The images appearing here are the best quality possible considering the condition and legibility of the original copy and in keeping with the filming contract specifications.

Original copies in printed paper covers are filmed beginning with the front cover and ending on the last page with a printed or illustrated impression, or the back cover when appropriate. All other original copies are filmed beginning on the first page with a printed or illustrated impression, and ending on the last page with a printed or illustrated impression.

The last recorded frame on each microfiche shall contain the symbol → (meaning "CONTINUED"), or the symbol ▼ (meaning "END"), whichever applies.

Maps, plates, charts, etc., may be filmed at different reduction ratios. Those too large to be entirely included in one exposure are filmed beginning in the upper left hand corner, left to right and top to bottom, as many frames as required. The following diagrams illustrate the method:

L'exemplaire filmé fut reproduit grâce à la générosité de:

Law Library, McGill University, Montreal.

Les images suivantes ont été reproduites avec le plus grand soin, compte tenu de la condition et de la netteté de l'exemplaire filmé, et en conformité avec les conditions du contrat de filmage.

Les exemplaires originaux dont la couverture en papier est imprimée sont filmés en commençant par le premier plat et en terminant soit par la dernière page qui comporte une empreinte d'impression ou d'illustration, soit par le second plat, selon le cas. Tous les autres exemplaires originaux sont filmés en commençant par la première page qui comporte une empreinte d'impression ou d'illustration et en terminant par la dernière page qui comporte une telle empreinte.

Un des symboles suivants apparaîtra sur la dernière image de chaque microfiche, selon le cas: le symbole → signifie "A SUIVRE", le symbole ▼ signifie "FIN".

Les cartes, planches, tableaux, etc., peuvent être filmés à des taux de réduction différents.
Lorsque le document est trop grand pour être reproduit en un seul cliché, il est filmé à partir de l'angle supérieur gauche, de gauche à droite, et de haut en bas, en prenant le nombre d'images nécessaire. Les diagrammes suivants illustrent la méthode.

HER Britannic Majesty and the United States of America having agreed by Article I of the Treaty concluded and signed at Washington the 8th of May, 1871, to

Her Britannic Majesty, the President of the United States, His Majesty the King of Italy, the President of the Swiss Confederation, and His Majesty the Emperor of

Her Britannie Majesty, Sir Alexander James Edmund Cockburn, Baronet, a Member of Her Majesty's Privy Council, Lord Chief Justice of England;

The President of the United States, Charles Francis Adams, Esquire;

His Majesty the King of Italy, His Exceller & Count Frederic Sclopis, of Salerano, a Knight of the Order of the Annunciata, Minist " of State, Senator of the Kingdom of

The President of the Swiss Confederation, M. Jacques Staempfli;

His Majesty the Emperor of Brazil, his Excellency Marcos Antonio d'Araujo, Viscount d'Itajubá, a Grandee of the Empire of Brazil, Member of the Council of His Majesty the Emperor of Brazil, and his Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary in France.

And the five Arbitrators above named having assembled at Geneva in (Switzerland) in one of the Chambers of the Hôtel de Ville on the 15th of December, 1871, in conformity with the terms of the IInd Article of the Treaty of Washington, of the 8th of May of that year, and having proceeded to the inspection and verification of their respective powers, which were found duly authenticated, the Tribunal of Arbitration was declared duly organized.

The Agents named by each of the High Contracting Parties, by virtue of the same Article II, to wit :-

For Her Britannie Majesty, Charles Stuart Aubrey, Lord Tenterden, a Peer of the United Kingdom, Companion of the Most Honourable Order of the Bath, Assistant Under-Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs;

And for the United States of America, John C. Bancroft Davis, Esquire; Whose powers were found likewise duly authenticated, then delivered to each of the Arbitrators the printed Case prepared by each of the two Parties, accompanied by the documents, the official correspondence, and other evidence on which each relied, in conformity with the terms of the IIIrd Article of the said Treaty.

In virtue of the decision made by the Tribunal at its first session, the Counter-Case and additional documents, correspondence, and evidence, referred to in Article IV of the said Treaty were delivered by the respective Agents of the two Parties to the Secretary of the Tribunal on the 15th of April, 1872, at the Chamber of Conference, at the Hôtel de Ville of Geneva.

The Tribunal, in accordance with the vote of adjournment passed at their second session, held on the 16th December, 1871, reassembled at Geneva on the 15th of June, 1872; and the Agent of each of the Parties duly delivered to each of the Arbitrators and to the Agent of the other Party the printed Argument referred to in Article IV of the said Treaty.

The Tribunal having since fully taken into their consideration the Treaty and also the Cases, Counter-Cases, documents, evidence, and Arguments, and likewise all other communications made to them by the two Parties during the progress of their sittings, and having impartially and carefully examined the same,

Has arrived at the decision embodied in the present Award:

Whereas, having regard to the VIth and VIIth Articles of the said Treaty, the Arbitrators are bound under the terms of the said VIth Article, "in deciding the matters submitted to them, to be governed by the three Rules therein specified and by such principles of International Law, not inconsistent therewith, as the Arbitrators shall determine to have been applicable to the case;"

And whereas the "due diligence" referred to in the first and third of the said Rules ought to be exercised by neutral Governments in exact proportion to the risks to which either of the belligerents may be exposed, from a failure to fulfil the obligations of neutrality on their part;

And whereas the circumstances out of which the facts constituting the subject matter of the present controversy arose, were of a nature to call for the exercise on the part of Her Britanuic Majesty's Government of all possible solicitude for the observance of the rights and duties involved in the Proclamation of Neutrality issued by Her Majesty on the 13th day of May, 1361;

And whereas the effects of a violation of neutrality committed by means of the construction, equipment, and armament of a vessel are not done away with by any commission which the Government of the belligerent Power, benefited by the violation of neutrality, may afterwards have granted to that vessel: and the ultimate step, by which the offence is completed, cannot be admissible as a ground for the absolution of the offender, nor can the consummation of his fraud become the means of establishing his innocence;

And whereas the privilege of exterritoriality accorded to vessels of war has been admitted into the law of nations, not as an absolute right, but solely as a proceeding founded on the principle of courtesy and mutual deference between different nations, and therefore can never be appealed to for the protection of acts done in violation of neutrality;

And whereas the absence of a previous notice cannot be regarded as a failure in any consideration required by the law of nations, in those cases in which a vessel carries with it its own condemnation;

And whereas, in order to impart to any supplies of coal a character inconsistent with the second Rule, prohibiting the use of neutral ports or waters, as a base of naval operations for a belligerent, it is necessary that the said supplies should be connected with special circumstances of time, of persons, or of place, which may combine to give them such character;

Parties, accompanied by on which each relied, in rst session, the Counterreferred to in Article IV of the two Parties to the Chamber of Conference, it passed at their second va on the 15th of June, each of the Arbitrators eferred to in Article IV

tion the Treaty and also s, and likewise all other rogress of their sittings,

And whereas, with respect to the vessel called the Alabama, it clearly results from all the facts relative to the construction of the ship at first designated by the Number 200 in the port of Liverpool, and its equipment and armament in the vicinity of Terceira through the agency of the vessels called the Agrippina and the Bahama, dispatched from Great Britain to that end, that the British Government failed to use due d'ligence in the performance of its neutral obligations; and especially that it omitted, not-withstanding the warnings and official representations made by the diplomatic agents of the United States during the construction of the said Number 290, to take in due time any effective measures of prevention, and that those orders which it did give at last, for the detention of the vessel, were issued so late that their execution was not

And whereas, after the escape of that vessel, the measures taken for its pursuit and arrest were so imperfect as to lead to no result, and therefore cannot be considered sufficient to release Great Britain from the responsibility already incurred;

And whereas, in despite of the violations of the neutrality of Great Britain committed by the "290," this same vessel, later known as the Confederate ernizer Alabama, was on several occasions freely admitted into the ports of Colonies of Great Britain, instead of being proceeded against as it ought to have been in any and every port within British jurisdiction in which it might have been found;

And whereas the Government of Her Britannie Majesty cannot justify itself for a failure in due diligence on the plea of the insufficiency of the legal means of action

Four of the Arbitrators for the reasons above assigned, and the fifth for reasons separately assigned by him,

Are of opinion-

That Great Britain has in this case failed, by omission, to fulfil the duties prescribed in the first and the third of the Rules established by the V1th Article of the Treaty of

And whereas, with respect to the vessel called the Florida, it results from all the facts relative to the construction of the Oreto in the port of Liverpool, and to its issue therefrom, which facts failed to induce the Authorities in Great Britain to resort to measures adequate to prevent the violation of the neutrality of that nation, notwithstanding the warnings and repeated representations of the Agents of the United States, that Her Majesty's Government has failed to use due diligence to fulfil the duties of

And whereas it likewise results from all the facts relative to the stay of the Oreto at Nassau, to her issue from that port, to her enlistment of men, to her supplies, and to her armament, with the co-operation of the British vessel Prince Alfred, at Green Cay, that there was negligenee on the part of the British Colonial Authorities;

And whereas, notwithstanding the violation of the neutrality of Great Britain committed by the Oreto, this same vessel, later known as the Confederate cruizer Florida, was nevertheless on several occasions freely admitted into the ports of British

And whereas the judicial acquittal of the Oreto at Nassau cannot relieve Great Britain from the responsibility incurred by her under the principles of international law; nor can the fact of the entry of the Florida into the Confederate port of Mobile, and of its stay there during four months, extinguish the responsibility previously to that time incurred by Great Britain:

For these reasons,

The Tribunal, by a majority of four voices to one, is of opinion-That Great Britain has in this case failed, by omission, to fulfil the duties prescribed in the first, in the second, and in the third of the Rules established by Article VI of the

And whereas, with respect to the vessel called the Shenandoah, it results from all the facts relative to the departure from London of the merchant-vessel the Sea King, and to the transformation of that ship into a Confederate eruizer under the name of the Shenandoah, near the Island of Madeira, that the Government of Her Britannic Majesty is not chargeable with any failure, down to that date, in the use of due diligence to fulfil the duties of neutrality;

But whereas it results from all the facts connected with the stay of the Shenandoal at Melbourne, and especially with the augmentation which the British Government itself admits to have been claudestinely effected of her force, by the enlistment of men within that port, that there was negligence on the part of the authorities at that place:

For these reasons,

The Tribural is unanimously of opinion-

That Great Britain has not failed, by any act or omission, to fulfil any of the duties prescribed by the three Rules of Article VI in the Treaty of Washington, or by the principles of international law not inconsistent therewith, in respect to the vessel called the Shenandonh, during the period of time anterior to her entry into the port of Melbourne;

And, by a majority of three to two voices, the Tribunal decides that Great Britain has tailed, by emission, to fulfil the duties prescribed by the second and third of the Rules aforesaid, in the case of this same vessel, from and after her entry into Hobson's Bay, and is therefore responsible for all acts committed by that vessel after her departure from Melbourne, on the 18th day of February, 1865.

And so far as relates to the vessels called-

The Tuscaloosa

(Tender to the Alabama),

The Clarence,

The Tucony, and

The Archer

(Tenders to the Florida),

The Tribanal is unanimously of opinion—
That such tenders or auxiliary vessels being properly regarded as accessories must necessarily follow the lot of their principals, and be submitted to the same decision which applies to them respectively.

And so far as relates to the vessel called Retribution,

The Tribunal, by a majority of three to two voices, is of opinion-

That Great Bratin has not failed by any act or omission to fulfil any of the duties prescribed by the three Rules of Article VI in the Treaty of Washington, or by the principles of international law not inconsistent therewith.

And so far as relates to the vessels called-

The Georgia,

The Sumter,

The Nashville,

The Tallahassee, and

The Chickamauga, respectively,

The Tribunal is unanimously of opinion-

That Great Britain has not failed, by any act or omission, to fulfill any of the duties prescribed by the three Rules of Article VI in the Treaty of Washington, or by the principles of international law not inconsistent therewith.

And so far as relates to the vessels called-

The Sallie,

The Jefferson Davis,

The Music,

The Boston, and

The V. H. Joy, respectively,

The Tribunal is unanimously of opinion—
That they ought to be excluded from consideration for want of evidence.

And whereas, so far as relates to the particulars of the indemnity claimed by the United States, the costs of pursuit of the Confederate cruizers are not, in the judgment of the Tribunal, properly distinguishable from the general expenses of the war carried on by the United States:

The Tribunal is, therefore, of opinion, by a majority of three to two voices— That there is no ground for awarding to the United States any sum by way of indemnity under this head.

And whereas prospective earnings eannot properly be made the subject of compensation, inasmuch as they depend in their nature upon future and uncertain contingencies:

The Tribunal is unanimously of opinion—
That there is no ground for awarding to the United States any sum by way of indemnity under this head.

And whereas, in order to arrive at an equitable compensation for the damages which have been sustained, it is necessary to set aside all double claims for the same losses, and all claims for "gross freights," so far as they exceed "nett freights;"

And whereas it is just and reasonable to allow interest at a reasonable rate;

And whereas, in accordance with the spirit and letter of the Treaty of Washington, it is preferable to adopt the form of adjudication of a sum in gross, rather than to refer the subject of compensation for further discussion and deliberation to a Board of Assessors, as provided by Article X of the said Treaty:

The Tribunal, making use of the authority conferred upon it by Article VII of the said Treaty, by a majority of four voices to one, awards to the United States a sum of 15,500,000 doilars in gold as the indemnity to be paid by Great Britain to the United States for the satisfaction of all the claims referred to the consideration of the Tribunal, conformably to the provisions contained in Article VII of the aforesaid Treaty.

And, in accordance with the terms of Article XI of the said Treaty, the Tribunal declares that "all the claims referred to in the Treaty as submitted to the Tribunal are hereby fully, perfectly, and finally settled."

Furthermore it declares, that "each and every one of the said claims, whether the same may or may not have been presented to the notice of, or made, preferred, or laid before the Tribunal, shall henceforth be considered and treated as finally settled, barred, and inadmissible."

ought

In testimony whereof this present Decision and Award has been made in duplicate, and signed by the Arbitrators who have given their assent thereto, the whole being in exact conformity with the provisions of Article VII of the said Treaty of Washington.

Made and concluded at the Hôtel de Ville of Geneva, in Switzerland, the 14th day of the month of September, in the year of our Lord 1872.

Reasons of Sir Alexander Cockburn for dissenting from the Award of the Tribunal of Arbitration.

THE indirect claims at first insisted on by the Government of the United States being now out of the question, we have to deal with the claims for damages, "growing out of the acts" of certain specified vessels, as to which it is alleged that, by reason of some default on the part of the Government of Her Majesty the Queen of England, these vessels were enabled to take and destroy ships and eargoes belonging to citizens

The causes of complaint put forward by the United States' Government may be Causes of elassed under the following heads:-

1. That by rearry of want of due diligence on the part of the British Government, in order to their being employed in making war against (a. United Kingdom, in order to their being employed in making war against the United States, and having been so equipped, were allowed to quit such ports for that purpose.

2. That vessels, fitted out and equipped for the before-mentioned purpose, in contravention of the Foreign Enlistment Act, and being therefore liable to seizure under that Act, having gone forth from British ports, but having afterwards returned to them, were not seized as they ought to have been, but having been allowed hospitality in such ports, were suffered to go forth again to resume their warfare against the

3. That undne favour was shown in British ports to ships of war of the Confederate States, in respect of the time these ships were permitted to remain in such ports, or of the amount of coal with which they were permitted to be supplied.

4. That vessels of the Confederate States were allowed to make British ports the base of naval operations against the ships and commerce of the United States.

Owing to all, or some one or other of these causes, vessels of the Confederate States were enabled, it is alleged, to do damage to the commerce of the United States; and compensation is claimed in respect of the damage so done.

The Treaty of Washington, from which our authority is derived, lays down, for our Rules of the guidance in dealing with and deciding on these claims, certain rules as to the obligations of Great Britain as a neutral State, which for the purpose of this arbitration are to be taken to have been binding on it.

Washington,

Not, indeed, that the British Government admits that these rules form part of the law before existing between nations. On the contrary, it is expressly stated that "Her Britannic Majesty has commanded Her High Commissioners and Plenipotentiaries to declare that Her Majesty's Government cannot assent to the foregoing Rules as a statement of principles of international law which were in force at the time when the claims mentioned in Article I arose, but that Her Majesty's Government, in order to evince its desire of strengthening the friendly relations between the two countries, and of making satisfactory provision for the future, agrees that, in deciding the questions between the two countries arising out of those claims, the Arbitrators should assume that Her Majesty's Government had undertaken to act upon the principles set forth in these Rules. And the High Contracting Parties agree to observe these Rules as between themselves in future, and to bring them to the knowledge of other maritime Powers, and to invite them to accede to them."*

The Rules in question are as follows:-

"A neutral Government is bound-

"First. To use due diligence to prevent the fitting out, arming, or equipping within its jurisdiction, of any vessel which it has reasonable ground to believe is intended to cruize or to earry on war against a Power with which it is at peace; and also to use like diligence to prevent the departmer from its jurisdiction of any vessel intended to cruize or earry on war as above, such vessel having been specially adap ed, in whole or in part, within such jurisdiction, to warlike use.

"Secondly. Not to permit or suffer either belligerent to make use of its ports or waters as the base of naval operations against the other, or for the purpose of the renewal or augmentation of military supplies or arms, or the recruitment of men.

"Thirdly. To exercise due diligence in its own ports and waters, and, as to all persons within its jurisdiction, to prevent any violation of the foregoing obligations and duties."*

With these Rules before it, the Tribunal is directed to determine, as to each vessel, "whether Great Britain has, by any act or omission, failed to fulfil any of the duties set forth in such Rules, or recognized by the principles of international law not inconsistent with such Rules."

Difficulty arising from the Treaty.

The effect of this part of the Treaty is to place this Tribunal in a position of some difficulty. Every obligation, for the non-fulfilment of which redress can be elaimed, presupposes a prior existing law, by which a right has been created on the one side and a corresponding obligation on the other. But here we have to deal with obligations assumed to have existed prior to the Treaty, yet arising out of a supposed law created for the first time by the Treaty. For, we have the one party denying the prior existence of the rules to which it now consents to submit as the measure of its past obligations, while the other virtually admits the same thing, for it "agrees to observe the Rules as between itself and Great Britain in future, and to bring them to the knowledge of other maritime Powers, and invite them to accede to them "—all of which would plainly be superfluous and vain if these Rules already formed part of the existing law recognized as obtaining among nations.

It is, I cannot but think, to be regretted that the whole subject-matter of this great contest, in respect of law as well as of fact, was not left open to us, to be decided according to the true principles and rules of international law in force and binding among nations, and the duties and obligations arising out of them, at the time when these alleged causes of complaint are said to have arisen.

From the history of the Treaty of Washington, we know that it was proposed by the British Commissioners to submit the entire question, both as to law and fact, to arbitration; but the Commissioners of the United States refused to "consent to submit the question of the liability of Great Britain to arbitration unless the principles which should govern the Arbitrator in the consideration of the facts could be first agreed upon." In vain the British Commissioners replied that they "should be willing to consider what principles should be adopted for observance in future, but that they were of opinion that the best mode of conducting an arbitration was to submit the facts to the Arbitrator, and leave him free to decide upon them after hearing such arguments as might be necessary." The American Commissioners replied that they should be willing to consider what principles should be laid down for observance in similar cases in future, but only with the understanding that "any principles which should be agreed upon should be held to be applicable to the facts in respect to the Alabama claims." The British Commissioners and Government gave way, possibly without fully appreciating the extent to which the principles, of which they were thus admitting the application, would be attempted to be carried in tixing them with liability.

How this apparent anomaly arose is plain. Her Majesty's Government, animated by a high sense of justice and by an earnest desire of conciliation, were anxious to remove every possible cause of complaint or sense of wrong which the Government and people of the United States had, or believed themselves to have, against Great Britain as to matters arising out of the civil war: they were willing that if, through any errors or shortcomings on the part of British Authorities, injury had been caused to American subjects, full redress should be afforded; they were willing that the question should be determined by an independent and impartial Tribunal; and though they would naturally have preferred that the matters in dispute between the two countries should be decided by what they believed to be the rules of International governing the case-rather than that, if the decision should be in favour of eat Britain, the American people should feel that the contest had not been determined according to what in their view were the principles applicable to it, Her Majesty's Government gave way to the desire of that of the United States, and consented that the rules, by which it was agreed that the duties and obligations of the two nations should be governed in any future case, should be taken to be the measure of the past obligations and duties of Great Britain with reference to the subject-matters

It was a great and generous concession, and though the effect of it might be a peenniary sacrifice on the part of Great Britain, it was one which was cheerfully made on the one side, and I trust will not fail to be appreciated in the same generous

If, however, the differences which have unhappily arisen between the United States and Great Britain were to be determined, not according to the rules of International Law which the Arbitrators to be agreed on should determine to be applicable to the ease, but according to rules to be settled by the Contending Parties themselves, then I cannot but wish that the framers of this Treaty had been able to accomplish the difficult task, now left to us, of defining more precisely what is meant by the vague afficint task, now left to us, or defining more precisely what is meant by the vague and uncertain term "due diligence," and had also set forth the further "principles of international law, not inconsistent with the rules laid down," to which reference is made as possibly affecting the liability of Great Britain.

To some of the heads of complaint hereinbefore referred to, this observation does not indeed apply. Whether vessels, which might originally have been seized, should have been so dealt with when they re-entered British ports, or whether they were protected by the commissions they had in the meanwhile received from the Confederate Government; whether Confederate ships of war were permitted to make British ports the base of naval operations against the United States; whether the accommodation afforded to them in British ports constituted a violation of neutrality, for which Great Britain can be held liable, are questions which are left to be decided and must be decided according to the rules of international law alone.

But when we have to deal with the far more important question of the liability of Great Britain by reason of the omission to use "due diligence" to prevent the equipment of vessels of war in her ports, as required by the Treaty, we find nothing in the Treaty to direct us as to the meaning of that term, especially as regards the degree of diligence which is to be understood to be required by it.

Left in this difficulty, we must endeavour to determine for ourselves the extent and meaning of the "due diligence" by which we are to test the alleged shorteomings of the Government of Great Britain. For, it is plain that the standard of "due diligence" ought not to be left to the unguided discretion of each individual Arbitrator. The municipal law of every country, wherever diligence is required by the law, whether in respect of obligations arising out of contract, or in regard to the due care which every one is bound to exercise to avoid doing harm to the persons or property of others,-ne alienum lædat,-prescribes some standard by which the necessary degree of Dealing here with a matter appertaining to law, it is to juridical science that we must lock for a solution of the difficulty. And since we have to deal with a question of international law, although, it is true, of an exceptional character, it seems to me that it will be highly useful to endeavour to form a clear view of the reciprocal rights and duties between belligerents and neutrals, created by international law generally, and of the diligence necessary to satisfy the obligations which that law imposes. I cannot concur with M. Staempfli, that, because the practice of nations has at times undergone great changes, and the views of jurists on points of international law have often been and still are conflicting, therefore there is no such thing as international law, and that, consequently, we are to proceed independently of any such law-for such is the effect of his reasoning, if I understand it rightly—according to some intuitive perception of right and wrong, or speculative notions of what the rules as to the duties of neutrals ought to be. It seems to me that when we shall have ascertained the extent to which a neutral State is responsible, according to the general law of nations, for Lecaches of neutrality committed by its subjects, and the degree of diligence it would be called upon to exercise under that law, in order to avoid liability, we shall be better able to solve the question of what constitutes due diligence in the terms of the Treaty of Washington. That Treaty may have admitted a liability in respect of the equipment of ships, where none existed by international law before, as I certainly think it has; but the degree of diligence required of a neutral Government to prevent breaches of neutrality by its subjects must be determined by the same principles, whatever may be the nature of the particular obligation.

Besides the necessity of thus considering the relation of belligerents and neutrals with reference to the subject of "due diligence," we have further, in order to satisfy the exigency of the Articles of the Treaty, to consider whether, besides in the omission of "due diligence," Great Britain has failed to fulfil any duty imposed by any principle of international law not inconsistent with the rules laid down. It is clear also that, with reference to the other heads of complaint, our decision must necessarily depend entirely on the rules of international law applicable thereto. It seems to me, therefore, desirable, in the first place, to endeavour to take an accurate survey of the law by which the relative rights of belligerents and neutrals are fixed and determined, as essential to the solution of the questions we are called on to decide.

I proceed, therefore, to consider the subject of neutral obligations in time of war.

Elements of neutrality.

Neutrality may be said to be the status of a country relatively to two others which are at war with one another, while it remains at peace with both, and gives assistance to neither.

The last mentioned condition is plainly an essential element of that which goes before it; for, to give assistance to either of the belligerents would be indirectly to take a part in the war, and would afford a sufficient reason to the one whose enemy was thus assisted, for having recourse to force to prevent such assistance from being

It is obviously immaterial in what form the assistance is rendered, so long as its purpose and effect is to add to the means of the belligerent for the purpose either of offence or defence. Troops, men, horses, ships, arms, munitions of war of every kind, money, supplies—in short, whatever can add to the strength of the belligerent for the purpose either of attack or defence, are things that cannot be supplied by a nentral State to either belligerent without forfeiting the character of neutrality and the rights incidental to it.

In like manner the neutral Sovereign cannot allow the use of his territory for the passage of troops of either belligerent, still less allow it to be used by either as a base of hostile operations. He cannot lend his ships for the transport of troops, arms, or munitions of war, or even for the transmission of despatches. Whatever restrictions, in the exercise of his territorial rights, he imposes on the one belligerent, he must impose on the other also; for restraints—however lawful and proper in themselves—enforced as against the one, dispensed with as regards the other, are indirectly assistance given to the one so favoured.

Obligations of the subjects of a neutral State.

Whatever obligations attach by the general principles of the law of nations to the State or Community, as a whole, are equally binding on its subjects or citizens. For the State or community is but the aggregate of its individual members, and whatever is forbidden to the entire body by that law, is equally forbidden to its component parts. In this sense, and in this sense only, can it be said that international law—in other words, the common law of nations—forms part of the common law of England; for the greater part of the rules of international law, by which nations now consent to be bound, are posterior in date by many centuries to the formation of the common law of England. Nevertheless, Great Britain forming part of the great fraternity of nations, the common law adopts the fundamental principles of international law, and the obligations and duties they impose, so that it becomes, by force of the municipal law, the duty of every man, so far as in him lies, to observe them; by reason of which any act done in contravention of such obligations becomes an offence against the law of his own country.

But the subject, who thus infringes the law of his own country by violating the neutrality which that law enjoins him to maintain, is amenable for his offence to the law of his own country alone, except when actually taking part in the war as a combatant, when of course he is liable to be dealt with according to the laws of war. The offended belligerent has otherwise no hold on him. International law knows of no relations between a State and the subjects of another State, but only of those which exist between State and State. But this being so, the belligerent, against whom a breach of neutrality has been committed by the subject of a neutral State, as distinguished from the State itself, may have a right to hold the State responsible and to look to it for redress. For the State, that is, the community as a whole, is bound to

Not, however, that the responsibility of the State for the acts of its subjects is absolute and unlimited. Reason has set bounds to a responsibility which would otherwise be intolerable. For it must be remembered that the consequence of a violation of neutrality is the right of the offended belligerent to treat the offending neutral as an enemy, and declare war against him. He is not bound to accept pecuniary amends as

Now, reason points out that the Government of a country can only be held responsible for breaches of neutrality committed by its subjects, when it can reasonably

There are things which a Government can prevent, and others which it cannot. It can prevent things that are done openly and in detiance of the law. The open levying of men, and expeditions departing from its territory by land or water, are things which a Government would properly be expected to prevent, and for which, if not

But a Government could not be so held in respect of things it cannot prevent; such as the conduct of individual subjects in enlisting or serving in the land or sea force of a belligerent; or things done clandestinely or surreptitiously, so as to clude observation or detection notwithstanding the exercise of proper diligence to prevent the law from being broken. But then the exercise of such diligence is part of the duty of a Government, and the condition of its immunity. If this diligence has been wanting, a belligerent has just cause to hold the neutral State responsible for wrongful acts done by its subjects in violation of neutrality, and from which he, the belligerent, has suffered. We are thus brought face to face with the all-important question of what is this "diligence" which a Government is thus bound to exercise to prevent breaches of neutrality by its subjects. I shall endeavour presently to grapple with that question; but I prefer first to complete my survey of the relative rights and obligations of belligerents and neutrals.

And as the principal complaint against the British Government relates to vessels of war furnished by its subjects to the Confederate States, I shall, in the first place, apply myself to the question how far the subjects of a neutral State can, consistently with the obligations of neutrality, supply a belligerent with articles of warlike use in the

For, thus far we have been dealing with assistance rendered to one belligerent Rights of neutral against another, animo adjuvandi, for the direct purpose of enabling him to overcome subjects in respect or resist his opponent. Here a broad and important distinction between the State and its subjects presents Difference between itself. The former, generally speaking, cannot, consistently with neutrality, under any a State and its eremstances, supply to one of two belligerents articles which may be of use to him in carrying on war. For, as Governments do not engage in trade, save in exceptional cases of very rare occurrence—as, for instance, when a Government disposes of ships for which it has no use—nothing supplied by a Government to a belligerent can be supplied otherwise than animo adjuvandi, that is, for a purpose inconsistent with neutrality. But its Subjects stand, in this respect, on a very different footing. The Subject, indifferent to both the belligerent parties, may be willing to sell to either articles of warlike use in which he is in the habit of dealing. Assistance, and sometimes very material assistance, is thus afforded to a belligerent, who, by this means, is enabled to carry on war. Is assistance thus afforded, not animo adjuvandi, but animo commercundi, a breach of neutrality, or is it to be considered as within the right of the

Now, the subjects of a neutral State having in time of peace the right of earrying on trade with the belligerent, on what ground of reason or justice, it may be asked, should their right of peaceful trade be taken away, and their interests thus be damaged by reason of a war which they have had no share in bringing about, and in which they have no concern? The condition of neutrality, in not supplying anything to either belligerent with the object of assisting him against the other, or which would not be as readily supplied to the other, being observed, what reason can be suggested why the rights of the neutral in his relations with either belligerent, as they existed before war broke out, should be disturbed or altered?

An Italian jurist thus writes:-

"Il fatto della vendita degli oggetti di contrabbando avvenuta in territorio nentrale è opera dello Stato stesso nella sua qualità di persona pubblica, o invece è l'operato di suoi privati cittadini, che fanno di ciò la loro abituale professione. Nel primo caso è fuor di dubbio che vi sarebbe motivo di laguanza per parte di uno dei belligeranti, poichè non entra negli officii dello Stato l'attendere a privati mercimonii, ed ogni suo ntto ha un valore internazionale o in senso di un diritto o in senso di una obbligazione, chono si può mai dissimulare. Ma lo stesso non si può dire ove la vendita degli oggetti, e quando sia il caso la fabbrica degli stessi, fosse il fatto particolare di privati cittadini di quello stesso Stato. In esso non potrebbe ravisarsi un fine politico come nell'azione pubblica del governo, non essendo lo scopo di tali cittadini che commerciale od industriale, epperò non losivo in modo alcuno degli altrui diritti.

"Se gli autori che hanno discusso la presente questione avessero ritenuta la capitale differenza che passa tra gli atti pubblici del governo e quelli dei privati cittadini, non avrebbero al certo classificato come atti contrari alla condizione neutrale la vendita fatta in territorio neutro da privati cittadini di armi e munizioni da guerra."*

Effect of war on neutral trade.

Nevertheless, it is certain that the rights of a nation, as regards trade with another nation, do undergo very considerable modifications, when such second nation engages in war with a third; and when it is said by some writers that neutrality is only the prolongation of the state of peace between the neutral and the belligerent, this language must be taken with considerable allowance. For, it is certain that, as regark trade and commerce, the rights of the peaceful neutral undergo very serious diminution. By the admitted rules of international law, a belligerent may seize articles contraband of war in transit by sea from the neutral to his enemy. By blockading his enemy's port he may shut out the commerce of the neutral even in articles not capable of being applied to warlike use. True, say those writers who advocate the rights of neutrals against belligerents-but if the rights of the neutral subject in respect of trade had been regulated according to natural law, or, to speak more philosophically, according to the law which reason points out as for the common benefit of all, those rights would have remained undisturbed and unaffected by the wars of others with whom his own country remained at peace. But between distant nations trade can be carried on only by sea. The nations most powerful at sea have generally been those who have waged war on the ocean. In such wars they have sought to weaken their adversaries by crippling their commerce, and to effect that object have imposed restraints on peaceful States less powerful than themselves. Some countries have even gone so far, in early times, as to interdict all commerce whatever with nations with which they were at war. The sense of mankind, it is true, revolted against pretensions so extravagant, and after a time the restraints which belligerents were entitled to impose on neutral commerce were rendered less oppressive. But they still bear the impress of their origin, as having been imposed by the strong upon the weak. They are manifestly in derogation of the common right of peaceful trade which all maritime nations enjoy in time of peace, but which is thus made to submit to restraint in order to serve the purposes of those by whom the peace of the world is disturbed.

If the article was of a doubtful character, ancipitis usus, that is, one that might be applied to purposes of peace or of war, the liability to seizure depended on whether the surrounding circumstances showed that it was intended for the one use or the other.

If either belligerent possessed sufficient force at sea to bar the access to a port belonging to his enemy, he was entitled to forbid the neutral all access to such port.

4. Besides this, according to the practice of France, the neutral was prohibited from having his goods carried in the enemy's ship; and if the ship was taken, the

Lastly, to enforce the rights thus assumed by powerful belligerents, the neutral had further to submit to what was called the right of search, in order that the belligerent might satisfy himself whether goods of the enemy, or goods contraband of war intended for the enemy, were being conveyed in the neutral ships.

By the wise and liberal provisions of the Declaration of Paris of 1856, the last two oppressive restraints on the trade of neutrals, mentioned under heads 3 and 4, have, as between most of the leading nations of the world, been done away with. The others remain. America has not as yet formally assented to the Declaration of Paris; the two rules in question do not however come into play on this occasion.

But the two first of the restraints put on neutral commerce occupy a prominent place in the discussions which have occurred in the course of this inquiry. Both of Blockade and them are manifestly restraints, and restraints of a very serious character, on the natural contraband of freedom of neutral commerce. The advantage thus acquired of preventing the trade of war. the neutral in articles of warlike use, at a time when that trade is the most likely to be profitable to him, and still more that of precenting it in any shape by the blockading of an enemy's port, is obviously obtained only at the expense of the peaceful rights

The right of blockading a port, and thereby excluding from it neutral commerce Blockade. of every sort, has been justified by assimilating it to that exercised by the besieger of a city or fortress, in investing it and debarring all access to it. But the analogy is not complete; for the immediate purpose of the besieger is to take the city or fortress, while that of the blockade is, not to capture the blockaded port, but to enfecble the enemy and diminish his means by the gradual destruction of his commerce, which of course necessarily involves a corresponding loss inflicted on the commerce of the neutral. And though it may be said that, just as the besieger of a city or fortress is in occupation of the territory which surrounds it, and is, therefore, by the law of war, master of such territory and entitled to give laws to all within its ambit, and has thus full right as well as power to forbid access to it, so the blockading force has occupation of the territorial waters and can exercise a similar right in respect of them; yet for the most part such occupation is constructive only, and the blockading force is generally in the habit of sending cruizers far beyond the limits of the territorial waters, to intercept vessels intending to enter the blockaded port.

On whatever ground the right of blockade thus conceded to helligerents may be placed, it is obvious that it is a very serious encroachment on the freedom of the neutral in the peaceful pursuit of commerce.

In M. Calvo's work, "Le Droit International," blockade is spoken of as "la plus grave atteinte qui puisse être portée par la guerre au droit des neutres.*

Fiore says:—" Le blocus est edieux et contraire à l'indépendance des peuples neutres; parcequ'il n'empêche pas seulement le commerce de certaines matières déterminées, comme la contrebande de guerre; mais il détruit toute espèce de commerce de quelque nature que ce soit avec les lieux assiégés et bloqués."+

Nor must it be forgotten, with respect to trade carried on in defiance of a blockade, that the neutral owes nothing to the blockading belligerent, who, for his own purposes thus seeks to shut out the innocuous commerce of the neutral with his enemy, regardless of the loss and injury he is thereby inflicting on him.

The right to intercept articles of warlike use has been for the most part treated by Contraband of earlier writers on international law as an admitted encroachment on the neutral in war, respect of freedom of trade. It has been justified on the score of the necessity in which the belligerent captor is placed, of preventing that which will be used to his own hurt from reaching his adversary; or as arising from the law of self-defence which gives to the belligerent the right of stopping things, which may be used against him, while on their way to his enemy, and, furthermore, of confiscating them to his own use as a penalty on the neutral for having intended to convey them to the enemy.

Looked at from this point of view, it is said that the right of the belligerent to intercept this species of commerce, and the liability of the neutral to have his property captured and confiscated under such circumstances, do not arise out of obligations inherent in the nature of neutrality. They are purely conventional, and, as it were, a compromise between the power of belligerents and the rights of neutrals; and, if this species of trade can be said to be unlawful, it is only so sub modo, it being left free to the neutral to pursue it, subject always to the right of the belligerent to seize it during its transit to his enemy if he can. "The right of the neutral to transport," says that great jurist, Chancellor Kent, "and of the hostile Power to seize, are conflicting rights, and neither party can charge the other with a criminal act."*

Different view.

M. Hautefeuilte.

A different view respecting the trade of the neutral in articles of contraband of war has, however, been maintained in our day. M. Hautefeuille, and the writers of his school, look upon the supplying of articles of contraband of war by the neutral in the way of trade as inconsistent with the duty of neutrality, which prohibits the rendering of assistance to a belligerent for the purpose of a war in which he is engaged—extending the rule to articles of warlike use supplied in the way of trade as much as to those furnished gratuitously.

According to this view, the neutral thus guilty of a breach of the first principle of neutrality justly incurs the penalty of his transgression in the confiscation and loss of his property.

This doctrine is open, however, to the objection that it is inconsistent with the practice of nations, according to which this species of trade has never been treated as a breach of neutrality in the full sense of the term. It wholly fails to account for or justify the right of blockade.

But the importance of this difference in the views of publicists will be more sensibly felt when we proceed to deal with the subject of the trade of the neutral with the belligerent in the country of the neutral.

No obligation on neutral Government to prevent trade in contraband of war, or with blockaded ports. One thing is quite clear, and must not be lost sight of. Neither the trade in contraband of war, nor that carried on in defiance of a blockade, constitute, practically, any violation of neutrality, so far as the Government of the neutral trader is concerned. Scarce any neutral Government has ever attempted to prevent its subjects from carrying on such trade: no neutral Government was ever held responsible, as for which there has been no difference of action among Governments, or difference of opinion as to the duty of Governments among writers on public law. It is one of those things which, on the part of its subjects, a Government, according to the existing practice of nations, is not called upon to prevent. It is one of those things which the belligerent, who, in furthering his own purposes is indifferent to the loss he inflicts of the neutral, must submit to if he is unable to prevent it, and for which he is not entitled to hold the neutral State responsible.

M. Ortolan.

Speaking of the transport of articles contraband of war, M. Ortolan states the \mbox{lm} most correctly :—

"Si c'est l'Etat neutre lui-même qui fait opérer ce transport, soit qu'il le fasse gratuitemes soit qu'il en reçoive le prix, il devient auxiliaire de la lutte, et par conséquent il rompt la neutralite. La chose change si ce sont les sujets de cet Etat qui, sans appui de leur Gouvernement, tont de ce même transport un objet de leurs opérations commerciales. Une l'uissance qui reste neutre n'est pas objet de défendre ce commerce à ses sujets, encore moins de les punir pour l'avoir fait; seulement elle nepet le couvrir de sa protection. En d'autres termes, le pavillon ne couvre pas les marchandises de contrebande de guerre, non pas même dans le cas où ces marchandises appartiennent à des neutres.

nation of contraband of war, o more particularly interest Both are excluded from the recognize as such anything which is not in its actually existing state ready to be used for attack or defence. The following passages from his work "Des Droits et des Devoirs des Nations Neutres," explain the views of the author on the subject of ships, which, till armed, he refuses to consider contraband of war, and which, whatever the construction, when unarmed, « ", "» ne puis comprendre qu'un bâtiment, quelles que soient sa grandeur, sa forme, sa destination, soit un objet de contrebande de guerre. Lorsqu'il est dépourvn des canons, des munitions, des armes et des hommes qui doivent les employer, ce n'est pas une machine de guerre ; c'est un véhicule plus on moins grand, plus ou moins solide, mais ce n'est qu'un véhicule. Pour lui donner les qualités spéciales et exclusives qui déterminent le cametère de contrebande de guerre, il est nécessaire de transporter à bord des canons, des armes, des munitions, en un mot, tout l'attirail du combat. C'est alors seulement bort des canons, ues armes, des munitions, en un mot, tout l'attirant du connait. C'est aiors seurement que le bâtiment devient, non une machine de guerre, mais une machine portant des instruments de guerre et susceptibles de maire, par cette circonst unce seulement, au helligérant. Mais la machine ellemême, mais le véhicule démié de son armement, ne peut être réputé muisible. Au reste, il faut convenir mente, mais te vemente deinie de sou armement, ne peut etre repute missine. Au reste, it aut convenir que ce commerce est peu fréquent, et la meilleure preuve que je puisse donner de l'innocuité de ce négoce est le silence du droit secondaire à son égard."*

As to coal, M. Hautefenille expresses himself as follows:—

"La houille est sans doute un auxiliaire indispensable des machines, mais elle ne saurait être considérée comme un instrument direct et exclusif de guerre; bien loin de là, les usages pacifiques anxquels elle est employée sont beaucoup plus importants que ceux qui résultent de l'état de guerre ; et la conche ess companye sont recursons pais importants que cens qui resintent de retat de guerre, et la consomation faite pour ces usages pacifiques est beaucoup plus considérable que celle nécessitée par les hostilités. D'après les règles du droit primitif, la houille est donc une denrée dont le commerce doit

"Je ne saurais prévoir comment les Traités à intervenir entre les peuples navigateurs trancherent cette question ; mais ce que je puis affirmer c'est que la houille, d'après le droit primitif, ne fait pas cette question; mais ce que je pais amirmer e est que la nomne, d'après le droit primini, ne iait pas partie de la contrebande; c'est que la loi secondaire ne peut changer la nature des objets, ni leur donner un caractère qu'ils n'ont pas, d'après les principes qu'elle est appelée à appliquer, mais non à

But the views of this eloquent and learned, but theoretical, author, on this subject, are not shared by other writers. Galiani, Hübner (the champion of the rights of neutrals), Martens, Tetens, Piantanida, Rutherford, Lord Stowell, Chancellor Kent, Heffter, in his able work "Das Europäische Völkerrecht der Gegenwart," include ships among the things which are contraband of war. Among later writers, M. Ortolan and Sir Robert Phillimore place both ships and coal in the list of articles of contraband. I entirely concur in thinking that a ship adapted and intended for war is clearly an article of contraband. Such a ship is, in fact, a floating fortress, and, when armed and manned, becomes a formidable and efficient instrument of warfare. Coal, too, though in its nature ancipitis usus, yet when intended to contribute to the motive power of a vessel must, I think, as well as machinery, be placed in the same category as masts and sails, which have always been placed among articles of contraband, except by M. Hautefeuille, who, as has been stated, insists that nothing is to be considered as contraband except what is capable of being immediately applied to the purpose of

It is perfectly clear, though I fear it has not always been kept in view in the course of these discussions, that, with the liability to the seizure and loss of the cargo, Passive commerce -in some instances, it is said, of the ship-if he transmits contraband of war to the of the neutral. enemy of the belligerent captor-and to the loss both of ship and cargo if he attempts to force a blockade—ends, according to the existing practice of nations, all restraint on the trade and commerce of the neutral. In his own country, in his own markets, in his own factories, the neutral may, according to the practice of nations, sell articles to the belligerent, which, if sent by sea, would be contraband of war. Theoretical writers are not, indeed, of one mind on this subject. While the great majority of authors are agree, as to the right of the neutral to sell, in the way of trade, to the his market, whatsoever the latter desires to buy, if the neutral has it to sell, whether the article be of an innocent character or contraband of war in its most destructive form, a few authors have recently written in a different spirit.

No writer on international law before Galiani had ventured to assert that the neutral was prohibited from selling, in his own country, to a belligerent, articles which, if sent out of his country by sea, would be liable to seizure as contraband of war. His doctrine to that effect was vigorously refuted by his two distinguished countrymen, Lampredi and Azuni, and was for a time abandoned as untenable; but it has been revived in our day. Let us review the leading authorities. The question is not only of interest to the jurist, but one which will be found to be important to some of the decisions of this Tribunal.

Lampredi

Lampredi, in his work on neutral commerce, refutes the opinion of Galiani. On the general subject (I quote from Peuchet's French translation, not having the original before me), he writes as follows:—

"Lorsqu'une fois l'on a établi la seule loi que les pemples neutres doivent observer pendant la guerre, il devient inutile de demander quelles doivent être les limites du commerce qu'ils font en conséquence de leur neutralité, parcequi'on peut répondre qu'il n'en doit avoir aucune, et qu'ils pendent le faire de la même manière qu'ils le faisaient en temps de paix, observant seulement une exacte impartialité pendant tout le temps de la guerre. Il n'y aure donc aucune espèce de marchandises qu'its ne puissant vendre de porter auc belligieunts, et l'on ne pourre pas les empécher de leur exacte ou loure des marchas pourvu qu'ils ne refusent point à l'un ce qu'ils accordent à l'unte. Devant et pouvant suivre légitimement leur commerce comme en temps de paix, il ne doit y avoir aucune distinction de marchandises, d'argent, d'armes, et d'autres manitions de guerre; la vente et le transport de ces divers objets dans les places des belligérants doivent être permis, et ne point porter atteinte à la neutralité, pourva qu'il n'y ait ni faveur, ni préférence, ni esprit de parti."*

In chapter v, page 57, he treats the question whether neutrals may sell every kind of merchandize within the neutral territory to a belligerent, as one which no jurist anterior to Galiani had ever thought of bringing into controversy, all their discussions being confined to the carriage of contraband to the enemy. It is not, he explains, till they have left the neutral territory that articles, though of warlike character, assume the character of contraband. In chapter vii, p. 72, he says:—

"Le caractère de contrebande ne vient donc pas, aux marchandises, de l'usage qu'on peut en faire dans la guerre, mais de tout autre source. Aussi longtemps qu'elles sont sur le territoire neutre, elles ne différent pas des autres marchandises; elles s'y vendent et s'y achètent de la même manière et saus aucune différence. Deux circonstances font prendre à ces marchandises le caractère de contrebande, 1, qu'elles soient passées à la puissance de l'emnemi, ou à moins destinés à y passer; 2, qu'elles soient sorties du territoire neutre. Alors elles deviennent choses hostiles, res hostiles; elles prennent le caractère de marchandises de contrebande; et si elles sont trouvées hors de toute juridiction souveraine, comme, par exemple, si l'on les trouvait en pleine mer, elles peuvent être légitimement arrêtées et confisquées par l'ennemi, quel que soit le pavillon qui les couvre, non pas parce que ce soit des instruments ou provisions de guerre, mais parce que ce sont des choses appartenantes à l'ennemi, ou an moins parce qu'elles sont destinées à devenir sa propriété et à accroître ses forces. D'où il résulte que le souverain qui permet, sur son territoire, le commerce libre de toutes sortes d'objets ne passe pas les droits de souveraineté, et les puissances belligérantes ne peuvent s'en plaindre ni l'accuser de donner la main à la vente des marchandises de contrebande, qui, sur son territoire, ne peuvent jumais avoir ce caractère, et ne peuvent en porter le nom que lorsqu'elles sont devenues ou destinées à devenir la propriété de l'ennemi, et sorties du territoire où elles ont été achetées."

In another work Lampredi, speaking of neutrality, says:-

"Et quia neutrius partis esse debet, et a bello omnino abstinere, neutri etiam suppeditabit qua directe ad bellum referuntur. Suppeditare hie loci transvehere ad alterutum hostem significat; namsi qua gens instrumenta bellica, et ecetera supra memorata utrisque bellantibus avquo pretio veluti merces vendat, neutralitatem non violat. Ad hane necessariam mercaturae distinctionem aminum non advertisse cos, qui de hac re tam prolixe scripserunt, manifeste patet; maxime enim inter se differe videntur exportatio mercium ad hostem meum ab auneo vel neutro populo facta, et corum venditis, que ad bellum necessaria esse possunt."†

Azuni, who wrote shortly after Lampredi, maintains the same doctrine. In his work "Système Universel de Principes de Droit Maritime" (ch. ii, art. 3), he says:—

"Le commerce général passif, ou la vente impartiale sur le propre territoire des neutres, de marchandises, denrées, ou monujactures, de toute espèce, sera toujours permis, pourvu que le souverain n'ait pas fait un Traité particulier avec un des belligérants dont les sujets viennent faire des archats et des provisions sur le territoire neutre, et qu'il ne se mêle pas des achats, des ventes, et des autres contrats qui transmettent la propriété, qu'il n'ordonne pas qu'on remplisse les magasins de provisions de guerre, et ne fasse pas mettre ses navires à la voile pour les transporter sur le territoire du helligérant. cmmerce de la même manière et avec la même liberté qu'avant la guerre, il ne fait qu'user de droits ncontestables, qui ne peuvent être limités que par des conventions spéciales, expressément ou tacitement nites.

After combating the reasoning of Galiani, he adds:-

" Il est nécessaire que je répète ici le principe incontestable que j'ai précédemment rapporté, qu'en "It est necessaire que je repete ie le principe incontestable que j'ai precensimient imprente, que suivant le droit conventionnel de l'Europe, les neutres ne peuvent porter les choses qui sont spécialement propres à la guerre, et qui y sont directement employées, mais qu'ils peuvent saus inconvénient, selon le droit universel des gens, les vendre comme anrebandise sur leur proprie territoire à quiconque se présente pour les acheter, pnisqu'ils le font sans partialité, et sans montrer de faveur plutôt pour une partie belligerante que pour l'antre."

Reddie, in his "Researches Historical and Critical in Maritime and International Law" cites these views with concurrence and approbation.

In Wheaton's "History of International Law" the author speaks of the refutation of Galiani by Lampredi as superthous—as an "idle question."

Massé, in his work "Le Droit Commercial dans ses Rapports avec le Droit des Massé. Gens," after maintaining the right of the belligerent to intercept contraband, adds :-

"Mais la thèse change s'il s'agit d'un commerce passif. S'il est défendu au neutre de porter des armes et des munitions aux belligérants, parcequ'alors il devient l'auxiliaire de l'un et l'ennemi de l'autre, il ne lui est pas défendu de vendre impart alement sur son territoire des objets nécessaires à la guerre, parceque son territoire est ouvert à tous, que tous peuvent venir y chercher ce dont ont-ils besoin, et que le neutre qui se borne à vendre chez lui, à la différence de celui qui porte ses marchandises un belligérant, n'est pas tenu do rechercher qui les lui achète, pour qu' elles sont achetées, et quelle est leur destination ultérieure. C'est alors qu'il est absolument vrai de dire que les neutres peuvent continuer pendaut la guerre le commerce qu'ils faisaient pendant la paix, et que la neutralité parties de continuation d'un état antérieur qui ne modifie pas la guerre à laquelle le neutre, qui ouvre son marché à toutes les nations, ne prend aucune part directe ou indirecte."*

"Sur un territoire neutre, il n'y a pas de marchandises de contrebande; tontes y sont libres, Elles ne deviennent contrebande qu'au moment où elles en sortent avec direction pour un lieu dont leur nature les exclut. C'est alers qu'elles tombent sons la juridiction des belligérants contre lesquels elles nature les execut. Cest acts qu'elles combent sous la journer ou ne peuvent leur nuire, ils n'ont pas sont dirigées. Jusque-là et tait qu'elles restent en un lieu où elles ne peuvent leur nuire, ils n'ont pas le droit de s'occuper des transactions pacifiques dont elles peuvent être l'objet. Sans donte, la guerre donne une nouvelle impulsion su commerce passif des objets utiles à la guerre; mais cette impulsion nest pas du fait des neutres, elle est du fait des belligérants, qui, après avoir eux-mêmes produit des circonstances nouvelles, ne peuvent trouver manyais que les neutres en profitent dans les limites de leurs droits et de leur territo; e." +

M. Ortolan observes as follows:-

" ('est seulement lorsque de telles marchandises sont en cours de transport pour une destination M. Ortolan. hostile qu'elles deviennent contrebande militaire. Lorsqu'un Etat neutre laisse ses sujets se livrer au commerce passif de ces mêmes objets, c'est-à-dire, lorsqu'it permet à tous les belligérants indistinctement de venir les acheter sur son territoire pour les transporter ensuite où bon leur semble, à leurs frais et à leurs risques, sur leurs propres navires murchands, il ne fait pas autre chose que laisser s'accomplir un acte licite; on ne peut pas dire qu'il prenne part à la guerre parce qu'il laisse ses ports libres, et parce qu'il conserve à toutes les nations le droit qu'elles avaient avant la guerre d'y entrer avec leurs bâtiments marchands pour s'y approvisionner, par la voie du commerce, des marchandises dont elles out besoin; les vendeurs eux-mêmes ne sont pas responsables de l'usage ultérieur qui seu fait de ces marchandises; ils ne sont pas tenus de comaûtre ni pour qui elles sont achetées ni la direction qu'on

"Le droit conventionnel est d'accord avec ces principes ; il ne défend pas la vente impartiale faite sur un territoire neutre des marchandises propres à la guerre. Muis si ces secoms effectifs en nature, que l'un des combattants vient prendre et exporte à ses propres risques, étaient fournis par l'Etat neutre lai-même; si, par exemple, des armes, des projectiles, de la poudre étaient tirés de ses arsemaux on de ses manufactures publiques, ce ne seruit plus là un commerce privé, et par conséquent il y aurait atteinte grave à la neutralité."

Heffter, in his "Volkerrecht der Gegenwart" (I eite from Bergson's translation), Heffter, p. 315, says:--

"En ce qui concerne les objets de contrebande, la vente faite aux belligérants en territoire neutre ne saurait être considérée comme un acte illieite et contraire aux devoirs de la neutralité; ce n'est que leur transport qui en rend responsable."

Professor Sandona, of Siena, "Trattato di Diritto Internazionale Moderno," comparing passive with the active commerce of neutrals, says :--

"Diso adunque che si crede a torto che faccia opera ad un di presso eguale, chi vende semplicemente a i proprio pe se quanto immediatemente si riferisce ai mezzi di fare la guerra, e chi trasporta questi mezzi sui mercati o nelle piazze dei belligeranti. Il primo vende le sue merci nel proprio puese, ove non vi è, stando al puro diritto razionale, alcuna legge che gliene vieti il troffico. sola cosa che si può dimandare da lui è questa, che sia disposto a vendere egualmente a chiunque si presenta le sue merci, onde evitare il pericolo di offendere l'imparzialità, a cui i neutrali sono tenuti."

Professor Illuntschli.

To these anothers Professor Bluntschli has added the weight of his authority. In his work entitled "Das Moderne Volkerrecht," or, as it is called in the French translation, "Le Droit International Codifié," he writes :-

" Le fait qu'un Etat neutre fournit ou laisse fournir à un des belligérants des armes on du matériel de guerre constitue également une violation des devoirs des neutres,

"Par contre, si des particuliers, sans avoir l'intention de venir en aide à l'un des belligérants, lui fournissent à titre d'entreprise commerciale des armes ou du matériel de guerre, ils courent le risque que ces objets soient confisquées par l'adversaire comme contrebande de guerre; les tionvernements neutres ne manquent pas à leur devoir en tolérant le commerce d'objets qui sont considérés comme contrebande de guerre.

Celui qui transporte de la contrebande de guerre à l'une des parties belligérantes s'expose à voir ces objets confisqués. Mais l'état neutre n'a pas de motifs de s'opposer à l'expédition de la contrebande de guerre. Dans les discussions de la loi Américaine sur la neutralité, le Président Jefferson déclara en 1793 que la guerre étrangère ne privait point les particuliers du droit de labriquer, de vendre on d'exporter des armes ; seulement les citoyens Américains, ajoutait-il, exercent ce droit à leurs risques

The opinion of Galiani has, however, been again revived by two or three writers in our own days.

Sir R. Phillimore.

Amongst these, Sir Robert Phillimore, in his work on International Law, vol. iii, § cexxx, speaking "as to the permitting the sale of munitions of war to a belligerent within the territory of the neutral," writes :-

"If the fountains of international justice have been correctly pointed out in a former volume of this work, and it be the true character of a neutral to abstain from every act which may better or worsen the condition of a belligerent, the unlawfulness of any such sale is a necessary conclusion from these Put tl tl oi A

"What does it matter where the neutral supplies one belligerent with the means of attacking another? How does the question of locality, according to the principles of eternal justice and the reason of the thing, affect the advantage to one belligerent or the injury to the other necruing from this act of the alleged neutral? Is the cannon, or the sword, or the recruit who is to use them the less dangerous to the belligerent because they were purchased, or he was enlisted, within the limits of neutral territory? Surely not. Surely, the locus in quo is wholly beside the mark, except, indeed, that the actual conveyance of the weapon or the soldier may evidence a bitterer and more decided partiality --a more unquestionable and active participation in the war."

MM. Pistoye and Duverdy also, in their "Traité des Prises Maritimes," express, though with less energy than the learned author last mentioned, a like view.

M. Hautefeuille,

M. Hautefeuille, who, as we have seen, not only refuses to admit vessels equipped for war, it not armed, into the list of contraband of war, but also holds that they are legitimate articles of neutral commerce- in criteless maintains that what is called the passive trade of the neutral in articles of warake use is inconsistent with neutrality. His reasoning is as follows:-

"Cette question a été traitée avec beaucoup d'étenduc par Lampredi et par Azuni ; la doctrine de ces deux anteurs a été combattu par Galiani. Avant d'examiner l'opinion de ces publicistes, il me ces deux interns a cre combatta par Gaman.

Avant indispensable de rappeler les bases de la discussion, de poser des principes qui, d'après la loi primitive, doivent la dominer. Ces principes ont déjà été établis. Ils peuvent se résumer en deux droits et en deux devoirs. Les droits sont: I. Liberté et indépendance du peuple neutre dans son commerce, en temps de guerre, même avec les deux belligérants. 2. Liberté et indépendance absolues du neutre sur son propre territoire. Les deux devoirs sont corrélatifs aux deux droits, ila les limitent. ce son! 5. L'impartialité; 2. L'abstention de tous actes directs de guerre, et par conséquent de fournir aux bell, gérants les armes et les munitions de guerre. De ces droits il résulte, suns doute, que la nation pacifique a le pouvoir de commercer librement avec chacun des belligérants, non seulement sur son propre territoire, mais encore partout alleurs, sans qu'aucun d'eux puisse s'y opposer: mais ce droit est borné par le devoir imposé au neutre de ne fournir, ni à l'un ni à l'antre, des instruments actuellement et uniquement destinés à la guerre

"Cette limite mise par la loi primitive à la liberté des nations, s'étend-elle à tout le commerce, au commerce passif comme au commerce actif? Le devoir du neutre consiste-t-il uniquement à ne pas o eguale, chi vende sempliceare la guerra, e chi trasporta e sue merci nel proprio puese, vieti il trollico. Professor Casanova, in his recent work, "Del Diritto Internazionale," adopts the views of M. Hautefeuille.

This difference of opinion arises from the different point of view from which party considers the question. The one party assume that to supply a belligerent - th articles of warlike use, though in the way of trade, is to take part in the way. assuming which, they say, with truth, that it is the same thing whether the objection able articles are sold to the belligerent in the country of the neutral or in his own. The other party, starting from the principle that, according to natural justice, the rights of the neutral should be left free and untonched by the wars of others, look on the existing restraints on the freedom of his commerce as encroachments on hi rights, and considering these restraints as arising entirely from convention, deny the rights, and considering these restantes as arising criticity from convention, deny the illegality of any trade, which the actual practice of nations does not prevent. The great authority of Chancellor Kent, and of the majority of writers, is in favour of the

But, in truth, the question does not depend on the incubrations of learned professors or speculative jurists. However authoritatively these authors may take upon themselves to write, and however deserving their speculations may be of attention, they cannot make the law. International law is that to which nations have given their common assent, and it is best known as settled by their common practice.

Now, in all wars, neutrals have traded at home and abroad in articles contraband Practice in former of war, subject always in the latter ease to the chance of capture and confiscation, wars. As I have already said, no Government has ever been sought to be made responsible on that account. Assuredly, no nation has ever asserted the freedom of commerce in this respect more broadly than the United States, or acted up to its principles with

On the breaking out of the war between France and England in 1793, after a proclamation of neutrality by General Washington, then President, Mr. Jefferson, then Secretary of State, thus writes to Mr. Hammond, Minister of Great Britain to the United States :-

Our citizens have ten always free to make, thas fact we are equany uninformed us of the former. Our entrens have seen always free to make, vend, and export arms. It is the constant occupation and livelihood of some of them. To suppress their callings, the only means perhaps of their subsistence, because a war exists in foreign and distant their callings, in which we have no concern, would scareely be expected. It would be hard in principle, and impossible in practice. The law of nations, therefore, respecting the rights of those at peace, does not require from them such an internal derangement in their occupations. It is satisfied with the external penalty pronounced in the President's Proclamation, that of confisc tion of such portion of their enemies. To this penalty our citizens are warried that they will be alandoned, and that even left equally free and open to all."

The Collectors of the Customs at the different ports were instructed that-

"The parchasing and exporting from the called contraband, being generally warlike instruct to be interfered with. If our own citizens undertake to carry them to any of these parties, they will be abandoned to the penalties which the laws of war authorize."

In 1842, Mr. Webster writes:-

"It is not the practice of nations to undertake to prohibit their own subjects from trafficking articles contraband of war. Such trade is carried on at the risk of those engaged in it under it sliabilities and penalties prescribed by the law of nations or particular Treaties. If it be true, therefore that citizens of the United States have been engaged in a commerce by which Texas, an enemy undexico, has been supplied with arms and munitions of war, the Government of the United States nevertheless, was not bound to prevent it, and could not have prevented it without a manifoldeparture from the principles of neutrality, and is in no way answerable for the consequences. So commerce is left to its ordinary tate, according to the law of nations."

In his Message to the American Senate, in December 1854, President Pier declares—

"The laws of the United States do not forbid their citizens to sell to either of the belliger Powers articles contraband of war, or to take munitions of war or soldiers on board their private ships transportation; and although, in so doing, the individual citizen exposes his property or person to set of the hazards of war, his acts do not involve any breach on national neutrality, nor of themselve implicate the Government.

"Thus, during the progress of the present war in Europe, our citizens have without nation responsibility therefor sold gunpowder and arms to all buyers, regardless of the destination of the articles. Our merchantmen have been, and still continue to be, largely employed by Great Britain a France in transporting troops, provisions, and munitions of war to the principal seat of milling operations, and in bringing home the sick and wounded soldiers; but such use of our mercantile man is not interdicted either by the international or by our municipal law, and, therefore, does not or promise our neutral relations with Russin."

Chancellor Kent, in his Commentaries, says:-

"It was contended by the French nation in 1796, that neutral Governments were bound restrain their subjects from selling or exporting articles contraband of war to the belligerent Pow But it was successfully shown on the part of the United States that neutrals may lawfully sell home, to a belligerent purchaser, or carry themselves to the belligerent Powers, contraband articles subject to the right of seizure in transitu. This right has since been explicitly declared by the jadic authorities of this country. The right of the neutral to transport, and of the hostile Power to seize conflicting rights, and neither party can charge the other with a criminal act." *

In 1862, on the occasion of the French invasion of Mexico, complaint was may M. Romero, the Representative of the Mexican Government at Washington, of a French being allowed to purchase horses and mules in the United States for a purpose of the war. A long correspondence ensued between M. Romero Mr. Seward, in which the latter vigorously maintains what he calls "the settled a traditional policy of the country." He says—

"It is not easy to see how that policy could be changed so as to conform to the view M. Romero, without destroying all neutral commerce whatsoever. If Mexico shall prescribe to what merchandize we shall not sell to French subjects because it may be employed in milit operations against Mexico, France must equally be allowed to dictate to us what merchandize wes allow to be shipped to Mexico, because it might be belligerently used against France. Every dination which is at war would have a similar right, and every other commercial nation would be but to respect it as much as the United States. Commerce, in that case, instead of being free or mipendent, would exist only at the caprice of war." §

Purchase of contraband of war by the Government of the United States.

As regards the purchase of articles of war, the United States have not serupled purchase arms and munitions of war in other countries when need required it. At a commencement of the civil war, the Government being short of arms, agents were set to England to procure them in large quantities. Other agents bought arms in different countries on the continent. Figures are given in the British Counter-Case which appear to bear out the statement that "the extra supplies of warlike stores, the exported to the northern ports of the United States during the civil war, a estimated to represent a total value of not less than 2,000,000%, of which 1,500,000 was the value of muskets and riftes alone." Mr. Adams, in a conversation will Earl Russell, on the 22nd May, 1862, when the latter, in answer to his remonstrance as to supplies sent out from Great Britain to the Confederate States, referred to the large supplies of similar materials obtained on the part of the United States, naive answered that "at one time a quantity of arms and military stores had been bough as a purely commercial transaction, for the use of the Federal army, but that it practice had been discontinued at his suggestion, because it prevented him for ms by their subjects as any infringement of the law of nations.

It thus appears that the continental Governments also did not consider the sale of

It seems to me, therefore, that the law relating to contraband of war must be Result of discussidered not as arising out of obligations of neutrality, but as altogether conventional; sions to sell to either of the belliger of that by the existing practice of nations, the sale of such things to a belligerent by e neutral subject is not in any way a violation of neutrality. Then how stands e matter as to ships of war? In principle, is there any difference between a ship of Sale of ships, and any other article of warlike use? I am unable to see any. Nor can I cover any difference in principle between a ship equipped to receive her armament, da ship actually armed. Opinion of Dana.

This is the view taken by Mr. Dana in a note to his edition of "Wheaton Elements of International Law," which has been reprinted in the documents appendent to the American Case:—

"Our rules do not interfere with bond fide commercial dealings in contraband of war. American merchant may build and fully arm a vessel, and provide her with stores, and offer her sale in our own market. If he does any acts as an agent or servant of a belligerent, or in pursuance of a arrangement or understanding with a belligerent, that she shall be employed in hostilities when sake is guilty. He may, without violating our law, send out such a vessel, so equipped, under the and papers of his own country, with no more force of crew than is suitable for navigation, with no related to resist search or seizure, and to take the chances of capture as contraband merchandize, of blocked and of a market in a belligerent port. In such case, the extent and character of the equipments is immaterial as in the other class of cases. The intent is all. The act is open to great suspicious and abuse, and the line may often be searcely traceable; yet the principle is clear enough. Is the intent one to prepare an article of contraband merchandize, to be sent to the market of a belligerent, subject to the chances of capture and of the market? Or, on the other hand, is it to fit out a vessel while shall leave our port to cruise, immediately or ultima aly, against to a commerce of a friendly native.

Opinion of M. Ortolan.

M. Ortolau, who had made no such distinction in the former edition of his work "Sur la Diplomatic de la Mer," in the last edition of that work has, with reference to this subject, the following, I cannot help thinking somewhat extraordinary doctrine:-

"Si I on suppose un navire construit sur le territoire neutre, non pas sur commande d'un belligieur ou par suite d'un traité estensible ou dissimulé avec ce belligérant, mais en vue d'un dessein quelconga soit de navigation commerciale, soit tout autre, et que ce navire, déjà par lui-même propre à la guer ou de nature à être converti à cet usage, une fois sorti des ports de la nation neutre, soit vendu, dans cours de sa navigation, occasionnellement, à l'un des belligérants, et se mettre à navigure en destinative directe pour ce belligérant; un tel navire dans de telles circonstances tombe uniquement sous le com des règles relutives à la contrebande de guerre. Il est sujet à être arrêté et confisqué par l'ennemi a pourra s'en emparer, mais sans qu'aucun grief de violation des devoirs de la neutralité puisse sofiride ce fait contre l'Etat neutre pour n'avoir pas défendu à ses nationaux de telles ventes ou ne les avoir pe triprimées. C'est une opération de trafic qui a eu lieu, trafic de contrebande de guerre, dont aucus circonstance particulière n'est venue changer le caractère.

" Tel fut, en l'année 1800, le cas du navire Américain le Brutus, capturé par les Anglais et jugée bonne prise par le Cour d'Amirauté d'Halifax.

"Mais la situation change, la contrebande de guerre n'est plus la question principale, d'aune règles du droit des gens interviennent et modifient profondément la solution, si l'on suppose qu'il s'agisse de bâtiments de guerre construits, armés ou équipés sur un territoire neutre pour le compa d'un belligérant, par suite d'arrangement pris à l'avance avec lui, sous la forme d'un contrat conmacra quelconque—vente, commission, louage d'industrie ou de travail; que les arrangements aient été pà ostensiblement, on qu'ils le soient d'une manière secrète ou déguisée; car la loyanté est une configue essentielle dans la solution des difficultés internationales, et sous le convert des fausses apparences faut toujours aller au fond des choses. Il y a ici, meontestablement, une seconde hypothèse qu'il importe de distinguer soigneusement de la précédente.

"Nous nous rattacherons, pour résoudre en droit des gens les difficultés que présente cette nouvelle situation, à un principe universellement établi, qui se formule en ce pen des mots: 'Inviolabilité uterritoire neutre.' Cette inviolabilité est un droit pour l'Etat neutre, dont le territoire ne doit pas de atteint par les faits de guerre, mais elle impose aussi à ce même Etat neutre une étroite obligation, celle de ne pas permettre, celle d'empêcher, activement au besoin, l'emploi de ce territoire par l'une des parties ou au profit de l'une des parties belligérantes, dans un but hostile à l'autre partie.

"Les publicistes en crédit ne font aucun doute pour ce qui concerne l'armement et l'équipement dans un port neutre de bâtiments de guerre destinés à accroître les forces des belligérants. It s'accordent pour reconnaître l'illégalité de ces armements ou équipements, comme une infraction de la part de l'Etat neutre qui les tolérerait aux devoirs de la neutralité.

"N'est-il pas évident qu'il en doit être de même a fortiori de la construction de pareils bâtiments lorsque cette construction a lieu dans les conditions prévues en notre seconde hypothèse?"

Ortolan, if a ship happens to be ready made and armed, she may be lawfully sold to a foreign belligerent, though with a full knowledge on the part of the seller of the purpose to which she is to be applied; but, if she is made to order, the transaction assumes the opposite character, and is a breach of neutrality. With all respect for the authority of this distinguished writer, I must decline to adopt a doctrine which rests on so shadowy a distinction.

Professor Bluntschli, undertaking to pronounce a judgment on the subject matter opinion of Profinal "of 1870, lays down the following doctrine:—

" L'Etat neutre qui vent garantir sa neutralité doit s'abstenir d'aider aucune des parties belligérantes dans ses opérations de guerre. Il ne peut prêter son territoire pour permettre à l'une des parties d'organiser en lien sur des entreprises militaires. Il est obligé de veilre tidèlement à ce que des partieuliers n'arment point sur son territoire des vaisseaux de guerre, destinés à être livrés à une des parties belligérantes. (Bluntschli, Modernes l'obterverlt, section 763.)

" Le devoir est proclamé par la science, et il dérive tant de l'idée de neutralité que des égards auxquels tout Etat est nécessairement tenu envers les autres Etats avec lesquels il vit en paix et amitié.

"La neutralité est la non-participation à la guerre. Lossque l'État neutre soutient un des belligérants, il prend part à la guerre en faveur de celui qu'il soutient, et dès lors il resse d'être neutre. L'adversaire est autorisé à voir dans cette participation un acte d'hostilité. Et cela n'est pas seulement prête à un des belligérants un appui mélide des troupes on des vaisseaux de guerre, mais aussi lorsqu'il territoire neutre, on envoie des troupes on des navires de guerre.

prete a un des recingames de appea son des navires de guerre.

"Partout où le droit de neutralité étend le cercle de son application, il restreint les limites de la guerre et de ses désastrenses conséquences, et il garantit les bienfaits de la paix. Les devoirs de l'État neutre envers les helligérants sont en substance les mêmes que ceux de l'État ami, en temps de paix, sur son territoire des agressions contre un état ami. Tous sont obligés de veiller à ce que leur sol ne devienne pas le point de départ d'entreprises militaires, dirigées contre des Etats avec lesquels ils sont en paix."

I entirely agree in all that is thus said by this able jurist—that is, if I properly apprehend his language, and am right in understanding it to apply not to the sale of ships of war, simpliciter, but to the sending out of troops and armed ships for the purpose of what the learned Professor terms "military enterprises," and to the "organizing of aggressions against a friendly State."

Arother eminent jurist, who has espoused the cause of the United States, in a very alle review of the work of Professor Mountague Bernard, and whose opinion is referred to by the United States as an anthority in their favour, M. Rolin Jacquemyns, opinion on the ast as I collect, deny the legality of the sale of ships of war, but rests his opinion on the general circumstances connected with the construction and escape of myns.

But the spirit in which this author writes will be seen from the following Opinion of M. Rolin Jacquemyns.

"Il est dans tous les cas été digne d'un jurisconsulte de la valeur de M. Bernard de ne pas se borner à examiner cette grave question des devoirs de la neutralité au point de vue du droit positif existant. C'est par l'opinion hautement émise de savants comme lui, que les idées générales en matière de droit sont appelées à se rectifier et à se complèter. Or, s'il y a une chose que chaque guerre nouvelle démontre, c'est le caractère non-seulement insuffisant, mais fallacieux de la vieille définition: neutroum partium. Si au début de cette dernière et épouvantable guerre de 1870, l'Angleterre au lieu d'être obstinément acateurum partium, avait chirement désapprouvé l'offensive inique de la France, est-ce que les intérêts de la justice et de la paix n'auraient pas été mieux servis ? L'idéal du personnage neutreurum partium, c'est le juge qui, dans l'apologne de l'Imitre et des plaideurs, avale le contenu du mollusque et adjuge les écailles aux deux belligérants. Il n'est d'une mais il siegnaisse scruphleusement aux dépens de tons deux. Une telle conduite de la pert d'un grand peuple peut être anssi cenforme aux précédents que celle du vénérable magistrat dont parle la fable. Muis quand elle se fonde sur une loi positive, sur une règle admise, c'est une preuve que cette tel ou cette règle est mauvaise, comme contraire à la science, à la dignité, et à la sclidarité humaine."*

This reasoning may be very well deserving of attention for the future; but, for the present purpose, when the authority of M. Rolin Jacquemyns as to the culpability of Great Britain is cited, I must protest against the question being determined not according to "existing positive law," but to the opinion of "savants" as to what the law should have been, or should now be made. The Tribunal cannot, I appreheed, adopt such a principle in forming its judgment. Its functions are not to make the law, but to decide according to the rules of the Treaty, with the light which the acknowledged principles of international jurisprudence and the established usages of nations may afford for its assistance. The occasion may be a tempting one for giving effect to speculative opinions or individual theories. But a decision founded on such a principle would not ensure the approbation of wise and judicious minds, or command the respect of those who might suffer from a judgment which would be at variance with the first principles of equity and justice.

Opinion of the Judges of England. Let us see what has been the practical view taken of the subject in England or America. As far back as the year 1721, ships of war having been built in England, and sold to the Czar of Russia, then at war with Sweden, and complaint having been made by the Swedish Minister, the Judges were summoned to the House of Lords, and their opinion was asked whether by law the King of England had the power to prohibit the building of ships of war, or of great force, for foreigners, in any of His Majesty's dominions. And the judges, with the exception of one, who had formed no opinion, answered that the King had no such power. It is plain that, if the sale of such vessels had been an offence against international law, the King would have had power to prevent it by the prosecution of the parties building and selling such ships, as offenders against the municipal law, as the offence would have been a misdemeanour at the common law.

Case of the Santissima Trinidad.

The judgment of Judge Story, in the well-known case of the Santissima Trinidad, shows that the sale of armed ships of war has never been held to be contrary to law in America. In that case a vessel, called the Independencia, equipped for war and armed with twelve guns, had been sent out from the American port of Baltimore, upon a pretended voyage to the North-West Coast, but in reality to Buenos Ayres, then at war with Spain, with instructions to the supercargo to sell her to the Buenos Ayres Government if he could obtain a certain price. She was sold to that Government accordingly, and, having been commissioned, was sent to sea and made prizes. She : aerwards put into an American port, and having there received an augmentation of her force, again put to sea and captured a prize. The validity of this prize was questioned in the suit, on two grounds: 1st. That the sale of the vessel to a foreign Government by American citizens, for the purpose of being used in war against a belligerent with whom the United States were at peace, was a violation of neutrality and illegal; 2ndly. Because the capture had been made after an augmentation of the force of the vessel in a port of the United States. The capture was held invalid on the latter ground. Upon the first, the Judge delivered judgment as follows:-

Judgment of Mr. Justice Story.

"The question as to the original illegal armament and outfit of the Independencia may be dismissed in a few words. It is apparent, that though equipped as a vessel of war, she was sent to Buenos Ayres on a commercial adventure, contraband, indeed, but in no shape violating our laws or our national neutrality. If captured by a Spanish ship of war during the voyage, she would have been justly condemned as good prize for being engaged in a traffic prohibited by the law of mations. But there is nothing in our laws, or in the law of nations, that forbids our citizens from sending armed vessels, as well as munitions of war, to foreign ports for sale. It is a commercial adventure which no nation is bound to prohibit, and which only exposes the person engaged in it to the penalty of confiscation. Supposing, therefore, the voyage to have been for commercial purposes, and the sale at Buenos Ayres to have been a bond fide sale (and there is nothing in the evidence before us to contradict it), there is no pretence to say that the original outfit on the voyage was illegal, or that a capture made after the sale was, for that cause alone, invalid."

It is now sought to shake the authority of this judgment, by saying that it was unnecessary to the decision of the cause, as the prize was held to be invalid on the other ground; but it was, nevertheless, a solemn judgment upon a point properly arising in the cause, and, so far as I am aware, it has never been questioned.

Case of the Grand Para. It is indeed alleged (but for the first time) in the American Case that the authority of this decision is to be looked upon as overruled or controlled by a judgment given by the same Court in the case of the Gran Para. Now, the latter judgment was a judgment of the same Court (of which, therefore, Mr. Justice Story was himself a member), and was pronounced on the very next day. We are told in the Case of the United States, that the cases were argued, the one on the 20th, the other on the 28th of February, 1822; that the judgment in the case of the Santissima Trinidad was pronounced on the 12th of March, that in the case of the Gran Para on the ensuing

It is said, and truly, that "there can be no doubt they were considered together in the consultation room," and lawyers are gravely asked to believe that it was intended by the second judgment to overrule or qualify the doctrine involved in the first. No English or American lawyer could entertain the notion for a moment that, if the same Court had intended to overrule, or even to qualify, the judgment given immediately before, it would not have referred to it in terms and given its reasons for so sudden a change in its views of the law. But the truth is,—and I am at a loss to understand how the American Counsel can have failed to overlood; this, or to call attention to it when citing the decision,—that, so far from overruling or affecting the judgment in the Santissima Trinidad, the ease of the Gran Para had nothing in common with it beyond that of being a suit for the restitution of prize. It was not the case of the sale of a ship to a foreign Government at all. It was simply he case of an American privateer armed in defiance of American law, and cruizing ander a fictitious commission, the property in her still remaining unchanged in the American citizen by whom she had been fitted out! The great importance of this distinction will be seen in another part of this case.

In a learned and able article in the well-known publication the "American Law American Review. Review" of January 1871, the writer after referring to the case of the Santissima Trinidad as "a famous and leading case," states the law as follows:-

" It may be declared as indubitable that the pure unalloyed bargain and sale of a ship, even a ship of war, to a belligerent is legal by the rules of international law; that such a ship is, however, contraband of war, and if captured after sale on her way towards delivery, or before sale on her way toward band of war, and it capatined after some on ner way towards derivery, or before some on ner way toward a market where she is intended to be sold to a belligerent, she will be properly condemned. Neutrality Acts have not been intended to change this state of the law, but only to furnish sufficient means for preventing its abuse. Our origina, proposition that the doctrine of contraband of war does not operate as a restriction upon trade, upon dealings which are purely commercial, remains correct, even in this matter of war vessels."

In this view of the law I am glad to have the concurrence of our distinguished Opinion of colleague Mr. Adams, who, writing to Earl Russell on the 6th of April, 1863, states, Mr. Adams. with reference to certain American authorities which Lord Russell had appealed to:-

"The sale and transfer, by a neutral, of arms, of munitions of war, and even of vessels of war, to a belligerent country, not subject to blockade at the time, as a purely commercial transaction, is decided by these authorities not to be unlawful. They go not a step further; and precisely to that extent I have myself taken no exception to the doctrine."*

This being the present state of international law on this subject, if it is desirable Question as to to introduce new rules, it must be done by the common consent of nations, not by the prohibition of sale speculative doctrines of theorists, however distinguished. speculative doctrines of theorists, however distinguished.

But is it desirable that it should be altered, and that obstacles to the industry and trade of neutral nations should be created?

Azuni observes :-

"Une grande partie du commerce de quelques nations Européennes, telles que les Suédois, Norvègiens, et les Russes, consiste en marchandises nécessaires pour la guerre maritime, pour la tonstruction et pour l'équipement d'une flotte; elles vendent en temps de paix, à quiconque en a besoin, de fer, du cuivre, des mats, des bois, du goudron, de la poix, et des canons, enfin des navires de ossan, de let, ut charte, des mais, les sons, ut goadon, de la poix, ce des canons, equi des neceres de gerre entiers. Quelles raisons pourrait-il y avoir de priver ces nations de leur commerce et de leur manière de subsister, à l'occasion d'une guerre à laquelle ils ne premnent aucune part? Il n'y a dans le code de la justice et de l'équité rien en faveur d'une telle protection. Il est donc nécessaire d'établir, comme maxime fondementale de tout droit, que les peuples neutres devant et pouvant licitement continuer le commerce qu'ils font en temps de paix, on ne doit faire aucune distinction de denrées, de marchandises, et de manufactures, quoique propres à la guerre, et que, par cette raison, la vente et le tansport aux parties belligérantes en sont permis, si le commerce actif et passif était établi en temps de paix, sans qu'on puisse prendre, en aucune manière, que la neutralité soit violée, pourvu que cela se fasse sans animosité, sans prélérence, et sans partialité."

I cannot but feel the force and justice of these observations. I ask in like manner, "Why—unless, indeed, on account of reasons of State affecting the interests of the neutral State itself, in which case private interests must give way to those of the public-are the armourers of Birmingham or Liege, or the shipbuilders of London or Liverpool, to have their business put a stop to because one of their customers happens to be engaged in war with another State?" It is not enough to say that but for the war the demand for the articles in question would not have arisen. From whatever cause it may proceed, increased demand is the legitimate advantage of the producer or the merchant, and it is by the advantage which periods of increased and more active demand bring with them that the loss arising from occasional periods of stagnation is balanced and made good.

The authors who desire to put further restraints on the free commerce of neutrals than international law has hitherto done, appear to me to think too much of the interests of belligerents, who are the disturbers of the world's prace, and to be too minindful of the interests of neutral nations, who are simply seeking occupation for their industry and commerce indifferent by whom they are employed. They seem to think that the belligerent is granting an indulgence or conferring a favour on the neutral in allowing him to remain a stranger to the war, which the grateful neutral should be too glad to purchase by the sacrifice of all rights at all incompatible with the convenience of the belligerent.

M. Hautefeuille, indeed, invokes humanity, and would prohibit the sale of articles of warlike use in order to prevent and put an end to war. But if considerations of humanity are to be taken into account, it is obvious that the sale of such things should be prohibited in time of peace, as well as of war. They are not the less available in time of war because bought in time of peace.

The armonrer or the shipbuilder, who is thus required to close his establishment to the belligerents when war arises, may continue to manufacture and sell, undisturbed, his instruments of destruction down to the very hour when war is proclaimed. Had Prussia, for instance, anticipated the attack of France as likely to occur so soon, and had desired to procure a fleet, she might have resorted to the shipwrights' yards of Eugland till she possessed ships enough to cope with her formidable adversary on the seas. But, let war but be proclaimed, and according to these views, the work becomes at once eriminal, the workman's hammer must be arrested, the shipwright's yard closed. There may be reasons of state in certain instances—as according to British and American views in the case of ships—for putting a restraint on the freedom of trade, but it seems idle to base it on the score of humanity. The effect would simply be that a Government meditating the invasion of another country would have to provide itself in time. The neighbour upon whom it thus brings war on the sudden, and who may be comparatively unprepared, is not to be at liberty to seek the materials of war elsewhere, but is to be left at the mercy of the invader. Peaceful nations would thus be at the mercy of others more ambitious and warlike and better prepared than themselves. The weak would be sacrificed to the strong. Let me suppose a people rising in a just and righteous cause. I will not offend the patriotic susceptibility of my honourable and esteemed colleague by suggesting, for a single instant, even hypothetically, the possibility that the cause of the Insurgents might have been such a one-1 will take what he will readily admit to have been so, the separation of the United States from the mother country. Let me suppose that, while Great Britain had her fleets prepared, her troops armed, her arsenals well stored, America had neither ships nor arms, nor munitions of war, with which to resist the superior forces of her adversary. Would it have been in the interest of humanity that she should be shut out from the markets of the world? An appeal to considerations of humanity has no doubt something very captivating about it; but I question very much whether humanity would not lose more than it would gain by the proposed restraint on the commercial freedom of nations.

Ship of war sent out for immediate service. The case, however, becomes essentially different when a ship thus equipped and arraed is not sent out to be taken to the port of the belligerent purchaser, but is sent to sen with officers and a fighting crew for the purpose of immediate warfare. Under such circumstances the transaction ceases to be one of mere commerce, and assumes the form of a lostile expedition sent forth from the territory of the neutral. Such an expedition is plainly a violation of neutrality, according to international law, and one which the neutral Government is bound to do its best to prevent.

Armament and crew sent out in different ships. But what if, in order the better to avoid observation and detection, the vessel is sent forth, without its armament, without its war crew, and these, sent to it by another or different vessels, are put on board of it in some place or water beyond the jurisdiction of the neutral? In my opinion, except so far as the question of difference is concerned, as to which it may form a very material element, this makes no difference. The ship, the armament, the crew, though sent out separately, form each of them part of one and the same enterprise or undertaking. Taken together, they constint a hostile expedition and must be treated as such. It is as though a hostile force were sent by sea to invade an enemy's territory, and each arm of the force so sent, infantry, eavalry, artillery, were embarked in different ships. The whole would still form one expedition. So here, ships, guns, crew, are each a part of one entire whole to be employed and used to furtherance of one common design. This is happily expressed in the American Law Review, in the article already cited: "It was not," writes the author, "because the Messis, Laird sold a war ship to the Confederates that we have a claim against England for a breach of international law; but it was because collateral arrangements for completing the equipment and arm men of the ship so sold, by placing on board officers and crew, guns and provisions, rendered the entire procedure, in fact, the inception of a hostile undertaking from the confines of a neutral country,'

Of course the question may become one of degree. The interval of time which might chapse between the sending out of the ship and that of the crew, the distance between the neutral territory and the place at which the war crew are to join, the possible fact that it was originally intended to procure a crew in some other country than that of the neutral, the occurrence of intermediate circumstances, might fairly lead to the inference that there was no present intention to apply the vessel to the purpose of war, which in my mind is an essential element in ascribing a belligerent character to that which might otherwise have remained a purely commercial transaction.

An expedition of this kind being an undoubted violation of nentrality, every one Duty of neutral will agree that it is the duty of the neutral Government, if it knows that such expedi- Government. tion is about to leave its waters, to use due diligence to prevent it. Nor does the duty of the neutral Government end here. It is also its duty to use due diligence to make itself informed as to the true character and destination of a vessel, where there is reasonable ground to suspect that such character and destination are unlawful.

The duty of the neutral Government in this respect appears to me to involve three things: first, that the law of the neutral shall be sufficient to enable the Executive to prevent breaches of its duties as a neutral; secondly, that, where its application is called for, the law shall be put in farce honestly and in good faith; thirdly, that all proper and legitimate means shall be used to detect an intended violation of the law, so as by the application of the law to prevent it.

Having thus seen what is the present state of international law, according to the American Having thus seen what is the present state of international law, according to the views of leading jurists and the practice of nations, more especially that of England argument as to views of leading jurists and the practice of nations, more especially that of England argument as to effect of Foregon and America, the parties to the present dispute, we are enabled to form an opinion as effect of Foregu to how far the assertion in the Case of the United States that the English Foreign Enlistment Act, which, going far beyond the restraints which international law imposes on the neutral subject, prohibits even the fitting-out and equipping of vessels for the purpose of war, is only a recognition of daties imposed by international law. The proposition is altogether untenable.

It is, in the first place, altogether at variance with what we know historically to have been the origin both of the American Acts of 1794 and 1818, and of the British Act of 1819, to say that either of these Acts arose out of, or was passed to prevent, the building or equipping or arming of ships of war to be sold to a belligerent.

The American Act of 1794 was passed in consequence of the proceedings of the British and French Envoy and Consuls in the United States, on the breaking out of the war between American Acts. Great Britain and France, in procuring privateers to be fitted out and manned by American citizens, and furnishing them with letters of marque as privateers. It was not a question of fitting out ships to be sold to the French Government, but of fitting out American vessels, the property of American owners, and manned by American crews, to prey, under commissions as privateers, upon the commerce of a friendly

In like manner, the American Act of 1818 arose out of the precisely similar conduct of American citizens in fitting out American vessels, manned by American crews, against the commerce of Spain and Portugal, under commissions as privateers from the de facto Governments of the revolted colonies of the two countries.

The Spanish Minister had loudly complained that some thirty vessels, specifically named, the property of American citizens, and belonging to ports of the Union, were thus preying on Spanish commerce.

The Representative of Portugal made similar complaints.

This practice carried on, on so large a scale, created great scandal; and after the complaints had gove on for two years, the Act of 1818 was passed, to put a cheek on it, if possible. This Act, in addition to the enactments of that of 1794, required that a bond in double the value of the ship should be given in the ease of any armed vessel, owned in whole or in part by American citizens, going out of an American port, that the vessel should not be employed against a foreign Government; and gave power to the Collectors of Customs to detain any vessel, built for war, leaving an American port, under certain suspicious circumstances specified in the Act. It is plain that this Statute, like its predecessor, was directed against privateering carried on by American citizens against countries with which the United States were at peace, Building or litting out ships of war for a belligerent had not come into question at that time at all.

In like manner the British Act of 1819 had in view, not the prevention of building or equipping ships for a belligerent, in the way of trade, but the prevention of military or naval expeditions on behalf of the revolted colonies or malcontent subjects of Spain. Its origin is briefly stated in the Report of Lord Tenterden to the Neutrality Laws Commission :-

"The British Foreign Enlistment Act may be said to have arisen from the provision of a Treaty; that with Spain of the 28th of August, 1814.

"This Treaty, or, as it is called, 'Additional Articles to the Treaty of July 5, 1814,' contains the following Article:

"Article III. His Britannic Majesty, being anxious that the troubles and disturbances which unfortunately prevail in the dominions of His Catholic Majesty in America should entirely cease, and the subjects of those provinces should return to their obedience to their lawful Sovereign, engages to take the most effectual measures for preventing his subjects from furnishing arms, ammunition, or any other article to the revolted in America.

"In 1818 the reactionary policy of King Ferdinand, the prohibitory duties imposed by him on British commerce, and the ingratitude with which he treated British efficers and others who had served his cause in Spain, had provoked a great deal of irritation in England; and there was a considerable party in the House of Commons, headed by Sir James Macintosh, who were prepared to support the claims of the Spanish American Colonies to independence.

Expeditions were said to be in preparation for rendering active assistance both to the maleontents in Spain and to the rebels in America, in spite of a Proclamation forbidding such expeditions, which had been published in 1817; and the Government consequently found that it was necessary, in order to keep good faith with Spain and to prevent infractions of British neutrality, to bring in an Act of Parliament to provide for the case which now for the first time arose in modern history, of Great Britain being neutral at the time of a great maritime war."

That it was against armaments going out from the shores of Great Britain that the measure was directed is plain from some of the arguments used by Mr. Canning in the course of the debate on the Bill. Thus he says :-

"If a foreigner should chance to come into any of our ports, and see all this mighty armament equipping for foreign service, he would naturally ask, 'With what nation are you at war?' would be, 'With none.

"'For what purpose, then,' he would say, 'are these troops levied, and by whom?' The reply of course must be. They are not levied by Government; nor is it known for what service they are intended; but, be the service what it may, Government cannot interfere. Would not all that give such a foreigner a high idea of the excellence of the English Constitution? Would it not suggest to him that for all the ordinary purposes of a State there was no Government in England ? Did the honourable and learned gentlemen not think that the allowing of armunents to be litted out in this country against a foreign Power, was a just cause of war t"+

Mr. Robert Grant, another member of the Government, said that-

"Every Government, in its foreign relations, was the representative of the nation to which it belonged, and it was of the highest importance to the peace of nations, that Governments should be so considered. Nations announced their intentions to each other through the medium of their rulers. Hence every State knew where to look for expressions of the will of foreign nations,-where to lean whether war or peace was intended,-where to demand redress for injuries, and where to visit injuries unredressed. But all this system was inverted and thrown into confusion, if the Government might act in one way, and the nation in another. All this system was at an end if, while we were professedly at peace with Spain, she was to be attacked by a large army of military adventurers from our own shores, -a sort of extra-national body—utterly irresponsible—utterly invulnerable, except in their own persons —for whose acts no redress could be demanded of the British Government—who might burn, pillage, and destroy, then find a safe asylum in their own country, and leave us to say, 'We have performed our engagements—we have honourably maintained our neutral character."

But the language of these acts being large enough to embrace a case of the equipping a vessel for a foreign belligerent, the Foreign Enlistment Act has been made available for the purpose of preventing a traffic, which is calculated to cause embarrassment to a Government pressed by the remonstrances of belligerents. And this Act having been so often appealed to and discussed, a notion has sprung up that the equipment of vessels of war, though in the way of trade, is a violation of neutrality, while, in fact, it is only a violation of the municipal law.

Mr. Dana, in the passage before cited, puts the matter on the right ground.

Again, it is idle to contend that alterations in the law, since made by statute, to give As to effect of a greater power to the Executive in dealing with suspected vessels, are to be taken as Act of 1870. the measure of the obligations incumbent on the British Government by international law. Catching at a few words in the Report of the Royal Commissioners, who, in recommending certain statutory additions to the law, ald : " In making the foregoing recommendations we have not felt ourselves bound to consider whether we were exceeding what could actually be required by international law, but we are of opinion that if those recommendations should be adopted, the municipal law of this realm available for the enforcement of neutrality will derive increased efficiency, and will, so far as we can see, have been brought into full conformity with your Majesty's international obligations,"—the United States desire that it shall be taken, notwithstanding hat the Commissioners expressly say that their recommendations are independent of any considerations of international law, that these statesmen and learned jurists meant that without these additions the law of England failed to come up to the exigencies of international law. Such an argument is really undeserving of serious

Equally unfounded is the assertion that the provisions of the Foreign Eulistment Act are only a statutory declaration of the common law of England. The enactment of that statute could only be declaratory of the common law, if co-extensive with the obligations of international law; whereas, in fact, it went far beyond them. The opinion of the judges, pronounced as far back as the beginning of the last century, that even the sale of armed ships was not contrary to the law of England, shows the rashness and the incorrectness of this assertion.

But it is claimed on behalf of the United States that, whether the Foreign Enlistment Act was, or was not, more than co-extensive with international obligations, on beligerent by the United States were entitled, irrespectively of the Rule of the Treaty of Washington, municipal law. question whether, where the municipal law of the neutral is more stringent than the international law, a belligerent can elaim, as of right, the putting in force of the municipal law in his behalf, and make the omission to do so a ground of grievance, as founding a right of redress at the hands of a neutral Government. A few short considerations will serve to dispose of this question, which, indeed, seems to answer

When a Government makes its municipal law more stringent than the obligations of international law would require, it does so, not for the benefit of foreign States, but for its own protection, lest the acts of its subjects in overstepping the confines, oftentimes doubtful, of strict right, in transactions of which a few circumstances, more or less, may alter the character, should compromise its relations with other nations. It was in this spirit and with this object that the Foreign Enlistment Act was passed, as is shown by its preamble, which is in the following terms:-

"Whereas the enlistment or engagement of His Majesty's subjects to serve in war in foreign service, without His Majesty's licence, and the fitting out and equipping and arming of vessels by His Majesty's subjects, without His Majesty's licence, for warfike operations in or against the dominions or sales of any foreign Prince, State, Potentiale, or persons exercising or assuming to exercise the powers of Government in or over any foreign country, colony, province, or part of any province or against the ships, goods, or merchandize of any foreign Prince, State, Potentate, or persons as atoresaid, or their subjects, may be prejudicial to and tend to endanger the grace and welfare of this kingdom: And whereas the laws in force are not sufficiently effectual for preventing the same:"-

Now, it is quite clear that the obligations of the neutral State spring out of, and are determined by, the principles and rules of international law, independently of the municipal law of the neutral. They would exist exactly the same, though the neutral State had no municipal law to enable it to enforce the duties of neutrality on its subjects. It would obviously afford no answer on the part of a neutral Government to a complaint of a belligerent of an infraction of neutrality, that its municipal law was insufficient to enable it to insure the observance of neutrality by its subjects; the reason being that international law, not the municipal law of the particular country, gives the only measure of international rights and obligations. While, therefore, on the one hand, the municipal law, if not co-extensive with the international law, will afford no excuse to the neutral, so neither, on the other, if in excess of what international obligations exact, will it afford any right to the belligerent which international law would fail to give to him.

In one respect, and in one respect only, does the municipal law, when in excess of international law, give a right to the belligerent. Equality being of the essence of neutrality, he has a right to insist that the neutral subject shall equally be compelled to keep within the municipal law in dealing with the adversary as when dealing with himself. A belligerent is also beyond question perfectly at liberty to urge upon the neutral Government, in the way of solicitation or even of remonstrance, to enforce the municipal law; but so long as it is not enforced against himself he has no right to redress, because it is not put in force against his enemy.

I am at a loss exactly to understand for what purpose these points have been brought forward, and so strenuously insisted on in the American arguments. For, the rule prescribed to us by the Treaty, and to the benefit of which the United States are, therefore, entitled at our hands, is in the very terms of the Foreign Enlistment Act. I presume the purpose was to create a foundation for the imputation against Great Britain of not having acted in good faith. In that respect I may have to advert to these arguments again. For my present purpose it is enough to have cleared the ground of them.

Effect of Proclamation.

In like manner when it is sought, in the Case of the United States, to make the Queen's Proclamation of neutrality the measure of the international obligations of her subjects, every lawyer ought to know that this is to give to a Royal Proclamation an authority which it does not possess. The purpose of such a Proclamation, used only in great conjunctures, is to remind the subject of the provisions of the law, and to warm him against breaking it; and if, after such warning, a man offends against the law, has offence is aggravated by the fact that he has set the injunctions of the Sovereign at defiance; but such a Proclamation cannot make or add to the law, or after it in the smallest particular. The Proclamation of 1861 was in the accustomed form. It drew attention to the enactments of the Foreign Enlistment Act, and warned all persons subject to British law that, if they did any acts in contravention of that Act, or in violation of the law of nations—as by culisting in the military service, or serving in any ship of war or transport, of the contending parties; or going or engaging to go beyond the seas for the purpose of enlisting, or procuring, or attempting to procure, within Her Majesty's dominions, others to do so; or fittingout, arming, or equipping any vessel to be employed as a ship of war, or privateer, or transport, by either of the contending parties; or by breaking or endeavouring to break any blockade lawfully and actually established by or on behalf of either of the said contending parties; or by carrying officers, soldiers, despatches, arms, military stores, or materials, or any article or articles considered and deemed to be contraband of war, according to the law or modern usage of nations, for the use or service of either of the contending parties—all persons so offending would incur and be liable to the several penalties and penal consequences by the said Statute or by the law of nations in that behalf imposed or denounced. The Queen's subjects are further warned that all persons entitled to Her protection, if they should misconduct themselves in the premises, would do so at their peril and of their own wrong, and that they would in nowise obtain any protection from Her Majesty against any liabilities or penal consequences.

The effect is that persons are warned that infractions of the Foreign Enlistment Act will be visited with the penalties of that statute, while acts within the penalties of international law will be liable to those penalties (namely, seizure and confiscation of property), and that against the latter penalties no protection from the Crown must be expected.

But the Proclamation contains no prohibition of these latter acts, namely, dealing in contraband of war, or breaking blockade; nor, if it did, would such prohibition make such acts an offence; such a Proclamation has never been understood by British statesmen or lawyers as making either of these things an offence against the municipal law, or as what the Government was called upon to prevent, or would be justified in attempting to prevent.

Nor have similar Proclamations of Presidents of the United States been dealt with as imposing additional obligations on American citizens, or as subjecting them to

Though of opinion that Her Majesty's Government were quite right in saying Contraction of that the Rules laid down by the Treaty are not such as international law would Rules of Treaty. have prescribed at the time these claims arose, I agree that we are bound by the Rules, and that it is our duty to give full effect to them in dealing with these claims. However great and unexampled the concession made by Great Britain in consenting to be bound, in respect of past in a runational obligations, by rules which had no existence in international law when the breaches of neutral obligations complained of are alleged to have occurred, I still think that we must proceed in this inquiry as though the Rules of the Treaty had been, either by international law or by convention between the two countries, binding on Great Britain at the time of the civil war. I cannot but concur with Mr. Evarts that we must give the same effect to those Rules as regards the past as we should give to them if dealing with a case which had arisen since they were agreed to by the two nations, nor do 1 indeed understand this proposition to be disputed by the Counsel on the part of Great Britain. The question is whether due diligence was used by the British Government to satisfy the exigency of the obligations prescribed I proceed then to consider what is this "due diligence," which the British Govern- Due diligence ment admits that it was bound to apply to prevent the fitting-out and equipping of the what?

I apprehend that such diligence would be neither greater nor less than any other neutral Government would be bound to apply to the preventing of any breach by its subjects of any head of neutral duty prescribed by international law.

The difficulty of the position is, that the question has not hitherto come within the range of juridical discussion on subjects connected with international law. Hitherto, where a Government has acted in good faith, availing itself fairly of such means as were at its disposal, it has not been usual to consider it responsible to a belligerent Government for acts of its subjects that might have cluded its vigilance, or that the degree of diligence exercised by it should be submitted to judicial appreciation. And no country has insisted more strongly on this as the limit of national responsibility than that of the United States. We must endeavour to find a solution for ourselves.

As I have already observed, I cannot agree that the question of what is "due diligence" should be left to the unassisted mind of each individual arbitrator; nor can I agree that the solution is to be found in the facts of each individual case; and though judges may be often disposed to apply the maxim, to which our honourable though judges may be often disposed to apply the maxim, to which our nonourable President has more than once referred, ex facto jus oritur, it is, I think, one which must not be pushed too far. I agree with M. Troplong, who, writing on this subject with reference to civil law, after referring to the different opinions of jurists on the subject of diligence, says :-

Il est vrai que jusqu'à présent les Tribunaux se sont montrés assez indifférents sur ces disputes de la claire; mais peut-être pourrait-on leur faire le reproche de n'avoir amorti la vivacisé de la question, qu'en étouffant tout ce qui est discussion de système et point de droit, sous la commode interprétation des faits, et sous un équitable mais facile arbitraire. Néanmoins, dans cette matière, magistrat, elles font luire de précieuses lumières pour ceux qui ont mission de discuter sur les faits et magistrat, elles tont turre de precieuses numeres pour ceux qui ont mussion de discuter sur les auts et de les juger. Ces règles m'ont paru simples et judicieuses; je vuis les exposer comme je les entends; dans tous les cas, et dussé-je me tramper, je prie le lecteur de ne pas m'adresser, comme fin de non-receour, le reproche de me livrer à d'oiseuses digressions. De tous les systèmes, le moins exensable, à cecour, le reproche de me livrer à d'oiseuses digressions. De tous les systèmes, le moins exensable, à mon avis, c'est celui qui, sous prétexte de fuir l'esprit de système, se fait une loi de n'en avoir ancun."*

It seems to me, therefore, right, before proceeding to deal with the facts, to seek in the domain of general jurisprudence for principles to guide us in judging how far the obligations of Great Britain have or have not been satisfied.

Diligentia and

No branch of law has been the subject of more discussion among juridical writers than that of diligentia and its correlative culpa, the latter being neither more nor less than the absence of the former. I was prepared to expect, from the able men who have prepared the pleadings of the United States, some assistance to guide us to right conclusions as to the standard of diligence required of a neutral Government for insuring the obedience of its subjects in matters of neutrality. But after a vague statement that "the extent of the diligence required to escape responsibility is, by all authorities, gauged by the character and magnitude of the matter which it may effect, by the relative condition of the parties, by the ability of the party incurring the liability to exercise the diligence required by the exigencies of the case, and by the extent of the injury which may follow negligence,"* the only authority cited in any detail is that of an obsolete author, whose exposition of the Roman law has been exploded by modern science. After this, the Case breaks out into the following vague and declamatory statement, not of what the law is, but of what the United States' Government desire it shall be understood to be:—

"The United States understand that the diligence which is called for by the Rules of the Treav of Washington is a due diligence; that is, a diligence proportioned to the magnitude of the subject and to the dignity and strength of the Power which is to exercise it;—a diligence which shall, by the use of active vigilance, and of all the other means in the power of the neutral, through all stages of the transaction, prevent its soil from being violated;—a diligence that shall in like tourner deter designing men from committing acts of war upon the soil of the neutral against its will, and thus possibly dragging it into a war which it would avoid;—a diligence which prompts the neutral to the most energed measures to discover any purpose of doing the acts forbidden by its good faith as a neutral, and imposs upon it the obligation, when it receives the knowledge of an intention to commit such acts, to use all the means in its power to prevent it.

"No diligence short of this would be 'dne;' that is, commensurate with the energency or with the magnitude of the results of negligence. Understanding the words in this sense, the United States find them identical with the measure of duty which Great Britain had previously admitted."

This is, of course, to beg the whole question in dispute. But it is obvious that a matter of so much importance, as lying at the very root of this inquiry, requires a more logical and precise consideration than the foregoing rhetorical statement presents.

Opinions of Jurists. The jurists of the seventeenth century, among whom Vinnius occupies a prominent place,‡ divided the diligentia and corresponding culpa of the Roman law into three degrees. Thus we have culpa lata, levis, levissima, taking the intermediate degree, or culpa levis, as being the absence of the diligence which a man of ordinary prudence and care would apply in the management of his own affairs in the given circumstances of the case. Though attacked by Donellus, this tripartite division of diligence and default held is ground among juridical writers for a considerable time; but on the formation of the French Code, the practical good sense of those by whom that great work was carried out, so visible in their discussions, induced them to discard it, and to establish one common standard of diligence or care as applicable to all cases of civil obligation, namely, that of the "bon père de famille," the "diligens paterfamilias" of the Roman digest. The Code Napoléon has been followed in the Codes of other countries. Among others, the Austrian Code has lately adopted the same principle, §

The juridical view, too, of the earlier writers was not destined to stand its ground. After it had been assailed by Thibaud and Von Lohr, Hassé, in a most learned and able treatise, "Die Culpa des Römischen Rechts," thoroughly exposed its unsoundness, and his views have since been followed by a series of German jurists, including Professor Mommsen in his well-known work "Beiträge zum Obligationsreelit."

French authors have for the most part taken the same view. Commentators on the Code, Duranton, Ducarroy, Troplong, and lastly M. Demolombe, in his great work the "Cours du Code Civil," have agreed that there can only be one standard for the diligence required in the affairs of life, where the interests of others are concerned, namely, that of men of ordinary capacity, prudence, and care.

"Qu'est ce que la diligence d'un bon père de famille ?" asks M. Troplong :—•

"C'est la diligence de celui qui, comme le dit Heineccius, tient le milieu entre l'avare aux cent yeux, et l'homme négligent et dissipé. C'est dans le système dont M. Ducarroy est l'organe, et que j'udopte pleinement, la diligence qu'un individu, aussi diligent que les hommes le sont ordinairement, apporte à la pleinement, la duigence qu'un monviau aussi aungent que les nommes le sont orangarement, apparte a la conservation de ce qui lui appartient. On voit qu'en ce point les deux systèmes se rencontrent, et conduisent à une même définition, c'est-à-dire, à ce juste milieu qui est dans la nature de l'humanité."

"The only thing to be considered," says Professor Mommsen, "is whether the default is such as does not occur to a diligent father of family in general." to be taken is 'qualem diligens paterfamilias suis rebus adhibere solet.'''

After distinguishing between culpa in criminal and in civil cases, the same learned writer says :-

"It is important, therefore, not so much to distinguish the degree of culpu, but rather to decide the starting point at which responsibility for inattention and negligence commences.

starting-point in which responsibility for inaccention and negligence commences.

^a This starting-point is settled according to one rule for all those cases in which there exists, not a simple responsibility for dolas (and culpa lata), but where culpa is to be imputed; culpa being admitted. in those cases where the conduct falls short of the measures which a diligens paterfamilias is in the

"Only under some few obligatory conditions is a decision more favourable to the debtor admissible, in so far that in these cases he is allowed to excuse himself from the responsibility, by proof that in his own affairs ho is by habit equally negligent."

"The ordinary conduct of an intelligent, prudent, and careful Haus-Vater, of a bonus et diligens paterfamilias," says Rivier in the Rechtslexicon of Holzendorff, alfords the normal measure of the obligation of diligence. He who so conducts binself is in general free from all reproach. If he acts otherwise he is in culpa and

"The measure," says Dr. Windscheid, "by which to determine whether particular conduct is open to the charge of negligence, or not, is the conduct of men in a Culpa leris consists in the omission of that care which an attentive and judicious head of a family regularly observes (diligratia diligratis patrisfamilius). The want of this care, this kind of culpa is generally understood, when speaking merely of oversight, of culpa simply. The observance color, is generally understood, when speaking merely of oversiger, or cusps samply. The observance of a higher degree of care than this is not required; this is the lightest offence for which a man can be made responsible; a cusps berssima, going beyond culps beris, does not exist either according to general or to Austrian Law. The culps beris forms the boundary of responsibility, it is by itself omeis on the other side of this limit begins the province of accident, for which the actors are not held

The Civil Code treats of this culpa levis in § 1297, where it states the highest degree of diligence and attention required to be that 'which can be exercised by ordinary capacities.' The omission of this care forms the lightest offence for which any one can be held responsible. By the diligence and attention 'which can be exercised by ordinary capacities' must, however, be understood what, in nother place, the Code calls the attention 'of a trusty and diligent head of a family,' the care 'of a good householder.'

Stubenrauch in his Commentary on the Austrian Code treats the whole subject of culpa with much ability and learning. He ends by saying :-

"It is to be assumed that every man, who is in possession of his faculties, is capable of that degree of diligence and attention which can be exercised by men of ordinary capacity. Whoever by the absence of this diligence and care causes injury to another, incurs liability."

Mr. Justice Story, with the good sense which characterizes his writings, says:-

"Common or ordinary diligence is that degree of diligence which men in general exert in respect otheir own concerns. It may be said to be the common prudence which men of business and heads of families usually exhibit in affairs which are interesting to them; or, as Sir William Jones has expressed it, it is the care which every person of common prudence and capable of governing a family akes of his own concerns. It is obvious that this is adopting a very variable standard, for it still aves much ground for doubt as to what is common prindence, and who is capable of governing a unily. But the difficulty is intrinsic in the nature of the subject, which admits of an approximation maily. But the difficulty is intrinsic in the nature of the singlet, which admits of an approximation ally to certainty. Indeed, what is common or ordinary diligence is more a matter of fact than of law, and in every community it must be judged of by the actual state of society, the habits of business, the general usages of life, and the changes, as well as the institutions, peculiar to the age. So that, although it may not be possible to lay down any very exact rule, applicable to all times and all circumstances, yet that may be said to be common or ordinary diligence in the sense of the law which men of common prudence generally exercise about their own affairs in the age and country in which they live. It will thener follow, that in different times and in different countries the standard is necessarily variable with respect to the facts, although it may be uniform with respect to the principle; so that it may happen that the same acts which, in one country, or in one age, may be deemed negligent acts, may, at another time or in another country, be justly deemed an exercise of ordinary diligence.

"What is usually done by pradent men in a particular country in respect to things of a like nature, whether it be more or less, in point of diligence, than what is exacted in another country, becomes in fact the general measure of diligence."*

The same standard is, in practice, applied in the English law. The older anthorities, indeed, speak of three degrees of negligence, and of "gross" negligence as being necessary in some cases to found liability; but the tendency of modern decisions has been to apply in all cases the sound practical rule that in determining the question of negligence, the true test is whether there has been, with reference to the particular subject matter, that reasonable degree of diligence and care which a man of ordinary prudence and capacity might be expected to exercise in the same circumstances. (See what is said by Tindal, L. C. J., in Vaughan v. Menlow (3 B. N. C., 475); by Parke, B., in Wyld v. Pickford (8 M. and W., 461); by Cresswell, J., in Austin v. Manchester, Sheffield and Lincolnshire Railway (10 C. B., 454); and by Rolfe, B., in Wilson v. Brett (11 M. and W., 115).

While, however, I thus seek in the writings of jurists, and the law of different nations, some standard for the measure of diligence, I readily concede that the application of that standard must depend on the circumstances of each individual case, and on the view which the Judge may, in his conscience, form of how far the conduct of the individual complained of may or may not have been that which ordinary prudence and sense of duty would have prescribed. I entirely agree with what is said by the learned editors of Zachariae's "Droit Civil Français," on Article 1137 of the French Code:—

"L'Article 1137 se résume en un Conseil aux Juges de n'avoir ni trop de rigneur ni trop d'indulgence, et de ne demander au débiteur que les soins raisonnablement dus à la chose qu'il est chargé de conserver, on de faire, soit à raison de sa nature, soit à raison des circonstances variables à l'infini qui modifient son obligation pour la rendre ou plus large ou plus étroite."†

What is here said by the learned editors of Zachariæ appears to me to afford the true criterion. It is for the Judge to determine, according to the best of his judgment, with reference to the facts of the particular case, and with reference to the thing to be done or left undone, whether what has been done, or left undone, as the case may be, has been what could reasonably and justly have been expected from a person of ordinary capacity and prudence in the affairs of life. More than this is not to be expected.

Same principle applied to Government.

I have cited these authorities because, in the absence of any reference to the question of diligence among writers on international law, it seems to me that the principle that prevails as to men's conduct in the affairs of life may by analogy be well applied to the discharge of its duties by a Government. Applying this standard, one nation has a right to expect from another, in the fulfilment of its international obligations, the amount of diligence which may reasonably be expected from a wellregulated, wise, and conscientious Government, according to its institutions, and is ordinary mode of conducting its affairs; but it has no right to expect more. The assertion of the obligation of a neutral Government, as stated in the American Case, -that "the diligence is to be proportioned," not only to "the magnitude of the subject," but also to "the dignity and strength of the Power which is to execute it"as though there could be one measure of diligence for a powerful State, and another for a weak one—a diligence "which shall prevent its soil from being violated"—which "shall deter designing men, &c."—thus making the neutral Government answerable for the event-and "which prompts to the most energetic measures"-appears to me much too extensive, and altogether inadmissible.

The diligence required of a Government to prevent infractions of neutrality may relate (1) to the state of its municipal law; (2) to the means possessed by it to prevent

As to the law, the subject may be divided into the prohibitive law, or, as it is Law. termed in the American Case, the punitive law, and the preventive law, that is, the law whereby the Government is armed with the power and means of prevention.

As regards the prohibitive or punitive law, no difficulty can arise. It is plain that to satisfy the exigency of due diligence, and to escape liability, a neutral Government must take care not only that its numicipal law shall prohibit acts contravening that is to say, of such as may reasonably be expected to deter persons from offending against it.

As regards the preventive law, doubtless a Government should be armed by law Means at disposal with power to prevent an infraction of the law, when it knows, or has reasonable of Government. ground to believe, that such infraction is about to take place.

But when we come to the question of the means which by law should be placed at the disposal of the Government, difficulties of a very formidable character immediately present themselves.

The more despotic and unlimited the power of a Government, the more efficacious will be the means at its command for preventing acts which it is desired to prevent.

Is this a reason, in a country where absolute and unlimited power is unknown, where every power is exercised in subordination to the law, and where for any interference by the Government with the rights of person or property, redress may immediately be sought, for investing the Executive with an absolute and irresponsible power, at variance with the whole tenour and spirit of the national institutions, in order to protect a belligerent from the possibility of injury from a violation of neutrality?

Again, a nation has a system of procedure which is in harmony with its institutions, and with which it is satisfied. According to that system, persons against whom the law is to be put in force cannot be subjected to be interrogated in order to establish their criminality. Proof must first be produced, from which, while it remains manswered, a presumption of guilt arises, before they can be called upon for a defence. Because a different system might be more efficacious in enabling the Government to establish a case for confiscating a suspected vessel, for the protection of a belligerent, is the legislature called upon to change the law because other nations become involved in war?

Again, the government of a country has been carried on for years according to an established system of official routine. This system may be somewhat complicated, and may render the action of the Executive less speedy than it might otherwise be. But it is safe, and has been found to work sufficiently well in carrying on the affairs of the nation at home and abroad. Because a more rapid and a more direct action on the point to be reached might be obtained by a simplification of the official unachinery, is a Government to be held guilty of negligence, because, not foreseeing what was about to happen, it had not altered its ministerial arrangements accordingly?

A Government, in all matters involving legal consideration, is in the habit of consulting and acting under the advice of lawyers specially appointed to advise it. The purpose is the laudable one of insuring the perfect legality of the proceedings of the Government; but this advantage necessarily involves some loss of time, during which the action of the Executive is for the moment suspended. Is this practice inconsistent with the diligence required of a neutral Government? Honestly intending to do what was right, is it to be held responsible because a vessel equipped for war has taken advantage of such a delay, though perhaps, in the particular instance, accidentally prolonged?

I can only answer these questions in the negative. I do so on the ground, as to some of them, that they are things which no Government could reasonably be asked to do; as to all, that they were not such things as a Government of ordinary prudence and sagacity, carrying on its affairs in the usual way in which the affairs of Governments are carried on, could have foreseen the necessity of providing for.

Passing from the law, and the means which the law should place at the disposal Action of of a Government, to enable it to repress intended violations of neutrality on the part Government of its subjects, to the action of the Government in the use of such means, it seems to me that two things are incumbent on a Government:—

1st. That it shall use due diligence to inform itself, by the use of the means at its disposal, whether a violation of the law is about to be committed; and,

2ndly. That being satisfied of the fact, it shall use due diligence in applying its means and power of prevention.

These conditions honestly and bond fide satisfied, no Government, as it seems to me, can be held liable for the acts of its subjects, but such acts must be deemed to be beyond the reach of any control which it can reasonably be expected to exercise.

But here questions of great importance, and of equal difficulty, present themselves:—

(1.) Is a Government, intending faithfully to discharge its duty towards another Government, to be held responsible for a mere error of judgment? As for instance in thinking a vessel not liable, in point of law, to seizure, when in fact she was so; or in thinking the evidence in a particular case insufficient when it was sufficient.

(2.) Is a Government wanting in due diligence if it declines to seize a vessel at the instance of a belligerent, when properly satisfied that, though there may be circumstances of a suspicious character, the only evidence which can be adduced will not justify the seizure before the law, and that the vessel will therefore be released ?"

(3.) Having seized a vessel and brought the matter before the proper legal authority, is a Government to be held responsible because, through some mistake of the Court, either of law or fact, there has been a miscarriage of justice?

(4.) Is it to be answerable for accidental delay, through which an opportunity becomes afforded to a vessel to evade the eventual decision of the Government to seize her ?

(5.) Is a Government to be held responsible for error of judgment in its subordinate officers, especially when these officers are at great distance, and not acting under its immediate control? Is it, under such circumstances, to be answerable for their possible negligence, or even for their miscondnet?

These are matters of infinite importance to neutral nations, who may be drawn within the vortex of wars in which they have no concern, if they are not only to be harassed and troubled by the demands and importunities of jealous and angry belligerents, but are, in addition, to be held responsible—to the extent, perhaps, of millions—for errors of judgment, accidental delay, indicial mistake, or misconduct of subordinate officers, acting not only without their sanction, but possibly in direct contravention of their orders.

We are not informed whether the two Governments have, in compliance with the pledge contained in the Treaty of Washington, invited other nations to adopt its rules; but if it is to be established that these rules carry with them a liability so extensive, I should very much doubt whether such an invitation, if made, would be attended with much success.

Any decision of this Tribunal founded on such a liability would have the effect, I should imagine, of making maritime nations look upon belligerent Powers with very considerable dread.

It is to be remembered that a Government cannot be taken to guarantee the event; in other words, to be answerable at all hazards and under all circumstances for a breach of neutrality by a subject, if it occurs. In spite of the law, and of the vigorous administration of the law, offences will take place, and neither at home nor abroad can rulers be held, under all circumstances, answerable to those who suffer from them. All that can be expected of the Government of a country is that it shall possess reasonable means to prevent offences, and use such means honestly and diligently for the benefit of those who are entitled to its protection. The terms of the Treaty, which require no more than "due diligence," exclude all notion of an absolute unconditional responsibility. This is evidently the meaning of an observation of the British Counsel at the close of the fifth section of his Argument on "due diligence," which the President of the Tribunal appears to have found some difficulty in understanding.

This being so, I have some difficulty in saying that a Government, aeting in good faith, and desiring honestly to fulfil its obligations, can be held liable for errors of judgment, unless indeed these are of so patent a character as to amount to crassa negligentia.

Prolonged and unnecessary delay is, in the very nature of things, incompatible

But delay, within reasonable limits, honestly intended for the with diligence. investigation of facts or the due consideration of the proper course to be pursued, is not so. Delay arising simply from accident ought not to be imputed as negligence. Accident can never be made the ground of an imputation of negligence, though it may found a legal claim where a party is in mord.

As regards the seizure of a vessel under the Foreign Enlistment Act, with a Scizure of vessels. knowledge that the evidence would be insufficient to justify it, I hold that such a seizure, whether for the purpose of furthering the ends of a belligerent, or because some suspicion might attach to the vessel, would have been unjustifiable both in policy and

For no Government can be called upon to institute legal proceedings under such circumstances. Every Government prosecution, which ends in failure, is, in itself, productive of mischief. It lessens the authority of the Executive by making it appear to have acted harshly and unjustly, and creates sympathy, perhaps unmerited, for parties against whom its efforts have been directed, and who have escaped from its pursuit. It impairs the authority of the law, by leading to the belief that it may be infringed with impunity, thereby holding out encouragement to crime. A government would be acting in violation of the spirit of the Constitution, as well as against law and right, if it seized a vessel, the property of a subject, unless it believed such vessel to be justly and legally liable to condemnation on legal and sufficient proof. Moreover, such a proceeding would be useless as well as arbitrary. The Government would be unable to defer indefinitely the decision of the question, but, on the contrary, would be bound to submit the case to the proper tribunal at the earliest practicable moment. In the ease supposed, the result would necessarily be that the vessel must be released

It must be borne in mind that the British Government possesses no despotic or arbitrary power. It could neither assume nor exercise such a power, even to protect a belligerent or maintain its own neutrality.

As regards any miscarriage of justice in matters within the sphere of the Judicial mismunicipal law, it appears to me utterly out of the question to hold that a Govern-carriage. ment, having done what in it lay,—as by seizing a vessel, and bringing it properly before the competent Court—ean be held liable because, through some mistake or accident, justice may have been defeated.

A breach of the law having been committed in the equipping or arming of a vessel for belligerent purposes, all that the Government could do under the Foreign Enlistment Act, was to seize the delinquent vessel and bring it into a proper Court for condemnation. This done, and the evidence of the facts in such a case having been submitted by the public prosecutor to the Court, the functions of the Government are at an end. It can do no more. The rest is with the law. In England, in America, in every well-constituted and well-regulated State, the executive and judiciary powers are separated by a broad and impassable barrier. There is no authority in the State, however high, that would venture to interfere with the discharge of the judicial office It would be considered a violation of the most sacred principles, and an outrage on all propriety, to seek to control, or even to influence directly or indirectly, the decision of a Judge, even of the most inferior tribunal.

This being so, the Government of a neutral cannot justly or reasonably be held responsible for all the mischief which a vessel, equipped in violation of its law, may do throughout the course of, possibly, a protracted war, because a suit, which it has properly instituted, fails through a mistake of the Judge. To decide in the affirmative would be to establish a rule hitherto unknown, and calculated to impose on neutral States a degree of responsibility altogether unprecedented and unheard of.

As regards liability for the acts or omissions of subordinate officers, it seems to me, Liability for acts that, while a Government may properly be held responsible for what is done, or of subordinates. omitted to be done, by its orders, or under its own immediate control, it would be most unreasonable to hold it answerable for the acts or negligences of subordinates, at all events unless it afterwards ratifies and adopts what these may have done.

In the matter of civil rights, individuals may be liable for the negligence of those to whom they depute the conduct of their affairs; but, considering the complicated machinery of political government, especially when distant Colonies and dependencies are concerned, and the consequent necessity of employing subordinate officers, it would be unreasonable and unjust to hold that the negligence of a subordinate, more especially from mere error of judgment, as, for instance, in allowing a vessel to take too much coal, was a want of "due diligence" on the part of the Government for which it can justly be held liable.

The following passage from the British Counter-Case sums up so well the different sides of this question that I do not hesitate to produce it at length:—

"That due diligence requires a Government to use all the means in its power, is a proposition true in one sense, false in another; true, if it means that the Government is bound to exert honestly and with reasonable care and activity the means at its disposal; false, impracticable, and absurd, if it means that a liability arises whenever it is possible to show that an hour has been lost which might have been gained, or an accidental delay incurred which neight, by the utmost foresight, have been prevented; that an expedient which might have succeeded has not been tried; that means of obtaining information which are deemed unworthy or improper have not been resorted to; or that the exertions of an officer or servant of Government have not been taxed to the atmost limit of his physical capacity.

"Nor can we fail to observe that, in proportion as we extend the duty of prevention incumbent on neutral Governments, from hostile enterprises which are open and flagrant to acts of a more doubful character which border on the line betwixt the lawful and the unlawful, it becomes more and more difficult to exact from the neutral, in the performance of that duty, peculiar and extraordinary vigilance and activity. The duty of preventing the open assembling within neutral territory of an armed hostile expedition against a neighbouring country is plain and obvious, and requires only a prompt exercise of adequate force. But it is otherwise when we come to acts of a different class, the criminality of which depends on a latent intention; such, for example, as the mere procuring for belligerent purposes from the yards of a neutral shipbuilder, whose ordinary business it is to build ships of all kinds for customers of all nations, a vessel with some special adaptation for war. There is nothing in the relation of a nentral to a belligerent to cast on the former the duty of exercising within his own territory a constant and minute espionage over ordinary transactions of commerce for the protection of the latter. This relation, always onerons to the neutral, is at the same time, it must be remembered, purely involuntary on his part. It is forced on him by the quarrels of his neighbours in which he has no concern, or by their internal discords when those discords break out into civil war."*

While I readily admit that the measure of diligence which a Government applies to the affairs it has to administer, if the ordinary course of its administration is negligent and imperfect, is not necessarily to be taken—any more than it would be in the case of an individual—as the measure of diligence which it is to apply in the discharge of international obligations, yet credit should be given to a Government for a properly diligent discharge of public duty.

Furthermore, if a given law and a particular system of administration have been found by practical experience sufficient to protect the interests of the Government in the important matter of the public revenue, and also to ensure the observance of neutral duties on the occasion of all former wars, surely it is highly unreasonable and unjust to condemn the whole system as defective, and the Government as negligent for not having amended it in anticipation of future events.

It must not be forgotten, that since the passing of the British statute, wars have occurred in all parts of the world, but no complaints of the violation of that statute have occurred till American citizens had recourse to new modes of defeating or evading it.

Such, in my opinion, are the principles by which we should be guided in deciding whether Great Britain has or has not failed to satisfy the requirements of due diligence. I proceed to apply them to the different heads of complaint preferred by the United States.

Municipal Law of Great Britain. One main head of complaint on their part is that the municipal law of Great Britain, as contained in the Foreign Enlishment Act, was insufficient to enable the British Government to enforce the observance of the duties of neutrality by its subjects. We have first a general condemnation of English Acts of Parliament. "English Acts," we are told, "are so overloaded with a mass of phrases, alike unprecise and confused, with so much of tedious superfluity of immaterial circumstances, as if they were specially de. gned to give scope to bar chiennery, to facilitate the escape of offenders, and to embarrass and confound the officers of the Government charged with the administration of law. Such, indeed, has been the ordinary complexion of the legislation of Great Britain, and this style of complex verbosity of legislation has unhappily been transmitted to the United States." But then we have the satisfaction of learning that "there it begins to encounter steady efforts of reformation, which are conspicuous in the legislation of many of the American States.

But then we have counter steady efforts of of the American States.

Of the Foreign Enlistment Act we are told that "Its practical inefficiency was glaringly apparent on the face of all the relative diplomatic correspondence between Great Britain and the United States."

That it was "valueless, except as occasion should arise to make it serve as a pretext to cover, in diplomatic communication with other Governments, indifference, unfriendly or hostile animus, on the part of some British Minister.'

British Ministers are represented as "floundering along in the flat morass of the meaningless verbosity and confused circumlocution of an Act of Parliament." They are represented as having been "compelled to drift into the condition of foreign war rather than break free from the entanglement of the cobweb meshes of that Act."

It strikes me that those who address us in this strange style must suppose us to be ignorant that the English Act of 1819 was framed on the model of the American Act of 1818; that it is, in the main, identical in language, and is, in one, and that an important particular, more stringent than its predecessor.

The English Act, in the part of it with which we are concerned, makes it an Foreign Enlistoffence to "equip, furnish, fit out, or arm, within the United Kingdom or the Queen's ment Act. dominions, without the Royal license first obtained, any ship or vessel, with the intent or in order that such ship or vessel shall be employed in the service of any foreign prince, State or Potentate, or of any foreign colony, province, or part of any province or people, or of any person or persons exercising or assuming to exercise any powers of government in or over any foreign State, colony, province, or part of any province or people, as a transport or storeship, or with intent to cruize or commit hostilities against any prince, &c., &c., with whom the Queen is not at war." To attempt to equip, &c., any such ship or vessel with a like intent, or to procure it to be done, as well as knowingly to aid and assist, or be concerned, in so doing, is equally made an offence. The penalty attached to the offence is fine and imprisonment, or either of them, at the discretion of the Court, and the forfeiture of the vessel, with all its accessories, and of all materials, arms, ammunition and stores, which may be found on board, on the directed to be had "in like manner, and in such courts, as ships and vessels may be prosecuted and condemned for any breach of the laws for the protection of the revenues of Customs and Excise, or of the laws of trade and navigation."

So much for the prohibitive or punitive part of the law. The preventive part Preventive law consists in a provision that the ship or vessel may be seized by any officer of Her Majesty's customs or excise, or any officer of the Royal Navy, who is by law empowered to make seizures for any forfeiture incurred under the revenue laws, or laws relating to trade or navigation within the limits of their particular jurisdictions.

On comparing the enactment relating to the fitting out of ships with the Comparison with corresponding enactment of the American Statute, it will be found that the English American Acts. Act, on which so much vituperative criticism has been lavished, is in fact, as regards the equipment of vessels, more comprehensive and effective than the former. For, while the English Statute makes it an offence to equip or arm, in the disjunctive, by the American Statute the offence consists in litting out and arming, in the conjunctive, thus bringing the vessel a stage further on towards helligerent completion before the law can interpose.

It is true that the Judges in the Court of Exchequer having been divided in opinion, in the case of the Alexandra, as to whether the arming of a vessel was not necessary before the intent that she should be employed for belligerent purposes could he interred, the result in that case was that the more comprehensive enactment of the English Statute failed in its effect. But when it is said, in somewhat strong language, that the effect of the decision in the Alexandra case was to "emasculate" the English Statute, it must be observed that, if such was the case, the effect was only to reduce the English Act to the condition in which the American Statute had been from its birth. I think it unnecessary, on the present occasion, to express any opinion on the question on which the Judges of the Court of Exchequer were divided; I will only, in passing, repeat my conviction that neither the American nor the English Statutes were ever intended to interfere with the execution of orders from belligerents by American or British shiphnilders, but simply to prevent the ports of the respective countries from being used for fitting out privateers, or being made the base of hostile expeditions. But the distinction between equipping and arming, and equipping without arming, is immaterial for the present purpose; for, in point of fact that 145] distinction never created any difficulty in the action of the British Government. In the cases both of the Florida and the Alabama the only question on which the action of the Government was arrested was as to the sufficiency of the evidence of the vessel being intended for the service of a belligerent.

Preventive powers of British and American Acts.

But it is with reference to the preventive powers conferred on the Executive by these acts that the Case and Argument of the United States principally assail the British Statute, and triumphantly assert the superiority of the American Act; maintaining that, while the British Act depends on the sanction of penalties, the American Act places power in the hands of the Executive which effectually secures it against infraction of the law.

Acquainted with the two Acts, I read, I must say, with much surprise, the following passage in the Argument of the United States:—

"The great difference between the two consists in the cardinal fact that the provisions of the British Act are merely punitive, and to be carried into effect only by judicial instrumentality; whereas the American Act is preventive, calls for executive action, and places in the hands of the President of the United States the entire military and naval force of the Government, to be employed by him in his discretion for the prevention of foreign equipments and foreign enlistments in the United States."*

This appears to me a thoroughly inaccurate representation of the effect of the American Act, which, as I understand it, confers no discretionary power on the President, beyond that of employing the military or naval forces of the Republic to support the law, if necessary. Referring to the different violations of neutrality made offences by the Act, the 8th section provides that -

In every case in which a vessel's all be fitted out and armed, or attempted to be fitted out and armed, or in which the force of any vessel of war, cruizer, or other armed vessel, shall be increased or augmented, or in which any military expedition or enterprise shall be begun or set on foot, contrary to the provisions and prohibitions of this Act; and in every case of the capture of a ship or vessel within the jurisdiction or protection of the United States as before defined; and in every case in which any process issuing out of any Court of the United States shall be disobeyed or resisted by any person of persons having the custody of any vessel of war, cruizer, or other armed vessel of any foreign Prince of State, or of any colony, district, or people, or of any subjects or citizens of any foreign Prince or State, or of any colony, district, or people; it shall be lawful for the President of the United States, or such other person as he shall have empowered for that purpose, to employ such part of the land or naval forces of the United States, or of the militia thereof, for the purpose of taking possession of and detaining any such ship or vessel, with her prize or prizes, if any, in order to the execution of the prohibitions and penalties of this Act, and to the restoring the prize or prizes in the cases in what restoration shall have been adjudged, and also for the purpose of preventing the carrying on any such expedition or enterprise from the territories or jurisdiction of the United States against the territories or dominions of any foreign Prince or State, or of any colony, district, or people, with whom the United States are at peace.

To any one who reads this section with any degree of attention, its meaning, l think, must be clear. No arbitrary power is given to the President; nor any power of seizing a vessel at all, except "in order to the execution of the prohibitions and penalties of the Act." No discretionary power whatever is given him except that of using force, where force is required, for overcoming resistance.

The enactment was contained in the original Act of 1794, which was passed shortly after the French Minister, Genet, had set the Government at defiance and threatened to resist by force any attempt to detain a privateer illegally armed in the port of Philadelphia, and after the French Vice-Consul at Boston had actually rescued by force a suspected vessel which had been seized by the United States' Authorities.

The section was obviously directed against the repetition of such an occurrence, and was necessary to enable the President to use the forces of the State on a sudden emergency without having recourse to the Senate. The section gives the President no power which he would not have had without it, except where recourse to actual force is necessary. It is an entire misrepresentation to say that he has a discretionary power to seize and detain a vessel without bringing her before the proper Court for adjudication. His power is to employ the State force, if necessary, among other things, to seize a vessel, "in order to the execution of the prohibitions and penalties of the Act," which implies that the vessel must be submitted, in the usual course, to the proper legal process to decide on her condemnation or release. Often overnments of Spain and of vessels in the ports of the United States, frequent as have been the raids and hostile expeditions from American territory since, no instance has been adduced of the exercise of this alleged discretionary power by a President of seizing a vessel and keeping her, without putting the matter into due corrse of law, and I feel tolerably confident that no such instance Instances may have occurred, as in the case of the Spanish gun-boats building at New York in 1869, in which it was considered necessary to provide for the use of force to arrest ships believed to be about to go forth on military expeditions; but such seizures have been followed by the ordinary course of legal procedure and inquiry, or the intended expedition having been prevented or else abandoned, the vessel has been restored without any further proceeding. Instances have no doubt occurred in which vessels have been seized by order of the President, as head of the Executive, as vessels might be seized by order of Her Majesty's Government; but this was only that the statute might be put in force. In like manner vessels may have been seized under the ordinary civil authority, and it being found that there was no sufficient case against them, may have been set free. But no instance, I believe, has occurred, except where force was actually necessary, of the seizure of a vessel by a President, in the mere exercise of executive power, suspending the ordinary action of the law. No example of such a proceeding has been, or I believe can be, adduced, with the single exception of the case of Gelston v. Hoyt, to which I am about to refer, in which the experiment to exercise such a power was tried and failed.

By the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the last-mentioned case, which is reported in the 4th vol. of Curtis' Reports, p. 228, the view I have taken of the effect of the American Act is conclusively borne out. An action having been brought by a shipowner against a civil officer for the seizure and detention of a ship, the defendant pleaded the order of the President, but the plea was held bad. In giving judgment Mr. Justice Story says :-

"The argument is that, as the President has authority, by the Act, to employ the naval and military The argument is that, as the Tresment was authority, by the rice, to employ the moval and initiary forces of the United States for this purpose, \hat{a} fortiori he might do it by the employment of civil force. But upon the most deliberate consideration, we are of a different opinion. The power thus entrusted to the President is of a very high and delicate nature, and manifestly intended to be exercised only when, by the ordinary process or exercise of civil authority, the purposes of the law cannot be effectuated. It is to be exerted on extraordinary occasions, and subject to that high responsibility which all executive acts necessarily involve. Whenever it is exerted, all persons who act in obedience to the executive instructions in cases within the Act are completely justified in taking possession of and detaining the offending vessel, and are not responsible in damages for any injury which the party may suffer by reason of such proceeding. Surely, it never could have been the intention of Congress that suffer by reason of such proceeding. Surely, it never could have been the intention of Congress that such a power should be allowed as a shield to the seizing officer in cases where that seizure might be made by the ordinary civil means? One of the cases put in the section is, where any process that the authority of the United States is disobeyed and resisted; and this case abundantly shows, that the authority of the President was not intended to be called into exercise, unless where military and haval forces were necessary to insure the execution of the laws. In terms the section is confined to the employment of naval and military forces; and there is neither public policy nor principle to justify an extension of the prerogative beyond the terms in which it is given. Congress might be perfectly willing to intrust the President with the power to take and detain, whenever, in his opinion, the case was so diagrant that military or naval force were necessary to enforce the laws, and yet with great propriety deny it where, from the circumstances of the case, the civil officers of the Government might, upon their private responsibility, without any danger to the public peace, completely execute them. It is certainly against the general theory of our institutions to create great discretionary powers by implication; and in the present instance we see nothing to justify it."

I cannot help expressing my surprise that, with this decision before them, American lawyers should have submitted so incorrect a statement to this Tribunal. If, indeed, what is meant is that the power of the President to use the forces of the State, to prevent forcible violations of neutrality, gives any superior efficacy to the American system, the answer is that which has been given by Sir R. Palmer in his most able argument, namely, that in all cases similar to those referred to in the American Act, the Sovereign of Great Britain possesses full power to use force, civil or military, such as the case

The first American Neutrality Act of 1794 was silent as to the authority by whom vessels infringing the law should be seized, proceedings being apparently left to be taken by any person choosing to become an informer, to whom half the penalty and half the forfeited property is to go. From the case of Gelston v. Hoyt, just cited, it however appears that at the time that cause was decided, in all cases of the forfeiture of vessels the duty of scizure devolved on the officers of Customs In this respect, therefore, the practice of the two countries would be the same.

Loud complaints having been made by the representatives of Spain and Portugal, of the number of privateers fitted out and mauned, from ports of the Union, by American citizens, and preying on the commerce of the two countries, under commissions from the revolted colonies, a new Statute was passed in 1818, which, in addition to the enactments of the Act of 1794, which otherwise remained the same, contained two new provisions.

Section 10 provided that:-

"The owners or consignees of every armed ship or vessel sailing out of the ports of the United States, belonging wholly or in part to citizens thereof, shall enter into bond to the United States, with sufficient sureties, prior to clearing out the same, in double the amount of the value of the vessel and cargo on board, including her armament, that the said ship or vessel shall not be employed by such owners to eraize or commit hostilities against the subjects, citizens, or property, of any foreign Prince or State, or of any Colony, district, or people, with whom the United States are at peace."

By Section 11 special power was given to Collectors of Customs-

"To detain any vessel manifestly built for warlike purposes, and about to depart the United States, of which the cargo shall principally consist of arms and munitions of war, when the number of men shipped on board, or other circumstances, shall render it probable that such vessel is intended to be employed by the owner or owners to cruize or commit hostilities upon the subjects, citizens, or property of any foreign State, or of any colony, district, or people with whom the United States are at peace, until the decision of the President be had thereon, or until the owner or owners shall give such bond and security us is required of the owners of armed ships by the preceding section of this Act."

But the power thus given would evidently not apply to the ease we have here to deal with, of vessels leaving equipped, but without an armament, and having no arms or munitions of war on board.

In like manner the bonding clause just quoted (section 10) applies only to armed ships, and therefore would equally have been unavailable. Besides which it applies only to ships belonging in whole, or in part, to American citizens, and would therefore obviously have no application to a ship sold to a foreign Government.

But though it is an entire mistake to say that the American Act of 1818 was in any respect superior to the British Act of the ensuing year, it is true that, since the time the American Act was passed, the working of the legal administration in the United States has become, for the purpose of proceeding against a suspected vessel, in one respect better than that of Great Britain. It appears that in each district of the United States there is a resident legal officer of the Federal Government ealled the District Attorney, to whom, if the action of the Government is invoked a question of this kind is referred, and whose duty it is to ascertain the facts, collect the evidence, and report to the Government. Such an officer is, no doubt, better adapted to such a purpose than a Collector of Customs. But can it be said to have been the duty of the British Government, not having similar district officers, to appoint such, at the different ship-building ports, with a view the better to protect belligerents against ships being equipped or armed against them?

Another advantage of the American system is, that the duty of adjudicating in such a case devolves on a Judge in the Court of Admiralty instead of on a Jury, who are sometimes apt to be swayed in favour of their own countrymen when such at the instance of foreigners. But this relates to the condemnation of vessels, not to their scizure. And with the exception of the Florida and Alabama, every vessel, the scizure of which could be asked for, as instanced in the cases of the Alexandra, the Pampero, and the iron-clad rams at Birkenhead, was seized and prevented from doing any harm to the commerce of the United States. The Alexandra, it is true, was released after trial in England, but she was seized again at Nassau, and not liberated till after the close of the war. Practically speaking, therefore, in the later cases, everything was accomplished which could have resulted from the most perfect machinery that could have been devised for such a purpose.

British Act of 1870. Great stress is laid in the pleadings of the United States on the British Act of 1870, passed on the Report of the Neutrality Commissioners. The Act is held up as the standard of neutral duty and of the requirements necessary to give effect to it. No doubt that Act introduced very material changes, and did much to strengthen the hands of the Executive. It made it an offence to build, or agree to build, or procure to be built, as well as to equip or arm. It did away with all question as to intent, by making it sufficient if the party doing any of these things knows, or even has reasonable cause to believe, that the vessel will be employed in the service of a belligerent. To dispatch a vessel with such intent, knowledge, or reasonable cause of belief, is added to the category of offences. Still more remarkable is the new proceeding introduced, in addition to the former process for the condemnation of the vessel, for the purpose of testing ports of the Union, by o countries, under comssed in 1818, which, in rwise remained the same, on the British Act of 1870, The Act is held up as the y to give effect to it. No ich to strengthen the hands to build, or proeure to be ion as to intent, by making even has reasonable cause a belligerent. To dispatch of belief, is added to the eeding introduced, in addil, for the purpose of testing the character of a suspected ship. If the Secretary of State, or Chief Executive Authority in any place, is satisfied that there is reasonable and probable cause for helieving that a ship within Her Majesty's dominions has been, or is being, built, commissioned, or equipped, contrary to the Act, and is about to be taken beyond the limits of such domitions, he may issue his warrant to any officer of the Customs, or public officer, or comm. smoned officer of the army or navy, who is thereupon to seize, search, and detain the ship. The owner may apply, indeed, to the Court of Admiralty for the restoration of the vessel; but it is incumbent upon him, it order to obtain it, to establish that the Act has not been contravened. So that the order of procedure is reversed. Instead of it being necessary for the prosecutor to establish, at all events a primal facie case of guilt, the owner has, in the first instance, to establish innocence-a proceeding alien altogether to English jurisprudence.

No doubt these are great changes—possibly improvements. But is it just to say that the pre-existing law was so essentially defective as that the British nation can be held liable by reason of its imperfections? Law, like all other human institutions, is in a constant state of progress and change. New events, new conjunctures, new combinations of circumstances, the lessons of experience, from time to time point out to the lawgiver the necessity of altering the work of the past to adapt it to the requirements of the present. Is every amendment of the law to carry with it the condemnation of the legislation which preceded it?

At all events, it does not lie in the mouths of Americans to say so in the present instance. I have just passed their own law in review. According to it, it is not an offence to build or equip a vessel unless it be also armed; knowledge, or reasonable ground of belief, is not, as under the Act of 1870, sufficient; the intent must be proved. The intermediate process given by the latter Act, and by which the burden of proving the innocent character of the ship, in the first instance, is cast on the owner, is unknown.

For all practical purposes the neutrality laws of the United States and of Great Britain, prior to the late war, were substantially the same. With this model Act now for two years before them, the United States have done nothing to bring their law up to the standard of it. How can they now with any pretence of justice ask that Great Britain shall be tried by the test of a law which is as much in advance of their own present law as it is of the past law of Great Britain?

When, notwithstanding this, one reads in the United States' Argument that "the British Government has stood obstinately on confessedly defective legislation of neutrality;" that "it is not yet emancipated from the national prejudices which obstructed Mr. Canning;" that it "still lags behind the United States in appreciation of the true principles of public law, which lie at the foundation of the relations of independent Sovereign States;" it is difficult to express the feeling which arises consistently with the seriousness which belongs to the present occasion.

It is true that it is not the law of the United States, but that of Great Britain, that is now on its trial. It may not be enough to say that if Great Britain is black America is no whiter. It may not be enough to say, as Great Britain might do in so many instances, "Si in me iniquis es judex, codem ego te crimine condemnabo." Yet a comparison of the respective laws of the two countries is by no means superfluous, For a remark is here to be made, which applies also to many other parts of the present controversy, namely, that the Government of the United States can have no right to require more of that of Great Britain than it could itself have rendered, had the position of the two countries been reversed, and Great Britain had been the belligerent and the United States the neutral Power. For, in the absence of convention, equality and reciprocity lie at the very root of international obligations, and no nation has a right to demand of another more than under the like circumstances it would have been able itself to render.

The statement I have quoted above from the United States' Argument, that "the Negotiations for British Government has stood obstinately on confessedly defective legislation of amendment of the neutrality," refers, I presume, to the communications which passed, during the war, between the Government of Great Britain and that of the United States on the subject Civil War. of an amendment of the British Foreign Enlistment Act. With respect to these communications, the facts, shortly stated, are as follows:—In 1861 and again 1863-64, Mr. Adams suggested (in the first instance, with a view to check the British colonial trade in articles contraband of war), that it might be of advantage if the British legislature would pass an Act similar to the temporary Act passed by the United States in 1838, which had reference only to expeditions, or exports of arms (not earried by sea), between the United States and any foreign territory conterminous with the United States. The precedent of this legislation was actually followed by Canada in 1864, when events made it requisite. No other request for an alteration of this British law was at any time made on the part of the United States.

On the 19th of December, 1862, Earl Russell wrote thus to Mr. Adams:-

"I have the honour to inform you that Her Majesty's Government, after consultation with the Law Officers of the Crown, are of opinion that certain amendments might be introduced into the Foreign Enlistment Act, which, if sanctioned by Parliament, would have the effect of giving greater power to the Executive to prevent the construction, in British ports, of ships destined for the use of belligerents. But Her Majesty's Government consider that, before submitting any proposals of that sort to Parliament, it would be desirable that they should previously communicate with the Government of the United States, and ascertain whether that Government is willing to make similar alterations in its own Foreign Enlistment Act, and that the amendments, like the original statute, should, as it were, proceed pari passo in both countries.

"I shall accordingly be ready to confer at any time with you, and to listen to any suggestions which you may have to make by which the British Foreign Enlistment Act and the corresponding status of the United States may be made more efficient for their purpose."

In reply to this overture (which was received with equal courtesy and caution by the Government of the United States) Mr. Adams was instructed not to make any suggestions whatever, but to state (according to Earl Russell's report of the conversation) "that his Government were ready to listen to any propositions Her Majesty's Government had to make, but they did not see how their own law on this subject could be improved," or (according to Mr. Adams' own report) that the Government of the United States considered their own law as "of very sufficient vigour." + Earl Russell thereupon said that the Cabinet, under the advice of the Lord Chancellor (Lord Westbury) had come to the same conclusion with reference to the law of Great Britain, "so that no further proceedings need be taken at present on the subject." Earl Russell's overture was not founded on any opinion of the insufficiency of the British law for the performance of the international obligations of Great Britain, but simply on the advice of the Law Officers that certain amendments might be possible which would increase the power of the Executive Government to deal with cases within the scope of that law. There could be no possibility, however, of carrying such amendments through Parliament unless similar amendments had been simultaneously made in the law of the United States, and the reply of the United States, throwing upon Great Britain the whole responsibility of making propositions in the matter, gave no assurance that those propositions if made, would lead to any useful result. If anything had been needed to confirm this impression, it would be found in Mr. Seward's answer when informed of what had Writing to Mr. Adams on the 2nd of March 1863, he says :-

"It remains for this Government only to say that it will be your duty to urge upon Her Majesty's Government the desire and expectation of the President, that henceforward Her Majesty's Government will take the necessary measures to enforce the execution of the law, as faithfully as this Government has executed the corresponding statutes of the United States."

Comparison with Foreign Laws.

Not content with instituting a comparison between the neutrality law of Great Britain and that of the United States, the American Case has gone on to compare both with the municipal law of other States; which comparison it seeks by some strange manipulation to turn in favour of the United States, though, as we have seen, the laws of the two countries were, at the time in question, substantially the same.

Having gone carefully through the laws of the leading maritime nations, I find none in which the equipping or arming of vessels for the use of a belligerent was, prior to the breaking out of the American civil war, prohibited, except under circumstances which would make it a violation of neutrality according to international law. After the breaking out of the war, in one or two countries, as in France and Brazil, the law in this respect was put on the same footing as the law of Great Britain and America prior to the dispute. In some, as in Italy, it has been altered since. In these cases the altered law is referred to in the Argument of the United States as though it had existed at the time of the war.

In the laws of those States which had hitherto taken but little part in maritime

In answer to an inquiry made on the part of Her Majesty's Government, the Austrian Minister for Foreign Affairs thus responds :-

"Apart from the principles which lie at the foundation of this declaration (the Declaration of Paris of 1856), there exists, how ever, no law in Austria, nor any other order generally binding, which eauld be made to apply to violatioes of neutrality by Austrian subjects.

States, by promulgating in legal forms special regulations for the preservation of neutrality applicable only to the war in question. Thus, in the year 1854, in consequence of the war then existing, the Ministerial Ordonnance of May 25, 1854, was promulgated, of which copy is inclosed herewith.

"In such special declarations the generally acknowledged principles of international law, as were as the known views of the belligerent Powers on certain points, have been taken into consideration, in order, as much as possible, to obviate any complaints of infringement of neutrality.

"There does not exist, however, a law of this kind applicable to all future occasions, and more particularly there are no general laws in Austria prohibiting the construction, equipment, or manning of ships (in Austrian harbours) which are destined for belligerent Powers, or are suspected of being so."

There is nothing, therefore, to prevent the equipping or arming of ships for a belligerent by the laws of Austria.

In like manner it appears from the note furnished to Her Majesty's Representative Law of Prussia. at Berlin, that no law exists in Prussia prohibiting the building or sale of ships.†

The Swiss law on the subject of neutrality has been introduced in the United Law of States' Argument in terms of landation; but as in the nature of things it can have Switzerland. nothing to do with maritime neutrality, I presume it has only been brought forward out of compliment to our Swiss colleague, and I need say nothing further on the

I pass on to maritime nations. And first, as to France. It is certain that there Law of France. is no prohibition in the French Codes against the building or equipping of ships for a belligerent. The only provision relative to a breach of neutrality by a French subject is to be found in the Sith and S5th Articles of the Code Pénal, which are in these

"Art. 84. Quiconque aura, par des actions hostiles non approuvées par le Gouvernement, exposé l'Etat à une déclaration de guerre, sera pani du bannissement, et si la guerre s'en est suivie, de la

"Art. 85. Quiconque aura par des actes non approuvés par le Gouvernement exposé des Français à éprouver des représailles sera puni du bannissement.

On these articles M. Treitt, the learned Counsel to the British Embassy, makes the following observations :-

"Vous vondrez bien remarquer la généralité de ces expressions, quiconque, actions hostiles; le législateur n'a pas voulu définir ce qu'il faillait entendre par actions hostiles, il en a laissée l'apprécia-tion souveraine aux juges.

"Il ne s'agit point dans les Articles 84 et 85 du Code Pénal des machinations et manœuvres au profit d'une Puissance étrangère, et ayant pour objet de provoquer des hostilités. Ces machinations patiquées dans une intention et un but criminels rentrent dans les différentes espèces de trahison, lesquelles sont punies par les Articles 76 à 83 du même Code. Les Articles 84 et 85 s'appliquent aux simples cas d'imprudence, de témérité, de négligence ; c'est moins l'intention que le fait matériel qui est paul la bit un voir que le fait matériel qui est paul la bit un voir que le fait matériel qui est paul la bit un voir que le fait matériel qui est paul la bit un voir que le fait matériel qui est paul la bit un voir que le fait matériel qui est paul la bit un voir que le fait matériel qui est paul la bit un voir que le fait matériel qui est paul la bit un voir que le fait matériel qui est paul la bit un voir que le fait matériel qui est paul la bit un voir que le fait matériel qui est paul la bit un voir que le fait matériel qui est paul la bit un voir que la fait matériel qui est paul la bit un voir que la fait matériel qui est paul la bit un voir que la fait matériel qui est paul la bit un voir que la fait matériel qui est paul la bit un voir que la fait matériel qui est paul la bit un voir que la fait matériel qui est paul la bit un voir que la fait matériel qui est paul la bit un voir que la fait matériel qui est paul la bit un voir que la fait matériel qui est paul la bit un voir que la fait de la fai puni. La loi ne voit que le résultat ; ainsi : La France a-t-elle été exposée à une déclaration de guerre, la guerre a-t-elle été déclarée ! Les Français ont-ils été exposés à des représailles ! Ces seules questions résolues affirmativement entraineront l'application d'une des peines si sévères prononcées par b loi, et en outre le paiement de dommages-intérêts qui peuvent toujours être réclamés "Il faut donc trois conditions pourqu'il y ait lieu à l'application des Articles 84 et 85 du Code

"Je précise ces trois circonstances parceque c'est le pouvoir judiciaire seul qui est appelé à les résoudre et à décider de la culpabilité.

"Si les juges décident que telle action n'est point une action hostile, et par conséquent non-violatrice de la neutralité, le Gouvernement devra respecter cette décision et pourra l'opposer au belligérant qui se plaindrait.

"Si devant les juges l'accusé excipait d'une approbation, soit tacite, soit expresse par le Gouvernment, l'action incriminée ne pourrait plus être punie.

"Entin, si l'action hostile n'avait pas pour conséquence des représailles on une éventualité de guerre, elle cesse d'être criminelle."*

Writing to Mr. Fane, then British Minister at Paris, M. de Monstier, the Minister for Foreign Affairs, says:—.

"A proprement parler, il n'y a pas de disposition dans la législation Française qui marque d'une manière précise les limites de la neutralité à observer entre deux Puissances étrangères qui sont en état de guerre, les questions de cette nature étant d'un caractère mixte, et trouvant leur solution dans les principes généraux du droit international."

It is clear, therefore, that the French law went no further than to provide for the punishment of any infraction of international law which has the effect of exposing France to a declaration of war or to reprisals. Now, as we have seen, the sale even of a nied ships is not an offence against neutrality and could not produce the consequences referred to in the Articles of the Code. It is true the Government has the power of preventing the arming of vessels in its own hands, if it thinks proper to use it, as the exportation of arms, except with the permission of the Government, is prohibited under heavy penalties,—197, indeed, with the motive of preventing breaches of neutrality, but from motives of policy of a very different character. If, indeed, the construction of an armed vessel formed part of an enterprise having for its immediate object hostile operations against a belligerent Power, then, as I have already pointed out, the whole would amount to a violation of mentrality.

But an Imperial Decree of the 10th June, 1861, passed with a view to the war which had then broken out, contained in its 3rd Article the following provision:—

" Il est interdit à tout Français de prendre commission de l'une des deux parties pour armer de vaisseaux en guerre, ou d'accepter des lettres de marque pour faire la course maritime, on de concomis d'une manière quelconque à l'équipement ou à l'armement d'un navire de guerre ou corsaire de l'anc des deux parties belligérantes, $\frac{\alpha_0}{\tau}$

Thus, the law of France in respect of the equipping and arming of ships of war, was placed on the same footing as that of Great Britain and America.

Law of Belgium

Belgium, which, as it is known, has adopted the French Codes, has likewise the 84th and 85th Articles of the Code Pénal; but with the exception of severe laws against privateering, or the reception of privateers, the prohibitive and preventive power of the law depends on the Articles in question.

Law of the Nether-

The Netherlands, in like manner, having also adopted the French Code, have the 84th and 85th Articles; but no special provision as to equipping or arming of vessels in the way of trade existed prior to the year 1866, as appears from the express statement of M. van Zuylen de Nyevelt, the Netherlands Minister for Foreign Affairs, in a letter to Mr. Ward, found in the Appendix to the British Case.

It is true that M. de Zuylen makes the following observation:-

"Quant aux moyens coact is dont le Gouvernement pourrait disposer pour empêcher des virblests de sa neutralité, les Articles 84 et 85 du Code Pénal peuvent aussi dans quelques cas servir à Ceux, par exemple, qui tacheraient d'équiper ou de vendre des vaisseaux de guerre dans nos ports per le compte des belligérants pourraient être poursuivies en vertu de ces articles; les navires ales sernient saisis comme pièce de conviction et par là même leur sortie sernit empêchée."

But it is to be remarked that the foregoing observation as to the possible application of the 84th and 85th sections of the Penal Code to the equipping or sale of ships is given only as a matter of opinion; no instance appears to have occurred in which the equipping or sale of a vessel of war has been held to be an offence within these Articles. It must obviously depend on whether what was done amounted to a violation of international law affording a just cause of war.

The regulations issued by the Dutch Government in 1866 do not touch the case of the equipment or sale of ships, but only the admission of belligerent vessels into Dutch ports. It may be remarked, in passing, that it is expressly provided by Article 4 of the Regulations, that "ships of war may remain an unlimited time in Spain has two provisions corresponding to the Articles of the French Code, viz. Law of Spain. Article 148 of the Codigo Penal, and Article 258 of a Statute of 1822 :- +

"Article 148. Whoseever shall, without having been permitted to do so by competent authority have provoked or given motive to a declaration of war against Spain on the part of another Power, of maye properties shall have exposed Spanish subjects to suffer vexations or reprisals against their persons or properties shall be punished with imprisonment; and if such person be a public functionary, he shall be punished with temporary reclusion.

"Art. 258. Whosoever shall, without the knowledge, authority, or permission of the Government, have committed hostilities against any allied or neutral Power, or shall have exposed the State to suffer for that cause a declaration of war, or if such hostilities shall have been the ground for reprisals against Spaniards, he shall be condemned to give public satisfaction for such offence, and to reclusion or Spannards, he shall be concenhed to give public satisfaction for such onence, and to recuision or imprisonment for a term of from two to six years, and shall pay a line equal to one quarter of the amount of damages he shall have occasioned, without prejudice to any further punishment which he may be liable to incur for the violence committed. If said hostilities shall have brought on an immediate declaration of war, or if such declaration shall have preceded the time of the trials, the offender shall be punished with transportation."

But there is no law which touches the equipping or arming of ships of war for a belligerent. The decree relating to neutrality issued on the occasion of the American Civil War is set out in the British Appendix. Lt contains no prohibition relating to the equipping or arming of ships.

It is stated, indeed, in the United States' Argument\(\) that the Codigo Penal, in Article 151, forbids the expediting of "cruizers." Is it possible that the writers are ignorant that the term "destinare buques al corso" does not refer to cruizers but to privateers?

Portugal has a corresponding provision in the 148th Article, the Empire of Brazil Law of Portugal in the 83rd Article, of the Penal Code of the respective countries. In the Brazilian and Brazil. Code, the offence consists in "committing, without the order or the authorization of the Government, hostile acts against the subjects of another nation, so as to endanger peace or provoke reprisals,"

In the report presented to His Majesty the Emperor of Brazil on these laws by D. Silva Ferrao, et out in the later United States' documents, there is the following ent observation :-

"Thus, it remains understood that if the fact in itself were not such as to give just reason for war, ac a ling to international right, it could never be reputed a crime even were it not authorized by the Government, and were it eventually followed by war. Such a fact is not then a reason but a pretext

In this elaborate report, in which the effect of the foregoing law is fully discussed, I find no reference whatever to the equipment or arming of ships, as being within it.

The Government of Brazil, like that of France, upon the breaking out of the civil war made special provision by law for the enforcing of neutrality. By a Circular of the 1st of August, 1861, the Presidents of the different provinces were instructed as

"The Confederate States have no recognized existence; but, having constituted a distinct Government de facto, the Imperial Government cannot consider their naval armaments as acts of piracy, nor refuse them, with the necessary restrictions, the character of belligerents, which they have assumed.

"In conformity with this, Bruzilian subjess are to abstain from all participation and aid in favour of one of the belligerents, and they must not take part in any acts which can be considered as hostile to one of the two parties, and contrary to the obligations of the neutrality.

"The exportation of warlike articles from the ports of the Empire for the new Confederate States is absolutely prohibited, whether it is intended to be done under the Brazilian flag or that of another

"The same trade in contraband of war must be forbidden to Brazilian ships, although they may be destined for the ports subject to the Government of the North American Union.

"No ship with the flag of one of the belligerents, and which may be employed in this war, or intended for it, can be provisioned, equipped, or armed in the ports of the Empire; the furnishing of victuals and naval provisions indispensable for the continuation of the voyage not being included in this prohibition.

"No ship of war or privateer shall be allowed to enter and remain with prizes in our ports or bays more than twenty-four hours, except in case of forced arrival, and they shall in no way be allowed to dispose of the said prizes, or of objects coming from them.

Thus, going far beyond other nations, Brazil prohibited not only the sale of ships, but all trade in articles contraband of war even in its own ports.

Serious disputes having arisen in the course of the ensuing year between the Governments of the United States and Brazil on the subject of Confederate cruizers received in ports of the Empire, the Government, in order to prevent as far as possible the occasion of such troublesome remonstrances, published the still more stringent regulations contained in the Circular of the 23rd of June, 1863, set out in the 7th Volume of the Appendix of the United States, regulations much more rigorous than those which have been adopted by any other nation.* But, as these regulations relate entirely to the reception of belligerent vessels in Brazilian ports, it is unnecessary to dwell upon them here.

Law of Italy.

Italy has in the 174th and 175th Articles of the Penal Code, provisions corresponding to those of the French Code:-+

"Article 174. If any person whosoever shall, by acts not authorized by the Government of the King, have exposed the State to a declaration of war, he shall be punished with banishment; if the war has actually occurred, he shall be punished with temporary penal servitude.

"Art. 175. If any person whoseever shall, by acts not approved of by the Government of the King, have exposed the subjects of the kingdom to reprisals, he shall be punished with banishment even for a term of ten years or with imprisonment, without prejudice to any further penalty to which he may be liable on account of the acts he has committed. If the offender be a public functionary, he shall be punished with banishment,'

So stood the law at the time of the breaking out of the Civil War between the Northern and Southern States of America. In the course of it the King of Italy, in an Ordinance of the 6th of April, 1864, but, so far as I have been able to discover, then for the first time, adopted the regulations established three years before by the Emperor of the French. By Article IV, "No Italian subject shall take commission from either belligerent Power to arm ships for war, or accept letters of marque to cruize, or assist in any way in fitting out, arming, or preparing for war a vessel or privateer of the said belligerents.":

The Naval Code, which was published in 1866, in the chapter relating to the neutrality of the State towards foreign Powers (chap. vii), has the following provisions :-- § " In case of war between Powers towards which the State remains neutral, privateers or vessels of war with prizes shall not be received into the harbours or roadsteads, except in cases of stress of weather.

" They will have to leave as soon as the danger has ceased.

"No ship of war or privateer belonging to a belligerest will be allowed to remain longer than twenty-four hours in a port, harbour, or roadstead of the State, or in the adjacent waters, even when alone, except in case of necessity arising from bad weather, of shipwreck, or of an absence of the means necessary to carry on the navigation with safety.

" In no case will they be permitted during their stay in the port, harbour, or roadstead of the State to sell, exchange, or barter, or even give away any of the prizes (taken in war),

"The ships of war of a friendly Power, even when belligerent, are permitted to touch or even to remain in any harbour, port, or roadstead of the State on condition that the object of their mission be exclusively a scientific one.

"In no case can a belligerent ship avail itself of an Italian port for the purposes of war, or of obtaining arms and munitions. It shall not be able under the pretence of repairs to execute any alterations or other works designed to augment its warlike force,

Nothing shall be furnished to vessels of war or to belligerent privateers beyond articles of fool and commodities, and the actual means of repair necessary to the sustenance of their crews and the safety of their navigation.

In the case in which vessels of war, whether privateers or merchantmen of the two belligerent nations, are both together in a port, harbour, or roadstead of the State, there shall be an interval of at least twenty-four hours between the successive departures of the vessels of one belligerent and those of the vessels of the other.

"This interval can be increased according to the circumstances brought before the mariime authorities of the place.

"The capture of prizes as well as any other act of hostility between two belligerent ships within the territorial waters or the adjacent waters of the islands of the State will constitute a violation of

In all these countries, at the time to which our attention has to be directed, the question whether there had been a breach of the municipal law by a subject turned on whether there had been a breach of neutrality, such as to expose the nation to war or reprisals. The equipping or arming of vessels for sale in the way of commerce does not come into question at all. It is, therefore, manifest that the municipal law, both of Great Britain and the United States, was far more stringent, though the punishment under the foreign law in case of a breach of the law was more severe, by reason of the greater gravity of the result, when a nation becomes exposed to war, or

I next turn to the law of the Northern nations on the subject of neutrality.

The law of Denmark relating to ships, with reference to neutrality, is fully set out Law of Denmark. in the third volume of the British Appendix.*

Denmark appears to be one of the very few countries that have gone the length of prohibiting to the subject the carriage of articles contraband of war. But though unusually strict in that respect, and minute as to its regulations in many others, the law contains no prohibition of the equipping or arming of ships of war for the purpose

The Swedish Ordonnance of April 8, 1854, while it expressly prohibits, by the 8th Law of Sweden. section, the arming or equipping of vessels for the purpose of privateering, is wholly without any prohibition against doing so with reference to ships armed or equipped for

The only Article in the Russian Code relating to neutrality is the 259th, which Law of Russia. is as follows :--- t

"If any Russian subject in time of peace shall by open force attack the inhabitants of a neighbouring state or those of any other foreign country, and shall thereby subject his own country to the danger of a rupture with a friendly Power, or even to an attack by such foreign subjects on the the manger of a repeat of a regime against international law, the offender and all those who participate voluntarily in his enterprise, with a knowledge of its objects and illegality, shall be sentenced to lose all their civil rights, and be condemned to hard labour in a fortress for a term of eight

With the exception of this Article, says M. de Westmann, in answer to an official inquiry from the British Government, § "La législation Russe ne renferme pas de dispositions ayant pour but d'empêcher sur le territoire de la Russie l'accomplissement d'actes dont les puissances belligérantes pourraient se plaindre comme d'une violation

There being thus no law in Russia relating to ships of war, and, as I have shown, none such in Prussia, I was surprised, after reference to the efficient regulations of the Dutch Government, followed afterwards by an assertion that by those regulations the construction of cruizers was prohibited (which it is not), to see it stated that "similar laws were to be found in Russia and in Prussia," as to the latter of which it is added (in a friendly spirit no doubt), that it "once had occasion to apply its laws to the acts of British Agents."

But while the codes of so many maritime nations are silent as to the equipping Laws as to or arming of ships of war in the way of trade, the codes of several—for example, privateers. Belgium, Denmark, Sweden-prohibit the fitting out of privateers. Here again the Argument of the United States falls into the same strange mistake as before. represents these Governments as preventing not only the armament but also the construction of cruizers. I can hardly suppose the writer ignorant of the meaning of the term corsaire, the term used in the laws in question, and which never has but one meaning, that of privateer, or in French phrase that of a "vaisseau armé en course par des particuliers, mais avec l'autorisation du Gouvernement." Neither of these countries has any law against the construction of cruizers. Such a statement, therefore, ought not to have been made.

The Argument of the United States winds up the comparison of the British law with that of other countries with the following remarkable observations;—

^{*} Report of Neutrality Laws Commission, p. 40, British Appendix, vol. iii. † Ibid., pp. 66, 67. ¶ Argument of the United States, p. 72.

 Pages 71, 72.

"The institutions of Italy, Brazil, Switzerland, France, Spain, Portugal, the Netherlands, and all other Governments of Europe, indeed, except Great Britain, expressly assume, as do the institutions of the United States, that volunteer and unauthorized military and naval expeditions, undertaken in a neutral country, are to be restrained, because tending to involve such country in war with the country aggrieved. Infringements of the law are punished mainly for that reason, including the protection of the national sovereignty.

"Hence, in all those countries, except Great Britain, the punitive law is a secondary fact; the primary fact being the preventive action of the Government.

"The United States perfectly understood this, the true relation of things, and while they indicted persons, and arrested ships, they did not, when occasion required action, rely on such merely punitive, or at most auxiliary, means, but called into play the armed forces of land and sea to support the Executive in summary acts of prevention by force for the maintenance not only of the sovereignty last of the neutrality of the Government.

"Neither Lord Russell, in his correspondence with Mr. Adams, nor the framers of the British Case appear to have had any clear conception of these higher relations of the subject, although distinctly and explicitly stated in the best works of international law of Great Britain herself.

"Great Britain alone pretends that punitive law is the measure of neutral duties: all other Governments, including the United States, prevent peril to the national peace through means of prerogative force, lodged, by implied or express constitutional law, in the hands of the Executive."

A stranger misrepresentation could scarcely have been penned. The assertion that the institutions of Great Britain do not assume that volunteer and unauthorized military and naval expeditions, undertaken in a neutral country, are to be restrained, is without the shadow of a foundation. It is equally untrue and unjust to say that Great Britain pretends that punitive law is the measure of neutral duties. Great Britain pretends nothing of the kind. The best answer to these unwarranted assertions is the fact, that the Alabama was attempted to be seized; that the Alexandra was seized; as were the Pampero and the Birkenhead rams, and the Florida at Nassau; by virtue of the preventive nower alone; and that, if in any of those eases resistance had been offered, or force required, force would, as a matter of course, have been resorted to immedia ... enforce the law.

But while the United States thus impugn the efficacy of the British law, and dwell upon the executive, as contradistinguished from legal, power possessed by their own, and, as they allege, by foreign Governments—of which, by the way, they offer no proof whatever-at another time, with startling inconsistency, they assert that the Government of Great Britain possesses this very executive power, and make the omission to put it in force the subject of vehement complaint.

The imagination of the writer must have been singularly lively, while his conscience must have slept, who could venture to put on paper the following passages :--*

"No independent State exists, either in Europe or America, encumbered with constitutional incapacity in this respect.

Violations of neutrality are issues of war and peace. Whatever power in a State declares war, or makes peace, has jurisdiction of the issues of peace and war, including of course all violations of neutrality.

In point of fact, such authority is not a quality of despotic Government only: it belongs equals to the most constitutional Government, as appears, for instance, in the political institutions of constitutional Republies, like Switzerland and the United States, and in constitutional Monarchies like Italy and Brazil"-

The selection by the Counsel of the United States of the countries of the four other members of the Tribunal was, I presume, accidental. But let us go on:-

"The Counsel of the United States submit these propositions as undeniable and elementary to prevent its liege subjects (and à fortiori commorant aliens), from doing acts which tend to involve it in a war with any other Government.

"But the British Government maintains that the sovereign State of Great Britain and Ireland the Imperial mistress of the Indies, the proudest in fame, the richest in resources, and (including let transmarine possessions) the most populous of the great States of Europe, does not possess constitutional power to prevent mercenary law-breakers among her own subjects, or bands of despense foreign rebels, commorant on her soil, from drugging her into nets of flagrant violation of neutality, and thus affording, to tending to afford, just cause of war to other foreign States!

"And such is the defence of Great Britain in answer to the reclamations of the United States!

"It would be difficult to find any other example of a great State defending itself against charges of wrong by setting up the plea of its constitutional incompetency and incapacity to discharge the most common-place duties of a sovereign State.

"Great Britain is not in that condition of constitutional disability which her Ministers

"We find, on the most cursory observation of the constitution of Great Britain, that the declaration of war, the conclusion of peace, the conduct of foreign affairs,—that all these things are in Great Britain elements of the prerogative of the Crown.

"We cannot believe and do not concede that in all these greater prerogative powers there is not included the lesser one of preventing unauthorized private persons from engaging in private war against a friendly foreign State, and thus committing Great Britain to causes of public war on the part of such foreign State.

"If the exercise of such power by the Crown involves derogation of the rights of private persons which Ministers fear to commit, they should obtain a proper Act of Parliament, either for antecedent general authorization or for subsequent protection, all which is within the scope of the theoretic omni-potence of Parliament.

"The British Ministers do not scruple to suspend the privileges of the writ of habous corpus, whether with or without previous Parliamentary authorization, and whether in the United Kingdom, or in the Colonies, on occasion of petty acts of rebellion or revolt, that is, the case of domestic war: à fortiori they should and may errest and prevent subjects or commorant foreigners engaged in the commission of acts of foreign war to the prejudice of another Government.

"Is it possible to deny or to doubt that British Ministers might as well do this as the Ministers of Switzerland, Italy, Brazil, and the United States in like circumstances?"-

Again Switzerland, Italy, Brazil, and the United States-

"Has the Queen of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland less executive power than the President of the United States? And if she have less, could not the deficient power be granted to her by Act of Parliament, just as readily as similar executive power, in this relation, has been granted to the President of the United States by their Congress?

"But there is no such deficiency of power in the British Ministers: their own conduct in pertinent cases proves conclusively that they have the power, and can exercise it, when they choose, without affording occasion of any serious doubt or denial of the constitutionality of their acts.

" Be it remembered that the excuse of the British Government, for omitting to detain the Alabama, and other Confederate cruizers, was the alleged want of power to act outside of the Foreign Enlistment

" And yet, subsequently to the escape of the Alabama from the port of Liverpool, on occasion of the construction in the ports of Great Britain of certain other vessels for the Confederates, commonly spoken of as the Laird rams, the British Government seized them upon its own responsibility in virtue of the prerogative cower of the Crown, and so prevented their departure to make war against the United States."

Sitting on this Tribunal as in some sense the representative of Great Britain, I cannot allow these statements to go forth to the world without giving them the most positive and unqualified contradiction. They are wholly uncalled for, as being unnecessary to determine the question whether, in particular instances, Great Britain had been wanting in diligence; they are not only unjust, but in the highest degree ungenerous—I use the mildest expression I can find—on an occasion when Great Britain is holding out the hand of friendship and conciliation to America, and though, perhaps, at a heavy sacrifice, is seeking to bury all sense of past grievance by submitting the claims of the United States to peaceful and friendly arbitration. But it is not only that these observations are ungenerous and unjust. There is in this extraordinary series of propositions the most singular confusion of ideas, misrepresentation of facts, and ignorance, both of law and history, which were perhaps ever crowded into the same space, and for my part I cannot help expressing my sense, not only of the gross injustice done to my country, but also of the affront offered to this Tribunal by such an attempt to practise on our supposed credulity or ignorance.

It is not true that "the Case and Counter-Case of the British Government assume and persistently argue that the sole instrument possessed by the British Government to enforce the performance of neutral obligations at the time of the occurrences in question, was a particular Act of the British Parliament."

It is not true that the British Government has ever "maintained that Great Britain did not possess constitutional power to prevent mercenary subjects or foreign rebels from dragging her into acts of tlagrant violation of neutrality."

It is not true that "a great State" is here "defending itself against charges of wrong by setting up the plea of its constitutional incompetency and incapacity to discharge the most common-place duties of a sovereign State."

The transparent fallacy which runs through the whole of this series of declamatory assertions consists in confounding infractions of the municipal law with infractions of neutrality properly so called. Though, by convention between the two Governments, the equipping of a ship without arming may have acquired, ex post facto, for the purpose of the present arbitration, the character of a violation of neutrality, no agreement can change the substantive reality of things belonging to the past. Now, at the time the occurrences took place on which the present claims arise, to equip a ship in the way of trade, though intended for the service of a belligerent, was not, as I have already shown, and as Mr. Adams himself, in all fairness, fully admits an offence against international law, and therefore was not a violation of neutrality, While, therefore, in a case of actual violation of neutrality, as by sending forth an armed ship, or a ship immediately about to be armed, for the purpose of immediate warfare, the executive power might, ex proprio vigore, interfere, and if necessary by force. to prevent such a proceeding, the seizure of a vessel unarmed, and not immediately about to go forth, and in respect of which, therefore, no breach of neutrality had taken place, could only be done by virtue of the municipal law, as constituted by the Act of Parliament. But if a seizure was to be made under the Act, it was necessary that proof should be forthcoming to justify and uphold it. Therefore, it was true, that as regarded the equipping of ships, the powers of the Executive were limited to cases in which proof of a breach of the Act was forthcoming. Therefore it was that, in the case of the Florida, the Government, thinking there was not sufficient evidence of belligerent purpose, abstained from seizing, and, in that of the Alabama, delayed the seizure for a time. Therefore it was that, in the later eases of the Alexandra and the rams, the Government, being advised that the evidence was sufficient, proceeded to seize, Hence, in discussing the question whether it was, at that period, and in the then admitted state of international law, the duty of the Government to seize the vessels in question, it is necessary to refer to the Foreign Enlistment Act to ascertain what were the powers of the Government. The distinction is a very obvious one, and one which persons must be, I should think, wilfully blind not to see.

The assertion-coming from the quarter from which it proceeds-the Government of a great Republic-where all executive power, I should have imagined, would be clearly defined by law, and exercised in subordination to it—that the British Government should have proceeded, independently of, and, if necessary, in defiance of the law, to seize ships and arrest subjects, as well as foreigners, engaged, as it is termed, in acts of foreign war to the prejudice of another Government, surprises me, I must say, not a little; but when, as the ground of such an assertion, I am told that "British Ministers do not scruple to suspend the privileges of the writ of habeas corpus, whether with or without previous parliamentary authorization, whether in the United Kingdom or in the colonies, on occasion of petty acts of rebellion or revolt, that is, the case of domestic war." I find myself lost in amazement, and seek in vain to discover what can possibly be meant by so strange a statement. War, whether it be domestic or foreign, is of course war; and, in regard to those who are actually engaged in war, the law of war necessarily supersedes the civil law and civil rights, and would, per se, suspend the privileges of the Habeas Corpus Act. But, if it is meant that, even in time of war, the Executive could, as regards persons not taking part in the war, or not coming within the operation of martial law, suspend the Habeas Corpus Act without an Act of Parliament, the assertion is equally unfounded and surprising, whether looked at in an historical or in a legal point of view.

But a discovery has been made by those who drew up the United States' Argument which I must say appears to me, as an English lawyer, surpassing strange. It is that, that which could not have been done towards seizing vessels under the Foreign Enlistment Act, for want of evidence necessary to support a seizure under that Act, might have been done with a high hand, by virtue of the prerogative of the Crown; in support of which strange dectrine the following instances are given, in which it is alleged that what was done was done by virtue of the prerogative. Such are:—

"The Queen's Proclamation of Neutrality, of May 13th, 1861.

While I quite see how likely statements of this sort are to produce an effect on the minds of persons not familiar with the constitutional law of Great Britain, I am at a loss to understand how Counsel, familiar with English law, can take upon themselves to

The limits of the Royal prerogative are ascertained and defined: they certainly do not include a power to interfere with the liberty, property, or industrial pursuits of the subject, except where such power is expressly conferred by law. In the instances given, with the exception of the Queen's Proclamation, as to the effect of which I have already spoken, and the Regulations as to the admission of belligerent vessels to British ports, and the accommodation there to be afforded to them, which are undoubtedly matter of Royal Prerogntive, and the order in respect of the Shenandoah, which was, as will hereafter be seen, a most exceptional case, every instance enumerated was, though in one sense an act of the Executive, yet an act done by virtue of power conferred by the Foreign Enlistment Act and not by virtue of the prerogative. As an English Judge and lawyer, I affirm that, short of their going out as a hostile expedition, in which case force might undoubtedly be used, these vessels could not have been seized under the exercise of prerogative power.

Throughout the statements of the United States a comparison is drawn between Comparison the conduct of the United States and that of Great Britam in reference to the main-between Great tenance of neutrality. When the British Government retorts with instances of Britain and United American default in this respect the answer courses that it is Great Britain and United States as to American default in this respect, the answer comes that it is Great Britain, not the observance of United States, that is now on its trial. And this is perfectly true; but when the neutrality, plaintiff seeks to prejudice the defendant in the eye of the judge and of the world, and at the same time to secure favour to himself by holding up his own conduct es righteous and immaculate, whereby to make that of the defendant appear more black, it is but fair that his pretensions should be submitted to the criticism to which he justly exposes himself.

The Argument of the United States asks at the hands of this Tribunal for a rigorous enforcement of the obligations of neutrality against Great Britain, on the ground that, while the latter has been unmindful of its duties as a neutral, the United States have maintained a consistent and unvarying course in the most exemplary fulfilment of those duties. I select one from many passages in which a comparison between the two nations, in this respect, is invidiously made :-

" Qualis ab incepto talis ad finem. With consistency unwavering, and at whatever hazard of domestic or foreign inconvenience, even if it were friendly Powers like France and Great Britain with demestic of foreign incontention, the United States have steadily adhered to principles of international neutrality; and we may well, therefore, demand the observance of those principles or reparation for their non-observance on the part of Great Britain."

It becomes, therefore, perfectly legitimate to take—as is done in the British Counter-Case—a retrospect of the history of American neutrality so vauntingly extelled in the papers before us. It cannot be fair or just that a country in whose ports privateering against the commerce of friendly nations has been openly carried on upon the largest scale, and from whose shores armed expeditions and raids have in so many instances gone forth, should seek to enlist the favour of this Tribunal, in order to swell the damages against Great Britain, by holding itself up as a model of neutral perfection. It is not so much for this purpose, however, that I advert to the history of the past, as it is for that of showing that there is no foundation for the assumed superiority of American laws or institutions in respect of the fulfilment of neutral obligations. The use of a review of American history in this respect will readily legislation, sought to restrain its subjects within the strict limits of neutrality. But those who make this boast as against Great Britain should also remember that it was through the acts of American citizens that such legislation first became necessary. The large and just mind of the greatest of American statesmen saw at once the reproach and the danger arising to his country from her ports being used for the building and equipping of privateers by American citizens, and for sending them out, manned with American crews, commissioned by the French Government, to make war on British vessels while the United States and Great Britain were at peace. For, as I have already observed, this was the mischief against which the legislation of 1794 was directed.

At that time no complaint had arisen of ships of war being built for a belligerent. The complaint, again and again made by the British Minister, was of "the practice," as Mr. Jefferson calls it, "of commissioning, equipping, and manning vessels in American ports, to cruize on any of the belligerent parties."* The Gevernment of General Washington was perfectly sineere in its desire to prevent American ports from being used for this purpose; and, had there always been Washingtons at the head of affairs, the well-founded complaints of Spain and Portugal, in 1816 and 1817, might never have arisen. I say "well-founded complaints," for the few vessels built or equipped in Great Britain during the late civil war bear but a small proportion to the organized and systematic privateering which was carried on from American ports at the period I am referring to.

Complaints of Spain.

I first take the case of Spain, as it appears in the correspondence set out in the third volume of the British Appendix.

On the 2nd of January, 1817, Don Luis de Onis, Minister of Spain to the United States thus addresses Mr. Monroe, then Secretary of State:—

"Washington, January 2, 1817.

"The mischiefs resulting from the toleration of the armament of privateers in the ports of the Union, and of bringing into them, with impunity, the plunder made by these privateers on the Spanish trade, for the purpose of distributing it amongst those merchants who have no scruple in engaging in these priracies, have risen to such a height, that I should be wanting in my duty if I omitted to call your attention again to this very important subject.

It is notious that, although the speculative system of fitting out privateers, and putting them under a foreign flag one disavowed by all nations, for the purpose of destroying the Spanish commerce, has been more or less pursued in all the ports of the Union, it is more especially in those of New Orleans and Baltimore, where the greatest violations of the respect due to a friendly nation, and, if I may say so, of that due to themselves, have been committed; whole squadrons of pirates having been fitted out from thence, in violation of the solemn Treaty existing between the two nations, and bringing back to them the fruits of their piracies, without being yet checked in these courses, either by the rechmations I have made, those of His Majesty's Consuls, or the decisive and judicious orders issued by the President for that purpose."

After setting forth depredations done by three American privateers, he continues:—

"The Consul at New Orleans informs me, that the pirate Mitchell, with the vessels under his command, fitted out by different merchants at that port, of whom a Mr. Dupuy is supposed to be the principal, has lately taken several Spanish prizes to Galveston, and that from the proceeds of their sales he has remitted to the said deputies 105,000 dollars, which he has deposited in the Bank of Louisiana, after deducting the shares of the captain and crew, amounting, as is supposed, altogether to 200,000 dollars. The same Consul adds that two of the prizes, one from Campeachy, and the other from Gratemala, were burnt, and their crews handed by that savage monster, near Boquilla de Piedra, that they might be, as they actually were, put to death by his great friend, Villapinto, a noted reletringleader, who being pursued by the King's troops, had retreated to the seashore to make his escape. Of ninety men composing these crews, only nine were saved.

Of ninety men composing these crews, only nine were saved.

"The Consul at Norfolk informs me of the arrival there of a privateer schooner from Buens Ayres, one of several fitted out at Baltimore, and wholly owned there; that from what he has been able to ascertain, among other vessels she plundered a Spanish ship, laden with a cargo of cochined, indigo, and specie, to the amount of more than 200,000 dollars, and proceeded to Baltimore to divide the spoil among the concerned. The said Consul, in the discharge of his duty and exercise of his rights, addressed an application to the Collector of the Customs, copy of which is annexed, and also of the answer of the Collector, by which you will perceive that he declines this just rechanation. I could cite immunerable other cases, as well attested as those I have just stated, but I omit them, at their detail would fatigue you, without tending to demonstrate more effectually that they proceed from the non-observance by the officers of this Government of the President's Proclamation, and of the Treaty of Limits and Xavigation between the two Governments."

"I have just received information from the King's Consul at New Orleans of the capture, within sight of the Balize of that port, and at little more than musket-shot from the land, of the Spanish schooner Hipolita. Captain Don Buenaventura March, by the pirate Jupiter, under the Margarita flag. To enable you fully to judge of the atrociousness of this capture, manifestly in violation of the territory of the United States, I have the honour to inclose the declaration of the captain of the raid schooner, made before His Majesty's Consul at the aforesaid port, by which it appears he was at anchor in the Pass of the Mississippi, and with pratique from the Balize, on board, when he was boarded by the aforesaid pirate, and so inhumanly treated by him as to be left weltering in his blood on the deck.

"It would be superfluous to affect your sensibility by a detail of the multiplied injuries and outrages incessantly sustained by His Majesty's subjects in these ports; they have already been admitted by the President in his Message to Congress, recommending the adoption of such measures as in their wisdom may appear best calculated to repress them, thereby offering to the Kim my master a pledge that his Excellency admits the necessity of indemnifying them as far as possible. It is, however, with great regret that I have to remark on the delay in carrying such urgent measures into execution, and that the injuries complained of have not been prevented by a due observance of the laws of nations, and of the existing Treaty, which, by the Constitution, has the force of law in all the Courts, in consequence of its ratification by the President and the Senate."*

On the 10th of February Don Luis complains of five more privateers belonging to ports of the States, as having taken prizes, and being engaged in cruizing against Spanish ships.†

On the 26th of March he writes :-

"I have just been informed that there have entered at Norfolk two pirates, under the flag of Buenos Ayres, the principal of which is called the Independencia del Sud, armed with 16 guns and 150 men; her captain is the well-known pirate called Commodore Chaytor. The second is the schooner Romp, which, to enter into that port, has changed her name to that of Atrevida; she has a crew of 70 men, and appeared to be commanded by a person called Grinnolds. Both vessels were built and fitted out at Baltimore, belong to citizens of that place, and others in this Republic, and their crews and captains are of the same. Their entrance into Norfolk has been public, to revictual, and return to their cruize against the subjects of the King, my master; but their principal object is to place in safety the fruits of their piracies, which must be of great importance, if we attend to the information from Havana, which states that they have robbed a single Spanish vessel coming from Vera Cruz, of 90,000 dollars; and to the fact that, on the 21st of the present month, they had deposited 60,000 dollars in the Bank of Norfolk, had landed a number of packages of cochineal, and had declared that they had taken to the amount of 290,000 dollars. I am informed that the person called Commodore Chaytor was abent to set out for Baltimore, probably to settle accounts, and divide his robberies with the persons interested in the outfit. It is a circumstance worthy of remark, that these two pirates saluted the fort at Norfolk, and that it returned the salute upon the same terms as would have been done with a vessel of war of my Sovereign, or of any other nation acknowledged by all independent Powers."

At the same time another vessel, the Orb, is made the subject of equally strong complaint:—

The pirate Orb, fitted out at Baltimore, under the name of the Congress, and flag of Buenos Ayres, commanded by Joseph Almeida, a Portuguese, and a citizen of this Republic, has had the adactive to return and enter the said port, there to deposit a part of his robberies. The piratical character of this vessel is as fully acknowledged as it is proved that she was armed and manned with people of this country, and of others in the above-mentioned port, and that she had made different prizes in the neighbourhood of Cadiz and other ports; since there now is in the port of New York the Spanish polacre, the Leona, captured by her, whose cargo, consisting of 200,000 dollars, is concealed, where it is not known; and in the same port of Baltimore there are deposited the proceeds of the Spanish Frg Sereno and her cargo, captured by the same vessel. No evidence can, in my judgment, be offered which gives greater certainty to facts so notorious. If by chance anything could be added thereto, it would be the acknowledgment of their atrocities. Nevertheless, I have the mortification to say, that neither this notoriety nor the reclamations of His Majesty's Consul at that port, have as yet been sufficient to produce those steps which are required by humanity to secure the person of this notorious pirate, to take the declarations of the crew, and to prevent their enjoying their plunder to the prejudice of the lawful owners."

One cannot help being struck with the similarity of the complaints of the Spaniard with those of which we have lately heard so much. The ships are "pirates;" the facts are "notorious;" "no further evidence can be necessary."

In like manner we have Mr. Rush answering as though it had been from Downing

"I have had the honour to receive your two notes, dated the 26th of this month, stating that you have been informed that two armed vessels which have been committing unauthorized depredations upon the commerce of Spain have recently arrived at Norfolk, and that a third, liable to the same charge, has arrived at Baltimore, thus bringing themselves within the reach of those laws against which, in the above and in other ways, it is alleged they have offended.

"Conformably to the constant desire of this Government to vindicate the authority of its laws and the faith of its Treaties, I have lost no time in writing to the proper officers, both at Norfolk and Baltimore, in order that full inquiry may be made into the allegations contained in your notes, and adequate redress and punishment enforced, should it appear that the laws have been infringed by any of the acts complained of.

" I use the present occasion to acknowledge also the secipt of you, note of the 14th of this mouth which you did me the honour to address to me, communicating information that had reached you of other and like infractions of our laws within the port of Baltimore; in relation to which I have to state that letters were also written to the proper officers in that city, with a view to promote every fit measure of investigation and redress. Should it prove necessary 1 will have the honour to address you more fully at another time upon the subjects embraced in these several notes. In the meantime 1 venture to assure myself, that in the readiness with which they have thus far been attended to, you will perceive a spirit of just conciliation on the part of this Government, as well as a prompt sensibility to the rights of your Sovereign."*

Don Luis replies as Mr. Adams or Mr. Dudley might have done:-

"By your note of yesterday I am apprized that the President, on being informed by the notes to which you have replied, of the andacity with which the pirates armed in this country introduce into it the fruits of their robberies, has been pleased to give suitable orders to the authorities at Norfolk and Baltimore, that having ascertained the facts which I have brought to his knowledge, they should duly proceed according to law against the violators of the Laws of this Republic. The District Attorney for the United States at Baltimore has replied to the King's Consul there, that he has no evidence upon which he can proceed against Captain Almeida; but if a witness should offer, who will depose to the facts referred to, he will proceed to order an embargo to be laid on his vessel. I am perfectly aware that good order, the personal security of individuals, and the prevention of any violence being committed upon them, require that suits should be instituted according to the rules of Court; but when a crime is notorious to all, and is doubted by none, when the tranquillity and security of the State, the honour of the nation, and the respect that independent Powers owe to each other, are interested in putting a stop to crimes so enormous as those I have had the honour to denounce to you, it appears to me that the magistrates are authorized to collect a summary body of information, to inquire whether the public opinion is doubtful, and if there be ground to institute a suit. The Collector of the Custems cannot be ignorant that the three vessels, which I have named to you, were built and fitted out at Baltimore; that they were cleared at that Custom-house as Americans; that their crews were, at their departure, composed of citizens of this Union, as were their Captains; and that the effects which they have landed can only come from Spanish countries. What stronger testimony, if more is wanted, than their own declaration, can be desired to proceed against these pirates?

The ship's papers, the declarations of the crews, the log-book, are all testimony which can throw light upon the truth or falsehood of the crime alleged, and make it unnecessary to trouble them until it be ascertained that there is ground for proceeding judicially against them."+

Next comes a complaint of the capture of a Spanish brig by the pirate Almeida, commanding the Orb or Congress, with depositions of sailors of the captured vessel.‡

These letters, like those of Mr. Adams, are accompanied by others from the local Consuls, with copies of correspondence between those functionaries and the collectors Thus Don Antonio Villalobos having called on Mr. Mallory, Collector of of the ports. Norfolk, to seize two noted privateers, the Independencia del Sud and the Atrevida. saying that these vessels had been "improving their equipment and considerably augmenting their crew," Mr. Mallory writes, as Mr. Edwards might have done:—

" In reply I conceive it proper only to remark, that these vessels have not been unnoticed by me. and that, in my conduct towards them, I shall endeavour, as I have done, to observe that course which my official duties appear to me to have prescribed. In pursuing which, that I may have the aid of every light to guide me which facts can afford, and as the allegations thus made by you, in an official form, must be presumed to be bottomed on positive facts, which have come to your knowledge, you will have the gooduess, I trust, to furnish me, with as little delay as possible, with the evidence of their existence in your possession."§

The Spanish Dudley replies:-

" With regard to the evidence you require I will not hesitate to say that, as the facts I have stated are matter of public notoriety, known to everybody, and I had no reason to suppose that you were ignorant of them, I did not deem it incumbent upon me to add any proof to the simple narration of them; and I was confident that, by going on to point out to you the stipulations and laws which are infringed in consequence of those facts, you will think yourself authorized to interfere in the manner requested.

"I will assert, Sir, as a known fact, that the brig now called Independencia del Sud is the same vessel which was formerly known under the name of the Mammoth privateer, belonging to Baltimore, armed and equipped in that port, from which she sailed under the command of the same James Chayter, who still commands her; that the very same James Chaytor was necessarily then, and cannot have ceased since to be, a citizen of the United States, is settled and has a family in Baltimere, whence his wife came down a few days ago in the packet Walter Gray, and is now in this town on a visit to her husband; that he has enlisted men in this port, many of whom are not so obscure as not to be generally

The Collector did not look upon the facts as sufficient to warrant any action on his part.

The correspondence goes on in much the same strain, On the 19th of September Don Luis writes to Mr. J. Q. Adams :-

A complaint having been laid before His Catholic Majesty's Government by a part of the crew of the Spanish polacca Santa Maria, captured on her passage from Havana to Cadiz by the pirate called the Patriota Mexicano, commanded by José Guillermo Estefanos, manned with citizens of these cannot the ratinos are stated and control of the classed and brought to the said polacre, until, having ascertained her capture, he hoisted the insurgent flag, 1 have received the commands of the King my ascertained ner capture, ne noisted the insurgent mag, i have received the commands of the Aring my Master to request of the President, through your medium, the most decisive measures for putting an end to the abuses practised in the ports of this Union, by arming privateers to cruize against the Spanish trade, thus prostituting the flag of the United States by these predatory acts, and trampling ander foot, with an unparalleled audacity, national rights and the existing Treaty between Spain and

"I therefore now renew those urgent reclamations which, on former occasions, I have submitted to the President, through your Department, on this important point; and I trust that the numerous instances of these abuses and horrible depredations will induce his Excellency to adopt energetic measures to restrain these excesses, which so deeply compromit the neutrality of the United States in the eyes of all nations, and are wholly repugnant to the friendship and good understanding happily subsisting between them and His Catholic Majesty."+

In a letter of the 2nd of November, he writes :-

"It is very disagreeable to me to have to repeat to you, Sir, what, unfortunately, I have been This very disagreeance to the to interest repeated you, Sn, what, unfortunately, I have been several times under the necessity of submitting to the President, through the medium of your predecessors, namely, that the Act of Congress of the 3rd of March 1817, has in no wise lessened the abases by which the laws are evaded, and which render entirely illusory the laudable purposes for which they were enacted. From the greater part of the ports of these States there frequently sail a considerable they were enacted. From the greater part of the ports of these States there frequently sail a considerable namber of vessels with the premeditated intention of attacking the Spanish commerce, which carry their armament concealed in the hold. It rarely happens that they can be arrested, inasmuch as the Collectors of the Customs say that they have not at their disposition the naval force necessary to effect it; on the other hand, armed vessels, under the flag of the insurgents, enter into the ports of the it; on the other hand, armed vessels, under the hag of the insurgents, enter into the ports of the Union, and not only supply themselves with all necessaries, but also considerably increase the means they already have of destroying the trade of Spain, as has recently been the case at New York, whereby (the so-called) privateers of His Majesty's revolted provinces, which are in reality nothing more than pirates, manned by the seum of all countries, enjoy greater privileges than the vessels of independent Powers."

The same state of things continues in 1818. On the 9th of June, Don Luis de Onis informs Mr. Adams :-

"At my passage through Baltimore, on my way to Philadelphia, it was represented to me by His Catholic Majesty's Consul for the State of Maryland that there were in that port four pirates, or privateers, if you please so to call them, namely, the Independencia del Sud, Captain Grinneld; the Paerredon, alias Mangore, Captain Barnes; the Republicano, Captain Chase; and the schooner Alerta, Captain Chaytor. These pirates, denominated privateers, or vessels of war, of the pretended Government of Baenos Ayres, have entered the port of Baltimore for the purpose of dividing the spoil resulting from their depredations on Spanish commerce, and of refitting and arming to renew these excesses on the high seas. It is a matter of universal notoriety at Baltimore that three of the above-named vessels were fitted out there, and the fourth is a schooner captured by them from Spanish subjects; it is no less so that their commanders, and the greater part of the crews are American citizens, and that there is scarcely a single individual belonging to Buenos Ayres to be found among them.

"I am aware, Sir, that you will tell me that the Courts are open to the recognizance of claims of this nature, and ready to apply the law to such cases as occur and are supported by suitable testimony; this nature, and ready to apply the law to such cases as occur and are supported by suitable resultingly, but I am under the necessity of declaring to you that it is in vain to seek such testimony, however clear it may be to everybody. I have demonstrated, in the most pointed manner, to His Majesty's Consul the prepriety of directing his intention to points of so much importance; but he has proved to me that a great portion of the commercial people of Baltimore being interested in the cases which produce my present reclamations, no one is willing to come forward and offer testimony against what is termed the general interest; and thus the wise measures of Government are eluded, justice is paralyzed, and the suits procrastinated and deferred from Court to Court, with a view to deprive His Majesty's subjects of that justice which they have an undoubted right to seek in the tribunals on all their claims."*

Having stated that the vessels, in addition to the object of "conveying to the parties interested at Baltimore the proceeds of their spoliations on the Spanish commerce, and, among others, that of the Philippine Company's ship Triton, to the amount of 1,500,000 dollars, captured by the pirate Independencia del Sud, and carried to Buenos Ayres to be sold there, have a project in fitting out anew and of attacking some possessions of the King my Master on this continent, to which they may more easily send their prizes; that these same privateers have brought in two Spanish prizes, which are at this moment in the port of Baltimore, one of them a vessel belonging to the Royal Navy," he continues:—

"I therefore demand, in the name of the King my Master, the restoration of those prizes, as having been made by American citizens, and vessels fitted out in this country, in violation of the existing Treaty between the two Powers, and that the sailing of the said privateers be stopped, and they compelled to give security for the result of an expedition, of which, without knowing positively that they intend to execute it. I have the strongest grounds for presuming they mean to do." †

The correspondence closes with a letter of Don Luis to Mr. Adams of the 16th of November, 1818, in which he thus writes:—

"Whatever may be the forecast, wisdom, and justice conspicuous in the laws of the United States. it is universally notorious that a system of pillage and aggression has been organized in several parts of the Union against the vessels and property of the Spanish nation; and it is equally so that all the legal suits hitherto instituted by His Catholic Majesty's Consuls, in the courts of their respective districts, for its prevention, or the recovery of the property, when brought into this country, have been and still are, completely unavailing. The artifices and evasions by means of which the letter of the law has on these occasions been constantly cluded, are sufficiently known, and even the combination of interests in persons who are well known, amongst whom are some holding public offices. With a view to afford you and the President more complete demonstration of the abuses, aggressions, and piracies alluded to, I inclose you correct lists, extracted from authentic documents deposited in the archives of this Legation, exhibiting the number of privateers, or pirates, fitted out in the United States against Spain, and of the prizes brought by them into the ports of the Union, as well as of those sent to other ports, tegether with the result of the claims made by the Spanish Consuls in the courts of this country. Among them you will find the case of two armed ships, the Horazio and Curiazo, built at New York, and detained by His Majesty's Consul there, on the ground of their having on board thiny pieces of cannon concealed, with their carriages, and a crew of 160 men. On which oceasion it was pretended that it could not be proved that these guns were not an article of commerce, and they tinally put to sea without them, the extraordinary number of officers and crew passing for passengers. The number of privateers, or pirates, fitted out and protected in the ports of this Republic, as well as of the Spanish prizes made by them, far exceeds that contained in the within list, but I only lay before your Government those of which I have certain and satisfactory proofs. The right of Spain to an adequate indemnity for all the spoliations committed by these privateers, or pirates, on the Crown and subjects of His Catholic Majesty, is undeniable; but I now submit it to your Government only to point out the extreme necessity of putting an end to these continued acts of hostility and depredation, and of cutting short these enormous and flagrant abuses and evils, by the adoption of such effectual precautions and remedies as will put it out of the power of cupidity or ingenuity to defeat or clude them."

The letter is accompanied by a list of thirty privateers belonging to the port of New Orleans, Charlestown, Philadelphia, Baltimore, and New York, with a formidable list of prizes made by them.

During this time similar complaints had been constantly addressed to the United States' Government, on behalf of that of Portugal, by the Minister of the latter Power, the Chevalier Correa de Serra. Portugal being at that time involved in war with the Artigas Government, privateers were in like manner fitted out and manned by American citizens against the commerce of Portugal.

On the 8th of March, 1818, the Portuguese Minister writes to Mr. Adams that he is ordered to lay before the eyes of the United States' Government the case of three Portuguese ships (of which he gives the details) "captured by privateers fitted in the United States manned by American crews and commanded by American captains, though under insurgent colours." He incloses an extract from the documents proving these facts, and offers to place the documents themselves at the disposal of Mr. Adams.§

Mr. Adams, setting, as it were, an example to future British Foreign Secretaries, answers:—

"Sir, "Woshington, October 15, 1818.
"This very moment 1 perceive the intelligence that a ship is fitting in the Pataxent to cruize against the Portuguese commerce, and the ship so lifting is no other than the Portuguese fine brig Soam Sexto, taken some we ke before by the Baldinonega privateer Fortuna, sent into Beautort, North Carolina, and the greats shipped for New York and Baltimore where they are under reclamation. Captain Taylor left Baltimore on Sunday to take charge of her, and the night before the last a great deal of stores left Baltimore for this ship.

The reply comes—that the vessel shall be seized? No.

"I have had the honour of receiving, and have laid before the President of the United States, your letter of the 15th instant. I am directed by him to inform you that, if you will furnish a list of the names of the persons chargeable with a violation of the laws of the United States, in fitting out and arming a vessel within the United States for the purpose of craizing against the subjects of your sovereign, and of the witnesses by whose testimony the charge can be substantiated, directions will be given to the Attorney of the United States for the district of Maryland to institute suits against the persons complained of, in the proper court competent to their trial.

"I pray you, &c. "doux Q. Adams."

Yet there can be no doubt that, during this time, the United States Government were honestly sincere in their desire to put down the scandal occasioned by this wholesale system of privateering. Several vessels were seized, of which some were actually condemned, others released only on giving security; but the practice continued, vessels being enabled to cinde all the vigilance and activity of the officials. As late as the 23rd of November, 1819, the Chevalier de Serra writes in a disconsolate strain, representing the evil as increasing rather than diminishing :-

" Philadelphia, November 23, 1819.

"I have the honour of submitting to you tle following facts and considerations: a During more than two years I have been obliged by my duty to oppose the systematic and organized depredations daily committed on the property of Portuguese subjects by people living in the United States and with ships fitted in ports of the Union, to the ruin of the commerce of Portugal. I do justice to, and am grateful for, the proceedings of the Executive, in order to put a stop to these depredations, but the evil is rather increasing. I can present to you, if required, a list of fifty terretarders ships, almost all richly laden, some of them East Indiamen, which have been taken by these people during the period of full peace. This is not the whole loss we have sustained, this list comprehending only those captures of which I have received official complaints. The victims have been many more, besides violations of territory by landing and plundering ashore with shocking circumstances.

"One city alone on this coast has armed twenty-six ships which prev on our vitals, and a week ago three armed ships of this nature were in that port waiting for a favourable occasion of sailing for a cruize. Certainly, the people who commit these excesses are not the United States, but nevertheless they live in the United States and employ against us the resources which this situation allows them, It is impossible to view them otherwise than a wide extended and powerful tribe of infidels, worse still than those of North Africa. The North Africans make prizes with leave of their Government according to their laws and after a declaration of war; but these worse infidels of whom I speak, make prizes from nations friendly to the United States against the will of the Government of the United States, and in spite of the laws of the United States. They are more powerful than the African infidels, because the whole coast of Barbary does not possess such a strength of privateers. They are numerous and widely scattered, not only at sea for action, but ashere likewise to keep their ground against the obvious and plain sense of your laws, since most generally, wherever they have been called to the law they have found abettors who have helped them to invade the laws by formalities.

"I shall not tire you with the numerous instances of these facts, but it may be easily conceived how I am heartily sick of receiving frequent communications of Portuguese property stolen, of delinquents inconceivably acquitted, letters from Portuguese merchants deeply injured in their fortunes, and seeing me (as often as has been the case) oppressed by prayers for bread from Portuguese suilors thrown penniless on the shores after their ships had been captured.

"The Executive having honourably exerted the powers with which your Constitution invests him. and the evil he wished to stop being found too refractory, it would be more and fruitless importunity if I continued with individual complaints except by positive orders. This Government is the only proper judge of what constitutional depositions or arrangements may be established for the enforcement of the laws, and he alone has the means of obtaining them, which are constitutionally shut to any foreign Minister: I trust in the wisdom and justice of this Government that he will find the proper means of putting an end to this monstrous infidel conspiracy, so heterogeneous to the very nature of the United States.

Before such convenient means are established the efforts of a Portuguese Minister on this subject (the only one of importance at present between the two nations) are of little profit to the interests of his Sovereign. Relying confidently on the successful efforts of the Government to bring forth such a desirable order of things, I choose this moment to pay a visit to Brazil, where I am authorized by His Majesty to go. My age and my private affairs do not allow much delay in making use of this permission, and I intend to profit by the first proper occasion that may offer. The arrangements for my departure will require my personal excitions, and it will not be consequently in my power to make an early or long residence in Washington this winter. As soon as I shall be able I will present myself there to pay my due obeisance to the President of the United States, and my respects to you.

of his fil un properties of St. St. St. ar

The United States' Government took the very proper step of getting an Act passed prohibiting the entrance of privateers into certain ports of the United States, but this does not appear to have had the effect of stopping the evil; privateering appears, if we may judge by the continued complaints, to have gone on as before.

On the 8th of June, 1820, the Chevalier de Serra calls attention to a ship, taken by one of the privateers, having been sold by judicial authority "in Baltimore, under the hammer, to Captain Chase, a notorious privateersman, standing under an indictment for piracy."

He adds :-

"It is to be immediately fitted as a privateer (and a formidable one it will prove, by its size and strength, which are those of a good frigate), to cruize against the Portuguese Indiamen, and the command of it to be given, as it is assured, to the notorious ('aptain Taylor.

"I have not the least doubt that the Sopreme Executive of this nation has both the power and the will of putting a stop to this hostile armament, particularly when, as in this case, he has timely information which will be successively put under his eyes, at the very stage of this inimical attempt on the Portuguese commerce."+

Again, on the 16th of July :-

"Sir,
"I am ordered by my Sovereign to lay before this Government the names and value of nineten citizens of these States. The values have been ascertained by the proper courts of justice, and revisel with all eare and attention by the Royal Board of Commerce. In proportion as the value of the other ships stolen is in the same manner ascertained, their names, and the amount of losses, will be laid before this Government."1

The value of the nineteen ships is stated at 616,158 dollars.

In this letter the Chevalier proposes the appointment of Commissioners to "confer and agree upon what reason and justice demand." The proposal was declined.

The reply was :-

"The appointment of Commissioners to confer and agree with the Ministers of Her Most Faithful Majesty upon the subject to which your letter refers, would not be consistent with the Constitution of the United States nor with any practice usual among civilized nations. The judicial power of the United States is, by their Constitution, vested in their Supreme Court, and in Tribunals subordinate to the same. The Judges of these Tribunals are amenable to their country by impeachment, and if any Portuguese subject has suffered wrong by any act of any citizen of the United States within their jurisdiction, it is before these Tribunals that the remedy is to be sought and obtained. For any acts of citizens of the United States committed out of their jurisdiction and beyond their control, the Government of the United States is not responsible."§

The preposal was renewed in 1822, but again declined. The Government had done all it could do. "Every altention, compatible with the rights of citizens of the United States and with the laws of nations, had been paid by the Government to the complaints of M. Correa of captures made by privateers fitted out within the United States and partly manned by their citizens," "The laws for securing the faithful performance of the duties of neutrality had been revised and enforced; decrees of restitution had been pronounced by the Judicial Tribunals in all cases of Portuguese captured vessels brought within the jurisdiction of the United States; and all the measures within the competency of the Executive had been taken by that department of the Government for repressing the litting out of privateers from United States' ports, and the culistment of citizens in them.'

Mr. Adams adds, in a letter to the United States' Minister at Lisbon: "These measures, however, do not appear to have been altogether satisfactory to the Portuguese Government, doubtless because they are not sufficiently understood by them."* The Portuguese Minister thought that the short and simple process would have been to seize the ships, by virtue of the Executive power; but the Mr. Adams of that day thought of "the rights of American citizens and the law of nations.

The pleudings of the United States say little or nothing in answer to the facts relating to Port and As to those relating to Spain, they say in a somewhat off-hand way, "What them?" Nor do I think that matters which happened half a century ago can with any fairness be brought forward to the prejudice of the United States in answer to the present claim, not even though provocation might have been given by the assertion of American superiority so ostentatiously obtruded in the pleadings of the United States. But these instances of infractions of maritime neutrality on so large a scale are important for a very different purpose: they show the difficulty of repressing offences of this sort; they show that the asserted superiority of the American law is an empty boast; and they entirely bear out my view as to the alleged power of the President to make up for any deficiency in the ordinary law as administered by the courts. In the long series of complaints made by the Representatives of Spain and Portugal as to the thirty privateers, of the issuing of which from the ports of the United States Don Luis de Onis thus incessantly complains, or as to the twenty-six which the Chevalier de Serra mournfully enumerates as capturing Portuguese vessels, no instance, so far as I am aware, occurs in which, when the Government officials alleged that the evidence was insufficient, the President intervened, by virtue of the discretionary power said to be vested in him, to

The temporary Act passed by the American Congress in 1838, on the occasion of American Act of the Canadian insurrection, has been more than once referred to in the course of the 1838. present controversy. §

The circumstances under which that Act was passed are stated in the Proclamation of President Van Buren, of the 5th of January, 1838, in which he said that information had "just been received that, notwithstanding the Proelamation of the Governors of the States of New York and Vermont, exhorting their citizens to refrain from any unlawful acts within the territory of the United States, and notwithstanding the presence of the civil officers of the United States arms and munitions of war and other supplies have been procured by the (Canadian) insurgents in the United States; that a military force, consisting in part, at least, of citizens of the United States, had been actually organized, had congregated at Navy Island, and were still in arms under the command of a citizen of the United States, and that they were constantly receiving accessions and aid.'

As Congress sits from January to March, the necessary law which the circum stances called for might have been passed at once, but it was delayed fill March 10, 1838, and does not appear to have been approved by the President until the 20th of April; even then, it seems either to have been inefficacions or feebly enforced, as on the 21st of November, the President issued another Proclamation :-

"Whereas, there is too much reason to believe that citizens of the United States, in disregard of the solemn warning heretofore given to them by the Proclamation issued by the Executive of the general Government, and by some of the Governors of the States, have combined to disturb the peace of a neighbouring and friendly nation; and whereas information has been given to me, derived from official and other sources, that many citizens in different parts of the United States are associated or associating for the same purpose; and whereas disturbances have actually broken out anew in different parts of the two Canadas; and whereas a hostile invasion has been made by citizens of the United States, in conjunction with Canadians and others, who, after forcibly seizing upon the property of then peaceful neighbour, for the purpose of effecting their unlawful designs, are now in arms against the authorities of Canada, in perfect disregard of their own obligations as American citizens, and of the obligations of the Government of their country to foreign nations :-

It may here be remarked, in passing, that, while open assistance was thus afforded from the United States to the Canadian insurgents, in 1838, during the whole period of the civil war, the Confederates never once succeeded in directing any hostile operations of importance from Canada against the exposed American frontier; and that, in October 1864, when a few adventurers made the attack on the bank at St. Alban's (a town near the Vermont boundary), prompt measures were taken to prevent any such attempt being renewed from the Canadian side, and an Act was passed by the Canadian Parliament when it met in February 1865, quice as stringent in its provisions as the Act of Congress of 1838.

Lopez, a Spanish adventurer, had formed a plan in 1849 for an attack on Cuba. with the object of annexing it to the United States. The idea of Cuban annexation was then in great favour with an important political party, who hoped to secure the entrance of a slave-holding State into the Union, and thus counterbalance the growing power of the northern or free States. Lopez accordingly met with much popular

On the 11th August, 1849, the President of the United States issued a Proclamation stating that "there was reason to believe that an armed expedition was about to be fitted out in the United States, with an intention to invade the Island of Cuba or some of the provinces of Mexico," and that "the best information which the Executive had been able to obtain pointed to the island of Cuba as the object of this expedition;" and calling upon "every officer of this Government, civil or military, to use all efforts in his power to arrest, for trial and punishment, every such offender against the laws providing for the performance of our sacred obligations to friendly Powers."

On the 7th May, 1850, Lopez left New Orleans in a steamer with about 500 raen. accompanied by two other vessels, and, on the 17th, landed at Cardenas, a small town on the north-west side of the island, and occupied the town; but troops arriving sbortly afterwards from Rayana, he was compelled to re-embark, and escaped to the United States.*

It appears, from the Appendix to the American Counter-Case,† that, on the 25th of May, orders were given for the arrest of Lopez; but the Appendix is silent as to the result, which was that no delay being granted by the district judge to procure evidence against him, he was discharged amid the cheers of a large crowd.

The Spanish Authorities liberated forty-two of Lopez' band, whom they had taken prisoners, and they were taken back to the United States in the United States' ship Albany. A further attempt seems to have been made to bring Lepez and his follows: to justice, as, on the 21st of July, the grand jury at New Orleans found a true bill against him and fifteen others, for violating the Act of 1818; but the American Government failed in making out their case, and finally abandoned the prosecution.

On the 25th of April, 1851, the President issued another Proclamation, stating that "there was reason to believe that a military expedition was about to be fitted out in the United States, with intention to invade the island of Cuba," and warning all persons of the penaltics they would incur by joining in it. The President concluded by 'calling upon every officer of this Government civil and military, to use all efforts in his power, to arrest for trial and punishment every such offender against the laws of the country."

Nevertheless, in the following August, Lopez started on a fresh expedition, of which the following details are taken from the President's Message to Congress of Lopez left New Orleans for Cuba on the 3rd of August in the steamer Pampero with 400 men, "with evident intentions to make war upon the authorities of the island." The steamer left stealthily, and without a clearance, and, after touching at Key West, proceeded to the coast of Cuba. Lopez and his band were soon overpowered by the Spanish troops, and Lopez himself was publicly executed at Havana.

The President adds:-

"What gives a peculiar criminality to this invasion of Cuba is, that under the lead of Spanish subjects, and with the aid of citizens of the United States, it had its origin, with many, in motives of singlets, and who are not all controls of the content rates, it may no origin, with many, in motives of capidity. Money was advanced by individuals, probably in considerable amounts, to purchase Cuban capidity. Money was advanced by individuals, probably in considerable amounts, to purchase Cuban bonds, as they have been called, issued by Lopez, sold, doubtless, at a very large discount, and for the payment of which the public lands and public property of Cuba, of whatever kind, and the fiscal resources of the people and Government of that island, from whatever source to be derived, were resources of the people and Cotestinated of the Government expected to be established. All these means of payment, it is evident, were only to be obtained by a process of bloodshed, war, and revolution. None will deny that those who set on foot military expeditions against foreign States by means like these are far more culpable than the ignorant and the necessitous whom they induce to go forth as the ostensible parties in the proceeding. These originators of the invasion of Cuba seem to have determined, with parties in the proceeding. These originators of the invasion of the ascent to have determined, with cooliness and system, upon an undertaking which should disgrace their country, violate its laws, and put to hazard the lives of ill-informed and deluded men. You will consider whether further legislation be necessary to prevent the perpetration of such offences in future."

No such further legislation was, however, carried out; though it was not long before the need for it was again put to the test.

This time the seene of operations was on the Pacific Coast and the leader chosen Walker's Expedito conduct it was the well known Walker; the plan being to gain possession of the tion against Mexican possessions in Lower California.

The attempt was made in October 1853, by an expedition from San Francisco. The invaders seized the town of La Paz, killed seven of its defenders, and wounded others, and committed various excesses. They were reinforced by another expedition, which sailed in the Anita from San Francisco in December, but they were eventually driven out of the country.

This expedition seems to have given rise to a new name, that of "filibusters," which has since been used to designate those who engage in outrages of this description, having their origin in America.

Filibustering became a sort of profession; and, under the name of " transit" and "emigration" companies, schemes were next openly planued for attacking Central America.

Walker sailed for San Francisco on the 4th of May 1855, arrived at Realejo on the 15th of June, and assumed the title of President of Nicaragua, in which capacity he was recognized by the United States' Representative. Having been surrounded at Rivas by the native forces in May 1857, through the mediation of the Commander of the United States' ship of war St. Mary's he was allowed to surrender unmolested, and to be conveyed away on board that vessel, with the remnant of his followers.

On returning to the United States, he organized a fresh expedition, this time at New Orleans. The attention of the Authorities was called to it, and a circular was issued on the 18th September, 1857, which states that "there is reason to believe that lawless persons are now engaged within the limits of the United States, in setting on foot and preparing the means for military expeditions, to be carried on against the territories of Mexico, Nicaragua, and Costa Rica;" after which it proceeds to call upon the District Actorneys and Marshals "to use all due diligence, and to avail" themselves "of all legitimate means at" their "command" to enforce the provisions of the Act of 1818.

In October, Lord Napier, Her Majesty's Minister at Washington, had warned the American Secretary of State that 2,000 men had been enrolled, arms purchased, 250,000*l.* subscribed, and that shipping was being hired.

On the 10th of November, Walker was arrested and was held to bail in 2,000 dollars; but, on the very next day, he embarked with 300 unarmed followers from New Orleans for Mobile Bay, where he was joined by fresh recruits in another vessel, the Fashion, in which he sailed for Nicaragua. Some of his hand occupied Fort Castillo. He was himself, with the others, detained by the United States' Commodore Paulding in the San Juan River and taken to Aspinwall, whence he returned to the United States.†

The Counsel of the United States have taken credit for their Government for this proceeding on the part of the Commodore. They say, "when wrong-doers manifested obstinate persistence of wrong, the military and naval officers of character and discretion, like General Scott, Admiral Paulding, and General Meade, were employed to apply to such persons the only method of prevention applicable to the case, namely, force, to maintain the domestic order and foreign peace of the Government."

As a matter of fact, however, the proceedings of the Commodore were at the time justly censure, as having been in excess of his authority.

The President, in his Message to Congress of the 7th of January, 1858,* uses this anguage :--

"In capturing tieneral Walker and his command after they had landed on the soil of Nicaragua. Commodoro Paulding has, in my opinion, committed a grave error. The error of this gallant office consists in exceeding his instructions and landing his sailors and marines in Nicaragua, whether with or without her consent, for the purpose of making war upon any military force whatever, which he night without her consent, no matter from whence they came. Under these circumstances, when Marshal Rynders presented himself at the State Department on the 23th ultimo with General Walker in custody, the Secretary informed him 'that the Executive Department of the Government did not reconize General Walker as a prisoner; that it had no directions to give concerning him and that it is only through the action of the Judiciary that he could be lawfully held in custody to answer any charges that might be brought against him."

The protest of the Nicaraguan and Costa Rican Governments will be found in the correspondence presented to Parliament respecting Central America, together with a description by Lord Napier of the grievous injury inflicted by the filibusters upon those countries. General Cass replied, on behalf of the United States' Government—

"That unlawful warlike enterprises have been carried on from the United States, composed of persons from different countries, against the territory of Nicaragua, is not to be denied. But during the whole progress of these illegal efforts, the Government of this country has faithfully performed the day imposed upon it by the laws, as well through public proclamations against such enterprises, as by giving the necessary directions to the proper officers to prevent their organization and departure, as by invoking the action of the judicial tribunals, and also by the employment of its naval force."

He, at the same time, "denied that a fresh invasion was preparing." This was on the 25th of July. In October, President Buchanan found it necessary to issue a Proclamation, containing the following passages, which show that General Cass's information was far from correct, or that the Government officials, from whose reports be had gained it, must have been singularly blind to what was taking place:—

"Whereas information has reached me from sources which I cannot disregard, that certain persons, in violation of the Neurality Laws of the United States, are making a third attempt to set on toot a military expedition within their territory, against Nicaragua, a foreign State with which they are pened in order to raise money for equipping and maintaining this expedition, persons connected therewith, as I have reason to believe, have issued and sold bonds and other contracts pledging the public lands of Nicaragua and the transit route through its territory, as a security for their redemption and fulfillment.

"The hostile design of this expedition is rendered manifest by the fact that these bonds and contracts can be of no possible value to their holders unless the present Government of Nicaragua shall be overthrown by force.

"The leaders of former illegal expeditions of the same character have openly expressed their intention to renew hostilities against Nicaragua. One of them, who has already been twice expelled from Nicaragua, has invited, through the public newspapers, American citizens to emigrate to that Republic, and has designated Mobile as the place of rendezvous and departure, and San Juan del Norte as the port to which they are bound. This person, who has renounced his allegiance to the United States, and claims to be President of Nicaragua, has given notice to the Collector of the port of Mobile that 200 or 300 of these emigrants will be prepared to embark from that port about the middle of November."

Two months afterwards, in December 1858, Walker's filibusters actually embarked at Mobile in the sailing schooner Susan, without a clearance, on the pretence of being bound on a coasting voyage. An unsuccessful attempt was made by the revenue cutter to stop them, but was resisted, and the Susan was joined unmolested by the Fashion and the Washington, with military stores.

The expedition afterwards broke down from the Susan being wrecked. Walker and his band then proceeded, in March 1859, to California, whence they were said in have intended to make a descent on Punta Arenas; but this attempt was not earlied into execution, and Walker returned to Louisiana.

In November 1859, he, for the third time, cluded the Mobile authorities, and set sail once more from that port in his old vessel the Fashion. The Fashion put had

The British Counter-Case gives a short account of the various Irish-American Fenan raids. societies which preceded the Fenian Brotherhood in the United States.

This "American Institution," as the Fenians called it, declared itself to be "virtually at war" with England, at a meeting held at Cincinnati in January 1865. Fenian bonds were issued, and soon afterwards the following extraordinary spectacle was Menaces of invading Canada were held out at numerous public meetings, and were made good by a Fenian said on the 1st of June, 1866, from Buffalo against Fort Colborne in Canada. This was speedily repulsed and sixty-five prisoners were taken, while the remainder of the Fenians recrossed the river into the United States, where they were arrested to the number of $75 by the Anaerican authorities, and their arms were taken from them. The subsequent events are thus narrated in the British Counter-Case, and the statement has not been contradicted:-

^{6 Th}o stores of arms at Buffalo, Ogdensburgh, and St. Alban's, were also seized by the United States District Marshals. On the 5th of June, the errest of the other Fenian leaders was ordered; and on the 6th, the President issued a Proclamation, stating that it had become known to him that certain evil-disposed persons had begun to set on foot, and had provided and prepared, and were still engaged evicusposed persons may be an interpretation and enterprise, which expedition and enterprise was to be carried on from the territory and jurisdiction of the United States against British territory; and authorizing the United States military forces and militia to be employed to arrest and

"Another band of Fenians made a demonstration near St. Alban's, but retreated immediately on the appearance of a Canadian regiment.

"Several arrests were made at St. Alban's, and elsewhere; and Roberts, the President of the Fenian Senate, and chief instigator of the raid, was taken into custody at New York. His examination commenced on the 11th; on the 12th he was released on parole; and the District Attorney eventually abandoned the prosecution from want of evidence, with the intentior $||\hat{a}||$ preferring an indictment before the Grand Jury

"In pursuance of the second of these Resolutions, the Attorney-General instructed the District-Attorney at Buffalo to abandon the Fenian prosecutions there, and they were abandoned accordingly.

"The prosecution was also withdrawn in the cases of Sweeney, Spear, McMahon, and the other leaders of the Vermont frontier demonstration, who had been arrested, but released on bonds of 5,000 dollars after a day's detention; and the intended indictment of Roberts was dropped as a matter of

"In October, the Government decided to return some of the arms which had been taken from the Fenians."

A bond was on this occasion taken from the editor of the "Buffalo Fenian Volunteer" and another Fenian sympathiser, that the arms should not be used in violation of the Neutrality Laws.

The remainder of the arms taken at Buffalo and Ogdensburgh were returned in the following year.

During 1867 the Fenians were occupied in promoting disturbances and outrages in England and Ireland.

In 1868 they obtained from the United States' Governor the return of 1,300 muskets seized at St. Alban's. In November 1868, the Fenian leader O'Neill marched in review through Philadelphia, with three regiments in Fenian uniform, numbering, as reported, 3,000 men.

Nothing however happened till 1870, when the second Fenian raid upon Canada took place from St. Alban's and Malone. Repulsed at both places the Fenians sought refuge, as usual, across the frontier.

Several of the leaders were arrested and a quantity of arms taken possession of by the United States' Authorities. Altogether 13 tons of arms are said to have been seized at the two raids, and conveyed to the United States' Arsenals; besides these a field-piece and numbers of rifles were abandoned on the scenes of action. On the 12th of July the trials of the Malone raiders took place; two were condemned to two years imprisonment and a fine of 10 dollars, and one to one year's imprisonment and a similar fine. On the 29th of July the St. Alban's raiders were tried: O'Neill was sentenced to two years' imprisonment and a fine of 10 dollars; another of the leaders to nine months' imprisonment, and a an of 5 dollars; and another to six months' imprisonment and a fine of 1 dollar. The proceedings against two others were postponed. On the 12th of October, O'Neill and his companions received an unconditional pardon from the President

Cn the day on which the pardon was granted the President published a Proclamation, warning evil-disposed persons that the law forbidding hestile expeditions against friendly States would for the future be rigorously enforced:—

"Whereas divers evil-disposed persons have, at sundry times, within the territory or jurisdiction of the United States begun, or set on foot, or provided, or prepared the means for military expeditions, or enterprises to be carried on thence, against the territories or dominions of Powers with whom the United States are at peace, by organizing bodies, pretending to have powers of Government over portions of the territories, or dominions, of Powers with whom the United States are at peace, or by being, or assuming, to be members of such bodies; by levying or collecting money for the purpose, or for the alleged purpose, of using the same in carrying on military enterprises against such territories of dominions; by enlisting or organizing armed forces to be used against such Powers, and by fitting out, equipping, and arming vessels to transport such organized armed forces to be employed in hostilities against such Powers.

"And whereas it is alleged, and there is reason to apprehend that such evil-disposed persons have also, at sundry times, within the territory and jurisdiction of the United States, violated the law thered by accepting and exercising commissions to serve by land or by sea against Powers with whom the United States are at peace, by enlisting themselves or other persons to carry on war against such Powers; by fitting out and arming vessels with intent that the same shall be employed to cruize or commit hostilities against such Powers, or by delivering commissions within the territory or jurisdiction of the United States for such vessels, to the intent that they might be employed as aforesaid," &c.

On the 5th of October last, less than a year after his release, and after this Proclamation, O'Neill led a third raid against Canada on the Pembina frontier, but was arrested by the United States' troops, and this time met with entire immunity, being discharged on the ground that there was no exidence of bis having committed any overt act within the United States' territory."

As stated in the British Counter-Case, the Proclamation of October 1870, referred not only to the Fenians, but to expeditions in aid of the existing Cuban insurrection, some of which are mentioned.

The correspondence between the Spanish Minister at Washington and the United States' Government on the subject of these expeditions against Cuba is, in parts, so applicable to the present question, that I cannot refrain from quoting some passages.

Mr. Lopez Roberts writes thus to Mr. Fish on the 18th of September, 1869:—†
"Certain malcontent Cubans have established themselves in the United States, especially in New York, and these are endeavouring, by every means in their power, not to conquer their independence by their own efforts, but to gain at present the sympathies of the American people, in order afterwards to seek the aid of this vlovernment for their cause. The history of what has taken place at the last few months is the clearest proof of this. In a state of peace, it has been seen with astonishment that associations were publicly organized in many ports belonging to a friendly mation, said associations being composed of the agents of the insurgents, with no other object that that of directing their attacks

Enlistments of men have also taken place during whole weeks, as if the object were to form expeditions authorized by law, and consequently with the consent of the authorities. form expentions authorized by taw, and consequently with the consent of the authorizes. These emissaries have carried their spirit of speculation so far as to take advantage of the good faith of emigrants from Europe, sending them to fight in Cuba, under command of the so-called General Jordan and other officers, who fought on the side of the South in the civil war. Hostile demonstrations have likewise been suffered to take place against a nation which, in 1861, had not even allowed (in order not to wonn!) the susceptibility of the United States) the title of belligerents to be given to an insurgent population numbering 6,000,000 or 7,000,000 of whites, who occupied a third of the territory of the population numbering 0,000,000 or 7,000,000 or wintes, who occupied a third of the territory of the Republic, and were in possession of such resources that they were only conquered by prodigies of valour, military talent, and heroic perseverance; and, after having seen the departure of various filibustering expeditions in broad daylight, and unmolested, from New York and other Federal ports, the Minister of Spain finally found himself obliged, by the incomprehensible apathy of the authorities, to take the imitative in order to prevent these repeated infractions of the neutrality laws.

To this Mr. Fish replies as follows, on the 13th October, 1869:—

This Government allows freedom of speech and of action to all, citizens or strangers, restricted only to the observance of the rights of others and of the public peace. The constitution of the United States secures to the people the right peacefully to assemble, and also to keep and bear arms; it secures them in their persons against unreasonable search and seizure, and provides that no warrant shall issue them in their persons against unreasonable search and seizure, and provides that no warrant small best but upon probable cause, supported by oath or affirmation, and that no person shall be deprived of life, "liberty, or property without due process of law.

"If certain malcontent (ubans (subjects of Spain) have misconstrued and abused the privileges

thus accorded by a liberal Government, the Undersigned need not remind Mr. Roberts what the occurrences, daily reported from across the ocean, are showing, that Governments cannot always restrain their malcontent subjects or residents. Laws will be broken at times; and happy is that form of Government that can control the tendency of evil minds, and restrain, by its peaceful agencies, the

The Undersigned is forced to admit with regret, that an unlawful expedition did succeed in escaping from the United States and landing on the shores of Cuba. It escaped from the United States without having attracted any notice or suspicion on the part of the Government, or its officers States without having attracted any notice or suspicion on the part of the Government, or its omeers or agents, and, as the Undersigned believes, without any suspicion on the part of the agents of the Spanish Government. Previous to its departure, Mr. Roberts had been frequently informed that this Government would act upon any information or suggestion which it could obtain through its own agents, or that might be furnished by the Spanish authorities or their agents.

On the 17th of December, 1870, Mr. Roberts writes to Mr. Fish to complain of the conduct of the United States' authorities in permitting the departure from New York of the Hornet, a notorious vessel, which, as would appear from the British Counter-Case, † has since succeeded in landing an expedition in Cuba. This vessel, formerly a despatch-boat in the United States' navy, was sold, in June 1869, by the Navy Department to a certain Senor Maeias. She was seized on her departure from Philadelphia, but released, and proceeded to Halifax, where she was again detained by the British authorities, but discharged, as no arms were found on board. Leaving Halifax, she sailed along the United States' coast, taking on board, at different points, cannon, small arms, ammunition, and men, and put into Wilmington. Here she was again seized, and a prosecution was instituted against some of the officers and crew. These proceedings seem to have terminated ineffectively, and the vessel was eventually released, upon bonds being given that she would not be used in violation of the neutrality laws. From Wilmington she proceeded to New York, where she was once more seized, and again released.

Mr. Roberts incloses in his note a letter addressed by the Spanish Consul at New York to the United States' District Attorney, in which, after recapitulating the above facts, the Consul goes on :-

"I have now information on which I rely with perfect confidence, that this steamer, in the hands of said Macias and his agents, is being fitted cut at this port, to at once sail to take on board at sea a military expedition from Nassau of some 200 men and military officers, which will leave there in a vessel, and another military expedition from Key West of some 100 men under command of one Cabaleiro; after all of which, and taking on board at sea arms provided, one Cisueros (who with General Jordan was joint commander of the Perit expedition from this city) will take charge of and conduct her to the coast of Cuba.

"I respectfully submit that the ownership and history of this steamer, together with the outfit on board and her preparations, easily ascertainable by this Government, if prompt movement be made, are sufficient to call for the exercise of the ample preventive power of this Government against her departure. Trusting that, in a proper way, I have complied with the disposition of this Government that I lay complaints of this character before, I hereby leave in your hands the responsibility of permitting this formidable instrument to proceed on her illegal expedition to the great injury of my Government." *

What is the reply of the District Attorney? Does he take the suspicions of the Consul as facts until disproved, and proceed at once to detain the vessel? Not so. He answers:—

"You accompany your letter with no proof or evidence that would authorize me to seize the Hornet for the alleged intended breaches of our neutrality laws, or to take any steps beyond those I have already taken. I have caused the most rigid scrutiny to be exercised, to see that the Hornet has taken on board nothing of a nature to indicate the hostile intentions you mention. I am advised that her intention is to clear and sail in ballast for Nessau. What her intentions may be 94 reaching that port are things that remain unproven, and in newise indicated except by the initiations of your favour. I cannot legally act on more surmise, but if formshed with proper evidence I shall not hesitate to take any steps necessary to prevent violations of our laws."

The violation of the laws was not prevented. Mr. Roberts complains that "that same day the steamer Hornet put to sea from the port of New York, without the judicial authorities of the Federal Government having taken such measures to prevent her departure as should have been dietated to them by the circumstances and criminal antecedents of the aforesaid vessel."

To this complaint of reliance upon the law fer preventive measures, instead of having recourse to prerogative force, Mr. Fish thus replies:-

"The Undersigned has the honour, in reply to this portion of the first note of Mr. Lopez Roberts, to say that it appears from this correspondence that the Hornet, having been seized on the complaint of the spanish Consul only two months before the date of the correspondence, and a hearing in which the Spanish Consul took part having resulted in the discharge of the vessel, no subsequent proof, or anything in the nature of legal evidence other than a repetition of that which had already been passed upon by the Court, and been decided to be insufficient for the detention of the vessel, had been forwarded by the Consul, or by anyother Spanish official; that, nevertheless, the District Attorney officer to again take steps to detain the Hornet, if proof were furnished which would warrant him in so doing which proof was not furnished.

"The Undersigned takes the liberty to call the attention of Mr. Lopez Roberts to the fact that a District Attorney of the United States is an officer whose duties are regulated by law, and who, in the absence of executive warrant, has no right to detain the vessels of American citizens without legal process, founded not upon surmises, or upon the antecedent character of a vessel, or upon the belief of conviction of a Consul, but upon proof submitted according to the forms required by law."

Mr. Fish, therefore, though he had promised to refer the matter to the Department of Justice, is of opinion that "the District Attorney complied with his duty and would not have been justified in taking steps for the seizure of the vessel on the unsupported representations of the Consul, after the failure of that officer to furnish the requisite proof to authorize her continued detention.";

After these details it can admit of no doubt that the history of the United States has been marked not only by systematic privateering against nations with whom the United States were at peace, but also by a series of hostile expeditions carried out in the most determined manner by American citizens against the territories of neighbouring and friendly nations.

The Counsel of the United States appear to have been aware of the anomalous position in which their Government is placed by the contrast between the manifest failure on its own part to repress these undertakings, and the strictness with which it now attempts to enforce against Great Britain the duty of diligence to repress far less flagmat breaches of neutrality directed against itself. A number of documents have accordingly been appended to the United States' Counter-Case showing (though in an imperfect and fragmentary manner) the various instructions and Proclamations which have been issued by the President and Government officials of the United States for the prevention of these enterprizes. These are ments, however, omit to mention the results are officials of which I have thought it not easily to state. Nevertheless, they tend strongly to confirm the statements of action at aimed in the Appendix to the Report of the attality Commissioners again these made in the Counter-Case of the British Government, and which have not been centradicted.

The story of all these expeditions, as told in a great part in the Proclamations of the different Presidents, is pretty each the same. Some scheme of annexation, or

British other form of invasion is started, public meetings of sympathisers are held, a reckless soldier of fortune is selected for chief, funds are raised by bonds issued on the security of the public lands of the country which it is proposed to conquer, arms are collected, recruits advertised for under some transparent verbal concealment of the object, and at last a certain number of men are got together and embark, or otherwise set forth. If the country against which the attack is directed is feeble or unprepared, seenes of ontrage and bloodshed follow, until the maranders are driven to the coast, where they find refuge on board American vessels (in some cases it has been on board ships of war), and return to the protection of the United States to prepare for a fresh attack. If the country is able vigorously to repel them, as in the case of the Fenian raids, they content themselves with a demonstration on the frontier, seek at once asylum, are disarmed, and the ringleaders are perhaps tried. Those who are convicted are almost certain of an immediate purdon. After an interval the arms are restored, and unless the scheme has become so discredited by failure as to be incapable of revival, preparations are forthwith recommenced for another attempt, and everything goes on

In the cases particularly mentioned in the British Counter-Case, viz., the expeditions of Lopez, Walker, and the Fenian raids, it will be observed that it cannot be said that the Government of the United States had not full information of the projected enterprises, and ample time for giving such instructions as might seem to be requisite for their prevention. Indeed, it is maintained in the Argument of the United States' Counsel (p. 90), that "the President of the United States acted in advance to enforce not diligence only, but active vigilance in all subordinate officers of the Government."

How successfully that vigilance and diligence was cluded may be gathered from the facts which have just been stated.

In the face of such facts the following comparison between the United States and Great Britain as to the observance of neutral obligations, to the disparagement of the latter, seems, to say the least of it, somewhat surprising :-

"As to the deportment of the Excentive in the course of these occurrences, we confidently appeal to the mass of official acts Ind correspondence contained in the documents annexed to the American Counter-Case, to prove that the American Government not only did everything which law required, bat did everything which was humanly possible, by preventive vigilance, as well as by punitive prosecution, to discharge the neutral obligations of the United States.

"Did the American Government, at any time, or on any occasion, either wilfully or with culpable negligence, fail to discharge those obligations? We deny it; although, in the midst of almost continual warfare, both in Europe and America, it is possible that violations of law may have occurred, in spite of all preventive efforts of that Government."

" Puring all this long period, the United States steadily laboured to prevent equipment of vessels in their ports to the prejudice of Spain. The successive Presidents of the United States were positive in instruction to all subordinate officers, and vigilant in observation, to enforce the execution of the laws of neutrality, international as well as municipal, Prosecutions were instituted by the Courts; ressels unlawfully captured were restored, by judicial or administrative order; and the principles of neutrality were proclaimed and maintained in every act, whether of the Courts or of the Executive."*

"Whilst England professes, as her view of public law, that constitutional Governments must of necessity allow themselves to drift continually into war by reason of having no other means to keep peace except an Act of Parliament, and that confessedly insufficient, the United States, on the other hand, have as constantly maintained, and do now maintain, that it is the duty of all Governments, including especially constitutional Governments, to discharge their neutral duties in obedience to rules designing especially constitutional covernments, to discharge their neutral daties in obenience to rines of right, independent of and superior to all possible Acts of Parliament. In consonance with which doctrine it is that every President of the United States, from President Washington to President Grant inclusive, has never failed to apply due diligence, voluntarily, sponte sud, in the vigilant discharge of his own official duty, not in mere complaisance to foreign suggestion, by himself or by other officers of the Government, to prevent all unhawful enterprises of recruitment or equipment in the United States."

Laws, no doubt, have been passed, and proclamations in abundance issued. But, in spite of all this, privateering, armed incursions into countries at peace with the United States, hostile raids, and filibustering expeditions have gone on as before. The practical result is that the Counsel of the United States cannot be permitted to prejudice the British nation and Government before the Tribunal and the world by an imaginary representation of the neutrality of the United States; and some allowance should be made for Great Britain if, on a far more humble scale, something of the same sort should have happened on her shores, seeing that, with a law said to be perfect, and with the loftiest sense of neutral obligations, the Government of the United States have not found it altogether possible to prevent their citizens from occasioning trouble to neighbouring nations, whether at war or at peace, and giving to other Governments much cause of complaint and remonstrance against their own.

The observation which thus legitimately arises is not got rid of by an attack on the past maritime policy of Great Britain, or by a reference to "the numerous piratical enterprises fitted out in former times against the possessions of Spain in America, and the honour accorded to the chiefs of those expeditions, such as Drake and Hawkins."

However offensive this telling sentence may have been intended to be, though an Englishman I readily forgive it for the sake of the charming simplicity which has made its authors forgetful of the fact that, at the time when Drake and Hawkins went forth on the enterprises they term "piratieal," the ancestors of their countrymen and their own still formed a part of the British nation. May not some of the old blood which warned the hearts and animated the courage of those bold adventurers, still flow in the veins of their Transatlantic descendants, who have made the name of "fillibuster" detract somewhat from our idea of the perfect character of American neutrality?

Complaints of infriendliness.

Having compared the law of the two nations in the matter of neutrality, I should, in the natural order of things, have now proceeded to the facts connected with the different vessels, were it not for the unexpected course pursued by the representatives of the United States in seeking to prejudge the question to which the inquiry before this Tribinal is directed—namely, whether the British Government was wanting in due diligence in respect of the equipment of certain specified ships—by imputing to the British nation an intentional disregard of its duties as a neutral, and to the British Government not only a want of diligence in the discharge of its duty for the protection of the United States against violations of neutrality, but a wilful negligence, arising out of an undue partiality and desire to favour the Confederates.

For this purpose, the representatives of the United States before this Tribunal have gone into the whole history of the time; and, not content with disparaging the institutions of Great Britain and reviling her law, have sought to east obloquy on her Government, on Statesmen whom the British people have been in the habit of looking up to, and, indeed, on the British nation itself.

We are told of "the early and long-continued unfriendliness of the British Government;" that "Her Majesty's Government was actuated by a conscious unfriendly purpose towards the United States." Again and again we are told of the unfriendliness and insincere neutrality of the British Cabinet. "The Cabinet were actuated by an insincere neutrality to hasten the issue of the Queen's Proclamation." "The feeling of personal unfriendliness towards the United States continued during a long portion or the whole of the time of the commission or omission of the acts complained of." Finally, we are told that "the facts established show an unfriendly feeling which might neutrally lead to, and would account for, a want of diligence bordering upon wilful negligence."

Earl Russell is made the object of unworthy and unjustifiable attack. He is represented as having "evinced a consistent course of partiality towards the insurgents," "When information as to the Florida was conveyed to Her Majesty's Principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, he interposed no objection to her sailing from Liverpool." Surely the writer must have known he was doing grievous injustice in making such a statement. The Florida sailed from Liverpool on the 25th of March. As will appear when we come to the facts connected with that vessel, Earl Russell had heard nothing about her for a month before. Again, "when the overwhelming proof of the complicity of the Alabama was laid before him, he delayed to act till it was too late." He who penned this must have known that the delay was not Lord Russell's and that, but for an unlucky delay, accidentally occurring elsewhere, so far as the action of his Lordship in that affair was concerned, the Alabama would have been stopped.

Of the Cabinet which has been thus assailed, three distinguished members are no more. But he who, at the difficult time in question, presided over the foreign relations of Great Britain, still lives among us in the fulness of years and honour. There have, of course, been many who, in the strife of party politics, have been opposed to Earl Russell; there have been others who have differed from him in particular incidents of his political conduct; but never did it occur to political enemy—personal enemy he never could have had—to question for a moment the lofty sense of honour, the high and unimpeachable integrity, the truthfulness, the straightforwardness, which have characterized the whole of his long and illustrious career.

When the history of Great Britain during the nineteenth century shall be written, not only will there be none among the Statesmen who have adorned it, whose name will be associated with greater works in the onward path of political progress than that of Earl Russell, but there will be none to whom, personally, an admiring posterity will look back with greater veneration and respect. That this distinguished man should feel deeply aggreeved by the unworthy attack thus made on the Government of which he was a leading member, and on himself personally, it is easy to understand: but there are attacks which recoil upon those who make them; and of this nature are aspersions on the honesty and sincerity of Earl Russell.

Speaking of the Officials in the Colonies, the Case of the United States asks the Speaking of the officials in the Colonies, the Case of the Office States asks the Tribanal to bear in mind what it calls "these constant demonstrations of partiality for the insurgents," "They show," it is said, "a persistent absence of real neutrality, which should throw suspicion upon the acts of the British officials as to the vessels, and should incline the Tribunal to closely scrutinize their acts."

The British nation comes in, of course, for a share of the abuse thus freely bestowed. British neutrality is described sometimes as "partial and insincere," sometimes as "habitually insincere." "Great Britain framed its rules, construed its laws and its instructions, and governed its conduct in the interest of the insurgents.

I have called this an "unexpected" course; for, assuredly, neither the British Government nor the British people were prepared to expect that, after Great Britain had not only expressed, openly and before the world, her "regret" that vessels should have left her shores which afterwards did damage to American commerce, but had voluntarily consented to make good that damage, if it could be shown that any want of sufficient care on the part of the British Authorities had rendered the equipment and evasion of those vessels possible—on an oceasion when, in the peaceful and amicable settlement of any claim the United States might have against Great Britain, the remembrance of past grievances or past resentments was to be for ever buried, and the many ties which should bind these two great nations together, drawn closer for the time to come—advantage should be taken to revive with aerimonious bitterness every angry recollection of the past, and, as it would seem, to pour forth the pent-up venom of national and personal hate. Deploring the course which has thus been taken, as one calculated to mar the work of peace on which we are engaged, I comfort myself with the conviction that a great nation, like the people of the United States, seeing in the present attitude of Great Britain a cordial and sincere desire of reconciliation and enduring friendship, animated itself by a kindred spirit, will not approve of the hostile and insulting tone thus offensively and unnecessarily adopted towards Great Britain, her statesmen, and her institutions, throughout the whole course of the Case and Argument presented on behalf of the United States.

In support of the alleged unfriendly feeling which the United States ascribe to the Alleged evidence British Government, as the foundation of the charge of partiality towards the Insurgent of unfriendly States, where the Government should have been neutral, they refer, in the first place, feeling. to certain speeches made on different occasions by leading members of the Ministry.

There can be no doubt that these speeches not only expressed the sentiments of the speakers, but may be taken to have been the exponents of the sentiments generally entertained at the time. But it is a mistake to suppose that those sentiments involved any unfriendliness towards the United States. In truth, why should any such unfriendliness have existed? The cherished sentiments of the British people on the subject of slavery had strongly tended to alienate them from the South, and the recent public discussion of the subject of slavery, on which the South felt so sensitively, had produced feelings of by no means a friendly character on the part of the latter towards Great Britain. The North might, therefore, not unnaturally calculate on the sympathy of Great Britain, if not on its active support, in a conflict with the South. How was it that what might thus have been expected à priori, was not realized to the extent of such expectation, and that where active sympathy, or even actual support might have been looked for, impartial neutrality took its place? The causes are not difficult to find. In the first place, it appeared to many that right and justice were on the side of the seceding States. To such persons it seemed that when eleven great provinces, with a population of several millions, forming fully one-fourth of the Union, impelled by the conviction that the political views of the majority of the Federal States were, if not antagonistic to, at all events inconsistent with, their interests, desired to separate themselves from the Union, to which they were bound only by the tie of a voluntary Confederation, an attempt to coerce them by the sword into a forced continuance in it, when it must henceforth be hateful to them, was to make the issue one of might rather than of right.

Others there were-men of calm judgment and reflection-who, while they deplored a disruption of the great American Union, yet thought that a reunion effected by the subjugation of the South was not to be desired in the true interest either of the victors or the vanquished; that before such a result could be brought about, a prolonged and fearful contest must have taken place, in which the best blood of an south would have been shed, its resources exhausted, its prosperity destroyed for years us spirit humiliated and broken, making its restoration to the Union of little value, except so far as the pride of the Federal States might be concerned; that, consequently, the Union having thus been torn asunder, it would be better for both parties that each should be left to work out its own desting, and develop its own resources, in the vast regions to which its dominious might extend. Many, too, there were who deplored this contest the more because they believed that, despite the superior force and resources of the North, the subjugation of the Sent's was impossible, and that the prolongation of the contest could only lead to use a sacrifices on either side. This view proved erroneous in the result, but it was not the less honestly entertained. A strong impression, too, could not fail to be produced on the public mind by the energy, determination, and courage displayed by the South, and the generous ardour with which its population risked life and fortune in the desperate struggle for national independence, so resolutely maintained to the last against infinitely superior force. Whatever the cause in which they are exhibited, devetion and courage will ever command respect; and they did so in this instance. Men could not see in the united people of these vast provinces, thus risking all in the cause of nationality and independence, the common case of rebels, disturbing peace and order on account of imaginary grievances, or actuated by the desire of overthrowing a Government in order to rise upon its ruins. They gave credit to the statesmen and warriors of the South-their cause might be right or wrong-for the higher motives which ennoble political action, and all the opprobrious terms which might be heaped upon the cause is which he fell, could not persuade the world that the earth beneath which Stonewall Jackson rests does not cover the remains of a patriot and a hero.

Public feeling in Great Britain, however, never went beyond this, that both parties having appealed to arms, they should be dealt with on terms of perfect equality, and that whatever was conceded to the one should not be wit. Ald from the other, -to use a common expression, that they should be left to fight it out fairly, without Great Britain throwing her weight into either scale, as the Northern States seemed to think she should have done in their favour, not perhaps by actual assistance in war, but by withholding from the Confederates the character of belligerents, and by treating their ships of war as pirates and denying them access to British ports. For the States appear to have been unable to understand the position assumed by the ish Government in making any concession whatever in favour of the Insurgent States. It appeared to the n like an act of perfidy towards a friend. Had not political and commercial relations bound Great Britain and the United States closely together for many years? How then could Great Britain take any step which should give any advantage to an enemy of the United States? Two things were lost sight of in this reasoning. First, that the Insurgent States, with whom the United States were now waging war, had formed part of that Union with which Great Britain had had the intimate relations referred to-the second port in the Empire, through which the cotton trade was carried on, having had att its relations with the South; secondly, that Great Britain had the interests of her own commerce to look after, which were seriously 'n the warfare as carried on by the United States. The blockade of the es blished by the North with a view to the speedier subjugation of the South, deed thy North of such paramount importance as to render all consideration for the interests of Great Britain unnecessary, was about to paralyze the industry of Laneashire, and bring famino and disaster on thousands. Gr at Britain accepted the position and acknowledged the blockade. Was she not, in other respects, to look after her own interests? It was natural enough that, in the first heat and passionate excitement, the North should take the view it did of the conduct of Great Britain. I cannot but think the time has come when it might take a calmer and juster view. It will do so hereafter, in spite of those who still seek to rekindle the flame of discord, the "ignes," which in their hands may be truly said to be "supporitos eineri doloso."

The charge of partiality and of wilful negligence having been thus brought requires to be disposed of. For, though partiality does not necessarily lead to want of diligence, yet it is apt to do so, and in a case of doubt would turn the scale. Where a sinister motive exists, culpa, which might otherwise be excused, becomes indeed dolo proxima and inexcusable. Besides, sitting on this Tribunal, as I have already said, as in some sense the epresentative of Great Britain, while I may say with perfect truth, "pudet hee opproluia nobis dici potuisse," I should not have fulfilled my duty if I did not see whether their retutation cannot be found in the facts before us.

sh ports. For th

a patriot and a hero.

Independently of having permitted the equipment of ships, three main heads of Complaints of complaint are placed on record against the Government of Great Britain :-- 1. That it unfriendly conduct, acknowledged the Confederate States as helligerent; and as a consequence, refusing to treat their ships of war as pirates, admitted them to British ports on the same footing with the war ships of the United States; 2. That it did nothing to prevent the agents of the Confederate States from procuring ships and supplies of arms and munitions of war from England; 3. That it did nothing to stop the blocks de-running, carried on through the British port of the Bahamas and Bermuda.

The contention of the United States that Great Britain was not warranted in Acknowledgment acknowledging the Confederate States as belligerents might find its answer in the unani- of belligereney. mous concurrence of the great maritime Powers in following her example. But independently of this, the course thus pursued may without difficulty be shown not only to have been strictly warranted by international law, but also to have been the only one which could with propriety have been adopted.

First, let us see how stood the facts at the time of the recognition of the Confederate States as belligerents by the Queen's Government.

Between the November of 1860 and April of 1861, seven Southern States of the Union, South Carolina, Florida, Mississippi, Alabama, Georgia, Louisiana, and Texas, had not only renonnced their allegiance to the Federal Government and declared themselves independent, but had formed themselves into a Confederation, under the title of the "Confederate States;" had adopted a federal constitution, with all the necessary elements of Government; and had appointed a President. They were in exclusive possession of the territory of these States, to the total and absolute exclusion of the former Federal Government. They had taken measures to raise an army, and had voted upwards of 2,000,000 dollars for the creation of a navy. In April 1861 hostilities had actually commenced. By the 13th of April Fort Sumter had fallen. The arsenal at Harper's Ferry was seized a few days later. On the 15th, the President tions for letters of marque and reprisal, to be granted under the seal of the Confederate States, against ships and property of the United States and their citizens, On the 19th of April President Lincoln issued a further Proclamation, declaring the ports of the seven States blockaded; and on the 27th, issued a like Proclamation with regard to the ports of North Carolina and Virginia, which, in the meantime, had joined the Confederation.

of the United States called out the militia, to the number of 75,000 men.* On the 17th, the President of the Confederate States issued a Proclamation inviting applica-

Here then were nine States, with a population of more than five millions of people, exclusive of the negro population-in other words, one fourth of the United Statesshortly afterwards to be joined by two other States--which had established a de facto Government, which Government had possion of the entire territory within the limits of those States, and exercised all the powers and functions of Government; with an organized army prepared to wage war with tl rest of the States for the establishment of national independence, and which had actually commenced hostilities by the capture of forts occupied by Federal forces. No one could deny that this was in fact war, and war about to be conducted on a great scale—a war to which the original Government, the authority of which was thus contested in arms, could not deny the character of war with all the incidents which attach to it.

On the 4th of May, 1861 (uine days before the date of Her Majesty's Proclamation of Neutrality), Mr. Seward himself wrote to Mr. Dayton at Paris :-

"The insurgents have instituted revolution with open, flagrant, deadly war, to compel the United States to acquiesce in the dismember and of the Union. The United States have accepted this civil war as an inevitable necess . . 'S

From the beginning the operations of the war were carried on as in a war between nations, according to the usages of war among civilized States. No attempt was made to treat insurgent prisoners as traitors or rebels.

Under such circumstances it is impossible to deny that a neutral State had a right to accord to the Insurgent Government, no character of a belligerent. Whether it would be morally justified in doing so must depend on the circumstances in which it found itself placed relatively to the parties to the contest. All publicists are agreed, that where an integral portion of a nation separates itself from the parent State, and establishes de facto a Government of its own, excluding the former Government from all power and control, and thereupon a civil war ensues, a neutral nation is fully justified in recognizing the Government de facto as a belligerent, though it has not as yet acknowledged it as a nation; and, from the time of the acknowledgment of its belligerent status, the Government de facto acquires, in relation to the neutral, all the rights which attach to the status of a belligerent of an established nationality.

Vattel.

"When," says Vattel, "a party is formed in a State which no longer obeys the Sovereign, and is of strength sufficient to make head against him, or, when in a republic, the nation is divided into two opposite factions, and both sides take arms, this is called a civil war."*

Again :-

"When the ties of political association are broken, or at least suspended, between the Sovereign and his people, they may be considered as two distinct powers; and since each is independent of all foreign authority, no one has the right to judge between them. Each of them may be right. It follows in virtue of the voluntary law of nations, then, that the two parties may act as having equal right."

Martens says :-

"Foreign nations cannot refuse to consider as lawful enemies those who are empowered by their actual Government, whatever that may be. This is not recognition of its legitimacy."

Hautefeuille.

Hautefenille says on this subject :-

"En effet, les peuples étrangers ne penvent intervenir entre les belligérants; la qualité de sujets revoltés que l'une des deux donne à l'autre, doit être écartée par eux; ils ne sont, et ne peuvent être, juges de la justice on de l'injustice de la guerre. Les nations qui désirent rester neutres doivent accepter la possession de fait; si elles veulent être respectés par les deux parties, elles doivent les reconnaître et les respecter également tous les deux. Le prince étranger qui refuserait de remplir les devoirs de la neutralité envers les insurgés ne saurait exiger d'eux d'être regardé comme neutre; il serait à leurs yeux l'allié de leur ennemi, et ils le traiteraient comme tel avec justice. D'un autre côié le souverain qui combat pour rannener sous son obéissance ses sujets revoltés ne saurait s'offenser que les neutres remplissent leurs devoirs envers ses ennemis, puisqu'il ne peut exiger qu'ils deviennent ses alliés, et que, s'ils refusaient de remplir ces devoirs, ils seraient effectivement ses alliés, les ennemis de ses adversaires.";

Mr. Dana, have been nowhere more fully and ably, or more fairly stated than by Mr. Dana, in edition of Wheaton, in a note to Section 23:—

"The occasion for the accordance of belligerent rights arises when a civil conflict exists within a foreign State. The reason which requires and can alone justify this step by the Government of another country, is that its own rights and interests are so far affected as to require a definition of its own force, and the insurgents claim a political nationality and belligerent rights which the parent Government does not concede, a recognition by a foreign State of full belligerent rights, if not justified by tovernment. But the situation of moral support to the rebellion and of censure upon the parent Government. But the situation of a foreign State with reference to the contests, and the condition of affairs between the contending parties, may be such as to justify this act. It is important, therefore, to determine what state of affairs, and what relations of the foreign State, justify the recognition.

It is certain that the state of things between the parent Sate and insurgents must amount, in fact, to a veze, in the sense of international law; that is, powers and rights of war must be inetual exercise; otherwise the recognition is falsified, for the recognition is of a fact. The tests to determine the question are various, and far more decisive where there is maritime war and commercial relations with foreigners, among the tests, are the existence of a de fact political organization of the insurgents sufficient in character, population, and resources, to constitute it, if left to itself, a State amough the nations, reasonably acting in accordance with the rules and customs of war, such as the use of flags of truce, cartels, exchange of prisoners, and the treatment of captured insurgents by the parent State as prisoners of war; and at sea, employment by the insurgents of commissioned cruizers, and the exercise by the parent tovernment of the rights of blockade of insurgent ports against neutral commerce, and of stopping and searching neutral vessels at sea. If all these elements exist, the condition of things is undoubtedly war; and it may be war, before they are all ripened into activity.

"As to the relation of the foreign State to the contest, if it is solely on land, and the foreign State is not contiguous, it is difficult to imagine a call for the recognition. If, for instance, the United States should formally recognize belligerent rights in an insurgent community at the centre of Europe, with of moral support. But a case may arise where a foreign State must decide whether to hold the parent State responsible for acts done by the insurgents, or to deal with the insurgents as a de facto Governnext (Mr. Canning to Lord Granville on the Greek war, June 22, 1826.) If the foreign State recognizes belligerency in the insurgents, it releases the parent State from responsibility for whatever may (Mr. Adans to Mr. Seward, June 11, 1861, 15); Corr. 105.) In a contest wholly upon land, a contiguous State may be obliged to make the decision whether or not to regard it as a war; but, in cases us they arise. Where the insurgents and the parent State are maritime, and the foreign nation has extensive commercial relations and trade at the ports of both, and the foreign nation on both of the contending parties have considerable naval force, and the donestic must extend itself over the sea, then the relations of the foreign State to this contest are far different.

"In such a state of things the liability to political complications, and the questions of right and duty to be decided at once, usually away from home, by private citizens or naval officers, seem to may to be decented at once, usually usus, from nome, my private cruzens or mann oncers, seem to require an authoritative and general decision as to the status of the three parties involved. If the required an attention of the contest is a war, all foreign citizens and officers, whether exceutive or judicial, are to follow one line of conduct. If it is not a war, they are to follow a totally different line. If it is a war, the commissioned craizers of both sides may stop, search, and capture the foreign merchant vessel; and that vessel must make no resistance and must submit to adjudication by a prize Court. If it is not a war, the cruizers of neither party can stop or search the foreign merchant-vessel; and that vessel may resist all attempts o nether party can stop or search the foreign merchant-vesser; and that vesser may resist an attempts in that direction, and the ships of war of the foreign State may attack and capture any cruizer persisting in the attempt. If it is war, foreign nations must await the adjudication of prize Tribunals, If it is not war, no such Tribunal can be opened. If it is war, the parent State may institute a blockade pure gratium of the insurgent ports, which foreigners must respect; but if it is not a war, foreign nations laving large commercial intercourse with the country, will not respect a closing of insurgent ports by paper decrees only. If it is a war, the insurgent cruizers are to be treated by foreign citizens and officials, at sea and in port, as lawful belligerents. If it is not a war, those cruizers are pirates, and may be treated as such. If it is a war, the rules and risks respecting carrying contraband, or despatches, or military persons come into play. If it is not a war, they do not. Within foreign jurisdiction, if it is a war, acts of the insurgents in the way of preparation and equipments for hostility, may be breaches of neutrality laws; while, if it is not a war, they do not come into that category but under the category of piracy or of crimes by municipal law.

"Now, all citizens of a foreign State, and all its executive officers and judicial magistrates, look to the Political Department of their Government to prescribe the rule of their conduct, in all their possible relations with the parties to the contest. This rule is prescribed in the best and most intelligible manner for all possible contingencies by the simple declaration, that the contest is, or is not, to be treated as war. If the state of things requires the decision, it must be made by the Political Department of the Government. It is not fit that cases should be left to be decided as they may arise, by assumed in the political Department of a foreign State to make the decision. It owes it to the some citizens, to the Contending Parties, and to the peace of the world, to make that decision easonably. If it issues a formal declaration of belligerent rights prematurely, or in a contest with id., liv. ii, § 56. o. 231. 456, &c. which it has no complexity, it is a gratuitous and unfriendly act. If the parent Government complain of it, the complaint must be made upon one of these grounds. To decide whether the recognition was uncalled for and premature, requires something more than a consideration of proximate facts, and the overt and formal acts of the Contending Parties. The foreign State is bound and entitled to consider the preceding history of the parties; the magnitude and completeness of the political and military organizations and preparations on each side; the probable extent of the conflict by sea and land; the probable extent and rapidity of its development; and, above all the probability that its own merchant. vessels, naval officers, and Consuls may be precipitated into sudden and difficult complications abroad The best that can be said is, that the foreign State may protect itself by a seasonable decision, either upon a test case that arises, or by a general prospective decision; while, on the other hand, if it makes the recognition prematurely, it is liable to the suspicion of an unfriendly purpose to the parent State. The recognition of belligerent rights is not solely to the advantage of the insurgents. They gain the great advantage of a recognized status, and the opportunity to employ commissioned cruizers at sea, and to exert all the powers known to maritime warfare, with the sanction of foreign nations. They can obtain abroad loans, military and naval materials, and enlist men, as against every thing but neutraling laws; their flag and commissions are acknowledged, their revenue laws are respected, and they acquire a quasi political recognition. On the other hand, the parent Government is relieved from responsibilis for acts done in the insurgent territory; its blockade of its own ports is respected; and it acquires right to exert, against neutral commerce, all the powers of a party to a maritime war."

Mr. Dana, though writing after the present dispute, and with reference to it, pronounces no opinion upon it, but the principles he has thus laid down enable us to udge of the matter without difficulty.

This question was the subject of a solemn decision in the ease already cited of the "Santissima Trinidad." One of the points there raised being that the Government of Buenos Ayres, under whose commission the vessel had taken prizes, was invalid, the independence of that State not having been recognized by the Government of the United States, Mr. Justice Story thus disposes of the objection:—

"There is another objection urged against the admission of this vessel to the privileges and immunities of a public ship, which may as well be disposed of in connection with the question already considered. It is, that Buenos Ayres has not yet been acknowledged as a sovereign independent Government by the executive or legislature of the United States, and therefore it is not entitled to have her ships of war recognized by our Courts as national ships. We have, in former cases, had occasion to express our opinion on this point. The Government of the United States has recognized the existence of a civil war between Spain and her colonies, and has avowed a determination to remain neutral between the parties, and to allow to each the same rights of asylum and hospitality and intercourse. Each party is, therefore, deemed by us a belligerent nation, having, so far as concerns us, the sovereign rights of war, and entitled to be respected in the exercise of those rights. We cannot interfere to the prejudice of either belligerent, without making ourselves a party to the contest, and departing from the posture of neutrality. All captures made by each must be considered as having the same validity, and all the immunities which may be claimed by public sleps in our ports, unfor the law of nations, must be considered as equally the right of each; and, as such, must be recognized by our Courts of Justice, until Congress shall prescribe a different rule. This is the doctrine heretofore asserted by this Court, and we see no reason to depart from it."*

An attempt has indeed been made to show that the judgment in the foregoing case has been overruled or shaken by the succeeding judgment in the case of the Gran Para, in which it is alleged that, notwithstanding the commission of a belligerent Power, a vessel was held to be subject to the jurisdiction of a Court of the United States. I have already shown that, in that case, in which the validity of a capture made by a privateer fitted out in the United States, was questioned by reason of the illegal character of the capturing vessel, the latter was not a ship of war commissioned by a belligerent Government, but simply an American vessel commissioned as a privateer, nor, indeed, sailing as a privateer under the commission of a recognized belligerent. She still remained, therefore, the private property of an American citizen, unprotected by any commission whatever, and a capture made by her could not be held to be good

In the recent case of the British barque the Hiawatha, and of the Mexican schooner Brillante, which were captured by ships of the United States, for endeavouring to run the blockade, and which had been condemned as prize, an appeal having been brough, and an objection having been taken that the Confederate States could not properly be held to be belligerents, and that consequently the President had no right to establish a blockade, Mr. Justice Grier, in delivering the judgment of the majority of the Cour, lays down the following important propositions:—

esies and rules common to public or national was.

"It is not the less a civil war with belligerent parties in hostile array, because it may be called an 'insurrection' by one side, and the insurgents be considered as rehels or traitors. It is not necessary that the independence of the revolted province or State be acknowledged, in order to constitute it a party belligerent in a war according to the law of nations. Foreign nations acknowledge it as war by party beingerent in a war according to the law of nations. Foreign nations acknowledge it as war by a declaration of neutrality. The condition of neutrality cannot exist unless there be two belligerent parties. In the case of the Smitissima Trinidad (7 Wheaton, 337), this Court say: The Government of the United States has recognized the existence of a civil war between Spain and her colonies, and has avowed her determination to remain neutral between the parties. Each party is therefore decimed has above the resulting laying so far as concerns us, the sovereign rights of war.

"The law of nations is also called the law of nature: it is founded on the common consent as well as the common sense of the world. It contains no such anomalous doctrine as that which this Court are now for the first time desired to pronounce, to wit: That insurgents who have risen in rebellion against their Sovereign, expelled her Courts, established a revolutionary Government, organized armies, against their societies, a specied has counts, escapished a revolutionary trovernment, organized armies, and commenced hostilities, are not encaries because they are traitors; and a war levied on the Government by traitors, in order to dismember and destroy it, is not a war because it is an 'insurrec-

Chief Justice Taney, Mr. Justice Nelson, Mr. Justice Carson, and Mr. Justice Chifford, differed, indeed, from the majority of the Court, on the question as to whether the blockade was, in its inception, lawful, founding their opinion upon the fact that though by the constitution of the United States the President could, in case of invasion or insurrection, call out the national forces, Congress alone could declare war, and that, Congress not having declared war till the 13th of July, 1861, the President had no power to declare a blockade, and consequently that the seizure of these vessels was illegal. But there was no difference of opinion on the question of belligerent status so soon as civil war is declared.

The practice of nations has been entirely in accordance with these principles. All the maritime nations—the others were not concerned in the matter—concurred in according to the Confederate Government the status and rights of a belligerent

But though it would seem impossible to contest that, at some time during the Whether continuance of the civil war, the recognition of the belligerent status of the Con-acknowledgment federate Government must have taken place, it is asserted that the recognition by the premature. British Government was premature. 1 will endeavour to take a calm and dis-passionate view of the position of the parties, and of this much agitated question. Looking to the state of things which had thus come into existence, Her Majesty's Government could not but see that it would soon become not only right, but also necessary to the protection of British interests, to concede to the Insurgent States the character of belligerents. As soon as it was known in Great Britain that the war was to be extended to naval operations, the interests of British commerce and British subjects required that the belligerent status of both parties to the great struggle, which was evidently about to ensue, should be clearly ascertained and defined. It was plain that a state of things was about to present itself, such as Mr. Dana refers to. as justifying the recognition of helligerency. Much reliance is placed in the Case of the United States,* for the purpose of establishing the desire of the British Government to recognize the insurgents as belligerents at an unduly early period, that as early as the 1st of May, Earl Russell wrote the letter of that date to the Lords of the Admiralty.

The letter is as follows:-

"The intelligence which reached this country by the last mail from the United States gives reason to suppose that a civil wer between the Northern and Southern States of the Confederacy was imminent, if indeed it might not be considered to have already begun.

Simultaneously with the arrival of this news, a telegram, purporting to have been conveyed to labfax from the United States, was received, which announced that the President of the Southern Confederacy had taken steps for issuing letters of marque against the vessels of the Northern States.

"If such is really the case, it is obvious that much inconvenience may be occasioned to the numerous British vessels engaged in trade on the coast of the United States and in the Gulf of Mexico. and that timely provision should be made for their protection against undue molestation by reason of the maritime operations of the hostile parties; and Her Majesty has accordingly commanded me to signify to your Lordships her pleasure that adequate reinforcements should forthwith be sent to Her Majesty's squadron on the North American and West Indian station, so that the Admiral in command may be able duly to provide for the protection of British shipping in any emergency that "I need searcely observe to your Lordships that it might be right to apprise the Admiral that much as Her Majesty regrets the prospect of civil war breaking out in a country in the happiness and peace of which Her Majesty takes the deepest interest, it is Her Majesty's pleasure that nothing should be done by her naval forces which should indicate any partiality or preference for either party in the contest that may ensue."*

When I say that the foregoing letter is relied on, I must correct myself. It is relied on only in a mutilated form. The third paragraph of the letter which gives the key to its purpose, and supplies the motive of the writer, is, I regret to say, omittedits place being supplied by asterisks-while the other paragraphs are given at length !-When the letter is before us in its entirety, we see plainly that the purpose Earl Russell had in view was, not to give any advantage to the Insurgents, but to seeme protection to British shipping in case the invitation of the Confederate President should have the effect of letting loose a swarm of privateers in the American waters.

There can, however, be no doubt that, prior to the issuing of the Queen's Proclamation of Neutrality, Her Majesty's Ministers, having become acquainted with the relative position of the two parties, and seeing plainly that this was no ordinary revolt, and that insurrection had assumed the form of organized government and of organized warfare, and locking to the dimensions the contest was about to take, had come to the conclusion that it would be impossible to withhold from the Insurgent Government the character and rights of belligerents.

At the time the letter last cited was written, nothing was known beyond the fact that the Confederate Government were preparing to issue letters of marque; but on the ensuing day, the 2nd, came the news that President Lincoln had proclaimed a blockade of all the Southern ports, though the terms of the Proclamation were not yet known. Hereupon the Government, in anticipation of any emergency that might arise, adopted the constitutional course of consulting the Law Officers of the Crown.

"Her Majesty's Government heard the other day," said Lord Russell in the House of Commons on the 2nd of May,-

"That the Confederated States have issued letters of marque, and to-day we have heard that it is intended there shall be a blockade of all the ports of the Southern States. As to the general provisions of the law of nations on these questions, some of the points are so new as well as so important that they have been referred to the Law Officers of the Crown for their opinion, in order to guide the Government in its instructions both to the English Minister in America and the Commander-in-Chief of the naval squadron. Her Majesty's Government has felt that it was its duty to use every possible means to avoid taking any part in the lamentable contest now raging in the American States. Nothing but the imperative duty of protecting British interests, in ease they should be attacked, justifies the Government in at all interfering. We have not been involved in any way in that contest, by any act or giving any advice in the matter, and, for God's sake, let us, if possible, keep out of it."

On the 6th of May Lord Russell stated in the House of Commons that the Law Officers and the Government had come to the conclusion that, according to principles which seemed to them to be just, the Southern Confederacy must be treated as a belligerent.§

A despatch to Lord Lyons of the same day, in which Lord Russell develops his views on the subject, is worthy of a wise and considerate statesman:-

"My Lord, "Her Majesty's Government are disappointed in not having received from you, by the mall which has just arrived, any report of the state of affairs and of the prospects of the several parties with reference to the issue of the struggle which appears, unfortunately, to have commenced between them; but the interruption of the communication between Washington and New York sufficiently explains the non-arrival of your despatches

"The question for neutral nations to consider is, what is the character of the war; and whether it should be regarded as a war carried on between parties severally in a position to wage war, and to claim the rights and to perform the obligations attaching to belligerents?

"Her Majesty's Government consider that that question can only be answered in the affirmative. If the Government of the Northern portion of the late Union possesses the advantages inherent in long-established Governments, the Government of the Southern portion has, nevertheless, duly constituted itself, and carries on, in a regular form, the administration of the civil government of the States of which it is composed.

"Her Majesty's Government, therefore, without assuming to pronounce upon the merits of the question on which the respective parties are at issue, can do no less than accept the facts presented to them. They deeply deplore the disruption of a confederacy with which they have at all times sought them. They deeply deplote the distribution of a confederacy with which they have at all times songue to cultivate the most friendly relations; they view with the greatest apprehension and concern the misery and desolation in which that disruption threatens to involve the provinces now arrayed in arms against each other; but they feel that they cannot question the right of the Southern States to claim to be recognized as a belligerent, and, as such, invested with all the rights and prerogatives of a belligerent.

Whether the determination to acknowledge the Confederate States as belligerents was come to a few days too soon or not is a matter on which there may possibly be a difference of opinion. But, that on this account British statesmen, acting under an anxious sense of duty, in furtherance of what they believed to be a just and necessary policy, should be publicly accused of having been influenced by the sinister design of promoting the interests of the one party at the expense of the other, while pretending simply to fulfil the duties incidental to their position towards both parties, is a painful The world must judge between the accusers and the accused.

Whether the resolution was come to too soon or not, it was not acted upon till the events which rapidly supervened could leave no doubt on the minds of Her Majesty's Ministers as to issuing the Proclamation of Neutrality. On the 10th of May, a dispatch was received from Lord Lyons, containing a copy of the Proclamation of President Davis as to issning letters of marque, and a copy of that of President Lincoln, declaring that Southern privateers should be treated as pirates, and announcing the blockade of the Southern ports.+

The British Government contends, and, as it seems to me, most justly, that when, by declaring the Southern ports blockaded, the President openly acknowledged the existence of a civil war, and thereby recognized the Confederate States as belligerents in the face of the world, he thereby rendered it not only the right, but the duty of the British Government to treat them as such.

That it became the right of Her Majesty's Government so to treat them can admit of no possible doubt: no jurist, I am satisfied, will assert the contrary. The pretension that the Federal Government could treat the contest as a war, so as to declare a blockade, and thereby exclude neutral nations from access to the blockaded ports for the purpose of trade, while neutral Governments, on the other hand, were not entitled to treat the war as one going on between two belligerent Powers, is a proposition which is, I say it with all respect for Mr. Adams, really preposterous.

Applying the principles laid down by the Editor of Wheaton, in the note which I have quoted at length, as well as by the other eminent jurists to whom I have referred, can any one doubt that Her Majesty's Government were fully justified in recognizing the belligerent character of the Confederate States. between the two parties to the contest became extended to the ocean, the interests of maritime nations, and more especially of Great Britain, with its extensive commerce with the ports of both Southern and Northern States, became at once seriously with the ports of one active and the Southern ports there was the constant intercourse of an active and extensive commerce. The British shipowners and merchants had a right to look to the Government for protection to ships and cargoes, if interfered with, in time of peace, in any way not warranted by international law. It was the duty of Her Majesty's ships of war stationed on the neighbouring navad stations, or detached from them, to afford that protection. So long as the war was not acknowledged by Her Majesty as a legitimate war, any interference by either belligerent with a British ship might have proved the occasion of some serious collision.

With the recognition by Her Majesty of the war, all her subjects would know that the blockade must be treated as a lawful one, and that any trade attempted to be carried on with the blockaded ports would be at the peril of the parties attempting it.

Unless the blockaded ports were treated as the ports of a belligerent, there could be no lawful blockade. The blockade of its own ports by a State, to the exclusion of those who have a right to trade with its subjects, is a thing unknown and unheard of.

the United States, p. 51. o, vol. iv, p. 482. s, vol. iv, p. 483.

^{*} United States' Documents, vol. i, p. 37.

The subjects of Great Britain had, by existing Treaties, the right of trading with those of the United States. If the citizens of the Southern States were still to be looked upon as citizens of the United States, British merchant ships had a right of free access to the Southern ports notwithstanding the blockade. Nor could the British Government deprive them of this right, or refuse them its protection if forcibly interfered with.

The effect of a blockade in the disturbance of contracts previously made, makes it of the utmost importance to the commercial world to have the earliest notice of the fact, and of the recognition of it by the Government; the more so as it has been considered that official notice of a blockade to a Government is sufficient notice to its subjects.

All these important considerations appear to me to show, beyond the possibility of dispute, that it becomes the duty of a neutral Government, when it is made aware of the fact of a blockade, to give notice of it to its subjects at the very earliest moment.

The alternative of refusing to acknowledge the war, as a war between two belligerent Powers, was therefore to refuse to acknowledge the blockade. Would the United States have preferred that Great Britain should adopt this alternative?

By establishing the blockade, therefore, the Government of the United States made it, as I have said, not only the right but the duty of Her Majesty's Government to acknowledge the belligerency of the Confederates, and thus to give to the war, so far as British subjects were concerned, the incidents which attach to war, as respects the relative rights and obligations of belligerents and neutrals.

The policy of the Government was explained and justified by Lord Russell in a letter to Mr. Adams, of the 4th May, 1865:—

"Let me remind you that when the civil war in America broke out so suddenly, so violently, and so extensively, that event, in the preparation of which Great Britain had no share, caused nothing but detriment and injury to Her Majesty's subjects; Great Britain had previously carried on a large commerce with the Southern States of the Union, and had procured there the staple which furnished materials for the industry of millions of her people.

"Had there been no war, the existing Treaties with the United States would have seemed the

"Had there been no war, the existing Treaties with the United States would have seemed the continuance of a commerce mutually advantageous and desirable. But what was the first act of the President of the United States? He proclaimed, on the 19th of April 7 361, the blockade of the port of seven States of the Union. But he could lawfully interrupt the two e of neutrals to the Southern States upon one ground only, namely, that the Southern States were carrying on war against the Government of the United States; in other words, that they were belligerents

"Her Majesty's Government, on hearing of these events, had only two courses to pursue, namely that of acknowledging the blockade and proclaiming the neutrality of Her Majesty, or that of refusing to acknowledge the blockade, and insisting upon the rights of Her Majesty's subjects to trade with the ports of the South. Her Majesty's Government pursued the former course as at once the most just and the most friendly to the United States.

"It is obvious, indeed, that the comes of treating the vessels of the Southern States as pinated vessels, and their crews as pinates, would have been to resource the character of neutrals and to take part in the war; nav, it would have been doing more than the United States themselves, who have never treated the prisoners toy have made either by land or sea as rebels and pirates, but as prisoners of war, to be detained until regularly exchanged.

"So much as to the step, which you say your Government can never regard 'as otherwise than precipitate,' of acknowledging the Southern States as helligerents. It was, on the contrary, your own Government which, in assuming the helligerent right of blockade, recognized the Southern States as belligerents. Had they not been helligerents, the armed ships of the United States would have had no right to step a single British ship upon the high seas."*

But it is said that the recognition was premature, because, when it was made, the official announcement of the blockade had not yet been received. What it this had been so? The blockade existed in fact; it was known to the British Government; and it was important to Her Majesty's subjects that it should be made known to them at the earliest possible moment. But this assumption, rashly made in the Case of the United States, turns out to be incorrect. The facts stood thus: The Proclamation of the President with regard to the ports of the seven States was issued on the 19th of April. It was followed by a similar Proclamation of the 27th, as to the ports of North Carolina and Virginia. The blockade was effectually established on the 30th. The issuing of the Proclamations was communicated to Lord Lyons, the Minister of Grat Britain at Washington, on the 29th. On the 1st of May, Mr. Seward, the Sceretary of State of the United States, writes to him as follows:—

The so-called Cenfederate States have waged an insurrectionary war against this Government. They are buying, and even seizing, vessels in several places for the purpose of furnishing themselves

On the 3rd of May, the proclamation of the blockade, which had appeared in the Boston newspapers, was published in the London newspapers. It turned out afterwards that there were inaccuracies in the version thus given by the Boston newspapers; but the substance of the thing remained the same; there was no doubt that the

On the 5th of May, the Government received a letter of the 23rd of April from their Consul at New York, transmitting a copy, correct in all essential particulars, of their consult at New Tolk, transmitting a copy, correct in an essential particulars, of the proclamation of the blockade, as also a complete copy of that of President Davis inviting applications for letters of marque.† On the 10th of May, complete copies of both proclamations were received from the British Minister at Washington.

In the meantime, a copy of the President's Proclamation of the 19th of April having been forwarded by Mr. Sceretary Seward to Mr. Dallas, the United States' Minister in England, it was officially communicated by Mr. Dallas to Lord Russell on the 11th of May. § Her Majesty's Proclamation of Neutrality was not issued till the 14th of May. Thus it was not till three days after the official communication last referred to, and nine days after a copy had been received from the British Consul at

New York, that Her Majesty's Proclamation of Neutrality was issued.

But it is said that the expected arrival of Mr. Adams should have been awaited. What difference could it have made. No explanations afforded by that gentleman could have altered the facts—facts which made it the duty of the Government to advise Her Majesty to recognize the validity of the blockade, and, in order so to do, to recognize also the belligerent status of the de facto Confederate Government.

But the not waiting for Mr. Adams is put forward as a breach of feith on the part of Earl Russell, his Lordship having, it is said, pledged himself to Mr. Dallas, the predecessor of Mr. Adams, to await the arrival of the latter. Here again we have an entire misconception. No such pledge was given, or intended to be given. What passed between Lord Russell and Mr. Dallas appears from a letter of the latter to

The bold me that the three type-semanties of the confinent confidency were nere; that he mad not seen them, but was not unwilling to do so, unofficially; that there existed an understanding between the Government and that of France, which would lead both to take the same course as to recognition, whatever that course might be; and he then referred to the rumonr of a meditated blockade recognition, which and their discontinuance as ports of entry—topics on which I had heard nothing, and could therefore say nothing. It is plain that the motive for waiting the arrival of Mr. Adams was to obtain ositive knowledge in the place of "mere rumour" - that is, "rumour of a meditated blockade;" not that there was any intention of discussing with Mr. Adams the question of the Proclamation of Neutrality, if the rumour proved correct. When authentic information came in the copies of the President's Proclamation officially famished to the Foreign Office, full knowledge took the place of rumour, and the after became converted into certainty. All motive for delay then ceased, and the

Yet this has been magnified into a breach of faith, and that by persons who have his letter before them.

The example of Great Britain in acknowledging the Confederate States as Recognition of belligerents was followed by the Emperor of the French in a Proclamation of the 10th belligerency. June; by the King of the Netherlands on the 16th; by the Queen of Spain on the Course pursued by 7th; by the Emperor of Brazil on the 1st of August.

The Government of the United States, however, refused to concede to other nations he right of acknowledging the belligerent status of the seceding States. In these they wonly what Mr. Seward termed "a discontented domestic faction." Writing to lr. Dayton on the 30th of May, 1861, Mr. Seward says :—

" The United States cannot for a moment allow the French Government to rest under the delusive belief that they will be content to have the Confederate States recognized as a belligerent Power by States with which this nation is in amity. No concert of action among foreign States so recognizing the insurgents can reconcile the United States to such a proceeding, whatever may be the consequences of resistance."*

In a despatch from Mr. Seward to Mr. Dayton of the 17th June, 1861; the former writes: " The United States, rightly jeulous, as we think, of their sovereignty, cannot suffer themselves to debate any abridgement of that sovereignty with France or with any other nation. Much less can be consent that France shall announce to it a conclusion of her own against that sovereignty, which conclusion France has adopted without any previous conference with the United States on the subject This Government insists that the United States are one whole undivided nation, especially so far as foreign nations are concerned, and that France is, by the law of nations and by Treaties, not a neural Power between two imaginary parties here, but a friend of the United States.

"It is erroneous, so far as foreign nations are concerned, to suppose that any war exists in the United States. Certainly there cannot be two belligerent Powers where there is no war. There is here as there has always been, one political Power, namely, the United States of America, competent to make war and peace, and conduct commerce and alliances with all foreign nations. either in fact or recognized by foreign nations. There is, indeed, an armed sedition seeking to over-throw the Government, and the Government is employing military and naval forces to repress it. But these facts do not constitute a war presenting two belligerent Powers, and modifying the national character, rights, and responsibilities, or the characters, rights, and responsibilities of foreign nations It is true that insurrection may ripen into revolution, and that revolution thus ripened may extinguish a previously existing State, or divide it into one or more independent States, and that if such States continue their strile after such division, then there exists a state of war affecting the characters, rights and duties of all the Parties concerned. But this only happens when the revolution has thus run is successful course.

"The French Government says, in the instruction which has been tendered to us, that certain facts which it assumes confer upon the insurgents of this country, in the eyes of foreign Powers, all the appearances of a trovernment de facto, wherefore, whatever may be its regrets, the French Government ment must consider the two Contending Parties as employing the forces at their disposal in conformity with the laws of war.

"This statement assumes not only that the law of nations entitles any insurrectionary faction when it establishes a de pacto Government, to be treated as belligerent, but also that the fact of the attainment of this status is to be determined by the appearance of ic in the eyes of foreign nations. If we should concede both of these positions, we should still insist that the existence of a de factorization for the concernment, entitled to belligerent rights, is not established in the present case."

In a despatch of June 19 he writes :-

"What is now seen in this country is the occurrence, by no means peculiar, but frequent in a countries, more frequent even in Great Britain than here, of an armed insurrection engaged attempting to overthrow the regularly-constituted and established Government. There is, of course the employment of force by the Government to suppress the insurrection, as every other Government necessarily employs force in such cases. But these incidents by no means constitute a state of war impairing the sovereignty of the Government, creating belligerent sections, and entitling foreign Sales to intervene or to act as neutrals between them, or in any other way to east off their lawful obligates to the nation thus for the moment disturbed."

Writing to Mr. Adams on the 21st of July, he says:—

"The United States and Great Britain have assumed incompaniele, and thus far irreconcilable positions on the subject of the existing insurrection.

"The United States claim and insist that the integrity of the Republic is unbroken, and that the Government is supreme, so far as foreign nations are concerned, as well for war as for peace, over all the States, all sections, and all citizens, the loyal not more than the disloyal, the patriots and the insurgent alike. Consequently, they insist that the British Government shall in no way intervene in the insurrection, or hold commercial or other intercourse with the insurgents in derogation of the felest authority."§

The position assumed by the United States' Government was plainly untenable being neither more nor less than this, that when a body of States secode from a former Government and form one of their own, the original Government is to be the sole judge as to when the status of belligerency can be conceded—a proposition wholly at variance with all received principles of International Law.

How Lord Russell viewed the matter appears from a despatch to Lord Lyons of

"I have to state to your Lordship that I have every reason to be satisfied with the language and conduct of Mr. Adams since he has arrived in this country.

be satisfied with the language and "The only complaint which he has urged here is, that the Queen's Proclamation announcing her neutrality was hasty and premature.

"I said, in the first place, that our position was of necessity one of neutrality; that we could not ake part either for the North against the South, or for the South against the North.

"To this he willingly assented, and said that the United States expected no assistance from us to enable their Government to finish the war.

"I rejoined that if such was the case, as I supposed, it would not have been right either towards our admirals and mayal commanders, nor towards our merchants and mercantile marine, to leave them without positive and public orders; that the exercise of belligerent rights of search and capture by a band of adventurers clustered in some small island in the Greek Archipelago or in the Atlantic would subject them to the penalties of piracy; but we could not treat 5,000,000 of men, who had declared their independence, like a hand of maranders or filibusters. If we had done so, we should have done more than the United States themselves. Their troops had taken prisoners many of the adherents of the than the tribetal parties the massives, then thomps had taken prisoners many of the americas of the Confederacy, but I could not perceive from the newspapers that in any case they had brought these prisoners to trial for high treason, or shot them as rebels. Had we lung the captain of an armed vessel of the Southern Confederacy as a pirate, we should have done that which a sense of humanity had prohibited on the part of the Government itself."

The question soon assumed a practical form. When the Government of the Question as to Confederate States had armed certain vessels, and had placed them under the Confederate command of officers duly commissioned by it, and those vessels put into ports of the neutral Powers, the Government of the United States protested loudly against their heing received as vessels of war, on the ground that the Insurgent States still formed an integral portion of the Union; that they were to be looked upon as rebels; and that commissions from a Government, the independence of which had not been acknowledged, could not give to its ships the character of ships of war. They insisted, therefore, on these vessels being looked upon as pirates, to which all entry into the ports of other nations, and all assistance of every kind should be denied. The Federal Government even went further, and threatened to hold neutral Governments responsible for any assistance or supplies afforded to Confederate ships. But the neutral Governments were unanimous in refusing to accede to these demands, and persisted in conceding to the Confederate ships the same privileges as were afforded to those of the

The question first arose with the Government of the Netherlands, on the occasion Discussion with of the visit of the Confederate vessel, the Sumter, to the Dutch Island of Curaçoa, in Government of the August 1861, and of her being allowed to replenish her stock of coal and obtain Netherlands. supplies there. The fact having come to the knowledge of Mr. Seward, he forthwith instructed Mr. Pike, the United States' Minister at the Hague, to bring the matter immediately to the notice of the Government:-

"You are instructed to bring this matter immediately to the notice of the Government of the Netherlands. The subject of damages for so great a violation of the rights of the United States will be considered when we shall have properly verified the facts of the case. In the meantime you will ask the Government of the Netherlands for any explanation of the transaction it may be able or see fit to give. You will further say that the United States, if the case thus stated shall prove to be correct, will expect, in view of the Treaties existing between the two countries, and the principles of the law of nations, as well as upon the ground of assurances recently received from the Government of the Netherlands, that it will disown the action of its authorities at Curaçon, and will adopt efficient means to prevent a recurrence of such proceedings hereafter."*

Mr. Pike accordingly protests against the idea "that aid and countenance could be afforded by a friendly Power to the Sumter, though she did assume the character of a ship of war of the Insurgents. I claimed," he says-

"That were she afforded shelter and supplies on this ground by the Authorities at Curaçoa, and should the Dutch Government approve the act, it would be, substantially, a recognition of the Southern Confederacy, and that, in my judgment, such an act would be regarded by the United States as an unfriendly and even hostile act, which might lead to the gravest consequences. I held that nothing more need be asked by the so-styled Confederate States, as a practical measure of recognition, than that a ship like the Sumter, claiming to be a national vessel of those States, should be permitted to exter the aeighbouring ports of foreign nations, and there obtain the necessary means to enable her to depredate upon the commerce of the United States. That such a course on the part of any Power, aggravated by the fact that she was unable to obtain such supplies at home, so far from being neutral conduct, was really to afford the most efficient aid to the men who were in rebellion against their own Government, and plundering and destroying the vessels and property of their fellow-citizens on the high seas. protested against such a doctrine as tending necessarily to the termination of all friendly relations between our Government and any Government that would tolerate such practices, whether that Govern-

A correspondence ensued between Mr. Pike and Baron Van Zuylen, the Netherlands Minister for Foreign Affairs, in which the former denied the right of other nations to accord to the Insurgent States the character of a belligerent Power, and insisted that the vessels of the Confederate Government were but "piratical craft," or at hest could only be looked upon as privateers, in which character they would be excluded, except in case of distress, from ports of the Netherlands.

M. Van Znylen stated the views of his Government in a most able paper, from which, however, owing to its length, I must confine myself to a few extracts:—

"It is not sufficient to dispose of the difficulty by the declaration that the Sumter is, as is stated in your despatches, 'a vessel fitted out for, and actually engaged in, piratical expeditions,' or 'a privateer steamer.' Such an assertion should be clearly proved, in accordance with the rule of law 'affirmanti incumbit probatio.'

"After having poised, with all the attention which comports with the weightiness of the matter, the facts and circumstances which characterize the dissensions which now are laying desolate the United States, and of which no Government more desires the prompt termination than does that of the Netherlands, I think I may express the conviction that the Sumter is not a privateer, but a man-of-war—grounding myself on the following considerations:—

"In the first place, the decharation of the Commander of the vessel, given in writing to the Governor of Curaçon, who had made known that he would not allow a privateer to come into the port, and had then demanded explanations as to the character of the vessel. This declaration purported 'the Sunner is a ship of war duly commissioned by the Government of the Confederate States."

"The Netherlands Governor had to be contented with the word of the Commander couched in writing. M. Ortolan ('Diplomatie de la Mer,' i, p. 217), in speaking of the evidence of nationality of vessels of war, thus expresses himself:—

"'The flag and the pennant are visible indications, but we are not bound to give faith to them until they are sustained by a cannon shot.'

"The attestation of the Commander may be exigible, but other proofs must be presumed; and, whether on the high seas or elsewhere, no foreign Power has the right to obtain the exhibition of them.

"Therefore, the Colonial Council has unanimously concluded that the word of the t'ommanding Officer was sufficient.

"In the second place, the vessel armed for war by private persons is called 'privateer.' The character of such vessel is settled precisely, and, like her English name (privateer) indicates sufficiently under this circumstance that she is a private armed vessel—name which Mr. Whenton gives them.—(* Elements of International Law, "i, p. 19.)

"Privateering is the maritime warfare which privateers are authorized to make, for their own account, against merchant-vessels of the enemy by virtue of letters of marque, which are issued to them by the State.

"The Sumter is not a private vessel; is not the private property of unconnected individuals—of private ship-owners. She, therefore, cannot be a privateer; she can only be a ship of war or ship of the State armed for cruizing. Thus the Sumter is designated in the extract annexed from 'Harper's Weekly,' under the name of 'rebel ship of war.'"

"Thirdy. It cannot be held, as you propose in your despatch of the 9th of this month, that all vessels carrying the Confederate flag are, without distinction, to be considered as privateers, because the principles of the law of autions, as well as the examples of history, require that the rights of war be accorded to those States.

"The Government of the United States holds that it should consider the States of the South as "It does not pertain to the King's Government to pronounce upon the subject of a question which is entirely within the domain of the internal regulation of the United States; neither has it to inquire whether, in virtue of the Constitution which rules that Republic, the States of the South can separate from the central Government and whether they ought then, age or no, to be reputed as rebels during the first period of the difficulties."

After referring to historical precedents, especially the case of the United States themselves in their straggle for independence, "Is there need," he asks, "to remind you that at the outset of the war of American Independence, in 1778, the English refused to recognize American privateers as lawful enemics, under pretence that the letters of marque which they hore did not emanate from the Severeign but from revolted subjects? But Great Britain soon had to desist from this pretention, and to accord international treatment to the colonists in arms against the mother-country."

M. Van Zuylen cites also the precedent of the American privateer Paul Jones :-

"This vessel, considered as a pirate by England, had captured two of His Britannic Majesty's ships in October 1779. She took them into the Texel, and remained there more than two months, notwithin October 1772. She took them into the lexel, and remained there more than two months, notwithstanding the representations of Mr. York, Ambassador of Great Britain at the Hagne, who considered the asylum accorded to such privateer (pirate as he called it in his Memoir to the States-General of 21st March, 1780) as directly contrary to Treaties, and even to the Ordinances of the Government of are York demanded that the English vessels should be released.

"The States-General refused the restitution of the prizes.

"The United States, whose belligerent rights were not recognized by England, enjoyed at that period the same treatment in the ports of the Republic of the United Provinces as the Netherlands authorities have now accorded to the Confederate States.

If the Cabinet of the Hague cannot, therefore, by force of the preceding, class all the vessels of the Confederate States armed for war in the category of privateers, much less can it treat them as the Confederate and them in your despatch of the 12th of this month), or consider the Sumter as prates (as you can them in your despatch of the 12th of this month), or consider the Sumter as engaged in a fillbustering expedition—'engaged in a piratical expedition against the commerce of the United States,' as it reads in your communication of the 2nd of September."*

The subject was resumed in the ensuing October, when the Sumter had again put into a Dutch port, namely, Paramaribo, and, in spite of the remonstrance of the United States Consul, had been allowed to coal and refit, Mr. Seward immediately directs Mr. Pike to demand explanations. Mr. Pike loses no time in writing in peremptory

In reply, Baron Van Znylen repeats the refusal of the royal Government to treat the Sumter as other than a ship of war. He observes, that the commission of the officer in command of her had been duly exhibited to the Governor. At the same

However, the Government of the Netherlands, wishing to give a iresh proof of its desire [to avoid] all that could give the slightest subject for complaint to the United States, has just sent instructions to the colonial authorities, enjoining them not to admit, except in case of shelter from stress (relache foreste), the vessels of war and privateers of the two belligerent parties, unless for twice twenty-four hours, and not to permit them, when they are steamers, to provide themselves with a quantity of coal more than sufficient for a run of twenty-four hours."

The offensive tone of Mr. Pike's previous letter does not pass unnoticed:—

"The feeling of distrust which seems to have dictated your last despatch of the 8th of this month, and which shows itself especially in some entirely erroneous appreciations of the conduct of the Government of the Netherlands, gives to the last, strong in its good faith and in its friendly intentions, just cause for astonishment. So, then, the Cabinet of which I have the honour to form part, deems that it may dispense with undertaking a justification useless to all who examine impartially, and without passion, the events which have taken place." S

In the mean time, Mr. Seward had written a despatch to Mr. Pike, of the 17th October, in which he states, in explicit terms, "for the information of the Government of the Netherlands, just what the United States claim and expect in

These demands have been made, not from any irritation or any sensibility of national pride, but to make it sure that henceforth any piratical vessel fitted out by or under the agency of disloyal American citizens, and cruising in pursuit of merchant-vessels of the United States, shall not be admitted into either the Continental or the Colonial ports of the Netherlands, under any pretext whatever. If that assurance cannot be obtained in some way, we must provide for the protection of our rights in some other way. Thus, the subject is one of a purely practical character; it neither requires not admits of debate or argument on the part of the United States. If what is thus desired shall be obtained by the United States in any way, they will be satisfied; if it fails to be obtained through the disinclination of the tovernment of the Netherlands, its proceedings in this respect will be deemed unfriendly and injurious to the United States. The United States being thus disposed to treat the subject in a practical way, they are not tenacious about the manner or form in which the due respect to their rights is manifested by the Government of the Netherlands, and still less about the considerations or arguments upon which that Government regulates its own conduct in the matter They regard the whole insurrection in this country as ephemeral; indeed, they believe that the attempt at piracy under the name of privateering made by the insurgents has already well nigh failed. While therefore, they insist that shelter shall not be afforded to the pirates by nations in friendship with the United States, they, at the same time, are not unwilling to avoid grave debutes concerning their right that might survive the existing controversy. It remains only to say in this connection that the coarse which the United States are pursuing in their complaints to the Government of the Netherlands is not peculiar to, but it is the same which has been and which will be pursued towards any other maritime

With these remarks I proceed to notice Baron Van Zuylen's communication. You will reply to Power on the occurrence of similar grievances, him that the United States unreservedly claim to determine for themselves absolutely the character the Sumter, she being a vessel fitted out, owned, armed, sailed, and directed by American citizens alowe allegiance to the United States, and who neither have nor can, in their piratical purposes and

The United States, therefore, cannot admit that the Sumter is a ship of war or a privateer and navigated as pirates. so entitled to any privileges whatever, in either of those characters, in the port of Curaçoa: nor can they debate any such subject with the Government of the Netherlands."

Mr. Pike expresses his satisfaction at the restrictions placed by the Government of the Netherlands on the Confederate vessels, but at the same time regrets that the same treatment should have been adopted towards the vessels of the United States; to which M. Van Zuylen replies that, the United States Government having desired that measures should be taken to prevent the prolonged stay in Dutch ports of the Sumter or other vessels in the seceding States, the King's Government had admitted the justice of the claim, but that the measures taken could not reach one of the two parties exclusively: they must be general.

The new regulations led to a singular result. On the 8th of November the United States' steamer Iroquois arrived off the port of Curaçoa; the Governor informed Lieutenant Palmer, who was in command of the vessel, that her stay must be limited to forty-eight hours, and her supply of coal to twenty-four hours consumption, although at the time the United States had more than 1,300 tons of coal at Curaçoa, which, by the way, shows that they had established a depôt there. Lieutenant Palmer declined to enter the port on these terms, and his conduct in so doing was approved by Mr. Seward Mr. Pike is directed to ask for explanations, with this remark from Mr. Seward:-

If His Majesty's Government shall approve of the proceedings of the Governor of Curaga. will become an important question what measure of hospitalities will be due by us to the naval vessand authorities of the Netherlands in similar cases."

Thus, while the regulation was received with satisfaction by the United State Government, as a restriction on Confederate vessels, an attempt to enforce it against one of their own was looked upon as matter of grave offence. It so happened, however, that the Dutch Government had shortly before, on the suggestion of the Government of Curaçoa, revoked the order.

No sooner had this been done than the Government of the United States desired its restoration. Mr. Pike is instructed to lose no time in "calling the attention of Mr. Stratenus to the subject of the intrusion of insurgent piratical American vessels seeking shelter in the ports of the Netherlands and their colonies. If you cannot obtain a decree excluding them altogether, it is thought that the Government will have no hesitation in restoring the restrictive policy which was adopted by it under the representatives of its foreign affairs by Baron Van Zuylen.";

Mr. Pike was at the same time instructed to call upon the King's Government on the King's Government to reconsider the subject of according to the Confederate States the character of belligerents, and, in the then state of affairs, to revoke the recognition.

Both proposals were declined by the King's Government. The inconsistency of the demand for the restoration of the restrictive order is pointed out by M. de Sombreff, the new Minister of Foreign Affairs :-

"In this regard I permit myself to observe to you that I could not understand how your Government could desire the re-establishment of measures which actually were, and would again be, applicable to both parties, and which were, at the time, the cause why the Union ship Iroquois would not enter

"It was on that occasion that the last were modified, which was brought to your notice the 30th of

It follows, from advices which have since reached the Government, that the new Commander of the Iroquois has expressed himself well satisfied to find the precedent restrictive measures withdrawn, and thus to have the privilege of taking as much coal as he might wish. These measures are also favourable to Netherlands commerce with the United States, so that the interests of the two countries

"If the instructions given before 1! onth of December 1861 were now returned to, the Government of the Netherlands might not interests, as well as those of the Unic answering that the consequence of said instructions would be, xed, with good reason, with trifling, but would hurt its own interests as went as those of the Communication of Baron de Znylen, dated October 29, 1861, that the vessels-of-war of the United States, also, could no longer be able to sojourn in the Netherlands East Indian ports more than twice twenty-four hours, nor supply themselves with coal for a run of more

A similar correspondence had, in the meantime, been going on between the United Correspondence States' Government and that of Brazil, in consequence of the Sumter having, on the with Brazil. 7th of September, 1861, been allowed to enter the Brazilian port of Maranhani, and to take in a supply of coal there, notwithstanding the protest of the United States' Consul. Mr. Webb, the United States' Minister at the Court of the Emperor, is instructed to "lose no time in calling the attention of the Emperor's Government to the affair,"

"You will ask explanations thereof, and, we less satisfactory explanations are rendered, you will "You will ask expanations thereof, and, it less satisfactory expanations are rendered, you will the inform His Majesty's Government that the shelter and supplying of pirates, as the Sunnter is sheltered and supplied, in the ports of Brizil, are deemed an unfriendly act by this Government, and will ask that such measures shall be taken in regard to the case as will make the Governor of Maranham sensible of His Majesty's displeasure, and will prevent a recurrence of such injuries to the United

"I hardly need say that the proceeding at Marauham is an occurrence of great surprise and deep disquiet to the United States. That we have supposed that Brazil and every other State on the American continent have an interest second only to our own in the stability of the American Union, the downfall of which would, in our belief, inevitably be followed sooner or later by the decline and fall of every independent nation on this continent, which must in that case become once more a theatre

"Such respect for the sovereignty of the United States as one great nation owes to another is an indispensable condition of friendly relations with foreign Powers in the present emergency. You will therefore take care not, for one moment, to admit into debate any question of claim on the part of the insurgents to any rights, whether as a sovereign or a belligerent."

Mr. Webb thereupon addresses to Senhor Taques, the Sceretary of State for Foreign Affairs, a despatch of prodigions length, but which ends with the pertinent inquiry :-

"Whether it is or is not the intention of the Brazilian Government to permit the piratical letters of marque and privateers of the rebels of the United States to enter into the ports of Brazil, and there and snecour and material aid—'provisions and coal—to continue their voyages' against the commerce

Senhor Taques replied, as the Baron van Zuylen had done before him, in a most able paper, in which he reminded Mr. Webb of the numerous instances in which Governments de facto had been admitted to the status of belligerents, although their sovereign character had not been acknowledged, pointing out that the recognition of belligerency carried with it the consequence that the commissioned vessels of the acknowledged belligerent could not be treated as pirates, but must receive the same treatment as those of the opponent.

The correspondence continued, and, owing to the exceeding fertility of Mr. Webb's pen, assumes very formidable proportions. It led to the regulations which I have already mentioned; which regulations the Presidents of the provinces were ordered to

Mr. Seward reviews the correspondence with evident dissatisfaction:—

"We cannot admit, and we are not likely to admit, that anything has occurred to relieve Brazil, or any other Power holding Treaty relations with us, from fulfilling the obligations of friendship towards us which it has heretofore voluntarily assumed; much less can we admit that any such nation has a right, by adopting a character of neutrality, to give hospitality, shelter, and supplies to pirates engaged in destroying our commerce, whether they affect to be public vessels of war, or are content to sail under cover of pretended letters of marque granted by the chief of their treasonable faction.

"At the same time we are not looking out for causes of conflict with maritime Powers. We state our complaints whenever grievances are committed by them, and we ask the redress due to us from friendly States. Unwilling to drag such Powers into our own domestic strife, we are content with a practical respect for our flag, and we engage in no discussions with them about the unjust or unfriendly manifestations with which that practical respect is sometimes attended. Acting on this principle, we have brought to the notice of the Bazilian Government the grievance committed against us by the Governor of Maranham. That Government, instead of giving us redress, or taking any measures to prevent a repetition of the grievance, has avowed and sanctioned it."*

In the position thus assumed, the Brazilian Government stands single and alone. We cannot with self-respect, further remonstrate nor debate. I confess that the attitude assumed by Brazil embarrasses us, because it tends to encourage our internal enemies. We trust, however, that we possess the ability to maintain and preserve our Government against all enemies at home, however much aid and encouragement they may receive from abroad,

"It is not needful that you state to the Brazilian Government any part of the contents of this despatch except its conclusions, which are these: 1st. We stand upon the position heretofore assumed that the proceedings of the Governor of Maranham are intolerable. 2nd. We cannot further debate at Rio, nor can we change the field of the discussion from that capital to Washington. 3rd. Conscions of our ability to protect all our national rights, we neither importune nor menace any foreign State which may deem it fit to do us wrong. But so fast as every such case matures we determine, with what prudence and firmness we can, the course which the emergency requires."+

Mr. Webb re-echoes:-

"We cannot go to war with all the world; and while circumstances compel us to acquiesce in the conduct of England, Spain, and Holland, we cannot insist upon reparation from Brazil for having adopted the same line of policy towards us."

The Marquis d'Abrantes having succeeded Sculior Taques as Minister of Foreign Affairs, in reference to Mr. Seward's last despatches writes, on the 16th of June, to Mr. Webb :-

" In view of the conclusions of the last of the desputches referred to from the Government of the Union, the Government of His Majesty the Emperor judges convenient to regard at an end the discussion of the subject it treats, it being flattering to observe that from it nothing has resulted in the least altering the relations of friendship and good understanding between the two countries which it so much interests both to maintain."

Hereupon Mr. Webb breaks out. After repeating verbatim the complaints set out in his letter of the 18th of March, he continues :-

" Here, as your Kacelleney will perceive, is not only grave cause for complaint set forth, but a mole is pointed out in which the friendly relations heretofore existing between the two countries can be restored, viz., by a simple act of justice, reversing the decision which Brazil has hastily made. If Brazil cannot meet the reasonable expectation of the Government of the United States, then the Secretary of State, speaking in the name of the President and the Government, claims, at least, as a concession to the past friendly relations of the two countries, that Brazil will no longer occupy towards the United States a more unfriendly position than any other Power; but, by following the example of other nations, place herself 'on the same ground in relation to the United States which is occupied by other maritime powers, and thus mitigate the discontent' which it is made my duty to report to this Government.

"But this is not all. In a despatch from Washington, dated the 3rd April, the Undersigned is instructed to say to the Government of His Imperial Majesty that the Government of the United States, standing 'upon the position heretofore assumed,' declare that the proceedings of the Government of the United States, standing 'upon the position heretofore assumed,' declare that the proceedings of the Government of the United States, standing 'upon the position heretofore assumed,' declare that the proceedings of the Government of the United States, standing 'upon the position heretofore assumed,' declare that the proceedings of the Government of the United States, standing 'upon the position heretofore assumed,' declare that the proceedings of the Government of the United States, standing 'upon the position heretofore assumed,' declare that the proceedings of the United States, standing 'upon the position heretofore assumed,' declare that the proceedings of the United States, standing 'upon the position heretofore assumed,' declare that the proceedings of the United States, standing 'upon the position heretofore assumed,' declare that the proceedings of the United States, standing 'upon the position heretofore assumed,' declare the upon the proceedings of the United States, standing the upon the proceedings of the United States, and the upon the upo of Maranham are intolerable; and we cannot further debate at Rio, nor can we change the field of the

"And how are these complaints, remonstrances, and friendly intimations to Brazil, from the Government of the United States, received by the Imperial Government ? Why, the Undersigned is called upon to apprise his Government that Brazil has 'put an end to this discussion upon the aforesaid subject, and is happy to perceive that 'not the least ulteration will result from it in the relations of friendship and good understanding between the countries.

'Most assuredly these are not the results which the Government of the United States promised itself when it ordered the Undersigned to place before the Government of Brazil the despatches of the 18th of March, and the very significant extract from that of the 3rd of April; and while it is the duty of the Undersigned to convey to his Government an answer so very different from what he anticipated, self-respect demands that he should not act as a mere automaton in the matter; and an earnest desire to restore and perpetuate the friendly relations which formerly existed between the two countries

The Undersigned is grateful to a kind Providence that in what has occurred the existing friendly relations between the two Governments have not been disturbed; but he is not unmindful that the good feelings upon which those friendly relations were based, and which is ever the best safeguard for their continuance, have been trifled with by the conduct of the Governor of Marunham, and which conduct has been defended, sustained, and approved by your immediate predecessor, speaking in the

"The Government of the United States, for more than a year, has been actively engaged in putting down the greatest rebellion recorded in the history of the world. A civil war, which has called into the field more than a million of soldiers, and which imposed upon the Government of the United States the near meaning and equipping of an army of seven hundred thousand men, and a fleet of nearly five hundred ressels to do battle for our national existence, has called forth the energies and exhibited the resources of a mighty people; and yet, in the hour of greatest peril, our Government has not hesitated to tell the of a mighty people, and yet, in the noin of greatest pent, our coverances has not instance to such wrong was impossible, that the United States will not debate with other States a question vital to its own existence, but content herself with pointing out the wrong done her, leaving for the present the expiation of such wrong and injury solely to the sense of justice and magnanimity of those who once styled themselves friends. Hence, as our Secretary of State justly says, acting on this principle we have brought to the notice of the Brazilian Government the grievance committed against us by the President of Maranham. That Government, instead of giving us redress, or taking measures to prevent a repetition of the grievance, Whence the Undersigned is instructed to say to the Brazilian Government 'that while the United States cannot ask Brazil for less than the absolute exclusion of pirates from her harbours, yet, standing as she does alone among nations, in the extent of her unfriendly attitude, if she would but place herself upon the same ground in relation to the United States which is occupied by other maritime Powers, it would mitigate the discontent which you are authorized to express; and as if foreseeing the failure of this appeal to the friendship and justice of Brazil, the Undersigned is ordered to say, in conclusion, that, conscious of our ability to protect all our national rights, we neither importune nor menace any foreign State which may deem it fit to do us wrong; but so fast as every such case matures we determine, with what prudence and firmness we can, the course which the emergency requires, "Inasmuch as the Government of the United States has definitively closed all further discussion of the affair of the pirate Samter, either here or at Washington, nothing of the kind is intended in this despatch; its sole object being to point out to your Excellency that, so far from nothing having despaten; its sore object being to point out to your excenency that, so far from nothing naving occurred to disturb the good feeling upon which is based the friendly relations between the United States and Brizil, the whole course of your predecessor in relation to the visit of the pirate Sunter to Maranham, and the present attitude of Brazil towards the piratical vessels belonging to the rebel States and to our national vessels, is considered by the Government of Washington untenable, unjust, and

" It is quite unnecessary for the Undersigned to repeat his ardent desire to draw closer and render more permanent the relations between the United States and Brazil, and the establishment by them of an American policy, in contradistinction to what is the recognized policy of Europe, as is being developed by interference with the internal affairs of Mexico; and he is pained to see all his efforts in developed by interference with the internal analysis of moxico; and he is pained to see an instends in a course declared by the Government of Washington to be more infriendly than that of any other foreign coarse declared by the Coveriment of Assungton to be more any coarse that the Coveriment of the Power; and by ignoring every fact, sentiment, and position taken in the Washington despatches of the 18th March and 3rd of April, and atterly refusing to perceive or admit that the United States feels aggrieved by the conduct of Brazil and confidently expects that she will not persevere in maintaining a position more unfriendly than that of any other maritime Power. Adherence by Brazil to her present a position more unificially activated to any other maritime rower. Admerence by Drazii to her present to cause a disruption of the peaceful relations existing between the two countries; there exists no such danger. The Government of the United States has demonstrated to the world that while struggling for its national existence against a gigantic rebellion, it can submit with grace and a not unbecoming bandlity to the irritating assaults nade upon it in the hour of adversity, whether they emanate from ancient enemies or professed friends. But nations, like individuals, while they frequently forgive ancient evenines or professed friends. Dut nations, tike individuals, while they frequently Jorgice in her present course by Brazil may inquiries, do not always forget them. And it is because perseverance in her present course by Brazil may inquire the people of the United States to forget the friendly feelings upon which the existing peaceful relations between the two countries are based that the policy of your predecessor is deprecated."*

The discussion on this subject was revived in the ensuing year by the arrival of the Alabama, and shortly afterwards the Florida and Georgia, in Brazilian ports. The first-named ship took two American vessels within Brazilian waters and burned them there. Notwithstanding which her commander was allowed to go on shore at the island of Fernando Noronha, and there to obtain supplies for the vessel and to land the prisoners. For this the officer commanding at Fernando de Noronha was displaced. The Florida was allowed to enter the port of Pernambuco, and there to refit and coal, in despite of the protest of the United States' Consul that the Florida was a pirate and the consort of the Alabama, which had just before violated the neutrality of Brazilian

"Nevertheless," says Mr. Webb in writing to the Marquis d'Abrantes on the 21st of May, 1863—

"Because her commander represented that the ship required repairs to her engine which could not be done within the twenty-four hours, the Governor, in a communication to the pirate, now before the Undersigned, dated the 9th of May, informed the applicant that, inasmuch as he represented to him that a compliance with his order to leave in twenty-four hours will compel him to do so in a distressed condition, because the repairs to his engine, necessary to his safety, cannot be completed in that time, and would be illiberal and inhuman, and expose him to danger, and Brazil to the consequences; and inasmuch as he, the Governor, does not wish to be inhuman or illiberal, or endanger the safety of the pirate, or to lessen his means of defence, or to expose him to imminent risks, therefore, believing the representation to have been made in good faith, and that he cannot in safety continue his cruize (against American commerce bound to Brazil) unless given time to repair his engine, the said Governor, representing the sovereignty of Brazil, and recognizing the truitors in rebellion against the United States as belligerents, does accord to the commander of the pirate bearing their flag all the time he asks for repairs, and privilege of taking in such coals and provisions as may place him in a condition to continue his depredations upon the commerce of a friendly Power. A grosser breach of neutrality has never come to the knowledge of the Undersigned."*

He adds ---

"At this moment the ports of Brazil are made harbours of refuge and places of resort and departure for three piratical vessels, avowedly designed to prey upon the commerce of the United States. The waters of Brazil are violated with impunity in this piratical work, and after the Imperial Government had admitted and declared its indignation at such violation of sovereignty, the guilty party is received with hospitality and friendship by the Governor of Bahia, and instead of being captured and imprisoned, and his vessel detained, he is fêted, and supplied with the necessary provisons and coal, to enable him to continue his depredations upon American commerce. The wharves and streets of Bahia and Pernambuco have been, for weeks past, swarmed with American sailors and passengers from merchanten trading with Brazil which have been captured, and the persons on board robbed, by the pirates of the Alabama, Florida, and Georgia, and they have been compelled, in the ports of a friendly nation, to witness their clothing and jewellery, and even family relies, sold on the wharves and in the streets of Bahia and Pernambuco, by their piratical captors, at a tenth of their value; while the piratical vessels and all on board were received and treated as friends, and supplied with the necessary materials to continue their nefarious practices. The scenes which history informs us were rife in the seventeenth century, in the islands of the West Indies, are now being enacted in this nineteenth century in the ports of Brazil, and that through no fault of the Imperial Government—which has already done its whole duty as rapidly as circumstances have permitted—but because the Governors of Pernambuco and Bahia, in their sympathy with piracy and pirates, have neglected their duty to Brazil, and brought discredit upon the civilization of the age."

As regards the Alabama, which at this time had come into the port of Bahia Mr. Webb insists that she should have been seized by the Governor for her violation of Brazilian neutrality:—

"Your Excellence will not for a moment deny that, having by your official acts, and those of the Governor of Perna , recognized the fact that this pirate has violated the waters and outraged the is your duty, when opportunity offers, to vindicate your violated sovereignty, sovereignty of Br and by his capture, 1 possible, remunerate the injury done to American commerce within your waters.

And should the pirate come into this port when the ability of Brazil to capture and detain him admits of no question, beyond all doubt the neglect to do so would be not only an unfriendly act towards the United States, but would render Brazil responsible for all and every aggression which he might commit on American commerce after leaving this port. At this moment, the ports of Brazil are made harbours of refuge and places of resort and departure for three piratical vessels, avowedly designed to prey upon the commerce of the United States. The waters of Brazil are violated with impunity in this piratical work, and after the Imperial Government had admitted and declared its indignation at such violation of sovereignty, the guilty party is received with hospitality and friendship by the Governor of Bahia, and instead of being captured and imprisoned, and his vessel detained he is fital and supplied with the necessary provisions and coal, to enable him to continue his depredations upon American commerce."

The Marquis d'Abrantes answers, as to the non-seizure of the Alabama, that the Governor of Bahia had not sufficient information to warrant him in taking such a measure: as to the Florida and Georgia, by going over the same topies as his predecessor had done, and with equal ability.

The Government of Brazil did not seize the Alabama; but it did exclude that vessel from its ports for the future, for having made prizes in Braziliau waters, and applied the same rule to the Tuscaloosa as being a tender of the delinquent vessel.

It was immediately after this troublesome correspondence that the Imperial Government promulgated the rules contained in the Circular of June 23, 1863 (set out in the 7th Volume of American Documents, p. 110), which, in point of stringency, far exceed what any other nation had ever thought it necessary to enact. A similar question arose with the Spanish Government on the entry of the Sumter Correspondence into Cadiz, with a requisition to have repairs done and to coal. After difficulties with Spain. raised by the United States' Representatives, permission was given, though the repairs were limited to what was absolutely necessary.+

The same question arose with the French Government when the Sumter put into Correspondence St. Pierre, in the Island of Martinique, in November 1861, and was permitted by the with French Government Governor to coal, which permission was afterwards approved of by the French Government. Government. It arose in a still more striking form when the Florida put into Brest to repair and coal; as we shall see more fully hereafter when I come to the case of that vessel. Mr. Dayton, the United States Minister at the Court of France, objected to her heing received or being allowed to have repairs done to her machinery, but his protest is in the more moderate tone of a statesman and a man of the world; we hear no more about "pirates;" his objection is that, being possessed of sailing power, the vessel did not require the aid of steam—an argument which was, however, overruled by the Imperial Council.

This question was raised between the United States and Her Majesty's Government Correspondence on the arrival of the Sumter, on the 30th July, 1861, at Trinidad, where she was with British allowed to coal and to remain six days in port. This was, in due course, complained of Government. to Her Majesty's Government, Mr. Seward declaring that "the armament, the insurgent flag, and the spurious commission should have told the Governor, as they sufficiently prove to Her Majesty's Government, that the Sumter is and can be nothing else than a piratical vessel." Of course this argument did not prevail with Her Majesty's Government any more than it did with those of the Netherlands, France, or

It was obvious that the Confederates having once been acknowledged as belligerents, the admission of their ships of war to the neutral ports and harbours followed as the

The objection to the reception of these vessels took a somewhat different and more telling form in the case of the Confederate ship the Nashville, which, having left the Confederate port of Charleston, had been allowed to coal at Bermuda on her voyage to

On that voyage the Nashville committed one of those acts which stained this bateful warfare with eternal opprobrium—that of setting fire to a harmless trading vessel and making her crew prisoners of war. This proceeding was made a ground by Mr. Adams, on the arrival of the Nashville, for elaining that the vessel should not be received into a British port. In terms of just and honest indignation he writes to Earl Russell:-

"The act of wilfully burning a private merchant-ship whilst pursuing its way quietly to its destination in its own country seems in itself little to harmonize with the general sentiment among civilize and commercial nations, even when it is committed under the authority of a recognized evalue and commercial nations, even such to a commercial and commercial nationally undertaken by individuals not vested with the powers generally beligerent; but when voluntarily undertaken by marying is not visited with the powers generally acknowledged to be necessary to justify aggressive warfare it approximates too closely within the definition of piracy to receive the smallest countenance from , y Christian people. The Undersigned definition of princy to receive the similars confidenance from a yearistian people. The Ondersigned cannot permit himself to doubt that Her Majesty's tovernment, which has voluntarily renounced the authority to wage private war at sea, would not fail to visit with its atmost indignation any attempt to seek shelter under its jurisdiction from the consequences of indulging a purely partizan malice in unauthorized acts of violence on the ocean."

Mr. Morse, the United States' Consul at London, only expressed the public feeling when he wrote to Mr. Seward:—

The leading event of the current week has been the appearance of the corsair Nashville from Charleston in European waters, and her wanton and malicious destruction of an American ship by burning about seventy-five miles west of Cape Clear, off the southern coast of Ireland, and her bold entrance into a British port for coal and repairs the day following the committal of the barbarous act, It has, as a matter of course, created much comment, and no little excitement here,

"So far as I can learn and judge, the public voice here is very strong and outspoken in condenning and denouncing the act as malicious and piratical. It has taken the English people by surprise, and is doing much to enlighten them as to the character of the enemy with whom we are dealing."*

But such an act could not be held to be sufficient ground of exclusion. However, revolting such a system of warfare, it was still within the stern principle of international law, relative to war, which justifies both the seizure and the destruction of enemy's ships and goods at sea, on the principle that whatever tends to impoverish the enemy is allowable. The practice had been sanctioned by the conduct of the United States themselves, in their last war with Great Britain.

When the civil war was over, it occurred to the United States' Government that, though Captain Semmes had been admitted to parole as a prisoner of war, and could not therefore be proceeded against criminally under the law relating to treason, he might, nevertheless, be made amenable to the penal law for the destruction of ships and cargoes belonging to citizens of the United States. But the idea was abandoned, and Mr. John A. Bolles, Solicitor to the Navy Department of the United States, in an article, bearing his name, in the July number of the "Atlantic Monthly,"† under the title of "Why Semmes, of the Alabama, was not tried," has fully explained the reasons, and among them has made us acquainted with the course pursued by the United States' Government in the war with England in 1812 and 1813. The question whether Semmes should be prosecuted or not seems to have been referred by the President to Mr. Bolles and the Law Officer of the Department, who appear to have entered upon and conducted the inquiry with a discrimination, ability, and sense of justice which do them infinite honour. In the article referred to Mr. Bolles, in the first place, observes that—

"By establishing a blockade of Confederate ports, our Government had recognized the Confederates as belligerents, if not as a belligerent State, and had thus confessed that Confederate officers and men, military or naval, could not be treated as pirates or guerillas, so long as they obeyed the laws of war; the same recognition was made when cartels for exchange of prisoners were established between the Federal and Confederate authorities; and, above all, when the Federal Executive, after the courts had declared Confederate privateersmen to be pirates, had deliberately set uside those judgments, and admitted the captured and condemned officers and men of the Savannah and the Jeff. Davis to exchange as prisoners of war."

This premised, Mr. Bolles writes:—

"Without consulting publicist or jurisconsult, it was easily possible to see and show that we, as a Government, could not afford to proseente and punish as a criminal any naval officer for capturing and destroying the enemy's trading vessels, as fast as possible, not only without any attempt to send them in for adjudication, but with a determined purpose and policy not to do so.

"This conclusion was the result of a careful study of our own naval history, and of a thoughtful examination of future possibilities in the event of war between the United States and some great commercial ration.

"I will not dwell upon this last division of the topic, but content myself with a reference to that past theory and practice of our naval warfare which rendered it impossible to punish Semmes for having learned and practised so successfully the lesson taught by our own instruction and example in the Revolutionary War, when we were rebels, and in the last war (1812) with Great Britain.

"The earlier records are imperfect; but enough can be gathered from our naval historian, Cooper, to show that many of the vessels captured in the war of the Revolution were destroyed at see

"Of the history and policy of the later period we have abundant proofs. Not less than seventyfour British merehantmen were captured, and destroyed as soon as captured, under express instructions from the Navy Department, and in pursuance of a deliberate purpose and plan, without any attempt or intent to send or bring them in as prizes for adjudication. The orders of the Department upon this subject are numerous, emphatic, and carefully prepared. They deserve to be studied and remembered; and they effectually silence all American right or disposition to complain of Semaes for having imitated our example in obedience to similar orders from the Secretary of the Confederate
Novy

Navy.

Extracts from the instructions of the Department which led to these immediate burnings of every prize is a serious diminution of her force; but a single cruizer destroying every captured vessel has the capacity of continuing, in full vigour, her destructive power, so long as her provisions and stores can be replenished, either from friendly ports or from the vessels captured.

Thus has a single cruizer, upon the destructive plan, the power, perhaps, of twenty acting upon pecuniary views and thus may the employment of our small force in some degree compensate for the great inequality [of our force] compared with that of the enemy."

Such were the policy and the orders of President Madison and of the Secretary of the Navy in 1812, 1813, 1814; and such, beyond question, would be the plan and the instructions of any Administration under the circumstances."*

In conclusion, Mr. Bolles says :-

"It is evident that, after it had been, as it soon was, resolved that neither treason or piracy should be charged against Semmes before a military or naval tribunal, and that his methods of capturing, plandering, and destroying vessels should not be treated as offences against public law and duty, but that he should be dealt with as a belligerent naval officer, bound to obey the laws of war and entitled that he should be defined with an and online to their protection, it was needless to inquire where or by whom the Alabama was built, manned, to their protection, it was nectices to inquire where of my busin the America was pain, manner, armed, or commissioned; or whether a government without an open port can legitimately own or employ a naval force. These inquiries, however interesting or important they might be in other connections, were of no sort of interest or importance as elements of a trial for violating the laws of war in nections, were on no surface in importance as elements or a trial for violating the laws of war in the conduct of a cruizer subject to those laws, and protected by them.

"In this way the field and the duty of inquiry were reduced to the two subjects of cruelty to prisoners and perfidy towards Captain Winslow and the Power he represented."

The two questions thus left are dealt with by Mr. Bolles in the following number of the same Review, in a most interesting paper; the result being wholly to exculpate Semmes of every charge of ill-treatment or cruelty to prisoners; to acquit him of any charge of perfidy during the engagement with the Kearsarge; but to maintain that he was guilty of a violation of military honour in not surrendering himself as a prisoner of war after being taken off by the Deerhound.

The British Government having thus decided on acknowledging the Confederate States as a helligerent Power, and, as a necessary consequence, on the admission of Regulations of Confederate ships of war into British ports on the same footing as those of the United 31st of January, States it only remains to be seen whether the same freatment was afforded to both 1861. States, it only remains to be seen whether the same treatment was afforded to both which impartial neutrality would require.

On the 1st of June, 1861, Her Majesty's Order was issued prohibiting, as has no been unusual in the case of modern maritime wars, and has been general with reference to privateers, the introduction of prizes by the ships of either belligerent into British ports.* Whatever may, generally speaking, be the motive of such a regulation, it was, in the present instance, obviously a measure the effect of which was to place the Confederate vessels in a position of considerable disadvantage, seeing that, their own ports being strictly blockaded, they were thus left without any port into which to take their prizes. Accordingly, as reported in a despatch from Lord Lyons to Earl Russell of the 17th June, 1861, it was hailed by Mr. Seward as "likely to prove a deathblow to Southern privateering." As it was clearly at the discretion of Her Majesty's Government to adopt this regulation or not, it must be admitted that thus far there was no manifestation of the partiality by which that Government has been said to have been animated.

In January 1862, after the war had been going on for some months, circum. stances arose which made further regulations as to the admission of the armed vessels of the two belligerents into British ports necessary. Instructions, bearing date the 31st January, 1862, were accordingly issued by the Government.* One of these had reference to the ports of the Bahamas in particular, the others to the ports and waters of Her Majesty's dominions in general.

Regulations of 31st January,

As to Nassau.

The following state of things had arisen at Nassau. As has been so often repeated. the port of Nassau had been made the entrepôt for the blockade-running trade, the natural consequence of which had been that the waters of the colony were watched by and their immediate vicinity made, the cruizing ground of Federal ships.

In October 1861, Mr. Adams forwarded to Lord Russell an intercepted letter from a Mr. Baldwin, whom he stated to be in the service of the Insurgents, addressed to a Mr. Adderley, of Nassau, from which he said that it appeared that Nassau had been made, to some extent an entrepôt for the transmission of contraband of war from Great Britain to the blockaded ports.† The matter was referred by Lord Russell to the Colonial office, and by that Department to the Governor of the Colony, and the latter forwarded, in reply, on the 20th November, 1861, a report from the Receiver-General at Nassau, stating that no warlike stores had been received at that port either from the United Kingdom or elsewhere, nor had any munitions of war been shipped from Nassau to the Confederate States. This report, received by Lord Russell on the 31st of December, was communicated to Mr. Adams on the 8th of January, 1862,§

Upon this the Case of the United States makes the following remark: "The United States with confidence assert, in view of what has been already shown, that, had Earl Russell seriously inquired into the complaints of Mr. Adams, a state of facts would have been disclosed entirely at variance with this report—one which would have impelled Her Majesty's Government to suppress what was going on at Nassan. The foregoing facts were all within the reach of Her Majesty's Government, although at that time not within the reach of the Government of the United States. The failure to discover them after Mr. Adams had called attention to them, was a neglect of the diligence in the preservation of its neutrality, which was 'due' from Great Britain to the United States; and it taints all the subsequent conduct of Great Britain toward the United States during the struggle."

Further on, Lord Russell's communication is described as the "announcement of an imaginary condition of affairs;" I thus making it appear that, at the date of Lord Russell's communication, the report received from Nassau and transmitted by him was an unfaithful one; whereas the fact was that, at the date of the report, no vessel laden with munitions of war had arrived at Nassau.

It was not till the 8th of December that a vessel, the Gladiator, with a eargo of arms, suspected of being intended for the Confederate States, arrived at Nassau. The United States' Consul at once sent a message to the Commander of the United States' naval forces at Key West to request the presence of a cruizer. On the 13th of December he reports the "most opportune" arrival of the United States' war-steamer Flambeau from New York, and adds that her commander "is watching intently the movements of the rebel steamers." † From a letter addressed by the Governor to the British Naval Officer on the station it appears that the Flambeau kept her steam up ready for instant movement, causing considerable alarm among the shipping in the port; and that a rumour prevailed that her commander meant to cut out the Gladiator, or, at all events, to seize that vessel immediately on her leaving. ‡‡

The dispatches reporting this state of affairs were received in London on the 16th of January, and the attention of the British Government was necessarily called to the

ed in London on the 16th is necessarily called to the peculiar position of the Bahama Archipelago. On the one hand, it was obvious that it would form a convenient place of resort for Confederate privateers; while, on the other, it seemed likely that its ports and waters would be used by the United States' war-vessels for the purpose of watching and pursning Confederate vessels or others engaged in trade with the blockaded ports, so that collisions in the waters of the Colony or in their immediate neighbourhood would be almost certain to result. To prevent this it was necessary to provide some special regulation.

About the same time, the Nashville Confederate war-steamer having put into the port of Southampton for repairs and coal, the United States' war-steamer Tuscarora, which had coaled at the same port, was found to be closely watching her for the avowed purpose of intercepting and seizing her on her again putting to sea. By keeping his steam up and keeping slips on his cable, the Commander of the Tuscarora was virtually keeping the Nashville blockaded, thus plainly making the waters of the Solent the base

Upon this M. Calvo, in the second volume of his well-known work, "Le Droit international," after stating the facts relative to the two vessels, says: "La corvette Fédérale la Tuscarora entra dans le même port pour surveiller son ennemi, et l'attaquer dès qu'il reprendrait la mer. Devant cette attitude hostile les autorités locales intervinrent, et la Tuscarora, abandonnant son poste d'observation sans toutefois renoncer à ses projets, resta près d'un mois dans les eaux Anglaises au mépris des règles les moins contestées du droit international."+

In the preceding November, after the reception of the Sumter at Trinidad, Mr. Seward had, through Lord Lyons, pressed upon the British Government, the propriety of adopting the rule laid down, as he said, by the other Powers of Europe, not to allow privateers to remain for more than twenty-four hours in their ports.

Such a rule, relating exclusively to privateers, was not one which Her Majesty's Government were at all called upon to apply to commissioned ships of war such as the Sumter, any more than the other maritime Powers had done-Mr. Seward being, in this respect, altogether mistaken, as was shown by the readiness with which the other maritime Powers received Confederate vessels of war into their ports and allowed them to stay there. Still, when to prevent the possibility of hostile collisions in their own ports, the British Government found it expedient to apply this rule to vessels of war indiscriminately, they might be assured that in doing so they would give cause of satisfaction rather than of complaint to the United States' Government.

The instructions issued were to the following effect:—1. No ship of war or privateer of either belligerent was to be permitted to enter any port, roadstead, or water in the Bahamas except by special leave of the Lieutenant-Governor, or in case of stress of weather; and in ease such permission should be given, the vessel was, nevertheless, to be required to go to sen as soon as possible, and with no supplies except such as might be necessary for immediate use. 2. No ship of war or privateer of either belligerent was to be permitted to use British ports or waters as a station or place of resort for any warlike purpose, or for the purpose of obtaining any facilities of warlike equipment. 3. Such ships or privateers entering British waters were to be required to depart within twenty-four hours after entrance, except in case of stress of weather, or requiring provisions or things for the crew or repairs; in which cases they were to go to sea as soon as possible after the expiration of the twenty-four hours, taking only the supplies necessary for immediate use: they were not to remain in port more than twenty-four hours after the completion of necessary repairs. 4. Supplies to such ships or privateers were to be limited to what might be necessary for the subsistence of the erew, and to sufficient coal to take the vessel to the nearest port of its own country, or to some nearer destination; and a vessel that had been supplied with coal in British waters, could not be again supplied with it within British jurisdiction, until after the expiration of three months from the date of the last supply taken from

With reference to the regulation concerning Nassau, the Case of the United States has the following remark:-

"An order more unfriendly to the United States, more directly in the interest of the insurgents could not have been made, even if founded upon Heyliger's friendly intimations to the Colonial coan not have been made, even in rounded upon ricyngers triendly infiliations to the Commu-authorities. Under the construction practically put upon it, the vessels of war of the United States were excluded from this harbour for any purpose, while it was open for free ingress and egress to vessels of the insurgents, purchased or built and owned by the authorities at Richmond, bringing their cotton to be transhipped in British bottoms to Fraser, Trenholm, and Co., in Liverpool, and taking on board the cargoes of arms and munitions of war which have been dispatched thither from Liverpool."*

And in another place it is observed :--

"The instructions of January 31, 1862, forbade both belligerents alike to enter the port of Nassau except by permission of the Governor, or in stress of weather. That permission was lavishly given to every insurgent cruizer, but was granted churlishly, if at all, to the vessels of the United States."†

How devoid of all foundation are these complaints will appear from the facts stated in the British Counter-Case, where it is observed:—

"It will perhaps be a matter of some little surprise to the Tribunal to learn, that whereas on two occasions only did vessels visit the port of Nassan as Confederate cruizers, there are no less than thirty-four visits of United States' ships of war to the Bahama Islands recorded during the time that the regulation was in force. On four occasions, at least, vessels of the United States exceeded the twenty-four hours limit, and took in coal by permission; one of them also received permission to repair; several were engaged in pursuit of vessels suspected of Ieing blockade-runners, and did not in every instance relinquish the chase within British limits. Two prizes appear, indeed, to have been captured by them, one within a mile of the shore, the other almost in port."

The tabular statement of visits of United States' vessels to the Bahamas during the civil war, which is printed in the British Appendix, abundantly hears out the answer thus given.§

The general regulations applicable to all Her Majesty's ports, which, as we have seen, were in conformity with the wishes of the United States' Government, though not intended by the British Government to have any operation more favourable to one belligerent than the other, nevertheless could not fail to prove very prejudicial to the Confederates, the strict blockade of whose ports left their ships of war without any ports to which they could resort for repairs or supplies, or into which they could the their prizes. The rule forbidding them a greater supply of coal than would suffice to take them to their nearest port, and prohibiting also a renewal of the supply within three months, was obviously calculated to place them at the greatest possible disadvantage. Compelled, from having no ports of their own, to keep the sea, their means of doing so were necessarily lessened, and the regulation, in itself so unfavourable to the Confederate vessels, was rendered still more so by the strict construction put on it by Her Majesty's Government, by whom the Governors of the different Colonies were instructed that, in case of any special application for leave to coal at a British port within the three months, if it appeared that any part of the former supply had been consumed otherwise than in gaining the nearest port, not even stress of weather should form a ground of exception. As no Confederate vessel could seek its nearest port, this was practically to prevent the possibility of a renewed supply under any circumstances within the three months,

The attempts on the part of the United States to show that any favour was extended to Confederate cruizers which was withheld from their own vessels, appear to me signally to fail.

The only specific instances in which any complaint has been made (and if there had been any others we may be quite sure we should have heard of them) are the cases of the Keystone State, Quaker City, and the Dacotah. As to the two first, the answer given in the British Counter-Case on the authority of a letter from the Governor of Bermuda to the Secretary of State for the Colonies, and which is further borne out by the letters of the commanding officers of the vessels themselves, is as follows:—

"An allusion is made in a foot-note at page 324 of the Case of the United States, to the failure of the United States' vessels Keystone State and Quaker City to obtain coal at Bermuda in December 1861. At that time there was no restriction on the coaling of belligerent vessels. All that happened was, that the British Admiral declined to supply the two vessels mentioned from the Government stores, not having a sufficient stock for his own vessels. A similar answer had, in the foregoing October, been returned to the Commander of the Nashville, who had supplied himself from private sources, but this, on account either of the scarcity or the high price of coal in the Colony, the United States' officers did not do."

As regards the Dacotah, which was allowed to supply herself with coal at Nassau, but only on an engagement from her commander that his vessel should not, within ten days after leaving the port, be found cruizing within five miles of any of the Bahama Islands. Governor Fayley, in a letter to the Secretary of State for the Colonies of the 2nd May, 1863, states:—

"I have no distinct recollection of the special reasons which induced me to impose the restrictions mentioned by the Consul in the Dacotali's codling; I can only suppose that I did this in consequence of the pertinacity with which Federal vessels about that time resorted to the harbour on pretence of cooling, but really with the object of watching the arrival and departure of English merchant-vessels, coaling, but reany with the object of watching the arrival and departure of raights inerchant-vessers, supposed to be freighted with cargoes for the Southern ports. Another subject of complaint is that partiality, inconsistent with neutrality, was Alleged partial y exhibited towards Confederate vessels by reason that these, as in the case of the as to coaling. Sumter, were permitted to coal, while liberty to form a depôt of coal at Bermuda, for the supply of their ships of war was denied to the United States. I cannot suppose that any member of this Tribunal could be misled by such a contention. It is obvious that to allow one belligerent to have a supply always stored up and ready, and to leave that to allow one beingerent to have a supply analys stored up and ready, and to leave the other to take his chance of the public market, are things essentially different, and that, far from the refusal of such an advantage to the United States being a violation of neutrality, the concession would have been so in the opposite direction. Moreover, such an act involves a forgetfulness of one of the elementary principles of international law. A neutral is only justified in allowing to a belligerent vessel the use of his ports and access to his shores to obtain the things which the belligerent may lawfully procure. He has no right to allow the belligerent the use of his territory on shore for belligerent purposes, which the permission to form a depot would necessarily

The practical answer to all these complaints is to be found in the striking facts stated in the British Counter-Case, with reference to the number of visits to British ports by the ships of war of the two helligerents, and to the quantity of coal received by them respectively. The statement in question is as follows:—

"During the course of the Civil War ten Confederate cruizers visited British ports. The total number of such visits was twenty-live, eleven of which were made for the purpose of effecting repairs. than was taken in at sixteen of these visits, and on sixteen occasions the limit of stay fixed by the regulations was exceeded. In one of these cases, however, the excess was no more than two hours, and in another, the delay was enforced in order to allow twenty-four hours to clapse between the departure of a United States' merchant-vessed and that of the Confederate cruizer. On the other hand, the returns a United States mere date the same time of the Colonies, though necessarily imperfect, show an aggregate total of 228 such vizits. On thirteen of these coolines, though necessary improvements an agaregate total of 220 such visits. In this content of the repairs were effected; on forty-flow occasions supplies of coal were obtained; and the twenty-four hours' limit of stay was forty-four times exceeded. The total amount of coal obtained by Confederate cruizers in British ports during the whole course of the Civil War, though it cannot be ascertained with accuracy, in briash poiss during the whole course of the Civit War, though it cannot be ascertained with accuracy, may be estimated to have amounted to about 2,800 tons. The aggregate amount similarly supplied to vessels of the United States cannot be estimated, from the want of data as to the supplies in many cases, but those cases alone in which the quantities are recorded show a total of over 5,900 tons; and this, notwithstanding the United States' navy had free access to their own coaling depots, often close at this, now missianting the United States, the Vanderbilt, alone received 2,000 tons of coal at different British ports within the space of less than two months, being more than two-thirds of the whole amount obtained from first to last by Confederate vessels."

The second head of complaint has assumed a more sensational and effective form Sepplies of aims in representing Great Britain as "the arsenal, the navy yard, and the treasury of the obtained from assingents." Again and again has this highly coloured representation been paraded. Great Britair. Let us see what, when stripped of rhetorical flourish, it really amounts to.

Having determined to support their effort to establish their independence by war, the Confederates of course required arms and munitions of war. Both were to be had in Great Britain in abundance. The commercial relations of the Southern States had been principally with Great Britain. It was natural that in Great Britain they should seek the arms which were so essentially necessary to them. But arms and munitions of war are not to be had for nothing. It was, necessary, therefore, that arrangements should be made for the deposit of funds in England to pay for the articles bought there. To earry on these operations—to purchase the articles required—to pay for them—to ship them—agents were, of course, necessary. Agents were accordingly established in England and provided with the necessary funds. Thus far, no one can say that there was anything contrary to the law of nations, or to the municipal law, or to obligations morally incumbent on a neutral Government or a neutral people. As Jefferson said, more than three-quarters of a century ago:—

"Our citizens have been always free to make, vend, and export arms. It is the constant occupation and livelihood of some of them. To suppress their callings, the only means perhaps of their subsistence, because a war exists in foreign and distant countries, in which we have no concern, would scarcely be expected. It would be hard in principle, and impossible in practice. The law of nations, therefore, respecting the rights of those at peace, does not require from such an internal derangement in their occupations. It is satisfied with the external penalty pronounced in the President's Proclamation, that of confiscation of such portion of these arms as shall fall into the hands of any of the belligerent Powers on their way to the ports of their enemies. To this penalty our citizens are warned that they will be abandoned, and that even private contraventions may work no inequality between the parties at war, the benefit of them will be left equally free and open to all."

Substitute Her Majesty's Proclamation and Her Majesty's subjects for the American phraseology, and the cases are identically the same.

But had the United States no arsenal in Great Britain? As we have seen, arms and munitions of war were purchased by the United States in Great Britain to the amount of 2,000,000/. sterling. Several agents, Colonel Thomas, Colonel Schuyler, Mr. J. R. Selauyler, Mr. Tomes, were sent over to order and select the arms, and forward them to the United States.

It appears from the British Counter-Case, and the documents therein referred to,

"Colonel Thomas, of the United States' army, was in England during the war, and came over to England to superintend the purchases of milliary stores. Colonel G. L. Schuyler was, in July 1861, appointed by the President of the United States' a duly authorized agent to purchase arms in Europe for the War Department.' He received his instructions from the Secretary of War with a Memorandum from General J. W. Ripley, of the Ordmanee Department at Washington, specifying the arms to purchased, viz., 100,000 ritle muskets with bayonets, 10,000 cavalry carbines, 10,000 revolvers, and 20,000 sabres. The financial arrangements for these purchases were to be made by the Secretary to the Treasury with Messrs. Baring, financial agents for the United States in London, and a credit of 2000 000 dollars was manuscripted for the nurrose.

'In the summer or autumn of 1861, Mr. J. R. Schuyler and Mr. Tomes, of the firm of Schuyler. Hartley, and Graham, of New York, visited Birmingham, and, after communicating with the principal rifle, bayonet, and sword manufacturers there, gave orders for as many of those articles as their respective manufactories were capable of supplying, the goods to be paid for on delivery to them at a place to be subsequently manuel, or on shipment, Messra, Schuyler and Tomes made no concealment of the fact that these arms were destined for the American Government, and they intimated their intention of continuing unlimited orders for a period of two years. They took warehouses in Birmingham for the receipt of arms when completed, and shipped them through the agency of Messra Baring Brothers, and Messrs. Brown, Shipley, and Co., of Liverpool. It appears from the Returns made to Congress of arms purchased by the United States' War Department up to December 1862, that 8,650 rifles and 232 revolvers of English manufacture had at that time been supplied by Messrs. Schuyler, Hartley, and Grubam; but Mr. Schuyler is also believed to have acted as agent for the purchase of arms for the State of New York. Messrs. Schuyler and Tomes were soon followed to Birmingham by a Mr. Lockwood of New York, who had entered into a contract for the supply of rifles boyons, and swords to the War Department at Washington. He also gave unlimited orders for such articles, acting, however, to some extent, in concert with Messrs. Schuyler and Tomes, and shipping the goods through the agency of the same houses at Liverpool. The effect of these orders was to raise the prices in the Birmingham gan trade to the extent of 20 per cent.; indeed, the price of rifles boyonce in the Birmingham gan trade to the extent of 20 per cent.; indeed, the price of rifles for some from 52s. to 75s. each."

A Mr. Laumont Dupont also came to England, furnished with a credit of 82,800l. on Messrs. Baring, and purchased and shipped saltpetre to the amount of very nearly 80,000l.

Messrs. Naylor, Vickers, and Co., of New York, Liverpool, and London, bought and shipped to the United States large quantities of small arms. They were supplied from Birmingham alone with 156,000 rifles between June 1862 and July 1863. They acted very extensively as agents of the United States' Government, and submitted to that Government large proposals from the Birmingham Small Arms Company. The Assistant Secretary of War at Washington, in a letter addressed to them on the 20th October, 1862, directly sanctioned an arrangement for the supply of 100,000 rifles, and

In December 1863, fifty 68-pounder Woolwich, at the request of Messrs. T. and C. Hood, and, after proof, were taken away by Messrs. Naylor and Co., and shipped to New York. Mr. Marcellus Hartley, of the firm of Schuyler, Hartley, and Graham, already mentioned, was also a large purchaser of small arms in London during the latter half of the year 1862.*

Warehouses were openly taken at Birmingham for the reception of arms when completed, after when they were shipped through the agency of Messrs. Barings and of Brown, Shipley, and Co., and Wright and Co., of Liverpool.

Had the United States no treasury in Great Britain? No less a one than the great house of Baring Brothers, with whom large credits were opened. The house appears to have been energetic in its efforts in furthering the United States' armaments.

"You will please express my acknowledgments," writes the United States' Secretary of War to Mr. Schuyler, "to Messrs, Baring Brothers and Co., for their prompt and patriotic action in facilitating your operations. The terms offered by Messrs, Baring Brothers and Co., namely, 1 per cent. commission and 5 per cent. interest per annum, as agreed upon by them with the Navy Department, are approved." †

Of course the "prompt and patriotic action" of Baring Brothers and Co. was in perfect conformity with nentral duties. But, what would have been said, if that great and wealthy house, its leading member having an influential voice in the House of and waterly have a compared to the common of cent. interest? or, was there to be one law for the United States and another for the Her Majesty's Government did not think so, and Great Britain remained an arsenal for the latter as well as for the former.

Next as to Great Britain having been, as it is said, "the navy yard of the Ships obtained insurgents.

It was of course impossible to prevent the Confederate Government, reduced to desperate straits by the blockade, and in want of ships of war, from resorting to the ship-builders' yards of Great Britain. It was impossible to prevent the ship-builders, who looked upon the furnishing of such vessels as purely commercial transactions—the Messrs. Laird who built the Alabama having been perfectly willing, as appears from their correspondence with a Mr. Howard, who professed to have authority to enter into a contract with them to build vessels for the Federal Government, to supply ships to the latter as well as to the insurgents-and who appear to have thought that, so long as the chips were not armed in British waters, such transaction would not be within the Foreign Enlistment Act-from entering into such contracts. All the Government could do was to use reasonable care to see that the Act was not violated.

Two vessels of war, and two only, the Florida and the Alabama, equipped in British waters, found their way into the hands of the Confederates. Whether, in respect of them, the British authorities were wanting in due d'ligence will be matter for future consideration, when these vessels come specifically under review. The most unjustifiable charge that the Government were wilfully wanting in the discharge of their duty from motives of partiality has, I hope, been already disposed of. Every other vessel built or equipped in British waters for the war service of the Confederate Government was prevented by the net of the British Government from coming into their hands. Immediate and untiring attention was paid to the frequent applications of Mr. Adams, which for the most part turned out to have proceeded on erroncous information. It may have been that, in the cases of the Florida and the Alabama, the local officers may have been somewhat too much disposed to leave it to the United States' officers to make out the case against the vessels. But such, as we have seen, had been the traditional view of the matter, not only in England but in the United States. These officers may have attached too much importance to the fact that the vessels, though equipped for receiving arms, were not actually armed before leaving the port. In that they only shared the opinion of two distinguished judges in the Court of Exchequer. But when the Anthorities had become thoroughly alive to what was going on, no vessel of war to which the notice of the Government was called, and which proved to be intended for war, was suffered to escape. An enumeration of the instances on which inquiry was instituted by Her Majesty's Government, with the results, will set this part of the case in its true light, and show the flagrant injustice of the wholesale accusations which have been so unwarrantably made.

The Bermada.

The first case in which a representation was made by Mr. Adams as to a vessel supposed to be titting out in England for warlike purposes against the United States, in violation of the Foreign Enlistment Act, was that of the Bermuda. Mr. Adams's letter was dated the 15th of August, 1861. The principal grounds of suspicion alleged against the vessel were that she was "ostensibly owned by the commercial house of Fraser, Trenholm, and Co., of Liverpool, well known to consist in part of Americans in sympathy with the insurgents in the United States;" that she was armed with guns, and had been for some time taking in crates, cases, and barrels, believed to contain arms and ammunition of all kinds ordinarily used in carrying on war. Mr. Adams continues:—

"This cargo is nominally entered as destined to Havana in the Island of Cuba, but her armament and cargo are of such a nature as to render it morally certain that the merchants who claim to be the owners can have no intention of dispatching her on any errand of mercy or of peace.

"I am informed that this vesset will sail in a day or two; I therefore feel under the highest obligation to submit the information I have obtained as the ground for application for a prompt and effective investigation of the truth of the allegations whilst there is time. Not doubting the earnest disposition of Her Majesty's Government faithfully to adhere to the principles of neutrality to which it has piedged itself, I ask, on the part of the United States, for no more than a simple enforcement of the law, in case it shall appear that evil-minded persons are seeking to set it at manch!"

Mr. Adams, it would seem, entertained none of those notions of the duty or the necessity of having recourse to prerogative force in order efficiently to observe the obligations of neutrality, of which we hear so much in the Argument of the United States.

Inquiry was at once made by the Government. The Collector of Customs at West Hartlepool, where the vessel was, reported the next day as follows:—

"Finding, from a communication which I had seen from the American Consul at Leeds to his broker here, that the steamer in question was suspected to be fitting out at this port for the purpose of being used as a privateer for the Confederate States, I have been keeping an eye on her, but I see nothing to indicate such to be her object, either as regards her external equipments, or the character of her crew, or anything in her case more than usual to give ground for remark, unless it be the circumstance that a large portion of her eargo consists of arms and ammunition; and it is possible that although the destination of the vessel ostensibly is Havana, it may be the design eventually to run some, if not the whole of the goods on board into the States referred to."+

The rest of the information collected pointed to a similar conclusion, and Mr. Adams was accordingly informed, on the advice of the Attorney-General, that the vessel did not come within the terms of the Foreign Enlistment Act (to which, in his letter, he had referred), and that there was no ground for any interference with the clearance or departure.

The Berminda turned out, in fact, to be a blockade-runner. She sailed from Liverpool with eargo for Savannah, and succeeded in entering that port and returning to Liverpool. On her second voyage she was captured by a United States ship, and condemued as prize.

The next cases in order of time to which Mr. Adams called the attention of the British Government, were those of the Oreto or Florida, and of the Alabama, originally known as No. 290. As I shall have to enter in detail into the facts connected with these vessels further on, I will not here allude to them more particularly.

The Georgiana.

On the 16th January, 1863, Mr. Adams made a representation to Earl Russel respecting the Georgiana, a vessel built at Glasgow, and then titting out at Liverpool, which he stated he "had reason to believe was intended to pursue a similar course with that formerly called No. 290—to wit, the destruction of the commerce of the United States." Mr. Adams inclosed a letter from the United States' Consul in Loudon, "giving," as he said, the "particulars based upon credible information received by Lord Russell informed Mr. Adams on the following day, the 17th, that he had communicated copies of his letter and its inclosure to the Board of Treasury, and to the Secretary of State for the Home Department without delay, and had requested that orders might be sent by telegraph to the proper authorities at Liverpool, enjoining them to take such steps in the matter as might legally be taken. He added:-

"I think it right, however, to observe that Her Majesty's Government cannot be answerable for any difficulty which may be experienced in carrying out those orders, in consequence of the evidence on which the statement of the United States' Consul is made being withheld from them."

Inquiries were accordingly made, both by the Customs officers and by the detective police at Liverpool, but it was found that the vessel was not in any way adapted for warlike purposes, and that, from the nature of her build, her cargo, and other attendant circumstances, she seemed to be intended to run the blockade; and such, in fact, proved

On the 21st of March, 1863, Lord Russell wrote to Mr. Adams " with reference to a report that vessels of war were being built at Glasgew for the so-styled Confederate Vessels at States; that it appeared from information collected by the Commissioner of Customs Glasgow. that there were only two large steamers in course of construction at the yard of Messrs. Thompson and Co.; that one of them had the appearance of being constructed are receive armour plates, but that the bottom was not more than half plated, and that me planking of her top sides had only just commenced." The other, Lord Russell wrote, was a serew-steamer intended to be employed in the Mediterranean trade, but neither of these vessels could be completed for several months,

In forwarding this letter to Mr. Sewara, Mr. Adams stated—

"It is proper to mention that the investigation appears to have been initiated by his Lordship upon information not furnished from this Legation, and that Lord Russell's communication to me was perfectly

Mr. Adams' letter of acknowledgment to Earl Russell is as follows:--

Thad the honour to receive your Lordship's note of the 21st instant, apprising me of the preparations making in the yard of Messrs, Thompson and Co. of a vessel evidently constructed for hostile purposes.

"Information of the same nature received from other sources has led me to a helief that this is one of a number intended to carry on the piratical species of warfare practised by the insurgents against the denotes the United States, in accordance with the plans laid down in the intercepted correspondence which I had the honour some time since to lay before you. It is a source of much gratification to me to learn that this proceeding is exciting the attention of Her Majesty's Government."

The intercepted correspondence alluded to by Mr. Adams had been forwarded by him to Earl Russell on the 9th February, $1863.\P$ It related to arrangements for the issue of a loan in England, on account of the Confederate Government, for the export of manitions of war to the Confederate States, and also to a supposed contract made by the Confederate Navy Department with a Mr. Sanders, for the construction in England of six iron-clad steamers, combining the capacities of freighting and fighting ships, in a manner which could enable them to force the blockade. A correspondence ensued in which Lord Russell denied that the papers proved any overtacts against the law which warranted a criminal prosecution of the parties concerned. He added, however, in a note of the 2nd of April, 1863, that-

In view of the statements contained in the intercepted correspondence, Her Majesty's Government have renewed the instructions already given to the Custom-house authorities of the several British ports where ships of war may be constructed, and by the Secretary of State for the Home Department to various authorities with whom he is in communication, to endeavour to discover and obtain legal eridence of any violation of the Foreign Enlistment Act with a view to the strict enforcement of that Satute whenever it can really be shown to be infringed, and Her Majesty's Government would be obliged to you to communicate to them, or to the local authorities at the several ports, any evidence of illegal acts which may from time to time become known to you."

The Phantom and Southerner.

The Alexandra.

On the 26th of March, 1863, Mr. Adams wrote to Earl Russell forwarding an extract of a letter from Mr. Dudley, the United States' Consul at Liver ol, on the subject of two vessels, the Phantom and the Southerner, which the Coast be intended for Confederate cruizers.* The principal reason for Mr. Drakey's suspicions seems to have been the connection of the firms of Fraser, Trenholm, and Co., and Fawcett, Preston, and Co., with these vessels. He says at the end of the letter: "I suppose it will be impossible for me to obtain legal evidence against these two vessels, and nothing short of this will satisfy this Government." Even of the information furnished by Mr. Dudley, part—namely, that the last-named of these two vessels, the Southerner, had arrived at Liverpool—was erroneous, and was corrected by Mr. Adams in his note, according to later advices received from Liverpool.

Mr. Adams was informed on the following day that immediate inquiry would be made on the subject, and inquiries were accordingly at once made, as in the case of the Georgiana, both through the Customs authorities at Liverpool and by means of detective police officers, as to these two vessels. They failed to produce any evidence against them, and indeed one of them turned out to be a blockade-runner, and the other was afterwards engaged in trade in the Mediterranean. In acknowledgment of the steps which had been taken, Mr. Adams wrote as follows to Earl Russell on the 6th of April,

"It is a source of great satisfaction to me to recognize the readiness which Her Majesty's Government has thus manifested to make the investigations desired, as well as to receive the assurances of is determination to maintain a close observation of future movements of an unusual character that justify suspicious of any evil intent."+

On the 28th March, 1863, Mr. Dudley, the United States' Consul at Liverpool, wrote to the Collector of Customs at that port, forwarding six depositions relative to a vessel called the Alexandra, and applying for her seizure. Copies of these depositions were also forwarded to Earl Russell by Mr. Adams on the 31st of March; and after further inquiry by the authorities, the ship was seized on the 5th of April. Mr. Adams. being informed of this step, wrote on the 6th of April to Earl Russell to express his

"lively satisfaction."

The history of this vessel is well known. The proceedings, which were instituted by the Government in the proper Court, failed, under the direction of the Lord Chief Baron to the jury that, to establish the intention that the vessel had been equipped for the purpose of war, it was necessary that she should have been armed as well as litted for the reception of guns. The jury having given a verdict against the Crown, the application to the Court of Exchequer for a new trial, on the ground of misdirection of the Judge in so directing the jury, tailed by reason of the Judges of that Court being equally divided in opinion. Writing to Mr. Adams after the verdiet had been given, Mr. Seward says :-

"You are authorized and expected to assure Earl Russell that this Government is entirely satisfied that Her Majesty's Government have conducted the proceedings in that case with perfect good said and honour, and that they are well disposed to prevent the litting out of armed vessels in British ports to depredate upon American commerce and to make war against the United States,

This Government is satisfied that the Law Officers of the Crown have performed their duties in regard to the case of the Alexandra with a sincere conviction of the adequacy of the law of Goes Britain, and a sincere desire to give it effect."

An appeal was made to the Court of Exchequer Chamber but it turned out that, owing to an omission in the Act constituting the latter, no provision had been made for such a case.

After a detention of a year, pending the trial and appeal, the Alexandra was liberated. She went first to Bermuda, then to Halifax, and from thence to Nassau, where after repeated investigations, she was again seized, in December 1864, on a firsh charge of an intention to employ her as a ship of war in the Confederate service, and though the proceedings in the Vice-Admiralty Courf there ended in an acquittal, the decision did not take place till the end of May 1865 when the civil war was at an end The costs and damages incurred by the Government on account of the two seizures amounted to over 4,000l.

New York, in which allusion was made to a report which had appeared in the newspapers of that city, that the Georgiana, which, as I have already said, was no more than a blockade-runner, and which is so denominated in the United States' documents,* was intended to be armed as a Confederate ernizer, and that a similar vessel, ealled the South Carolina, was building in the Clyde. The matter was referred to the Commissioners of Customs, and the latter reported, on the 13th of April, as follows:—

"On the receipt of the said letter, we referred the same to our Collector at Glasgow for his inquiry respecting the South Carolina; and it appears from the report of the Measuring Surveyor of Shipping at that port, which has been forwarded to us by the Collector, that there are about forty ships that the research time in the port, and it may be intended to give one of them that power, that Suppose a consequence of the port, and it may be intended to give one of them that name; that the only ship apparently designed for a ship of war is the one building in the yard of Messrs. I shall have subsequently to go fully into the case of this vessel also, which was an object of constant vigilance during her stay at Liverpool, and which was not permitted to leave until the Authorities were satisfied that there was no intention of

On the 7th of July, 1863, Mr. Dudley fowarded to the Collector of Customs Iron clads at at Liverpool several depositions relative to two iron-elad steam-ships building in Birkenhead. Messrs. Laird's yard at Birkenhead, which were alleged to be intended for the service of the Confederate States, one only of which had at the time been launched, the other heing still in process of construction. Representations were also made on the subject by Mr. Adams, and a lengthened correspondence ensued. A strict watch was from the first kept upon the vessels, and inquiries made as to their character and destination. It was at first reported that they were built for the Government of France. Subsequently, they were claimed by a M. Bravay, of Paris, who produced a legal instrument, from which it appeared that the vessels had, in fact, been built to the order of Captain Bullock (the Confederate agent who had been instrumental in obtaining the Florida and Alabama for the Confederate Government), but that Bullock had transferred his interest in them to Bravay. M. Bravay stated that he had purchased them for the Viceroy of Egypt, but the Viceroy, on inquiry, disclaimed any intention of acquiring

On the 9th of September, 1863, a letter was addressed to the builders, Messrs. Laird, informing them that the Government could not permit the vessels to leave the Mersey until satisfactory evidence could be given of their destination, or until the inquiries then being prosecuted on the subject should be brought to a conclusion; and, on the 9th of October following, both vessels were seized and given over into the care of the Captain of Her Majesty's ship Majestic, then stationed at Liverpool. A Commission was sent to Egypt for the purpose of procuring evidence with a view to their condemnation, but the result appearing doubtful, it was decided by the Government to purchase them, though it was not in want of them, rather than run the risk of their passing directly or indirectly into the hands of a belligerent. They were accordingly purchased in May 1864 for the sum of 220,000/.

Mention has already been made of the inquiries instituted by the Government as The Canton or to vessels supposed to be building for the Confederate States at Glasgow. On the 17th Pampero. of October, 1863, Mr. Adams wrote to Earl Russell, stating that, in addition to a formidable steam-ram in process of construction at that port, there was also another steamer ready to be launched, ealled the Canton, having all the characteristics of a war-vessel, which was about to be fitted out and dispatched with the same intent from the same place. Mr. Adams inclosed some extracts from a letter from the United States' Consul at Glasgow, who, he said, entertained no doubt as to the destination of the vessel, although, from the secreey used in the process of construction and preparation, he had been slow in gaining evidence on which to base a representation.

Directions are at once given to the proper authorities to make inquiries and to take any measures which might legally be possible. The investigations remained for some time without any definite result. The vessel was carefully examined. It appeared that though in course of being fitted as a passenger ship, she possessed some peculiarities of construction which rendered her capable of being converted into a vessel serviceable for warlike use. The builders, however, and the firm through whom she had been contracted for, disclaimed any knowledge of such an intention, and declared their belief that she was intended for the merchant service. The evidence as to her being intended for the Confederate service, which was supplied by the United States' Consul, did not go beyond vague rumour and hearsay.

The vessel was launched on the 29th of October, 1863. On the 16th of November the Collector of Customs at Glasgow reported that, as she was being rapidly got ready for sea, he had arranged with the Captain of Her Majesty's ship Hogue, then stationed in the Clyde, to prevent the possibility of a departure pending the decision of the Authorities;* and a week later a gnn-boat was moored alongside of her to prevent any chance of her leaving surreptitionsly.†

By the end of November the inquiries of the Government led to the production of evidence showing who were the real owners of the vessel, and that they had contracted to sell her to one Sinclair, calling himself a citizen of the Confederate States. A letter from Sinclair was produced, dated in the previous September, in which he said that "the determination of the Government to prevent the sailing of any vessel that might be suspected of being the property of a citizen of the Confederate States was made so manifest, that he had concluded it would be better for him to endeavour to close the contract and go where he could have more liberal action;" ; and it appeared from the further correspondence that he had agreed to do this, even on condition of forteiting the corton certificates which he had already deposited as security.

The Pampero was seized on the 10th of December and legal proceedings were instituted, a verdict was entered against her by default, and she remained under scizure

Iron-clad ram at Glasgow.

As regards the other vessel building in Messrs, Thompson's yard at Glasgow, on which the Authorities, as has been mentioned, were keeping watch, Mr. Adams, writing respecting the seizure of the Pampero, reports as follows (January 28, 1864):-

" One good effect of these various proceedings has been to remove all further anxiety respecting the destination of the formidable iron-clad ram in process of construction at the same place. That she was ordered in the first instance by the rebels, I have no manner of doubt; she has now been purchased by the Danish Government, as I learn from the Minister, M. de Bille."

In September 1863, an old gun-boat named the Victor, being considered as rotten and unserviceable, was sold by the British Government to a private firm. The firm having afterwards applied for the masts and sails of the vessel, the question of granting the application was referred to Earl Russell, who advised, as a measure of precantion, that the masts and sails should for the present be reserved. On the 24th November, 1863, she suddenly left Sheerness, where she was being prepared for sea, at midnight, and crossed over to Calais. She was still in a condition quite unfit to go to sea, her rigging being incomplete and her crew deficient. At Calais her Commander declared her to be a Confederate vessel of war, though she was neither equipped, manned, nor armed. She was allowed to remain, and to make such repairs as were necessary to render her seaworthy, but the precautions taken by the Authorities to prevent her being made more serviceable for warlike purposes rendered her practically useless for the Confederate service. It having been discovered that large additions had been made to her erew, the French Government refused to permit her departure, and she was even tually abandoned by her officers.

"Contrast, again," says the Case of the United States triumphantly, "the course of the French Government with that of the British Government in like cases. What vessel bearing a commission was ever disturbed by a British gun-boat, no matter how flagrant might have been her violations of British sovereignty?" Had those who ask this question forgotten the case of a certain vessel called the Canton, or Pampero, which was served exactly in the same manner, having first had a gun-boat placed alongside of

Not aformation had been received by the Government tending to throw any suspicion on the Victor before her departure. Evidence having subsequently been furnished by Mr. Adams to Lord Russell tending to implicate various persons in the fitting-out of this versel and the obtaining a crew for her prosecutions were instituted against such of them as seemed to have rendered themselves liable to punishment, and several of them were convicted or pleaded guilty. Among others, proceedings were taken against Mr. Rumble, an officer in the Government dockyard at Sheerness, and, though he was acquitted, the Government marked their displeasure at his conduct by dismissing him from his appointment and placing him upon half-pay as an officer in whom they could

In consequence of the events connected with the Rappahannock, the British Government at once gave orders that no more ships should be sold out of the navy

An advantageous offer having been made to the Admiralty, in December 1863, for two vessels (the Reynard and Alaerity), which it was thought desirable to dispose of, the matter was referred to Earl Russell, who gave as his opinion that "it would be much better at the present time not to sell any vessels to private firms, as it is impossible to obtain any sufficient assurance in regard to what may be done with

It was also thought right to keep careful watch on another vessel, the Amphion, The Amphion. which had already been sold to a private firm, and the police authorities were directed to make inquiries on the subject in January 1864.‡ The vessel was at that time lying dismantled and dismasted. In March following Mr. Adams wrote to call Lord Russell's attention to the subject, and a constant watch was kept on her by the police. She seems to have been in a state quite unfitted for war purposes, and her destination was stated to be Copenhagen. She was eventually stranded on the British coast a few

On the 1st April, 1861, the suspicions of the Customs Collector at Glasgow having The Hawk. been excited by certain peculiarities of construction in a vessel recently built at Renfrew, and named the Hawk, he referred the matter to the Authorities in London. Pending their decision, he refused the application made for a pass to enable her to leave for the latter port. On the 16th of the same month, Mr. Adams addressed a representation to Lord Russell on the same subject. The Hawk shortly afterwards left for London, as was at first believed, without a clearance, and the owner was called upon for explanations. The vessel was also subjected to strict examination by the police and Customs Authorities. The explanations of the owner proving satisfactory, and no evidence appearing to justify further measures, she was allowed to depart, went to the West Indies, and returned, and was never employed for any warlike purpose.

Four other vessels formed the subject of representations by Mr. Adams at the The Ajax, commencement of the year 1865—the Ajax, the Hercules, the Virginia, and the Louisa the Hercules, commencement of the year 1000—the Agax, the ricremes, the virginia, and the Louisa the Virginia, Ann Fanny. As to the first of these vessels, investigations had already been made by the Virginia, the Leuisa Ann Tangaland and Anthonicia of Dublin, while she was lying in Kingston Hambour. It said the Leuisa Ann the Customs Authorities at Dublin, while she was lying in Kingston Harbour. On the 28th of February, 1863, a letter was addressed to Mr. Lay, by Earl Russell's directions, requesting him to give the particulars of the vessels obtained by him for that purpose, and the information given by Mr. Lay was communicated to Mr. Adams, to whom it was likely to be of service in distinguishing the vessels really destined for the service of the Emperor of China from those reported to be so as a pretext for other purposes connected with the Confederate service.

On the arrival of the fleet in China, a difference arose with the Chinese Government as to the terms on which the command of the fleet should be held, and Captain Osborn eventually declined the appointment.

Under these circumstances the British Minister at Peking was of opinion—an opinion which was shared by his American colleagues, that if the fleet was allowed to remain in the hands of the Chinese Government, there was great danger of the vessels being bought for employment as Confederate cruizers. It was therefore arranged that Captain Osborne should take back part of the fleet to Bombay and part to England, and there dispose of them for the Chinese Government; and the vessels were brought back accordingly.

On heaving of this arrangement, the British Government gave orders that every precaution should be taken to prevent their passing into the hands of any belligerent Power. The sale of one of the vessels at Bombay was stopped: but as she was merely an unarmed dispatch-boat, the prohibition was subsequently removed. The other ships were held in the custody of the Government, and the Law Officers having advised that the sale within the British dominions of armed ships of war, already equipped for a different purpose, was not contrary to the Foreign Enlistment Act, the Government determined upon taking upon themselves the responsibility of detaining them unsold. A committee was accordingly appointed to assess the values of the vessels, and the Chinese Government were assured that they should not ultimately lose by any delay in the sale. Several overtures for the purchase of one or other of the ships fell through in consequence of the stringent nature of the guarantees required against their employment by belligerents, or from other causes; and they were in consequence not disposed of till after the close of the war. The delay and consequent deterioration of the vessels caused a loss of over 100,000l., which was made good by the British Government to that of China.

General result.

It thus appears that, during the whole course of the civil war, two ships only were built in Great Britain for, and actually employed in, the service of the Confederates. Four others were intended to be built and equipped, but were arrested while in the course of construction. Four merehant-vessels, though not adapted for warlike purposes, were converted into vessels of war by having guns put on board, but out of the jurisdiction of the British Government—two of them in Confederate ports—and this by reason of the impossibility of getting ships of war built, owing to the active vigilance of the Authorities. And it is upon this foundation that Great Britain is represented as having been "the navy-yard of the insurgent States," and that men who must be supposed to have a conscientious appreciation of what is just and right, accuse Earl Russell and Her Majesty's Government of "a consistent course of partiality towards the insurgents," and of "a want of diligence bordering upon wilful negligence!"

Proceedings of other Governments.

Brazil

In the United States' Argument, the proceedings of other Governments are compared with those of Great Britain, to the disparagement of the latter. Thus, of Brazil it, is said:—

"We beg leave to refer this high Tribunal to the administrative regulations of the Brazilian Empire for the enforcement of neutrality in all the ports of the Empire, in the amplest manner, by efficient action on the part of the Imperial Ministers, and of the Provincial Presidents.

"In the American Case, and the documents to which it refers, there is sufficient indication of the loyalty and efficiency with which the Brazilian Government maintained its sovereignty against the aggressive efforts of the Confederates."

After the correspondence which I have already inserted, I may very well say that not even with Her Majesty's Government or officers did the correspondence of the United States' Government assume so angry a tone as that which pervades the letters between the American Minister and the Brazilian Government.*

Portugal.

Portugal is referred to in the American Argument in these terms:—

"As to Portugal, we refer to the correspondence annexed to the American Counter-Case, to show that she also never pretended that her neutral duty was confined to the execution of the provisions of her Penal Code. She also put forth the executive power of the Crown to prevent, repress, or repel aggressive acts of the Confederates in violation of her hospitality, or in derogation of her sovereignty. Nay more, the Government of Portugal, finding its own naval force inadequate to prevent the Confederates from abusing the right of asylum in the Western Islands, expressly authorized the American Government to send a naval force there for the purpose of defending the sovereignty and executing the law of Portugal."

neutral Power, it was bound to do, namely, interfere to prevent the Azores from being made a depôt of munitions of war, or coal, for Confederate cruizers.

With reference to the authority given to the United States' Government to send a naval force to the Azores, all that appears is that, when Mr. Hervey, the United States' Minister, informed the Viscount Sá da Bandeira, the Minister for War, then acting as Minister for Foreign Affairs, what was going on at the Azores, the Minister said, "that the islands in question had been used and abused by corsairs and pirates during centuries; that they were exposed and unprotected, and therefore might be so employed again, and that the best plan would be to send a sufficient force there to protect American ships against threatened depredations, and to punish criminal offenders. other words, the Americans were to take care of themselves. This is dignified by the name of "defending the sovereignty and executing the law of Portugal." I may add that, when the Confederate steam-ship Stonewall was at Lisbon, she was allowed to supply herself with coal, notwithstanding the remonstrances of the American Consul. conformity with the general rule she was required to leave in twenty-four hours.

The American Argument informs us that—

"When attempts were made by the Confederates to construct and equip cruizers in the ports of France. "When attempts were made by the Confederates to construct and equip erinzers in the ports of France, on complaint being made by the Minister of the United States, the construction of these vessels was arrested; and when a builder professed that vessels under construction, with suspicion of being intended for the Confederates, were in fact intended for a neutral Covernment, the French Ministers intended to the professed honest intention, and carefully watched these vessels to make sure that they should not go into the service of the Confederates. On this point we quote the language of the

"The vessels of war, to which you have called our attention, shall not leave the ports of France, until it shall have been positively demonstrated that their destination does not affect the principles of neutrality, which the French Government wishes to rigidly observe towards both belligerents."

The documents annexed to the Counter Case of the United States do not contain more than a small selection of the correspondence relating to this subject, which is given in greater detail in the Mémoire and documents submitted by the United States to the French courts of justice in the "Affaire Arman,"—documents which, to quote the words of the Mémoire itself, "show most clearly the dangers to which M. Arman and his associates exposed the maintenance of peace between France and the United States."+

The suit in question was instituted, in November 1867, on the part of the United States against MM. Arman, Voruz, and others, for the recovery of moneys disbursed by Bullock, acting as agent of the Confederate States, for the construction of six

After explaining that the measures taken by the British Government in respect of the seizure of both the Alexandra and Pampero, and the detention of the Birkenhead rams had compelled the Confederates "to seek in France the market they were losing on the other side of the Channel," the Mémoire proceeds to relate that their choice fell on M. Lucien Arman (member for Bordeaux in the French Legislative Assembly), "whose official position seemed calculated to secure greater freedom and certain impunity for the execution of these orders." An agreement was accordingly entered into with Arman by Bullock, who stated in the contract that, "with a view to establish regular communications by steam between Shanghae, Osaka, Yedo, and San Francisco, he wished to procure in France four steamers of great speed, fitted to carry from ten to twelve guns, for their protection in those distant parts."

Arman undertook to build two of these steamers in his own yards at Bordeaux, and sublet the building of the other two to "another deputy of the Corps Législatif," M. Voruz, of Nantes. Besides these four steamers he further entered, on the 16th July, 1863, into a fresh agreement with Bullock, "for two iron-clad steam-rams."

One difficulty had to be removed before the final ratification of these contracts, and that was the restriction placed by the Royal Ordinance of 1847 on the exportation

It has been already shown that this enactment had no reference to the special subject of neutrality, and simply formed part of that general legislation by which the State in France has frequently sought, in its own interest, to place restraints upon private commerce in articles of a warlike character. In the present instance, however, its practical effect was to interfere with the arming of the vessels. Accordingly,

M. Arman applied to the Government for permission to arm the four vessels, which were building ostensibly for service in the China Seas, and this was readily granted, on the faith of his assurance, by the Marquis de Chasseloup-Laubat, the Minister of

In the following September the knowledge of these facts was betrayed to Mr. Bigelow, then United States' Consul at Paris, by a clerk of M. Arman, who furnished him, at the same time, with the originals of the deeds drawn up between his employer and the Confederate agent, Bullock, as well as of the correspondence exchanged between the parties, and other papers, which placed beyond possibility of doubt the existence of an intention on the part of Arman to violate the neutrality of France.

Mr. Dayton at once brought the matter under the notice of M. Drouyn de Lhuys. then Minister for Foreign Affairs, and followed up his first representations with a formal demand, on the 22nd September, that "the permission to arm the vessels should be withdrawn, the manufacture of the guns and shot suspended, and if already completed, that the delivery should be prevented." He called on the French Government to "take such steps as it might deem best calculated to stop the building or departure of the above-mentioned vessels.'

Writing, on the 9th October, to express his approval of the course adopted by

Mr. Dayton, Mr. Sceretary Seward says-

"It is hardly necessary to inform you that the President awaits with much solicitude the decision of His Imperial Majesty's Government upon the application you have made, and cannot but regard an adverse decision as pregnant with very serious consequences."

On the 1st of November Mr. Seward writes again to Mr. Dayton, expressing his disappointment at the indirect and inconclusive answer received from the French Government, and relying on Mr. Dayton's endeavours to obtain a more satisfactory reply. The Minister of Marine withdrew the permission to arm the vessels, but justified the course he had taken in granting it "on the builder's declaration." This measure, however, the memorial informs us, "did not put a stop to the construction or fitting out of the vessels," which Arman continued, possibly in the hope of disposing of them to the Confederates; but this the measures taken by the French Government prevented except in the case of one of the steam-rams, building at Bordeaux.

The history of this vessel, originally known as the Sphinx, may be thus summed up from the Mémoire and correspondence annexed thereto.

On the 4th February, 1861, M. Drouyn de Lluys informed Mr. Dayton that Arman had given him the most positive assurance that he had sold the two iron-clads viz., the Sphinx and her sister-vessel, the Cheops, to the Danish Government, Mr. Dayton made inquiries at Copenhagen, which resulted in a formal contradiction of the fact by the Danish Minister for Foreign Affairs. M. Arman next represented to M. Drouyn de Lhuys that he had sold them to Sweden, and M. Drouyn de Lhuys repeated to Mr. Dayton, on the 7th of April, this new statement of Arman (which, however, was almost immediately afterwards contradicted by the Swedish Foreign Minister), declaring himself "satisfied that the sale had been completed."* Mr. Dayton did not place the same confidence in Arman's assertions, and continued, in obedience to the instructions of his Government, to make serious representations to M. Drouyn de Lhuys on the subject of the rams. On the 8th June he writes to Mr. Seward:-

"I had already informed M. Drouyn de Lhuys of the very serious character of these questions and the probable consequences which would result from the completion and delivery of these vessels to the Confederates. I have, on all occasions, used strong language when applied to these questions. I told him to-day that, in expressing the views of the President on this subject, I could scarcely speak with the necessary earnestness and directness, without trenching on that respectful forbearance of language to which I desired at all times to limit myself in our official intercourse. I told him that should these vessels pass into the hands of the Confederates, become armed and commence a system depredation on our commerce, the exasperation would be such that the Government, if so disposed (which I did not intimate that it would be) could scarcely keep the peace between the two countries"

In the meantime, Arman had succeeded in defeating the vigilance of the French Authorities in the following manner:—In March 1864, he had concluded a contract of sale with the Danish Government, then at war with the German Confederation, but the conditions of the contract not having been observed, the Danish officer, to whom the

the vigilance of the French had concluded a contract of erman Confederation, but the Danish officer, to whom the Splinx was to have been handed over at Bordeaux, refused to receive her. Arman however, took advantage of this contract to get the vessel out of French waters under again submitting her to inspection there. The Damish Government having persisted in their refusal to purchase the vessel, he obtained permission to bring her back, waters, off the Island of Houat, on the coast of Brittany, she stopped to receive from and munitions of war, hoisted the Confederate flag, and, changing her name for the she obtained permission to that of the Stonewall, left the French waters for Ferrol, in Spain, where These proceedings were the subject of energetic remonstrances at Paris and Madrid, and would, in all probability, have given rise to much more, had not the close of the civil war deprived the question of any practical interest it might otherwise have had, the Stonewall having been anable to commit any acts of warfare. The American Government wisely preferred to drop its grievances, as Mr. Seward explains in a letter to Mr. Bigelow, United States' Minister at Paris, dated 13th March, 1865:—

Le Gouvernement a déjà, contre les puissances maritimes impliquées dans cette affaire, des causes de plainte assez nombreuses et assez graves. Il préfère néammoins entretenir la paix, l'harmonie, et très-heureux si les appréhensions que l'affaire actuelle a soulevées ne sont pas justifiées. Les circontélégraphiques nous affirment que le Stonewall est absolument hes d'état de tenir la mer, et que, pour cette raison et pour d'autres, les criminels qui le possèdent cherchent à s'en débarrasser."

From this narrative it will be seen how very different was the view taken of these eigenmentances by the Government of the United States, at the time when they occurred, from the colour now sought to be put upon them by the American Argument.

The running of the blockade, as it is termed, by British vessels, and the use of the Bahamas and Bermuda and other islands, as places by means of which the blockade-loud complaint on the part of the United States' Government. No doubt it was a cause of grievance.

Complaints of blockade-running

That, when the arms and munitions of war necessary to the Confederates had been purchased in Europe, means should be sought to convey them to the purchasers was purchased in Europe, invalis should be songhe to convey them to the purchasers was in the nature of things. That the high rates of freight which, owing to the vital importance of obtaining these supplies, the Confederate Government were willing to pay, should have induced shipowners to run the risk of capture and confiscation, and that the high premiums for insurance which the owners of ships and cargoes engaged in this traffic were willing to pay, should have tempted insurers to undertake the risk of insuring them, cannot, knowing as we do the boldness of mercantile speculation on maning them, the state of warfive us. Accordingly, from a very early period of the war, vessels were employed to run the blockade with cargoes of articles of warlike use. Before long a systematic traffic of this description became regularly established. As the nature of the Southern coast and the local peculiarities of its ports made it extremely difficult for ocean-going vessels to avoid pursuit and capture in endeavouring to enter them, advantage was taken of the proximity of the Bahama Islands and Bermuda to the Southern ports to tranship the cargoes sent from England, at these places, into fast steamers of light draught, which, taking advantage of shallow waters into which they could not easily be pursued, could thus find means of cluding the hostile cruizers. By these means, though ships and cargoes to the value, it is said, of 8,000,000l. sterling fell into the hands of the Federals, a very large quantity of arms and articles centraband of war found their way to the Confederate Government,

The first question which presents itself is, Was the traffic unlawful? So far unlawful undoubtedly, by the law of nations, as between the trader and the blockading belligerent, that if the belligerent could catch the vessel in the act of breaking the blockade, vessel and eargo would become lawful prize; but by the law of nations involving no ulterior lability. By the municipal law not prohibited, and therefore not unlawful—not even secretly so, as has been lately held by Lord Westbury in the case of exparte wasse in re Grazebrock,* and by Dr. Lushington in that of the Helen, † to avoid a contract made in contemplation of such a transaction. How as between the blockading belligerent and the country of the blockade-running trader? Clearly and indisputably without consequence of any sort.

It has never been centended by any one that a neutral State incurred any responsibility by the general law of nations by reason of any violation of neutrality by ils subjects, in earrying on trade with a blockaded port. It is therefore clear that a neutral Government is not bound to prohibit such trade by its municipal law. With the single exception of Denmark, if my memory does not deceive me, no European State has prohibited it. The United States have no law which does so.

Such being the state of the international law of the civilized world and the municipal law of Great Britain on the breaking out of the war, not only was it not incumbent on Great Britain as a duty to alter its law, with a view to prohibiting its subjects from trading with the blockaded ports, but to have done so would have been, as it seems to me, in direct contravention of a fund mental principle of neutrality. namely, that a neutral Power shall not, with a view to a pending war, except so far as may be necessary for the fulfilment of its own obligations as a neutral, alter its law, or make new regulations, having the object or effect of favouring one belligerent at the expense of the other. But that such would have been the effect of an alteration of the law, as desired by the United States, by passing an Act to make blockade-running penal, is manifest. The United States, as between them and their adversaries, were masters of the seas, and had their ports open, and could therefore freely receive the cargoes of arms and munitions of war which were being daily supplied to them. To the Confederate Government, the blockade-runner afforded the only means of obtaining the arms with which he was to tight for independence. An alteration of the law would have been to place him helpless in the power of his enemy. Would it have been consistent with neutrality to alter the law at such a time, and with the certainty of The right of a belligerent to exclude the commerce of a neutral from a such a result? blockaded port is too well established to be shaken; but it is the most odious and arbitrary form in which the freedom of the neutral can be interfered with, and I can see, therefore, no reason why a Government should interfere to make the exercise of the power more productive of detriment to the commerce of its subjects than it necessarily carries with it at present. But if any alteration of the law is to take place, it should be in time of peace; not when the change would prove fatal to one of the combatants, and insure victory to the other.

of Mr. Adams, on the 17th of May, 1862, he replied :-

"If the British Government, by virtue of the prerogative of the Crown, or by authority of Parliament, had prohibited and could have prevented the conveyance in British merchant-ships of arms and ammunition to the Confederate States, and had allowed the transport of such contraband of war to N York and to other Federal ports, Her Majesty's Government would have departed from the neutral position they have assumed and maintained.

"If, on the other hand, Her Majesty's Government had prohibited and could have prevented the transport of arms and ammunition to both the contending parties, they would have deprived the Unitel States of a great part of the means by which they have carried on the war. The arms and ammunition received from Great Britain, as well as from other neutral countries, have enabled the United States to fit out the formidable armies now engaged in carrying on the war against the Southern States, while by means of the blockade established by the Federal Government the Southern States have been deprived of similar advantages.

The impartial observance of neutral obligations by Her Majesty's Government has thus been exceedingly advantageous to the cause of the more powerful of the two contending parties.".

The same reason applies to the frequent use of the ports of the Bahamas and Bermuda as entrepôts for the blockade-running eargoes, and the transhipment of the latter into lighter craft. There was nothing in all this in any way contrary to law. Vessels with cargoes of arms intended for the Southern ports had a perfect right to enter, remain, and quit, when and as they thought proper. If this traffic, suddenly springing up, soon assumed such large dimensions, the cause was to be found in the forced interruption of the trade with the Southern ports through the blockade. Here again a neutral Government could not be called upon to make new laws to prevent the neutral trader from availing himself of such means, not inconsistent with law, as circumstances placed at his disposal in seeking to compensate himself for the restraints imposed on his commercial freedom. When the ordinary course of things is disturbed by intervening force, the tendency is always, in some shape or other, to a restoration of the equilibrium. Unfortunately, instead of seeing in all this only the natural effect of commercial speculation and enterprize, the United States' Government, in the excitement of the time, saw in it nothing but hostility to the cause of the Union. Impressed with this idea, Mr. Seward writes to Mr. Adams on the 11th of

Mr. Adams, in a letter to Lord Russell of the 30th of December, 1862, complains in earnest language :--

" It is a fact that few persons in England will now be bold enough to deny, first, that yessels have been built in British ports, as well as manned by Her Majesty's subjects, with the design and intent to carry on war against the United States; secondly, that other yessels owned by British subjects have carry on war against one content states; secondly, that other vessels owned by firitial subjects have been and are yet in the constant practice of departing from British ports, laden with contraband of war, and many other commodities, with the intent to break the blockade and to procrastinate the war; thirdly, that such vessels have been and are insured by British merchants in the commercial towns of the blockade with the confinered towns of the blockade with the thirdify, that such vessers may been and are insured by Driasa mercuants in the commercial cowns in this kingdom, with the understanding that they are dispatched for that illegal purpose. It is believed to be beyond denial that British subjects have been, and continue to be, culisted in this kingdom in the service of the insurgents, with the intent to make war on the United States, or to break the the service of the insurgence, with the intent to make war on the timed states, or to oreak the blockade legitimately established, and to a proportionate extent to annul its purpose. It is believed that persons high in social position and in fortune contribute their sid directly and indirectly, in that persons high in social position and in fortune contribute their an unrectly and inducedly, in building and equipping ships of war as well as other vessels, and furnishing money as well as goods with the hope of sustaining the insurgents in their resistance to the Government. To that end the port of Nassan, a colonial dependency of Great Britain, has been made, and still continues to be, the great entrepot for the storing of supplies which are conveyed from thence with the greater facility in exading the blockade. In short, so far as the acts of these numerous and influential parties can involve them, the British people may be considered as actually carrying on war against the United States. them, the partiest property, valued at eight millions of pounds sterling, is reported to have been captured Afficiary british property, bullet a cight united so produce sections is represented and property of far greater value has either been successfully introduced or is now stored at Nassau awaiting favourable

But that these were commercial speculations, and had no reference to any political sympathies, is plain from the following letter from Mr. Morse, the United States' Consul-General, to Mr. Adams, of the 24th of the same month. After mentioning the different steamers engaged in the blockade-running, he says:—

"The ownership of these steamers, the cargoes they carry out, and the manner of conducting the "The ownership of these scenners, the curgoes they carry out, and the manner of conducting the trade, is a question of much interest to Americans. During the early stages of the war the trade was curied on principally by agents sent over from the Confederate States, nided by a few mercantile houses and active sympathizers in this country. These agents, with their friends here, purchased the supplies, and procured steamers, mostly by clarter, and forwarded the goods,

But by far the largest portion of the trade, with perhaps the exception of that in small-arms, is sor, and for a long time has been, under the management and control of British merchants. It is son, and for a constant man recognition of the protection principally by British capital, in British ships, and crosses the Atlantic under the protection

"Parties come from Eichmond with contracts made with the Rebel Government by which they are to receive a very large per-centage above the cost in t'onfederate ports of the articles specified. British merchants become interested in these contracts, and participate in their profits or loss. I have seen the particulars of one such contract drawn out in detail, and have heard of others.

"There are good reasons for believing that a large portion of the supplies more recently sent to the aid of the insurgents has been sent by merchants on their own account. Several will join together to charter a steamer and make up a cargo independent of all contractors, each investing as much in the enterprise as he may deem expedient, according to his zeal in the rebel cause, or his hope of realizing

"Again some one will put up a steamer to carry eargo to a rebel port at an enormous rate of freight, or to ports on the Atlantic or Gulf coast, such as Bermuda, Nassau, Havana, Matamoras, &c., at a less fright, to be from there reshipped to such Southern ports as appears to afford the best opportunities forgaining an entrance. Ships bound on these voyages are, of course, not advertised, or their destina-tion made known to the public. Their cargoes are made up of individual shipments, on account and risk of the shippers, or go into a joint stock concern, on account and risk of the company, each member thereof realizing profit or suffering loss in proportion to the amount be invested in the adventure. Both same representations are often, if not generally, insured in England "to go to America with liberty to run the blockart."

The views of Her Majesty's Government were set forth in a letter from Earl Russell to Mr. Adams:—

⁶ With regard to the 'systematic plan' which you say has been pursued by Her Majesty's subject to violate the blockade by steady efforts,' there are some reflections which I am surprised have not occurred to you.

"The United States' Government, on the allegation of a rebellion pervading from nine to elever States of the Union, have now for more than twelve months endeavoured to maintain a blockade of three thousand miles of coast. This blockade, kept up irregularly, but when enforced, enforced severely, has seriously injured the trade and manufactures of the United Kingdom. Thousands of persons are now obliged to resort to the poor-rate for subsistence, owing to this blockade. Yet Her Majesty's Government have never sought to take advantage of the obvious inperfections of this blockade, in order to declare it ineffective. They have, to the loss and detriment of the British nation, sermpulously observed the daties of treat Britain towards a friendly 81.4c. But when Her Majesty's serupulously observed the daties of treat Britain towards a friendly 8. I.e. But when Her Majesty's Government are usked to go beyond this, and to overstep the existing powers given to them by municipal and international law for the purpose of imposing rebinary restrictions on the trade of Her Majesty's subjects, it is impossible to listen to such suggestion. The ingenuity of persons engaged in commerce will always, in some degree, defect attempts to starve or debar from connected intercourse an extensive coast inhabited by a large and in bistrones population.

"If, therefore, the Government of the United States consider it for their interest to inflict this great injury on other nations, the utmost they can expect is that European Powers shall respect those acts of the United States which are within the limits of the law. The United States tovernment cannot expect that Great Britain should frame new statutes to aid the Federal beleakade, and to carry into effect the restrictions on commerce which the United States, for their own purposes, have thought fit to institute, and the application of which it is their duty to confine within the legitimate limits of international law."

It is hardly worth while to dwelt on the attempts made to show partiality and unfair conduct on the part of the authorities at Nassan. A Mr. Heyliger appears to have been sent there as the Agent of the Confederates, and a letter from him to the Confederate Government of December 27, 1861, is quoted in the Case of the United States.‡ in which it is said, "We have succeeded in obtaining a very important modification of the existing laws, viz., the privilege of breaking bulk and transhipment." It is said in the Case of the United States—

"That modification was all that the insurgents wanted. That privilege converted the port of Nassan into an insurgent port, which could not be blockaded by the naval forces of the United States. Further stay of the United States' vessels of war was therefore useless. The United States ask the Tribunal to find that this act, being a permission from the British authorities at Nassan, enabling a vessel chartered by the insurgents, and freighted with articles contraband of war, to diverge from its voyage, and to tranship its cargo in a British port when not made necessary by distress, was a violation of the duties of a neutral."

I pass by the admission contained in this passage that Nassau was being used by the United States' vessels of war as a post of observation for the detection and pursuit of vessets carrying contraband of war to the South; in other words, as a base of naval operations.

The explanation of the passage in Mr. Heyliger's letter, which I find in the British Counter-Case and American, is simple enough. The Customs Regulations of the Colony forbade that a pinent of goods in its ports or waters, unless they were landed for examination by the Customs officers. There was nothing however to prevent their being at once re-shipped in other vessels after being so landed and examined, and the Receiver-General of the Colony had power to grant permission for dispensing with the landing of the goods if he thought fit. It would seem that this permission had been customarily granted, as a matter of course, in the case of goods in transit. In conformity with this practice Messes, Adderley and Co., of Nassau, applied to the Receiver-General, shortly before the date of Mr. Heyliger's letter, for permission to tranship the cargo of the Eliza Bonsell, stated to consist of assorted merchandize, to another vessel, the Ella Warley, bound ostensibly for St. John's, New Brunswick.

The Receiver-General, having regard probably to the destination of the Ella Werley, St. John's being the port for which blockade-running vessels were in the habit of taking clearances, refused to give the usual permission unless authorized by the Governor. Thereupon Messrs. Adderley wrote to the Governor explaining that all they asked for was to be dispensed from the formality of landing the goods on the wharf, and Complaint is made that the vessels engaged in running the bekade, and leaving Massau for that purpose, were allowed to clear out for St. John., New Brunswick, means of controlling vessels in this respect. The nature a operation of a clearance is explained in the British Case:—

"Clearance signifies the final official act by which the paper office of that as notifies that all has been done which the law requires to be done before the departure of An and Ago. It is purely for Customs purposes, the main objects being to protect the revenue, and to up offistics as to the number of ships and quantity of aerelandize entering and leaving Briti 1 at As there are in minior of same and particularly ordinary times no restrictions or devices on the export of articles of any kind no rigid inspection is exercised by 1 + Customs authorities over the general on board vessels in British ports. Before starting on his voyage the master of the vessel is bound to been a paper called a Content, giving the number and description of any packages of merchandize which exemption from or remission of duty is claimed, but a crely specifyin sandry packages of free goods. The master has also to produce a Victualling bjed on board, on sundry packages of tree goods. The masser has also to produce a victualing amount of stores liable to duty (such as et a spirits, tobacco, and the like), whice that shipped for the use of his crew. These papers are commared with the shipping bills and certifes already in the possession of the Customs authorities, and if they are found to tally, a label signed and scaled by the examining officer and Collector, is alliked to the Victualling Bill and certificates, and see papers are other articles as delivered to the master as instreamnce.

"It is true that, for statistical purpose, the agents to the master of the vessel be required to furnish to the Customs Department a list, called a Manifest, giving the number and description of all packages of goods, whether limble to duty or ot, shipped on board the vessel, and the shipping agents or exporters are also required to furnish specifications of all goods, described by the master on his subsequently further described in his Manifest; but the law does not require that these particular should be given before the vessel sails; it is complied with provided they be furnished within six day after she has cleaned.

"Previously to the year 1867, no penalty was attached by law to the departure of a vessel for foreign ports without a charance provided she w. in ballast, and had on board no stores except such as in other cases.

Since that date, he sever, clearance has been required in these as well as in other cases.

"A clearance may not be granted until the master of the ship has declared the nation to which he affirms that she belongs; and a ship attempting to proceed to sea without a clearance may be detained until such a declaration has been made. The officer, however, cannot question, or require proof of, effects of Customs have little or no means of a crtaining this beyond the information which the master or owner gives on entering outwards. It frequently happens that a vessel entered outwards for a specified destination changes her course when at ea, and proceeds to a different destination. There are no means of preventing this."*

If these vessels had cleared out for a Confederate port, they must equally have been allowed to leave. It has been argued that the vessels employed in conveying contraband. " war for the use of the Confederate Government should have been considered as transports, and therefore as contravening the Foreign Enlistment Act; and therefore that they should have been stopped. If this is meant to be said figuratively, it comes to nothing. If it is meant that the vessels were actually built or fitted out for, and made over to, the Confederate Government, to be used by them as transports—in which case only they would come within the Foreign Enlistment Act—the answer is, that there is not only no evidence of in thing of the kind, but there is every reason to believe that the contrary is the case, and that they remained the property of the original owners, who found the employment of them in this trade profitable, notwithstanding that many of them fell into the hands of the blockading ships. It is plain, from the letter before cited, that this is the view that Mr. Consul Morse took of the matter.

Sympathy in the Colonies.

Angry complaints are made in the American documents of the sympathy exhibited at Nassan, and in several other British Colonies, towards the Confederate cause.

When it is asserted, in particular instances, that this favourable feeling towards the insurgent States led to partiality, inconsistent with a due observance of neutrality on the part of the Authorities, it will be better to deal with these charges when I come to the particular cases in which it is alleged to have occurred. As regards the inhabitants of these places generally, it seems to me that it was quite natural that, at the Bahamas and Bermuda, and possibly in the other West India Islands, the tide of public feeling should run strongly in favour of the Confederates. These Colonies lay more or less contiguous to the Southern coast. What trade they had had before with the United States was principally what the South. But what was more likely to operate in favour of the latter was the active trade which the transmission of ships and cargoes to the Southern ports suddenly brought to them. Human nature is pretty much the same at Nassan as it would be under similar circumstances at London or New York. We are apt to look with favour on those who bring us business or promote our wealth, or who in any way cause the sun of prosperity to shine upon us. No Government can control, or ought to endeavour to control, or to interfere with, public feeling in such cases, if leading to no violation of the law.

Independently, however, of any influence exercised by local interest, I cannot doubt that, as the great contest went on, and while the inferiority of the means of upholding it on the part of the South became more and more manifest, their gallantry and courage shone out the more brightly in continuing the unequal struggle, there did arise the sympathy which enduring courage struggling with adversity never fails to inspire. And I can not help thinking that the haughty and offensive tone assumed by many of the Representatives of the United States helped greatly to turn the tide of public feeling in favour of their opponents. Men refused to see in the leaders of the South the "rebels" and the "pirates" held up by the United States to public reprobation, and thus the effect which a more generous appreciation of the nosition and qualities of their adversaries might have had in neutralizing the feeling in their favour, tended only to increase it.

Be this as it may, I assert that, whatever individual persons may have thought or felt, Great Britain as a nation was throughout the contest between the Northern and Southern States honestly desirous that perfect neutrality should be maintained, and that the Queen's Government, from the beginning to the end, were animated by the honest desire faithfully to discharge the duty which their position as the Ministers and servants of a great Sovereign, pledged to neutrality in the face of the world, imposed upon them.

Application to particular vessels. Having thus passed in review the general heads of complaint put forward in the pleadings of the United States, for the purpose of vindicating the British Government and British authorities from what appear to me unfounded and unjust aspersions, I proceed to the cases of the individual ships, as to the equipment of which it is alleged that the British Government were wanting in diligence.

But it is here, when we proceed to apply, practically, the test of due diligence to the conduct of the Government, that the anomaly of the present position, to which I adverted in the outset, makes itself sensibly felt. As I have shown upon abundant authority, the equipping of a ship for sale to a belligerent, in the way of trade, was at the time in question no offence against the law of nations, or a violation of neutrality, though it was an offence against the municipal law of Great Britain. The Government, of Her Majesty though, like every other Government, it was bound to prevent any known violation of the law, was under no obligation to a belligerent to enforce the law for his benefit, and incurred no liability to such belligerent for not doing so, so ong as the law was not enforced against the latter any more than against his enemy. Any hostile expedition permitted to leave the shores of Great Britain, which the Government by the exercise of reasonable diligence could have prevented, would have amounted to a breach of neutrality, for which it might have been held responsible. But for the mere equipping of a vessel, by ship-builders in the way of trade, though intended for a belligerent, the Government would not be responsible; and though every Government is no doubt bound to prevent infractions of the law, so far as it knows of them and can prevent them, still this general duty which it owes to its own country, is obviously a very different thing from the responsibility it incurs as representing the State, in relation to a foreign Power. In the one case, the maintenance of the law is left to the ordinary Authorities, and to the individuals who have occasion to seek protection or redress from its operation: in the other, the action of the Government by its immediate officers becomes necessary for its own protection. No doubt, as a matter of comity, and from a sense of justice, a Government would pay ready attention to the Representatives of a belligerent Power complaining of an infraction of the municipal law in a matter in which the interests of the belligerent were affected -more especially in a matter lying as it were on the confines of municipal and international law-and would call into action the preventive powers it possessed, to keep the law from being broken. But, under such circumstances, it might fairly leave to the Representative of the belligerent to make out a case for the application of the law, just as it is left so to do to an ordinary individual who desires to put the law in motion in order to obtain redress on his own behalf. Hence, no doubt, had arisen the practice, common to the Governments both of the United States and Great Britain, of requiring the Representative of a belligerent Power, invoking the aid of the Government, to produce evidence by which the action of the Executive, when brought to the test of judicial inquiry, can be justified and upheld.

It is obvious that the degree of active diligence which could reasonably be expected from a Government under such circumstances, is very different from what it would be bound to exercise in order to prevent a violation of neutrality according to the law of nations, for which as a Government it would be properly responsible to a

It seems to me that though, by the Treaty of Washington it must be taken that Great Britain was bound to use due diligence to prevent the equipping of ships as a matter of neutral obligation, and not as a mere matter of municipal law, yet, that in determining whether due diligence was then applied or not, we must look to the relative position of the parties at the time, and insist on no more than would have satisfied the exigency of obligations then existing. Morally, in judging the conduct of the Government of that time, we are assuredly bound to do so.

The Florida.
At Liverpool.

Case of the Florida.

The following are the facts relating to the Florida as they are to be gathered from the Cases, Counter-Cases, Arguments, and printed Evidence supplied to the Tribunal:—

This vessel, originally named the Oreto, was no doubt built for war. The contract for her construction was made by Bullock, who, it has since become known (though at the time the fact was altogether unknown to Her Majesty's Government) was an agent of the Confederate States, with Fawcett, Preston, and Co., of Liverpool, by whom the contract for the construction of the hull was again sublet to Miller and Sons, shiphuilders at that port. The attention of Mr. Dudley, the United States' Consul at Liverpool, was attracted to the vessel as early as the end of January 1862. In despatches to Mr. Seward, of the 24th of January and 4th of February, he calls attention to this steamer under the name of the Oritis, or Oretis. In the letter of the 24th of January he says: "She is reported the the Italian Government, but the fact of the machinery being supplied by Fawcett and Preston, and other circumstances connected with it, make me suspicious, and cause me to believe she is intended for the South."*

On the 4th of February he writes to Mr. Seward as follows:-

"In my last two despatches I called attention to the iron screw steam gun-boat Orcto, or Oritis, being built at Liverpool, and litted out by Fawcett, Preston, and Co. She is now taking in her coal, and appearances indicate that she will leave here the latter part of this week without her armament. The probabilities are she will run into some small port, and take it and ammunition on board. This of itself is some shalt suspicious. They pretend she is built for the Italian Government; but the Italian Consul have informs us that he knows nothing about it, has no knowledge whatever of any vessel-being built for bis Government. There is much secrecy observed about her, and I have been unable to get anything definite, but my impressions are strong that she is intended for the Southern Confederacy. I have communicated my impressions and all the facts to Mr. Adams, our Minister at London. She has one funnel, three masts, barque-rigged, eight portholes for guns on each side, and is to carry sixteen guns."

It thus appears that, by the 4th of February, Mr. Dudley had put Mr. Adams in possession of such information as he possessed concerning this vessel. The letter of Mr. Dudley to Mr. Adams has not been published among the American documents; but it is evident that Mr. Adams did not consider the information communicated to him sufficient to warrant any application to Her Majesty's Government, for none was made by him on the subject of this vessel till the receipt of another letter from Mr. Dudley, a fortnight latter. Indeed, Mr. Dudley expressly states that he was mable to get anything definite about the vessel. He speaks only of suspicions and impressions. He had nothing to communicate beyond reports and rumours.

Amongst other things stated by Mr. Dudley, he mentions that he had made inquiry of the Italian Consul at Liverpool, who had told him that he knew nothing of the vessel. But if, as was stated by the builders, the order for the vessel had been given by Thomas Brothers, of Palermo, the Italian Consul at Liverpool might have remained without information on the subject; and Mr. Dudley, while mentioning what had passed between him and the Italian Consul to Mr. Seward, does not appear to have mentioned it to Mr. Adams. The fact was unknown to Her Majesty's Government.

On the 17th of February, Mr. Dudley again writes to Mr. Adams about the Oreto as follows:—

"The gun-beat Oreto is still at this port. She is making a trial trip in the river to-day. No armament as yet on beard. She has put up a second smoke-stack since I wrote you. She therefore has two funnels, three masts, and is barque-rigged. I am now informed that she is to carry eight ripled cannon, and two long swivel-guns on pivots so arranged as to rake both fore and art. No poins or expense has been spared in her construction, and when fully armed she will be a formidable and dangerous craft. The Florida. At Liverpool.

In a postscript he adds, "The gun carriages for the Orcto, I have just learned, were taken on board on Friday night last, in a rough state, and taken down in the hold. Fraser, Trenholm, and Co. have made advances to Fawcett, Preston, and Co.,

This statement as to the gun carriages was wholly incorrect.

Having received the letter of Mr. Dudley, Mr. Adams writes, inclosing it to Lord Russell, as follows :-

"My Lord,
"I have the honour to submit to your consideration the copy of an extract of a letter addressed to me by the Consul of the United States at Liverpool, going to show the preparation at that port of an armed steamer evidently intended for hostile operations on the ocean. From the evidence furnished in the names of the persons stated to be concerned in her construction and outlit, I entertain farnished in the names or the persons stated to be concerned in her construction and outht, I entertain little doubt that the intention is precisely that indicated in the letter of the Consul, the carrying on war against the United States. The parties are the same which dispatched the Bernuda, laden with contraband of war at the time, in August last, when I had the honour of calling your Lordship's attencontributed of the state of the succeeded in running the blockade, and which now appears to

" I have, &c. (Signed) "CHARLES FRANCIS ADAMS."*

It is clear that, in the information thus conveyed to Lord Russell, there was, so far, nothing that could justify the seizure of the vessel. Whether Mr. Dudley communicated to Mr. Adams the details of the information, to which he refers in general neated to Mr. Adams the actains of the information, to which he refers in general terms in his letter of the 17th, or not, it is certain that no details were communicated to Her Majesty's Government. Nothing was specifically stated beyond the names of the parties for whom and by whom the vessel had been built, and that the former were the same as had, in the preceding August, disputched the Bermuda laden with munitions of war, with which she had succeeded in running the blockade. Beyond this, all is suspicion, or, at best, the belief of two zealous servants of the United States' Government, with only a general reference to information received by one of them from "many different sources," no details of which are given, or means afforded of testing its accuracy or trustworthiness. It is obvious that, if upon such a representation the Government had proceeded to seize the vessel, no Court could have condemned her: she must inevitably have been released. Indeed, Mr. Adams himself seems to have been conscious that his representation was not one on which the Government could act without further materials; for he ends his letter by saying, "Should further evidence to sustain the allegations respecting the Oreto be held necessary to effect the object of securing the interposition of Her Majesty's Government, I will make an effort to procure it in a more tormal manner."

It is plain from this that, as late as the 18th of February, Mr. Adams was not in possession of evidence on which he felt he had a right to call for the interposition of the Government.

Nor does Mr. Dudley appear to have succeeded in obtaining any more reliable information. On the 19th he writes again to Mr. Seward :-

"I do not think there is any doubt but what she (the Florida) is intended for the so-called Southern Confederacy. Information from many different sources all confirm it, and some of the Southern Agents have admitted it. On Friday night last, her gan carriages, in pieces, and some in a rough state, were taken on board and put down in the hold. It is understood that her guns are at the foundry of Fawcett, Preston, and Co.—It is probable they may be taken on in boxes, and mounted after they get out to sea; but I have nothing to warrant this supposition, except the fact of the gun-carriages heing taken on board in the night time and in the manner they were. She will be quite equal in strength and armament to the Tuscarora when completed. She made a trial trip of twenty miles yesterday. I have made this vessel the subject of two despatches to Minister Adams, and communicated to him all the particulars."†

Southern Confederacy, he communicated the fact only to Mr. Seward. No such information is given to Mr. Adams, still less to the Government or to the local Authorities, by whom, had it been imparted to them, the information might have been followed up.

Both in this and his former letter Mr. Dudley's information as to the gun-earriages he ving been conveyed on board the Oreto, with the additionally suspicious circumstance of this having been done by night, proved altogether mistaken. The report made hy the Custom-house Officers of Liverpool of the 21st of February shows that the vessel had no gun-carriages on board. It further appears by reports made at a later period that she had no gun-carriages on board when she finally left Liverpool. She had none on board when she arrived at Nassau.

All that under the circumstances could possibly be asked for, on the information conveyed to the Government by Mr. Adams, was inquiry; and this Her Majesty's Government at once proceeded to institute.

Immediately on the receipt of Mr. Adams' letter, Earl Russell took the necessary steps for causing local inquiries as to the Oreto to be made by the officers to whose Department it appertained to investigate such a matter. No clue having been given to the secret sources of information which Mr. Dudley may have possessed, these officers could only apply in the first instance to the builders of the vessel. The result of their inquiries, as shown in the reports made by them, appeared perfectly satisfactory. The Commissioners of Customs, on the 22nd of February, report to the Treasury as follows:—

"On receipt of your Lordship's reference, we forthwith instructed our Collector at Liverpool to make inquiries in regard to the vessel Oreto, and it appears from his report that she has been built by Messrs, Miller and Sons for Messrs, Faweett, Preston, and Co., engineers, of Liverpool, and is intended for the use of Messrs. Thomas, Brothers, of Pulermo, one of that firm having frequently visited the vessel during the process of building.

"The Oreto is pierced for four guns; but she has, as yet, taken nothing on board but coals and ballast. She is not, at present, fitted for the reception of gune, nor are the builders aware that she is to be supplied with guns whilst she remains in this country. The expense of her construction has been paid, and she has been handed over to Messrs. Fawer and Preston. Messrs Miller and Sons state their belief that her destination is Palermo, as they have been requested to recommend a master to take her to that port, and our Collector at Liverpool states that he has every reason to believe that the vessel is for the Italian Government.

"We beg further to add, that special directions have been given to the officers at Liverpool to watch the movements of the vessel, and that we will not fail to report forthwith any circumstance which may occur worthy of your Lordship's cognizance.

The statement of the Commissioners was based on the following reports which they had received from their officers at Liverpool:—

Mr. Edwards to the Commissioners of Customs.

Here, therefore, was the assurance of a respectable i. m of shipbuilders, by whom the vessel had been built, that it was understood by them to have been built for Thomas Brothers of Palermo, whose agents Faweett and Co. were, and that Mr. Thomas, a member of the Palermo firm, had frequently visited the ship whilst she was in the course of construction. There was the statement of Mr. Edwards, an officer possessing the confidence of the Government, that he had every reason to believe that the vessel was built for the Italian Government, and not for the Confederates. And from the report of Mr. Morgan, another Government officer, as well as from the statement of Mr. Miller, it further appeared that the representation of Mr. Dudley, that the vessel "had received her gun-carriages and was ready to take her arms on board," was altogether incorrect, there being no gun-earriages on board, or preparation of any sort

If, prior to the receipt of these reports, the evidence was insufficient to justify the seizure or detention of the vessel, assuredly after them Her Majesty's Government would have acted most improperly if they had directed their officers to adopt so

It may be said that further inquiries should have been instituted. But of whom? Mr. Du'lley, to whom every one who had conceived any suspicions about the vessel, or heard any rumours respecting her, appears to have run, and who of course was naturally disposed to listen to any statements of the kind, made a point of not giving up the rames of his informants. No facts were ever communicated by Mr. Dudley, either to the officers of the port or to the police of Liverpool.

The reports received from the Commissioners of Customs by the Government were at once communicated to Mr. Adams. I cannot help thinking that then was the time for putting Her Majesty's Government in possession of any information which had been obtained by Mr. Dudley from so "many different sources," if that information could have been made available, and for procuring the evidence which Mr. Adams had expressed himself willing to make an effort to obtain. But nothing further was heard expressed innied willing to make an effort to obtain. Due nothing differ was near from that gentleman till the 26th of March (upwards of a month later), when the vessel had actually sailed. Either Mr. Adams felt, after the reports made to the Government by its officers, that the zeal of Mr. Dudley had led him to form hasty conclusions; or the information, though derived from "many different sources," turned out to be such as could not be relied on; or the evidence was found not to be forthcoming. Even Mr. Dudley, whose untiring industry and zeal in the discharge of his duty is certainly entitled to admiration, does not appear to have supplied Mr. Adams during the whole of this period with any evidence of importance, or to have been required by Mr. Adams to procure evidence upon which the Government could be called upon to act. It appears to me, under these circumstances, singularly inconsistent and unjust to impute as matter of blame to Earl Russell, as is done in the Case of the United states, that he did not call upon Mr. Adams to furnish further evidence. The Government were satisfied with the reports of their officers, having received which they might reasonably, and without being liable to any imputation of want of due care be of opinion that they ought to rest content, at all events till something more should be brought forward. There was no reason why they should doubt the written statement of Messrs. Miller, a firm of known respectability, and one of the members of which was a Government officer at the port. All the firms mentioned had carried on business at Liverpool previously to the war, and it neither is, nor can be, suggested that after the war had begun they had no business dealings or transactions except with the Confederate States. At the same time, as there was no doubt that the vessel was one which was capable of being adapted to the purpose of war, it was right at such a conjuncture that a watchful eye should be kept on her. Directions to this effect were accordingly given by the Commissioners of Customs, and the vessel was diligently

The Florida. At Liverpool. watched until the hour of her departure. If evidence had been forthcoming to show that the Government officers were deceived, it was for Mr. Dudley, who professed to know where it was to be found, to produce it. He would have been wholly wanting in his duty if, being possessed of, or enabled to obtain such evidence, he had failed to produce it. The fact that neither Mr. Dudley nor Mr. Adams made any communication to the Government till after the vessel had sailed is, as it seems to me, very strong to show that no such evidence was to be had.

If Mr. Dudley, to whom everybody appears to have resorted who had anything to communicate, could find nothing on which his superior, Mr. Adams, ever ready to address requisitions or remonstrances to Earl Russell, could call for the intervention of Her Majesty's Government, it seems unreasonable to reproach the Government with want of due diligence in not making inquiries which, there is every reason to think, could have led to no profitable result.

That the Government were sincerely desirous of ascertaining the true character of this vessel lest, possibly, any violation of neutrality should be contemplated, is shown by this, that instead of resting satisfied with the inquiries of the local officers, a belief having been expressed that the vessel was being built for the Italian Government, Lord Russell, on the 26th of February, telegraphed to Sir James Hudson, the British Minister at Turin, desiring him to "ascertain and report whether a vessel called the Oreto, now fitting out at Liverpool, is intended for the use of the Italian Government." Sir James Hudson having referred to Siguor Ricasoli, the Minister for Foreign Affairs, telegraphs, in answer: "Ricasoli tells me he has no knowledge whatever of the ship Oreto, but will cause inquiry to be made."† As the construction of such a vessel would belong to the Department of the Marine, the fact of Signor Rieasoli being unaware of any order having been given for its construction would, of course, not be conclusive. Indeed, Signor Ricasoli would not take upon himself to negative the fact, but promised to make inquiry on the subject. Unfortunately the result of the inquiry, which was that the vessel had not been built for the Italian Government, was not communicated to Sir James Hudson till the 25th of March, by which time the Oreto had actually sailed.‡ The delay is believed to have been owing to a change in the Italian Ministry, which occurred about the period in question; for the answer to Sir James Hudson was given not by Signor Rieasoli, but by Signor Ratazzi, who had succeeded him as Minister for Foreign Affairs. The delay is certainly not one for which Her Majesty's Government can in any way be held responsible. Until the final answer to Sir James Hudson's inquiry had been given, the uncertain answer of Signor Ricasoli could not, for the reason already given—namely, that the matter was not one belonging to his department—suffice to warrant the seizure or detention of the vessel. The ignorance of the Italian Consul at Liverpool, who would not necessarily be informed of an order given by the Italian Government, especially if the order had been given to Thomas Brothers of Palermo, could not make it unnecessary to wait for Signor Ratazzi's answer. But the alleged ignorance of the Italian Consul was never communicated to the Government or to the local authorities. The information was given by Mr. Dudley to Mr. Seward alone; in other words, was thrown away.

Mr. Dudley continued to keep a watchful eye on the Oreto. On the 27th of February

he writes to Mr. Seward:-

"I have positive evidence that the Oreto gun-boat is intended for the Southern Confederacy. She is to earry sixteen guns, is intended as a privateer, and, from present appearances, looks as if she would start on her cruize direct from this post. She has taken on board, this morning, seventy barrels of pork and beef, sixty sacks of navy and six barrels of cabin bread, together with other provisions. The guss are to be shipped at some other por an England." §

Again on the 1st of March:-

"The day before yesterday I wrote the Department that I had obtained evidence that the gun-best Oreto was intended as a privateer, and that she was taking on her provisions, &c. Since then she has been quite busy in taking on provisions. She has a very large quantity, enough for a long cruise. They are getting as many Southern sailors as they can. They want 130 men if they can procure them. The pilot has been told they would leave to-day; they are only waiting for the arrival of the West India boat at Sonthampton. The captain who is to command her is to come by this boat. A man by the name of Duguid, a Scotelman, is to take her out of this port as an English vessel. Her transfer will be made outside. The pilot thinks she will not come back to Liverpool after her trial trip. The Florida

At Liverpool

The programme was not carried out. The Oreto neither went to the Isle of Man, nor Holyhead, nor the Mediterranean; nor did she get any Southern sailors.

In the foregoing letters Mr. Dudley says he has "positive evidence" that the gun-boat Oreto was intended as a privateer, and for the Southern Confederacy. It so, one is naturally induced to ask how it was that this evidence was not communicated to Mr. Adams, by whom it might immediately have been made available, instead of being only spoken of, and that only in general terms, to Mr. Seward, who, being on the other side of the Atlantic, could not, of course, make use of it to stop the vessel. Is not the fair inference to be drawn from this and the other letters of this gentleman, when we see how little resulted from them, that anxious to show his zeal in the best light, he was more disposed to address himself to the Secretary of State than to the Minister in London, and was somewhat apt to boast of possessing evidence, when, in fact, he had nothing more than reports and conjectures, which, though not inconsistent with probability, possessed no substantial or available reality? Or was it that his information was obtained by secret means which would have stamped it with discredit

On the 5th of March Mr. Dudley again writes to Mr. Seward:—

"Owing, as it is alleged, to the authorities here, the Oreto has been compelled to register as an "Owing, as it is an eget, to the authornies here, the Oreto has been compened to register as an English vessel, and be regularly entered, &c. She entered on Saturday last for Palerno, in Sicily, and Jamaica, in the West Indies, W. C. Miller as owner, and Dugnid as commander. Her guns are not on the control of the contro Jamaica, in the west frames, w. c. affiner as owner, and Dugand as commander. Ther guns are not on board. She shipped her crew on Monday last. Inclosed find a copy of an agreement given by the captain to one of the men. By it you will see that, while Miller is the owner, Faweett, Preston, and Co. captain to one of the men. By it you will see that, while Miller is the owner, rawcett, reston, and co, pay the men. I have this document temporarily in my possession. The transfer of the vessel to the pay the men. I have this document temporarry in my possession. The transfer of the vessel to the Southern Confederacy will not be made here, but at some place outside; it may be at Palermo or Bennuda, but most likely at some place in the Mediterranean, as the pilot and all the men are now given to understand that they are first to go there. The foreman in Fawcett, Preston, and Co's told a young man formerly in the employ of that company that the guns for the Oreto were to be shipped to Young man tormerly in the campage of case company time the game of the order to be supported to Palermo, and put on board at that place; while another person in their foundry told one of my men that the guns had been sent on in the steamer Bermuda, and were to be landed at Bermuda, and that the Oreto was to call there for them. Which of these, or whether either of them, is true, I cannot tell; but what gives some strength to the latter statement is the fact that on Saturday morning last, while the Bernauda gaves some stronger and just before she sailed, several large cannon were placed on board of her. Both of was in the river, and just before she saired, several large cannon were placed on board of her. Both of these persons in the employ of Fawcett, Preston, and Co. stated that she was intended for the Confederates. The report is that she is to stop at Holyhead. I have sent a man there to watch her, and made arrangements with one of the crew to give information from 'time to time; made her the subject of a number of communications to Mr. Adams, and on Friday addressed a circular to all our Consuls in the Mediterranean, requesting them to look after and report to the Department in case she should visit the Mediterranean, requesting them to look after and report to the Department in case she should visit the last a year,) with abundance of wines and liquors for the officers. She sailed from here last evening the bill of entry says for Palermo and Jamaica in ballast. Her crew shipped consists of fifty-two

The conflicting statements set forth in this letter show how uncertain and unreliable were the reports which were conveyed to Mr. Dudley by persons who gave their conjectures as facts, as well as how little reliance can be placed on the information of Mr. Dudley, and how readily that gentleman accepted unauthentic rumours and reports as the foundation of his statements. Mr. Miller was not registered as owner, but, as we shall see in a moment, Mr. John Henry Thomas, a merchant connected with Palermo. In the agreement with the crew, printed in the British Appendix, the firm of Fawcett, Preston, and Co., are mentioned as "managing owners;" no mention is made of Mr. Miller, either as registered or managing owner.

The guns for the Oreto, which it was asserted were to go out in the Bermuda, did not go out in that vessel.

Here, again, I cannot but repeat the observation that while facts, which, if true, were no doubt of importance, are communicated to Mr. Seward, no information respecting them is given to Mr. Adams, by whom they might have been turned to good account, or to the local Authorities, to whom they might have afforded a clue to get at the truth. The statements made by the foreman and workmen of

The Florida. At Liverpool. Faweett, Preston, and Co., if mentioned in the proper quarter, might have led to important revelations. The attention of the local Authorities at Liverpool had not been withdrawn from the vessel. They insisted, as appears from Mr. Dudley's letter to Mr. Seward, of the 5th of March, that the ship should be registered, no doubt as the condition of her clearance, and on the 3rd of March she was registered accordingly, in the name of "John Henry Thomas, of Liverpool, in the County of Lancaster, merchant," apparently either a member of, or connected with, the Palermo firm—the said John Henry Thomas then making the following declaration, according to the usual form:-

" I, the undersigned John Henry Thomas, of Liverpool, county of Lancaster, merchant, declare as follows:—I am a natural-born British subject, born at Palermo, in the Island of Sicily, of British parents, and have never taken the oath of allegiance to any foreign State. The above general description of the ship is correct. James Alexander Duguid, whose certificate of competency or service is No. 4,073, is the master of said ship. I am entitled to be registered as owner of sixty-four shares of the said ship. To the best of my knowledge and belief no person or body of persons other than such persons or bodies of persons as are by the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, qualified to be owners of British ships is entitled, as owner, to any interest whatever, either legal or beneficial, in the said ship. And I make this selemn declaration, conscientiously believing the same to be true. " JOHN H. THOMAS.

"Made and subscribed the 1st day of March, 1862, by the above-named John Henry Thomas, in the presence of-"J. C. Johnstone, Jun., Registrar of Shipping, (Signed)

"Port of Liverpool."* The fact of Mr. Thomas, who thus declared himself to be a native of Palermo, being registered as the owner, and his declaration that no person or body of persons, other than such as were by the Merchant Shipping Act qualified to be owners of British ships, was entitled, as owner, to any interest, legal or beneficial, in the vessel, were of course calculated to give support to the statement that the vessel was intended for the firm of Thomas Brothers of that place. On the ensuing day, the 4th, the Oreto cleared out for Palermo and Jamaica.

Attention is called in the Case of the United States to the fact that, "notwithstanding the alleged belief of the Liverpool officers that the vessel was intended for the King of Italy, she was allowed to clear for Jamaica in ballast." In fact, she cleared for Palermo and Jamaica; not, as would appear to be thus represented, for Jamaica alone. And it is to be observed that the belief of Mr. Edwards, the Collector, on this head, had been expressed as much as a month before, without, as it would appear, any definite grounds; and that, on the other hand, Messrs. Miller had stated that she had been built for the Palermo firm, and that this statement had received confirmation from the registration of Thomas as her owner.

Though represented as destined to be handed over to the Italian Government, as a dispatch hoat, yet if built in the first instance for a private firm, it was not impossible that it might be intended that she should make a voyage to the West Indies before being parted with. Even if her being cleared for Jamaica, as well as Palermo, had been deemed a circumstance of suspicion, it would not have justified a scizure of the vessel, unless there was something to show that the clearance was fictitious and fraudu-It was only by subsequent events that this was made to appear.

Attention is invited in the Case of the United States to what is called the "easy credulity" of these officials, "who to the first charges of Mr. Adams replied by putting forward the belief of the builders as to the destination of the vessel, and who met his subsequent complaints by extracting from the Custom-house records the false clearance which Bullock, and Fraser, Trenholm, and Co., had caused to be entered there."+

This representation appears to me very unfair. These officers, on receiving instructions from the Commissioners of Customs to make inquiry, had no one to resort to on the first occasion but the builders. They could report no other than what the builders stated, which was that "to the best of their information" the present destination of the vessel was Palermo, as it had been built for the firm of Thomas, Brothers, of that place, and they had been asked to recommend a master to take her out to Palermo. When it is said that on the second occasion the officers extracted from the Customhouse records the false clearance which Bullock, and Fraser, Trenholm, and Co., had caused to be entered there, it is again to be borne in mind that it was their duty to communicate the entry of the ship's clearance to their superiors, according as it stood on the register: besides, there is no evidence of the entry having been made by er, might have led to

The recklessness of the assertion is apparent from the fact that the clearance was effected, and the entry of it made, on the 3rd of March; whereas Bullock did not arrive at Liverpool in the Annie Childs till the 11th.* If Fraser and Co. were parties to the clearance, the fact appears to have been unknown to Mr. Dudley: no suggestion of the kind is anywhere made by him. Still less is there any ground whatever for supposing that the officers had any knowledge or reason to suspect that the entry had been made by these parties, or was in any respect false. The slur attempted to be cast on these officers, who are said to have been deceived only "because they wished to be deceived," appears to me, I must say, wholly unfounded, and one cannot but regret to see imputations of this kind introduced into a Case stated on the part of the American Government.

But the question, it must never be forgotten, is not whether these officers were unduly eredulous; the question on which the liability of the British Government must depend is whether there were facts, ascertained, or capable of being ascertained, upon which they would have been justified in taking possession of this vessel. It seems to me that there were not.

Upon what evidence could Her Majesty's Government have supported the scizure, or asked for the confiscation of this vessel in an English Court of law?

It is here all essential to keep in mind what it was which in a Court of Law it would have been incumbent on the Public Prosecutor to establish, in order to the condemnation of the vessel under the Foreign Enlistment Act. He would have had in the first place to show that the vessel was equipped for war. As to this, it is true there would have been no difficulty. The vessel was pierced for guns, and had the necessary fittings for war: she was represented as a dispatch-boat, which means a vessel capable of being armed, and therefore of being used for war. But it would have been further necessary to prove that the vessel was intended to be used against a beligerent with whom Great Britain was at peace. Here lay the difficulty. For on this head the evidence totally failed. Beyond surmises, suspicion, rumour, there was nothing, at least nothing tangible or that could be made practicably available. According to the safe and sound rules of evidence, which happily prevail in an English Court of Justice, as also in those of America (for the procedure is the same in both) the suspicions and impressions of Mr. Dudley would have been wholly inadmissible; the reports received by him from persons who could not be brought forward would have been rejected as mere hearsay; the gossip of the docks or the shipwrights' yards would have been at once excluded; insinuations, imputing to respectable officers abandonment of duty and complicity in crime, recklessly made and unsupported by proof, would have been treated with proper disregard. But, beyond this, what was there to show that this vessel was intended for the service of the Confederate States? Positively nothing: while, on the other hand, there was the fact that an apparently respectable merchant, a native of Palermo, had registered himself as the owner; that the vessel had cleared for Palermo and Jamaica, and that her erew had signed articles for a voyage to those places.

A circumstance to which the officers at Liverpool appear to have attached considerable importance, was that the vessel, though pierced for guns, had not even gun-carriages on board, and was wholly unarmed and destitute of munitions of war. It might indeed be surmised by Mr. Dudley that the vessel would receive her armament elsewhere, and the sequel proved that his suspicions were well founded; but on his own showing he was wholly without evidence to prove that such was to be the ease. Nor must it be forgotten that the Florida was the first vessel of war built in England for the Confederate States, and that the artifices and tricks, to which the unserupulous cunning of the Confederate Agents did not hesitate to resort in violation of British neutrality, had not till then been brought into play. The officers therefore finding, after having unceasingly watched the vessel, that no attempt was made to arm her, may not unreasonably have been satisfied that she was leaving on an innocent voyage; or, at all events, without there being any intention of arming her in British waters. To some minds this may seem "easy credulity." To others, less astute, it may seem natural enough, and not to be justly imputable to want of proper diligence or to intentional neglect of

If, indeed, the officers had become aware that another vessel had been at that time taking on board gun-carriages and guns capable of being put on board the Oreto after

The Florida. At Liverpool. she had left the port, such a circumstance would have been well calculated to excite suspicion that the professed voyage to Palermo and Jamaica was but the pretended destination of the vessel.

But nothing of the kind existed. M. Staempfli, who has insisted on such a fact as one of the main grounds of a decision against the British Government, has here fallen into a very serious error. Instead of the guns and their carriages being brought, as he has imagined, from Hartlepool to Liverpool and there shipped, they were, in fact, in order to avoid suspicion, transmitted by railway, unknown to the authorities, from Liverpool to Hartlepool, a port on the opposite coast of England, and there shipped; so that, while the officers at Liverpool knew nothing of the shipment of the guns, the officers at Hartlepool knew nothing of the sailing of the Oreto. To this it may be added that, though Mr. Dudley was aware of the sailing of both the ships, and also of the transport of guns and munitions of war from Liverpool to Hartlepool by Fawcett and Co. to form part of the cargo of the Bahama, it never occurred to him to imagine that there was any connection between the two vessels. While he believed that the Oreto was about to proceed to the Mediterranean, his letters show that he believed that the guas and munitions of war sent to the Bahama were intended to run the blockade or be taken to Bermuda or Nassau, to be there transhipped for that purpose.

On the 7th of March he writes to Mr. Seward :-

"Some three weeks ago I was credibly informed that the same parties who had purchased the Herald had bought the steamer Bahanar, that they would load her with munitions of war for the so-called Southern Confederacy, and either run the blockade or else land her cargo at Bernauda and run it into Charleston on smaller vessels. I made inquiries to had her, and wrote to different Consulates without obtaining any information about her, or any vessel of that name. Yesterday, we discovered that Fawcett, Preston, and Co. were shipping, by rail, cases containing shells and shot, also case supposed to contain cannon and rifles, directed to 'Pickford and Co., West Hartlepool, for shipment per steamer Bahama, for Hamburgh.' This Hartlepool is the same place where the Bermuda, on her feet trip, received a portion of her eargo. I have written to the Consuls at Leeds and London, and will endeavour to learn something more about this business."*

On the 12th of March:-

"The Vice-Consul at Newcastle writes me that there is a steamer, called the Bahama, loading at West Hartle [60]. He no doubt will advise the department and give all the particulars in reference to her. Fawcett Preston, and Co are sending large quantities of munitions of war to this vessel; they have already sent from Liverpool 500 cases of shot and shells, upwards of 20 tons of caunon, and about 4 tons of gun-curriages. This vessel will either run the blockade or land her cargo at Bermuda or Nassau, and have it ferried over in smaller vessels."+

When Mr. Dudley himself had not the shadow of a suspicion that the guns sent over to Hartlepool to be loaded in the Bahama were intended for the Oreto, it would be unreasonable, even independently of the mistake I have adverted to, to expect that the Liverpool officers should have seen through the contrivance.

Now, indeed, we are enabled to see these things by the light of subsequent events and since-acquired knowledge. We now know that the Oreto was ordered by Bullock for the Confederate States, and that Bullock was an agent of those States. But at that time these facts were entirely unknown to Her Majesty's Government, and the first of them, at least, equally so to Mr. Dudley himself. Subsequent events have shown that the suspicions entertained by Mr. Dudley and others were well founded; but though these suspicions may have had more or less of probability, they were but suspicions, and were, therefore, incapable of being made practically available. It is easy to be wise after the event,—" Eventus stultorum magister," says the adage. The Tribunal must be on its guard against the impression likely to be produced by the adroit way in which, in the United States' pleadings, the story of these vessels is told without distinguishing what was formerly known, and what is now known about them. But, obviously, nothing can be more irrational or unjust than to say that Her Majesty's Government were bound to have seen things then as we see them now, or to seek the condemnation of the Oreto on such evidence as was then forthcoming, because subsequent events have made manifest what was then incapable of being proved.

The inability of Mr. Dudley to obtain any evidence as to the destination of the vessel becomes the more remarkable from the fact that, owing to an accident, an additional three weeks from the clearing out of the Oreto was afforded him for discovery. The vessel in going out, after she had cleared, sustained some injury, and n d d e a t

Notwithstanding this favourable circum ance Mr. De lley appears to have been unable to obtain any proof of the vessel being intended for the Confederate service.

The Florida.

At Liverpool.

On the 12th of March he writes to Mr. Seward:-

"The steam gun-boat Oreto put back into the river yesterday again. This is the third time she has come back. She is now anchored in the stream. I am quite anable to account for her conduct. She, no doubt, is either wniting for her guns or some person. I was told, some two weeks ago, that a see waiting for his arrival."*

Again, on the 15th he writes: - -

"The Oreto is still in the river, lying off Eggmont. She is evidently not ready for sea, and is waiting for her guns or else for some erson. I was informed yesterday that her guns are to be placed on board before she leaves this port; that they are to be boxed, taken over to Birkenhead, and there have communicated it to our Minister at London."

According to these letters, and that of the 5th of March, previously quoted, Mr. Dudley had addressed several communications to Mr. Adams on the subject deemed worthy of being submitted to Her Majesty's Government, for no communication was received from him. If Mr. Dudley was in possession of available information to Mr. Adams, or if such information was communicated acquainted with it, there would have been a want of "due diligence" on the part of these gentlemen renders such an imputation impossible.

On the 22nd of March, the day the Oreto actually sailed, Mr. Dudley writes thus to Mr. Adams:—

"The Oreto is still in the river. A flat boat has taken part of her armament to her. A part of the crew of the steamer Annie Childs, which came to this port loaded with cotton, have just left my office. They tell me that Captain Ballock is to command the Oreto, and that four other officers for this tessel came over with them in the Childs. The names of three are Young, Low, and Maffet or Mofiti, the fourth was called Eddy; the first two are lieutenants, and the two last named midshipmen. They at a place called Smithville, some 20 miles down the river from Wilmington; that it was talked about and understood by all on board that their object in coming was to take command of this vessel, which is being built in England for the Southern Confederacy. They further state that it was understood in Wilmington, before they left, that several war vessels were being built in England for the South. As they were coming up the river in the Childs, as they passed the Oreto, she dipped her flag to the Childs. I have had this last from several sources, and the additional fact that the same evening, after the arrival stand she will make direct for Madeira and Nassau."

Here was, indeed, information of importance, but unfortunately it came too late; nor was it communicated to the Government or to the local Authorities till the ship had sailed. Had Mr. Dudley, instead of contenting himself with writing to Mr. Adams, at once put the Collector of Customs in communication with the part of the crew of the Annie Childs to whom he refers in his letter, the statement thus made, had it appeared to be such as could be depended on, might have made it incumbent on that officer to detain the vessel. But this obvious course does not appear to have occurred to Mr. Dudley. He contented himself with writing to Mr. Adams. The opportunity was lost and the vessel left.

It is further to be observed that a considerable portion of this information turned out to be untrue. In what is stated in the foregoing letter as to Captain Bullock and four other officers being intended for the Oreto, Mr. Dudley was again misled by his informants, whose names as usual are not given. Only one of these parties, a Mr. Low, went out in her. Her master and erew were English, and shipped, as we have seen, for the voyage to Palermo and Jamaiea.

On the 25th of March, having received Mr. Dudley's letter of the 22nd, Mr. Adams, for the first time since his letter of the 18th of February, a period of five weeks, again writes to Earl Russell on the subject of the Orcto:—

 ^{*} United States' Documents, vol. vi, p. 223.
 † United States' Documents, vol. vi, p. 228; British Appendix, vol. i, p. 5.

The Florida. At Liverpool. " My Lord,

"I have the honour to submit to your consideration the copy of a letter received from the Consul of the United States at Liverpool, touching the case of the steam gun-boat Oreto, which I have already made the subject of a communication some time ago. It is with great reluctance that I am driven to the conviction that the representations made to your Lordship of the purposes and destination of that vessel were delusive, and that though at first it may have been intended for service in Sicily, yet that such an intention has been long since abandoned in fact, and the pretence has been held up only the hetter to conceal the true object of the parties engaged. That object is to make war on the United States. All the persons thus far known to be most connected with the undertaking are either directly employed by the insurgents in the United States of America, or residents of Great Britain notoriously in sympathy with and giving aid and comfort to them on this side of the water."

The letter, which is of considerable length, then quits the subject of the Oreto. and goes into the question of the assistance derived by the insurgent States from England. It is so far important to the present purpose, that it shows that, while making general complaints on the part taken by British subjects in what was going on, Mr. Adams had no specific complaint to make on the score of the Oreto. He nowhere complains of the Oreto not having been seized, nor had he ever called upon the Government to seize her; nor has his complaint reference to the insufficiency of the existing municipal law to meet such a case as that of the Oreto; the complaint relates to the assistance derived by the Confederates from Great Britain in other ways-such as blockade-running and importation of contraband of war and other articles-and not to the special subject of the Oreto, or the Foreign Enlistment Act.

At this time Her Majesty's Government were not aware that the Oreto had, in fact. sailed. Earl Russell, therefore, on receiving the letter of Mr. Adams of the 25th immediately directed that the Treasury and Customs should be requested to take such steps as might be necessary to ascertain whether the Oreto was equipped for the purpose of making war on the United States, and if that fact could be proved, to detain the vessel. He informed Mr. Adams that he had done so. In reply to the general complaints of Mr. Adams, he observes :--

"You have not yourself hitherto furnished me with evidence that any vessel has received a hostile or warlike equipment in British waters, which has been afterwards used against the United States. The care that was taken to prevent the warlike equipment of the Nashville in British waters must be familiar to your recollection.";

The reference to the Commissioners of Customs led to the following report of April the 4th:-

"Your Lordships having referred to us the annexed letter from Mr. Hammond, transmitting, by desire of Earl Russell, a copy of a further letter, addressed by the United States' Consul at Liverpool to Mr. Adams, the United States' Minister at this Court, in which it is again affirmed that the Oreto is being fitted out as a vessel of war for the Southern Confederacy, and various statements are reported in support of that assertion, and requesting that your Lordships would instruct this Board to give directions that the Oreto might be vigilantly watched, and that, if any armament prohibited by the Foreign Enlistment Act should be discovered, the vessel might be at once detained;

"We report-

"That, on the receipt of your Lordships' reference, we directed our Collector at Liverpool image diately to inquire into the further allegations, made in regard to the Oreto, and to govern himself in accordance with the instructions contained in Mr. Hammond's letter, and, having received the report of the Collector, we find that the vessel in question was registered on the 3rd ultimo, in the name of John Henry Thomas, of Liverpool, as sole owner; that she cleared on the following day for Palerno and Januaica in ballast, but did not sail until the 22nd, the day on which the American Consul's letter is dated, having a crew of fifty-two men, all British, with the exception of three or four, one of whom only was an American. She had no gunpowder, nor even a single gun, and no colours, saving Maryatt's Code of Signals and a British ensign, nor any goods on board except the stores enumerated on the accompanying copy of her victualling bill.

With regard to the statements in the letter of the Consul, the Collector further reports that it is clear the passengers brought by the Annie Childs, the vessel therein mentioned, which has recently arrived from one of the Southern States, were not intended to form any portion of the crew of the Orefo inasmuch as they were still in Liverpool, and that the dipping of the ensign on board the latter vessel on the arrival of the Annie Childs, as far as the Collector had been enabled to ascertain, was intended as a compliment to one of the Cunard steamers and another vessel which saluted the Annie Childs on her arrival, the masters of the several vessels being known to one another. "Tho. F. FREMANTLE. (Signed)

It further appears from statements made afterwards in Au ust 1862 by the officers of Customs at Liverpool, when evidence was being collected to be used in the proceedings instituted against the Oreto at Nassau, that those officers never lost sight of the Oreto to the time of her final departure; and it also appears, from their statement and that of the pilot, who took the vessel out of the Mersey, that her condition was to the last wholly incompatible with any present purpose of war :-

Statement of Mr. Edward Morgan,

"I am one of the Surveyors of Customs at this port. Pursuant to instructions I received from the Collector on the 21st of February in the present year and at subsequent dates, I visited the steamer Oreto at various times, when she was being litted out in the dock, close to the yard of Messrs, Miller and Sons, the builders of the vessel. On one occasion I was alongside of her, and spoke to Mr. Parry, the pilot, and the chief mate. Upon the facts to which I have been referring, it seems to me impossible to enterlain a serious doubt that if the cause had been brought into a Court of Justice, the ease of the Government must have broken down hopelessly, and the vessel must have been forthwith released. In discussing the legal questions bearing on this part of the ease, I have already given my reasons for thinking, that under such circumstances a Government would not be justified in instituting legal proceedings. I reiterate that opinion here. I think it would have been useless, and therefore wrong, to seize, and take proceedings to condemn, the Oreto.

The deficiency of proof, up to the time of the departure of the Florida from Liverpool, as to the vessel being intended for the Confederate States, is now sought to be made good by a general and sweeping statement as to the "notoriety" of the fact. "All the facts about the Florida," it is said, "and about the hostile expedition which it was proposed to make against the United States, were open and notorious at Liverpool." + Of course nothing is more easy than to make a general assertion of this kind; but such an assertion ought not to be made without some evidence to support it. The only proofs to which we are referred, are the dispatches of Mr. Dudley during the period in question; but having gone carefully through these despatches, almost all of which I have hereinbefore set out, I find nowhere any reference whatsoever to the "notoriety" which, on the authority of these dispatches, is thus boldly asserted to have existed. I find, however, strong proof of the contrary in the statement of Mr. Dudley himself, as to the great secreey that was maintained about the vessel, and his consequent inability to obtain any "definite information" concerning her, as well as in the fact that in all his statements respecting her he seldom adduced any definite or specific information, which did not afterwards turn out to be incorrect. The British Government is therefore, as it seems to me, well warranted in asking, Where is the proof of these assertions? Where is the proof that even the American Consul at Liverpool, whose activity in hunting for secret information appears to have been indefatigable, and to whom every one resorted who had information to disclose, knew of the contract with Bullock, or of the dispatch, cargo, and destination of the Bahama? And if he knew them, why did he not either communicate his knowledge, and the proofs in his possession, to the British Government, or himself lay an information on oath against the ship?*

^{*} British Case, p. 58; British Appendix, vol. i, p. 34. † Case of the United States, p. 335.

But there is an important fact, which appears to me conclusive to disprove the alleged notoriety thus positively asserted. The erew of the Oreto had shipped at Liverpool for what they believed to be a mercantile voyage to Palermo and Jamaica. By the time they had arrived at Nassau, they began to suspect the true character of the vessel, and that she was intended for a vessel of war for the Confederate States, whereupon they refused to continue in her, and insisted on their discharge. It is plain that these men, coming from the port of Liverpool, had been wholly unaware of what is now represented to have been there matter of open notoriety. No one, acquainted with the habits of seamen, and aware of the interest this class of men take in the character of a vessel in which they are about to ship for a long voyage, can be credulous enough to believe, upon the mere credit of an assertion unsupported by proof, that a crew of fifty men could have shipped on board of this vessel in utter ignorance of a fact alleged to have been notorious to every one at the port; and which, if known to them, would, as the sequel showed, at once have deterred them from taking service in her? It is impossible to believe in anything so unlikely.

But even if this alleged notoriety lad existed, it would have availed nothing towards proof of the facts to be established. If facts are notorious, they can the more readily be proved. But if notoriety rests, not on proof capable of being adduced, but on common talk and rumour, evidence of such notoriety is inadmissible in an English Court. It would have availed the Government nothing to allege that the destination of the Oreto to the Confederate service was matter of notoriety at Liverpool, even had the fact that such notoriety existed been true, which, however, appears not to have been the case.

The substance of the facts to be gathered from the correspondence, as stated in the British Counter-Case, appears to me, after a careful examination, to be so accurately stated, that I have no hesitation in transcribing it and giving the sanction of my confirmation:—

"It is clear that Mr. Dudley himself was in ignorance of the facts which, in the Case of the United States, are asserted to have been open and notorious to all. His attention had been called to the Florida, then in the builder's yard, as early as November 1861. On the 24th January, 1862, he writes that 'she is reported for the Italian Government,' but the fact of the machinery being supplied by Fawcett and Preston, and other circumstances, make him 'suspicious,' and cause him to believe she is intended for the South. On the 4th February the circumstances are still 'somewhat suspicious' 'There is much secrecy observed about her, and I have been unable to get anything definite, but my impressions are strong that she is intended for the Southern Confederacy. I have communicated my impressions and all the facts to Mr. Adams, our Minister in London.' At that moment the ship was taking in her coal; and 'appearances indicate,' he wrote, 'that she will leave here the latter part of this week He makes, however, no representation to the Government, nor does Mr. Adams make any. On the 12th he writes to Mr. Seward that everything he sees and hears confirms him in the belief that the vessel is intended for the Confederacy; but he mentions no fact, except that Miller (the builder) had said that Fawcett, Preston and Co. gave him the contract. Still no representation is made. On the 17th, he has 'obtained information from many different sources,' which 'goes to show' that she is intended for the Confederate States. Nevertheless, the solitary fact mentioned is that Fawcett, Preston and Co. are said to be the owners, with the addition that advances are said to have been made to them and to Miller by Fraser, Trenholm, and Co. Afterwards he tells Mr. Seward that he has 'no doubt,' and has 'positive evidence, that she is for the South; and, on the 5th March, that two persons in the employ of Fawcett, Preston and Co. had said so. But up to the time when she left Liverpool, his correspondence nentions not a single circumstance proving, or tending to prove, for what purpose she was intended, hentions not a single circumstance proving, or tending to prove, for what purpose she was intended, hentiorious fact' that she had been ordered by Bullock he is evidently quite unacquainted. As to the Bahama, so far is he from being aware of the 'notorious fact' that she was about to take out the Bahama, so far is he from being aware of the 'notorious fact' that she was about to take out the Florida's armament, that up to the 6th March he is making fruitless inquiries about that vessel, and can obtain no information about her, or any vessel of that name. But it is said that Her Majesty's Government ought not to have remained satisfied with the inquiry made by its officers; that it should have pushed its inquiries further; and that had it done so with due diligence, it might have obtained means to establish the fact of the Oreto being intended for the Confederate service. But we are not told where such further inquiry could or should have been made, or where this supposed eridence could have been obtained. We know from Mr. Dudley that the greatest secrecy was observed, so that even he could discover nothing definite. The secret would, of course, be confined to a very few persons; and though surmise and conjecture may have soon sprung up and given rise to the rumours and pretended information which found their way to Mr. Dudley, the persons really possessed of the secret would be little likely to reveal it. However pressing the inquiry, the same story would in all probability have been persisted in. The builders had already been applied to, and had given an apparently satisfactory answer. Mr. Adams himself appears (from his letter of the 25th of March) to have believed at one time that the vessel might at first have been intended for service in Sieily, and that such an intention had afterwards been abandoned. The firm by whom she had been built was a respectable one, and it could hardly be assumed that they would knowingly lend their names to an intentionally false statement. It is now plain that the statement then made was untrue; but there was no reason to believe so then. Possibly the firm were themselves misled. Mr. Thomas and the Palermo firm may have been introduced for the purpose of deceiving Miller and Sons into the belief that in building the vessel they were doing nothing wrong. Be this as it may, the question is what means the Government then had of knowing or discovering that the Oreto was not meant for the firm of Thomas Brothers of Palermo, but for a belligerent State. Of whom else is it suggested that the authorities could have inquired and ascertained the truth?

It may be said that it would have been better if the Government had again telegraphed to the British Minister in Italy, but a period of upwards of a month had elapsed since anything had been heard from Mr. Adams about the Oreto; the vessel was still unarmed, nor had the Government reason to suppose she was about to leave. It may, perhaps, he said that inquiry should have been made of Faweett, Preston, and Co.; and I agree that it would have been better if that course had been taken, but I greatly doubt whether it would have produced any other answer than that which had been given by Miller and Sons.

It must not be forgotten that the persons who carried information, more or less entitled to credit, to Mr. Dudley, communicated with him in confidence and insisted on secrecy. Mr. Dudley more than once states that the information having been given in confidence he is not at liberty to disclose the names of his informers. It is obvious that these parties would not be likely to give similar information to the Authorities, who certainly would not have treated it as confidential. While aspersions are east on the officers for omitting to make inquiry, I look in vain for a suggestion as to where such inquiry should have been made.

And here it is necessary to point out what perhaps will appear strange to those who are unacquainted with English procedure, which in this respect is identical with that of America; namely, that persons against whom a prosecution, or proceeding to recover penalties, is either pending or about to be instituted, cannot be interrogated; nor, if persons are called on to give evidence as witnesses, can any questions be put to them which have a tendency to implicate them in any breach of the law.

Still less is it in the power of the Government to institute any compulsory inquiry with a view to establish a breach of the law, except according to regular process of law; or to search a person's premises, or to insist on explanations from persons suspected of having committed an offence against the law. The Government had, therefore, no possible means of obtaining information, except from those who might be voluntarily disposed to give it. If Mr. Dudley had opened any of his secret sources of information, supposing him really to have possessed such, a clue to the truth might possibly have been discovered; but he kept them to himself, and those who were ready to furnish information to him kept aloof from imparting it to the Anthorities.

Lastly, there is not in England, any more than in America, any system of espionage

The Florida. At Liverpool. or secret police to pry into men's secret actions or obtain information for the Government by underhand and unworthy means.

Can it be contended that Great Britain should have abandoned principles and rules of public conduct, hitherto held sacred, for the benefit of other nations embarked in quarrels and wars in which she herself had no concern-at all events before experience had shown that her existing law was insufficient?

When, therefore, a member of this Tribunal states as the principal ground of a judgment adverse to Great Britain that, notwithstanding the complaints of Mr. Adams, the English Authorities did not take the initiative; that they did not insist on its being proved what was the true destination of the ship, who was the true owner, who had given the orders for it, and who was to pay for it; and did not insist on the true position of Fraser, Trenholm, and Co. being shown by legal proof, or upon being positively informed as to the crew of the vessel, I am at a loss to know whether he means that the law of England was such as that the Government could have exercised the powers which he says they ought to have used, or whether he means to say that Great Britain ought to have changed the tenor of her law and the course of her procedure, before the necessity of such a charge had become apparent, simply because war had broken out between the Northern and Southern States of the American Union. If the former, the proposition appears to me untenable; if the latter, I must be allowed to express my regret that Great Britain should have to suffer by reason of a judgment founded upon an apparent misconception of her law.

If it is really meant to be said that Great Britain is to be held responsible because her law ought to have been other than it was, and ought to have been such as to give power to the Excentive to insist on proof of the innocent destination of this vessel, and to detain her till such proof was given, or to enable it to exercise inquisitorial powers as to her character, I fall back on the position I asserted some time since, and say that not only could no such thing reasonably be expected, but that, inasmuch as the Government of the United States possessed no such power-for their assertion that they did possess it, is, as I have shown, but a pretence—and therefore, if the position of the two Governments had been reversed, could not have done for Great Britain what they now say Great Britain should have done for the benefit of the United States, they can have no claim in justice or equity for such an exercise of power on the part of the British Government.

After a careful review of the whole case, my opinion is that upon the then existing state of facts, and with the amount of evidence they then possessed, Her Majesty's Government were guilty of no want of due diligence in suffering the Oreto to leave the port of Liverpool, and, on the contrary, would not have been justified in detaining her.

Further, I am of opinion that Her Majesty's Government were not wanting in due diligence in not procuring the evidence necessary to insure the condemnation of the Oreto, for the simple reason that I am satisfied that there were no means whatever in their power of obtaining it.

I am very far from saying that officers to whom is committed the duty of guarding against any infraction of this part of the law are justified in considering themselves merely as the recipients of evidence to be furnished by the Agent of a belligerent Government, and that they may remain inactive till the latter has made out a complete case against a vessel, as to which a violation of the Foreign Enlistment Act is suspected to have taken place. If reasonable grounds of suspicion appear, it becomes their duty to make inquiry, according to the best of their ability, and to take active measures to prevent a breach of the law. On the other hand, it is the duty of a foreign Agent, if information comes to his knowledge of which the Authorities are not possessed, to set them in motion, and to aid them in their proceedings, more especially if he happens to have access to secret sources of information not open to them. Here Mr. Dudley either had information which could be made available, or he had not. If he had, he ought to have given the Authorities some clue whereby they might have got at the truth. Had he informed them, or Mr. Adams, of the facts which, transmitted to Mr. Seward alone, became useless, inquiries might have been instituted which might have led to the detention of the vessel. If Mr. Dudley had available information and neglected to communicate it in the proper quarter, the fault was his, and Her Majesty's Government ought not to be held responsible for the default of an Agent of the United States, when the latter are seeking damages at their hands. If he, with his superior opportunities, was unable to obtain such information, it ought not to be imputed to the Authorities as negligence that they were unable to do better.

The Florida.

At Liverpool.

There was not evidence on which to seize this vessel and to ask for her condemnation under the Foreign Enlistment Act.

There were no means of obtaining such evidence except by the exercise of inquisitorial powers which the Government did not possess,

It was not incumbent on the Government of Great Britain to ask for, or on Parliament to grant, powers inconsistent with the established principles of British law and government and with the general institutions of the country.

It cannot properly be imputed to the Government, as want of due diligence, that it did not endeavour to obtain such powers when the existing law had hitherto proved

It would be in the highest degree inequitable and unjust to hold the contrary in favour of the United States, when the law of the latter was substantially, if not absolutely, the same as that of Great Britain, and therefore could have afforded no more efficacious means of prevention than that of Great Britain,

I pass on to what may be termed the second stage in the history of this vessel, At Nassau, namely, the events which took place on her arrival at the Bahamas.

Having left Liverpool on the 22nd of March, she arrived at Nassau on the 28th of April.* On the 29th she quitted the part of the harbour which is adjacent to the town of Nassau, and proceeded to Cochrane's Auchorage, a station distant from the town about fifteen miles. It was stated that this was done by the advice of the pilot who had charge of her, for the reason that there was not room for her in the harbour; † but it is probable that this was only a pretext.

Ten days afterwards, namely, on the 9th of May, Mr. Whiting, the Consul of the United States at Nassau, writes to Mr. Bayley, the Governor of the Bahamas, as "I have the honour to communicate to your Excellency several facts of importance, deeming it to be my duty so to do, as Representative of the Government of the United States of America.

"The tug Fanny Lewis, which arrived here from Liverpool on the 6th instant, has on board, I am credibly informed by letters received from that port, a large quantity of powder for the rebel States of America, or for the so-called Confederate States.

"On the 28th ultimo the steamer Oreto also arrived off this port from Liverpool, and now lies at Cochrane's Anchorage, where, it is believed, and so reported by many residents here, that she is being prepared and fitted out as a Confederate privateer, to prey on the commerce of the United States of rica. "I inclose for your Excellency's perusal a slip from the Wilmington North Carolina paper of the 20th April.

"I cannot but think that your Excellency will consider it proper that some inquiry should be made, to ascertain how far the vessels alluded to are preserving the strict neutrality so carnestly enjoined by Her Majesty's late Proclamation, and I am confident that I pay but a deserved tribute to your Excellency's high character when I express my firm belief that no illegal steps will be allowed to those who seek to subvert the Government which I have the honour to represent."

As the Colonial authorities of the Bahamas, including, of course, the Governor and his legal adviser, have, in the Case of the United States, been publicly accused of "open partiality to the cause of the South," and of having been "actively friendly to the insurgents," and it is directly imputed to them that, in the course they pursued with reference to the Oreto, they were induced by these motives to depart from what would have been the line of conduct which a sense of duty would have prescribed, I deem it no more than is due to absent men, whose honour is thus impugned, to call particular attention to the correspondence which passed on this subject and to the facts which actually occurred.

On the receipt of Mr. Whiting's letter, the Governor requested an immediate report from the Receiver-General of the Colony as to the truth of the allegations contained in it, and received from him the following reply, dated the same day:-$

^{*} British Appendix, vol. i, p. 58.

The Florida. At Nassau

" The British steamer Oreto entered at this office on the 28th April from Liverpool (England) in ballast. She did not enter the harbour, and now lies at Cochrane's Anchorage, and I have no information as to her future proceedings.

"The British brig Fanny Lewis entered 7th May from Liverpool with "assorted cargo, not to be landed." She now lies near Potter's Cay, and I am confident that she has not transferred any part of her cargo, as no permission to do so has been asked, and without a permit she would be subject to a heavy penalty. I cannot tell whether she has any powder on board, as no such article is mentioned in the manifest.

The matter was at once referred by the Governor to the Attorney-General of the Colony in the usual course. The Attorney-General, on the same 9th of May, reported as follows :-

" Assuming the cargo of the Fanny Lewis to be such as stated by the United States' Consul, it is nevertheless one that can legally be imported here from the United Kingdom, and its future presumed destination does not invest it with any character of illegality which calls for, or would authorize any action with respect to it on the part of the Executive or other authorities of the Colony.

2. With respect to the Oreto, the Consul's allegation is to the effect that it is believed and reported by many residents here that she is being prepared and fitted out where she now lies at Cochranes Anchorage, which is within the limits of the port of Nassau, as a Confederate privateer. Now if such is the fact, an offence against the Foreign Enlistment Act has been committed, all parties implicated in which are liable to be criminally proceeded against for misdemeanor, and the vessel may be seized by any naval or revenue officer; but to justify proceedings either against the parties or the vessel, the matter must not rest on repute or belief alone, but the authorities must have positive facts to ground their proceedings on, and unless the Consul can adduce such, or they can be obtained through other channels, no steps can be taken either for the arrest of the vessel, or those on board of her. "G. C. Anderson."* (Signed)

The Attorney-General was perfectly right on both points. The Governor had no power to prevent a merchant-vessel, such as the Fanny Lewis, with cargo, from attempting to run the blockade; he had no power to seize or interfere with a vessel as for a breach of the Foreign Enlistment Act, unless it could be shown not only that she was equipped for war, but also that she was destined for the service of a belligerent.

Upon the latter point, evidence was at this time wholly wanting, and therefore, so far, all was right. At a later period the circumstances became materially altered.

On the 9th of May, Governor Bayley wrote officially to Adderley and Co., a mercantile firm at Nassau, who were the consignees of the Oreto, notifying to them that, "if they were arming or putting arms on board that vessel, he should enforce the rules laid down in Her Majesty's Proclamation; as, in such case, looking to the description of the vessel, he must infer that she was a vessel of war intended to act against the United States;" adding that, "as Her Majesty's Government had expressed their deliberate intention of observing and enforcing neutrality in the Queen's possessions, he should use his strongest efforts to prevent either of the belligerent Powers from arming or equipping vessels of war in that port."+

The reply of Adderley and Co. appeared quite satisfactory. In positive terms they say, "We beg to state, for the information of his Excellency the Governor, that we have neither attempted to arm or put arms on board of the British steamer Oreto, consigned to our firm; nor are we aware of there being any intention on the part of the owners to arm that vessel."

So matters remained till the 28th of the month, when Commander McKillop, then commanding Her Majesty's ship Bulldog in the port of Nassau wrote to the Governor as follows :-

"Several steamers having anchored at Cochrane's Anchorage, I sent an officer yesterday to visit them and muster their crews, and ascertain what they were and how employed.

"The officer reports that one steamer, the Orcto, is apparently fitting and preparing for a vessel of war; under these circumstances, I would suggest that she should come into the harbour of Nassau to prevent any misunderstanding as to her equipping in this port, contrary to the Foreign Enlistment Act, as a privateer or war-vessel."$

On receipt ϵ this letter the Governor desired the advice of the Attorney-General as to whether he had power, in point of law, to order the removal of the vessel from her then anchorage to Nassau, a question about which he might well entertain serious doubts. Thereupon that officer reported as follows :-

"Any British or foreign trading-vessel has a right, in carrying on her lawful commercial pursuits,

This brings me to the question whether there removal of the vessel from her present position. The information amounts to this, that the Senior Naval Officer on the station has officially reported to the Governor that 'this vessel is apparently fitting and Officer on the station has omerany reported to the Governor that 'this vessel is apparently utting and preparing for a vessel of war;' or, as stated in your note of yesterday, has the appearance of a privateer some overt act, such as the placing of arms or other munitions of war on board of the vessel without the sanction of the Revenue Department, or some such similar act, evidencing an intention on the part of the persons in charge of the vessel to fit her out as a vessel of war to be employed in the service of a the persons in energe of the vesser to be her our as a vesser of war to be employed in the service of a against a possible infraction of the law, could not be justified. Such removal would, in fact, constitute againse a possinio intraction of the law, count not be justined. Such removal would, in fact, constitute a 'seizure,' which the parties making would be responsible for in damages unless they could show a legal justification, which must be based upon something beyond mere suspicion; but while mere legal justification, which must be based upon something beyond mere suspicion; our while mere suspicion is not sufficient to authorize the course of proceeding indicated in your letter, it is certainly suspicion is not same an example the course of proceeding managed in your fetter, it is certainly sufficient to call for precantionary measures, such as I advised in respect of this very vessel in my minute on the Receiver-General's letter referred to me by the Governor two or three days since, namely, that the Receiver-General should, under the powers of his office, place a Revenue officer on board of her to watch the proceedings of the parties on board, in order that if any actual contravention of the law to water the processing of the parties one reported, and prompt measures taken by seizure of the vessel and otherwise to punish all parties implicated therem."*

So far, the opinion given by the Attorney-General was perfectly sound.

The letter of the Receiver-General here referred to was one dated the 26th of May, in which that officer stated that he had every reason to believe that the consignees of the vessel intended shipping large quantities of arms and munitions of war as cargo, and might probably apply for permission to tranship cargo to her from other vessels

In a letter to the Colonial Sceretary of the next day (May 30), the Attorney-General writes :-

"Any act of arming, or any attempt to arm a vessel in contravention of the Imperial Statute, commonly known as the Foreign Enlistment Act, will subject the vessel to seizure; and it is quite commonly known as the Foreign Edinsthent Act, will subject the vessel to seizure; and it is quito immaterial in what manner the violation of the law is ascertained, or by whose testimony it is established, the only necessary requirement being that the facts testified to should be such as would be received in a Court of Law as legal proof of the violation of the Statute sought to be established.".

Having received the Attorney-General's report, the Governor, on the 2nd of June, thus writes to Commander McKillop:-

"I may say that it is quite impossible that the Oreto, or any other vessel, should be allowed to am herself for belligerent purposes within the jurisdiction of the harbour.

"The Oreto is registered as a British vessel, and carries the British flag. Therefore she would be a property of the property of guilty of piracy if, without changing her British nationality, she equipped herself as a vessel of warand were she to change her nationality and to be equipped for the service of either of two belligerent States, with both of whom Great Britain is at peace, she would, under the directions of Her Majesty's Government, be precluded from remaining more than twenty-four consecutive hours in our harbour.

But masmuch as it is not yet proved beyond doubt that the Oreto is a vessel of war, and as it is just possible that she may be only a merchant-ship, taking arms and implements of war solely for exportation, it is desirable that a more special and minute examination of her conditions and equipexponential in it is desirable character into a more special and minute examination of her conductors and equipment should be made before she can be treated as a pirate, a privateer, or foreign man-of-war arming within our waters; for, whilst it would be in contravention of the Foreign Enlistment Act to arm an English vessel for the service of a foreign belligerent Power, and contrary to the positive orders of the Queen's Government to allow a vessel of war belonging either to the Federal or Confederate Government to arm herself in an English port, it would be equally illegal on our part to seize a merchantvessel honestly and exclusively employed in the shipment of cargo for the purpose of commerce.

"Therefore I request that you will take such steps as in your professional opinion seem best for the purpose of ascertaining the true character of the Oreto, and the nature of her equipment; and, if after inspecting her guns, her crew, and the general disposition of the vessel, you are convinced that she is in reality a man of war or privateer arming herself here, then it will become your duty either to coarse, to remove your own ship to Cochrane's Anchorage, and there watch her proceedings from

The Florida. At Nassau.

"I should much regret to disarrange your plans in any way, or to impose on you any irksome duty, and I hope the necessity of either may be averted. But I am sure you will concur with me in thinking that all considerations (except that of affording due protection to the harbour) must give way to the obligation of observing the strictest neutrality in our dealings with the two contending American federations, and carrying out the Queen's orders with the most perfect good faith."

Can it be doubted that the Governor in thus writing was acting according to an honest sense of duty?

It appears that about this time a man of the name of Jones, who had come out as boatswain of the Oreto, together with two of the erew, having got on shore, had refused to return to the vessel; whereupon, he and his companions had been, at the instance of the captain, apprehended and sent to prison, as having deserted from a British vessel, This man, Jones, put himself in communication with Mr. Whiting, the United States' Consul. On the 4th of June Mr Whiting forwarded to the Governor the following letter from Jones to himself:-

" Nassan Prison, June 4, 1862. "Sir,
"The ship I am from is the Oreto, built by W. C. Miller, in Liverpool, after the model of the English navy gue-boats, with magazine, shot-lockers, ports and bolts for twenty guns. Everything is rigged, and ready for mounting; even all the articles necessary for seamen, such as hammocks, bedding rigged, and ready for moduling, even at the artists in the series in short, she is a perfect man-of-war. Captain, James kettles and pans, with three years' provisions. In short, she is a perfect man-of-war. Captain, James Duguid; chief officer, William Duggin; second officer, — Hudson; 1, Sir, was third officer and boat. swain; the chief steward and purser, who refused duty, are in jail here."+

This letter only confirmed what was already known, namely, the capacity of the vessel for the purpose of war. No evidence of her belligerent destination was afforded in it, or in the report of Commander McKillop to the Governor of the 6th of June, wherein he says that he "has visited the serew-steamer Oreto and examined her, and that she is fitted out in every way for war purposes,-magazines, shell-rooms, and other fittings, totally at variance with the character of a merchant vessel. She has no guns or ammunition on board. The captain does not deny that she is intended for a war vessel."

On this, taking the same view as before, the Attorney-General reports:-

"There are no facts set forth in the within letter which would, in my opinion, authorize the seizure of the Oreto. They constitute only circumstances of suspicien, which, if coupled with some actual overt act, would doubtless materially strengthen the case against the vessel, but which do not in themselves form a ground of seizure."

In a note of the 8th of June, Commander McKillop again adverts to the warlike character of this vessel, and states his opinion "that she was not capable of taking in any cargo, having no stowage; adding that, should she take in guns or ammunition, he should consider it his duty to seize her."

On the 12th of June Mr. Whiting again calls the attention of the Governor to the Oreto. "One of las officers," he says-I presume he refers to Jones, the boatswain-"testifies to her warlike character and equipment, with everything that marks a vessel of war-ports, magazines, shot-lockers, &c. He avers that shells were transferred from the steamer Hero to the Oreto at Cochrane's Anchorage, an act which, I suppose, would warrant her seizure and detention. The steamer Melita, from England, landed here last Sunday Captain Semmes and officers of the pirate Sumter, and I have no doubt they are here to join the Oreto and pursue their maritime depredations."

The Colonial Secretary replies:-

"His Excellency has been assured by the agents of the Oreto that it is their intention to clear her in ballast for Havana; and he has received from the Treasurer (as Collector of the Colonial Customs) an application to give her this clearance, an application to which he has accorded his assent "His Excellency has, therefore, no right to assume that she is now equipping herself, or will leave this port equipped, as a privateer.

"While his Excellency is bound by his instructions to observe the strictest neutrality between the United States and the Confederate States of North America, he has no power whatever to act on general suspicion or hearsay. He is bound to give the twenty-four hours' notice to any known privater or man-of-war belonging to either of the belligerent States which may put into this port for indispensable supplies, but he is not bound to detain or obstruct any vessels professing to be engaged on a commercial voyage, unless he has evidence strong enough to satisfy the Caurt of Admiralty that she is in fact a belligerent vessel, proceeding on a belligerent mission.

It would appear that, in the first days of June, the consignees of the Oreto had applied to the Receiver-General of the Colony for permission to load the vessel with eargo for a voyage to St. John's, New Brunswick, that port being the usual destination for which vessels intending to run the blockade ostensibly cleared. The Receiver-General, before acceding to this request, referred the matter to the Governor. The permission to ship the cargo was granted, but, in consequence of the suspicions attaching to the vessel, the following order was at the same time adopted by the Governor in Council on

"At an Executive Council his Excellency the Governor, with the advice of the Board, was pleased to make the following Order:-"I. That the Oreto, if practicable, should take in her cargo within the port of Nassau.

2. That if, however, it be found impracticable, from the depth of water in port or otherwise, that she cannot conveniently take in her cargo within the port, then that she be permitted to do so at Cochrane's Anchorage, under the direct supervision of officers of the Revenue Department, to be specially appointed to the propagation of the suspicions which have arisen respecting the character of the Oreto, it is advisable that a British vessel of war should remain at Cochrane's Anchorage, in the immediate an is navisable that a price of the Oreto, while she is taking in eargo, and to prevent such vessel being detained at the anchorage an inconveniently long time, there be imposed as a condition, for the permission for the Oreto to load without the port, that she complete her lading at Cochrane's Anchorage, within a period to be designated by the Chief Officer of the Revenue Department.

His Excellency was further pleased to direct that a copy of the foregoing Order be furnished to the Receiver-General and Treasurer, and the Commander of Her Majesty's ship Bulldog, respectively,

This order having been communicated to the consignees, the latter determined to remove the Oreto from Cochrane's Anchorage to the port of Nassau, which she entered on the 7th of June. On the 9th she commenced taking in empty shells as cargo, of which upwards of 400 boxes were shipped.‡

In deference, however, as it seems, to the desire of the Governor, the consignees changed their purpose, and determined to clear the vessel in ballast for Havana, and the shells were therefore discharged.§

In the meantime Mr. Whiting continued his communications with Jones, and on the 13th June drew up the statements of the latter in the form of an affidavit, in which all that had taken place since the vessel had left Liverpool was detailed, and the true character of the vessel placed beyond a doubt.

The following is the affidavit:-

" I, the Undersigned, Edward Jones, late third officer of the steamer Oreto, do solemnly swear to the following facts, viz.:

1. That, on the 3rd day of March, 1862, I shipped on board the steamer Oreto at Liverpool, as boatswain; the articles specifying that 'the vessel was bound to the port of Palermo, thence, if required, to any port in the Mediterranean or the West Indies, and back to a final port of discharge in the United Kingdom; the term of service not to exceed six months.

"2. That the Oreto was expressly built for a man-of-war, and was said to be destined for the King of Sardinia; that she has twenty ports, magazine of 50 tons' capacity, shot-lockers, &c., &c.; that on her passage to this port, breechings and gun-tackles were litted and everything got in readiness for mounting guns.

"3. That the Oreto was supplied with two suits of sails, spare wire rigging, a large quantity of provisions, said to be sufficient for three years' supply for seventy-five men, &c., &c.

"4. That after leaving the channel the courses were frequently altered, and that my suspicions are the lower true destination as a rehel privateer, and I refused duty; that on the were then aroused as to her true destination as a rebel privateer, and I refused duty; that on the dairty-fifth day out, we anchored off the port of Nassau, New Providence, Bahamas, and the next day proceeded to Cochrane's Anchorage; that soon after 1 left the Oreto, and was imprisoned as a deserter at Massau, for two weeks, when, after sending a petition to the Governor, I was at last released.

"5, I also testify to the fact that, for several nights prior to our arrival at Nassau, the lights on board the Oreto were ordered to be put out, and the smoke-stacks were reefed, while look-outs were kept at the mast-heads, and great anxiety was manifested and expressed by the officers lest they should fall in with American craisers.

"I do also solemnly swear that the Oreto is, to my certain knowledge, owned by the so-called Confederate States of North America," and that she is intended for one of their men-of-war, or armed privateers; which facts I stated in my petition to Governor Bayley while I was in prison at Nassau."

Mr. Whiting committed the unpardonable mistake of sending off this affidavit to Mr. Seward, instead of making it known to the local Government.

In the meantime, Captain McKillop having gone on other service, his place had been taken by Captain Hickley of Her Majesty's ship Greyhound. On the 10th of June Captain Hickley, having previously had a conversation with the Governor and the Attorney-General, relative to the Oreto taking in warlike stores for the purpose of becoming an armed vessel, and perceiving lighters alongside of her, went with competent surveying officers to examine her; after which he and the other officers made the following report:-

" On going on board the Oreto this morning, the captain informed me that the crew had refused to get the anchor up until they could be certain as to where the ship was going, as they did not know what might become of them after leaving port, and that the Oreto was a suspicious vessel. I then proceeded round her decks to note her fittings, &c., and to ascertain whether she had any warlike stores on board for her own equipment, and I have the honour to make the following Report:

That the Oreto is in every respect fitted as a man-of-war, on the principle of the dispatch gun-vessels in Her Majesty's Naval Service.

That she has a crew of fifty men, and is capable of earrying two pivot-guns amidships and four broadside both forward and aft, the ports being made to 'ship and unship,' port bars, breeching, side tackle, bolts, &c.

"That she has shell-rooms, a magazine and light-rooms, and 'handing senttles' for handing powder out of the magazine, as fitted in the mayal service, and shot boxes for Armstrong shot, or shot similar to them. Round the upper-deck she has five boats (I should say), a ten-oared cutter, an eightoared cutter, two gigs, and a jolly-boat, and davits for hoisting them up—her accommodation being in no respect different from her similar class of vessel in the Royal Naval Service.

And on my asking the captain of the Oreto, before my own officers and three of his own, whether she had left Liverpool fitted in all respects as she was at present, his answer was, 'Yes, in all respects, and 'that no addition or alteration had been made whatever.'"*

In transmitting this report to the Governor, Captain Hickley adds:—

"When I boarded the Oreto she appeared to be discharging her cargo, and this cargo, to all appearance, shells; and I was proceeding to go on with the examination when the consignee (Mr. flarris) and a revenue officer told me that she (the Oreto) had cleared in ballast for the Havana, and was to sail shortly (I understood the next day), and that due notice had been given at the Customhouse. On this I considered interference unnecessary on my part, and came immediately with the consignee to you, to report what had taken place, and the determined destination of the Oreto, but with the understanding that, owing to the suspicions already cast on the vessel, I was to again visit her before her leaving. This took place on the 10th, and the 11th and 12th passed, and the Oreto did not sail, which again aroused my suspicions that the vessel was not acting in good faith, and that she was still equipping, or making very definite arrangements for so doing.

"This morning, at 6:30 A.M., I was informed by Mr. Harris that the Oreto was to sail immediately. at 8 A.M.: and feeling it a bounden duty to ascertain her character before her leaving, to make av Report to your Excellency, that by so doing I might have the Law Officers' opinion as to the legality of her sailing before she quitted the port.

"I have the honour to inclose my report for your Excellency's information, for the opinion of the Attorney-General and Queen's Advocate, that my course may be clear as to my dealing with the Oreto, and whether, under the circumstances detailed therein, she is crititled to go her way on the high seas under British colours."+

As the report of the officers and the letter of Commander Hickley, while conclusively establishing the warlike character of the vessel, failed to earry the case any further as to any attempt to equip or arm her within the waters of the Bahamas, the Attorney-General, to whom these documents were referred, still adhered to his former view, and advised that there was nothing contained in them which would justify the detention of the vessel.

From the foregoing letter of Captain Hickley, it appears that, on finding that the Oreto was discharging shells out of the vessel, and on being told by Mr. Harris, one of the consignees, and by a revenue officer on board, that she had cleared out in ballast for the Havana, and was to sail, as he understood, the next day, and that due notice had been given at the Custom-house, Captain Hickley, however, desirous of preventing with inflexible rigour any breach of neutrality in a port of Her Majesty, considered that all ground for further interference with the vessel-provided always that this undertaking should be carried out-was at an end.

Two more days, however, having elapsed since his last letter, and the vessel still remaining at her anchorage, the suspicions of Captain Hickley became aroused anew. He ling off this affidavit to does not appear to have been at first aware that the cause of the delay was the continued refusal of the crew to remain in the ship, in consequence of which it had become necessary to collect another crew. On the 15th, the boatswain Jones and some of the erew of the Oreto, acting under the influence and at the instigation of Mr. Whiting, as appears from the letter of the latter to Mr. Seward of the 18th of June, came on oard the Greyhound, and made, as Captain Hickley reports, publicly before him a variety of statements to the prejudice of the vessel as a legal trader, both on her first leaving and subsequently to her leaving Liverpool, stating that they had now left the Oreto, as they could not ascertain her destination, although she had cleared out for

Referring to the statements made to him by the boatswain and crew, Captain Hiekley writes to the Governor:-

"These circumstances, her long detention in this port, her character, her fittings, convinced as I am also that during her stay in the port arrangements have been made for arming her outside, with the previous correspondence on her account, and the suspicions already cast on her, her evident equipment previous correspondence on the account, one the suspections arrivally vast on her, her extreme equipment of for war purposes, although not at present armed, or to my knowledge having any arms on board, and my conviction, as also that of my officers and men that have been on board her, that she is built intentionally for a war-vessel and not for a merchant-ship, make it incumbent on me to seize the Oreto, as a vessel that can be no more considered as a free-trader, but that she is, on the contrary, Oreio, as a vesser that the direction of the calculated to be turned into a formidable vessel of war in twenty-four hours; and that this, I am Captain Hickley accordingly proceeded to seize the vessel, and reported to the Governor that he had done so. In his letter he proposes to "send the vessel to the Commodore or Commander-in-chief on his own professional responsibility."*

On the other hand Governor Bayley, in reply, states his general concurrence with the opinion of the Attorney-General :-

"I do not consider," he says, "that suspicion alone would justify the seizure of the Oreto, and the case as stated by yourself hardly seems to go beyond suspicion.

"And the suspicion itself attaches not to any acts done by the Oreto, but only to the intention of her equipment. Indeed, the testimony of the crew 1 understand to amount to no more than an expression of suspicion. Now, I do not consider that I have any legal authority to scize a vessel merely on the suspicion of her intentions. It seems to me that such an act on my part would violate the hospitalities of the harbour, and be a precedent for grave injustice on future occasions.

"The Oreto, as you are aware, has, in deference to your remonstrances and my orders, discharged her cargo of shell, shot, and ammunition, and is ready to clear in ballast. She has thus divested herself her curso of sherf, snow, and administrating and is ready to clear in banasa. She has thus divested herself of the character of an armed vessel leaving this port for belligerent purposes. I do not think it consisters with law or public policy that she should now be seized on the hypothesis that she is clearing out for the purpose of arming herself as a vessel of war beyond the limits of the harbour. We have out for the purpose of arming heisen as a vessel of win beyond the mints of the harbour. We have done our duty in seeing that she does not leave the harbour equipped and prepared to act offensively against one of two belligerent nations, with each of whom Great Britain is at peace,

"And if she has still any such intention—an intention which cannot be fulfilled within the harbour—I think this could be effectually thwarted by giving instructions that the vessels which are supposed to be freight d with her arms, and to be prepared to go out with her, should not leave the harbour within forty-eight hours after the Oreto has left it,

"If, however, you still retain the firm conviction not only that she is about to arm as a vessel of war, but also that she is already partially equipped as one, and, moreover, that she is engaged to act against a belligerent State, which is at peace with Great Britain, and that she has enlisted a crew for that object, your proper course undoubtedly is, on seizing the Oreto, to submit the question of her condemnation to the Vice-Admiralty Court of this Colony.

"To remove her to Bermuda, Halifax, or any other Colony, for the purpose of having her condemned there, would be a course not only at variance with prescriptive usage, but, as I cannot help thinking, open to censure, as implying an unmerited imputation on the fairness and competency of the Court of this Colony. It is a course which I cannot myself recommend or sanction, and which, if adopted by you, must be adopted on your own responsibility."+

The opinion of the Attorney-General remained unshaken:-

"The report of Captain Hickley," he writes, "does not appear to me to carry the case against the Oreto further than that shown in the previous reports of himself and Commander McKillop, and I contend that no case has as yet been made out for the seizure of that vessel under the Foreign

"With respect to the suggestion in the concluding part of Commander Hickley's letter, I have to remark that, if the vessel is liable to seizure at all, it must be under the provisions of the Foreign Ealistment Act, and if so seized, the question of her liability may as readily and efficiently be decided in the Court of Vice-Admiralty in this Colony as before any tribunal in Her Majesty's Colonial Possessions, and consequently that no necessity exists, nor do 1 think that any excuse can be inade for sending her, as suggested by Commander Hickley, to the Commodore or Commander-in-Chief, who, I presume, are either at Bermuda or Halifax; while, on the other hand, if 1 am correct in the view 1 have taken of her non-liability to seizure, the reasons against sending her hence will, of course, be far more powerful; and therefore, on either view of the case, 1 navise his Excellency to withhold his sanction from the course of action suggested."*

On the receipt of these communications, Captaiu Hiekley replies, "repeating his professional opinion, and that of his brother officers, and again expressing his conviction that the Oreto was a vessel of war that could be equipped in twenty-four hours for battle, and that she was then going out of the harbour as nearly equipped as a vessel of war could be without guns, arms, or ammunition;" but "declining to take on himself the responsibility of the further detention of the Oreto for the purpose of placing her in the Admiralty Court, it being contrary to the Law Officers' opinion, or of adopting the course of sending her to the Commander-in-chief contrary to the Governor's wishes." He announced his intention, therefore, of removing the officers and men from the Oreto, and, "as a final decision had been come to, of offering no further obstacle to her sailing." †

On the 17th, Governor Bayley replies that he "had felt it to be his duty, in his letter of the day before, to express unreservedly his opinion on the case of the Oreto, and the doubt he entertained respecting the legality and policy of preventing her from leaving the harbour—doubts which had been much increased by the strong opinion expressed by the Law Officer of the Crown, who discharged the conjoint duties of Queen's Advocate and Attorney-General in this Colony." He continues:—

"In deference to the views entertained by that officer and myself, you have, I now understand, removed the officers and crew who were in charge of the Orcto, and thereby given her the option of leaving the harbour.

"But, in the letter which announces this proceeding, you repeat the expression of your own and your officers' conviction that 'the Oreto is a vessel of war, which can be equipped in twenty-four hours for battle.' And, in your brief conversation with me this morning, you stated that, though the Oreto had discharged some of her suspected eargo here, still she was not leaving the port empty. A professional opinion coming from an officer of your character and rank cannot fail to have its due weight with me. On the one hand, I am unwilling to place any restraint on a vessel which has not as yet been formally proved to have violated the law, or impaged the neutrality of the harbour by any overt act. I am equally unwilling to place any limit on the rights of hospitality usually accorded to vessels of all nations in English harbours. I am most unwilling to strain the law to the prejudice of any vessel seeking that hospitality. But, at the same time, I cannot fail to recognize the great importance of the testimony which may be brought forward by yourself and your crew; nor can I fail to see the grave consequences which might result if a vessel, equipped and fitted as you represent for the purposes of war, were quietly allowed to take a crew here and quit the harbour with the intention of fighting on the side of one of two belligerent States, with each of whom Great Britain is at peace.

"To the doubts which this dilemma creates, I can see only one solution. The equipment of the Oreto, the object of her voyage hither, the intent of her voyage hence, the nature of her crew and the purpose of their enlistment, are all the fair subjects of judicial investigation. to depart unexamined and unabsolved.

"Under every aspect therefore of the case, I think the best course which can be taken in the interests of yourself, the Colony, and the Government, will be to seize the Oreto, and at once submit the question of her condemnation to the local Court of Vice-Admiralty; and I am glad to see that you abandon the idea of carrying her before the Court of any other Colony. If, on the evidence which you adduce, the Court condemn her, you will have the satisfaction of having prevented, certainly an illegal, and probably a disastrous, voyage. If the Court do not condemn her, you will have the satisfaction of having discharged your duty under circumstances of anxious doubt and difficulty, the solution of which will be course of others placed in situations equally trying and embarrassing.

"My opinion is that an appeal to the decision of the local Vice-Admirulty Court is the best expedient which could be embraced by all the parties interested in the matter. I will give the necessary instructions to the Queen's Advocate."

The course suggested was accordingly adopted. The Oreto was seized, and proceedings taken in the Admiralty Court of the Bahamas for her condemnation, the result of which I shall advert to further on.

From the correspondence which, in view of the accusations made, I have thought it my duty towards absent men, deprived of all means of defence, to set out in some detail before the Tribunal, even at the risk of appearing tedious, it is apparent that two different and opposite views were taken as to the propriety of seizing the Oreto. ons made, I have thought efence, to set out in some as, it is apparent that two f seizing the Oreto. The n her presence at Nassau, and the other suspicious circumstances connected with her, entertaining no moral doubt that she was intended for the service of the Confederates against the United States, were for seizing her with a high hand. The civil Anthorities, sensible that to seize the vessel, unless they could afterwards hold her upon legal proof of her destination as a belligerent vessel, such as would be received in a Court of Law, would be more than useless, and seeing no such proof forthcoming, were unwilling to take upon thereselves the responsibility of a proceeding which, if it ended in defeat, would be attended with serious consequences. In addition to this, the Attorney-General appears to have entertained an opinion that, in order to warrant a seizure at Nassau, some equipment of the vessel must have taken place within the precincts of the Vice-Admiralty Court. That opinion was, in my judgment, erroneous; but, after a careful perusal of the correspondence, and consideration of the facts, I am bound, in common justice to these parties, whose conduct has been so cruelly impugned, to say the Governor and Attorney-General in the course of these proceedings were not honestly and sincerely entertained.

But while I feel bound to give credit to the Governor and Attorney-General for perfect honesty of intention, I am not prepared to go the length of saying that, in my judgment, a degree of activity, such as the circumstances demanded, was exhibited in ascertaining the true character of the Oreto. Down to the time, indeed, when revelations as to the antecedents of the vessel were made by the crew, and while all that had happened at Liverpool remained unknown in the Colony, I am entirely of opinion with the Law Officer of the Colony that the seizure of the vessel would not have been warranted. However strong the suspicion, there was till then no actual proof of her destination. But, when the men on the 4th of June communicated all the facts to Mr. Whiting, and afterwards, at his suggestion, to Commander Hickley, and it thus became known to the Authorities that there were antecedents of a suspicious character connected with the vessel, it became, in my judgment, the business of the Law Officers to inquire into the facts. It is true Mr. Whiting neglected the obvious duty of communicating to the Anthorities the affidavit made by the boatswain Jones. But the Attorney-General must have been aware that there were important matters connected with this vessel which the men who had come out in her were prepared to disclose; and I cannot but think that, in such a state of things, he should have taken steps to inquire into and ascertain the facts. In all probability the opinion—as 1 think, a mistaken one—that nothing but what took place in the waters of the Colony could be made available against the vessel, may have had the effect of inducing him to remain passive.

But the question, whether the omission to resort to this source of information did not amount to a want of due diligence, loses its importance by reason of the circumtance that, in spite of the opinion of the Attorney-General, the Oreto was in fact seized and brought into court with a view to her condemnation. Upon that fact supervening, any previous omission in this respect becomes, practically speaking, wholly immaterial. Whether the vessel was seized a few days sooner or a few days later can, obviously, under the circumstances, not have been of the slightest consequence.

In like manner, when M. Staemplli suggests that the Government at home were wanting in due diligence, because, on finding that the Oreto had not been built for the lalian Government, they did not send out to Nassau and other British Colonies to direct the seizure of the vessel should she come into a British port, the obvious answer, which I should have hoped would have occurred to his own mind, it that, even assuming that the Government were bound to send instructions to that effect all over the globe, the only purpose which such exemplary activity could have served would have been to secure the scizure of the vessel and the bringing her into court. But this end having been otherwise effected, by the action of Captain Hickley and the Governor, any want of diligence in any other quarter becomes wholly immaterial.

When once the end to be obtained is by some means or other effected, what matters it whether some other means, whereby the same result might possibly have been brought about, may have been omitted to be resorted to?

It cannot surely be necessary to point out that the omission to use due diligence, if it produces no injury to a party entitled to claim the exercise of such diligence, affords no ground for complaint or compensation. If, for example, a vessel were, by the negligence of the Authorities, permitted to be equipped and armed and to go forth to wage war on a belligerent, but before doing any actual mischief, were fallen in with by a more powerful enemy and taken, no amount of negligence in suffering her to go forth could constitute a ground for asking for pecuniary compensation.

We may, therefore, pass over all the facts preliminary to the seizuro of the vessel, and come to the trial before the Judge of the Court of Admiralty of the Colony.

Now I at once feel bound to say that with the result of this trial I am anything but satisfied. In my opinion, the Oreto ought to have been condemned, and there was a miscarriage of justice in her acquittal. Not that, on the point which the Judge of the Vice-Admiralty Court thought the only issue in the case, namely, whether there had been any equipment of the vessel within the waters of the Colony, I am prepared to quarrel with the judgment. The mistake of the Judge, which led to the acquittal of the Oreto, consisted in holding that the equipment of a vessel in any part of the British dominions, for a purpose prohibited by the Foreign Enlistment Act, would not, so long as the property in it remained in a British subject and had not been transferred to a foreign belligerent, of which there was here no sufficient proof, form a sufficient ground of condemnation in any court of competent authority, within whose jurisdiction the vessel might be found, though no part of such equipment might have taken place within such jurisdiction. Fitted out, equipped, or armed within British dominions, in contravention of the statute, a vessel becomes at once forfeited by the effect of the statute, and becomes liable to be seized and condemned as forfeited. The character of forfeiture once attaching to her remains permanently affixed to her, and the proceeding being in rem, any competent Court within whose jurisdiction she may be, may adjudge her to be the property of the Crown, and give effect to the seizure of her as such.

It is admitted by Her Majesty's Government, upon the advice of its Law Officers, that such is the law.

It is clear that, if the Judge on the trial had acted on this principle, there was abundant evidence on which to condemn this vessel, and that she ought to have been condemned.

That she was equipped, though not armed for war, not only when at the Bahamas, but also when she left Liverpool is undoubted. The obstacle to her seizure at Liverpool was the absence of sufficient proof of her being intended for a belligerent. But when it turned out that her asserted destination for a firm at Palermo, or for the Italian Government, was a mere pretence, and that, having cleared out and shipped her crew for Palermo and Jamaica, she never went near cither, but proceeded at once to Nassan a port conveniently situated with reference to the coast of the Southern State of when to these facts was added the evidence of the statements of those who had had charge of her that she was intended for the Confederate service, evidence which acquired additional force from the antecedent circumstances, no rational doubt could remain of the service for which the vessel was designed. Had the adjudication proceeded on right legal principles, the vessel must clearly have been condemned.

But, when I am asked to sanction the imputation that the prosecution was conducted by the Attorney-General in the scandalously corrupt manner imputed to him-that he directed it with the predetermined purpose of getting the Oreto released; that he hurried on the trial before evidence could be obtained from Liverpool; that he conducted his cross-examinations so as to suppress evidence unfavourable to the Oreto when it could be done; that he neglected to summon witnesses, who must have been within his control, who could have shown conclusively that the Oreto was built for the insurgents, and was to be converted into a vessel of war, -witnesses, I may add, by the way, who, if ealled, would have been privileged from answering, or certainly would have been hostile, and whom, therefore, a Counsel, in the exercise of his discretion, would searcely think of calling-witnesses, too, who could have added nothing as to that which the Attorney-General and the Judge believed to be the essential matter to be provednamely, an equipment of the vessel in the port—and when I am asked to ascribe to a Judge the disgraceful partiality imputed to Mr. Lees, I must refuse my assent to imputations, which go to fix a stigma on the character of high legal functionaries, who are not here to defend themselves, on grounds which appear to me of the most shadow and unsubstantial character. These imputations of scandalous dereliction of duty in a public prosecutor, and of gross partiality in a Judge, are of a very grave and serious character. I must express my opinion that they ought never to have been made, more especially in the tone of eareless and offensive levity in which they are presented to us in the pages of the American Case. Few things of the kind, I can say with truth, ever gave me more pain than the perusal of the observations in that document relating to this part of the case.

I say this the more, because it appears to me that these accusations were unnecessary to the case of the United States. There was a misearriage of justice on the trial of the Florida. If that miscarriage can be imputed to the British Government as negligence, so as to render it responsible, the Government of the United States is entitled to the benefit of it, no matter whether the miscarriage arose from corrupt design or mistake of law. It would surely have been sufficient to show the judgment to be wrong, without assailing men's characters by the imputation of base and evil

I have yet to consider, whether any default on the part of Her Majesty's Government can have contributed to the failure of the proceedings against the Florida. It is eertain that, as soon as the fact of the seizure of the vessel and the institution of the suit was communicated to the Government at home, they approved of and ratified what had been done, and directed that Commander Hickley, as the prosecutor, should be indemnified against all the expenses of the suit. Instructions were given that any witnesses from Liverpool, who could give evidence material to the case, should be sent '2 Nassau. But when the evidence came to be looked into by Sir R. Phillimore, who had then succeeded to the office of Queen's Advocate, it turned out that the Liverpool witnesses could really add nothing to the evidence already forthcoming at Nassau.* Their evidence went to prove that the vessel, when she left Liverpool, was equipped so as to be capable of being armed; but, to prove this, no evidence was needed. The fact could not be disputed; if it had been, there was the vessel at Nassau to speak for The Liverpool evidence would, indeed, have established that the Oreto had cleared out on what after events showed to have been a pretended and fictitious voyage,—no doubt a most material fact; but of this again abundant evidence was forthcoming, from the evidence of the crew, who had signed articles for the voyage to Palermo and Jamaica. The evidence was, therefore, unnecessary: what is more, had it been forthcoming, it would have proved unavailing, by reason of the Judge holding the absence of equipment at Nassau to be fatal to the exercise of his jurisdiction to condemn the

It is complained that the Attorney-General hurried on the trial to avoid the evidence of the Liverpool witnesses. Now, as I have just remarked, no witnesses were sent, or were thought by Sir R. Phillimore of sufficient importance to be sent for the purpose of the trial; which is a sufficient answer to this head of complaint. It is complained that Maflit and other persons connected with the Oreto were not called on the trial; and this head of charge is also dwelt upon by M. Staempfli, as one of the grounds of his judgment. But this was a matter on which it was for the Public Prosecutor to exercise his discretion.

In the first place, the witnesses would of course have been hostile, and it is not usual with English advocates to call witnesses known to be adverse; they leave them to be called on the other side, that they may have the advantage of cross-examining them, which they are not permitted to do if they produce them themselves. Had the Attorney-General called these witnesses himself, the complaint would prebably have taken the opposite form. It would then have been said that he had called witnesses from the enemy's camp for the purpose of damaging his own case.

In the second place, as these witnesses, if mixed up in a transaction involving a breach of the Foreign Enlistment Act, such as was involved in this suit, would have been liable to be prosecuted and punished, they would, by English law, have been privileged from giving evidence at all.

Thirdly, all that these persons, if called, could have proved, was that the vessel was intended for the Confederate service. But this, in the view unfortunately taken by the Judge, that equipment within the local limits of his jurisdiction was indispensable as the foundation of his authority to condonn, would obviously have availed nothing, and therefore no detriment can have arisen on the result from its not being

There is an observation of the honourable Arbitrator, M. Staempfli, namely, that the witnesses on the trial were not examined on oath, which it is necessary to correct, lest it should go forth to the public that the Attorney-General and the Judge were so unmindful or ignorant of their duty as to allow the witnesses to be examined without the sanction of an oath. This statement must have been founded on an oversight; every witness called is shown by the report of the trial to have been sworm before he was examined. I am sure the honourable gentleman will regret his mistake.

The Oreto ought to have been condemned. She escaped condemnation by reason of a mistake on a matter of law of the Judge before whom she was brought for condemnation. Can such a failure be ascribed to the Government? The question is one of serious importance. I have already stated my views on it in an earlier stage of these remarks.

But a further charge of negligence is brought against the Government of the Bahamas by reason of the Oreto having received her armament in the waters of the Colony. The facts are as follows.

Having been released by the Court of Admiralty, the Oreto cleared out as a Having been released by the Court of Admiralty, the port for which vessels merehant-vessel for St. John's, New Brunswick, in ballast,* the port for which vessels merehant-vessel for St. John's, New Brunswick, in ballast,* the port for which vessels went intending to run the blockade usually cleared. On the 7th of August the vessel went out, into the neighbourhood of Hog Island, to try her steam.† She was at that time very short handed. It appears, from the letter of the United States' Consul to Wir. Seward of the 6th of September, that her crew at that time was "a very small one Mr. Seward of the 6th of September, that her crew at that time was "a very small one and that the officers expressed great doubts of being able to man her sufficiently for their nefarious purposes." It is stated in the United States' Case that the Oreto lay outside, with a hawser attached to one of Her Majesty's ships of war.

In a letter of the United States Consul of the 9th of August, that gentleman writes to Mr. Seward as follows:—

"Sir, "United States' Consulate, Nassau, N.P., August 9, 1862.

"I have the honour to inform you of the arrival off this port yesterday morning of the United States' steam-ship R. R. Cuyler, Winslow Commander, eight days from Boston. The steamer Oreto had left this harbour the day previous and anchored off Hog Island; but early on the morning of the Cuyler's arrival she got under way, and kept "backing and filling" around that vessel while she lay of the port. Seeing these suspicious movements of so suspicious a vessel, Captain Winslow concluded not to leave his ship, but sent a boat for me, and I promptly joined him on board, giving him all the information in my power. He concluded to stand over for the North-west Passage, as 1 advised that course as the most likely method of trapping the Oreto, which vessel is reported to be bound for

We now see how unfounded was Mr. Whiting's suspicion as to the intentions of the Peterel.

The Oreto being in this position, on the 9th of August, a small steamer called the Prince Alfred, having been loaded with the armament intended for the Oreto, which had been brought out partly in the steamer Bahama, partly in other vessels, the blockade. The Prince Alfred having passed the Oreto, the latter soon afterwards let go the blawer, and put to sea; and having overtaken the Prince Alfred, took her in tow, when both vessels proceeded to Green Cay, a small desert island, lying 60 miles south of Nassau, on the edge of the Great Bahama Bank, wholly uninhabited, and only frequented at times by fishermen. There, out of sight of every one, the armament of the Oreto was transferred to her from the Prince Alfred, the Confederate flag was hoisted, and the Oreto thenceforth received the name of the Florida.§

It had been surmised in the Colony that the Prince Alfred was taking out the armanient of the Oreto, but the matter went no further than surmise. was full of shipping and vessels were leaving every day loaded with contraband of war The harbour for the purpose of running the blockade.

Mr Whiting, as we have seen, had stated it as a fact in his letter of the 9th. In a later letter to Mr. Seward of the 12th, he speaks with less certainty; he says:-

^{*} British Appendix, vol. v, p. 50. ‡ United States' Documents, vol. vi, p. 324.

The Florida.

At Nassau.

"On the 9th, the schooner Prince Alfred, which had been purchased by Lafitte, the Confederate Agent here, left this port, and it was currently reported and generally believed that she had on board the armament for the Oreto, and as that vessel left the same night (both clearing for St. John's), I think it probable.

"I have given full details of these movements to the commanders of the Adirondack and Cuyler, and also sent such information to the different Consulates.*

On the 16th, a report of the two vessels having gone to Green Cay appears to have reached Nassau.

Mr. Whiting writes on that day :-

"The Oreto is reported to have gone to Green Cay, about 50 miles south-west from Providence Island, and it is also reported that the schooner Prince Alfred has gone there to deliver to the Oreto her piratical armament.

"I have sent despatches to the United States' cruizers by the best channels open to me."+

The fact did not, however, become actually known at Nassau till the 6th of September, when certain men, who had been engaged at Nassau to go out in the Oreto for the purpose of assisting in transferring the gams and arms from the Prince Alfred, having returned to Nassau, gave to the American Consul an account of what had happened at Green Cay.‡

That, till a week after the vessels had left, no one in the Colony had any idea of an intention to transfer the armament in any place in the Bahamas, is plain. So far from expecting anything of the kind, Mr. Whiting expressly states, in his letter of the 9th, that he "advised Captain Winslow to stand out for the North-West Providence Channel, as the most likely method of trapping the Oreto, as she was reported to be bound for Charleston." Upon the faith of this belief, Mr. Whiting, as he tells us, "gave full details of these movements to the Commanders of the two American ships of war the Adirondaek and Cuyler."§

What then is the negligence complained of in respect of the arming of the Orcto within the waters of the Colony? In the American Case the argument is put thus:—

"The arrangements for arming were made in the harbour of Nassau, and the two vessels left that port almost simultaneously, and proceeded to Green Cay together. The purpose for which they went was notorious in Nassau. This was so palpable an evasion that the act should be assumed as having taken place in the harbour of Nassau." This is a very adroit way of putting the case, but is it a just one? In the first place, it is a great deal too much to assume that it was "notorious" that the Prince Alfred had on board the armament of the other vessel. The Consul puts it no higher than that it was so reported, and the Government could not act on mere report. The fact was never said to have been notorious till 1865, three years later, whea Mr. Kirkpatrick, the then Consul, who knew nothing of the facts when they happened, thought proper so to state.

But the Argument further puts it as though the purpose of going to Green Cay was notorious; whereas we now know that neither the Consul nor any one else had the remotest idea that the transfer of the armanient was intended to be effected within the limits of the Colony. The Consul believed that both vessels were going to Charleston. Can it be said that the Governor ought to have sent a British ship of war to accompany the two ships some sixty miles or more, till clear of the waters of the Bahamas, to prevent the possibility of a violation of neutrality in this respect?

But then, it is said, "the act was committed within British jurisdiction, and was therefore a violation of the first clause of the first Rule of the Treaty."

But, with submission, the act is not necessarily within the first Rule of the Treaty, because it was committed in British jurisdiction. To bring it within the first Rule of the Treaty it must be shown that there was a want of due diligence in not preventing the act so done, and of this I find no proof in the American documents.

To be sure, our honourable colleague M. Staempfli, in the grounds of his judgment,

"Que Green Cay était éloigné et peu fréquenté; cette objection est d'autant moins importante que tout ce qui se fit à Green Cay partit de Nassau, et pouvait fort bien s'apercevoir depuis ce dernier endroit."

I confess I do not quite understand what is meant by this. I do not suppose M. Staempfii can mean that what was done at Green Cay could be seen at Nassau, sixty miles off. I must, therefore, take it that what he means is, that the loading of the Prince Alfred and the nearly simultaneous departure of the two ships from Nassau could have been seen at Nassau—which, as it strikes me, is a self-evident proposition. But if he means that, because the cargo of the Prince Alfred consisted of guns and arms that might be transferred to the Orefo, therefore the Authorities ought to have stopped the Prince Alfred, the answer is that, until such transfer had actually taken place, or was about to take place, in British waters, the Authorities had no power to

The Prince Alfred had a perfect right, subject to the chance of capture, to take arms to a beligerent port. There was nothing to show that she was not about to do so. The American Consul believed she was. What authority had the Government

Lastly, M. Staempfli makes it matter of reproach to the local Government that no prosecution was instituted against the master of the Prince Alfred.

I must observe that this Tribunal has nothing whatever to do with the question of whether Her Majesty's Government should or should not have directed a prosecution in this or that particular instance. Though this is a point which has more than once been dwelt upon, it is wholly irrelevant to our inquiry.

However, let us see how the facts stand in this respect. On the 8th of September Mr. Whiting having seen the men who had returned from the Oreto, and having obtained a deposition from them, writes to the Governor:-

"I have the honour to inform year Excellency that I have good authority for stating that the "I have the honour to inform year Excellency that I have good authority for stating that the schooner Prince Alfred, of Nassau, took the Oreto's armament from this port and discharged the same on board that steamer at Green Cay, one of the Bahamas. "But his Excellency has no authority to take any steps against the Oreto, which is out of his

"I have, &c.

Instead of putting his evidence into the hands of the Attorney-General, who, of course, was not himself in the possession of any, Mr. Whiting allowed the matter to drop. He probably thought, and thought rightly, that it would profit the United States' Government very little to punish this man.

Another charge in respect of this vessel is that Maffitt, her commander, when at Alleged recruit-Nassau, induced about 40 men to enlist on board the Oreto. The United States' Case, ment of crew. without more, sets this down as a violation of the second Rule of the Treaty, but is wholly silent as to any negligence of the local Government in this behalf.

M. Staempfli, nevertheless, but without any reference to facts showing negligence, states, as a ground of his judgment, that the manning of the Oreto at Nassau is to be imputed to the negligence of the British Authorities. In the first place, it does not appear that the Authorities knew anything whatsoever about the matter. In the second place, the Oreto, at the time these men were engaged, had not adopted the character of a ship of war; it was not known that she would do so; it was not known to the local Government, or even to Mr. Whiting, that she had been made over to the Confederate Government; it was not known that Matfitt had taken possession of her as their officer; Duguid, who had brought her out, still remained apparently the master of her; her former erew had all left her; the erew she had engaged were wholly insufficient as a fighting crew, and there was not, and could not be, any present purpose of using her as a fighting ship; it was believed she was going to run the blockade. If that fact had turned out to be true, the allowing her to hire a crew would have been perfectly legitimate, and could not have been prevented.

Was the vessel to be kept at Nassau permanently for want of a crew?

It is quite true that, by the second Rule of the Treaty, a neutral Government is not to permit its ports or waters to be used by a belligerent for the recruitment of But at this time, as I have already remarked, though it was known that the vessel was intended for the Confederate Government, it was not known that she had been transferred to them; still less that she was about to be used for belligerent purposes, which indeed she could not be till a different crew could be obtained. Till then she might be liable to capture as contraband of war, but she would not be liable to seizure as for a breach of the municipal law.

I confess I do not see the negligence which M. Staempfli's keener sight is enabled to discover.

Florida after leaving Green Cay.

When the Florida had taken in her armament at Green Cay, the crew shipped at Nassau being altogether inadequate for the vessel as a ship of war, she proceeded to the port of Cardenas in Cuba, where she remained till the 31st of August. She there attempted to ship a crew, but the matter having come to the knowledge of the Λ uthorities, the officer in command repudiated the transaction, and left the port without any increase of his numbers.* Unable to keep the sea for purposes of war, with so insufficient a crew, the Florida ran past the hostile cruizers, though challenged and fired at, and succeeded in getting into the Confederate port of Mobile, where she arrived on the 4th of September.†

She remained in the port of Mobile upwards of four months; at the end of which time, having shipped a crew, she was sent out, on the 15th of January, 1863, under the command of Maffitt, as a Confederate ship of war.;

Question as to nd remaining at Mobile.

A grave question here presents itself whether Great Britain, even if open to the effect of going into imputation of want of due diligence in respect of the original equipment of the Oreto, or of her arming at Green Cay, can properly be held responsible for the acts of this ship subsequently to her entry into Mobile. It is all important to bear in mind that the original equipment of this vessel, though an offence against the municipal law of Great Britain, was not, there being up to the time she arrived at the Bahamas no present intention of war, an offence against international law. All the power which the Government could exercise against her, in respect of any offence against the municipal law, was such as was derived from that law, that is to say, from the Foreign Enlistment Act. Now, all that the latter empowered the Government to do was to seize the vessel and to bring her before a competent Court for condemnation. If, when such a proceeding has been adopted, it results in the acquittal and release of the vessel, the matter becomes res judicata, the original vice becomes purged, and no further proceeding in rem can be had. A ship cannot be seized, and brought into Court again and again, when once it has been decided by a competent Court that she was not liable to seizure and condemnation at all. After the Oreto had been thus acquitted, all power of further seizure, as for an infraction of the Foreign Enlistment Act in her original equipment, was at an end. 1 grant that the right of a belligerent to redress for a breach of neutrality against international law would not be affected by a judicial proceeding under the municipal law; but there having been here, according to my view, no more than a breach of the municipal law, all that the belligerent could possibly exact was that the municipal law should be put in force by a proceeding against the vessel. When under such a procooling the vessel had been acquitted, the matter was at an end.

It will be said that a second offence was committed in British jurisdiction by the arming of this vessel at Green Cay; and this may be so; but here again we have in like manner no breach of neutrality according to international law if, owing to the De Quincy.

In that case the defendant was indicted under the 3rd section of the American Act of 1818, for having been concerned in fitting out a vessel called the Bolivar, afterwards Las Damas Argentinas, with intent that such vessel should be employed in the service of the United Provinces of Rio de la Plata against the subjects of the Emperor of Brazil, with whom the United States were then at peace. The vessel in question, originally a pilot boat, had been fitted out at Baltimore for the defendant and one Armstrong, and adapted for carrying a gum. She sailed from Baltimore to the Island of St. Thomas, Armstrong being on board as part owner and agent for the other owners. On the way to St. Thomas's, Armstrong told a witness that it was his intention and wish to employ the vessel as a privateer, but that he had no funds. spoke of the difficulty of getting any, and said he could not tell, until he got to the West Indies, whether he should be able to procure any. After negotiating for two or three days at St. Thomas's, Armstrong succeeded in obtaining funds; the Bolivar was fitted out as a privateer; and, Armstrong having provided himself with a commission from the Buenos Ayres Government, the vessel, under the name of Las Damas Argentinas, cruized under the flag of that Government and took several prizes. Two questions presented themselves for the decision of the Court as to the direction which should be given to the jury. The first was whether, to constitute an offence within the Act, it was necessary that the vessel should have been armed when she left Baltimore, the decision on which is immaterial to the present purpose. The second question is the one which touches the present case. On the part of the defendant it was submitted that the jury should be directed :-

"That if the jury believe that, when the Bolivar was fitted out and equipped at Baltimore, the owner and equipper intended to go to the West Indies in search of funds, with which to arm and equip the said vessel, and had no present intention of using or employing the said vessel as a privateer, but intended, when he equipped her, to go to the West Indies to endeavour to raise funds to prepare her for a cruize, then the defendant is not guilty.

"Or, if the jury believe that when the Bolivar was equipped at Baltimore, and when she left the United States, the equipper had no fixed intention to employ her as a privateer, but had a wish so to employ her, the fulfilment of which wish depended on his ability to obtain funds in the West Indies for the purpose of arming and preparing her for war, then the defendant is not guilty.

The Court said:—

"We think these instructions ought to be given. The offence consists principally in the intention with which the preparations were made. These preparations, according to the very terms of the Act, must be made within the limits of the United States; and it is equally necessary that the intention with respect to the employment of the vessel should be formed before she leaves the United States; and what respect to the emptoyment of the vesser shound be formed before she leaves the United States; and this must be a fixed intention, not conditional or contingent, depending on some future arrangements. This intention is a question belonging exclusively to the jury to decide. It is the material point on which the legality or criminality of the act must turn, and it decides whether the adventure is of a commercial or warlike character."*

At the same time the Court, at the instance of the prosecution, held that if there was an intention of employing the vessel as a privateer when she left Baltimore, the offence would be complete, though subsequent events might have prevented that intention from being carried into effect.

The distinction is a sound one. A present intention does not the less exist, because unexpected events may afterwards change it; but an intention which is to depend on uncertain contingencies cannot be said to be a present one. It is the present intention of the immediate employment of the vessel for hostile purposes which makes the sending out an armed ship an offence against the law of nations, as a violation of neutrality, as distinguished from merely making it contrabund of war. Assuredly there must be a distinction between the two things, and I am at a loss to see where the line can otherwise be drawn.

A similar purpose, in like manner, makes the equipping of a vessel an offence against the municipal law, when without it—as if, for instance, the vessel had been already built raid equipped—the transaction would be simply one of trade. Now, in the case before us, it may, perhaps, be questioned whether there was any present intention of using the Florida as a ship of war, or whether such employment was not contingent on her obtaining a war crew. If no erew could be got, the cruise was, as the sequel shows, to be given up, and an attempt made to run her into one of her own ports. Be this as it may, the belligerent purpose, if any such existed, was frustrated by the ship not obtaining a crew, and the voyage was lost. This being so, why, as Sir Roundell Palmer puts it to us, should not a vessel, equipped in a neutral port, contrary to the municipal law of the neutral, be considered, like any other contraband of war,—such being, in point of international law, the true character of such a vessel till she actually enters on her employment as a ship of war,—as no longer in delictor when she has once reached the port of the belligerent.

Having shown, as I think, abundant grounds for saying that as to what passed at Green Cay, no possible imputation of want of due diligence can attach, it seems to me that it would be carrying the doctrine of neutral responsibility to an unheard-of and most unreasonable length to say that, after a lapse of five months, during which no vessel of the United States was captured by the Florida, and after this vessel had been four months in a Confederate port, and had there shipped a new crew, Great Britain is to be held liable for damage afterwards done by her.

I agree with Sir Roundell Palmer in thinking that, with her arrival at Mobile, if not with her departure from the Bahamas, the illegal voyage upon which any liability attached came to an end, and with it all responsibility which can reasonably be fastened on the Government of Great Britain.

Question whether the Florida should have been seized on again coming into a British port.

But it is said that the Florida, having again come into a British port, and being known to be engaged in hostile operations against the United States, ought to have been detained, it being obligatory on the British Government to stop such a vessel, by reason of the admission in the second branch of the first Rule, viz., that "a neutral nation is bound to use due dil genee to prevent the departure from its jurisdiction of any vessel intended to cruize or carry on war" under the circumstances referred to in the first branch; "such vessel having been specially adapted, in whole or in part, within its jurisdiction, to warlike use."

The question is one of considerable importance, as it may affect not only the Florida, but also the Georgia and the Shenandoah, vessels as to the equipping of which it will be impossible to fix the British Government with want of due diligence.

I cannot understand how such a contention can have been raised. It appears to me to rest on a thorough perversion of the obvious meaning of the Rule. It is impossible to read the first Rule without seeing that it is intended to apply to two branches of one entire transaction, which consists, first, in allowing the vessel to be equipped, next in allowing her to depart; the second branch of the Rule being intended to meet a case in which a vessel may have been equipped in such a manner as to clude the diligence of the Authorities, but where there may be an opportunity, on her character being discovered, to arrest her before she has quitted neutral waters.

The second branch of the Rule is obviously intended to apply to the first departure of a vessel—that is to say, its departure from a neutral port before passing into the hands of a belligerent Government—and to that alone.

It is absurd to suppose that, if it had been intended that, Great Britain should be held liable for not having seized these vessels on their re-entering her ports, this would not have been expressly stated; especially when it is remembered that this might have been virtually to admit liability in respect of all these vessels, if shown to have been specially adapted for war within British territory; for every one of them returned to a British port at an early period of its career. It is plain that it never could have entered into the mind of the British Ministry that the Rule would be treated as applicable to anything beyond the first departure of the vessel.

The moral bearing of the question has been admirably pointed out in Sir

R. Palmer's argument :-

"It would have become the plain duty of any neutral State which had entered into such an engagement to give notice of it beforehand to all belligerent Powers, before it could be put in force to their prejudice. It is impossible that an act, which would be a breach of public faith and of international law towards one belligerent, could be held to constitute any part of the 'diligence due' by a neutral to the other belligerent. The Rule says nothing of any obligation to exclude this class of vessels, when once commissioned as public ships of war, from entrance into neutral ports upon the ordinary footing. If they were so excluded by proper notice, they would not enter; and the Rule (in that case) could never operate to prevent their departure. If they were not so excluded, instead of being 'due diligence,' it would be a flagrant act of treachery and wrong to take advantage of their entrance, in order to effect their detention or capture. Can Her Majesty be supposed to have consented to be retrospectively indged as wanting in due diligence, because, not having excluded these Confederate ships of war from her ports by any prohibition or notice, she did not break faith with them, and commit an outrage on every principle of justice and neutrality by their seizure? The Rules themselves had no existence at the time of the war; the Confedentes knew, and could know, no hing of them; their retrospective application cannot make an act expost facto 'due,' upon the footing or 'diligence,' to the one party in the war, which, if it had been actually done, would have been a wholly unjustifiable

And this being so, it may safely be asserted that the United States' Government must have framed the Rules with a like mind; for it would be to give them credit for sharp practice indeed, if, while the British Government agreed to the Rule, on the supposition that its application was to be limited to the first departure of an offending vessel, the United States should be at liberty to insist on its application, totics quoties, to every subsequent departure. I will say no more than that the construction thus sought to be put on the second branch of the first Rule is quite preposterous.

But it is said, in the second place, that the equipment and sending out of an armed vessel from the port of a neutral being a violation of its territory and neutral rights, and therefore a hostile act, Great Britain had the right to seize these vessels on their again coming within her jurisdiction, and was bound to do so, to prevent them from continuing to make war on vessels of the United States.

The answer of the British Government is threefold:-

1st. That it had not the right, according to international law, to seize these vessels, seeing that when they came again into British ports, they were admitted as the commissioned ships of war of a belligerent State.

2ndly. That, independently of the foregoing ground, the British Government could not as a neutral Government, seize a ship of war of a belligerent State for that which was not a violation of neutrality but only of its own municipal law.

3rdly. That even if it had the right, it was under no obligation to exercise it.

The first of these grounds depends on the effect of the commissions which these Effect of Commisressels had in the meantime received from the Government of the Confederate States as sions on ships of war.

The Florida.

Now, it must be taken as an unquestionable fact that these ships were built, or equipped, for the de facto Government of the Confederate States, and were employed by it as regular ships of war, under the command of officers regularly commissioned. Hereupon two questions present themselves. Were these commissions valid? If so, what was their effect as to affording immunity to a vessel, thus commissioned, from seizure by the Government of Great Britain?

It is a familiar principle of International Law that the ships of war of a State are Ships of war exentitled to the privilege of exterritoriality. This is a point on which leading publicists territorial. are agreed. Wheaton, in his "Eléments de Droit International," writes :-

upon strict international right, or upon an original concession of comity with respect to the State in its aggregate capacity, which, by inveterate practice, has assumed the position of a right, is a consideration of not much practical importance. But it is of some importance, for if the better opinion be, as it would seem to be, that the privilege in question was originally a concession of comity, it may, on due notice being given, be revoked by a State, so ill-advised as to adopt such a course, which could not happen if it were a matter of matural right. But, unquestionally, in the case of the foreign ship of war, or of the foreign Sovereign and Ambassador, every State which has not formerly notified its departure from this usage of the civilized world, is under a facility convention to accord this privilege to the foreign ship of war lying in its harbours."

No writer has, however, discussed the subject with so much clearness and force as M. Ortolan in his "Diplomatic de la Mer":—

"Les bâtiments de guerre au contraire, armés par l'Etat Int-même et pour sa défense, en sont les représentants à l'etranger; leurs commandants et leurs officiers sont comme des délégués du pouvoir exécutif, et sur quelques points du pouvoir judiciaire de leur pays. Ces bâtiments doivent donc participer pleinement à l'indépendance et à la souveraineté de la puissance qui les arme; ils ont droit aux respects et aux homeurs qui sont dus à cette souveraineté; c'est ce que reconnaissent et ce que commandent les lois internationales."

Par cela seul que les bâtiments de guerre sont armés par le Gouvernement d'un Etat indépendant, auquel ils apparaiement, que leurs commandants et leurs officiers sont des fonctionnaires publicies de cet Etat et en exercent la puissance exécutive, en certains points même la puissance judicies enfin que tout individu faisant partie de leur équipage, sans distinction de grade, est un agent de la force publique ; ces bâtiments, personnifiés, sont une portion de ce Gouvernement et doivent être indépendants et respectés à son égal.

Ainsi, quel que soit le lieu où ils se trouvent, qui que soit au monde, étranger au Gouvernement auquel ils appartiennent, n'a le droit de s'immiscer en rien dans ce qui se passe à leur bord, et ercore moins d'y pénétrer par la force.

On exprime généralement cette règle par une métaphore passée en contume, et tellement accréditée, tellement traditionnelle, que dans la plupart des esprits elle est devenue comme une raison justificative de la proposition dont elle n'est véritablement qu'une expression figurée. On dit que tout bâtiment de guerre est une partie du territoire de la nation à laquelle il appartient : d'où la conséquence que même lorsqu'il est dans un port étranger, les officiers, l'équipage et toute personne quelconque qu'en expression bord, est censée être, et que tout fait passé à bord est censé passé, sur ce territoire. C'est par une continuation, par une expression résumée de la même ligure, qu'on appelle ce privilège le privilège ou le droit d'exterritorialité."

The matter is so well handled by this able writer that I am induced to cite one or two more passages:—‡

"Ce qui est vrai, c'est que le navire est une habitation flottant, avec une population soumise aux lois et au tiouvernement de l'Etat dont le navire a la nationalité, et placée sous la protection de cet Etat. Ce qui est vrai, c'est que si le navire est bâtiment de guerre, il est, en outre, une forteresse mobile portant en son sein une portion même de la puissance publique de cet Etat, des officiers et un équipage qui forment tous dans leur ensemble un corps organisé de fonctionnaires et d'agents militaires de la leur de la puissance publique de cet Etat, des officiers et un équipage qui forment tous dans leur ensemble un corps organisé de fonctionnaires et d'agents militaires de la leur de la pution.

"By the unanimous consent of nations," says Chief Justice Marshall, "a foreigner is amenable to then, to the Court to be a principle of public law that national ships of war entering the port of a friendly Power open for their reception are to be considered as exempted by the consent of that Power from its jurisdiction."

It has been ingeniously attempted by the Counsel of the United States to place the decision in this case and the judgment of Chief Justice Marshall on the footing that a neutral Court has no jurisdiction over a belligerent vessel as a matter simply of judicial authority. But this is not so; the eminent Judge who delivered the judgment in that case places the matter not on the footing of jurisdiction in a judicial point of view, but as one of international right. In proof of which the following passages are

"A nation would justly be considered as violating its faith, although that faith may not be expressly plighted, which should suddenly, and without precious notice, exercise its territorial powers in a manner not consonant to the usuges and received obligations of the civilized world.

"If, for reasons of State, the ports of a nation generally, or any particular ports, be closed against vessels of war generally, or the vessels of war of any particular nation, notice is usually given of such determination. If there be no prohibition, the ports of a friendly nation are considered as open to the determination.

If there is no position, the position is at peace, and they are supposed to enter such ports, and to remain in them, while allowed to remain, under the protection of the Government of the place.

But in all respects different is the situation of a public armed ship. She constitutes a part of the military force of her nation; acts under the immediate and direct command of the Sovereign; is employed by him in national objects. He has many and powerful motives for preventing those objects employed by min in national organs. The has many one powering interference cannot take place from being defeated by the interference of a foreign State. Such interference cannot take place without affecting his power and his dignity. The implied license, therefore, under which such vessel enters a friendly port, may reasonably be construed, and it seems to the Court ought to be construed, as containing an exemption from the jurisdiction of the sorreign within whose territory she claims the rights

No doubt the effect to be given to the commission of a belligerent Government must Commission of depend on its power to act as a Government. And I repeat what I have before mere belligerent. endeavoured to make good: namely, that where an integral portion of a nation separates itself from the parent State, and establishes a de facto Government of its own, excluding the former Government from all power and control, and thereupon a civil war ensues, a neutral nation is fully justified in recognizing the Government de fucto as a belligerent, though it has not as yet acknowledged it as a nation; and that from the time of the acknowledgment of its belligerent status, the Government de facto acquires, in relation to the neutral, all the rights which attach to the status of a belligerent of an established nationality. The practice of nations has been uniform on this point; all the maritime nations concurred in according to the Confederate Government the status and rights of a belligerent. The commissions of the Confederate States, must therefore be taken to have been valid, and to have had the same force and efficacy as the commissions of any recognized Government would have had.

It has, indeed, been contended that, in the particular instance of the vessels belonging to the Confederate States, the commissions of the Government de facto ought not to have been respected. After having listened, with the utmost attention, to the argument of Mr. Evarts, I protest I am at a foss to know why. Setting aside all the idle tanguage that has been written and spoken about "piracy"—as though the ships of eleven great provinces, having an organized Government, and carrying on one of the greatest civil wars recorded in history, could be called pirates—the argument comes to this: that a country, the independent nationality of which has not been acknowledged, and which has not been admitted into the fraternity of nations, has no rights of sovereignty, and consequently cannot by its commission exclude the right of the local sovereign to seize one of its vessels of war if any infraction of the municipal law has been committed in respect of it. But what is this, practically, but to deprive the recognition or belligerency of all the effects it was intended to have? It is admitted among nations that such a recognition may be made by a neutral State. Its purpose is to invest the de facto Government with the character of a belligerent Power, for the common benefit of both belligerent and neutral, without any recognition of independence or sovereignty. The recognition would plainly be idle if it did not carry with it one of the most important rights incidental to a belligerent Government, that of commissioning and employing vessels of war, and of having those vessels, when sailing under its flag, and armed with its commissions, invested with the privileges conceded to ships of war, and therefore exempted from the jurisdiction of any neutral country in whose waters they may be.

Effect of alleged violation of neutral territory.

But it is alleged that, even assuming the Commissions to have been valid, these vessels ought nevertheless to have been seized. The argument, as I understand it, is in substance this: the equipping and sending forth of a vessel from neutral territory, for the purpose of being employed in the service of a belligerent, is a violation of the territorial rights of the neutral; every violation of the territory of a neutral is a hostile act; every hostile act calls upon the neutral to vindicate its rights by force; therefore Great Britain ought to have seized these vessels.

Hautefeuille.

In support of this argument the following passage is cited from Hautefeuille:—

"Le fait de construire un bâtiment de guerre pour le compte d'un belligérant, on de l'urmer dans les Etats neutres, est une violation du territoire. Toutes les prises faites par un bâtiment de cette mature sont illégitimes, en quelque lieu qu'elles aient été faites. Le souverain offensé a le droit de s'en empurer, même de force, si elles sont amenées dans ses ports, et d'en réclamer la restitution lorsqu'elles emparer, mena de note, en général, conduites dans les ports hors de sa juridiction. Il peut également sont, comme cela arrive en général, conduites dans les ports hors de sa juridiction. réclamer le désarmement du bâtiment illégalement armé sur son territoire, et même le détenir s'il entre dans quelque lieu soumis à sa souveraineté, jusqu'à ce qu'il ait été désarmé."•

After which the learned author goes on to use the following strong language, which, however, appears to express a view peculiar to himself, and, so far as I am aware, shared by no other writer on international law :-

"Le peuple neutre ne peut négliger l'accomplissement de ce devoir, sans s'exposer à la juste vengeance de la nation à laquelle cet abandon de ses droits porterait un grave préjudice, sans lui fournir un juste sujet de guerre. On pourrait en effet l'accuser, avec raison, d'abdiquer les droits de sa souvernincté, de son indépendance, en faveur de l'une des parties en guerre, au préjudice de l'autre, et par conséquent de manquer d'impartialité, de mécommitre le second devoir de la neutralité. +

If, indeed, by constructing or arming a ship, M. Hautefeuille means constructing or arming for the immediate purpose of war, so as to constitute a hostile expedition from the shore of the neutral, I entirely agree that this will amount to a violation of neutral territory. Short of that, it will only be a violation of the local law, and therefore will not amount to a violation of territory. This distinction is all important, but appears to have been wholly lost sight of.

But even should it amount to a violation of territory, it seems monstrous to assert that the neutral is bound to have recourse to force, possibly to become involved in war, for the benefit of the other belligerent.

It is to be observed that M. Hautefeuille, before he came to the subject of ships, had been speaking of the violation of neutral territory by acts of hostility, such as the taking of a ship in neutral waters.

He could hardly, I imagine, mean to go the length of saying that the clandestine equipment of a ship for belligerent use, not amounting to a hostile expedition, would be such a violation of the rights of the neutral as would justify, much less necessitate, a declaration of war.

M. Ortolan discusses the subject with the calm judgment which distinguishes

It is true that his reasoning is addressed to the obligation of the neutral State to him. insure the restoration of prizes illegally captured within its waters; but it is obvious that the principle he lays down applies to every violation of neutral territory by a belligerent:-

" L'illégalité des actes d'hostilité exercés dans les eaux territoriales d'une puissance neutre entraîne, comme conséquence directe, l'illégalité des prises faites en dedans des limites de ces enux. Ces prises ne sont pus valables soit qu'elles aient été l'ûtes par des navires de guerre, soit qu'elles Paient été par des corsaires. C'est le devoir de l'Etat auquel appartient le capteur de les restituer aux premiers propriétaires; et même c'est le droit et le devoir de l'Etat neutre dont le territoire a été violé de prononcer lui-même cette restitution si la prise se trouve amenée chez lui.

"Toutefois la nullité des prises ainsi faites n'est pas tellement absolue qu'elle puisse être invoquée, et que l'Etat du capteur doive la prononcer même en l'absence de toute réclamation de la part de l'Etat neutre dont on prétend que les droits ont été méconnus. 'C'est une règle technique des cours de prises, dit à ce sujet M. Wheaton, 'de ne restituer leur proprieté aux réchamants particuliers, en cas pareil, que sur la demande du Gouvernement neutre dont le territoire a été ainsi violé. Cette règle est fondée sur le principe que l'Etat neutre seul a été blessé dans ses droits par une telle capture et que le réclamant ennemi n'a pas le droit de paraître pour entraîner la non-validité de la capture.

"Nous adhérons complètement à cette doctrine et à cette jurisprudence pratique. The Florida.

But it is said that-independently of any violation of territory in the sense of inter- Duty of seizing national relations-because the vessel was equipped and armed in defiance, or in fraud, for breach of of the municipal law of Great Britain, it was incumbent on the British authorities to municipal law. seize her when she next entered a British port. In this contention there appears to be—I say it with all possible respect—considerable confusion of ideas, and a losing sight of elementary principles. I agree with M. Staempfli that, these vessels having been ordered by agents of the Confederate Government, it is the same thing as though they had been ordered by that Government itself; and that there was, consequently, in respect of them, a violation of the municipal law of Great Britain by the Confederate Government itself. But it is a great mistake to suppose that a breach of the municipal law of a neutral country, though relating to neutrality, becomes a violation of the territorial rights of the neutral, because committed by a belligerent Power. The character of the offender does not change or affect the character or quality of the offence. Nothing short of a breach of neutrality, according to international law, can justify a resort to forcible measures on the part of the neutral as for a violation of his nentral rights.

Now, the equipment of the Florida in England for the service of the Confederates constituted no violation of neutrality by international law, the vessel not having been armed, or sent out for the present purpose of war. On her way to Nassau she would have been subject to seizure as contraband of war; but that is all. In like manner, though the arming of the vessel at the desert island of Green Cay may have been, strictly speaking, a violation of British law, yet, there being no present purpose of war, it was no violation of neutral territory within the rules of international law. It was, at the utmost, a breach of the law of Great Britain. And here the distinction should be kept in view to which I have already referred, and which seems to me to have altogether been lost sight of, namely, that a breach of the municipal law, though it may be of a law relating to neutrality, does not constitute a breach of neutrality as between nations. That which, if done by a subject, would simply amount to a breach of his own law, does not become a violation of neutrality, because done by a foreigner. Nor is it the more so because done by a helligerent Government, or the agent of such Government. Let such a Government send agents to purchase ships equipped and ready for war, not with any immediate purpose of using them as ships of war on leaving port, but that they may be conveyed to its own country, to be eventually used for war, if such an act is an offence by local law, it will still be an offence against the local law alone. How, then, can it be said that for a violation of municipal law alone a neutral can seize a vessel, in respect of which that law alone has been violated, when it has become the property of the Government of another State? No principle of the law of nations is more firmly settled or universally acknowledged than that an independent Sovereign or Government, and, for this purpose, the Government of a State, as yet acknowledged only as a belligerent, must be taken to be an independent Government-is not amenable to the municipal law of another country. All rights, all obligations, all duties; all liabilities, as between Sovereign and Sovereign, State and State, Government and Government, depend wholly and solely either on express convention or on the principles and rules of the common law of nations. How, then, in the matter of an infraction of the municipal law only, could a neutral State have recourse, as against a belligerent Government, to the powers which that law gave it against its own subjects alone?

But, assuming even that a neutral State would be entitled to seize a vessel, though armed with a commission from a belligerent Power, by reason of some offence committed against its neutrality, as a reparation for a wrong done against itself, how can it possibly be asserted that it is under any obligation to do so? It may be said that a nation is bound to maintain its own sovereignty, to vindicate its honour, to maintain the inviolability of its territority; and, morally speaking, this may be true; but, I ask, what law is there which makes it obligatory on it to do this? A State, like an individual, may omit to insist on its rights, among others on its right of reparation for wrong done to it-unusquisque potest renuntiure juri pro se constituto. admit the argument that it is less free to do so, because it is to the interest of a belligerent that it should resent a wrong by force, and so infliet damage on his adversary. To ask for apology or reparation is one thing; but to seize the ship of another State, is neither more nor less than a step towards war. It is an act which no powerful State would submit to; which would lead to reprisals, in all probability to war. It is, therefore, one which no powerful State should have recourse to as against a weak one. Again, the neutral State may be a weak one-the wrong-doing belligerent a powerful one. The neutral may have the strongest motives for remaining at peace. Is it to be said that, in spite of all such considerations, the nentral, who would not have recourse to forcible measures so far as his own interests are concerned, is nevertheless bound to do so, no matter what may be the consequences, because the other belligerent has a right to insist on it? this is what I understand our honourable President to maintain. I cannot, for my part, concur in such a view. What would be said if a State, the neutrality of which is secured by internation: I arrangements, such for instance as Belgium, were to find itself in such a position ? Would it be bound to have recourse to force because a belligerent had had a vessel of war constructed in one of its ports without its knowledge. I cannot think so. I adopt the conclusion of M. Ortolan. The question whether a breach of its neutral rights shall be resented or not is matter for the neutral State to determine. "C'est à lui à juger s'il y a eu, ou s'il n'y a pas eu, véritablement atteinte portée à sa souveraineté; s'il doit à sa propre dignité et aux obligations d'impartialité qui lui impose sa qualité de neutre, de réclamer contre cette atteinte et de demander que les conséquences en soient annulées ou réparées; ou bien s'il veut garder le silence et n'élever aucune réclamation."

No doubt a neutral State may, and in some instances ought-as, for instance, in such a flagrant case as the capture of the Florida by the Wachusett in the port of Bahia -to insist on redress. If the Florida had not sunk in the meantime, Brazil would have had a right to insist on her being set at liberty. But what if the Florida had not fortunately sunk, and the United States had refused to release her on the demand of Brazil? Though the latter might, it so minded, have made reprisals, or gone to war in vindication of her own rights, will any one say that Brazil must necessarily, and as matter of obligation to the Confederate Government, have gone to war with the United States? Surely it is for a nation whose neutrality has been infringed to judge for itself whether it will or will not resent it. In some cases, as where the disparity of force is very great, it might not think it politic to do so. In others, where the degree of offence is comparatively slight, it might not be thought worth while to follow the matter up. In the present instance, Great Britain, having no diplomatic relations with the Confederate Government, had no opportunity of remonstrating. This is an inconvenience which necessarily accompanies the recognition of belligerency without that of sovereignty, though the inconvenience is counterbalanced by other weighty considerations. Being thus unable to remonstrate, will it be said that Great Britain ought to have thrown the weight of her arms into the contest going on between the Confederate States and their more powerful opponent, because these vessels had managed to get away from her shores? especially when there was very great doubt whether, in respect of vessels armed out of British jurisdiction, any offence had been committed against international law. Would the world's opinion have sanctioned such a proceeding? At all events, would not public opinion have reprobated the seizure of these vessels as an act of unpardonable perfidy, if they had been allowed to enter British ports without notice, a deliberate intention of seizing them having been first formed?

In truth, this contention on the part of the United States is entirely an afterthought. During the whole course of the war, amid the numerous demands and reclamations made by the United States' Government and its Representatives, it never occurred to them, so far as I am aware, to suggest to Her Majesty's Government to detain these vessels on their entering British ports. The conclusion, then, at which I arrive, is that, even if Great Britain had a right by international law to seize these vessels, she was not bound to do so, and in common honour could have not done so without giving son of some offence done against itself, o do so? The Florida.

But it has been said that, whether or not Great Britain had the right to seize, or whether or not, having the right, she was under any obligation to exercise it, or whether from neutral ports. Duty of excluding from neutral ports.

Duty of excluding from neutral ports.

The answer is, that the questions—whether the law of Great Britain had been broken, and whether the vessels were, in this sense, delinquent or not, were in each case disputable questions of mixed law and fact, which could not in any way be investigated between Great Britain and the Confederate States, and on which the opinions of high legal authorities in Great Britain were known to differ. It was the right and duty of the British Government, under such circumstances, to take the course which it deemed most consistent with the maintenance of a strictly impartial neutrality; and if, under the influence of this motive, it decided (as it did) against attempting to discriminate between the different vessels bearing the public commission of the Confederate States, there belligerent. The Rules of the Treaty of Washington are wholly silent as to any such obligation, and the law of nations imposes none.

The question as to the effect of a belligerent commission in the case of a vessel illegally armed in a neutral port came under the consideration of a Circuit Court of the United States in the case of the United States r. Peters,*—a case relating to a hip called Les Jumeaux, otherwise the Cassius. The result was remarkable, and is deserving of serious attention.

The vessel in question was originally a British cutter engaged in the Guinea trade. Case of the She was pierced for twenty guns, but only carried four guns in broadside and two swivels. Having passed into the ownership of one Lemaître, a Frenchman, she came into Philadelphia with eargo as a merchant-vessel. Lemaître having admitted others of his countrymen to joint ownership, it was resolved to augment the force of the vessel, with a view to her sale to the French Government, then at war with England, as a ship of war. The attempt having been prevented by the United States' Government, the vessel left Philadelphia in ballast; but some sixty miles down the river took in more guns and a considerable number of men. There was no doubt that what was done amounted to a breach of the Neutrality Act of 1794. One Guinet, who had taken part in arming the vessel, was indicted under that Act, found guilty, and was sentenced to a year's imprisonment and a fine of 400 dollars.

The vessel was sold to the French Government and duly commissioned as a vessel of war. Coming again into Philadelphia, the year after, with a prize, no less than three suits arose; one in rem for restitution of the prize; one in personam against Davis, the officer in command of the Cassius, for damages for taking the prize vessel, neither of which are in point to the present purpose; in the third, a Mr. Ketland instituted a suit to have the vessel declared forfeited. The Act of 1794 giving half the value of forfeited vessels to the informer, Ketland filed his information for the forfeiture, as it is technically termed qui tam, for the benefit as well of the Treasury as himself, on the ground of the illegal equipment of the vessel, the year before. On M. Adet, the French Minister, writing to complain of this procedure, Mr. Pickering, then Secretary of State, replied that the Executive could not take this case, any more than it could the preceding one relative to the same vessel, from the judiciary; and that the court had decided that it could not, in this penal proceeding, accept security for the Cassius in lieu of the vessel He stated the unquestioned fact that, the Cassius was, the year before, fully equipped and armed in the United States, and that the acts done had been already decided in the trial of the United States versus Guinet) to be a violation of their laws of neutrality; and he added that the French Minister ought not to be surprised that this matter should become a subject of judicial inquiry, and the effect of the subsequent alleged transfer to the French government, a matter of judicial decision.

The United States' Attorney was instructed by he Government to intervene in these suits, and to suggest for the consideration of the Court, as matter of defence, the transfer of the vessel to the French Government, and her having been commissioned by the latter, which he did in the form of a suggestion. In the suit in rem against the vessel, at the term of the Court in April 1796, the Secretary of State. Mr. Pickering, requested M. Adet to furnish the evidence of the bond fide transfer to the French Government, for the use of the United States' Attorney. M. Adet replied, declining to furnish proofs to the judiciary of a sale and payment, saying that his relations were solely with the Executive. He, however, gave a certificate that the vessel was a French public ship, duly commissioned, to which he afterwards, on request of the Attorney, added the date of her acquiring that character. Mr. Rawle, the United States' Attorney, expressed his fear that this certificate would not be accepted as legal proof; but M. Adet declined to furnish any other, as beneath the dignity of his nation, and informed the Secretary of State that the French Government had ordered him to ascertain, in conference with the Secretary, the reparation for the injuries and damages from the proceedings in the matter of this vessel; and that he furnished the certificate as a courtesy to the United States' Government and not for a cause in which the French Government had any further interest. In October term, 1796, the motion of the United States' Attorney for a dismissal of the proceedings came on for argument. At the hearing, another question presented itself under the statute, namely, whether the Circuit Court could take cognizance of informations for forfeiture under the Act of 1794; and the Court dismis ed the proceedings on the ground that such a suit must be instituted in the District Court, and, consequently, that the Circuit Court had no jurisdiction in the cause.

Thus, no decision was actually given by a Court of Law on the important question—how far the commission of a belligerent Power would be a bar to the seizure of a vessel illegally equipped or armed in the port of a neutral. But, on the other hand, the intervention of the Government, through its chief legal officer, with a suggestion to the Court in which the suit was pending, that such a Commission alforded a sufficient defence, shows, beyond all possibility of doubt, that the United States' Government considered the question as one which it ought to raise in favour of the belligerent who had acquired property in the vessel, and had commissioned it, not-withstanding that there had been a flagrant violation of its own neutrality and of its own law; and, what is of still greater importance, that the United States' Government would not itself seize, or be party to the seizure and condemnation of a vessel under such circumstances, but, on the contrary, did its best to oppose it. With what pretence of reason or justice, then, can it be said that Great Britain was bound to do, for the benefit of the United States, in the case of the Florida, what the American Government not only refused to do, but opposed being done, under precisely the same circumstances?

Stay of belligerent ships in neutral ports. Supplies of coal there.

I proceed a the consideration of another subject which arises, in the first instance, with respect to the Florida, but which applies equally to the whole series of vessels with which we have to deal—namely, that of the entry and stay of belligerent ships of war in the ports and waters of a neutral, and of the supplies which may be there afforded to them.

There are certain points on which all writers are unanimous, and, as I had till now imagined, all nations agreed.

Power of neutral Sovereign. A Sovereign has absolute dominion in and over his own ports and waters. He can permit the entrance into them to the ships of other nations, or refuse it; he can grant it to some, can deny it to others; he can subject it to such restrictions, conditions, or regulations as he pleases. But, by the universal comity of nations, in the absence of such restrictions or prohibition, the ports and waters of every nation are open to all comers. Ships can freely enter, and freely stay; can have necessary repairs done; can obtain supplies of every kind, and in unlimited quantity; and, though their crews, when on shore, are subject to the local jurisdiction, ships of war are considered as forming part of the territory of the country to which they helong, and, consequently, as exempt from local jurisdiction; and, save as regards sanitary or other port regulations, as protected by the flag under which they sail from all interference on the part of the local authority.

Such is the state of things while the world is at peace. But if a war arises between any two countries, a considerable modification, no doubt, of the rights both of Sovereigns who remain neutral and of those engaged in the war, immediately arises.

While the neutral Sovereign has the undoubted right of imposing any restrictions or conditions he pleases, in respect of any of the foregoing particulars, on the ships of war of either belligerent, yet, if he exercises that right, the equality which is essential to neutrality requires that he shall impose them equally on both, and enforce them equally against both. On the other hand, by the universal accord of nations, the belligerent is bound to respect the inviolability of neutral waters, and therefore cannot attack his enemy within them, or make them the base of bostile operations. He is subject also to restraint in three other important particulars: he cannot recruit his erew from the neutral port; he cannot take advantage of the opportunity afforded him of having repairs done to augment in any respect the warlike force of his vessel; he cannot purchase on the neutral territory arms or munitions of war for the use of it. These restrictions are imposed by the law of nations, independently of any regulations of the local Sovereign. Besides this, the helligerent is bound to conform to the regulations made by the latter with reference to the exercise of the liberty accorded to him: but subject to these conditions, a belligerent vessel has the right of asylum, that is, of refuge from storm and hostile pursuit; has liberty of entry and of stay; that of having the repairs done which are necessary to enable it to keep the sea in safety; and that of obtaining whatever is necessary for the purpose of navigation, as well as supplies for the subsistence of the crew.

And—be it remembered—I fear it has not always been borne in mind—the liberty thus afforded is not by the general law subjected to any limitations as regards length of stay, quantity of supply, or condition as to the future proceedings of the vessel.

The Case of the United States seeks, indeed, to put further limits on the liberty thus conceded to helligerent ships. It would prohibit "successive supplies to the same he the United lately necessary to gain the nearest of its own ports;" would make the permission afforded to a vessel to take what it calls "an excessive supply of coal" a failure in the performance of the duty of the neutral.

Such restrictions, though they may be created by the will of the local sovereign, have, however, no existence by international law. They are unknown to it. No authority is adduced in support of them, nor can any be found. No writer on international law, in speaking of the general liberty of belligerent vessels to have repairs done or to obtain supplies, speaks of any such restriction as existing independently of local regulations. The authorities are conclusive to the contrary.

Two leading authors are express on the point. M. Ortolan writes thus:-

"Les règles relatives à l'accès et au séjour momentané des bâtiments dans les ports et dans les ndes étrangers restent les mêmes en temps de paix qu'en temps de guerre."*

M. Hautefeuille says :-

"L'asile maritime consiste à recevoir dans les rades fermées, même dans les ports, les bâtiments des belligérants, que leur entrée soit volontaire ou nécessité par la tempête, par le manque de vivres, ou par tonte autre cause, même par la poursuite de l'ennemi. Les vaisseux admis peuvent acheter les vivres qui leur sont nécessaires, réparer les avaries faites, soit par les accidents de mer, soit par le combat, soigner leurs malades où leurs blessés, puis sortir librement pour aller livrer de nouveaux combat, soit par les accidents de mer, soit par les accidents de mer, soit par les malades où leurs blessés, puis sortir librement pour aller livrer de nouveaux combats."

While restraints may be and often have been imposed by neutral Sovereigns in respect of the entry of belligerent vessels into their ports and waters, of the length of their stay, and of the supplies to be afforded them, no one has till now ever gone the length of saying that it forms any part of the obligations of the neutral to make such regulations.

The greater number of the maritime States made none such on the occasion of the evil war, except as regards the reception of privateers, it being the apparent desire of all rations to put down for ever this worst and most noxious form of maritime warfare. Some imposed a restraint on ships of war bringing prizes into their ports, though mostly this was confined to privateers. Spain, France, Brazil, and Great Britain adopted the rule contained in Her Majesty's Instructions of the 31st January, 1862, of limiting the stay of belligerent vessels to twenty-four hours, except in eases of necessity; Brazil and Great Britain, but these alone, that of limiting the supply of coal to the quantity sufficient to take the ship to the nearest port of her own country.

The Government of the Netherlands issued instructions to the Governors of its West India Colonies, limiting the stay of belligerent vessels of war to twice twenty-four hours, but afterwards did away with such restrictions on the occasion of a complaint made by the United States.

"The ships of war of the belligerent parties, provided they submit to the international regulations for their admission into neutral ports, may remain for an antimited time in Dutch harbours and estuaries; they may also provide themselves with an antimited quantity of coal. The Government, however, reserves to itself the right, whenever it is thought necessary for the preservation of neutrality, to limit the duration of such stay to twenty-four hours."

Italy had at the time in question no regulations on the subject. By the present Italian Naval Code (chap. 7), while it is provided that "nothing shall be furnished to vessels of war or to belligerent privateers beyond articles of food and commodities, and the actual means of repair necessary to the sustenance of their crews and the safety of their navigation," it is further provided that "vessels of war or belligerent privateers wishing to fill up their stores of coal, cannot be furnished with the same before twenty-four hours after their arrival"—this regulation being to prevent hostile vessels from leaving together.

Nothing is said as to the "navigation" being to the nearest port, and "stores" of coal are spoken of without limitation. It is evident that this code contemplates no such restriction.

As, then, the general law neither imposes any limit on the stay of a belligerent vessel in a neutral port, nor any restriction as to quantity in respect of the articles of which it sanctions the supply, no question can arise as to the stay of any Confederate vessel in a British port, or as to the quantity of coal supplied to it, prior to the Queen's Regulations of January 31, 1862.

After that date, the stay of belligerent vessels in Her Majesty's ports having been limited, save under exceptional circumstances, to twenty-four hours, and the supply of coal to so much as should be necessary to take them to their nearest port, and a second supply within a period of three months having been prohibited, it became the duty of Her Majesty's officers not to allow either of these limits to be exceeded; and it became the duty of belligerents, knowing that they were admitted into British ports on the condition of complying with these regulations, honestly and in good faith to conform to them. What if there should have been at any time an instance of deviation from the strict tenor of these regulations? The officer offending would, of course, be responsible to his superior. Would the Government be responsible to the other belligerent for any damage done by the vessel?

In the first place, it being the undoubted right of the local Sovereign to impose such conditions as he pleases on the entry of belligerent vessels into his ports, but the regulations being directed to the Sovereign's own officers to be carried out by them, and thus forming part of the municipal law of the neutral, what right does a belligerent acquire to insist that the regulation shall be enforced against his enemy? Simply that which arises from the duty, always incumbent on the neutral, as being of the very essence of neutrality, of enforcing against the one belligerent any rule which he enforces against the other. If both are treated alike there can be accause of complaint.

Again, to constitute an offence against the law of neutrality, there must be, as to constitute an offence against any law, a malus unimus, a mens rea—an intention to contravene the law—here, that of showing undue favour to the one belligerent to the disadvantage of the other.

When, therefore, any departure from the letter of a regulation has arisen from mistake, as where a Governor believed that, because a vessel had suffered from vis major, as from storm and tempest, the ease formed an exception to the rule; or where he considered that, because he had furnished an extra supply to one belligerent, he might, under similar circumstances, do the same for another; or, where a mistake might be made as to the precise quantity of coal necessary to take the vessel to the nearest port—there would, as it seems to line, be no violation of neutrality for which, on rational grounds, a nation could be held responsible.

In all such cases of alteged infraction of neutrality, the true question should be, not whether a vessel has been permitted to stay in a port a few hours more or less than the precise time prescribed, nor whether n few tons, more or less, of coal have been allowed to be taken, but whether there has been an honest intention to carry out the regulations fairly and impartially. And, in judging of this, credit should be given to persons in anthority for honesty of purpose and a desire to discharge their duty faithfully. This Tribunal should take a larger and more generous view of official conduct than it may have assumed in the eyes of jealous belligerents, disappointed that exclusive favour was not shown to themselves, and irritated because, notwithstanding thei. loud demands that their opponents should be treated as pirates and outcasts, civilized nations, with Great Britain at their head, took a nore liberal and enlightened view of the relative

Undoubtedly, if, after regulations had been made by a neutral Sovereign as to the accommodation and hospitality to be accorded to belligerent ships in the neutral ports, the regulations were enforced against the one, while they were not enforced or were relaxed with regard to the other, there would be a breach of neutrality, of which the less favoured belligerent, if injury was thereby occasioned to him, would have a right to complain. And, in truth, it is to this point, and this point alone, and not to minute questions of hours of stay or tons of coal supplied, that the inquiry with reference to what has been called the bospitality afforded to belligerent vessels should be directed. Whether Her Majesty's regulations were carried out by the local Governors in the different ports fairly and conscientiously, with an honest desire to discharge their duty in obedience to those regulations, we shalf see as we advance; but so far as I am aware, there is no ground for saying that the ships of the United States were not admitted into British ports as freely, or were not supplied with coal and other necessaries as liberally, as the ships of the Confederates. One or two complaints made by querulous officials during the war will be noticed by-and-by. In substance they really come to nothing.

But a novel and, to may mind, most extraordinary proposition is now put forward, Whether coaling namely, that if a belligerent ship is allowed to take coal, and then to go on its business as a ship of war, this is to make the port from which the coal is procured "a base of naval operations," so as to come within the prohibition of the second Rule of the

The Florida.

We have here another instauce of an attempt to force the words of the Treaty to a meaning which they were never-at least so far as one of the Contracting Parties is concerned—intended to bear. It would be absurd to suppose that the British Government, in assenting to the Rule as laid down, intended to admit that whenever a ship of war had taken in coal at a British port and then gone to sea again as a war vessel, a liability for all the mischief done by her should ensue. Nor can I believe the United States' Government had any such arrière pensée in framing the Rule; as, if such had been the case, it is impossible to suppose that they would not have distinctly informed the British Government of the extended application they proposed to give to the Rule.

The rule of international law, that a beligerent shall not make neutral territory the base of hostile operations, is founded on the principle that the neutral territory inviolable by the belligerent, and that it is the duty of the neutral not to allow his territory to be used by one belligerent as a starting point for operations against the other. This is nowhere better explained, as regards ships of war, than by M. Ortolan,

"Le principe général de l'inviolabilité du territoire neutre exige aussi que l'emploi de ce territoire aste franc de toute mesure on moyen de guerre, de l'un des belligérants contre l'autre. C'est une ebligation pour chacun des belligérants de s'en abstenir; c'est aussi un devoir pour l'Etat neutre déxiger cette abstention; et c'e.t. aussi pour lui un devoir d'y veiller et d'en maintenir l'observation à l'encentre de qui que ce soit. Ainsi il appartient à l'autorité qui commande dans les lieux neutres, où des navires belligérants, soit de guerre, soit de commerce, ont été reçus, de prendre des mesures nécessaires pour que l'asile accordé ne tourne pas en machination hostile contre l'un des belligérans; pour empécher spécialement qu'il ne devienne un lieu d'où les bâtiments de guerre ou les corsaires surveillent addelà de la mer territoriale. Une de ces mesures consiste à empêcher la sortie simultance des navires apartenant à des puissances ennemies l'une de l'autre."*

It must be, I think, plain that the words "base of operations" must be accepted in their ordinary and accustomed sense, as they have hitherto been understood, both in common parlance and among authors who have written on international law. Now, the term "base of warlike operations" is a military term, and has a well-known sense. It signifies a local position which serves as a point of departure and return is military merations, and with which a constant connection and communication can be kept up, and which may be fallen back upon whenever necessary. In naval warfare it would mean something analogous—a port or water from which a fleet or a ship of war might watch an enemy and sally forth to attack him, with the possibility of falling back upon the port or water in question, for fresh supplies, or shelter, or a renewal of

The meaning to be ascribed to the term in question as applicable to a neutral port operations. is to be gathered, as was so well pointed out by Sir Roundell Palmer, from the instances given by the various writers on international law. Thus we find the distinguished author before referred to saying, in addition to the passage cited above :-

" Si des forces navales belligérantes sont stationnées dans une baie, dans un fleuve, ou à l'embonchure d'un fleuve, d'un Etat neutre, à dessein de profiter de cette station pour exercer les droits de la guerre, les captures faites par ces forces navales sont aussi illégales. Ainsi, si un navire belligérant mouillé on croisant dans les eaux neutres capture, au moyen de ses embarcations, un bâtiment qui se trouve en dellors des limites de ses caux, ce bâtiment n'est pas de bonne prise ; bien que l'emploi de la force n'ait pas eu lieu dans ce cus, sur le territoire neutre, néanmoins il est le résultat de l'usage de ce territoire; et un tel usage pour des desseins hostiles n'est pas permis."+

"It is a violation of a neutral territory," says Chancellor Kent, "for a belligerent ship to take her station within it in order to carry on hostile expeditions from thence, or to send her boats to capture vessels beyond it."

So Heffter :-

"Le neutre ne doit pas permettre que ses rades ou ses mers territoriales servent de stations aux

bâtiments des Puissances belligéeuntes.

"Le respect du aux mers territoriales neutres ne se borne pas à l'abstention absolue de tout acte d'hostilité ; il s'étend également aux faits qui préparent immédiatement ces actes. Ainsi une flotte, un vaisseau de guerre, un armateur ne saurait, sans commettre une violation de territoire, s'établir sur un point quelconque de cette mer, pour épier le passage des hâtiments, soit de guerre, soit marchands, de l'enneun, ou les navires neutres, encore qu'il sorte de sa retraite pour aller les attaquer hors les limites de la juridiction neutre. Il est de même défendu de croiser dans les caux réservées pour arriver au même but. $

So Pistoye and Duverdy:-

"Les belligérants ne doivent, ni par eux-mêmes ni par leurs corsaires, s'établir dans les mers neutres, pour surveiller l'ennemi et lui courir sus. Ils ne doivent non plus rester en croisière dans les mers neutres, pour saisir l'ennemi à sa sortie des ports neutres."

None of the instances thus given have the remotest reference to the ease of a vessel which, while cruizing against an enemy's ships, puts into a port and, after obtaining necessary supplies, again pursues her course.

If a military or naval officer were asked whether a ship merely putting into a port to coal, and then going to sea again, possibly on a particular warlike expedition, but without any idea of returning to or communicating with such port, for the next three months, can be held to be using it as "a base of operations," he would certainly laugh at the simplicity of the question.

That the United States are putting this construction on the term for the first time is plain from their own conduct throughout the civil war unless, indeed, they are prepared to acknowledge a perpetual violation of British neutrality on their own part.

It appears from the return sent from the various British ports of the amount of coal supplied to ships of war of the United States,¶ that these vessels received over 5,000 tons during the civil war. It appears from the claims made by the United States in respect of the employment of their vessels of war in the pursuit and capture of Confederate Ships, that of the foregoing amount no less than 4,000 tons was had expressly for the purpose of watching or pursuing particular ships.

The case of the Vanderbilt, when in pursuit of the Alabama, is a striking instance. After having coaled at Rio, she proceeded to St. Helena, there took in 400 tons (all she could get), then proceeded to Simon's Bay, and there took in 1,000 tons; she then went to the Mauritius and there coaled again. If the construction put by the United States' Government on the term "base of operations" is correct, in every one of these instances, there was a violation of neutrality and an infraction of the second and third Rules. Is there to be one law for the United States, and another for Great Britain?

But, in truth, such a construction is altogether unwarranted.

It may, perhaps, he as well to notice, as one instance occurs in this inquiry of a vessel remaining in a British port to avoid capture by an enemy, that the right of naval asylum is not subject, as is that afforded to military forces on laud, to any condition of disarming or dismantling the vessel. Azuni alone proposed to subject a vessel seeking refuge from an enemy to a similar condition to that of a military force on land, but he admitted that no precedent could be found for such a thing, and all subsequent writers

M. Hautefeuille for instance says:-

"Le droit d'asile maritime diffère essentiellement de celui que les neutres peuvent exercer en faveur des belligérants sur le territoire continental. Dans les guerres terrestres, lorsqu'une armée, fuyant devant son ennemi, vient se réfugier sur un territoire neutre, elle y est reçue, il est vrai ; elle y tronve devant son emieun, vient se rengier son un territone neatre, ene y est reçue, n'est viul, ene y trouve tous les secours d'humanité. Mais l'armée est dissonte, les hommes qui la composent sont désarmés et éloignés du théâtre de la guerre: en un mot, on remplit les devoirs d'humanité à l'égard des individus, elognes de discorde pas l'asile à l'armée pris comme corps. Le neutre qui, au lieu d'agir ainsi que je viens de la dire, accueillemit les troupes ennemies, leur fournirait des vivres, leur donnerait le temps de se de la dre, de leurs fatigues, de soigner leurs mulades et leurs blessés, et leur permettrait cusuite de renderte de la considéré comme neutre ; il manquemit à tous les devoirs de son Etat. L'asile maritime, au contraire, consiste à recevoir dans les rades fermées, a tous res de tous au son 1940. même dans les ports, les bâtiments des belligérants, que 1cur entrée soit volontaire ou nécessitée par la tempête, par le mauque de vivres ou par toute autre cause, même par la poursuite de l'ememi. Les vaisseaux admis peuvent acheter les vivres qui leur sont nécessaires, réparer les avaries faites, soit par vasseaux aums pearent au nous per leur sont necessantes, reparer es avaries mues, sont par les accidents de mer, soit par le combat, soigner leurs malades on leurs blessés, puis sortir librement pour aller livrer de nouveaux combats. Ils ne sont pas, par conséquent, soumis au désarmement comme les

M. Calvo in his recently published work on "International Law," says:—

"Tous les auteurs sont d'accord sur la différence radicule à établir entre l'asile accordé aux forces navales et celui qui l'est aux troupes de terre. En effet lorsqu'une armée en finite ou en déroute franchit les frontières d'une nation neutre celle-ci doit aussitôt la désarmer, l'interner, et l'éloigner le plus possible du théâtre des hostilités. Les mêmes mesures ne sont évidemment pas praticables à l'égard des navires qui entrem dans les ports, et qu'un usage universellement établi autorise, au contraîre, à se réparer, et à faire soigner leurs blessés, sauf à remettre en mer dès qu'ils ont ponrvu à leurs besoins."

M. Hautefeuille gives what seems to me to be the true ground of the distinction. Galiani and Azuni had ascribed it to the perils to which ships and men are exposed on

M. Hautefeuille says:-

"Il y a donc à cette différence immense une autre cause qu'il est utile de rechercher. Je crois qu'elle est tout entière dans la qualité reconnue du bâtiment. Il est une partie du territoire de son quene est tout ce qui concerne son gouvernement intérieur, il est exclusivement placé sons la juridic-pays; pour tout ce qui concerne son gouvernement intérieur, il est exclusivement placé sons la juridic-tion de son Souverain. Or, il est évident qu'ordonner le désarmement, c'est s'immiscer dans le gouvernement intérieur du vaisseau, c'est faire un acte de jur diction sur le vaisseau; le Prince neutre n'a pas le droit de le faire. Il peut refuser l'asile; il peut l'accorder sculement sous certaines conditions, avec des restrictions. S'il veut remplir les devoirs d'hu nanité, arracher le bâtiment aux périls qui peuvent le reprendre la mer. Tel est, à mon avis, le seul motif de la différence dont je viens de parler."‡

It is plain, therefore, that M. Staempfli was in error when, in speaking of the Sumter at Gibraltar, he assumed that her being allowed to remain in port, to avoid hostile capture, was a violation of neutrality.

It would be to carry the perversion of language too far to contend that, to supply of coal. coals to a belligerent from a neutral port was a use of the port for a "renewal augmentation of military supplies" within the meaning of the rule of the Treaty. The term can only have reference to munitions of war-slings necessary for actual battle, as powder, shot, shell, and the like. No question has ever been raised—no one has whatever was necessary to it for the purpose of navigation. Machinery and copl having taken, in a great measure, the place of masts and sais, the same principle tast of course apply to them. It was upon this principle that the great maritime nations— France, Holland, Spain, Brazil, acted in allowing coal to be supplied to Confederate vessels; it was on this principle that so abundant a supply was afforded in British ports to vessels of the United States.

In the result then it seems to me beyond all doubt that no question can arise as to the stay of belligerent ships in British ports prior to the issuing of the regulations of 31st of January, 1862, or as to the quantity of coal supplied to them before that time, so long as equal accommodation was afforded to both; and that, subsequently to that period, the only question is, whether these regulations were honestly and fairly acted upon towards both parties. To that question I shall now proceed to address myself, with reference, in the first instance, to the Florida.

At Nassau.

Having left Mobile on the 16th of January, 1863, the Florida arrived at Nassan on the 26th. It is complained in the Case of the United States* that "her entry into the harbour, though made without permission, was condoned;" that the visit lasted thirty-six hours, instead of twenty-tour; "that the supplies exceeded largely what was immediately necessary for the subsistence of the erew;" that "by the permission of the authorities she took in coal and provisions to last for three months." "She entered the port," it is said, "without any restrictions, and the officers landed in the garrison boat, escorted by the Fort Adjutant, Lieutenant Williams, of the 2nd West India Regiment." "The Governor made a feint of finding fault with the way in which she had entered, but ended by giving her all the hospitality which her Commander desired.

In an intemperate letter from Consul Whiting to Mr. Seward, of the 26th, he

"Sir,-I have the henour to inform you of the arrival at this port, this morning, of the Confederate steamer Florida, late the noted Oreto, in command of one Maflit, once a lieutenant in the United States navy. This pirate ship entered this port without any restrictions, with the Secession ensign at the peak and the Secession war pennant at the main, and anchored abreast of Her Majesty's ship Barracouta, Maflitt and his officers landing in the garrison boat, escorted by the Fort Adjutant, Lieutenant Williams, of the Second West India Regiment.

The pirate officers proceeded at once to the Royal Victoria Hotel to breakfast with the Confederate agents here, and they were received with much enthusiasm by the Secession sympathizers and a display of Secession bunting. The pirate ship, soon after anchoring, commenced coaling, by permission of the Governor; an evidence of the perfect neutrality which exists here, where the United States' steamer Dacotali, but a few months since, was only permitted to take on board twenty tons of coal from an American barque off Hog Island, and then only on Captain McKinstry and myself pledging ourselves, in writing, that within ten days after leaving this port she would not be cruizing within five miles of any island of the Bahama Government.

"Pretty neutrality this, I must say."

"Junuary 27, 1863.—The pirate ship is still at anchor, having exceeded her time of lying in a neutral port. Gangs worked all night taking in her coal, and she is ordered to sea this forenoon. By this time, however, my despatches have most likely reached some of our war vessels, and I trust they may be able to capture this formidable pirate.

"At noon the pirate got under way and stood out of the harbour, but continued all day coasting up and down the Hog Island shore, within two miles of the land. Twenty of her men left here, and others were shipped in their place. From one of the deserters I gleaned the following information,

"The Oreto left Mobile, January 15th, under command of Maffit; touched at Havana, where she lay twenty-four hours; thence sailed for Nassau, where she lay thirty-six hours and took on board coal. She has six 32-pounders, two 9-inch pivot guns, two brass 12-pounders, ample stores, ammunition, and one hundred and thirty men."+

I do not see why it should be stated in the Case that the Florida remained in the port of Nassau thirty-six hours, when Mr. Whiting's letter states that she arrived on the morning of the 26th and left at noon on the 27th. In point of fact she remained twenty-six hours. It behaves those who make accusations to use "due diligence" to secure accuracy in their facts.

It is to be regretted that it should be asserted that this steamer was allowed to take in coal for the months, when the other facts stated in the Case show this to have been impossible it is difficult to suppose that the Consul should not have been aware of the circumsta. c. under which Captain Maflit, the Commander of the Florida, had been brought or those in the garrison boat. It is to be regretted that his statement on this subject have been repeated in the Case of the United States, accompanied by the offensiv mark that "the Governor made a feint of finding fault with the mode in which the vessell ut entered, but ended by giving her all the hospitality which her Commander required "-especially after the full explanation afforded by Governor Bayley at the time, both to Lord Lyons and to the Secretary of State for the Colonics which was in due course communicated to the Government at Washington. more to be regretted that these imputations should have been made, because it must have been known to those who make them that a ship of war of the United States had shortly before entered the port of Nassau without permission; that her Commander had, in like manner, been brought on shore in the garrison boat; and that the entry had been, in like manner, "condoned," and the ship allowed to remain in the harbour for repairs. The conduct of a British Governor being thus called in question I think it right to call attention to the correspondence, which will speak for

Mr. Whiting's letter having been brought to the notice of Lord Lyons, and his Lordship having applied to Governor Bayley for an explanation, the latter, in a letter of the 11th of March, 1863, replies as follows:—

"My Lord,
"I have the honour to acknowledge your Lordship's despatch inclosing a complaint from the Alleged to have been given to Mr. Seward, the Secretary of State, respecting undue advantages in words. They have been given to the Confederate steamer Florida in this harbour.

"In reply, I beg leave to state that no undue advantages were accorded to the Florida. She arrived in our harbour, laving steamed over the bar without a pilot, early in the morning of the 20th of January. I was not aware of it till 8 or 9 o'clock A.M. About that hour Captain Maffit called (I think in company with the Fort Adjutant) to explain that he was ignorant of my Proclamation requiring that permission should be formally asked before any man-of-war belonging to either of the better from him, of which I transmit your Lordship a copy, along with the copy of the Memorandum endorsed on it by myself before I sent it to the Colonial Secretary. The Florida remained in harbour about twenty-six hours, during which time I neither spoke to nor saw Captain Mathit.

"So far from any advantage having been accorded to the Florida which was not accorded to United States' vessels, she did not receive univileges could to those which I cranted to the United States' gun-

So far from any advantage having been accorded to the Florida which was not accorded to United States' vessels, she did not receive privileges equal to those which I granted to the United States' ganboat Stars and Stripes. That vessel entered the harbour without permission (which she asked for after she had come in). Her Commander then asked for an extension of the permission, which I also of undergoing repairs.

"I regret that the Secretary of State should have given credence to the misrepresentations of a person of such infirm judgment and excitable temperament as Mr. Whiting have not himself to be."

Captain Maffit, the Commander of the Florida, having written to the Governor, saying that the vessel was in distress for want of coal, and asking leave to enter the Governor:—

"I grant this request under the circumstances; thereby according to a Confederate steamer the same privileges which I have formerly granted to Federal steamers. But the irregularity in delaying to make this request should be pointed out, and the pilot called on to explain how he admitted the Florida without my permission."

Repeating these statements in a letter to the Secretary of State for the Colonies, of May 2, Governor Bayley adds:—

"I have no distinct recollection of the special reasons which induced me to impose the restrictions mentioned by the Consul in the Dacotah's coaling; I can only suppose that I did this in consequence of the pertinacity with which Federal vessels about that time resorted to the harbour on pretence of coaling, but really with the object of watching the arrival and depurture of English merchant-vessels, supposed to be freighted with cargoes for the Southern ports. Had not such prohibition been issued, the harbour would have become a mere convenience for Federal men-of-war running in and out to intercept British shipping. And that such conditions as I thought it my duty to impose were tempered by a proper feeling of courtesy and humanity will, I think, be made evident by the accompanying letters from the American Consul on the subject of the Federal man-of-war, the R. Cuyler, and the memoranda of my replies endorsed upon them by myself.

of my replies endorsed upon them by myself.

"On the whole I am satisfied that I have acted with perfect impartiality in all my dealings with Federal and Confederate men-of-war. But I am not surprised that my conduct should have been misrepresented by so hot-heated a partizan as the late American Consul, Mr. Whiting, whose ingenity in misconstruction is well illustrated by his reply to my letter at the 29th of September, of both of which papers I inclose copies, with the endorsation of the draft of my replies to his last communication.

"I think that these inclosures will be sufficient to prove that, in my demensioner to the Federal men-of-war, I have generally preserved an attitude of fairness and impartiality. And that if at any time I have appeared to assume an unfriendly or inhospitable mien, the charge can be fully explained and defended by my desire to maintain the security of a British possession, and the rights of British subjects."

The Florida. At Nassau.

It is not worth while to set out the inclosures, with the exception of the letter of Lieutenant Williams, the Fort Adjutant, which is of importance, and is in these terms :-

" Nassau, New Providence, April 30, 1863. "Sir, "Assau, Act Production of his Excel"In answer to your letter of yesterday, requesting me to state, for the information of his Excel"In answer to your letter of yesterday, requesting me to state, for the information of his Excelleney the Governor, whether Cuptain Mailit, of the Confederate States' steamer Florida, came ashore in the garrison boat, I beg to observe that, in the middle of last year, I received instructions from his Excellency, through the Colonial Secretary, that when I boarded any ship of war belonging to either belligerent, I was to hand to the captain of such vessel a copy of the Proclamation regarding neutrality, and to point out the clause forbidding belligerent vessels to anchor in the port or roadstead of Nassan without having previously obtained the Governor's permission, adding at the same time that, circumstances permitting, his Excellency would always be most happy to extend the hospitality of the port to such as might require it.

"The first vessel which I had occasion to visit after the receipt of the above instructions, was the Federal gun-hoat Stars and Stripes. I pointed out to the Captain the requirements of the Proclamation, but he said that, 'owing to certain injuries received by his machinery, and the roughness of the weather, he must anchor at once, or his ship would go on shore.' I therefore suggested to him the propriety of coming ashore with me, and proceeding to Government House to explain personally to his Excellency the necessities of his position. He landed in the garrison boat, and went with me to the

"A short time after this the Confederate States' steamer Florida ran into the port at daybreak, and cast anchor before I was able to board her. I gave a copy of the Proclamation to Captain Mathit, who stated his entire ignorance of any such restrictions, and expressed his regret for having unwittingly violated the regulations of the port, and also asked me what course he had better follow. I told him that he had better come ashore in my boat, and go with me to the Governor, explain matters, and obtain the necessary permission to remain. He therefore, like the Captain of the Stars and Stripes, landed in the Government boat, and proceeded with me to his Excellency the Governor.

"Trusting that his Excellency will consider the above explanation sufficient for the purpose for which he may require it, I have, &c.

"S. W. WILLIAMS, (Signed) " Licutenant, 2nd West Indian Regiment, Fort Adjutant,"*

The Tribunal must judge for itself how far, after these explanations, which were communicated to the United States' Government, and the fact that precisely the same circumstances had previously occurred with a Federal vessel-unless, indeed, the word of a British Governor or of a British officer is to be discredited or set aside by an offensive sneer—the colour attempted to be given to this transaction in the Case of the United States is just or right. I pass on to what is of greater relevancy to the present inquiry, namely, the quantity of coal taken by the Florida on this occasion.

It is stated in the American Case† that the Florida at the time in question "received a three month's supply." A moment's reflection would have sufficed to satisfy those who make this rash assertion that, upon their own data, it must necessarily be incorrect. The only evidence adduced in support of it is a loose statement from the "Liverpool Journal of Commerce" of the 27th February, 1863, in which, after saying that the Florida had arrived at Nassau on the 30th January (instead of the 26th), it is said, by some one writing on this side of the Atlantic, that she left on the evening of the 31st (instead of the 27th) "fully supplied," it is not said with what, "for a three months' eruise." To which must be added a passage from an anonymous journal afterwards found on board the Florida, in which it is said, under the date of January 26, "We took on board coal and provisions to last us several months." § But when we come to the only evidence worthy of a moment's consideration, namely, the deposition furnished to Mr. Whiting by John Demeritt, who assisted to put the coal on board, the quantity is reduced to 180 tons. "I suppose," he says, "she had on board over 180 tons that we put there; she did not have less than that quantity." Yet even this must have been an exaggeration. According to the report of the British officers, who afterwards surveyed the Florida at Bermuda in June 1864, and which will be set out hereafter, her capacity for carrying coal was limited to 130 tons. Demeritt, it is true, says, "we placed some on deck, and in every place that would hold it;" but a vessel of war would not be likely to encumber her deeks with very much coal; nr in such a vessel would there be many places in which coal could be stowed, except those expressly appropriated to the purpose. Rear-Admiral Wilkes, writing to Governor Walker at Barbados on the 6th of March following, says that the Florida had "obtained a full supply (160 tons) at Nassau;" but gives no other authority than the public prints. But even if Demeritt's statement as to the quantity having been 180 tons could be taken as true, it would fail to bear out the assertion of a three months' supply. For it is stated in the United States' Case* that the Florida generally sailed under canvas, and that, when using steam in the pursuit and capture of vessels, her consumption of coal, as shown by her log book, did not average 4 tons a day." Now, at the rate of 4 tons a day, a supply for three months or ninety days would have amounted to 360 tons, i.e., just double the amount which according to Demeritt's statement she actually took in.

But the best proof of the incorrectness of the assertion is to be found in what follows in the American Case:-+

"The Florida left the port of Nassau on the afternoon of the 27th of January, 1863. middle of the following month her coal was getting low. On the 26th day of February, Admiral Wilkes, n command of the United States' squadron in the West Indies, wrote to his Government, thus:— The fact of the Florida having but a few days' coal makes me anxious to have our vessels off Martinique, fact of the Florida naving out a few days' coal makes me auxious to have our vessels off Martinique, which is the only island at which they can hope to get any coal or supplies, the English islands being ent off, under the rules of Her Majesty's Government, for some sixty days yet, which precludes the possibility, unless by chicanery or fraud, of the hope of any coal or comfort there.' Admiral Wilkes' hopes were destined to disappointment. On the 24th of February, two days before the date of his despatch, the Florida had been in the harbour of Barbados, and had taken on board about 100 tons of coal in violation of the instructions of January 31, 1862."

How, if the Florida took with her from Nassau a provision of coal sufficient for three months, or even 180 tons as stated by Demeritt, her coal could have been getting low in a fortnight's time, even though she had been obliged to consume a greater quantity than usual, owing to had weather-or how far, having taken in such a quantity, she could by the 24th of February have been able to take in 100 tons more—her capacity being limited to 130 tons—it is for those who make these apparently inconsistent statements to explain. For my part, I must decline to give credit to them.

We may then, I think, safely assume that the Florida took away with her from Nassau little more coal, if any, than what her capacity enabled her ordinarily to carry. At the same time, it must be admitted that, reference being had to the Regulations of the 31st of January, this quantity was in excess of what would have sufficed to take her to the nearest port of the Southern States. But up to this time, there being, owing to the blockade of the Southern ports, no port of their own country to which the Confederate eruizers could resort, and these vessels being consequently compelled to remain at sea, the Colonial Governors appear to have relaxed som, what of the rigour of the Rule; a line of conduct, however, which was soon after charged by reason of what occurred on the occasion of the visit of this same vessel to Barbados in the ensuing month, to the facts of which I am about to refer.

The Florida arrived at Barbados on the 24th of February. Her command at Barbados. stated to the Governor that, unless he was allowed to have some humber to repair damages which he had suffered in a recent gale of wind to the northward, and some coal, as every bit he had had before had been exhausted in the same bad weather, he could not go to sea, and should be obliged to land the men and strip the ship. He received permission to ship 90 tons of coal. No complaint is made as to the quantity thus allowed; but it is alleged that a supply of coal having been granted within a month previous, the further allowance thus accorded was in contravention of the Regulations of January 31, 1862. And this no doubt, strictly speaking, is true, and it is admitted by Governor Walker that, though he had not received official information that the Florida had received the supply at Nassau, yet the fact had transpired and was not unknown to him. But it appears that the view he took was that the rule laid down was not applicable to a case of distress, and the case was dealt with by him as the earlier case of the Federal ship San Jacinto had been; both vessels having been, to use Governor Walker's own expression, "dealt with specially as being in distress, and, therefore, "without reference to the circumstance of having been in British ports within the previous three months.";

I trust we are not called upon to doubt the word of Governor Walker that, in granting liberty to the Florida to take in a fresh supply of coal, he believed himself to be following a precedent set by himself in the case of the San Jacinto. It has, however, since been discovered, though only as lately as last year, by reference to the papers of the Navy Department of the United States, that it was a mistake to suppose that the San Jacinto when, on the 13th of November, 1862, (the occasion to which Sir James Walker had referred), she took in a supply of 75 tons of coal at Barbados, had had a supply from a British port within three months before.* That the Governor believed she had done so must be taken as undoubted. He referred to the fact at the time, in his conversation with Admiral Wilkes, as the precedent which he had followed with reference to the Florida. How the mistake arose admits of easy solution. It appears from a letter of Mr. Robeson to Mr. Secretary Fish, that on the 1st of November, 1862, the San Jacinto "came to nuchor in Grassy Bay, off Bermuda, and there remained till the morning of the 4th, having been in port sixty-three hours, twenty-seven minutes." It appears from a return of the United States' men-of-war that visited Bermuda during the civil war (set out at page 226 of Volume V of the Appendix to the British Case), that the San Jacinto and another United States' ship of war, the Mohican, entered Grassy Bay together on the 1st November, and that the latter was allowed to repair damages, and, as not being on a belligerent errand, to take in 100 tons of coal,+ The fact of the two vessels having put into Bermuda together, and of the one having coaled during their stay, a fact which must have come to the Governor's knowledge, world easily account for any confusion which might have arisen as to which of them it was that had coaled on that occasion.

The coaling of the Florida at Barbados gave rise to a more rigorous application of the rules contained in the Regulations of January, 1862.

The American Admiral, Wilkes, who, as we know from his letter of the 26th of February, had been lying in wait for the Florida off Martinique, no sooner heard of her having put into and coaled at Barbados, than he sought a personal explanation from Governor Walker. The Governor explained the principle on which he had acted, and referred to the coaling of the San Jacinto as a precedent directly in point. He failed, however, to appease the anger of the Admiral, who, having returned to his ship, addressed to the Governor an offensive letter of remonstrance, or rather of reproach, with a demand of explanation—a proceeding wholly unprecedented and irregular, it being altogether beyond the authority of an officer of the United States' Navy to address a letter of remonstrance to the Queen's Representative in the person of the Governor of one of Her Colonics, in respect of acts done in the execution of his duty, such Representative being responsible to Her Majesty alone, and any alleged misconduct on his part being matter for discussion between the two Governments.

Governor Walker, of course, declined to furnish any explanation in answer to such a demand, and transmitted Admiral Wilkes' letter to the Duke of Newcastle, then

Secretary of State for the Colonies, with a simple statement of the facts.

Both these letters were submitted to the Law Officers of the Crown, to report whether there had been any breach of Her Majesty's Regulations

The Law Officers reported as follows:-

"We are of opinion that his Excellency the Governor of the Windward Islands does not appear to have been guilty of showing any undue partiality to the Oreto, or to have committed any literal breach of Her Majesty's Regulations. We would take the liberty of observing further, that his Excellency owes no account to Admiral Wilkes of his conduct in the matter of his discharge of his duties towards Her Majesty; and that the very offensive tone and language of that officer's letter ought to apprise his Excellency of the inexpediency of long personal interviews and explanations with him. It is manifest that upon this, as upon other occasions, these interviews and explanations are made the pretext for writing subsequent letters of this description, intended to be used breafter very disingenuously, as proof of charges made at the time of the favour shown by Her Majesty's Officers to the Confederate States.

"We leef ourselves called upon, while giving to Governor Walker full credit for honest and in a rial conduct, to add that, in our opinion, the letter and spirit of Her Majesty's Regulations (quotect in r-Admiral Wilkes' despatch of the 6th March, 1863), have not been adhered to with sufficient the an either of the cases mentioned, that of the San Jacinto or that of the Oreto. The limits of sure of coal, in particular, prescribed by that Regulation, ought to be observed, both as to the quantity of coal to be supplied in the first instance, and as to the interval of time which, in the absence of "special permission" (a permission to contemplated except under "special" circumstances of a kind different, in our opinion, from those which occurred in the two cases in question) ought to clapse

the responsibility of many things which are made matter of complaint on the part of the United States.

In the meantime, Mr. Secretary Seward having transmitted to Lord Lyons Admiral Wilkes' letter to Governor Walker, Lord Lyons, in forwarding it to Earl Russell, accompanied it with the following very pertinent and sound advice:—

"I have always been myself of opinion, that the course best calculated to avoid an cleasant discussions with this tovernment, is to achieve as closely as possible to the Regulations. A departure lead to misunderstandings respecting the nature and extent of the concession intended, and to demands to for similar concessions on other occasions; while the displement occasioned here by any favour granted to a Confederate ship is in no degree diminished by proof that a similar favour had been previously

The Colonial Secretary appears to have deemed the report of the Law Officers too general and too deficient in precision to afford a sufficient guide to the Governors of Colonies in the great difficulty of their position between the belligerent parties—a difficulty which will be the better appreciated from his Grace's observations and the questions put to the Law Officers to enable him to give instructions to the Governors for their future guidance. His Under-Secretary, Mr. Elliot, writes:—

"With regard to the Law Officers' opinion that the Governor did not adhere to Her Majesty's regulations with sufficient strictness either in the case of the Oreto, or in that of the San Jacint, his Grace observes that the Law Officers have not aborded any such specification of the Governor's errors as might be a guide to him in future. They say that the limits of the supply of coal prescribed by the regulation should be adhered to. But they do not say on what grounds they come to the conclusion that it has been exceeded. The supply is to be bruited to such as will enable the ship to reach the nearest of its own ports, or any nearer destination. The supply to the Oreto was 90 tons. The papers do not show (though possibly the Law Officers may be aware tom other sources) what was the supply to the San Jacinto. The enestion, therefore, arising upon these papers is, whether 90 tons is more than would be required by such a vessel as the Oreto to reach the nearest Confederate port, or any nearer destination.

" It would be very desirable to explain to Governor Walker for what destination (supposing all Confederate ports to be under blockade) the Oreto, or any other Confederate ship under similar circumstances, should be allowed to take in eqal.

"On the next point of alleged insufficient strictness, his Grace is disposed, to a certain extent, to agree with the Law Officers. The regulation requires that "no coal shall be again supplied to any such ship of war, or privateer in the same, or any other port, roadstead, or waters, subject to the territorial jurisdiction of Her Majesty, without special permission, until after the expiration of three months from the time when such coal may have been last sumiled to her within British waters got the coal may have been last sumiled to her within British waters got to the coal may have been last sumiled to her within British waters got to the coal may have been last sumiled to her within British waters.

the time when such coal may have been last supplied to her within British waters, as aforesaid.

"The Oreto appears to have coaled at Xassan within three months, and indeed, within thirty days of her arrival at Barbados; and though the American Consul's vehement remonstrance of the 24th rebrnary against her being allowed to coal, did not touch the point, and the Governor had no official information of the fact, he does not deny that the fact had transpired, and was known to him, but states, that the supply of coal was allowed on the ground of the ship having suffered at sea in a gale of wind, had been obliged to exhaust her coal, the whole of which was gone; so that, if supplies were refused, he captain said he would be obliged to land his men, and strip the ship. The statement of the captain of the San Jacinto was of a like tenor. The first question seems to be, whether the Governor ought to have instituted an inquiry into the truth of the statements made to him by the captains of the Oreto and San Jacinto. It appears to his Grace that he ought. It is, no doubt, very desirable to avoid resting decisions, of which inpartiality is sare to be questioned, upon the results of inquiries in which more or less doubtful and c officing testimony has to be weighed. But, in the case of an admiral for such a fact, and were to send an officer on board to verify it, the Admiral would regard the proceeding as offensive; but, nevertheless, his Grace thinks that he should be required to submit to it before he should be allowed to coal out of time, unless he be prepared to consent to the word of a Confederate officer being taken in like manner without inquiry.

But, supposing the Governor to have erred in these cases, it is not explained in the Report of the Law Officers whether it is of this, or of what other errors, he has been guilty, so as to help him to avoid a repetition of error. For example, supposing it had been the fact duly ascertained, that the Oreto or San Jacinto had suffered severely in a gale of wind, had exhausted all her coal, and was disabled from proceeding to sea unless supplied, was the Governor to have forbidden her to coal on the ground that she had coaled at some British port within thirty days.

"On the other rand, did his only error consist in his having allowed her to coal without verifying the late of her distress.

"Again, assuming the fact to be that there is, or may be hereafter no Confederate port umblockaded, and that the real destination of a Confederate vessel asking for supplies is a cruizing destination, so that he is not bound for any particular port, is this to deprive her of the supplies which would be granted to a Federal cruizer in all respects similarly circumstanced, except that in her case a port can be designated which is in the possession of her Government, by the distance of which from the British Colony a standard is afforded for measuring the quantity of coal to be supplied.

"His Grace would be glad to be enabled to send out instructions to Governor Walker, founded upon the opinions of the Law Officers, so far us they shall appear to have fully and correctly understood the course taken by the Governor, together with any further instructions which would serve for the Governor's guidance on the points adverted to, and on the nature of the cases if not those alleged by the Oreto and San Jacinto) in which 'special permission' is to be given to take in coals.

"His Grace desires me to observe that Governor Walker, by adopting the course of sending immediate notice to all the other Governors in the West Indies of a belligerent vessel having obtained coals and supplies at Barbados, appears to have taken a very useful precaution against the violation of the Regulations, and that it would apparently be expedient to instruct the other Governors to do like-

To these questions the Law Officers answered :-

"That with respect to the observance of Her Majesty's Regulations, in answer to the questions of the Duke of Newcastle, it is most desirable that the terms of Her Majesty's Proclamation should be surictly adhered to; that coal ought not to be supplied to either belligerent, except in such quantity as may be necessary to "carry such vessel to the nearest port of her own country, or to some nearer destination," and that by these latter words it is not intended to include a mere cruizing destination, but some definite port or place. That, therefore, coal granted at any of Her Majesty's ports, and consumed in cruizing, ought not to be replenished under the terms of the Proclamation; but that a vessel, whose coal has, owing to real necessities arising from stress of weather, been prematurely exhausted, before she could (if time and weather were the only obstacles) reach her port of destination, ought not to be forbidden by the Governor to coal, although within the time specified in the Regulations.

"It would appear to us that the suggestion of sending an officer on board to verify in each case the necessity of coaling, would be likely to give great offence to belligerent men-of-war; but of course it would be competent to Her Majesty's trovernment, if they thought fit, to make such a verification

the United States' Navy.

"You were quite right in refusing to enter into correspondence with that officer upon the matter adverted to in his despatch of the 5th March. On this and other occasions it has become evident that interviews and explanations such as you accorded to Rear-Admiral Wilkes were made the pretext for placing on record charges more or less direct against officers of Her Majesty. And I think that, as the Governor of one of Her Majesty's Colonies owes no explanation of his conduct to an officer of the United States Navy, it will be prudent hereafter to avoid such explanations as far as the rules of courtesy It is the wish of Her Majesty's Government that matters of complaint should in general be discussed between the two Governments concerned rather than between any subordinate officers.

With regard to the issue of coal to the war-vessels of the belligerents, you have, I think, allowed yourself too much liberty in giving the 'special permission' to take in fuel contemplated in Her Majesty's Proclamation. Coal, in the opinion of Her Majesty's Government, ought not to be supplied to a vessel of war of either belligerent except in such quantity as may be necessary to carry such vessel to the nearest port of her own country (or, of course, any nearer port), and this, I will add, without reference to the question whether the ports of that country are or are not under blockade. In ease of such brockade it will rest with the officer in command to seek some more convenient destination. If within the period prescribed by the Proclamation, a vessel thus furnished with coal in one of Her Majesty's possessions should apply for a second supply in the same or another Colony, the application may be granted, if it is made to appear that, owing to real necessities arising from stress of weather, the coal originally given has been prematurely exhausted before it was possible that the vessel could, under existing circumstances, have reached the destination for which she coaled.

"But if it should be the case that the vessel has not, since taking in coal, been loud fide occupied in seeking her alleged destination, but has consumed her fuel in cruizing, the coal should not be replenished under the terms of the Proclamation. Such a case is not one to which the 'special permission' referred to in that Proclamation was intended to apply.

"Her Majesty's Government are of opinion that the regulations of the Proclamation thus interpreted should be strictly adhered to, without any arbitrary concession to either belligerent. It is by such a course that misunderstandings and complaints of partiality will be most certainly avoided. An unauthorized concession to one belligerent, it may be safely assumed, will not be accepted by those to whom it is made a justification of a similar concession in an opposite direction.

"I have, &c. al) "NEWCASTLE."*

The foregoing papers are certainly deserving of attentive consideration, as establishing beyond controversy that the British Government were desirous of carrying out, in their fullest extent, the Queen's Regulations for the maintenance of neutrality, and, what is more, that they were prepared to do so, though an adherence to the letter of these Regulations would have the effect of placing one of the belligerents in a position of great disadvantage relatively to the other. It was obvious that the rule that, unless the whole of the last supply of coal obtained in a British port had been consumed in seeking the nearest port of the belligerent, not even distress of weather should form a ground for allowing a further supply within the three months, was one which exposed to very great difficulties those whose own ports were closed, and who, having few other ports to resort to, were thus compelled to keep the sea at the same time that their means of doing so were seriously diminished, while it was of very little importance to the other belligerent, who, having his ports open, could always have recourse to them for supplies if other resources failed.

Yet, when Sir James Walker, recollecting what had happened on the former occasion, and solicitous to carry out the instructions he had since received, in all their stringency, on the application of Captain Boggs, in April 1865, to remain a few days at Barbados for the purpose of overhauling the piston and feeding-pump of the engine of his ship, the Connecticut, replied that it would be necessary in order that he should sanction a stay beyond the prescribed time of twenty-four hours, that Captain Boggs should give a definite assurance of his inability to proceed to sea at the expiration of that time, and as to the period within which it would be possible to execute the necessary repairs-matters as to which the Florida at Bermuda had to submit to a survey by the naval authorities—Captain Boggs allowed his temper to get the better of of him; says that "an American man-of-war can always go to sea in some manner, —which sober-minded people may perhaps think a somewhat idle boast—and that he shall do so, "though with risk to his vessel and machinery"—which, as it involved danger both to his ship and crew, may be thought a questionable view of his duty; "regrets that the national hospitality of remaining at anchor for the purpose named in his letter is refused," which was the reverse of the fact; and, evidently with considerable temper, informs the Governor that he shall depart from the port to-morrow at 10 a.m.+

It is a pity that this outbreak of temper on the part of Captain Boggs should have been exposed by his own countrymen, as though it had been an example of heroism, or that the requisition of Governor Walker, induced by the stringent instructions issued by the British Government on the occasion of the complaints of the United States relatively to the Florida, should have been distorted into anything more than a resolution to carry out those instructions efficiently and impartially towards both

I return to the Florida. Her next visit to a British port was at Bermuda. From a despatch of Governor Ord to the Duke of Newcastle it appears that the Florida was off the port of St. George's on the evening of the 15th of July, and on the following morning received the necessary permission to enter the port:-

"Having sent to Captain Maffit a copy of the printed Circular letter I have had drawn up, embodying the instructions of Her Majesty respecting the treatment of Federal and Confederate vessels of war, he called on me on the day of his arrival, and stated that he had been at sea seventy days, with the exception of two visits to Havana and Barbados, each of which occupied less than twenty-four hours, and a visit of shorter direction to a port in the Brazils; that he was last from the immediate neighbourhood of New York, within sixty miles of which he had been harassing the United States' commerce; that he was in want of repairs to the hull and machinery of his ship, and a small supply of coal; that he feared he should experience difficulty in obtaining the latter, as he was informed that there was no steam coal whatever in the Colony, except in the stores at the dockyard; and that he trusted, under the circumstances, he would be permitted to receive from this source as much as would serve to carry him to a port of his own country; that he would then use every exertion to complete his refitment, and would leave the Colony forthwith.

"I told Captain Mallit that his application for coal from Admiralty stores must be made to the senior naval officer, but I assured him at the same time that it would not be complied with, and I granted At Bermude

The Florida.

The Florida. At Bermuda him permission to remain so long as might be necessary to fit his ship for sea, and to procure from private sources the coal actually required."*

All supply of coal from the dockyard was refused. Thereupon Mr. Walker, a merchant of the colony, applies on behalf of Captain Maffit to the Governor:-

"As the Florida must of necessity be detained at this port, as a vessel in distress, until the arrival of coals which are daily expected. Captain Mattit legs me to inquire of your Excellency if the privilege will be accorded to him of proceeding to the dockyard for the purpose of having effected some repairs to machinery and hull of ship, which are of essential importance, and which cannot be effected in the port of St. George's."+

The answer of the Governor was that the application could not be granted, to which he adds :-

" In making this communication I have to express a hope that Captain Maflit may yet find it in his power to obtain for his vessel such supplies of coal, and such necessary repairs as will enable her to proceed without delay to her destination, but I must at the same time point out that Her Majesty's instructions (with a copy of which Captain Mallit was supplied on the 16th instant) are very stringent as to the limitation of the stay in British waters of vessels of war of the United States or Confederate States, and that it is necessary that whatever may be required to enable the Florida to take her departure from these islands should be provided in the shortest possible period. If, however, Captain Maflit should find it impossible to procure at the present time whatever may be requisite for this purpose, I must request that he will at once proceed with the Florida to Grassy Bay, there to remain until his departure from the Colony is rendered practicable."

Mr. Walker wrote again, suggesting that there was a large quantity of coal lying in the Commissariat Department, and applying, on behalf of Captain Maflit, in his great emergency, for a sufficient quantity to carry his vessel to some coaling depôt, offering to pay for them, or to return them in kind within a week or two. This again was refused.

On the 22nd of July the Governor writes to Mr. Walker, requesting him "to ascertain, for his satisfaction, when the necessary repairs and coaling of the Florida will be completed, so as to enable her to proceed to sea." In answer, Mr. Waiker says he is requested by Captain Mailit to inform his Excellency that he is using every effort to proceed to sea with as little delay as possible.

"Captain Maflit," he says, " is fully aware of the stringent character of Tier Majesty's instructions with regard to the stay in British waters of men-of-war of the United States and of the Confederate States; and begs me to assure your Excellency that his detention has been occasioned not by any disposition to contravene Her Majesty's instructions on the subject, but from the great deficiency of labour at this port, and from causes to which the attention of your Excellency has already been directed.

The necessary repairs to Captain Mailit's ship are now nearly completed, and he will commence taking in his coals at 12 A.M. to-day. As it is probable that it will be impossible to finish coaling until to-morrow (Friday) Captain Maffit would be happy to receive the permission of your Excellency to remain in the port of St. George's until Saturday morning. §

"Although the instructions of Her Majesty respecting the limitation of the stay in British waters of vessels of war of the Confederate and United States are very stringent, yet, as I have reason to believe, that circumstances beyond Captain Maffit's control have obstructed him in procuring the supply of coal and repairs to his vessel, necessary to enable him to proceed to sea, I think I am justified in complying with his request; and 1 accordingly authorize the Florida remaining in these waters until the morning of Saturday the 25th instant, but no longer."§

A cargo of coal had, in the meantime, arrived in a vessel called the Harriet Pinckney, out of which Captain Maffit was enabled to obtain a supply. It is stated in the United States Case and Argument || that this vessel was one of the "insurgent transports;" from which it is sought to be inferred that the eargo of coal brought out in her was intended expressly for the Florida; and upon this a charge is founded of a violation of neutrality in a breach of the rule that neither belligerent was to be permitted to establish depôts of coal on British territory. To prove that the Harriet Pinckney was an "insurgent transport," a letter from Mr. Dudley to Mr. Seward of January 2, 1863, is referred to; but, on turning to that letter, it will be found that Mr. Dudley is not speaking of or referring to "insurgent transports" at all, but to British vessels employed in running the blockade with arms and contraband of The word "transport," which, in the Argument, is printed between inverted re commas, as if taken from the letter, does not occur in it at all. The vessel was, to all appearance, an ordinary trading-vessel—one of those engaged in the profitable employment of running the blockade. In this business she visited St. George's five times between January, 1863, and February, 1864.* A letter from a Mr. Walker is, indeed, printed in the VIIth Volume of the United States' Documents,† in which he says that he had employed the Harriet Pinckney in the beginning of July to bring a cargo of coal from Halifax; not, however, for the Florida, but to supply some steamer with the means of running the blockade; and, as he expresses it, to save that steamer "the loss of a moon." This shows that the intention was not to supply the Florida with coal; and that the visit of the Florida to Bermuda was not in any way connected with the voyage of the Harriet Pinckney; still less was there anything to suggest the slightest suspicion of such a kind to the Colonial Authorities. Besides which, the anxiety of Captain Maffit to obtain coal from other quarters shows plainly that he had no expectation of a specific cargo being sent out for his vessel.

The charge of any violation of neutrality on the occasion of the last mentioned visit, appears wholly to fail.

Leaving Bermuda on the 25th of July, the Florida arrived at Brest on the 23rd of August. This part of her history is touched upon lightly and cautionsly in the Case of the United States; yet the indulgence alleged to have been granted to this vessel in Beitish ports is but trifling as compared with that which was extended to her in the French port; and the events which occurred there are important as showing that the French Government entertained notions more liberal than our own on the subject of hospitality to be extended to belligerent vessels. She had sustained considerable injury to her copper, and much of her machinery required renewing, and workmen and materials had to be brought from England, and these repairs were likely to require a period of several months for their accomplishment. A considerable part of her crew, the time for which they had engaged having expired, desired their discharge. From the despatches of Mr. Dayton, the United States' Minister at Paris, to Mr. Secretary Seward, it appears that Mr. Dayton began by remonstrating against any assistance being given to the Florida at all. But the French Government answered that, having recognized the Confederate States as belligerents, they could not refuse them the ordinary assistance rendered to ships of war in need of repairs. Next, Mr. Dayton issisted that, as the Florida was a good sailing-vessel, no repair should be allowed to be done to her machinery. But to this, M. Dronyn de Lhuys answered, "that if she were deprived of her machinery, she would be pro tanto disabled, crippled, and liable, like a dack with its wings cut, to be at once caught by the United States' steamers. He said it would be no fair answer to say the duck had legs and could walk or swim. He said that, in addition to this, the officers of the port had reported to the Government that the vessel was leaking badly, that she made water at so much per hour (giving the measurement) and unless repaired she would sink."

There being no commercial dock at Brest, Captain Maffit applied for the use of a Government dock. M. Dayton remonstrated; but M. Dronyn de Lhuys repliedthat, where there was no commercial dock, as at Brest, it was customary to grant the use of any accommodation there to all vessels in distress, upon payment of certain known and fixed rates; that they must deal with this vessel as they would with one of the United States' ships, or the ships of any other nation; and that to all such these accommodations would be granted at once."§

Lastly, permission having been asked to ship new hands, in the place of those whose time had expired, M. Dayton strongly opposed it. He flus states the result:—

"M. Drouyn de Lhuys informed me that this Government, after much conference (and, I think, some hesitation), had concluded not to issue an order prohibiting an accession to the crew of the Florida while in port, inasmuch as such accession was necessary to her navigation. They had made againes, it would seem, and they had ascertained that the seventy or seventy-five men discharged ater she came into Brest were discharged because the period for which they bad shipped had expired. lle said, furthermore, that it was reported to him that the Kearsarge had likewise applied for some silors and a pilot in that port, as well as for coal, and leave to make repairs, all of which had been and would be, if more were needed, cheerfully granted.

I told him I was quite confident the Keursarge had made no attempt to ship a crew there, and that, as respects a pilot, that stood on ground peculiar to itself, and had no reference to the general

He said, however, that in the conference they had reached that unanimously, although a majority of the Ministry considering the question were lawyers."*

From a report by the British Consul at Brest, on the subject of the reception and stay of the Florida at that port, it appears that—

"Captain Maflit, the Commander of the Florida, was informed by the Admiral of the Port (Prefet Maritime), Vice-Admiral Count de Gueyton, that he was at liberty to effect the repairs of the ship and provide her with coal and provisions, the same as any merchant-ship.

"The commercial resources of Brest proving insufficient to effect the repairs of the Florida, application was made to the Port Admiral to allow her to enter the Government dockyard, and permissis for her to do so was granted, it being stipulated that all expenses should be reimbursed by the agent.

M. Aumaitre, and that her powder-magazine should be cleared before entering the dock. To effect the latter operation, a Government barge was furnished for the purpose of removing the ammunition: and this barge was, later, moored in the bay.

"On the 9th of September, 1863, the Florida entered the Government dock, and remained there for general repairs for a period of about five weeks.

"The Florida completed her repairs in the dockyard, a d afterwards took moorings in the merchant harbour of Brest, where she was slowly refitted. On he 27th of December she was moved to the roadstead.

"It appears that some of the mechanism of the more heavy guns of the Florida had never been regulated, and her Commander desiring to have this done, an application was made to the Port Admiad for permission to land the guns for that purpose, but this was at once and positively refused, on the ground that such an act might be interpreted as equivalent to allowing a reinforcement of arms.

"But, it appears, her small-arms were allowed to be kinded, in order to be repaired by a gunnaker of Brest, named Kock; this permission was granted, on the agent, M. Aumaitre, giving a guarantee we the authorities of the Custom-house that they should be reshipped on board the Florida.

"Through M. Aumaitre, the agent, M. Rainads ascertained that thirty-five seamen claimed and obtained their discharge from the Florida here; that they were, in part, replaced by others chiefly natives of Belgium, Germany, Italy, and Southern Austria, brought to Brest by railway direct from Paris, in numbers never exceeding four at a time, and that they were quietly sent on board in similar numbers.

"The Federal corvette Kearsarge reappeared in Brest waters on the 3rd of January, 1864; and after steaming about the bay to within a nule of the town, again proceeded to sea.

I cannot help surmising that, if all this had happened in one of Her Majesty's ports; if a Government dockyard had been placed at the disposal of a Confederate cruizer; if such cruizer had been allowed to remain six months; to have her smallarms repaired on shore; and to take in as much coal as she wanted, "like now merchant vessel," and largely to recruit her crew; this Tribunal would not have failed to find a very eloquent and indignant denunciation of such a violation of neutrality in Again at Bermuda.

After leaving Brest on the 12th of February, 1864, the Florida visited the French Colony of Martinique, where she remained from the 26th of April to the 7th of May repairing her machinery and taking in a full supply of coal.‡ On the 12th of May she touched at Bermuda, but only to land a sick officer, and left again at once.§ Of the 18th of June, 1864, she again put into Bermuda, being then under the comman of Lieutenant C. M. Morris. Heintenant Morris immediately wrote to Colonel Munro, the Acting Governor, stating that his vessel was in want of coals, provisions, and repairs, and requesting permission to have the necessary repairs to the propeller and blow-valve done at Her Majesty's Dockyard, as they could not otherwise be effected; ¶ and Governor Munro having referred the application to Sir James Hop, the Admiral on the station, Sir James Hope directed a survey of the vessel to be made by competent officers, who, on the 20th, reported as follows:—

"We have the honom to report that, having, in obedience to your directions, been on bond to Florida, and with the assistance of Messis. Thompson and Leitch, assistant engineers, as brined lamachinery, we beg to make the following report

"P.S.—The Florida can stow 130 tons of coal,"*

Upon this a stay of five working days was accorded for the completion of the necessary repairs.† Permission was given to ship 80 tons of coal.

Three heads of complaint are put forward by the United States' Government as to what was done on this occasion. Twice over it is stated that, a stay of five days having been granted, that stay was extended to nine. We have here another of those inaccurate statements of fact, the effect of which may be to mislead the Tribunal. The stay of the Florida at Bernuda on this occasion was only nine days in the whole. But the earlier portion of that time was occupied in the preliminary communications and in the survey. The stay of five days was granted by the Governor on the 21st of June. The Florida left on the 27th. The total stay of nine days has thus been confounded with the stay after the granting of the five days. I should be aslaumed to suggest that this misrepresentation was intentionally made; but I must repeat that those who accuse persons in authority of misconduct should take more care to be accurate as to their

It is next stated that, instead of 20 tons, the Florida was allowed to take 135.§ But on reference to the report of the surveying officers, it will be seen that they estimate 46 tons as the amount necessary for the vessel, if seeking the nearest port, namely, Wilmington; 100 tons if seeking the furthest, namely, Mobile; with varying amounts if making for intermediate ports.

Lieutenant Morris assured the Governor that the port he expected to make was Mobile. The Governor compromised the matter by giving permission to load 80 tons. Lectenant Morris reported officially in writing to the Governor that he had loaded 80 tons, as appears by the letter of Governor Munro to Mr. Secretary Cardwell of the 7th of July 1861. But the United States produce a voucher for 135 tons of coal shipped

If it be true that Lieutenant Morris abused the confidence of Colonel Munro, and took in 135 tons instead of 80, all that this proves is that Lientenant Morris acted in a manner unworthy of an officer and a gentleman. Is it to be said that it was the duty of the Governor to send officers to watch the shipment of the coal, and see that Lieutenant Morris did not play a dishonourable part and abuse the trust reposed in him, and that the quantity was not exceeded? Such a proceeding would have implied a disbelief in the word of the officer commanding a ship of war, and therefore would more or less have amounted to an affront. I carnot think it was necessary.

The next complaint is, that whereas five days' work was reported by the surveyors to be all that was necessary to be done to the vessel, twenty days of carpenters' work was done to her. + The voucher produced shows that four carpenters were employed for four days * Looking to the small quantity of materials charged for, it is probable that, if an undue amount of time was occupied in earpenters' work, it arose from the unskilfulness of the workmen.

The number of men required for the repairs of the maintopmast is not stated in the report of the officers. The work of four men for four days may have proved absolutely necessary.

But even if a small and microscopic criticism could here discover anything to find fault with, here again the fault was that of the officer commanding the Florida, not of the Authorities. Or, is it to be said that here also a watch should have been set to measure the precise amount of work to which the carpenters should have been limited?

But complaint is made that, besides coal, the Florida was allowed to take in large supplies of provisions, clothing, and other stores, even of medicines!* For what purpose this is stated I cannot conecive. If it is meant to be said that herein there was any breach of neutrality, such a proposition implies ignorance of the first principles of international law. All the articles enumerated are things which a belligerent has a perfect right to procure in a neutral port, and which the Governor could neither prevent the commander of such a vessel from buying, or the Queen's subjects from selling to him.

There is one other complaint, which I confess oceasions me both surprise and pain. It is that, although the surveyors had reported that "the vessel was nnmanageable with her screw up in bad weather," and that "her defects aloft (cross-trees) rendered the maintopmast unsafe," yet, as they had reported that "she could proceed to sea with safety in her then state under steam," the Governor ought not to have allowed the repairs necessary to render her safe when under sail. † We have here the converse of Mr. Dayton's contention with the French Government, but in a more objectionable form. When it is borne in mind that in a screw-steamer steam is but an auxiliary power, and that no such vessel is ever committed to the ocean without every. thing necessary to her safety under sail being in a seaworthy condition; when it is remembered that all machinery is liable to accident, especially such as is exposed to the action of the elements, and that if anything had happened to the machinery of this vessel in her then condition, she would have been exposed, with her living freight, crippled and helpless, to danger and disacter, I think the proposition which the Tribunal is asked to adopt ought not to fir much tayour in its sight. For myself I can only say, that I trust and believe no British Governor, placed in similar circumstances, would-let our decision be what it may, let the political consequences be what they will-be so wanting in a sense of what is due to humanity and to the honour of nis country as to act otherwise than I am glad to think the Governor of Bernuda acted on this occasion.

I have only further to observe that when much is made in the Case of the United States of the fact that the Florida, instead of proceeding to the nearest port, was kept cruizing off the islands, looking out for United States' vessels, which no doubt appears to have been the case,‡ the same observation occurs as before. Such a course of conduct may have been dishonourable in Lieutenant Morris, as being in breach of the good faith he ought to have kept with the Governor, but it certainly cannot be ascribed as a fault to the latter.

No doubt the conduct of Lieutenant Jorris is open to observation. He came back afterwards to the island, on the pretext of delivering up two deserters, but in fact to try and get more coal, which, bowever, was peremptorily refused, § But the answer lies in a word: Lieutenant Morris was an officer bearing a commission and wearing a sword in the service of an American Government; as such, he was entitled to the presumption which attaches to such a position, and which presupposes the impossibility of acts inconsistent with the highest sense of honour and the most scrapulous good faith. To have acted on such a presumption ought not to be ascribed, by a tribunal of honourable men, to those who did so, as a want of due diligence in the discharge of any duty they were called on to fulfil on the part of a neutral Government.

On the 5th of October, 1864, the Florida entered the port of Bahia, whereupon Mr. Wilson, the United States' Consul, forthwith addressed a letter to the President of the Province in the accustomed terms:—

The President replies,—

Mr. Seward appears at first to have been disposed to think that the Brazilian Government, in "furnishing of shelfer and a haven to pirates," was as much to blame as the Captain of the Wachnsett, as we find him, on hearing what had occurred, writing thus to Mr. Webb:-

" Department of State, Washington, November 11, 1864. The Florida consider whatever questions may arise out of it, in a becoming and friendly spirit, if that spirit shall be acopted by his Imperial Majesty's Government."*

The Government of Brazil protested immediately in strong terms against this violation of its sovereignty and the neutrality of its waters.

The following letter was immediately written by Senhor Barbosa da Silva, the Brazilian Chargé d'Affaires at Washington, to Mr. Seward:—

"Imperial Legation of Brazil, Washington, "December 12, 1864.

(Translation.)

"The Undersigned, Charge d'Affaires ad interim of His Majesty the Emperor of Brazil, has just received orders from his Government to address himself without delay, to that of the United States of North America about an act of the most transcendant gravity, done on the morning of the 7th day of Ooctober last, in the port of the capital of the Province of Bahia, by the war-steamer Wachusett, belonging to the navy of the Union, an act which involves a manifest violation of the territorial jurisdiction of the Empire, and an offence to its honour and sovereignty.

"On the 4th day of the month referred to there entered that port, where already had been lying for some days the Wachusett, the Confederate steamer Florida, for the purpose, declared by her Commander to the President of the province, to supply herself with alimentary provisions and coal, and to repair some tubes of her machinery.

The President, proceeding in accordance with the policy of neutrality which the Empiresolved to adopt on the question in which unfortunately these States are involved, and, in conformity with the instructions in this respect issued by the Imperial Government on the 23rd of June of the year last past, assented to the application of the Commander of the Florida, and fixed the term of forty-eight hours for taking in supplies, and fixing, in dependence on the final examination by the Engineer of the Arsenal, the determination of the residue of the time which, peradventure, should be deemen indispensable for the completion of the repairs.

"The same authority at once took, with the greatest impartiality, all the measures necessary to avoid any conflict between the two hostife steamers.

• The Florida was placed under cover of the batteries of the Brazilian corvette D, Januaria, on the inshore side, at the request of her Commander, who, reposing on the faith with which, without doubt, the chief authority of the province could not fail to inspire him, considered himself sheltered from any attack of his adversary, and in this confidence not only stayed a night on shore, but gave liberty to a great part of the crew of his vessel.

"It behaves me to say that, as soon as the Confederate steamer entered the port of Bahia, the American Consul, Wilson, addressed to the President a despatch claiming that the Florida should not be admitted to free pratique, and that on the contrary she should be detained, alleging for this, that that vessel had, in concert with the Alabama, violated the neutrality of the Empire by making captures in 1863, near the 1-land of Fernando de Noronha.

"Such exaggerate I pretensions, founded on facts not proven, which had already been the subject of discussion between the Imperial Government and the Legation of the United States, could not be even listened to.

"If the President should have refused the hospitality solicited by the Commander of the Florida
he would have intringed not only the duties of neutrality of the Empire, but also those of humanity, considering that steamer, coming from Teneriffe, had been sixty-one days at sea, was unprovided with food, and with machinery in the worst condition

"Afterwards, the President having stated to the same Consul that he hoped, from his honour and loyalty toward a friendly nation, that he would settle with the Commander of the Washusett that he should respect the ne neality and sovereignty of the Empire, he was answered affirmatively, the Consul pledging he would of honour. Things were in this condition, the term of forty-eight hours being to expire at 1 o'clock of the afternoon of the 7th, when about dawn of that day, the Commander of the steamer Washusett, suddenly leaving his anchorage, passed through the Brazilian vessels of war and approached the Florida.

"On passing across the bows of the Bazilian corver. D. Januaria, he was hailed from on board that he must ambor; but, as he did not attend to this intination, and continued to approach the Florida, at the same time firing a gun and some musketry, the Commander of the Naval Division of the Empire stationed in the evaters sent an officer on board the Wachusett and informed her commander that the ships of the division and the forty would open like upon her if she should attack the Florida. The Brazilian officer was not allowed to make fast to the Wachusett, but the officer of the dock hailed him, saying in reply that he accepted the intimation given, that he would do nothing more, and that he was going to return to his anchorage. The Commander of the Brazilian division then thought proper to ratify his intimation by firing a gun, upon which a complete silence followed between the two ships Wachusett and Florida.

At the time this was passing, the corvette D. Januaria, on board which the Commander of Division had hoisted his flag lay head to flood, the steamer Florida anchored B.B., side by side of her and quite close to the shore, and between her and the corvette the Wachusett stopped her wheels.

"The Commander of Division then observing—notwithstanding the darkness of the night—that the Wachusett, from the position in which she was, kept moving onward and was passing ahead of the corvette, in a course E.B., became convinced that, in fact, she was steering for her anchorage, this complying with the promise made.

"Such are the facts to which the Undersigned has received order to call all the attention of the Honourable William H. Seward, Secretary of State of the United States.

The principles of international law which regulate this matter, and in respect of which there is not the least divergence among the most distinguished publicists, are common and known to all. The Undersigned would fail to recognize the high intelligence of the Honourable Mr. Seward, if, perchance, he should enter in this respect into fuller developments.

"He limits himself then only to recall a memorable example, in which these principles, invariably sustained by the United States, had entire application. In 1793, the great Washington then being President of the United States, and the illustrions defferson, Secretary of State, the French frigate Tembuscade captured the English ship Grange, in Delaware Bay, thus violating the neutrality and the territorial sovereignty of the United States. The American Government remonstrated energetically against this violation, and required from the Government of the French Republic not only the immeagainst constront and required from the complete liberation of all the persons found on board, that derivery of the captured vesser, for also the compact roctation of an the personal field of the province of bahia, which makes the subject of the present note. By the special circumstances which preceded and attended it, this act has no parallel in the annals of modern maritime war.

The Commander of the Wachusett not only gravely offended the territorial immunities of the Empire, passing beyond the laws of war by attacking treacherously, during the night, a defenceless ship, whose erew, much reduced, because more than sixty men were on shore with the Commander and sing, whose crew, timen reduced, occause more man sixty men were on shore with the commander and several officers, reposed unwary beneath the shadow of the protection which the neutrality of the Empire guaranteed to them; and so open was the violation, so manifest the offence, that the enlightened American press was almost unanimous in condemnation of the inexcusable proceeding of "forumander" and the condemnation of the inexcusable proceeding of the i

"On this occasion, reminding the United States, whose antecedents are well known and noted in history by the energetic defence of, and respect for neutral rights, of those unshaken principles, the Undersigned cannot consider the event which occurred at Bahia otherwise than as the individual act of the Commander of the Wachusett, not authorized or approved by his Government, and that it will consequently give to the Government of His Majesty the Emperor the explanations and reparation which, in conformity with international laws, are due to a Power which maintains friendly and pacific

"The just reclamation of the Imperial Government being thus presented, the Undersigned awaits the reply of the Honomable Mr. Seward, and, fully confiding in his exalted wisdom, and in the justice of the Government of the United States, he has not even for a moment doubted but that it will be as satisfactory as the incontestable right which aids the Empire, and the vast gravity of the offence which

Mr. Seward's answer is remarkable for its haughty tone, and still more as showing the view which the United States' Government persisted in taking as to the inadmissibility of the Confederate States to the character of belligerents, notwithstanding that all the great maritime States had agreed throughout, in conformity with principle and precedent, in according to them the status of belligerency :-

" Dry retinent of Shu . W shington, December 20, 1864. "I have the honom to acknowled, the cript of your note, which sets forth the sentiments of the Imperial Government of Brazil concerning the capture of the Florida by the United States' warseamer Wachusett in the port of Bahia.

"You will, of course, explain to your Government that, owing to an understanding between you and myself, your note, although it bears the date of the 12th December, was not submitted to me until suspend Captain Collins, and direct him to appear before a court-martial. The Consul at Bahia admits that he advised and incited the captain, and was active in the proceedings. He will therefore be dismissed. The flag of Brazil will receive from the United States' Navy the honour customary in the intercourse of friendly maritime Powers.

" It is, however, not to be understood that this Government admits or gives credit to the charges of falsehood, treachery, and deception which you have brought against the captain and the Consul. These charges are denied on the authority of the officers accused.

You will also be pleased to understand that the answer now given to your representation rests exclusively upon the ground that the capture of the Florida was an unauthorized, unlawful, and indefensible exercise of the naval force of the United States within a foreign country, in deliance of its established and duly recognized Government.

"This Government disallows your assumption that the insurgents of this country are a lawful naval belligerent; and, on the contrary, it maintains that the ascription of that character by the Government of Brazil to insurgent citizens of the United States, who have hitherto been, and who still are, destitute of naval forces, ports, and Courts, is an act of intervention, in derogation of the law of nations, and unfriendly and wrongful, as it is manifestly injurious to the United States.

" So, also, this Government disallows your assumption that the Florida belonged to the aforementioned insurgents, and maintains, on the contrary, that that vessel, like the Alabama, was a pirate belonging to no nation or lawful belligerent, and therefore that the harbouring and supplying of these piratical ships and their crews in Brazilian ports were wrongs and injuries for which Brazil justly owes reparation to the United States, as ample as the reparation which she now receives from them. hope, and confidently expect, this reciprocity in good time, to restore the harmony and friendship which are so essential to the welfare and safety of the two countries.

" In the positions which I have thus assumed, the Imperial Government will recognize an adherence to the rights which have been constantly asserted, and an enduring sense of injuries which have been the subjects of earnest remonstrance by the United States during the last three years. The Government of Brazil is again informed that these positions of this Government are no longer deemed open to argument.

"It does not, however, belong to the captains of ships of war of the United States, or to the commanders of their armies, or to their Consuls residing in foreign ports, acting without the authority of Congress, and without even Executive direction, and choosing their own time, manner, and occasion to assert the rights and redress the wrongs of the country. This power can be lawfully exercised only by the Government of the United States. As a member of the family of nations, the United States practise order, not anarchy, as they always prefer lawful proceedings to aggressive violence or retaliation. The United States are happy in being able to believe that Brazil entertains the same sentiments The authorities at Bahia are understood to have unsuccessfully employed force to overcome the Wachusett and rescue the Florida, and to have continued the chase of the offender beyond the waters of Brazil out upon the high seas. Thus, in the affair at Bahia, subordinate agents without the knowledge of their respective Covernments, mutually inaugurated an unauthorized, irregular, and unlawful war. In desisting from that war on her part, and in appealing to this Covernment for redress, Brazil rightly appreciated the character of the United States, and set an example worthy of emulation.

"The disposition of the captured crew of the Florida is determined upon the principles which I have laid down. Although the crew are enemies of the United States, and, as they contend, enemies of the human race, yet the offenders were, nevertheless, unlawfully brought into the custody of this Government, and therefore they could not lawfully be subjected here to the punishment which they have deserved. Nor could they, being enemies, he allowed to enjoy the protection of the United States They will, therefore, be set at liberty, to seek a refuge wheresoever they may find it, with the hazard of recapture when beyond the jurisdiction of this Government.

The Florida was brought into American waters, and was anchored, under naval surveillance and protection, at Hampton Roads. While awaiting the representation of the Brazilian Government, on the 28th November, she sunk, owing to a leak which could not be seasonably stopped. The leak was at first represented to have been caused, or at least increased, by a collision with a war-transport. Orders were immediately given to ascertain the manner and circumstances of the occurrence. It seemed to affect the army and the navy. A Naval Court of Inquiry and also a Military Court of Inquiry were charged with the investigation. The Naval Court has submitted its Report, and a copy thereof is herewith communicated. The Military Court is yet engaged. So soon as its labours shall have ended. the result will be made known to your Government. In the meantime it is assumed that the loss of the Florida was a consequence of some unforeseen accident, which cast no responsibility upon the United States."*

When this correspondence, together with that which passed on the occasion of the Sumter, the Alabama, and the Florida, in 1862 and 1863, and which I have already referred to, is borne in mind, it is somewhat surprising that Brazil should be held up for our special admiration in contrast to the defective neutrality of Great Britain. Our worthy Brazilian Colleague will, I doubt not, appreciate the compliment thus paid to the country of which he is the distinguished representative.

The Alabama.

I proceed to consider the facts relating to the Alabama, which, I am glad to say, can be brought into a much shorter compass than those relating to the Florida. are now in possession of the whole history of this vessel, partly through the published journal of her commander; but in deciding whether Her Majesty's Government were wanting in due diligence in not seizing her, the Tribunal can look only to the facts as they existed at the time of her escape, and the amount of available evidence then forthcoming to justify and support her seizure.

There is no doubt that, from the beginning, the Alabama was a vessel intended for war, and constructed and adapted accordingly, although, as is stated in the Case of the United States, "she was designed as a scourge of the enemy's commerce rather than for battle." We now know that from the beginning she was intended for the Confederate service. The fact that she was ordered by Bullock expressly for the Confederate States is no doubt true, but at the time in question this was wholly unknown to the British authorities.

Commenced in October or November 1861, by Messrs. Laird, the well-known ship-builders of Liverpool, the vessel, known then only by her number (290), was launched on the 15th May, 1862.

She had already attracted the attention of Mr. Dudley, whom we find writing about her to Mr. Secretary Seward on the day following her launch:-

"In a previous despatch I mentioned the fact that Messrs. Laird and Co. were building a gun-boat at Birkenhead, which I believed was intended for the Confederacy. This hoat was launched yesterday; she will be, when finished, a very superior boat." He then gives a description of her, and winds up by saying, "There is no doubt but what she is intended for the rebels.

This was admitted by one of the leading workmen in the yard; he said she was to be the sister to the Orcto, and for the same purpose and service." †

After this, Mr. Dudley remains quiet for a month; but on the 18th of June writes again :-

The gun-boat building for the Confederates by Messrs. Lairds will soon be completed. She made a trial trip last Thursday. None of the press were invited. No one was admitted on board without a ticket. They were issued only to the persons actively engaged in aiding the rebellion. All the active persons and houses engaged in fitting out ships, &c., were represented on her. The New York papers have published articles stating that information of ships fitting out at this port is sent to our Government. These pieces have been copied in the newspapers here, and the effect has been to make the people much more careful and guarded. It is now difficult to obtain information about this vessel They will not admit any one except those connected with the yard to go in."

After giving a full description of the vessel, he adds:-

" No pains or expense has been spared in her construction, and, when finished, she will be a very superior boat of her class. Indeed, they say there will be no better affoat. Her trial trip was entirely satisfactory. She will be finished and ready for her armament in about ten days or two weeks. not yet learned what it is to be. The platforms for the guns that are being made are such that the gun can be used on both sides of the vessel."!

On the 2 st of June, Mr. Dudley, who had been to London to see Mr. Adams, the United states' Minister, on the subject of this vessel, wrote, on the suggestion of the latter, a letter to be forwarded by him to Her Majezty's Government. Writing to Mr. Seward on the 27th of June, Mr. Dudley says:—

"Being entirely satisfied in my own mind that this vessel was intended as a privateer for the rebel government, and that it was my duty to use every effort to prevent her sailing. I went up to London to confer with Mr. Adams. At his instance I drew up and addressed to him a note, a copy of which is inclosed, marked No. I. It inclosed a copy of this, necompanied with an energetic note from himself to Earl Russell. Mr. Ada as thinks there is a better feeling on the part of the Government toward us, and that they will now do what they can to conciliate us, and will stop the fitting out of this vessel. It is to be hoped that they will do it, as she would do much mischief to our commerce if she got out in some quarter distant from our cruizers. One of the Lairds, an active member of this firm, is a member of Parliament. This vessel is ready for sea, and if not prevented will sail before the end of next week. Captain Bullock will command her. She will enter upon the business us a privateer at once, and not attempt to run into a Southern port. It is said that her armament will consist of eleven guns, all of heavy calibre."

Mr. Dudley's letter to Mr. Adams, under date of the 21st of June, was as follows:—

The gun-boat now being built by the Messrs, Laird and Co., at Birkenhead, opposite Liverpool, and which I mentioned to you in a previous despatch, is intended for the so-called Confederate Government in the Southern States. The evidence I have is entirely conclusive to my mind. I do not think there is the least room for doubt about it. Beaufort and Caddy, two of the officers from the privateer Sunter, stated that this vessel was being built for the Confederate States. The foreman in Messrs, Laird's yard says she is the sister to the gun-beat Oreto, and has been built for the same parties and for the same purpose; when pressed for a further explanation he stated that she was to be a privateer for the 'Southern Government in the United States.' The captain and officers of the steamer Julia Usher, now at Liverpool, and which is loaded to run the blockade, state that this gunboat is for the Confederates, and is to be commanded by Captain Bullock.

"The strictest watch is kept over this vessel; no person except those immediately engaged upon her is admitted into the yard. On the occasion of the trial trip made last Thursday week, no one was admitted without a pass, and these passes were issued to but few persons, and those who are known here as active Secessionists engaged in sending aid and relief to the relacls.

nere as active Seressionists engaged in a similar and an active seressionists of eleven guns, and that she is to enter at once, as a Lunderstand that her armament is to consist of eleven guns, and that she is to enter at once, as soon as she leaves this port, upon her business as a privateer.

"The vessel is very nearly completed; she has had her first trial trip. This trial was successful, and entirely satisfactory to the persons who are superintending her construction. She will be finished in nine or ten days,

"When completed and armed she will be a most formidable and dangerous craft; and, if not prevented from going to sea, will do much mischief to our commerce. The persons engaged in her construction say that no better vessel of her class was ever built."

Transmitting this letter to Earl Russell on the 23rd of June, Mr. Adams, after adverting to the affair of the Oreto, goes on to say:—

"I am now under the painful neces, wof apprising your Lordship that a new and still monpowerful war steamer is nearly ready for departure from the port of Liverpool on the same errand. This vessel has been built and hamched from the dockyard of persons, one of whom is now sitting as a Member of the House of Commons, and is fitting out for the especial and manifest object of carrying on hostilities by sea. It is about to be commanded by one of the insurgent agents, the same who sailed in the Oreto. The parties engaged in the enterprise are persons well known at Liverpool to be agents and officers of the insurgents in the United States, the nature and extent of whose labours are well explained in the copy of an interceptual letter of one of them which I received from my Government some days ago, and which I had the honour to place in your Lordship's hands on Thursday last.

⁶ I now ask permission to transmit, for your consideration, a letter addressed to me by the Consuloff the United States at Liverpool, in confirmation of the statements here submitted, and to solicit such action as may tend either to stop the projected expedition, or to establish the fact that it—purpose is not inimical to the people of the United States.

The evidence which was conclusive to Mr. Dudley's mind, and left no doubt on it, and on which Mr. Adams asked for the seizure of the vessel, was wholly insufficient to justify such a proceeding. The statements of the two officers of the Sumter, and those of the captain and officers of the Julia Usher, then leaving Liverpool in order to run the blockade, and which Mr. Dudley could only produce at second hand, would have been unavailable in an English Court of Justice. The unsupported statement of a single workman from the shipbuilders' yard, even if such workman should be willing to reproduce it in the shape of evidence on oath, would have fallen short of what probably would have been deemed judicially requisite. The assertion of Mr. Adams "that the parties engaged in the enterprize were well known at Liverpool to be agents and officers

It amounted only to a statement of general notoriety. A fact does not the less require to be proved by positive evidence because it may be generally reported.

The "intercepted letter" referred to by Mr. Adams was a letter from a Captain Caleb Huse, a Captain of Confederate artiflery, on subjects connected with the supply of artillery and rifles.* The only parties in this country referred to in it are Fraser, Trenholm, and Co., who are mentioned as having placed the Bahama at his disposal for the transport of some batteries of artillery. It is stated in the United States' Case that the officers who were to serve in the Alabama were in England awaiting her completion and were paid their salaries monthly at Fraser, Trenholm, and Co.+ But it is not stated, as I think it should have been, that this was not known at the time even by Mr. Dudley, much less by the British Government. The fact first came to light in the following April, when Yonge came forward to make disclosures.

Earl Russell having in due course referred the letters of Mr. Adams and Mr. Dudley to the Department of the Customs, the following Report was received by the Commissioners from the Surveyor of the port of Liverpool, under date of the 25th of Sir, "I most response Custo seg to report that the vessel to which these papers refer has not escaped the accers, but, as yet, nothing has transpired concerning her which appeared to demand a special Report

"I beg to add that any further information that may be obtained concerning the vessel referred to will be immediately reported, agreeably with your directions.

" Very respectfully, (Signed) " E. Morgan, Surveyor." The Alabama. At Liverpool.

The reports carrying the case no further, the Solicitor of the Customs advised the Board:-

"At present there is not sufficient to show that the vessel in question falls within the provisions of the 7th section of the Foreign Enlistment Act, or to give the Board of others of this revenue power to interfere in this case. The officers at Liverpool have acted discreetly in keeping a watch upon her, to interfere in this case. The one do at the porting to the floard any circumstances that they may consider to call for directions, or advisable to bring under the Board's notice; but the officers ought not to move in the matter without the clearest evidence of a distinct violation of the Foreign Eulistment to move in the matter without the clearest evidence of a distinct violation of the Foreign Emistment Act, nor unless at a moment of great emergency, the terms of the Act being extremely technical, and the requirements as to intent being very rigid. It may be that the ship, having regard to her cargo as contraband of war, might be unquestionably liable to capture and condemnation, yet not liable to detention under the Foreign Enlistment Act, and the seizors might entail upon themselves very serious consequences.

"June 30, 1862."

(Signed) "F. J. HAMEL.

The Commissioners of Customs concurred in opinion with their legal adviser. In their Report to the Lords of the Treasury, they add:-

"With reference to the statement of the United States' Consul, that the evidence he has in regard to this vessel being intended for the so-called Confederate Government in the Southern States is entirely conclusive to his mind, we would observe that, inasmuch as the effects of Customs of Liverpool would not be justified in taking any steps against the vessel unless sufficient evidence to warrant her detention should be laid before them, the proper course would be for the Consul to submit such evidence as he possesses to the Collector at that port, who would thereupon take such measures as the provisions of the Foreign Enlistment Act would require. Without the production of full and sufficient evidence to justify their proceedings, the seizing officers might entail on themselves and on the Government very serious consequences."*

In forwarding these Reports to Mr. Adams, Earl Russell, in a note of the 7th July to Mr. Adams, suggests to Mr. Adams "to instruct the United States' Consul at Liverpool to submit to the Collector of Customs at that port such evidence as he may possess tending to show that his suspicions as to the destination of the vessel in question were well founded."†

Mr. Adams accordingly wrote to Mr. Wilding, the American Vice-Consul at Liverpool, inclosing a copy of Earl Russell's note, requesting him to "communicate as soon as may be any evidence which he could readily command in aid of the object designated."

Referring to the requisition thus made, Mr. Dudley, in a despatch to Mr. Seward of the 9th July, writes:—

"I do not think the British Government are treating us properly in this matter. They are not dealing with us as one friendly nation ought to deal with another. When I, as the Agent of my tovernment, tell them, from evidence submitted to me, that I have no doubt about her character, they ought to accept this until the parties who are building her and who have it in their power to show if her destination and purpose are legitimate and honest, do so. It is a very easy matter for the Messrs. Laird and Co. to show for whom they are building her, and to give such information as to her purpose as to be satisfactory to all parties. The burden of proof ought not to be thrown upon us. In a hostile community like this it is very difficult to get information at any time upon these matters, and if names are to be given it would render it almost impossible. The Government ought to investigate it and not call on us for proof."

Notwithstanding the view thus expressed that his belief as to her destination was sufficient to call for the seizure of the vessel, Mr. Dudley, on the same day, addressed the following communication to the Collector of Customs:—

"Sir, "In accordance with a suggestion of Earl Russell in a communication to Mr. Adams, the American Minister in London, I beg to lay before you the information and circumstances which have come to my knowledge relative to the gun-boat now being litted out by Messrs. Laird, at Birkenhead, for the Confederates of the Southern United States of America, and intended to be used as a privateer against the United States.

"On my arrival, and taking charge of the Consulate at Liverpool in November last, my attention was called by the Acting Consul and by other persons to two gun-hoats being or to be litted out for the so-called Confederate Government: the Oreto, fitted out by Mr. Miller and Messrs. Fawcett, Preston and Co., and the one now in question. Subsequent events fully proved the suspicion with regard to the Oreto to be well founded; she cleared from Liverpool in March last for Palermo and Janmica, but sailed direct for Nassau, where she now is receiving her armament as a privateer for the so-called Confederate tovernment; and my attention was called repeatedly to the gun-boat building by Mr. Laird by various persons, who stated that she also was for a Confederate privateer, and was being built by the Messis. Lairds for that express purpose.

"In May last two officers of the Southern privateer Sumter, named Caddy and Beaufort, passed through Liverpool on their way to Havana and Nassan, and while here stated that there was a gunboat building by Mr. Laird, at Birkenhead, for the Southern Confederacy; and not long after that a foreman employed about the vessel in Mr. Laird's yard stated that she was the sister of the Oreto, and intended for the same service, and when pressed for an explanation further stated that she was to be a privateer for the Southern Government in the United States.

"When the vessel was first tried, Mr. Wellsman, one of the firm of Fraser, Trenholm, and Co. who are well known as agents for the Confederate Government), Andrew and Thomas Byrne, and other persons, well known as having been for months actively engaged in sending munitions of war for said Government, were present, and have accompanied her on her various trials, as they had accompanied the Oreto on her trial trip and on her departure.

"In April last the Southern screw-steamer Annie Childs, which had run the blockade out of Charleston, and the name of which was changed at this port to the Jutia Usher, was laden with munitions of war, consisting of a large quantity of powder, rilled cannon, &c., by Messus Fraser, Trenholm, and Co., for the Southern Confederacy, and left Liverpool to run the blockade under the continuand of a Captain Hammer, and having on board several of the erew of the privateer Sumter, to which I have before referred.

"For some reason unknown this vessel came back and is now here. Since her return a youth named Robinson, who had gone in her as a passenger, has stated that the gun-boat building at Lairlis for the Southern Confederacy was a subject of frequent conversation ameng the efficers while she (the Julin Usher) was out. That she was all the time spoken of as a Coni-denate vessel; that Captain Bullock was to command her; that the money for her was advanced by Friser, Trenholm, and Co.; that she was not to make any attempt to run the blockade, but would go at once as a privateer; that she was to mount cleven guns; and that if the Julia Usher was not going, the six men from the Sunder, who were on board the Julia Usher, were to join the gun-boat. I may also state that Captain Bullock referred to is in Liverpool, that he is an officer of the Confederate Navy, that he was sent over here for the express purpose of fitting out privateers and sending over munitions of war; that he transacts his business at the office of Fraser, Trenholm, and Co.; that he has been all the time in communication with Fawcett, Preston, and Co., who fitted out the Oreto, and with Laird's, who are fitting out this vessel; that he goes almost daily on board the gun-boat, Oreio, and with Lairus, who are fitting one this resset, that he goes and seems to be recognized as in authority.

"The information on which I have formed an undoubting conviction that this vessel is being fitted out for the so-called Confederate Government, and is intended to cruize against the commerce of the United States, has come to me from a variety of sources, and I have detailed it to you as far as practicable. I have given you the names of persons making the statements, but as the information in most cases is given to me by persons out of friendly feeling to the United States, and in strict confidence, I cannot state the names of my informants; but what I have stated is of such a character that little inquiry

Everything about the vessel shows her to be a war vessel; she has well constructed magazines; she has a number of canisters of a peculiar and expensive construction for containing powder; she has platforms already screwed to her decks for the reception of swivel guns. Indeed, the fact that she is a pattorns arready screwed to her decks for the reception of swiver gains. Indeed, the fact that she is a war vessel is not denied by Messrs, Laird, but they say she is for the Spanish Government. This they stated on the 3rd of April last, when General Burgoyne visited their yard, and was shown over it and the various vessels being built there by Messrs, John Laird, junior, and Henry H. Laird, as was fully stated in the various of the time.

Seeing the statement, and having been already informed from so many respectable sources that she was for the so-called Confederate Government, I at once wrote to the Minister in London to ascertain from the Spanish Embassy whether the statement was true. The reply was a positive assurance that she was not for the Spanish Government. I am therefore authorized in saying that what was stated on that occasion, as well as statements since made that she is for the Spanish Government, are untrue.

I am satisfied beyond a doubt that she is for a Confederate war-vessel.

"If you desire any personal explanation or information, I shall be happy to attend you whenever you may request it."*

Of the statements contained in the foregoing letter the greater part could not have been made available in an English Court. For the reasons I have already mentioned the loose statements made to Mr. Dudley by persons unnamed; the unauthorized statements of Caddy and Beaufort, on their way through Liverpool; the loose conversations and equally unauthorized statements of the officers on board the Annie Childs, reported by the youth Robinson, who had been removed to a school in London, nobody knew where, would all have been inadmissible according to English procedure. The fact that particular persons, supposed to be connected with the Confederates, had gone out in the vessel on her trial trip was equally worthless. But there were other facts which were of a different stamp and deserved more attention than they appear to have

The Collector returned for answer, that he should immediately submit Mr. Dudley's communication to the London Board, adding, however, his own opinion that the statement made by that gentleman "was not such as could be acted upon by the officers of the revenue, unless legally substantiated by evidence." † Forwarding Mr. Dudley's communication to the Board of Customs, Mr. Edwards incloses a report from Mr. Morgan, the Surveyor, saying, that he has inspected the steamer; that she is in the same state as regards her armament as on the date of his former report, having no guns or carriages on board, nor were her platforms fitted to the deck. "If," says Mr. Edwards, "she is for the Confederate service, the builders and parties interested are not likely to commit themselves by any act which would subject them to the penal provisions of the Foreign

The Solicitor of the Customs adopted the views of the Collector, and thus advised the Board :-

"There is only one proper way of looking at this question. If the Collector of Customs were to detain the vessel in question, he would no doubt have to maintain the seizure by legal evidence in a Court of Law, and to pay damages and costs in case of failure. Upon carefully reading the statement, I find that the greater part, if not all, is hearsay and inadmissible, and as to a part the witnesses are not fortheoming or even to be named. It is perfectly elear to my mind that there is nothing in it amounting to prima fineir proof sufficient to justify a seizure, much less to support in a Court of Law, and the Consul could not expect the Collector to take upon himself such a risk in opposition to rules and principles by which the Crown is governed in matters of this nature.

" July 11. 1862."

Acting on this advice, the Commissioners of the Customs acquainted Mr. Edwards that there did not appear to be primd fucie proof in the statement of the Cousul sufficient to justify the seizure of the vessel, and directed him to apprize the Consul accordingly.

This having been communicated to Mr. Dudley, we find him writing to Mr. Adams on the 11th of July:-

"The Collector seems disposed to hold our Government to as strict a rule as if we were in a Court of Justice. We are required to furnish legal evidence (I take it this is his meaning, though it is involved in some of scurity), that is, that the onus is upon us to prove and establish by legal evidence that this vessel is intended as a privateer. If this is to be taken as the answer of the Government, it is hardly worth spending our time in making further application to them. They show that their neutrality is a mere pretence, and that the United States cannot expect anything like impartiality and fairness at their hands.

"When the United States' Government, through its acknowledged Representatives, say to the British Government that it is satisfied that a particular vessel, which is being built at a certain place in the Kingdom by certain parties who are their own subjects, is intended as a privateer for the rebel Government, it is the duty of that Government to call upon the parties who are fitting out the vessel, to tell them what the charge is, and require them to state for whom and what purpose she is being built, and if the charge is admitted or shown to be true, to stop her sailing. Our Government has a right, it seems to me, not only to expect but to require this much of another friendly Government. And if there was any disposition to do right and ack honestly, this much at least would be accorded. I inclose a description of the inside of this vessel." †

The pretension thus put forward by Mr. Dudley in this and in his former letter, that as soon as the agent of a foreign State declares his conviction that a vessel is being built for another belligerent, it becomes the duty of the neutral Government to call on the parties engaged in building her to show that her destination is lawful, and if they do not do so, to seize her, is one which cannot be admitted. It proceeds on an entirely mistaken notion of the powers of a Constitutional Government in a free State. As I have already pointed out, by the then existing Law of Great Britain, as by that of America, a vessel could only be seized with a view to its being brought forthwith into a competent Court with a view to its condemnation; nor could the Government call on the parties interested in the vessel to show that the purpose for which she was being built was a lawful one, they had made out in a Court of Justice at least a sufficient primal facie case to ever the condemnation on these parties for an answer.

But it is a very different thing to say ... when persons capable of giving evidence are expressly named, and sources of information are pointed out from which the truth may be ascertained, the Authorities are to sit with their arms folded, and do nothing towards satisfying themselves whether a vessel is one the unlawful purpose of which it is their duty to frustrate by seizure; and although the British Government had no power to insist compulsorily on explanations being given by shipbuilders as to the destination of a particular vessel, yet I can see no reason why, in a case of suspicion, official application might not be made to the builders to relieve the Government from its embarrassment by stating for whom the vessel was being built. If an answer were given to such an application, its truth could generally be tested. If all explanation were refused, or if that which was given turned out on inquiry to be untrue, the evidence against the vessel would become strongly confirmed. It is true the builders of this vessel appear to have been very shy of answering inquiries about her, but I do not find that any inquiry of an official character was ever addressed to Messrs. Laird. If it had been, the high character of these gentlemen would doubtless have insured either a refusal to answer or a truthful answer. The former would have helped materially to establish a case against the vessel, the latter would have justified her immediate seizure.

Under these circumstances Mr. Adams hit on the happy idea of employing a solicitor to get up the case in a business-like manner; and a Mr. Squarey, an active solicitor of Liverpool, was retained for the prosecution. This gentleman, in spite of difficulties, soon succeeded in discovering evidence. "The difficulty we have had to contend with," writes Mr. Dudley to Mr. Seward, "was to get direct proof. There were men enough who knew about her, and who understood her character, but they were not willing to testify, and in a preliminary proceeding like this it was impossible to obtain process to compel them. Indeed, no one in a hostile community like Liverpool, where the feeling and sentiment are against us, would be a willing witness, especially if he resided there, and was in any way dependent on the people of that place for a livelihood."* All this no doubt was true, but then it should not be forgotten that exactly the same difficulty, arising both from the unwillingness of the witnesses to come forward and the absence of process to compel them, stood in the way of the local Authorities just as much as it did in that of Mr. Dudley and Mr. Squarey.

On the 21st of July, however, Mr. Dudley with his solicitor waited on Mr. Edwards with six depositions, one of which, that of a man named Passmore, went directly to the point to show that the vessel was intended for the Confederate service. It was shown by the affidavit of an articled clerk of Mr. Squarey that he had examined the Birkenhead Dock-master's book, and found an entry relating to a screw steamer, No. 290, the number of the vessel in question, of the registered tonnage of 500 tons, from which entry it appeared that the name of her master was Matthew J. Butcher.

Then Passmore deposed as follows:—

"I, William Passmore, of Birkenhead, in the county of Chester, mariner, make oath and say as follows :-

"1. I am a seaman, and have served as such on board Her Majesty's ship Terrible during the Crimean War.

2. Having been informed that hands were wanted for a fighting vessel built by Messrs. Laird

"2. Having been informed that hands were wanted for a fighting-vessel built by Messrs. Laird and Co., of Birkenhead, I applied on Saturday, which was, I believe, the 21st day of June last, to Captain Butcher, who, I was informed, was engaging men for the said vessel, for a berth on board her.

"3. Captain Butcher asked me if I knew where the vessel was going, in reply to which I told him I did not rightly understand about it. He then told me the vessel was going out to the Government of the Confederate States of America. I asked him if there would be any fighting, to which he replied, yes, they were going to fight for the Southern Government. I told him I had been used to fighting-vessel and showed him my papers. vessels, and showed him my papers. I asked him to make me signalman on board the vessel, and, in reply he said that no articles would be signed until the vessel got outside, but he would make me signalman, if they required one, when they got outside.

"4. The said Captain Butcher then engaged me as an able seaman on board the same vessel, at the wages of 4l. 10s, per month; and it was arranged that I should join the ship in Messrs. Laird and Co.'s yard on the following Monday. To enable me to get on board, Captain Butcher gave me a password,

5. On the following Monday, which was, 1 believe, the 23rd of June last, I joined the said vessel in Messrs. Laird and Co.'s yard at Birkenhead, and I remained by her till Saturday last.

"6. The said vessel is a screw-steamer of about 1,100 tons burthen, as far as 1 can judge, and is built and titted up as a fighting-ship in all respects; she has a magazine and shot and canister-racks on deck, and is pierced for guns, the sockets for the bolts of which are laid down. The said vessel has a large quantity of stores and provisions on board, and she is now lying at the Victoria Wharf in the great float at Birkenhead, where she has taken in about 300 tons of coal.

"7. There are now about thirty hands on board her, who have been engaged to go out in her; most of them are men who have previously served on board fighting-ships; and one of them is a man who served on board the Confederate steamer Sumter. It is well known by the hands on board that the vessel is going out as a privateer for the Confederate Government to act against the United States under a commission from Mr. Jefferson Davis. Three of the crew are, I believe, engineers; and there are also some firemen on board.

"8. Captain Butcher and another gentleman have been on board the ship almost every day. It is reported on board the ship that Captain Butcher is to be the sailing master, and that the other gentleman, whose name, I believe, is Bullock, is to be the fighting captain.

"9. To the best of my information and belief, the above-mentioned vessel, which I have and is to be called the Florida, is being equipped and fitted out, in order that she may be employed in the service of the Confederate Government in America, to eruize and to commit hostilities against the Government and people of the United States of America.

Thus it appeared that the registered captain of the vessel, and who was in charge of her, had actually engaged a seaman expressly for the service of the Confederate States. The other depositions went strongly to show that Captain Bullock was the agent of the Confederate Government; that he had superintended the building of the vessel, selecting the timber to be used for her, and directing and giving orders to the workmen; and, this being so, that he had proposed to one Brogan, an apprentice in the shipbuilding yard of Messrs. Laird, and Co., to enter as carpenter's mate on board the vessel.

Now, if this evidence could be relied on, it established a strong case against the vessel, and afforded sufficient reason for seizing her. I by no means go the length of saying that a public prosecutor is bound to accept as trustworthy evidence the statements of witnesses furnished to him by a party interested, till he has had an opportunity of satisfying himself that the evidence is deserving of credit. But here the officer whose business it was, neither acted nor inquired. He made no inquiry in the first instance of the workman in Messrs. Laird's yard, who appears to have been willing to speak. The important statement that it had been represented to General Burgoyne, when visiting the yard, that the vessel was being built for the Spanish Government, while the Spanish Minister in London denied the fact, was not followed up. When the evidence of Passmore and Brogan was brought before him, he took no trouble to communicate with these witnesses with the view of satisfying himself of the truth of their statements.

The blame of this inaction, however, attaches rather to those under whose direction Mr. Edwards proceeded, than to himself. He cannot, I think, be justly blamed for having sought for and acted under the directions of his superiors in London in an affair of so much importance.

The legal advisers of the Customs Department of the Government did not see in the evidence submitted to them sufficient to justify the seizure of the ship. The Assistant Solicitor reports as follows:—

"In my opinion there is not sufficient evidence in this case to justify the detention of the vessel under the 59 George III, c. 69. The only affidavit that professes to give anything like positive evidence is that of the seaman Passmore; but, assuming all he states to be true, what occurred between the reputed master (Butcher) and himself would not warrant a detention under section 6, nor support an information for the penalty under that section. Nor do I think, however probable it may seen that the vessel is fitted out for the military operations mentioned, that sufficient evidence has been adduced to entitle the applicants to the interference of the Collector of Customs at Liverpool. The only justifiable grounds of seizure under section 7 of the Act would be the production of such evidence of the fact as would support an indictment for the misdemeanour under that section.

This report of the Assistant Solicitor was upheld by his principal:-

"I entirely coneur with Mr. O'Dowd in opinion that there is not sufficient evidence to warrant the seizure or detention of the ship by the officers of Customs. There appears to be some evidence of enlistment of individuals, and if that were sufficient to satisfy a Court, they would be liable to pecuniary penalties, for security of which, if recovered, the Customs might detain the ship until those penalties were satisfied or good bail given; but there is not evidence enough of enlistment to call upon the Customs to prosecute. The United States' Consul or any other person may do so at their own risk, if they see fit.

The papers were submitted to the Law Officers on the 23rd, with a request for their answer at their earliest convenience.

In the mean time Mr. Squarey had procured two other important depositions: the one that of a ship's carpenter, named Roberts, who stated that he had been engaged as earpenter's mate on board this vessel, and had seen Captain Butcher by appointment, and that Captain Butcher had spoken to the boatswain about him; and that it was generally understood on board of the vessel that she was going to Nassau for the Southern Government; the other an affidavit of Robert John Taylor, which was still more to the purpose. This man, an Englishman by birth, but living at Mobile, had been captured in attempting to run the blockade, and was now desirous of taking service, whereby to get back to Mobile. The material part of his statement was as

"Mr. Rickarby, of Liverpool, a brother of the owner, at Mobile, of the vessel in which I was captured when attempting to run the blockade, gave me instructions to go to Captain Butcher at Laird's yard, Birkenhead. I had previously called on Mr. Rickarby, and told him that I wanted to go South, as the Northerners had robbed me of my clothes when I was captured, and I wanted to have and I was to get 41. 10s. per month, payable weekly.

"I then inquired if I might consider myself engaged, and he replied, Yes, and that I might go on board the next day, which I accordingly did; and I have been working on board up to last Saturday

These depositions were properly forwarded by Mr. Squarcy to Mr. Gardner, the Secretary to the Board of Customs, together with an opinion which had been given by Mr., now Sir Robert, Collier, on the whole Case, and which was in these terms:-

"I have perused the above affidavits, and I am of opinion that the Collector of Customs would be justified in detaining the vessel. Indeed, I should think it his duty to detain her; and that if, after the application which has been made to him, supported by the evidence which has been haid before me, he allows the vessel to leave Liverpool, he will incur a heavy responsibility—a responsibility of which the Board of Customs, under whose directions he appears to be acting, must take their share.

"I have read the additional evidence, and I do not think that it materially strengthens the case of the applicants. " July 23, 1862."

These papers were immediately submitted to the Law Officers.

On the 25th of July came a further affidavit from Mr. Squarey, that of a man named Redden, who deposed as follows:-

"I am a seaman, and have followed the sea for lifteen years. I have been boatswain on board both steamers and sailing-vessels, and belong to the Naval Reserve.

"About six weeks ago I was engaged by Captain Butcher (with whom I had previously sailed) as boatswain on board a vessel then in Messrs. Laird and Co.'s ship-building yard, but now lying in the Birkenhead float, and known by the name No. 290. The said Captain Butcher offered me 10l. per month, and said an agreement should be signed when we got outside. He told me that we should have plenty of money when we got home, as we were going to the Southern States on a speculation to try and get some.

"The crew new on board the said vessel consists of about forty men, but I believe that she will take to see about 100 men, all told. It is generally understood on board that she will clear for Nassau, but not make that port. The said vessel has all her stores and coals on board ready for sea. She is fitted in all respects as a man-of-war, to carry six broadside-guns and four pivots, but has no guns or ammunition on board as yet. The rules on board are similar to those in use on a man-of-war, and the men are not allowed to sing as they do on a merchantman. The call is used on board. The said vessel is of about 1,100 tons burthen. "I know Captain Bullock. He has been superintending the building of the said vessel in Messis, Laird and Co.'s yard, und is, I believe, to take charge of the vessel when we get outside.

"It is generally understood on board the said vessel that she belongs to the Confederate Government. " HENRY REDDEN.+

Nevertheless, Mr. O'Dowd still clings to his opinion with the pertinacity with which men sometimes persist in adhering to an opinion once formed. He says:-

"I submit a reference to my former Reports, to the epinions expressed in which I feel still bound to adhere. So far from giving additional force to the application, the allidavit of Henry Redden appears to me to weaken it, as, after the lapse of several days since the date of the former affidavits, the applicants are confessedly unable to make out a better justification for detaining the vessel. It is, no doubt. difficult to procure satisfactory evidence in such a case; but, in the absence of at least a clear prima facic case there cannot exist those grounds for detaining the vessel which the Foreign Enlistment Act contemplates.

" Customs, July 25, 1862."

There was, however, abundant evidence to make out a prima facie ease; and of that opinion were the Law Officers of the Crown, who, on the 29th of July, reported as follows:-

"In our opinion, the evidence of the witnesses who have made depositions (we allude particularly to William Passmore, Edward Roberts, Robert John Taylor, and Henry Redden), coupled with the character and structure of the vessel, makes it reasonably clear that such vessel is intended for warlike use, against citizens of the United States, and in the interest of the (so-called) Confederate States. It is not, and cannot, be denied that the vessel is constructed and adapted as a vessel of war; being pierced for guns, the sockets for the bolts for which, Passmore states, are already laid down, and having a magazine, and shot and cannister racks on the deck, and a certain number of cannisters being actually on board. It is also stated in the Report of the Commissioners of Customs of July 1st that Messrs, Laird, the builders, do not deny that the vessel has been built for some 'foreign Government' although they maintain apparently a strict reserve as to her actual destination, and as to the 'foreign Government, in particular, for whose service she is intended. We do not overlook the facts that neither guns nor ammunition have as yet been shipped; that the cargo (though of the nature of naval stores in connection with war-steamers) may yet be classed as a mercantile cargo; and that the crew do not appear to have been, in terms and form at least, recruited or emolled as a military crew. It is to be expected that great stress will be laid upon these circumstances by the owners and others who may oppose the condemnation of the vessel if seized by the officers of the Customs; and an argument may be raised as to the proper construction of the words which occur in the 7th section of the Fereign Enlistment Act, 'equip, furnish, fit out, or arm,' which words, it may be suggested, point only to the rendering a vessel, whatever may be the character of its structure, presently fit to engage in hostilities. We think, however, that such a narrow construction ought not to be adopted; and, if allowed, would fritter away the Act, and give impunity to open and flagrant violations of its provisions. therefore, recommend that without loss of time the vessel be seized by the proper authorities, after which an opportunity will be afforded to those interested, previous to condemnation, to alter the facts,

The Alabama.

As Liverpool.

Unfortunately, the report of the Law Officers came too late. Before the necessary orders to seize the vessel could be issued, a telegraphic message from Liverpool announced that she had gone out of dock the night before (the 28th), and had left the port that morning (the 29th). She left under the pretence of making a trial trip, but stood out to sea, and never returned.

Upon these facts it appears to me impossible to say that in respect of this vessel there was not an absence of "due diligence" on the part of the British authorities. The delay which occurred in the furnishing of the Report of the Law Officers is no doubt to be attributed to the illness of the Queen's Advocate, referred to in the Case of the United States—an illness unhappily affecting his mental faculties, and which necessitated his entire withdrawal from public life. As senior in standing of the Law

Officers, the papers would be sent to him in the first instance.

From a letter from Mr. Adams to Mr. Seward, of the 1st of August, 1872, it appears that, in the interview had by the former with Lord Russell on the previous day, Lord Russell had explained to him that a delay in determining on the course to be taken with respect to the Alabama had most unexpectedly been caused by the sudden development of a malady of the Queen's Advocate, Sir John Harding, totally incapacitating him for the transaction of business, and that this had made it necessary to call in other parties, whose opinion had been at last given for the detention of the gun-boat.* Upon this, it is observed in the Argument of the United States, that no opinion of the Law Officers was signed by the Queen's Advocate after the 30th of June, whence, it is said, the United States infer that that officer "was unable to attend to his duties as early as that date," and, it is added with an ungenerous sneer, "they infer that it was not necessary to call in new parties, but to call upon the old."+ The unworthy insinuation here meant to be conveyed is that Lord Russell stated that which was untrue-an insinuation which will be treated as it deserves by every one who knows him. It is obvious that Mr. Adams must, in this particular, have misunderstood his Lordship. The accompanying explanation of the circumstances attending the delay in the delivery of the opinion of the Law Officers on the occasion in question has been handed to the Tribunal by Sir Roundell Palmer, and is beyond doubt the true explanation :-

"Sir John Harding was ill from the latter part of June 1862, and did not, after that time, attend to Government business. It was not, however, known, till some weeks afterwards, that he was unlikely to recover: nor did the disorder undergo, till the end of July, such a development as to make the Government aware that the case was one of permanent mental alienation.

"Although, when a Law Officer was ill, he would not be troubled with ordinary business, it was quite consistent with probability and experience that, in a case of more than usual importance, it would be desired, if possible, to obtain the benefit of his opinion. Under such circumstances, the papers would naturally be sent to his private house; and, if this was done, and if he was unable to attend to them, some delay would necessarily take place before the impossi' daty of his attending to them was

"Lord Russell told Mr. Adams (31 July, 1862) that some delay had, in fact, occurred with respect to the Alabama, in consequence of Sir John Harding's illness. He could not have made the statement, if the fact were not really so: because whatever the fact was, it must have been, at the time, known to him. The very circumstance, that Sir J. Harding had not already advised upon the case in its earlier stage, might be a reason why it should be wished to obtain his opinion.

"Sir J. Harding, and his wife, are both (some years since) dead: so are Sir W. Atherton (the then Attorney-General) and his wife: no information, therefore, as to the circumstances which may have caused delay, with respect to the delivery at their private houses, or the transmission and consideration, caused delay, with respect to the denvery at their private houses, or the transmission and consideration, of any papers on this subject, can now be obtained from them.

"The then Solicitor-General was Sir R. Palmer, who is able to state positively that the first time he saw or heard of the papers sent to the Law Officers (i.e., all three Law Officers) on the 23rd and 25th or 26th of July was on the evening of Monday the 28th of July, when he was summoned by the Attorney-General, Sir W. Atherton, to consider them in consultation, and when the advice to be given to the Government was agreed upon.

Sir R. Palmer thinks it his duty to add, that no Government was all large to the consultation of the consultation and that it is in the consultation of the consultation and that it is in the consultation and that it is in the consultation and that it is in the consultation of the consultation and that it is in the consultation of the consult ever had a more diligent, conscientious, and laborious servant than Sir W. Atherton: and that it is in the last degree unlikely, that he would have been guilty of any negligence or unnecessary delay in the consideration of papers of such importance."

As I think that a Government, in the habit, according to its constitutional practice, of consulting its Legal Advisers before taking action on matters of importance, would be entitled to reasonable time for doing so on such an occasion as this, and would not be liable for delay occasioned by an unforeseen accident, I should not have been prepared to say, had the delay in the Report of the Law Officers thus arising been the sole cause of the delay in ordering the seizure of this vessel, that a delay arising from such an accident could properly be attributed to a want of "due diligence" in the Government. The want of "due diligence," on which my judgment in respect of the Alabama rests, is to be found further back. I entirely agree with Sir Robert Collier that it was the duty of the Collector of Customs at Liverpool, as early as the 22nd of July, to detain this vessel. When for his better guidance and protection the Collector sought the directions of his superiors,—for which I can scarcely blame him, although the case appeared clear enough,—it became, in my opinion, the duty of the Commissioners of Customs at once to direct the seizure to be made. Misled by advice which they ought to have rejected as palpably erroneous, they unfortunately refused to cause the vessel to be seized. The matter properly belonged to their Department; it was competent to them to act independently of any other Department of the State; and the case, as it seems to me, was too clear to require the opinion of the Law Officers, although, after the decision of the Commissioners, it might well be deemed proper on the part of the Heads of the Government to consult the Law Officers before acting in opposition to it.

At the same time, I must not be understood as holding that a mere error in judgment amounts to negligence. Questions present themselves in the business of life so difficult of decision that the wisest and the ablest men are apt to err in respect of them. Humanum est errare. In such cases the question must always be one of degree. But here I cannot help thinking that the mistake was such as to carry with it legal responsibility as its consequence. I readily admit that, in a case of doubt, a public department may properly act on the advice of its constitutional advisers, and would not be liable to the imputation of negligence if that advice should turn out to be unsound. But here I think there was no room for doubt. My judgment is founded on the view that the course to be taken was plain and unmistakable, but unfortunately was not pursued; and that there was consequently an absence of the due diligence which ought to have been exercised. The vessel having thus escaped through want of due diligence in that department of the Government to which it specially appertained to seize her, the entire British Government, and through them the British people, become, as it appears to me, by necessary consequence, involved in a common liability. But how far, considering the fact that, while the British Government was desirous of doing its duty in respect of this vessel, the escape of it was, in the event, practically speaking the result of an unfortunate and unforeseen accident, the Tribunal should award to the United States damages to the full extent demanded, as though the result had arisen from negligence alone, is a question which may deserve serious consideration.

But it belongs rather to a different department of our labours, and I will reserve it till we enter thereupon.

After leaving Liverpool.

But, I am sorry to say, the charge of want of diligence in respect of this vessel does not stop with the fact of her escape.

On the morning of the 30th of July, a letter of the 29th, from Mr. Squarey's firm, informed the Commissioners of Customs that the vessel had come out of dock the night before, and had steamed down the river between 10 and 11 that morning, as the writers had reason to believe, on her way to Queenstown.* At that time, indeed, the Commissioners of Customs were under the belief that there were not sufficient grounds for detaining the vessel. It was, therefore, not to be expected, that on being informed she had left the Mersey and gone to Queenstown, they should take any steps to seize her at the latter place. But on the preceding day, the 29th, the opinion of the Law Officers had been given that the vessel should be seized. Had that opinion been at once communicated to the Customs, as the emergency of the case required, and the Commissioners had themselves immediately telegraphed to the Collector at Liverpool, as it would have been their duty to do, desiring him to ascertain where the ship was, and if possible to follow and seize her, there would still have been an opportunity of stopping her; for it appears that she first proceeded to to Moelfra Bay on the Welsh coast, a place about fifty miles from Liverpool, and remained cruizing off the coast. On the afternoon of the 30th the tug Hercules left the Mersey, with thirty or forty men, who were to form part of the ship's crew, and found her in Moelfra Bay, where the two vessels lay alongside one another till midnight, and the war steamer remained till 3 in the morning of the 31st. On the morning of the 30th, prior to the Hereules leaving the river, the Consul called in person upon the Collector and informed him that the tug was then in port, having returned from the Alabama the evening before; that she reported that the Alabama was cruizing off Point Lynas, and that she (the tug) was then taking on board men and equipments to "convey down to the gun-boat."+

The Collector sent the Surveyor to the tug, and he reported that he found a considerable number of persons on deck, "some of whom admitted that they were a portion of the crew and were going to join the gun-boat." He also informed the Collector that it was said she had cruized off Point Lynas the night before.

It is obvious that if a telegraphic communication had been sent to the Collector at Liverpool, as, looking to the urgency of the case, it should have been, he might, by following the Hercules, have found the steamer in Moelfra Bay; and, though in these waters, as being beyond his jurisdiction, he would have had no authority to seize her, he might have called on the Collector of Customs at Beaumaris, a place eight miles off, within whose jurisdiction she was, to take the necessary steps for doing so. Knowing that she was off that part of the Welsh coast, he might also have telegraphed from Liverpool, before leaving to follow the Hercules, to the Collector at Beaumaris to look out for the vessel, and, if possible, to seize her.

Unfortun tely, the Report of the Law Officers, though sent in on the 29th, was not communicated to the Commissioners of Customs till the afternoon of the 31st, by which time the vessel was beyond the reach of British juvisdiction. It followed the ordinary routine of official communication—was sent in to the Foreign Office, thence to the Treasury, and thence to the Department of the Customs.

It seems to me that the United States' Government have also reason to complain of the inactivity of the Collector at this conjuncture in another particular. When in addition to the evidence which had passed through his hands, the Collector found that the vessel, having gone out ostensibly on a trial trip, did not return, but was lying off the Welsh coast, and that, instead of having shipped her crew at Liverpool, she was having them brought off to her by the Hercules, all doubt as to the real character and destination of the ship should have been at an end; and as he might fairly presume that the men had a knowledge of the service on which they were entering, he ought not to have allowed the Hercules to leave (unless for the purpose of finding and seizing the war steamer), seeing that, under the 6th section of the Foreign Enlistment Act, he had power to seize the tug, as being about to take off to the steamer persons who had unlawfully enlisted as part of her crew.

I must say I think the complaint of the United States of a want of official activity at such a conjuncture by no means without foundation.

There is little more to be said on the subject of the Alabama. She left England Arring of without her guns or munitions of war of any kind. She received her armament, as we Terreira. now know, off Terceira, it having been conveyed to her in two vessels called the Bahama and Agrippina, but without any knowledge whatever on the part of the Authorities that those vessels were leaving Liverpool for the purpose. What is stated in the British Counter-Case on this head appears to me strictly accurate:-

The Alabama sailed from England wholly unarmed, and with a crew hired to work the ship, and The Management Surfect from England whonly unarmed, and with a crew lined to work the Sing, and not enlisted for the Confederate service. She received her armament at a distance of more than 1,000 miles from England, and was armed for war, not within the Queen's dominions, but either in Portuguese waters or on the high seas. The guns and ammunition, which were put on board of her off Teregrae, had been procured and exported from England in an ordinary merchant steamer, which loaded Terceira, had been procured and exported from England in an ordinary merchant steamer, which loaded them as cargo and sailed with a regular clearance for Nassau. The clearance and departure of this steamer presented, so far as Her Majesty's Government is aware, no circumstance distinguishing her from ordinary blockade-runners. No information was ever given or representation made to the Government as to this ship or her cargo before she left British waters; nor does it appear that the errand on which she was employed was known to or suspected by the officials of the United States. But, even had a suspicion existed that her cargo was exported with the intention that it should be used, either in the Confederate States or elsewhere, in arming a vessel which had been unlawfully litted in England for warlike employment, this would not have made it the duty of the officers of Customs to detain her, or have empowered them to do so. Such a transaction is not a breach of English law; nor is it one which the British Government was under any obligation to prevent. Whether the cargo was sent from the same port as the ship, or from a different port, and by the same or different persons, is manifestly immaterial for this purpose. The distinction is plainly not such as to create in the one case a duty which would not arise in the other,"*

The armament was, however, prepared in England, and it was part of the same scheme that the vessel, having been "equipped," that is to say, prepared to receive her armament in England, should have her armament and crew sent out and put on board out of the Queen's dominions, for the purpose of immediate warfare. It is fairly open to contention that under such circumstances the whole should be regarded as one armed hostile expedition issuing from a British port, or, at all events, that the ulterior purpose of arming, though out of British jurisdiction, gives to such an equipment of the vessel within the jurisdiction the character of an equipment with intent to carry on war.

On the whole, I concur with the rest of the Tribunal in thinking that in respect of this vessel the liability of Great Britain, in respect of want of due diligence, is established.

It would be unnecessary to pursue the history of the Alabama any further, were it not that, in respect of her after proceedings, imputations of insincere neutrality are cast upon British Authorities. As to these it becomes necessary to say a word.

At Martinique.

The first port which she put into after leaving Liverpool was at Martinique. The Agrippina, with a cargo of coal specially destined for the Alabama, was there by arrangement awaiting her arrival. What further passed is thus stated in the Argument of the United States:—†

"The Agrippina left port upon the order of Captain Semmes to get under way forthwith and proceed to a new place of rendezvous, as 'it would not do for him to think of coaling in Martinique under the circumstances.' Martinique was under the jurisdiction of the French Government and not under that of Her Majesty."

The part of this passage printed in italies is taken from the journal of Captain Semmes set out in the sixth volume of the United States' Appendix, page 491.

The effect of this statement is to convey the impression that Captain Semmes found it would not do for him to coal at Martinique on account of the strictness of the French Authorities, as compared with the lax neutrality of ports within Her Majesty's jurisdiction. I deeply and sincerely regret to find myself bound to denomnee this representation as altogether disingenuous. It was the fear of the United States' cruizers, not apprehension of French Authorities, which led Captain Semmes to seek a safer place for cooling. His journal shall speak for itself:—

"After describing his cruize and captures until October 30, he continues (p. 492):-

"The engineer having now reported to me that we had no more than about " in days of fuel on board, I resolved to withdraw from the American coast, run down into the West Indies to meet my coal-ship, and renew my supply. Being uncertain, in the commencement of my career, as to the reception I should meet with in neutral ports, and fearing that I might have difficulty in procuring coal in the market, I had arranged with my ever attentive co-labourer, Captain Bullock, when we parted off Terceira, to have a supply ship sent out to me, from time to time, as I should indicate to him in the rendezvous. The island of Martinique was to be the first rendezvous and it was thither accordingly that we were now bound. This resolution was taken on the 30th of October.'

"After describing several other captures, and his arrival at Martinique he continues (p. 514):—
"I found here at her anchors, as I had expected, my coal-ship the Agrippina. She had been lying here eight days. Her master, an old Scotchman, who, like most old sailors, was found of his grog, had been quite indiscreet, as I soon learned, in talking about his ship and her movements. Instead of pretending to have come in for water or repairs, or to hunt a market, or for something of the kind, he had frequently, when 'half seas over,' in the coffee-houses on shore, boasted of his connection with the Alabama, and told his brother tars that that ship might be daily looked for. Eight days were a sufficient space of time for these conversations to be repeated in the neighbouring islands; and as I knew that the enemy had several cruizers in the West Indies, I was only surprised that some one of them had not looked in upon the Agrippina before. It would not do for me to think of coaling in Martinique, under the circumstances, and so I ordered my coal-ship to get under way forthwith, and proceed to a new remiczyons—a small island on the Spanish main, where, in due time we will rejoin her. I had the satisfaction of seeing her get a good offing before nightfall, and knew that she was safe."

The foregoing extract speaks for itself. What makes the matter still worse is "The Alabama." that, at the time this passage in the United States' Argument was penned, a letter from the British Consul at Martinique to Earl Russell had been published in the British Appendix, from which it appears that the Consul netually remonstrated with the master of the Agrippina, and called the attention of the French Governor to the transaction, as an improper one, on which the Governor declared his intention of allowing the same facilities to the Alabama, as he had previously afforded to the

" My Lard, "I have the honour to report to your Lordship that the Confederate steamer Alabama, Captain Semmes, has visited this island.

"The following are the circumstances in connection with the arrival and departure of this noted

"I had to proceed to Fort de France on the 12th instant on official business with an English ship lying there, and, on my arrival, I heard that an English lark, the Agrippina, master, McQueen, had entered the harbour on the previous evening with a cargo of coals, shipped at Cardiff and cleared from the Custom-house there, for Jamaica; that to explain his presence at Fort de France, the master had stated that he was to receive instructions from me. I was, moreover, informed that it was reported in town that the coals on board of this vessel were destined for the Alabama.

"I immediately sent for the master and acquainted him with what I had heard; at the same time I immediately sent for the master and acquainted min with what i man heard; at the same time expressing my surprise and displeasure at his having presumed to connect my name with such a matter, expressing me positively that these reports were without any foundation whatever; that he had merely said that, when about to leave England, he had received from his owners a telegram desiring him to call at Martinique, where he would find a letter of further instructions addressed to my care.

"On informing him that I had received no such letter, he replied it would, no doubt, arrive by the

"The harbour regulations not allowing vessels to remain over three days without paying port charges, I gave him, at his request, and on the faith of his assurances, a draft of a 1 tree to be addressed to the authorities to obtain permission to await the arrival of the steamer, due on the 18th of November, to the authorities to obtain permission to await the arrival of the steamer, due on the 18th of Aovember, without expense. This demand, I may here observe, was not granted ultimately.

"On the same afternoon, laying heard from the Captain of the port that the pilot, who had been on board of the Agrippina, had reported to him that the master had told another British captain, who on neared of the Agrippina, and reported to min that the master had communicate pritish captain, who had bearded the ship in the offing, in his presence, that his cargo was for the Alabama, I at once sent for both the master and the pilot, but they all agreed that the statements the master of the Agrippina had made was to the effect merely that he had, on a previous voyage, taken stores to the Alabama. I man made was to the cheek merely that he had acted most improperly on that occasion, and I warned him of the consequences that might follow the repetition of any such illegal proceedings. No longer feeling assured of the veracity of his protestations, and hearing that a sloop was about to sail for St. Vincent, I addressed a letter to the Senior Officer of the station, in the hope that it might find him there, and

"On my return to ". Pierre, finding everywhere the same rumours affoat concerning the Agrippina, I thought it proper to write to the master to repeat the observations I had already made to him verbally. Herewith I have the hopour to inclose copies of both these letters.

"I was obliged to return to Fort de France the next day to end the inquiry, began the previous day with regard to another vessel, and I was about leaving again when the master of the Agrippina came to tell me be had a confidential communication to make. I answered that I would not refuse to hear any statement he might wish to make, but that I reserved to myself complete freedom of action as to the course I should adopt afterwards, particularly if the communication had reference to the report in circulation concerning his vessel. He still persisted in making a statement to the effect that his cargo was, in truth, for a steamer that he had expected to find at Fort de France, and which he had reason to believe was a Confederate cruizer.

"I again pointed out the illegality of a such a line of conduct, but the sequel showed that my remonstrances proved of no avail.

I next deemed it proper to acquaint his Excellency the Governor of what I had just learned. He did not seem much surprised, and observed that, if the Alabama came into port, he would act regardly as he had done on a former occasion, in the case of the Sunter, when the French Government had altogether approved of the measures he had taken in regard to that vessel.

had a nogether approved of the measures be mad taken in regard to that vessel.

"Nothing new occurred until the morning of the 18th instant, when a black, akish-looking screw-steamer was seen approaching the land, steering for Fort de France. As she passed close before this town, she showed a British blue ensign and pennant, but no one was dereived by the character she had been supported by the character she are the standard of the standard standard she was dereived by the character she

On his arrival at Fort de France, Captain Semmes sent a message to the Governor to request a permission to land lifty-three prisoners whom he had on board. On the return of the officer they were landed, and sent to the U ittel States' Consul at this port. On the same afternoon the Agrippina, whose master had gone on board of the Alabama, as seen as she came in sight, got under weigh, having taken a clearance for Demerara.

"The Alabama appeared to be still well provided with fuel, and her Commander said that he would leave during the night. But he was still at anchor on the morning of the 19th, when, about 7 A.M., a Federal war-steamer st. idenly made her appearance, which proved to be the San Jacinto, Captain Ronckendoff, fron. the Government pilot, or enter the harbour on learning that, in such case, he would have to remain in port twenty-four hours after the departure of his adversary. He was then informed, by a letter from the Governor, that he must remain at a distance of three miles from the nearest land, and that any attempt to violate the neutrality of the port would be repressed by force of arms, if necessary.

"Shortly afterwards, a small French war-steamer that was in the port was sent out, and took up a position, with steam up and her men at their quarters, between the rival ships. At the same time, the forts were manned, and twenty rounds of ammunition were served out for each gun bearing seaward; the officers in charge of those at the mouth of the bay having orders to maintain the San Jacinto at the prescribed distance from the land, and fire into whichever vessel might become the assailant,

"Meanwhile, the greatest anxiety prevailed on shore; many bearing in mind the vagaries of the Federal cruizers elsewhere, and recollecting what had occurred a year previously to the Commander of the Iroquois, when the Sumter made her escape, were of opinion that the San Jacinto would have attempted, at all risks, to run down the Alabama where she lay. No such occurrence, fortunately, took place.

"Meanwhile, the Alabama remained perfectly still, her crew being employed in painting and repairing the masts and riggings. Her captain, it seems, had at first taken the San Jacinto for another vessel of the force of his own, and he sent a message to the Governor to say that, intending to go out to engage her, he in consequence requested his Excellency to permit him to deposit, at the Public Treasury, a sum of money, about 12,000l. sterling, which he had on board; this request could not be granted, and arrangements were being made with a merchant who was to receive it at a certain percentage, when, having recognized the San Jacinto, Captain Semmes sent word that he would keep the money on board, having made up his mind to run out that same night.

The did so, in effect, and accomplished his design so successfully that his adversary did not even perceive his flight; nor was it until after remaining thirty-six hours before Fort de France after the Alabama had left that the captain of the San Jacinto could believe that she had really got away.

The movements of the Alabama had been well calculated.

"Shortly before sunset a boat had conveyed to the San Jacinto one of the masters who had been lately released from the Alabama, and who was sent by the United States' Consul to arrange for the signals to be made from an American schooner anchored near the Alabama, in ease the latter should attempt to leave during the night.

Suspecting their intentions, Captain Semmes sent word to the captain of the port for a pilot, who came off forthwith, and at dusk he got under weigh, first running towards the inner port, and when out of sight of the schooner, altering his course so as to run out on the south side of the bay. The pilot left him, already, nearly half an hour, when the master of the schooner, on his return from the San Jacinto, finding the Alabama had gone, sent up three rockets in the direction which his crew told him she had taken.

"The San Jacinto, under all steam, ran to the south side of the bay, and not meeting the Alabama, she having already passed out, Captain Ronekendoff remained all night off the entry to the bay, within which he placed his armed boats in a line, to prevent all egress. So certain was he of the result of these measures, that, as I have already said, he was with difficulty brought to believe the escape of his adversary."*

At Jamaica.

It is thus abundantly clear that it was not because Martinique was not within British jurisdiction that Captain Semmes did not coal there.

Having thus left the port on the evening of the 19th, on the afternoon of the next day the Alabama joined the Agrippina, and the two ran together to the appointed place of anchorage, Blanquilla, described by Captain Semmes as "one of those little coral islands that skirt the South American coast, not yet fully adapted to the habitation of man." † There the Alabama took in a supply of eoal, after which the Agrippina, which had still another supply of coal on board, was sent to the Arcas, small islands off the coast of Yucatan. The two vessels met there on the 23rd of December. The Alabama took in the remainder of the supply of coal, after which the Agrippina was sent to Liverpool to procure a fresh supply.

On the 11th of January, the Alabama encountered the United States' ship of war the Hatteras, when, after a short engagement, the latter went down, there being just time to save the erew.

After this, the Alabama with her prisoners made for Jamaica, and arrived at Port Royal on the evening of the 20th.

This was her first appearance in a British port after her departure from Liverpool on the 29th of July, 1861. It is observed in the Case of the United States that the "promised orders 'of Earl Russell to detain her for a violation of British sovereignty were not there.§

Earl Russell had promised no such orders. The only orders ever spoken of were

The Alabama.

The same question arises in respect to the Alabama as arises in respect of the Florida, namely, whether her commission as a ship of war of the Confederate States gave her immunity from seizure for the breach of British law when she was again found in a British port. But this question it is unnecessary to consider if the British Government is liable, as we are all agreed it is, in respect of this vessel, by reason of the want of due diligence in not preventing her departure.

The morning after the arrival of the Alabama at Jamaica, Captain Semmes called on Commodore Dunlop, the officer in command at the station, who reported to the

The necessity of the repairs was obv"ons, and I informed Captain Semmes that no time must be lost in completing them, taking in his supplies, and proceeding to sea, in exact conformity with the spirit of Earl Russell's despatch. Captain Semmes gave me his word of honour that no timecessary delay should take place, adding, "My interest is entirely in accordance with your wishes on this point, for if I remain here an hour more than can be avoided I shall run the risk of finding a squadron of my enemies outside, for no doubt they will be in pursuit of shall run the risk of finding a squadron of my enemies outside, for no doubt they will be in pursuit of

Owing to the delay in receiving the Lieutenant-Governor's answer to my letter relative to landing the prisoners from Spanish Town, it was not until the evening of the 21st that the permission to do so reached Captain Semmes, and too late for them to be landed that night. The crowded stace of the vessel previous to the landing of the prisoners on the morning of the 22nd made it diffictly to proceed with the necessary repairs, and no doubt caused some unavoidable delay. As soon as these repairs are completed, the Alabama will proceed to sea."

The Governor at once consented to the landing of the prisoners, observing that "common humanity would dietate such a permission being granted, as otherwise fever or pestilence might arise from an over-crowded ship, to say nothing of the horrors which would ensue should the Alabama again go into action with them on board." Governor Eyre added that, "of course, once landed, no person could be re-embarked against their will from British soil." The prisoners were accordingly landed.

Assuming that the Alabama was properly received as a belligerent vessel, no question can arise as to the propriety of allowing the necessary repairs to be done, "The fractures made by six large shot or shell near the water-line of the Alabama," says Commodore Dunlop in his Report to the Admiral, "required extensive repairs."

I presume it can hardly be said that the ship ought to have been forced to go to sea without these "large fractures" having been stopped up. She had anchored in the port, the Commodore reports, after dark on the evening of the 20th of January; she commenced repairing the damages received in the action with the Hatteras the next morning; but the Commodore adds that the repairs with the Hatteras the next morning; but the Commodore ands that the repairs "could not be completed by the unskilful workinen hired here before late in the afternoon of the 25th, and the Alabama sailed at 8:30 p.m. of the same evening." It enanot, therefore, be said that she was permitted to stay too long in the port. She received, the Commodore states, "a supply of provisions and coal," but it does not appear what was the quantity. No complaint has ever been made, that I am aware of, of any excess having been allowed. Commodore Dunlop certainly appears to have been quite alive to his duty of enforcing the regulations. He concludes his report by saying:—

"In conclusion, I have only to state that the Uonfederate vessel was freated strictly in accordance with the instructions contained in Earl Russell's letter of the 31st January, 1861, and exactly as I shall act towards any United States' man-of-war that may hereafter call here.

⁶ Two United States' ships of war, the Richmond and Powhattan, arrived here in 1861, coaled and provisioned, and remained in port, the Richmond four days, and the Powhattan three days:

the San Jacinto was also here, and remained four hours."

I am therefore unable to concur in an opinion expressed by the President of this Tribunal in thinking that "the reception of the Alabama at Jamaica far exceeded the measure of what the duties of neutrality would admit of." If, by this, reference is intended to be made to the fact that a young officer, in the absence of his superior, thoughtlessly allowed the band of a Queen's ship to play a Southern national air, a circumstance afterwards fully explained, and for which he was severely reprimanded, or that the officers on the station went on board of the Alabama, and treated her captain and officers as officers of a man-of-war, or to the possible fact that the inhabitants of the island may have shown some kindness towards, or sympathy with, the Southerners, I can only protest against such facts being made a ground for fixing a liability on the British Government, when no fault can be fixed on the local Anthorities. If the British Government has been in any respect wanting in due diligence, and injury has thence resulted to American citizens, the British people are ready to make reparation. But to call in aid, as founding a liability on the part of Great Britain, the fact that officers of Her Majesty's ships, or the inhabitants of a West Indian colony, may have shown civilities to the officers of a Confederate shipas why should they not -or have exhibited sympathy for the cause of the South, when the Authorities have strictly done their duty, does seem to me, I must say, to be going a great deal too far, indeed, further than the United States themselves. For neither in their Case nor Argument have the latter gone so far as to assert that, saving in the matter of not seizing the vessel, there was any breach of neutrality in what passed at Jamaica.

At the Cape of Good Hope.

But the same exception is also taken to what passed at the Cape. It is necessary therefore to review the facts.

The Alabama arrived in Saldanha Bay on the 29th of July, 1863. It appears from a despatch of the Admiral on the station, Sir Baldwin Walker, to the Admiralty, of August the 19th, that, on receiving information of her being there, he immediately gave orders to Captain Forsyth, of Her Majesty's ship Valorous, to hold himself in readiness to proceed to any of the parts of the Colony in which the Alabama might anchor, in order to preserve the rules of strict neutrality.† On the 5th of August, having received a telegram that the Alabama was off Table Bay, the Admiral ordered the Valorous to proceed thither. As the Alabama was standing into Table Bay, she fell in with and captured a United States' vessel, called the Sea Bride, and a question arose whether the eapture had not been made within the waters of the Colony. Mr. Graham, the United States' Consul, immediately called the attention of the Governor, Sir Philip Wodehouse, to the capture, alleging it to have been unlawful by reason of its having been made within 4 miles of the shore.

He writes :-

"I believe there is no law defining the word 'coast' other than international law. That have has always limited neutral waters to the fighting distance from land, which, upon the invention of gunpowder, was extended to the distance of three nautical miles from land on a straight coast, and by the same rule, since the invention of Armstrong ritled cannon, to at least six miles.

national law, you will find the above rules laid down and elucidated." +

Mr. Graham also sent affidavits of the Captain, the steward, and the cook of the Sea Bride giving the bearings of the vessel at the time of the capture to prove that the vessel when captured, was within the waters of the Colony.

Captain Semmes having been called upon for an explanation, answered:-

The Alabama.

At the Cape.

The Gay is or referred the matter to Captain Forsyth, who, after taking the evidence of the Port (2 yearin, of the light-house keeper of the Green Point light, of the Collector of Customs, of the signal man at the Lion's Rump telegraph station, and of a boatman, all of whom had seen the position of the two vessels, reported that he had come to the conclusion that the Sea Bride was beyond the limits assigned when captured by the

The decision of the Governor, which, of course, was in accordance with the opinion of Captain Forsyth, having been announced to Mr. Graham, this gentleman loses all sense of propriety, and, forgetting that he is addressing Her Majesty's Representative,

"Your decision in the case of the Sea Bride was duly received at 4 o'clock P.M. on Saturday. In communicating that decision you simply announce that the vessel was, in your opinion, and according communicating that decision you simply announce that the vesser was, in your applied, and to the evidence before you, a legal prize to the Alabama: but you omit to state the principle of international law that governed your decision, and neglect to furnish me with the evidence relied upon by

"Under these circumstances, I can neither have the evidence verified or rebutted here, nor am I enabled to transmit it as it stands to the American Minister at London, nor to the United States' Government at Washington. An invitation to be present when the ex parte testimony was taken was not extended to me, and I am therefore ignorant of the tenor of it, and cannot distinguish the portion thrown out from that which was accepted. If your decision is that the neutral waters of this Colony only extend a distance of three miles from land, the character of that decision would have been aptly illusextent a tistance of three annearons had, the character of characterism would have been apply the tated to the people of Cape Town had an American war-vessel appeared on the scene and engaged the Alabama in battle. In such a contest, with cannon carrying a distance of six miles (three over land), the crashing buildings in Cape Town would have been an excellent commentary on your decision.

"But the decision has been made, and cannot be revoked here, so that further comment at present probably will be when the United States' Government shall claim indemnity for the owners of the Sea Bride."

Referring to the Tusealoosa, he ends by saying:-

"The capture of the Sea Bride in neutral waters, together with the case of the Tuscaloosa, also a prize, constitute the latest and best illustration of British neutrality that has yet been given."

The offensive tone which the United States' Consuls allowed themselves to assume towards British authorities is not a little remarkable.

The Sea Bride having been put in charge of a prize crew, while the officer in charge was below, the vessel was, through inadvertence, allowed to be brought within two miles of the shore, and this also was forthwith brought under the notice of the Governor by Mr. Graham, who insisted that the vessel should be seized. But it appeared from Mr. Graham's own witnesses that the officer, coming on deck, stamped this foot as if vexed at seeing the vessel where she was, and immediately ordered her to be kept further off. The Governor therefore treated it as an act of inadvertence, especially as it was afterwards apologized for.§

Prior to coming into Table Bay, Captain Semmes had written from Saldanha Bay to the Governor:-

"An opportunity is offered me by the coasting schooner Atlas to communicate with the Cape, of which I promptly avail myself.

"I have the honour to inform your Excellency that I arrived in this bay on Wednesday morning last for the purpose of effecting some necessary repairs. As soon as these repairs can be completed I will proceed to sea, and in the meantime your Excellency may rest assured that I will pay the strictest attention to the neutrality of your Government."

On the announcement of the Alabama being in Saldanha Bay, Mr. Graham, the United States' Consul, wrote to the Governor, insisting on her being seized :-

"From reliable information received by me, and which you are also doubtless in possession of, a warsteamer called the Alabama is now in Saldanha Bay, being painted, discharging prisoners of war, we.

"The vessel in question was built, in England, to prey upon the commerce of the United States of America, and escaped therefrom while on her trial trip, forfeiting bonds of 20,000%, which the British Gavernment exacted under the Foreign Enlistment Act.

not recognized the persons in revolt against the United States as a Government at all, the vessel alluded should be at once seized and sent to Englar'l, from whence she clandestinely escaped. Assuming that the British Government was sincere in a cting the bonds, you have doubtless been instructed to send her home to England, where she belongs. But if, from some oversight, you have not received such instructions, and you decline the responsibility of making the seizure, I would most respectfully protest against the vessel remaining in any port of the Colony another day. She has been at Saldanha Bay four [six] days already, and a week previously on the coast, and has forfeited all right to remain an hour longer by this breach of neutrality. Painting a ship does not come under the head of 'necessary repairs,' and is no proof that she is unseaworthy; and to allow her to visit other ports inter she has set the Queen's Proclamation of Neutrality at defiance would not be regarded as in accordance with the spirit and purpose of that document."*

Mr. Graham received for answer:-

"His Excellency has no instructions, neither has he any authority, to seize or detra that vessel; and he desires me to acquaint you that he has received a letter from the Commander, dated the 1st instant, stating that repairs were in progress, and as soon as they were completed he intended to go to sea. He further announces his intention of respecting strictly the neutrality of the British Government."

"The course which Captain Semmes here proposes to take is, in the Governor's opinion, in conformity with the instructions he has himself received relative to ships of war and privateers belonging to the United States and the States calling themselves the Confederate States of America visiting British ports.

"The reports received from Saldanha Bay induce the Governor to believe that the vessel will leave that harbour as soon as her repairs are completed; but he will, immediately on receiving intelligence to the contrary, take the necessary steps for enforcing the observance of the rules laid down by Her Majesty's Government."

Called upon afterwards to advise as to the propriety of what had taken place with reference to the Alabama at the Cape, the Law Officers, Sir R. Palmer, Sir R. Collier, and Sir R. Phillimore, the latter so deservedly held up as an authority by the United States, on the 19th of October advised:—

"With respect to the Alabama herself, we are clearly of opinion that neither the Governor nor any other authority at the Cape could exercise any jurisdiction over her; and that, whatever was her previous history, they were bound to treat her as a ship of war belonging to a belligerent Power." ‡

It strikes me that this Tribunal should hesitate before it decides that three such legal authorities were wrong. Or are we to suppose that an "insincere neutrality" lurks beneath their opinion, though given in the course of official duty?

On his arrival in Table Bay, on the 5th of August, Captain Semmes wrote to the Governor, informing him that he had come in for supplies and repairs, and requesting to be allowed to land his prisoners, thirty-three in number, lately captured on board two ships destroyed by him at sea. The Governor gave permission to land the prisoners, but desired that Captain Semmes would "state the nature and extent of the supplies, and repairs required, that he might be enabled to form some estimate of the time it would be necessary for the Alabama to remain in the port."

Captain Semmes replies :-

"In the way of supplies I shall need some provisions for my crew, a list of which will be handed you to-morrow by the paymaster, and as for repairs my boilers need some iron-work to be done, and my bends require caulking, being quite open. I propose to take on board the necessary materials here, and to proceed with all dispatch to Simon's Bay, for the purpose of making these repairs."

On the morning of the 6th the paymaster of the vessel called on the Governor, with the merchant who was to framish the supplies, and leave was given to the vessel to remain till the next day, the 7th. In a despatch to the Duke of Newcastle Sir Philip Wodchonse states:—

"On the night of the 5th Her Majesty's ship Valorous had come round from Simon's lay. During the night of the 6th the weather became unfavourable; a vessel was wrecked in the bay, and a heavy sea prevented the Ahlama from receiving her supplies by the time arranged. On the morning of the 8th, Captain Forsyth, of the Valorous, and the Port Captain, by my desire, pressed on Captain Semmes the necessity for his leaving the port without any unnecessary delay; when he pleaded the continued heavy sea and the absence of his cooking apparatus, which had been sent on shore for repairs, and had not been returned by the tradesman at the time appointed, and intimated his own anxiety to get away. Between 6 and 7 A.M. on the 9th he sailed, and on his way round to Simon's Bay captured another vessel, but on finding that she was in neutral waters, immediately released her."

1 Ibid. p. 323.

With reference to the latter circumstance, Sir B. Walker in his despatch to the Admiralty, says :-

"During his passage to this port Captain Semmes chased another American vessel, the Martha Wentzel, standing in for Table Bay. On my pointing out to him that he had done so in neutral waters, he assured me that it was quite uninto tional, and, being at a distance from the land, he did waters, he asserted he that it was quite unintermonal, and, being at a distance from the land, he did not observe that he had got within three miles of an imaginary line drawn from the Cape of Good Hanglip, but on discovering it he did not detain the vessel. This explanation I considered sufficient.

Having arrived at Simon's Bay on the 9th, the vessel was caulked, and had other slight repairs done. She took in no coal on this occasion. She left on the 15th. "Captain Semmes," says the Admiral, "was guarded in his conduct, and expressed himself as most anxious not to violate the neutrality of these waters."

The Alabama again put into Simon's Bay on the 16th of September to coal and have repairs done. It has never been suggested that, either in respect of the stay of the vessel on either occasion, or the amount of repair, or the quantity of coal, any indulgence was allowed to her in excess of the Queen's regulations.

Courtesies and sympathy may have been shown by the inhabitants to the officers and erew of the ship. But, as I have already observed, these are things which a it could be responsible. Probably, as was very sensibly remarked by a Cape newspaper, the "Argus," cited by Captain Semmes in his journal when speaking of the sympathy or Confederate, but in admiration of the skill, pluck, and daring of the Alabama, her captain, and her crew, who afford a general theme of admiration all the world over."§

From the Cape of Good Hope the Alabama proceeded to the Eastern Seas. She In the Eastern touched at Singapore in December 1863, and visited the Cape on her way back to Seas. European waters in March 1864. It is mentioned in the Case of the United States. as a fresh instance of the violation of the duties of Great Britain as a neutral, that having taken in coal at Singapore on the 23rd of December, she was allowed to commence coaling again at Cape Town on the 21st of March—two days too soon. But I can hardly suppose this will be seriously insisted on. Moreover, it appears from the British Counter-Case, that the charge, such as it is, resting on no better foundation than Captain Semmes' journals, is founded on a miscalculation of dates. The Alabama seems to have taken in her supply of coal at Singapore, not on the 23rd, but on the 22nd of December; and although she arrived at Table Bay on the 20th of March, she zend of December; and annough she arrived at Table Day on the 20th of March, she did not commence coaling till the 22nd, when the period of three months, prescribed by the Regulations, had exactly clapsed. Indeed, she could not have done so earlier, had it been wished, on account of a heavy gale that was then prevailing.

The career of the Alabama was now drawing to a close. On the 11th of June, At Cherbourg. 1864, she entered the port of Cherbourg. The United States' war steamer, the Kearsarge, appeared shortly afterwards in the neighbouring waters. A challenge ensued between the Commanders of the two vessels, and on the morning of the 19th of June the Alabama steamed out of Cherhourg to encounter her formidable opponent. The fire of the Kearsarge proved too heavy for the Alabama, and the latter sank under it, and went down, affording to the victors the opportunity for the boastful taunt-which even the peaceful occasion of this arbitration could not restrain—that "thus this Britishbuilt, British-armed, and British-manned cruizer went down under the fire of American

As if everything connected with this vessel must give birth to controversy, the sinking of the Alabama gave rise to a discussion, not uninteresting in a juridical point of view, though beside the purpose of the present inquiry. As the Alabama was rapidly sinking, an officer in one of her boats came to the Kearsarge, said they had surrendered, and that the ship was going down, and asked for assistance to save the erew. The Deerhound, a steam-yacht belonging to an English gentleman, who had gone out of Cherbourg to witness the combat, coming up at the moment, was begged by the captain of the Kearsarge to help to save the people of the Alabama. The boats of the Decrhound having been lowered succeeded in saving Captain Semmes and many of the crew, who were struggling in the water. ††

The Alabama.

Others were saved by the Alabama's boat, with the before-mentioned officer in her. All the persons saved were taken on board the Deerhound, and were carried by the owner, Mr. Lancaster, into Southampton, and there set free.

They were claimed as prisoners by the United States' Government on the ground that, the Alabama having surrendered, her crew were necessarily prisoners. If saved they could only be saved as prisoners, or, as the alternative, they should have been left to drown.

Mr. Adams having written complaining that the owner of the Deerhound had taken away the persons thus saved, Lord Russell answered:-

"I have the honour to state to you, in reply, that it appears to me that the owner of the Deerhound, of the Royal Yacht Squadron, performed only a common duty of humanity in saving from the waves the Captain and several of the crew of the Alabama. They would otherwise, in all probability, have been drowned, and thus would never have been in the situation of prisoners of war. "It does not appear to me to be any part of the duty of a neutral to assist in making prisoners of war for one of the belligerents."*

The alternative is thus sternly put by Mr. Seward in a despatch to Mr. Adams:—

"The Earl argues that if those persons had not been so taken from the sea they would in all probability have been drowned, and thus would never have been in the situation of prisoners of war. Earl Russell further observes, in that connection, that it does not appear to him to be any part of the duty of a neutral to assist in making prisoners of war for one of the beligerents.

"I have to observe, upon these remarks of Earl Russell, that it was the right of the Kearsarge that the pirates should drown, unless saved by humane exertions of the officers and crew of that vessel, or by their own efforts, without the aid of the Deerhound. The men were either already actually prisoners, or they were desperately pursued by the Kearsarge. If they had perished, the Kearsarge would have had the advantage of a lawful destruction of so many enemies; if they had been recovered by the Kearsarge, with or without the aid of the Deerhound, then the voluntary surrender of those persons would have been perfected, and they would have been prisoners. In neither case would they have remained hostile Confederates.

"The Deerhound, by taking the men from the waves and conveying them within a foreign jurisdiction, deprived the United States of the lawful benefits of a long and costly pursuit and successful

"I freely admit that it is no part of a neutral's duty to assist in making captives for a belligerent;
"I freely admit that it is no part of a neutral's duty to assist in making captives for a stranger but I maintain it to be equally clear that, so far from being neutrality, it is direct hostility for a stranger to intervene and rescue men who had been cast into the ocean in battle, and then convey them away from under the conqueror's guns."+

Possibly, in strictness of law, Mr. Seward was right in contending that a belligerent is entitled to the death of his enemy, and that a neutral cannot interfere to save the latter from destruction. But it is idle to propound legal theories in such a case: the instinct of humanity will be certain to prevail over all considerations of legal right—God forbid that it should not!—and the neutral who has rescued a sinking fellow-creature from impending death may be excused if he does not deliver up as a prisoner the man whom he has saved from perishing.

Be this as it may, the British Government had but one answer to make to the demand that these persons should be given up as prisoners, namely, that, however they had reached British soil, when on it they were entitled to the protection of its laws, and that the Government, which had had nothing to do with the manner of their

Case of the Tuscaloosa.

The Tuscaloosa.

Immediately connected with the Case of the Alabama is that of the Tuscaloosa. This vessel, originally ealled the Conrad, was a merchant-vessel of the United States. She was taken by the Alabama when off the coast of Brazil, being then loaded with a cargo of wool.

Captain Semmes, the Commander of the Alabama, put an officer and ten men on board of her, with two small rifled 12-pounder guns, gave her the name of Tuscaloosa, and, bringing her to the Cape, where she arrived on the 7th of August, 1863, requested that she might be admitted to the harbour of Simon's Bay as a tender of the Alabama, in other words, as a ship of war.

The Admiral on the station, Sir Baldwin Walker, learning that the so-called tender had never been condemued in a prize court, conceived doubts as to the legality of considering her in the light of a tender. He, therefore, wrote to the Governor, Sir Philip Wodehouse, requesting him to obtain the opinion of the Law Officers as to whether the vessel ought not to be looked upon as a prize, and as such prohibited from entering

The Attorney-General of the Colony reported that the Tuscaloosa could not be looked upon as a prize, on the ground that she purported to be a ship of war, and there was no legal proof to satisfy the local Government that such was not her true character; that Captain Semmes, as commanding a ship of war of the Confederate States, had authority to convert a captured vessel into a ship of war, and so to invest her with all the rights and immunities accorded to such vessels, and that it was not for the local Authorities, but for the courts of the captor, to determine her real character, while no means existed in the Colony for determining whether she had or had not been legally condemned.

Having afterwards found that the vessel had her cargo of wool still on board, and that her armament was only what has been stated, Sir B. Walker felt still more doubtful as to the real character of the vessel. Writing to the Governor on the 9th of August, he says :-

"The admission of this vessel into port will, I fear, open the door for numbers of vessels captured under similar circumstances being denominated tenders, with a view to avoid the prohibition contained in the Queen's instructions; and I would observe that the vessel the Sea Bride, captured by the Alabama eff Table Bay a few days since, or all other prizes, might be in like manner styled tenders, making the prohibition entirely null and veid.

"I apprehend that to bring a captured vessel under the denomination of a vessel of war, she must be fitted for warlike purposes, and not merely have a few men and two small guns on board her (in fact nothing but a prize crew) in order to disguise her real character as a prize.

"Now this vessel has her original cargo of wool still on board, which cannot be required for war-like purposes, and her armannent and the number of her crew are quite insufficient for any services other than those of slight defence.

Viewing all the circumstances of the case, they afford room for the supposition that the vessel is styled a tender, with the object of avoiding the prohibition against her entrance as a prize into our ports, where, if the captors wished, arrangements could be made for the disposal of her valuable carge, the transhipment of which, your Excellency will not fail to see, might be readily effected on any part of the coast beyond the limits of this Colony.

"My sole object in calling your Excellency's attention to the case is to avoid any breach of strict neutrality.'

The Attorney-General, however, on being again referred to, reported that "if the vessel received the two guns from the Alabama or other Confederate vessel of war, or if the person in command of her has a commission of war, or if she be commanded by an officer of the Confederate navy, in any of these cases there will be a sufficient setting forth as a vessel of war to justify her being held to be a ship of war: if all of these points be decided in the negative, she must be held to be o ly a prize and ordered to leave forthwith."

The Tuscaloosa.

The Admiral on this gave way, and the Tuscaloosa was treated as a ship of war, and as such admitted into the harbour and allowed to obtain provisions. She left the bay on the 14th of August,* and Captain Semmes having contrived to dispose of her cargo of wool at a place on the coast beyond the precincts of the Colony, dispatched her on a cruize to Brazil.†

Whilst thus occupied she is said to have done some mischief to United States' vessels.

The Tuscaloosa again put into Simon's Bay on the 26th of December, 1863.‡

In the meantime, the Government having reported to the Secretary of State for the Colonies what had happened on the occasion of her former visit, the Duke of Newcastle had deemed it right to take the opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown as to the law applicable to such a case.

On the 19th of October the Law Officers reported as follows:-

"Upon the point raised with regard to the vessel called the Tuscaloosa, we are not able to agree with the opinion expressed by the Attorney-General of the Cape Colony, that she had ceased to have the character of a prize captured by the Alabama merely because she was, at the time of her being brought within British waters, armed with two small guns, in charge of an officer, and manned with a crew of ten men from the Alabama, and used as a tender to that vessel, under the authority of Captain Semmes.

"It would appear that the Tuscaloosa is a barque of 500 tous, captured by the Alabama off the coast of Brazil on the 21st of June last, and brought into Simon's Bay on or before the 7th of August, with her original cargo of wool (itself, as well as the vessel, prize) still on board, and with nothing to give her a warlike character (so far as appears from the papers before us) except the circumstances already noticed.

"We therefore do not feel called upon, in the circumstances of this case, to enter into the question whether, in the case of a vessel duly commissioned as a ship of war, after being made prize by a belligerent Government, without being first brought infrat presidia or condemned by a Court of Prize, the character of prize, within the meaning of Her Majesty's orders, would or would not be merged in that of a national ship of war. It is enough to say that the citation from Mr. Wheaton's Book by the Colonial Attorney-General does not appear to us to have any direct bearing upon this question.

"Connected with this subject is the question as to the cargoes of captured vessels, which is noticed at the end of Sir Philip Wodehouse's despatch of the 19th Adgust last. We think that, according to the true interpretation of Her Majesty's Orders, they apply as much to prize cargoes of every kind which may be brought by any armed ships or privateers of either belligerent into British waters as to the captured vessels themselves. They do not, however, apply to any articles which may have formed part of any such cargoes, if brought within British jurisdiction, not by armed ships or privateers of either belligerent, but by other persons who may have acquired or may claim property in them by reason of any dealings with the captors.

"We think it right to observe that the third reason alleged by the Colonial Attorney-General for his opinion assumes (though the fact had not been made the subject of any inquiry) that 'no means existed for determining whether the ship had or had not been judicially condemned in a Court competent of jurisdiction;' and the proposition that, 'admitting her to have been captured by a ship of war of the Confederate States, she was entitled to refer Her Majesty's Government, in case of dispute, to the Court of her States, in order to satisfy it as to her real character,' appears to us to be at variance with Her Majesty's undoubted right to determine, within her own territory, whether her orders, made in vindication of her own neutrality, have been violated or not.

"The question remains, what course ought to have been taken by the authorities at the Cape, first, in order to ascertain whether this vessel was, as alleged by the United States' Consul, an uncondemned prize, brought within British waters in violation of Her Majesty's neutrality; and secondly, what ought to have been done if such had appeared to be really the fact? We think that the allegations of the United States' Consul ought to have been brought to the knowledge of Captain Semmes while the Tuscaloosa was still within British waters; and that he should have been requested to state whether he did or did not admit the facts to be as alleged. He should also have been called upon (unless the facts were admitted) to produce the Tuscaloosa's papers. If the result of these inquiries had been to prove that the vessel was really an uncondenned prize, brought into British waters in violation of Her Majesty's orders made for the purpose of maintaining her neutrality, it would, we think, deserve very serious consideration whether the mode of proceeding in such circumstances, most consistent with Her Majesty's dignity and most proper for the vindication of her territorial rights, would not have been to prohibit the exercise of any further control over the Tuscaloosa by the captors; and to retain that vessel under Her Majesty's control and jurisdiction until properly reclaimed by her original owners."

It will be observed that in the foregoing opinion of the Law Officers, the question whether the Tuscaloosa should, under the circumstances, have been detained for the purpose of being restored to her original owners is suggested as one deserving, should the like case recur, of very serious consideration; it is by no means one on which a positive opinion was intended to be given. The Governor and the Admiral, however,

They accordingly took possession of her. Her Commander, Lieutenant Low, thereupon addressed the following protest to the Governor:-

" Tuscaloosa, Simon's Bay, Cape of Good Hope, " December 28, 1863.

"Sir,
"As the officer in command of the Confederate States' ship Tuscaloosa, tender to the Confederate State States' steamer Alabama, I have to record my protest against the recent extraordinary measures which have been adopted towards me and the vessel under my command by the British authorities of

"In August last the Tuscaloosa arrived in Simon's Bay. She was not only recognized in the character which she lawfully claims to be, viz., a commissioned ship of war belonging to a belligerent Power, but was allowed to remain in the Larbour for the period of seven days, taking in supplies and effecting repairs, with the full knowledge and sanction of the authorities.

"No intimation was given that she was regarded merely in the light of an ordinary prize, or that she was considered to be violating the laws of neutrality. Nor, when she notoriously left for a cruise on active service, was any intimation whatever conveyed that or her return to the port of a friendly of the Queen's Proclamation of Neutrality, and consequently liable to seizure. Misled by the conduct of Her Majesty's Government, I returned to Simon's Bay on the 26th instant, in very urgent want of repairs and supplies; to my surprise I find the Tuscaloosa is now no longer considered as a man-ofrepairs and supplies, to my surprise I may the Tuscanoosa is now no longer consincrea as a man-or-war, and she has, by your orders, as I learn, been seized for the purpose of being handed over to the person who claims her on behalf of her late owners.

"The character of the vessel, viz., that of a lawful commissioned man-of-war of the Confederate States of America, has not been altered since her first arrival in Simon's Bay; and she having been once fully recognized by the British authorities in command in this colony, and no notice or warning once infly recognized by the praisa authorities in command in this colony, and no notice or warning of change of opinion or of friendly feeling having been communicated by public notification or otherwise, I was entitled to expect to be again permitted to enter Simon's Bay without molestation.

"In perfect good faith I returned to Simon's Bay for mere necessaries, and in all honour and good faith I returned to Simon's Bay for mere necessaries, and in all honour and good simulations.

faith in return I should, on change of opinion or of policy on the part of the British authorities, have been desired to leave the port again.

"But, by the course of proceedings taken, I have been (supposing the view now taken by your Excelleney's Government to be correct) first misled, and next entrapped.

"My position and character of my ship will most certainly be vindicated by my tovernment. I am powerless to resist the affront offered to the Confederate States of America by your Excellency's

"I demand, however, the release of my ship; and, if this demand be not promptly complied with, I hereby formully protest against her seizure, especially under the very peculiar circumstances of the

Upon this proceeding being reported to the Government at home, the opinion of the Law Officers was again taken. It was felt that what had been done could not be properly upheld. It was obviously one thing to have seized the Tuscaloosa on the former occasion, as a prize brought into a port of Her Majesty; a very different thing, after she had been treated as a ship of war, and allowed to go free, to let her come again into port in the like character without notice of any hostile intention, and then to seize and practically condemn her. Assuming—of which, however, I must say I entertain very serious doubts-the right and power of the Government to take such a course, it savours too much of perfidy to be a course which Her Majesty's Government could pursue with a due regard to honour and good faith. Orders were therefore sent out by the Secretary of State for the Colonies "to restore the vessel to the Lieutenant of the Confederate States who lately commanded her; or, if he should have left the Cape, then to retain her until she can be handed over to some person who may have authority from Captain Semmes, of the Alabama, or from the Government of the Confederate States, to receive her."+

The order to restore this vessel has been reflected upon in the Case of the United States; but I cannot but think that the decision come to by the Government was, under the circumstances, perfectly right: not only for the reason assigned, but also because, whatever might have been the power of the British Government to seize this vessel while still retaining the character of a prize, she had now been invested with that of a vessel of war belonging to a belligerent, and was therefore no longer amenable to the municipal jurisdiction.

The question is, however, of no practical importance whatsoever.

The Tuscaloosa never was delivered up. Lieutenant Low having left the Cape when the order of the Duke of Newcastle came out, she remained in the custody of the local authorities till the end of the war, and was then delivered up to the United States. No claim of damages can arise, therefore, with regard to her in this respect.*

A serious question of law, however, presents itself in respect of whatsoever damage may have been done by the Tuscaloosa, while cruizing in the interval between her leaving the Cape and her return to it. This liability may be asserted on two grounds: first, it may be said that, the Alabama having been enabled to make war on the commerce of the United States through the want of due diligence on the part of the British Government, and the Tuscaloosa having been taken by the Alabama and converted into a ship of war employed in the same warfare, the unischief done by her must be looked upon as the consequence of such original default of the Government and must be answered for accordingly; a proposition obviously involving very serious consequences, as leading to a liability of a most extensive and unlimited character. Secondly, it may be said that the Tuscaloosa ought to have been seized and delivered up to her original owners, when first found at the Cape, and that the British Government must, as having allowed her to go free, be held liable for any damage afterwards done by her. But this argument of course assumes, first, that the Government had the power and right to seize this vessel; secondly, that it was under any obligation to do so; thirdly, that if such an obligation existed, it rendered the Government liable to do more than compensate the original owners, and involved them in liability towards the United States' Govern-

The question, though of some legal interest, is otherwise but of small importance by reason of the very small amount of damage done by this vessel. On the whole I am disposed to think, though not without some doubt as to whether the damage may not be too remote to found a legal liability, that the mischief done by the Tuscaloosa being the direct consequence of the equipment of the Alabama, on the principle that "onne accessarium sequitur summ principale," those who are answerable for the one must be answerable also for the other. Case of the Georgia.

The Georgia.

The case of the Georgia is one in which not even the desire to establish great principles of neutrality at the expense of Great Britain can, as it appears to me, find matter on which to found a charge of want of due diligence.

This vessel was built at Dumbarton, on the Clyde, and was evidently originally intended as a blockade runner, which may account for the interesting fact, thrice repeated in the American Caso and Argument, that she was christened by a young lady, the daughter of Captain North, who was in some way connected with the Insurgent service.

The Georgia was evidently not constructed as a vessel of war, though afterwards applied to that purpose. The vigilance of the Government having been aroused by the escape of the Florida and the Alabama, the building of ships of war for the Confederate service had become a matter of extreme difficulty, and recourse was had to the contrivance of converting ships, originally built as blockade-runners, into vessels of war.

She was registered on the 20th of March, 1863, as the property of a Mr. Thos. Bold, a merchant of Liverpool, on his declaration that he was the sole owner.* The was were engaged for her as bound to that port, and her crew signed articles for a voyage to Singapore, or any intermediate port, for a period of two signed articles for a voyage to Singapore, or any intermediate port, for a period of two years.†

On the 1st of April this vessel, the name of which had been changed to the Japan, cleared out in ballast for a voyage to Point de Galle and Hong Kong.‡ Her crew, the number of which, as appears from the deposition of Thomas Mahon, one of them, was about 50,§ but which, according to the report of the Chief Officer of Customs, was in fact 48, || though magnified by Mr. Dudley into 70 or 80,¶ having been hired at Liverpool by the firm of Jones and Co., of that place, were sent by steamer to the Clyde. They had shipped for a two years' voyage to Singapore, there and back, and beyond all question had shipp d in the honest belief that the ship was bound for that place. The vessel sailed on the 2nd of April from Greenock, but appears only to have dropped further down the river, and not to have finally left till the 6th or 7th. Mr. Dudley, on the 3rd of April, writing to Mr. Seward on the subject of this vessel, adds:—

"My belief is that she belongs to the Confederates, and is to be converted into a privateer; quite likely to cruize in the East Indies, as Mr. Young, the Paymaster from the Alabama, tells me it has always been a favour'te idea of Mr. Mallory, the Secretary of the Confederate Navy, to send a privateer in these waters. I sent a man from here to Glasgow to accompany these men, to endeavour to find out the destination of the vessel, &c. He has not been successful yet in his efforts. He has been on board, and writes that she has no armament, and he is still there watching her. I have directed him, before he returns, to visit the yards in the Clyde, and to go down to Stockton and Hartlepool."

From a letter from Mr. Adams to Mr. Seward, of the 9th, it appears that that gentleman "had long been in possession of information about the construction and outfit of this vessel in the Clyde; but," he adds, "nothing has ever been furnished me of a nature to base proceedings upon." Neither had there been, assuredly, up to this time, anything which would have justified Mr. Adams in applying to Her Majesty's Government to seize this vessel, or the Government in seizing her.

The measuring surveyor, who had surveyed her on the 17th of January, and had been on board on two subsequent occasions for the purpose of completing his survey, stated that she "appeared to him to be intended for commercial purposes, her framework and plating being of the ordinary size for vessels of her class." The Collector of Customs, upon an inquiry being afterwards directed by the Government, reported:—

The Georgia.

"I have questioned the officer who performs Tide Surveyor's duty affoat, and who visited her on the evening of the 1st instant, to see that the stores were correct. He informs me he saw nothing on board which could lead him to suspect that she was intended for war purposes. I can testify that she not heavily sparred; indeed, she could not spread more canvas than an ordinary merchant-caner. I beg to add, when the Tide Surveyor was on board, the joiners were fitting doors to the ables."

The vessel left ostensibly for the purpose of trying her engines, and an intention was professed of returning to land the joiners who were on board.

But while thus leaving in the disguise of a peaceful merchant-vessel trying its engines, the Japan was intended to be converted into a ship of war, and was not to return to Greenock. When she got well away from Greenock, the joiners, who had been fitting-up cabin doors when she left, were employed to fit-up a magazine, and were afterwards landed lower down in the Clyde. Up to this time, no information had been furnished, or communication made, to Her Majesty's Government on the subject of this vessel.

Having left the Clyde, the Japan proceeded to the coast of France, where, as we know, she was joined by the small steamer Alar, which brought out to her her armament of guns and munitions of war.

Let us pause here for a moment, to see whether, thus far, there was anything in respect of which negligence could be, with the slightest show of reason, imputed to Her Majesty's Government.

It is certain that, though the attention of Mr. Underwood, the United States' Consul at Glasgow, had been for some time fixed on this vessel, there was nothing on which it was thought that the action of the Government could be invoked.

It is said, indeed, in the Argument of the United States, that the reason was that he "had not and could not, with his means of information, produce 'such evidence as would support an indictment for misdemeanour;' and nothing short of that, Mr. Adams had been informed in the July previous, would, in the opinion of the Solicitor of the Customs at London, furnish 'justifiable ground of seizure.'" But, whatever might have been said in the preceding July, at this time there was everything to encourage Mr. Adams, if he had possessed any ground for asking for the interposition of the Government, to take that course. During the last three months he had made representations to the British Government on the subject of three different vessels, the Georgiana, the Phantom, and the Southerner, in regard to which, at the time of his first communication he had no evidence to produce beyond the statements or suspicions of the United States' Consuls at London or Liverpool; and inquiries had been instantly made in each case, and in regard to the latter two vessels, Mr. Adams was writing at this very time (April 6) to express his satisfaction at the steps which had been taken.† He was, moreover, in correspondence with Earl Russell on the subject of another vessel, the Alexandra, which was seized on the 5th April by order of the Government, a fact of which he was informed on the same day, and at which he also wrote to testify his "lively satisfaction." He knew too that, on no hetter authority than public report, the Government had of themselves instituted an inquiry in the month of March with a view to ascertaining whether vessels of war were being built at Glasgow for the Confederates, the result of which inquiry had been communicated to him on the 21st of March.§ The reason why Mr. Adams made no communication to the Government relative to this vessel was, as he expressly stated when writing to Mr. Seward three days later than the date of the vessel's departure, that "nothing had been furnished to him of a nature to base proceedings upon.

Upon what, then, can any charge of negligence against Her Majesty's Government be founded in respect of this vessel? Simply upon the old allegation of the notoricty of the fact that it was being fitted out as a vessel of war for the service of the Confederate Government. And how is this notoricty attempted to be established? Solely by an anonymous letter, purporting to be addressed to Lord Palmerston, published in the "Daily News" of the 12th of February, 1863, in which the vessel is specien of $\| \] The letter is a very long one, and not written in a style to command the attention, the changes being rung on "pirates" and "slaveholders" in a very long object, and is laveholders? If it is meant to be suggested that the author was writing upon facts notorious to the world, and not from his own private sources of knowledge, it is only necessary to turn to the letter to see that this could not have been so. The writer is personally familiar with the whole subject of vessels built for, or in the interest of, the Confederates, and was doubtless some official connected with the United States. But what form did the notoriety, of which this anonymous writer was the organ, take in respect of the Japan, afterwards the Georgia? Did it trent her as a vessel of war, as the passages in the American Case and Argument wound lead us to suppose? Not so. Her destination was expected to be of an humbler kind—that of a blockade-runner. This is what is said by "Anonymous" respecting this vessel:—

"Mr. Peter Denny, of Dumbarton, has constructed two fine ser-w-steamers. They are lying in the Clyde. Report, of a somewhat authentic kind, says one of them is partly owned by the 'Chinese' and partly by individuals at Nassau, New Providence. It is publicly announced that she is soon to be employed on the line between Nassau and Charleston. Her name is the Virginia. The term 'Chinese' is in general use in the building-yards of the Clyde and the Mersey to designate the Confederates, and the 'Emperor of Chinese' have been striving very hard to purchase the sister-vessel to the Virginia, through one of their agents at Liverpool, but Mr. Denny built and lost the Memphis, and he requires the 'Celestials' to pay each down before he parts with his property."

It need hardly be pointed out that, being "employed on a line," with reference to a vessel, means being employed in carrying goods or passengers backwards and forwards between two or more given places.

There was, therefore, nothing in this letter, any more than in the facts, to lead to any supposition on the part of the Government that the Japan was intended for a ship of war.

But let us follow the vessel. Having left the Clyde, the Japan first made towards the Isle of Man, then suddenly changed her course, and went North, through the North Channel, then down the west coast of Ireland, passed Cape Clear, then steered eastward, and then made straight for Ushant, Ushant Light being the first light sighted. She then kept on and off near the French Coast.†

In the meantime a small steamer colled the Alar, of London, having taken the armament of the Georgia on board at Newhaven, as well as some twenty to thirty men, who were to form an addition to her crew, set sail from Newhaven on the 5th of April, having cleared out for Alderney and St. Malo. Keeping clear, however, of both these places, she steered straight for the west coast of France; which, however, owing to accidents which happened to her machinery, she did not reach till Wednesday the 8th. The Georgin was then sighted far away to the westward, and the machinery of the Alar having again broken down, the former vessel came and took her in tow, and took her into the narrow passage between Ushant and the mainland. There the transhipment of the guns and munitions of the Georgia from the Alar took place, the whole being finally accomplished by the afternoon of Thursday the 9th, when the Georgia stood out to sea, while the Alar returned, but her machinery having again broken down, she was obliged to put into Plymouth.‡

Prior to the Alar parting company with the Georgia, a Captain Lamont, or Dupont, who had come out in the Alar, assumed the command of the Georgia, and, having called the crew together, informed them that the vessel was not bound for Singapore, but was intended for the Confederate service, to "sink, hurn, and destroy vessels belonging to the United States." He then proposed to them to sign articles to serve for three years. Part of the crew agreed to sign articles accordingly, but some seventeen refused, were paid their wages then due, and returned in the Alar.

seventeen refused, were paid their wages then due, and returned in the Alar.

In the meantime, Mr. Dolan, the Collector of Customs at Newhaven, had, the day after the Alar left Newhaven, written to the Commissioners of Customs respecting her:—

"Honourable Sirs,
"The steam-ship Alar, of London, 85 tons, owned by H. P. Maples, sailed on Sunday morning, the steam-ship Alar, of London, 85 tons, owned by H. P. Maples, sailed on Sunday morning, and St. Malo. On Saturday, at midnight, thirty men, twenty of whom appeared to be British sailors, ten mechanics, arrived by train. Three gentlemen accompanied them, Mr. Lewis, of Alderney, Mr. Ward, and Mr. Jones. The men appeared to be ignorant of their precise destination; some said they were to get 20l. each for the trip. A man, in lame, superintended them. Shortly after midnight, a man arrived from Brighton on horseback, the a telegram, which, for purposes of secresy,

His answers were brief, and with reserve, leaving no doubt on my mind, nor on the minds of any here, that the thirty men and munitions of war are destined for transfer at sea to some second Alabama. The private telegram to Brighton intimated, very probably, having been reserved for the last hour, where that vessel would be found. Whether the shipment of the men, who all appeared to be British subjects, can, if it should be hereafter proved that they have been transferred to a Federal or Confederate vessel, be held as an infringement of the Foreign Enlistment Act, and whether the clearance of the Alar, if hereafter proved to be untrue, can render the master amenable under the Customs Consolidation Act, is for your consideration respectfully submitted.

Thus, Alderney was supposed to be the place to which the Alar had gone. Similar information appears to have reached Mr. Adams, though we are not informed from what quarter. On the 8th of April he writes to Earl Russell.-

" Legation of the United States, London, April 8, 1863.

"From information received at this Legation, which appears entitled to credit, I am compelled to the painful conclusion that a steam-vessel has just departed from the Clyde with the intent to depredate on the commerce of the people of the United States. She passed there under the name of the Japan, but is since believed to have assumed the name of the Virginia. Her immediate destination is the Island of Alderney, where it is supposed she may yet be at this moment. A small steamer called the Alar, belonging to Newhaven, and commanded by Henry P. Maples, has been loaded with a large supply of guns, shells, shot, powder, &c., intended for the equipment of the Virginia, and is either on the way or has arrived there. It is further alleged, that considerable number of British subjects have been culisted at Liverpool, and sent to serve on board this cruizer.

"Should it be yet in the power of Her Majesty's Government to institute some inquiry into the nature of these proceedings, in season to establish their character, if innocent, or to put a stop to them. if criminal, I feel sure that it would be removing a heavy burden of anxiety from the minds of my countrymen in the United States.

This was the first communication received by the Government on the subject of this ship. Not a moment was lost by the Government in instituting inquiries, and a letter was dispatched the same day to the Lieutenant-Governor of Guernsey, Major-General Slade, from the Home Office, to whose department the Channel Islands belong :-

"Sir,
"I am directed by Sir George Grey to transmit to you herewith, as received through the Foreign Office, a copy of a letter from the United States' Minister at this Court, respecting a steam-vessel named either the Japan or the Virginia, reported to have left the Clyde for Alderney, where she is to receive on board an armament conveyed to that island by a small steamer, the Alar, belonging to Newhaven, and is to be eventually employed in hostilities against the United States; and I am to request that you will make immediate inquiry into the truth of the allegations contained in that communication, "I have to call your attention to the Statute 59 Geo. 111, cap. 69. In that case the Law Officers of the Crown should be instructed to take, without delay, the proper proceedings authorized by the law of Alderney, to enforce the provisions of the Act in question, and the Officers of Customs may be called upon to assist, if necessary "Sir George Grey will be glad to be informed of the result of the inquiry, and of any steps that may be taken in consequence.

On receipt of this letter General Slade immediately sent a ship of war to Alderney; but, as neither the Japan nor the Alar had gone to Alderney, of course neither of them was to be found there.

I should have thought it difficult under these circumstances to raise an accusation of negligence against Her Majesty's Government. Nevertheless, the Government are charged in the American Case with neglect in not having, on the receipt of Mr. Adams's letter of the 8th, dispatched ships of war from Portsmouth and Plymouth to seize the two vessels. "The sailing and the destination," it is said, "were so notorious as to be the subject of newspaper comment." A single newspaper, the "Liverpool Journal of Commerce," of April 9, is referred to in support of this assertion. I turn to it, and I find it there stated, indeed, that the vessel had sailed, but "for unknown destinations," The only direction, therefore, given to the Government inquiry was Alderney. that island it is said to have been incumbent on the Government to send ships of war from Portsmouth and Plymouth, because "Alderney and the Channel Islands were

Brest and St. Malo are on different sides of the French coast, and at least 150 miles apart, and according as a vessel was bound to the one or the other, she would steer a totally different course. But still more startling is the statement that Alderney and the Channel Islands would have been in the course of a vessel coming round the west coast of Ireland, and bound for Ushant and the northwest part of the French coast, as the Georgia undoubtedly was. To a vessel coming round Cape Clear, and intending to make her way towards the Bay of Biseay, or to stand out into the Atlantic, Alderney would have been from 250 to 300 miles out of Independently of the absurdity of supposing that the Georgia would have come to Alderney at all—more especially as she would there have been exposed to seizure, as being in a British port, if any suspicion should have arisen respecting her real character when it was much easier for her to take in her armament off the French coast, I must express my surprise that it should be deliberately stated, by those who know that she never went to or near Alderney at all, and that no other destination of the vessel was known or surmised, to which ships could have been sent after her, that, by reason that Barl Russell, "instead of directing action to be taken by the navy, directed inquiries to be made by the Treasury and Home Office, the Georgia escaped.

Is it to be said that without having the least idea of any other destination than Alderney, the Government were to send ships of war in all directions in quest of two vessels, neither of which could possibly be known to any officer in Her Majesty's navy? Even had the spot where the two vessels were to meet been known, it would searcely have been possible for a ship from Plymouth-much less from Portsmouth-which is more than 100 miles further off, to have overtaken them.

The letter from Mr. Adams was not written till the 8th, and would appear from Mr. Hammond's letter to that gentleman of the same date, to have been received in the afternoon of that day. Had instructions been telegraphed to Plymouth that afternoon, it would have taken some short time to carry the orders into execution. Steamships are not ready to start at five minutes' notice. From Plymouth to Ushant is some 120 miles; and, on the 9th, the Georgia had left the French coast and was on her way upon the ocean. But for the delay oceasioned by the breaking down of the Alar's machinery she would have been gone several hours sooner.

There is a homely, but expressive, English saying that "Any stick serves to heat a dog with," but one must have a most determined intention to beat the creature to make such a case as this a ground of complaint.

It has been sought to fix the British Government with the responsibility for damage done by this vessel on the ground that, until the 23rd of June, Bold continued to be on the register as owner. It is true that it was not until this date that Bold informed the Collector of Customs that he had parted with the vessel, and returned the certificate of registry. No such consequence, however, as is contended for, at all follows. The ownership of a British vessel may be transferred, though the evidence of it, as afforded by the register, remains incomplete; and it would be absurd to suppose that Mr. Bold, if the true owner, lent his vessel to the Confederate Government, or failed to take care to be paid for her before he parted with her. The delay in cancelling the registration was, no doubt, for the purpose of delaying as long as possible the disclosure of the real transaction.

Mr. Squarey, the Liverpool Solicitor engaged for the United States, being eonsulted on this point, gave the following very sensible advice:-

"It does not appear to me the engagement of the crew can be treated as an offence against the Act, because the only legal contract binding upon the crew was that appearing upon the articles. The men were not hable to do anything except what they had agreed to do by the articles; and from the statements of the men whom I saw, it did not appear that they knew when they shipped that it was expected or intended that they should serve on board a man-of-war or privateer. As regards the liability of the British registered owner to make good to the owners of the American vessel destroyed the loss sustained by them, I conceive it must depend upon the question whether those in command of the vessel at the time can be considered to have been the agents of the British owner. If they were such agents, and there was any evidence to show that the destruction of the American ship could be considered as an act within the scope of their authority, I have no doubt that the owners would be liable; but it appears to me that the circumstances to which I have previously referred go very far to rebut the presumption that such agency existed, and to prove that, in destroying the American vessel, the officers and crew were acting, not for the British owner, but for the Government of the so-called Confederate States. In such case I do not think that any liability could be established against the British owner, for it is now well established that the mere fact of being on the register of the ship does not involve liability for the acts or engagements of the master and crew, and that such liability is in fact a question depending upon express or implied agency in every case.

"Although, therefore, I do not see how a British owner is to be made liable, there is, in my opinion, a case which justifies the American Government in bringing the matter before the notice of the British Government, and requiring explanations from that Government of the circumstances under which a British vessel is found to be engaged in the destruction of vessels belonging to American

It appears to me, therefore, beyond all question clear that no charge of negligence can by possibility attach to Her Majesty's Government in respect of this ship. And I confess it was not without surprise that I heard one member of this Tribunal say that, but that Mr. Adams had declared in favour of the British Government on this occasion, he should have been prepared to pronounce "a more severe" judgment. If such views are to prevail, the responsibility of neutrals will be a serious thing indeed.

It only remains to be added in respect of this vessel that a prosecution was instituted by the Government, under the Foreign Enlistment Act, against Jones and Highatt, two members of the firm of Jones and Co., of Liverpool, by whom the men had been engaged to serve on board the Japan, and as to whom it was alleged that they had engaged the men for the purpose of their enlisting in the Confederate service when the true character of the vessel was declared. The case was tried before me at Liverpool, when both defendants were found guilty by the jury, but points of law were reserved involving considerable difficulty, particularly that the men, at the time they were engaged at Liverpool, were not aware of the ulterior purpose which the defendants were alleged to have had in view.

On the defendants being brought up for judgment, the defendants having consented to abandon the points reserved, and to forego an intended application for a new trial, an arrangement was come to between the Counsel for the Crown and the Counsel for the defendants that a fine of 50l. should be imposed on each of them. The punishment might, at first sight, appear inadequate, but looking to the legal difficulties, it was on the whole, I think, a prudent arrangement; it having been better that the law should be vindicated, though with a less degree of punishment, than that the chance of a defeat should be risked.

Case of the Shenandoah.

The Shenandoah.

This vessel, originally known as the Sea King, was a screw-steamer built at Glasgow in the year 1863, for the purpose of being employed in the China trade.* She had been seen by Mr. Dudley at Glasgow in 1863, who represented her as well adapted for warlike purposes, and thought she was likely to be bought for such purpose by the Confederates.† But in this he was mistaken. She was bought by private owners; Messrs. Robertson and Co., of London, acted as managing owners.

She had from the beginning two 12-pounder carronades, such as merchant-vessels are in the habit of earrying as signal guns, but nothing more.§

In November 1863, she left London on a voyage first to New Zealand, taking out troops for Her Majesty's Government to Auckland, and from thence to Hankow for a cargo of tea, and with the latter she returned to London. She was a vessel built entirely for commercial purposes, and was in no respect whatever adapted for war.

In September 1864 she was sold by her owners, in the ordinary way of business, to a Mr. Richard Wright, a shipowner of Liverpool. On the 7th of October, 1864, Wright granted a certificate of sale to Mr. P. S. Corbett, the master of the ship, empowering him to sell her within six months from the date of the certificate, at any port out of the United Kingdom, for a price not less than 45,0001.

After this the vessel cleared out, as for a trading voyage "to Bombay, calling at any ports or places on the passage, and any other ports or places in India, China, or Japan, or the Pacific or Atlantic Oceans, trading to or from, as legal freights might offer, until the return of the ship to a final port of discharge in the United Kingdom or continent of Europe; the voyage not to exceed two years."

A crew was hired, and signed articles for the voyage in question, and the vessel sailed as if upon it, without any suspicion on the part of the crew, or of any one not in the secret, that she was

The vessel underwent no change prior to her leaving; no equipment of her for the purpose of receiving any armament took place; she remained, as she had been from the beginning, fitted for commercial purposes only. She was wholly unadapted to receive guns. She had on board only the two small 12-pounder guns she had always had, such as merchant-vessels of her class always carry as signal guns. She had no arms or

When afterwards examined at Melbourne by Captain Payne, the latter reported that, "everything indicated that she was nothing more than an ordinary merchant-ship. He could not discover any magazine; there were no stands for small-arms, cutlasses, or pistols; no shot racks were fitted, nor could be see any shell room aloft. "There is nothing" he says, "to protect her machines from shot and shell; in fact, her boilers and the principal part of her machinery are above the water line. Her bunkers certainly are between the machinery and the ship's side, but from their small dimensions they would offer but small resistance to shet. The most vulnerable part, viz., the boilers, is left quite unprotected." "I am altogether of opinion," adds Captain Payne, "that there is nothing in her build, armament (with the exception of two Whitworth guns), and equipment that should call for more special notice than that she is an ordinary merchant-vessel armed with a few guns."

It is plain therefore that, till the Whitworth guns in question were put on board, there was nothing whatever on board the Sea-King to attract attention, or to excite the slightest suspicion about her. That this was so is shown by the fact that the crew fully believed that she was really bound for the voyage to the East.

The Shenandoab.

But it appears that the Mr. Richard Wright who had bought the vessel, was the father-in-law of Mr. Prioleau, the managing partner of the firm of Fraser, Trenholm, and Co., of Liverpool; whereupon we are gravely told, in the Case of the United States, that "the acquisition, by a near connection of a member of their firm, of a fastgoing steamer, capable of being so converted, and the proposition to send her to sea in ballast, with nothing on board but two mounted guns and a supply of provisions and coal, ought of itself to have attracted the attention of the British officials; and that the omission to take notice of the fact is a proof of want of the due diligence required by

Not the slightest intimation, however, is given as to what notice should have been taken, or what could possibly have been done. There was nothing that could, in any way, have justified the detention of the vessel. In the foregoing statement we have, therefore, as it seems to me, an unwarrantable assumption.

The Sea King left the port of London on the 9th October, and proceeded to Madeira, where she arrived on the 18th† In the meantime a small steamer called the Laurel had left Liverpool, having cleared for Matamoras and Nassau. She took out cases marked as machinery, that in reality containing two 33-pounder Whitworth guns, and four 8-inch smooth-bore guns of 55 cwt. each, together with shells, small arms, and ammunition for the use of the Sea King.

Mr. Dudley was somehow informed that the cases contained guns and gun-carriages, and believing they were intended to be mounted on the decks of the Laurel, wrote to Mr. Adams that he apprehended she was intended as a privateer. At the same time he admitted that he had no evidence to implicate her except the taking on the guns in cases.§ It is plain, therefore, that Mr. Dudley did not surmise any connection between the two vessels, one of which was starting from London, the other from Liverpool, and I am at a loss to see how any could possibly have been surmised.

Lieutenant Waddell, the future captain of the Sea King, and the other officers, and seventeen men who were to form part of her erew, were also passengers in the Laurel.

Before the Laurel left Liverpool, Mr. Dudley began to suspect that the guns put on board her were intended for another vessel, as they were more in number than would be required for a vessel of her size; || but he was evidently altogether without any definite information about her.

The Sea King arrived at Madeira about the 18th of October; the Laurel about the same time. The following day both vessels proceeded to some small islands called the Desertas, where the guns and warlike stores intended for the Sea King were trans.crred to her from the Laurel. Either then, or prior to leaving England, Corbett, acting on the power of attorney received from the owner, Wright, sold the vessel to the Confederate Government. According to his account the sale took place on the 19th. On that day, the captain and officers took possession of her as a Confederate ship. Captain Corbett informed the crew that he had sold the ship to the Confederate Government, that she was henceforth to be a cruizer in their service, and that he had delivered her up to them.

Every effort was made, by persuasion and offers of large bounties and high wages, to induce the former crew to enter the Confederate service on board the vessel; but, with the exception of two or three, all the rest, forty-two in number, refused, and were conveyed in the Laurel to Teneriffe, from whence they afterwards returned to London. The Confederate flag having been hoisted in the Sea King, she cruized thenceforward under the name of the Shenandoah.

It must be, indeed, a stern stickler for neutral responsibility who could say that up to this point there had been anything for which blame could be attributed to Her Majesty's Government. Not the slightest suspicion had attached to this ship, which was only known as a merchant-vessel, prior to her leaving England. But besides this, was only known as a increment-vesser, prior to her leaving languard. But besides this, no offence whatever had been committed against British law.

The ship had not been either "fitted out," "equipped," or "armed," within the United Kingdom or within Her Majesty's dominions. Built as a merchant-vessel, she had been sold, as she stood, to the Confederate Government; and neither by the municipal law of Great Britain, any more than by that of the United States, nor by international law, was such a sale in any way illegal.

The Argument of the United States itself admits that "if the Shenandoah at this The Shenandoah. point of her history stood alone, and there had been no other cause of complaint against Her Majesty's Government, the United States could not now hold Great Britain responsible for her original escape and armament."

No question, therefore, can arise as to the responsibility of Great Britain in respect of any damages done by this vessel prior to her arrival at Melbourne.

The first that was heard of the Shenandoah by Her Majesty's Government was from a letter of the 30th of October from Mr. Grattan, the British Consul at Teneriffe. On the Laurel arriving at that place, the master, J. F. Ramsay, on presenting himself at the Consular Office, stated that he wished to land 43 passengers, who were to proceed the Consular Office, stated that he wished to fail to passengers, who were to proceed to England by the next Liverpool steamer, and that these persons were the master and erew of the British steamer Sea King, of London, which vessel had been wrecked off the Desertas. The Laurel continued her voyage on the 22nd instant. The master, on getting up steam, and not before, landed the above-mentioned scamen.

The master of the Sea King, P. S. Corbett, did not call at the Consular Office, as is usual in such cases, either for the purpose of making a protest or to claim assistance. Therefore, on the 25th instant, Consul Grattan sent to desire his attendance, and demanded the certificate of registry of his vessel, in pursuance of instructions contained in paragraph No. 13 of the Board of Trade Instructions. On handing in his certificate Corbett informed Mr. Grattan that his vessel had not been wrecked, but that she had been sold in London, and delivered to her owners on the high seas; and that himself and his erew had landed here for the purpose of returning to England as passengers in the West Coast of Africa mail-steamer, due at the port on the 31st instant.

The Consul, having been struck by the discrepancy between the statements of the two masters, made inquiries of some of the former crew of the Sea King, and having taken their depositions, and being of opinion that they contained evidence sufficient to substantiate a charge against the master, Corbett, of an infringement of the Foreign Enlistment Act, sent him in custody to England, at the same time forwarding the depositions of the men in a despatch to Earl Russell.*

I will conclude the narrative as to what further happened in relation to Corbett before I pursue the further history of the Shenandoah.

On the arrival of the depositions in England, the Law Officers at first advised that no prosecution could be sustained against Corbett, as all the facts had taken place on the high seas, and a British ship on the high seas could not properly be considered as "within Her Majesty's dominions, or a place helonging to or subject to Her Majesty." Two further affidavits having been afterwards furnished by Mr. Adams, cf men who had been engaged by the defendant in London, and who spoke to language of a suspicious character then used by him, the Law Officers, on being again consulfed, thought that there was sufficient evidence on which to found a prosecution; and they further thought that as the ship had left the country as a British ship, sho might, primd facie, be considered as such, that is, till a sale and transfer of property in might, prima facie, be considered as such, that is, the a sale and transfer of property in her was shown; and that it might be deserving of serious consideration whether her deck might not be considered as "a place belonging to Her Majesty," within the language of the Act.‡ A prosecution against Corbett was accordingly instituted by the Government, for a breach of the 2nd section of the Foreign Enlistment Act, in endeavouring to procure men to enlist and serve, or to embark and go out of Her Majesty's dominions to enlist and serve, in the Confederate service. The case came on before myself and a special jury, at Westminster Hall, in December 1865. The witnesses for the prosecution were six sailors who had formed part of the crew of the Sea King, and who deposed that, after Captain Corbett had informed the crew that he had sold the ship to the Confederate Government, he endeavoured to persuade the men to enlist, pointing out to them the advantage of so doing in the way of pay and prize-money. There was, however, considerable inconsistency in the evidence of these men, some of them ascribing to the defendant what others put into the month of Captain Waddell, and vice versa. The men appear to have had a strong feeling against the Captain, by reason of their intended voyage to the East having come to an abrupt termination, and to their not having received as much wages as they expected for the time they had been out.

The first mate, the steward, and the chief engineer of the erew of the Sea King, one of the crew of the Laurel, and two or three Confederate sailors who had joined the The Shenandoah.

Confederate ship, all of whom had witnessed all that passed, denied positively that Corbett had taken any part in persuading the men to sign articles, but attributed to Captain Waddell, exclusively, the language which the witnesses for the prosecution had represented as spoken by Corbett.

It having been objected on the part of the defendant that, while, in order to constitute an offence under the enactment in question, the act complained of must have been done within Her Majesty's dominions, what was here alleged to have been done by the defendant had taken place in Spanish waters; it was answered by the Solicitor-General that, if the act had been done on board a British vessel, that would be sufficient to satisfy the statute, and that, though he could not deny that a sale of the vessel had taken place, yet that, so long as the British crew remained on board, the vessel could not be considered as having been delivered up to the purchasers and must still be looked upon as a British ship. I was, however, clearly of opinion that the defendant Corbett having openly announced the sale of the ship and that he had delivered her over to Waddell, and the latter having assumed the command, and, with his officers, taken possession of her, the delivery had been completed and the property effectually transferred. I, however, desired the opinion of the jury on this point, as well as on the questions whether the defendant had endeavoured to induce the men to enlist in the Confederate service, as crew of the Sea King; and, if so, whether, when he engaged the men in London, he had the ulterior design of inducing them to enlist when beyond the Queen's dominions. The jury thought the evidence too conflicting upon which to convict the defendant, and, it being very doubtful whether the witnesses for the Crown were not confounding what had been said by Waddell with what was said by Corbett, I think the jury acted wisely on the whole in acquitting the defendant.*

I have adverted to these circumstances in justice to the Government and the Solicitor-General who conducted the prosecution. No public prosecutor could have discharged his duty more honestly or zealously, or with a greater desire to obtain a conviction if it could legitimately and properly be done.

At Melbourne.

I return to the Shenandoah. Nothing more was heard of her by Her Majesty's Government till she arrived at Melbourne on the 25th of January, 1865.

Before relating the events which occurred during her visit at this port, it may be well briefly to describe the locality, some knowledge of which is necessary to a thorough appreciation of the facts. Port Philip, at the north-easterly end of which Melbourne is situated, is a bay of irregular oval shape, some 60 or 70 miles in circuit, opening into the sea by a narrow entrance to the south-west, called the Heads. The harbour of Melbourne, situated as has been said at the opposite end, is called Hobson's Bay, and forms the estuary of the Yarra-Yarra. Melbourne itself is about two miles inland up the Yarra-Yarra; on either side of Hobson's Bay are two suburbs of Melbourne, named respectively Williamstown and Sandridge. They are each connected with the town by a railway, and a steam ferry runs between the two, from one railway pier to another across the bay, which is here two and a-half miles wide. Williamstown is the place where shipping operations are for the most part carried on, and where scafaring men principally frequent. It should be added that the Governor had, at the time of the arrival of the Shenandoah, a small military force at his disposal, but no vessel of war of any kind; the Bombay, which is spoken of in the Argument of the United States as such, being merely a contract steam-packet belonging to the Peninsular and Oriental Company, with a naval agent on board in charge of the mails. The authorities were therefore dependent upon the Customs officers and the ordinary water police for the surveillance of the harbour.

Immediately on the arrival of the Shenandoah her Commander, Waddell, wrote to have been marked by the most anxious desire to do what was strictly right.

The conduct of the Governor and of the Executive Council of the Colony seems to The Shenandoah.

At Melbourne.

The Commissioner of Trade and Customs was directed to communicate with the Commander of the Shenandoah in the name of the Governor,* requesting him to inform the Government of Victoria of the nature and extent of the repairs of which he stated his vessel to be in need; and informing him that permission would be granted for the Shenandoah to remain in the waters of the Colony a sufficient time to effect her repairs, and to receive the provisions or things necessary for the subsistence of her crewbut not beyond what would be necessary for immediate use; and that when the Government of Victoria were in possession of the nature and extent of the supplies and repairs which were necessary, he should be informed of the time which his vessel would be permitted to remain in the waters of the Colony; and that, as to that part of his letter which referred to prisoners, he must communicate to the Government the names of the prisoners, and any other particulars relating to them which he might be willing to supply.

The application of Lieutenant Waddell to land his prisoners was also directed to be communicated to the United States' Consul.

Mr. Blanchard, the Consul of the United States at Melbourne, protested against the Shenandoah being admitted to the privileges of a belligerent, maintaining that, as she had been sold at sea to the Confederate Government, a sale under such circumstances was unlawful; that, being a British-built merchant-ship, she could not be converted into a war-vessel of the Confederate States on the high seas, but only by proceeding to, and sailing in such a character from, one of the ports of the Confederacy; and that, "not being legally a man-of-war, she was but a lawless pirate, dishonouring the flag under which her status was to be established and under which she decoyed her victims.

Having consulted the Law Officers of the Colony, who advised that the vessel purported to be, and in their opinion should be treated as, a ship of war belonging to a belligereat Power, the Governor and Council decided that, whatever might be the previous history of the Shenandoah, the Government of the Colony was bound to treat her as a ship of war belonging to a belligerent Power.

It is clear that the Law Officers of the Colony were perfectly right. Even had there been any foundation for the notion of Mr. Blanchard that the sale of the vessel on the high seas was invalid, the Shenandoah arrived at the Colony as a commissioned ship of a belligerent Power, which, according to the usage of maritime nations, was a sufficient ground for her reception as a vessel of war. It is to be observed that no question can arise in respect of this vessel as to its having been the duty of the British Government to seize her in spite of the commission of the Confederate States. She had neither been equipped, nor armed, nor specially adapted, wholly or in part, for warlike use, in British territory, nor was the sale of her to a belligerent on the high seas any violation of the rights of Great Britain as a neutral. To have seized her would therefore have been utterly unjustifiable.

A question, it appears, arose as to whether the officer in command should not be required to show his commission, and the majority of the Council decided that there was no necessity for doing so. And nothing having then occurred to lead to any doubt as to the vessel being commissioned by the Confederate Government, or as to the honour of the officer who commanded her, to have demanded to see the commission he professed to bear would have implied an unworthy suspicion.

What followed is thus related in a narrative signed by the gentlemen who were at that time Chief Secretary, Minister of Justice, Commissioner of Trade and Customs, and Attorney-General of the Colony:—

"On receiving the communication from the Covernor, Lieutenant Waddell employed Messrs. "On receiving the communication from the Covernor, Lieutenam wanter employed Messis, Luglands, Brothers, and Co., ironfounders, of Melbourne, to examine the vessel and to undertake the repairs, and they, on the 30th January, reported that it was absolutely necessary to put the Shenandoah on the Government slip, as the diver who inspected the vessel had reported that the lining of the outer stern-back was entirely gone, and would have to be replaced; as d that, as three days would be a superfection of the control of the contro

"It may be here remarked that the slip (termed the Government slip) in the Report of Messus, Langlands, Brothers, and Co.) was not in possession of, or under the control of the Government, the fact being that, although it was originally built by the Government, yet it had been for many years leased, and at that time was under lease to Mr. Enoch Chambers.

The Shenandoah.

"This Report was submitted to the Commissioner of Trade and Customs, who wrote, by direction of his Excellency the Governor, for a list of the supplies required for the immediate use of the vessel, and stated that his Excellency had appointed a Board, consisting of Mr. Payne, Inspector and Secretary of the Steam Navigation Board; Mr. Elder, the Superintendent of the Marine Yard at Melbourne; and Mr. Wilson, the Government Marine Engineer, to go on board the Shenandoah, and to examine and report whether that vessel was then in a fit state to go to sea, or what repairs were necessary.

Lieutenant Waddell furnished a list of the supplies he required, and permission was given for the shipment on board of reasonable quantities of the supplies asked for

"The Board appointed by his Excellency had the vessel examined by a diver, and then reported— "1st. That the Shenaudoah was not in a fit state to proceed to sea as a steam-ship.

"3rd. That the part or parts requiring repair being the inner stern-post bearing of the screw-shaft, the extent of the damage could not be ascertained without the vessel being slipped.

"His Excellency, on the receipt of this report, gave permission for the vessel to be placed on the patent slip, and he requested the Commissioner of Trade and Customs to make arrangements for obtaining daily reports of the progress of repairs and provisioning of the Shenandoah, and directed every precaution to be taken against the possibility of the Commander of that vessel in any way extending its armament, or rendering the present armament more effective; and these instructions were carefully

"On the 6th of February, 1865, an application was made for permission to land some surplus stores from the Shenandoah, which was refused on the advice of the Attorney-General.

"The repairs of the Shemmdonh not having been proceeded with, the Commissioner of Trade and Customs wrote on the 7th of February to Lieutenant Waddell, stating that his Excellency desired that a day should be named for proceeding to sea; and that he was directed to say that, after carefully considering the question of the position of Great Britain as strictly neutral in the present contest, the use of appliances—the property of the tovernment—could not be granted, nor any assistance rendered by it, directly or indirectly, towards effecting the repairs of the Shenandoah.

Lieutenant Waddell replied that he could not name a day for proceeding to sea till the vessel was taken on the slip, when the injury could be ascertained, and the time estimated for its repair, the recent gales having prevented him from lightening the ship to the necessary draught preparatory to going on the slip, in which matter he had been guided by those in charge of the slip. He hoped the weather would permit the engineer in charge of the slip to take the Shenandonh on the slip the following morning. "The vessel was not hauled up on the slip until the morning of the 10th, when the Board appointed by the Governor had another inspection, and they then reported as follows: "1st. That the liganum vitor staves forming the bearing of the forward end of the outer length of

"3rd. That these repairs (necessary to render the steam-ship seaworthy), could be effected in or extent of about 4 inches, about five clear working days from that date."*

It thus appears that on the 3rd of February, the Commissioner of Trade and Customs was instructed by the Governor to make arrangements for obtaining daily reports of the progress of the repairs and provisioning of the Shenandoah, and communicated to him the information so obtained; and to take every precaution in his power against the possibility of the Commander of that vessel in any degree extending his armament, or rendering the present armament more effective.

Thus matters stood when, on the 10th of February, the United States' Consul wrote to the Governor, inclosing a deposition on oath of one John Williams, who had been a prisoner on board the Shenandoah, and who, having been one of the crew of the ship D. Godfrey, captured by the Shenandoah, had escaped from the latter by swimming ashore on the 6th. In this deposition Williams stated that fifteen or twenty men had joined the ship since her arrival in port, and were concealed in various parts of her, and that three others, who were wearing the ship's uniform, had also come aboard since her arrival. To this was added, on the 13th, the affidavit of one Madden, another of the crew of the D. Godfrey, who stated that "when he left the vessel on the 7th, there were men hid in the forecastle of the ship, and two working in the galley, all of whom came on board the vessel since she arrived in the port; and that the officers pretended they did not know these men were hid."§

The proceedings of the Governor and Council on the 13th of February, are marked by the same attention to their duty in the matter as before, as appears from the following minute of their proceedings:-"The further Report of the Board of Survey on the Shenandoah, after viewing that vessel on the slip, is submitted and considered.

"His Excellency states to the Council that, in consequence of a letter which he had received from The Shenandoah. the United States' Consul, dated the 10th instant and inclosing a testimony on oath of one John Williams, he had deemed it his duty to refer it for the consideration of the Law Officers of the Crown; as, presuming the statements therein contained to be correct, it would appear that the Commander of the Shemandoah was taking advantage of the aid and comfort which had been afforded to him in this port, to increase the number of his crew by enlisting British subjects, in contravention of the Foreign Eulistment Act.

In consequence of this reference, the Law Officers of the Crown had directed the attendance of the man John Williams, and that he had, with other men, attended that morning at the Crown Law Offices, and had made statements to the effect that a number of men representing themselves to be Englishmen had gone on board the Shemandoah since her arrival in this port, with the intention of joining her, and were now concealed on board.

The Law Officers being of opinion that there was sufficient evidence to take steps for prosecuting, had instructed the police to lay informations against these men for a misdemeanour, and to apply for a warrant for their apprehension.

"On consultation with the Council, it was not considered necessary by his Excellency to take any further steps in the matter until the result of the police-officer proceedings were known; but Mr. Francis is instructed again to inquire, by letter, when Lieutenant Waddell would be ready to

"A Report from the detective police at Sandbridge, of this day's date, on matters relating to the Shenandouh, is laid upon the table of the Council; and as, from information which had reached the Government, some suspicion had been attached to the movements of a vessel called the Eli Whitney, now lying in the bay, the Honourable the Commissioner of Trades and Customs undertakes that her movements shall be carefully watched.

"The Honourable the Attorney-General then submits to his Excellency depositions taken on oath by eleven persons before the Consul of the United States in Melbourne, which depositions have been placed in his hands by the Consul."

The Eli Whitney was watched accordingly, and if any intention of using her as a means of shipping the men had been entertained, it was abandoned.

On the 13th of February a warrant was granted by a magistrate at Williamstown, for the apprehension of a man known as James Davidson, or "Charley" who was stated to be concealed on board the Shenandoah. The Superintendent of Police, who was charged with the execution of the warrant, went on board the ship, and Captain Waddell not being on board, saw the officer in charge, told his business, and requested to see the man on board to execute his warrant. This was refused. He showed his warrant, which the officer looked at, saying, "That is all right, but you shan't go over the ship." The next morning the police officer returned to the ship, and stated that, information having been sworn that persons had joined the vessel from Melbourne, and were now on board, he had come with a warrant. Captain Waddell replied: "I pledge you my word of honour as an officer and a gentleman that I have not any one on board, nor have I engaged any one, nor will I while I am here." The Superintendent answered that he understood that the persons he wanted were wearing the uniform of the Confederate States, and were working on hoard, but this Captain Waddell distinctly denied. The Superintendent asked to go over the ship and see if the men he wanted were on board. This being refused, he said that he must execute his warrant even if he had to use force. To which Waddell replied that he would use force to resist; that he dare not allow his ship to be searched; it was more than his Commission was worth; and that such a thing would not be attempted to a ship of war of any other country; that a great slight had been put upon him by sending any one to the ship with a warrant. On the Superintendent again asking if the Captain refused to allow him to look for the man for whom he had a warrant, Waddell answered, that he "did refuse it, and would fight his ship rather than allow it."*

The Governor having ealled the attention of the Council to the circumstances, and to the necessity of considering what steps should be taken, by the advice of the Council directed the Commissioner of Trade and Customs to write to Captain Waddell and to request him to reconsider his determination, and further to inform him that, pending his reply, the permission which had been granted to him to repair and take in supplies had been suspended. The Governor then issued a direction that, on receipt of an instruction to that effect from the Chief Commissioner of Police, none of Her Majesty's subjects in the Colony should render any aid or assistance to, or perform any work in respect of the so-called Confederate steam-ship Shenandoah, or in launching the same. The Chief Commissioner of Police was instructed to send some police to Williamstown, to take care that the direction above-mentioned was duly observed.

On the 14th, a letter was addressed to Captain Waddell, informing him that the Government conceived it had a right to expect that those who were receiving in the At Melbourne.

He was therefore appealed to, to reconsider his determination, and was informed that, pending his answer, the permission granted to him to repair and take in supplies was suspended, and that Her Majesty's subjects had been duly warned accordingly.*

Captain Waddell replied on the same day in the following terms:-

"I have to inform his Excellency the Governor that the execution of the warrant was not refused, as no such person as the one therein specified was on board; but permission to search the ship was refused. According to all the laws of nations, the deck of a vessel of war is considered to represent the majesty of the country whose flag she flies, and she is free from all executions, except for crimes actually committed on shore, when a demand must be made for the delivery of such person, and the execution of the warrant performed by the police of the ship. Our shipping articles have been shown to the Superintendent of Police. All strangers have been sent out of the ship, and two commissioned officers were ordered to search if any such have been left on board. They have reported to me that, after making a thorough search, they can find no person on board except those who entered this port as part of the complement of men.

"To the Hon. Jas. G. Francis,
"Lieutenant Communiting, Confederate States' Nacy. +
"Commissioner of Trade and Customs, Melbourne."

It appears from a report of the Superintendent of Police that, in order to earry out the instructions of the Government, he proceeded to Williamstown on the afternoon of the 14th, took possession of the slip on which the Shenandoah was placed, and cleared the yard of the workmen employed on the vessel. The effect of this determined course of proceedings soon showed itself. At about 10 P.M. four men were seen to leave the vessel in a boat pulled by two watermen. They were pursued by the water police, and brought back to the Superintendent. On being questioned, they said they had been on board a few days, unknown to the Captain, and that as soon as he found they were on board, he ordered them to go ashore. The men were detained, and the American Consul was communicated with respecting them. Towards rorning tug steamers came to tow the vessel off, but were ordered away by the Superintendent, who also took steps for preventing the vessel being furnished with a pilot. The four men were taken before a magistrate on the 16th. One, being an American, was discharged; the three others, one of whom was the man Davison ("Charley"), were committed for trial. Two of them, after awaiting their trial in prison for a month, were sentenced to a further imprisonment of ten days; the other, being a mere youth, was, on that account, discharged.§ The vessel still remained on the slip.

On the 15th of February, the lessee of the slip wrote to the Chief Secretary, stating that his manager had informed him that should a gale of wind occur, he would either be compelled to launch the ship, or run a great risk of her sustaining serious damage in consequence of her unsafe position on the cradle. This being so, and all motive for searching the ship being now at an end, the man against whom the warrant had been directed having been taken, and there being no reason for supposing that there were other Melbourne men secreted in the vessel, it was thought advisable that the order suspending the permission to repair should be revoked, and the necessary repairs to the ship be allowed to be completed, the Commander being informed that he was expected to use every dispatch in getting to sea by the time previously fixed.

Captain Waddell having written to complain of the ship having been seized, was informed, in reply, that the ship had not been seized, but that further progress with the repairs had been arrested by reason of his refusal to allow the ship to be searched. He was also reminded of the four men having been eaught leaving the ship, notwithstanding his statement that there was no stranger on board; but he was at the same time informed that, as the man against whom the warrant had been issued was now in custody, and he (Captain Waddell) had given his assurance that no persons other

" The four men alluded to in your communication are no part of this vessel's complement of men they were detected on board by the ship's police after all strangers were reported out of the vessel, and they were ordered and sent out of the vessel by the ship's police immediately on their discovery, which was after my letter had been dispatched informing his Excellency the Governor that there were no such persons on board. These men were here without my knowledge, and I have no doubt can be properly persons on board. These men were nere without my knowledge, and charge no notice in the people called stownways, and such they would have remained but for the vigilance of the ship's police, inasmuch as they were detected after the third search, but in no way can I be necessed, in truth, of being cognizant of an evasion of the Foreign Enlistment Act."

On the evening of the 15th, the repairs having been completed, the vessel was launched from the slip and anchored in the bay, where she proceeded to re-ship her stores and coal, of which latter article she was allowed to take in a further supply of 250 tons.†

She finally quitted Port Philip on the morning of the 18th of February.

Blame has been cast on the Governor for having allowed the repairs of the vessel to be completed and the vessel to be launched, or coal to be supplied to her, in consequence of the attitude of defiance assumed by Captain Waddell in refusing to suffer his ship to be searched.

The position was however an embarrassing one.

It was very doubtful how far the police officer, after having received the word of honour of Captain Waddell, as an officer and a gentleman, that the man against whom he had a warrant was not on board, he I done right in insisting on searching the ship, and in threatening to use force in order to execute the warrant. The position taken by Captain Waddell that a ship of war of another nation is not subject to local jurisdiction is undoubtedly true. Upon a request of Sir C. Darling to be informed as to the propriety of executing a warrant under the Foreign Enlistment Act on board a Conferrate ship of war, the Law Officers of the Crown, on being consulted, advised as follows:-

"It appears to us that, in the circumstances stated, his Excellency the Governor acted with propriety and discretion; and there does not appear to us, at present, to be a necessity for any action

"With respect to his Excellency's request, that he may receive instructions as to the propriety of executing any warrant under the Foreign Enlistment Act on board a Confederate (public) ship of war, executing any warrant under the Foreign ranisament are on pour a comederate (phone) sup of war, we are of opinion that, in a case of strong suspicion, he ought to request the permission of the Commander of the ship to execute the warrant; and that, if this request he refused, he ought not to attempt to enforce the execution; but that, in this case, the Commander should be desired to heave the port as speedily as possible, and should be informed that he will not be re-admitted into it."

There can be no doubt as to the soundness of this advice. While a ship of war is thus exempt from local jurisdiction, the right of the local authority to withhold the accommodation of the port is equally undoubted; and the exercise of this power, applied here in the first instance, might no doubt have been prolonged. But, the honour of the Commander of the ship having been pledged, ought the search of the vessel to have been further insisted on? By the comity of nations the word of a commissioned officer is held to be sufficient guarantee for the truth of anything to which it is officially pledged. The rule is a sound one. The best security for honourable conduct is unhesitating confidence whenever honour is pledged. It is of infinitely greater moment than such a rule should be maintained than that a "Charley" should be arrested and undergo a month's imprisonment. Any vapouring language, or, in Transatlantic phrase, "tall talk" of Captain Waddell might be excused owing to the impropriety of the police-officer's threat of using force to search the ship under his command.

It is true that the fact to which the word of the Commander had been pledged turned out to be otherwise. But Captain Waddell explained this by saying that the men had secreted themselves in the bottom of the vessel, and had only been discovered on a third search. Now it is well known that men do contrive to secrete themselves in ships so as to clude search. A striking instance occurred in the case of the United States' ship the Kearsarge. When that ship left Cork in November 1863, 16 men contrived to hide themselves in her, nor was their presence in her known to Captain

The Shenandoah. At Melbourne.

Winslow, her commander, till the day after the vessel had gone to sea, notwithstanding that search had been made, and other men, found concealed on board, had been sent out of the ship just before her opporture.* It should be added that Williams and Madden having stated in their depositions that certain of the subordinate officers of the ship had been aware of the presence of "Charley" in the forecastle of the ship, these officers immediately published in the "Melbourne Argus" declarations signed by them denying in the most positive terms the statements affecting them. Sir Roundell Palmer puts the pertinent question: "Can it be imputed as a want of due diligence to the Government of Melbourne (whose good faith and vigilance had otherwise heen so manifestly proved) that although not entirely satisfied with Captain Waddell's demeanour or conduct, they accepted the solemn assurances of not one, but several, officers of the same race and blood, and with the same claims to the character of gentlemen as the officers of the United States?"

The matter was further complicated by the fact that the owner of the slip had reported that the position of the vessel on the eradle was one of danger; and that, if a gale of wind should arise, a disaster would probably ensue. It is obvious that, if such a thing had happened, it would have been very awkward for all parties. The wisest thing, therefore, as it appeared to the Governor and his Council, was to allow things to be completed and to get rid of this unpleasant visitor as early as possible. That the conduct of Captain Waddell in augmenting his crew from the Colony, as it afterwards turned out that he did, in spite of his solemn promise to observe neutrality in this respect, was conduct disgraceful in an officer and a gentleman, there can be no doubt; but, as I have before observed, no Governor or other Authority can be blamed for trusting to the word of any one hearing the commission of an officer. I am bound to respect, but I certainly cannot share, the opinion of some of my colleagues that Sir C. Darling showed any indulgence to the Commander of the Shenandoah, in further extending to him the privileges of a belligerent, inconsistent with what, as the Governor of a neutral Government, he was fully empowered and entitled, in the exercise of his judgment and discretion, to extend. Still less can I think that, even if there was any error of judgment in this respect, and the Governor of Melhourne was, under the circumstances, -as I heard it two or three times said in the course of the discussion, too civil ("trop poli") to Captain Waddell, that the British nation is therefore to incur a liability to a claim of some 6,000,000 dollars. If such a conclusion is to be arrived at upon such facts, I shall be half disposed to agree with M. Staempfli that there is, indeed, no such thing as international law, but that we are now creating it for the first time.

Supply of coal.

I pass on to another subject of complaint, namely, the supply of eoal which the Shenandoah was allowed to receive and which is said to have been excessive—an assertion which, I confess, I have heard with no little surprise. It is true that the Shenandoah still had, on her arrival at Melbourne, it reliance is to be placed on a journal kept by a midshipman on board, t00 tons of coal in her bunkers; it is true that she was there allowed to take in 250 tons more.

But international law, as we have seen, imposes no limitation on the quantity of the supplies which a belligerent vessel may obtain in a neutral port. The only restriction in this case would therefore arise from the Government Regulation that no vessel should be allowed to take more than sufficient to convey her to aer nearest port. Now the nearest port of the country of the Shenandoah was some 13,000 to 14,000 miles from Melbourne; and all the coal which could possibly have been stowed in the vessel would have fallen infinitely short of what she must have consumed on such a voyage if she had had recourse to her steam power. It is true we are told that she was an excellent sailer. Mr. Evarts informed us, I believe, on the authority of a midshipman's journal, afterwards published under the title of "The Cruize of the Shenaudoah," that her speed under canvas was at times equal to 16 knots an hour; but it did not occur to that distinguished counsel tell us how the Governor and his Council could possibly know that fact, unless, indeed, they were to know it by intuition. Although, from the vessel's build and appearance she might be thought likely to be a fast vessel, all they knew of her was that she was a serew steamer, adapted to sail or steam.

The argument that a vessel is not to be allowed coal because she is not likely to use it, strikes me, I must say, as a very singular one. If she does not use it, what harm can arise to any one from her having it on board? "Yes, but," says Mr. Evarts, "this coal was to enable her to have an advantage over the whalers when among the ice." But here we must have recourse again to the intuitive powers of the Governor and his Council. For how else, in the name of common sense, were they to know that The Shenaudoah. the intention of Captain Waddell was to go among the icebergs in pursuit of the whaling-vessels? Captain Waddell knew his business too well to let his intentions in this respect be known. Nor is it at all reasonable to say that, because a vessel can both sail and steam, she is not catitled to have whatever is necessary for navigation in both forms. The Government Regulations, which allow a vessel to have the quantity of coal necessary to take her to the nearest port, make no distinction (any more than does international law) between vessels depending whofly upon steam, and others navigating both by steam and sail. The Regulation must be taken to have reference to the quantity of coal which would be required to take the vessel to her nearest port, if she had to depend on steam alone.

It would be absurd to suppose that, in every case, the local authority is to enter upon a nice calculation of the sailing power of the particular vessel, and allow a greater or less quantity of coal according to the estimate that may be formed of the rate of speed under canvas. A vessel is entitled to the advantage of all her motive power, however derived. Either may fail. A vessel under sail may carry away her masts. In this instance, had the Shenandoah been going a anewards this might have happened when she was thousands of miles from home. It seems to me, therefore, that it was not a question for the local Government whether this vessel was a good sailer or not. The only question was, what amount of coal she was at liberty to have according to the regulation. Referring to that, and looking to the humense distance between her and her nearest port, no one, as it seems to me, can reasonably say that she was allowed a single ton too much.

But it is said that, by taking in coal at Melbourne, with the ulterior purpose Melbourne a base of making war on the whaling-vessels of the United States, this vessel was enabled to of maral operamake the port of Melbourne a "base of naval operations,"

As I have already observed, when the law on this subject was under discussion, the application of such a rule in favour of the United States to the prejudice of Great Britain would be a flagrant injustice, seeing that, as I then showed, ships of war of the United States obtained many thousand tons of coal, under exactly the same circumstances, that is to say, when they had particular "naval operations" in immediate view. If this doctrine is to hold, every time a vessel, having a particular belligerent purpose in view, takes in coal, and proceeds on such purpose, the port will be at once converted into a base of naval operations. The same reasoning would of course apply, and, in the same degree, to repairs.

This proposition is, to my mind, utterly unreasonable, as being altogether inconsistent with any idea that ever has been, or properly can be, attached to the term, "base of operations;" and is, moreover, in the most flagrant degree unjust, if it is to have the effect of imposing on the neutral any responsibility to the other belligerent. For it is obviously inconsistent with common justice that the neutral State shall suffer for that to which it is not only no party, but of which it has also no knowledge. By the common practice of nations, as well as by the regulations of the Government, a belligerent vessel is allowed to have the benefit of necessary repairs, and to take a supply of coal without the Local Government being entitled to inquire into her ulterior destination. No such inquiry is prescribed by the Regulations in question, or by those made by any other nation; nor has any publicist ever suggested that such a proceeding should be adopted. No such inquiry could with propriety, be made; nor could the Commander of the ship be called upon to answer it it made. The knowledge of his intended course might expose him to the attack of an enemy. No such question, so far as 1 am aware, was ever put to a helligerent vessel during the whole course of the war. None such was ever put to a ship of the United States when applying for coal at a British port. This being so, to say that, the local government being in ignorance of the destination of the vessel, a responsibility is to be incurred because the belligerent, in obtaining this accommodation, has an ulterior operation in view, as to which, by some violent distortion of language, the port may be said to be thus rendered a base, but of which ulterior operation the neutral knows nothing, appears to me to be an outrage not only on the first principles of justice, but also upon the plainest dictates of common sense.

Thus far I am unable to discover anything but a desire on the part of the local Government to comply with the Queen's Regulations, and to discharge their duty, faithfully and conscientiously, in preventing any breach of neutrality on the art of the commander of the Shenandouh in the enlisting of men; nor does it appear to me At Melu time.

that any blame can reasonably or justly attach to them in respect of permitting necessary repairs to be done to the ship, or as to the time allowed for that purpose, or as to the quantity of coal which the vessel was suffered to take on board.

The only question which presents any real difficulty is whether sufficient care was exercised to prevent men from enlisting in the Sher andoah immediately prior to her departure.

For, it is an undoubted fact that, on the night before the vessel left, which it will be remembered was on the morning of the 18th, a considerable number of men contrived to get on board and sailed away in the Shenandoah, as part of her crew.

In addition to the suspicious circumstances connected with the secretion of the man "Charley" and the other three men, it appears that a detective named Kennedy, having been directed to make inquiries, on the 13th of February, reported as follows:-

That twenty men have been discharged from the Shenandoah since her arrival at this port.

"That Captain Waddell intends to ship forty hands here, who are to be taken on board during the night, and to sign articles when they are outside the Heads.

It is stated that the Captain wishes, if possible, to ship foreign seamen only, and all Englishmen shipped here are to assume a foreign name.

"Methath, Finlay, and O'Brien, three Melbourne boarding-house keepers, are said to be employed in getting the requisite number of men, who are to receive 6/, per month wages, and 8/, bounty, &c.

"Peter Kerr, a shipwright living in Railway Place, Sandridge, stated about a fortuight ago, in the hearing of several persons, that Captain Waddell offered him 17% per month to ship as carpenter. A waterman named McLaren, now at Sandridge, is either already enlisted, or about to be so.

"The detective has been unable, up to the present, to collect any reliable information as to whether ammunition, &c., has been put on board the Shenandoah at this port, or whether arrangements have been made with any person for that purpose. (Signed) " D. S. Kennedy, First Class Detective."*

The Superintendent, in forwarding this report, added the following statement:-

"Mr. Scott, Resident Clerk, has been informed—in fact, he overheard a person represented as an assistant-purser state—that about sixty men engaged here were to be shipped on board an old vessel, believed to be the Eli Whitney, together with a quantity of animunition, &c., about two or three days before the Shenandoah sails. The former vessel is to be cleared out for Portland or Warrnambool, but is to wait outside the Heads for the Shenandoah, to whom her cargo and passengers are to be transferred.'

Hereupon, the Commissioner of Trade and Customs undertook, by the desire of the Government and Council, that the Eli Whitney should be watched, and that vessel 7as watched accordingly.

Notwithstanding that the foregoing report of the detective Kennedy appeared to point to specific facts, and the police were on the look out to detect any attempts to enlist men, nothing of a definite or certain character came to light. In the report ufterwards made by the Minister of Justice, the Attorney-General of the Colony, the Chief Secretary, and the Commissioner of Customs, which has been before referred to, it is stated that :-

"Whilst the Shenandoah was in port, there were many vague rumours in circulation that it was the intention of a number of men to sail in her, but although the police authorities made every exertion to ascertain the truth of these rumours, yet (with the exception of the four men already alluded to) nothing sufficiently definite to justify criminal proceedings could be ascertained; indeed, at the best, these runours justified nothing more than suspicion, and called only for that watchfulness which the Government exercised to the fullest extent in its power. It was not until after the Shemandoah had left the waters of Victoria that the Government received information confirming in a manner the truth of these rumours,"+

On the 16th (as appears from a report of the Chief Commissioner of Police on this subject made in October last), representations were again made to the Government that the Foreign Eulistment Act was being violated, and the police were instructed to use their utmost efforts to prevent it. Nothing, however, appears to have occurred on that day.

But about 5 o'clock on the afternoon of the 17th, a man of the name of Forbes came to the American Consul, Mr. Blanchard, and informed him that, at 4 o'clock that afternoon, he had seen, at the pier at Sandridge, five men, most of whom, if not all, were British subjects, and that one of them had told him that they and others were

The Consul thereupon took Forbes to the office of the Crown Solicitor; but, according to the statement of the Consul made to the Governor on the ensuing day, the Crown Solicitor refused to take the information, and the Consul further complained that the language and manner of that officer in doing so had been insulting to him. The Crown Solicitor, however, disclaimed any intention of giving offence to the Consul, as appears from the letter of the private secretary of the Governor to Mr. Blanchard, the Consul, which is as follows:

"Sir,
"I am desired by his Excellency the Governor to accuaint you that he received your letter of the Saturday and that on Monday, the 20th, he caused it to be 18th instant in the afternoon of that day, Saturday, and that on Monday, the 20th, he caused it to be referred, through the Honourable the Attorney-General, to the Crown Solicitor for any explanation lie

3. His Excellency feels sure that the Crown Solicitor's tone and manner have been misapprehended and confidently assures you that there was no intention on the part of that officer to fail in the respect due to your position as the Consul of the United States of America."

What occurred after the Consul left the Crown Solicitor's office is to be found in the statement of a Mr. Lord, an American gentleman residing at Melbourne, made for the use of the Consul; Mr. Lord having accompanied that gentleman in his endeavours to secure the arrest of the men. Mr. Lord states as follows:-

"We left and went first to the office of the Chief Commissioner of Police, and not finding either him or Mr. Lyttleton in, we drove to the Houses of Parliament, and on sending your name to the Attorney-General he at once came out and asked us into the side room; he patiently listened to all you Action and then suggested that, if you would place the matter in the shape of an affidavit, he would had to say, and then suggested that a verbal statement was not sufficient for the Government to proceed upon. We then left and drove to the office of the detective police, and saw Mr. Nicholson, the Chief, who heard the man's statement in full, but as he could not act without a warrant, advised us go to the Police Magistrate, Mr. Sturt, and get a warrant: then he would at once act upon it. Leaving there, the Fonce angistrate, art. Start, and get a warrant: then he would at once act upon it. Leaving there, we went to the residence of Mr. Start, in Spencer Street, who received you very politely, listened to what you had to say, examined the man, but stated that he could not take the responsibility of granting a warrant on the evidence of this man alone, and advised your going to Williamstown to Mr. Call, who, a warrant on the evidence of this man alone, and advised your going to will amission to Air. Can, who, perhaps would be in possession of corroborative testimony through the water police. We then left, it being about half-past 7, and you, finding such a disinclination in any one to act in the matter decided to take the deposition yourself and send it to the Attorney-General, leaving it to the Government to take such action on it as it might deem proper. Going to your Consulate the deposition was taken, and a copy inclosed to the Attorney-General, with a request for me to deliver it.

"I took it to the Houses of Parliament, which I found closed, and it being then late, about 9, I decided it was too late to stop the shipment of the men, as we understood the vessel was to leave at 5, and I went home and returned the letter to you on Sunday morning. Previous to going home, however, I again went to the detective office, saw Mr. Nicholson, told him how you had been prevented from getting the evidence before the Government in the shape they required it. He expressed his regret but could not act in so important a matter without a warrant."

From the foregoing statement it appears that it was suggested by the Attorney-General to the Consul to embody the matter of his communication in the shape of an This the Consul, having the power to take affidavits, could readily have done, in which case the responsibility of further action would have rested with the Colonial authorities. Instead of this the Consul proceeded to the office of the detective police, but as the chief officer could not act without a warrant, he very properly advised Mr. Blanchard to proceed to the residence of Mr. Sturt, the Police Magistrate, to procure a warrant. This accordingly Mr. Blanchard did, but it appears that Mr. Sturt, having heard the statement of the man Forbes, was not satisfied with it or disposed to act on his unsupported testimony. He therefore declined to grant the warrant, but advised that the Consul should proceed to Williamstown to Mr. Call, the

The Shenandoah. head of the water police, who would probably be able to procure evidence of a more conclusive character.

It being by this time almost 7 o'clock, the Consul decided upon taking the deposition himself, as the Attorney-General had desired him to do some two hours before, and dispatching it to that Officer by Mr. Lord, leaving it, as Mr. Lord says, to the Government to take sneh action as it might deem proper. The Consul himself proposed to follow Mr. Sturt's advice, and to go to Williamstown; but we learn from his own statement that when Forbes, his informant, "found he had to go among his acquaintances, he was afraid of bodily harm, and refused to proceed."

In the meantime, Mr. Lord went with the deposition taken at the Consulate to the House of Parliament to find the Attorney-General; but, on arriving there, he found the House was up, and it being then about 9 o'clock, concluded it was too late to stop the shipment of the men, as it had been understood the vessel was to leave at 5. so he gave the matter up, and went quietly home.

I am at a loss to see wherein it can be said that there was here negligence on the part of any one, unless it may have been on that of Mr. Lord, who, having undertaken to deliver Forbes' deposition to the Attorney-General, left the task he had undertaken incomplete, because he did not succeed in finding that officer at the only place where he sought him. But, in truth, the whole matter becomes perfectly immaterial from the fact that what was desired to be done had reference solely to the preventing of the men from being taken off to the Maria Ross by the boats of that vessel. But, as it turned out, no intention whatever existed of conveying the men to the Shenandoah by means of the Maria Ross; or, if such intention ever did exist, it was afterwards abandoned. No boats of that vessel came to take the men off, and she left the next morning upon her own destination. But, as showing the anxiety of the local authorities to prevent men from joining the Shenandoah, it should be mentioned that it appears from the report of the detective officer subsequently employed to make inquiry on the subject, that the Maria Ross was searched, to see that no men for the Shenandoah were on board of her, both before she left, and again when off the Heads, that is, before she finally quitted the bay.

As has, however, been said, there can be no doubt that men did contrive to get on board the Shenandoah late that night, under cover of the darkness. It appears from the statement of the Consul, that one Robbins, a master stevedore, having observed boats taking off men with their luggage from the pier at Sandridge, went up to the American Consulate about 11 o'clock at night, and gave information to Mr. Blanchard of what was going on. Mr. Blanchard, however, did not think himself called upon to repair to the spot, or deem it necessary to call upon the police to take any steps to prevent the men from being conveyed to the Shenandoah. He contented himself with telling Robbins "that Mr. Sturt, the Police Magistrate, Lad told him the water-police were the proper persons to lodge any information with," and that, "as a good subject, he (Robbins) was bound to inform them of any violation of law that came under his notice." This Robbins promised to do, and to convey a message from Mr. Blanchard to the police.

Thus the interests of the American Government were transferred by their proper representative, who no doubt went quietly to bed, hoping for the best, to Robbins, the stevedore, who, however, seems to have been, "as a good subject," more zealous in the maintenance of neutrality than the Consul; for it appears that Robbins actually went to Williamstown and gave information to the police. He crossed over to Williamstown, however, only in time to see the last boat-load going towards the ship. In the meantime, the water-police having heard reports of what was likely to take place, were ont in the Bay in their boat; but Williamstown, on the opposite side of the Bay, being the principal shipping place, and the place from which men would be the most likely to embark, their attention had to be directed to that quarter; and it would seem that when they approached the pier at Sandridge, from which the men were putting off, the latter secreted themselves in some rough wood in the immediate vicinity, called scrub, and, as soon as the police-boat had gone in another direction, slipped off in watermen's boats, and managed to reach the Shenandoah unseen by the police. They were seen by two constables who were successively on duty at this spot, who must, one would suppose, have been pretty well aware of what was going on, as the men had their

It is possible that, not having any warrant for the apprehension of the men, they did not think they had any power or authority to detain them; or, the numbers being formidable and the place lonely, they may have thought it wiser to abstain from interfering. By the time Robbins arrived at Williamstown and gave information of what had occurred, the last boat-load of men must have been already on board; † and the police were powerless to act without orders from the Authorities, which would have involved a forcible search of the ship, and which, therefore, the latter could not properly have given. ‡

I will not go the length of saying that, in my opinion, the police were on this occasion as vigilant and active as they might have been. There was reason to suspect the officers of the Shenandoah of a design to recruit their crew from the port; and as that purpose had so far been prevented by the look-out kept in respect of the two ships, the Eli Whitney and the Maria Ross, suspected of being intended to take the men to the Shenandoah when outside the waters of the colony, it was not unlikely that, on the eve of the ship's departure, some attempt would be made by the men who wished to ship in her to get on board. The police had received instructions to use the utmost vigilance to prevent anything of the kind being done, but they appear to have failed to earry out their instructions at a critical moment. A few resolute officers, stationed on the two piers of Williamstown and Sandridge, would probably have prevented the men from embarking, or deterred the watermen from conveying them to the ship. But the Governor and Council acted throughout under an honest and thorough sense of duty, and exhibited in all their relations with the Commander of the Shenandoah the fullest determination to prevent, as far as in them lay, any infraction of neutrality.

Possibly their suspicions may have been removed too easily by the positive word of honour of the American Commander and his officers, but, as has been more than once observed, it has ever been a received rule of official conduct to trust implicitly to the honour of an officer.

To hold, under such circumstances, that because the local police were not as vigilant as they might have been, or because under cover of the darkness men may have contrived to clude their vigilance, a nation is to be held liable for damage done by a vessel to the extent of a claim of many millions of dollars, would be, as it appears to me, to carry the notion of "due diligence" to an unheard-of and unwarranted length, and would be calculated to deprive the decisions of the Tribunal of respect in the eyes of the world.

Questions have been raised as to the number of men thus added to the erew of the Shenandoah, and as to the proportion which the number thus added bore to the number of her crew on her arrival in the port. But to this I attach no value. The second Rule of the Treaty prohibits any recruitment of men. There can be no doubt that the number was sufficient to constitute a recruitment. And though it may be true that, independently of the addition thus made, the number of the crew remaining after the desertions at Melbourne would have been sufficient to enable the vessel to earry on operations against ordinary merchant-vessels, and therefore, if the operations of this ship had been directed against the same class of vessels as before, the augmentation of the crew would have made no difference as to her capacity for mischief, yet I agree with the Counsel of the United States that it is unlikely that without such augmentation she would have ventured into the dangerous polar seas to destroy the whaling vessels. My opinion is based on the ground that the authorities cannot justly be held responsible for what happened in spite of their anxious desire and endeavour to ensure the observance of neutrality.

It only remains to be stated that on hearing that men had been embarked in the Shenandoah prior to her departure, the Governor caused inquiries to be made, and finding that a violation of neutrality had taken place, he announced his intention of refusing the hospitality of the port to the captain or any other officers of the Shenandoah, should they again visit the colony. He, moreover, wrote to the Governors of the other Australian colonies, and to the Commodore of the station, to warn them of what had At Melbourne.

occurred. As the Shenandoah did not visit any other British port until she arrived at Liverpool to be surrendered at the end of the war, no opportunity occurred of taking proper notice of the conduct of her commander on this occasion.

Importance has been attached to the language of this letter of the Governor. It is in the following terms:-

"Sir,
"I consider it my duty to place your Excellency in possession of the accompanying correspondence
"I consider it my duty to place your Excellency in possession of the accompanying correspondence and other documents connected with the proceedings of the commander of the Confederate States' vessel Shenandoah, while laying in Hobson's Bay, for the purpose of having necessary repairs effected and taking in supplies, under permission granted by me in accordance with the conditions prescribed by Her Majesty's Proclamation and Instructions for the observance of neutrality.

"2. I have als) the honour to forward copies of letters from the Chief Commissioner of Police in Victoria, accompanied by reports and statements which leave no doubt that the neutrality has been flagrantly violated by the commander of the Shenandoah, who, after having assured me of his intention to respect it, and pleaded the privilege of a belligerent ship of war to prevent the execution of warrants under the Foreign Enlistment Act, nevertheless received on board his vessel, before he left the port on the 18th instant, a considerable number of men destined to augment the ship's company.

"3. I have thought it right to communicate to your Excellency this information, in the event of Lieutenant Waddell or any of his officers hereafter claiming the privileges of a belligerent in any port of the colony under your government.

" I have, &c. "C. H. DARLING,"* (Signed)

Our distinguished President dwelt, as one of the governing motives of his decision against the British Government as to this ship, on the admission thus made by the Governor, that the neutrality had been flagrantly violated by the Commander of the Shenandoah, as though this were an admission made by the Governor as against himself. The Governor is complaining that the neutrality of a British port has been violated by a belligerent, in spite of the endeavours of the Authorities to maintain it, and of the pledge given by the belligerent to respect it. To hold the Governor responsible for what he thus complains of is to reverse the nature of things and to make the party wronged liable instead of the wrong-doer. The violation of the neutrality of a British port by the commander of the Shenandoah could only affect British liability if there had been negligence on the part of the British Authorities, whereby the violation of neutrality had been allowed to occur.

I cannot, therefore, concur in the decision of the majority of the Tribunal that the British Government is responsible for anything that happened with reference to the Shenandoah at Melbourne. Looking to the Regulations, and the distance of the vessel from her nearest port, I cannot agree with the President that too much coal was allowed. I cannot agree that repairing or taking in coal at a particular port, on the way to some ulterior operation, makes the port a base of naval operations; still less that the neutral can be affected thereby when he is ignorant of the ulterior operation so contemplated. I cannot agree that where the government of a colony is honestly desirons of doing its duty and maintaining neutrality, the fact that men anxious to ship on board a belligerent vessel elude the vigilance of the police in the night time is to make the parent State liable for all the damage such vessel may afterwards do. And I protest, respectfully but emphatically, against a decision based on grounds to my mind so wholly untenable.

After leaving Melbourne.

The remainder of the history of the Shenandoah may be told in a few words. On leaving Melbourne in February 1865, she proceeded to the Arctic Seas in quest of the whalers of the United States; and does not appear to have touched at any port, with the exception of the Island of Ascension, until she arrived and surrendered at Liverpool, on the 6th of November, 1865. Meanwhile, however, the great contest between Federals and Confederates had been finally decided. General Lee had been forced to evacuate the lines of Petersburg and Richmond, and had surrendered with the remnant of his army. The President and Vice-President of the Confederacy had been arrested and the principal European Powers had withdrawn the recognition of belligerent rights accorded in 1861. Under these circumstances, Mr. Mason, the Confederate Agent in England, applied to Her Majesty's Government, on the 20th June, 1865, for permission to send, through the British authorities, letters to the Commander of the Shenandoah directing him to desist from any further hostile proceedings. This application was acceded to. and the letters of recall were sent to Nagasaki, Shanghae, and the Sandwich Islands, and copies ort until she arrived at nity occurred of taking

The vessel herself was to be surrendered to the United States' authorities, but the crew was to be allowed to go free.† She arrived at Liverpool on the 6th of November, 1865, and was at once placed under detention by the Authorities. A party of men from Her Majesty's ship Donegal was placed on board of her, and a gun-boat lashed alongside to prevent her leaving the port. Her Commander addressed, the same day, a letter to the British Government surrendering the vessel. He explained that the captures made by him after the close of the war had been made in ignorance of that fact, and asserted that he had received the first intelligence of the extinction of the Government, under whose authority he was acting, on communicating at sea with a British barque on the 2nd of August, and that he had then suspended all further warlike action. Acting upon the advice of the Law Officers, the British Government decided upon setting free such of the crew of the Shenandoah as could not be prosecuted under the Foreign Enlistment Act, and upon giving up the vessel herself to the United States' Government, who had claimed her through their Minister in London. This was accordingly done. The Captain of Her Majesty's ship Donegal, who had been placed in charge of the Shenandoah, interrogated the crew, and having satisfied himself, as he afterwards reported, that none of them were British subjects, the whole of them were set at liberty. § It is certain that, at the time, no evidence to prove the British nationality of any of the crew was offered to, or in the possession of, Her Majesty's Government. About seven weeks afterwards, the deposition of a man named Temple, who asserted among other things that part of the erew were British subjects, was communicated by Mr. Adams to the Government, and investigations were made with a view to instituting prosecutions. But Temple was found to be himself unworthy of credit, and, no further evidence being forthcoming, the matter was allowed to drop. The Shenandoah was finally delivered up to the American Consul at Liverpool, and sailed for New York in November 1865.¶

The act of the British Government in thus giving orders for seizing the Shenandoah, has been referred to in the United States' Argument as an instance of the exercise of the prerogative. And in a certain sense it is true that it was so. But the case was altogether exceptional. It was supposed that the Shenandoah being, owing to the extinction of the Confederate Government, from whom her character as a ship of war had been derived, without a commission, was continuing her hostile operations on the high seas. Such acts done in the absence of a commission would have assumed the character of piracy, and the party committing them have become a hostis communis, who might be taken by any one having the means of stopping such proceedings. Instructions might therefore well be given to any officers of Her Majesty to seize the vessel wheresoever found.

After leaving. Melbourne.

Cases of the Sumter, Nashville, Chickamauga, Tallahassee, and Retribution.

The five eases we are now about to enter on belong to a class differing altogether from those which have hitherto occupied our attention. We have here no question as to the fitting-out or equipping on British territory; none of these vessels having been fitted-out or equipped, for the purpose of war, in a British port. The complaint, with respect to them, is that they were permitted unduly to enter and remain in ports of Great Britain, and to procure coal, beyond what Her Majesty's Regulations of the 31st January, 1862, prescribed; or that they were treated with a degree of indulgence refused to ships of the United States.

The Sumter.

At Trinidad.

First, as to the Sumter.

This vessel was a steam-ship; she was purchased, at the commencement of the war, by the Government of the Confederate States, fitted-out, and armed, and duly commissioned as a ship of war. As such she left the Mississippi, on the 30th of June, 1861, under the command of an officer of the name of Semmes, holding a commission from the Confederate Government. She cruized for a period of six months, and during that time made seventeen prizes. She coaled once, and once only, at a British port, namely, at Trinidad, where she arrived on the 30th of July. But prior to arriving at Trinidad, she had put in and coaled at the Spanish port of Cienfuegos, and the Dutch port of St. Ann, Curaçoa. After her visit to Trinidad, she put in and coaled at the Dutch port of Paramaribo, and after that at Martinique. Besides stopping at these ports, she put into Cadiz for repairs.

It was in respect of the Sumter, the first ship of war of the Confederate States which appeared upon the ocean, that the United States' Government asserted the untenable position that, while itself treating those States as a belligerent Power, and shrinking from treating Confederate prisoners as rebels, or Confederate ships, when taken, as pirates, they were entitled to call upon all other nations to treat these ships as such, and to refuse the ordinary shelter accorded by the universal comity of nations to vessels of war in neutral ports. Upon this assertion, which was at once repudiated by every other country, I have already taken the opportunity of making such remarks as occurred to me. I refer to the subject in this place only for the purpose of pointing out that, as regards the assistance afforded to the Sumter at Trinidad, the complaint preferred by the United States' Government was not in respect of any excess in the accommodation afforded, but to the vessel having been permitted to enter the port and receive any assistance at all.

On the 7th of August, Mr. Francis Bernard, an American gentleman, residing at Trinidad—there being at the time no United States' Consul at that place—wrote to inform Mr. Seward that, "on the 30th ultimo, a steam sloop of war (Semmes, Commander) carrying a Secession flag, five guns, some of a large calibre, and a crew of from 120 to 150 men, sailed boldly into our harbour, and reported herself to the authorities of this island as being on a cruize. She was last from Puerto Cabello; and since she succeeded in getting out of the Mississippi River she has already captured no less than eleven American vessels."

Having given the names of some of these he adds:—"The Sumter remained here till the 5th instant, and was allowed to supply herself with coals and other necessary outsits. The British flag was hoisted on the Government flag-staff for her arrival, and the officers of the British war-vessel Cadmus appeared to be on amicable terms with those of the Sumter. The merchant who supplied the Sumter with coals did it with the consent and approval of our Attorney-General."*

On the 30th September Mr. Adams, transmitting to Earl Russell an extract from Mr. Bernard's letter, writes as follows :-

The Sumter. At Trinidad.

"The Undersigned, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States, regrets to be obliged to inform the Right Honourable Earl Russell, Her Majesty's Principal Secretary "Legation of the United States, September 30, 1861. of State for Foreign Affairs that he has been instructed by the President of the United States to prefer a complaint against the authorities of the Island of Trinidad for a violation of Her Majesty's Proa complaint against the authorities of the Island of Trinidad for a violation of Her Majesty's Proclamation of Neutrality, by giving aid and encouragement to the insurgents of the United States. It appears, by an extruct from a letter received at the Department of State from a gentleman believed to be worthy of credit, a resident of Trinidad, Mr. Francis Bernard, a copy of which is submitted herewith, that a steam-vessel known as an armed insurgent privateer, called the Sunter, was received on the 30th of July last at that port, and was permitted to remain for six days, during which time she was not only franished with all necessary supplies for the continuance of her cruize, under the sanction of the Attorney-General, but that Her Majesty's flag was actually hoisted on the Government flag-staff in acknowledgment of her arrival.

"The Undersigned has been directed by his Government to bring this extraordinary proceeding to the attention of Lord Russell, and in ease it shall not be satisfactorily explained, to ask for the adoption of such measures as shall insure, on the part of the authorities of the island, the prevention of all occurrences of the kind during the continuance of the difficulties in America.

"The Undersigned deems it proper to add, in explanation of the absence of any official representation from Trinidad, to substantiate the present complaint, that there was no Consul of the United
since, to apprize Lord Russell of the fact that this deficiency has been since supplied by preferring an application for Her Majesty's exequatur for a new Consul, who is already on his way to occupy his post."*

It will be observed that, in these communications, nothing is said as to the quantity of coal; all that Mr. Bernard reports is, that the vessel "was allowed to supply herself with coal and necessary outfits," In the Case of the United States, this is converted, without any reference to the actual quantity, into "a full supply of

In point of fact, the vessel took in 80 tons, which, as we shall see presently was not a third of what she could actually carry.

The facts which occurred on the arrival of the Sumter at Trinidad were

The Governor, evidently a little embarrassed at this, the first visit of a Contederate ship of war to the island, sent off a despatch to Captain Hillyer, commanding Her Majesty's ship Cadmus, then supposed to be at St. Vincent, requesting his presence. Refore receiving the letter Captain Hillyer, as appears from his report to Admiral Sir A. Milne of the 6th August, being about to enter the harbour of Granada, was informed by the Harbour Master there that a large privateer, belonging to the Southern Confederation, was at Trinidad, and that the Governor of the latter island had dispatched a letter to him at St. Vincent the day before; whereupon he proceeded with his ship to Trinidad, arriving there on the 4th.

He reports further as follows:--

"I found a heavy barque-rigged steamer, with South Federal flag, with ten stars and pendant flying. An officer from her boarded us as soon as we anchored, with the Captain's respects. Soon after, I sent the Senior Lieutenant, Mr. Sittingstone, with my compliments, requesting he would be good enough to show his commission and papers, which, after some hesitation, and not before Mr. Sittingstone produced his commission, he did.

Mr. Sittingstone produced his commission, he did.

"From his report, it is a regular commission as Commander to Captain Semmes, late of the United States' Navy, to the Sumter, as a man-of-war, signed by President Davis. assurance that he would in no way interfere with British or neutral trade, but complained greatly of the Southerners having no port to send their prizes to, and that he would be obliged to destroy all he took, in consequence of the strict blockade on the Southern ports and the stringent proclamations of all the great Powers. He thinks himself safe at Cuba, as the Government of Spain's Proclamation is only against privateers and their prizes, and says nothing about men-of-war.

The Governor, Mr. Keate, appears to have been much on his guard against any compromise of the neutrality he had been enjoined by Her Majesty's Government to observe. In his despatch to the Duke of Newcastle of the 7th of August, announcing the arrival of the Sumter, he writes:—

"I have the honour to report that a steamer, purporting to be a man-of-war, and to belong to the so-called Confederate States of North America, put into the harbour of Port of Sprin on the 30th ultimo. The vessel is called the Sumter, and appears to be a converted passenger-steamer. She now carries, as I am given to understand, five powerful guns.

"2. On the day of her arrival, one of her officers (all of whom seem to have been in the naval service of the United States) called upon me, sending in his card, with the words written under his name, 'Lieutenant, Confederate States' Navy.' Before receiving him, I directed my Private Secretary to inquire of him whether my doing so, after reading these words, would be construed into any sort of recognition of him or his ship in their assumed character. I did this in consequence of the injunction in your Grace's despatch 'on no account to recognize' any ship 'in any other capacity than that of a United States' vessel.' Mr. Evans, for such was this officer's name, replied that he was sent by his Commanding Officer, Captain Senames, who was himself unwell, simply to pay his respects, and that to prevent any such construction he would withdraw his card and only send in his name verbally. I then received him, and had some conversation with him, taking occasion to refer expressly to the neutral position occupied by Great Britain in regard to the two belligerent parties in North America."

It seems pretty plain that the presence of the Sumter was by no means agreeable, for Governor Keate adds:—

"The avowed and principal object, no doubt, with which the Sunter ran to this port was to obtain coals and provisions. A great deal of trade goes on between Trinidad and the northern ports of North America, and Captain Semmes, I imagine, has not failed to take this opportunity of obtaining information with regard to the vessels employed under the flag of the United States in this traffic. Fears are entertained with regard to one or two now expected. It is to be hoped that the presence of the Sumter in these waters will soon be made generally known, and that, while the civil war continues, the lumber and provision trade, any interruption of which would cause serious embarrassment to this community, will be carried on in British bottoms. I have communicated with Admiral Sir Alexander Milne, now, I believe, at Halifax, on the subject, and since the arrival of the Sumter, Her Majesty's ship Cadmus has come into the harbour, and her Commander, Captain Hillyar, has verified the character of the Sumter, and the commissions of her officers, and recognized her as a man-of-war."

It appears from these letters that the Governor, beyond recognizing the Sumter as a belligerent, as he was bound to do, acted with the utmost caution as to recognizing her nationality; that the production of Captain Semmes' commission was insisted on before any accommodation was afforded; that the supplies which the ship obtained, beyond provisions, were confined to a new main yard and 80 tons of coal; that even this was not conceded before the advice of the Attorney-General of the colony had been taken; that the ship came into port on the 30th of July, and left on the 5th of August; a period of about six days.

We are now able to estimate the correctness of Mr. Bernard's opinion as to the amicable terms on which the officers of the British war-vessel were with those of the Sumter. Their intercouse appears to have been purely of an official character.

It is important to observe that what thus took place at Trinidad occurred in August 1861, several months before the issuing of the regulations restricting the stay of belligerent vessels and the supplies to be obtained in British ports, and when the matter stood simply on the principles of international law.

The Sumter, in her short career of six months, put in and obtained supplies of coal, as has been stated, at ports of four different nations, Spain, Holland, the Brazils, and France.

It may be interesting to see how the Governors of these ports understood and acted upon the principles of neutrality which they were bound to observe.

The Sumter.

At Trinidad.

It appears from the remonstrance of the United States' Consul to the Captain-Gereral of the Havana that, she arrived there on the 7th of July and took in coal; from the journal of Captain Semmes, we learn that the quantity was 100 tons.

It appears from a despatch of Mr. Secretary Seward, to the United States' Minister at the Hague, of the 15th August, that the Sumter arrived at St. Ann's, Curaçoa, on the 17th July, and that she time received 120 tons of coal. It appears from Captain Semmes' Journal and from a letter of the United States' Minister at the Hague of October 8, 1861, that she remained there six or seven days.

After her stay at Trinidad, we next find her at the Dutch port of Paramaribo. She arrived, as appears from a letter of the United States' Consul at that port to the United States' Minister at the Hague, on the 19th August, and left on the 31st, making a period of twelve days, having been allowed to coal and refit.‡ The quantity of coal is stated, in a latter of the 15th October, from the Netherlands Minister for Foreign Affairs to the United States Minister, to have been, as he terms it, "the very restricted quantity of 125 tons, at the most sufficient for four days progress."§

The vessel next arrived at the Brazilian port of Maranham. It appears, from a letter from the United States' Consul at that port to Mr. Seward of the 15th September, 1861, that she arrived at Maranham on the 6th and remained there nine days, and obtained 100 tons of coal, having already 150 tons on board, "which," he adds, "would make an ample supply for ten or fifteen days of constant running." Other supplies she was allowed to procure ad libitum, and, when she left, her Commander stated that she had enough to last for three months.

She appears to have arrived at Martinique on the 9th of November. She remained there fourteen days. Permission was given by the Government to take on board as much coal as her commander required. He took sufficient to enable him to cross the

The ship arrived at Cadiz on the 4th January, 1862, as appears from a despatch of the United States' Minister to Mr. Seward of the 8th of that month. As she needed repairs her Commander requested the use of the Government dock for that purpose. The request was granted, though with the limitation to such repairs as were strictly necessary. She remained at Cadiz thirteen days. ++

It thus appears that, in every instance on which the Sumter had occasion to coal, she was allowed to take in a considerably larger quantity than she took in at Trinidad, and that on every one of such visits, with the exception of the one to Cienfuegos, she remained a greater number of days than in the British ports.

On the receipt of Governor Keate's despatch, this being the first time such a thing as the arrival of a Confederate ship of war at a British port had occurred, the Secretary of State for the Colonies required the opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown "as to the propriety of the course pursued by the Governor and the Commander of Her Majesty's ship Cadmus;" and also "as to whether vessels of war, or privateers, belonging either to the United States or to the so-styled Confederate States can properly be required to leave British ports in the West Indies and British North America, if the state of the weather permitted their doing so."

Mr. Adams to Lord Russell, reported as follows:-

"We do not precisely understand what was the course pursued towards the Sumter by the Commander of Her Majesty's ship Cadmus; there is nothing from this officer; and Governor Keate's despatch, of August 7, only states that 'Captain Hillyer has verified the character of the Sumter, and the commissions of her officers, and recognized her as a man-of-war.

Governor Keate appears to have carefully avoided any such recognition whatever. We know not upon what instructions either of these officers may have acted; but, as at present advised, we see no reason to disapprove of the conduct of either. The Sumter certainly appears not to be a privateer, and is (we presume) a vessel of war commissioned by a defacto belligerent Government.

"Your Lordship's second question must, in our opinion, be at present answered in the negative. "Although it is competent, by the law and usages of nations, to Her Majesty, in common with all neutrals, to pluce certain restrictions upon the access of the ships of war, or privateers, of belligerent governments to British ports, yet Her Majesty has not (as far as we are aware) done so during the present contest, excepting only in the case of their being accompanied by prizes in the (printed) instructions, of June 1, herewith; at the present time, therefore, expressio unius est ceclusio alterius; and Her Majesty's Government should determine apon and make public some other general instructions on the point if this should be considered expedient on grounds of Imperial and international policy; unless, or until, this be done, the shaps of war, or privateers, of either party, unaccompanie' by prizes, should not, in our opinion, be required to leave British ports by the local authorities."*

This opinion having been given by the Law Officers, Earl Russell on receiving the letter of Mr. Adams of the 4th October, replied as follows:-

" Foreign Office, October 4, 1861.

"The Undersigned, Her Majesty's Principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, has had the honour to receive a complaint from Mr. Adams, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States at this Court, against the authorities of the Island of Trinidad for a violation of Her Majesty's Proclamation of Neutrality, by giving aid and encouragement to the insurgents of the United

"It appears, from the accounts received at the Colonial Office and at the Admiralty, that a vessel bearing a Secession flag entered the port of Trinidad on the 30th of July last.

"Captain Hillyar, of Her Majesty's ship Cadmus, having sent a boat to ascertain her nationality, the Commanding Officer showed a Commission signed by Mr. Jefferson Davis, calling himself the President of the so-styled Confederate States.

The Sumter, which was the vessel in question, was allowed to stay six days at Trinidad, and to supply herself with coals and provisions; and the Attorney-General of the island perceived no illegality in these proceedings. "The Law Officers of the Crown have reported that the conduct of the Governor was in conformity and, if he did so, it was probably in order to show the national character of the island, and not in acknowledgment of the arrival of the Sumter.

"There does not appear, therefore, any reason to believe that Her Majesty's Proclamation of Neutrality has been violated by the Governor of Trinidad, or by the Commanding Officer of Her Majesty's ship Cadmus."+

The Government of the United States instructed Mr. Adams to inform Her Majesty's Government that "the President deeply regrets that Lord Russell is unable to give to our complaint a satisfactory solution." The armament, the insurgent flag, and the spurious commission," says Mr. Seward, "told the Governor, as they snificiently prove to Her Majesty's Government, that the Sumter is and can be nothing but a piratical vessel." Consequently her officers and crew ought not to be received in foreign ports. At another time she was said to be a privateer, and that Great Britain ought to adopt towards her, as such, the rule established by some European Governments of not allowing privateers to stay in their ports longer than twenty-four hours at a time. Such was the language of Mr. Seward to Lord Lyons, as appears from a despatch of the latter to Earl Russell of November 4, 1861.§ But the assumption that the Sumter was a privateer was a mistake. She was a commissioned ship of war of the Confederate States.

Now, we have seen, when considering how far, according to international law, a neutral Sovereign is bound to place any restraint on the stay in his ports of belligerent vessels, or on the supplies they are allowed to procure, that by that law, no such obligation exists. Indeed it is admitted in the Case of the United States | that there were "not any precedents which settled absolutely the quantity or coal that might be furnished to a belligerent man-of-war by a neutral," and I observe that it is nowhere asserted by the United States that the Law of Nations imposes any such restraint. There is, therefore, an end to the claim of the United States in respect of this vessel having been permitted to coal at Trinidad. For, I need hardly say that the Queen's Regulations of January 1862 cannot be applied ex post facto to create an obliga-tion which did not previously exist. It would indeed be strange if regulations, more stringent than the rules of International Law, framed by a neutral Sovereign for the very purpose of insuring the observance of neutrality, can be made to create an antecedent liability which never would have existed without them. Even if the hospitality afforded to the Sumter at Trinidad should be deemed too great with reference to the rules laid down in the Regulations, the fact that it occurred some months before those regulations were issued deprives it of all importance.

It is true that in this case, as in others, the Government of the United States insists that partiality, inconsistent with neutrality, was exhibited towards Confederate vessels by reason that these, as in the present instance, were permitted to coal, while liberty to form a depôt of coal at Bermuda for the supply of their ships of war was denied to the United States. No one can be misled by such a contention. I have already pointed out that to allow one belligerent to have a supply always stored up and ready, and to leave the other to take his chance of the public market, are things essentially different, and that, far from the refusal of such an advantage to the United States being a violation of neutrality, the concession of it would have been so in the opposite direction. Moreover, such a contention involves a forgetfulness of one of the elementary principles of international law. A neutral is only justified in allowing to a belligerent vessel the use of his ports and access to his shores to obtain the things which the belligerent may lawfully procure. He has no right to allow the belligerent the use of his territory on shore for belligerent purposes, which the permission to form a depôt would necessarily involve.

There is one other material fact connected with this vessel to which I desire to draw attention, the more particularly as it is stated in the American Case* that "the excessive supply of coal" (80 tons) "furnished to the Sumter at Trinidad enabled her to inflict the subsequent injuries on the commerce of the United States." The fact to which I refer is, that while using the coals furnished at Trinidad, the Sumter did not capture a single prize.

From the lists of captures contained in the fourth volume of the American Documents, and from the two lists of claims successively put in by the United States' Government, it appeared that this ship captured in the whole eighteen vessels, of which, however, one was recaptured, and seven were afterwards released by the Spanish Government. Those captured should be thus distributed:—

On her cruize back from New Orleans to Cienfuegos the Sumter captured eight vessels; on her cruize between Cienfuegos and Curaçoa, none; on her cruise between Curaçon and Trinidad, two; between Trinidad and Paramaribo, none; between Paramaribo and Maranham, none; between Maranham and Martinique, one; between Martinique and Cadiz, five; between Cadiz and Gibraltar, two. It thus appears that, of the eighteen vessels taken by the Sumter, eight were taken before the vessel ever entered a neutral port at all; nine before she arrived at Trinidad; that after leaving Trinidad she made two cruises without taking a single vessel; and that it was not till she had obtained at Maranham the supply of 100 tons of coal, in addition to the 150 of the prizes for which Great Britain is now asked to make compensation, two were taken before the Sumter arrived at Trinidad, and the rest at intervals of two, three, and four months from the time she left a British port, and when she was cruizing by means of coal furnished from a French port. The Tribunal is now in a position to judge how far the supply, said to have been "excessive," furnished at Trinidad, "enabled this vessel to inflict the subsequent injuries sustained by the commerce of the United States."

It is impossible, with any regard to equity and justice, to hold Great Britain liable for injuries inflicted by the Sumter on United States' commerce at a time when this vessel was deriving no benefit from coal supplied to her from a British port, but was availing herself of supplies obtained from other countries.

The facts connected with the Sumter during her stay at Gibraltar may be briefly stated.

She arrived at Gibraltar on the 18th January, 1862, in need of some repair, and wholly out of coal. According to the United States' Consul, she had but two days' supply in her burkers. The merchants at Gibraltar, from what motive is immaterial, refused to supply her with any. The pecuniary resources of her commander ran short. Many of the crew having got on shore refused to return, and when force was attempted to be used to compel them, the local police interfered and protected the men against violence. Another crew could not be got, and, under these circumstances, the vessel was compelled to remain in the port. Mr. Sprague, the United States' Consul, had from the first protested against her being allowed to enter or remain in the port, but received the very proper answer that strict neutrality should be observed. On the 21st of January he telegraphed to Mr. Adams, "the Sumter is still here,

The helpless condition of the vessel further appears from a letter from Mr. Sprague to Mr. Adams of the 6th of February :-

The Sumter remains in port. She took in yesterday 3,000 gallons of water, paid for by a Mr. R. O. Joyce, of this city, who had previously provided her with an anchor and chain. To-day her commander made a second attempt to obtain coal from the coal merchants in this market, and I am informed they have declined supplying him, out of deference to myself.

"Since yesterday, there are some ten or twelve seamen of the Sunater on shore, and to-day they have nearly all refused to return to their ship. One of them, in a drunken state, called upon me this day for protection. As the officers of the Sumter have attempted to forcibly ship them off from the quay, I to-day called upon the Governor of this fortress to inform him of the circumstance, that I was ready to take under my charge any of these scamen who might wish to avail of my protection, and who would swear allegiance to the Government of the United States; and that I did not believe that it would be in conformity with strict neutrality to force these men on board of the

"Since my interview with the Governor, I hear that orders have been given to the police anthorities not to permit these men to be forcibly taken on board of the Sumter by her officers, and up to this hour (7 P.M.) they remain on shore, mostly in a state of intoxication.

"All these circumstances may probably retard the departure of the Sumter from this port; still I sincerely hope that a Federal cruizer may soon uppear to do away with any further trouble about this craft. I have every reason to believe that her boilers are defective, and that she is very badly provided with powder and other munitions of war.";

On the 10th of February Captain Semmes having, it seems, in the meantime procured funds, finding the market shut against him, addressed a pressing letter to Captain Warden, the officer of the dockyard, to be allowed to purchase coal from the Government stores. He writes :-" Confederate States' steamer Sumter,

" Buy of Gibraltar, February 10, 1862. "Sir,
"I have the honour to inform you that I have made every effort to procure a supply of coal
"I have the honour to inform you that I have made every effort to procure a supply of coal without success. The British and other merchants of Gibraltar, instigated, I learn, by the United States' Consul, have entered into the unneutral combination of declining to furnish the Sumter with coal on any terms. Under these circumstances, I trust that the Government of Her Majesty will find

"By the recent letter of Earl Russell (January 31, 1861), it is not inconsistent with neutrality for a belligerent to supply himself with coal in a British port. In other words, the article has been pronounced, like provisions, unnoxious; and this being the case, it can make no difference whether it be supplied by the Government or an individual (the Government being reimbursed the expense), and this even though the market was open to me-much more, then, may the Government supply me with an innocent article, the market not being open to me. Suppose I had come into port destitute of provisions, and the same illegal combination had shut me out from the market, would the British Government permit my crew to starve? Or suppose 1 had been a sail ship and had come in dismantled, and the dockyard was the only place where I could be refitted, would you have denied me a mast; and if you would not deny me a mast, on what principle would you deny me coal, both articles being declared by your Government to be innocent! The true criterion is not whether the Government or an individual may supply the article, but whether the article itself is noxious or unnoxious. The Government may not supply me with powder, why? Not because I may have recourse to the market, but because the article is noxious. A case in point occurred when I was in Cadiz recently. My ship was admitted into a Government dock and there repaired, and why? First, because the repairs were innocent; and, secondly, because there were no private docks in Cadiz.

"So here the article is innocent, and there is none in the market (accessible to me); why may not the Government supply me? "In conclusion, I respectfully request that you will supply me with 150 tons of coal, for which I will pay the cash, or if you will prefer it I will deposit the money with an agent, who can have no difficulty, I suppose, in purchasing the same amount of the material from some one of the hulks and returning it to Her Majesty's dockyard."§

Here was an oceasion where an "habitually insincere neutrality" might have found grounds for making an exception to rules however strict. The only answer, however, which Captain Semmes received was, "Captain Warden's instructions prohibit him from supplying the foreign men-of-war of any nation with coal, either by purchase or otherwise, from the Government depôt, so long as there is any in the market."

On the 12th of February the United States' war ship the Tuscarora arrived off Algeeiras, and was soon followed by the Kearsarge, and later by the Ino, and these vessels thenceforth lay in wait to intercept the Sumter if she attempted to leave the bay. In the meantime her condition remained as helpless as before. On the 18th Mr. Sprague writes to Mr. Adams—"The Sumter still remains in port. The Coal Companies in this market still persist in refusing to sell her coal, not withstanding that 12 dollars per ton is offered for it, which is 50 per cent. over the market price."*

The Sumter

At Gibraltar.

Whether by reason of not being able to procure coal, or from fear of being captured by the United States' ships which were waiting to intercept her, or both, the Sumter remained at Gibra'tar till December, when it was proposed to sell her. Having heard of the intended sale, the United States' Minister at Madrid desired Mr. Sprague to protest against it.

Captain Pickering, the Commander of the Kearsarge, though considering the vessel "as of little value," yet thinking that she was offered for sale probably only in order to establish a precedent, and because, in his opinion, "the sale of the so-called Confederate war-vessels in British ports was an act as unfriendly and hostile to the United States' Government as the purchase of war-vessels in their ports by the same party," advised a similar course.+

Mr. Adams took a wiser and more liberal view. On the 24th of December he writes thus to Mr. Seward:-

"I have the honour to transmit copies of a series of communications received from Mr. H. J. Sprague, the Consul at Gibraltar respecting the movements made at that port to sell the steamer Sumter. As he desired my advice, I give it to him in the letter a copy of which goes with the papers. The question of the right to sell the property of a belligerent to a neutral in a neutral port is not without its difficulties, and I find the authorities differ materially about it. My own leaning is, rather to a liberal construction, especially as in this case it relieves us from a burdensome process of vigilance. Besides which, I find that the Government bought a war-vessel of the Greeks whilst engaged, in 1826, in their war with the Turks."‡

The protest of Mr. Sprague was founded on two grounds: first, that the Sumter was a United States' vessel which had been made prize by the Confederates; 2ndly, that the sale was made in order to avoid capture by the vessels of the United States navy.§ The local Government refused to interfere to prevent the sale, but gave official publicity to the protest of the American Consul. The sale took place, and the vessel was sold for 19,500 dollars. The purchaser was a Mr. Klingender, said to have been connected with the house of Frazer, Trenholm, and Co., of Liverpool. It is probable that the purchase was in reality made on behalf of the latter. It was no doubt believed at the time that the sale was fictitions, and that the vessel was intended still to remain the property of the afederates, and to be employed in her former service (whence the objection to the sale), more especially when the vessel, taking advantage of a very high wind, slipped away at night and escaped the vigilance of the hostile cruizers, who had instructions from Mr. Adams to seize her, notwithstanding the sale, if she quitted the port and was caught on the high seas. Had the sale been to an objectionable purchaser, Mr. Adams was prepared to acquiesce in it. On the 17th of December, three days before the sale, he writes to Mr. Sprague :-

"You will, first of all, confine yourself to the simple duty of watching all the proceedings. In case of any attempt at a merely fraudulent transfer for the sake of escaping harmless from our cruizers case of any attempt to a merely transment transfer for the sake of escaping harmless from our cruizers and resuming her former career, you will call their attention to the fact, deny the validity of any such proceeding, and invoke their interference. Should it appear to you, on the other hand, that the purchasing parties are foreigners acting in good faith for the conversion of the vessel to some legitimate and peaceful trade, I see no better way of getting rid of a burdensome labour of vigilance upon a property of little value than to acquiesce in it. On the other hand, should you have reasen to suspect a spurious transaction for the sole purpose of extricating the vessel from its present position in order to replace it in a more effective attitude of hostility to the United States, you will do well to remonstrate with the local authorities, and to send a copy of your remonstrance, together with the evidence on which you rest it, to this Legation."

The vessel arrived at Liverpool on the 13th of February, 1863. There she underwent repairs; all fittings for warlike purposes were removed, and she was reduced to the condition of a freight-earrying merchant-vessel. ++ But Mr, Dudley maintained to the last the belief that she was again intended to be employed on her former service. The consequence was, that vigorous remonstrances were addressed by Mr. Adams to Her Majesty's Government for having permitted the sale of the vessel, on the double ground that the transfer was fictitious, and that the sale of a belligerent ship in a neutral port, effected to avoid capture, is, by the Law of Nations, unlawful.*

Three complaints are put forward with reference to the foregoing facts:—(1.) That the vessel ought to have been compelled to leave the port in conformity with the Regulations of January 1862, as soon as those regulations came into operation, namely, on the 17th of February. (2.) That the Authorities ought not to have permitted the sale to take place, more especially as it was fictitious. (3.) That when, after the sale, the vessel entered the port of Liverpool she ought to have been treated as a Confederate ship of war, and as such compelled to leave the port under the Regulations of January 1862 +

The first of these heads of complaint is brought forward for the first time in the Case of the United States; it never having occurred to the zeal either of Mr. Sprague or Mr. Adams to insist on the Sumter being driven out of the harbour into the very jaws of her enemies. It is now put forward as a flagrant violation of neutrality.

As regards this head of complaint it is plain that the only way in which the United States could be prejudiced by the Sumter remaining in the port is that, if compelled to leave, she would inevitably have been captured by the Federal ships which were waiting to seize her. But for this, the longer she remained idle at Gibraltar, incapacitated by want of coal and want of funds, the better; while there, she could do no damage to the commerce of the United States. From the hour she entered the harbour of Gibraltar all complaint of prizes taken or destroyed necessarily ceases. All that the United States could have gained by the Sumter being forced to leave Gibraltar, and being taken by their war-vessels, would have been the few thousand pounds which this old steamer would have sold for; to which, however, should perhaps be added, that the employment of ships to watch her would have ceased to be necessary.

But was the Government under any obligation to compel the ship to leave on the expiration of the twenty-four hours? The answer is that the Regulations of January 31, 1862, did not apply to, but on the contrary excluded, the Sunter, which entered the harbour on the 18th of January, 1862, the regulations applying in terms only to such vessels as should enter ports of Her Majesty, "ofter the time when the order should be first notified and put in force," in the particular place; which, in this instance, was not till the 1st of February. Even had this been otherwise it would have been impossible with any pretence of justice to apply, ex post facto, to a vessel which had entered the port, when no such regulations existed, a rule which must inevitably have had the effect of delivering her into the hands of her enemies.

Again, even if the 3rd Article of the Regulations had been applicable to the Sumter, the fact that the necessary effect of forcing her to leave the harbour would have been to give her up to hostile vessels, waiting just outside to seize her, would have efforded, I think, a sufficient ground for suspending the Regulation, and extending the time beyond the twenty-four hours, under the discretionary power which admits of such extension in cases of necessity. No Governor, as it seems to me, is bound to force a vessel to quit a port in which she is in safety, when the necessary effect of doing so must be to throw her into the hands of a more powerful enemy who is waiting for her outside. It is admitted that by the Law of Nations a vessel taking refuge, when pursued by an enemy, in a neutral port, cannot be pursued. She is protected by the reason of the inviolability of the neutral territory and its waters, and by the right of asylum which the neutral concedes to her.

But of what avail would this be, if the neutral were bound, at the expiration of twenty-four hours, to say, "You must quit my port. I am aware that your enemy is waiting ouside to seize you, but your time is up and you must go. If, indeed, your enemy were inside the port, I could give you twenty-four hours start of him, which would probably enable you to escape; but he is just outside the port instead of within it, and I must therefore leave you to your fate." I cannot think that any Governor would be bound to drive a vessel out of a port where she is in safety, when the necessary consequence must be her capture or destruction, any more than he would be bound to do so if the consequence would be her exposure to a hurricane. The Regulation never was intended to apply to such a ease.

Furthermore I cannot help thinking that, giving an equitable construction to the 3rd Article of the Queen's regulations, the inability to procure a supply of coal also brought the vessel within the exceptions contained in it, although coals are not specifically mentioned.

The Sumter, indeed, had her sails and could have put to sea; but it is obvious that a steamer without coal, in the face of powerful steam-ships, would have but a poor chance. Thus crippled, her power of navigation on the ocean or of escape from enemies being seriously impaired, she would be the crippled duck in the comparison of M. Drouyn de l'Huys. Supposing a sailing vessel dismasted, in a port at which no mast suitable to her size could be procured, the local authority would certainly not be bound to compel her to leave; the case would be within the exception: but what masts and sails are to the sailing vessel, coal, in addition to her machinery, is to the steamer.

If, as I have shown, the Queen's regulations did not apply to the Sumter, à fortiori: in the exercise of his discretion the Governor ought not to have compelled her to leave under the circumstances stated.

In answer to the remonstrances of Mr. Adams as to the sale of the vessel having been allowed to take place, Her Majesty's Government, under the advice of its Law Officers, took this position. The sale of a belligerent ship in a neutral port to avoid capture has in it nothing unlawful. It may possibly be invalid against the other belligerent, into whose hands, but for such sale, the vessel would have tallen; but it is good against the rest of the world. The vessel may be subject to capture, when again at sea, by a ship of the belligerent, and the new owner must abide by the decision of a Prize Court of the belligerent as to the validity of his purchase; he cannot claim protection from his own Government in respect of the seizure. But the Government of the neutral port cannot interfere to prevent the sale, nor can it prevent the purchaser from dealing with the vessel as he pleases. It is under no obligation to do so; andwhat is still more to the purpose—it has no power to do so.

It was therefore impossible that the British Authorities could, consistently with the law, interfere with the sale or movements of this vessel.

They had no power to try the question whether the sale was real or fictitious; even if the transfer had been plainly fictitious, they had no power to prevent the vessel leaving the port as freely as she had entered it.

This position appears to me impregnable. I will only add that I do not find anywhere pointed out by what power, whether derived from statute or common law, the British authorities could have seized or interfered with this vessel after her sale.

Even if the British Government could be held to have incurred any liability in respect of the Sumter having been suffered to leave Gibraltar, as she never again appeared on the seas as a vessel of war, or did injury to an American ship, no claim to damages can arise in respect of her being permitted to leave, beyond, possibly, the inconsiderable sum which may been her value.

The position at first taken by M. Staempfli that, by analogy to the ease of a military force taking refuge in a neutral country, in which case an established rule of international law requires that such force should submit to being disarmed and disbanded, a ship of war taking refuge in a neutral port must in like manner be disarmed and dismantled is, as I have shown elsewhere, wholly untenable, the distinction between military and naval forces in this respect being universally admitted. I am glad to find the honourable gentleman no longer insists on it.

After the arrival of the ship at Liverpool Mr. Adams, addressing Earl Russell, insisted on her being still considered as a Confederate vessel of war, and therefore within the Queen's regulations relating to the stay of ships of war in British ports.*

Earl Russell gave the proper answer:-

" I have the honour to inform you that Her Majesty's Government have had under their consideration, in communication with the proper Law Advisers of the Crown, your letter of the 18th ultimo, stating that you had received information of the arrival of the steamer Sumter at Liverpool, and calling my attention to the bearing on this case of Her Majesty's Proclamation, limiting the stay within British ports of vessels of war belonging to either of the belligerent parties.

"I have now to inform you that Her Majesty's Government, in the present state of their information on the subject, are unable to assume, as you appear to do, that the ship lately called the Sumter has not been legally and bond fide sold to a British owner for commercial and peaceful purposes; and unless it were established that the sale was merely fictitious, Her Majesty's Proclamation, to which you refer, cannot be deemed applicable to that vessel in the port of Liverpool."+

At Liverpool.

The Sumter.

To this might have been added that she was no longer a vessel of war.

Even if this view were erroneous, the Sumter, never having done further mischief to United States' vessels, no claim to damages can possibly arise in respect of her having been allowed to remain at Liverpool.

This being so, it may be scarcely worth while to say more about her. But as this pitiful claim is made the occasion of studied insult to Great Britain, on the score of her "habitually insincere neutrality," it is right to observe that, as soon as this vessel was known to be at Liverpool, she became the object of watchful attention on the part of Her Majesty's Government.

On the 4th of April Earl Russell writes to Mr. Adams, as follows :-

"My attention having been drawn to a paragraph which appeared in the 'Daily News' of the 17th ultimo, in which, under the heading of 'Confederate War-Vessels,' is included the Sumter, now called the Gibraltar, as having been thoroughly repaired at Birkenhead, and being ready for sea, I deemed it advisable at once to request the proper authorities to cause particular attention to be paid to this vessel.

"I have now the honour to acquaint you that it appears, from a Report which has been received from the Collector of Customs at Liverpool, and which has been communicated to me by the Lords Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury, that, since the arrival of the Sumter at Liverpool on the 13th of February last, she has been carefully watched by the Custom-house officers, and that, although the vessel has received some repairs, nothing has taken place regarding her of a suspicious character.

"The Sumter appears to be laid up in the upper part of the Great Float, at Birkenhead, and there seems to be no sign of her being at present intended for sea.

"I have the honour to add that the authorities at Liverpool are instructed to continue to observe this vessel and to report without delay any circumstances of an unusual character which may happen to take place with regard to her."*

To which Mr. Adams replies :--

"I have had the honour to receive your note of the 4th instant, in reference to a paragraph which appeared in the 'Daily News' of the 17th ultimo, respecting the immediate preparation of the Sumter for departure from the port of Liverpool. I must confess that the information received by me from Liverpool, from wholly independent sources, had led me to believe the newspaper statement to be true. It is, however, with very great satisfaction I receive the contradiction of it from your Lordship, as well as the assurance that the movements of that vessel are under the observation of Her Majesty's Government. I am the more led to indulge this that the notice appears to have been spontaneously furnished to me with a degree of courtesy which I should be wanting in my duty if I were to fail properly to appreciate."

A month or six weeks later, all her war fittings were removed; and the vessel, having been adapted for running cargo, it was proposed to leau some heavy ordnance on board of her, the intention being no doubt to run the blockade and convey the guns, which appear to have been intended for purposes of fortification, to one of the Southern ports. The Authorities immediately interfered, nor would they allow the ship to sail with the guns, till thoroughly satisfied that they were incapable of being used on board, and were to be carried only as cargo.

On the 1st of July, M.. Dudley, for once giving credit to the Authorities for a desire to do their duty, writes:—

"The steamer Sumter is still in port. She has taken on the two large guns referred to in previous despatches. The Collector refuses to clear the vessel until they are removed, and threatens to seize her if she sails without her clearance. Either the Government or owners will have to give way. This looks as if the authorities were in earnest; at least, so far as this vessel is concerned."

On further inquiry all doubt as to the guns being eargo was removed, and the vessel was allowed to clear with them on board.

The consident expectations at first entertained by Mr Dudley of her being destined for further use as a vessel of war proved unfounded.

She assumed the humbler character of a blockade-runner, and is supposed to have been lost in attempting to get into Charleston.

It is impossible to say that any responsibility attaches to Great Britain in respect of this vessel.

The Nashville.

The Nashville.

The facts relating to the Nashville are very similar to the earlier part of the history of the Sumter.

She is stated, in the Case of the United States," to have been a large paddle-wheel steamer, formerly engaged on the New York and Charleston line; to have been lightened to diminish her draught; to have been armed with two guns, and to have been commanded by an officer who had been in the navy of the United States. She ran out from Charleston on the night of the 26th of October, 1861, and arrived at the port of St. George, Bermuda, on the 30th. She was then short of coal, having, no doubt, taken only a sufficient supply to bring her to Bermuda, the object being to lighten her draught as much as possible, in order to facilitate her getting over the bar at Charleston. In a despatch to the Duke of Newcastle, of the 2nd of November, At Bermuda.

"I have the honour to acquaint your Excellency that these islands were visited, on the 30th ultimo, by the Confederate States' paddle-wheel steamer Nashville, commanded by Lieutenant Peagram, and having on board Lieutenant-Colonel Peyton, of the Confederate States' army, said to be a Minister from those States to the Court of Spain, with numerous other officers and persons apparently connected with the ship. The vessel anchered off the dockyard; and Lieutenant Peagram and Colonel Peyton at once called upon Captain Hutton, R.N., the Superintendent, and requested him to supply their vessel with 600 tons of coal, it being their wish to proceed to sea as early as possible."

This request Captain Hutton declared himself unable to comply with, and the Governor, on being applied to, having repeated the refusal, Lieutenant Peagram supplied himself from private sources.

The Governor further states:-

object of the Nashville's visit has not been distinctly stated; but there can be no doubt then size 3 bound to England, and that she has on board persons who will endeavour to excite an increase in the favour of the Confederate States at some of the European Courts, and probably to obtain supplies of material and stores for the support of their cause.

"It had been reported that the Nashville left Charleston, on the 12th ultimo, with ex-Senators Slidell and Mason, as Representatives from the Confederate States to the Governments of France and England; that she had 2,000,000 dol. on board for the purchase of material, and was intended to coal

England; that she had 2,000,000 dol. on board for the purchase or material, and was intended to coal at Bermuda. This report no doubt led to the calling in here, on the 20th ultimo, of the United States' steam-vessel Connecticut, which left here immediately after, and proceeded apparently to cruize south.

"It appears from the report of the Nashville officers that these ex-Senators really did break the blockade about the time named, but in a smaller vessel, and that they reached Havana on their way to England. The United States' steam-vessels being thus put upon a wrong scent, the Nashville ran the blockade the night of the 26th, probably with the remainder of the Confederate States' Representatives and the specie and get to Bernauda in safety from which she has overy change of reaching England. and the specie, and got to Bermuda in safety, from which she has every chance of reaching England unmolested by the United States' vessels of war.

"I trust my proceedings on this occasion will meet your Grace's approval."

It is stated in the Case of the United States, that "the Nashville took on board at Bermuda, by the permission of the Governor, 600 tons of coal, and that this act was approved by Her Majesty's Principal Secretary of State for the Colonies. This approval seems to have been elicited by the complaints which had been made to the Governor by the Consul of the United States at that port. It may also be that Her Majesty's Government preferred to have the question settled, before it could be made the subject of diplomatic representation on the part of the United States."

This statement requires correction. In the first place, no permission was given by the Governor. At that time none was required. No regulations having then been issued as to the stay of vessels in British ports, or the supply of coal to be allowed to them, it was free to a vessel of war to purchase as much coal as she required.

In the second place the quantity was, in fact, not 600 tons, but, as appears from a despatch from Governor Lefroy to the Earl of Kimberley, either 442½ or 472½ tons, according as the report of an officer of the port, who took down the amount, or the memory of the party who supplied the coal, may happen to be correct.

This fact appearing in the evidence furnished by Her Majesty's Government, it is now said by the United States' Government to "matter little which is the true account;"* yet we have seen 150 tons treated as a considerable amount; and while on this subject I cannot help observing that although it is true that Governor Ord, in writing to the Duke of Newcastle, says, with reference to the amount of coal taken by the Nashville, he "has been informed they have taken in about 600 tons," the United States' Consul, Mr. Wells, who no doubt kept a sharp eye on what was doing, and was more likely to be well informed about it, states, in a letter to Mr. Seward of the 8th of November, "the Nashville took in about 500 tons of coal." Why should the larger figure at once be assumed to be the right one, without any reference to the statement of Mr. Wells?

When it is stated that the approval of the Colonial Secretary of what has been done "seems to have been elicited by the complaints which had been made to the Governor by the United States' Consul," I am struck by the fact that there is a total absence of all such complaint. Beyond an application made by the Consul to the Governor, on hearing of the ship's arrival, soliciting that an order may be given that no supplies shall be granted to the vessel, no remonstrance or complaint of any kind is made by Mr. Wells.;

When it is insinuated that "Her Majesty's Government preferred to have the matter settled before it could be made the subject of diplomatic correspondence," two things should be added; the first, that the supplies furnished to the Nashville at Bermuda zever did become the subject of diplomatic correspondence, no complaint having ever been addressed to Her Majesty's Government, either as to the fact of coal having been supplied to the Nashville, or as to the quantity furnished to her. The subject is brought forward as a matter of complaint, for the first time, in the proceedings before this Tribunal. Further, it should be stated that the approval of the Secretary of State was elicited by the request of Governor Ord himself, who asked to be informed if he had acted rightly in allowing the vessel to coal. It is distressing to have so frequently to advert to inaccuracies of this kind.

The approval of the Secretary of State for the Colonies was in these words :-

"The course pursued by you in the present instance was in strict accordance with the principles which you will find laid down in my Circular despatch.

"I have further to state that both you and Captain Hutton showed a very proper discretion in declining to furnish supplies to a war-vessel of one of the belligerant parties from public stores belonging to the British Government.

"Her Majesty's Government entirely approve of the whole of your proceedings on this occasion."

The Secretary of State, by the same mail which carried out the approval of the Secretary of State as to what had been done, sent a Circular to the Governors of Her Majesty's Colonies, containing instructions for their future guidance in such cases :-

"Having had occasion to consult the Law Officers of the Crown on the subject of remonstrances addressed to the Governors of some of the Colonies by Consuls of the United States, in regard to certain particulars in the treatment of vessels bearing the flag of the States which have seceded from the Union, I think it right to communicate to you, for your information and guidance, the principles which ought to be observed in cases of the kind which raised the present question.

"You will understand, therefore, that no foreign Consul has any power or jurisdiction to seize any vessel (under whatever flag) within British territorial waters, and that the British authorities ought not to take any steps adverse to merchant-vessels of the Confederate States, or to interfere with their free resort to British ports.

"With respect to supplies, even of articles clearly "contraband of war" (such as arms or ammunition), to the vessels of either party, the Colonial authorities are not at liberty to interfere, unless anything should be done in violation of the Foreign Enlistment Act, 59 Geo. 111, cap. 69, which prohibits the equipping, furnishing, fitting out, and arming of ships or vessels of foreign belligerent Powers, and also the supply of guns or equipments for war, so as to increase the warlike force of vessels of war, but which does not render illegal the mere supply of arms or attanualtion, &c., to private ships or vessels.

"If it should be necessary for the Colonial authorities to act in any such case, it should only be done when the law is regularly put in force, and under the advice of the Law Officers of the Crown.

"With respect to the supplying in British jurisdiction of articles ancipitis usus (such, for instance, as coal), there is no ground for any interference whatever on the part of the Colonial authorities."

It is plain from these instructions that Her Majesty's Government, acting under the advice of the Council of the Crown, took the same view of the law applicable to such a case that all writers on international law had taken, namely, that in the absence of regul perfect l No of regulations made by the neutral State, a belligerent vessel in a neutral port enjoys perfect liberty to obtain, from private sources, whatever supplies she may require.

Nor, even if the Governor had had any discretion in the matter, could it be said that he had exercised such discretion unwisely. The Nashville did not appear to be going on a mission of war at all. She was imperfectly armed with only two rifled E-pounder guns. She was conveying to Europe agents authorized to communicate with European Governments on behalf of the Confederate States. The quantity of coal allowed her was no more than was sufficient for the purpose of such a voyage, and there was then no rule limiting the supply to the quantity to take her to her nearest port. As a ship of war she was at liberty to buy what she wanted.

I am therefore quite at a loss to see how the supply of coal at Bermuda can be made a ground for asking damages at the hands of this Tribunal. The argument that what was done, at a time when there was unrestricted freedom in respect of such transactions, is to be tried by the test of stringent regulations, afterwards made for the purpose of placing restraints on that freedom, is obviously unsound. When it is said that there was a violation of neutrality in allowing a Confederate vessel to take as much coal as she wanted, while the United States were not permitted to establish a depôt of coal for the supply of their vessels, the argument which confounds the obvious distinction between a public national store and the resources of private dealers, if indeed worthy of attention, has already been disposed of.

The Nashville arrived at Southampton on the 21st November, 1861. On her way At Southampton. she seized and set fire to a United States' merchant-vessel, making her crew prisoners of war. On this ground, as well as her being a vessel of the insurgent Government, Mr. Adams objected to her being received into a British port.

It was ascertained that the Nashville was duly commissioned as a ship of war of the Confederate States, and was under the command of a duly commissioned officer.

The Law Officers, on being consulted by the Government, gave an opinion in strict conformity to established principles of international law:-

"The Nashville appears to be a Confederate vessel of war; her commander and officers have ommissions in the Confederate navy; some of them have written orders from the Navy Department, Richmond, to report to Lieutenant Peagram 'for duty' on board the Nashville, and her crew have signed articles to ship in 'the Confederate navy.' Her having captured and burnt a United States' and the Confederate navy. merchant-vessel on the high seas cannot, under these circumstances, be considered (to adopt Mr. Adams' merchant-ves-" of the figh seas cannot, under these circumstances, be considered (to adopt Mr. Adams words) as 'voluntarily undertaken by individuals not vested with powers generally acknowledged to be necessary to justify aggressive warfare;' nor does it at all approximate within the definition of piracy; nor is it an unauthorized act of 'violence; and if (as Mr. Adams suggests) Her Majesty's Government is called on in this ease 'cither to recognize a belligerent, or to denounce a wrong-doer,' Her Majesty's Government must, upon the facts and documents now appearing, adopt the former course.

"With reference to the allegation that some of her officers are to be put in command of vessels are in the United States, we can only say that if reasonable evidence can be procured that such vessels are being so fitted out, in contravention of the Foreign Enlistment Act, all parties concerned therein should be legally proceeded against, with the view to their being personally punished, and to the forfeiture of the vessels.

"We may add (generally) that it will be competent to Her Majesty, as a neutral Power, either to designate the particular ports to which alone the national ships of the belligerents are permitted to resort; to limit the time for which, or to define the circumstances under which, they may so resort thereto, or to make and publish such general regulations with reference thereto as she may think proper; but, subject to such limitations, Her Majesty cannot interfere with the national ships of one party resorting to her ports in respect of hostile acts done on the high seas to the ships of the opposite party."*

Sir Hugh Cairns and Dr. Deane, being consulted by the United States' Consul as to the possibility of recovering chronometers seized as prizes on the taking of the Harvey Birch, advised :-

"It appears from the affidavit of Captain Nelson that the Harvey Birch was taken possession of and burnt on the high seas, outside the limit of British waters, and that the armed ship Nashville carried the flag of the Confederate States.

to have held a commission under the Confederate States and in the navy of those States.

"The British Government has considered the Federal and Confederate States entitled to be treated as belligerents, each possessed of the rights of war, one of which rights is the capture and destruction of vessels belonging to the enemy by the commissioned vessels of the belligerents.

"If, therefore, the Nashville was a commissioned vessel belonging to the Confederate States, we are of opinion that Captain Nelson has no legal rights in this country against the Nashville or her Commander."*

There is nothing in what was done in relation to the Nashville after her arrival at Southampton which could give occasion for any complaint. As soon as it was found that she was about to undergo repairs at that port, instructions were given by the Government to exercise the utmost vigilance to see that nothing was added to her equipment or her power as a vessel of war.† Mr. Adams, naturally anxious to prevent any attempt of this nature, found, on applying to Earl Russell, that he had been anticipated by the spontaneous action of the Government.‡ Nothing was done to the Nashville beyond necessary repairs, and she eventually left England on the 3rd of February, 1862, the same in point of equipment and strength as she had been on leaving Charleston.

On the 15th of December the United States' steamer Tusearora arrived also at Southampton, and having taken in 150 tons of coal proceeded to keep watch on the Nashville, evidently, as the sequel showed, for the purpose of seizing her on her departure from British waters. From a telegram of Captain Patey, Senior Officer of Her Majesty's ships at Southampton, to the Admiralty, it appears that on the night of the 9th of January "the dockmaster reported having discovered in the dock two officers and three men from Tusearora, who stated they were on shore under orders watching Nashville, and to signal should she get under weigh. Dockmaster removed them from the dock."§

Earl Russell, having become acquainted with this state of things, wrote on the 10th to Mr. Adams:—

"I have just been informed that armed men were found last night watching the Nashville in Southampton docks, and that they were discovered by Mr. Hodge, the Dock Superintendent, close at the Nashville's bows.

"I think it necessary to state to you that, except in case of stress of weather forcing them to land, Her Majesty's Government cannot permit armed men in the service of a foreign Government to land upon British ground.

"I therefore request that you will inform the Captain of the Federal steamer in Southampton waters that he must refrain from acts of this kind, which may lead to a collision between his men and the British authorities.

"I have also to inform you that no act of hostility can be permitted between the Federal steamer and its enemy within British waters, and that orders to that effect will be issued to the Board of Admiralty.

"In the case of the Nashville leaving British waters, the Federal steamer of war will not be permitted to start from British waters in pursuit of her till after the expiration of twenty-four hours.

"The same rule will be applied to the vessels of the so-called Confederate States."

On the 10th Captain Wilcox, of Her Majesty's ship Dauntless, writes to Captain Craven, the Commander of the Tusearora, as follows:—

"Having observed preparations for departure in the United States' steamer Tuscarora, under your command, and also in the Confederate States' steamer Nashville, I beg to acquaint you that I have received instructions to prevent any hostility taking place in British waters; and I beg to bring to your notice the usual law of nations which requires that twenty-four hours should chapse before the departure of one belligerent ship in pursuit of the other.

"Relying upon your good judgment in this matter, and the friendly feeling existing between the two Governments, I have, &c." "

Captain Craven answered, giving, it will be observed, no pledge:-

"I have the honour to ucknowledge the receipt of your communication this evening.

"I am not aware that I have given cause for your assuming that I meditate an act of hostility in the waters of Great Britain.

"Claiming the right of free access to, and egress from, the waters of a nation believed to be in amity with the United States, and sincerely desirous of avoiding all semblance of offence, I am, &c."

It was not without some difficulty that Captain Patey obtained the required pledge. On the 25th of January he reports to the Admiralty:—

"The Nashville's necessary defects have been made good, and she has been coaled; and, judging from the frequent movements of the Tuscarora up and down the Southampton water, including one trip through the Ncedles and round the Isle of Wight, that the ship is in all respects ready for sea, I am induced to bring this matter under the notice of their Lordships, because it appears to me, from the course pursued, and avowedly so made known to me by the Captain of the Tuscarora, in a conversation which I have had with that officer, he will do his utmost to render the rule of twenty-four hours which

"I would also beg to point out to their Lordships the possibility of the Tuscarora and Nashville coming into collision in a narrow channel and at night, and the probability of Tuscarora, supposing that the other ship had purposely run into her, opening fire on her, and hence bringing on a grave difficulty the other sup may purposely run into ner, opening are on ner, and nence oringing on a grave unneatey in the matter. Under all the circumstances of this peculiar case, I think it my duty to make this communication to their Lordships, that they may take such steps as may by them be deemed necessary, respectfully submitting that the Commanders of the Tuscarora and Nashville respectively should be called upon to give me a written notice of the date and hour they intend to proceed to sea, and that, that a positive described from either one, the other should be immediately notified of the fact and that he would not be allowed to follow until twenty-four hours had elapsed."*

The following summary of facts, forwarded by the Admiralty to the Foreign Office on the 31st, is printed in the British Appendix :-

"November 21, 1861.—Nashville arrived at Southampton, and taken into dock for caulking and other repairs.

"December 15.—Tuscarora arrived, and anchored off entrance to River Itchen.

"December 23.—Captain Patey reported no repairs had been made in Nashville beyond what were absolutely necessary, and that she had not been in any way equipped more completely as a man-of-war.

"January 10, 1862.—Captain Patey reported that Dockmaster at Southampton had on previous three men belonging to Tuscarora under Graving night found two officers (one with side-arms) and three men belonging to Tuscarora under Graving Dock fence on pier between Docks; they stated that they were stationed there by their Captain's orders to watch Nashville and to make a signal to their own ship should Nashville attempt to get under way. Dockmaster removed these persons.

January 10. Captain Patey also reported that Tuscarora had received 150 tons of coal, and had kept her stam up since her arrival, with a spring on her cable, apparently ready for sea.

"January 11.—Captain Wilcox, of Her Majesty's ship Dauntless, stationed in Southampton Water, informed Captains of Tuscarora and Nashville that he had observed preparations for their departure, and had instructions to prevent any hostilities in British waters, and brought to their notice that the and nad instructions to prevent any nostricties in British waters, and brought to their notice that the Law of Nations requires that twenty-four hours should clapse before the departure of one belligerent ship from a neutral port in pursuit of another. Captain Patey, as Senior Officer at Southampton, also informed Captains of Tusearora and Nashville that he had received orders to detain one vessel until the other had twenty-four hours' start. Captains of two vessels answered they would conform to law; and Captain Craven (of Tusearora) claimed right of free access to and egress from 'waters of a nation believed to be in amity with United States,' trusting that strict impartiality would be observed between the two vessels. It make the first of Captain Craven having sout officers and the two vessels. In reply, Captain Patey referred to fact of Captain Craven having sent officers and men into Docks to watch Nashville, and also pointed out that a boat, apparently armed, from the Tuscarra had been observed pulling in and out of the Docks without landing during the night. Captain Craven gave assurance that this would not be repeated.

"January 13.—Tuscarora left anchorage at 4 A.M., and proceeded to anchor one mile west of Calshot light-ship. Returned at 4 P.M. to former anchorage at entrance of Itchen River.

"January 15.—Tuscarora at 2 P.M. weighed, and passed Culshot.

"January 16.—At 2 P.M. returned to original anchorage.

"January 20.—At 8 P.M. proceeded down Southampton Water, and anchored outside Culshot. Castle.

"January 22.—At 10 A.M. returned to anchorage at mouth of Itchen River.

"January 25.—Captain Patey reported Nashville coaled, and necessary repairs completed, and Tuscarora ready for sea; also that, in conversation with him, Captain Craven, of Tuscarora, had avowed that he would do his utmost to render rule as to twenty-four hours' start null and void by constantly keeping up steam, and having slips on her cable, so that the moment Nashville might move Tusearora would precede her, and claim priority of sailing, returning again within twenty-four hours, and so actually blockading Nashville in a nentral port.

"January 26.—Under instructions, Captain Patey obtained written promises from captains of

Tuscarora and Nashville not to leave their then positions without giving twenty-four hours' notice.

"January 27.—In order to prevent any hostile proceedings between the two vessels in British waters, a messenger was dispatched in the morning to Southampton, with instructions to Captain Patey to require Nashville to depart by 12 o'clock at neon or Tuscaday, the 28th January, and Tuscarora on following day at same hour; but at 1 P.M., and before receiving these last-mentioned instructions, Captain Patey telegraphed that Captain of Tuscarora had notified to him that that ship would put to see on the following day, namely, on 28th January, at 11 A.M. To this telegram an answer was at once sent that Tuscarora was accordingly to be allowed to proceed first; and, under the circumstances, Captain Patey did not think it necessary to acquaint the captain of Tuscarora of the orders he (Captain Patey) received subsequently (on the afternoon of the 27th), requiring the ship to quit Southampton.

"January 28.—Captain of Tuscarora reported by letter to Captain Patey that he should defer departure, in consequence of inclemency of weather, until 29th, or first fine day. Captain Patey, in answer, told Captain Craven that he saw nething in the state of the weather to prevent Tuscarora

January 28.—Captain Patey directed by telegraph not to take any steps, at present, to compel Tuscarora's departure.

"January 29.—At 8:10 a.m., Tuscarora proceeded down Southampton Water.

"January 30.—Captain Patey, by telegraph, reports Tuscarora, at 2 p.m., remains in Tarmouth Roads, and he asks for instructions as to Nashville's departure. Informed, in reply, that the time of Nashville's departure will date from hour Tuscarora shall really go to sea, in accordance with notice. 'Admiralty, January 30, 1862."*

This summary was forwarded by Earl Russell to Mr. Adams, with this observation :-

"I think you will see from this summary that Her Majesty's Government have reason to complain of the conduct of the commander of the Tuscarora, as an attempt to carry on hostilities in the waters

"I have the honour also to inclose a copy of the 'London Gazette,' containing the rules which I mentioned to you in a previous letter."

On the 1st of February, the Tusearora, having left Lymington, to which place she had previously shifted her berth, six miles to the west of the Needles, is seen steaming to the westward. The Nashville is accordingly informed that she can leave on the ensuing day. The next day the Tusc rora is at Portland. On the 3rd, she is at her former station in Cowes Roads. The Nashville having in the mean time given notice to leave on the 3rd, notice was given to the captain of the Tuscarora not to leave for twenty-four hours. But so suspicious did the movements of this vessel appear to the commanders of Her Majesty's ships, that it was thought necessary for a ship of war to accompany the Nashville past the Tuscarora, and for a watch to be kept on the latter by the Dauntless.

It thus appears that the Captain of the Tuscarora systematically endeavoured to clude the twenty-four hours' rule by keeping up his steam and having slips on his cable, and by making a series of false starts. Indeed, he preceded the Nashville only to return at the moment of the latter's departure, and he was therefore not permitted to leave for another space of twenty-four hours. Nevertheless this officer, who had himself been treated with scrupulous impartiality and attention, but had given to Her Majesty's Government just cause of complaint, having been baffled in his endeavours to clude the necessary regulations of neutrality, did not leave Southampton without emplaining that "a just and rigid impartiality did not appear to have been extended to him," in connection with "the escape of the pirate Nashville." It is true that Mr. Adams admits, in a despatch of the 7th of February, 1862, that "he (Captain Craven of the Tusearora) will doubtless lay the blame on the action of the people and Government of this country; my own opinion is, that if he had been a little more cool and quiet, he would have fared better." §

M. Calvo in his recent work as a clear violation of neutrality.

Again at Bermuda.

The Nashville, on leaving Southampton, recrossed the Atlantic and arrived at Bermuda on the 20th of February, $1862.\parallel$ The regulations issued by the British Government on the 31st of January previous, limiting the stay of the armed vessels of the belligerents and the supplies to be obtained by them in British ports, did not arrive in that colony until nearly a fortnight later, and were unknown to the Governor at the time of the Nashville's visit. There was no ground therefore for placing any restriction on the coaling of the Nashville, and she is stated by the United States Consul to have taken in 150 tons. She left the following day, and apparently went straight to Charleston. Measures were taken by the Governor to insure the observance of neutrality during her visit, and as at the time of her departure several merchant-vessels were in sight, some of which might have been United States' ships, the Admiral in command desired the Commander of Her Majesty's ship Spiteful to proceed to sea and watch that the Nashville did not interfere with any vessels of whatever nationality until beyond the limit of British territorial jurisdiction.†† her return to Charleston she was converted into a merchant-vessel, under the name of The Nashville. the Thomas L. Wragg.*

It is idle to say that any responsibility can attach to Her Majesty's Government in respect of this vessel.

The Chickamauga.

The Chickamauga.

The claim put forward in respect of this vessel is founded on a single act of coaling at Bermuda. I must express my surprise that the time of this tribunal should have been occupied with a claim so groundless and frivolous as this.

This vessel was originally ealled the Edith. She was a double serew steamer, and was employed in running the blockade. She was purchased by the Confederate Government, and being found to be fast, was converted into a vessel of war, and named the Chiekamauga,

The Case of the United States "invites the attention of the Tribunal of Arbitration" to the facile manner in which this and other vessels were permitted to adapt themselves to circumstances. + Why our attention should be thus invited I am at a loss to imagine. Is it meant to be suggested that Great Britain could, or ought to have, prevented vessels, originally built as trading vessels from being converted into ships of war, or should have refused to recognize them as ships of war, when so converted and commissioned, because their original destination had been of an humbler character? Either supposition is obviously absurd.

Having run out from Wilmington on the night of the 28th of October, 1864, and succeeded in evading the blockading ships, she destroyed several trading vessels belonging to the United States. On the 7th of November she put into Bermuda. Her Commander, Lieutenant Wilkinson, applied to the Lieutenant-Governor for leave to coal and repair his machinery. The Lieutenant-Governor thereupon requested the Admiral commanding on the station to cause a survey to be made to ascertain the repairs required by the vessel, and the time necessary for their completion, as well as the quantity of coal now in her, and the additional quantity, if any, that would be required to enable her to proceed to the nearest Confederate port.§ The officer appointed by Captain Glasse reported that certain repairs (specified in detail) were necessary to render the vessel fit for sea, and that these repairs would occupy from four to five days; that they were informed that she had about 75 tons of coal on board, while her daily consumption was 25 tons; they therefore considered that 25 tons more would be sufficient to enable her to reach the nearest Confederate port. Orders were issued by the Lieutenant-Governor in conformity with this report.

Permission was given to Lieutenant Wilkinson to remain five days from the 9th of November for the completion of the necessary repairs, and to take 25 tons of coal. But the permission to take in the 25 tons of coal was coupled with the condition that "a revenue officer should be allowed to go on board and see the coal shipped," and the chief officer of the Customs was directed to "take measures for ascertaining that the vessel received no more than the quantity prescribed."

Lieutenant Wilkinson, while making "no objection to the terms on which the coal was to be permitted to come on board," "with respect to the quantity, begs to inform his Excellency that, in his opinion, there will not be a sufficiency to take the Chickamanga to the nearest Confederate port." "I trust therefore," he says, "that on further consideration, an additional day's supply (or say 25 tons) will be allowed." But he is told in answer that the quantity had been fixed in conformity with Admiral Glasse's report, and that if he was dissatisfied any further communication must be addressed to the Admiral. There the matter ended.

Upon these facts it might have been thought difficult to found any possible complaint. But it is alleged that having obtained permission to stay five days, she actually stayed seven; that the permission was given to take the 25 tons of coal when she already had 100 tons in her bunkers; and that having had permission to take 25 tons, she in fact took 82.++

The Chickamanga.

The only authority for this statement is the diary of a midshipman who was serving on board the ship. The diary is not unamusing, and it is not without its value. It proves conclusively that any claim in respect of this vessel is wholly out of the question. The part which relates to Bermuda is in these terms:

"November 7, 1864.—At 7.25 took Bermuda pilot. At 8 A.M. let go the port anchor with 25 fathems chain in Five Fathom Hole off St. George. I went in ashore in charge of captain's boat. Captain went to Hamilton to see the Governor to get permission to bring the ship in.

"November 8, 1864.—Ship still auchored in the same place. We will go in this evening. They have decided to let us come in for five days. Hove up anchor at 4 P.M. and came into St. George, and

"November 9.—Ship in the stream. Receiving fresh water and provisions. Ship is swarming with bumboat women, washerwomen, &c. Met Midshipman Warren, Confederate States' Navy, who is waiting for the Florida. Went out into the country and staid all night with him. "November 10 .- Ship still in stream. At 4 P.M. the bark Pleiades hauled alongside to give us coal. Coaling ship all night. Got in about 72 tons. "November 11.—Stopped coaling at 4 A.M.

" November 15 .- Returned on board at 2:30 P.M. Got under way and stood out of the harbour.

Pilot left us at 3 P.M.

"November 19 to December 20.—Reached Wilmington at about 11 a.m. Found the Tallahassee safe in port. She had destroyed six vessels, one of which was a brig that we chased the second day out.

Until about the middle of December, nothing occurred. The officers were granted leave. The Tallahassee was put out of commission about the 15th of December, and loaded with cetton. The command was given to Captain Wilkinson, Captain Ward taking the Chickamanga, out in the Chameleon, as she is now called, but I slipped up on my expectations."*

We thus find that leave having been given on the 9th of November to stay till the 15th, the vessel left on the 15th, the day on which the permission expired; and we further see that by another unlucky inaccuracy, the 72 tons in the midshipman's diary are magnified into 82 in the Case of the United States.

From the following affidavit of William Gilbert Outerbridge, the revenue officer who superintended the lading of the coal, it would appear that the writer of the diary must have been in error as to the quantity shipped.

The affidavit is as follows:-

"I, William Gilbert Outerbridge, of Hamilton Parish, Bermuda, make oath and say :-

"I was employed as a Revenue Officer at St. George's in 1864. I was ordered to see that the Confederate cruizer Chickamauga did not receive more than twenty-five tons of coal. I saw her receive twenty-five tons of coal, in the stream, and left her between 3 and 4 in the morning, or, perhaps, between 4 and 5, I cannot be positive to the hour, nor am I sure whether the date was the 10th November; I have a note-book of 1865, but have not been able to find the one I kept in 1864. I swear that she did not receive more than twenty-live tons in the night in which I was on board her. She was coaled from a barque alongside, but I cannot recollect if she was called the Pleiades. I made a report to Mr. Edwin Jones, but kept no copy of it. The barque was still alongside when they ceased coaling, and I left the Chickamauga, and I am positive that she was not alongside at daylight in the morning.

"I went on board about 6 r.m. the previous evening, and did not leave my post all the time she was coaling. I took an exact account of all the coal put on board, and swear that she did not get seventy-two tons while I was on board.

I do not believe she got that quantity at all.

(Signed) "WM. GILBERT OUTERBRIDGE."+

It is, however, possible that the opportunity may have been abused and the vigilance of the officers cluded. It appears from the affidavit of another revenue officer that there were at that time frequently as many as fifty vessels in the harbour of St. George's. Mr. Brown, a merchant of the port, says:-

"I, John Tory Bourne, of the town of St. George, in the Islands of Bermuda, merchant, make oath and say that I well remember the rrival of the Confederate States' cruizer, the Chickamauga, in the port of St. George, in the said Islands, in November 1864, and that she obtained permission from the Colonial authorities to take on board twenty-five tons of coal, and no more. I cannot positively state that she received on board no greater quantity, but I know that the officers and others connected with the ship expressed great dissatisfaction at the restrictions placed on her and the very small quantity of coal allowed. The port of St. George was so crowded with shipping at that time that it would have been easy for the Chickanauga to evade such restrictions, and no vigilance or activity on the part of the Colonial Government could, in my judgment and opinion, have prevented such evasions if the officers of the vessel chose to practise them.

Assuming, however, that the Commander of the Chickamauga, forgetful of what The Chickamauga. a due sense of honourable conduct should have dictated, did get any coal in excess of the prescribed quantity, it would be most unjust to impute this to the default of the Bermuda authorities.

But in the result the whole question becomes immaterial. We see from Mr. Carey's diary, that the Chickamauga arrived at Wilmington, where this young officer unfortunately "slipped up on his expectations" on the 19th of November, without having fallen in with, taken, or destroyed a single United States' vessel. The coaling at Bermuda therefore did not lead to any injury to the United States, and cannot in any point of view found a claim for damages.

Case of the Tullahussee.

This vessel, said to have been also known as the Olustee, was built and originally The Tallahassee. employed as a blockade-runner under the name of the Atlanta. In the correspondence of the United States' Consulates during the first six months of the year 1864 she is several times spoken of as a blockade-runner of superior power of speed.* No reference whatever is made to her having been built for, or being adapted to, the purpose of war.

In the August of that year, some guns were put on board of her at Wilmington, with a crew of 120 men, and having contrived to escape from the blockading vessels, she commenced her work of devastation, and destroyed several vessels.† Having done so, she arrived at Halifax on the 18th of August. What occurred there will be best told in the narrative of her commander, John Taylor Wood :-

"My reception by the Admiral was very cold and uncivil: that of the Governor less so. I stated I was in want of coal, and that as soon as I could fill up I would go to sea—that it would take from two to three days. No objection was made at the time. If there had been, I was prepared to demand forty-eight hours for repairs. The Governor asked me to call next day and let him know how I was progressing and when I would leave. I did so, and then was told that he was surprised that how I was progressing and when I would leave. I did so, and then was told that he was surprised that I was still in port; that we must leave at once; that we could leave the harbour with only 100 tons of coal on board. I protested against this, as being utterly insufficient. He replied that the Admiral had reported that quantity sufficient (and, in such matters, he must be governed by his statement) to run the ship to Wilmington. The Admiral had obtained this information by sending on board three of his officers, ost-asibly to look at our machinery and the twin screw, a new system, but really to ascertain the quantity of end on board, that burned daily, &e. . . . I am under many obligations to our agent, Mr. Weir, for transacting our business, and through his management about 120 tons of coal were put aboard instead of half that quantity. Had I procured the coal needed, I intended to have struck the coast at the Capes of the Delaware, and followed it down to Cape Fear, but I had only coal enough to reach Wilmington on the night of the 25th. coal enough to reach Wilmington on the night of the 25th.

It is admitted, in the Case of the United States, that, in respect of what took place on this occasion, the United States have no cause of complaint. Indeed, it is said :-

"Had the British authorities at Nassau, Bermuda, Barbadoes, Cape Town, Melbourne, and other colonial ports, pursued the same course that the Lieutenant-Governor at Halifax did, under the wise advice of the Admiral, the grievances of the United States would have been much less, and this case would have been shorter by many pages. The first time that the rule of January 31, 1862, as to the supply of coal, was fairly carried out, the operations of the insurgent cruizer, to which it was applied, were arrested on the spot, and the vessel was obliged to run for a home port."S

The Tallahassee remained at Wilmington some months; and she was then sold by the Confederate Government and purchased by a private merchant, and became, and afterwards remained, a merchant-vessel. In that character, and under the name of the Chameleon, she visited Bermuda in January 1865, with a cargo of cotton and tobacco. The vessel being identified as the former Tallahassee, inquiries were set on foot by the Authorities, when it was fully shown by Mr. Wilkinson, the consignee of the eargo, that she had passed into private hands, and had been duly registered as private property.

Upon what possible grounds, then, can we be asked to award damages in respect of this vessel? Simply because, as it is said, "the Tallahassee was a British steamer fitted out from London to play the part of a privateer out of Wilmington." But upon what authority is this statement made? Simply on that of a passage to that effect in a letter of Mr. Adams to Earl Russell, written much later, namely in March 1865, in which, complaining of the system of blockade running carried on by British ships, he thus speaks of the former Tallahassee:—

"The Chameleon, not imptly named, but before known as the Tallahassee, and still earlier as a British steamer fitted out from London to play the part of a privateer out of Wilmington, was lying at that very time in Nassau, relieved, indeed, of her guns, but still retaining all the attributes of her hostile occupation."*

Every one knows that Mr. Adams would not say anything that he did not fully believe to be true; but he must forgive me for saying that in this instance he must have been mistaken, possibly confounding the vessel in question with some other. In the earlier correspondence of the United States' Consulate respecting this vessel there is not, as I have already mentioned, any reference whatever to it as having been intended for a privateer. She was, in fact, sold after a three weeks' ernise, because, as the consignee of her eargo at Bernnuda tells us, she had been "found ill adapted to the purposes of war." Besides, had she been built as a privateer, it is very unlikely that she would afterwards have been bought by a merchant as a carrying vessel. Every one aequainted with these things knows that a vessel intended for war-purposes differs essentially, in point of construction, from one intended for trade.

When a Government is unable to build or to procure ships properly constructed for war, it may be driven to the expedient of converting merchant-vessels into vessels of war; but a merchant does not buy ships of war to turn them to a purpose for which their construction makes them wholly unfit.

But what if this vessel had been originally built as a privateer? Is it meant to be asserted that this alone, without any suggestion, much less proof, of default on the part of the British Government, is enough to fix the latter with liability for the acts of such a vessel?

But it would be a waste of time to pursue this further. Here again, I must say I think this elaim ought never to have been submitted to us.

The Retribution.

The Retribution.

This vessel was a small steamer built in the State of New York and originally employed as a tug-steamer on Lake Eric. Just before the attack on Fort Sumter she was chartered by the Government of the United States and sent to the Southern coast.

Having been compelled by stress of weather to enter Cape Fear River, she was there seized by the Confederates. Her machinery was removed, and she was converted into a sailing schooner and armed; she then started on a cruize under the name of the Retribution.

On the 28th of January, 1863, she captured near San Domingo the United States' merchant-vessel Hanover, laden with a cargo of provisions. The master and crew of the vessel were put into the boat, in which they rowed to San Domingo, and the chief officer of the Retribution, a man named Vernon Locke or Parker (for he was at different times known under both these names) took possession of the Hanover with a prize crew.§

The Hanover arrived on the 5th of February at Long Cay, a small island of the Bahamas, about 240 miles from the seat of Government, in company with a wrecking schooner named the Brothers, and owned by Messrs. Farrington, merchants, of that island. Here Vernon Locke represented himself to be the master of the Hanover, and stated that he was bound from Boston to a port of Cuba, where he was to have sold his cargo, and to run the blockade with a cargo of salt. On the plea that his vessel had run ashore on a neighbouring island, and was in a leaky condition, he obtained the permission of the Customs Collector at Long Cay to transfer part of the cargo to the Brothers, and to land the rest, and eventually to sell the whole through the agency of Messrs. Farrington. For this purpose he produced the manifests of the cargo, and

The magistrate of the district, who resided in another island, but who happened to arrive at Long Cay at the time, questioned the pretended master, and appears to have had his doubts as to the truth of some of the particulars of the story.

In a report which he afterwards furnished to the Governor, of the 20th of April,

"I had my doubts as to the vessel having been on shore at Inagua, and I mentioned my doubts to Mr. Farrington. I told him that I was under the impression that in the cargo there might be articles Mr. Farrington. I told him that I was under the impression that in the cargo there might be arrived contraband of war, and that the reported disaster was but a ruse to prevent the Boston merchant being tracked in Nassau in his illicit trade with the South. But I found out afterwards, on inquiry from the Acting Tide Waiter, that the cargo was really one of provisions.

"Mr. Farrington admitted that he also doubted whether the Hanover had been on shore, but inasunch as the captain came to him properly documented, he did not see any impropriety in his matter as the captain came to him properly documented, he did not see any impropriety in his matter as the captain came to him properly documented.

It must be remembered that the captain was a perfect stranger; the rear mets of the case as I was. It must be remembered that the captain was a perfect stranger; that the register and articles of the Hanover were produced, I believe, at the Collector's office, but I know that he had the ship's clearance, the bills of lading, and even the certificate from the Customhouse in Boston that the captain had taken the oath of fidelity to the Union. He represented himself as Captain Case, and signed all documents as Washington Case, the name of the captain as appearing

The Hanover remained at Long Cay for a day or two after the Brothers had left, and then seems to have sailed for some port in the Southern States.† The masper in saich the fraud which had been committed on the Authorities was discovered, a thus related by Mr. Burnside, the magistrate of the district, in the report which has been already referred to:-

"The Hanover remained a day or two after the Brothers had left, at Long Cay, under the charge The Hanover remained a day or two after the brothers had left, at Long Cay, under the charge of the former mate taking in a curgo of salt, and it was only about half-an-hour previous to her departure that I, and, I am under the impression, Mr. Farrington also had the slightest misgiving that the person who had represented himself as the Captain of the Hanover was not Washington Case. One of the sailors of the Hanover, under the influence of liquor, referred to the supposed captain in the Collector's presence by some other name. I was with Mr. Farrington when the Collector mentioned the circumstance; reference was immediately made to the documents and the difference in the signa-tures confirmed what the Collector had heard. The supposed Captain Case had then left in the Brothers, and no action could have been taken even if I had been armed with power; but even then we were under the impression that the name had been assumed in the Custom-house, in Boston, by some other person to facilitate Captain Case's leaving Boston, supposing him to have been a suspicious some once person to mematate capanic scales of the person; and it was only after I had left Long Cay, on my way to Inagua, that we met a vessel from Inagua, and I received a letter from Mr. Sargent informing me that he was under the impression that

On the 19th of February following, the Retribution captured another American merchant vessel, the Emily Fisher, in the neighbourhood of Castle Island, one of the Bahamas. The case of this vessel does not seem to have formed the subject of any complaint either on the part of the United States' Government or of the parties interested until the present time; and the Collector of Customs at Long Cay being now dead, there is little evidence to be depended upon as regards the proceedings at

The statement, produced by the United States, of a man named Sampson who was at the time, according to his own account, employed at Long Cay under the orders of the United States' Government as a "deputy marshal" or detective officer to look after wreckers and blockade-runners, cannot be regarded as reliable. He states that all the facts connected with the capture of the vessel and the subsequent transactions art the facts connected with the capture of the vessel and the sinsequent dansactions were true, "from his personal knowledge," and that he had previously testified to them before a Court in New Jersey... But it is obvious that he can have had no personal knowledge of the facts connected with the capture of the vessel, which took place at a distance from Long Cay; and, on reference to the proceedings of the trial mentioned, the material portion of his evidence is found to be no more than that he saw the Retribution in the spring of 1863 at Long Cay, where she was lying outside the Emily Fisher; that he was introduced by an acting magistrate of Long Cay to the first and

According to the statement on oath of Mr. Staples, the former master of the Emily Fisher, which, however, was only made in September last, eight years after the event, he was induced by the assurances of a captain of a British wrecking vessel, to come within range of the Retribution, by whom he was captured. The Emily Fisher was then run on shore by the orders of the Captain of the Retribution, and was taken possession of by some wrecking boats. The vessels afterwards proceeded to Long Cay, where the Master was eventually placed in possession of the vessel by the Collector, but not until he had bargained with the wreckers to pay them 50 per cent. on the eargo and 33½ per cent on the vessel for salvage. Staples adds, that "he was told by the Authorities that, though the law would not allow the privateer to touch the brig," yet, "if he wished to do so, they had no means of preventing him; that the captain of the privateer told him, the deponent, that he had given the cargo to the wreckers, as he wanted the brig; that he was going to put his guns on board of her, and destroy his schooner;" "that he further told the deponent that the wreckers were to pay him something handsome, and that the deponent believes that they did so; that deponent was obliged to accept the wreckers' terms at the port of entry, because the brig lay under the guns of the privateer, and the Authorities declared their inability to protect him."†

the Emily Fisher proceeded on his voyage.

It is admitted, in a memorandum inclosed in a despatch from the Acting Gover of the Bahamas of the 17th of February last, that "from inquiries which have been recently instituted, there is very little doubt that the statements contained in the deposition of Captain Staples are substantially correct, so far as they relate to what took place in Fortune Island." It seems not improbable indeed that the Authorities may have really been unable to afford any protection to the master of the Emily Fisher, the place being a small port in a remote island. The Magistrate, Mr. Burnside, who was at this time absent, speaks in his report, quoted above, of his inability to take action against the supposed Captain Case, "even if he had been armed with power." The Authorities, in Mr. Burnside's absence, probably consisted only of the Customs Collector, and perhaps the "Assistant Magistrate," mentioned in Sampsen's affidavit. It does not, moreover, appear how far Mr. Staples made them acquainted with what had happened previously to the arrival of this vessel at Long Cay.

The question of the capture of the Emily Fisher, as I have already said, seems not to have formed the subject of any complaint up to the lime of the present arbitration, and all the information that appears to have reached the Government at the time is contained in the following passage of Mr. Burnside's report, which shows no trace of any improper proceedings having been committed or tolerated at Long Cay:—

"I have heard from Long Cay that the Retribution, subsequent to the affair of the Hanover, captured an American brig in the neighbourhood of Castle Island—the Emily Fisher, with a cargo of sugar—that the Commander of the Retribution ordered her to be run on shore near Long Cay, and that subsequently she was extricated from danger by the wreckers, who carried her to Long Cay, where salvage was awarded to the wreckers, and a portion of the cargo sold to pay the salvage and expense, and the Emily Fisher then proceeded with the balance of her cargo to New York.

"On this latter occasion the Petribution did call at Long Cay, and some of her officers had communication with Mr. Pichard Farrington, and at that time the supposed Washington Case was seen on board of the Retribution; but I do not know in what capacity."

There seems no ground whatever for saying that either in respect to the Hanover, or to the Emily Fisher, any charge of want of due diligence can be sustained against the British authorities.

The Retribution remained at Long Cay, according to the evidence afterwards given by Mr. Farrington at the trial of Vernon Locke, not more than a day.¶ Shortly before the end of February she arrived at Nassau, where it must be remembered that none of her previous proceedings were at the time known to the Authorities. It is stated in the Argument of the United States that—

"The 'special leave' called for by the British Government, under date of January 31, 1862, seems never to have asked for or granted. Her commander was not even called upon for his commission. All that occurred upon her arrival is thus stated by the pilot: 'She had a small gun on deck. The captain

The Retribution.

Here the quotation ends, but the deposition of the pilot, when referred to, is found to continue as follows:—"1 then told him he could not go into port. We rounded to immediately, and came to anchor;" and the pilot goes on to say that the captain came on shore in his boat.†

And in the evidence of Mr. Taylor, at that time the Acting Receiver-General at Nassau, given afterwards at the trial of the Etta, it is stated that "the Retribution did not enter as a trader in the port of Nassau, she was treated as a Confederate vessel of war." It seems obvious, therefore, that her character was verified and the necessary permission obtained before she was allowed to enter the port. This view receives additional corroboration by the notice inserted in the "Bahama Herald" of the 28th of February, to the following effect:—

"The Southern gun-boat Retribution put in here on Thursday last for the purpose of undergoing repairs, if permitted to do so by his Excellency the Governor. She has since been condemned, and is to be sold at public auction on Monday." §

The vessel was, as is stated in this announcement, condemned as unseaworthy by a board of survey. Her hull was sold on the 3rd of March, 1863, for 250l., to Messrs. Perpall and Co., merchants, of Nassau, there being at the time no regulation to prevent the dismantling and sale of belligerent armed vessels in British ports. By Messrs. Perpall she was again sold for the same sum to a Mr. Thomas Stead, who was at the time a clerk to some parties engaged in the blockade-running trade. by him she was registered on the 10th of April, 1863, as a British vessel, under the name of the Etta, and it is said that an attempt was made to run the blockade with her, but failed. In June 1863, she was again sold by public auction to the firm of Renouard and Co., of Nassau, who, having bought her for 158l. and repaired her at a cost of 200l., sent her with a cargo of fruit to New York, where she was seized, libelled in the District Court of New Jersey, and ultimately adjudged as forfeited to the United States.

This terminates the history of the Retribution. Into the steps taken by the authorities at Nassau for the punishment of the principal offender, it is scarcely necessary to enter in detail, as they do not affect the acts previously committed by the vessel. They are briefly as follows:—The first information received by the Governor as to the sale of the cargo of the Hanover at Long Cay, was given in a letter dated the 11th March, 1863, from a Mr. Jackson, Agent at Nassau for the American underwriters. The Retribution had at this time been sold to private owners, and although it was said by Mr. Jackson that the officers of that vessel were residing in Nassau, the Attorney-General was of opinion that the facts as related were not sufficient to render the parties eriminally liable. §§ A further representation was made on the same subject in April 1863 by the United States' Government through the British Minister at Washington. Inquiries had in the meanwhile been made by the Governor on the advice of the Attorney-General, which led to the report of the resident Magistrate, Mr. Burnside, dated April 20, 1863, of which I have quoted some passages. This report rendered it clear that the pretended master of the Hanover had been guilty of forgery and personation, and the Attorney-General received in the following month information pointing to Vernon Locke, then in the Colony, as the guilty person. As the witnesses were all at a considerable distance, the ordinary process of obtaining sworn information on which to found a warrant would have caused considerable delay, the Attorney-General therefore availed himself of the power given him by a local Act, and issued a precept to the police magistrate at Nassau requiring him to issue a warrant against Locke. || The latter was accordingly arrested, and, after a long examination, was committed for trial, but escaped, forfeiting his bail. He was, however, re-arrested and brought to trial; but the evidence being insufficient on some of the essential points, he was finally acquitted.

Cases in which Great Britain has been held responsible. I have now gone through the cases of all the different vessels in respect of which claims have been preferred for losses sustained through the alleged want of due diligence on the part of the British Government. After all that has been said and written, it is only in respect of two vessels, both equipped at the very outset of the civil war, and before the contrivances resorted to had become known by experience, that this Tribunal, which has not shown a disposition to take too indulgent a viow of the fulfilment of neutral obligations, has been able to find any default in British Anthorities at home; while, in respect of a third, the Tribunal, by a majority of one voice only, has fixed the Government with liability for an alleged error in judgment of the Governor of a distant Colony in respect of allowance of coal, and for the want of vigilance of the police in not preventing men from joining a Confederate vessel at night. We have here the best practical answer to the sweeping charges so perseveringly brought against the British Government and people.

The Tribunal having thus settled the instances in which it is prepared to hold Great Britain responsible, we have next to consider the important question of damages.

As to the award of a sum in gross.

The first question which presents itself on approaching the subject of pecuniary compensation is, whether the Tribunal ought to award a sum in gross, or whether it would be advisable to refer the amount of compensation to be settled by assessors under the provisions of the Treaty of Washington. On the one hand, as it is admitted that these claims have never been audited, or even been bond fide examined, by the Government of the United States, it must necessarily be extremely difficult to estimate the amount which should be awarded in respect of them; more especially as it becomes apparent that a large proportion of them are most extravagant in amount, while none of the ordinary documents evidencing the value of shipping property or merchandize have been brought before the Tribunal. On the other hand, it is for many reasons desirable that the matters in dispute should be disposed of and settled as soon as possible, so as to put an end to all further disputes, as well as to avoid giving the opportunity, which would be afforded by sending the settlement to assessors, to invent fresh claims and present them from day to day before the latter. On the whole, I have come to the conclusion that, if the clearly inadmissible claims be rejected, and the extravagant claims properly reduced, justice may substantially be done by awarding a lump sum, and that the advantage of such a course would counterbalance the disadvantages which it no doubt involves.

Amount of claims.

The claims for individual losses, which were in April last advanced in the Revised Statement, amounted to 25,517,161 dollars; besides which a claim for "costs of pursuit and capture," exceeding 7,000,000 dollars, was preferred on the part of the United States' Government. To all which was superadded a claim for interest of 7 per cent. per annum from the times of capture until payment. These claims have, however, to be diminished by reason of Great Britain having been pronounced by the Tribunal to be liable in respect only for the captures made by the Alabama, Florida, and Shenandoah, and for those made by the latter only after her departure from Melbourne. On the other hand, the claims in respect of the other vessels having been rejected, the representatives of the United States, on the 19th of August last, presented new and increased claims to the extent of 2,150,000 dollars, so that the claims then advanced by the United States in respect of those captures, for which Great Britain has been held liable, amounted, after correcting certain admitted errors of calculation, to 19,146,444 dollars, over and above a claim of 6,735,062 dollars for the cost of pursuit and capture in respect of the three vessels and the claim of interest at the rate of 7 per cent.

Claims for cost of pursuit and capture.

I concur entirely with the rest of the Tribunal, in holding that the claim for cost of pursuit and capture must be rejected. This item of expense formed part of the general expense of the war. The cruizers employed on this service would, probably, have been kept in commission had the three vessels in question never left the British shores.

We have, therefore, only to deal with the claim for losses sustained by individua' Question of citizens.

Now there can be no doubt that the only damages which the Tribunal is authorized to award under the Treaty for the indemnification of American citizens must be confined to loss actually sustained by destruction of ships, cargoes, or personal effects. Where damage to property arises, not directly from wilful injury, but indirectly only, from want of due care, an indemnity against actual loss is all that, by the law of England or America, or by any principles of general jurisprudence, can possibly be awarded.

If, therefore, this Tibunel, instead of sending the amount to be paid by Great Britain to be ascertained by assessers, should think fit to award a sum in gross, as it is empowered to do by the Treaty, it must still, in fixing the latter, proceed on the best estimate it may be enabled to arrive at, on the data before it, of the losses actually sustained by American citizens through the three ships for which Great Britain is to be held liable.

The claims for individual losses by reason of property destroyed by the three ships in question amounts to the sum of 19,116,111 dollars; but this amount includes items which involve important questions of principle, and deserve special consideration.

These are:— (A.) The claims in respect of the whaling-vessels destroyed, for loss of prospective Dollars catch, amounting to

The claims for gross freights amounting to 4,009,301 1,007,153 The double claims, amounting to ... 1,682,243 (D.) The new claims, presented for the first time on 19th August, amounting to... 2,150,000 8.848.697

(A.) There can be little doubt that the amount claimed for the prospective catch Claims for of the whalers, which is, in fact, about double the value assigned to the vessels and their outfits, is so extravagant as almost to justify at once the rejection of the whole claim.

The true character of these claims will be seen by comparing the amount of the demands now made for the prospective earnings of the whalers, with the original list of claims forwarded by Mr. Seward to Mr. Adams in 1866, and communicated by the latter to the British Government. It thus appears that these claims have, without any assignable reason, increased to such an extent that they are now sometimes double, sometimes treble, and sometimes even more than five times what they were in the original list. The following Table exhibits some of the more striking cases:-

			Claims for Pro- spective Earnings in the Original List.	Six-ilar Claims in the i.evised State- ment presented in April last.
Alert Kate Cory Lafayette J. Howland	••	 ••	Dollars, 30,000 1,820 33,446 53,075	Dollars. 144,869 19,293 50,000 196,158

Many other similar instances of extraordinary and arbitrary increase might be cited, but the above will suffice to show (what, indeed, a mere comparison of the claims themselves with the value and tonnage of the vessels but too clearly proves), that these demands are of a most extortionate character. But, independently of the undeniably exaggerated amount of the claims, a demand for gross prospective earnings as distinguished from nett earnings is quite incapable of being maintained. This is admitted in the Argument of the United States, and is clearly demonstrated in the British Report. According to the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, the only allowance which ought to be made in respect of prospective catch is in the nature of interest from the time of the destruction of the vessel.*

I should myself be disposed to adopt a more liberal mode of compensation, and to award for prospective profits a reasonable per-centage on the values of the vessels and outfits; but I cannot but think that if a year's wages is to be awarded as proposed for the officers and crews, the amount of 25 per cent. on those values as claimed in the American Tables presented on the 26th of August, in case of the claim for prospective catch being disaflowed, far exceeds what is properly assignable. The total amount claimed for the whaling-vessels and outfits, an amount, which, as I shall presently show, bears every sign of great exaggeration, is 1,780,691 dollars. A claim of 659,021 dollars is advanced for secured earnings. To award a further sum of 400,000 dollars, as claimed, in lieu of prospective profits, would make a total allowance of over 1,000,000 dollars (or 60 per cent. of the original values of the vessels and outfits) for secured and prospective outfits alone; in addition to a sum of 588,000 dollars, or more than 30 per cent, more, for the wages of the officers and crew (which are supposed to come out of the gross earnings), and this irrespective of the fact of interest being claimed on the whole from the date of the capture.

Claims for gross freights.

(B.) As to the claims for gross freights amounting to 1,007,153 dollars.

That these claims are also greatly exaggerated appears from the several instances to be found commented on in the British Reports; but the same fact follows beyond a doubt from the following consideration:-

In a Report presented by a Committee of the House of Representatives of the United States in 1870 a Table is to be found (Table XVI) giving the value of the grass yearly earnings of all American vessels engaged in the foreign carrying trade from 1861 to 1870. The value of these gross yearly earnings is there stated to amount to 33\frac{1}{3} per cent, of the value of the vessels. On looking at the British Tables it will be found that the amounts claimed for freight, although for individual voyages not exceeding on the average six months in duration, are more than 47 per cent, on the alleged values of the vessels, from which it would follow that these claims are exaggerated to the extent of searly 60 per cent.

Independently, however, of the exaggeration in amount, it is clear that a claim for gross freight as distinguished from nett freight cannot be supported by any sound reasoning. It is, moreover, inconsistent with all the English and American authorities on the subject.* The United States' Counsel seemed to have themselves thought such a claim hopeless; for, on the 19th August last, they, for the first time, asserted that these were claims, not for gross, but for nett freights. It is sufficient on this point to say that, in the face of the well-known official estimate above referred to, according to which the gross average yearly earnings of American merchant-vessels arounted only to $33\frac{1}{3}$ per cert, of the values of the vessels, an assertion that claims amounting to more than 47 per cent. of such values were advanced for nett and not for gross freights on voyages not exceeding, on the average, half a year in duration, is one which carries its own refutation on the face of it, especially when it is remembered that these claims are generally presented in the Revised Statement as claims for charter-party or bill-of-lading

Under these circumstances I cannot but think that the allowance of 50 per cent. on these claims, which the Tribunal received with favour and is prepared to adopt, is far in excess of what would in justice satisfy them.

Double claims.

(C.) As to the double claims. They consist in the main of claims made by the owners for the value of their property, simultaneously with claims advanced by insurance companies with whom the property was insured, and who paid the owners the amount of their loss. To pay the owners and the insurance companies these double claims would be clearly equivalent to paying the losses twice over. One of these claims, therefore, must necessarily be rejected.

One cannot but regret that these claims should have been advanced, and that the United States' Government should not at once have expunged them as inadmissible, instead of allowing them to be included, without exception, in the total claims of the United States.

These double claims are of two descriptions: first, those which are avowedly and intentionally made, or where, to use their own words, "the claimants protest against any diminution of their claims by reason of their having been paid by insurance companies;" secondly, those which are tacitly made.

As regards the second class of double claims, viz., those tacitly made, it is enough to observe that they were pointed out many months ago in the British Reports as double claims, and the United States' Government, although it has had in its possession all the evidentiary documents bearing on the same, has never denied their character as double claims. It is, therefore, clear that all these double claims amounting to the large sum of 1,682,243 dollars must be struck out.

(D.) As to the new claims presented, for the first time, in August last.

As a majority of my colleagues have already intimated an opinion that these claims ought to be excluded from consideration in a arding a lump sum, it is only necessary for me to state that I am decidedly of the same opinion, because the claims are entirely unsupported by any evidence, and are merely based upon assumptions as to the amount of wages the officers and crews might or should have been receiving, and the amount of personal effects which they might or should have had on board at the time of capture, and which they have lost in consequence of it. I find, moreover, in the Revised Statement presented with the United States' Counter-Case, claims to considerable amounts actually preferred by the officers of some of the vessels for loss of wages and personal effects, and, as I shall show, those gentlemen have been by no means disposed to undervalue their property. Finally, it seems to me entirely inconsistent both with the letter and the spirit of the Treaty of Washington that, at the last moment, the request of the Tribunal for explanatory Tables to assist it in the discussion of the various items of claims should be taken advantage of to swell the amount already presented, without giving the British Government an opportunity to advance argument and evidence in opposition to such increase.

For all these reasons I am clearly of opinion that the claims for prospective catch and for gross freights, the double claims and the new claims presented in August last,

I now proceed to consider the questions relating to the value of the property Property actually descroyed. It is admitted in the Argument of the United States' Government destroyed. that these claims had never been audited by that Government. I cannot help thinking it would have been better if, before the United States called upon this Tribunal to estimate the value of claims to be assessed by it without an inspection of the documents which are said to be filed at Washington, these claims had been audited under the authority of the United States' Government. Had this been done I think it is only fair to assume that the very numerous demands which are manifestly extravagant would have been diminished in amount in the same manner as the claims in respect of the vessels sunk in the River Seine (more than once referred to in the British Reports) were reduced after they had been thoroughly sifted by Her Majesty's Government. The Tribunal is, in fact, called upon to estimate the values of vessels, the age and class of which are not given, and the values of cargoes, of which neither the description nor quantity is stated. Under these circumstances it is manifest from the experience every day gained in courts of justice, that a very considerable deduction ought to be made from the estimates presented by the claimants in respect of the losses for which they are claiming compensation. To hold Great Britain simply liable for the amounts demanded by the claimants would not be to award the latter fair compensation, but to grant them enormous profits.

I now proceed to consider the values of the vessels—and, first, the whalers. The Values of whaling fact of the extraordinary express double claims advanced in respect of these vessels is of vessels. itself sufficient to make one look with some suspicion on the other items of claim. I believe that the estimate of 100 dollars per ton for ship and outfit, proposed in the British Reports, is such as would be accepted as adequate by persons acquainted with the character and value of whaling-vessels. It is, moreover, horne out by the fact that the claims for insurance in the Revised Statement show that these vessels were not insured at so high a value.

But I am ready to refer to a standard given by the claimants themselves. I find that, ir 'he case of the fourteen whalers destroyed by the Alabama, with a total tonnage of 3,560 tons, a claim is advanced for vessels and outfits of 409,233 dollars, which is equivalent to a valuation of less than 115 dollars per ton. In the case of the whalers destroyed by the Shenandoah, on the contrary, with a total tonnage of 8,560, the claim under the same head amounts to 1,325,768 dollars, or very nearly 155 dollars per ton. I cannot see why the average value of the whalers destroyed by the Shenandoah should so vastly exceed that of those destroyed by the Alabama, and I certainly think the average in the latter case may be taken as likely to be more near the mark.

New claims.

Values of merchant vessels. As regards the merchant-vessels I see no reason to doubt that the British average estimate of 40 dollars per ton is adequate; but there is one mode of arriving at an average estimate which is open to no objection. It appears from the same Table, in the Report presented to the Congress of the United States already referred to, that the average value of American vessels engaged in the foreign trade was, in the year 1861, 41 dollars per ton, and that it has, since the year 1862, been 45 dollars per ton. It will be found, on looking at the United States' Argument, that it is there strongly neged that the depredations committed by the Confederate cruizers occasioned a very serious diminution in the value of American shipping property. This assertion seems directly opposed to the statistical information given in the Table I have just referred to; but whether it be or be not correct, it cannot be doubted that an estimate of the nearchant-vessels in the rate of 45 dollars per ton must be a very liberal estimate. The adoption of this valuation would cause the British allowance to be increased by 200,000 dollars, but it would cause the elain of the United States to be diminished by more than 500,000 dollars.

Claims for cargoes.

I now come to the claims for cargo. Those claims, it must be remembered, include claims for the value of goods, insurances, commissions, and profits on the same cargoes; profits which will be found to be claimed at the rate of sometimes 25, sometimes 50, and sometimes as much as 100 per cent. Moreover, it is important to observe that, as merchants generally considerably overvalue their property in policies of insurance, and always include in the amount insured the premium of insurance cits 12, a considerable reduction ought to be made from the amounts claimed by insurance companies. Again, for reasons fully stated in the first British Report,* it is generally impossible to trace the double claims which are advanced for cargoes; and yet the probability certainly is that they exist to at least as great an extent as they have been proved to exist in the cases of vessels and freights. Taking all these circumstances into consideration, I believe that nost persons who study these claims, and who are acquainted with the subjects to which they relate, will consider the reduction of 12 per cent. which has been made in the British estimate from the total claim for cargo, commission, profits, and insurances on the same, a very moderate reduction.

Claims for personal effects. The last item of claims to be considered is that relating to personal effects. That some of these claims are exorbitant is proved by the various instances cited in the British Reports. I will direct attention to a few of them.

Ebenezer Nye, the master of the Abigail, a whaling-vessel of 310 tons, has claimed upwards of 16,000 dollars, or 3,200l. for the loss of personal effects on board that vessel. Again, the master of the Rockingham, a vessel of 976 tons, has claimed for personal effects 8,054 dollars, or 1,600l. In the Winged Racer a passenger claims for loss of office as Consul 10,000 dollars, over and above 1,015 dollars for loss of personal effects. Finally, in the Crown Point, a vessel of 1,100 tons, the master and the mate each advance claims for 10,000 dollars. Excepting in these and some other similar cases, in which the demands are evidently grossly exaggerated, all the claims for personal effects have been allowed in the British estimate, and I see no reason whatever for adding to the amount which is proposed to be allowed in that estimate under this head.

On the whole, therefore, I am of opinion that if half a million dollars were to be added to the British estimate, more than adequate compensation will in all probability be granted for any direct losses which may have been occasioned by the Confederate cruizers, and that, therefore, the Tribunal ought to assess these claims at an amount not greater than 8,000,000 dollars.

In the observations on M. Staempfli's calculations which I submitted to the other members of the Tribunal on the 2nd of September, and which will be found in the Protocol of that date, I have shown that, even including the allowances of 988,000 dollars for profits and wages of the whalers, and the allowance of 50 per cent. on the claims for freights, and striking a mean between the British estimate and the gross claims for the other items not absolutely disallowed by the Tribunal, the sound should not exceed 10,000,000 dollars in round numbers.

Claim for interest.

The Tribunal arriog formed its estimate of the accordioss sustained in respect of ships and property at the time of their destruction, throat important question presents itself, whether, to such actual value, interest from the time of loss should be superadded. Upon this question, which is entirely in the discretion of the Tribunal, at the British average arriving at an average arriving at an average are Table, in the Report d to, that the average are year 1861, 41 dollars ton. sustained in respect of tant question presents loss should be superon of the Tribunal, according to what it may deem equitable and right under all the circumstances, we have had the advantage of very able arguments. Looking to technical considerations alone, Sir Roundell Palmer's argument appears to me to be unanswerable. But I confess I should be disposed, when able to deat with a case of indemnity, unfettered by technical considerations, as I think we may do in the present instance, to hold that where a pecuniary indemnity against loss is to be given, such indemnity is not complete unless the party is compensated, not only for the property actually destroyed, but for the profit—here to be represented by interest—which that property would have brought him. If a man loses property worth 1,000l., which, but for the loss, he would have continued to turn to some profitable account, and after a given period the actual value, namely, the 1,000l. is given to him, and no more, it is plain that he remains a loser of of all the profit he would have realized in the meantime; in other words, he remains to that extent unindemnified. Under ordinary circumstances, therefore, I should have been willing to award interest, when awarding compensation for property destroyed. But there are in this case most peculiar circumstances which make me incline to a different conclusion.

The first is, that neither the British Government, nor British subjects, were the authors of the damage done. All that can be ascribed to the British Government is want of diligence in not preventing these vessels from leaving British waters on their work of mischief. Professor Bluntschli has done justice to the British Government in

"Il ne faut d'ailleurs pas perdre de vue que tous ces effets désastreux sont en premier lieu imputables, aon pas au Gouvernement Anglais mais aux eroiseurs eux-mêmes. Personne n'accusera le Gouvernement Anglais d'avoir donné mission de détruire les navires de commerce Américains, ou d'avoir, par ses agissements, entravé ou endommagé la marine Américaine. Ce que l'on peut lui reprocher à bon droit (en supposant que les fiais cités plus hant doivent être considérés comme avoués ou prouvés), ce n'est pas un freit, mais une omission contre le droit. Sa faute ne consiste pas à avoir équipé et appareillé les corsaires, mais à n'avoir pas empéché leur armement et leur sortie de son territoire neutre. Mais cette faute n'a qu'un rapport indirect, et nullement un rapport direct, avec les déprédations réellement commises pas les croiseurs."

American citizens have suffered by the acts of American citizens. Great Britain is to make good the injury. Why? Because, in order to commit these acts, the wrong-doers began by violating her laws, and her Government was not quick enough in preventing them. But who were the American citizens who did these things, and brought these injuries and losses on American citizens? Private individuals? No! Eleven States, heretofore an integral portion, and now again an integral portion, of the North American Union—in other words, an integral portion of the body who are the Plaintiffs against Great Britain in this memorable suit. And, to make the anomaly of the position more complete, but for concessions voluntarily made, Great Britain would have been enabled to say, first, that she was not, and could not be, liable to another nation for losses sustained through breaches not of international but of her own municipal law; next, that if she, on the one hand, was liable for injury done to American citizens, because her Government by greater diligence might have prevented them, she, on the other hand, might have claimed to be recouped by States, now forming an integral part of the Union, as having been the actual wrongdoers through violation of her law, whatever sum she was obliged to pay as compensation.

For, had the Confederate States possessed, or had they succeeded in acquiring an independent nationality, Great Britain would have had a perfect right to insist on being indemnified for a pecuniary loss incurred through a violation by them of her neutrality and of her law. The nationality of those States is now again united with and merged in that of the United States, now plaintiffs against Great Britain. And though, the compensation being asked for losses suffered by individual American citizens, and not by the Government of the United States, Her Majesty's Government were, in my humble opinion, right in not taking their stand on such an objection, I cannot but think that, looking to all these circumstances, this Tribunal, in the exercise of the equitable and unfettered jurisdiction with which it is invested, might well decline to add interest to the amount of the loss actually sustained.

Even if interest should be given, it seems to me that, as the United States might have had, as far back as the year 1869, an arbitration for the purpose of having these identical claims adjudicated upon, an arbitration having been offered by Great Britain and accepted by the Executive of the United States, and having only failed because rejected by the American Senate, all claim to interest, as from that date, should, as matter of equity, be disallowed by the Tribunal.

At all events, I can see no reason why, under all these circumstances, anything more than the lowest rate of interest anywhere prevailing in the United States should be allowed, and I cannot concur in the rate of 6 per cent. adopted by the Tribunal.

Conclusion.

I have now travelled through the wide range of this inquiry, partly in order to place the facts, over which a cloud of prejudice has been raised, in their true light; partly to explain the reasons which prevent my concurring in the award which the majority of the Tribunal have thought it right to pronounce.

The result is that, while I differ from the grounds on which the decision of the Tribunal in the case of the Alabama is founded, nevertheless, owing to the special circumstances to which I have hereinbefore called attention, I concur in holding Great Britain liable in respect of that ship.

With respect to the Florida, on the best judgment I can form upon a review of all the facts, the charge of want of due diligence is not made out. I cannot concur in thinking that anything was left undone by the Government of Her Majesty which could be reasonably expected of them, or the omission of which can justly subject them to the charge of want of due diligence and carc. I cannot agree that the law of Great Britain should have been changed because of the breaking out of the civil war. First, because the existing law was adequate to all that could reasonably be expected; secondly, because, at all events, there was at the time no reason for believing it other than sufficient; lastly, because, even if the law might have been improved and the hands of the Executive strengthened with advantage, the United States could have no possible right to expect any amendment of the British law so long as their own remained unaltered.

As to the Shenandoah, I cannot express too strongly my dissent from the decision of the majority.

Not concurring in the decision as to the Florida and Shenandoah, I cannot, of course, concur in awarding the sum which is to be paid on account of the damage done by them.

Even if this were otherwise, I should still hold the amount awarded greater than it should have been.

Lastly, under the very special circumstances out of which these claims have arisen, it appears to me that the allowance of interest was uncalled for and unjust.

But, while the award of the Tribunal appears to me to be open to these exceptions, I trust that, by the British people, it will be accepted with the submission and respect which is due to the decision of a Tribunal by whose award it has freely consented to abide.

The United States, on the other hand, having had the claims of their citizens for losses sustained considerately weighed, and compensation awarded in respect of them, will see, I trust, in the consent of Great Britain to submit these claims to peaceful arbitration, an honest desire on her part to atone for any past errors or omissions, which an impartial judgment might find to have existed—and will feel that all just cause of grievance is now removed—so that, in the time to come, no sense of past wrong remaining unredressed will stand in the way of the friendly and harmonious relations which should subsist between two great and kindred nations.

A. E. COCKBURN.
