaching. What we could not agree on, however, was how fast that time was approaching. My counterparts were not in a position to agree to any arrangements for concluding the debate and sending the bill to committee. Therefore, the government had to take the responsibility.

It is important to note that this motion does not end discussion of the issues raised in Bill C-83. Far from it. This motion provides four additional days of debate at second reading. Then the bill will go to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs, where witnesses may be heard and the bill will be given very thorough consideration. After committee, of course, there is the report stage, and after that there will be a very thorough debate at third reading. Thus, this motion is not so much intended to restrict discussion as to move it in an orderly fashion into a more satisfactory forum.

I think in the long run it is beneficial to members on all sides to know in advance how much time is to be given to various debates, and I hope that in the future it will be possible more often to fix the time for debates by agreement among the parties. As things now stand, open-ended debates at the early stages of measures such as this help neither their advocates nor their opponents. Members supporting a measure all too often hesitate to intervene in debate lest the time taken be unduly extended. Members opposing a measure tend, after a while, to repeat arguments and to lose thereby the attention of the media and the public. I might say that a strong advocate of this course was the former leader of the Progressive Conservative party who, like myself, felt that we should concentrate our efforts more in committee and on third reading than on second reading stage.

Mr. Paproski: But he was not in favour of the muzzle at second reading.

Mr. Sharp: The legislative process is deliberately designed to provide opportunities for members not only to examine bills but also to stimulate public response. This particular bill raises issues that have been of public interest for many months. It was introduced late in February and will have received second reading by mid-April after being debated in the House on ten days. This does not seem to me to be an unreasonable amount of time either in terms of House time or of the over-all passage of time that is necessary to stimulate public response. Now it will go to committee where, as I have said, it will receive careful consideration. In due course it will be passed, but that will be many weeks from now. This time allocation motion does not end debate. We are attempting to make the legislative process an orderly one. We would prefer to do it by agreement. We hope that members will soon realize that parties do not have to agree on a bill in order to agree on how much time to spend on a given stage of the bill.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I am always amused when the government House leader begins any discussion for making parliament more responsive with the introduction of a motion the effect of which is to muzzle parliament.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Sharp: Some muzzle! It's a ten-day muzzle.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): The government does this when public response shows the government and the opposition that the public opposes this ill-conceived bill. The government can think of no better way of stopping public discussion than by limiting debate.

Mr. Paproski: By muzzling parliament.

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): The government House leader decided to do just that. I can think of no better method of muzzling discussion on the bill than embarking on this bad procedure. What is really interesting about this government House leader is the kind of issue he chooses with respect to closure. First it was the anti-inflation program, Bill C-73, which by any measure in this country, prejudiced or unprejudiced, socialist, Conservative or Liberal, political or apolitical, is an absolute failure in terms of inflation. That was his first choice for closure.

● (1600)

The second choice was the abomination of Bill C-58, the Time and Reader's Digest bill. It started off as a marvellous piece of legislation to improve the publishing industry in this country. All of a sudden, with a little twist of the foot of the Minister of National Revenue, it became a piece of censorship legislation that no one could ever count on. It brought a degree of mystery and intrigue into the law, an ability to change legislation without referral to parliament the like of which we have never seen.

The third instance chosen to muzzle parliament and cut off debate for the government's own reasons and for the reasons advanced in the puffery of the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Sharp) is this bill.

An hon. Member: Bill C-68.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Yes, there was one other, Bill C-68. That is another indication of the marvellous choices of the government House leader—a grand slam. That bill directly affects the delivery of health care in the province of Ontario and in other provinces. Surely there is not a self-respecting member on the other side who can support such stupidity.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): We have heard, in terms of the length of debate, the best example of the scissors' syndrome of this government. This bill is full of bureaucratic discretions in many things, not the least in gun control. There is a danger of imposing a burden on the law-abiding citizen and doing very little for the peace and security in this country and the protection of society which the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford) indicated was the intention of this bill. That is the position which this government asks the House to lie down and accept for the purpose of closure. Mr. Speaker, we are not going to do that.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): We are not going to accept the unintentional misleading of this House by the President of the Privy Council. He said we had debated this bill for six days. I have the record of the debates in this House—Monday, March 8, four hours and 50 minutes; Tuesday, March 9, two hours and 35 minutes; Thursday, March 11, one hour and 25 minutes, and then nothing with respect to this bill—and it is he who chooses the legislation, not us—until Monday, March 29, when the matter was debated for 15 minutes. On Tuesday, March 30, it was debated for three hours and ten minutes, and on Wednesday, March 31, for two hours and 35 minutes. That, Mr. Speaker, is a total of 15 hours' debate on a matter that is of great public importance.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): If a normal, average day—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order, please. With the noise on both sides it is very hard to follow the hon. member. This is a very emotional subject and I think hon. members should at least listen to the member who has the floor.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): If a normal, average day at this time of the year is put at three hours and 40 minutes—and that is the experience in terms of debate in this House—we have spent the equivalent of just over four days on Bill C-83. That is hardly any period of time to debate something of urgent and public importance, at least so important that it was put on the order paper and brought forward. The government House leader is attempting to indict the opposition for delaying this piece of legislation. Up to March 31, yesterday, there were 11 Liberal, 11 Progressive Conservative, 4 NDP and 4 Social Credit speakers. If there was ever an indication that a piece of legislation has engaged the attention of members on all sides of the House, it is the record I have just quoted. If there was ever an indication that debate on a piece of legislation ought not to be cut off before running its normal course, it is this.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): This was introduced as a peace and security program. It is part of a whole package of legislation that includes a government proposal for the abolition of capital punishment. This government is putting forward an alternative when it asks this country to go with it and abolish capital punishment. If that abolition is important to this government, then I say this government ought not cut off debate on one important aspect of the whole package it is asking parliament and this country to accept. This parliament and this country is not prepared to accept this kind of untoward muzzling on matters which are so important that they are likely to engage the time of the House until the end of this session.

Mr. Blais: Do you want to sit in July?

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): The choice as to whether we sit in July rests with the government House leader and his colleagues, and not with anyone else. In fact, I think it would be a much more pleasant July if the hon. member for Nipissing (Mr. Blais) went home.

[Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton).]

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, this government ought to know better, four times they have gone to the plate with respect to closure, and they are about to strike out for the fourth time. The people of Canada are not going to forget what this government is trying to do to this parliament in terms of legislation which is so important that it has generated the greatest amount of mail on any subject since many members have been here, including many who have been here much longer than I have. I cannot understand what motivates this government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, we are thoroughly opposed to this motion. Before he sat down, the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) said that he could not understand what motivates the government to bring in a motion of this kind. I can only conclude that the government is stupid.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): In the course of his remarks, the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Sharp) said that he hoped it would be possible more often to fix the time of debate by agreement among the parties. The implication of that statement is that what we are doing today is fixing the time of debate by agreement among the parties, and that is not true. Neither was it true with regard to Bill C-73, Bill C-58 or Bill C-68. This is another case of the government using its authority, its majority and its brute force to tell this parliament what it shall do.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): As has often been said from the chair, this is a place of debate. It is a place of confrontation, where issues are involved. However, I suggest that when it comes to arranging the business of the House and arranging how we will use our time, that ought not to be done by debate and confrontation. It ought to be done by understanding, consultation and agreement.

● (1610)

I hope to be in this place long enough to see the day when we shall arrange the time of the House by consultation, understanding and agreement. But every time the President of the Privy Council moves a motion under 75scc he puts off the day of understanding or agreement. In effect, he says he cannot wait for the business of the House to be arranged in that way; he has the power, he has a majority, and so he uses a form of closure. Every time this is done, it not only raises questions about the immediate issue under debate but it delays the day when we can come to some sensible arrangement about the conduct of business.

An hon. Member: Not with you here.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): It is for this reason I am annoyed because this stupid motion is being put forward today, and my colleagues and I will vote against it. What is before us is Bill C-83. Gallup polls and other indications make it fairly clear, I think, that the majority of Canadians want legislation along the lines of Bill C-83. But there are requests from all over the country, even from those who support the bill, for improvements and modifications which might be made in committee.

There is, however, a sizeable minority of Canadians who do not like some of the things that are contained in the bill. They have a feeling it is being railroaded through the House. The minister's action today will reinforce that feeling. As for the minority which does not like the gun control measures, I suggest they have a right for their voices to be heard through members in the House who wish to express their objections.

I used the word "stupid" with respect to this motion. I did so deliberately because I think that what is being done today hurts the cause of Bill C-83. It is hurting the cause of the whole peace and security legislation package. I wish the President of the Privy Council had paid attention to the advice some of us tried to give him not to bring in this motion.

May I also point out, in addition to the statistics put on the record by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton in connection with the debate up to this point, that the motion the minister has made is not as generous as he would like to suggest. He said there would be four more days; and there were interjections during the remarks of the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton repeating that phrase—"Four more days". We learned today that those days are to be Wednesday, Thursday and Friday of next week, and Monday of the following week. So two of those days are short days, the Wednesday and the Friday. Further, on Thursday, Friday and Monday there are private members' hours and I see nothing in the motion which would turn those hours into time spent on Bill C-83. So the total number of hours is limited.

I suggest, too, that there is another form of closure which comes into play when a motion such as this is made. When there is no time limit placed on debate, members of the opposition speak one after another and government members sit back; they do not like to speak because they know that to do so would lengthen discussion. But when there is a time limit on the preceedings they rise freely to take part in debate, and since the majority of the members of the House are Liberals they can claim, and expect, a majority of the time to be allotted to them in the days available.

Mr. Blais: And why not?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order, please. I would remind hon. members that during this debate no member may speak for more than ten minutes. Experienced members know that once a speaker has the floor he should be heard without interruption.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): That interruption from the other side reveals the basic attitude of the Liberal majority. The Liberals think they run the place, they think they own it. I was not suggesting that Liberal members do not have the right to speak in this debate. I was pointing out that by taking up 50 or 60 per cent of the time available, they cut down considerably the amount of time available to the opposition.

Mr. Blais: Why not?

An hon. Member: Because we shall be under closure.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I shall spend no more time dealing with these idiotic interruptions. The fact of the matter is that the motion contains the elements of double closure. It provides for four days, two of which are short and on three of which there are private members' hours. It also sets up a situation in which members of one party can take up more than half the time available. This means that opportunity for the opposition to express its point of view will be seriously curtailed. Again, I say the President of the Privy Council has been most unwise. In my opinion he has done a disservice to the good which is contained in the bill; he has done a disservice to the whole peace and security package, and he has done a disservice to the effort to arrive at arrangements for conducting our business in an orderly fashion. We shall be voting against the motion.

[Translation]

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, as both House leaders spoke before me, namely the leader of the official opposition and the leader of the NDP, I ought to express the views of the members of the Social Credit Party of Canada. We strongly object to the adoption of this motion under Standing Order 75C to restrict the debate on Bill C-83 to four days only on second reading.

This important piece of legislation deals on the one hand with gun control and on the other hand with all the measures the government intends to take in order to reduce the crime rate in this country. I think that anyone who supports this motion accepts at the same time that a member's role be downgraded. It is even an undemocratic measure because it cuts short forcibly the debates in this House. Why then are members elected to come and discuss in this House if the government keeps on resorting to this so-called special legislation to end the debate to suit itself?

In my view, it is a misuse of authority, it is dictatorship, and history has proved that those administrators who have indulged in dictatorial methods were most unpopular at least with those under their jurisdiction.

I hope that all the members of this House will take a stand against that proposal, even Liberal members. Otherwise, I shall have to conclude that there is some truth in the tale about the frog which is gradually heated in a pot of water until it bursts. I shall also have to infer that this tale applies to the letter to those speechless members whose powers, responsibilities and even right to speak are being gradually eroded and who allow themselves to be quietly boiled by the government House leader and the cabinet without so much as raising an objection.

No matter how the government leader explains away that his motion is not a motion of closure, it is nevertheless a gag. I will not accept this attitude on the part of the government. Nor do I accept the rule which was passed in 1969 because it is becoming a political instrument in the hands of the government whenever it wishes to gloss over a problem or ignore an important or controversial issue, as is the case with Bill C-83.

If the debate were to last for too long, the public would have enough time to realize the nonsense the government is ramming down their throats through this legislation. Therefore the government is simply reducing the discussion period to a maximum of four days. That is why I say that Standing Order 75C is an anti-democratic political tool. What other logical reason could there be to limit the time spent on debating this bill?

Are there very few bills before the House? Is there any problem in the country which calls for an emergency debate today and which would require the time of the House? The government has not given us any proof of that. Bill C-83 now before us is very important and its implications are many. Many members had expressed the desire to take part, in conformity with democratic principles, in this debate on second reading.

Then why is the government trying everything to limit these discussions, if not prevent the opposition from doing its work, thus making sure the public has no time to react; for public opinion is beginning to get involved.

If the government does not want to manage in a democratic way, it should say so openly and stop this charade to make believe that discussions in Parliament are not useless. At the same time it could tell us how the real powers governing the country—those who administer it and introduce legislation—are out of the House and Parliament and can be found in the hands of big financiers and enterprises that take care of the Liberal party fund.

When the government takes out this blackjack that article 75C of the Standing Orders represents, less than 10 per cent of the members of this House have spoken on second reading of this legislation. There were 28 speakers out of 265 members and ministers, as follows: 11 Liberals, 11 Progressive-Conservatives, three New Democrats and three Social Crediters.

It is now suggested that the debate be limited to four days only. If we look at the schedule of the House business, it may happen that such days be allocated as follows: three short days and only one long day, which will further reduce the time allocated to hon. members. Tomorrow, Friday, is a short day, because the House does not sit in the evening. Next Monday and Tuesday will be devoted to the consideration of the electoral boundaries reform. Wednesday and Friday will be short days and Thursday, April 8, will be the only long day devoted to the consideration of Bill C-83.

Mr. Speaker, there is something else I would like to point out before concluding. By ending the debate on this bill, the government gives the impression that it is irregular that on second reading the House should devote more time to some bills than to others. As if all legislation should be equally important and require the same time, which is totally wrong and illogical.

Mr. Speaker, when it is impossible to have democracy serve one's own purposes, one is sometimes willing to resort to force. This is how I see this motion which was introduced today pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 75C. The entire government army, with its back bench mercenaries, is now fighting against democracy and we have the proof.

In the Middle East they have the PLO, the Palestine Liberation Organization. Here in the House of Commons we have the Liberal party which, through this silencer motion, becomes Parliament's PLO, the Parliamentary Liberties Ostracizer, so to speak.

● (1620)

[English]

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the government has moved that Bill C-83 be referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs after four more days of debate. The motion is moved under this section simply because we could not receive agreement under the other sections of the rule having to do with time allocation. As has already been pointed out, this will mean that there will be ten days of debate on what, under the rules of the House, is supposed to be the principle of the bill, not the detail of the bill.

For those unaccustomed to parliamentary procedures, I want to put on the record, as did the House leader, that this bill will go to committee for clause by clause, word by word examination by the members of that committee. The committee will call witnesses. The committee is comprised of good members from all sides of the House; there are lawyers and experts of one sort or another on the justice and legal affairs committee. The bill is then reported from the committee back to the House for consideration of changes made in committee and for third reading. The same process is then repeated in the other place, the Senate. By no imagination, Mr. Speaker, is this rushing legislation.

The debate so far, of which we have four more days to go, has confirmed my own belief that amendments to the criminal law of this country are complex, intricate measures that require detailed and careful examination in a committee. It has confirmed that there are misunderstandings of the proposals made in Bill C-83 which can only be cleared up in committee. It has confirmed that there are many groups in this country that need and want to be heard on the bill. If the opposition does not want to provide them with an opportunity to be heard, then I want that clearly on the record.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Sheer sophistry.

Mr. Basford: The debate has shown that there are parts of the bill of particular contention, such as the gun control measures and the protection of privacy amendments. With regard to gun control, a number of concerns have been expressed by responsible and knowledgeable members of the House, some resulting, however, from misunderstanding which I hope is not deliberate. Questions have been raised concerning the nature of the licensing system; as to the adequacy of the firearms-use training programs; as to the nature of the rural needs and interests and the urban needs and interests of the people of this country; as to the bill's effect on gun collectors and on crime and criminality; and as to how to encourage responsible gun use.

We have spent six days debating those subjects and we will debate them another four days. I may be a lawyer and a politician, but I believe in action, Mr. Speaker, rather than rhetoric. I believe that the most effective action at this time is to refer this bill to the expert committee on justice and legal affairs so that the many suggestions made by members of the House, as well as those made in correspondence and in briefs, can be considered by that committee of experts. It is in the hands of the committee, not mine, Mr. Speaker; but I hope that at an early date the committee will hear, and hear exhaustively, the representations of the Canadian Bar Association, the Canadian Wildlife Federation—of which I am a member—the firearms and responsible ownership group, the Canadian Association of Chiefs of Police, the Canadian Sporting Arms and Ammunitions Association, the Shooting Federation of Canada. The Canadian Civil Liberties Association is a responsible group that has raised questions about Bill C-83 which it is my duty, as minister, either to answer and convince them or consider changes in the bill.

In addition, Mr. Speaker, I want to hear from the various native groups that have expressed concern about the bill. All of these are people who have a right to come to parliament and be heard.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Basford: An effective parliament has the obligation to provide the machinery to hear these people at the earliest time. Much has been said recently about the importance of making parliament more effective. I was delighted when the Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Clark) was elected the new leader of the Conservative party, because he said one of his priorities was to see parliament become a more workable and relevant institution. I regret that his House leader and his followers are out of step with him already—only three weeks after his election as leader.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Nowlan: We have not had any resignations yet.

Mr. Basford: We on this side want an effective and relevant parliament. The Leader of the Opposition wants an effective and relevant parliament, and the people of Canada want an effective and relevant parliament. For Pete's sake, Mr. Speaker, let us make this that kind of parliament!

● (1630)

It is the theory of parliament that the government proposes legislation and parliament disposes of it. In this case, Mr. Speaker, parliament cannot properly deal with this kind of legislation until it has received full, rational and complete consideration by an expert committee which, under the Standing Orders, is there to deal with bills of this House. The committee on justice and legal affairs is the place to deal with the details, the words, the clauses and the ramifications of Bill C-83 and to explore with witnesses of interested groups their views as to the effect of this legislation and where it goes.

When we have had ten days' debate on the principle of this bill, we should then refer it to the committee, as this motion would require. I do not think my history in trying to get legislation through this House would indicate that I am unreasonable when looking at amendments, and I think the hon. member for Calgary South will confirm that.

Mr. Woolliams: He might, but I won't.

Mr. Basford: We cannot look at amendments or changes, and we cannot look at the details and the ramifications of this measure until it is before the committee.

Someone asked how members on this side of the House can support the motion today by the government House leader, seconded by myself. The reasons are very simple, Mr. Speaker, and they are two: we on this side of the House believe this country needs an effective and relevant parliament and, second, we want to put parliament to work dealing in detail with the problems of crime in this country. Let us get on with that job.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I was glad to hear the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford) congratulate our leader, in spite of his fallacious remarks. It is true that our leader said we wanted a workable parliament, but he never suggested that we wanted parliament gagged or muzzled, and that is what the government is doing today. The Minister of Justice says he wants action and not rhetoric. I suggest that what he wants is a dictatorship rather than a democracy.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Woolliams: What has taken place, Mr. Speaker? There has never been a bill brought before this House about which there has been so much public response and uproar. It is not about what the bill is called, but rather about what it contains. All across this land—and everyone of the backbenches over there knows this—there has been a great deal of response in the form of letters and telegrams, in fact, there has never been an issue over which so much abuse has been poured on the government—and that is what it deserves. This bill contains not only gun controls—about 83 pages in that regard—but also provisions relating to dangerous offenders, amendments giving police full powers under wiretap, amendments giving provinces additional jurisdiction and provisions respecting parole and the Parole Board.

The Minister of Justice talks about wanting to get on with the job. We have so far had about 15 or 16 hours of debate. There have only been 11 Progressive Conservative, 11 Liberals, 4 members of the NDP, and 4 of the Social Credit party who have made speeches on this bill. Considering the important content of this bill and the amendments to the Criminal Code, 16 hours of debate is nothing. This whole thing is a farce. It is nonsense that the government should implement the provisions of Standing Order 75C at this time to guillotine or cut off the opposition.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Woolliams: Is this the new kind of arrogance, the new kind of duress, the new kind of coercion? Is this the new society? Is this the new compulsive democracy? Is this just the beginning? Our House Leader pointed out that this measure has been used four times. Is this the procedure we can now expect to be used? Are we to have a few hours' debate on important matters and then be gagged in the opposition? The Minister of Justice said the committee is the place to study this bill, rather than here in the House. If we carry that argument to its logical conclusion, it means that we will just have second reading with a bill referred to the committee, and that is all. That is nonsense.

Mr. Sharp: We said ten days' debate, first.

Mr. Woolliams: I suggest that if this is the way we are going to carry on in this place, parliament will not last. God help Canada, God help the democratic process, and God help Canadians. How long can this country withstand this government that was elected on a program totally different to that which it is trying to implement now? This is the same government which is preaching and implementing an easing of the laws which, either intentionally or unintentionally, is making it easier for the criminal element to operate against law-abiding citizens. The government now comes forward with a peace and security package to cover its mistakes. This is a legal poultice to cover up the next bill, C-84, about which the government is frightened of public opinion.

I hope the Minister of Justice's promises about amendments to be made to the bill and briefs that will be received from a wide section of the country are not idle promises. The Minister of Justice may feel that we should be allowed to call more witnesses and hear more briefs, but I am always afraid of another guillotine that can be used outside this chamber. That guillotine is the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) who will tell the Minister of Justice how many briefs and how many witnesses can be heard. He is the man behind the scene. This is the Prime Minister's baby, and the mover of this motion is merely his puppet.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Woolliams: The government House leader dances to the tune of the Prime Minister. Because of this action on the part of the government, when this bill does get to the committee, which has always worked well together, instead of there being that kind of fellowship and co-operation we will have nothing but tension.

Mr. Lang: Oh, surely!

Mr. Woolliams: The minister says "Oh, shoot". He might want to change that word, because I could use it in reply.

Mr. Lang: I said, "Oh, surely"—you are not being serious.

Mr. Woolliams: I am being very serious. I think this is a very serious matter. The hon. member for Saskatoon-Humboldt (Mr. Lang) may think this is a great joke because the guillotine is part of his way of life.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the parliamentary secretary rising on a point of order?

Mr. Blais: No, Mr. Speaker; I wish to participate in the debate.

[Mr. Woolliams.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The parliamentary secretary did not rise in time, and I recognize the hon. member for Waterloo-Cambridge (Mr. Saltsman).

● (1640)

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo-Cambridge): Mr. Speaker, on one occasion, when discussing the relative merits of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford) as against the merits of the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand), someone asked me who I would hire as my lawyer if I had to go to court. My reply, of course, was obvious: I said that it depended upon whether I was innocent, or guilty. If I was guilty, I would obviously take the Minister of Justice, because that had been his role for a long time. I remember the minister when he was a bright, curly-headed backbencher. His job in those days was to take the bad case of the government and to defend it. That is how he got to be Minister of Justice. He did such a fine job of defending bad cases that they made him minister—and he is still doing the same thing. So everything changes, and nothing changes.

This is one of the things that I do not think the Liberals will ever learn, namely, that it is important to have an opposition in the House of Commons. If the Liberal party had its way, there would be just the Liberal party in the House.

An hon. Member: Hear, hear!

Mr. Saltsman: I hear "Hear, hear!" They admit to it openly. When they say that, after all, they are entitled to speak and they rise and say they are entitled to equal time with the opposition, do you feel like asking them, "What are you guys supposed to be doing in caucus? This is not the Liberal caucus, this is the House of Commons." I presume that they have voices in their own caucus, and I presume someone pays attention to them in their caucus. But perhaps they do not; perhaps they sit there like a bunch of sheep in caucus and no one pays any attention, so they impose closure so that someone notices they are alive. They do not understand the most elementary fact about parliamentary debate and the opposition.

What is the point of this debate? This is an important decision that parliament is being asked to make. It is a decision that must be aired, a decision that needs time to gel. They say, "Take it to committee and examine it point by point." It is valuable, and no one disagrees that it will go to committee at some point; but public opinion is formed in this House of Commons and it needs time to form. That is the point of the debate, and that is the one thing the Liberals do not seem to want any part of. They can take the best case in the world and, by some incredible piece of genius, turn it to mud. Many of us on this side of the House recognize the importance of this legislation and, in fact, have spent a good part of our time going around the country and defending it. We have tried to reassure people that the government does not mean to be arbitrary, that it does not mean to behave badly to the collectors of guns or the legitimate hunters in this country.

What is the government trying to do? It is trying destroy a good case. It is going out of its way to take a good case and wreck it so that nobody can defend it. This is really what the implication is. If we look at the legislation, we find sections in it that have an arbitrary ring. One of the legitimate complaints of people who are hunters or collectors of guns is their fear that the government intends to be arbitrary in relation to them. If anything is required to reinforce these fears, the government has managed to do it by bringing in closure. It has managed to say, "Yes, you cannot believe a thing we say in this legislation."

I have spent a good part of my time in the past two months speaking to rod and gun clubs. I have been very fortunate, because there are a number of rod and gun clubs in my riding and their members initially did not see any need for legislation of this kind. But unlike the American rod and gun clubs or rifle associations, the members of our clubs are pretty intelligent people who say, "All right. If parliament wants to have this legislation, if the country or parts of the country feel that this kind of legislation is important, we are prepared to co-operate."

I am very proud of the rod and gun clubs in Canada. They have gone out of their way to look at the legislation, to make suggestions, and in most cases their suggestions have been excellent. After all, what do most of us in this place know about guns? Not a great deal. I certainly do not know a great deal about guns, about collecting guns and about the problems associated with either the legitimate or illegitimate use of guns. I welcome the kind of advice that I have been receiving from hunters and associations who know more about it than I do. I have asked for their co-operation and it has been given to me.

I am sure I am not the only member in the House who has done that. I know other members have gone to these associations and asked them to help them, to look at the legislation and to make some suggestions so that we can come out with a bill which achieves the purpose we want it to achieve; in other words, to keep guns out of the hands of the people who should not have them, without inhibiting the legitimate use of guns for sports activities and the use of guns in the hands of people who know how to take care of a gun and do not constitute any problem to society. That is really what many of us have been working to do, and we have received that co-operation.

How do I go back—I am glad I am not a member of the Liberal party; I am glad I am not one of their backbenchers—after having sought the co-operation and given assurances to the rod and gun clubs that the government means to do the right thing, and that if there is something wrong with the legislation there will be ample time in parliament to look at it and correct it and explain the government's imposition of closure? I do not have to do it, of course, because I can say I did not like it and I voted against it. But I would hate to be a Liberal trying to explain that after having gone around telling rod and gun clubs not to worry about it, this legislation will not hurt them, their feelings will be taken into account, the government wants their ideas, it wants to listen to them, and then the government brings in closure and cuts off the debate.

What is the great urgency about getting the bill through in what amounts to two working days? I suspect that the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. Holt), while she does not have much of an effect on anybody else, has had a very profound effect on her caucus. She has sold them the notion of piecework, that you come to the House under a kind of piecework system and that the more words spoken in the House of Commons, the more it costs the country. We are not on piecework. We get our salary whether we talk or whether we do not talk, whether we sit all year round or whether we do not sit all year round. As a matter of fact, some people over there rarely come here.

An hon. Member: That is socialism.

Mr. Saltsman: It is equality of income. It is equality of condition, rather than equality of opportunity. I do not think you should take the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway very seriously. I see there are a few people opposite who have suddenly become very articulate. They are going to speak today because they do not have to worry about the opposition. It is very handy; they brought in closure and they can kill it themselves by talking. They do not need caucus because, after all, caucus is irrelevant. I wonder whether they have said anything in caucus.

It is really disturbing—and I think every member of the House is upset, or if they are not upset they certainly should be—to see the kind of thing the government is doing with this particular legislation. I think it is the kind of legislation which the country really needs, and that is what makes it doubly sad for all of us to see the ineptitude of the Liberal party trying to bring in legislation that is required, and destroying it simultaneously.

Mr. J.-J. Blais (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I take great pleasure in participating in the debate because I hope that my few comments might tend to temper the attitude which seems to have been created by the opposition. Effectively I am a parliamentarian, and I have indicated that before. I feel that this House is a place where debate ought to take place. I am very disturbed by the suggestions made by the hon. member for Annapolis Valley (Mr. Nowlan) and by the hon. member for Waterloo-Cambridge (Mr. Saltsman) that Liberal backbenchers ought not to participate in any of the debates in this House, or at least that our participation ought to be inferior, numerically, to the participation of hon. members on the other side. Surely that is a complete misconception of the role of a member of parliament. Surely hon. members opposite will agree that each and every member of parliament is equal in status in this House and should have an equal opportunity to participate—

● (1650)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Blais: —in the deliberations within this precinct. I am shocked when the hon. member for Annapolis Valley says that for us to maintain that we have a right to participate equally in any debate in this House is stupid because we are dealing with government legislation. That is the depth of misconception of the role of a backbencher, whether he is from the opposition or from this party. The hon. member for Waterloo-Cambridge says we have a caucus, and why do we not speak up in caucus? That, again, is an absolute misconception of the process within this House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Blais: The hon. member for Waterloo-Cambridge knows full well that the backbencher's role in caucus, prior to the introduction of legislation, is to make sure that the legislation is acceptable when it is presented. Once the legislation has been presented following the input of the backbenchers in caucus, surely it is the obligation of those backbenchers to sell the legislation, as much as it is the responsibility of the minister to sell it, and to persuade gentlemen on the other side of its validity. Surely that is the role of hon. members on this side. Surely we have a role in debate. If we are to have an adversary process, we are not going to sit here and be bludgeoned by hon. members opposite—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Blais: —with the use of misrepresentations, be they unconscious misrepresentations; and on top of that, using all the rules available to them in order to defeat the legislation of the government without any response from this party. I can understand the objection of the New Democratic Party. When we were dealing with this same motion with regard to Bill C-68, every member of the NDP had spoken—and when we consider the legislation which has been delayed in this House we note that that small party, representing less than 10 per cent of the total number of members in this House, has taken a disproportionate amount of time.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Rodriguez: Sit down.

Mr. Blais: The hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez) tells me that I should sit down. The hon. member has had an opportunity to speak whenever he has been in the House, but that has not been too often lately. He has had more opportunities than any other hon. member in this House, or any backbencher in the Liberal party whose attendance record is superior.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Rodriguez: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Since the hon. member for Nipissing (Mr. Blais) has taken my name in vain, I want to point out that he has talked about equality among hon. members in this House. I have been seeking an opportunity to speak on second reading of this bill and I am being denied that opportunity by this motion.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Beaudoin: Mr. Speaker, the previous speaker accused us of taking too much of the time of the House in relation to the number of Social Crediters who are elected. I think this is not true. If we take time it is because we want to comment on the issue and find it important, and we are entitled to speak in this House as much as he is no matter how many members are elected since we are elected democratically. If we are in this House it is because we secured a majority in our ridings.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. McCleave): I think the points advanced by the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez) and the hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Beaudoin) are really points of debate and the parliamentary secretary should be allowed to continue his remarks.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, with all due respect to the hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Beaudoin), I suggest that I did not refer to the fact that his party was taking too much of the time of this House. I spoke about the members from the socialist party. I did not refer to the Social Crediters for whom I have much respect. I respect not only the hon. member for Richmond but also all his colleagues.

[English]

When the hon. member for Nickel Belt—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Blais: I have a problem with my voice. It is not as powerful as the voices of some hon. members opposite who are kibitzing. May I have some peace so that my arguments can be made?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Paproski: We don't kibitz. Only the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) kibitzes.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. McCleave): Perhaps the parliamentary secretary will regain his voice over the next couple of hours. I will leave a note for the next occupant of the chair to the effect that when this debate resumes at eight o'clock, certain time should not be subtracted from the hon. member because of the difficulty he has encountered.

An hon. Member: The poor little fellow!

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. McCleave): It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. McKenzie)—Criminal Code—Suggested committee study on other methods of applying capital punishment; the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Haidasz)—Industry—Douglas Aircraft, Malton—Measures to save jobs—Date of announcement of aerospace policy; the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Roche)—External Affairs—Cambodia—Inquiry as to Canadian protest against violations of human rights.

It being five o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, private bills, public bills and notices of motions (papers).

PRIVATE BILLS

[English]

CONTINENTAL BANK OF CANADA

The House resumed, from Thursday, March 18, consideration of Bill S-30, to incorporate Continental Bank of Canada, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, there have been some suggestions, which I do not believe were conclusive, that the sponsor of the bill before this House would be prepared to forgo the hour by postponing it in order to carry on the debate on the motion of the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Sharp). I am not sure there is disposition in all corners of the House in that regard, but if there is, I would be very grateful.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): There is not a disposition in all corners.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. McCleave): There does not appear to be unanimous consent, and when the bill was being debated previously the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters) had the floor.

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, when I was speaking previously I referred to a number of names on the list of directors which indicated the interlocking directorship of those who comprise the board of IAC and the directors of the proposed Continental Bank of Canada. It was pointed out that these poor, small, little innocent people were asking for the right to spend whatever largesse they have under their jurisdiction for other people. I referred to some of those people and mentioned some of their interlocking directorships. Many already are bank directors. In that category I put F. M. Covert, a director of Royal Bank; J. S. Dewar, director of Toronto-Dominion Bank; C. F. Harrington, a director of BM-RT Realty Investments, which is jointly owned by Bank of Montreal and Royal Trust; L. A. Lapointe, a director of Toronto-Dominion Bank; Paul Paré, a director of Royal Bank; and Renault St. Laurent, a director of Banque Canadienne Nationale.

● (1700)

It strikes me as strange that all those directors, who also hold the directorships in other companies, want to set up another bank. My party, which represents many disadvantaged people in this country, does not favour the proliferation of banks. We see no reason for establishing another bank. I agree wholeheartedly with at least one plank of the Creditiste party: The banking industry should be nationalized. At present there is absolutely no competition in the banking industry except to the extent that one teller, in one bank, may be cuter than another in another bank. We would be well advised to nationalize the banking industry, not proliferate the number of banks. Let us nationalize banks so that they can work in the national interest and develop this country uniformly. The need for more uniform development is evident in our disadvantaged areas, the maritimes, northern Ontario and many parts of Quebec. We do not need the proliferation of banks. Adding one more bank to the list will merely mean the addition of an expensive building downtown in some city and more expense for someone—for me and the ordinary Canadian.

Banks do not always work in our best interests. For example, the other day an Ottawa bank refused to cash government-backed pay cheques. I do not know if the Bank of Montreal across the road had listened to some disgruntled civil servant, but it refused to pay government-backed pay cheques. Mr. Speaker, our banking system is not like the United States system. Our banks do not go bankrupt; they do not behave stupidly because they are governed by the Bank Act. They are protected. They cannot go broke unless the country goes broke. Imagine a bank saying, "We cannot cash government-backed pay cheques because the government has no money." If the government has no money, the banks don't have money either, because they get their money from the government. Mr. Speaker, there is no competition in the bank industry.

All the directors I mentioned who hold interlocking directorships want to establish a bank merely for their own advantage. IAC has not been a good company. In many ways it has been a bad company. In northern Ontario, IAC cancelled some automobile financing contracts. In New Liskeard it was responsible for making two automobile enterprises go out of business. IAC decided that there were better returns in the small loans business than in the automobile business. Were automobile time payments not lucrative enough? Apparently not, because they now want to go into the banking business.

Those little, disadvantaged citizens on the board of directors of IAC want special privileges going far beyond letters patent which would establish the new bank. They are asking, in effect, the Bank Act to be changed. They are asking all kinds of favours which could even give them advantages over other banks. Mr. Speaker, we will not act in the best interests of the small people of Canada if we let those shysters, those people on the list of interlocking directors, band together and set up another bank. They want to do it only for their financial advantage.

[Translation]

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I believe that it is extremely important for us to express certain opinions during this debate on Bill S-30, which aims at allowing the IAC finance company to become a chartered bank in Canada.

Mr. Speaker, since my early childhood, I have heard Canadians from all parts of the country, especially in my social group, say that finance companies are bad, that they gouge the people, charge high interest rates and use the financial problems of people to jump on them and strangle them. Finance companies in general are commonly called the sharks of finance. Mr. Speaker, this is why I am surprised to see that one of these companies wants to become a bank. This must means that there is something even more profitable than being a finance company. IAC does not want to become a bank because of its generosity, it does not want to become a bank simply because that would serve Canadians. I refuse to swallow that.

● (1710)

Mr. Speaker, it is important to realize that finance companies in Canada have always been scorned by almost all Canadians, especially those who had some knowledge of either social or economic issues. They were considered as big villains, as loan sharks.

Every time we talked about the bank system, the chartered banks, the process of creating money, every time we said that chartered banks systematically control the Canadian economy, the government as well as the provinces we were told by the Liberals that it was not true. They tell us it is an extraordinary and excellent banking system and that there is much to be said for the Canadian banking system because, thanks to it, our economy is sound. The Liberals find the proposals of the Social Credit Party concerning the bank system ridiculous. When we tell them it is only normal that a country should control its own economy, namely the money, the Liberals find this funny.

And now, Mr. Speaker, the Liberals have become the sponsors, the supporters of a finance company which is aiming at changing into a chartered bank. First of all, Mr. Speaker, this is proof that our banking system is a real racket and that it actually exploits Canada. The IAC people who hold capital stock amounting to hundreds of million dollars are no fools, Mr. Speaker. They like to get in where there is money to be made and where there is security. That is why they want to leave the world of finance and become a chartered bank.

They said in committee, and I was there, that the finance market is no longer secure, that it is overcompetitive and crowded, whereas banking is an open field with room for one more bank in Canada. That is why they are applying for incorporation. Mr. Speaker, not only do they wish to incorporate as a chartered bank, but they do not comply at all with the Bank Act nor with the Bank of Canada Act, as one immediately realize upon reading Bill S-30.

Mr. Speaker, Bill S-30 contains more than five exceptions to the Bank Act and the Bank of Canada Act.

My third point is this: Mr. Speaker, IAC which wants to become a chartered bank not only does not comply with the Bank Act, but asks for exemptions on 16 points and, in addition, asks to be given letters patent one year before the ten-year review of the Bank Act due in 1977, as the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) confirmed again this week.

Mr. Speaker, here is what is most serious about the decision Parliament is about to make. If this Parliament agreed to incorporate this corporation so that the new Continental Bank may transact business, we would thereby create a precedent in our chartered bank system. We would grant letters patent with 16 exceptions to the Bank Act, and the following year the same government would introduce a new Bank Act. And what would the government do with the act it had just passed, which is not yet passed and already contains 16 exceptions?

Mr. Speaker, I suggest that the government is supporting this bill in Parliament because they have financial interests to preserve or promote. If the government is actually serious and concerned about the Canadian economic situation, it is first going to allow the House and Parliament to conduct an in-depth, responsible review of our banking system in order to correct abuse and then allow IAC to become a bank if they still want to. Mr. Speaker, even if this financial institution waits a year before it is transformed, there will be no great harm done. I would like to repeat that Liberals, with regard to the banking system, are pure hypocrites. They protect the banking system and compromise with it. They allow Canadian chartered banks to generate—I cannot state an exact amount but from memory—I would say 16 times their deposit. They let the population being exploited by uncontrolled interest rates which deprive people and require more of them than they can financially assume. The Liberals protect a banking system which contributes to run our country, our provinces and our municipalities into debt.

The Liberals prevent the provinces, their own partners, from having their own bank. What they refuse to their partners in confederation they are prepared to grant to a finance company. The Liberals are hand in glove with the banking system to protect it, and the list read by the some hon. members of New Democratic Party to the effect that the owners of some banks are also owners of Dominion Stores, Steinberg. This nice big family of nice people, Mr. Speaker, indicates to what extent there is an obvious monopoly in the banking system, yet the Liberals say: We should leave banking system as it is.

When we discuss with the liberals, they tell us: You Social Crediters are very good MPs indeed, but the moment you start talking about the banking system, it's the end of it. They recognize that we are right on many points, but never on the banking system because they are protecting it. So what is their interest in refusing that this point be discussed? They prefer to introduce Bill S-30, recommending that Parliament turn a blind eye on 16 exceptions to the law on the chartered banks which Parliament itself voted. They ask us to vote the bill and then, next year, they will ask us to vote their own law on the charteved banks because they, the Liberals, always hold the truth.

As for me, Mr. Speaker, I do not object to the fact that this bill could be voted quickly, I object, on principle, to this bill. I am not opposed to the fact that the IAC become a chartered bank, but I refuse that this company be given letters patent so that it can transform itself into a bank, on the very eve of the day when we are going to decide that the law dealing with the chartered banks be revised. Mr. Speaker, I think we are going a bit to fast, we are putting the cart before the horse.

In committee, it appeared that if passed, Bill S-30 would create a number of precedents. The committee heard a Mr. Read, inspector general of banks, who very definitely stressed the fact that a big financial corporation was attempting to covert into a bank. That resulted from government policy which stimulated competition within the banking system. Some may say there is too much competition within the banking system, others will say there is not enough competition, but this is not the main point. What counts is the reason why IAC wants to become a bank.

That reason is that the banking business is quite better than the finance business.

Mr. Speaker, if people knew what goes on the banking system, they would be astounded. Mr. Speaker, many people and several members of parliament, especially opposite members believe that the government controls money in our country but they are wrong; the chartered banks, not the government, control money, the issue of money and credit in Canada. It is not the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) either who controls the issue of money and credit.

The finance minister and Cabinet members control the lives of citizens in many areas. They control subsidies, they encourage unemployment, they control inflation, they control the workers' salaries, they control some prices—they say. They fine companies which want to raise their employees, salaries, they control people through forms, through taxation, and they control Parliament today through Sanding Order 75C. The government controls the political life of the people of Canada at all levels, from birth to death. But this very government does not control one cent of our bank system, but is the valet of the system.

Mr. Speaker, I raise here a fundamental issue and none of the opposite members can give any evidence that I am wrong. This question is very clear and one has only to listen to the President of the Royal Bank to know it.

● (1720)

This afternoon I read his latest speech, in which he attacks the government anti-inflation policy. This is to save the face because there is no section in the act dealing with this subject. It will also be noticed that in the anti-inflation this government is controlling workers. It also controls prices in some way, it is confronting everybody and downgrading collective bargaining. But this same government flatly refuses to control interest rates. Abuses are tolerated. They let the banks create money, they let them create in a systematic way 16 times their volume, if I am not mistaken. That is a minimum figure, 16 times their volume.

Banks are allowed to set interest rates. People are forced to pay back principal, interest, plus interest on the principal money that does not exist. Mr. Speaker, a certain type of business or "racket" is allowed between those banks. They are allowed to buy bonds and control our municipalities and even the federal government, but interest rates are allowed to go up. Who foots the bill, as always? The Canadian citizen, the low-wage earner. What then is a new bank doing in that picture? Absolutely nothing more, except maybe some supposedly increased competition. But everyone knows that there is no competition in the banking system. There may be different corporate names, but basically it is the same group of people, it is a family compact, it is a monopoly.

When one bank increases its prime rate, the others do the same. When one increases interest rates on deposits, the others follow suit. When one bank tightens the money, the others follow suit. This is simply a monopoly, protected by the Liberals, encouraged by the Liberals. When I think, Mr. Speaker, that these same Liberals would now allow a finance company considered by every Canadian as a loan shark, when I think they want to allow that company to become a bank, I see the light. This is disappointing. At any rate, a great number of people are shown that banking is much more profitable, and gives a much better yield than any investment that could be made by a finance company. Mr. Speaker, many things have been written about the banking system. I have studied and read the latest works published on the occasion of the last review of the banking system.

I hope to follow very closely the review for 1977. Mr. Speaker, we shall see that once again the Liberals will be there, not to promote the review of the banking system, but to protect the banks and ensure that this review will be in their favour. Mr. Speaker, as concerns the proposals of Bill S-30, I have nothing against IAC, I have nothing against its wish to become the Continental Bank; it can do what it wants. We live in a democracy, at least the opposition thinks so, Mr. Speaker; we live in a free competition system. I am not opposed to the idea that this company have the same public recognition as the Royal Bank of Canada, the Bank of Montreal, the Canadian National Bank and any other bank; I am not opposed to that, but I want the government to understand that we are not going to swallow this as easily as it hopes.

A company cannot become a Canadian bank simply through a small bill like Bill S-30, because we are supposed to know nothing about the banking system, because this is only normal and good for competition. Too many things and too many factors are involved in such proposal, Mr. Speaker, for us to close our eyes and do nothing.

Mr. Speaker, I believe that on behalf of Canadians, before going along with the government under the pretext of helping competition, we must see the situation like it is. This government is very good at making us swallow or believe certain things. For instance, when a parliamentary delegation makes a trip, the Liberals glorify themselves throughout Canada by saying: For our part, we live in a democracy. They use the Progressive Conservatives, the New Democrats and the Social Crediters to show that the Canadian Parliament is a great democracy. But when we are back in Parliament, they invoke Standing Order 75C and blame us for wanting to work. Mr. Speaker, this shows how much this system is hypocritical.

Let us truly go to the bottom of things and before issuing a permit, a piece of paper, in return for some favours for the Liberal party I suppose, Mr. Speaker, let us serve the interests of Canadians, let us go to the bottom of things and let us protect Canadians through the banking system. In other words, let the government regain control over the issue of money and credit in Canada.

Mr. Speaker, I am well aware that these are all honest people and very nice guys, but the most powerful cartel in Canada is the banking system, the banking monopoly, and as Canadians we cannot agree to increasing this cartel. We do not believe that competition will be increased through Bill S-30. The monopoly of money on human lives, human beings is allowed to grow. Mr. Speaker, on the eve of the decennial bank review it is, to my mind, premature to pass Bill S-30, all the more so because it does not comply with the chartered banks act and the Bank of Canada Act, and because Parliament is being asked to pass, in addition, the sixteen exceptions to the Bank Act it includes. Mr. Speaker, let us leave well alone, for the time being. Let us hope for an in-depth revision of our banking system after which we can see how necessary and urgent additional competition is within our banking system.

● (1730)

For the time being, it seems to me, Mr. Speaker, and this I repeat, it would be premature to allow this finance company to become a bank. However, that possibility is certainly interesting, and I shall make sure this bill is sent out to the tens of thousands of Canadian citizens who did not hesitate to laugh at the Crediters when they decried the banking system: they might then see where the racket is: With the finance companies or the banks.

Mr. Speaker, Bill S-30 is the best proof that the Social Crediters are right in attacking the banking system. And the government recognizes our claims in this regard through this bill, since it proves that the real monopoly is not that of finance companies but that of the banking system. No one is forced to go to a finance company but everyone, sooner or later, has to deal with a bank. There is the real monopoly.

Some time ago, I made a speech in this House to prove the monopoly that exists with food products. At that time, I demonstrated how the owners of the Bank of Montreal and the Royal Bank in fact own Dominion, Steinberg and Canada Packers. I think that if we relate this to what the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters) and the hon. member for Waterloo-Cambridge (Mr. Saltsman) said, it becomes an extremely dangerous monopoly.

Mr. Speaker, let us go back to the sources. Let us allow the Canadian people to control their own country. However, the members of the cabinet want to make us believe that inflation is being controlled. The Liberal members say to us: You members of the Social Credit Party claim you know the banking system, but you would print money. It is the usual joke. Then they tell us: There would be too much money in circulation and money would have no value any more. Suffice to look at the present situation, Mr. Speaker, and to ask oneself: what is money worth today? Absolutely nothing. Our unemployment rate is increasing. And the members of the Social Credit Party are not those who are in power.

Mr. Speaker, we must stop fooling around with the banking system, it is too important and too serious. We will have to approach these matters seriously. Here is a very simple example. When there is too much blood in the human body, what happens? Hemorrhage. When there is not enough blood, there is anemia. If there is too much money in Canada, certainly it is not good, and the same if there is a lack of money.

Now the government is saying in its fight against inflation: Tighten your belts, restrain yourself! Let unemployment increase! Control yourself and accept a 10 per cent ceiling on your wage increases. At the same time, the profits of chartered banks rise to 30 per cent, interest rates are up and the government does nothing. That is why I finally ask the question. On which side does the government stand? On the side of the Canadian people or of the banking system? Who elected this government and whom does it serve? For me, it is obvious that it serves—

[Mr. Fortin.]

[English]

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, I am really very hurt and touched by that fact that this bill, S-30, is being sponsored by a member of parliament who comes from Northern Ontario, an area I represent. I think of all the hours he is going to put in in defence of a group of corporate bigwigs when we face such serious problems in northern Ontario, including those just enunciated by the Department of Regional Economic Expansion which showed in its tabled report that we are on the wrong side of the track. His riding in northwestern Ontario, and my riding in northeastern Ontario, are probably the two most underprivileged areas in this country, with a declining population, a housing shortage, pollution, and unemployment. Meanwhile, this member of parliament is getting himself tied in with the political bosses to be a running dog, as it were, to the corporate sector, to be lackey, to be a footman to the corporate sector in moving Bill S-30 through the House.

Mr. Symes: A flunkey.

Mr. Rodriguez: My hon. friend from Sault Ste. Marie says "A flunkey". I suppose that could be most apropos. It hurts me to see the fine talents of a member like this being wasted a fruitless, frivolous search after building the corporate banking system, one which, does not in any way serve the interests of the people of northern Ontario. We heard the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters) point out how quick they are to withdraw from even such activities as financing automobile purchases. It really grieves me to see a man who was involved earlier in the budget debate defending motorboat owners and motorboat dealers, and all the rest, being used again. Why could they not have got someone from their backbenches, a flunkey from an urban centre, or one of their corporate sector guys over there to sponsor this private member's bill through the House? I say to the hon. member: It is a shame you have to come to this level to be a sort of capitalist-roader for Bay Street and try to move this bill through the House.

An hon. Member: A Bay Street buddy!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. McCleave): Is the hon. member for St. Catharines rising on a point of order?

Mr. Parent: Surely, Mr. Speaker, we are going to hear something about the bill which is before us. Surely the hon. member for Nickel Belt does not intend merely to waste our time by dilly-dallying on calling hon. members on the back benches here "flunkeys". We would not think of lowering ourselves to call him anything so base. I would hope, Mr. Speaker, that you would direct the hon. member to say something, at least, about the bill which is before us so that we can get on with the business of the House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

● (1740)

Mr. Rodriguez: Mr. Speaker, all I can say to the hon. member for St. Catharines (Mr. Parent) is that I would have preferred him to sponsor the bill through this House rather than the other flunkey. It is good to get a bill like this once in a while coming through this House because it once more reinforces what we on this side have long recognized—the incestuous relationship that exists between Liberals, Tories, and the corporate sector of this country.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. McCleave): Order. The hon. member for Madawaska-Victoria (Mr. Corbin) is rising on a point of order.

Mr. Corbin: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member who has the floor used a word in the English language that has not been interpreted and I should like to know its meaning. I wonder whether the interpretation service could give it to us. I think the word used was "flunkey".

The Acting Speaker (Mr. McCleave): The hon. member asks for an opinion or a direction from the Chair. I have had the opportunity to consult and it seems to me that the word "flunkey", though it has some definite connotations, is not a term ordinarily considered to be unparliamentary.

Mr. Rodriguez: Mr. Speaker, I will use a term that hon. members may better understand. The parliamentary term would probably be "bumboy" instead of "flunkey". This bill is excellent when it comes to showing—

Mr. Raines: A point of order, Mr. Speaker—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. McCleave): The hon. member for Burnaby-Seymour (Mr. Raines) is rising on a point of order.

Mr. Raines: Mr. Speaker, I am sure the hon. member would wish to withdraw his expression "bumboy". However, if he wishes to stay with it I suggest he is stuck with it. I do not think it is a matter of great importance, but on another point of order I would suggest that hon. members should not become too preoccupied with the sex life of parliamentarians since we have had reference to the word "incestuous", and a few other connotations, which may be of interest to some people outside the Chamber though I think we have other business to do. Since we have had reference specifically to the expression "bumboy", perhaps we could get a definition. Otherwise we might waste a great deal of time, and so I will await Your Honour's ruling on that.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. McCleave): Whatever happens I will not count the time taken against the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez). The attention of the Chair has been directed to the "Concise Oxford Dictionary" which is upon the Table of this Chamber. I cannot see the word "bumboy" but I do see the word "bumbo", which is a cold rum punch. That seems to be a very commendable suggestion.

I think the hon. member has a certain knack with words. Frankly, the Chair had more difficulty with his use of the word "incestuous" than the word "flunkey" or the word "bumboy". When the debate becomes a little warm in here we do try to respond in kind. I do not think it holds up operations in a way that the Chair should intervene. Therefore I recognize the hon. member for Nickel Belt, and the time taken will not be held against him.

Continental Bank of Canada

Mr. Rodriguez: Thank you for your kindness, Mr. Speaker. It seems to me that when it comes to showing that Canada's financial and political systems are one and the same thing, no course in any school or business administration could be more effective in showing that relationship than simply coming to this place and observing the progress of Bill S-30 through the House and the other place. Every time one looks at this bill or at the companies behind it one cannot help but stumble over the names of Canada's big business, the guys who clearly run both our country and our finances, and that includes this House and the other place. As the profitability of IAC goes up, there are a lot of people who stand to benefit greatly. I am not talking about the little shareholders benefiting. They will still have to go to the banks feeling very apologetic about asking for a loan. But the big boys and their friends will see plenty of profit, and this is the kind of thing that we in this party question.

Why should we make an exception under the Bank Act to facilitate this particular arrangement for IAC to become a bank? We have argued that IAC ought to go through the normal processes stipulated in the Bank Act if they want to become a bank. Parliament ought to be making exceptions for small groups in this country, yet never does. For example, widows should be able to get their widow's pension and the guaranteed income supplement. Why not put a special bill through parliament to enable such people to get those benefits? Why not sponsor a private member's bill to do this? We on this side would let it go through almost without debate so that the poor people of this country would get some benefit.

This is why we in this party cannot vote for privilege. That is what this is all about, Mr. Speaker—privilege. We as a party have stood against privilege and will stand against privilege, and we do so as it comes before this House in the form of Bill S-30.

The hon. member for Timiskaming made reference to the name Bronfman. That name has come up time and time again during this debate. The Bronfmans are the friends of the health minister. He travels in their jets to Israel and all over the place. It seems to me there are a lot of other people like that, MP's and Senators, members of both houses, who are involved either directly or indirectly in IAC.

Since this is a Senate bill let me see how that body is involved in interlocking directorships in IAC and other companies. I have a list of Senators before me and the companies on which they sit as directors, on the boards of other companies as well as IAC. I should like to show how corporate interlocking meshes with memberships of this parliament. Since we are dealing with interlocking directorships it is only fair to put on the record the names of those in the other place who have an interest in this particular bill.

Why should the people of this country put up with this kind of nonsense? These are individuals who are supposed to be passing laws. They are passing laws for themselves. They are the ones who will get the biggest benefits out of IAC becoming a bank quickly through circumventing the regulation that provides that you cannot be a member of the boards of directors of two banks at the same time. Who are going to get any benefit from that, Mr. Speaker? It is certainly not the people of my riding or the people in the riding of Kenora-Rainey River. We cannot even get the government to close off a polluted river in that area.

Who is the first poor little Senator who is trying to make a living on his senatorial salary of $29,000 a year? His name is Louis-Philippe Gélinas, a Liberal. He is vice-president and director of the Mercantile Bank of Canada. I think they had profits of 65 per cent in the last quarter. In any event they did very well. He is also a director of the Canadian International Paper Company, Candiac Development Corporation, Delta Benco Limited, and Gerling Global Life Insurance Company.

Incidentally, there is a Mr. C. F. Harrington, the honourable, and a Senator, who is also on the board of directors of IAC and on the board of directors od Gerling Global Reinsurance Company.

An hon. Member: They don't talk to each other.

Mr. Rodriguez: They don't talk to each other? I see! As I say, he is a director of the Gerling Global Reinsurance Company. That is a new one; reinsurance.

An hon. Member: They get you the second time around.

Mr. Rodriguez: He is also a director of Alexander and Alexander Services Limited, Gerling Global General Insurance Company, Greyhound Leasing and Financing Limited, Montreal—

Mr. Corbin: Mr. Speaker, I should like to inform the hon. member who has the floor, and has referred to Senator Gelinas, that he passed away sometime ago.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Shame, shame!

An hon. Member: That's NDP research for you.

Mr. Rodriguez: The way things go around here, the spirit lives on.

He is also involved in Montreal Refrigerating and Storage Limited.

An hon. Member: You mean was.

Mr. Rodriguez: Also the Manicouagan Power Company, and North American Car (Canada) Limited.

Then we have one Peter Kilburn and Renault St. Laurent, directors of IAC. Then we have reference to Hilton of Canada Limited and one Louis A. Lapointe who is also on the board of directors of IAC as well as Canada Cement Lafarge Limited and United North American Holdings Limited.

We then have E. Jacques Courtois who is a director of IAC and of Foster Wheeler Limited, Crush International Limited, The Robert Mitchell Company Limited, Distillers Corporation, Seagrams Limited, and is an honorary director of John Labatt Limited.

An hon. Member: If I had all that I would never die.

Mr. Rodriguez: I have always been under the impression that they have been dead over there for years.

[Mr. Rodriguez.]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. McCleave): Order, please. I think there are provisions in the Standing Order referring to members of the other place, and while I think the Chair has to permit the hon. member to continue the type of debate that is presently taking place in the sense that he is raising a very fundamental issue which involves one of the Houses of Parliament, it should be done with a certain amount of restraint, particularly regarding personal references that are outside the actual subject matter.

Mr. Rodriguez: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Then, of course, we have John M. Godfrey, a Liberal Senator as well.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. McCleave): May I interrupt the hon. member again. The Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Blais) rises on a point of order.

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, in view of the manifestly limited vocabulary of the hon. member perhaps you might define the word "restraint" for his benefit.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. McCleave): Order, please. I do not think it helps the Chair or the debate very much when members use points of order to smuggle in one-liners in a debate such as this.

Mr. Rodriguez: Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Beaudoin: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

[Translation]

On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

It is not that I doubt your judgment when you say that we must take care not to name members of the Senate, Mr. Speaker. However, it is obvious that when a person has a federal or provincial charter, it is a public document which anyone can see; it does not harm any reputation. I know that this does nothing but describe the facts to the House.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. McCleave): Perhaps the hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Beaudoin) misunderstood. I hope that I was clear, but perhaps I should repeat what I said so that hon. members will know. The Chair did not suggest that members of the other place could not be identified by name in connection with their outside activities. I just thought this ought to be done within the spirit of Standing Order 35, which I shall read in part as follows:

> No Member shall speak disrespectfully of Her Majesty, nor of any of the Royal Family, nor of His Excellency or the person administering the Government of Canada; nor use offensive words against either House, or against any Member thereof.

I certainly grant the hon. member for Nickel Belt the right to identify people in the other place and the directorships they hold. I think that is quite proper in a debate such as this. But I thought one of his remarks went perhaps a little too far, and that was when I interrupted him.

Mr. Rodriguez: The next senator we are dealing with, and I should like to make this clear to the hon. member for Madawaska-Victoria (Mr. Corbin) since this gentleman is still with us, is John M. Godfrey, a Liberal. He is a director of IAC and a director of Campbell, Godfrey and Lewtas.

He is vice-president and director of Renzy Mines Limited, and secretary and director of Cleveland Twist Drill Carpet (Canada) Limited, Canadian Admiral Corporation Limited, and Canadian Klockner Limited.

Then there is one Denis K. Yorath who is on the board of directors of IAC as well as of the Montreal Trust Company, Dover Industries Limited, Howell Litho and Cartons Limited, Richardson Mernell (Canada) Limited, Wayne Sweeper Manufacturing (Canada) Limited. He is, in addition, governor of the Canadian Council on Social Development.

An hon. Member: That's interesting.

Mr. Rodriguez: Yes, that is very interesting. Then, Mr. Speaker, we have one Harry W. Hays, another Liberal senator. He is a director of the Burritt Travel Service Limited and of The Canada Permanent Trust Company. Then there is Mr. K. H. MacDonald, also on the board of directors of Canada Permanent Mortgage Corporation and on the board of directors of IAC.

An hon. Member: They don't talk to each other either.

Mr. Rodriguez: They don't? I guess that means they are on opposite sides of the Chamber. Then, lo and behold, we come to K. H. MacDonald who is also a director of that company and also on the board of directors of IAC. This K. H. MacDonald is the same fellow. He is also a director of the Home Oil Company Limited. Then we have Renault St. Laurent. He is on the board of directors of IAC and Lakeside Cattle Company Limited.

I understand that this chap Harry W. Hays, the Senator, is also a director of Lakeside Cattle Company Limited. Then, somehow or other, and I do not know how this gets in here but I suppose it is quite understandable, we have Senator E. C. Manning—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. McCleave): Order, please. The hon. member for Trinity (Miss Nicholson) rises on a point of order.

Miss Nicholson: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member accept a question?

Mr. Rodriguez: Certainly, Mr. Speaker.

Miss Nicholson: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the hon. member if he is saying that all private sector activities are intrinsically wrong, or is he going to offer us some kind of definition of the degree of nationalization he wishes?

Mr. Rodriguez: Mr. Speaker, I must thank the hon. member for giving me this opportunity to clarify once again what we are about here. When I started out I said that if we look at Bill S-30 and what it attempts to do, and we look at the people who are behind it, we find an interesting situation in view of the fact that we are dealing with interlocking directorships. That is the purpose of our amendment. No director should be allowed to sit on two boards of directors of banks. I was trying to point out the incestuous relationship—I cannot help but use that word because this conjures up in my mind—

Some hon. Members: Shame, shame!

Mr. Rodriguez: Mr. Speaker, I must apologize if I used the wrong word, but I am just a new Canadian and I have difficulty with the language. I am trying to build a word picture for the Canadian people.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. McCleave): Order, please. I regret having to interrupting the hon. member but his allotted time has expired. I did him extra time in light of certain events that occurred during his speech.

● (1750)

Mr. Rodriguez: Mr. Speaker, do I have the permission of the House to continue?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. McCleave): The hon. member has asked for leave to continue, but there is no unanimous consent.

Mr. Rodriguez: Mr. Speaker, who said no?

Mr. Roy (Timmins): I did. Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Surely the hon. member—and I should not use the term "honourable"—the member who just spoke should know that with the low level of the debate in this House he lowers every constituent whom he represents. He should be ashamed of his performance. If he cannot flush that big head of his through the toilet, he should not leave this extra mess behind.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Rodriguez: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I think the hon. member for Timmins (Mr. Roy) has been very intemperate. I can understand that the hon. gentleman has become so perturbed because his friends have been unmasked. But surely we should extend the usual courtesies in this House to each other irrespective of the views we put forward.

I have heard members in the House being accused of having been in cahoots to protect the medical profession. We saw that today.

I have had the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Hurlburt) insult me in the House for being a foreigner and a new Canadian.

I would never suggest the hon. member for Timmins is not honourable. I may think all sorts of things about him, but surely this House is a forum for the democratic process and we observe those niceties here. I suppose that is most difficult when your friends are being bored, but surely his words are uncalled for in the House. He should be asked to apologize and withdraw his words because, if that is the system, I could use every kind of word in the House with respect to that gentleman.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. McCleave): I suspect that the language used—

Some hon. Members: Make him withdraw!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. McCleave): A great deal of the language used in the last half hour has been intemperate, and some of it has been provoked. The Chair therefore, with much cheerfulness, turns to a healing force, I hope. I recognize the hon. member for Rimouski (Mr. Allard).

[Translation]

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, I hope my speech will not produce the same effect as did the one of the hon. member who has just spoken. I would not like every of you to draw prematurely his own conclusions.

Mr. Speaker, I greatly appreciate having this opportunity to express my admiration for all the great financiers who have contributed and still contribute to the administration of this country and of its banking, financial, industrial, commercial and agricultural institutions.

Various institutions such as IAC Ltd. have felt that their great success was being too closely emulated by the big banks, particularly since the revision of the banking system in 1967. That is the reason why these corporations want to sustain the competition against those privileged banks by obtaining the same charter, with the same privileges. All things considered, it matters little to us, of the Social Credit, whether the number of banks in the country varies by one or two. The important thing to us is that our bank legislation should be more in line with the good of the people in general, that is should control more closely their exclusive privileges, and that their services should reach the whole population rather than a small proportion of all Canadian citizens.

Personnally, I have no objection to IAC Ltd., its president, directors and shareholders being allowed to run their bank on the basis of the privileges granted to other banks, since the law exists and these gentlemen certainly have the millions of capital necessary to operate a bank. We can also recognize that greater competition between banks is even more beneficial to the people who have more options with regard to the source of credit they are seeking. When a bank refuses to give you a loan, you can apply to another one. I know something about it for it happened to me not so long ago.

We are pleased to see that the chartered banks are doing a terrific business and making tremendous profits, each year, and that they are repeatedly increasing by several billions their yearly assets out of their profits, and after tax, Mr. Speaker. During the last fiscal year, we have seen in public reports that, 10 chartered banks have increased their assets by more than 14 billions; the Bank of Commerce has increased its assets by 3,300 millions and the Royal Bank of Canada by 3,500 millions.

And is only one year Mr. Speaker, in Parliament we have seen our government increase its annual deficit of $3.50 billions by $500 millions. You can see here the government representing the people and the banks representing the private sector which, within a single year, has increased its assets by $3.5 billions, while the people have to account for a deficit of $3.5 billions, that is, altogether, a difference of $7 billions for this single item.

How is it, Mr. Speaker, that before the revision of the Bank Act in 1967, banks were only accounting for an annual increase in assets of about $3 billions while now, not even ten years later, the annual surplus of their assets is over $15 billions?

There is a great deal of talk about inflation, higher rate of unemployment and poverty. But who benefits from inflation, who suffers from unemployment and poverty? It is a question far more serious than it appears on the surface. It is all very nice for the banks to make big profits and to increase their assets and capital. There is nothing wrong, per se, in having strong banks and companies in Canada, but we still have to make sure that it is not going to be detrimental to the interests of the majority of the Canadian people.

When me talk about Social Credit, we mean finance, on a social level as much as on a capital level, we mean work, and so forth, and social justice, for all Canadians.

Why then is the gap widening each year between the poor and the rich between those who make profits and those who operate at loss, including our present government. Why is it that the more the deficits increase on one side, the more the assets increase on the other?

Does that not depend a little on legal privileges granted to some at the expense of others? That is what we must take into account if we sincerely want to fight inflation, unemployment and poverty in Canada in 1976. I do not want to imply that all is wrong in Canada, but I want to say to everyone that there is a way to correct a situation which is not related to the laws and legal privileges that we granted to some and not to the others.

Mr. Speaker, we have no time here—

An hon. Member: Call it six o'clock.

Mr. Allard: May I call it six o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. McCleave): As the hour for the consideration of private members' business has now expired, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock this evening.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Sharp:

That, in relation to Bill C-83, an Act for the better protection of Canadian society against perpetrators of violent and other crime, four sitting days shall be allotted to the further consideration of the second reading stage of the said bill; and

That, on the fourth of the said days, at 15 minutes before the expiry of the time provided for government business in such sitting, Mr. Speaker shall interrupt any proceeding then before the House, if required for the purpose of this order, and, shall forthwith put, without further debate or amendment, every question necessary for the disposal of the second reading stage of the said bill.

Mr. J.-J. Blais (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I have only two minutes, Mr. Speaker, I am told. So, I have one point to make.

First we are accused, when proposing this motion, of not providing enough time for public opinion, in fact, to respond to the bill before the House.

[English]

This bill was given first reading on February 24. At that time the government House leader indicated that he would allow approximately ten days before bringing the bill on for second reading because, although it has been expected by hon. members of the opposition, there was a belief that perhaps some time would be required in order to ascertain the full impact of the bill. Subsequently, at the request of the opposition House leader, an additional week was permitted so that public opinion would be allowed to jell, so we did not begin second reading until March 8.

The purpose in not beginning before March 8 was to permit hon. members of the opposition and government backbenchers to communicate with their constituents so that their constituents migh be informed about the provisions of the bill. I am not responsible for any delinquency on the part of some hon. members of the opposition in failing to communicate with their constituents and advise them on the provisions of this bill and to obtain replies from them.

Initially when I became aware of this bill I insisted upon communicating its provisions to everyone in my riding who was interested. As a matter of fact I have been in constant communication with most of my constituents interested in gun control and other aspects of this legislation for the better part of 18 months. As it stands, I am now replying to replies received from people in my constituency, so in effect the matter has jelled in the minds of constituents in the riding of Nipissing. I might indicate that they are willing and ready to make representations so that those representations can be dealt with when the matter goes before the Committee.

I suggest that now is the time to pass this bill at second reading and send it to committee. To the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez), who is concerned about not speaking on this bill because of this motion, I say that when he speaks to his party whip the superiority of his remarks will permit him to be recognized within his caucus, and in the event that his whip feels that his remarks are superior to those of other hon. members of his party, he will be heard. Of course I doubt very much that that will be the case.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, this debate demonstrates beyond any doubt that Standing Order 75C is not working. I am not talking about Standing Order 75, because we have Standing Order 75A and 75B. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) knows full well that when we brought in these rule changes back in 1968 it was the understanding of the House during that debate, notwithstanding the fact that this particular provision of the rules was itself brought in by closure, that Standing Order 75C would only be used on the rarest of occasions, and rightly so, because we are talking about closure.

We know the history of closure in this House. We know what it did to the Liberal Party in 1956, and it went on to pay for it in 1957. However, there is a whole new element entering into the use of the principle of closure, and that is the application of closure when there is no apparent urgency. The hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) pointed out that we have spent barely six days on this bill. If we equate that to full parliamentary days, it works out to about three days or a total of 15 hours, and now we will have closure. As a consequence of this measure before the House and the vote which will follow we will be told that we have only four more days of debate.

I listened with great interest to the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Blais). It is not often he gets a chance to take off in full flight as he did today, and perhaps that is a good thing because I know the pent up frustration of the hon. member who has an opportunity in this House only to say no.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McGrath: He is the original Dr. No. I can imagine the parliamentary secretary having a nightmare one of these days and waking up in the middle of his sleep saying, "Yes, yes, yes".

An hon. Member: To his wife, I hope.

Mr. McGrath: Just think how many worth-while measures have been cut off by the indiscriminate use of the prerogative of the parliamentary secretary to withhold unanimous consent under Standing Order 43.

I listened very carefully to what the parliamentary secretary said. He said that each and every member in this House is equal in status, and I could not agree with him more. Each and every member of this House is equal in status, yet by the very motion of closure which has been introduced in this House the government is denying us the right to participate at second reading of this bill.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McGrath: I have the right to speak at second reading of this bill. Every hon. member of this House has that right, if he feels so inclined. I submit that there has not been a bill which has come before this House in a long time which has aroused public interest to the extent this measure has, in my recent knowledge, and there has been no measure which has generated more mail than this bill.

It is only right that each member who has to deal with his constituents, who has to answer to his constituents and has to account for his actions in this House—if he feels so inclined and if he feels that he has a responsibility to his constituents—should have a right at second reading of a bill to stand in his place and speak on behalf of his constituents. We are being denied that right.

The Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford), when he participated in this debate, said that second reading was only a debate on principle. I am not going to argue that. We are operating under new rules; we have new procedures for the passage of bills in this House; we have committee stage and report stage. Debate on the principle of a bill has always been an important part of our parliamentary procedure, has always been an important prelude before a bill is sent to committee. It sets the state for the examination which is to follow in committee.

● (2010)

This afternoon I listened with amazement to the Minister of Justice saying that it is time we sent the bill to committee so that witnesses can be heard. I say to the Minister of Justice and to the government House leader that members of parliament have the right to be heard before witnesses are heard. That, Sir, is what this debate is all about.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre put his finger right on it when he said that it is the right of every member of this House to be heard. Sir, we have that right. I will be the first to concede to the parliamentary secretary and to the government House leader that at times, infrequent to be sure, closure can be justified. But I submit that closure under Standing Order 75C was never meant to be applied as a general principle.

Mr. Blais: It is not closure. It is time allocation.

Mr. McGrath: Consider what has happened since the beginning of this session. We are now debating the fourth closure motion introduced since this parliament began. What does this mean? The government talks about managing the business of the House; but when you talk about four closure motions you are talking about debate taking two full parliamentary days.

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. McGrath: Yes, Mr. Speaker, you are talking about debate taking two parliamentary days.

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point or order. The hon. member suggested that the government has introduced four closure motions. I submit that that is not correct. There have been only three closure motions. Allocation of time was not used with respect to the anti-inflation bill.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order, please. The hon. member can deal with that point if he makes a speech.

Mr. McGrath: The fact remains that important time of this House has been used to debate closure motions brought in under Standing Order 75C. That is a shameful misuse of the time of this House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McGrath: The government's shameful action in bringing in closure on this bill will ultimately be reflected in the votes which voters will cast when the government goes to the country to give an account of itself. Make no mistake about it, closure will be an issue.

I was surprised to hear the Minister of Justice, a parliamentarian for whom I have the greatest respect, stand up and try to justify closure after only six days of debate on the principle of the bill. I listened to him very carefully. He brought forward that well-worn cliché: parliament disposes, the government proposes. He meant that this government proposes and arbitrarily disposes, and to hell with parliament. That is the government's attitude.

I hope the Minister of Justice can assure us before this debate ends that this bill in committee will not be treated as Bill C-58 was treated. As you remember, Sir, the government introduced closure in the House with respect to Bill C-58. When the bill was sent to committee we found ourselves once more faced with closure in committee. We were told to send Bill C-58 back to the House before Christmas. And what happened? We did not reach Bill C-58 again in the House until last month. How can the government justify its shameful use of closure on that occasion? It introduced closure on second reading, and closure again when the bill was in committee. I see the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Cafik) nodding, apparently in approval. He was on that committee and knows that what I say is right.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member. His time has expired.

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, today when the government House leader moved the closure motion under Standing Order 75C we learned what the new society is all about. At one time I thought the government wanted to do away with free enterprise. Without equivocating, I say that the government seeks to emasculate the opposition. That, exactly, is what it wants to do. The government wants to reduce us to nobodies. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford), and the government House leader have said so in so many words. They want to reduce us to nobodies, and we will not accept it. The government seeks to erode the authority of parliament. I only wish the right hon. gentleman from Prince Albert were here this evening. He would tell the House what this is all about.

The government has conveniently forgotten the role of the opposition. It is our role to be the watchdog of the public purse and to make the government behave. It is hard to make this government behave properly. It is also our duty to offer constructive criticism. This we have done all along, but the government pays no attention. This insensitive, arrogant government does not want a watchdog, does not want to be told how to behave, does not want to listen to constructive criticism. Yes, I recall the words of some ministers, "We are the masters of this House." Nobody falls for that nonsense. There is a responsible role for the opposition to play. We accept our responsibility, no matter what the government wants to do.

The Prime Minister's attitude to the opposition is, if they don't like it they can lump it.

Mr. Cullen: Really, really!

Mr. Alexander: I see the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Cullen) opposite me. He is one of the class of '68 and no doubt remembers the statement attributed to the Prime Minister, "If they don't like it, they can lump it." Well, when the Prime Minister says that to me he is talking indirectly to between 80,000 and 100,000 people. As my hon. friend from St. John's East said, the people will not forget in the next election.

Here the government is, closing off debate on an important measure. It says we may debate the closure motion for two hours and the bill for four more days. What will happen when the bill is in committee? The work of our committees is a myth. Our committee structure is a farce. It is insensitive to the wishes of opposition members. So far as I am concerned the committees are nothing but à means for pushing through government bills. The opposition has been muzzled even in committee. I have seen much hanky-panky in committees. We have asked that witnesses be called, and the government refused.

It is quite possible that the government will close off debate on this bill in committee. The government is fond of closure, fond of stifling debate on controversial measures. I am thinking of the anti-inflation bill, the Reader's Digest bill, the medicare bill, and other similar bills. In those cases the government ended debate with closure. The guillotine prevented my speaking, took away a right given to me when I was elected. I listened to the parliamentary secretary talk about bludgeoning. They are masters at that. We in the opposition must guard our rights most jealously. We resent this strong arm, arrogant use of closure. There is no excuse for it.

We have had 16 hours of debate. Surely a bill so complicated and complex that not even government members understand what is going on and the implications of it should be given more time. If government members do not know, they will soon know because letters are coming in by the hundreds, stating that this bill is ill-drafted. It was brought in without any thought whatsoever. All we are trying to do is point out these faults and make constructive criticism so that what is a bad bill can, perhaps in the long run, become a contemporary bill, one that is acceptable.

In conclusion, it must be tiresome for members opposite again to hear the government being labelled arrogant—tiresome, but true. Again members of the government are proving they have little understanding of and less respect for the House of Commons. This closure motion on Bill C-83 is a disgrace. It is a disgrace to the government House leader, to the government, and to all members of this House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Alexander: I urge prompt defeat of this guillotine motion.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, when I sit and listen to debates like this I often question my position with regard to capital punishment.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Allmand: This afternoon I did a quick check of the order paper. I found that there are 19 or 20 government bills at different stages presently before parliament, bills which should be passed before the end of this session or, as hon. members know, they will expire and must be re-introduced in a new session. These are important bills for the Canadian people. We as a government are committed to them and we want to see them passed as soon as possible. It is obvious that the opposition is not as enthusiastic about the bills as we. It is in their interest to drag out debate as long as they can. It is in their interest to delay the government's legislative program and make it look as poor as possible.

The government, faced with this situation, has two choices. It can either let the opposition run this House and control this parliament, or we can do it ourselves. If we do not take action to see that our legislation is put through this House in a diligent way, then I say the opposition will do it in their way. How will they do it? They have what I call the closure of the opposition. They have the closure of delay, the closure of repetition, the closure of obstruction, and the closure of just plain tactical interference. With that type of closure, instead of passing those 20 important bills before the House of Commons, we will only pass five or ten. I say that is just as serious. It is what I describe as closure by the opposition.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) criticized the government for putting this motion to provide ten days of debate at second reading, and he poses as an opponent of closure and allocation of time. However, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre did not hesitate for one minute in the last two weeks to introduce a motion to adjourn this House when it suited his own political purposes. That kind of tactic to introduce motions of adjournment, to refuse extensions of hours and to introduce frivolous motions to delay time in the House, is just as much a delay in time and obstruction, and a type of closure as this type.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Allmand: As long as the opposition insists on using that type of closure in trying to control this House, we will respond with reasonable rules and reasonable measures to put through our program of legislation.

There are other ways to get through the large volume of legislation that we must put through this House. We could extend the hours of this House. We could extend the sittings. However, I understand that each time we went to the opposition with that kind of proposal, they turned it down. I have been in this House time and again when the government House leader has asked for an extension of hours so that we could sit late to get in more debate and pass a bill, and was refused by the opposition. That is one way we could do it. I am sure our House leader would be pleased to discuss that type of extension of hours.

I also understand that the government House leader approached the opposition House leaders during this debate to see if they would accept some allocation of time such as seven days, ten days, or 15 days. They were not interested in any allocation of time. We asked for a suggestion, but they were not interested in an allocation of time.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order, please. This afternoon I called the House to order. Each member is only allowed ten minutes to speak. It is difficult for the Chair to follow the debate when one cannot hear what is being said. I ask hon. members to allow the minister to speak and be heard.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Allmand: The hon. member for Waterloo-Cambridge (Mr. Saltsman) suggested that we were acting contrary to the spirit of parliament in introducing this motion. However, I do not know of any parliament under the British parliamentary system that drags out debates as long as this parliament in Ottawa. If we look at the parliament of Westminster we find that it is very rare for any debate on second reading to go beyond a couple of days. Further, if we look at many of the parliaments in our Commonwealth, very few of them go beyond a few days on second reading debates. Therefore if hon. members wish to follow the spirit of parliament I suggest that we follow the Mother of Parliaments and restrict second reading debates to one or two days.
